Beyond this milestone, probably just part of a kilometer further on, we have this bill which brings into doubt some of the beliefs we have had for a long time. The bill, in effect, says that we shall empower the Governor in Council to state that it will not be to the benefit and to the wellbeing of this country to export certain goods unless they are processed, fabricated or manufactured to a further state. Here we have evidence that we are beginning to stop thinking of ourselves as merely hewers of wood and drawers of water.

While going through the Toronto terminal II yesterday, which is something I must do in order to get to Ottawa, I went through one of the security mechanisms which the Department of Transport have installed to check everybody, including members of parliament. I noticed one of these mechanisms was a particularly handsome one and I stopped to look at it. It was made of wood, a commodity we produce in quantity in this country. But although it was made of wood, it was not made of wood from this country. It was made in Finland in a place called Kuopio, a marvellous community which I had the opportunity to visit last year.

This reminded me of a principle of economics, production and exports which the Finnish people have had now for some time. It is very simply this: no resource that is developed and produced in Finland is exported out of the country unless it is manufactured, processed or fabricated to the nth degree. This is not the first time, of course, that we have had products of wood made from wood grown in Finland arrive in Toronto. Somehow the Finnish people are able to produce lumber and sell it at competitive prices in Toronto, in a country which if it has nothing else at least has a lot of wood.

I agree that the principle behind this bill is very good because I think we are beginning to tell ourselves two things. First, the more we can put into a product in terms of skill, effort and intelligent work, the more our return will be from it. That is fairly obvious. The other thing we are beginning to learn is that the most important aspect in the production of a resource is not the wages we gain through the production of the resource, not even the profits that the exploiting companies make in developing the resource, and indeed not even the taxes that we can gather from taxing the profits of the exploitation of that resource. The most important aspect of the production of a resource is the end use. Who is it in this world who will benefit ultimately from the use of the resource which we produce? We are now beginning to see the light, that the end use of the product is the most important aspect of the production of that product. We are now beginning to see the light and tell ourselves, very slowly I grant, that perhaps it is not to our benefit to try to flog all of our resources on the world market, but that perhaps it is to our benefit to put Canadian needs first.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) made the point, very effectively and succinctly, that we have to begin developing an industrial policy for this country which will satisfy the needs of the people first. One of the absolutely essential notions behind an effective industrial policy for Canada would be one that would insulate the people of Canada from the vagaries of the world market. They know this country can produce enough to satisfy their real needs.

We have all the right in the world to wonder, these days particularly, why it is that the prices of the goods we produce in abundance are getting beyond our reach. Perhaps the economists, those practitioners of the dismal science, may try to explain how it is that a commodity they produce in abundance can be priced beyond their reach; but the good people of Canada, in the main simple, direct folk, will refuse to understand that kind of casuistry, and they will be absolutely right. They, along with many other people and some people in this House, are beginning to understand that what we must do in order to develop an industrial policy to satisfy Canada's needs first is to begin attacking two of the great unquestioned tenets of our industrial economic philosophy in this country. The first is that we must export whatever we can not only to survive but to thrive; the second is that in order to have wellbeing we must have economic growth.

Some members of this House may say that what I am saying is absolute heresy. I can understand that they think this way, because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) stood up a few weeks ago in this House and said that the ultimate objective of the economy is to create jobs. What utter absurdity! Surely the ultimate objective of the economy is not to produce work but to produce wellbeing, in the same way as the objective of the exploiters of the resources or commodities of a country is to produce satisfaction and wellbeing for the people living in that country, not simply to flog the resources as quickly as possible for whatever profit can be made by the exploiting corporations.

I will end by making one single observation, and it is this. In the history of this world, those countries whose economies have tended to have a large export quotient have been the poor countries. Conversely, generally speaking, those countries which were wealthy were countries which had developed and well balanced internal economies which consumed the major part of their production. Many small countries in this world, countries which we call underdeveloped, can boast of having a very high export quotient, but the higher the export quotient very often the poorer the country.

Because it is a step in the right direction, I support this bill. I would be in favour of seeing the bill define the powers that are listed. It would be much more clear and perhaps indeed should be mandatory. But nevertheless it is a small step, and perhaps the first light of the dawn of a new day. I think that in a few years from now, maybe 25 years or so, Canadians will wonder how practically the entire population of the country could have accepted as an article of faith the thesis that a total drive for ever greater exportation, particularly of unfinished goods, could have led to the wellbeing of the people of this country. As I say, because it is a step in the right direction I am glad to lend the bill my support.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it seems to have become quite a habit with those members who apparently still support the government that every time a bill comes before this parliament they say: Let us have the question, let us have closure immediately and get on with something else. I do not know what they think the purpose of parliament is if members are not given some opportunity to debate a bill such as Bill C-4.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We have heard your speech before. It is the same speech.

Mr. Stevens: This is a new one. Yesterday evening when I spoke on another bill I mentioned that we had already indicated to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) that if he wished to bring this bill forward we would give it a speedy passage and not delay it. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) indicated that we were willing to see this bill go to committee and that we support it in its broad outline. But that does not mean that the members of my caucus or any other member of the House should be denied the right to speak on this bill. I say that because I think it is unfortunate, for example, that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was not in the House to introduce the bill although the acting minister made a good presentation.

I think it is particularly relevant to point out that the report that we are proposing to amend in this bill has not yet been tabled in the House of Commons. I am referring to the report that is required by section 26 of the act, which provides that as soon as practicable after the 31st day of December of each year the minister shall prepare and lay before parliament a report on the operations under this act for that year. I have checked with the library and I find that the report has been received well before that date every year for the past five years. I did not go back any further.

It is a very full report. In 1972, for example, the report consisted of 13 full pages. I think it is very informative regarding exactly what has transpired under the act in each of the years under review, and it is regrettable that the report is not before the House as we consider the amendments before us. I urge that the acting minister contact the department to see whether it could be tabled tomorrow in order that, as the debate continues, we could have the advantage of it.

In dealing with the 1972 report, to show the impact of this act I think it is relevant to point out that the report gives a statistical summary of the export permits processed during 1972. In that year, applications received for export permits totalled 10,633. In the same year, the officials issued 10,024 export permits. They refused 431 applications and cancelled 81 export permits. Also they handled 2,321 import applications, and 2,287 import permits were issued. There were 315 applications refused and six import permits cancelled. There were 528 import certificates issued in 1972.

I mention those figures to indicate that this legislation is relatively important; and I suggest that if the amendment contemplated to Bill C-4 is passed by the House, the legislation could well become much more important than it has been in the past. In fact, when I hear that the NDP are almost enthusiastically in support of this legislation, I wonder if it should be reviewed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That was said by the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Stevens: I wonder if there is something in the legislation that I have not noticed, although I feel that it would have far reaching effects if applied to the export of various resources from Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PUBLISHING—INTENTION OF HOUGHTON-MIFFLIN TO EXPAND INTO CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, on April 15, as reported on page 1420 of Hansard, I asked a question of the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) designed to elicit his response to the announced intention of the American publishing house of Houghton-Mifflin Incorporated to locate a branch plant in Canada. The question was motivated by the very clear evidence that the Canadian publishing industry, for a variety of reasons, is in imminent danger of collapse and that foreign intrusion into the Canadian market will hasten that collapse.

It is odd that on the day when this House has given second reading to a bill designed to protect Canadian football we should be discussing the future of the Canadian book publishing industry, without any stated governmental guideline beyond the minister's professed belief that "a substantial portion" of the industry should remain in Canadian hands. That is a statement which he admits is subjective in the extreme and which cries out for definition, a definition which is not forthcoming.

Without in any way suggesting that the continued existence of the Candian Football League and the annual Grey Cup spectacle is unimportant or that they are not an expression of Canadian culture, I venture to state that the continued existence of an independent Canadian book publishing industry might be of at least equal importance, and that the incursion of Houghton-Mifflin into the Canadian market constitutes a danger to the independent Canadian book publisher equivalent to the danger presented by the World Football League to the CFL, and that action of equal vigour is required.

The final report of the Ontario royal commission on book publishing outlines clearly on page 51 the way in which Canadian owned publishing houses have been damaged by the establishing of subsidiary companies in Canada. I quote:

> Most non-Canadian publishing houses are branch plants of long-established British or American houses that first sold their books here through Canadian publisher-agents. We have been reminded frequently that representation of foreign principals has always been an important prop to the creative side of our country's publishing industry; we have also been told that such agencies face many problems. We have come to think that one of these must be that if a Canadian publisher agent does not succeed in selling his principal's books he may lose the agency, but if he sells them too successfully he may lose the line anyway, when his principal decides to open up here on his own. After all, the foreign publisher says, my books are being purchased by bookstores, schools and libraries across Canada. Why should they be promoted and billed in the name of another publisher, perhaps half-heartedly (he may suppose) alongside a number of lines other than my own? It's hard enough to earn a single profit in book publishing; it is even harder to earn two profits—one for an agent and one for a principal. And if original publishing is what is wanted in Canada, he rationalizes, all the more reason for me to open up there so that I can do my share of it.

The commission outlined the advantages that each subsidiary company possessed in its competition for the Canadian market. I again quote:

> —the momentum of the backlist of its own parent company; the fact that it enjoys "a cost advantage" . . . as overwhelming as the economics of this advantage are easily explained, "the international momentum of information and promotion (which) favours imported books," and "the size and sophistication of its sales organization".

The extent of the problem is even clearer when one looks at the Ernst and Ernst reports finding that 65 per cent of the books sold in Canada were foreign publications and a further 10 per cent were adaptations of foreign publications. Small wonder then that the Independent Publishers Association on March 21 wrote to the minister in the following vein:

> "It has just come to the attention of this Association that a new subsidiary American publishing company is in the process of establishing itself in Canada. the company involved is Houghton-Mifflin, one of the larger U.S. publishers.

"We wish to see this company prevented from setting up here and would ask that you and your officials intervene directly. Already the strength of the subsidiary companies, largely on the basis of their imported titles, is far greater than that of domestic firms. If your objective of seeing that the majority of the industry becomes Canadian-owned and controlled is ever to be achieved then the entry of any new subsidiary firms must be prevented."

It is a well known fact that the Canadian book publishing industry is on the verge of collapse. Increasing cost of fine paper are hastening that process; the locating of yet another foreign publishing house in Canada may well further accelerate the process of collapse.

We are acting on football. We have acted in respect of Canadian ownership and content in the electronic media. We have legislation which attempts to support the growth of Canadian periodicals. Why not the book publishing industry? The Independent Publishers Association suggests as immediate measures that, and I quote:

No further takeovers of existing (Canadian) companies should be allowed, and existing branch plants should be prevented from expanding by adding new agency lines.

They further recommend to the minister in their letter of March 21:

As part of a policy for the development of a domestic publishing capacity the entry of new subsidiaries in the future should be prevented.

These measures are admittedly negative in character, but they are designed to meet a crisis. If I had time, I would add to them the five suggestions which I made in a speech reported in Hansard for February 16, 1971. However, time does not permit. I would ask the government at this point what action it intends to take and when it intends to take it.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I very much share the hon. member's interest about this particular issue. I obviously share his confessed concern for the viability of the Canadian publishing industry. He referred to the speech I made to the Canadian Book Publishers Association in January where I said at that time on behalf of the government that a major segment of the publishing industry in Canada should be Canadian-owned. I think the arguments are clear and are shared by members of this party and of the hon. member's party.

I also pointed out to him in response to his question that up to this point the measures we adopted were measures of positive support to Canadian-owned publishers and that this was one means of ensuring a viable Canadian publishing industry.

As far as the particular issue of Houghton-Mifflin is concerned, I have received one brief, on April 7 I think it was, from the Canadian Book Publishers Association and I received another brief on April 22 from the Independent Publishers Association. Both expressed the same concern about the implications of the expansion into Canada of Houghton-Mifflin.

Since receiving these briefs, I have been in touch with the Ontario government and it is my hope that we will be able to explore this question jointly and co-operatively. The discussions on the question and its implications will be continuing.

The Canadian Book Publishers Association specifically recommends that a screening agency be established to review the possible establishment in Canada of new foreign-based publishing houses during what has been described as this delicate period. This possibility is receiving serious consideration in my department.

Traditionally, the interests of such screening or review agencies have been exclusively directed to economic and business oriented questions. It is my view that this should be expanded to comprehend cultural interests as well.

POST OFFICE—PROPORTION OF EMPLOYEES WORKING ON MECHANICAL SORTING DEVICES RECRUITED FROM WITHIN SERVICE

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, it had been my intention to raise certain matters which are of concern to me with regard to the Post Office Department this evening. However, in view of representations which have been made to me by the minister with regard to the nature of progress in the postal strike itself, I have agreed not to raise those matters which I had intended to raise this evening.

I wish to ask the Chair for assistance in this regard, possibly to permit me to raise the same subject at a later date when negotiations will not be at such a delicate stage.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's request, of course, will be granted. His position on the list will not be prejudiced by his forbearance this evening.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

FLOODS

PRAIRIE PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I request the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity. The devastating effect of the unprecedented floods in the western provinces upon thousands of prairie residents and municipalities is now clearly recorded. Federal and provincial authorities, and the people themselves, are fighting to contain the damage. There are joint federal-provincial partial compensation programs which will come into effect after the floods recede and the damages are assessed in each and every particular case. However, there is an urgent and pressing necessity for a program of immediate financial aid to carry these thousands of citizens through the crisis—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate the importance and urgency of the matter to which the hon. member is referring, but perhaps at this point he would come to the motion he proposes for the consideration of the House.

Mr. Murta: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will get to my motion. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the government, out of moneys available in the contingencies or other fund, provide immediate interim financial aid to the citizens and municipalities suffering financial hardship and loss from prairie flood conditions; and, in view of the devastating and unforseeable force of these floods, be prepared to supply additional financial aid to the prairie provinces over and above the present federal-provincial disaster compensation scheme.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

BEEF PRICES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I seek the consent of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion arising from the continued uncertainty in the matter of beef prices and the urgent need for a statement on government policy in this regard. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney):

That this House direct the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to make an immediate statement on motions with respect to beef prices.

Mr. Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY RELOCATION AND GRADE CROSSINGS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43 that may bear some striking similarity to the motion the hon. member for New Westminster endeavoured to introduce yesterday. In view of the fact Bill C-27 will permit the federal government to aid in the relocation of railways, the rerouting of rail traffic and the improvement of rail safety and security at railway grade crossings, and in view of the fact that this assistance is desperately needed by all Canadians, particularly, I might say, within the Sudbury riding, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais):

That consent be granted by this House for the passage of all stages of Bill C-27 today.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, we are in favour of moving this bill forward quickly but it should be done in the proper way by the government through the House procedures. Why did they turn down our motion yesterday?

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Leggatt: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I should like to correct the obvious misunderstanding of the House leader for the Conservative Party in indicating that the motion presented yesterday to the House was from the Conservative Party. That motion was moved by me and was from the New Democratic Party which is very willing to see Bill C-27 pass all stages right away.

GUINEA-BISSAU INDEPENDENCE

Question No. 7—Mr. Rowland:

What measures has Canada recently taken in an effort to persuade Portugal to grant independence to the country of Guinea-Bissau and the other African territories which Portugal claims as its own?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Canadian government has expressed its conviction on numerous occasions that Portugal should grant self-determination to all its African territories. This viewpoint was conveyed directly to the Portuguese Foreign Minister during the December 1973 NATO Ministerial Meeting in Brussels. The Canadian attitude was repeated in very clear terms during the recent sessions of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

DIPLOMATIC RECOGNITION OF GUINEA-BISSAU

Question No. 9—Mr. Rowland:

Is it the intention of the government to acknowledge, through diplomatic recognition or other means, that the country of Guinea-Bissau has effectively achieved independence from Portugal and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Canadian practice is to grant recognition to sovereign states which have governments able to exercise effective control over the territory which they claim to represent and who are able to discharge their international obligations. The Canadian government is prepared to recognize Guinea-Bissau when the Canadian Government is assured that these criteria have in fact been met.

[Mr. Bell.]

UIC—PRESENCE OF THIRD PARTIES DURING INTERVIEWS WITH CLAIMANTS

Question No. 238—Mr. Ellis:

Has the Unemployment Insurance minute 69-121, regarding attendance of third parties during interviews of claimants by investigators, been certified by the Deputy Minister of Justice?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Unemployment Insurance Commission Minute 69-121 is the record of an administrative decision, which does not require certification by the Deputy Minister of Justice. Solicitors of the Department of Justice are consulted on all matters having legal implications and the commission has been advised that there is no legal objection to following the practice adopted.

MR. MARTIN O'CONNELL

Question No. 407—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Has Mr. Martin O'Connell, principal secretary to the Prime Minister, attended or appeared before any groups, meetings or gatherings of any kind in the constituency of Scarborough East in the past six months and, if so, what were the locations, dates, times of day, purpose and nature of each such occurrence and by what specific person in government was each authorized?

2. On any of these occasions, did Mr. O'Connell show or display to those present, pictures of the Prime Minister, including pictures of the Prime Minister's visit to Communist China and, if so, what was the general subject-matter of all such pictures, by whom were they taken, by whom were they supplied to Mr. O'Connell and what is the name of the specific owner?

3. Were any of these pictures shown in schools and, if so, what were the names of the schools, who were all persons involved in making arrangements for such showings and, in particular, who was the specific person initiating such gatherings in each case?

4. How many and which of these gatherings took place during normal business hours, was the Prime Minister aware of such gatherings and did Mr. O'Connell receive his usual government salary for the days on which they occurred?

5. Will the Prime Minister either instruct or permit Mr. O'Connell to undertake further showings of such pictures in (a) Scarborough East (b) elsewhere?

6. Has the Prime Minister been advised or made aware in any way that Mr. Martin O'Connell will resign his present position for the stated purpose of seeking the Liberal party nomination in the constituency of Scarborough East in the next federal election?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. Mr. O'Connell was appointed under Section 37(1) Public Service Employment Act, and is therefore a member of ministerial exempt staff. Meetings and gatherings he has attended in evenings and on weekends have not conflicted with the duties for which he was appointed and are his personal affair.

2, 3, 4. During school hours on two occasions and therefore during conventional office hours, Mr. O'Connell visited West Hill Collegiate Institute, Scarborough College, R.H. King Collegiate Institute, Sir Wilfrid Laurier Collegiate Institute and Woburn Collegiate Institute to give a talk on "Impressions of China" relating to his trip there in October, 1973. The talk was accompanied by slides taken personally by Mr. O'Connell showing the Great Wall of China, a Ming Dynasty tomb, the Forbidden City, traditional and modern modes of transportation, housing, a school, people in the streets and in the fields, the interior of various caves, scenery along the River Li and other scenery. Some pictures included the Prime Minister. In two instances, the arrangements were initiated at the request of students; and others by Mr. O'Connell. In all cases, arrangements were concluded with the school authorities. Mr. O'Connell is paid on a monthly basis without deduction for time missed during conventional office hours nor with any additional compensation for evenings or weekends worked.

5. The Prime Minister will leave the matter entirely to Mr. O'Connell's discretion.

6. See answer to question No. 2311 on page 5960 of Hansard for July 25, 1973.

TURKS AND CAICOS ISLANDS

Question No. 434—Mr. Howie:

Have any studies been authorized or completed concerning the amalgamation of the Turks and Caicos Islands with Canada and have the potential off-shore mineral and resource benefits of these islands in this region been considered?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The question of a political association of the Turks and Caicos Islands with Canada has been reviewed and a statement of the government's position on this matter was tabled in the House on April 10. No study has been made of the potential off-shore mineral or other resources of these islands.

CFB, GAGETOWN, N.B.—CONSTRUCTION ON EXTENSION TO COMBAT ARMS TRAINING SCHOOL

Question No. 451—Mr. Howie:

1. On what date is construction on the extension to the Combat Arms Training School facilities at CFB Gagetown, New Brunswick planned for commencement?

2. On what date is the tender expected to be called and what is the estimated value of the project?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. No date has been set for the commencement of construction on the extension to the Combat Arms Training School facilities at CFB Gagetown, as the development of the project is only in the preliminary stages.

2. In view of the above, the date when tenders will be called and the value of the project, cannot be stated at this time.

AIRCRAFT—NUMBER OF MILES FLOWN BY ARGUS, 1963-73

Question No. 535—Mr. McKinnon:

How many total nautical miles were flown by all our Argus aircraft, for any purpose, during each calendar year 1963 through 1973?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The Department of National Defence does not record or calculate distances flown by military aircraft in miles but in terms of hours flown. The following table gives the hours flown for the years in question and an approximation of the mileage based on an average true airspeed of 180 knots.

Year	Hours Flown	Calculation	Approximate Mileage
64–65	22,382	= 170 =	4,028,760 nautical miles
65–66	21,738	= 180 =	3,912,840 nautical miles
67–68	24,234	= 180 =	4,362,120 nautical miles
69–70	28,040	= 180 =	5,047,200 nautical miles
70–71	28,511	= 180 =	5,131,980 nautical miles
71–72	26,951	= 180 =	4,851,180 nautical miles

CBC—TV STATION IN SEPT-ÎLES

Question No. 579—Mr. Blouin:

With the completion of construction of the Telesat onshore stations in Sept-Îles and Fort Chimo, in the constituency of Manicouagan, on what date does CBC expect to have a television station in Sept-Îles with a French and an English network and is an extension of these networks planned east of Sept-Îles i.e. on the medium and lower North Coast?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the CBC as follows: The French transmitter CBST Sept-Îles came into service on October 23, 1973, but the construction of studios is dependent on the eventual acquisition of a site in that town. The French TV network will be extended eastward towards Rivière-au-Tonnerre next September. Revised applications for VHF channels at Natashquan/Aguanish and La Romaine have been forwarded to CRTC, together with an application for Baie Johann Beetz. In addition, the municipality of Blanc Sablon is included in the Accelerated Coverage Plan and a rebroadcast transmitter will be established there later. As for the English network, the CBC intends to submit applications to the CRTC in 1976 for the establishment of stations at Sept-Îles, Harrington Harbour, La Tabatière/Mutton Bay, St. Augustin/Saguenay, Old Fort Bay and Blanc Sablon.

PRACTICE RELATING TO CORRESPONDENCE WITH TAIWAN

Question No. 704—Mr. Cossitt:

Does the Department of External Affairs refuse to permit, or discourage in any way whatsoever, departments from corresponding on any kind of government letterhead when seeking information of any kind from Taiwan and, if so, who made such a decision and for what reason?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Secretary of State for External Affairs is responsible for the conduct of Canada's foreign relations and, through his Department, for official communications with foreign governments. As for Taiwan, the Canadian Government does not recognize the régime in question. The Department of External Affairs would not, therefore, approve any official communications between any department of the Canadian Government and the régime on Taiwan, and would not normally engage in such communications itself. This is in conformity with generally accepted international practice.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR RESEARCH INTO IMPROVED METHODS OF ADJUDICATING LABOUR DISPUTES

Question No. 707—Mr. Howie:

1. What are the terms of reference of any studies or research now under way by the Department of Labour into new and improved methods of adjudicating labour disputes as an alternative to strike action?

2. What are the names of those conducting the studies or research?

3. Are any of these people from outside of the Department of Labour and, if so, what are their qualifications to act in this capacity?

4. On what date did any such studies begin and on what date is an interim or final report anticipated?

5. Will such a report be made public?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): 1. There are no terms of reference as such. Departmental officials, through internal studies and discussions with labour and management, are exploring methods of impasse resolution in labour disputes other than strike and confrontation methods.

2. Research and discussions are being carried out by departmental officials.

3. N/A

4. Research of this nature is a continuing effort within the department, but studies of experimental negotiations and discussions with labour and management were accelerated following the railway strike.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 3, 4, 5 and 6.

COPY OF APPLICATION OF "NEW CANADA—TORONTO" RELATING TO MULTICULTURALISM GRANT

Motion No. 3—Mr. Hellyer:

That an Order of the House do issue for production of copies of the application of "New Canada—Toronto" in respect of the $18,000 grant announced by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism on October 3, 1973 and all correspondence to and from the government in respect thereof.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, these papers contain or refer to information provided in confidence to the department. Under the circumstances the hon. member may wish to withdraw his motion.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting my rights and the rights of all members of the House of Commons. The government of Canada, in refusing to make available the papers asked for in this notice of motion for the production of papers, is not complying with its own guidelines as laid down on March 15 of last year at page 2288 of Hansard.

More specifically, the papers and documents asked for do not represent legal opinions or advice provided for the use of the government. The motion does not ask for papers, the release of which would be detrimental to the security of the state. It does not ask for papers dealing with international relations, the release of which might be detrimental to the future conduct of Canada's foreign relations. It does not ask for papers that are private, confidential or not of public or official character. It does not ask for internal departmental memoranda. In substance, the papers asked for are not included in any of the categories which the government indicated to the House were amongst those that were considered privileged.

Furthermore, when these motions were under consideration at the last session of parliament the Minister of State in charge of multiculturalism (Mr. Haidasz) told me that a Mr. Michael McCabe had made the decision that these papers were privileged. An official from the office of the Secretary of State subsequently confirmed this information and added that the decision had been referred to Mr. Bernard Ostry who had concurred in the decision. It is obvious that the two ministers, the Minister of State in charge of multiculturalism and the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) are not concerned about the rights of parliament and in fact have been mere rubber-stamps for Messrs. McCabe and Ostry.

I have taken the trouble to look up the precedents going back 25 years and I would like to cite several in an attempt to establish a prima facie case of privilege. If Your Honour so rules, I would then be prepared to move a substantive motion based on the question of privilege.

The precedents go back to some examples in the twenty-first parliament. They are as follows: no objection was raised by the government to producing a copy of all correspondence passing between a Mr. Marion and the Department of Transport with respect to the construction of telegraph and telephone lines in Saskatchewan. Another Saskatchewan item met with no objection: correspondence in connection with a payment to a named individual under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

A typical example of the attitude of the government of the day can be found in the answer of the parliamentary assistant upon objecting to a motion for papers because it involved interdepartmental papers:

MR. CÔTÉ (VERDUN-LA SALLE): The construction we have to place on this motion clearly indicates that it has to do with strictly interdepartmental matters. Upon that ground it would be impossible for us to agree to the passing of the motion as it stands. If the hon. member has something else in mind, or if he would be satisfied with the tabling of communications to or from any external source, we would agree to the amending of the motion, and the passing of it as amended.

This emphasizes the willingness of the government to produce documentation channelled to or from sources outside the government.

On March 12, 1952, when some correspondence between the federal government and provincial governments and a farmers' union was requested, Prime Minister St. Laurent agreed to the motion with the usual reservation that the consent of the other governments involved was necessary, but there was no hesitation whatsoever in delivering the correspondence involving the farmer' union.

The same practice prevailed in the twenty-third parliament. The communications from outside sources were quite varied and were still easily produced. For example:

Motion No. 12—Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Public Works and any person or persons recommending or approving the dismissal of breakwater foreman in Charlotte county, since June 10, 1957.

The motion was agreed to. The government also agreed to release copies of all correspondence between any association, person and company and members of the government and/or Northern Ontario Pipe Line concerning requests for opportunities to submit tenders for some construction work.

No change in policy was recorded in the twenty-sixth parliament. The following motion was readily agreed to by the government. Again, the nature of the correspondence is unknown. The motion was:

For a copy of any correspondence between Mr. Vanden Heuvel of Goderich, Ontario, and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, or any officials of her department, since January, 1961.

The motion was agreed to. Communications from groups of persons seem to have been readily available:

Motion No. 161—Mr. Pickersgill: For a copy of the communication addressed to the Minister of Fisheries by the general secretary-treasurer of the Newfoundland Federation of Fishermen on August 24, 1961, together with the reply thereto of the minister.

The motion was agreed to. The same practice persisted in the twenty-seventh parliament. The government agreed to produce communications received from groups of persons. For example:

Motion No. 35—Mr. Dinsdale: That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence between the Clear Lake Cottage Owners' Association and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development during the current year.

The motion was agreed to. Here is another example from the same parliament. It seems that when individuals petition the government because of some complaint, their letters may be published. This is an example from the twenty-seventh parliament:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Fisheries and the owners of trawlers in Newfoundland involved in damaging cod traps or other net gear owned by inshore fishermen.

The motion was agreed to. There are many more examples from all parliaments, from the twenty-first parliament right down to the present time, which indicate very clearly the types of communications that are considered in the public domain and those that are considered privileged. The government went to the trouble last year to set out for the benefit of members of parliament those classes of documents which are considered restricted and the reasons for those restrictions. But the documents in respect of applications for grants from various government departments and letters in support of those applications for grants have been considered as public documents for 25 years at least.

It is my opinion that this is a fundamental change on the part of the present government, that the change in practice is a denial of the rights of the individual members of parliament and through them of parliament itself. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider the precedents. If Your Honour would like to take the question under advisement and make a ruling at a future time, that would be agreeable to me.

I would like you to consider the matter carefully because the responsibility of the Chair is not to protect the government, which should be capable of looking after its own interests, but to guarantee the rights of individual members of parliament and through so doing the rights of this honourable institution itself. I ask Your Honour to consider the precedents. If you should agree that this is a serious matter and rule that a prima facie case of privilege is warranted, I will then move that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: The point of order raised by the hon. member is not new. It has been raised many times in this session, in past sessions and in past parliaments. The question is whether a member seeking the production of documents is entitled to insist that those documents be tabled in spite of objection on the part of the minister who is opposing the production of the documents.

The hon. member has cited a number of precedents which indicate that in certain circumstances documents of the type which he claims should be tabled today have been tabled in the past when an order has been adopted by the House for the tabling of such documents. The hon. member, with his long experience in the House, will be the first to recognize that there at least are an equal number of instances in the past where documents have been refused by the government, and this on the basis of the Standing Order.

The Standing Order is clear and provides for four possibilities. When a notice is put on the order paper for the production of documents it can be, when called, adopted by the House, dropped, voted upon or, at the request of the member putting the motion or at the request of a minister, transferred for debate. Standing Order 48(1) is very clear on this point.

It may well be that the Standing Order is not properly drafted. It may well be that there should be a different procedure which would make it easier or more practical for hon. members to obtain the tabling of documents which they feel ought to be tabled or which they feel should be the responsibility of the government to table. But the Standing Order is there and it is clear. It says that there are these four alternatives open to a member presenting a motion or to the minister or the government in response to the motion. In this particular instance the minister refuses to table documents which the hon. member feels ought to be tabled. What the Chair has to do in such circumstances is inquire whether the member wishes to drop his motion—obviously the hon. member does not intend to do that—whether the House wishes to vote on the proposed motion or whether either the member who has put the motion or the minister or someone on behalf of the government wishes the motion to be transferred for debate.

As I say, it may well be that the procedure is faulty, that the procedure does not give effect to the kind of legitimate wish that the hon. member is suggesting ought to be the day-to-day practice in relation to this Standing Order. But the Chair, without wishing to protect anyone, has to interpret the Standing Order in the way it has always been interpreted, and that is that there are these alternatives open. If a minister of the Crown or the member proposing the motion asks that a motion be transferred for debate, I have no alternative but to accept that it be transferred for debate.

The point raised by the hon. member and the precedents he cited are interesting and are an indication that he has considered the matter seriously as it deserves to be so considered. It is the kind of very serious situation in relation to private members' business which I hope will be considered some day by hon. members, perhaps in the committee to which the hon. member referred. But clearly I have no authority except to ask whether it is the wish of the House to vote on the hon. member's motion or to have it transferred for debate.

Mr. Foster: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF APPLICATION OF "CROSS-CULTURAL COMMUNICATION" RELATING TO MULTICULTURALISM GRANT

Motion No. 4—Mr. Hellyer:

That an Order of the House do issue for production of copies of the application of "Cross-Cultural Communication Centre—Toronto" in respect of the $8,000 grant announced by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism on October 3, 1973 and all correspondence to and from the government in respect thereof.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, these papers contain or refer to information provided in confidence to the department. In the circumstances the hon. member may wish to withdraw his motion.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I think the minister shows terrible effrontery when he says this is privileged information. I reiterate that in my opinion this is a terrible abuse of the privileges of parliament by the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF APPLICATION OF "CENTRE CHINOIS DE QUÉBEC, ENR., QUÉBEC" RELATING TO MULTICULTURALISM GRANT

Motion No. 5—Mr. Hellyer:

That an Order of the House do issue for production of copies of the application of "Centre Chinois de Québec, Enr., Québec" in respect of the $5,000 grant announced by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism on October 3, 1973 and all correspondence to and from the government in respect thereof.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, these papers contain or refer to information provided in confidence to the department. In the circumstances the hon. member may wish to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF APPLICATION OF "BLACK YOUTH TELEVISION WORKSHOP, MONTREAL" RELATING TO MULTICULTURALISM GRANT

Motion No. 6—Mr. Hellyer:

That an Order of the House do issue for production of copies of the application of "Black Youth Television Workshop, Montreal" in respect of the $6,500 grant announced by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism on October 3, 1973 and all correspondence to and from the government in respect thereof.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, these papers contain or refer to information provided in confidence to the department.

Some hon. Members: Secrecy!

Mr. Haidasz: In the circumstances the hon. member may wish to withdraw his motion.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Since the information requested would obviously, in the opinion of Mr. McCabe and Mr. Ostry, be embarrassing to the government, I seem to have no alternative but to request that the motion be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Shall the remaining notices stand?

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE WORK STOPPAGE BY AIRLINE PILOTS—ACTION BY MINISTER—SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask the minister whether he is aware of the contents of the communications from the Airline Pilots' Association to Mr. Pratte of Air Canada indicating that the pilots may leave their jobs tonight at midnight? If so, what action, if any, is the minister taking in this connection?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I am aware of the request by the pilots. This is a problem, of course, for Air Canada to decide with the pilots.

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): It is a matter for collective bargaining with the company. There is no other way. The same negotations took place with the other unions, and Air Canada is now considering the request of the pilots. As soon as a decision is reached it will be communicated to the public.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the minister whether, in view of the very serious trouble which would be caused to the Canadian public if a walkout actually took place, he has considered proposing to the pilots' association and to Air Canada the intervention of a mediator before the walkout rather than after the walkout as in the case of the Post Office workers?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think that when there is a labour contract everyone in this House should agree that the labour agreement should, first of all, be respected. The labour agreement should be followed. If there is a grievance procedure provided, as there is in this case, that is the way the matter should proceed.

Mr. Lawrence: What about the people of Canada?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): In this day, sometimes it is the employees who have the advantage of having a mediator appointed and not following the agreement, and sometimes it is the employers. I believe that in both cases we should be ready to say: follow your agreement and we shall see, afterwards, what may be necessary.

Mr. Lawrence: What about the public?

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact that the distinguished parliamentary secretary indicated yesterday, I believe, that there was some difference of opinion between Air Canada and the flight attendants, in view of the possibility that there is a difference of opinion here, and recognizing what the minister says about the importance of collective agreements being followed and preserved—

An hon. Member: Do you remember the question, Bob?

Mr. Stanfield: I remember the question, and I am trying to keep in mind, too, the great inconvenience to the travelling public.

● (1430)

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the importance of the question I am simply asking the minister, not that he circumvent the agreement, whether he is considering some method of mediation in advance of the walkout with a view to bringing the parties together in the event of a substantial difference of opinion about what the agreement means?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I saw Mr. Pratte in Montreal. I asked him to do all he could in order to avoid the pilots going on strike tonight. I must underline that it is too easy just to talk about the effect on the public. We adopted those laws and, unless we decide to change them, each time there is a strike in public services there will be inconveniences. This is something which is in the very nature of our bargaining process.

LAY-OFFS BY AIR CANADA BECAUSE OF STRIKE—INTERPRETATION OF COLLECTIVE AGREEMENTS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Transport, agreeing entirely with the statement he made with regard to collective bargaining.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I do not belong to that group of members who support collective bargaining one minute and are against it the next.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would ask his question.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact these difficulties arise from an apparent difference in the interpretation of the collective agreements, will the minister ask Air Canada to stop acting in the way it has with regard to the pilots and others of its employees until the meaning of the agreements has been adjudicated upon through an arbitrator instead of placing its employees at a disadvantage and then requiring them to go to arbitration?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that what the hon. member for York South is saying makes sense.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The thing is that it happens that on the other side of the House there is one who knows what collective bargaining is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The problem is that some of the important unions in Air Canada formally accepted that in such cases, and there is no doubt in the agreements that they accepted, they would be laid off without pay. In what situation will Air Canada be placed if they pay those who are in the higher brackets and do not pay those in the lower brackets? This is what they are now trying to work out. It is quite a complicated problem. This is why I say it is easier to solve it just by a statement referring to the public interest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if I could—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. The hon. member for York South has the floor for the purpose of asking a supplementary question.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in the same area of work stoppages I wish to ask the Postmaster General whether he can make—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that, even though he says the question is in the same general area, it is hardly a supplementary. It may be a related question. The hon. member may wish to ask a question about another situation, but that is not really a supplementary. I am sure many other members will want to ask questions about the other situation to which the hon. member is referring. Perhaps he might allow the Chair to complete the first round of questioning.

BROADCASTING

DIRECTION BY CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION COMMISSION TO CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION TO REDUCE TELEVISION ADVERTISING

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Communications.

As some time ago the CRTC gave the CBC the order to reduce its televised publicity, which reduction would cost the government $40 million over the next four years, does the minister intend to call those two bodies before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications that this situation might be studied? If not, what measures does the minister intend to take with regard to that confrontation?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the allegations of the hon. member with regard to the cost of the implementation of the CRTC recommendations, I would say that for the time being neither the decisions of the minister nor his procedures matter, but the provisions of the law do.

The Broadcasting Act states that when a dispute opposes the CRTC to the CBC, first of all the two parties will meet, which in this case they have done twice already according to the reports I have been given and which they will do again, after which arbitration is imposed by the minister if the two parties have failed to reach an agreement. As for having the two parties appear before a committee of the House, the committee could doubtless so decide, but that is not the procedure provided for by the act.

Mr. Speaker: We shall revert to supplementaries to the first question asked this afternoon, and we may return to this matter later on.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Transport.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member—

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague from Drummond wishes to ask a supplementary question on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I ask the hon. member to resume his seat. I agree completely with him, but the hon. member for Drummond has risen and has not indicated that he wanted to put a supplementary question. At least, I did not hear him. If he is fully vocal this afternoon and indicates that his question is a supplementary, then I will recognize him, before I recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. The hon. member for Drummond.

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Communications.

In view of the fact that a recommendation to restrict advertising on television inevitably results in a deficit to be made up by government, and that deficit means that government will have to make an appropriation, is a Crown corporation or the CRTC entitled to put up the monies that would eventually be voted by the House?

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): From all evidence no, Mr. Speaker. The recommendations of the CRTC are only recommendations and not regulations.

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF PRACTICE OF LAYING OFF ONLY UNION EMPLOYEES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Transport. As Air Canada has a two class system for lay-offs, laying off only union employees, will the minister investigate this discriminatory practice?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is a practice which is practised all over Canada.

AIRPORT FIREFIGHTERS' STRIKE—RESULT OF VOTE ON TREASURY BOARD OFFER—POSSIBLE APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I also want to pose a question concerning the troubles we are having at our airports. In view of the fact that getting the firefighters back to work would help to restore normalcy at the airports, will the President of the Treasury Board give the House and the nation an up to the hour report on the results of the firefighters' vote to accept or reject the latest Treasury Board offer to the Public Service Alliance?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the president of the alliance had hoped that conclusive results might have been available to him by noon today. Such has not been the case. We are hoping for later today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have moved from one strike to another or one threatened strike to another. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a related question and then the hon. member for York South who also has a related question.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he has contingency plans for immediate application in hand to appoint a mediator in this dispute pending eventual settlement through arbitration? I have good reason to believe that an undertaking of this sort would have the firefighters back on the job—

● (1440)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. While the hon. member's question is being pondered the Chair will recognize—

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks whether we have a contingency plan to meet what as yet is a hypothetical situation. The answer is yes, and I think that the contingency plan will meet the requirements of those who have been making special representations.

Mr. Baldwin: It is like the budget; it is all hypothetical.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL WORKERS' STRIKE—PROGRESS IN MEDIATION OF DISPUTE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Postmaster General if he can inform the House whether discussions under the leadership of the special mediator, Mr. Eric Taylor, are continuing and whether any real progress is being made in those discussions?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the House that management and union representatives held discussions till one o'clock a.m. without arriving at a concrete result. They met again this morning with Mr. Taylor and the discussions are still going on this afternoon.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I note there are a number of supplementary questions. The Chair will first recognize the hon. member for York South, then the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, followed by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I realize that the Postmaster General would not want to deal with the details of the discussions and negotiations at this stage, but I wonder whether he could inform us with regard to the second part of my question? Is progress being made in those discussions or are they still in great difficulty and at an impasse?

Mr. Ouellet: According to the word of Mr. Taylor, Mr. Speaker, there is progress being made. They are working very hard to come to some concrete proposal for decision.

POSTAL WORKERS' STRIKE—MEASURES TO ASSURE DELIVERY OF SOCIAL SECURITY CHEQUES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Postmaster General what emergency measures were being taken to deliver social security cheques of all kinds across the country. Today I found out that in my riding and across the country pensioners and welfare people are queuing up not knowing where to find their cheques. Again I ask, what precise emergency measures are being taken by the government to make sure that welfare cheques, UIC cheques and pension cheques of all kinds are being delivered to Canadians?

An hon. Member: And milk cheques.

Mr. Grafftey: Will he tell the House exactly what is being done?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that in any case the pensioners' cheques are not to be delivered before Monday next. I can assure the hon. member that we have set up a plan to see that the pensioners will not be deprived of their cheques. I offered yesterday to show confidentially to the hon. member a document describing steps to be taken to assure the delivery of cheques. The member left the House soon after asking his question yesterday and I could not find him.

[English]

Mr. Grafftey: Oh, Mr. Speaker, this is a disgrace.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will, of course, recognize the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, but I would ask hon. members to give the House a chance to proceed with the question period. It seems to me we are spending more time on hooting and cheering than on questions and answers. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Grafftey: Will the Postmaster General inform the hundreds of people in my riding who are waiting for these cheques and cannot draw welfare, and who this weekend will perhaps not be able to pay for their groceries, what these confidential measures are—they should not be confidential—and indicate where they can get their cheques?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: The hon. member should well know that social welfare cheques are sent out by provincial governments. It has been announced again and again that the provinces will take steps to deliver these cheques to social welfare recipients. As to the old age security payments which we are responsible for, I ask the hon. member to try and understand that security demands that steps taken to deliver these cheques not be made public. The sum at stake ranges in millions of dollars, but if the hon. member is ready to offer some guarantee for it, I am willing to revise my position.

[English]

An hon. Member: Get your dog team out.

Mr. Woolliams: Tell the truth.

An hon. Member: Nonsense!

AIR TRANSPORT

AIRPORT FIREFIGHTERS' STRIKE—POSSIBILITY OF APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR IF TREASURY BOARD PROPOSAL REJECTED TO AVOID WALKOUT BY PILOTS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. It arises out of the widespread knowledge in Canada today that the airline pilots' situation could be straightened out very quickly if the minister would indicate just a little bit more clearly than he did a moment ago, in answer to my colleague, whether his contingency plan does include the utilization of a mediator during the interim period between the possible rejection of the proposal that has been offered the firefighters and the naming of an arbitrator to follow the arbitration procedure if in fact that is required. If the minister could give that indication we all know, including the Minister of Transport, that the Canadian Airline Pilots' Association would drop the matter immediately and there would not be any strike by them tonight.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, there are two possibilities before the government.

An hon. Member: To resign.

Mr. Drury: One is that the settlement agreed to by the union will be ratified, in which case we will have an agreement. The other is that the settlement agreed to by the union will be rejected, in which case we will apply for binding arbitration according to the terms of the law. During the process of waiting to set up the arbitration tribunal and the convening of it in order to undertake the case, the services of a mediator would be employed in an endeavour to resolve the differences existing between the two parties so as to make clearer and easier the work of the arbitration tribunal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Why didn't you say that the first time?

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUGGESTED LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE FOR SETTLEMENT OF LABOUR DISPUTES WITHOUT STRIKES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and relates to strike problems as well but is in a much broader sense rather than in respect of a specific matter. In view of the constant and continuing unrest on the federal labour scene where so few individuals can effectively disrupt essential services in this country, some illegally, which adversely affects every Canadian, can he advise the House whether he is considering over-all legislation which would by some alternative means curb this type of damaging strike, possibly in favour of some rational and satisfactory form of arbitration prior to the fact?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, because of the noise I missed the last part of the question but I think I do have the gist of it. As the hon. member knows, it was stated a few days ago by the President of the Privy Council that we have received two of the three parts of the report which has been prepared by Mr. Finkelman. This embodies suggestions and proposals which we will study and which may lead in the direction the hon. member is suggesting.

Mr. Jelinek: In that case, will the Prime Minister advise this House if he has instructed any of his ministers, possibly the President of the Treasury Board or the Minister of Labour, to make any specific or concrete recommendations to the cabinet regarding this matter and, if not, is he now prepared to do so?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Finkelman report recommendations will, indeed, be coming to cabinet through the President of the Privy Council. I repeat that we have not received the third part of the report, but it does deal with a very important aspect of labour negotiations in the public sector. When the previous government recognized the right to strike in the Public Service as one of the options, it was quite clear in our mind and in the public mind that this would not entail any condoning of illegal strikes, and this government wants to make sure that if anything can be done to prevent illegal strikes happening or to dissuade people from embarking on them it will do so.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

RETAIL BEEF PRICES—ALLEGATION WESTERN CANADIANS PAYING MORE THAN EASTERNERS—ACTION TO PREVENT INCREASES

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has he investigated the allegations made yesterday by the Canadian Cattleman's Association that western consumers are paying more for beef than eastern consumers and that the retailers are to blame?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I saw the allegations in the press just before coming into the House. I certainly want to have them looked into, especially if they involve questions under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister arising from the increases in the retail price of beef which have taken place this week and still further increases which are anticipated. May I ask the minister what steps he is planning to prevent these increases since the prices being paid to beef producers clearly cannot justify them?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, government policy is that it will be prepared to take appropriate action if there are reports from the Food Prices Review Board indicating that prices are unwarranted and in response to which the parties will not make changes voluntarily. I followed up on a suggestion of the hon. member for St. John's East and was in touch with the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board who confirmed to me that this subject is on the agenda for their meeting tomorrow. As I said yesterday, it could well be that there could be, as suggested by the hon. member, an interim report as a result of that meeting.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Témiscamingue, but an hon. member is rising on a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is this: on Monday I asked the minister whether he would investigate the matter to which I have just referred. He replied, as recorded on page 1626 of Hansard, that he hoped he would be able to give the House a report as soon as possible and certainly within a day or two. This is the second of the two days to which the minister referred. My point of privilege is that he has given an undertaking to the House which he has not lived up to.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think my exact words, and I stand to be corrected, were "a day or so". In any event, I have not yet received a report containing the kind of information sought by the hon. member, by myself and by other members of the House. In view of the importance of the situation, I think he would expect as complete and as full a report as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure we could have saved a few minutes if we had not gone into that question of privilege.

LABOUR RELATIONS

SUGGESTED ACTION BY GOVERNMENT TO PREVENT STRIKES AFFECTING ECONOMY

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the wave of strikes which is sweeping over this country, does the government intend to put an end to this throwing work out of gear, and by throwing it back into gear again, favour the development and progress of the Canadian economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian economy is doing just fine, thank you. The development of Canada can favourably compare with that of any OECD country. As far as strikes are concerned, the hon. member is aware of the law. I do not know whether or not he has any precise suggestion to make on behalf of his party. In case he has, let him put them forward and we shall have a look at them. I have just indicated, in reply to another question, that Mr. Finkelman's report was under review.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see to my left and to my right a large number of members seeking to ask questions. I think members might realize that many will be disappointed this afternoon. We have spent quite a bit of time on the first two or three questions and it will be difficult to have many questioners before the termination of the 40 minutes. For the moment the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary to the Prime Minister.

He asked me whether we had solutions to suggest. We certainly have. In this connection, can the Prime Minister tell us if the government is considering establishing a labour court and compulsory arbitration in labour disputes in public sectors, such as postal services, transportation, social affairs and health?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member seems to think that the right to strike should be removed from these sectors, Mr. Speaker. Unless I am mistaken, this is what he suggests since he talks about compulsory arbitration, thus assuming there is no right to strike. If so, the answer is no.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

AVERAGE RATE OF INCREASE IN EARNINGS AND INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that the underlying cause for so much of the industrial unrest in this country today is the runaway rate of inflation, can the minister tell us, particularly because the average rate of increase in earnings is substantially less than the increase in the cost of living, if he intends to do anything at all before the budget comes in about this serious problem?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the hon. gentleman's premise. He will have to wait for a complete answer until the budget debate.

ACTION TO CONTROL GROWTH

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. Can the minister indicate to the House whether recommendations have been made by him to the cabinet on proposals that would control the growth of the civil service and, if so, has his policy been ratified by the cabinet?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman will want to rephrase his question and not invite me to violate my cabinet oath.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Would the hon. member repeat the last part of the question, please?

Mr. Carter: Are any changes contemplated with regard to the operations of the Minister of Transport in Newfoundland and in the Atlantic area?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, not that I know of, Mr. Speaker.

POSTAL WORKERS' STRIKE—REQUEST FOR SPECIAL MEASURES TO ASSURE DELIVERY OF BLOOD SAMPLES

Mrs. Albanie Morin (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General.

Can the minister state whether there is a way or measures which could be taken for the delivery of 6,000 blood samples from newly born babies in hospitals in the province of Quebec? These samples are now held up in mail bags in Quebec City, and considerable harm will come to the babies if they do not receive appropriate treatment at the right time.

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, this example and, I believe, many others are a clear indication of the grave harm that can come from illegal strikes. I shall inquire of Quebec postal officials whether these samples could not be afforded special treatment, after agreement between postal workers and management in Quebec City.

REASON FOR CABINET NOT MEETING EXECUTIVE OF NATIONAL FARMERS UNION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Would he tell the House why the cabinet refused to meet with the executive of the National Farmers Union to discuss national agricultural policy? Is the cabinet out on strike?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet receives a great number of requests from various organizations that wish to meet with the cabinet. Some we see every year, some we see every other year. The National Farmers Union is in the latter category. We have told them that we will see them on a two-year basis.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: In the meantime, they have been invited to make their representations to a group of ministers headed by the Minister of Agriculture, and they will be making representations to our caucus if they have occasion to, as they have made them to the Senate Committee on Agriculture. It is not as though they are not having a hearing. The cabinet cannot meet on a weekly basis with every group in the country that wishes to meet with us.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Red Deer for a supplementary question, followed by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

REASON FOR CABINET NOT MEETING EXECUTIVE OF NATIONAL FARMERS UNION

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that executives of the National Farmers Union, which represents thousands of producers in the food industry in this country, are in town all week, and in view of the fact they represent thousands of independent producers, not the food processing industries and others, can the Prime Minister inform the House why his cabinet, in view of its meetings with the urban association last week, with the Canadian Labour Congress and many other organizations in this country, is not prepared to meet with the National Farmers Union which represents farmers from one end of Canada to the other?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this seems to be an exact repetition of a previous question. If the hon. member did not hear my answer, he might—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the right hon. Prime Minister—

That question was asked. I recognized the hon. member for a supplementary question. Perhaps he would like to rephrase the question, but we are running short of time.

Mr. Knight: In view of the fact that this meeting is not occurring between the government of Canada and the National Farmers Union, would the Prime Minister inform the House whether he is moving jurisdiction over the Canadian Wheat Board from the minister now in charge to the Minister of Agriculture in view of the fact the only reason this meeting is not being held is the vendetta of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board—

EGGS AND TURKEYS—STABILIZATION OF RETURNS TO PRODUCERS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I met again last night with representatives of the egg producers. We are trying to work out a satisfactory program for them. I cannot tell the House what that program will be because we have not finalized it yet.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

ISSUE OF PUBLICATION IMPLYING THAT NAME OF CAPITAL IS "OTTAWA-HULL"

Mr. Norval Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible to the House for the National Capital Commission. It arises out of a recent publication entitled "Canada's New Capital". Does the minister endorse the idea presented there that Ottawa is no longer the capital and the implication that the new name is Ottawa-Hull? Perhaps the minister could inform the House and the people of this country what is the name of our capital.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the particular brochure about which the hon. member asks was not authorized by me and I never saw it until last night. CONSUMER AFFAIRS

FOOD PRICES—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO CONTROL PROFITEERING

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the rapidly increasing cost of food and meat in particular, and in view of the strong possibility that some groups such as the packers may in fact be making excess profits which could be a factor in such increases in food prices, is the government considering giving the Food Prices Review Board or its equivalent power to roll back these prices where it is determined that such prices are the result of excess profits?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. There is just a minute or two left before the end of the question period. With the co-operation of hon. members we might be able to have a few more questions.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am glad somebody asked that question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I have said in the House before that we would bring in legislation to act against profiteering or those who are making undue profits, and in effect we will be giving first reading to that type of legislation in a very few days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: After I questioned the Postmaster General I left the House and I was informed by his department that unemployed people in my riding could go to the nearest unemployment office to get their UIC cheques. My question of privilege is that for the majority of the unemployed people in my riding, and in many ridings across the country, the nearest UIC office is 70 miles away. FISHERIES

OVERFISHING OF SALMON OFF GREENLAND BY DANES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries, though I would not want to interfere with the Prime Minister any time he wishes to leak part of the budget. Does the government have evidence of overfishing of salmon by the Danes off Greenland in open defiance of the salmon agreement in which the minister took great satisfaction? If this is so, what is the hon. gentleman's next move to be? Where does this leave the Atlantic salmon fishermen and the ban that was imposed?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): As to evidence, the answer is yes, we have evidence of overfishing. As to what we are going to do next, the Internationl Commission for the North Atlantic Fishery meets in June and we shall be dealing with the salmon issue at that time.

Mr. Bell: Would the minister get hold of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and persuade him to get tough with the Danes?

LOBSTERS—SUGGESTED CHANGE OF SEASON DATES BECAUSE OF ICE CONDITIONS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move to another species of fish. Is the minister aware that because of ice in the Gulf of St. Lawrence lobster fishermen are unable to lay lobster traps? Since this situation recurs from year to year, what action does the minister propose to take in future to change the dates of the lobster fishing season to suit these fishermen?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): We have changed the opening dates from year to year depending on natural conditions such as ice.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the usual question from the House leader of the Official Opposition, may I ask the government House leader, in light of the undertaking given to the House by the Prime Minister today, when we can expect the very important piece of legislation dealing with excess profits?

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING EXPORT OF NATURAL RESOURCE PRODUCTS AND LIMITATION OF IMPORT OF FARM PRODUCTS

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-4 to amend the Export and Import Permits Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, yesterday evening when I began to speak on the bill which is now before the House I said it was regrettable that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) had not seen fit to table the current 1973 report as required under the Export and Import Permits Act. I pointed out that previous reports have been tabled earlier in the year than this. This is certainly true of the last five years. I can be more explicit. In 1972 the report was tabled on March 3, in 1971 it was tabled on March 29, and in 1970 on February 12. In 1969, it was tabled on March 5 and in 1968 on February 18. These were all reports for the period ending December 31 in the year prior to their being tabled.

I draw attention to this shortcoming because I feel it demonstrates the haphazard, rather careless way in which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is running his department. Presumably as a result of my comments last night, the report for 1973 has now been tabled. Here we are, late in April, with a report just tabled, while in all the years to which I have referred it was tabled well in advance of the present date. This item of legislation proposing amendments to the act has been on the order paper for some time now. Surely the least the House can expect is that the minister should provide the relevant reports under the act within a reasonable time after the end of the year.

The main comment I should like to make today is this. While we are in agreement with the principle of the legislation, we feel this is a measure which cannot be taken lightly. If the minister is correct in saying it is simply enabling legislation and that there is no immediate thought of utilizing the provisions we are being asked to put into the act, we can, of course, all be more relaxed. On the other hand, from what we hear from the other wing of the government—for example, from the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent)—we suspect there may be much more in the amendments than most of us read into them.

This is what the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby said, as reported on page 1684 of yesterday's Hansard:

> We are gradually inching our way toward some kind of resource management policy by means of amending an act which was originally passed to deal with trade in armaments.

He went on to say, as recorded on the same page:

> What we need, and I want to assert this now, is an extension of the two-price system beyond these two commodities to a whole range of other commodities. I will list some of them before I suggest in a general way what the benefits will be from such a program for the people of Canada. I should like to suggest that a two-price system, one for export and one for import, be applied to energy resources—oil, natural gas, coal, uranium and hydroelectric power. In metals, it should include, copper, lead, zinc, gold and silver; in non-metallic minerals, gypsum, salt, asbestos, phosphates, and forest products, including lumber.

I suggest that the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or, preferably, the minister himself on his return, should rise in his place and declare unequivocally the government's purpose in introducing these amendments at the present time. Is it simply enabling legislation, as we have been told? Does the government have no immediate plans to impose export controls on any commodity, or is this bill being eased through the House in a relatively quiet way when in reality it is legislation introducing a two-price system in respect of commodities we produce?

This is an important issue and I think there ought to be extensive debate on it. As I say, there seems to be some conflict between what the official government spokesman tells us about the intent of this bill, and what the unofficial spokesman for the government says—that it is a bill introducing a two-price system into the country. These views should be reconciled and clarified. I say this because on reading section 3 of the act one understands the true import of what the amendment is doing. The section states:

> The Governor in Council may establish a list of goods, to be called an Export Control List, including therein any article the export of which he deems it necessary to control for any of the following purposes, namely:

At the present time the only items that are cited are certain arms items. The act can also be used to implement an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment which is an understandable power for the government to want to retain. The government also say that the act may be used to ensure that there is an adequate supply and distribution of such articles in Canada for defence or other needs. That is the present section, and the amendment that is being proposed is that certain items may now be included in an export control list. These items are referred to in the amendments before us.

Section 3 of the Export and Import Permits Act is to be amended by adding the following:

> (a.1) to ensure that any action taken to promote the further processing in Canada of a natural resource that is produced in Canada is not rendered ineffective by reason of the restricted exportation of that natural resource;

It is also proposed to amend the section so that the list may now contain this limiting provision, and I emphasize this:

(a.2) to limit or keep under surveillance the export of any raw or processed material that is produced in Canada in circumstances of surplus supply and depressed prices and that is not a produce of agriculture;

As hon. members are aware, there are two other sections. One deals with agriculture and the other deals with the termination of the present act.

I should like to deal mainly with section 3, the section that has triggered the belief of the NDP that this is in truth their two-price system coming into law.

We have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) undertake to meet the first item on the list of four presented by the leader of the NDP. The Prime Minister, I understand, proposes to introduce some more legislation with respect to the review board. I should like to know if there is any chance that this amendment, which was presented in a rather innocuous way, is in truth meeting the number two item on the shopping list of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), namely a two-price system with respect to materials that may be exported from Canada.

I say that because, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) pointed out in the House not too long ago, this is a much too complicated question to be treated in an offhand manner. I am not saying that there are not circumstances in respect of which some type of two-price system is required, but if we are going to a two-price system across the board, leaving it to the government to decide what may or should be included in that system without any reference to parliament, then I think the fear that the Minister of Finance had only a few days ago that we might trigger international consequences could be well founded.

I believe that we in Canada should never forget that exports, in relation to production in this country, represent 71.3 per cent of production. That is a fantastic figure if you review the world comparable figures. That figure is an increase over the 43 per cent for 1960 and 42.5 per cent in 1950. We have been rapidly expanding our exports in relation to production. To tinker with this vast field without due deliberation is exceedingly dangerous. The figure of 73.1 per cent contrasts with the case of the United States, where their exports are 14.4 per cent of total production. The U.S.S.R. has only 7 per cent of their exports in relation to production. We in Canada have almost ten times what the U.S.S.R. has.

When we start talking about a two-price system with respect to the exportation of our commodities, Mr. Speaker, we are really talking about a two-price system in relation to our trade with the United States. We should bear in mind that such trade is very much a two way street. For example, according to the American figures, in 1973 our trade with the United States hit $17.8 billion in exports and our imports from that country were $15.1 billion. As I indicated during the famous football debate, there is a $2.5 billion transfer of invisibles that makes the difference in our trading pattern with the United States.

What I want to indicate is that we should not treat this question of tinkering with our trade patterns very lightly. I could refer to the fact that 21 per cent of the total United States export trade and 26 per cent of their import trade is with Canada, for example. This is the magnitude of the subject we are dealing with. When we deal specifically with the United States I think we should bear in mind that they rely to the extent of 87 per cent of their requirements on imports of bauxite from foreign sources, asbestos 81 per cent, chromium 100 per cent, cobalt 92 per cent, manganese 95 per cent, nickel 90 per cent, platinum 93 per cent, tin 100 per cent, and tungsten 44 per cent. That is the dependence of the United States on such import items. As I have pointed out, many of these items in gross export-import terms come from Canada.

I urge hon. members to consider these amendments. I would appreciate it if the minister, upon his return, would enter the debate and tell us frankly what he has in mind in the amendments that he is proposing. I think he should satisfy us that he is not trying to do something rather quietly that he does not have the courage to have a full debate on.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I am not turning down categorically the suggestion of a two-price system. What I am saying is that I think it is time that this government was more candid with members of this House and with the people of Canada. If they intend to introduce some policy, let them be explicit and elaborate on it and then let the House judge whether it is worthy of our endorsement.

I think it is most disturbing that we are asked to deal repeatedly with odds and sods of legislation without any over-all industrial strategy or plan for the control or utilization of the resources of this country. This government is obviously drifting and is responding only to whatever prodding it happens to get from the NDP. This is a sad way to run the country.

I think it is time for members to dig in their heels and tell the government that it is not good enough to give us these little bits of legislation, that they claim are designed to serve some purpose, without giving us some over-all approach or strategy as to how they can operate both economically and in the resource field in the coming years.

In the past year the administration of this act has become more harsh than it has been in previous years. From a report I received just a few minutes ago, I notice that the number of applications for export and import permits has gone up. Of 20 suspected violations of the Export and Import Permits Act which have been investigated, charges are being laid in seven cases.

There was a conviction in one case; the others have not been decided. This is the first time there have been so many prosecutions under the act. In committee we shall want to know why the number of prosecutions has suddenly increased. Why are people being convicted for contravening the act? I ask this as for many years there was little trouble with the administration of the act in the sense that few people committed infractions.

We want to see this bill go to committee. We are dealing with a highly technical field. Although this debate is all very well, in the final analysis many of the questions which we feel proper to consider can only be dealt with in committee. We shall reserve our judgment until we have heard the evidence which may be produced before the committee. After that we can decide what will become of this proposed legislation.

I say this particularly as the bill seeks to eliminate the termination date of the act, which otherwise would expire on July 31 of this year. The minister proposes that deadlines for extension periods be abolished and that the statute be permanent. His reasons may be right. He told us yesterday why he thinks this legislation is justified. Our spokesman, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), thought his reasons were acceptable. We want to hear the minister's reasons confirmed in committee, and to that extent we agree that the committee should review this bill and, in so doing, try to determine what is the real thinking and planning behind the bill.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to place on record some thoughts on Bill C-4 which has been brought forward partly to repeal section 27 of the Export and Import Permits Act which is due to expire in July, 1974, and to make amendments to the regulations.

This relatively innocent law has not been made use of too often in the past. It was first enacted to control the export of munitions of war, so it is quite understandable that export licences were required under the act. We are now entering the era of the two-price system. GATT regulations, trade regulations and traditional tariffs which protected industry and which at least had the advantage of being visible and consistent are being replaced by export and import permits. So I think it behooves us to consider this legislation carefully. Certainly it can be effective in bringing about a two-price system, as happened with oil.

This bill is a further example of government interference in the export market. It is an attempt to control and direct the export market for our producers and, of course, to control the importation of products, particularly food, the existence of which on our market could be considered inimical to our producers. This is largely an anti-trade bill. Obviously, it will increase the possibility of non-tariff trade barriers being erected in the rest of the world.

It is interesting to speculate on the export control list which will permit the cabinet to restrict the export of any natural resource produced in Canada if our national policy requires further processing of the product in this country. That, I think, has been brought in as a reaction to the comments of the leader of the NDP, who suggested in October, 1972 that we should slow down resource development and protect future Canadian jobs by requiring that resources be fully processed in Canada in the future. In addition, the NDP leader called for the government to put export and price controls on steel, lumber, some building materials, some minerals and some food products. The response of the February 27 throne speech was an amendment to the Export and Import Permits Act to provide the government with better means for stabilizing the Canadian market. Although such controls have been imposed on wheat, to some extent on feed grains and on oil, they have not been imposed on other commodities.

I now want to comment on the inherent philosophy of these amendments, as they affect our trading with the world. Recent wild fluctuations in commodity markets made a two-price system seem attractive for us, but I am not so sure it is the answer to our difficulty. Consider what happened on commodity markets this past summer. As an editorial in Country Guide put it:

> To understand what happened . . . you've got to go back to 1970 when the U.S. and Canadian governments increased the money supply at more than twice the rates required by actual growth in gross national production. The inevitable result was inflation and subsequent devaluation of the dollar on international money . . .
> . . . the U.S. delayed devaluation by forcing foreign governments to build up huge holdings of U.S. currency and Japan ended up owning billions of U.S. dollars. When Japan realized it stood to take a terrible drubbing because the dollar was in deep trouble, it looked for a way out. World commodity markets offered an escape.

The commodity futures market normally offers buyers and sellers protection against price swings. Producers know in advance what they will receive for their products and manufacturers want to lock in prices for commodities they will need in future. Speculators who neither produce nor consume but try to make money by trading normally provide enough trading volume to allow the market to work in an orderly and efficient manner. Most of the time this system works quite well.

In 1973 things got out of hand. The huge Russian purchase of United States wheat mopped up world wheat surplus. Japan began to realize it could protect itself against the imminent dollar devaluation by buying commodity futures. In addition, the American practice of holding down interest rates to unreasonably low levels made it cheap for foreigners to borrow money with which to speculate. What happened? The price of soybeans went almost through the roof, and when the price settled, there was a marked change in price levels. That action prompted this government to impose export regulations in this country. During the soybean crisis we put flax and rapeseed under the export permit regulations.

The problem is that it is fine for us to restrict exports when it is in our own interests to do so, but we become terribly upset when other nations have the same idea, sometimes with much more national reason than we. The whole premise of the import-export idea is that it is better not to trade under certain circumstances. Furthermore, the use of import-export controls sets up a chain reaction that does not stop with the initial action by the government concerned.

With the behaviour of the commodity market last year and the sudden demand for soybeans, the price went skyhigh. The Americans put a ban on soybeans which was equivalent to our export ban. We in turn put a ban on the export of oil seeds from Canada. What happened? It brought cries from countries in the world which depend on our rapeseed and American soybeans. We were accused of withholding supplies and being unstable suppliers by the traditional importers around the world.

At the present time soybeans are plentiful. This is partly because Brazil is entering the export market with large amounts of soybeans to take over that portion of the market the Americans lost.

Let us take a look at what happened to the North American beef situation. Here again we have export controls on beef. The freeze on prices in the United States last summer caused the feedlot operators to withhold their cattle from the market. The supply dried up and the price went up. However, there was no price restriction on imported beef from abroad, so the Canadian beef was drawn off and the price rose. This caused a reaction from the Canadian government and a ban was placed on the export of Canadian cattle. This is an example of where the export control is working.

The ban was not selective in that it stopped the export of the traditional feeder cattle from the west to the United States and caused chaos in the western market. I know of one instance where a feeder moved his operation from southern Manitoba to the Dakotas because of this ban. He stayed there.

At the present time, with the drop in the American consumption of meat, especially beef, of between 20 and 30 pounds per person, and with both the American and Canadian beef population at a very high level, the beef producers are again in trouble, particularly with the high price of feed grains.

We responded with banning American beef by the convenient use of DES as a means of justification. This has caused comment among the American trading people. They have talked about retaliation. I understand there will be a meeting in Calgary with the officials of the two countries to try and iron out the difficulties so that this import-export ban in which we both indulge may be settled. If not, we can look for the complete separation of the cattle industry in the North American market.

In the long run, the net effect of preventing the flow of meat products across the border will mean higher prices for Canadian consumers without any corresponding benefit to Canadian producers. Like the auto pact, the meat industry is largely an exchange. If we are going to prevent this exchange, we can expect dislocation. An example of this is hogs. I understand bacon is exported in large quantities and hams are brought in to balance. This is not a bad idea.

Use of export-import controls causes many problems. Use of an export control to determine what products will be exported certainly raises many questions. It really implies that some government official in Ottawa acting under the authority of the minister will have to make decisions about which he is not particularly cognizant. They will be complicated. He will not be familiar with all the problems. The further you get from Ottawa the more you realize that decisions are made by government officials who do not have proper knowledge of the real problem. Fortunately, they may not be that important to the country; however, they are often very important to the individual.

What criteria will determine at what level the state of manufacture of a product has to be? It is also necessary to decide what natural resources are to be affected by export restrictions. That really means that regions of the country can be discriminated against with impunity. This raises several questions. If natural resources cannot be exported in what is considered a desired form, should they be exported at all? An example might be wheat.

Many years ago we had a thriving flour export along with the normal exports of wheat. This has dropped way down. Developing countries and other countries are grinding their own wheat to be made into flour. If we stopped exports of commodities that are not fully processed, we would not export any wheat.

This raises the problem at what level we should export. I agree with the hon. member who just spoke that this is a question of trade. If we do not export, we will not be able to import. It raises the whole question of our stance in world trade. Are we to share our resources with the world, or do we keep them only for our own use? If we restrict our trade with the world and the total volume of trade breaks down, will international anarchy and wars result? There are feelings that the resources of the world should be pooled, at least to some degree. For example, should the price of oil be allowed to rise, causing great consternation in the developing countries?

The purpose of trade is to allow political units to have effective use of each other's products. When trade breaks down, standards of living fall correspondingly. Obviously the use of import and export permits is a trade barrier, and in many ways these permits have considerable disadvantages over tariffs.

Since coming to Ottawa I have been interested in studying tariffs, which I never thought were a very good idea, as opposed to quotas. We now have the export and import means of changing trade. I find that tariffs have at least one advantage. They are visible, and an importer or exporter can survey them and assess what can be done in the way of trade in his particular circumstances. However, trade plans become much more vulnerable and uncertain when at a minute's notice the cabinet can disrupt and cause cessation of any normal trading pattern.

Import and export controls should not be undertaken lightly. Perhaps tariffs have a place with regard to the control of goods going out and coming in. The use of quotas often brings better results than the use of any import or export regulations.

At the present time we are debating the relative value of a two-price system. Let me cite an example in respect of wheat. We are selling some 60 million bushels of wheat within the domestic market for considerably less than it is being sold for in world markets. What does this mean to the producer? It means he gets somewhat less than the world market price, and as a consequence his ability to produce is restricted by that amount. We all realize that the Americans, who represent one of our main competitors in the export of grain, do not have this situation, and in this way they are better equipped to penetrate and capture world markets than are we.

What is the situation in respect of the production and processing of minerals? We have had a two-price system on copper for a number of years, with the result that the price returned to the producer is obviously a combination of world and domestic pricing. So the producer receives less than he would if the copper was sold on world markets alone. What is the answer? The answer is that he does not work the ore bodies at the lower level which he might work if he was receiving world market prices for his copper.

Conservationists suggest we should be using all our low-grade ore and low-grade crude in the old fields. It is a well-known fact that if the price of oil rises high enough a great deal of crude can be extracted from our old fields and used. Presumably this is a wise conservation practice.

I certainly feel that the two-price system is bad in the long run and should only be used under certain special circumstances; otherwise the situation will remain as though the world price was prevailing both in and out of the country.

I think Canadians who are dependent on trade cannot divorce themselves from the world situation. They must expect to receive world prices and to pay world prices for what they consume. In that way Canadians will enjoy the highest standard of living possible; and I think it is because we have accepted our place in world markets that we do enjoy our present high standard of living.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take part in the debate on Bill C-4, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act. I find the amendments offered in this piece of legislation extremely interesting. While the bill is not very extensive, we find that the proposed new first paragraph would permit the Governor in Council to restrict the exportation of any article that is a product of a natural resource of Canada or where national policy requires the further processing of that product in Canada.

The explanatory note then goes on to suggest that the proposed new paragraph would permit the Governor in Council to restrict the exportation of raw or semi-finished materials, other than agricultural products, produced in Canada in circumstances of surplus supply and depressed prices. I think this is a very welcome change. Let me point out that this party has for years been pressing governments at the federal level to bring about policies which would ensure that we manufacture a larger percentage of our raw materials within the confines of our own country than we do at the present.

There is no doubt that Canada is a great trading nation, and to the detriment of the Canadian economy we have in the past relied too heavily on the export of raw materials from the abundance we have in this great nation. We now see, in 1974, as we have for a number of preceding years, extremely heavy unemployment in Canada. While we are wealthier than we have ever been, and while in terms of export trade we have never shipped as much to other countries as we are shipping now, we have an increasing growth in our unemployment rates.

Let me give hon. members an example. It just does not make sense to rip out our non-renewable resources and get rid of them, often at fire sale prices, without looking to the future and planning what to do about the industrial future of this nation. One of the weaknesses of both Liberal and Tory governments in the past few years has been the lack of an industrial strategy for this nation. The old philosophy has been to dig out the raw material and get rid of it at any price.

I do not think anyone will question the suggestion that for every worker you have in the extractive industries—and let us take mining as an example—there is an increasing number in those industries which process the raw materials into finished products; that the further down the line you go and the more refining you do in the manufacturing of products, the more labour intensive the industry becomes and the more men and women are hired to do the job.

Let me take hon. members back to British Columbia where I live. We have a vast copper resource in British Columbia. Practically all our copper concentrates are shipped from the province to the United States and Japan. We do not even have a smelter to turn the copper ore into ingots which could be shipped. The establishment of a copper smelter in British Columbia would provide employment for an additional 1,000 or 2,000 people. Why should we stop there? Why do we not go a little further, for example in producing copper wiring or tubing? Again this would provide thousands and thousands of jobs for Canadians living in Canada, instead of the manufacturing taking place in some other country which ships the finished product back. This is faulty economy, and it is stupid on the part of government to allow this type of policy to grow and encompass Canada from one end to the other.

As I say, it is time we developed an industrial strategy for Canada which looks to the future and makes certain that we provide opportunities for those who will follow in the years to come. There is much more that could be said about the processing of raw materials in Canada and the need for Canada to nurture its non-renewable resources. These non-renewable resources are limited. The time will come when we will be in trouble unless we again take measures to ensure that there is a continuity of supply for future Canadian use.

Tied in very closely with this is another aspect of industrial development which is very important. I refer to the use of energy. Again Canada has not been too wise. We are in the export field so far as oil is concerned; over half of our oil is exported. We find that our reserves are low with just a ten-year supply left. When these reserves are exhausted we will have to start moving to the more expensive tar sands, and hopefully to the reserves in the north and in the east if they are found in sufficient quantities to warrant development.

In addition, we export vast quantities of natural gas. If we are to have an industrial strategy and industrial future in this nation, we must plan now. Because if we get into the field of extensive manufacturing, one thing is certain; we will need far more energy than we are using today. Again this is part of the over-all planning which is required by this government in this particular day and age.

A number of members have spoken about a two-price system in Canada. I am not opposed to it. I think a two-price system, for example for oil, is an excellent idea. I regret that we ever allowed the price of oil to rise above the $4 a barrel level to the $6.50 per barrel level which the government negotiated with the premiers of the various provinces just about a month ago. It seems to me that at the price at which we are selling oil in Canada, $6.50 does not represent the production cost of that oil. Even at the price of $4 at the wellhead in Alberta—and Alberta is the province with the largest amount of oil reserves since over 85 per cent of our supply originates there—the oil companies were making unprecedented profits.

For example, in the first quarter of this year we find that Imperial Oil increased its profit over the same period last year by over 100 per cent. This is a fantastic increase, and an increase based on the $4 level at Edmonton. Now the price has gone up to $6.50, and we will be seeing profits that will be difficult to believe made by all these oil corporations over the next few years. This again is part of the industrial strategy that is tied in with this piece of legislation.

There are several amendments to the act, but there is one point I should like to speak on very briefly because it affects a little company in my riding of Kootenay West. This has to do with an article which is imported into Canada. I should like the minister to take this situation into consideration because perhaps there might be a further amendment to the bill currently before us added at the committee stage. We have in Kootenay West a chainsaw manufacturing company which exports 85 per cent of its production to over 20 countries around the world. About 20 per cent of the total production goes to Europe, 10 per cent goes to countries on the Pacific rim, and the balance goes to the United States.

The total amount involved in the export of this product will exceed $4 million this year, which is a very substantial addition to both the economy and our total export of manufactured goods. Less than 15 per cent of the product content of this factory is of foreign origin. This company has been able to compete successfully with other manufacturers.

There is a problem, however, regarding the importation of certain components used in the manufacture of these chainsaws which I feel is both detrimental and unfair to this particular company. I refer to the type of pistons imported by the company for its chainsaw manufacturing operation. The real problem is that the class and kind categories upon which import duties are based seem to be far too broad in scope. There is some control in the class qualification but it is too broad in scope. Canadian manufacture of pistons is rather limited but because of this they are classified as being subject to duty. I am, of course, referring to the pistons imported by this company.

This chainsaw company recently put out inquiries to nearly 50 potential suppliers in Canada and found that the bulk of the piston production in Canada is captive to either their competitors or to people in unrelated fields. Those firms not captive are not properly equipped to make the product at the volume levels required, as they are either very small operations or oriented toward the replacement component field rather than the original equipment field. The quotations received for the tooling of these pistons ranged from five to ten times that quoted by the non-domestic suppliers, and the unit cost of the product offered runs from three to seven times that now paid to non-domestic suppliers. These price ranges make the product non-competitive in Canada.

The application of protective tariffs to cover Canadian manufacture which does not exist should be closely examined in view of the experience of this company to which I have referred. The final result, so far as this company is concerned, is that it pays a substantial import duty on certain components which it cannot obtain in Canada, which thus raised the end cost of the manufactured product which is sold primarily on the export market. Needless to say this makes competition in foreign markets that much more difficult.

I see no reason that the department cannot make changes to either the legislation or the regulations to meet this specific problem. Perhaps a yearly import permit, renewed annually, would suffice and still give protection to any Canadian company which might eventually become involved in this specific component manufacturing field. Until we reach that stage I am of the opinion that an import permit should be allowed this company.

There are other items which also are included in this unfair duty classification field. Examples could be shown of manufacturing equipment on which heavy import duties are levied although no comparable equipment is manufactured here. This is the reason I draw this situation to the attention of the minister and urge perhaps a more thorough overhaul of the act than the few amendments offered in this bill.

In closing, let me say I trust that the minister and the committee will take into consideration the points which I have raised, and I trust that they will be able to come up with some kind of amendment or suggestion which will at least alleviate the problem which this company in Kootenay West is experiencing. I want to say again that I believe the legislation is good, and it is my intention to support it, particularly in view of the restrictions which it will place on the export of raw materials to other countries. I trust that the department responsible will make certain that we will fully protect future Canadian interests so far as the export of our raw materials is concerned.

Mr. Dan Hollands (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill to amend the Export and Import Permits Act I should like to say that I am concerned about some of the clauses. I think they will certainly have to be studied in much greater detail and explanations will have to be given regarding some of them.

I should like to refer to clause 2, which reads as follows:

(a.1) to restrict, for the purpose of supporting any action taken under the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, the importation in any form of a like article to one produced or marketed in Canada the quantities of which are fixed or determined under that act;

According to the explanatory notes, section 5(1) of the act provides:

The Governor in Council may establish a list of goods, to be called an Import Control List, including therein any article the import of which he deems it necessary to control for any of the following purposes,—

Are we to understand from this bill that if there is a shortage of a product in Canada we will be able to control the import of this product into Canada? If we have a product surplus, such as is the case these days with pork, the domestic price of which has been driven down to a level which is almost disastrous for the industry, will that influence the export of this product to Japan? It has been the policy of the province of Alberta to go out into the markets of the world and try to find a buyer for many of our surplus agricultural products on a long term basis, based on the cost of production in Alberta.

I should like to refer to the recently signed agreements with Japan with regard to pork. The price negotiated in the last contract has been approximately 56 cents a pound, basis packers in Edmonton. The domestic price of pork is approximately 37 cents a pound. So we see that it is a real advantage to those farmers who are fortunate enough to have signed this contract to sell their product at a better price than they can get in this country. However, if in six months from now the position is reversed and we find the producers of pork not supplying the Canadian market, does that mean that we will have to limit our exports on the long term contracts which we have signed?

We might also consider the fertilizer industry. In my riding of Pembina there are two fertilizer plants, and there is another one in Calgary. The fertilizer plants are dependent on other markets than Canada, and there are many reasons for this. For a number of years, the price of farm products such as grain has been so low that it has not been economical for farmers to buy fertilizer. But all of a sudden, because of the increase in the price of grain, farmers now have money and are placing orders at the plants for fertilizer which will probably be in excess of their production. But if we curtail that export to the United States, we will damage the long term contracts which they have. We must also remember that the phosphorus rock which is used in the manufacture of fertilizer comes from Florida. I wonder what kind of a response we would get from that state if we were to forbid the export of fertilizer to the United States.

I should like to mention also rapeseed. When the government became so concerned last fall that there would not be enough protein in Canada, they put a ban on the sale of rapeseed. I cannot for the life of me understand why we would ban the export of a product that was in surplus supply in this country. Only a limited amount of rapeseed can be used in animal feeds. There is a type of acid in that seed which makes it unsuitable for livestock feed, and we could have moved it out of the country had we chosen not to limit its export.

To go to another matter—and I am sure this is a tragedy which the livestock industry in Canada will remember for a long time—let me point out that through no fault of their own the producers of beef have been put into the position of losing thousands and thousands of dollars. The House will recall that black Monday in September when the government announced that the controls on the price of beef would be dropped. There was confusion in all the markets in Canada and it was the first time in history that the public stockyards in Canada were closed. Imports were coming in on a day to day basis, and all of a sudden we used the DES argument to keep American cattle out of Canada.

I should like to say that in exceptional cases, such as in the case of beef when the deliberate action of another government caused problems which we now have in the cattle industry, some import controls are certainly necessary. I think that those controls should have been applied earlier so that the industry might have had an opportunity to adjust and perhaps partly rectify the international situation that has developed.

[Mr. Hollands.]

When we talk about imports and exports we must realize that Canada must be an exporting country and that we must be prepared to honour our long term commitments regarding the export of our products. Closing our doors one year and opening them another could only damage the long term prospects for the export trade upon which we depend so greatly. I hope this bill will receive careful examination in committee and that changes will be made in it to ensure there will be no restriction of production in Canada.

ENVIRONMENTAL CONTAMINANTS ACT

MEASURES TO PROTECT HUMAN HEALTH AND ENVIRONMENT FROM CONTAMINATING SUBSTANCES

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C-3, to protect human health and the environment from the release of substances that contaminate the environment, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-3 is an important piece of legislation. Passed into law it will become an important weapon in the government's armoury for dealing with pollution. Described as the Environmental Contaminants Act, it will set up a screening process. It will ensure that man-made substances will be checked out thoroughly before they are produced in this country and sold to an unsuspecting public.

We are, all of us, concerned about the quality of life. This new law will give the federal government the power not only to ask for, and get information about, substances which may be harmful to the environment, but also to take steps to control their use. Some products may also be banned. The idea is that artificial or unnatural substances should be spotted well ahead of time. They should not be sold in large numbers or vast quantities and broadcast around the country before we know what their environmental effects are likely to be. They should be checked over carefully before they are scattered around and before the cost of recovery and recycling gets out of hand.

Obviously we are moving into a preventative phase of our war against pollution. We are moving ahead of events rather than following in their wake. Bill C-3 is designed to stop pollution before it starts. Our new Environmental Contaminants Act will put us into the business of prevention rather than cure. We will not have to go around picking up non-degradable plastics after they have been produced and sold in their millions; we will make sure that they are not manufactured or imported in the first place.

With this new law on our statute books we shall be in a position to demand information, not only about substances already in use in this country but also about products in their early developmental stages as well. Data about their chemical characteristics, their biological qualities and their persistence in our natural surroundings will be assembled. Statistics as to how much may be sold and how these substances may accumulate in our natural food chain can also be collected. With this information, we shall be in a position to see whether the new substance, or family of substances, will have a harmful effect on our environment and on human health in this country. Its impact on our quality of life will be known in advance. It will be known before it is mass produced and before it gets into our natural environment in a big way.

This legislation, aimed at dealing with environmental contaminants before they contaminate our natural surroundings, has not been developed in a vacuum. We have been in close consultation with industry. We have also sought the advice of the provinces. Numerous changes have been made and a number of suggestions have been incorporated in Bill C-3 to make it more effective. There is a minimum of red tape involved. There is no overlapping with existing laws. Our new Environmental Contaminants Act will fill in gaps in existing legislation. It will backstop other laws, federal and provincial. It will round out environmental legislation in this country. It will also help government to work more closely with industry in the development of new products, the production and use of which is beneficial to all concerned.

If I may draw an analogy, the new Environmental Contaminants Act is akin to the screening of new kinds of foods and new kinds of drugs. Industry is responsible not only for developing new ideas but also for vetting them ahead of time. Government will call for certain kinds of tests to be made and industry must make them. Industry must pay for the testing procedures and it must produce information on the environmental consequences of these ideas or products which government will be insisting upon before they become commercially marketable.

Our basic policy in so far as pollution is concerned is that the polluter shall pay. In this case the potential polluter will pay for the screening of his products. He will include the cost of carrying out the necessary tests in the cost of developing the new idea or product he hopes to sell at some future date. Environment Canada personnel will give the manufacturer certain guidelines. They will outline procedures and set standards. But most of the scientific and other staff needed in the screening process will be employed in the private sector. Most of the equipment and most of the testing will also be done there. Government will have a hand in this screening all right, but the federal taxpayer will not have to foot the bill. The company or industry in question will have to meet most, if not all, of the expenses involved in this process, the main purpose of which is to prevent pollution from occurring in the first place.

I said earlier that we have worked closely with industry in this connection. The reaction from trade associations and individual firms has been good. Chemical companies, in particular, would like to have their products screened before they go to the expense of manufacturing them on a large scale, because the losses involved in their being banned at a later date are bound to be large. An early warning system is best not only from the public's point of view but from a corporate point of view as well.

What are we talking about here? We are talking mainly about artificial, man-made substances. We are talking about chemicals. We are talking about substances many of which have never existed on this planet before. We are talking about things which are either poisonous in nature or which do not readily break down in nature. If they are likely to accumulate in large quantities in the food chain and have ill effects not only on human beings but also on other forms of life, animal and vegetable, then they may be restricted or banned under our new Environmental Contaminants Act.

Perhaps I should go back a bit and give hon. members a few examples. Metallic mercury would have been dealt with directly under this legislation had it been in place in 1970 when we first found that this poisonous metal was escaping from our chlor-alkali plants. We used the Fisheries Act because mercury had a deleterious effect on fish. But mercury had a harmful effect on birdlife also and posed a serious threat to human health as well. As I say, we could have dealt with the so-called mercury crisis more effectively using Bill C-3, but the most effective approach would have been to screen mercury out of these various chemical processes ahead of time. We would have known about its effects in advance and we would have restricted or banned its use before, and not after, it got out into the air and into the local rivers and streams.

Phosphates in detergents constitute another case in point. When the Canada Water Act was being drafted—and that act deals primarily with the management of water in the physical sense of the word—a section was added to deal specifically with the phosphate question. We have cut back, progressively, on the phosphate content of detergents manufactured or imported for sale in this country. We have cut the content from 20 to 30 per cent to less than 5 per cent. This is in contrast to what has been done in the United States where, by and large, phosphates have not been limited and have had to be taken out at great expense to the taxpayer.

We did a lot of testing along the way. We made sure that a figure of 5 per cent or less would have a minimum effect on water quality in Lake Erie, for example. We drew up protocols for testing and we set standards. We called the industry in and we insisted, using these special sections in the Canada Water Act, on its cutting down on the phosphate content in our Canadian soaps and detergents. This we did in order to prevent the unnecessary fertilization or enrichment of our inland waterways. We saved our municipalities a lot of money because we did not put these enriching substances into our sewers in the first place. I am told that the capital cost saving in this case is in the order of 50 per cent. It shows the economic benefit of following the prevention rather than the cure approach to contamination and protection of the environment in this country.

If we had had an Environmental Contaminants Act back in those days we would not have had to add a few special sections dealing with phosphates to the Canada Water Act. In future we will be able to use either of these pieces of legislation in dealing with phosphates, but there are many other substances which are harmful from an environmental point of view. They are not covered in the Canada Water Act, and we need a broader piece of legislation to deal with them as they are developed and offered for our use in the future.

A third example is a group of compounds, the so-called chlorinated hydrocarbons like DDT. They are also chemical in nature. They are, most of them, extremely harmful from a biological point of view. We have to keep them under control. Many of them, environmentally speaking, should never see the light of day. Like the PCB's, they are a contaminant in the worst sense of the word. We should not allow them to be produced in any quantity. Certainly they should never be allowed outside the factory fence. They are an emphatic no-no, from an environmental point of view. They should be stopped in their tracks and a new Environmental Contaminants Act is needed to make sure they never leave the laboratory, let alone be produced on a pilot scale anywhere in this country.

Having given a few examples, I should now like to describe, in a more general way, what is meant by an environmental contaminant. Environment Canada, in requesting information about new products from chemical and other firms, will be asking about their chemical, biological and toxicological properties. It will be asking these firms about their persistence in the environment. It will be asking the firms to anticipate the way in which these new products or class of products will be dispersed in our natural surroundings. Environment Canada will want them to anticipate the manner in which they will be concentrated in some of our foodstuffs or in substances which are consumed by other living things. How might they be sold and with what limitation? Do they break down naturally and can they eventually be assimilated in our natural scheme of things? And, otherwise, what measures, if any, are being made for their recycling and recovery by industry?

We need this information urgently because literally hundreds of new chemicals are being introduced into our local environment every year. Some of them should be withdrawn; that is after the event. But many others can be intercepted in the future; that is ahead of the event. It is the ahead of the event operation which our new Environmental Contaminants Act is all about. However, it can also be used to deal with harmful substances which are already making a mess of things and which, using any reasonable standard of environmental housekeeping, should be withdrawn from the market today.

There is reference in Bill C-3 to a schedule. This is a schedule or list of substances which will either be restricted or banned by Environment Canada. The naming of a substance to a schedule, in other words, withdraws it from circulation or, as is much more likely in the future, will prevent it from being manufactured or imported in the first place. The list will undoubtedly grow as time goes by. Occasionally, on further testing, some names of substances may be deleted from the schedule, but these are likely to be exceptions rather than the rule. More and more chemical-type substances will be banned or limited because we are becoming more inventive all the time. Chemical-type industries are expanding faster than most other activities and the diversity of their output is proliferating with the passage of time.

[Mr. Davis.]

The Minister of the Environment will obviously need a lot of advice. There is provision in Bill C-3, therefore, for the setting up of advisory committees. These will be established to hear representations from interested parties—that is to say, manufacturers, importers, users and others who may be directly affected by this new law—or concerned members of the public whose advice will also be sought in order to help the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of National Health and Welfare to decide on the names of products or groups of products which should be added to the schedule and which should not.

Bill C-3 also provides for the creation of ad hoc boards of review. This provision was included at the request of industry. It will give any company or individual affected by this legislation an opportunity to state his or her case. Producers, importers, etc., will therefore have an avenue of appeal open to them. These industry-oriented boards of review will have powers and responsibilities similar to those already enjoyed by the board of review under our Canadian Hazardous Products Act.

Still on the subject of relations with industry, I would like to say this: We do not want to be working at cross purposes. We want industrial development in the sense of new industry and new products. We want more industry, better industry, in order to generate more and better jobs. But we do not want, at the same time, to be spewing out hundreds of additional products every year, a sizeable number of which are harmful to our natural environment. We want to preserve quality while enjoying more in the sense of quantity. We want to maintain, and if possible improve, our quality of life while, at the same time, enjoying a rising material standard of living.

This legislation certainly goes with the grain of nature. I believe that it can also go with the grain of development. A forward looking industry does not really want to produce a product or class of products which is going to be banned at a later date. It does not want to get a bad name for producing something which is frowned upon by a large segment of our population. So an early screening process makes a lot of sense, not only from an environmental point of view but also from an economic point of view. It makes a lot of sense to developers who want to see a good financial return on their investment, and a good financial return means many years of successful sales. Continuity in sales means compatibility with the rest of the marketplace and the marketplace of modern man is much more sensitive to the needs of our environment than it was even a few short years ago.

Bill C-3, our new Environmental Contaminants Act, breaks new ground. It breaks new ground on the environmental front. But it is not unprecedented in the sense that we have similar screening arrangements in respect of foods and drugs and other hazardous substances. It is new or advanced in the sense that no other country has gone as far as we are going in this connection. A similar bill is before Congress in the United States. Similar legislation is already in effect in Sweden, but is not quite as good as ours. It does not involve as close a liaison with the private sector as ours does.

I commend this legislation to all members in this House, Mr. Speaker. I think it is a good bill and one which merits the whole-hearted support of all hon. members here. I hope it does not take too long on second reading and that it goes quickly to committee for detailed examination. I am prepared to accept changes if they are reasonable and if they go along with our main theme, which is one of prevention rather than cure, to stop pollution before it starts. Along with our new system in Environment Canada for screening projects from an environmental point of view, this legislation will help us to preserve the wonders of nature in this country. It will help to ensure that the quality of life in Canada is second to none.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I want first of all to say on behalf of the official opposition and this House that we welcome this bill and compliment the minister on bringing it forward. One can always say, of course, that it should have come forward sooner. None the less, the minister and the department have been studying a complex subject.

Although it is easy to say that we would have preferred to see this bill several years ago, the bill is here now and we commend the minister for bringing it forward. It is appropriate to say that this bill has serious implications for our future well-being as citizens of Canada, indeed, as citizens of the world. Let there be no mistake: all members of the House support the principle of the bill. Those outside this House who in the last year have taken pot shots at what they call radical environmentalists in this House should understand clearly that this legislation has not been introduced through any desire to interfere unduly with the legitimate activities of others but that, rather, without legislation of this kind any debate about undue interference with anybody's rights could rapidly become an academic exercise.

May I draw to the attention of the House an article in this morning's Globe and Mail entitled "Disastrous pollution threat seen in organic compounds use", which I shall read:

> A potentially disastrous pollution threat is mounting from the uncontrolled use of organic compounds in industrial processes, says a U.S. biologist employed by the Mitre Corp., a Washington-based environmental assessment agency.
> Robert Ouellette, formerly of Montreal, said yesterday that the compounds—many of which are used in the plastic, paint and paper industries—are especially dangerous to man because they can penetrate human membranes.
> These compounds—such as benzyne, phenols and alpha benzpyrene—could become the real offenders to man's survival in the future, he said during an interview at the Royal Society of Canada's symposium on waste recycling and the environment.
> The man-made organic compounds were used as solvents and chemical binders to make synthetic products from nylons to plastic cups, and are disposed of as waste in the air, soil and water with little understanding of potential harm.
> He described their hazard as the spinoff of a burgeoning synthetic-products industry created to appease a throw-away society.
> Although there are literally millions of the compounds with undetermined potential for harm, benzyne is known to damage the liver, phenols have corrosive properties and alpha benzypreme is believed to cause cancer, said Mr. Ouellette, head of the corporation's environmental systems department.
> The compounds—80 per cent of which are unavailable to the public and only used industrially—are already entering the food chain from pesticide residues, he said.
> Because the compounds were soluble in water or fat, they could penetrate human membranes, which are intended to keep foreign substances out of the body, and damage vital organs.
> He described the compounds as 'non-perceived pollutants', meaning that the scientific community was only now beginning to focus on the threat. Also, the hazards of organic compounds were poorly understood and laws generally didn't deal specifically with them.

It is incumbent on members of parliament to make certain that members of the public understand why this legislation is necessary and that it must be passed and enforced. I am concerned about the form of the legislation. The minister indicated that the intent of the legislation is to prevent the manufacture and use of certain substances before we discover to our disadvantage or peril that these substances are dangerous. The definition of "dangerous substance" is wide enough to cover all substances known, unknown, invented or not invented, which can cause difficulties.

I am somewhat concerned about the way the bill has been drafted. It puts the onus on the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) or on the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) to approach industry, but only when one of those ministers suspects, or has reason to suspect or believe, that a dangerous substance within the meaning of the act is being manufactured or used. The bill does not require the manufacturer or inventor of the substance to give notice to the government of its manufacture or invention, or of its sale. I wonder whether this omission is the result of an oversight on the part of those who drafted the bill, or whether there is a substantive reason for drafting the bill this way. We shall need to examine that aspect in committee.

It will be difficult for the legislation to do what is intended if the onus is placed only on the government. The bill provides that the ministers I have mentioned must suspect that a dangerous substance is being manufactured or used, or have reason so to believe. In view of the vast numbers of these substances, there may be considerable administrative obstacles to discovering which substances are being manufactured, if they are being manufactured, and where. I serve notice that we shall want to look at this aspect in committee. I make this suggestion in a spirit of co-operation and constructive criticism, as we want to pass legislation which will in every way meet the worthwhile intent the minister so clearly expressed.

Another aspect of the bill merits consideration. May I draw to the attention of hon. members clause 5(2), which reads in part:

> Where, after consultation as required by subsection (1), the minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare are satisfied that the significant danger referred to in that subsection will not be eliminated by any action taken or proposed to be taken pursuant to any other law and they propose to recommend to the Governor in Council that
> (a) an order amending the schedule by adding the substance or class of substances be made under subsection 7(1) . . .

● (1650)

That is the first mention of the word "schedule". I take it from that a schedule is indeed contemplated under this act. However, there does not seem to be any operative section that establishes the schedule. It is curious to note on going through the bill that the word "schedule" is repeated a number of times, but again without any reference to an operative part of the bill that establishes this schedule. This may have been an oversight at the time the bill was drafted.

Again in a spirit of co-operation, I want to let the minister know we will want to take a look at this particular wording and see whether we can tidy it up a bit so it makes quite clear that the schedule is established, who established it and what goes into it. From looking at the wording of the bill, it seems that a schedule has been taken for granted, but it is difficult to know just how the schedule is, in fact, established.

As I said before, this bill has the support of the opposition and I think the support of all members in this House. I am conscious of the minister's entreaty that we put this bill through second reading quickly so that we can get it to committee. The intent of the bill is sound and deserves the support of all members of the House. I trust it will receive sympathetic and intelligent understanding from the public.

With those caveats, I again compliment the minister for bringing the bill before us. We will look at it carefully in an effort to tighten it up to achieve the objectives of the bill. I again ask hon. members to support this bill at least in principle at this time.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to speak briefly on the bill currently before us, the Environmental Contaminants Act. I wish to say at the outset that the New Democratic Party welcomes this legislation. We certainly intend to support it. I commend the minister and the government for bringing this legislation forward at this time.

There are several points I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. Before doing so, I caution the members of this House and the general public that quite frequently legislation is brought in by the government which stays on the order paper. While they might be law, the regulations dealing with the environment, for example, are never enforced. I want to make it crystal clear to the members of this House that this is one of the reasons we have rather severe pollution problems facing many parts of Canada today.

An hon. Member: An hour ago you wanted a smelter.

Mr. Harding: It is not a matter of whether we want a smelter. We have legislation. I am going to give a list of some of the acts on the statute books which have sections in them dealing with various aspects of pollution and which to my knowledge have not been enforced for many years. For example, some time ago I put a series of questions on the order paper dealing with the number of infractions which have taken place against certain sections of certain acts. There is a series of them; the Migratory Birds Convention Act, the Fisheries Act, the National Harbours Board Act, the Canada Shipping Act, the Navigable Waters Protection Act, the International Rivers Improvements Act, the National Health and Welfare Act, the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and the Energy, Mines and Resources Act.

With the exception of two or three of these acts—and fisheries is one department where more action has been taken than any other—we find there has been complete neglect for a period of years by the departments concerned with regard to the policing of certain aspects of pollution which come under those departments.

If this legislation is going to stay on the statute books, not be utilized and not be adequately policed by the department, we will be in the same position as we are today with regard to many sections of other pieces of legislation which could and should have been used in the past to control pollution in Canada. If we had taken all the legislation, federal and provincial, and carried out the pollution regulations already laid down, we would not have a fraction of the pollution problems which now hound Canadians from one end of Canada to the other. Again, it is a matter of enforcement. I trust we will see the minister's department do a real job of policing the legislation we are debating at this time.

Might I make one or two general comments before getting to the bill. As far as I am concerned, protection of the environment is one of the key issues facing every nation of the world today, including Canada. After all, we live on spaceship earth. We think we are a pretty important nation. As far as we know, this is the only sphere circling around which carries life. That life is enclosed in a very narrow envelope of air, ground and water that produces the life support systems that keep mankind and everything alive. If anything happens to it, we have no place to go. We would not be able to go to the moon because we cannot live there. If anything happens to the life support systems which keep mankind alive, we know of no other planet to which we can go. Yet today—and the minister is one of the first to admit it—there are signs of trouble everywhere. They have been apparent for years. Pressure has been brought on government at all levels, municipal, provincial, federal and international, to do something about pollution problems. We have not made the type of progress we should have with such an important problem.

Canada is not the only country with pollution problems. Pollution is worldwide. It is international. Despite this, we find that even the United Nations is having trouble moving effectively in the international sphere to deal with these problems. If there is pollution on the other side of the world, it will affect us in Canada in some way and at some time. That is why eventually we need to have tough international standards and controls. We must ensure they are policed and carried out if we are going to continue to live on this earth for a period of time.

I want to give one or two examples of the foolishness of mankind in the past few years. I will first talk about the nuclear testing that has been taking place. Last year in this House of Commons we moved motions urging the French government not to have atmospheric testing of nuclear weapons. We are opposed to any country in the world testing nuclear weapons, whether it is in the atmosphere or underground. This is contamination not of the air over any one country or area but contamination of the air resources throughout the world, and we are the ones who suffer. We must learn to stand up, speak out and fight for the complete elimination and ban of this stupid philosophy which some nations have that they must test nuclear weapons in order to improve their nuclear arsenals and the nuclear weapons they feel they need for protection against someone else. One thing is crystal clear as far as nuclear devices are concerned, and that is that if a nuclear war breaks out mankind is doomed, regardless whether you hear the explosion or the fired shots. This is the story we have to get across not only to the people of Canada but to the people of every nation of the world.

It is for this reason that we welcome this beginning by the government to develop a philosophy and some guidelines in respect of certain products which might be manufactured by companies in years to come. The minister mentioned certain problems in respect of nuclear testing, and he also referred to DDT. The world thought DDT was one of the greatest things ever discovered for mankind, and it is still being used in some areas of the world today. We did not understand what the use of DDT was doing to our food chains through an accumulative effect. We now know that a number of species in various parts of the world are endangered because of the use of DDT. It has been found in the Arctic, the Antarctic and on islands hundreds and thousands of miles from habitation that certain animals and birds have traces of DDT in their systems. DDT has an accumulative effect which works its way through food chains which are absolutely essential to the survival of mankind as well as to the survival of many other species of life on this planet.

This legislation will for the first time attempt to stop this type of production and usage of poisons in the form of contaminants getting into the air, waters and the earth, eventually coming to reside in mankind and doing a tremendous amount of damage. As we look at the bill we see a number of interesting points. I have gone through it very carefully and closely and, as a number of hon. members, feel that many of the points can be dealt with at the committee stage. There are, however, one or two things I should like to draw to the attention of the minister today.

At page 12 there is a reference to a one-year limitation period. If a company allows some contaminant to get into the air or water, it cannot be held responsible for the damage after a period of a year. I suggest in all humility that one year is far too short a period. Let us consider the example used by the minister when he referred to mercury compounds being used in pulp mills. These compounds get into the water and it takes many years before the companies or other individuals realize that mercury poisoning is taking place in these waters because of the use of chloral-alkali. In Canada today we have lakes and rivers in a number of areas still closed to fishing and recreation simply because of mercury contamination which took place many years ago. This is an example of why the one-year period is too short.

I do not think society should be saddled with the cost of cleaning up these contaminated waters, and unfortunately we have been saddled with this cost in the past. If we have to do any cleanups of mercury deposits in our rivers and lakes the cost will come out of the public treasury just as did the cost to clean up DDT and other contamination because we did not lay down regulations in time. I suggest that the minister take a pretty careful look at this part of the bill to see whether there is something that can be done. I think the responsibility of the companies should carry on for longer than the one-year period.

There is another point about which the minister spoke that I think is very interesting, and that is the establishment of an environmental contamination board of review. I think this is a step in the right direction as I feel such a board of review could be extremely useful. The members of this board would certainly have to possess some degree of expertise if they are to investigate and handle these problems, but I would hope that the membership will include laymen who also have knowledge and expertise in this field. Sometimes there is a tendency when we set up these boards to look to the academic world, leaving out others who have a great deal of practical experience, and quite often it is those with the practical experience who can come up with the solutions required in this day and age.

As I indicated earlier, there may be a large number of minor suggestions made during the committee stage. Once the bill reaches the committee I presume we will have a general discussion about the principle contained in the clauses. If we have amendments to offer I can assure the minister that we will see they are drafted well in advance in order that he will have time to look them over and decide whether the incorporation of them in the legislation will improve it or otherwise.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) talked about a schedule. I certainly feel that a schedule setting out the classes of materials to be prohibited should be provided to hon. members at an early date. This is an extremely important and key clause in the bill. One of the key areas is that in respect of percentages of concentrations that will be allowed, and again this is a mighty tricky subject, one that quite frankly I am not competent to judge. I think we must have engineers and biologists who are extremely expert in these fields give us information about the effects of even extremely minute concentrations.

In closing, I should like to make one final suggestion. We must have a definition of "environment" somewhere in this bill. Dictionary definitions are not adequate. We must have a definition which will give us an idea of exactly what we are considering in this bill in the way of the environment. Again, Mr. Speaker, you might not agree that a definiton of environment is necessary, but I certainly feel it is.

Finally, I want to congratulate the minister for bringing down this bill. It is certainly a step in the right direction. I would like to see it get through the committee and I hope we can improve it by amendment so that this environmental legislation will give a lead to other countries to proceed along similar lines.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-3 to protect human health and the environment from the release of substances that contaminate the environment. As my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) indicated earlier, of course we support this bill and support in particular the fundamental principles of this bill.

It is not my intention at this point in time to actually discuss the details. However, I do wish to indicate I feel there are special features, some of which have been alluded to by others, which will require careful scrutiny by the standing committee. It is my intention to deal with some of these details when the bill is referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. At the outset of my comments I intentionally read the title of the bill and shall repeat it again. It is entitled, "An act to protect human health and the environment from the release of substances that contaminate the environment".

In my view this contains three important words. I believe they are the crux of the bill and the crux of the problem. Those three words are, "human", "health" and "environment". It is to this area I wish to direct my remarks. When I first read this bill I vividly recalled an examination I had many years ago during my early years of training. At that particular time I was asked to describe the importance of a substance called adenosine triphosphate and the role it played in the normal functioning of the human body. So I proceeded to describe it in terms of its cycle and muscle metabolism, and quite frankly I felt rather satisfied that I had given a satisfactory answer. I have no intention of discussing the biology and physiology of adenosine triphosphate, but the response of the examiner at that time is germane to this debate and to the legislation before us. Because the response I received to my answer was that I had picked one tree out of the forest. I cannot think of a better analogy for the bill that is presently before us. The minister has introduced a bill discussing human health and environment which is limited by clause 2, which is entitled "interpretation," to one principal area which is defined by the words "substance" and "release". Surely in the context of total environmental health we are indeed out of context and are picking one tree out of the forest by limiting ourselves to that extent.

Before I proceed let me place this bill in the proper context. If I may I should like to quote from the bill with specific reference to the words "release" and "substance". These appear at page two of the bill under the interpretation section. I quote:

> "substance" means any distinguishable kind of inanimate matter capable of being dispersed in the environment or a precursor of any such matter.

I wish to compliment the minister for talking at the outset of his remarks about prevention rather than cure, a most important concept to which I shall allude at some further point.

As I analyze this bill, I interpret it as a fragmented approach to the problems of human health and the environment. I really believe it is an example of the lack of comprehension the minister has for the total area of the problems of human health and the environment. I also believe it indicates a lack of liaison between the Department of the Environment and many other important agencies. What is more important, and what I feel is more tragic, is that it clearly demonstrates there is no over-all government policy dealing with the broad spectrum of the problems we see in terms of human health and the environment.

[Mr. Holmes.]

During the debate on the Speech from the Throne earlier this year I analyzed the health care system in Canada and outlined at that time an action-oriented program dealing with the health problems of Canadians, and more specifically with the environmental health component which I felt was important in approaching the over-all concept of the health of Canadians. I may say also that at that time the Department of National Health and Welfare was sufficiently interested in my comments that they asked for a copy of the document, which I gladly provided.

I suggest that the minister might obtain a copy of that document from his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and review in particular the special area of environmental health, which I think would be most informative for him. Perhaps he has read it, and if so it may have prompted the legislation we have before us. I hope that after he has reviewed it, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare has as well, they may see fit to implement some of the additional proposals discussed in the document.

With regard to that document, I have no hesitation in transmitting it to the department in the hope of course they might establish new health priorities and that we might see some action in many of the health care areas, including environmental health to which I have alluded. It is interesting that rather recently I asked for a similar document in the form of a press release from the Department of National Health and Welfare dated March 25, 1974. I wish to quote a little from this release:

> A separate Yukon Region of Northern Medical Services with headquarters at Whitehorse, the territorial capital, as of 1st April 1974, was announced today by Health and Welfare Minister Marc Lalonde.

Further in the release we find this:

> The Minister's decision is based on the recommendations of a Medical Services Branch task force under the chairmanship of Dr. Lyall Black, Director General, Program Management. It was charged with examining the feasibility of raising the Branch's Yukon Zone to regional status.
> Among the findings on which the task force based its recommendations were:
> 1. Northern Region which covers a vast area had encountered serious management problems due in large part to its very size.
> 2. The Yukon had good internal communications including transportation and well-developed health services suited to regionalization at minimum cost.
> 3. Establishment of the Yukon Region would enable the Northern Region to concentrate its efforts in the Northwest Territories which has a rapidly expanding population and because of its huge area more difficult problems of organization and health delivery operations.

It seemed to me that in performing our function as a constructive opposition such a document as I suggested, which had been prepared by Dr. Lyall Black, should be tabled. I made this request before the standing committee and I was quite upset and annoyed when the ruling of the chairman indicated it would be impossible to have such a document tabled. This was because it was considered to be an internal document and therefore confidential.

If you attempt to analyze the health care field with the usual traditional models, Mr. Speaker, you realize very quickly that it is fragmented, very complex, diverse and subject to many special interest groups. It is this type of setting that has made it impossible to rationalize our health care system and to identify specific problem areas, to set important goals, to set long term objectives, and to decide on the specific program content designed to reach specific populations or programs.

In an effort to break away from these conventional methods of classifying diseases or health into specific categories, such as public health, mental health, dental health, etc., I described a new framework dividing health into four main entities. The first was health care organization and management; the second was human biology; the third, life style health; and the fourth and most important, the one we are discussing today, environmental health.

For those who are interested I would refer members of the House to an excellent article that appeared in the Canadian Medical Association Journal of February 1973 written by Bert Laframboise, who describes this concept in far more detail. Some of you may well be interested in that particular article.

As I indicated previously, this framework permits us for the first time to rationalize our health care system and, what is more important, it prevents us from ignoring any factors that have a deleterious effect on the health of individuals. It is this latter point that is not appreciated by the minister responsible for this bill. Indeed, if it were otherwise, we would be debating a bill encompassing the entire area of environmental health matters.

To put this in its perspective let me briefly review the four categories to which I have alluded, emphasizing in particular the environmental health component which is a subject matter of this bill and which has relevance and importance to the comments I will make.

First, let me turn to health organization and management. This is the traditional component of which all of us are aware. It is the category that contains all aspects of health, manpower, location, the availability of all facilities including hospitals, nursing homes, clinical group practices, etc., and the relationship of people and resources in the health care field. It is that traditional part of health care organization as we know it which encompasses about 95 per cent of the funds for medical services.

I think it is clear that this category has been the primary consideration of all our thinking today. In the past, emphasis has been placed on the building of hospitals, the training of a greater number of professional health personnel. We have enhanced the myth that good medicine equals good health. Further, we have preoccupied ourselves at times with measuring deficiencies in this area through numerous federal and provincial studies, reports and recommendations ranging from the Royal Commission on Health Services, the Hastings Report on Community Health Centres, and the most recent report which was tabled in Ontario.

What is frequently overlooked is the fact that most of our efforts in this field have been, and continue to be, related to the actual discovery and treatment of specific disease processes. Preventive aspects of medicine have frequently been deferred. The minister referred to this earlier and I commend him for this.

Time does not permit a detailed discussion of health care organization and management, but of course there are some clearly defined areas in which we need federal leadership and where problems must be resolved, areas such as physician manpower requirements, health costs, computer technology and regionalization of health care. Perhaps at some later date we can go into these in more detail.

The second category to which I referred earlier was human biology. It includes all aspects of the organic makeup of man, including all relevant research with clinical application and research to improve individual patient care. I should point out that this party has long recognized the importance of medical research and during this session, with the support of some hon. members to my left, we have attempted to have the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) reverse his position with respect to inadequate funding of the Medical Research Council.

May I say that I find there is a similarity between the recent debate on the Medical Research Council and the debate on the bill presently before us. In both instances, a fundamental issue has not been recognized and appreciated by the respective ministers. In the first instance, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has not recognized that medical research, medical education and the health care of Canadians are inseparably interrelated. I must point out unequivocally that a viable medical research base is essential for excellence in medical education and, what is more important, fundamental to the delivery of quality medicine to all Canadian citizens. With respect to this bill, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) has not recognized and does not appreciate the magnitude of environmental health problems because he is limiting himself to one particular small area.

Now I should like to turn to the third component of this concept to which I referred, namely, the so-called life style health. Life style health refers to those aspects of health over which individuals exert decision making and control. It is quite clear that these decisions are influenced by value systems highly developed within each individual and influenced to a great extent by widely accepted social and cultural determinants.

Many of the past disease categories which were physical in etiology have been overcome and are preventable. We recognize that there is still much to be accomplished in this area, but we also recognize that by looking at the life style factors and the potential years of life a great impact can be made if we put greater emphasis on life style health.

Let me give two or three examples to give some idea as to what I mean by life style health. If tomorrow we could eradicate all cancer in North America, we would increase life expectancy of all citizens by about three years. If tomorrow we could have every Canadian at a normal weight, we would increase life expectancy by between eight to nine years. This is an example of life style health. Look at the principal causes of death for men between the ages of 45 and 64, which are lung disease, bronchitis, emphysema, heart disease and cirrhosis of the liver. Of course we know what the principal precipitating factors for these diseases are: smoking, overeating, high fat food intake, excessive consumption of alcohol. Of course, now we are talking about life style type habits.

Environmental Contamination

Now I should like to turn to that important category which is really the crux of the bill, that is, environmental health. This category is most important and includes the conventionally accepted environmental factors to which reference has been made today by many members in the House. DDT and phosphates have been mentioned. We know the usually accepted environmental factors, such as pure air, high quality water supplies, control of food processing and handling, disposal of sewage, garbage and waste products. Also there are the following: control of animal and insect vectors of disease, the wise use and storage of pesticides, etc.

In addition, our meaning of environmental health encompasses many more aspects, such as noise control, factors affecting home accidents attributed to poorly designed or constructed houses, poor automobile or highway design, factors which have an impact on mental confusion and fatigue and which do not appear in some areas of work among the labouring class. Others are pressures to succeed in work assignments and in the area of cosmetic manufacture and distribution.

It is obvious that the list of hazards to health is limitless. In considering the improvement of environmental health, several important factors must be considered in any approach to legislation. First, I think it should be recognized that individuals can do little to control threats to environmental health. An individual Canadian can do little about them. The corollary is, of course, that governments are expected to introduce measures to protect the health of all Canadians in this area. The third point is that many areas of environmental pollution are not yet totally understood, and require extensive research. The fourth is this. In the past, because of growing public awareness and interest, the government has sometimes over-reacted by taking decisions the effects of which are far-reaching and in certain cases undesirable. I suspect this goes back to the thalidomide experience.

Let me give the House two examples which I am sure all hon. members will recall—the controversy about cyclamates, which were eliminated from the market, and the more recent controversy about DES. This is an aspect which must be considered in any projected legislation.

In the establishment of national priorities and the sitting of national standards, a number of equally important factors must be considered before policy decisions are made which will affect accepted social or individual values. Measures to achieve good health effects might involve detrimental economic implications resulting not only in loss of work but in the loss of non-replaceable natural resources. The unwise uprooting of industry, with consequent loss of jobs as the result of health standards which are too high or too inflexible, would be generally unacceptable to Canadians.

Let me identify a few of the environmental factors which call for intervention by the federal government. There is a need for standards of excellence in the food processing industry designed to ensure a supply of high quality foods with good nutritional content. I am sure everyone who has read the report "Nutrition Survey" is well aware of the need for more control in this area. There is a need to control the levels of animal fat present in food and dairy products; the connection between supersaturated fats and heart disease has only lately become more clearly evident. There is a need for the continued monitoring of cosmetic products, a need to upgrade and assure the quality and effectiveness of drugs, vaccines and so on.

I might mention also the need for controls to ensure the safety of prosthetic devices, and the establishment of safety standards to be followed by automobile manufacturers and by those concerned with homes design and construction. Finally, I might mention the value of setting viable, practical standards to govern air quality, water processing and sewage disposal.

Another area requiring urgent federal involvement arises from the phenomenon of urbanization accompanied by the rapid mushrooming of suburbs. Crowding, the isolation of families, the alienation of individuals, are cardinal features of this typically twentieth century process. Movement from one part of the country to another by large numbers of the population has contributed to the confusion.

While I recognize that this area rightfully belongs to the Department of Urban Affairs, important environmental health factors are involved here, particularly in the light of recent progress toward urban core renewal and the developing policy of establishing satellite cities. Factors which must be considered here include the provision of adequate recreational facilities, the avoidance of high density crowding, and the mental health of people uprooted and relocated as a result of the redevelopment of "old city" areas or the development of suburbs or satellite cities. Manpower and health facilities must be adequately planned so that they are readily available.

A major difficulty about developing an environmental health program has been the minister's inability to develop effective collaboration with other concerned and interested federal government agencies. I have no doubt the minister will respond by referring me to clause 3, subclauses (3) and (4). I quote:

> The minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare shall, in carrying out any activity described in paragraph 1(a), wherever reasonably possible, act jointly and make use of the services and facilities of other departments of the government of Canada or of any agencies thereof.

And, further:

> The minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare may carry out any of the activities described in paragraph 1(a) in co-operation with any government or agency thereof or any body, organization or person.

My point is that from experience in the past I can derive very little re-assurance from the words "wherever reasonably possible" or from the word "may". I suggest that if we are to benefit from a useful environmental health program effective input must be forthcoming not only from the Department of the Environment and from the Department of National Health and Welfare but from the Ministry of Science and Technology, the Ministry of Trade and Industry, the Ministry of Urban Affairs, the Ministry of Transport and, indeed, from all other interested groups.

As I indicated earlier, I intend to support this bill. But I wish to emphasize again that in the area of environmental health the minister has picked one tree from the forest; he has failed to show he has an understanding of the total picture.

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. With regard to the recommendation of Bill C-3, I note that this bill is intended "to protect human health and the environment from the release of substances that contaminate the environment". Throughout the years, many activities—industrial, municipal and individual—have contributed to contaminating the environment, as a result of which health problems have cropped up and some sectors of our environment have been destroyed.

Recently, I wrote to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) requesting the help of his department to remedy a situation that now exists in my riding where a company, over a period of 40 years, has destroyed all animal life; it has destroyed the salmon that spawned there and contaminated the water. Today, when we ask the federal department to make the efforts required to remedy the situation in the province of Quebec, we are told that this matter does not fall within federal jurisdiction, that it is a provincial matter in the case of Quebec. Now, my intervention this afternoon will be strictly limited to asking the minister to tell us, in his closing remarks on second reading, what means he intends using to apply this act in the province of Quebec. He will have to give us his assurance that the amounts will in fact be transferred to the province of Quebec and spent on projects of the type suggested in Bill C-3. That is the problem in this case, as in many others, when it is decided at some time or other that the province will deal with a certain matter.

I would like to congratulate the minister for introducing that bill which has been called for since a good number of years. Although perhaps too late, it tries nevertheless to correct a problem.

Unfortunately that bill does not refer to the control of the federal government when the enforcement of the legislation is entrusted with a province. This concerns me, because in past cases as in the one I mentioned a while ago, the answers of the provincial government are delayed as for example, the necessary correctives on the north shore where the pollution of a river by a certain company should be checked. Steps to prevent the destruction of animal life are delayed, perhaps due to a lack of agreement between the federal and provincial governments. I therefore hope that in his final speech the minister will indicate what pressures or control he expects to use to see that this legislation is enforced in Quebec.

[English]

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I too want to express the feeling of appreciation that we have on this side of the House for having this bill before us. It is a very, very small step in the marathon walk, but to take this step today is certainly better than to take it a few years from now. It would, of course, have been a lot better had it been taken a few years ago.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on the remarks that the minister made to clear up in my mind how this bill is going to be implemented in Canada.

The minister said that the bill could be compared to legislation existing in other countries and that it is far superior to such legislation. That might be so when we look at Bill C-3 alone and at the controls other countries have to protect their citizens from environmental disasters. But, of course, the bill does not go nearly as far as we would all like it to.

The federal government had a wonderful opportunity years ago, before words like "phosphates", "detergents" and "chlorinated hydrocarbons" became household words, to establish some policies by which Canadians in all walks of life could live. The government was slow in recognizing this new phenomenon. It was so slow in fact that provincial governments throughout the country had to make their own laws to protect their citizens from some of the things that were happening. Because of that we now have all kinds of environmental laws in Canada to which we ask industry, big and small, provinces and municipalities, to adhere. This, of course, is disastrous.

I should have liked to see—and eventually this will have to come about—the minister bring in a bill based on strict guidelines that industry could follow. It can be argued that we do not know today what some of the dangers will be tomorrow and that we want to have a flexible approach to this problem. We do not know what man will invent tomorrow and how harmful that invention might be to people and to society. But I am talking about some of the things that are in existence now, Mr. Speaker. I can only assume that this bill will be like so many others that the government has presented to us, a bill that will regulate retroactively.

It may be true that a lot of industrial concerns intending to invest multimillions of dollars in a new invention and program will go through the pain and trouble to engage either their own engineers and laboratories to research the product or to hire the engineers required to provide the government with this know-how.

What about the smaller industry that is producing a commodity of which we have no knowledge today, Mr. Speaker? They are not compelled to come to the federal government and say that they are producing something and that they do not know what its impact will be. If the minister does not know what is happening, the industry will be in business and the product will be on the market to be consumed by our people. Thus damage will be done and the provisions of the legislation will have to be retroactive.

Ever since we started talking about environmental control there has been conflict between industry and the do-gooders, the environmentalists, the bearded fellows who come out of the concrete jungles where the environment leaves a lot to be desired and go up north to tell us how we should protect the environment. There has always been this conflict between such people and industry. Industry does not want to be difficult but they find it hard to live with all these unknown factors.

Such questions arise as: Suppose we put a cleaning plant at the end of this pipe, will there be some federal, municipal or provincial agent around tomorrow wanting us to put something on the stack? And so on. If industry had proper guidelines, taking into account all the things we know about the environment and chemicals, it would not be very hard to go to the engineer and give an undertaking that no more than so many parts per million will go into the water and that the exhaust from the pipes will not be offensive.

I come from an area where recently a great number of pulp mills have been built. Nobody likes to talk about it. You have to be very careful, particularly as a politician, in the city of Prince George when you talk about the offensive odour there most of the year. People say it is the smell of money, the smell of success. However, there are a large number of people who would rather be poor than live in an area where there is this constant offensive odour. Incidentally, it is not harmful to health.

The minister says that with the new law on our statute books we will be in a position to demand information. That might be so, but someone will have to lay a complaint because there is nothing in the bill that compels anyone to tell the minister what he is doing. There will have to be a witch-hunt. Or course, it will be after the fact when the complaint is laid. The legislation will work retroactively and this will be disastrous to industry.

As I said, the federal government had the opportunity to move into this field and be a leader. It could have consulted with the provinces, but it did not do that. As a result, we not only have 12 or 13 different environmental standards, but we have dual standards which each government follows. The federal government uses its own standards for activities it carries on in the Northwest Territories and other northern parts of our country, and it has developed standards which industry must follow. All these things create serious conflicts between rational people who recognize the problem, people who would rather eliminate it but do not have the tools to do so.

The minister said industry would have to bear the cost, that there would be no cost to the taxpayer. That all sounds exciting these days. However, I must ask about the small businessmen who cannot afford the expensive laboratory and research staff it takes to provide the minister with information he will now be able to demand under this bill. I would have liked the minister to be honest and say it is going to be very expensive for Canadians to live in a healthy environment. I could live with that because it is a very serious problem. I would like to see the minister come up with programs that would help industry in the first instance, before the factory is built, to research the product they are going to produce, and help them to instal the necessary abatement equipment. Such a program could be attached to a bill like C-3 which, although it is a small step, is certainly the right step in a marathon walk.

I would like to see the federal government become more energetic in sharing with the provinces and municipalities. I know all kinds of things are now being done. Municipalities are the biggest offenders, not usually industry. It is areas where people gather to live. The municipalities are the biggest offenders in many areas on environmental pollution. There should be programs by which the junior governments could have access to the federal coffers and obtain the help they so badly need to keep the environment in our cities and towns liveable. I do not see any further intention on the part of the government in this bill to pass that kind of help on to the junior governments.

The minister said this bill provides for the creation of ad hoc boards of review, and that this provision was included at the request of industry. He said it will give any company or individual affected by this legislation an opportunity to state his or her case. Again, Mr. Speaker, that will happen after the fact.

The minister said producers, importers and so on will have an avenue of appeal open to them. He said the industry-oriented boards of review will have powers and responsibility similar to those already enjoyed by the board of review under our Canadian Hazardous Products Act. This is all fine and dandy, but as I have said, these measures are all designed to come into being after the fact.

I do not think the minister would find too much opposition from any member of this House or any party if he were to bring in strong legislation compelling industry and business to keep government aware of their future activities. However, the cost and the onus should not be passed on to industry. We must be prepared environmentally because otherwise it is going to cost us money. Steps taken by municipalities and some of the activities carried on by the provinces will cost money. These resources must come from somewhere. Until we are ready to share with these governments, we cannot expect the kind of co-operation the minister obviously must expect if he thinks everyone will come running to the federal government from here on to provide them with information on all the activities they intend to carry on in the future. I notice it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Oberle: I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what length of time the hon. member has in mind, but we are prepared to sit a few minutes if it will make it possible to finish second reading of this bill.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to carry on for a few moments if the hon. member wants to continue his speech.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, my remarks are nearly finished. However, I wish to call it six o'clock so that if any of my colleagues wish to carry this debate on tomorrow they will have the opportunity to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL WORKERS' STRIKE—SUGGESTED END TO MAIL DELIVERY MONOPOLY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek unanimous consent of the House to put a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Once again a strike in the postal service has disrupted mail delivery in Canada, causing great hardship and inconvenience to millions of people whose pension and other cheques are being delayed, and creating untold extra costs for all businesses in Canada which must ultimately be borne by consumers. Section 8 of the Post Office Act gives to the Postmaster General the sole and exclusive privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would put the motion to the House. I am not sure whether this is the motion or the explanatory part, but really a motion should be put without a long explanation or preface.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): That was merely the explanation, Mr. Speaker. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House give immediate consideration to taking whatever action is necessary to repeal the grant of monopoly to the Canada Post Office in order to allow private enterprisers to offer competitive service, thereby giving the people of Canada the opportunity, in a genuinely free and competitive market, to buy the postal services they need from the most efficient supplier thereof.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

FLOODS

MOOSE JAW—IMMEDIATE FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact flood damage in Moose Jaw is estimated to total approximately $10 million, and in view of the fact many residents will not have money to repair and clean up their homes and replace their personal and household goods lost in the flood, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Horner):

That the government give consideration to making funds available immediately on an emergency basis to assist these people to become re-established.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

SASKATCHEWAN—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR PREVENTIVE WORKS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to request unanimous consent to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of great urgency that requires immediate clarification, namely, the conflicting answers and statements of the Prime Minister and two other cabinet ministers on whether or not the federal formula for sharing of costs resulting from flood damage in Saskatchewan also covers costs incurred for temporary works such as dykes and sandbagging. If I have the unanimous consent of the House, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight):

That this House is in agreement with the answer of the Minister of Environment (Mr. Davis) who said at page 1674 of Hansard for April 23: "In other words, temporary works such as the dykes now being built and sandbagging are subject to the formula for cost sharing".

And further, that this House requests the government to ensure that such costs are in fact shared with the province and municipalities concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

HOUSING

MEASURES TO REDUCE COST OF SINGLE FAMILY HOMES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a matter whose urgency requires immediate attention. I refer to the excessive cost of houses which has again increased by 22 per cent in comparison with the same date last year. It is therefore urgent that steps be taken so that Canadians may purchase a house without running into debt for their lifetime. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Boisvert):

That this House consider the steps to be taken to reduce substantially the price of detached houses, more especially as a result of the removal of the sales tax on building materials, and enable all Canadians to become owners of detached houses.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity, therefore the motion cannot be put.

YOUNG VOYAGEURS PROGRAM

ALLEGED RACIAL DISCRIMINATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. This motion is pursuant to the participation by students in the Young Voyageurs Program to which the Department of the Secretary of State contributes and also to the report that a white girl from Cardston, Alberta, apparently may have been advised or directed not to stay at the home of a black girl at New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, thus apparently contradicting the aims of programs such as these funded by all Canadians and designed to encourage personal interaction among Canadians from different regions of the country. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the Secretary of State take whatever action he considers appropriate to ensure that as an integral part of all programs to which his department contributes in any way there are guidelines or conditions that there be no discrimination involved, thus setting out the principles implicit in the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

DOMESTIC PAPER SUPPLY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my motion under Standing Order 43 to the series of 43's today.

In view of the fact that exports by British Columbia paper mills threaten a sufficient supply of these products to meet local needs this summer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

That this House urge the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to consult with his provincial counterparts with a view to limiting paper exports to the extent that domestic demands can first be satisfied.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is also proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AIRPORTS

RECLASSIFICATION FROM CLASS D TO CLASS C—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that airliners over 200,000 pounds are now being permitted to land on a limited basis at airports at which they have not been able to land recently, I move under Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche):

That the Minister of Transport be instructed by this House to make a statement on motions to explain this very exciting news and to explain how the airports involved have become reclassified from class D to class C airports.

Mr. Speaker: Again, the motion proposed by the hon. member requires unanimous consent under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

AUTOMOTIVE TRADE WITH UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43. According to figures released by Statistics Canada yesterday, Canada experienced a further major decline in automotive trade with the United States, particularly in automotive parts, which if continued could lead to the largest annual deficit in automotive trade with the United States in many years. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House instruct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to make a statement on motions early next week offering an explanation for Canada's deteriorating position on automotive trade with the United States and outlining the course of action the government proposes to take to remedy this situation, with particular reference to changes in the Canada-United States automotive agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put under the terms of Standing Order 43.

TABLING OF AGREED MINUTE SIGNED BY MINISTER AND MINISTER OF ECONOMY OF IRAN FOLLOWING RECENT CANADIAN MISSION

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I should like to lay on the table of the House in both official languages an agreed minute signed jointly by His Excellency Hushang Ansary, Minister of Economy of Iran, and myself, reporting on the discussions which were held on the occasion of the recent Canadian trade mission to Iran.

TRADE

REPORTED DEFICIT WITH UNITED STATES IN MARCH—POSSIBILITY OF U.S. IMPORT LEVY ON CANADIAN TRUCK PARTS—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question and supplementaries for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact Canada's trade with the United States suffered a deficit in March of $89 million compared with a deficit in February of this year of $42 million, has the minister determined whether this trend is shortlived or, if it is a continuing one, can it be anticipated over what period of time it will continue and, if it is anticipated that it will continue, what does the government intend to do about it?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think if the hon. gentleman were to look at the figures he would see that for the first quarter we had a surplus.

Mr. O'Connor: Mr. Speaker, I am quoting Statistics Canada which is the government's own agency and certainly it indicates a deficit of $89 million and not a surplus. May I refer specifically to the auto pact between Canada and the United States. In view of reports yesterday that the United States has proposed an import levy on Canadian-made truck parts, an action clearly in violation of the auto pact and taken despite Canada's significant auto pact trade deficit last year of over $350 million, what is the government's response to the United States proposal?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, reverting to the first question, by way of clarification I should like to make it quite clear to the hon. member that there are fluctuations from month to month, and on an over-all basis Canada had a surplus on merchandise trade for the first quarter of this year. On the second point, with respect to the alleged duties that might be applied to truck parts, I believe that story is quite inaccurate.

ACTION TO ASSURE ADHERENCE TO AUTO PACT BY UNITED STATES

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the reports, which I believe are accurate in that I have checked them personally, that Ford of Canada intends to produce only large cars at Oakville starting with model year 1975 and now that General Motors similarly intends to phase out small car production at Ste. Thérèse, both of which moves will severely affect Canadian parts manufacturers, if not automobiles, when will the government make a determined effort to assure adherence to the Canada-U.S. auto pact by the United States?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the question was a very general one. I think the hon. member inadvertently tried to create the impression that in some way Ste. Thérèse was not going to proceed with small car production. That, of course, is quite inaccurate as I have already told the House on a previous occasion. On the second question, with respect to living up to the agreement, I think both countries and the companies in both countries have, through their joint co-operative efforts, made the auto pact a very beneficial one from both points of view.

● (1420)

Mr. O'Connor: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I thought I had emphasized that I was not referring to any problem that might arise with respect to the automotive manufacturers themselves but to the parts industry which supplies the manufacturers. If there is a change quickly from small car production to large car production, those automotive parts suppliers will suffer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is debate between the minister and the hon. member. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

DEFICIT IN AUTOMOTIVE TRADE WITH UNITED STATES—ACTION TO ENSURE CANADA GETS GREATER SHARE OF INDUSTRY INVESTMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the major explanation for the deficit Canada has experienced in the automotive trade in the first three months of this year and all last year is to be found in the investment patterns in this industry in the United States, where investment exceeds investment in Canada by a ratio of nine or ten to one, what is the government doing to ensure that we get in Canada our share of the investment in this industry?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I reject the basic premise of the question. The reason for the significant change in terms of the balance is that the Canadian market has been the strong one and the American market a very weak one.

USE OF DISC PROGRAM BY UNITED STATES AUTO INDUSTRY—CANADIAN PROTESTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, without accepting by way of premise the conclusion of the minister, may I ask him if the government has yet protested, either through some international body or directly to the United States, against the DISC program which is being used by the automotive industry in the United States in flat contradiction of the agreement signed between the two countries concerning automotive trade?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on other occasions it has been made very clear that the Canadian government does not favour the DISC program and the government has so made these views known.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that the government has said it has made these protests, including the protest by the preceding minister, for the past 15 to 18 months without results, can the minister inform the House what the government intends to do inasmuch as the United States is ignoring these protests?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that by now the hon. gentleman would have realized that one of the major reasons for the corporate tax cuts was to put the Canadian manufacturing industry on a competitive basis with the United States manufacturing industry.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

BILL TO BE INTRODUCED TO CONTROL PROFITEERING

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since he announced yesterday that he would introduce next Monday a bill intended to bring to order some of the companies that make exorbitant profits, the radio and television have not ceased to clamour that the bill promised by the Prime Minister was prepared by the socialists in Parliament in order to avoid elections. Would the Prime Minister clarify the situation and say whether socialism is making some headway within the Liberal party, or whether the government will protect personal initiative and private enterprise?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the simplest way of answering the leader of the Social Crediters is to remind the House that probably the same journalists have been asking this in the last few months: When will the Prime Minister implement the promise made during the debate on the Speech from the Throne and take action against the companies whose benefits are excessive?- After asking the question for months they are flabbergasted that I should introduce the bill I promised.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Is the Prime Minister also alluding to the CBC in his reply?

FINANCE

SUGGESTED ACTION TO CONTROL RISE IN LEVEL OF CANADIAN DOLLAR VIS-À-VIS UNITED STATES DOLLAR

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. As the Canadian dollar has now risen to $1.04½ U.S., making it increasingly difficult for the 25 per cent of our production sold in the export market to be sold competitively, as shown by the last two months of merchandise trade deficits, will the minister advise the House just how high the government is willing to let the Canadian dollar rise before it will step in to control this rise?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not speculate on interest rates or exchange rates on the floor of the House of Commons, but I say to the hon. member that he should reconcile the policy he is advocating with his friend from Don Valley who has been recommending for some months that the Canadian dollar appreciate against the American dollar. The current reasons for this appear to be, first of all, the general weakness of the American dollar, reflecting a very weak first quarter in the American economy, compounded by the Canadian situation where we have a very strong economy and perhaps the best balance of payments situation of any industrial country in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: As the minister made no attempt to answer my question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: —and obviously intends to take no action to stop the dollar from rising and endangering Canadian exports, may I ask the minister whether this is the kind of dynamic leadership we can expect him to give when he presents his budget on May 6?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether that supplementary is in order. The hon. member for Peace River.

ALLEGED PRIOR REVELATION OF BUDGET PROPOSALS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance who will be bringing down his budget on May 6. He is obviously aware of the strict requirements as to secrecy of presentation regarding the budget. Was the minister aware and did he approve of the striptease technique practised by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Prime Minister in response to a planted question, in disclosing matters and tax proposals which quite clearly are or ought to lie squarely within the realm of a budget presentation? Did he give his approval to what was done, or has he expressed his concern to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I would like the hon. member to specify what particular divulgations I made which might be of a budgetary nature. Would he please do that? He has accused me of talking about budgetary matters.

Some hon. Members: Oh oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Peace River on a supplementary question.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take the Prime Minister outside later because I am unable to answer questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Members on this side will be answering questions in a few short weeks. I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Has the minister received representations today following the extremely chaotic conditions which prevailed on the stock exchanges, particularly in Toronto, with a monetary erosion of almost $2 billion in Toronto and a 50 per cent increase in the volume of sales as a result of these improper disclosures? Is the minister able to assure the House there will be no further disclosures, either in the form of public electronic trafficking for political advantage or at all, and can he assure the House that the residue of the budget will be brought in without any further disclosures?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, can I take it that the hon. member is withdrawing his allegation regarding me in his first question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1430)

Mr. Muir: Who is the Minister of Finance and who is the leader?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the Minister of Finance rising on a point of order?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, to answer the question put to me by the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me there has been an exchange of questions and answers. If the hon. member for Peace River wishes to pursue the matter he will be recognized, but for the moment the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Verdun.

ALLEGED RACIAL DISCRIMINATION—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State. In the light of what appears to be an act of discrimination in a program financed by the federal government, would the minister immediately investigate the matter to see whether such discriminatory directives arise from his own department and, if so, will he send the responsible person immediately to the U.I.C. offices?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order on behalf of my hon. friend from Central Nova to draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that this matter was put forward in a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 and the minister's supporters refused consent to deal with the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): The former minister of labour should be calling on the minister to resign and on the hon. members who supported him in this discrimination to resign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not know who shouted no. I know how I felt about the proposed motion under Standing Order 43. I supported the very logical proposal of the hon. member for Central Nova and I am showing my anger in the only way I can, as a member, by asking a question of the minister directly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond rose on a point of order and the hon. member for Verdun has spoken to the point of order. The minister is prepared to reply, and I will certainly recognize the hon. member for Central Nova on a supplementary.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): On a further point of order, I apologize to the hon. member for Verdun since he stood behind the motion under Standing Order 43. But the fact remains, Mr. Speaker, that you yourself put the motion a second time and the supporters of the Secretary of State on two occasions showed their discrimination.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, maybe I could clarify the situation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Muir: No way!

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): A double whamee!

Mr. Faulkner: Hon. members do not seem to be treating this matter very seriously.

An hon. Member: We do.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Central Nova now rises on a question of privilege. I am not sure whether all this is very helpful, but I will recognize the hon. member.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is simply this. Unfortunately the minister was not in the House when the motion under Standing Order 43 was presented, and I do not think it is proper for him to suggest that we on this side do not take this matter seriously. We do. I put it to Your Honour that this is an improper allegation for the minister to make.

An hon. Member: Silly!

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, the incident was brought to my attention this morning. I have dispatched one of my officials to look into the matter. I would point out to hon. members opposite, before they begin to make blanket accusations about the Young Voyageurs Program, that although it is financed federally it is administered provincially. I can assure the hon. member for Verdun and others who have raised this matter that as a matter of principle this government will not tolerate any form of discrimination under any of its programs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond).]

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I just want to take this opportunity to thank those hon. members on the other side who supported the motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 and ask the minister—I concede that this is a provincially administered program—to look into this matter diligently and consider, insofar as possible, implementing guidelines or conditions to govern funds contributed to programs such as this so as to prohibit strictly any such discrimination, as is done already in many other areas of government legislation.

Mr. Faulkner: Yes, Mr. Speaker, if it is necessary. But I would point out that the program has been operating for ten years and this is the first incident of this kind which has occurred. But if it should prove to be necessary to provide protection against this sort of thing, I would certainly be willing to look at the hon. member's suggestion about guidelines.

REQUEST THAT PROVISION AGAINST DISCRIMINATION BE INCLUDED IN ALL GOVERNMENT FUNDED PROGRAMS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the seriousness of this matter I wonder whether the Prime Minister, in keeping with what I know his attitude to be, will cause an investigation of all government funded programs to be made to see to it that a clause prohibiting discrimination is included in each of them, thus indicating that this House and the government take a dim view of discrimination whether on the basis of race, creed, colour, sex or national origin? Would he assure the House that this will be done? I am very serious about the matter.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As to the substance of the question I agree, of course, with the hon. member—and he was good enough to recognize this in his question. As to the way in which we might proceed, I do not think the solution is as easy as he suggests. This government has been concerned for some time now that federally-funded programs which are administered by the provinces do not always respond to the particular criteria or even to the intentions of the federal government. I am talking now about such programs in general. There is a constant effort—and there is one currently going on—to make sure that when the funds are derived from the federal taxpayers the federal government should get its share not only of the responsibility but also of the credit for programs which have worked well—for ten years, in this case—and for which the provinces very often get more credit than the federal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR RESOURCES AFFECTED BY HIGH INTERNATIONAL PRICES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Cominco has reported a first quarter profit increase of 174 per cent and Sherritt Gordon 180 per cent and the fact that the president of Sherritt Gordon attributes this to unreasonably high prices on the world level for certain resources, does the right hon. gentleman now intend to extend the two-price system to resources affected by high prices at the international level?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will stand by the position taken by the Minister of Finance in response to a question of this type a few days ago.

INCREASE IN DIVIDENDS, INTEREST AND BUSINESS SERVICE CHARGES—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO END PROFITEERING

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of reports this morning that in the first four months of this year dividends have increased by 35 per cent, and since the majority of these payments are going to non-residents, as well as increased interest charges and business service charges, could the minister say whether or not he intends to introduce legislation to end this type of profiteering?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): That four-month report is not completely conclusive as to the trend, but this will be one of the over-all subjects to which I shall wish to address myself when I am thinking of what I should say in the budget speech.

ENERGY

ELECTRICITY—POSSIBILITY OF SUBMARINE POWER CABLE TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND TO REDUCE COST

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it relates to a question I asked him about a month ago in respect of rapidly increasing electricity costs in Prince Edward Island, the recent energy agreement and in particular the proposed construction of a submarine power cable. He indicated at that time that he had instructed further discussions to take place on this matter. Is he now in a position to make an announcement in respect of a decision or does he expect a decision shortly in order that some hope might be given to Prince Edward Islanders regarding their high electricity costs and the likelihood of even more increases in the future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the more fundamental aspects of this question, we are awaiting the outcome of the election to pursue the discussion, hopefully with Premier Campbell.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: But on a related matter, Mr. Speaker, I am informed that Premier Campbell will be making an announcement in the next couple of days relating to a subsidiary matter on which we have already agreed regarding the transportation of electricity.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member on a supplementary. I believe the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo has a supplementary to a previous question and I will come to him immediately afterward.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question in respect of the agreement to be announced shortly. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether any actual feasibility or engineering studies have been done with regard to a submarine power cable or whether such studies will be commissioned shortly, and when there might be some report from those studies in order that some final decision might be made?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that this is the very matter which will be the subject of an announcement by Premier Campbell within a very few days.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have one further supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister give the House some idea as to when there might be, and there is no pun intended, a concrete decision in respect of the actual cable itself, because that is the operative question in this whole matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think this is a repetition of the first question to which I answered that there would be an announcement relating to the second question, which is surely preliminary to the concrete action to which he has referred. There have to be research and feasibility studies, and because this is a joint agreement I would not want to be any more explicit today in the House but will wait until the time that both the province and the federal government agreed to.

Oral Questions

POST OFFICE

POSTAL WORKERS' STRIKE—DISTRIBUTION OF FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that of the Leader of the Opposition and it is for the Postmaster General. Yesterday he repeated that he had secret plans for getting family allowance cheques out of the regional post offices and into the hands of the people who are awaiting them. Without asking him to compromise the secrecy of his plans for getting them out of the regional post offices, can he inform the House where the people who are expecting family allowance cheques in southwestern Ontario will be able to pick them up and at what time? Can he indicate whether it will be in the first half of next week and where?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member is referring to old age pension cheques or family allowance cheques.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Family allowance cheques.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, family allowance cheques are almost all distributed except a very few, and they are in the process of being delivered presently.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary question of the minister for clarification. In the case of the hundreds of people who are expecting family allowance cheques which were stranded in regional post offices when the strike was called, has he been able to get them out of the post offices and distributed since then?

Mr. Ouellet: Most of them, yes, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

FEED GRAINS—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO HIGH PRICE OF WHEAT IN EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Since the publication La Terre de chez-nous reports that first quality wheat sells for $7.09 per hundredweight in eastern Canada and in Quebec in particular, and the Canadian Wheat Board informs us in its report that western farmers get only $2.65 a hundredweight for the same quality of wheat, does the minister intend to investigate and check this exploitation of eastern farmers, not profitable in any way to western farmers?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, these prices are all monitored and all posted. It is very easy for them to check the actual cost of shipping and the actual commissions involved in respect of the people actually handling the sales. These figures when broken down show, I believe, that no one would be getting an unwarranted mark-up on the grain. In addition, as I am sure the hon. member is aware, Ontario corn is much cheaper and many people are buying this.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Can the Minister of Agriculture assure the House that the bill to control profiteering which will be introduced shortly will deal with the exploitation of the western farmers who get only $2.65 a hundredweight of wheat, while eastern farmers must pay $7.05 for it?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think the only thing I can tell the hon. member is that he will have to be patient for a couple of more days to see the bill himself.

GRAIN

NORTHEASTERN ALBERTA—AID TO FARMERS WHOSE UNHARVESTED CROPS DESTROYED BY FLOODS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Inasmuch as flood conditions in northeastern Alberta have virtually destroyed a great portion of the unharvested crop remaining in that area, is he now reconsidering his earlier decision with regard to crop aid to the farmers who are affected there since, now that the floods have taken place, these people will not have a harvest to complete, and also bearing in mind that large advances have been taken out on those crops?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if we have received an official request from the province of Alberta, but I do know from telephone conversations between our officials and officials of the Alberta Department of Agriculture that there have been some rough estimates of the loss. I understand that a formal request will be presented to the federal government, and we have responded generally to these requests in the past.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Generally or generously?

Mr. Mazankowski: Some time ago the province of Alberta did make representations to the federal Department of Agriculture requesting that acreage payments be made. I am simply asking the Minister of Agriculture whether he is now reconsidering his earlier decision in regard to that proposal made by the Minister of Agriculture for the province of Alberta?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we have done practically—I do not think I can say exactly—what was requested by the province of Alberta at the time I met with the minister for that province. Before the spring runoff, which is taking place at the present time as a result of the melting of snow, there had been very small requests by the farmers of Alberta amounting to a total of $80,000, according to the last records I saw, because they too were waiting to see how much of their crops they were going to harvest. I admit that things have certainly changed since then.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a further supplementary, and then the hon. member for Labelle.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your indulgence. I am indeed surprised and rather disappointed with the explanation of the Minister of Agriculture. Can he explain to the House why that area of Canada is being treated differently from areas such as the eastern part of Ontario and Quebec which faced similar situations a year ago in respect of which the federal government participated in crop aid?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I take strong exception to what the hon. member is trying to insinuate. We have treated them all the very same no matter what part of Canada they are in.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: We recently agreed with the province of Saskatchewan to pay $1,200,000 because there was no insurance available in that area. The hon. member knows that insurance was available to those people for this type of crop loss in Alberta, as does the Minister of Agriculture for Alberta, and that is why the step was taken in Quebec and even in eastern Ontario where insurance was not available.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: All talk.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Alberta gets it again.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AIR TRANSPORT

AIRPORT FIREFIGHTERS' STRIKE—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

Could he advise the House of the progress made in the bargaining between his department and the firemen on the Canadian airports?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, there is no bargaining involved, but rather the question of finding out whether the report concerning the bargaining between the Treasury Board and the Civil Service Alliance, acting on behalf of the firemen, has been approved or not. Some 20 minutes ago, I learned that the firemen had rejected the agreement reached by the Civil Service Alliance and the government, which means, as far as I could judge from the statements made by the firemen involved, that they will resume work immediately, the Alliance having accepted to submit the conflict to arbitration, and I am told that a request for arbitration has already been sent to the Canada Labour Relations Board as regards aspects related to the Public Service. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seems that we may see the normal resuming of operations.

INQUIRY AS TO REACHING OF AGREEMENT WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS ON PAY INCREASE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate whether an agreement has been reached between the government and the air traffic controllers who are seeking a new contract with his department?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): No, they are not seeking a contract with my department. They are seeking a contract with Treasury Board.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I will redirect my question to the President of the Treasury Board. Would he indicate whether any agreement has been reached between the air traffic controllers and the Treasury Board with regard to their request for an increase in remuneration?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker, not as yet, but we are working continuously to achieve this objective.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta for a supplementary and then the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

RECLASSIFICATION OF CERTAIN AIRPORTS FROM CLASS D TO CLASS C

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact the minister has reclassified Vancouver international airport and other airports from class D airports to class C airports so that DC-8's are now landing on a limited basis, can he tell us why they were not reclassified at the start of the strike so we could have had better service?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): For the very good reason that the supervisors fulfilling these duties wanted to know how to operate very suitably and rapidly the equipment which they did not know before. It is a matter of security, and now they say they can handle the equipment to take care of the DC-8's and 707's.

Mr. Speaker: I seek the co-operation of hon. members to attempt to limit the number of supplementaries between now and the end of the question period. I will see the hon. member for a supplementary.

Mr. Reynolds: I have a short question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister telling us that those supervisors were not fully trained and that the security was not good at the start of the strike?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): They were trained and they could handle the aircraft that were described in the communiqué issued to the press. Now that they are better trained they say, "well, we can take a little bit more".

FLOODS

PREVENTION MEASURES BY TOWN OF LUMSDEN, SASKATCHEWAN—POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Prime Minister but he just got away on me. I will direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who just became Acting Prime Minister. In view of the response to a question of mine on Tuesday by the Minister of the Environment regarding compensation for temporary works such as dykes, sandbagging, bulldozing and so forth to the effect that they would be subject to the federal formula for cost-sharing, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister if the government agrees with that answer and that in fact communities such as the town of Lumsden will be able to receive financial assistance under the federal formula?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to answer a question so precisely. Certainly the Minister of the Environment was speaking for the government and I support the statement he has made on behalf of the government. The particular question about Lumsden the hon. member has put to me now I shall have to take under consideration.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of the Environment if he has the support of his colleagues in the Cabinet and the government for his answer to my question of last Tuesday or whether the minister in charge of the Wheat Board when speaking in Regina yesterday was correct in saying as indicated in the following report?

Mr. Lang told a press conference the existing federal-provincial cost-sharing formula for disaster loss compensation does not extend to the cost of efforts to prevent the disaster.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I want to correct the quotation which the hon. member puts forward. I think that in the various statements that have been made what must be appreciated is what the Acting Prime Minister just referred to, that it is difficult to make a complete statement on the situation because whatever is paid by the federal treasury under our formula depends upon the approval in the first instance of the province of payments in respect of those matters. There is a list of things which are eligible on our part, but it depends first on what the province does and at this stage there is no way of knowing precisely what the province will do. But we have a very important support formula—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

Mr. Lewis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member. The hon. member for York South seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Lewis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The question was addressed to the Minister of the Environment. The Minister of Justice rose to his feet to clarify a statement which he was reported to have made. He did nothing of the sort. He added to the confusion. I think he was arrogant in rising and confusing in his remarks and that the Minister of the Environment should be given a chance to answer the question so that the citizens of Lumsden will know whether or not there is a chance for them to get some assistance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has no objection, of course, to allowing the minister to reply to the hon. member's question, but we are running short of time and I am wondering whether this is what hon. members want the Chair to do.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer is that we are both right, the Minister of Justice and myself, in respect of my answer the other day. All works which have been put in place currently or as a result of the current flood threat, as well as damages incurred as a result of the flooding, are subject to the federal formula and compensation from Ottawa. It is a fact that the province makes out the cheques and the federal government then pays the province on a matching dollar basis, the formula for which includes a threshold above which the federal contribution rises in an ascending fashion. Dikes recently put in place to deal with the flood threat, sandbagging and so on are all subject to federal support.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain. Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period. I will, of course, recognize the hon. member who is seeking the floor on a question of privilege and then the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain who has been trying to get the floor for three or four minutes. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is very brief. It can be simply handled by the Acting Prime Minister on behalf of all members of the House and the residents of Saskatchewan, particularly Lumsden, if he will have the Minister of Justice keep his nose out of this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. I suggest to hon. members that these alleged points of order and questions of privilege are not really what they are claimed to be. They are really debate between members and a minister. Perhaps we might try to go on to the next question. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

MOOSE JAW—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE FEDERAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the World Health Organization has recently suggested an international study of the migration of health personnel. We have just received representations from the World Health Organization in this respect. We are considering this proposal for study and I would think this matter might well be raised at the next conference of WHO in Geneva during the month of May.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we met the Ministers of Agriculture from la belle province, Mr. Pepin, and from the next belle province, Ontario, yesterday afternoon.

While I am on my feet I should like to make a correction to the answer which I gave earlier to the hon. member regarding flood damage in Alberta. I erred when I said that we were sharing with Saskatchewan $1,200,000. It is possibly $2 million that we will be sharing with them. Also, the Alberta government has informed us that as soon as they make a complete survey of the damage they will send us a formal request.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

I have a clear impression that I did not get the answer I wanted. I want to know precisely—and I am very happy for the people of Ontario, Mr. Speaker—whether the minister is prepared to revise or reconsider milk policies to give a positive answer to the requests of the Quebec Federation of Milk Producers.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: The Minister of Agriculture of the province of Quebec has asked if I will meet with these people together with him, and I have agreed to this. We have also agreed to look over the whole program. But, to be fair, let me point out that the whole program is not three weeks old yet, and I do not know how they can say just what it is going to be. However, we are willing to explain it in greater detail to show them what this program will do and what we hope to do with the new long-term dairy policy.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton and then we will have to call orders of the day.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL CAPITAL

POLICY OF GOVERNMENT ON USE OF GREEN BELT—SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF REGIONAL MUNICIPALITY CHAIRMEN TO COMMISSION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact there is a study under way by the National Capital Commission which may result in the reshaping of the green belt and its possible use for housing under certain circumstances, would the minister inform the House whether his statement on June 29, 1973, that the green belt would not be used for industrial purposes and his statement on July 9, 1973, that he would not recommend a transportation complex in the green belt still represent the policy of the government with respect to the use of the green belt?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Those statements stand. The commission is, however, as the chairman made clear, reviewing its policy on land holdings, which include many other things than the green belt, and they will be making recommendations to the government in due course which we will be considering. Their determination in preparing and reviewing their land holdings is, however, to protect the integrity of the green belt and to ensure that it is a valuable conservation and recreation asset.

Mr. Baker: In view of the critical planning stage we have reached in the national capital area, particularly in the relationships of the regional municipalities with the federal government which is the largest landholder, has the government taken a position with respect to the appointment of the chairman of both regional municipalities, the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton on the one hand and Outaouais regional municipality on the other, as members of the National Capital Commission so that there can be co-ordination on the policymaking level of the commission?

Mr. Basford: No, Mr. Speaker, but it may well be that Mr. Fullerton, the former chairman of NCC, who is preparing a report on the structure of the NCC, which report will be referred to a committee of the House in due course, may want to examine it. With regard to the substance of the question, I want to assure the hon. member that there is a very close collaboration between the two regional municipalities and the NCC in their planning processes which are very current at the present time, and I would anticipate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have gone beyond the question period. Perhaps the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain might be allowed a supplementary, and I believe the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster has a point of order.

INFORMATION CONTAINED IN BOOKLET "CANADA'S NEW CAPITAL"

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question was for the Prime Minister but I will direct it to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In May, 1973, the Prime Minister commissioned a special task force to study the national capital area. To my knowledge, the study headed by Mr. Fullerton has yet to be tabled. Can the minister tell me if the booklet, "Canada's New Capital", which contains information that one would expect from Mr. Fullerton's study, is indeed a leak from that study and, second, does the minister agree that land bought from the E. B. Eddy Company in the province of Quebec is indeed in the heart of the capital of Canada, as stated in the booklet?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no relationship between Mr. Fullerton's study, which I understand is on time, and this booklet. The study has not yet been submitted to the government but I understand that Mr. Fullerton's preparation work is on time for his study. With reference to the second part of the question, the E. B. Eddy property is partly located in the province of Ontario and partly in the province of Quebec. It is located in the centre of the national capital region as agreed to by the Prime Minister and ten provincial premiers some years ago.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Bell: May I ask the government House leader the business for next week and say to him that we are willing to show reasonable co-operation in moving forward these small bills before the finality of the budget makes itself known the following week.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we propose to continue until completion second reading of Bill C-3, environmental contaminants, to be followed by Bill C-27, the railway crossing bill, followed by the federal business development bank bill and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. I might mention to the House that I propose to give notice of the end of profiteering bill on Friday, and probably will be able to call it on Tuesday—

Mr. Hees: That is known as the NDP buy-off bill.

Mr. MacEachen: —if the House is ready to deal with such a comprehensive measure after only a day to study it.

With reference to the railway crossing bill, I understand it would be agreeable if the House ordered that debate on second reading be confined to two speakers for each of the parties in the House and that following that we would deal with the bill in Committee of the Whole with no limitation. I would say it would be my intention to continue with the railway crossing bill today. If it were completed, I would call the Federal Business Development Bank but if not, and in any event, I would call the Federal Business Development Bank as the first item of business tomorrow to give hon. members some certainty as to what will be before the House on Friday.

An hon. Member: Is Stanley happy with all that?

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rising on the same point of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): First, Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate our agreement with the House order which was proposed.

Mr. Hees: It is just the way you wrote it, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope I am just as successful when I ask when we will see the bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I must say I cannot thank the hon. member for giving me notice of that question! I cannot tell my hon. friend when he will see it but I can assure him that he will see it in the near future. We are working on it.

Mr. Bell: How many shopping lists have you got?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will we get it before budget day?

Mr. Hees: Otherwise there will be trouble!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to do serious business with the distractions provided by the hon. gentlemen opposite. I cannot give that assurance, but my hon. friend will see it in a form that will make it irresistible to him.

An hon. Member: Allan in wonderland!

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege concerns the publication of this booklet "Canada's New Capital" by the National Capital Commission. I said earlier that I thought there was a leak from this bulletin. I see here that part of the address of this commission contains the proposed new name for the capital of Canada, namely 48 Rideau Street, Ottawa-Hull. Would the Minister of State or the Postmaster General wish to comment on that?

ENVIRONMENTAL CONTAMINANTS ACT

MEASURE TO PROTECT HUMAN HEALTH AND ENVIRONMENT FROM CONTAMINATING SUBSTANCES

The House resumed, from Wednesday, April 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Davis that Bill C-3, to protect human health and the environment from the release of substances that contaminate the environment, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the item before the House now is the item standing in the name of the hon. Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis). The point of order which was raised by the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) related to the next order of business. I wonder whether it is the wish of the House that that order be passed immediately in respect of the second item of business. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The understanding of the Chair was that there would be two speakers from each party in the House or a maximum of two speakers for each party and that the bill be referred to a committee of the whole. Is this agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my remarks were almost completed at six o'clock last night. I had pointed out to the minister some of the concerns that we on this side of the House have about the bill. I had pointed out to the minister, as had colleagues on this side of the House, that we welcome the measure but that we would want to subject the bill to much closer scrutiny when it gets to committee. I have pointed out that we would much rather have had some official guidelines which other levels of governments, departments of government and industry could follow. We would have liked to see some moneys in the bill. The minister went to great lengths to explain that the onus would be on industry, on the offenders, rather than on the government and the people to ensure that there is no environmental damage or damage to human life as a result of pollution and industrial discharge. He said that industries must pay. We all agree, Mr. Speaker. That is not a difficult idea to sell these days, if we look at the federal budget. The question is, for what does industry have to pay?

There is a certain amount of uncertainty about this bill because the minister introduces all kinds of new problems. We have gone a step further now. We used to say, "Don't do like we do, do like we say". Now, we have altered that to "Do as we might say". The bill introduces all kinds of new things that could happen.

The disclosure section of the bill refers to the minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare having reason to believe that a substance is being or will be released into the environment. This could be a strange substance, Mr. Speaker, something that we do not know about today, that could have been released into the environment or that might be released in the future. The clause provides that the minister may cause an order to be published in the Canada Gazette and that he may send written notice to those engaged in the activity. But, Mr. Speaker, how is the minister going to find out about the offence in order to have it published in the Canada Gazette or to send a letter? He would have to send out an army of witch hunters, such as we have in other departments of government. They would have to report to him that something is about to happen that might damage the environment or human health. There is a great feeling of uncertainty as a result of this bill. I am sure that my colleagues in the opposition and, I hope in the government, would like to rectify some of these matters when the bill is in committee.

I am not fishing in the dark, Mr. Speaker. I should like to recite a situation in which I was involved. In this case the Department of Public Works, on behalf of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, contracted to carry out some work in the Northwest Territories. A private firm was engaged to move equipment to the site and commence the work. There was some delay because of floods and transportation problems, so by the time the contractor got to the site the Department of the Environment had decided not to issue an environmental permit. Subsequently, through the Department of Public Works and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the work was cancelled. Then, it was discovered that the contractor had to be compensated for the cost of bringing his equipment on site. However, due to the fact that there was a delay, not of a year or of six months or of three weeks, but of two days, by a technicality it was decided that he did not have to be compensated. Had he been on the site at the specified time, he would have had to be compensated but because he was two days late, there was this loophole.

I point this out, Mr. Speaker, three departments of government were involved and yet we put the onus on industry to protect itself. I ask, against what are we asking industry to protect us? Surely it is the responsibility of the federal government, in conjunction with provincial governments, to provide guidelines with respect to substances which are polluting our air, water and environment. Such guidelines are not now in existence. It is easy to provide for anti-pollution equipment when a plant is in the planning stage. If there are guidelines with respect to pollution levels, they can be applied at the stage where the feasibility of a new plant is being considered, and then they can budget for equipment. It becomes almost impossible to plan with respect to pollution control if you are not planning on the basis of known factors. I know the minister is concerned about this.

When the bill is in committee I hope members will work with diligence to work out some solution to this difficulty. I know it cannot be done overnight, as the problem is complex. We must arrive at some solution so that we can provide business and industry with guidelines in this area. When introducing the bill yesterday, the minister said several times that he strongly favours prevention as opposed to cure. To my mind strict guidelines are the first preventive measure which ought to be considered in dealing with this serious problem.

Having said this, I assure the minister that my colleagues on this side welcome the bill. We should have liked to see it long ago, but, nonetheless, we will co-operate in every way possible to pass the measure. Efforts will be made on our behalf to move amendments. The minister invited comments and amendments to this bill. I know he will co-operate when they are advanced.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I will not unduly delay the progress of this bill which is of sufficient importance to warrant broad discussion at this stage of our deliberations. The concept of controlling and managing the environment is of fairly recent origin. Members who have spoken in the debate so far have said how pleased they are to note the initiative taken by the government in taking this further step in dealing with the problems connected with the environment.

In his statement yesterday the minister emphasized that the purpose of the bill is preventive, that it anticipates the possible contamination of man's environment. He said that it also deals with a broader concept, the protection of human health. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes), who spoke on the bill yesterday, dealt in detail with the health aspects of the bill and about problems which flow from contamination. I do not need to report what he said.

As the minister has included in the bill a concept for protecting human health from contaminants, I hope he realizes how broad are the dimensions of what is implied. If such an idea is to be effective, we shall need legislation much more comprehensive than that represented by Bill C-3 which is now before us.

May I comment briefly on the object of prevention. Although it is desirable to make sure that man does not further unnecessarily contaminate his environment with man-made contaminants, particularly through the growth of the synthetic industry, I need hardly remind the minister that we cannot arrest the problem at this stage with legislation like this. This legislation, which it is hoped will prevent man from further contaminating his environment through his own pollutants, hardly deals with the broader aspects of the problem.

Yesterday the minister said, justifiably, that he will require lots of advice if he is to come to grips with this difficulty. He expressed the hope that advisory councils, both formal and ad hoc, will be sufficient to keep him, the department and the government fully posted on the broad implications of the question.

That brings me to the first point of my brief contribution today. There has been in existence since 1962 an advisory council which, I think, will be one of our most useful tools for dealing with environmental pollution in future, as anticipated in the bill, and for dealing with some of the broader aspects of the problem yesterday outlined by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent. I am referring to the resource ministers council which has been in operation for the past 12 years. That council is a purely advisory body. It cannot be given executive responsibility because the area of resources, particularly renewable resources like air and water with which the present bill is designed to deal, is an area of joint jurisdiction. Responsibility lies somewhere between federal and provincial administrations.

All governments have failed to come to grips with pollution, partly because it has been difficult to know where specific areas of responsibility lie. That is one of the difficulties of life in a federal state. Here is a ready made advisory council which is based in one of our major cities, Montreal. It has been in existence for the past 12 or 13 years. Its purpose is to advise the federal government and provincial levels of government on the broad implications of pollution, particularly environmental pollution, and to recommend legislative solutions. The resource ministers council will make this broader examination possible, as it is involved with the private sector of the Canadian economy.

The minister went to some lengths to point out that the bill will be effective because the polluter will pay. The bill implies that the polluter in most instances in industry and, as a financial penalty is to be imposed on the polluter, industry will be more circumspect in its plans and programs for industrial growth and expansion. The difficulty from my reading of the bill is, how are we to bring about enforcement? The bill is pretty well permissive and voluntary in this aspect.

How are we going to get the cooperation of industry? The suggestion seems to be that the advisory committees will keep a watching brief on the whole problem. The advisory committees will report to the government and, having received the report, the government will move in to take the necessary corrective action.

It would be much more useful and effective if somewhere in the bill it could be stated that industry itself has some responsibility of giving notice of its intentions to move into an area where the synthetic products involved might be the source of contamination. This would anticipate the problem. It would lock the door before the horse is stolen in the figurative sense, and would have the desired effect of preventing the difficulty rather than trying to resolve it after it has developed.

If we are looking for a body that would look at the whole aspect of the problem, not only intergovernmental, but the continuing relationships between industry and governments, the resource ministers council with its qualified staff which has been carrying out studies in the area of pollution control for the past number of years would be most useful and effective in this regard.

The greatest difficulty in administering the bill will be the fact that there is an inherent conflict between industrial growth and the problem of pollution control. We had this brought forcibly to our attention in recent months when Canada and the world was faced with an energy crisis. Immediately there was a tendency to relax the emphasis of pollution control through the use of energy. We had a discussion in the House. Certain federal government departments were violating some of the standards laid down for the use of energy and domestic fuels that did not meet the restrictions on sulphur content laid down by government anti-pollution programs.

Here is where we will face the real difficulty of bringing the bill into effective implementation. We will not only need the voluntary control of industry, but there will have to be in the legislation some built-in safeguards to ensure that industrial polluters will not only be threatened with the necessity of paying for pollution, but will have some responsibility for reporting in anticipation of any particular industrial activity and growth that will constitute a threat.

I know the bill provides for the payment of any expenditures with regard to research in this area devolving upon the industrialists. This will make it all the more difficult to control these industrial polluters who because of the heavy financial penalty imposed by the terms of the legislation which makes them responsible for paying the cost of research, might be tempted to conceal the information that their activities are going to constitute a threat to man's environment.

Not only is it going to be necessary to get the support of industry by voluntary and, to a certain extent, legislative action if there is to be any hope of successful enforcement of the legislation, but there must be an assurance of continuous public support. In most instances, where the legislation is going to apply, it will be as a result of information laid by the concerned public.

It seems that as the issue has developed over the years, the public are ahead of governments in this regard. There has been pressure from the Canadian public. Indeed, very concerned people around the world have forced governments, which in many instances have been reluctant, to come to grips by introducing legislation to deal with the problem. It is the public protest and the public voluntary action that has gradually forced governments to move into this area. The fact that the United Nations has seen fit to move into the area of environmental control by setting up a separate secretariat indicates that it is not only a problem peculiar to Canada and North America, but that it is a problem of growing concern around the world.

One of the most hopeful developments is the growing concern of young people. It is the young people of Canada and around the world who are most concerned about the control of pollution on the spaceship earth. They are, of course, most concerned about the future prospects for the quality of life on the earth in which we live, move and have our being.

When this bill goes to committee, I hope we will have the opportunity of hearing from some of the organized groups in this country which have from time to time sent excellent briefs expressing their concern and indicating a considerable knowledge of the problem as the result of intensive study. I trust that when the bill goes into committee we might be able to hear from some of these voices from the people.

One final point I wish to make before concluding my remarks concerns the international implications. In the first instance the problem of environmental contamination as it involves the renewable resources of air and water, is respecter of international boundaries. I hope that at the committee stage there will not only be discussion on how we get provincial cooperation and the cooperation of private industry, but that there will be some consideration of cooperation, particularly within North America, across the international boundary. There are many areas of Canada which are crossed by international boundary waters.

I wish to mention one particular problem that concerns the part of Canada I represent in the House of Commons, the Souris River and the potential threat that arises from a project south of the border in the state of North Dakota that has been underway for a number of years. The Garrison Dam represents a major multi-million dollar project to control the waters of that area of the United States. Eventually it will involve the Souris and the Red River which crosses the international boundary.

Obviously, if the project of the United States is to proceed as anticipated by the planners in the American government, there should be some means by which Canadians can not only express their concern but can take effective action to prevent the pollution and contamination of boundary waters. I know there is already legislation in existence designed to deal with international boundary waters, and I know also that the government of Canada has expressed its opposition in official notes to Washington. But here we are debating and dealing with a piece of legislation which, as the minister outlined in his opening statement the other day, is bringing together important aspects of the issue which have been dealt with in isolation in the past. Here is a piece of legislation which is heralded as a major break-through in controlling environmental contamination, and I trust we shall not only consider the domestic aspects of the subject when we are deliberating in committee but also the fact that on the North American continent the prevention of the pollution of our environment, particularly of the air and water, will be dealt with effectively in this bill.

Several areas of concern have been brought to the minister's attention in the course of this debate. Members of the Official Opposition will be putting forward amendments in committee to improve the legislation. I trust that the minister, who in his presentation yesterday indicated he wanted this bill to represent a major break-through in pollution control, will take a positive and sympathetic attitude to these amendments when they come before the committee.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, while the bill now before us is not related to inflation, the cost of living, the price of groceries, the price of milk or the low purchasing power of those on fixed incomes, subjects which are of prime concern, I submit, to the Canadian people, the legislation in the name of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) nonetheless deals with another matter which is of great concern, if not of prime concern, to Canadians and to all who live on this planet, namely, environmental pollution and contamination.

To this extent, and because the bill will involve the imposition of more rigid controls, we on this side of the House wish to assure the minister of our general support for the measure, as long as due weight is given to all the implications and priorities which must inevitably enter into decisions on such questions. There are few provisions in the bill to suggest that the dividing line between pollution and the exploitation necessary for the development of our country has been sufficiently considered. The various reports which will be submitted to the minister under the provisions outlined here will do so, I trust.

My comments this afternoon will be to a large extent confined to an attempt to seek clarification—to remove some of the confusion, uncertainty and fuzziness which, I suggest, this legislation contains but which could be cleared up in committee. First of all, it is interesting to note that this is what might call a bi-ministerial bill. It is presented by the Minister of the Environment but it definitely and closely involves the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), for obvious reasons. The situation is one which requires close co-ordination between the two ministers. I hope this co-ordination will be forthcoming and that it will be effective. I hope that indeed it will be more effective than the co-ordination which has prevailed in the past between the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand)—I refer to the recent hand over of responsibilities in connection with small harbours. I believe things are on the right road now, but during the process of the hand-over the co-ordination between the ministers concerned left a certain amount to be desired. In this case, the ministers do not sit as close to each other as the two ministers I have just mentioned. Nevertheless, I trust they will be able to co-ordinate their activities in this field.

There is one thing which mystifies me with regard to this bill and I hope the minister will have something to say about it when he closes the debate on second reading. It is the use of the word "contaminant". The word everyone has been using up to now is "pollution". Suddenly, we find the word "contamination" being used, apparently as something distinct from "pollutant". Are they the same thing? I have looked up both words in the dictionary, and I find they are very close to being the same in meaning. The Concise Oxford Dictionary says that to contaminate is to pollute. I looked up "pollute" but the definition did not mention "contaminate". It said: "destroy the purity and sanctity of". That is about the same thing. Nevertheless, I am not quite sure why the minister has shifted his ground. Does he, for example, intend to exclude those pollutants which have captured the frightened imagination of the world in these last days and months—oil pollution at sea, for example? Is it his intention that industrial effluents be covered, or excluded? We are concerned nowadays about the effect of industrial effluents in the air in the form of smoke.

I recall hearing in a committee meeting I attended about the rather frightening prospect of vapour trails and ice trails being created by high-flying aircraft as a pollutant or contaminant of the atmosphere capable, it is thought, of altering atmospheric conditions, or environmental conditions of the world—I cannot use the word meteorological anymore—by increasing cloud cover. Is this the sort of contaminant the minister has in mind in presenting the bill with this wording, and I ask him this in all seriousness? There is another question, of course, in respect of car emission standards. Is this envisaged as part of the area this bill is intended to cover?

I also notice this wording, which again I find a little confusing:

—that a substance is being or is likely to be released into the environment—

It is true that we have to deal with language when formulating these clauses, and I am not being hypercritical. I am asking these questions and making these enquiries so I will understand what this bill is intended to cover in the way of pollutants that are being or are likely to be released. I have already mentioned vapour trails from high-flying aircraft amongst those things that are being released. I am wondering if such a thing as the Irving Whale, for example, which is below the water off the Cavendish Beach, is one of the concerns to be dealt with in this bill. This pollution is not being released, but it is capable of being released. Is it intended under this bill to require that this particular vessel be floated and that the energy it contains be put to some better use than is now the case?

In looking at His Excellency's recommendation I notice that it is intended to provide for the appointment of an Environmental Contaminants Board of Review, for the appointment of advisory committees, and for the designation of any person as an inspector or analyst. As I understand recommendations, these must be there because of the financial implications involved in these particular actions.

One area I do not see covered in this recommendation, and one I suggest we should not overlook, is research into possible contaminants or pollutants to ensure that proper measures of control are taken. This satisfies me to a certain extent, but I would like to have further assurances from the minister.

I notice in Clause 3 on page 3 of the bill the minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) are to be empowered under this particular provision to make use of the services and the facilities of other departments of the government of Canada or of any agencies thereof, by which I understand, and I hope I am correct in my understanding, this would mean the Defence Research Board, the National Research Council and other research agencies. However, there is no provision made for assigning to these research bodies the areas of inquiry or research into matters covered by the bill, and I think some consideration ought to be given to this. I welcome that particular clause at page 3 because it does go that far anyway.

I welcome also the reference to provincial consultation, and the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) who spoke just before me did mention the existence of a federal-provincial consultative body, the ministers of resources, which I think is a body that must be used more and more to ensure that there is not any heavy-footed federal interference in provincial jurisdictions, but that the provisions of the law that are applied across Canada shall be implemented, where they have to be implemented, provincially and not by imposition from the outside.

I note on pages 7 and 8 of the bill some reference to the tabling of reports which are prepared by the board and a decision as to whether those reports might be made public or whether they might be retained in the hands of the government rather than made public. We have had experience with government's refusing to table reports which, from all outward appearances, ought to be public documents. I am wondering whether it would not be a worthwhile amendment to suggest, and perhaps this will come out but I put it forward for what it is worth at the moment, that the device of having so many members of the House requiring a debate on the decision regarding whether a report ought to be made public and possibly referred to the appropriate committee, be adopted. The matters covered in any of these reports are bound to affect Canadians from one side of the country to the other, and it is not right or proper for any government to allocate to itself the decision on the matter of whether the report should be made public. There should be provision here I feel for parliamentary consideration of that particular aspect of tabling reports.

I mentioned a little earlier the matter of pollutants, and particularly oil, as there is a fear that this will become more and more a source of pollution in our waters. I take this opportunity to welcome the note which was presented by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) to the United States government not very many weeks ago, and which he tabled in the House. I am very glad that note was tabled as we now know some of the matters that were hinted at in that note. I am wondering whether this bill could be of assistance in that particular field.

What is needed in addition to these agreements is the ability to enforce the undertakings we make, or the things we insist on in any agreement we have with United States, be they navigational standards, construction standards or other standards. I have mentioned the Irving Whale and the possibility of oil pollution in that regard. I have good reason to believe from talking with technicians, people competent in the art, that this particular vessel could be floated, and I am wondering why it has not been. I have heard for example, that this might involve a legal matter because the insurance on the cargo has been paid and it should not be raised because there might have to be some compensation or reimbursement to the insurance company. I ask whether this is really a telling argument. Surely, a hulk lying on the floor of the sea must be a fair prize available to any organization, person or government agency which has the wit and whim and funds to raise it. I find the legal argument that has been put forward to me a rather specious one.

I feel reasonably certain that some of the other matters that this bill is intended to cover are such things as industrial effluents from pulpmills and iron and steel mills, again matters where provincial consultation will be most important. I think the provinces are doing all they can, and I hope they will welcome the added strength which this bill will give.

I have one further inquiry in respect of one degree of contaminant in the food we eat. I refer to fish and one particular species. I would refer to the research work in relation to mercury contamination, not only in respect of fresh water fish but also fish on the high seas. A swordfish industry did exist. It was brought to an untimely end because it was felt that the mercury content of the swordfish was too high for human consumption. My understanding is that, because of the nature of the beast and the way it feeds, the swordfish is a mercury carrier if you like. Swordfish is still eaten as a delicacy in many parts of the world. Anyone who visits Istanbul will know about the delicious swordfish dishes presented there. It is available in other parts of the world and yet our swordfish industry has been eliminated entirely. I ask the minister whether there is not room for further research in this area so that we will be absolutely certain concerning the levels of mercury in swordfish.

There may be other areas also in which we can clarify our thinking on this matter through good, solid, funded research. We want to be sure that this particular fish, as has been ruled, is a fish unfit for human Canadian consumption, let me put it that way, because the people of other nations do eat it. With these remarks and these hopes for clarification I wish to thank members for listening so carefully to what I have had to say.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the House is ready for the question I shall now proceed to put it. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

RAILWAY RELOCATION AND CROSSING ACT

PROVISION FOR PLANNING, ACQUISITION OF LAND, GRANTS, GRADE CROSSING ASSISTANCE

Hon. Ron Basford (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-27, to facilitate the relocation of railways lines or rerouting of railway traffic in urban areas and to provide financial assistance for work done for the protection, safety and convenience of the public at railway crossings, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps before the minister commences his remarks it should be recalled to the House that an order was made earlier concerning the number of speakers from each party.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to say how pleased I am to move, on behalf of my colleague the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), the second reading of Bill C-27 and to explain to the House his absence. He is appearing before the standing committee on his estimates relative to the Ministry of Transport. Either the minister or his parliamentary secretary will be closing the debate as the second speaker for the government. I am happy on behalf of the minister to begin the debate on this bill. I also want to thank most warmly the House leader of my party and the House leaders and members of the three opposition parties for the arrangement the House entered into earlier today that this bill would be dealt with in Committee of the Whole and that there would be two speakers from each party at the second reading stage.

Mr. Paproski: You always get agreement from this party.

Mr. Basford: The hon. member gets that kind of agreement for his party because he is dealing with a minister who is very easy to get along with. In respect of the order of the House limiting the speeches to two from each party, I wish to say that many members of this House would have liked to have spoken on this bill during second reading. Certainly, judging from the correspondence I have had from mayors across Canada and from many other people in respect of this bill, I am sure many members of parliament who are involved in the affairs of their city would have liked to have spoken during this debate on behalf of their city councils.

The railway relocation and crossing bill is divided into four parts. The first part deals with joint urban development and transportation plans for relocation schemes. Part II provides for special grants for separations. Part III provides for railway grade crossing assistance. Part IV is the general clause relating to the transitional provisions of the Railway Act under Bill C-27. As Minister of Urban Affairs, I have particular responsibilities assigned to me with regard to Part I. Parts II, III and IV are clearly the responsibility of my colleague the Minister of Transport. Part I is very clearly urban legislation. It is directed to and at urban problems. By way of relocation schemes in respect of railway facilities, it holds the potential to improve the urban environment in many cities and towns across this country.

The railway relocation provisions of this act will be a major lever when this bill becomes effective and, through orders of the Canadian Transportation Commission, in reshaping the core areas of our cities and many of our communities. There are cogent and pressing reasons, which have obviously been recognized by all parties in the House, for the introduction of this bill and for its speedy passage.

As we all know, railways have been caught up in the rapid urbanization which is occurring in this country. They, as have other elements in our economy, have been caught up in the rapid development of our cities and in the problems of urbanization. In many instances, the railways bisect cities and towns, and create noise zones. They are traffic impediments and safety hazards. Their location determines in a social sense the right and wrong side of the tracks, to use an old expression. In many instances, railways and rail facilities occupy prime urban land that might be better developed in a number of ways to improve the quality of urban life. Their influence on the growth of many of our cities has obviously been pervasive. One only needs to visit cities from Halifax to Vancouver to see the part that railways have played in the development of all our cities. Often the city has developed because the railway was there, and then other cities and towns grew up around that railway junction.

One of the first priorities of this government was to examine how federal action could be brought to bear on the range of urban problems created over the years by the relationship between railways and cities, and the presence of tracks, yards and other rail facilities in urban centres. This review that we conducted made it clear very quickly that new legislation was needed to permit the federal government to help integrate railways and rail facilities with urban development, especially in inner city and core areas.

The legislation that has been introduced is a major federal initiative to help achieve a better balance between the need for efficient rail services and the adverse effects of railways on the quality of the urban environment and urban development in Canadian communities. It is designed to apply to cities where railway facilities—tracks, yards, terminals—are formidable obstacles to planned and orderly urban development; and to meet the demand for new or improved grade crossings and grade separations. The railway relocation and rerouting provisions will permit the federal government, for the first time in the history of this country, to fund and support in a major way the planning for and implementation of railway relocation and rail traffic rerouting proposed by provinces and municipalities.

Where a rail line is relocated, the property thus vacated may be put to any number of uses, in accordance with the priorities established by such plans. These priorities can include, for example, the provision of improved and expanded rapid transit facilities, which I will mention in a moment, and land for housing. I can think of land that could be made available, for example, in Winnipeg by way of railroad relocation. It is good land that is already serviced. We have seen in the national capital area one successful relocation scheme which made land available by way of relocation for recreational purposes, for housing purposes, and for development purposes. The uses that the railroad could be put to are innumerable and of immense value.

Part I of the bill provides federal assistance for the planning and implementation of railway relocation and rerouting proposals put forward by the provinces and the municipalities. The federal government may also acquire railway property, if called for under the proposed act, which again is a new feature and may be one of the most important ones in the legislation. Historically, railways in this country have had the right to expropriate land for their purposes, but no one, including the government of Canada, has had the power until now to expropriate a railway facility. For the first time, parliament is being asked to reverse that historic situation and to establish a mechanism, if need be, for the expropriation of railway facilities.

A railway relocation and rerouting project is to begin with provincial and municipal initiatives and calls for participation by all three levels of government. When a province and involved municipalities wish to redevelop a specified urban area, including new transportation facilities and new uses for rail properties and lines, they inform the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs and the Ministry of Transport of their intent to submit an application to the CTC to seek orders to relocate railway facilities.

The applicants may ask for financial assistance from the federal government to prepare one or more alternative plans for submission to the CTC. Our budget for that purpose for these initial studies is $6 million. The Ministry of State for Urban Affairs may contribute up to 50 per cent of the cost of preparing the urban development plans, and the Ministry of Transport may contribute up to 50 per cent of the cost of preparing transportation plans. The applicants are responsible for the remaining portion of the costs of preparing the plans. Where that comes from is unspecified in the legislation. It could be paid by municipalities, regional districts, provinces, or interested groups in any proportion or share that can be arranged.

Before the CTC can consider a railway relocation rerouting application that contemplates the use of federal programs in implementing the urban development or transportation plans, it must be informed by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs after his review, that these federal programs are available and will significantly contribute to the improvement of the urban area concerned.

The purpose of this review by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is designed to ensure two things: first, to ascertain the availability of the various federal programs which would be required to implement urban development. Such programs, for example, might embrace infrastructure funding by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, housing programs of CMHC, acquisition of railway land for federal facilities by the Department of Public Works by, for example, using the construction and location of a major federal building as this part for the relocation projects.

Second, the review will ensure that proposed use of federal programs reflects over-all priorities established for the use of those programs in terms of costs and benefits. We want to ensure that the improvement to the urban environment is worth the federal money that is proposed to be spent on the relocation scheme. When the Minister of State for Urban Affairs has indicated to the CTC that the federal programs called for by the plan can be made available, and when the Governor in Council has notified the CTC that it is prepared to authorize a relocation grant voted by parliament, the province and municipality then submit a proposal to the CTC. A railway relocation and rerouting proposal presented to the CTC must be supported by an urban development plan—that is what we are going to do after we relocate railway facilities—and a transportation plan—that is to show if the transportation facilities are to be relocated and what is the plan to continue transportation facilities in an efficient and effective way—and a financial plan regarding how the whole relocation will be carried out.

The urban development plan is to show, among other things, why the rail facilities to be relocated constitute a significant impediment to urban development; how the situation is to be improved by rail relocation, and what is to be done with any railway land freed by relocation.

The transportation plan must show how transportation will be controlled within the study area, including rail traffic and location of streets, highways, bridges, railway lines, crossings and stations, bus routes and terminals, rapid transit lines and stations. It must show where new rail facilities will be located, where railway traffic will be rerouted—either over lines of other railways or over new lines to be built—and how the use of railway lines will be allocated.

The financial plan will show how the costs and benefits of the project are to be apportioned. It will also indicate the financial assistance to be made available by all of the parties involved, including federal assistance through the railway relocation grant and the railway grade crossing fund.

In studying the proposal put forward by a province or municipality, the CTC is to weigh carefully the advantages and disadvantages of the relocation and rerouting proposal and possible alternatives to it. The onus is on applicants to prove that the public interest will be served by the proposed plan. The Canadian Transport Commission may—and obviously in major proposals will—hold hearings on these proposals if it feels this would be in the public interest. In this way, merchants, shippers, railroad unions and residents in the area to be acquired for railway facilities or in areas that might be affected by railroad relocation schemes, can put their point of view to the commission.

A necessary condition for approval of the proposal is that the railway involved with neither gain nor lose from railway relocation and rerouting. There are sections in the bill and an appendix which set out the admittedly rather complicated formula which is designed to ensure that the railways neither win nor lose by a proposal.

The order that the commission makes relative to railway facilities could contain provisions for discontinuation of railway operations over any line within the railway transportation study or for relocation of railway lines, facilities, removal of tracks, buildings, bridges or other structures in the area and use of rail lines belonging to one company by equipment of another company. For example, proposals for a city where there were two or three different transportation centres and railway stations could recommend that they be combined into one "union station" where obviously the facilities of one railroad would be used by another. The use of rail lines belonging to one company by equipment of another, and the use of rail lines or rights-of-way by a public transit system—which is now a proposal in many major cities—will provide to them at the least possible cost, the right-of-way for the public transit facilities that many are now studying. If you go out to build a rapid transit system and have to acquire rights-of-way through urban areas by buying buildings and land, it will be too expensive. But if, under these provisions, you can use the existing rights of way for rapid transit that have heretofore been used for street and rail traffic, there will be an immense saving to municipalities and public transportation commissions.

When the commission goes through this whole process which recommends federal assistance for implementation of relocation/rerouting proposals, the Minister of Transport may authorize payment of a relocation grant toward the cost of implementing the project. Such a grant can be up to 50 per cent of the net cost of relocation and rerouting proposals. It is clear that we can make a contribution to the development of the plans of up to 50 per cent, and toward the actual implementation of this plan of 50 per cent of the net cost. I underline net cost, because obviously if you take railway facilities and move them from one piece of land to another area, there are costs and savings to the railway involved. The land that is set free is of immense value and is put on one side of the ledger, while the costs are put on the other. Any grant is 50 per cent of that net cost.

Financial assistance may be provided for grade separations for new railway lines and new safety devices on existing railway lines, if required, because of railway relocation/rerouting from one part of a city or around a city.

A needed underpass or overpass would be provided under Parts II and III of the act. Federal expenditures under this legislation are expected to be in the order of $250 million over the next five years for railroad relocation. Specific allocation for each year will be provided by a separate vote in the estimates of the Ministry of Transport.

Thus far, Mr. Speaker, I have concentrated my remarks almost entirely on part I, relating to railway relocations and reroutings provisions. I think these have tremendous urban implications for cities across Canada. In the time that I have been minister, nothing that I have said or introduced has generated so much interest from municipal councils across Canada as these relocation proposals. I know that this is recognized in this House and that the opposition parties will agree to deal with this legislation quickly because they, too, know the great interest that municipalities have in the urban implications of the relocation proposals.

I want to turn briefly to parts II and III of the bill, Mr. Speaker, which are clearly transportation matters and under the jurisdiction of my colleague. They will be dealt with in more detail by the parliamentary secretary or by my colleague later in this debate.

Obviously of equal importance when dealing with railroads is the matter of public safety, which is embodied in parts II and III of the bill. These are concerned with special grants for grade separations, underpasses, overpasses, tunnels, bridges and railway grade crossings.

The provisions relating to grade crossings and grade separations follow recommendations made by the railway transport committee and the Canadian Transport Commission to increase the limits of federal assistance for railway grade separation projects. Also important are the recommendations that have been made by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities as to the level of contribution under the grade crossing fund.

Such expansion as is provided in the legislation is intended to bring grant provisions into line with the increased costs of construction of overpasses and subways. The cost of providing safe railway crossings and grade separations has climbed over the years. Such installations, especially in large centres, have become extremely costly and the act provides increased federal assistance either to provisions in the railway grade crossing fund or through new provisions for special grants for separations which are contained in part II.

The proposed new federal assistance covers level crossing protection work—signs, signals and that type of thing. Federal assistance covers level crossing protection work, reconstruction of or improvement to existing grade separations and construction of new grade separations. The proposed new levels of federal assistance are for level crossing protection work for which 80 per cent of the costs may be paid from the grade crossing fund up to a new limit of $1 million which is double the existing limit; for reconstruction of or improvement to existing grade separations, 50 per cent of the cost, from the grade crossing fund, up to a new ceiling of $625,000; the existing limit is $250,000.

In the legislation there are quite complicated formulas for the payment of portions of the cost of any reconstruction projects to $1,250,000. The parliamentary secretary will deal with this in more detail this evening. That is the financial formula for grade separations and grade crossings which is contained in parts II and III of the act, Mr. Speaker.

The commission may, apart from the formulae, recommend a special grant if it is satisfied that a grade separation is required for the protection, safety and convenience of the public, and that the new road or highway will divert traffic from existing grade crossings. In addition to the financial formula, there is a special provision which will allow the Canadian Transport Commission to make recommendations for payment of a special grant.

The new act maintains the provisions of the Railway Act whereby a railway crossing must be in existence for at least three years before an application can be made for a grant from the railway grade crossing fund toward construction of a grade separation. The act provides exceptions to the three-year rule. These are designed to meet the observations of municipalities relative to this question. First, when the new grade crossing is required by a railway for a relocation or rerouting project, the three-year period will not apply. Second, when it is required for a new highway traffic rerouting scheme, it will not apply. The exception to the three year limitation provision is designed to deal with the situation in which there is a rerouting or relocation proposal, or a new highway traffic rerouting scheme. Then, the three-year period is waived.

Grants provided for reconstruction of or improvement to an existing grade separation will be made available where the grade separation has existed for at least 15 years. Formerly, the limitation was to grade separations that existed prior to June 29, 1955. This provision is included, as well, in line with representations which have been made to us.

In conclusion, I suggest this bill deserves the support of all members of the House. I very much appreciate, for my own part and that of my colleagues, the arrangements which members opposite have entered into for dealing with this bill. On behalf of the government I extend my thanks to them.

The provisions of the bill have been considered carefully. It holds out major benefits, in my view, for the reshaping of Canadian towns and cities. It pays renewed attention in parts II and III to the issue of public safety at rail crossings. It will greatly extend the federal government's ability to respond to the needs of our cities and to assist in improving the environment of most cities of Canada. It is an important urban initiative on the part of the government, one which I know is eagerly awaited by mayors, municipalities and provinces across the country.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on Bill C-27, an important bill concerning rail line relocation. My colleagues and I are not taking a negative approach to the bill. We point out that exhaustive studies and consultations must take place with interested parties with regard to social and environmental objectives and the cost aspects. A number of cities are waiting with anticipation passage of the rail line relocation bill, namely, Toronto, Winnipeg and Wetaskiwin. An exhaustive study has been conducted in Winnipeg by a firm known as Damas and Smith. It brought out what is known as the Winnipeg Railway Study, to which I intend to refer.

According to the report, the objectives of the rail study were to develop alternative plans of railway facilities to those presently in existence which would appear to be technically feasible and desirable from an economic and social point of view in the realization of a superior and more amenable plan for the future development of the urban community and its transportation facilities. The study recommended that most railway tracks be removed from Winnipeg's downtown area, freeing large amounts of real estate for urban development. Three alternatives being considered actively range in cost from $50 million to $92 million. Each of the four proposed schemes would have a major impact on the over-all future planning of the city, of its transportation systems and its industrial development.

One scheme recommends common running rights for CNR and CPR through downtown Winnipeg, plus a combination of both railway passenger terminals into one union station. One scheme would bury the railway tracks in the central core, with high banks for traffic and noise separation, and a further scheme supported tunnelling for much of the downtown track. All schemes took account of downtown development and found this to be in line with the ideas presented in the study. The study found that major economies and benefits would result for all parties involved in relocation.

The study says that the proposed program would bring the following benefits: release 200 acres of CP yards for more appropriate use; remove barrier effect of CN mainline and allow redevelopment of 50 acres and reductions in road-rail conflict and opportunities to extend and connect natural arterial connections.

If simultaneous relocation of both lines is not feasible, then relocation of the CP yards and main line is the main priority, with CN relocation being secondary. It is stressed, however, that both should occur simultaneously. However, in spite of what the report asserts, there are a great many people in Winnipeg who have grave reservations about the document. There are a great many questions still to be answered. They are, first, is rail relocation a pressing and urgent need compared to other concerns such as providing low income housing, improving deteriorated areas and reducing property taxes? Second, how will the citizens of Winnipeg benefit from the plan? Which citizens will benefit most? Third, does implementation of the rail study commit us to other plans such as the Downtown Development Plan and the Winnipeg Area Transportation Study? Is this plan really a way of getting things in via the back door? Fourth, where will the marshalling yards be relocated? Fifth, the study refers to the St. James Corridor. What is meant by this? I will go into detail in a few moments. Sixth, what adverse effects on the surrounding area will result from the relocation of the CP classification yards in Rosser, Manitoba? Seventh, are we to suppose that similar effects are to be incurred in that area in which the marshalling yards are relocated? Eighth, what about allocating moneys for other equally important projects like runway relocation? Ninth, what effect will the plan have upon our leisure areas? One scheme has tracks running through the centre of one of Winnipeg's most beautiful parks, Assiniboine. Imagine that, Mr. Speaker. Someone wants to put a railway line through Assiniboine Park, one of the most beautiful parks in Canada. I hope the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson), one of the representatives of the area, is noting my comments about what is proposed for Assiniboine Parks.

I now wish to quote from a letter written by Damas and Smith on the subject of the Winnipeg rail study. It reads in part:

During the course of public meetings it became apparent that the strongest opposition to the railway relocation came from those people who own homes in or near the reception areas, i.e., the corridor into which the relocated railways would be placed (for example, the residents of Foxgrove Avenue in East St. Paul, and St. Michael's Road in St. Vital) and who believe that this relocation would lower the value of their property. Some sympathy for these people who feel themselves directly threatened was also found amongst those whose homes are remote from the reception areas and who would be less directly affected but nevertheless allied themselves with the opponents because they believe the proposed relocation to be unnecessary and unjust.

It continues:

The proposal to remove the yards but retain the main lines in their present locations is in effect what has been referred to in the Railway Relocation Study report as 'the Do-Nothing alternative'. Strictly speaking the Do-Nothing alternative of the report was thought of as just that—the alternative of doing absolutely nothing with the railways; but it soon became obvious that even if the public were to do absolutely nothing about railway relocation, the Railway Companies themselves would take action; and it seemed equally clear that the Railway Companies would act with respect to their yards but not to their main lines.

This suggestion may conflict with the provisions in the bill. Even if the municipalities may not wish to do anything, the railways might do something on their own. I continue:

Although a clear and reliable appreciation of the results of a Do-Nothing approach to the railway problem can only be provided by a detailed study, it is nevertheless possible to speculate about such a prospect, and to arrive at certain conclusions, however tentative and unsubstantiated they may be.

● (1640)

I mentioned the St. James corridor. One of our fears is that some of the CPR yards or their freight facilities might be moved adjacent to a residential area, namely Crestview Heritage Park and other areas off Sturgeon Road in west Winnipeg. I have a description of the properties the CPR has been acquiring. This is agricultural land They have acquired some 172 acres adjacent to this residential property. The last thing we want in that area is a classification yard or warehouse facilities for CPR. This is one of our main concerns in west Winnipeg. I quote:

For example, it is generally known that the CP Rail has acquired land in the Rosser Area for the relocation of their classification yard. I can be assumed that the plans for this yard are designed to meet the requirements of the CP and that the creation of a rational pattern of land use for this sector of the City is a secondary consideration, if indeed it is a consideration at all. Moreover, even if the classification function is moved from the present CP Rail yard to the new location in Rosser, the present yard will still be required for industrial support and car storage, and will therefore remain in its present location. The result of this Do-Nothing approach (on the part of the public) therefore would be to create a new classification yard in Rosser with possible adverse effects on the surrounding area, as well as the retention of the existing yard in its present location. There would appear to be no real advantage at all to the public in such a situation.

I quote from an editorial in the Winnipeg Tribune dated October 29, 1973:

As the city's environment committee chairman, Abe Yanofsky, said, Winnipeg's previously anticipated cost of $20 million for rail relocation is now $50 million. That means Ottawa would be excepted to pay another $50 million or more. Add that to the cost of helping other cities relocate their railways and the price becomes astronomical.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

It would be different if this was the only project the federal government has to worry about financing. But it isn't. As an Information Canada report said last year, federal and provincial government departments are now in the position where they don't even try to tell people how government programs can help them. As one official said: "If the general population was aware of the services offered, the government would go bankrupt."

It would, of course, be nice to see the railways removed from the downtown core and the city embarked on a massive reconstruction program, with parks and byways and a generally planned environment. But can taxpayers generally afford it? Perhaps the time has come to be realistic. As Coun. William Norrie said: "Rail relocation will probably not happen in your lifetime and mine."

If city hall really wants to save the taxpayers money, they could stop talking of relocating railways at a cost of $100 million and get on with the $13.2 million Sherbrook-McGregor Street Overpass before the price goes up. That way, the saving would be terrific.

There was considerable concern over rail line relocation at the last tri-level meeting in Edmonton. I quote from a news report in the Edmonton media:

A federal government program aimed at aiding provincial and municipal governments with the cost of rail relocation Monday got a critical reception by Manitoba Urban Affairs Minister Saul Miller and Winnipeg Councillor Robert Steen.

Federal Urban Affairs Minister Ron Basford announced here Monday during the second national tri-level conference that the federal government will pay up to 50 per cent of the net costs to the railroads of approved rail relocation schemes.

Mr. Miller said his initial reaction to the program was "extreme disappointment." Coun. Steen said the announcement makes rail relocation impossible.

"The idea of them only picking up 50 per cent of the net cost to the railway would put up the price of land (vacated by the rail lines) to such an extent that the costs to Winnipeg and the province would be exceedingly high," Mr. Miller said.

"Whether this land could then be used in a beneficial way is highly doubtful in my mind."

Mr. Miller said the Manitoba government supports the principle of rail relocation in Winnipeg "if it makes economic and social sense."

"But if it means that we are paying $100 million or perhaps $50 million to simply move something and then find that the costs of the land vacated is so expensive that we can't really use it in a proper way, then frankly I am not that convinced that it is a good thing."

(The principle of rail relocation was first proposed by the now-extinct Metro government to get railway facilities out of the centre of the city and to free the land they now occupy for other development.)

Mr. Miller said the federal program is a backward step because in the original Winnipeg rail relocation study the federal government had shared 75 per cent of the cost with Manitoba and Winnipeg picking up 7½ per cent each and the two major railroads five per cent each.

"What you have here is a regressive step, and not at all a forward step"—

Coun. Steen ... said Mr. Basford's announcement was "the most disappointing thing I have heard at this conference."

He said the city had been hoping the federal government would pick up at least 75 to 80 per cent of the total cost of rail relocation in Winnipeg.

"As far as I am concerned, this (announcement) finishes the hopes of rail relocation," Coun. Steen said immediately after hearing the federal minister's proposal.

Whether their fears are justified is hard to say at this time. The standing committee will certainly have its hands full with this bill. The Damas and Smith report on the Winnipeg railway study gives the advantages and disadvantages. Whether the figures contained in it are realistic today, I do not know.

Those are just a few of the concerns of the people of Winnipeg, the members of my party and myself with regard to this rail line relocation. It is certainly something that will have to be studied very carefully in the standing committee.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I am glad you have been able to recognize this corner of the House. It makes one feel a little less uncomfortable around here when that happens. I wish to say, on behalf of our party, that we welcome this legislation. However, we are slightly amazed at the length of time it has taken the minister to finally get it on the order paper. I recall during the 1972 election campaign—

An hon. Member: Not 1974?

Mr. Leggatt: No, 1972; 1974 is coming.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Is that a promise?

Mr. Leggatt: During the election campaign, on October 10, 1972, the minister issued a very interesting press release. At that time, the minister was Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) was Minister of Transport. In a moment of euphoria approximately 20 days prior to the election, they issued a very interesting press release which in part reads:

> Special federal assistance is being prepared to move railways out of cities and let people in, two federal ministers announced today . . .
> Mr. Jamieson and Mr. Basford jointly announced the intended legislative package as an instance of federal policy in key fields, such as transportation, being directed to the best urban impact it can make.

We welcome the legislation, but the length of time it has taken to place it before the House for consideration is an indication of the priority the government places on urban issues. There is a lot of oil, a lot of wheat and a lot of lumber in this country, but the major problems in this nation are urban in nature and the sooner the House understands this the sooner the people will get more adequate representation here.

I must say I am pleased with the co-operation shown, the readiness among members in all quarters of the House to expedite the passage of this bill. The last bill of this nature was presented approximately 20 days before a federal election, and this one may well be before this chamber 74 days before a federal election. I believe the timing is appropriate. I hope its fate will not be to die on the order paper in the event of a federal election; I hope we shall not have to wait another year and a half before we see it.

Mr. Basford: Don't worry, we shall re-introduce it.

Mr. Leggatt: Somebody has said that the federal government has most of the power, the provincial governments have most of the jurisdiction and the municipalities have all the problems. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKinnon) described in some detail the plan the city of Winnipeg has in mind in connection with rail relocation, and the minister responsible for this legislation indicated the intention was to spend $250 million over five years. Mr. Speaker, the cost of moving the rails from Winnipeg alone will amount to nearly $100 million, not far short of half the amount allocated for the whole program. It might be cheaper to move the city of Winnipeg and leave the rails where they are!

Mr. O'Sullivan: Stanley would like that.

Mr. Leggatt: This is some indication of the size of the undertaking. It seems to me the minister has underestimated what is involved. It is true that $250 million may sound like a lot of money, but it is a small amount in terms of urban expenditures required.

The increase in the grade crossing fund from $500,000 to $1 million is really small potatoes when one considers the extent of the increase in construction costs over the last five years—at least 150 per cent. I know that under section 16(1) of the bill special provision is made for projects which cost more than $1,250,000. I think the minister can expect that all the applicants will try to squeeze in under section 16(1). If they do, he will find his figure of $250 million wholly inadequate. I suggest that in many cases we should not relocate rail stations outside the centre of communities. A single track into an urban rail station makes a lot of sense. More important, when we consider relocation of tracks in urban centres, we should not allow ourselves to be hypnotized by the commercial value of the property. What will happen in the case of many of these communities is this: the blight of freight yards and tracks will be replaced by the blight of Eaton's and the blight of Simpsons-Sears or those high-rise bleak monoliths which sit in the centres of communities and provide nothing in terms of making them livable places. As the minister has pointed out, this measure will improve the urban environment but if we do not consider the value of the property as it relates to people rather than its commercial value, if we fail to appraise its value in terms of space, or parks, or livability, then the purpose of the bill will not be achieved.

The biggest problem in my community, in this area, at least, is a rail crossing which is creating a particularly dangerous situation because it is in a key position in an urban centre; a million people have to use this crossing to get to the emergency ward of our local hospital. This is important because they are running the risk of cardiac arrest—

Mr. Andre: Those people shouldn't be driving!

Mr. Leggatt: There is a real risk to people who are trying to get to the emergency ward. In addition, there is the usual urban frustration, line-ups for half an hour or even longer as trains go by at 15 minute intervals.

One of the provisions I welcome, and it may be one of the most significant and imaginative, is the provision, as I read it in section 6(2)(a), for what is effectively the expropriation of track time in order to give urban communities a chance to use those railroads for urban transit purposes. I wish the minister had gone farther with regard to expropriating track time. Why not expropriate the whole company and have a national transportation system. In other words, take over the Canadian Pacific, in which case we would be making some real progress.

Mr. Basford: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I am glad to see the minister pounding his desk. In any event I can recall, as an alderman in my community for many years, trying to persuade the CPR to give us a little track time to move people into the urban core of the lower mainland. The number of reasons the company could find for not making track time available was incredible. I am pleased there seems to be a little muscle in this bill, giving this very necessary power to the Transport Commission.

As I say, the bill does not go far enough, but at this particular point we believe half a loaf is better than none at all, and the legislation will probably constitute a real contribution to the development of our cities and a better standard of life. We in this group have some reservations with regard to certain of its aspects, but we heartily support the legislation.

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse)—Finance—Statement of minister concerning level of corporate profits and necessity to pass on cost increases; the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose)—Transport—Action to implement Transport Commission recommendations for prevention of railway accidents; the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty)—The Canadian Economy—Number of jobs created by corporate tax concessions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-5, an Act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from the first day of January, 1973, to the 30th day of June, 1974, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, without amendment.

The House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, (papers), private bills and public bills.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council rises on a point or order.

• (1700)

Mr. Foster: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In respect of the business of the private members' hour this afternoon, I understand that the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin), in whose name stands item No. 9, is agreeable to withdrawing his notice of motion for the production of papers. There have been discussions between members of various parties, and I think there would be an agreement in the House to continue with Bill C-27 on railway relocation and railway crossings. If there were such an agreement perhaps we could make that an order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there are only a few days left of this parliament, we certainly will agree to this move to show our sincerity in moving this bill along, but we hope the government will not ask us too often to give up the private members' hour as we guard it very jealously.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I take it that the agreement is that motion No. 9 under Notices of Motions (Papers) is to be withdrawn with unanimous consent, and that we proceed to another order.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This would have to be agreed upon by everyone, including the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin).

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

RAILWAY RELOCATION AND CROSSING ACT

PROVISION FOR PLANNING, ACQUISITION OF LAND, GRANTS, GRADE CROSSING ASSISTANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford (for the minister of Transport), that Bill C-27, to facilitate the relocation of railway lines or rerouting of railway traffic in urban areas and to provide financial assistance for work done for the protection, safety and convenience of the public at railway crossings, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, we in this party regard Bill C-27 as a very significant piece of legislation. As our House leader has said, in the interest of expediting the orderly passage of this bill, we are prepared to speak briefly on it and, we hope, constructively, so it can be discussed further in the Committee of the Whole.

By way of an opening comment, I think I should say that it is a good and constructive development that the government has finally recognized in a tangible way the connection between urban development and transportation. This piece of legislation is not only somewhat overdue, as has been said by hon. members previously, it develops a somewhat new concept further to the concept the drafters perhaps had in mind. It is interesting to see, for example, that there is a very clear and somewhat innovative concept of the divisions of powers reflected in this particular bill. We have a division of powers as between federal, provincial and municipal authorities. This piece of legislation also involves at least two federal ministries, urban affairs and transportation. Clause 7 of the bill also involves the ministry of public works.

This concept of intergovernmental and interdepartmental co-operation is one that has intrigued me greatly. It is one that is welcome in many areas of legislation, and it is needed, for instance, in the activities of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It is certainly appropriate in the Departments of Urban Affairs and Transportation because, as all members know, there is a growing realization that many of the problems faced in this country require the concerted efforts of more than one government department.

It is very clear that much of the efficacy of this legislation will depend on the efficiency and expedition with which the CTC performs its task. One cannot help but be impressed when one reads this legislation with the great responsibilities the Canadian Transport Commission has. If this commission does not improve its tendency, I would suggest without meaning to be sarcastic, to frustrate to a certain extent and delay proceedings, then I think the thrust of this legislation could be seriously impaired.

There is no particular region in Canada that will not benefit by the provisions of Bill C-27, and I think it is significant in respect of the total transportation picture in this country. I say that because it seems obvious that if this legislation is carried out according to its scope, meaning and apparent intent, it could involve, in some areas of this country, significant rerouting of our major rail lines.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) has said recently that he does recognize that his department lacks an over-all policy. Further to this, it has been pointed out on many occasions that one of the policies which must be considered in respect of the total transportation picture, is a policy in respect of the poor maintenance of the roadbeds of our major rail lines. This has many significant implications.

In addition to this situation, we are aware that a former President of the Canadian National Railway system questioned the priorities involved in allocating many millions of dollars to the STOL program in an attempt to improve transportation links between major cities, particularly in central Canada. This money, which has been tentatively and actually allocated in some cases for this STOL program, as opposed to what might have been done, in the opinion of the former President of the CNR might have been used to improve the rail systems in this country.

The reason I say this bill may have an important effect on our nation's transportation system is that if there are significant changes made to reroute and change some of the present railway rights-of-way, these new additions or changes to be made will presumably be of a modern and highly satisfactory nature in so far as technology is concerned. Having regard to the old adage that a chain is only as strong as its weakest link, I would think that somewhat in a converse analogy, when these major rerouting changes are carried out, surely they will by contrast expose the inadequacies of much of our railway systems to which they are connected, particularly in serving areas where passenger travel could be very profitable if the roadbeds of the rail lines were upgraded and updated.

For that reason, I think this bill might serve as a catalyst in persuading this government and the Minister of Transport that while they are making these changes in respect of some of the traditional rights of the railways, to which the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) has referred, and to which the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) referred, and I have in mind the traditional rights in respect of expropriation and things of that nature, to use this piece of legislation as a springboard from which to refinance and perhaps rebuild larger stretches of railway rights of way so that Canada can take advantage of some of the technological advances presently known, to improve and upgrade our transportation system generally.

There is no doubt, as the minister has said, that this bill has significance in the realm of urban development. Certain cities, or the core areas of these cities, have to some extent been held back and sometimes actually stunted by the effects of having freightyards and railway rights of way in certain areas which, with the passage of time, are better suited for other purposes. This is true all across the nation. It is true in the city of Winnipeg which is one of the few cities that has had a comprehensive study done in this area. But it is also true of places like Halifax, St. John's Newfoundland and practically anywhere you might want to go across Canada. With the concept expressed in this bill it is obvious the government has recognized the need, even at a great deal of cost, to do something about this situation. Certainly, I think the government is to be commended in this regard.

There is another aspect, of course, of this legislation that is important. It has to do with the terrible safety record our transportation system, particularly rail transport, has accumulated over the years. In comparison to other industrialized nations, it is quite evident that our railway system is at about the bottom of the list. For those members who have not had the opportunity to do so I would really recommend that they make themselves aware of the contents of a study carried out by Professor Lukasiewicz of Carleton University. This man did a very interesting treatise or project involving the history of our railways in this country.

Professor Lukasiewicz paid particular attention to the situation involving the passenger carrying capabilities of the various railways and the failure of the CTC to effect meaningful changes despite the fact it has had a very definite regulatory function since it was formed. Professor Lukasiewicz points out that really the situation in this country's railway development has been one of institutionalized obsolesence. In fact, this is part of the title of the work he has composed. Unless the Minister of Transport is prepared to seize on the initiatives that this particular piece of legislation might provide, and unless he is prepared to carry on and do something tangible pursuant to the speech he made a couple of days ago in Montreal when he said that the railways and not the highways are our hope for the future in this country so far as efficiency of movement of people is concerned, this piece of legislation will probably, although it will be useful, not have the far-reaching and sweeping effect it might otherwise have.

So far as the safety aspect itself is concerned, I see that the drafters of this legislation did have something specifically in mind because there is, as I recall it from reading the bill, a provision that approximately 80 per cent of the cost of installing devices like a revolving light for the main head beam of a locomotive be provided. This is the type of measure together with the improvement to our railway crossings, that has been trying out for attention over the years. Although I realize it is counter-productive to take the time of the House to flay the government for not doing so earlier, still I think there is merit in taking a few moments to say that it is difficult to understand why some of the obvious improvements contemplated by this piece of legislation were not brought forward a long time ago. However, I suppose this is in keeping with the general philosophy that until very recently this government has had, and may still have, of promising to make available remedial legislation and then somehow never managing to bring it forward in a decent length of time.

We will watch with great interest the uses to which the railway lands are put, which this bill will permit to be appropriated, pursuant to the procedures over which the Canadian Transport Commission has jurisdiction. I am sure many members, upon reflection, in respect of this principle, will want to elaborate on it during the committee of the whole proceedings because this probably will become quite an issue in many communities where railway lines are to be rerouted. I am very hopeful that when this issue does come up it will not be something that will turn into an exhibition of jealousy and fighting or perhaps be a political football in the municipal field. I think there should be some strict guidelines or jurisprudence developed very carefully so that these lands which will be made available will not be tied up by petty bickering either at the municipal, provincial or federal level. It seems to me that unless the minister is prepared to show more initiative than he has—and perhaps this is a fair comment to make in respect of both the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Urban Affairs—he should make sure that the CTC carries out quickly its responsibilities under this legislation, otherwise much of its timeliness and much of the good inherent in it will not come to pass.

I do not know what the statistics are concerning staff employed by the CTC, but I suspect, like many other government commissions, agencies and departments it is too big. I suspect it is larger than is necessary. I also suspect that because of the scope of this legislation and the responsibilities given to the CTC that it will become even bigger. So, again I wish to point out to the minister that while he is watching the activities of the CTC he refrain from the obvious temptation to permit this empire to grow any larger, and that he look for quality rather than quantity when looking after the needs of this very powerful commission.

I suspect that the Minister of Transport, who probably will be closing this debate as has been suggested, may have some particular comment to make, as did the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, in respect of his particular interest in this piece of legislation which involves these joint responsibilities between the two departments. I hope the minister will take this opportunity, although it may be to some extent related only in an indirect way to the bill under discussion, to answer the question to which many transport authorities in this country have been long awaiting an answer, concerning what the priorities are and what other measures are to be brought forward to supplement the upgrading of the railways and the roadbeds generally between the major population centres in this country.

We would like to know whether the minister still intends to proceed in the same way with regard to the STOL program or does he intend to divert some of the money—I think the figure is around $200 million if I recall it correctly,—to assist in the proposed aims of Bill C-17 and in expanding the improvements that no doubt will be required to link the existing roadbeds to the diversions and changes contemplated under this legislation. So far as the initiatives required are concerned, and which have been mentioned in the legislation—initiatives which if I read the bill correctly are at least by implication supposed to emanate from municipal and provincial governments—

I would hope we do not become involved in the type of situation I have noticed in respect of DREE, where there is a somewhat parallel situation, in that there are mutual areas of responsibility, particularly in growth centres, where one particular type of policy is advocated, by cities or municipalities, and the province is so jealous of its constitutional prerogative that it watches very closely to see that the cities or municipalities do not deal directly with the federal government, whereby adding administrative complications. I hope that this type of situation can somehow be circumvented in respect of this legislation and that methods will be explored by the federal authority to make sure that needed projects and improvements pursuant to this legislation will be undertaken without necessarily waiting for the provinces, municipalities or civic governments involved to decide what is the exact time at which they might proceed or by what method they would like to see it done.

I recognize that there will be certain problems almost "diplomatic" in nature, involved. I am not suggesting for one moment that the federal ministers of the Crown should try to over-ride or in other ways usurp the very real contributions that municipalities and provinces have to make in allocating priorities and determining the methods that should be employed. What I am pointing out to the minister is that I hope in some way an effort will be made to avoid any type of impasse that may develop and that early on in the application of this legislation there will be a great deal of time made available to try to establish guidelines, and to try to avoid any conflicts or jurisdiction, real or imagined, that could impede the proficiency and the speedy implementation of this legislation.

There are all sorts of comments that any member of the House could make about a bill that is as sweeping as this one. I think that it would be a mistake to go into it on a purely parochial basis. Much has been said on the subject of urban renewal. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has dealt with this particular subject in his usual learned fashion over the past few months. The minister himself has spent a lot of time on it, and it is well known that the field of transportation and all the various ills implicit in it have been aired in a very complete way. Therefore, I do not propose to speak much longer on this occasion, except to say again that there are probably within this legislation areas of concern that are so long standing that it will take the people affected by them quite a while to realize that here is a vehicle which at last may be able to solve some of these impediments to urban development and to take away some of the roadblocks that have plagued our transportation system.

The only way in which a piece of legislation such as this can be made effective is to get it through the House as quickly as is reasonably possible after we have had a look at it in committee of the whole, and then to make certain that it is being implemented and administered in such a way that its provisions are not used as political footballs by any level of government, but that a genuine joint effort is made by the municipal, provincial and federal authorities involved to do something constructive, because few, if any, problems existing in this nation need attention more than urban development and transportation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to welcome this bill I should like to assure the minister that we do not do so wholeheartedly because if we were to welcome it without reservation I am sure that he would become somewhat apoplectic. There are some reservations, and some relatively major ones at that. For example, as my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) pointed out, it is not all that much money that we are proposing to spend in a very vital area over the next few years. As part of the announcement of this bill we were told that an estimate of some $100 million has been made as the cost of rail relocation in Winnipeg. Those who live in the Ontario area certainly know that a major project of a rail relocation in the Toronto area is intended. I assume that this will consume $150 million. So, we have $100 million for Winnipeg and $150 million for Toronto. What do we have left for Wetaskiwin?

Mr. O'Sullivan: And how much for Hamilton?

Mr. Harney: I do not know whether the railway still goes to Hamilton, but they might want some relocation there, possibly the relocation of the city.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Shame; withdraw that remark.

Mr. Harney: I will, Mr. Speaker. So, really, we should not be led down the garden path wearing rosy coloured glasses. We are not speaking about an awful lot of money here.

We must be a little careful about several other provisions of the bill. We must be careful, not just because it is a complicated bill, but because it is presented to us by a minister who is very eloquent and adept at making a bill look the best possible. As I make my remarks on the bill I will point out the good things that are in it and also the bad things that are in it. Some of the bad things that are in it are simply matters that demand clarification. When it comes to our work in the committee of the whole I will urge the minister to clarify some of these matters. I know that he fully intends to be as clear as possible because, as the bill says at page 20, it seeks to provide an amendment so as to make certain matters abundantly clear.

Let me read to you the explanatory note:

> The purpose of this amendment is to make it abundantly clear that a pedestrian walkway is a highway within the meaning of the Railway Act.

Rarely, in reading explanatory notes to amendments or bills, have I seen this kind of purple prose. Usually, the word "clear" is good enough. But the hand of the minister is evident here. In the same way I hope that he can make other aspects of the bill abundantly clear.

I come to the first matter which needs clarification. In the presentation of the bill, the minister said in effect that the bill will provide that where the railways are required, after the final processes of application and decision are through, to relocate rails, this relocation shall be done at no cost to the railway, that is to say, there will be a no-win no-loss provision for the railway. The relative clause of the bill is on page 5. I refer to clause 5(1)(a). If we read it carefully, we will see exactly what it is that the minister intended to underline here. The clause reads:

> 5. (1) The accepted plan, together with the financial plan, shall be filed with the Commission and the Commission may accept the transportation plan and the financial plan either as submitted or with such changes in either of them as the Commission considers necessary, if
> (a) the financial plan will not, in the opinion of the Commission, either
> (i) impose on any railway company affected thereby any costs and losses greater than the benefits and payments receivable by the railway company under the plan.

So, it does appear to be clear that this is a no-win no-loss provision so far as the railways are concerned. What we want to do when we come to the committee of the whole is to hear from the minister whether or not this section also means that if it can be shown by the railway in any way that it can be at all inconvenient or that it can be put to a disadvantage, the plan cannot go through. If that is so, it will be possible in almost all cases for the railways to say "You are, in effect, affecting us adversely", or beneficially, "and therefore you cannot do it."

● (1730)

Another part of this particular section that needs to be clarified is the meaning of the word "railway". What do we understand by "railway"? As an example, in the city of Toronto, CN and CP are seeking to redevelop a major holding of theirs between Front Street and the lake, a project which involves billions of dollars of investment. The railways themselves are not doing the redevelopment, but, rather, subsidiary companies which are owned by the railways. To be specific, the redevelopment will be carried out by a firm called Metro Centre Developments Ltd.

I should like to outline what Metro Centre consists of in terms of its corporate ownership, Mr. Speaker. Metro Centre, we are told, is a joint venture of CP and CN. Accordingly, Metro Centre Developments Ltd. is jointly owned by CP and CN. To all intents and purposes this is the case, although in actuality Metro Centre Developments is owned 50 per cent by Marathon Realty Co. Ltd. and 50 per cent by Canadian National Realties. The latter is presumably owned 100 per cent by CN. Marathon Real-ties, on the other hand, is owned 100 per cent by Canadian Pacific Investments Ltd. which has holdings in a host of companies including Cominco, MacMillan-Bloedel and others. Strictly speaking under the law, when we are dealing with Metro Centre what we are really dealing with is a firm called Metro Centre Developments Ltd., and this firm is owned by subsidiaries of the two railways. The railways, as far as their financial relationship with the development is concerned, are several times removed from it.

How would it be possible for us or for the commission to follow the letter of this bill, which will be an act it is presumed, and be able to indicate that the railways benefit or do not benefit? The railways can say, "You have moved our tracks, it has not cost us anything to establish north of Toronto, so it is not up to us to worry what is done with the land". Then under the shell game which corporations can play it will be very difficult for the commission or the public to indicate just who does benefit. Some tightening up must be done in the two camps. The "no win, no loss" provision could be a stumbling block in the actual relocation of railway lines. We should determine just what is meant by this provision. Just what do we mean by a "railway," and what do we mean by the corporation which benefits in this particular application?

I think it is important to understand that, surprisingly enough, this act may work, although perhaps inadvertently, more to the benefit of the railways than to the benefit of the public or urban centres in general. I will give an example of what I mean. It could suit the railway to move operations from downtown Toronto. It may be preferable for them to establish their passenger traffic north of the city, where the terminal is, to coincide with the major developments of freight rail traffic there in the last few years. Under this act the public would be paying for a relocation which the railway desires in any case. Even after all the compensation factors have been taken into consideration, and even after we had considered net benefits and so on, assuming we can sort out the benefits to the railways, what we might be doing is performing a favour for the railways of Canada. I am a little suspicious of this. Surely if this act were doing its stuff it would cause the railways to move for the sake of the national interest; and if such moves were to have a serious effect on their operations, surely we would have heard about it.

There is another item which is rather disturbing to some of us in this part of the House, and it concerns clause 5(2) on page 6 of the bill. The subsection provides that after the commission has received an application in good order and has checked it according to the provisions of this bill, it may hold hearings thereon if it considers this desirable in the public interest. This hearing provision is repeated with regard to grade crossings on page 12, clause 16(3)(e). There again there is the possibility of holding a hearing. When the bill comes to committee of the whole we in this part of the House shall move an amendment to make a hearing mandatory. The amendment will have the effect of forcing the commission to hold a hearing to which the public shall be invited and at which it can make representations.

I will give an example of the importance of such a provision. First of all, a general example. There will be in many communities duly elected municipal governments which will see fit, according to their best lights, to agree to place an application before the commission, in co-operation with the railways, for a certain relocation plan. But even though the municipal government and perhaps even the provincial government in question may put forward this application, there may, nevertheless, be a significant part of the citizenry of that community which will not like the particular development plan. We know from the recent history of this country of the popular demand for hearings at which the people can make an input, at which people in urban communities are given a chance to have their say.

I come now to a particular example. A very few years ago it was the full intention of the province of Ontario and the council of metropolitan Toronto to proceed with the construction of the Spadina expressway. Most elected politicians were in favour of it but there was a small and growing section of the community in Toronto which began to object. Finally, after struggling for a long time and with great effort, they were allowed a preliminary hearing. This hearing led to another and to fuller hearings, until finally enough pressure was put on the municipality of Toronto and the government of Ontario that the decision originally taken by both levels of government to proceed with the building of the expressway was reversed.

Why do we not include a provision in the bill to make a hearing in each application mandatory? If there is no public interest, hardly anybody will turn up at the hearing and the commission will have spent money on an ad or two in the local newspaper; but if there is public interest, people should be heard. I think the time has come in this country for citizens to raise their voices in order to be heard.

Members on both sides of the House, NDP members as well as Conservative members, have pleaded with the government, particularly the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), to allow a new, full hearing on the building of Pickering Airport. This sort of thing need not be done every time; but why not provide in the bill for it to be done automatically? If an application is brought forward which would involve major change and disruption or dislocation of the life of the community, that community would be given the chance to have its say, to provide its input.

Let me hold up Toronto, my community, as an example. There are enormous differences of opinion in this city as to how the Metro Centre development should proceed. When we speak of Metro Centre we are speaking of the spending of billions of dollars; we are speaking of the future shape of our city; we are speaking of a decision which will change and alter forever the very shape and nature of our city. There are enormous differences of opinion within Toronto about it and, we must allow these different opinions to be heard.

Let me repeat, for the benefit of the minister and of the House, that we intend to bring in amendments. I hope my friends to my right have heard me. I do not see any of them nodding, although I see some of them looking.

Mr. O'Sullivan: I am nodding.

Mr. Harney: I see the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan) nodding. That is contagious. I see the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) shaking his head. Perhaps he is chatting. But the point has been made. I think we should consider amendments seriously.

We should also consider the size of grants to be offered by the federal treasury to meet the net cost of the relocation. I can imagine cities and towns like Toronto, Winnipeg, and possibly Wetaskiwin, mentioned earlier, undertaking to put up 50 per cent of the cost of a relocation project in co-operation with the provincial government. That course is possible for Toronto, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Vancouver, and so on. The definition section of the bill—and the bill provides funds for the redevelopment or amelioration of certain urban areas—defines "urban area" as "an area or areas . . . classified by Statistics Canada in its most recent census . . ." According to the Dictionary of the 1971 Census Terms compiled by Statistics Canada, an urban area includes "(1) incorporated cities, towns and villages with a population of 1,000 or over," which includes most incorporated communities of Canada, and "(2) unincorporated places of 1,000 or over, having a population density of at least 1,000 per square mile", and so on. That definition covers practically every organized community in Canada. I wonder what the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) would say if he were here.

Mr. Woolliams: He is not here.

Mr. Harney: He had to go away, slightly ill. It is the weather which had that effect on him. If the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville were here I am sure he would say something like this: "Look at the situation in Yorkton, where both the CNR and the CPR have a crossing in town." Actually, the lines meet right in the middle of town, right along Broadway Street. He would say: "Surely we want some kind of redevelopment to make the centre of our town more attractive, but how can Yorkton do this, even in co-operation of the government of Saskatchewan, if it has to pay a significant part of the 50 per cent of the cost of the relocation which is not picked up by the federal government?" I wonder if this bill offers much of a gift to the smaller communities of Canada.

That brings me back to my first point. As only $250 million is being offered under the bill for the next five years, once Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver and other large centres have taken their share, there will be not much left for other communities.

I said at the beginning of my speech that I welcome parts of the bill. I welcome without qualification Clause 6, particular subclause (2), which provides that the railways must comply with the request of the CTC when it asks them to make their rights of way available for purposes of public or rapid transit in our urban communities. Several members of the House, myself included, have asked questions for the past year and a half of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and other ministers as to when there will be legislation or direction which will tell the railways that their business is not simply that of transporting goods across the country but, also, that of transporting people and facilitating the transportation of people.

Mr. Woolliams: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harney: Obviously, not everybody in this House comes from Toronto. Some of us do. Those of us who come from Toronto know of the enormous problem we face in urban transport. Despite that, the city of Toronto over the years has developed one of the finer urban transit systems in North America. Although it is good, it is by no means good enough.

In Toronto a major study was undertaken recently relating to the Scarborough Expressway, an expressway which was to have extended from the eastern part of the city. That study, produced under the direction of Dr. Richard Soberman who at one time worked either for the Department of Transport or the Department of Urban Affairs—

Mr. Basford: Transport.

Mr. Harney: —recommended that the expressway not be built. That was a milestone recommendation in the history or urban development in Canada. Further, instead of recommending some kind of Flash Gordon, super levitation, Kraus Maffei, linear induction, super technology project, the study recommended that we go to light rail transit. Simply put, the report recommended the use of super streetcars. But in order to make the light rail transit system for Metro Toronto possible in a financial and concrete sense, the rights of way owned by the railways would have to be made available to the Toronto Transit Commission, or whatever commission will be responsible for light rail transit.

I cannot describe the map of the area. Anyone who looks at the Soberman report will see immediately that the whole area in question is crisscrossed in the most intelligent and effective way by main railway lines, branch lines, feeder lines and what-have-you, which could be used to provide a means for letting the people of the area travel to work and back without disrupting the existing amenities of the area. Obviously this is one of the most sensible and least expensive ways of moving people about in our urban centres. I commend the minister, not for having listened to the questions asked in this House, but for having had the good sense to include this provision in the bill before us. I can see it can certainly be made use of by many of our urban centres.

That was a piece of good news. Now for another worry. We in this corner of the House are a bit fretful. I, among others, am a little worried because the railways might find this bill so much to their advantage. Under the guise of offering a better environment to the people of our urban communities, under the guise of removing the track slums in certain sections of our communities, or under the guise of the beautification of our communities, this bill may simply permit the railways to offer to move themselves, again in co-operation with the municipalities, away from downtown areas.

Surely at first many people would laud this kind of a move, but there may be a trap here. We have had much painful evidence in the past few years of the desire of railway companies to move out of the passenger business.

This bill may give them yet another opportunity of doing so.

If the tracks are moved away from the downtown areas, the stations will also be moved. This will make it more difficult, in some cases impossible, for people to take a train. If it were not for the kind of resistance there is in the Toronto area to the obliteration and razing of Union Station, we could easily have all rail passenger facilities moved out of that area in spite of the fact the Metro Centre plan provides for a transportation centre.

We saw what happened a few years ago in Ottawa. We thought that removing the tracks from the downtown area was a beautiful and good thing. Most, including those directly involved and those watching on, agreed with moving the station away from the canal to the outskirts of Ottawa. What has this done? It has made it even more difficult for people to take a train out of this city.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, April 25, 1974

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Wishart F. Spence, O.B.E., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 25th April, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a bill.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

● (1800)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give in Her Majesty's name the Royal Assent to the following bill:

Bill C-5, an Act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System and Air Canada for the period from the 1st day of January, 1973, to the 30th day of June, 1974, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada—Chapter 6.

At 6.05 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PROVISION FOR PLANNING, ACQUISITION OF LAND, GRANTS, GRADE CROSSING ASSISTANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Marchand (Langelier) that Bill C-27, to facilitate the relocation of railway lines or rerouting of railway traffic in urban areas and to provide financial assistance for work done for the protection, safety and convenience of the public at railway crossings, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, before we were called to the Senate for Royal Assent, I was concluding my remarks. By the way, I am not forgetting that I intend to conclude them shortly.

[English]

I was making the point just before six o'clock, when we were called out for Royal Assent, that we must beware that the provisions of this bill are not used by the railways in a devious fashion to move essential passenger rail accommodations, stations, and terminal points away from those places in our cities where they are most convenient. I was making the point that with the excuse of beautification, clearance of track slums or regional redevelopment, it could be possible—I am not suggesting it would be done—for the railway company under one of its many avatars to persuade the fathers of a city that it would be better to have a track relocation, and before the city knew it they would have a project they really did not want, a project which would involved moving a rail terminal facility out of reach, as it were.

I had given the example of what happened here in Ottawa. I did make the point, and I will repeat it, that I am sure at the time it was decided to move the station out of Ottawa many people approved, as they felt that something unsightly, something that brought in smelly, smoky trains, would be moved away from the region of Parliament Hill. Since then we have come to realize that modern passenger trains are not unsightly and need not be dirty. We have also come to realize that moving the station out of the reach of the travelling public further discourages the travelling public from using the railway.

As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) pointed out to us not long ago, modern thinking is that railways, particularly their passenger services, have to return if the movement of people efficiently, safely and economically between our cities is to be carried out. Particularly now that we are confronted with an ongoing energy crisis we have to be ready to put more and more stress upon passenger rail travel.

One of the essential elements of good passenger rail service is that it be attractive and convenient. So I end by making this my last point of caution to members in respect to this bill, a bill which, along with my colleague the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), I welcome, but which has to be looked at nevertheless very closely. Perhaps the main reason I welcome this bill—and this may be a little philosophical—is that it is an indication that we are finally moving toward government ownership or control of the railways as opposed to railway ownership or control of the government.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity of saying a few words on the second reading of Bill C-27. As the hon. Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) made clear, this legislation will be of great value to Canada's municipalities. It provides significant assistance not only to urban development and redevelopment, but also will greatly facilitate the implementation of improved urban transit and, in addition, will more than double federal financial support in respect of public protection and convenience at railway crossings.

As many members of the House may know, this legislation in a certain sense can be said to have had its beginnings really and truly in western Canada, namely in Winnipeg. A few years ago the city of Winnipeg, together with the government of Manitoba, approached the Ministry of Transport for assistance regarding a major railway problem in the city. At that time it appeared the best solution might be to consider relocating railway lines in a major way rather than continuing to build and rebuild large and expensive grade separations near the heart of the city.

Mr. Woolliams: You speak better from your own notes.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): This is all I have at the present time, but I will make some comments when the hon. member speaks. I have noticed on occasion that he cannot even read his.

The Ministry of Transport provided 75 per cent of the cost of a $500,000 study which examined in detail a number of alternative transportation plans, each with its own railway relocation scheme. This effort was an excellent example of tri-level co-operation in which the federal government, the government of Manitoba, the city of Winnipeg and both railways worked together in a spirit of mutual co-operation.

Winnipeg is but one example of many cities in Canada where railway relocations may be the best answer to deal with situations where the railway lines have been in place for perhaps 100 years and are now a serious impediment to desirable urban development or redevelopment. Canada is also fortunate in that many of our cities are well endowed with excellently situated rail rights of way which, if made available for rapid transit use, would greatly contribute to the solution of urban transportation problems.

This legislation provides that the CTC may order existing rail lines to be freed of other rail traffic so that they can be used for rapid transit. Today one of the greatest difficulties in moving forward with intermediate capacity transit systems using modern streetcars, reserved lane bus systems, or perhaps some of the new technology systems currently under development, is the problem of acquiring the necessary corridors of land in which to operate such urban transit systems. Without the availability of railway rights of way often the only recourse is the expropriation of very expensive strips of land, including much valuable residential and other developed real estate. I need not remind the members of the House how difficult it is these days, and how wrong from a social justice point of view, to expropriate people's homes. I personally feel that this legislation fits perfectly the kind of legislation which will facilitate increased tri-level co-operation in many urban matters where action is so urgently needed.

The thrust of this bill is consistent with the direction the government is taking with regard to the whole field of a renaissance in the railway mode. We are not only looking at the need for greater and more effective use of passenger rail services in Canada, but we are also fully aware of the need to implement this policy in concert with many urban needs.

There are a number of other railway issues in Canada today. Many of these are social issues rather than economic ones relating to railway operations. Often from a social benefit or an export benefit point of view railway operations, which in themselves may not be economic, are none the less viable operations.

So far my remarks have dealt with the urban transit and urban development aspects of this legislation. I should like for the next few minutes to point out that this bill also contains valuable new provisions in the matter of public protection and convenience at railway crossings which are embodied in Parts II and III of this legislation. These are concerned with special grants for separations and modernization of the railway grade crossing fund.

The provisions relating to grade crossings and grade separations follow recommendations by the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission to increase the limits of federal assistance for railway grade separation projects. Such expansion is intended to bring grant provisions into line with the increased costs being experienced in the construction of overpasses and subways. The cost of providing safe railway crossings and grade separations has climbed over the years. Such installations, especially in large centres, have become extremely costly. The bill provides increased federal assistance either through provisions in the railway grade crossing fund, which are continued in Part III of the bill, or through new provisions for special grants for separations, which are contained in Part II. The proposed new federal assistance covers level crossing protection work, reconstruction of, or improvement to, existing grade separations, and construction of new grade separations.

The proposed new levels of federal assistance in Part III are as follows. First, level crossing protection work, 80 per cent of the cost of which may be paid from the grade crossing fund up to a new limit of $1 million for new construction. The existing limit is $500,000. Second, construction of, or improvement to, existing grade separations, 50 per cent of the cost of which may be paid from the grade crossing fund, up to a new ceiling of $625,000. The existing limit is $250,000.

Part II of the act provides special grants for very expensive grade separations and for new separations required by highway traffic rerouting schemes. For the very expensive grade separations there is an escalation scale of grants; for example, a grant of over $2 million for a new separation costing $3 million and a grant of about $1.3 million for reconstruction of a grade separation costing $3 million. New grade separations required by highway traffic rerouting schemes which are required to cross a railway line by means of a grade separation will qualify for special grants equal to 50 per cent of the construction costs.

This new railway relocation and crossing legislation deserves the support of this House. Its provisions have been carefully considered. It holds out major benefits in the reshaping of urban neighbourhoods. It pays renewed attention to the issue of public safety at railway and highway crossings and it will greatly extend the federal government's ability to assist in improving the urban environment in our nation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the Chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I might just speak to a point of order. I think we will be able to expedite the passage of the bill in committee of the whole. I might suggest that, on the clause now called, if any speaker is permitted to speak in respect of any clause on which he wishes to speak generally this might shorten the procedure when the bill is called clause by clause.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary North. Is it agreed that while we consider clause 2 we will hear debate on all clauses?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I might indicate that that is quite agreeable. The suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary North is a worthwhile one.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair will act accordingly. On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, it is probably refreshing to some of us to return to what I suppose we were accustomed to under the former rules, which is to have an opportunity to discuss a bill such as this in the committee of the whole House. We have heard six speeches today. I might say at the outset that this party, in so far as the principle of the bill is concerned, supports it 100 per cent. The mayors and reeves who were down here met not only with members of the government but also with members of our party, and I understand the New Democratic Party and the Social Credit Party. They presented certain briefs and came out strongly in support of a bill for relocation of railways so far as it affects urban centres.

I should like to make a few points in respect of the bill itself. As I said at the outset, we support the principle of the bill. We believe the federal government must move into this field, because it is very expensive to relocate railways, change tracks and improve urban centres, thereby enhancing the quality of life for those living in urban centres.

It is now accepted, of course, that the railways fall directly under the jurisdiction of the federal government under our constitution. It seems to me that if the railways accept the responsibility laid down in the bill to make certain changes in agreement with the provinces and municipalities, then I sympathize with the minister in this regard. I think that one of the problems of any minister who is responsible for urban affairs is that he has to deal with three levels of government. Each level is jealous of its own powers and jurisdiction. Under Bill C-27, all three levels of government have some jurisdiction when it comes to making certain changes.

In this regard, what is most important is these conferences which I mentioned this week in a question which I put to the government. I referred to the tri-level conferences. In my opinion there should be at least two conferences a year of the three levels of government on matters relating to urban affairs. Some experts say that 66 per cent of the people live in urban centres. Actually, it would be more correct to say that 80 per cent of the population live in the large centres of Canada.

The minister in charge of housing, whether it be this minister or any other minister, must face the fact that three levels of government and three levels of bureaucracy are involved, and that he must obtain the acceptance of the municipality concerned, of the province, and finally of his own officials before any decision can be reached. The same applies to changes in railway tracks, if the minister decides that they should be taken out of the city so that the land may be used for other purposes. Each time he runs into the problem of having to deal with three levels of government and three levels of bureaucracy, which of course slows down the decision making process and sometimes makes it practically impossible.

I should like to digress for a moment to say that this is one of the great problems facing the minister, and that my sympathy is with him. In housing matters, the minister who represents the federal government finds that first a decision must be made at the city level, then at the provincial level, and finally at the federal level. The same is true of railway relocation.

We support this bill 100 per cent, although we may want to propose some amendments to it. In fact, I may support the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Scarborough West. However, one thing which I would like to emphasize—and I think the minister and every member of the House would agree with me—is that it is necessary to obtain the co-operation of the railroads. Every government has had difficulties in this regard. The railways must come to the conclusion that the governments of this country run the country. The country cannot be run by the railroads.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I am not one of those who laughed or poured scorn on the Minister of Transport when he said that there is no transportation policy in this country. It is very difficult to establish a transportation policy which would be acceptable to the railways and which would be put into effect by them.

I digress for a few moments to point out tonight in this committee of the whole the difficulties that any government faces, whether it be at the federal or the provincial level. Of course, the railways fall directly under the jurisdiction of the federal government, let us make no mistake about it—and I draw that to the attention of my friends in the NDP. The fact is that whether it is the CPR, which is a private company, or the CNR, which is a Crown Corporation, they are both responsible to the federal government.

Inasmuch as the railway have failed to measure up to their responsibilities and to fulfill the mandate which this nation gave them, both the CNR and the CPR have failed the nation. So there is no difference between them there. So far as I am concerned, both the railway companies have failed the nation. Under this bill—and I want to emphasize this—we have undertaken to cover part of the cost of certain changes and to guarantee that the railways will not lose money if an agreement is reached at the municipal, provincial or federal level. So that if any changes are made, the companies themselves will not lose money.

One has to ask oneself: Will the railways, if given this new mandate under the bill for the benefit of the people who live in urban centres, measure up to their responsibility? I am not so sure that they will. This problem will face any minister in charge of urban affairs, whether it is the present minister or the future minister from this party.

We have been the opposition since 1963—11 long years, maybe too long—and in all that time we have been screaming about the shortage of boxcars, for example. In my opinion, the railways have been totally irresponsible in their failure to fulfil the mandate of confederation and to carry out the services for which they were created. I am using this as an example. If the railways fail to measure up to their responsibility under this bill as they have failed to measure up to their responsibility under the constitution, then what we are doing tonight will be to create one more new problem for the nation instead of trying to improve the quality of life of the average individual living in the city and trying to improve our cities generally.

It is interesting to note that Mr. MacMillan Q.C., President and Chairman of the Board of Directors of CNR, was called before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications last December 11 and interrogated by members of parliament. I should like to quote some questions and answers from the procedings on that occasion which will illustrate how serious the problem is and how paralysed is any government or any minister to get the railways to act in a responsible manner. The hon. member for Vegreville asked these questions:

MR. MAZANKOWSKI: Mr. Chairman, when Mr. MacMillan previously appeared before the committee, he had indicated that he had comparative figures on the actual movements versus the targets for last year and this year.

That is talking about grain, Mr. Chairman.

I am talking about the boxcar allocation targets. I wonder whether you could provide this information to the committee at this time. It is for last year and for the current crop year, from August 1 to the present time.

MR. MACMILLAN: Last year, the Canadian National target was 99,419 and our actual deliveries were 97,040. Canadian Pacific's target last year was 101,907 and their actual deliveries were 99,352.

MR. MAZANKOWSKI: Was that for the total crop year, Mr. MacMillan?

MR. MACMILLAN: No, no!

MR. MAZANKOWSKI: For the calendar year?

MR. MACMILLAN: August 2 to December 8.

THE CHAIRMAN: Of 1972?

MR. MACMILLAN: Of 1972, yes.

MR. MAZANKOWSKI: Fine.

I could read question after question, Mr. Chairman. These railways were asked to build box cars. Is that the kind of responsibility we are going to get from them—building 3,000 new cars to move grain out of western Canada? At the committee, Mr. MacMillan said they built 3,000 new cars for the shipment of grain. But when he was questioned it appeared that none of the cars were built, trimmed and shaped for the movement of grain. If the railways are going to be that irresponsible and get away with it in regard to movement of grain, what will they do when they receive money from the federal government to change the tracks and railroads that go through our major cities?

To further show the irresponsibility of the railways, ten years ago there were 88,000 cars that were fit to move grain. At the standing committee it was admitted that the number has now been reduced to 44,000 cars. If the railways do not want to move grain and do not want to change their tracks going through the cities, although they will agree with what the government wants, when they get back to their boardroom they will just do something else.

The minister is a charming man and I hope his charm will be strong. I hope it will be so strong that when this House approves this bill he sees to it that, when money is paid to the railways, they will carry out their mandate and their responsibility not only in accordance with the constitution but in accordance with the terms and conditions of this bill. As I said at the beginning and I repeat, I have sympathy for the minister in this regard. The railways seem to believe they are above the law, but he must force them to carry out their responsibility.

As I pointed out in my example, these facts boil down to a simple formula: that the railways, although subsidized by the taxpayers, without right or equity have reduced the number of grain boxcars by 50 per cent in the last ten years. In other words, the number of boxcars suitable for grain movement dropped from 88,200 in 1963 to 48,000 in 1973 for both railways. Canadian National and Canadian Pacific split 50-50. My question, Mr. Chairman, is: Should the government of this nation, whatever it may be, permit the railways to run the nation, instead of the government running the nation and the railways?

It would seem to me that when money is paid by subsidy for the purpose of moving grain, or for building cars, or for lumber shipments, or for movement of other commodities, or for moving tracks out of the cities and large centres of Canada, the railways should be forced to sign an agreement and to live up to the terms and conditions of their agreement. Then the taxpayers' money is used for the purpose for which it was paid.

I feel sorry for the Minister of Transport, who had to admit—for he is honest—that this government did not have a transportation policy. My indictment is not against him or the government for not having a transportation policy; my indictment is against the railroads that have been able to run slipshod over governments for a number of years, and will continue to do so until this government and this parliament gets tough with them.

An hon. Member: Take them over.

Mr. Woolliams: My hon. friend says "Take them over". If I thought that was the solution, Mr. Chairman, I would speak in favour of it. If I thought socializing the railroads would solve the problem, I would support it. But I find that the procrastination and negligence of the CNR is as great, if not greater, than that of the CPR. In fact, if you ride on the passenger trains of the CNR or the CPR you will find that you get service. I might even mention Air Canada and CP Air. At least CP Air has not got the monopolistic routes Air Canada has. I have tried both lines from here to Calgary so I know who gives the service.

An hon. Member: Nationalize Eldon Woolliams!

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member says "nationalize Eldon Woolliams." I am going to digress for a moment, Mr. Chairman. I hold no brief for Imperial Oil Company, but when the NDP talk about profits they should think about the minister of this government who bought heating oil for $50 million, which is one-quarter of Imperial's profits. Yet nobody complained about that. However, when free enterprise makes a dollar, there is a great deal of complaint about it. I am not going to be sidetracked by that, Mr. Chairman.

Although this is a very short bill, Mr. Chairman, I think it is probably one of the most important to come before the House. In such major centres as Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary and Edmonton the railways own some of the choicest land, because the lines were built before the cities were. If we can get the railways to make changes and relocate in areas outside the cities, as has been done in Ottawa, then, when land is taken over for development within the city, whether by the federal, provincial or municipal government, I think a certain amount of that land should be set aside for parks.

I can only speak about the city of Calgary, which has developed very quickly during the last ten or 15 years. The streets are narrow and very little land has been left for parks. A large acreage of railway track goes through the city and an attempt was made by Senator Hays to have it moved so that the land could be used for other development. It is not for me to say what happened at the city level as I was not a member of council and had nothing to do with it. The idea was good but it was killed, and the tracks are still there in the middle of Calgary.

Mr. Lang: Saskatoon did it.

Mr. Woolliams: The Minister of Justice says that Saskatoon did it, and I want to congratulate Saskatoon. The minister probably knows that is my home city. They have done an excellent job, and I do not know if the minister had anything to do with it or not. Anyway I congratulate him, although I do not think he was mayor at that time. Nevertheless Saskatoon has done a good job. I hope other cities including Winnipeg and Calgary can follow suit.

● (2040)

I see the chairman is getting itchy and feels I have used up my 20 minutes, so I will sit down. In committee of the whole I like to hear what others have to say. I will present some other ideas later this evening when the relevant clauses are called.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I rise, not to make general remarks, but to ask specific questions about clause 2. I was not in the House when the minister spoke on second reading and possibly he may have touched on the matter I am about to allude to. The definition section of the bill says that "urban area" means "an area and areas adjacent thereto that are classified by Statistics Canada in its most recent census . . ." It would help us to understand the bill better if the definition were presented in less technical terms, as not every citizen of Canada reads the publications of Statistics Canada and knows exactly what that organization means by "urban area".

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Scarborough West touched on this point earlier and there is on record what is meant by this definition in the act. For the benefit of the hon. member, Statistics Canada has defined an urban area to include, "(1) incorporated cities, towns and villages with a population of 1,000 or over." I suggest that the bill will therefore apply to any legal entity incorporated as such town or village. Then the second definition is: "(2) unincorporated places of 1,000 or over, having a population density of at least 1,000 per square mile; (3) the urbanized fringe of (1) and (2) . . ." That would include places with a density of population of at least 1,000 per square mile. As far as I can determine, this definition will encompass all inhabited areas of this country where it is appropriate that this bill should apply. We have calculated that within the Canadian Transport Commission's jurisdiction there are 672 such urban areas. Obviously, an urban area may include many municipalities, as there are many more than 672 municipalities in Canada.

After examining various definitions of urban area, we settled on that definition, being satisfied that it applies to those areas of habitation supplied with railway facilities, areas to which the procedures set out in the bill and the regulations can apply.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, another question occurs to me. According to the minister, Statistics Canada defines an urban area as an incorporated city, town or village with a population of 1,000 or more or an unincorporated place with a population of 1,000 or better. He did not mention any district municipality.

I am sure the minister knows that in the province from which he and I come there are municipalities which are really urban areas, with populations well over 1,000. One such area in my constituency springs to mind immediately, because there is no railway in it, the district municipality of Campbell River, which I suggest has a population of at least 10,000. At one time it was a village; later it was defined by the province as a district municipality. If I heard the minister correctly, the district municipality of Campbell River is to be excluded from the provisions of the bill, even though it may more readily be considered an urban area than, say, the village of Tahsis, on the west coast of my constituency. I mention the village because it is unlikely that a railway will run through it in the near future.

Can the minister comment on what I have said about the definition of an urban area?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I know the city the hon. member refers to as being the place where the best salmon in Canada are caught.

Mr. Forrestall: Says who?

Mr. Basford: The bill would apply to Campbell River in two ways. It would apply to the area as an incorporated municipality, or as an unincorporated place with a population of over 1,000 and a density of 1,000 per square mile. Remember, there are two definitions, one dealing with an incorporated municipality, the other with unincorporated places with populations of 1,000 and over. So the definition would include Campbell River. At the moment I am not sure whether there is a railway in Campbell River.

Mr. Barnett: I do not think there is, but we will not go into that at the moment. May I ask another question. The definition section deals with "transport plan". The question which arises is this: How would this legislation apply, if at all, to new communities such as have sprung up in British Columbia and elsewhere which have been referred to as instant towns? I do not know of any served directly by railway. I think of the town of MacKenzie, north of Prince George. There is much talk about creating new satellites to urban areas. I ask the minister to look at clause 6(1) which says, "For the purpose of carrying into effect a transportation plan accepted by the Commission under section 5," certain things shall be done. I understand that section 5 deals with a plan, which would have to be accepted by the commission, which would include both the urban development and transportation plan.

I may be wrong, but as others have observed this bill is complex. If I am correct, and this is the aspect which interests me in relation to the development of new, planned communities, then may I say this. Clause 6(2)(c) empowers the commission, in relation to carrying into effect the transportation plan, to "require a railway company to build a railway line in such location as may be specified by the Commission within the transportation study area to which the transportation plan relates". That power could be important in relation to proper planning and direction to a railway company to fit its service for a planned community which is to be an urban area. Can the direction be given before the area has acquired the minimum population of 1,000 but which, once the direction has come into effect, will, for the purposes of the next census, acquire sufficient population to be classed as an urban area? I wonder whether the minister could comment on the implications of the legislation for the kind of situation I am trying to suggest.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the question very much. I would answer it by saying that this legislation is obviously designed to deal with situations that currently exist and correct things. With regard to railway lines, if they are being under-utilized or could more effectively be utilized, the CTC by way of a transportation plan would be allowed to make an order as to a relocation, re-routing or re-use of those lands or rights of way.

With regard to new towns, we passed legislation in this House a year ago to finance new towns. If you were developing a new town, I quite frankly cannot conceive that you would design it to have a major railroad relocation as part of the plan or a year after the start. A new community being planned and developed now would use the best possible planning techniques and advice. It would not have to use this kind of technique to go back and correct or change things. I appreciate the hon. member's concern that we consider new towns or new communities, something in which I am very interested; but in developing a new community, you would plan it so you would not have to use these provisions at all.

The hon. member raised the specific question of rapid transit or public transit. Again you would not have to use these provisions because you would have to put in the transportation facilities as part of the plan for the new community.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I specifically stopped my quotation from clause 6 before I came to the matter of rapid transit because this is not the point. I understand that the thrust of this legislation is to try to deal with actions taken in the past which might properly not have been foreseen in their long-term results. I am glad to know the minister is concerned about the planning of new communities.

The question I am raising is what authority of direction there is to a railway company, whether it is the CPR, which my friend from Calgary loves so much, or the CNR, which is the subject of his criticism, to ensure that a railway will be located in accordance with the desire of planners of new communities.

I am no authority on the provisions of the Railway Act or the kinds of powers a railway company can exercise. However, some of us have been hearing about decisions made in the past by a former general manager of the CPR regarding the location of towns. This may have refreshed our memories or put in our minds the kind of authority railways have with regard to putting in their lines.

As I read clause 6, it provides that, under the circumstances prescribed in this bill, specific authority is given to the commission to require a railway company to build a railway line, in effect where the commission says it should. The general thrust of this bill is to provide for a constructive liaison between decisions of a commission and decisions made at a community level.

I raise this point because unless the minister can indicate to the committee that under some other existing authority there is a power of direction to the railway companies that they must co-operate in the development of a new community with regard to the location of lines and so on, this is something that should not be considered. That is, if we are going to prevent mistakes in the future rather than being altogether preoccupied with the mistakes of the past.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I go back and say what I said before, namely that it seems inconceivable that you could plan a new community without planning your transportation facilities as part of that plan and without the need to rely on this legislation at all.

Let me cite two examples of new communities. One is in the national capital region, where I have been speaking of the development of a new community which at the moment is called Southeast City. It is being located there because of the attractiveness of the particular site and the fact that it now has a transportation corridor to it. One would plan that new community by providing transportation facilities to it as part of an original new plan for a new community, and without any reference to this particular legislation.

The other is the community of Pickering, being planned in association with the proposed new airport. That is a situation where the government of Ontario, in association with the airport, is planning a new community. We have again said we will co-operate with the provincial government in the provision of public transit and rapid transit facilities to that new community. They will be developed as part of a new transportation plan for that new community. They will be facilities that will not need correcting.

I want to say that in both examples I cited, Southeast City and the new community outside metro Toronto, they would be by definition an urban area deemed to be within an urban area. Southeast City would be deemed to fit within this definition if it wre necessary to apply it, although I cannot conceive of needing to make use of it. Both Southeast City and Pickering would be deemed to be within the definition.

Mr. Barnett: I want to thank the minister. I raised this point deliberately under the definition section in order to relate it to further clauses of the bill. I want time to think about the minister's answer before we come to clause 6.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on Bill C-27, one of the most important pieces of legislation which, I believe, have been put before us during this session.

This bill binds the government for many years. The first question I am asking myself on this bill before us is to know if there are priorities in the field of transportation other than the relocation of railway lines.

Farm producers of western Canada as well as lumber operators complain, justifiably so, of a lack of railway cars. There are also reasonable complaints that the passenger service between the major cities is really of inferior quality, and I believe that these should be priorities to consider in order to improve transportation services.

The relocation of railway lines may have a sound basis. The environment needs protection, and urban beautification is desired. There is also talk of pollution, but knowing how fast has been the growth of urban centres in recent years, I think that this will continue for quite some time. And, in spite of the answer given by the minister to my hon. colleague for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), that urban development plans will prevent new construction along the relocated railway lines, I wonder to what extent they will work out.

A few weeks ago, I heard an interview on the radio about the pollution problems in Montreal. We know that in the metropolitan area that problem is rather serious at times and a director of Miron Co. Limited was asked his views, because the company was charged with polluting the air around its plants. The director's answer, in my opinion, was correct. He stated that when Miron Company was set up on its present location, that is a rather long time ago, it was practically open country where there was no residential area and it was precisely why it had been chosen. However, today the city is surrounding the plant. How can the people be prevented from getting close to that pollution centre? We know that such a large cement plant does create pollution problems.

In my opinion, the relocation of railway lines could create a number of problems.

In the past, people used to build their homes near waterways. For instance, they started with the St. Lawrence River. Then, they established their settlements along the main rivers, for these rivers provided the best means of transportation of that era. Later, people built villages along railway lines. Today, we mentioned Calgary, Montreal, Quebec City and some other great cities which have existed for hundreds of years. In those days, development was fairly slow. Today, railway lines can be relocated, but steps will have to be taken to prevent people from crowding around the new railway lines which will be rerouted out of the great cities.

If land is to be recovered in downtown areas, much will be lost in the areas surrounding the cities. When the hon. member for Scarborough (Mr. Harney) spoke a while ago—I do not know whether he had Montreal in mind—but he spoke of railway transport as an inexpensive mode of transport at a time of energy crisis.

In Montreal, for instance, we have commuter trains which offer the workers an inexpensive and convenient mode of transport. In Montreal East, railway lines will have to be replaced by another means of transport. Of course we have the subway and buses, but because of the large number of cars and trucks on our highways and streets, buses are not the answer to the massive movement of workers from the outskirts to the city or vice versa.

To my mind, commuter trains are very useful, and I wonder whether it is wise to cancel that means of transport.

There is another means of transport between large centres such as Quebec, Montreal, Toronto and the large cities in western Canada or the Maritimes, namely the plane. Still, one has to leave from downtown and drive several miles to reach an airport. For shorter trips, if you take the train to go to Halifax or Vancouver for example, you will still find a station downtown.

But if you relocate the railways, you will have to travel a longer distance before you can get to a station.

Mr. Chairman, we might create problems while solving existing ones.

I suppose that when he prepared this bill before submitting it to the House, the minister has made some research to see how much money had to be invested in travelling.

The minister said that more than 600 municipalities would benefit from this act. My opinion is that it will require a considerable investment. I do not know if the minister has figured out how much it would cost in total, but I guess that the budget will have to be allotted each year and that the House will have to vote these sums.

There is another point just as important. Has it been foreseen, since the amount invested each year is rather limited, which cities will be able to relocate these lines?

I think there will be violent controversies between municipalities and provincial or federal governments.

A few minutes ago, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) mentioned the need for three-level conferences so that the three levels of government can reach an agreement on this question. But I am not so sure it would be useful to invite municipalities to such conferences to discuss these projects.

Recently Mayor Lamontagne of Quebec City compared the current situation of municipalities to that of a child of divorced parents. It is never possible to speak to both parents simultaneously; in the same way, municipalities cannot meet senior levels of government at the same time to discuss problems together.

Therefore, if we want to be logical, if we want to implement this program in order that it may bring the satisfactory results we are anticipating, municipalities will have to be allowed to have their say about the development of their area.

It may be, as the minister said a few moments ago, that in a large city, a relocation may involve more than one municipality. At that time, serious negotiations will be required to bring about agreement among the parties involved.

I think that on the whole, the bill proceeds from a good principle, but I feel that care will be needed in its application and in the surveys and studies to be conducted.

Perhaps we want to solve some of our cities' problems. Well and good, but I am wondering whether in doing so we will not be creating new problems.

In any event, if we relocate these railway lines and stations that were in the centre of cities, I believe that we must consider at the same time developing a rapid transit service, not too expensive and suitable for workers living in the suburbs.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, if I might, I should like to pick up the thread of the remarks of my colleague the hon. member for Calgary North by making one or two comments regarding some of the fears we have on this side of the Chamber. It has been suggested by other speakers, I believe the hon. member for Central Nova and others, that we welcome this type of legislation. I liken it somewhat to a schooner with a full set of sails; but, as pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary North, we are a little bit concerned about the wind that is going to fill those sails. He was talking about the efficiency and adequacy of Canadian National Railways' management effectively to administer and operate within the parameters of this legislation.

This bill essentially extends to the CTC the authority for management of what is proposed and contained therein. While it is an arm of government, it seems we would be a little remiss if we were not to take a few minutes to look at the general competency of the CTC and the CNR to administer this authority. If you look at the past history of the CTC you will find it is not such as to give someone like myself any great encouragement that it will be able to deal efficiently with the authority and power as well as the funds given to it.

As in everything else, there are certain instances which occur from time to time that discourage one in this area, and I think in this type of debate it is appropriate to cite some of them. I intend to do so, as others have done, to indicate a lack of trust in the efficiency and adequacy of the CTC.

A case occurred only a month or two ago in which an application was made by the city of Dartmouth for funds to assist in the removal of one of our city's more inelegant examples of a CN 1920 baroque, if you will, and to replace it with something more modern, thereby doing away with a very dangerous intersection. Not only did the CTC take well over a year and a half to decide what to do, but having made a decision it failed to notify any of the parties that awaited its decision in order that they could get on with this work for well over a month. This would indicate not just a lack of concern on the part of the commission, but an absolutely disgraceful and callous attitude, if you will, toward municipalities and other bodies that simply must know of decisions like this for various reasons, including budgetary ones.

This undue delay in advising the parties of the decision of the CTC is continuing to have an effect on the progress of this work. Apparently having made a decision, it was filed away and forgotten. This happened a long time ago and I have seen nothing happen in this case, so it makes one question the efficiency of the CTC.

Another area of concern is this decision making process that is entrusted to the CTC. I have in mind the authority to make decisions in this whole area of urban rail transportation and to advise ministers of the Crown. I suppose the Minister of Transport is most likely to be the one involved in this regard, particularly in respect of whether such shared cost programs should be initiated.

When we give authority to the CTC and a fairly heavy bank account, I think members of this chamber are quite justified in asking for some reassurance by way of action. We want some demonstrated reason for placing our trust in the ability of the CTC to administer, and I must say that my experience is such that I cannot help but be anything but concerned.

I suppose many examples could be given of this experience. I think of another one in the Halifax urban area involving a problem in the constituency of my dear colleague, our distinguished Chairman this evening. This has to do with a rail commuter service. I would cite this example to underline my concern about whether the CTC is in fact capable. This involved a long and protracted process, still underway, in the establishment of a commuter service to serve the outlying area of my own metropolitan Dartmouth-Halifax riding. In this instance all that was sought was a rescheduling of certain existing rail services to provide the people with a much needed service. The railway companies said no, not unexpectedly, citing their own problems, in the details of which I am sure hon. members are not interested.

To say the least, the railway companies, in this case both the CN and CP, were not very anxious or willing to do anything on their own and, accordingly, the citizens, with their somewhat impressive concern about this commuter service, presented a petition to their member of parliament. It eventually came across my desk and I wrote to the CNR, which again said no.

I then wrote to the Dominion Atlantic Railway which operated part of the commuter service on the tracks, and the reply I received was the same. They said they were merely a subsidiary of CPR and that since the terminal facility belonged to the CNR they could do nothing, that their hands were tied. I then addressed myself to the Minister of Transport, who in turn shuffled me off to the Canadian Transport Commission. He did so without any comment at all, I suppose believing I would flounder there.

On January 28 this year I addressed myself to the Chairman of the CTC and asked if he could advise me of the progress to date. That letter has not been answered to this point in time, April 25. Hon. members with longer memories will remember with some interest the contribution made in this chamber by a former member from Hamilton West who has since departed to a committee of the CTC. I believe he has been elevated to the position of executive director of the committee.

Mr. Macaluso, in a letter written to me over a month ago, advised me that studies in respect of this commuter service were underway but that no progress could be reported. I called his office this afternoon and the response was that there was still no word. Apparently the railway companies have not seen fit to answer the committee. So obviously the railway companies no longer tread in any fear of the CTC and feel they have successfully captured the commission.

This tale of frustration and indecision would seem to me after having been in this chamber some years, to be typical of the incompetence of the government. In addition, I am by no means convinced that the commission itself is being chaired, as it is in a sense by another of our former colleagues, in a manner that in any way demonstrates any concern, or indeed any desire, to accept the responsibilities charged to the commission under existing legislation, let alone any ability to deal efficiently with this new legislation. The inescapable conclusion I suppose one might draw from this is that the government in a sense lost the initiative to assist, let alone sustain, the CTC, which is being asked to exercise considerable authority under this particular bill.

I suggest that the apathy has spread to various other commissions and agencies. There would appear to be a lack of leadership and drive. There is frustration over the difficulty of obtaining simple things or getting things done for people, and yet when asking us to accept what is essentially a long overdue piece of legislation the government also asks us to give powers to a body whose chairman, and perhaps even the other members, should be fired.

With new blood on the commission perhaps it might be stirred up and we might get a little action. I suggest we will not get such action under the present system. I cannot even get an answer after 18 months in respect of a simple matter like a commuter service or the reason that a train schedule cannot be altered by five minutes in order to accommodate thousands of families who live in a very rapidly growing area, albeit not the largest area of Canada but a healthy and growing area.

I do not wish to wander from the subject matter before us and cover other areas, but there are a number of other matters which have been touched on by the hon. member for Abitibi and by my hon. friend from Vancouver Island, who spoke about planning priorities and so on. I do note that in virtually every phrase in the bill there is some reference to the convenience and safety of the travelling public.

I would be somewhat remiss if I did not direct another shot at the minister, not necessarily the minister who is guiding this bill through the House, in respect of safety and the assurance that Canadians must have in respect of their transportation facilities. This is the assurance that institutions such as parliament owe to the people who use the transportation system. I refer to the regulatory body which investigates accidents within the parameters of its regulatory authority. Here we are giving more authorithy to the CTC to administer a fund that will be established, yet we do not consider the other aspects. I suggest, and I believe other members in this chamber share my view, that there is nothing in the performance of the CTC to warrant any confidence in it with regard to the administration of this particular bill.

The requirement in respect of public inquiries is a permissive thing under this legislation. We might have wished the minister had provided within the bill a means by which the public at large could perhaps, by the simple instrument of a petition to the CTC or other body, apply for a public hearing. I note that my colleagues to the left in this chamber would like that provision to be mandatory, so that there would be public hearings in every instance.

It would seem to me, however, that many applications for meaningful and useful assistance will be made under the provisions of this legislation, and not all of them by any stretch of the imagination will require public inquiries. Indeed, the process of establishing the mechanics of a public inquiry might in some cases unduly delay the issue. So rather than have this made mandatory, I wish the minister might have built in a provision for an inquiry to be made on the part of people who might be affected. I cannot help but say, perhaps just in passing but fairly seriously, that the Minister of Transport, and indeed even his delightful and charming parliamentary secretary, while sometimes agreeing with me, on many occasions are not prepared to do anything about ideas that are presented. They have not really demonstrated any enthusiasm in respect of the transportation needs of Canada. Perhaps that will change shortly, but there is no enthusiasm. That is a somewhat startling admission regarding those who have had a degree of absolute control over that area for long periods of time. But I think even the parliamentary secretary would admit that there are times when he himself is not enthusiastic, even though we are chiding him for being the only live spokesman for the department. The department has run out of steam; it has given no leadership. We have been waiting for this piece of legislation, as the provinces have been waiting for it, for ten years now, and the government asks us to approve it with enthusiasm when we know they will turn it over to a body which operates within their parameters and reports to them. But there is no steam there either; there is no energy. I do not think even Geratol will help the chairman of that commission. There is no demonstrated reason why we should express other than respect for the measure that is in front of us and a deep concern for the commission, the body that will administer it.

● (2130)

As I say, we praise the principle of the bill, but its implementation and effective administration cause me some concern, as I am sure they do many thousands of Canadians. I commend my colleague, the hon. member for Central Nova, for the remarks he made here this afternoon. This is indeed an interesting bill. One aspect of it is that it seems to bring together several ministries of the Crown.

Perhaps I should stress again the need for the government to assure us that as the body behind this piece of legislation they will accept some responsibility with regard to the attitude of the CTC to the implementation of the provisions of this bill. The government should perk them up a little bit and get them working. Good God, a few mistakes once in a while are nothing compared with the work that can be achieved. It would be a welcome and refreshing thing to most of us in this chamber compared with their track record in recent years, which has shown them to be somewhat less than useful, at least as far as I am concerned.

Obviously the commission will have to do better in the future, but they will not do better unless the government spurs them on. My colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North, earlier asked who runs the country. It seems to me that it is the CNR in these times. Obviously the CNR do not care about the CTC and they have never given a damn about the government. So I am not all that happy with the administrative mechanics behind this legislation, or with the demonstrated enthusiasm on the part of the CTC, indeed the absence of it on the part of the government, to make sure that the provisions of this bill are not only administered but administered with some imagination and enthusiasm. The government should ensure that this legislation does not bog down in some corner of somebody's back filing drawer, but rather that it is used to the extent that the provinces and municipalities require to correct some serious situations that have existed for many years and that worsen each year as property values go up.

Let the government take hold of the CNR and of the CTC and let them know once in a while that this chamber and they as the government do have some concern about the way in which these two bodies go about administering this act. When the government do this, some people on this side of the House will let them have the type of support that is required for the meaningful implementation of the provisions of this bill. For many of us this will mean a long overdue but very welcome involvement in work in our own communities.

We welcome this bill, Mr. Chairman, but I request of the government that they make absolutely certain that the administrative body is shaken up a little bit. Let the government point out to them the necessity for a more vigorous approach to the massive problems that they must tackle under the provisions of this legislation and make sure that they do so with some enthusiasm.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, earlier today I spoke in support of this bill, and now I would like to ask the minister two questions. I have a copy of the Winnipeg railway study which covers a number of aspects of rail line relocation with regard to the economic benefits and the social and environmental impact of such. I should like to quote from a letter from the Damas Smith consulting firm in the city of Winnipeg. They refer to CP Rail and say: "The railway has acquired land south of the main line". However, they do not say how far south. If they go as far south as they can, they will go up to Saskatchewan Avenue which is adjacent to residential property. They say:

> The railway has acquired land south of the main line between the Perimeter Highway and the Airport for a new classification yard. It will probably build this yard.

As I stated this afternoon, CPR has been acquiring property adjacent to residential property. I should like to ask the minister: What protection will the city have in this situation?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I want to make it clear to the hon. member that I am not familiar with all the details of the Winnipeg proposals because I have not had to familiarize myself with them. The hon. member asks what kind of protection would be provided under this legislation. First, the initiation of the relocation proposal must come from the municipality or province. That is very clear in this legislation. They are the applicants to the CTC. They put together an urban development plan and a transportation plan on the basis of studies and work, and they put that to the CTC. So it seems to me that the protection about which the hon. member asks lies in the fact that the applicant is the municipality, in this case the city of Winnipeg. That is the first general area of protection. I am not referring at this point to specific sections, although this would be clear as we go through this bill clause by clause.

The other point is that the CTC will deal with the application, and on any major ones, as I made clear this afternoon, they will undoubtedly hold hearings. So if there is an objection to what the municipality has done, they will have the right to be heard and will have protection in that way. So the fact, that the municipality prepares the application and is the initiator of the railway relocation proposals is the first line of protection.

The second line of protection is the public hearings. The third, of course, is the CTC itself. If some part of the plan was clearly not in the public interest in terms of the urban area, the commission would not go along with the plan. The railroad simply cannot put in a facility wherever it wants without the approval of the commission. Those three areas are the protection which the hon. member asked for.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Chairman, it would appear that the railways are being presumptuous in acquiring land already, so you can understand our concern. My second question is another quotation from the Damas Smith letter to the city of Winnipeg. At page 8, it says:

> The railway reception areas or impact corridors were studied in some depth in the railway study. It was concluded that these corridors should be designed so that the "community remains whole", that is to say the adverse effects of the railway should be designed out. This means that the cost of railway relocation will automatically include the cost of environmental protection.

When I see a map in the Damas Smith report showing a new rail line going through an area like Assiniboia Park, I wonder how the environmental protection cost would be covered for the largest environmental park in Winnipeg.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, what the hon. member is reading from is a set of proposals which set out a series of options for railroad relocation in Winnipeg, none of which has the approval of the municipality, the province or the federal government. They are just a set of proposals. If there is one proposal about the use of Assiniboia Park which is environmentally damaging to the municipality involved, I presume it would not be part of the urban plan.

Mr. Frank: Mr. Chairman, I will try not to take too long. I appreciate the opportunity to ask the minister or the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport for clarification on the funding of a specific relocation project which I feel should be a tremendous urban renewal step forward for the city of London, part of which represents an important part of my riding. The part of the bill that I am not too clear about is the percentage of funding that could be expected for such a project. In order to give the minister a picture of what I am speaking about, I should like to outline what is there now and the tremendous improvement that could be made by its relocation.

[Mr. Basford.]

First of all, we have both main lines operating through the city of London. Both CPR and CNR are there, they operate as separate entities, but the facilities are somewhat different. The CNR has a relatively new station and the facilities are in reasonably good shape. The CPR station is somewhat antiquated and I doubt very enticing to passengers. The two railways operate about a mile apart, through the main core of the city. The CPR has only two crossings that are not open through the whole area, which is approximately four miles long. You can imagine the number of level crossings that people have to contend with, particularly in the mornings and evenings. Even though it is a single line track that the CPR operates on, it is hard to estimate how many hundreds of man hours are lost by people each day waiting on train switching or for a freight train of over 100 cars passing through. The yard area is on the east side of the city.

The CNR right of way is a double line track and, as I said before, is in reasonably good shape. The CPR right of way is located in such a position that it could fill a very desperate need for an east-west, in-city traffic route for rapid transit, automobiles, or whatever would best serve future in-city traffic flow.

I feel the possibility of dualing these two main lines through the city of London is unique. Some six miles from the present CNR station and less than two miles from the city limits to the west of London the two lines are literally side by side, separated only by a telegraph line. I know this area well because the two main lines go through property where I have lived all my life. The side by side area I speak of is immediately east of my property. It would be a natural thing to route these two traffic potentials to the two-track CNR line, and would be almost equally convenient to separate them to go their separate ways east of the city by way of a spur CNR line that already heads north east and presently crosses the CPR line. It would be quite easy to reroute them. After they have progressed through the city on the dual line, they could go their separate ways again.

No doubt the proposed in-city relocation would present some technical and manpower problems, but the many advantages would far outweigh the disadvantages. One problem, of course, that would have to be overcome would be the relocation of some employees in the yards in the existing facilities that operate within the city on the CPR line. However, I am sure that would not be a major problem.

This is a very brief explanation of the present situation and the possible future of the railroads in London. My question to the minister is for some clarification of the percentage of funding that would be possible. If I have made myself clear I would like an answer to that.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. member for Middlesex. They point out a wonderful example of what happens in cities. He has chosen the city of London to demonstrate the need for this legislation. It is just such situations that are to be dealt with, and that is why I think the legislation should be passed as soon as possible.

With reference to the city of London scheme, I understand that they have consultants working on this. We have been informed that the city is at a preliminary study stage, but the scheme is being worked out within the framework of the proposed railroad relocation bill. So that when the bill is passed the work of the consultants will fit the mechanism of the bill. The financial mechanism provided in the bill would mean that the city of London could apply to my department for 50 per cent of the study costs of developing the urban plan, and to the Department of Transport for 50 per cent of the cost of developing the transportation plan.

Then, once the relocation scheme is approved, they can get a grant equal to 50 per cent of the net cost to the railroads of the relocation scheme, plus moneys—we will deal with this when we come to the appropriate section—which might be required if some of the land were used for housing. That is, they could get money for housing or funds for special crossings under Parts II and III of the act.

Mr. Frank: I appreciate the minister's explanation, Mr. Chairman, and I hasten to add I appreciate what this bill will provide. I am well aware of the study which is under way. However, I am confused about the 50 per cent and the 80 per cent. Is there any possibility of an 80 per cent area coming into effect by this relocation provision?

Mr. Basford: No, Mr. Chairman, but I prefer to answer that when we deal with specific clauses under Part III which relate to funds payable with regard to grade crossings, new grade separations, or the construction of existing ones.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I approve of the bill. I should like consideration to be given to the tax load borne by communities smaller than Winnipeg or Toronto. I am referring to places like Weyburn. We should examine some of the cost factors involved in this legislation.

In the last 50 minutes I have heard many good questions asked, but have not heard one member say he opposes this bill. Within the last ten days the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities has told us to pass this bill. Considering the present situation of this parliament and the prospect which may arise in the coming weeks, I suggest that this bill should pass. Unless the next speaker says he opposes the bill, I suggest we should pass it. Of course, if someone opposes it we should be prepared to listen to him.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, I have some serious reservations about some proposals of the bill.

Mr. Knight: Every member from Toronto should vote for it.

Mr. Blenkarn: The definition of "urban development plan" is fatuous. We are told that:

> . . . 'urban development plan' means a plan respecting the development and use of land within or within and adjacent to an urban area whereby it is proposed to control and regulate the use of such land for purposes of industry, commerce, government, recreation, transportation, hospitals, schools, churches, residences, homes for the elderly or for other purposes or classes of users . . .

I suggest that such definition in a bill in the name of the Minister of Transport is fatuous. If the urban development plan does not provide for a home for the elderly, for a church, for a school or for a recreation centre, it cannot be considered by the minister. Perhaps the minister will say something about that.

Presumably the plan would be examined by the Canadian Transport Commission. Despite what the hon. member for Assiniboia said, members on my side have serious reservations about the Canadian Transport Commission. In September, 1972 560 people worked for the commission. It is now seeking budgetary authority for some 860 employees, representing an increase in employment of 60 per cent. The commission is under the chairmanship of a former member of this House. He was minister of finance but is now head of the Canadian Transport Commission. He is to be responsible for determining if transportation corridors in our cities presently owned by the railways are to be turned over to other authorities for other purposes.

The House must look carefully at the relocation provisions of the bill. While it may be necessary to relocate some railway routes, we must make certain that we do not lose valuable transportation corridors through cities, as cities can no longer obtain them by filing a plan with the commission and having the commission rubber stamp it.

Look at what happened in Ottawa. A conference centre was built where the downtown railway station used to be. That station was convenient for travellers who came from Toronto or Montreal. To get to and from the Ottawa railway station nowadays, you must take a cab or some other conveyance.

As a rapidly changing urban society we face many difficulties. Changes in our urban society will be reviewed by the Canadian Transport Commission. Members are concerned about the personalities of commission members who are to make determinations in these areas. We are concerned because through such determinations we could easily lose valuable existing rights of way in our cities.

That brings me to the situation in Toronto. People are concerned about the CPR line which runs through the city. That line causes some residents annoyance, because trains make a noise. One of the problems is this. That line could be abandoned in compliance with a redevelopment plan, and the result would be, say, some 176 extra acres for housing, for industry or for other innumerable purposes. The right of way could be preserved. However, the sale of a crucial five or even ten acres of that 176 acres might mean that there would no longer be a right of way through the city to meet the city's rapid transit requirements. It is so easy, when pretending to be bright, to be intelligent, to be capable, and with the best intentions in the world for improving the city, to wind up losing valuable rights of way which can never be replaced. The provisions of this bill would make it easy for rights of way to be lost. May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Progress reported.

FINANCE—STATEMENT OF MINISTER CONCERNING LEVEL OF CORPORATE PROFITS AND NECESSITY TO PASS ON COST INCREASES

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago I directed a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) relating to the skyrocketing prices in the construction industry. I asked what measure was being considered to stabilize prices in this important sector of our economy. I raised that question because of the way in which prices are soaring. Many small construction firms are finding it all but impossible to continue in business. The report from one firm of chartered quantity surveyors, for example, indicated the following claim:

> Material shortages and labor and material price increases will continue into the 1974-1975 period and contractors and sub contractors will be forced to carry substantial contingency sums in any estimate prepared during this period in order to cover costs that cannot be determined at the time of tender.

This is all but impossible for small companies to undertake. Many find this kind of provision all but beyond them because many of their would-be customers demand a firm price. Many of these small firms are not capable of absorbing the losses they risk in the present period of price instability.

To give an example, I draw statistics provided by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. With regard to residential buildings, if we take as a base index 1971 prices and signify that by the number 100, we find that prices of material rose in 1972 from 104.1 in the month of January to 115.1 in the month of December. In 1973, they rose from 116.8 in the month of January to 125.5 in the month of September.

In the same period, the cost of labour rose in 1972 from 105.8 in January to 116.1 in December and in 1973 from 116.5 to 123.4.

In the non-residential building sector, the same process was followed. If we take as a base index the costs in 1961 and signify that by the number 100, we find that the cost of materials in 1972 rose from 138.1 in January to 146.7 in December and in 1973 from 148.9 in January to 160.1 in December.

From this can be seen the predicament that is challenging every firm in the construction industry. It is an almost impossible problem for many small firms that have very little margin to go on. The escalation of prices continues, so that between the time a firm submits a tender to a customer and delivers its product, the contractor is almost doomed to suffer a loss. This is a risk that small firms find they simply cannot bear.

To illustrate, I will cite an example of one company just outside the area of metro Toronto. It found that electrical conduits increased in price 100 per cent in one year. The cost of small items like switches, outlet boxes, fasteners and so on rose from 50 to 100 per cent.

This kind of escalation of prices resulted in the following experience. They submitted a tender on October 30, 1973. They estimated that the job would require $2,815 per 1,000 feet of cable. When the order was placed for supplies on December 18, 1973, the price had risen to $3,303 per 1,000 feet of cable. When the cable was delivered in mid-January, 1974 they were billed $3,517 per 1,000 feet. That meant an increase of $702 per 1,000 feet, or 25 per cent, in two and a half months. It was for that reason that an officer of that company wrote that the situation is running wild and urged that the government put on controls to end these large price increases.

I cite the predicament of that small firm as an example of small business who have various people working for them. I plead with the government to take more seriously the predicament of these small companies in the construction industry. They simply cannot carry on. I the present price escalation continues, some action will be necessary.

I plead with the government to pay more attention to the plight of these companies and to give them more support. What we need is an effort at price control, an effort to stabilize prices so that small companies submitting tenders and offering contracts can have some assurance that prices will not run hog wild during the period between tender and delivery. It is all but impossible for a small company to absorb a 25 per cent price increase in a period of two months.

This is a serious matter not only for businessmen but for the consumers involved. We read in one newspaper a report that the cost of building or replacing the most unpretentious house in metropolitan Toronto in 1974 will be 25 per cent more than last year. We are all aware of the difficulties faced by would-be house purchasers. These difficulties are now becoming almost insurmountable by people contemplating the purchase of a home, with costs going up at this rate.

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it must be agreed that the profit picture varies from one industry to the other, and that the risks involved in doing business come from various areas and reach different levels.

Looking at Canadian industry as a whole, it may be seen that profits increased substantially in 1973. Their relationship to sales is not however at record level. Higher ratios were experienced in the 1950's.

Recent profit improvement derives mainly from the increase in prices relative to inventories. Disregarding gains on inventory revaluation, operating profits as compared to sales did not even reach in 1973 the average level of the period since 1949.

The profit increase was parallelled by very strong growth in capital expenditures by corporations. This is an encouraging sign for, in an inflationary economy, rising offer stemming from increased spending on capital goods will have positive results.

It must be remembered that a large part of those investments has taken the form of industrial and commercial buildings, and this, allied to rapidly increasing housing construction, has led to considerable activity in the construction industry. Businesses in that sector are extremely varied and I am sure all of them have not managed to the same extent to match their profits with rising costs.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has said that, to his mind, higher profits, although useful from the point of view mentioned, would become undesirable if they were to exceed the level required to encourage the necessary productive investments. Basing himself on a study of currently available statistics, he said that, generally, the Canadian industry now enjoys enough prosperity to produce those investments, but that additional profits would be unjustified.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I will say that the minister has in fact asked Canadian businesses, each in the light of its particular situation, to take into account the interests of the people. Those interests are not well served by price increases that produce profits exceeding those the companies need to finance the expansion of their production capacity, which is so important in present day circumstances.

TRANSPORT—ACTION TO IMPLEMENT TRANSPORT COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS FOR PREVENTION OF RAILWAY ACCIDENTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is both appropriate and timely that I speak tonight about railroad safety since the Canadian Transport Commission hearings concerning the recent tragic deaths of railroad enginemen Boyd and Battuci in the middle of March are expected to conclude tomorrow in the city of Vancouver.

I think it is sad but true that it usually takes a death or two to bring everyone to his senses regarding the lack of track maintenance and sufficient regard for safety procedures, both of which items are and have been appallingly lax in my province of British Columbia for a decade at least, and certainly since the introduction of unit trains.

During these current hearings of the CTC we learned that the rock face which let go in March killing the two men, and one which is contiguous to the CPR main line rail track, have been described by a Canadian Pacific geologist as unstable and likely to crumble at any minute. Probably if they do it would rain death and destruction on the trains that pass beneath every day.

A 10-mile per hour slowdown was first issued, then cancelled, then reinstituted by the CPR in that slide area near Spencer's Bridge where the tragedy occurred. The CP main line number one passenger TransCanada passes this spot every day. I am told that a watchman has been placed in the slide area with a lantern, but if that rock face ever lets go it is goodbye watchman, bringing the tragic death total to three.

We have also assumed, because of these hearings and the nature of some of the testimony, that many CPR engineers tend to be a bit reluctant to be over-explicit in giving evidence before the hearings. I wonder if this could be because of the jeopardy their testimony might place them in with the company, since for two years or so engineers have had hanging over their heads approximately $130,000 worth of court injunctions which followed their protest in 1972 over an identical lack of safety features and decent working conditions. I could detail this if I had time.

In any event, their protests were the result of these identical conditions that caused the deaths of Mr. Boyd and Mr. Battuci in March. Only a sudden shock, such as the news in the middle of March that these two Kamloops men had died in the train wreck, makes us think about the fact that for railroaders the Fraser Canyon is an exceedingly dangerous place to work. Yet hundreds of men who live in my riding and surrounding ridings constantly face snow and rock slides and numerous other hazards as part of their normal routine, especially in winter months.

While each fatality is tragic and brings headlines rail deaths in the canyon, or for that matter all across Canada, are by no means uncommon. Derailments caused by track conditions on both national railways in 1972 were up three times over 1959, and nearly double the mishaps in 1969. Over the past 20 years the lines from Kamloops to the coast of Vancouver have been the scene of 115 accidents, with 14 killed and 51 injured. Additionally, in another 29 accidents at level crossings, and similar accidents associated with railroads, there occurred three fatalities and injuries to 42 people. In the last month since the tragic deaths of the two men there have been six serious derailments in that canyon.

The picture is so grim that in 1970 the CTC launched a study into rail safety and has published three fat reports, devastating in their condemnation of CN and CP safety practices. These reports only confirm what the CN and CP engineers, conductors and trainmen have been telling me for years. It is time the CTC got tough with the railroads who have stalled decent safety measures for years. The decline of track maintenance is criminal at a time when trains are longer, 150 cars, and heavier than ever before. In the Spencer's Bridge wreck the engines that plunged to the highway carried no ditch lights, no roll bars and no padding in the cab, permitting the cab to collapse like a tin can. But track maintenance, slide fences, ditch lights and roll bars cost money, and both our national railroads are far more interested in profit than they are either in service or safety. I think that has been demonstrated particularly over the past year.

Treating the railroads as a public utility is bound to improve service, but only an aroused public and a zealously vigilant Canadian Transport Commission can reduce the accident rate to a reasonable level. There have been far too many mornings when some railroader's family have awakened in horror to find that they no longer have a daddy.

One of the many reasons for the derailments has to be the heavy unit trains. Some railways, notably the Santa Fe in the United States, have quietly experimented with much smaller trains. They have found that the turnaround time is much faster and more productive despite the matter of economy of scale which suggests that longer trains are more efficient. They find that is not true at all. They are getting far more use from their rolling stock and equipment by using shorter trains, even though they have to use the same crew on a 100-car train as they might have had on a 150-car train. This is the kind of innovation that I think could be copied in Canada.

I close, Mr. Speaker, because I see you are getting ready to leap, but may I say I do not think the CPR would mind if the government took it over tomorrow. In fact I think the CPR has let its tracks and rolling stock run down in anticipation of this very move. But just the rail takeover would not be enough; we must do something immediately to stop this carnage in the canyon.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Transport Commission has the obligation of ensuring that all railway operations in Canada are carried out in maximum safety. In order to identify the factors involved in railway accidents and explore the effect on safety of operation of the longer heavier trains now being operated, the commission undertook to conduct a railway safety inquiry.

The third report, issued on December 28, 1973, contained the committee's findings and recommendations in specific areas such as signal systems, staff training, slide detectors, fences, and track and bridge maintenance. This report indicated that the earlier formed railway safety advisory committee, consisting of members representing CNR, CPR, Canadian Railway Labour Association and chaired by the RTC, would be expected to work on the conclusions and findings of the general inquiry, and would provide a forum for discussion on matters of railway safety. The work of the advisory committee is on a continuing basis and the committee is scheduled to meet at regular intervals for the purpose of dealing with material before it in accordance with established priorities.

The committee met on January 25, 1974 at which time the terms of reference of the committee were approved. During this meeting the following two areas were designated as priorities regarding the establishment of higher safety standards: first, condition of track—movement of long trains, heavy trains and high speed trains; and second, inspection of track, and so on. The advisory committee also gave official recognition to the formation of a group to deal with the subject of public disclosure of railway accident reports.

On April 5 the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) released copies of correspondence which was exchanged between himself and the railway presidents on the subject of the CTC report and safety on the railways. These letters certainly highlighted the minister's concern that prompt, sensible and practical measures be taken. The minister has also announced his support for a new type of transport accident investigation structure.

We feel that through the mechanism of the railway safety inquiry and with the co-operation of those who manage, operate and maintain the country's railways, acceptable standards of operation and maintenance of railway trains can be achieved.

PARLIAMENT

ANNOUNCEMENT OF MEMBERSHIP OF ADVISORY COMMISSION ON PARLIAMENTARY ACCOMMODATION

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the House will doubtless remember that on July 20, 1973, I announced our intention of expropriating the land enclosed within Wellington, Elgin, Sparks and Bank streets in order that we might enlarge parliamentary facilities and protect the Parliament Hill environment. I also announced that we would try to get the co-operation of all parties of the House in creating an Advisory Commission on Parliamentary Accommodation to determine what facilities Parliament will need to operate efficiently in the future.

Since then, we have met the first requirements of the Expropriation Act and have made offers, as the fact requires, to all former owners. We are now studying, with them, the administrative steps to be taken to ensure the administration of real estate, and, especially, to make sure that the unique and attractive aspect of the Mall is preserved, an aspect on which I insisted in my previous statement.

[English]

Thanks to the co-operation of all parties, Mr. Speaker, I am in the happy position today to be able to announce the membership of the Advisory Commission on Parliamentary Accommodation. The commission will be comprised of members of all parties and both Houses and will include former distinguished parliamentarians. I trust that the Speakers of both Houses will accept to serve as ex officio members of the commission. The chairman will be a former cabinet minister and former Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Hon. Douglas C. Abbott. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will table after my brief statement the order in council and the names of the 16 members of the commission.

I believe all members will share my pleasure that we have been able to secure such distinguished participants to pursue this historic and important task on our behalf. It is vital that parliament, as the paramount legislative body of the nation, should be extended the full facilities it requires to perform effectively in this modern age. It is expected that in arriving at its conclusions the commission will look into how parliamentary needs should be met in this country and compare with other countries with similar parliamentary institutions. Many complex problems about space, convenience, tradition and effectiveness will have to be faced and resolved by the commission on our behalf. The commission is being asked to look into these matters and to advise on the amount and type of accommodation and facilities, and how these will interrelate in order to permit parliament to operate effectively in the future.

The first stage in this process was the acquisition of the land and real estate and this has now been completed. The second stage is the one I just described, namely, the definition of the needs of parliament, as will be established by the advisory commission. The third stage will be the implementation, and I trust this will be facilitated by launching a competition open to all Canadian architects for providing the most inspiring concept of parliamentary architecture. This planning will be done in conjunction with the National Capital Commission and the city of Ottawa.

As I indicated in my earlier statement, the parliament of Canada is a vital symbol and presence in our country and we intend that its expansion will enhance and protect its dignity in accordance with the fundamental position it occupies in the life of the nation.

May I therefore, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the House, wish the commission full success in its deliberations.

Mr. Walter C. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on July 20, 1973, when I spoke for the official opposition in reply to the minister's initial statement, I indicated at that time that we believe this project to be a significant development for parliament, and the calibre of the members of this special and important advisory commission honours the magnitude of the undertaking. The membership of the commission is a good balance between the various parties in the two chambers of parliament, but most important of all it represents, in the parliamentary sense, a good blend of experience on the one hand and freshness on the other.

We welcome reconfirmation of the intention to preserve the unique quality of the Sparks Street Mall which is important to the centre-town core of the national capital. We urge upon the minister, his department and the advisory commission the importance of consultation on a continuing basis with tenants and others who have an economic interest in that area because of the understandable uneasiness that can develop from an announcement of this kind.

I am sure that all of us urge upon the commission the importance of considering the changing role of the parliamentarian as one which is moving from the legislative on the one hand to a greater mixture of the legislative role and that of ombudsman on the other, where personal contact and frequent and direct communication are becoming of increasing importance. I am sure that the commission will consult with serving members of parliament to ensure that the facilities are such that they can be adapted to these changes as they occur.

We welcome as well the aspect of competition for design to be limited to Canadian architects who, as a profession, are more than equal to this challenge. I hope there will be no unreasonable limitations placed on the ability of the commission to travel and to view innovations in legislative facilities throughout the world.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, the job of consultation and resolution of differences of opinion that will undoubtedly arise with local governmental authorities is a formidable one indeed, but we all share the view that this commission will be equal to that particular task. I should like to join with the hon. gentleman in wishing the commission every success.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I had the privilege on July 20 of last year of responding to the statement made that day by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé). In doing so, I indicated the pleasure of this party with respect to the decision to appoint an advisory commission, the membership of which is now being made public. We welcome the progress that the government has now made concerning this matter in that it has proceeded with the expropriation arrangements.

I join with the Minister of Public Works and with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) in wishing the very best to this commission. We are happy to have named two members of our party to it and we believe that they, along with others, will do a useful and imaginative job.

The fact is that the functions of members of parliament have multiplied greatly during the past few decades. Those of us who have been here for a while can testify to that fact. Even though we have not planned for change, we have had it. As the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton indicated, our functions as members of parliament include not only the legislative tasks that we have always had, even they are increasing; we have also become 264 ombudsmen, and it is important that the necessary facilities be made available so that these 264 ombudsmen can serve the interests of the people of Canada as a whole.

Every time this matter comes up I feel I must emphasize the desirability of realizing that this capital is not just an Ottawa institution, off somewhere removed from the rest of Canada, but that it belongs to all the people of this country. We can emphasize that by making it a place of beauty, and also by making it a place where the job that is supposed to be done is carried out. We must also, particularly in these days when there is so much more travel, increase the facilities for the visitors who come to this place. I am not thinking in terms of larger galleries so that more people can watch what is going on in this chamber. I am thinking of facilities for visitors in terms of increased committee space. I am thinking of facilities for people who come here to meet members to discuss their problems with their legislators and generally to express their concern about what goes on in their parliament which is, after all, what this institution is.

[Mr. Baker.]

I urge that the commission keep in mind the desire that the Hill be a place of beauty as well as a place that is functional and efficient. I emphasize once again that I hope there will be sufficient co-operation among this commission, the National Capital Commission and the city of Ottawa so that the view of Parliament Hill will continue to be one that can be enjoyed from all parts of this city. I object very much to the way in which high-rise buildings are blotting out the view of this place which is, after all, important to the whole of Canada.

We welcome the announcement of the appointment of this commission and we wish its members well in the job they are undertaking.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the statement of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé), and like those who spoke before me, I am pleased to see that two stages have been passed. There is one more to go and that is the realization of the wishes expressed last July.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the expropriations indicated in the statement will be carried out more fairly than has been the case at Ste. Scholastique. However, as a national capital, Ottawa must preserve a very distinctive character in this country. There are a great number of tourists, not only from Canada but from outside the country, who wish to see the capital. Ottawa is considered a national capital. I would feel then that Parliament is the first thing that attracts attention and the curiosity of visitors. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, the third stage, to implement the projects developed by the minister and this government, is most important. I point out, for example, the fact that those who come to Parliament to see their members have to be directed sometimes to another building, the West Block or Confederation Building.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the government and the minister should study the possibility of cleaning the central building to host all members of parliament, install air conditioning and appropriate offices, and transfer the senators to other buildings. As I see it, Parliament is indeed the Centre Block where we are now located and where all members of parliament should be.

The minister and the government should take measures to have all members of parliament located in the central Parliament building.

SHIPPING

WITHDRAWAL BY CANADA FROM BRITISH COMMONWEALTH SHIPPING AGREEMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In view of the decision of the Canadian government to notify the government of Great Britain of Canada's intention to withdraw from the British Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement, with the effect that Canada can, at long last, move toward having its own merchant marine, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

That this House express its appreciation for this action.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is proposed to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

ENERGY

OIL—REPORTED INTENTION OF VENEZUELA TO CUT BACK ON EXPORTS TO CANADA—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister who I am sure is fully in the picture, as usual. I would ask him if Venezuelan oil coming to Canada has been cut back as announced and, if so, to what extent? Has the government of Canada sought an explanation for this action?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of what the Leader of the Opposition has just said but I will examine these reports to see what substance there is to them and endeavour to obtain an answer for him.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the intention of the government to have the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources visit Venezuela once again or is it the intention of the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs to state Canada's case to Venezuela?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if it is necessary to state Canada's case I will, of course, do so. I intend to be in Venezuela for the opening of the Law of the Sea Conference, but it may be necessary to take action before then if there is substance to what the Leader of the Opposition has said.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the efforts of the government in the past year to offset possible shortages of oil by the government making contracts through the office of the Minister of Supply and Services, will the Acting Prime Minister inform the House whether the government is considering requesting the Minister of Supply and Services to contract for any more Roumanian oil to offset this difference?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think it is very significant that Canada is one of the few countries in the world that did not experience any shortage of oil or gasoline.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I think that the people of Canada, if not the Leader of the Opposition, are probably grateful. I have no hesitation in saying that if a similar kind of emergency arises in the future we will take whatever steps are necessary to protect the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker—

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): On a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: As usual, I shall try to complete the first round of questions, then I shall recognize the hon. member in a moment.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I should like to put a supplementary to the minister.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to make any difficulty. However, the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway would perhaps allow me to recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue, if he would sit down for the moment. The hon. member for Témiscamingue may have noticed that in the last few days on his own suggestion, I tried to limit the supplementaries to the first question in order to come quicker to his subject, and I rely on his co-operation.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REFUSAL TO ACCEPT TELEVISION ADVERTISING OF CONTRACEPTIVES—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would be very willing to have the hon. member for Témiscamingue go first because my question does not have anything to do with the first question.

Mr. Speaker: Such generosity is very impressive. The hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): In fact, the type of question I usually ask is responded to more enthusiastically, so I hope I do not disappoint people. At this time when responsible people are anxious for the knowledge and the means to space and limit the number of their children, is the government aware—this is to the Minister of Communications—that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation refuses to accept television advertising of contraceptives on the ground that this would be controversial? If the government is aware of this policy, is it in agreement with it?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, if the content of programs on the CBC is the concern of any minister, it would be my colleague, the Secretary of State. I do not know that the CRTC, for which I answer to parliament, has made any pronouncement on the question.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Secretary of State. Let me say that the CBC has made a pronouncement. It says that the reason it does not accept television advertising of contraceptives is that the matter is controversial. I ask the Secretary of State whether this reflects the policy of the government?

● (1130)

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a decision taken by the corporation, but I will certainly make the views of the hon. member known to the corporation.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): In view of the fact that this is World Population Year and that so many television commercials deal with subjects which are contraversial and unacceptable to large numbers of viewers, will the government ask the CBC to reconsider its policy on contraceptives?

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, maybe I should ask the Secretary of State a supplementary, following the questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway.

Would the minister be prepared to establish a committee including the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway to allow her to propagate her knowledge in the field of contraception?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Témiscamingue should keep to the supplementary he intended to ask earlier after the matter raised by the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

POST OFFICE

END OF POSTAL WORKERS' STRIKE—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I will now come back to my question. I should like to direct it to the Postmaster General.

We learned this morning that the postal conflict was apparently settled. We are not quite certain, but I would like, Mr. Speaker, to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister who acted like a man during the conflict. I am not a political friend of his, but otherwise we are on very good terms.

Mr. Speaker, my question is as follows: Can the minister tell us now whether, at the meeting held at 10 a.m. with the union, it was agreed that the strike was over and the postal service would be immediately restored?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the agreement concluded early this morning provided for the immediate resumption of work by all employees. I know that a meeting is now held in Montreal. I do not know its results, but the union leaders approved that agreement yesterday and have undertaken to recommend resumption of work to all employees. I can assure the House that every possible step will be taken to restore as soon as possible an efficient postal service for the Canadian people.

[English]

END OF POSTAL WORKERS' STRIKE—RETENTION OF SERVICES OF MEDIATOR TO DEAL WITH ISSUES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): In view of the great success of the mediator, Mr. Eric Taylor, in this matter—

An hon. Member: Don't forget the minister.

Mr. Dinsdale: —will his services be retained to deal with the real issues underlying the problem?

Mr. Lefebvre: Are you sorry it's over?

Mr. Chrétien: It's a sad day for you.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is proper to thank Mr. Eric Taylor for his continued efforts to try to settle this dispute. The agreement that was reached provides that Mr. Taylor will preside a committee of three members that will take a decision on the coders issue. Mr. Taylor has also been asked to consider a number of problems related to this dispute.

[English]

END OF POSTAL WORKERS' STRIKE—COST INVOLVED IN SETTLEMENT—EFFECT ON POSTAL RATE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Can the minister tell us the estimated cost of the settlement? Will it result in an increase in the postal rate?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret the inconveniences caused to Canadians by this long work stoppage. I am unable to give any figures relating to the costs of this work stoppage, but it is certain that under this agreement no salary increase is provided for our employees and I can assure the hon. member that I do not intend to recommend to Parliament an increase in postal rates.

END OF POSTAL WORKERS' STRIKE—ACTION TO EXPEDITE DELIVERY OF OLD AGE PENSION CHEQUES

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Postmaster General.

In view of the backlog in mail which has accumulated in the main centers, will the minister consider establishing a new priority, so that old age security pension cheques may be delivered without unnecessary delay?

Hon. André Ouellet(Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that precedence will be given to the sorting of all social security cheques, that a large number of old age security pension cheques which have already been processed are being delivered, so that I feel they should be received in time.

POSSIBLE RELATIONSHIP OF CUTBACK IN OIL EXPORTS BY VENEZUELA TO CANADA TO PRICE RECEIVED BY CANADA ON EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is related to a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition earlier. It is addressed to the Acting Prime Minister. Figures produced before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works show that the price received by Canada for a barrel of crude petroleum exported to the United States was the highest the United States paid for any imports. Has this created a sense of irritation in the United States, and is there any relationship between the Venezuelan cutback and the price of Canadian crude petroleum exported to the United States having regard to the fact that if not now, then previously—I believe it is still the case now—the United States controls the interests of Venezuela when it comes to crude petroleum?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I would doubt there is any such connection as put forward by the hon. member. The principle upon which we base our sales of petroleum to the United States is that we sell our petroleum at approximately the same price as we buy it, so I do not think there is any discrimination of that kind involved.

Mr. Woolliams: Has the minister had a chance to peruse the evidence placed before the standing committee which showed that the price Canada received from the United States for crude petroleum exported to that country during the last few months was the highest the United States paid for imports? Has there been any complaint from the United States in this regard, in reference not only to Venezuelan crude but also with regard to the apparently growing irritant involving the automobile pact? It is all connected.

Mr. Sharp: The hon. gentleman is obviously trying to cause trouble. There has been no complaint.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

STEPS TO ENSURE COMPETITIVE BIDDING FOR GOVERNMENT OIL REQUIREMENTS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Further to the minister's statement three weeks ago that his department usually receives just one bid when it calls tenders for the supply of oil for government use, which supply cost federal taxpayers over $100 million last year, would the minister tell us whether he has taken any steps to ensure there is more competitive bidding for the supply of the government's oil needs or whether competition is still practically nil as he indicated on April 2?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult indeed to obtain a wide open competitive situation in respect of oil despite our efforts to convince the companies to make submissions. We could certainly not force the companies to tender. Whenever we are dissatisfied with the price they are asking or when there is only one price, we try to negotiate for the best possible terms and conditions and the best service for the best price.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: My supplementary is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and it arises from the answer I have just received. In view of the indication by the Department of Supply and Services that not only is there lack of competition in connection with tenders to supply the government's fuel needs but that in many instances tenders are divided in two with one company bidding on one part and another bidding on the other part but never bidding against each other would the minister advise us whether the Minister of Supply and Services has informed him of this lack of competition, and, if so, has the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs investigated the matter to determine why there is so little competition in the field, and does the minister intend to take steps to rectify the situation?

● (1140)

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have already informed the House there is an inquiry under way under the Combines Investigation Act in respect of the petroleum industry arising out of a complaint formally made by people connected with the consumers association, which complaint was made public, and this information is a very useful input as well.

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO EXPORT OF ROUMANIAN OIL PURCHASED BY GOVERNMENT TO UNITED STATES AT LOWER PRICES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Supply and Services.

He recently said that we had to buy fuel oil at 99.5 cents a gallon. Will he tell the House whether we have exported that oil to the United States at a lower price? The Secretary of State for External Affairs said a while ago that we had no shortage of oil in Canada. If such is the case, why then were Canadians asked to lower their thermostats, to move their furniture into the middle of their rooms and freeze peacefully while there was a surplus of oil in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, to that part of the question that concerns me the answer is no.

HEALTH

DEATHS CAUSED BY MIX-UPS IN ANAESTHETIC GAS LINES—ACTION TO IMPROVE SAFETY STANDARDS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware of various reports from across Canada indicating many deaths by nitrous oxide have been due to mix-ups in anaesthetic gas lines and, if so, will the minister make representation to the provincial governments with a view to implementing better safety standards?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed aware, as all hon. members are, of those infinitely regrettable incidents. I am sure that my provincial colleagues are also very much aware of them and that steps have been or will be taken to remedy the situation by those of my provincial colleagues who deal with the administration of hospitals.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: Will the minister conduct a national inquiry into this matter to see if the CSA standards are being or have been followed in the installation of anaesthetic gas lines in any type of medical building?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: I will certainly take note of the hon. member's suggestion and look into this matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ENFORCEMENT OF AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES RESPECTING QUEBEC WORKERS EMPLOYED IN MAINE

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

On April 2 I asked the minister about the 1942 and 1958 notes of agreement between Canada and the United States, inquiring whether these notes concerning the protection of Quebec workers employed in Maine were still in force. May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he is in a position to answer this question today?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with your indulgence, perhaps I might be given an opportunity to look up my file. I did get an answer to this question some time ago and I seem to have mislaid my piece of paper. Perhaps I might answer the question later.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Speaker, with your indulgence, after you have indulged the Secretary of State for External Affairs may I then ask a supplementary when he has answered?

[Mr. Goyer.]

FINANCE

ALLEGED STATEMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER AND ENERGY MINISTER RESPECTING PROPOSED TAX CHANGES—APPROVAL BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It involves the problem that seems to have occurred in the public stock markets. I should like to know if the Minister of Finance approved the statements by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with regard to proposed tax changes that were distributed through the public media and have clearly affected the public stock markets?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the preamble advanced by the hon. gentleman, I have no comment to make on any statement that may or may not have been made by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

EFFECT OF DROP IN STOCK MARKET VALUES ON PROPOSED SALE OF SHARES TO PUBLIC

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the President of the Treasury Board. Is it the intention of the government to allow the Canada Development Corporation, as a result of the significant drop in stock values, to market Canada Development Corporation shares this spring?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Development Corporation is run by an independent board of directors. While it is true that the corporation reports through me to the House, no instructions have been given by the government one way or the other. It is a matter that will have to be left to the chairman and the board of the corporation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR FASTER MAIL DELIVERY AND PROVISION OF NEWSPAPERS TO FORCES PARTICIPATING IN UNEF AND UNTSO

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, having had the privilege no other member has had of visiting the Canadian forces not only in UNEF but in UNTSO also, may I be permitted to say they are a wonderful group and do honour to all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are making a magnificent contribution. There is one matter I wish to bring up. It has to do with the mail. I know that above everything else servicemen want to have mail delivered at the earliest opportunity. There is a rather long delay between the time letters are sent and the time they are received by these two forces. I would ask the Minister of National Defence whether anything can be done to speed up this mail by having it sent on the military aircraft that go back and forth. This would add to the morale, which is high. As well, representative daily newspapers would be highly acceptable and deeply appreciated by the members of each of these units in which Canadians are serving. Will the minister do something in this regard as well?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the right hon. gentleman for the remarks he has made about the Canadian Armed Forces. I know their morale is high. The reason for that is that they are aware they are serving the cause of peace and are bringing credit to this country by what they are doing in the Middle East. We have tried from the beginning to supply Canadian newspapers. Daily newspapers are collected from across the country and are flown in by service aircraft. There may be some delay in getting them, but I think that mail and newspapers going in service aircraft in recent days have been getting there faster than has been the case in some places in Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it has taken even longer for mail to be delivered by the so-called expeditious means the minister suggests than mail from Toronto to Ottawa. Will the minister immediately take steps to improve communication in this regard? So far as newspapers are concerned, they are so old when they arrive that they are out of date. So far as mail is concerned, four, five, six, or seven days is normal and that is abnormally improper insofar as morale is concerned in the armed forces.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, we have a good service but we will be doing our best to continue to improve it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER OF FINANCE INTENDS TO VISIT JAPAN

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister inform the House if preparations are being made for a trip to Japan by him and, if so, when?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the question was directed to me but perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs would like to answer it. Under present circumstances I doubt very much whether I will be going.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I say that even if the Minister of Finance is not going to Japan other ministers are planning to be there.

ENFORCEMENT OF AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES RESPECTING QUEBEC WORKERS EMPLOYED IN MAINE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer at this time the question that was asked by the hon. member for Scarborough West. The 1942 and 1958 exchanges of notes dealt with arrangements for cross-border movement of seasonal workers between Canada and the United States but not with wages, working conditions or social security measures. The procedure for the annual renewal of these arrangements was discontinued in 1965. However, at that time an understanding was reached with the American authorities that this cross-border movement would continue. In practice, seasonal workers have continued to move across the border when conditions of demand and supply permit.

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): In view of the fact that 1,500 workers from southeastern Quebec work in the state of Maine in conditions of medieval difficulty and that their working and living conditions leave much to be desired, and considering that they are engaged to work in that state very much in the nature of indentured servants, may I ask the minister whether he has any intention to contact the government of the United States and the governments of Quebec and Maine to work out arrangements for the protection of the rights of these workers?

Mr. Sharp: If these workers have any reason to believe that they are being discriminated against because they are Canadians or that they are suffering different treatment from United States citizens, they can, of course, make complaints and these complaints will be dealt with immediately.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for Annapolis Valley will allow me at this time to recognize the hon. member for Scarborough West who has a supplementary, and we will then hear the hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. Harney: In view of the fact these workers have already complained about this situation and in view of the fact that because they work across the border in another country they do not have the protection of Canadian laws, both federal and provincial, would the minister undertake to look into their very legitimate complaints, which do not arise from the fact they are Canadians but simply because they are workers not under the protection of our laws?

Mr. Sharp: Quite obviously they are not under the protection of Canadian laws while they are working in the United States. But I will undertake to look into the representations the hon. member has made to see if there is a legitimate ground for complaint.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Annapolis Valley. It is his turn. But at the same time I notice that the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary has a supplementary to his previous question. I will return to the hon. member eventually.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE FREIGHT RATE SUBSIDY ON MOVEMENT OF GOODS WITHIN ATLANTIC PROVINCES WILL NOT BE REDUCED

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask him, now that some short-term labour stoppages have been partially and thankfully resolved, whether he will direct his attention to a few more fundamental transportation policies and give a specific undertaking to the House that there will be no reduction in the freight rate subsidy on the movement of goods within the Atlantic area until a more selective policy has been defined so that there can be protection for some of the industries which are going to be adversely affected?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I think that a few weeks ago I announced that there would be an increase in the outward subsidies for the Maritimes. It was agreed with the provinces that intraprovincial subsidies might be reduced, but this will be done on the recommendation of the joint transportation committee of the Maritimes. I do not think we have the intention of moving outside this framework.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary has a supplementary to a previous question.

THE BUDGET

REQUEST THAT FORTHCOMING DEBATE NOT BE INTERRUPTED BECAUSE OF VISIT OF MINISTERS TO JAPAN

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the President of the Privy Council. Will he assure the House that there will be no interruption in the budget debate because of the trip to Japan?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I understand the full import of the question. As I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition earlier, it is the intention of the government to begin the budget debate immediately, or practically immediately, to use the words of the Leader of the Opposition. I cannot foresee circumstances that would cause interruption of that debate, but there may be circumstances that will arise at that time.

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN SUBSIDY ON POWDERED MILK AND BUTTER

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture is not in the House and his parliamentary secretary has just left, so I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the fact that the lack of long-term encouragement to our agricultural industry can ultimately result in less Canadian produce in the future—for example, the phasing out of the sugar beet industry in Ontario—thus causing a further increase in consumer food prices, can the Acting Prime Minister assure us that the cabinet will encourage the Minister of Agriculture to take the suggestions personally offered to him this week by his counterparts, the Ministers of Agriculture of Quebec and Ontario, that he raise the subsidy on powdered milk and butter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister of Agriculture will look at these representations and consider them.

SHIPPING

COASTAL TRADE—WITHDRAWAL BY CANADA FROM COMMONWEALTH SHIPPING AGREEMENT—STEPS TO ESTABLISH CANADIAN REGISTERED AND MANNED FLEET

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In light of the fact the government has finally agreed to notify the government of Great Britain of Canada's intention to withdraw from the British Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement, would the minister now outline to the House the steps necessary to establish coastal shipping by Canadian registered and Canadian manned vessels?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that the minister can reply to this question briefly. He will be recognized if he can do so, but it seems to me that the hon. member is inviting the minister to make a statement on motions.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can answer very briefly. The notice will be served on the Commonwealth countries immediately because it will come into effect in only one year. I do not know exactly what the situation of the shipping industry will be in one year, how many ships we can use and if we will have the crews to put on the ships that will replace those which will no longer be allowed to come to Canada. So I will have to wait some time before answering the question fully.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I ask the Minister of Transport a supplementary question. Did I understand him correctly to say that the government has made the decision to remove British shipping and thus advance coastal trade for Canadian ships but he does not know what the prospects are of developing our own Canadian merchant fleet? If that is correct, would he be prepared to meet with people in the various aspects of shipping, including members of unions—the SIU and the Merchant Service Guild—and the Shipping Federation of Canada and shipping interests in an attempt to work out a plan, because we are only one year away from the withdrawal date?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REQUEST THAT BUDGET BE TABLED PRIOR TO APPEARANCE BY CORPORATION BEFORE STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council. Would he undertake to have the budget of the Cape Breton Development Corporation tabled before that corporation appears before the Standing Committee on Regional Development?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will check into that and, if it is possible, I will gladly do it.

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to announce to the House that I received information since the same question was asked by another member earlier. CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST THAT FORTHCOMING AMENDMENTS NOT RELAX CONTROL OF SOFT DRUGS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Will the minister, with regard to the amendments to the Criminal Code he will be introducing in the near future, assure the House that there will not be any relaxation of the control of soft drugs despite the fact that a member of the Immigration Appeal Board, in quashing a deportation order, stated it was probable that in the future parliament would amend the Criminal Code to permit the legal use of cannabis on a small scale, such as at social gatherings?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there is no intention to include in the upcoming amendments to the Criminal Code any changes in regard to the law relating to drugs. The law relating to drugs is largely contained in other statutes, and it is the announced intention of the government to transfer certain drugs from the Narcotic Control Act to the Food and Drugs Act and to lessen the penalties. This matter is under the general jurisdiction of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

DISCONTINUANCE OF USE OF DON JAIL, TORONTO, TO DETAIN ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS—INTENTION RESPECTING VANCOUVER

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can he give us a date when the Don jail in Toronto will cease to be used for the detention of illegal immigrants in the Toronto area, and is a similar program to be implemented in Vancouver where at the present time the Vancouver city jail is being used for these detainees?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the minister issued instructions with respect to the cessation of the use of the Don jail in Toronto a week or two ago, and the department is now in the process of effectuating that. The Vancouver situation is under study.

PROPOSED COST OF LIVING ESCALATION IN PENSIONS OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that for some considerable time there has been anticipated an announcement concerning a 1974 cost of living escalation in the pensions of retired CNR employees, can he say how soon we may expect that announcement?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope I can complete my discussions on this matter very soon. Next week I am going to meet with the new managers of the CNR in Montreal, Mr. Bandeen and Mr. Taschereau, the new top officers of the CNR. I have to look into this in relation to the bill that was introduced by the hon. member for St. Boniface, and I hope I can announce something before too long.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the minister also have words with the management of the CPR in respect of the same question?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): If I can reach them, Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to.

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister why the government cannot bring forward measures in the proper way in this House, pursuant to an announcement by the government House leader, in order that hon. members do not have to use Standing Order 43 motions and private bills, thereby mixing everything up? If the minister wants to do something for the CNR pensioners, why does he not act in a straightforward manner in the House, announce it, and then go ahead with it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would suggest that the hon. member's question is of the same nature as the previous one and should normally be asked to determine whether the minister proposes to make a statement on motions. Otherwise, if there is urgency the matter can be considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Penitentiary guards should also be considered to be an endangered species in Canada. The situation is like an accident waiting to happen. I think the minister would like to reply. This is a serious problem, and if he has a program or a plan perhaps he might refer to it.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister has a program he wants to announce to the House, I suggest to the hon. member that such a program would normally be announced by way of a statement on motions. I do not want to be difficult, but I do not think we should encourage too many questions of this kind.

The results of that meeting have not yet been communicated to the various governments, but we do understand that they have called for discussions with the Soviet Union, Japan and the Republic of Korea to seek measures to preserve the halibut resources in the north-eastern Pacific Ocean and the Bering Sea. As soon as we have received a copy of this report we will follow it up.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps with the agreement of the House the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich might be permitted to ask a supplementary question and then we will call orders of the day.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to ask the minister whether by any chance there is any interim action such as representations being made to the Soviet Union at this time to encourage them to support this?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, when we have received the report of the commission we will certainly support their recommendations.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR INCORPORATION, OBJECTS, REGIONAL ADVISORY COUNCILS, POWERS

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-20, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

● (1210)

He said: Mr. Speaker, last July the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) announced in general terms some important measures to further encourage and assist the establishment and growth of Canadian small business. In order to implement these measures, Bill C-20 was tabled on April 8 to provide for the creation of a new Crown corporation which will bear the name Federal Business Development Bank. I am pleased, on behalf of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and for the government, to present this bill to the House today for second reading.

The new bank is the result of a careful assessment of the requirements of small business. This assessment has been based on the considerable experience which the government has gained with a wide range of programs designed to meet specific needs which it has introduced over the years. What the Federal Business Development Bank will do will be to combine a number of these programs, giving them new thrust and orientation, and provide a new organizational structure and guidelines under which they will be operated in a co-ordinated manner.

The new bank will provide a focal point for information, management counselling and training, and financing. Small businessmen who need information on government programs will find such information available in the branches of the bank. Those in need of management counselling to solve business problems will find it available at rates which they can afford. If financing is the requirement, small businessmen will find that loans are available under new flexible arrangements when such financing is not available on reasonable terms and conditions from the private sector. Moreover, the new bank will institute management seminars and, in general, provide management training courses in conjunction with the provinces, universities and community colleges.

While the Federal Business Development Bank will bring together the necessary facilities to meet the main requirements of small business, it is not intended to meet all of them. When facilities outside the banks are required, the Federal Business Development Bank personnel will be able to refer clients to the sources of the additional help they may require and provide competent assistance to enable them to secure it.

In taking steps to create the Federal Business Development Bank, the government is primarily concerned with the needs of small business which are not being met by the private sector on terms and conditions that the small businessmen can accept. The intention is to supplement or complement these private services when, for one reason or another, they are not available to the small businessman.

The bank, Mr. Speaker, will be under instructions to encourage small business enterprises which have developed an appropriate degree of strength, to secure future financing and counselling services from the private sector.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, the three key elements in the philosophy behind the Federal Business Development Bank are: first, co-ordinated programs under independent management to meet the major needs of small business; second, the provision of a focal point where the small businessmen can find a competent person to talk to about his problems and requirements, and third, concentration on filling the gaps which exist in the private sector rather than competing with private institutions.

These elements are summed up in the objectives of the new bank which you will find set out in clause 4 of the bill, which reads as follows:

(1) The objects of the corporation are to promote and assist in the establishment and development of business enterprises in Canada by providing, in the manner and to the extent authorized by this act, financial assistance, management counselling, management training, information and advice and such other services as are ancillary or incidental to any of the foregoing.

(2) The corporation in carrying out its objects shall give particular consideration to the needs of small business enterprises.

In order to carry out these objectives, the new bank will require certain powers and an indication of how these powers should be used. With regard to financing operations, the legislation provides the bank with a full range of powers to enable it to meet any financial need of small business. It will be empowered to make or guarantee loans, to enter into underwriting agreements, to make equity investments and to engage in the financing of equipment and in leasing operations.

Great care has been taken in setting out the criteria under which these powers will be used. Financing is to be made available only when a person is engaged, or about to engage, in a business enterprise in Canada; when credit or other financial resources would not otherwise be available on reasonable terms and conditions; when the amount invested, or to be invested, in the enterprise by persons other than the bank, and the character of that investment, are such as to afford a reasonable expectation of a continuing commitment to the enterprise by such persons, and when the enterprise may reasonably be expected to prove successful.

[Mr. Gray.]

The objective of the bank, coupled with powers and criteria for the financial services program is designed not only to enable the provision of financing when it is not available from the private sector on reasonable terms and conditions, but also to encourage private institutions to provide such financing. The decision on what are reasonable terms and conditions will be the responsibility of the board of the bank, as it is not possible to provide other than broad guidelines in the changing circumstances of the financial markets. While these powers are similar to those under which the Industrial Development Bank has operated successfully for many years, it is expected that the new bank will make fuller use of them.

For example, I expect that the new bank will give more careful consideration to the financial structure of small businesses and provide equity financing when this meets the financial and other needs of the client, such as extending the equity base to enable the firm to raise additional financing from private sources. With regard to term lending, no specific limitation is placed on the size of loan or size of business which may be financed, but general guidance is given that particular attention is to be paid to the needs of small business. Under similar guidelines, 77.4 per cent of the loans made by the Industrial Development Bank are for $50,000 or less, and the average authorization is now around $44,000. It is the government's intention that the Federal Business Development Bank concentrate its financing activities in the same way to meet the needs of small business.

The new bank will also introduce new and flexible lending techniques in recognition of the sometimes difficult financial situation of small businesses. For example, consideration will be given to delaying of repayment of principal for several years, arranging repayment schedules with balloon payments at maturity. These are only two of a number of new flexible techniques which I expect will improve financial services to small businessmen.

Mr. Speaker, members may recall that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stated on July 11 that the new bank would build on the existing strengths and organizational network of the Industrial Development Bank. This will indeed be the case. The Industrial Development Bank has, at present, 60 branch offices operating out of five regional offices. These will provide the initial office structure of the new bank. On the financial side, the Federal Business Development Bank will start from a strong financial base as the outstanding loans and commitments of the Industrial Development Bank total more than $800 million. Its clients currently number more than 19,000. Thus the new bank will begin its operations with a strong organization structure and a substantial clientele.

The new bank will have the power to provide management counselling services, directly or through others, to persons who are engaged in, or about to engage in, a business enterprise in Canada, who meet criteria established by the board, and when such services will supplement other available services from the private sector. The bank will have the power to underwrite the cost of providing counsellors when the requirements cannot be met by the bank's own staff.

The management counselling service will initially be provided by the Counselling Assistance to Small Enterprises, known as the CASE program, of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, which program will be absorbed into the new bank. However, officers in all branches of the bank will be available to provide a sounding board for ideas developed by existing or prospective small businessmen to assist them in working out a viable idea that could be the basis of a commercial plan. Accordingly to need, the small businessman could then be directed to the appropriate source of information, expertise, or financing to meet his need. The bank will also have available counsellors who will provide detailed management advice in particular areas. This will be done initially by following the pattern already established by CASE in the use of retired executives as counsellors and by the use of private counsellors when retired executives are not in a position to deal with particular assignments. The CASE service is accordingly being expanded geographically in close consultation with the provinces, and the intention is to extend the coverage to the service sector in addition to the manufacturing and tourism sectors which are covered at present. As the bank gains experience in the area of management counselling, it will explore ways of improving, modifying and expanding these services.

In the management training field, the new bank will have the power to provide or enter into contracts with governments, agencies, associations or individuals for the provision of management training services. It will also be empowered to sponsor, support or organize conferences, seminars or other meetings for the promotion of good management practices.

In this area, the prime responsibility of the bank will be to pinpoint the needs of small business which can be filled most effectively by training and to meet those needs with the most effective training methods available. Consultation with provincial educational authorities, business associations, small businessmen and educational consultants, will all be necessary to ensure that training initiatives are appropriate, effective and complete. The training service will establish priorities, develop courses, or make contractual arrangements for the preparation of course materials by recognized experts and assist provincial government departments in the implementation processes. It will also play a useful role in developing and facilitating the exchange of information on implementation techniques, publicity, teacher training and other related teaching aids.

To fulfil these responsibilities initially, the bank will take over the owner/manager training program of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The relevant courses are short and oriented to specific aspects of small business management. The bank will also continue the one-day small business seminars provided by the Industrial Development Bank at different locations across Canada, with emphasis given to small cities, towns and remote areas where such services are not otherwise available.

The new bank will have the power to develop and operate an information service, publish and distribute information relative to the mandate of the bank, as well as to provide advice on federal programs for small business and on assistance available to small business from others. To this end the bank will seek to establish close and continuing communication with provincial authorities.

This will be a major new thrust as the bank will act as a focal point for information on the wide range of federal services and programs designed to meet the needs of small business. The information services, to be provided locally through all offices of the bank, will be free to all interested persons and will be aimed at small firms that do not have the resources to seek out help from the multiplicity of specialized sources of assistance to small business—particularly those of the federal government. The services of the bank itself will also be made known more widely in this way. In addition to the immediate practical value to the inquirer, the information services will represent another two-way channel of communication between the businessman and the bank.

The activities of the information services will take several forms. The experienced local officers providing the services will give inquirers comprehensive information, competent advice and direct referral on the entire range of federal assistance programs and services for small business. The bank will provide reference libraries and booklets on a broad field of small business management subjects, and will publish and distribute industry profiles containing typical costs and operating date for specific industries. In this way, it will share with the public the experience gained by the bank and its predecessors in dealing with thousands of small businesses over many years. A Small Business News Bulletin, highlighting various assistance programs, business developments and many other forms of guidance to its readers, will be distributed to many thousands of small business operators.

In deciding on a corporate structure for the new bank, the government has had several considerations in mind. The first is that the new bank should have a considerable degree of independence in its day-to-day affairs. The second is that it should be guided by a strong top management that is well versed in business practice and representative of small business interests. These considerations have led to the decision to establish the Federal Business Development Bank as a proprietary corporation pursuant to Section 66 of the Financial Administration Act. It will report to Parliament on its activities through the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie).

These same considerations were of importance in determining the number and composition of the board of directors. Ten of the fifteen directors will be chosen from the private sector to ensure broad business representation and access to business experience and expertise. To provide equitable geographic, cultural and population representation, two directors will be chosen from each of the five geographic regions of Canada. These members of the board will be appointed for a term of three years by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The remaining members of the board will be four senior federal officials and a full-time president who will also act as chief executive officer. A chairman, who will preside at meetings of the board, will be appointed by the board from among its members.

Provision is also made for an executive committee to deal with matters within the competence of the board when the latter is not in session. Its composition is outlined in the bill.

In order to emphasize the regional character of the new bank, and to ensure that regional and local views are taken into consideration in establishing the policy and operations of the bank, regional advisory councils will be established for each of the five geographic regions of the country. Each council will be composed of up to 12 members from the region, including the two board members, a senior bank officer and a senior officer of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Private members will be appointed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. These councils, while purely advisory in nature, will assess the bank's activities in their regions and will draw the board of director's attention to the requirements of the small business community in their regions. I believe that these regional advisory councils will serve a useful purpose and will further accent the regional character of the new bank.

The organizational structure of the new bank will be a matter for the board to decide, but it can be envisaged that its corporate structure will be built around two major components, one a financing division and the other, a management services division. These two components will have to be well co-ordinated at different levels of the bank's organization so that a fully client-oriented and comprehensive service is made available to small business in Canada.

While the services of the new bank will be able to build on the experience and organizational structure of the Industrial Development Bank and CASE and other programs which will be brought into it, it will be a big and probably lengthy job to structure a complete service which can meet the requirements of small business in all parts of the country. The government will ensure, however, that those who are put in charge of these services will be qualified to undertake their tasks with initiative and energy.

The financing of the new bank will involve separate budgets for the financial services and for the management services operations. For its financial operations the bank will have an authorized capital of $200 million and a debt-to-equity ratio of ten to one. A capital budget for financing activities will be submitted each year for the approval of the Governor in Council. In accordance with this budget, the Bank will borrow at the Crown corporation rate for the appropriate term. The management services elements of the bank will be financed through parliamentary appropriations in accordance with the normal steps of the budgetary cycle.

The organization which I have outlined will, I think, enable the Federal Business Development Bank to carry out its mandate with a substantial degree of independence. However, its operations will be followed closely by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce which, along with other departments, will be represented on the board. It will also be possible for parliament to keep in close touch with the operations of the bank when appropriations are considered each year for financing the management services operations.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay tribute to the small businessmen of this country, who, by their initiative, their willingness to take risks and their management of often difficult situations have played an important role in the growth of our national product in the provision of goods and services and in making available substantial employment opportunities. Approximately 60 per cent of the labour force or about five million persons are employed in small business enterprises, broadly defined. Through the Federal Business Development Bank and its other programs the government is showing its support for small businessmen and that it stands ready to help when help is needed.

If such help can enable many small businesses to become medium sized or even big business or at least to become more soundly established and more economically viable, our policies will have shown their worth. If, as well, the Federal Business Development Bank can encourage a substantial number of potential entrepreneurs to enter the field of small business by providing the services they require, the bank will perform, over the years ahead, a very important service to the economy of the country and to the small businessmen who operate a very important part of it. I believe this bill will bring about in a very substantial way the achievement of these important objectives. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, may I urge all parties in this House to support this bill which will provide such important benefits to the nation's small businessmen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in introducing the bill before us today, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) on behalf of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) concluded by commending the small businessmen of this country for their aggressiveness and willingness to take risks. He pointed out that in fact 60 per cent of the labour force in the country is employed in small business.

I wish to point out to the minister it is partly due to his government's action that the small businessmen are in the position they are today, namely that of finding it increasingly difficult to sustain their position in the Canadian economy. To be frank about it, when the minister commends them for their willingness to take risks, one of the greatest risks a small businessman has to live with today is what action this government may take tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I am not speaking in general terms. I am speaking in specific terms. For example, in 1962 the small businessmen of this country had a 10.4 per cent share of the nation's national income. In 1973 that share had fallen to 7.5 per cent. I would point out also that the small businessmen of this country lost every year in percentage terms in relation to the national income. Those are the facts. Whether the government likes to admit it or not, they know they have failed small businessmen in this country at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Sometimes it is more meaningful to translate what I have just put in percentage terms into actual terms. In 1963, small business net income in this country was $3.5 billion. In 1973, it was $6.8 billion. It did not even double in that period. On the other hand, let us take a look at corporate profits before taxes in the same period. I remind hon. members that when I say corporate profits before taxes, I am dealing substantially with the non-small business sector of the economy. The fact is those profits rose from $4.9 billion in 1963 to $14.8 billion in 1973. As can be seen, they almost tripled in the period this government has ruled Canada whereas small business did not even double its net income in the same period.

As has been pointed out, in recent years, due very heavily to the income tax revisions that this government put into our corporate income tax system, the taxation of corporations has not maintained its relationship to their profitability. Unfortunately, the same tax act has put almost insurmountable difficulties in the way of small businessmen attempting to carry on in the country.

It is an odd government that we have ruling at the present time. I sincerely hope the members of that government will, on this bill at least be given an ample opportunity to stand in their place in this House and give their true feelings concerning the lot of small businessmen in Canada. I say that because I have a certain sympathy for the backbench members in the Liberal party at the present time. In debate after debate, I have witnessed them being required to sit in this House but not to speak, and to vote only when and how they were told. In fact, the only role that seems to be left for them is to tap their desks at the appropriate time if they feel the minister involved wants a little desk tapping.

Mr. Hopkins: What a bunch of garbage.

Mr. Stevens: Surely, the members sitting in those back benches must be completely frustrated when they see things going wrong in this country at the present time and there is so little they can do or say.

An hon. Member: You talk too much.

Mr. Stevens: I see I am getting a response. I am glad. It is good if we can find some way of getting them to speak, and hopefully start speaking up for the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: If those backbenchers had the courage to buck their cabinet, they could perhaps be more useful. If their only role in this House is to hit their desks, possibly every cabinet minister could be equipped with some kind of button he could press so that a recording of suitable desk thumping could play whenever he desired it. Those unfortunate fellows have the manual job of desk thumping which could be pre-recorded.

Mr. Lefebvre: Ask Bill Davis about that. They are experts in Toronto. Now start talking about the bill.

Mr. Gray: Have you not seen the bill? Can you not talk about it? You are demonstrating you have not looked at the bill. Tell us about your banking experience.

Mr. Lefebvre: Quit wasting the time of the House and sit down.

• (1240)

Mr. Nowlan: Who gave them a blood transfusion?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member should be allowed the opportunity to continue his remarks, but I might remind him it would probably be easier for him to continue without interruption if he were to follow the rule of relevancy.

Mr. Stevens: I see the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) in his place, and I know he is interested in practical matters which arise from time to time. Even the government I understand, is worried about runaway expenses, and I suggest money could be saved if we could find a more efficient way of handling Liberal Party backbenchers. Considering it costs roughly $110,000 a year to keep a member in the House. Multiply this figure by the number of backbenchers in the Liberal Party and we arrive at a figure which suggests that a considerable saving—

Mr. Lefebvre: You would save us a lot of time if you sat down.

Mr. Hopkins: Think of the poor people of York-Simcoe.

Mr. Lefebvre: You should be paying them.

Mr. Stevens: Judging from the response of those backbenchers, I have struck a chord and it hurts them deeply.

The bill before us has been described by the minister who introduced it as a great step forward, a mechanism enabling him to do things for small business which have not been done to date. I think we should not accept a statement of that kind without analysis. The fact is that the measure relates in the main to the reconstitution of the Industrial Development Bank. It does contain certain new features, for example, clauses 21, 22 and 23 dealing with management services the bank could offer small businessmen, advisory services to small businessmen and general counselling. But we should not lose sight of the hard fact that the government has always been a friend of big business, and I am fearful it will continue to be so. I say this advisedly, because what we are seeing today is a shifting of the Industrial Development Bank from the Department of Finance to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

We have had some experience of the way in which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has run similar corporations in this country. I am referring, of course, to the Export Development Corporation. The minister has been quite willing to make loans to foreign governments for the benefit of relatively large corporations in Canada, most of them more than 50 per cent foreign-owned. He has been willing to make those loans on a long term basis at interest rates of approximately 7 per cent. Contrast this with the situation today—and I have just checked—in which the current interest rate of the Industrial Development Bank is 11 per cent; for the larger loans it is 12 per cent. The person from whom I obtained this information said it was 12 per cent plus. That is the attitude the government takes toward the small businessmen of this country.

There are two annual reports available to us. One is from the Export Development Corporation and the other is from the Industrial Development Bank. Both spell out what it costs to borrow money from the treasury or from the Bank of Canada. The Export Development Corporation points out that loans and advances from the government of Canada totalling 682 million bore interest at rates up to 7¾ per cent. Dwell on that figure. When we turn to page 22 of the Annual Report of the IDB, we find that loans from the Bank of Canada to the IDB bore an interest rate ranging up to 9⅞ per cent. In other words, the government is currently lending money to the Export Development Corporation at 7⅜ per cent and to the Industrial Development Bank at 9⅞ per cent. That differential, something over 2 per cent, has to be passed on to the small businessmen. On the other hand, the saving which is represented by the low rate financing on the part of the Export Development Corporation goes indirectly to the benefit of large corporations which, as I have mentioned, are more than 50 per cent foreign-owned.

The needs of businessmen in Canada are simple. First, they need relatively cheap money. They would like to fill out fewer forms for all levels of government. They would like the requirements for collateral in respect of whatever loans they are getting to be reduced. I am not in disagreement with the proposition that they should get advice in management from whoever the new corporation may choose to hire for this purpose. But it is important to realize that the small businessman already knows what his needs are and in most cases there is no point in high-priced Ottawa executives coming down to tell him how to run his business. What he really needs are relatively cheap funds, less government interference in the line of forms to be filled out and a competitive atmosphere in which he can continue and grow.

We should never lose sight of the fact that there is a great difference between big and small business. The socialists to my left often forget this, as do the Liberals from time to time. It is completely wrong to confuse big business with small business. I would think that 90 per cent of the business in this country is carried on by small businessmen who are the backbone of our productivity. I would go further and say that this includes other businessmen such as the farmers who, in truth, are one of the most obvious groups of small businessmen in this country. I would suggest that the small businessman is the great buffer between big business on one corner, big government on another corner and big finance on the third corner of the triangle, if you like.

In my opinion, it is important that the government accept the fact that this is a sector or our economy which requires help and protection, and that this sector at all costs should be preserved. I believe there are five or six points which should be raised as reasons for ensuring that small business continues to prosper and exist in this country. I suggest that a large number of small independent businesses helps preserve competition through ensuring increased efficiency, high quality and reasonable prices for consumers. I suggest also that if we had a truly small business oriented economy, we would not have the lack of competition and the problems we have today in our country.

If small businesses decrease there is a likelihood that there would be a concentration of excessive economic or political power. Surely, we should always be conscious of the fact that it is just as wrong to have a concentration of economic power as it is to have undue concentration of political power. In my opinion small business constitutes a large and diversified source of employment opportunities. This is something that seems to be overlooked so often by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). Many of his tax measures are designed really to help the larger corporate entity in this country as opposed to the small businessman. In fact small businessmen have mentioned to me that it is extremely difficult for them to live with the current income tax legislation. I am referring to the fact that so many small businessmen find the legislation so confusing that they virtually have to turn over the entire reporting of their income for taxation purposes to their accountants, a service for which they pay substantially higher fees than was the case under the less complicated income tax structure.

I might mention that in the field of new products and new methods, small business is second to none in its innovative stance in ensuring that the country pioneers and develops new fields. I would also suggest that certain things are best done by small business. Small business has the adaptability, resilience and ability to respond to change which bigger companies rarely have. On that point I think it is fair to say that in many cases there is a role for large corporations. Certainly if we expect to become competitive in international markets we need large corporations to meet large corporations. However, I am stressing that this government's passion to help and support big business must be modified so that small business will get a fair share of the national income. I believe personal initiative and individual judgment can be reflected through small business to a much greater extent than is the case in respect of many large corporations, certainly in respect of big government and in respect of being a backbench member of the Liberal Party.

To some extent it has been suggested that small business gives people the opportunity to do in effect their own thing. So many people find frustration in being a relatively insignificant employee, even an executive, in a large corporation that they welcome an opportunity to become active self-employed businessmen in this country. If we agree that small business is an extremely important factor in the economy, I feel we then must analyze the bill before us to determine whether in fact it goes as far as the minister indicates. I suggest it does not. It may be the intent—and I hope in fact it is the intent of the government if it remains in power—to utilize the new corporation to genuinely assist small business, but on the surface I would emphasize again that the bill does not appear to do much more than re-constitute the Industrial Development Bank and give certain other powers to the new corporation.

There are some specific points on which I would like to touch in respect of this new legislation to incorporate this new bank. The minister referred to clause 4 which deals with the corporate objects of the bank. Subclause (2) specifically states:

> The Corporation in carrying out its objects shall give particular consideration to the needs of small business enterprises.

I am not sure why subclause (2) is phrased in that manner. I would have thought this bank would give its entire emphasis to supporting small business and not just particular consideration. I say that because if we turn to the annual report of the Bank of Canada we find that in the past year the rate of growth of business loans to small businessmen under authorizations of $100,000 or less was 14 per cent. That is in sharp contrast to the first six months of 1973 when business loans generally went up 23 per cent, and in the last six months of that year went up 31 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue, but if I may I will call it one o'clock and after lunch deal further with specific points in this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being one o'clock I leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I should like to summarize what I was saying before the lunch break. The Liberal government is hostile to small business. There has been a torrent of new laws and regulations, difficult enough for a specialist to understand; interference with small business has increased; extra costs have multiplied for purposes sensible, perhaps, if taken individually, but in the aggregate they are truly excessive; taxes have rocketed for the individual and especially for the individual businessman at a disproportionate rate; incentives have been smothered by the conjunction of a capital gains tax with the present levels of succession duties that still exist in most of our provinces; disclosure requirements have been carried to absurd lengths for small companies; and the rules of the family business or closed company add up to a virtual nightmare for the average businessman in this country. Those rules make his expansion from retained profits virtually impossible.

This Liberal government which has made life so difficult for the small companies has actively encouraged the development of larger corporations, especially those that are foreign controlled. I gave certain figures concerning interest rates where we find that the Industrial Development Bank is lending at rates in excess of 12 per cent to small businessmen in this country, whereas the Export Development Corporation is still facilitating loans to foreign countries to help mainly larger corporations at interest rates which are in the 7 per cent range.

In fact, the country needs businesses of all sizes. Giants make sense in certain world markets—there is no doubt about that. Their production capabilities are needed to compete realistically in the world markets. But I believe that sight should never be lost of the fact that small business is an integral part of our economy, certainly as integral as the larger business sector.

I was referring to clause 4 in the bill before us which gives the corporate objects for the new corporation and states, in subclause (2) that it will have particular consideration—that is the new corporation—for the needs of small business enterprise. I find it rather remarkable that no place in this act is there any definition given of a small businessman. I think in fact a small businessman wants to be defined, he wants to understand and to have the government understand what his place is in the economy.

I would also point out to hon. members that no place in the bill is there any suggestion that preferential treatment will be given to Canadian owned concerns as opposed to those that may be controlled in a foreign land. Surely, this could be an integral part of the over-all planning of any government in power. Yet, we find that this government, which at least has given lip service to the idea of some restraint on foreign ownership in Canada, is proposing the incorporation of a new industrial bank, which presumably is completely free, judging from the wording of the act, to lend as much money as they may see fit to Canadian concerns, notwithstanding that they may be foreign controlled. In this respect a former minister of finance in 1963, who at that time was a Liberal member, and I do not mean "Liberal" in today's context as there is no similarity between the Liberal party now and that of 10 or 20 years ago, advanced certain budgetary measures in this House. I refer, of course, to Walter Gordon.

● (1410)

Yesterday in Washington, speaking to the annual meeting of the American Society of International Law, Mr. Gordon indicated that he felt the government's passage of the foreign investment review legislation only covered what he regarded as 20 per cent of the problem in respect of foreign ownership in this country. He stated:

> The other 80 per cent of the annual increase in foreign control of Canadian industry is represented by the expansion of foreign controlled companies already established in Canada, companies which often hold a dominant position in their respective industry.

I would tend to agree with Mr. Gordon. Certainly, the legislation passed by this government to date has not had as much effect in restricting or containing foreign ownership in Canada as one would desire. I do find, however, that it is encouraging that Mr. Gordon, in his speech in Washington, has come up with some suggestions for the repatriation of ownership of Canadian concerns now controlled by foreign hands. In fact, in many respects Mr. Gordon's comments are similar to the suggestion contained in the policy papers passed by this party at its recent convention. Most members will recall that at that time we proposed that in the non-renewable resource industry field, at least 50 per cent of equity ownership in these companies should be repatriated into Canadian hands.

I mention this because I feel that so much of what the Liberal government does, it does in an ad hoc fashion. It passes one act which is supposed to restrain foreign ownership expansion in this country and yet, apparently with no inter-relationship whatsoever, it has its Crown corporations actively supporting foreign corporations in the land, or is passing new acts which in all likelihood will benefit some foreign corporations presently active in the country.

In introducing the bill the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) indicated how well he felt the government had done in respect of small businesses. He perhaps did not realize at the time he was speaking that the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen was at that moment suing the Canadian government for almost $100 million. That association, on behalf of 13,000 members, feels that it has a claim against the federal government as a result of its haphazard handling of the post office dispute. What an odd twist in that here we have a government introducing a bill which it professes to be in the best interests of small businessmen in the country, who it indicates it has been supporting, yet we have a 13,000 member federation of independent small businessmen at the same time suing the same government for $100 million as a result of its mismanagement of the post office strike.

If I may deal with other aspects of this bill, I should like to touch on provisions 21, 22 and 23 which deal with management consulting, management training and the provision of information and advice to small business people. We believe this is probably a good step as we think such consulting, advice and information should be given by the federal government to small business. We do question, however, and if this bill reaches committee we intend to question this further, whether it is necessary to have this type of service within the bank itself. We question whether the responsibility of the bank in lending money, and in ensuring its return, will blend well with the counselling and advisory services such as contemplated in these clauses.

I would point out in this regard that in the United States, in the United Kingdom and in certain other of the western industrialized nations there has been a tendency to set up separate bureaux to help small businessmen in the same way as is contemplated in the three clauses. It may be that the divorcing of that advisory type of function from the banking function is a wise move. We are in agreement with the provision of that service, but we should like to know why it is being included within the banking function itself.

I believe we, as members, should not accept the suggestion that the chartered banks in Canada do not wish to lend money to small businesses. In all fairness, this is a business proposition as far as our chartered banks are concerned. The banks must determine whether they can make advantageous loans, properly secured to ensure the return of capital at a fair rate of return. It is only common sense to realize that it is much easier to make a million dollar loan, a loan of $10 million or even $100 million to a credit worthy company at a relatively good interest rate, and to make a worth-while return, than it is to make loans of $25,000 with all the added work and possible security risk.

I would emphasize that fact when I say there must be assistance to small businesses. I feel we are simply being realistic in respect of how the marketplace works, and that is why it is right and proper that institutions such as the Industrial Development Bank and, hopefully, the new Federal Business Development Bank, if and when it is incorporated, will be active in that field. I would point out, and this should not be lost sight of, that this is a field which has already been entered to some extent by provincial governments. Many of our provinces are quite active in the field of supporting small businesses. If you review the annual report of the Industrial Development Bank you may be as surprised as I was that one-third of the volume of its lending in the fiscal year 1973 was in British Columbia, involving 2,835 loans totalling some $124 million odd. I asked the Industrial Development Bank why that was so. They pointed out that British Columbia is one of the few provinces that does not have a provincial agency financing activities of small business. Consequently, the IDB has a bigger role to play in that province that in most other provinces.

The second reason they gave for their activity in British Columbia was the fact that more than most provinces, it has many frontier type businesses in operation which find their type of loan quite attractive. I am pleased that the IDB has been taking that type of lead, and I hope that the new Federal Business Development Bank will take a similar lead in support of small businesses if and when it is incorporated.

I would draw the attention of hon. members to clause 36 which deals with voting, or not voting, by directors if loans involving them are being considered by the board of the new corporation. It came as a surprise to me that it would even have been contemplated by the federal government that future directors of the new bank would be able to borrow from it. Granted, the clause requires that:

> A director shall not vote on a resolution relating to, or be present at a meeting of the board during the time at the meeting when the board is considering, a loan to, a guarantee to, a guarantee of a loan to, an underwriting agreement with, or a purchase from, that director or a firm or corporation of which > is a partner or shareholder, as the case may be.
> (a) that director, . . .

If this bill reaches committee I think it should be explained, bearing in mind that there are only ten outside directors on this board, why it is felt necessary to have any one of those directors eligible for a loan directly or indirectly, from this bank.

Now, I should like to deal with clause 36 dealing with the appointment of an auditor. This is quite unlike the present Industrial Development Bank provision. The proposal is that there be only one auditor in future, although the Industrial Development Bank has two auditors. I think this should be explained. It should also be explained why it is proposed to appoint the auditor for five years instead of a more limited term.

I have reviewed what I believe to be some of the main provisions that should be considered in this act, and have tried to indicate why I feel that small businessmen deserve assistance as well as encouragement from any federal government. In addition, I have indicated why I believe this federal government has not given such assistance or encouragement to them, nor to the country, and also why in many instances they are openly hostile to small businesses.

Just before we recessed for lunch the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said that he found it interesting that I somehow linked his party with the Liberal Party, pointing out as he did that I, on the one hand, talked socialism and then suggested that the Liberal Party was quite close to big business. I would refer him to the comments of John Kenneth Galbraith, a sometime Canadian who said we must bear in mind that:

In North American society, the big business bureaucracy and the public bureaucracy work in close alliance and the goals of this alliance are essentially in conflict with the interest of most individual members of North American society. There is a system of several thousand giant corporations which dominate the economic life of the continent. The bureaucracy of this corporate world in alliance with the public bureaucracy is increasingly the focus of public power and is responsible for the inequities and irrationalities which are deeply inherent in the structure of the system in all developed countries.

I mention that because I feel that Galbraith is referring to the fact that there are the two extremes. You have big business, big bureaucracy and big money and in between you have this great mass of small businessmen and small farmers who are really the backbone of the productive capacity of any country. Any government that allows that central group of independent business people to be trampled by government or big business, is not a good government. That is why I feel it is so urgent that we, as members, make this our concern. I sincerely hope that the backbench members of the Liberal Party, on this bill at least, will have the courage to say what they think concerning the lot of the small businessman in this country in the last ten years under their rule.

Mr. Speaker, I know that we have people on this side of the House who wish to speak on this bill. I will conclude by saying that we are thankful for anything that appears to be helpful to small businessmen. We do not intend to vote against this bill on second reading. We hope that if it is as helpful as the minister has indicated, it will be well received by small businessmen. We feel that the bill should have good and extensive debate, that it should go to committee to be thoroughly reviewed and perhaps amended, then returned to this House in relatively short order for third reading.

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to rise and make a few comments in relation to the bill now before us, Bill C-20. First of all, I should like to thank hon. members of all parties for allowing a shift in speaking order so that I may make my remarks now. I assure them that I will not take too long.

One of the obvious areas in which this bill will apparently offer some benefit, is the area of small business. In his remarks this morning the minister agreed that small businessmen have not been properly encouraged to remain in business. While listening to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) read the explanation of the bill, I started to become so emotional that I was beginning to worry that I might not be able to speak on it because of the change of attitude this government has suddenly adopted in respect of small business. It reminds me of another area in which their attitude has changed in the last year, and that is in respect of the monarchy. These two things are so obvious to any member, and I am sure to the general public, that they will be well recognized for some time to come.

Mr. Baker: It is known as deathbed repentence.

Mr. Frank: However, Mr. Speaker, now that I have had time for lunch I have recovered, and hopefully will be able to continue.

It would be interesting to tabulate the number of times the minister mentioned small business during that presentation, which emphasizes the point I have previously made. I remember that he mentioned small business many, many times. Actually, I ran for election to this House because I wanted to fight for better legislation for that important sector of society, small business. The government has recognized how important that segment is. I shall not go into more detail, as it may appear I am criticizing the Industrial Development Bank. At this point may I commend my own local bank office for the co-operation and encouragement it has extended over the years. Unfortunately it was restricted by the guidelines laid down in the act.

● (1430)

May I mention areas of concern to small business. Small businesses play an important role in the Canadian economy, creating over 50 per cent of Canada's Gross National Product, paying 50 per cent of taxes collected by government—an important consideration to bear in mind if the government is to continue spending more and more money—and employing more than 50 per cent of the people working in Canada.

There are at least eight important economic functions performed by small businesses. For instance, small businesses provide a productive outlet for the energies of that large group of enterprising and independent people who attach great value to economic independence. Many of these people are less suited to employment in a large organization but have much to contribute to the over-all vitality of the economy. Often, a small business is the most efficient form of business organization. That is why many important trades and industries are made up mainly of small businesses. Many small businesses act as specialist suppliers to large companies of parts, sub-assemblies or components which can be produced at a cost lower than that which can be achieved by large companies. In addition, small businesses add greatly to the variety of products and services offered to the consumer, because they can flourish in a limited or specialized market which it would not be worth the while of a larger business to enter.

In an economy in which ever larger multi-product businesses are emerging, small businesses provide competition, actual and potential, and provide some check on monopoly profits and the inefficiency which monopoly breeds. In this way they contribute to the efficient working of the economic system as a whole.

Despite their relatively lower expenditures on research and development, small businesses are an important source of innovation in products, techniques and services. May I refer to my own case. With the co-operation of employees, we brought forward new products. I am thinking of two cases in which we evolved equipment for which we took out Canadian and U.S. patents. I suggest that a bigger business would not have done this, as the sort of equipment we make is sold in small quantities. It would not have been developed if we were not a small business.

Further, Mr. Speaker, the small business sector is the traditional embryo or breeding ground for new industries. What is most important, small businesses provide the means of entry into business for new entrepreneurial talent and the seed bed from which new, large companies will grow to challenge and stimulate the established leaders of industry. Despite its important economic role, the small business in Canada is weakening because it finds it increasingly difficult to cope with the many problems confronting it.

One of the major difficulties confronting small business today is the difficulty of obtaining funds. Fundamentally, the problem may be summarized this way: owing to their limited economic base, small businesses find it difficult to raise funds on the capital market and have had to turn either to self-financing or bank credit. In many cases self-financing involves difficulties owing to the limited profit margins. As far as bank credit is concerned, small businesses suffer from certain handicaps as compared with the big firms. In the first place they cannot offer the same security and, second, the smallness of their loans involves the banks in higher administrative costs. The small businesses are therefore less attractive customers to banks than the big firms and this fact has its repercussions on the terms they can obtain. Third, the volume of investment loans to the smaller enterprises is apt to fluctuate because financial institutions have a tendency to start by cutting their money supply to the smaller enterprises when the money market becomes tight and to increase it when the money market becomes easier.

While the most obvious source of capital is the venture capital firm, entrepreneurs are reluctant to use this source for the following reasons: first, venture capital firms tend to want to assume equity control of the firm in which they invest; second, venture capital firms insist on appointing their own company executives on the Board of Directors of the firm, and may go so far as to wrest complete control from the entrepreneur by having their own man assume the responsibility of chief executive officer; third, venture capital firms which have acquired effective control of the entrepreneur's company tend to prevent the entrepreneur from acquiring additional capital through equity participation for fear of weakening their control. The preoccupation with the issue of control appears to be the critical factor underlying the resistance of entrepreneurs against utilizing the services of venture capital groups.

Governments in many industrialized countries have found it necessary or desirable to make special provision for privileged access by small businesses to external finance. The measures taken for this purpose most commonly take the following forms: first, the establishment of specialist institutions—with access to loans or grants from government sources—which are able to co-operate with, and support, commercial banks in their lending operations; second, the provision of rediscount facilities to commercial banks by official institutions, including, ultimately, the central bank, for at least a proportion of their term loans; third; official financial support and encouragement for the establishment, by commercial banks of affiliated financial institutions specializing in term loans to small and medium-sized concerns; fourth, official financial support and encouragement for the formation of trade associations and co-operatives which make term loans available to their members; fifth, the establishment of, or financial support for, institutions and co-operatives which guarantee the credit standing of small businesses seeking term finance; sixth, subsidization of interest rates charged by institutions lending to small businesses.

The best known of such policies are those of the United States where the Small Business Administration, an administrative body set up specifically for small businesses, has been empowered to subsidize loans to small business, that is to say, the interest rate on loans to small businesses is subsidized.

May I mention two or three other areas which involve concern and frustration for the small businessman. For example, the numerous bureaucratic government forms which the small businessman must fill out when applying for a loan add to his confusion and difficulty. In addition, the large collateral demanded by the Industrial Development Bank makes it difficult for a small businessman to get a loan. The chartered banks have not been sympathetic in their administration of small business loans. I hope lending institutions will adopt a different attitude under this legislation. In any event, the government should adopt a Canada first policy when considering loans to businesses. I suggest that loans could be based on the percentage of Canadian equity in the company. The existing legislation has tended to favour foreign subsidiaires getting loans, simply because they can provide more collateral for loans than Canadian companies can. I suggest that we should favour giving priority to Canadian businesses seeking loans.

As the previous speaker suggested, a small business should be more clearly defined in the bill. The volume of lending assistance should be subject to parliamentary approval, as well. The bank to be set up should be more flexible in its attitude to collateral requirements. The requirement for collateral should be calculated on an overall, average basis, rather than for each individual loan. As I said previously and as my party has also pointed out, it has been almost impossible for the small businessman of this country to gain access to capital. The idea is this, if you put a maximum of $5,000 each year into a small business, a small business being defined as a company having a net worth of up to $1 million and annual revenue up to $10 million, you will be able to claim a tax credit in that year of $2,500. You can apply this $2,500 against your income tax or have it rebated to you directly.

The advantage of the tax credit will remain with you so long as you continue to hold the investment, but will be repayable to the government if and when the investment is realized. If you do not recover your investment, the amount of credit repayable will be half of your recovery. If you realize a gain, the gain will be taxable in the ordinary way and there will be no capital loss deduction allowed.

Regardless of how this bill may look to small businessmen, I question whether it will go as far as he really needs. As I emphasized in the remarks I made on Bill C-14, the small business and farm improvements act, the most significant void in that bill was the lack of working capital available. I am sure this bill will pass all stages. I trust when that is done it will be of some benefit and encouragement to an area which is very close to me and for which, as long as I am here, I intend to stand up and fight.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the bill we are discussing today is little more than a renaming of the act which established the Industrial Development Bank. The reason we are changing the name of the act and expanding the programs this bank will be able to deal with is that in this country we tend to deal in a very fragmented way with social-economic groups which need assistance.

We have given the banks, insurance companies and trust companies the virtually unlimited right to decide how to dispense the savings of the people of Canada which are deposited with them for re-investment. With regard to the needs of those who want to borrow money, this is not done on the basis of social need, but on the basis of what is most profitable for the banks, insurance companies and trust companies. In that kind of situation, it is not surprising that the bulk of the money which the banks, insurance companies and trust companies lend goes to the largest and most profitable corporations in this country many of which, as the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) pointed out, are in fact multi-national corporations. Money is loaned to those foreign-owned and controlled corporations by the lending organizations such as banks, trust companies and mortgage companies. They are not concerned about the social return to the people who are asking the individuals or organizations for loans.

They do not deal with the kind of people and organizations which are forced to go to the Industrial Development Bank and, after this bill is passed, will be going to the new banking corporation which will be set up. That means very often those things which are most needed in this country are not available. We do not receive the amount of money that should be put into housing, particularly housing for people with moderate or low incomes. Rather, a decision has been made to funnel money into office buildings which very often are not needed. No wonder the small businessmen suffer compared to the large corporations.

I was interested in hearing the hon. member for York-Simcoe point out that profits of large corporations before taxes almost tripled in the past 10 years, increasing from $4 billion to over $14 billion. It was because we in the New Democratic Party knew this kind of situation was developing and accelerating that we were so active in supporting the recommendations of the Carter royal commission which was appointed by the former Conservative government under the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) to look into the problems of taxation.

The Carter commission recommended that our tax system should be based on the simple principle that a dollar of income, regardless of whether it is earned in the form of wages, salaries, interest, real estate speculation or stock dividends, is a dollar that should be taxed in the same way. I remind the hon. member for York-Simcoe, who was not here at that time, that his party was very hostile toward those kinds of recommendations. They thought then, and as far as I know still do, that that kind of tax policy was bad. They basically supported the kind of tax policy we have had in this country for many years under both Liberal and Conservative governments whereby special consideration and concessions are traditionally given to big business, particularly the kind of concessions which have and care being given to the resource industries, the largest and most foreign dominated companies in this country.

An hon. Member: Read our policy paper.

Mr. Orlikow: Policy papers come and go. What I do is watch how members vote when the crunch comes.

Mr. Crouse: So do we watch how members vote when the crunch comes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: The members of the opposition can jeer as much as they want, but we have always made it clear that we are opposed to the kind of tax concessions which have been given by Liberal and Conservative governments to the large resource corporations. We moved an amendment expressing our point of view. What happened? The official opposition, which had been saying day after day and week after week that the one thing they wanted to do was get rid of this government, had that opportunity. What happened when the vote came? They voted the other way. We will give them another opportunity in another few days.

An hon. Member: Is that a promise?

Mr. Orlikow: That is a promise. We will give you that opportunity. When Mr. Kierans analysed tax policy in Canada and pointed out that the resource industries were paying less tax on their earnings than any other type of enterprise, there was silence on the Conservative benches.

● (1450)

An hon. Member: Why don't you speak to the bill?

Mr. Orlikow: I am doing so. If the hon. member will wait for a few moments he will find out what I have in mind. Mr. Kierans pointed out that the manufacturing industry in this country—and this includes many small manufacturers—were paying about 40 per cent of their earnings in corporation taxes; the retail industry was paying taxes on about 50 per cent of its earnings, and the mining companies, the oil companies and the gas companies were paying corporate taxes on somewhere in the neighbourhood of five to 15 per cent. When he drew attention to this situation there was silence from the Conservative benches.

It is estimated that the concessions made to industry in last year's budget, the reductions in the rate of tax, accelerated depreciation allowance and provision for fast write-off will cost the Canadian taxpayer $1400 million in the coming fiscal year.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Orlikow: Those are the figures, and when we get to the debate on the budget we shall put the details on the record. When that proposal was made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) it was supported by the Official Opposition. The hon. member for York-Simcoe was complaining that big industry had done well by comparison with small business. I suggest that if the large corporations paid a fair share of taxation, working men, farmers and small businessmen would do a hell of a lot better. If the government would adopt the principle that it has a duty and a right to take part in the planning required to meet the needs of the country, the kind of bill which is now before us would be superfluous.

The government already asks the banks to do certain things. It already tells the chartered banks they must maintain a certain level of reserves in relation to the amount they lend. We say the government should accept its responsibility for planning to meet the needs of the country and do so in part by directing the banks, the trust companies and other financial institutions as to the particular fields to which capital should be allotted. In other words, the banks, mortgage companies and the insurance companies should be required to direct a portion of their available money to housing instead of office buildings, to farms instead of gasoline stations and to small businessmen rather than giant supermarket chainstores.

In this way the lending institutions would use their resources—money which, in any case, is not theirs, but belongs to the people of Canada,—not merely to the advantage of the banks and mortgage companies, so that more profit would be gained, but in such a way that the basic needs of the people could be met. If this were government policy, the ad hoc approach inherent in the kind of bill before us would not be necessary, because money would be available through existing institutions. However, this is not the policy of Liberal governments, nor of Conservative governments. I am not surprised they are not prepared to accept this concept. As a result though, we find ourselves dealing with the kind of proposals which are before us today, and in the absence of anything better we shall support this idea with respect to change from Industrial Development Bank to Federal Business Development Bank.

However, I am a member of parliament from a have-not province and I must take into account the needs of the people of my province, my area and my city—the needs of all people, with no account taken of political differences or differences between cities and rural areas. The four western provinces, three of them—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia—with NDP governments and the Province of Alberta, with a Conservative government, met in Calgary in July of 1973, almost a year ago. They discussed a number of subjects and reached agreement on a number of subjects—surprisingly, I suppose, in the light of the differing complexions of those governments. One of three subjects was capital financing and financial institutions. They were critical of the Industrial Development Bank and the manner in which it has functioned until now.

I want to spend a few moments putting on record the substance of this criticism, with which, essentially, I agree. The provinces made a number of suggestions which I commend to the minister and which I hope the new bank will keep in mind when it begins its operations, so that it will work better than the IDB did. Let me quote a few sections from the statement made by the four western premiers.

● (1500)

The Western Provinces find the Industrial Development Bank deficient in several respects. To increase the effectiveness of the Bank as a vehicle for stimulating economic development in the Western Provinces in particular and the rest of Canada in general, the Western Provinces recommend that the Industrial Development Bank:

(1) provide substantially greater assistance than in the past to higher-risk ventures;

(2) explore the possibility of taking equity positions in existing firms and of establishing new companies based on joint private and public ownership; and

(3) broaden the types of services which it offers to small business.

They went on in some detail to explain what they meant when they listed the objectives I have already placed on the record. They say that small and medium sized businesses are of crucial importance to the economy of western Canada. They state that firms earning less than $100,000 of taxable income per annum comprise over 80 per cent of the total companies in both western and central Canada. These relatively small firms in western Canada contribute a larger portion of the total taxation income than do similar firms in central Canada.

Anybody who has visited western Canada or the northern part of Canada knows how important the branch bank, the local department store, the drug store and the clothing store are to the community and how the closing of one such store can lead to the virtual extinction of a small town or village. It is for that reason the premiers urged that the stimulation of the growth and expansion of small enterprise be given major priority at all levels of government. The Industrial Development Bank was supposed to be a major federal agency to provide assistance to small business. Since its establishment in 1944 its primary function supposedly has been to provide capital assistance to industry with particular consideration being given to the financing problems of small enterprises.

However, frequently it has been difficult, if not impossible, for many small companies to obtain assistance from the Industrial Development Bank. Before 1961 financial aid was offered only to firms in the manufacturing sector. Since then an amendment was made to the Industrial Development Bank Act and the bank was able to move into other fields, but the loans have been relatively small. Half the loans have been in amounts of $25,000 or less and 80 per cent of the loans have been for amounts of $50,000 or less. The bank has assisted in the development of many small scale enterprises but its participation has been limited for a number of reasons.

The Royal Commission on Banking and Finance and the Gray Report noted that the Industrial Development Bank's lending policies have tended to be too conservative. They pointed out that the bank's loan ratio has been only approximately 0.5 per cent of annual disbursements. This suggests that the bank has not been involved in very many high risk ventures. When the bank takes that attitude it means the lending of money for high risk ventures is left almost exclusively to provincial development corporations.

It is for this reason that the record of those provincial development agencies in every province has been pretty bad. They have had to take the risk of lending money to those companies which could not obtain the money from the commercial banks, insurance companies or trust companies or from the Industrial Development Bank. The western premiers therefore suggest that this bank be prepared to take more risks than it has so that the needs of small business, more particularly in the western provinces and in the maritime provinces, can be met. They point out that the Industrial Development Bank's assistance to small business has also been severely limited because of this reluctance to enter into joint ventures with privately owned firms. The Industrial Development Bank Act authorizes the bank to take an equity position, but the bank has not used that authority. The distribution of loans among the provinces is another matter which gives the western premiers a great deal of concern.

If one looks at the accumulative record of the Industrial Development Bank it is obvious that the bulk of the loans have gone to the central provinces which are now the most prosperous. From 1944 until September 30, 1972, 30.2 per cent of all the loan money which the bank authorized went to the province of Ontario while 23.9 per cent of the money loaned by the Industrial Development Bank went to the province of Quebec. Companies in the province of British Columbia received 21 per cent of the money loaned by the Industrial Development Bank. When one looks at the situation in respect of the other provinces one realizes how restrictive the Industrial Development Bank has been until now. The province of Nova Scotia received 2.2 per cent of the money. The province of New Brunswick received 2.4 per cent of the money. The province of Manitoba received 4.6 per cent of the money. The province of Saskatchewan received 3.3 per cent of the money, and the province of Alberta received 9.3 per cent of the money. That performance is not good enough if the bank is to be of any assistance to the existing commercial banks and mortgage and trust companies.

Surely this federal government bank ought to have some social purposes. One of its main functions should be to meet the needs of the have-not provinces. I say, as the premiers have said much more effectively, that the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba have obtained collectively 17.2 per cent of the value of all the loans granted by the Industrial Development Bank. The Atlantic provinces have acquired only 6.6 per cent of the money authorized for loans by the bank. This simply is not good enough. I say to the minister that the new bank with its new board, and with the regional advisory committee which the minister outlined when he introduced this bill, simply must be instructed not about whether to give a particular loan but to pay a good deal more attention to the needs and requirements of the have-not provinces of Canada, whether they be on the Atlantic coast or in the prairie region.

The four premiers made, in the submission which they published in July of 1973, three recommendations. I think that they should be put on the record and that the government should give serious consideration to adopting them. First, they recommended that the bank provide substantially greater assistance than in the past to high risk ventures. Instead of restricting assistance only to enterprises which possess a substantial amount of collateral, the bank should also assist those businesses which may not have an abundance of collateral but which present sound business proposals.

Second, the bank should explore the possibility of taking equity positions in existing firms and of establishing new companies based on joint private and public ownership. This would help to fill the gap for ventured capital which currently exists in Canada.

Third, it is recommended that the bank broaden the type of services which it offers to small businesses. It should desist from relying almost exclusively on the provision of loan capital and should provide other services, such as consultative services to management, technical assistance in the securing of contracts, etc.

I will close by quoting from the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance as follows:

> The aim of government institutions should not be to get the maximum number of loans on their books. Rather it should be to ensure that businesses which can be competitive and profitable have access on a reasonable basis both to a variety of sources of funds and to guidance in planning their financial affairs.

The recommendation of the Western Economic Opportunities Conference was as follows:

> ... the Industrial Development Bank should provide a substantially greater amount of financial assistance to such regions as the prairie provinces and the Atlantic provinces. In so doing, it would bring about a more equitable participation by all regions of Canada in industrial activities.

That statement came from the four premiers of western Canada representing two different political parties, but I am certain that if there had been a Liberal premier in one of those provinces, he would have endorsed the statements made by the present four premiers.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Those days are gone.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says that the days when there would be a Liberal premier in any of the western provinces are gone, and I agree with him.

Much of what the premiers said sounded very familiar to me as I listened to the minister introducing the bill earlier today. He spoke about regional advisory committees and regional directors. If there is any purpose in having regional directors on the new bank, if there is any purpose in having regional advisory committees, except to pretend to meet some of the legitimate desires of the people of the western provinces—and I believe that the minister was sincere in what he was saying—then they have to do more than just make a speech about it. They have to do more than just appoint directors; they have to give the directors and the advisory committees a program, and they have to outline guidelines for the kind of purposes which they want the new bank to achieve.

If they look at the statement made by the western premiers, if they give those kinds of directives to the officials of the new organization which they are setting up, and if they give that kind of purpose to the new bank, then it will be much more useful to the have-not regions of this country than the Industrial Development Bank has been until now.

It is with the hope that this government has learned from past experience that the new organization will be given the kind of directives which I have outlined that we support this bill, though not with a great deal of enthusiasm because we have seen too many proposals by this Liberal government being aborted in their execution and not reaching the objectives for which we have been told they have been put forward. We think that if the government is sincere and follows the reasoning which the minister used in introducing this bill, if it follows the advice which the western premiers have given to the government, we believe that this new organization can play a useful purpose, and it is for that reason that we will support this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words about the establishment of the new bank.

We are, Mr. Speaker, partly satisfied with the introduction of that bill because we feel that we already have an organization which could perform that work. The Industrial Development Bank with its branches in every area of the country could surely serve the population. If new responsibilities were given to the Industrial Development Bank, we could, Mr. Speaker, save up in administration costs.

● (1520)

The administration could be less costly, but since we are setting up a new bank, it will require a new staff and consequently the administration will cost millions of dollars in public funds.

Instead of providing benefits to the small industry under the present system, we will probably be compelled to lend money at very high rates so that the small industry will not directly profit by the legislation or that bank which could give cheap credit to produce cheaply.

The purpose of the new organizations which we are setting up such as the proposed one, should be to encourage Canadians to produce or to develop further the small or medium Canadian industries to have them produce cheaply.

For them to be able to produce cheaply, interest rates would necessarily have to be brought down to a decent level, let us say no higher than 3 per cent, so we could really produce at a lower cost.

Interest rates, Mr. Speaker, are the prime factor in the increase in prices and the cost of living. Interest rates are primarily responsible for any increase in the cost of living.

Mr. Speaker, a new institution of economic development such as the one provided for in this bill might help big business, but what about the small business? They always claim to promote small and medium-sized businesses when actually, with all the existing old institutions, big business has always been favoured. Small businesses have always found it difficult to take advantage of regulations and legislation to avail themselves directly of the benefits offered by those institutions.

The benefits are for big industries that borrow millions and millions of dollars because they are fortunate enough to have capital stock or to sell shares in their operation, while small businesses are far from having the same possibilities. It is easier for big businesses with capital stock to operate and produce with their capital stocks than with borrowed capital, because industry must pay back borrowed capital with interest. Small businesses never have working capital while a business with capital stock does not have to make payments, pay back interest and, therefore, that industry has more working capital with which to operate. It seems to me that this should be included in this bill in order to help small business. We could also help him by establishing lower interest rates.

If the government is able to guarantee loans to the industry, then they should also be able to guarantee reasonable interest rates. There is no reference to interest rate but I know it will be the same as that charged by other institutions and it is presently too high; it is therefore nearly useless to try to produce.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, both small businessmen and big industry are forced to operate on a seasonal basis. Some products become seasonal; they must be stored for five, six, seven or even eight months, and storage is very expensive. The industrialist, who is unable to support storage charges, is again forced to borrow money from chartered banks, under what is known as the 88 formula, and interest rates are presently 12 per cent. Thus, when the storage of some products for several months must be financed at high interest rates, the interest gulps the benefits of the small business.

In this bill, we should provide for financing storage at a very low interest rate to allow small businesses to operate normally. We could allow them to have a working capital and to manufacture more cheaply. Also, the small businesses often have another problem that the medium and large industries do not have, that of transportation. Indeed, it is a well-known fact that in general small businesses are located far from the major centres, do not have suitable highways or throughways, and must therefore pay excessive transportation rates which eat up part of their profits.

Here again, the government should do something to help the small businesses to organize since they cannot pay the excessive transportation rates. They should be able to operate their business and transport their goods in time and more economically, which would allow them to develop more rapidly. For this reason, they should have access to the Industrial Development Bank, which could provide more capital at more reasonable interest rates so that small businesses could operate more economically. Several small industries cannot operate if they do not have their own transportation system and transport goods directly to their destination.

Mr. Speaker, we should also be able to provide the small businesses with reasonable income tax rates. I know that this cannot be included in this Bill, but it should be provided for the small business, for instance those with a turnover of less than $1 million should benefit from a tax exemption, because with a turnover of $50,000, $100,000, or $1 million, small industry cannot assume all those costs without some form of assistance. Small industry is overtaxed and income taxes are excessive. There should also be provision, in addition to reasonable income tax rates, for a certain deductible turnover. Furthermore, small industry should be non-taxable if its turnover is less than $1 million.

Then, Mr. Speaker, it would be of great benefit to the small industry to consider each individual sector and introduce a bill which would really help small and medium industries in general, for the large industry has no problem.

Major industries, which can be listed on the stock market have no problems, but those unable to do so have all kinds of problems: labour, taxes, and so on. It is very difficult for the small industry to survive and even flourish because it has to pay in all sectors, for all administrative services, federal and provincial, municipal and school. School boards and municipalities take unfair advantage of small industry, depriving it of all its working capital.

Mr. Speaker, we know that the government's job is to manage, therefore, we should give it the opportunity to do so, since it can and because now the opposition also has a say in the matter.

A few minutes ago, I listened to an hon. member from the New Democratic Party who made suggestions and offered solutions. Some Progressive Conservative members did the same. At this time we have a government which is listening to the suggestions made by the opposition. Therefore, I believe we now have one of the best governments we ever had in Canada, because the opposition really has the opportunity to make its contribution. Moreover, the views of the opposition are to a large degree taken into consideration. That is why I say we have one of the best governments ever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the government collects a tax of 12 per cent on anything produced made in Canada. In view of the almost overall increase in the cost of living at a rate of 25 to 30 per cent, it would seem reasonable I think for the government to consider the lowering of that 12 per cent tax. This 12 per cent excise tax should at least be reduced, Mr. Speaker, and if the minister was willing to consider our suggestion, we would be very happy.

It is generally known that a higher cost of living generally increases government's income, and that the 12 per cent excise tax brings in far more to the government. Now, if it were reduced, all Canadians would benefit from it, and this would contribute most certainly to reducing the cost of living and the cost of goods. I am of the opinion that this suggestion should be considered by the minister.

This new institution should then be adapted to new techniques on the basis of facts and of today's realities and not of past traditions. If this new institution is set up according to old customs, we will only get the same results as in the past.

I ask the minister to consider the situation. Even if we can move amendments, I feel we should leave this task to the minister. It should suffice to ask him to do so. He could change the bill himself, with a view to really granting the required advantages to small and medium industries, because if we really want to develop a strong country, our industries and institutions must also be strong.

Every day a number of small industries have to close down because they cannot stay in business, while it is those industries which support the big ones. Large industries extract the raw materials that are consumed and processed by the small and medium-sized industries.

That completes the industrial and economic cycle because large industries cannot produce at a lower cost than small industries. The latter are often family businesses where people work 10, 15 and even 18 hours a day. They work almost night and day and working hours mean nothing. That is why the small industry can produce at a lower cost than the big industry which must close at fixed hours and operate only 48 hours a week. Then it has to close because employees will not work any longer because the law prevents them or because they must be paid double time. In small family industries, people work as they like and, as long as they like, they produce at a lower cost and technical management, bookkeeping, accounting all that is done in the evening. During the day, many owners work as employees and at night, even on Sunday sometimes, they look after their accounting in the spare time.

That is why one can infer that small industries produce at a lower cost than big industries. Therefore, we should encourage the small business which is the backbone of our society and to a great extent the basis of all other businesses. Big industrial producers depend upon it, because it processes a good deal of their raw materials or products. It markets those finished products at a much lower cost.

This is one of the reasons why we will support this bill, but we are not really enthusiastic because we think that it will not meet our present economic needs. It will not give to small businessmen what they are entitled to expect from their government.

Mr. Speaker, this government is here to get results, to guarantee production means to small businessmen. Guaranteeing production means in the small industry is only a matter of financing. Today it is difficult to get loans at a small interest rate and even at higher rates. Many small businessmen cannot get any loan because our financial institutions say they are not solvent enough, that they already owe too much and should not run deeper into debt. Then, Mr. Speaker, several industries are now at a standstill because they already got a small loan of $25,000, $35,000 or $50,000. They wish to expand and buy new equipment. However they are unable to get one more penny on the market because they cannot get a new loan from those who did lend them money on a first mortgage unless those industries increase and even double their production. To double their production, they need twice as much money and they cannot find it anywhere. Then they are stopped because they lack funds that should be at their disposal.

I think that everything which is physically possible should financially be so. The government should assume its responsibility and lend money at reasonable interest rates to check the increase, in the cost of living.

Nowadays, large financial institutions make billions of dollars in profit, as do the banks for that matter. All ten Canadian chartered banks increased their assets by about fifteen billion dollars in 1973.

Mr. Speaker, if such increases in assets do not pass all bounds, then I do not know what does. With an assets increase of 228 per cent, those institutions could make a little less profit and give more money to the people to live on.

The government, out of honesty, clear-mindedness and initiative, must ask those institutions to be reasonable, and if they refuse, we can, through our banks or other institutions such as the one we are creating now, be reasonable and not only charge the same interest rates as they do, like the Industrial Development Bank, for instance, which keeps pace with other institutions. If the others raise their interest rates, the Industrial Development Bank does the same much before the others. It is always ahead of the others in that respect because it charges a higher interest than the other institutions.

Therefore, it is not an institution which helps people but one which exploits them and allows the other institutions to survive and exploit the population.

Mr. Speaker, we are against that type of exploitation and against financial organizations, which should be there to help rather than to exploit the people.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words in this debate I am reminded of the story of two small businessmen who met at a social gathering. One said to the other, "How's business?" The reply was, "Well, I didn't make enough money to retire last year and I didn't lose enough to go bankrupt." I believe that typifies the condition of most small business people today. A recent statistic produced by the Bank of Canada shows that the share of national income going to smaller business has declined by a full three percentage points. In 1962 the share of national income going to small business was 10.5 per cent. In 1973 that share had eroded to 7.5 per cent. The decline has been gradual year by year and shows there is a long standing and serious difficulty in the field of small business

● (1540)

In one sense I welcome this bill, for it calls for the restructuring of the Industrial Development Bank into a new Federal Business Development Bank. I welcome it in one sense because, on the surface, it may be a partial answer to the difficulties facing small business. We need to take a comprehensive look at the entire picture. That is, we must examine the financing needs of small business, look at managerial and marketing skills and examine taxation applying to small businesses.

Attention must also be paid to the growing demands of Statistics Canada on small businesses. I should like the minister to take the initiative in this matter. I ask him to obtain from Statistics Canada one copy of all forms which Statistics Canada sends to small businesses. These forms could be presented to the Standing Committee on Industry, Trade and Commerce. We could ask Statistics Canada officials to appear before the standing committee and prove the necessity of these forms and questionnaires. I should like to see current procedures changed. Let new forms be cleared by the standing committee and let us allow spokesmen from small businessmen's organizations to provide some input to the standing committee in this matter. The average small businessman just does not have the time or staff to climb the paper work mountain which is facing him today.

A constituent of mine wrote to me about this. I shall read part of his letter, as follows:

> Enclosed is a copy of a letter to Statistics Canada. I find it extremely difficult to understand why at least once a month for the last many months we have had to waste time filling out this type of form. I run a one girl office, have done for ten years, and do not plan to change this, and can certainly not see any reason for the extreme waste of taxpayers money in this sort of ridiculous questionaire. Surely it is time that some of these obvious make programs should be looked into.

Many small businessmen have expressed the same views to me. The author of the letter is a doctor with a small practice in Burlington. His inquiry is typical of many similar ones which have come to me from the small business community.

It is somewhat ironic that the Industrial Development Bank was created some 30 years ago to be a lender of last resort, especially for small enterprises. Now it is being restructured, to be known as the Federal Business Development Bank which is being set up to help small enterprises especially.

The obvious question is, what has happened in the intervening 30 years? Is not the IDB doing the job it is supposed to do for small business? If you want the answers, you need only talk to people who have used the services of IDB. I wonder if we are only changing the name, adding the counselling and consultative service, removing the IDB from the shadow of the Bank of Canada and placing it totally under the authority of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, (Mr. Gillespie). That is a good move and I support that part of the bill.

In many cases what happens is this. When the small businessman goes to the local bank manager and asks for a loan, the bank manager actually suggests that he should go to the Industrial Development Bank. When you come to that stage you have passed step one in the loan process; you have been refused a loan by your local bank manager. The IDB manager and your local bank manager put their heads together and talk over the phone, at which time your account is discussed and the bank rate revealed. At this point the IDB is in the driver's seat. You need money to carry on your project and your bank has turned you down. Then IDB sends one of its loan officers and engineers to see you. After discussion, he usually indicates whether or not he feels you may be granted a loan. The interest rate is then discussed.

The Industrial Development Bank has been accused of lending money at rates lower than those charged in the private sector and of competing openly with the private sector. I have read these accusations but have not seen such cases. The IDB has been accused of competing openly with the private sector and undercutting rates. As the bank pays no income tax, its actions have been classed as unfair competition. I should like to see evidence of this. I have read in various places that the bank does this. My experience is completely the opposite. I have found IDB rates to be between 1½ and 2 per cent above the rate available to small businessmen.

What really ties the small businessman down is the security IDB takes. It will be interesting to see if the new Federal Business Development Bank will follow the same procedures. I have found that IDB insists on a debenture on all the company's assets, a charge on fixed assets, insurance policies on the life of the president or owner, a claim on receivables and inventory, and a secondary position with relation to the commercial bank, where those assets are used as collateral with the commercial bank. You will find, as well, that IDB will usually take collateral mortgages on the owner's residence as well as personal guarantees by the owner or president of the company and the directors of the company. This massive collateral acts like a millstone round the neck of the entrepreneurial ability of the small businessman. It tends to negate the basic philosophy behind limited companies, that of shielding shareholders from personal liability.

The danger, as I see it, is that the Federal Business Development Bank may be only a cosmetic change. We may be seeing merely a change of name and the addition of a few consultative services. Clearly we need new people at the top and a totally new philosophy for stressing the entrepreneurial aspect of business. We need people who will seize on the innovative abilities of small businessmen and be more of a partner to assist and guide the small businessman. That is the attitude we need, rather than the heavy handed attitude of collateral security.

I do not see why the new bank should not take preferred stock in a small company as collateral, instead of debentures, floating charges and personal guarantees. I would much rather see the Federal Business Development Bank shake itself loose from the traditional bank approach and take a leaf from the book of, say, the Toronto-Dominion Bank. That bank went outside the circle of bank employees and employed people from business to head its Toronto-Dominion venture capital group.

Because of the failure of IDB to answer the needs of small business, we have witnessed the proliferation of venture capital enterprises in the last few years. I have mentioned the Toronto-Dominion venture capital group. May I also mention Venta Investments, Charterhouse Canada Ltd., Canadian Enterprise Development Corporation, and Roynat Limited, a division of the Royal Bank.

The provinces have moved into this field as well with agencies to assist small business. There is the Ontario Development Corporation, Manitoba Development Corporation, Industrial Estates in Nova Scotia and so on. Clearly, the emergence of these provincial enterprises points up the failure of the Industrial Development Bank to fulfil the original mandate it was given when it was established 30 years ago.

If the Federal Business Development Bank is to be a success and really help small business, it must be shaken up from top to bottom and show genuine desire, through some direction from the minister, to move in a positive way to assist small business.

A case might be made that public funds are involved and they must be protected with adequate collateral, but look at what is at stake here. If you let your fingers do the walking through the yellow pages, as the advertisement states, you will find that 90 per cent of the companies listed are small businesses. They create 50 per cent of Canada's gross national product, pay 50 per cent of all taxes collected by government and employ over 60 per cent of all the people working in Canada.

One cannot but wonder why they have been neglected so long by this government, but the reasons are obvious to those who seriously study the matter. Big business bureaucracy and the public bureaucracy work in close alliance. The goals of this alliance are essentially in conflict with the interests of most individual businessmen in Canada. This alliance increases the focus of public power and is responsible for the inequities in the free enterprise system.

A good case can be made in the rigidity of our tax system. The arrogance of the civil service in the application of Bill C-259, the Income Tax Act as amended in 1971, is evident. It is essentially a technocratic nightmare to the small businessman. Even large corporations have problems with the act, but at least they have the physical and financial resources to cope with it.

I would first like to see a small business enterprise defined and then some amendments to simplify the act so that the average businessman can understand it as it applies to his operation. I would like to see this as a separate section of the act, written in plain language, in terminology the average accountant can understand.

The measure of success the Federal Business Development Bank achieves will depend upon whether the minister is willing to go to his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), and sell this idea. He must also seek out his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury), and have the tax form for small businesses simplified.

I am told that corporate managers and senior civil servants keep the same company. They have the same unfailing confidence in themselves that what they know and do is for the good of all people. However, the guts of the economy, the small businessman, has not been served. The people who really make this country go have been frustrated at every turn by a rigid and inflexible, arrogant bureaucracy. The proof is in the Bank of Canada figures which show the steady decline in the share of national income, as I quoted a few moments ago, from 10.5 per cent to 7.5 per cent over a period of 10 years or so.

While this and previous parliaments have wrestled with such weighty problems as bilingual guidelines, football legislation and all the social legislation that is leading us toward more state control, the small business enterprise has gone its way, still employing 60 per cent of the work force of this country, still paying more than 50 per cent of the taxes into the public treasury, and still accounting for 50 per cent of the gross national product.

Anyone in marketing and manufacturing will tell you that 80 per cent of the products on the shelves today will not be there in 15 years. They will have changed. New products will emerge, new ideas will come forth and new products will be created to fill the demands of the day.

Hardly a week goes by without a businessman contacting me to tell me of his inability to get venture capital to push a new product or idea. On my office desk are examples of such innovations. One deals with a retrieval system for computers. It is a real breakthrough. It is a system that would immeasureably assist even the House of Commons and the Speaker. It allows information to be retrieved almost at will without the rigidity of a structured computer program.

Another deals with, of all things, dogs. A group of knowledgeable people have compiled courses for community colleges that will teach people the care and handling of dogs. These courses are presently being taught in four community colleges in Ontario. This group of people has inquiries from Japan, New Zealand, the United Kingdom, France and the United States, from people who want to use them in their education courses. They have produced a book and instruments that are absolutely unique. Fifteen more books are projected. This small group of people are being pressed by American publishers to sell publishing rights to them on a royalty basis. I am trying to get them started in a purely Canadian venture so they can export their products.

These are only two of the many examples that have come to my attention. Therefore, the question we in this parliament must face is whether we are going to urge the minister to make sure that the Federal Business Development Bank is flexible and is stripped of its rigidity so that it can respond to new ideas and use to the fullest the innovative talents one finds in the small business enterprise. May I call it four o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the acting House leader to give us a line on the business for Monday so that those of us who like to read Hansard over the weekend can see what is coming up?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to begin on Monday with the railway relocation bill. On the completion of that, we will return to the bill we have just been dealing with relating to the federal bank. We will then go on to the cash advances bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being 4 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private member's business as listed on today's order paper, namely Notices of Motions, Public Bills.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE CITIZENSHIP FOR CHILD OF CANADIAN BORN OUTSIDE CANADA

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway) moved that Bill C-110, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act (natural born Canadian citizen), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

She said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is one of a number I have placed on the order paper over the past few years designed to deal with various facets of the problem of securing equality before the law for women in this country. It is a bill which deals with citizenship. I introduced it for the first time on March 12, 1973, one year ago.

The purpose of the bill is set out clearly in the explanatory notes, and since those notes are probably more brief than I am likely to be, I will just read them.

The purpose of this bill is to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act to provide, in the case of a married woman who is a Canadian citizen residing outside of Canada, that her child born outside of Canada shall have the same right for her child to be a natural born Canadian citizen as the father and as an unmarried woman.

Then there is a little bit about the existing law. Under the Canadian Citizenship Act at the present time a great many people are shocked when they run up against the fact that only a Canadian father of a child born outside this country has a right to confer Canadian citizenship on that child. A Canadian mother of a child born outside Canada to an alien father has no right whatever to confer citizenship on that child.

There is one case in which a Canadian mother can confer citizenship on a child born outside Canada and that is when the child is illegitimate. I think this is a shocking state of affairs. We have probably overlooked it because not too many people have been involved over the years and sufficient fuss was not made about it; but now, with the greater amount of travel back and forth, people are beginning to get caught and resent very much the fact that women are in a terribly inferior position in finding themselves unable to confer Canadian citizenship on children born outside this country.

The Report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women was tabled on September 28, 1970. There are a couple of sections and a recommendation with regard to this matter. I quote:

Another situation arises in relation to the citizenship of children. Children born in Canada are automatically natural-born Canadians. But the Canadian citizenship of the mother is less meaningful to the citizenship status of a child born outside Canada than is the Canadian citizenship of the father. Under the terms of sections 4 and 5 of the Act, a child born outside Canada of a Canadian father is a natural-born Canadian regardless of the citizenship status of the mother. A child born outside Canada of a Canadian mother and an alien father, on the other hand, is not a natural-born Canadian unless the mother is unmarried. In all cases, of course, certain administrative requirements must be met for the natural-born child to retain his citizenship.

We believe Canadian women and men should have the same right to confer Canadian citizenship on their children. Many countries, for example, The Republic of Ireland, the United States and France, provide for this. Therefore, we recommend that sections 4 and 5 of the Canadian Citizenship Act be amended to provide that a child born outside Canada is a natural-born Canadian if either of his parents is a Canadian citizen.

I might well say "if either of his or her parents is a Canadian citizen." It would please some women a lot if those words, "or her" had been inserted.

Time has gone by since September 28, 1970. On April 2, 1973, more than a year ago, the government replied to questions by my hon. colleague from Skeena (Mr. Howard) concerning this attitude toward a number of these recommendations. This was the reply given to the hon. member for Skeena with regard to that particular recommendation about Canadian citizenship:

The recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women to amend section 4 and 5 of the Canadian Citizenship Act to provide that a child born outside Canada is a natural-born Canadian if either of his parents is a Canadian citizen has been sympathetically considered and an opportunity for discussion will be given Members of the House shortly at the time the new citizenship bill or major amendments to the current act are introduced.

That was on April 2, 1973, and so far no legislation has been introduced to deal with this matter. The reply I have just quoted has been embodied in a pamphlet put out by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. The pamphlet is entitled "What has been done?". It sets out a list of the recommendations made by the Royal Commission and assesses what has been done with regard to each of them. With regard to the particular recommendation which is the subject of the proposal put forward in my bill, they say "Not implemented; amendments to the Citizenship Act are required."

It is three and a half years since the Report of the Royal Commission came out. In the meantime we have been getting letters from women who have been caught by this legislation. I have one letter I received from someone in a town in British Columbia about a year ago. I quote:

I should like to voice my support of your private member's bill to give Canadian married women living outside of Canada the same rights as men and unmarried mothers.

At the present time I am in the process of selling my business in Canada and will be moving to the United States to marry an American citizen.

I was born and raised a Canadian and intend keeping my citizenship. Several weeks ago I wrote to the immigration office to find out the status of my future children and was shocked to learn that I could not register them as Canadians.

Here is a letter from New York. This is a copy of a letter written a year ago to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras). It puts the whole case very succinctly:

I should like to bring to your attention a matter which I believe falls within your area of responsibility, namely, the implementation of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada.

I am a natural-born citizen of Canada presently residing in America as a resident alien. My husband is an American citizen. On October 9, 1972, I gave birth to a son, Peter Campbell Lichter, in New York City.

It is not possible to register him with the Canadian Consulate in New York, thereby awarding him dual nationality, because the Canadian Citizenship Act states that "A person born after the 31st day of December 1946 is a natural-born Canadian citizen ... if he is born outside of Canada elsewhere than on a Canadian ship, and (if) his father ... is a Canadian citizen ..."

The Canadian Bill of Rights, however, states that "It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religon or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely ... the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law;"

The Canadian Citizenship Act would seem to be in direct contradiction to this aforementioned portion of the Bill of Rights: a woman clearly does not have equality as stated in the citizenship laws.

The Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada recognizes this inequality and states that "We believe Canadian men and women should have the same right to confer Canadian citizenship on their children ... Therefore, we recommend that sections 4 and 5 of the Canadian Citizenship Act be amended to provide that a child born outside Canada is a natural-born Canadian if either of his parents is a Canadian citizen ..." The greater importance attached to the citizenship of the father does not recognize the equal status of the citizenship of the mother".

Then the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women are embodied in the letter. This woman goes on to say:

The Citizenship Act has not been amended as of this date. As a citizen of Canada I am therefore bringing this to your attention in the hope that action may be taken on this specific recommendation of the Royal Commission. I look forward to hearing from you regarding this matter.

I should now like to read from a copy of another letter addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on November 15, 1973. It states in part:

I am a Canadian citizen, and I was always a resident of Canada until March 1972, when I became a resident of Switzerland. I am now engaged to be married to a Czechoslovakian who has been a Swiss resident since 1969, and whose nationality is presently defined as "stateless".

When I inquired at the Canadian Embassy in Berne what citizenship a child born to us in Switzerland could have, I was told it is unfortunate that I am a woman. It seems that the child would have the citizenship of the father, in this case "stateless", and that even then the mother's citizenship is not considered at all. I would appreciate knowing what steps are being taken by the government to change this appalling law.

So far we have had no evidence that steps are being taken, although from copies of answers to these letters which I have been I realize there are hopes that such legislation will be brought in. I expect that someone from the other side of the House will be speaking to indicate that the time is not far off. However, I should like to know when we may expect this legislation, what are the government's priorities, and when women will be brought up to equal status in a matter of this kind.

For the life of me I cannot understand why there should be so much red tape and delay. This is not a complicated matter. I am inclined to agree very firmly with the President of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, Dr. Katie Cooke, who in a recent press release said: "I get uneasy when what can be done easily is not done."

I want to say that I also become uneasy when what can be done easily is not done. I think this is something which could have been done easily a long time ago and which could be done easily at any time. I do not like to think of children of Canadians wandering around Switzerland as stateless individuals because their mother is regarded as an inferior citizen, without the right to confer Canadian citizenship. When we talk about Canadian nationalism and about developing our own industries and products in this country, I do not like to think that we should have a situation at this time where a child born in the United States to a mother who is a Canadian cannot be invested with Canadian citizenship because that child is regarded as a branch plant of some American down there to whom the child's mother is married. I think that is stupid. I think it is time we began to realize that a Canadian woman should be in a position of equality with a Canadian man, no matter which country she happens to be in, and that she should have the same rights in respect of her children.

I could go on at greater length in respect of this matter but I shall not do so because I am led to believe quite a number of people would like to speak on this bill this afternoon. I should like to make my stopping now, in order to give these members a few minutes, contingent on their not saying that there will be legislation soon on this matter, because this is the answer we have received for a long time. The replies to all these letters to which I referred indicated that we are just on the edge of having legislation in respect of the equality of women. It is all right for a member to say that the cabinet will not let the minister introduce this legislation, but I say that if the people on the government benches really cared about this legislation they could make it hot enough for the cabinet that it would have to bring in this legislation without all this time lapse.

I shall stop at this point and find out what they have to say in this regard, whether they can really give us any answers or whether we are to have more of the soothing syrup which has been prepared for the women of this country.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I listened quite attentively to the hon. member for Vancouver Kingway (Mrs. MacInnis) and I think that she is quite right about this Bill, C-110, which grants presently to the father or, in the case of a child born out of wedlock, to the mother, at the time of the person's birth, the status of Canadian citizen.

If under the existing legislation a child born abroad can be recognized as a Canadian citizen I believe that it would be quite normal to give the mother the same rights as the father, or the mother of a family, or the unwed mother.

I heard a while ago the applause of the hon. members opposite who approved of the contents of this Bill and of the explanations of the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway. As she wants to give the greatest number of members a chance to express themselves, I think, Mr. Speaker, that we should not only ask the government to table such a bill, but ask the members of the government side and of the opposition to pass this Bill C-110, immediately, so that a woman will receive the same respect as a man, in Canada and abroad.

[English]

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, it is often said that politicians are in favour of motherhood and against sin. I should like to commend the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) for bringing in a private member's bill essentially in favour of that subject, having to do with motherhood and citizenship. I am not entirely certain that there is any correlation between this and her question during the question period today involving contraceptives, but there may be some correlation which has escaped me.

I should like to be as brief as I can. Several other members have tabled private members' bills, each in its own way attempting to correct anomalies in the present act, or conversely, to update the act so that it may more closely reflect the prevailing ideas of the rights, qualifications and obligations of citizenship in Canada. It should be remembered, however, that the government, in the debate on the throne speech, pointed out that legislation would be brought forward by the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) for the purpose of a complete overhaul of the Citizenship Act, including therein the necessity of recognizing equal rights in citizenship law as between the sexes.

There are many aspects of the citizenship law which require change and it is with that in mind that I suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway that while the specific amendment proposed in her bill deserves full recommendation and attention, none the less it would seem to me to be preferable that the issue taken up in the hon. member's private bill might be better considered in terms of a complete package of government legislation which should come before the House some time in the near future.

Mr. Baker: We cannot wait that long.

Mr. Blaker: I might mention to hon. members who are anxious to see this bill go to committee that there are some defects in the bill as currently drafted, and although this does not in any way reflect on the validity of the bill, perhaps the bill should be looked at in terms of the other problems which might arise if the bill were passed with its present wording.

I think I should add the caveat at this point that it is the accepted practice and tradition of this House that backbenchers do not speak for the government nor for any specific minister. While I intend to discuss many aspects of the Canadian Citizenship Act and many recommendations for change, neither the government nor the Secretary of State, who is the minister responsible for the Citizenship Act, should or could be in any way committed by what I might say this afternoon.

Twenty-seven years ago Canada became the first country in the Commonwealth to adopt a separate Citizenship Act which came into force on January 1, 1947. The bill was introduced by the Hon. Paul Martin, then secretary of state. Evidence of the changing concepts of citizenship can be found in the fact that there have been 61 amendments since that day.

There are a number of curiosities on anomalies in the present act, including, for example, the following. The period of residence to qualify for citizenship is shorter for wives than for husbands. This is regarded both as discrimination against and in favour of women, depending on one's point of view. The father is designated as the "responsible parent" in applications for citizenship made on behalf of minors, unless the mother has legal custody or is the de facto guardian. The age of majority differs in the Canadian Elections Act and Citizenship Act, with the result that many persons between 18 and 21 are unable to vote because their non-citizen parents are ineligible to apply for citizenship on their behalf, as they are themselves, until they reach the age of majority specified in the Citizenship Act.

Twenty-seven years ago many people believed that there was a difference in the legal status of men and women and that the age of majority should be 21. Whether they were right or wrong is not at issue; what is important is that now, in 1974, 27 years and 61 amendments later, we should look to a Citizenship Act which reflects the thinking of our times and which will reflect the Canada of the 1970's.

Citizenship amounts to membership in the family called Canada, and it would seem to me that any new legislation would have to begin with the most basic consideration of all: shall we make it relatively easy or shall we make it relatively difficult for our brothers and sisters throughout the whole of humanity to join us in our Canadian family? I should think we would want to do everything possible to enable others to join us and to share in the pursuit of a decent life in a nation which is one of the most fortunate on earth.

It is perhaps we who are born here who too easily forget that the accident of birth has entitled us to one of the most valued and desirable citizenships on earth. But we should remember this when we look to new legislation, that outside our borders stand men, women and children who ask only that they be allowed the opportunity to join us in Canada, to share with us in partnership the enormous resources of Canada and to live with us in respect of one another and under the rule of law.

I hope we shall see legislation which reflects our willingness to encourage citizenship and not to make it difficult in any way. Neither marriage nor lack thereof should affect the rights of the newborn to Canadian citizenship. Children born abroad should not be required to undergo registration, and individuals who persistently live abroad should be able to pass on their citizenship rights generation by generation, provided only that they give evidence at our consular offices of a retained ability to speak either of our two official languages, and thus show an interest in their native homeland.

There should be no distinction in the law, as the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) has quite rightly pointed out, between male and female. All distinctions between men and women which result in one or the other sex being placed at a disadvantage should be removed from the law. The legislation should and will, I hope, be so framed that all citizens, whether male or female, have the same rights under our law.

While the Royal Commission on the Status of Women recommended retroactivity in this regard, I would point out to the House that retroactivity is an extremely difficult concept in law and that often it is impossible to define exactly what may be the effects of such retroactivity. We can and should restore the status to women wherever it may have been previously lost, provided there is no conflict with the private or the public interest. To go beyond that, however, would in all probability involve us in an unending examination of individual cases, making the application of our laws an almost ad hoc situation.

I think that in the Canada of the 1970's, the Citizenship Act should reflect both the law as found in other but relevant pieces of legislation and the changing circumstances in a world of virtually instant communications. If the age of capacity for voting is 18, then surely we must bring harmony to the Citizenship Act and reduce the age of capacity from 21 to 18 as well.

The length of residence is currently five years before application for Canadian citizenship can be made. Perhaps originally the period of five years had merit, but surely we can encourage those who ask to join our family. On this matter the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) has for several years presented private member's bills in an effort to reduce the five year period, and I will leave to him further comment in that regard.

I hope that we will ease the language requirements so that while on the one hand we indicate the desirability of a knowledge of one or the other of the two official languages of Canada, at the same time we provide exemptions in various categories. Then we should encourage those who come here with a limited knowledge or no knowledge of either of our two official languages by providing for them facilities for instruction in the language of their preference.

It is of the essence of citizenship that those who apply must accept the obligations which go with the rights. We should continue to insist that applicants for Canadian citizenship learn and understand our institutions of government and the role of law in our society. At the same time we need to develop systems of instruction and examination which provide the applicant not only with the opportunity to know our structures of society but to make use of education programs which will encourage his interest.

The entire subject of "good character" is a quicksand of shifting meaning and value. Whatever one individual might consider to be a matter of good character in a form that can be useful for the assessment of individual suitability for citizenship, another might consider irrelevant or even an invasion of privacy. The entire notion of good character should, I think, be simply disposed of and dispensed with for applicants who may have been charged with a deportable offence or who may be subject to deportation following conviction for such an offence.

In days gone by, perhaps it was useful to have the posting of an application for citizenship in the office of the clerk of the court for the period of three months before the court considered the application. Posting simply has no meaning in reality today and should be completely eliminated.

We should be done with the business of renunciation of foreign nationality. Nationality law of various countries either applies the principle that a national cannot divest himself of nationality by the act of renunciation without the consent of the state, or that voluntary acquisition of foreign nationality results automatically in loss of citizenship. In the one case, therefore, a declaration of renunciation takes no effect, while in the other case it is superfluous.

We should consider naturalization to be a right, not a privilege. Naturalization, resumption, retention and renunciation should altogether form the right of the applicant, with of course exceptions for special cases. This would prevent arbitrary exercise of executive authority and discrimination unfounded in our laws.

We will need to preserve ministerial discretion for many reasons, but essentially to protect Canada and the Canadian public in special cases which our law may not pursue.

We will want to retain our citizenship court and judge who provide both the image and the substance of the importance of the occasion in terms of its impact on the individual applicant.

I said earlier that I cannot, of course, speak for either the government or the minister responsible in this regard, but I very much hope that parliament will be able to give serious consideration to the manner by which an individual may lose his Canadian citizenship, and that I hope this will be restricted to one case only—the voluntary decision of that individual who seeks citizenship in another jurisdiction.

I hope that both parliament and the people of Canada will recognize the maturing of our nation and do away with the preferential treatment of British subjects. The Canadian Citizenship Act now excuses British subjects from appearance before a court, thus exempting them from any effective examination and creating what is felt by many immigrants of other backgrounds to be an invidious distinction. Although the system of preferential treatment may have had some logic based upon language, similarity of political systems, historical association and the reciprocal benefits, all in the past, all those grounds for preference can be shown today to be equally applicable to many other national groups. In effect, this is a discriminatory process in the Canada of the 1970's. It establishes a class of people based upon national origin rather than upon individual worth. At its worst, it is insulting to those who are of other than British origin and has no foundation either in logic or in moral value. I would go further and point out that it is my belief that there are few applicants for citizenship of British origin who in this day and age would ask for preferential treatment. For them to do so or for us to continue such treatment amounts to moral discrimination which is distasteful and totally unfounded.

At the same time, in terms of the Canadian Citizenship Act we should abandon the expression "British subject status", which is taken for purposes of federal legislation to include Canadian citizens, nationals of the Commonwealth countries and the republic of Eire. British subject status is a term entirely derivative from citizenship and has no independent reality whatsoever. The term is widely misunderstood and often resented or considered inappropriate in an independent country such as ours. The term is virtually meaningless, but because it appears in other federal legislation one may hope that the Citizenship Act will be amended in such a manner as to avoid confusion or conflict with other legislation, but at the same time remove this concept from our law of citizenship.

[Mr. Blaker.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) wishes to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wonder what has happened to the rule of relevance. We have before us a bill which deals with one very narrow point. I believe that the House would like to hear a discussion and perhaps reach a decision on that one narrow point, not on all the aspects of the Citizenship Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaker: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I speak, of course, as a new member in the House but I believe it has been traditional to permit a fairly wide ranging discussion. Secondly, I do suggest that the matters to which I am referring relate to the bill on citizenship and immigration.

Mr. Speaker: I have to agree with the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Perhaps he was prompted to rise on a point of order because at that point I had decided to look at the bill and read the explanatory note. It did appear to me that the hon. member's comments about many aspects of the Citizenship Act did go beyond the principle of the bill before us, and I do not see why there should be a relaxation of the rules during the private members' hour. I think it is the duty of all hon. members, on both sides of the House and in all parties, to try to respect the important rules of debate, and certainly members owe it to the House to be relevant at all times to the subject before us. This is really the basic rule of debate, and I am sure the hon. member will want to heed the point of order raised by the hon. member will want to heed the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, with which I agree. The proposal in the bill before us, Bill C-110, is very narrow in scope, and the hon. member should restrict his comments to the principle and the essence of that bill.

● (1630)

Mr. Blaker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would be pleased to accept your direction, and since I will be finished in 30 seconds I hope I will not transgress again. To complete the thought, if we are going to swear allegiance to the Queen, then let us amend the act so that we swear allegiance to the Queen of Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I had hoped that the hon. member would now relate his comments to some clause of the bill, but it seems to me he is just continuing what he was saying before. If he can satisfy the Chair that what he is saying now relates to the bill, certainly he has every right to complete his speech.

Mr. Blaker: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. I simply want to leave the thought that the bill presented by the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway reflects but one element of many in our Canadian Citizenship Act which should be subject to scrutiny and to change. We have much to do to bring our citizenship laws to the point where they reflect not only our involvement in the world around us, but also set down the manner in which we invite others to become members of our own Canadian family. With great respect to the intent of the bill presented by the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway, I would suggest, in view of the many other points of the legislation which might be considered for amendment, that the bill not proceed today.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I will not occupy too many minutes in the House this afternoon, but I have stood on a number of other occasions for this principle of equal rights for women before the law. I have done so on the matter of pensions and I do so again here.

I do also having had some experience with the administration of this particular act from the very day of its inception. It is a difficult act to administer, particularly abroad. I agree fully with the intent of the amendment put before us in Bill C-110. I have a suggestion to make in order to avoid another discriminatory use which is forced upon us, I suppose, because of the nature of the English language. At any rate, it does not appear quite the same in French, hopefully because of the nature of the French language. I would say that instead of saying "his father" or "his mother", the Act should say "the father" or "the mother" of the child at the time of its birth.

There is one other matter in this bill which I think we should not lose sight of. The hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) did mention the extraordinary anomaly that was created by the fact that if one of the parents, actually the citizen-giving parent under the present Canadian law, happened to be a stateless person, he therefore transferred statelessness upon the child. This is, of course, completely unacceptable to any human being.

The other thing we must remember is that in the suggested proposal put forward here we run the risk of conferring dual nationality upon the child because the father and the mother might, under separate laws relating to the country of their own nationality, each confer a nationality upon the child. I suggest, therefore, that there might be a further amendment toward the end of that particular clause, or in the clause relating to the statement or declaration that must be made by the child under the Canadian law in deciding which nationality he shall choose, if by any chance he should be a dual national, either at the age of 21 or 18, as suggested by the previous speaker.

Some provision ought to be made under the law that the child should as a matter of right be informed by the government of Canada that he should make his declaration, and should be informed at least a year prior to the date when he must make that decision. Children and parents too, it has been my experience, often forget this requirement. Having registered their child at the consolate they think as a matter of course he is going to be a Canadian, but in the case of a dual national it is necessary for him to decide whether he is to be Canadian or some other nationality. Therefore I think we must try, in addition to the suggestions made here, and in the context of this particular amendment, to make provision for that child to be notified prior to the date that he must declare his intention to renounce one of his citizenships.

Mrs. Albanie Morin (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take part in this debate on Bill C-110 today. I want first of all to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) for having introduced this bill. I want that hon. member to know that even if her bill were not to reach the committee stage it will have nevertheless permitted certain members of this House to bring once more out into the open the fact that discrimination against women does exist in many of our Canadian laws, and that it is time this should be corrected.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, after reading sections 4 to 15 of the Citizenship Act one has the clear impression that the act gives a child born out of wedlock outside Canada to a Canadian mother the possibility to become a Canadian citizen but that same act denies a child born to a wed mother marrying a foreigner the same privileges as those extended to an illegitimate child.

Mr. Speaker, let me read, from that section which had me puzzled:

> A person born after the 31st day of December ... if he is born in Canada is a Canadian citizen, or if he is born outside of Canada, and
> (i) his father, or in the case of a child born out of wedlock, his mother, at the time of that person's birth, is a Canadian citizen, ...

So, as I said before, if a Canadian marrying a foreigner gives birth to a child abroad and if the marriage fails afterwards and she wants to come back to this country the child is not a Canadian citizen.

On the other hand, section 5(2) states that:

A child born to a Canadian father or a Canadian mother and an unknown father has three years after his 21st birthday to decide whether he wants to retain his citizenship or give it up. He has a choice. But, as I already said, if a child is born to a Canadian mother marrying a foreigner who afterwards leaves her husband, if that child wants to become a Canadian citizen, it is absolutely impossible. On the other hand, section 6 states that on his 21st birthday such a child may file a petition for resumption of Canadian citizenship, and the minister has the necessary discretion to either approve or reject that petition.

Once again, that privilege exists for a child born to a Canadian father and a child born out of wedlock. After reading that act one has the impression that it favours birth out of wedlock for those living abroad, and that does not make sense. Section 7 states:

> Every foundling, who is or was first found as a deserted infant in Canada, ...

—is considered a Canadian citizen. I have nothing against it. On the contrary, it is quite commendable but that foundling who has the Canadian citizenship ipso facto can be the child of foreigners only visiting in Canada, the child of parents who would not have the status of British subject, but having been found in Canada he becomes a Canadian citizen. On the other hand, if a Canadian woman living abroad, separated from her husband but with two children, wishes to return to her country, her children do not have Canadian citizenship. What nonsense!

I wondered if my interpretation of the legislation was wrong and thought that the minister surely had the discretion to grant citizenship to children such as the abovementioned. I referred first to the clauses dealing with the minister's discretion and then to section 10. And I said to myself: Now, the minister can, at his discretion, grant a citizenship certificate to anyone who is not a Canadian citizen and makes an application after 21 years of age. I said: Fair enough. But what about the spouse of a Canadian citizen residing in Canada? It is still impossible for the child of such a union to become a Canadian citizen. What about the person who has been residing in Canada for at least 12 to 18 months immediately preceding the application date? How is it possible to enforce the law? No clause applies to such cases.

Section 10(4) reads and I quote:

The Minister may, in his discretion, grant a certificate of citizenship . . .

Paragraph (c) states—

. . . a British subject who was born elsewhere than in Canada or on a Canadian ship, whose father, or in the case of a person born out of wedlock . . .

Once more, if a woman marries a foreigner who has children and whose marriage is afterwards dissolved, or who is simply legally separated, her children are not yet recognized as Canadian citizens.

In all the sections dealing with the minister's discretion, none provides for the case I just mentioned.

Again, I hope I am mistaken, because if the legislators have really dreamed up such legislation, it would be about time to amend it. Now, Mr. Speaker, far from objecting to the bill of the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), I am totally in favour of it, even of her amendment.

● (1640)

[English]

I repeat in English, I am totally in favour of such an amendment. However, I am told that the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) will be introducing legislation to amend this act so that, among many things, men and women will be given equal status in this country.

In addition to this, an onmibus bill on the status of women will be placed before the House in the near future, a bill which will remove from a number of other acts provisions which are presently prejudicial to women.

[Translation]

We know that this legislation is not the only one which is discriminating against women. It is strangely similar to section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act. An Indian man, whether he has 25 or 50 per cent Indian blood, can marry, for instance, a cabaret dancer from Texas with four or five kids who become ipso facto full-fledged Indians. But an Indian woman who marries a white man and who is separated from her husband, through judicial separation or through divorce, cannot go back to the Indian reserve, even if she is 100 per cent Indian. What's more, she cannot be buried in her ancestors' cemetery. Here is another piece of legislation discriminating very much against women. Fortunately, an onmibus bill on the status of women will be brought in soon.

[English]

Fortunate indeed are the women of Canada that Canadian legislators are, like St. Paul on the road to Damascus, finally beginning "to see the light."

[Mrs. Morin.]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, like the other members, of course, I have read with great interest the bill introduced by the member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis).

Surely, if we recognize that all Canadian citizens are equal before the law and entitled to an equal treatment, it goes without saying that the hon. member's bill should become part of the Canadian statutes. The Canadian Citizenship Act should be amended.

Earlier, Mr. Speaker, you reminded my colleague from Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker), in all fairness, that he was perhaps getting away from the matter before us, but on second thought, I must say that if the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway seeks amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act, we must surely be given some leeway. On the subject of amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act, one could say that this legislation is unfair in many ways.

That was what my colleague meant when he said, in agreement with the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway, that we should amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

A great many other sections of the Canadian Citizenship Act should have been amended long ago. It is in this vein that my colleague spoke at the outset of his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I must admit that we see a great many cases of injustice in Canada. At least for the time being, the Women's Lib movement appears to me to be going astray. Nevertheless, I think I can say in another are a "equal pay for equal work". I may be out of order, but this example merely goes to prove that there is injustice everywhere. Moreover, the hon. member is perfectly aware that if a woman can do the job of a man, she should normally get the same pay; if a man can make a Canadian citizen of his child, I do not see why a woman could not.

I can think of all kinds of other amendments, not to break the rules but to show that the Citizenship Act should be amended, but not bit by bit. I shall refer to a bill that I already introduced. I think that my memory serves me right because I have here the papers for December 18, 1970, March 2, 1972, June 1973, and March 12, 1974, when I asked that the time limit for obtaining Canadian citizenship be reduced from five to three years. This was an amendment to the Canadian Citizenship Act, and I shall not dwell on the matter because it will eventually be discussed in the House.

The hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) will agree that it is not bit by bit that we should obtain this from the government—because I am not one of its members; I sit on the government side, but I am not a cabinet member—but that we should stop the debate before five o'clock and refer this bill to the committee and amend the Canadian Citizenship Act. In my opinion, this is not what we want to do in the House. I am not interested in taking everything the government offers, because I know what we could obtain, and in accepting the scraps it gives us to soothe us. For my part, I have been asking for something for four years, and it is time a decision were made.

The hon. member is proposing an amendment to a section of the act, namely section 5(1)(b)(i), and the government is saying: these amendments have been proposed for so many years that we shall give in. Since there are several amendments proposed to the Canadian Citizenship Act, as the hon. member knows from the list of private members' bills, we can see that there is considerable interest in amending the Canadian Citizenship Act.

I know my hon. colleague in the official opposition does not agree that we should take steps to make all citizens equal before the law.

I am a Canadian of French extraction and I do not seek greater rights than those of English Canadians, but I would not accept that English-speaking Canadians should have rights I would be deprived of. I think that we are all equal before the law and we should all be considered as such. That is why even though I do not want to scare anybody nor start a futile argument, I wonder about restrictions applicable to citizens who are said to be British. I do not see why those people should be treated any differently from Ukrainian, Polish, Italian, Greek, French or English Canadians. I think that if all citizens are to be equal before the law... I do not wish to start a useless argument with people more aware of the status fo British citizenship. Besides, I would be ready to uphold that opinion before any group in Canada, whether it be the Royalist League of Canada or any other movement. If we believe that all citizens are equal before the law, it is only normal for all of us to be treated equally.

I agree, of course, with the bill introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), except that I am wondering about the legislator's intention.

I cannot understand how legislators well briefed by the Department of Justice's legal advisors could include in the Canadian citizenship Act such an amendment or such a limitation.

I am therefore wondering what was the legislator's intention. Did he want to avoid something? I did not get any answer. The Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) will eventually introduce a bill. I therefore urge the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, all my colleagues who are interested in the Canadian Citizenship Act, members from the official opposition, members from the Social Credit party of Canada to get together so as to wrench out of the government of the House leader a piece of legislation that has been drafted for many years. I do not wish to divulge secrets I came to know as parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State, but I know that a piece of legislation has been in the making for many years. I know that legislation is now ready. What remains to be done now is to find in the House the right moment to table a bill that will not only meet with the wishes of the very distinguished member for Vancouver Kingsway, but that will also provide Canada with a modern statute in keeping with our time without rejecting what has been done in the past.

In the past, citizens of a different racial origin were treated differently. It was the Canadian history of the past. I see that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) is looking straight at me. Maybe there was some reason then, historical reasons, to treat citizens differently, but like all the others, he might perhaps join the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway in order that finally we might have a modern act, truly Canadian rather than French Canadian, English Canadian, multiculturally Canadian or Ukrainian. This would be an act respecting modern Canadian citizenship whereby everyone would receive equal treatment. No special treatment would be afforded a married citizen without his wife getting the same treatment whether she is abroad or from any ethnic group or what have you.

I regret that my time is up, but I would not want to be the last member in this House to speak on the matter. I know that in this respect I will wholeheartedly co-operate with the very distinguished member for Vancouver Kingsway in order that together we may extract from the government, because I feel there will be ample time for that until the end of the session and next fall, that we may get under this government a modern act on Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in participating in this debate and I strongly support the remarks of the previous speaker. I think that if the bill is studied and debated seriously, the question raised in particular by the honourable member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), i.e. that of multinationality, must be examined deeply.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks on this matter.

There are many people who, due to legal conflicts in this regard have several nationalities. As you will remember, Mr. Speaker, the honourable member for Esquimalt-Saanich mentioned the fact that a person might happen to hold two or more nationalities. And I am thinking particularly about American or Israelite parents, for instance, who could be in Canada and whose child could have three nationalities, Americain, Israelite and Canadian.

Most countries do not tolerate such an arrangement and multi-nationality is not recognized, but here in Canada, the existing legislation seems to have been written for this purpose, i.e. we recognize the right to Canadian nationality of the person born in Canada and, in certain cases, of persons whose father or son is Canadian.

I agree entirely with the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) when she proposes a very important amendment to the present act which would entitle to citizenship any child born in whatever way from a Canadian father or mother. I would like this debate to be quick and that the government deems it convenient to propose a complete bill which would give us the chance to discuss all the problems involved in this question which is obviously quite important.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the hour appointed for private members' business is now over. The House will stand adjourned until Monday at two o'clock.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

GREY CUP TRUST AND AMATEUR SPORT

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

April 25, 1974—Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond)—Bill intituled: "An Act to maintain the Grey Cup Trust and further to promote fitness and amateur sport in Canada".

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated to the hon. member the other day, the Chair has some procedural reservations in relation to this bill. In the days ahead I should like the opportunity to have a closer look at the bill, perhaps have a conversation with the hon. member, and certainly give the hon. member eventually an opportunity to advise the Chair.

I think the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond will appreciate the difficulty with which I am confronted. The hon. member's bill is on the subject of a government bill which was presented to the House and has already received second reading. In a way, the hon. member is attempting to amend a bill to which second reading has already been given. Normally, an amendment to a bill which is before the House would be proposed by way of an amendment in committee or perhaps at the report stage or even on third reading, if that were possible. These are the difficulties with which the Chair is confronted. But I do not think the matter should be treated too lightly and I thought I should make these comments so that the hon. member would realize the area of the procedural difficulties and be able to give the matter consideration in the days ahead so that eventually we might hear argument and then reach a decision on whether the bill should be proceeded with. For the time being the notice will stand.

3. $1,206,501.16.

OVERTIME PAID TO MINISTERIAL STAFF

Question No. 386—Mr. Knight:

1. What were the names of employees on the ministerial staff (including the Office of the Prime Minister) who in the fiscal year 1972-73, received overtime pay in excess of $1,000?

2. What were the amounts of overtime paid each month in each case and what were the salary ranges of each of these employees?

Return tabled.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to refer to question No. 626 which today has been on the order paper for one month.

1. What is the total amount expended to date or contracted for on the program entitled "Multi-Culturalism is sharing your heritage with other Canadians" . . .

2. What amount has been expended in the ethnic press to date?

It should not be difficult to answer those questions unless the department is either dormant or endeavouring to cover up.

Mr. Haidasz: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the department is not dormant; we are very active. Replies have been prepared and will be tabled on Wednesday next.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why another week's delay?

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order referring to unanswered order paper question No. 50 which dates back far into the last session of the House. The question asks for details of trips made at public expense by the Prime Minister since October 30, 1972, including the means of transportation, the amounts paid from public funds for expenditures involved and also on what occasions the itinerary included addressing or appearing at functions of the Liberal Party. Surely there can be no valid reason why the government has not answered this legitimate question up until this date. I ask the parliamentary secretary if he is now in a position to tell the House when this question will be answered and when the Canadian people will thus be made aware of the amount of public funds being used for these trips in a way which resembles a form of embezzlement of public funds for political purposes.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I have on the order paper a couple of questions. One of them, No. 552, has been on the order paper for five weeks. It is not of your one and a half million dollar questions. It is in monosyllabic terms which even the parliamentary secretary ought to be able to comprehend and asks very simple questions that could be answered by picking up a device known as a telephone and communicating with me. Many of my constituents are affected by the answer which may or may not be forthcoming to this question. I am continuing to receive correspondence from these people who are concerned about the so-called personal history security form and the implications it may have for their futures in the Public Service. I suggest that the government does not need to clam up about this. It could have given the answer a long time ago.

LAG IN INCREASE IN WEEKLY WAGES COMPARED WITH INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Finance and bring home to him once again the deplorable situation of the average Canadian wage earner in that, although the average wage has increased by 8 per cent or $12.53 from February, 1973, to February, 1974, the consumer price index has risen by 9.6 per cent or $15.02, or a difference of $3.51. What is the minister's response to these recent indices indicating that average weekly wages continue to lag behind the rising cost of living? What response does the government have to deal with this situation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to express my continuing concern about the situation the hon. gentleman has described in terms of the real income of Canadian workers. The response I might make might be more fully digested within the budget speech a week from today. I want to bring to the hon. member's attention that many of the yardsticks used in the statistical form purportedly showing a decrease in labour income do, in a sense, distort the situation in that they do not allow for the changed mix in the labour force, for the increase in hourly as against weekly wages, and for the decline in the average work week. This is a statistical matter which I should like to deal with in more general terms on another occasion.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the minister's concern will not help those who have been adversely affected by the failure of the government's anti-inflation policy. In view of the minister's repeated claim that Canadians are some 6.8 per cent better off now than they were a year ago, has he asked companies such as the Steel Company of Canada, Westinghouse and Dofasco, which have advanced cost of living adjustments in their labour contracts, why they have taken this action if everything is as fine as the minister continually states? Has he asked those companies why they have taken that action?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not.

Mr. Alexander: Will the minister now acknowledge that during the period of time since his last budget the percentage increase in average weekly wages has in fact been less than the percentage increase in the consumer price index, or does the government not acknowledge truth based on its own published statistics?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I refer the hon. member to the latest figures representing real disposable income of Canadians, that is to say, the income the average man or woman has to spend or to save or has in his or her pocket to dispose of by way of discretionary income. That shows that in real terms Canadian's incomes have increased by one-fifth over the past three years.

CRUDE OIL—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE EXPORTS WILL NOT BE INCREASED AND WILL BE REDUCED IF REQUIRED TO MEET CANADIAN DEMAND

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of representations by the Independent Petroleum Producers Association to the National Energy Board urging that there be no further reductions in exports of crude oil and, in fact, that they should be increased. In view of the fact the final determination of exports of crude oil lies with the federal government on the recommendation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, can the Prime Minister assure the House this recommendation will not be accepted, that there will be no increase in exports of oil and that we will continue to reduce exports of oil where Canadian requirements make that desirable?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to look fully at the representations and discuss them with the minister before answering that question in the House.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact the government has committed itself to meeting the petroleum requirements of eastern Canada from western crude and that we may be in a deficit position by 1980, will the Prime Minister inform the House whether the government is planning a phase-out of exports of oil and, if so, over what period of time?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we have been looking at such projections. When a policy has to be announced in that regard we will do so, probably in the House of Commons.

OIL—USE OF SURPLUS FUNDS FROM EXPORT TAX TO DEVELOP FUTURE SUPPLIES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since the known financial commitments for compensation on imports are now known to be in the neighbourhood of $925 million, assuming there are no participation costs, which could leave a surplus of some $500 million, can the Prime Minister assure the House that these additional funds will be used in the oil producing provinces to develop future oil supplies, particularly in the oil sands and heavy oil areas?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this subject was, of course, very much discussed at the meeting of the premiers and myself in March. We have in mind the earlier projections that the hon. member himself mentioned in his previous question. For that reason and for many others, including uncertainty as to the figures he has just quoted, we have reached an agreement with all ten provinces which has been made public, the effect of which is that the federal government keeps for itself the export tax to be used largely, perhaps even totally this year—we do not know—for the attainment of one price for oil for all Canada. If there is any surplus, we will make sure it is used in the best interest of all Canadians. It is certain some of that will be used in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

SALE OF MONTREAL ALOUETTES FOOTBALL CLUB—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the fact that the sale of the Montreal Alouettes football team has just been announced and that its disappearance would destroy, in part, the principle of the bill studied last week, can the minister tell us whether he had been advised by the authorities of that member of the NFL of their intentions, and tell us what his attitude is towards this incident?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my answer to the part first of the question is no; as for the second part, transactions of that type are constantly occurring in the world of sport as well as in that of business, and I fail to see how this incident will change anything.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the minister has not understood my question's second preamble. The withdrawal of that football team would suppress one of the bill's fundamental principles, which is to promote Canadian unity. If we were to do as he says, there would not be any team further east than Toronto.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I have answered the hon. member's two questions. If I were to answer his preambles too, all I could say about them is that his preamble in this case does not make any sense.

POSSIBLE EXPORT OF OIL BY PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—SUGGESTED AGREEMENT TO HELP CHINA PAY FOR CANADIAN WHEAT

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is a supplementary addressed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the People's Republic of China is now considering exporting oil, has the government considered arranging a long-term agreement with China to help the Chinese pay for Canadian wheat?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I did discuss this matter personally with Mao Tse-tung in Peking. They are not at this time anxious to talk about such an agreement. They hope they have a great potential but their actual production is substantially below even Canadian production. They already have some agreements with the Japanese government regarding exports to that country. The suggestion of the hon. member is one, I repeat, that we talked about, but I am afraid it would not have any immediate application. It is something we shall have to keep in mind if, as and when additional petroleum is discovered in the People's Republic of China. Of course, I did not fail to point out to them the excellence of our engineering capacity in looking for offshore oil—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps I should wait for the supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In view of the fact the Chinese have just announced an agreement to purchase from the Americans highly technical equipment for offshore drilling and for deeper drilling in their present fields on the mainland, will the government not give priority to this matter, consider re-establishing contact with the People's Republic and see whether we can gain access to some of their oil and thus make their purchases of Canadian wheat a bit easier?

Mr. Trudeau: It is difficult to see how it would make the purchase of wheat easier if we were to sell them other things apart from wheat. If the hon. member is concerned about the long-term implications of the question, may I say I made it clear to the Chinese leaders that we are prepared to co-operate with them. May I remind the House that there is no need for us to re-establish contact with the Peking government. We have a good contact with it, much better than the Americans.

POSSIBILITY OF RESTRICTION OR PROHIBITION OF TELEVISING IN CANADA OF WORLD FOOTBALL LEAGUE AND NATIONAL FOOTBALL LEAGUE GAMES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister related to the question put to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the government's interest in the Canadian Football League, is it the intention to restrict or prohibit the televising of World Football League games in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would have to refer this matter to the minister responsible for either the CBC or communications.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Passing the ball.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, if I can throw it forward.

● (1430)

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, if the quarterback could get together with some of his boys in the scrum and decide just who is carrying the ball over there, perhaps he could direct this question to the appropriate minister who is looking after this matter. In order to be consistent with Bill C-22, is the government also contemplating any legislation to restrict or prohibit the televising of National Football League games in Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this matter having been sent to the committee, I hope this type of amendment will be proposed by the hon. member and that he will be able to stand up for his views at that time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the right hon. member for Prince Albert and then the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

ISSUE OF PUBLICATION IMPLYING THAT NAME OF CAPITAL IS "OTTAWA-HULL"

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the first time I have directed a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I should like to ask him to begin with whether he personally saw the publication put out by his department entitled "Canada's New Capital"? After he answers that, I will have some supplementary questions.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I answered that the other day and the answer was no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this document put out by his department is one that contains a mass of incomprehensible falsehoods and constitutional evasion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister, since when did Ottawa-Hull become the capital of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that question was asked on a number of occasions last week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there are many more questions arising out of this that must be answered for the benefit of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have no objection, of course, to the right hon. gentleman asking a supplementary question, but the particular question just asked by the right hon. gentleman was asked in those very terms at least once last week. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman has a supplementary question to which the minister might want to reply.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I could not believe that the minister understood what he was talking about when he made the answers he did and that is the reason for the further questions. Does he accept the views contained therein, which are as follows:

Ottawa is the Capital of Canada. Right? Wrong.

A little farther on it states:

To begin with, it's not just Ottawa any more. It's the National Capital Region. Think of Ottawa and neighboring Hull as a central core and seat of government—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has one supporter.

I ask the minister this question. Since when did this government assume the right to depart from the constitution? The British North America Act, section 16, deals with this.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I know that hon. gentlemen opposite are used to citing the Canada Year Book as a constitutional authority, but this is the first time the right hon. gentleman has referred to a 50-cent brochure as a legal or constitutional document.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Basford: The seat of government is set out in a section of the British North America Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: To be sure.

Mr. Basford: However, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and the premiers of this country unanimously agreed at a federal-provincial meeting relating to reform of institutions linked with federalism that the cities of Ottawa and Hull and their surrounding areas shall be the Canada capital area.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Canada capital area, yes.

Mr. Basford: There is no conflict between the British North America Act and the resolution by the 11 heads of government of this country or the National Capital Commission.

Mr. Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): There is in that brochure.

Mr. Basford: Nowhere have I seen a 50-cent brochure referred to as a constitutional document. However, this document, written in a light and lively style—

An hon. Member: And loose.

Mr. Basford: —does serve to show the immense amount of effort and work which have gone into making the cities of Ottawa and Hull and all the surrounding area a national capital area, a section of this country that I think all members of the House should be able to take pride in.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I did not refer to it as a constitutional document, I referred to it as an unconstitutional one. I would ask the minister this question. Does he accept the views contained therein, which are the antithesis of those he is trying to put over at the moment, of Ottawa-Hull being the central core and seat of government? Does he accept that? When was the amendment to the British North America Act brought in?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: They have never even heard of the constitution.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we might allow the minister to reply, but we should try to move on to the next question. The minister may reply.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, normally I accept answers from ministers, but when they are false, such as the one that has just been given, I do not accept them.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the right hon. gentleman rising on a point of order?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Over and over again hon. members opposite howl down members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Or try to.

Mr. Muir: Same old bunch.

Mr. Sharp: Same old Dief.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The people of Canada have the right to have the constitution maintained despite the fact we have a government that has done everything to destroy the great principles of that constitution and to evade it. In view of the fallacy of this monstrosity, will the minister have it withdrawn and, indeed, have the individuals responsible for publishing it pay the actual publication account?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might want to speak to the question of privilege and also answer the supplementary question, after which I will try again to move on to the next question if we are going to have more than two or three questions during the question period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are doing everything to destroy the whole constitution.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what the point of privilege is, and I am not sure whether you are having the same difficulty, but I have referred to the fact that this document, of course, is not a constitutional document.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, it is a falsehood.

Mr. Basford: It does not change anything relating to the constitution of this country or the institutions of federalism. I have said that the wording was unfortunate, and I meant that—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The wording is unfortunate; then withdraw it.

Mr. Basford: —only in the sense that it was wording that would have the effect we have just seen on the right hon. gentleman and a few of his colleagues.

An hon. Member: And the people of Canada, too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that we cannot resolve the matter at this time. I refer hon. members to the exchanges that took place last week when similar questions were asked and similar answers were given. At this point the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

HOUSING

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO ASSIST AVERAGE AND LOW INCOME PEOPLE TO PURCHASE HOMES IN LIGHT OF FURTHER INCREASE IN COST

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have what I think is my fiftieth question of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Following the revelation that the cost of an average home in the Toronto area went up by another $3,000 last month, is the minister going to introduce a measure in the House soon that will have the effect of modifying the assisted home ownership program or providing an entirely new program in order that average and low income people in urban areas in Canada will once again be in a position to buy a house they can afford?

● (1440)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform the hon. member that for 1974 we have doubled the budget of the assisted home ownership program to $300 million, and I would anticipate that this expenditure will allow us to respond more effectively to the concerns the hon. member has expressed.

Mr. Broadbent: As the minister's answer in no way affects the possibility of average or low income people using the program to which he referred in urban areas, I would like to ask the minister more specifically whether he plans to copy the Americans who have an interest rate program which begins at one per cent with a ceiling of eight per cent for average and low income people who want to buy a house? They have mandatory regulations to ensure that financial institutions put up money at this interest rate. Would the minister consider consulting his American colleagues to see what might be done?

Mr. Basford: I am always happy to consult them but I hope the hon. member is not urging that we import the American housing situation into Canada because it is far inferior to that in this country.

[Mr. Basford.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSITION OF GOVERNMENT ON WAGE EARNERS' SHARE OF NATIONAL INCOME

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the recent wage negotiations that have been going on in the Public Service and in the private sector, is it the view of the government that wage earners are taking too great a share of the national income? Would the Prime Minister clarify the position of his government in this regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I stated exactly the contrary in my speech in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. Perhaps I could send the hon. member a copy of that speech.

Mr. MacKay: May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether it is his view that, having regard to the present conditions of rampant inflation, the average wage earner in Canada is in a position to protect himself adequately in this environment which the government has created?

Mr. Trudeau: He can adequately protect himself with the measures of various kinds which we have brought in. The answer is, of course, that inflation is still a problem for many people in Canada and that is why we intend to keep the House around for many months yet in order to pass legislation which will alleviate the situation.

POSSIBILITY OF DECLARATION OF EMERGENCY UNDER PROSPECTIVE LEGISLATION BECAUSE OF COMMODITY PRICES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of what the Prime Minister has just said, has the government in contemplation the declaration of an emergency when this legislation is passed regarding any commodities to be made the subject of immediate action because of the very high prices they have reached? Has the government any such commodities in contemplation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I am glad that my hon. friend has confirmed the necessity and utility of this parliament continuing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Has the minister any idea if there are commodities to which this bill should apply upon declaration of an emergency and, if so, would he please indicate to the House if it is the intention to so declare?

Mr. Gray: It would be hypothetical for me to talk about these things in the way my hon. friend has invited me to until the bill receives the approval of parliament.

POSITION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING AMOUNT OF RETURN TO GRAIN FARMERS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In light of recent statements made by the minister that grain farmers are receiving a little too much for their product, and noting that on April 25 the minister stated, "I believe that no one would be getting an unwarranted mark-up on the grain", can the minister tell us which statement is government policy?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member to get a replay of the program if he did not see it because in the press there is a slight misinterpretation of what I said. It is not reported word for word. I said that for what the grain farmers in Canada have contributed to this nation and the world they were not getting too much.

Mr. Towers: Inasmuch as farmers' input costs have risen by 19.5 per cent in the first quarter of this year, according to Statistics Canada, and some other input costs have risen by over 200 per cent in the last nine months, will grain producers be asked to subsidize the two-price system for feed grain to which the minister has referred?

Mr. Whelan: Again the hon. member is reading from the report in the Globe and Mail. He would have to see the complete text of the tape so as to be accurate. There are costs to which farmers have been subjected that have risen by 200 per cent in some instances, and more. The Globe and Mail report does an injustice; it is inflammatory and it is wrong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Red Deer for a third question, but I think we have reached the point where I have to seek the co-operation of hon. members to limit the number of supplementaries.

Mr. Towers: I am just wondering if the Minister of Agriculture is suggesting it is a fact that the Globe and Mail does not print the truth.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley.

ISSUE OF PUBLICATION IMPLYING THAT NAME OF CAPITAL IS "OTTAWA-HULL"

Mr. Norval Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary and is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Can he explain his complete reversal of his position from last week with regard to the pamphlet, "Canada's New Capital"? He said then that the wording in it was unfortunate and not representative of the policy of the government. Today, however, he seems to have changed his view. Perhaps the cabinet has met in the meantime and a lot of ambitious backbenchers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SCIENCE

ALLEGED DENIAL TO PUBLIC OF ACCESS TO TELESCOPE AT OBSERVATORY AT EXPERIMENTAL FARM

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, this question should really be directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources but in his absence I will direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister. It has to do with the telescope at what used to be called the Dominion Observatory at the experimental farm, and for all I know may now be called Stars Canada. Why has the government decided to deny further access to this telescope by the general public, including as many as 10,000 students each year, by packing it up and getting rid of it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, calling it Stars Canada shows the little regard that the hon. member has for bilingualism in this country. As to the rest of the question, I am afraid I must refer it to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who is addressing the Canadian Manufacturers Association in Montreal today, but his parliamentary secretary will be glad to refer this interesting question to him.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would be very happy to refer to the aforementioned installation as Étoiles Canada if it will please the right hon. gentleman.

FERTILIZER PRICES—POSSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSIST FARMERS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact the minister first assured the House that there would be no increase in the price of fertilizer and later modified this by saying that there might be a modest increase in the price because of increases in the cost of labour and materials, can the minister now say whether or not the tremendous increase that has been experienced by farmers will be allowed by the government, or will the government subsidize the producers or take some action to modify the prices that producers are being asked to pay?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the record speaks for itself with regard to what I said about the price of fertilizer. I am sure the hon. member would not want to give that impression to the House no matter what the fertilizer companies have told me before the energy crisis took place when they estimated what their costs would be, before rock phosphate went up four times and before shipping charges were more than doubled in many instances for the products they import. All these factors have been taken into consideration and we are studying the costs, but I can say that the manufacturers are not very far from what they had told us, so far as I know. At present the cost of fertilizer in Canada in some instances is only about 50 per cent of what it is across the border to United States farmers with whom we compete at all times.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary on behalf of the producers. Does the government condone the present prices that are being asked of the producers by the fertilizer companies? If it does not, is it going to take any action to subsidize the producers, or has it any other policy to alleviate these tremendous increases in costs?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the proposed new legislation to be presented to the House would give us power if we find undue and unwarranted profiteering in the fertilizer industry. So far we have not had that evidence presented to us, and if the hon. member has such evidence I wish he would send it to us.

HEALTH

INCIDENCE OF SILICOSIS AMONG URANIUM WORKERS—CONSULTATION WITH ONTARIO GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS ON WORKING CONDITIONS AND SAFETY STANDARDS

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. While I understand there is some hope that the strike at Denison Mines may be ending, for which I am happy, the health question still remains. In view of the federal government's responsibility regarding uranium production and sales and in light of recent reports in the press concerning the high incidence of disability awards to miners suffering from silicosis at the Denison Mines operations at Elliott Lake, can the minister inform the House whether consultations have taken place with authorities of the Ontario government regarding working conditions and enforcement of safety standards in the Denison Mines operations?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have had very useful meetings with representatives of the workers in the mines. As the hon. member knows, inspection is the responsibility of the provincial government at the present time, but subsequent to these meetings we have reviewed the situation and we are in touch with the provincial authorities to make sure that these workers get full protection.

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): I thank the minister for his answer, but in view of the fact there is a tremendous conflict between the opinions of the provincial government and those of the miners and their union, can he tell the House whether or not his department has conducted any investigation of its own to determine whether the allegations of the workers at Denison Mines that they are working under hazardous conditions, with higher than normal pollution, are factual or not?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the information I have is that experts from my department stand ready to conduct inspections upon request of the provincial government. There has been no direct survey or examination done by the experts in my department independently of those already undertaken, but this matter is being re-examined at the present time.

ONTARIO HOG PRODUCTION—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO NATIONAL STABILIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact Ontario hog producers find themselves at a definite economic disadvantage compared with producers in other provinces which have instituted stabilization programs, can the minister tell us now where are the improved national stabilization program amendments which were promised to the provinces several months ago?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member can assist the Minister of Agriculture, they will probably be passed in a few weeks time by the House of Commons. I hope they will be introduced later this week. I can also say that there is nothing to stop the province of Ontario from initiating a plan if it wants to like Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia have.

Mr. Frank: I think the minister knows what is stopping Ontario.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Frank: You will find out. In what light should Canadian hog producers consider the fact that as early as last fall the Prime Minister summoned to Ottawa provincial ministers of agriculture in regard to a national hog stabilization program, that there have been two subsequent meetings of top level government agricultural officials on the same subject, and still no program has been announced? What are they to think about that?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will agree that a question asked in such terms is argument. He asks what people are going to think about certain things. A question asked in those terms is hardly in order. The hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Whelan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is so important to the livelihood of so many farmers who are producing food that we want not only for ourselves but for the world that the impression should not be gotten across that I promised stabilization immediately to these people. The provinces knew they had to put in temporary programs.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Bellechasse.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME FOR PERSONS BETWEEN 60 AND 65

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

As it seems that the House wants Canadians to have a system of guaranteed annual income and that this is also the desire of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, can he tell the House if he will table, during this session, a bill intended to guarantee a minimum income to persons aged 60 to 65?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have said many times and I repeat again that the government has undertaken the establishment of a system of guaranteed annual income for all persons unable to work, or judged as such, at any age, and this still remains a firm and established policy of this government. As to when such a bill will be introduced, this remains a matter for the government House leader and will be decided in due time by the government after consultation with the provinces.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Considering the seriousness of the situation where people are unable to find work, especially people aged 60 to 65, does the minister think that a bill should be tabled, as soon as possible, to help alleviate the problem of these people?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, any legislation aimed at reducing poverty in this country has high priority with this government.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is he prepared to table the budget of the Cape Breton Development Corporation for the year 1974?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I arrived in the House just a few minutes ago and the question which was directed to the House leader during my absence was brought to my attention. I am not sure what he discovered over that period. As far as I know there is no impediment, but I will be glad to find out.

HEALTH

INCREASED ASSISTANCE FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH TO END BRAIN DRAIN

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In order to end the brain drain among Canadian medical scientists and ensure that important medical research projects in Canada are not brought to a halt, does the minister intend to increase subsidies to Canadian medical research by tabling as soon as possible supplementary estimates in this House?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, witnesses appeared before the Health, Welfare and Social Affairs Committee of this House, and I see nothing that warrants the argument on which the hon. member's question is based. We have evidence to the contrary. As regards moneys for medical research in Canada, I have already indicated that inasmuch as funds can be made available, we will allocate them to research. As I indicated to the committee, this is something that cannot be done instantly.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATION BY FOOD PROCESSORS THAT PRICE INCREASES NECESSARY IF PROFIT TO BE REALIZED THIS YEAR

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It concerns the brief submitted to the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board by the Canadian Food Processors Association last Tuesday which indicates that unless the processors put their prices up some 24 per cent they cannot expect any profit in the current year. Has the minister discussed this brief with the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board, and is he prepared to announce any action on the part of the government?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the brief has not yet been brought to my attention. I will certainly take a quick look at it.

PENSIONS

MEASURES TO ASSIST THOSE RECEIVING PAYMENTS UNDER PRIVATE PLANS IN LIGHT OF INFLATION

Mr. Joe Hueglin (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Those on fixed private pensions are afflicted by inflation as well as those who are able to increase their incomes or those dependent completely upon various social schemes. Would the Prime Minister indicate what specific measures have been undertaken or are anticipated that will assist this particular segment of our population who spent many working years building up their standard of living only to find it now being eroded by continuing inflation?

● (1500)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question would require a statement which normally ought to be made on motions. Unless the Prime Minister can reply briefly, I would be inclined to go to the next question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to accommodate you but it would be a very long statement if I were to set out the various things the government has done.

ENERGY

REPORTED CUTBACK BY VENEZUELA IN OIL EXPORTS TO CANADA

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in regard to the cutback in oil from Venezuela. Has he any information on whether Venezuela has cut back its oil deliveries and whether Canada is being affected by those cutbacks?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the same question was asked of me at the last meeting of the House. I have not had any confirmation yet, but I understand that such cutback would not be directed against Canada. It would be a cutback applying to production.

Mr. Saltsman: Has there been any discussion between Canada and the government of Venezuela to the effect that they would prefer to deal directly with our government through an energy corporation rather than through the multinational corporations?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I have not had any discussion. My colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, was in Venezuela some months ago and I believe that there is a general trend in the world toward operations in the oil industry by government rather than by private enterprise. We are even seeing some evidence of it here.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

POSSIBILITY OF CONSTRUCTION OF GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS IN WEST CARLETON COUNTY AREA

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and arises out of the question put by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Since the pamphlet referred to the Ottawa-Carleton and Hull-Ottawa area as the new capital of Canada and the government has been doing some decentralizing by putting new buildings in Hull, which is not the constitutional capital of Canada, can the minister advise when he will be moving some buildings of the federal government out into Carleton county and the west Carleton area?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that the hon. member agrees with the intent and purpose of government policy relative to the national capital region. I will take that matter under consideration and discuss it with the National Capital Commission and its chairman to see what accommodation can be made.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SUGGESTED EXPANSION OF SYDNEY STEEL PLANT RATHER THAN ANOTHER SITE FOR NEW STEEL COMPLEX IN EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the fact the Sydney steel plant is urgently in need of expansion at the moment, and in view of the fact the government of Nova Scotia some time ago announced a multimillion dollar expansion program, can the minister explain to the House why a study has been commissioned to investigate the possibility of alternate sites for a new steel complex in eastern Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I can give a brief answer. The two are not necessarily mutually exclusive; they may very well be complementary. But the one to which the hon. member refers is designed primarily for a different type of steel production for which an offshore market appears to have been identified at least in the preliminary stages. It will not have any effect in a negative way on the plans of the government of Nova Scotia for the Sydney Steel Corporation and its negotiations with us in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary, then see the hon. member for Victoria and then call orders of the day.

Mr. Muir: In view of the minister's comments, would he indicate to the House whether, if a site is recommended other than Sydney, he will agree with the findings of the study and propose that the government act upon these findings?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, I think this is hypothetical. So far no place has been decided upon. I can assure the hon. member that, in so far as the viability of the existing operation in Sydney is concerned, this is very much on the government's mind, and we will be prepared to continue co-operation with the provincial government and with Sydco to that end.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I appreciate the minister's comments and the information he has provided so far but he has hardly gone far enough. My point of privilege is that we already have a steel plant in Sydney and we already know that this plant requires modernization and expansion. We also know that the government has commissioned a study to investigate the feasibility of establishing an expensive major steel complex on the east coast. What we would like to know is what effect this second steel complex, apparently envisioned by the government, would have on the present 4,000 employees and their families and all those who depend on the Sydney steel plant should this come into being? If there is to be any expansion it certainly should be in the city of Sydney where we already have steelmaking at the moment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That, of course, is hardly a question of privilege. It is a representation and perhaps a supplementary question to which the minister might like to reply, after which the Chair will have to call orders of the day.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had already. The hon. member has made a fine representation on behalf of Sydney but as I have said already, first, any such study is very much in the preliminary stage and, second, no such project would go ahead if it were to the detriment of existing operations on Cape Breton Island.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if you would allow the Minister of Agriculture to clarify a point on an issue he raised and I did not. Could he have an opportunity to tell the House whether or not the Globe and Mail did or did not print the truth with regard to his statement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order; it is a supplementary question. There will be another day, I hope, and an opportunity for the hon. member to ask his question. I apologize to the hon. member for Victoria; I shall certainly give him priority tomorrow. I had recognized him a moment ago. A number of his colleagues did not have the opportunity to ask questions today either and I hope they will be given that chance tomorrow.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding the length of time that was taken up today in the question period inquiring about some two-bit document that has been elevated by inflation to 50 cents and the consequences of that. The length of time taken on that matter resulted in some members being unable to raise questions on matters of extreme importance transcending that of the document referred to, particularly fisheries on the west coast which is germane today more than any other day. I should like to ask whether, in order to provide an opportunity for the House to deal with the question of fisheries tomorrow, the Secretary of State for External Affairs would make a statement on motions with particular reference to some of the recommendations of the International Pacific Halibut Commission and thus take up the time of the House that way instead of during questions?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now making a representation or suggestion which I assume the minister will take into account for further consideration before motions are called tomorrow afternoon. Orders of the day.

PROVISION FOR PLANNING ACQUISITION OF LAND, GRANTS, GRADE CROSSING ASSISTANCE

The House resumed, from Thursday, April 25, consideration in committee of Bill C-27, to facilitate the relocation of railway lines or rerouting of railway traffic in urban areas and to provide financial assistance for work done for the protection, safety and convenience of the public at railway crossings—Mr. Basford—Mr. Boulanger in the chair.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Chairman, we have had some general discussion of the bill on clause 2 but I rise on a very small but nevertheless significant matter concerning one of the definitions on page 2 of the bill. The definition of "urban area" reads:

"urban area" means an area and areas adjacent thereto that are classified by Statistics Canada in its most recent census of Canada as urban;

The minister may suspect he is not writing on tablets of stone which will last forever. I know he also hopes that the law he is presenting to the House will last for some time. In the future, the most recent census may not be the one of 1971, but the one of 1981, of 1991, and so on. Does the minister really mean to fix the definition of "urban" as in the document relating to the census of 1971? Or, is he willing that the act shall say that we shall abide by the definition which might be put out by Statistics Canada after the census of 1981, of 1991, and so on? Could the minister respond to my question so that we may understand more clearly what is meant?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member's question really relates to the most recent census. The definition would relate to the most recent census. As time goes on and as the bill endures, the definition would be the definition prescribed by Statistics Canada from time to time. The hon. member looks puzzled, as if I have not understood the question properly.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Chairman, the minister understood the question properly, but what puzzles me is this. I wonder if he really wants this definition. That definition has now been referred to several times and read into the record, and I will not take the time of the committee by reading it again. It is possible that as the country grows, the definition of urban area, which is to include so many people and so on, could also change. Does the minister intend the definition in the act to be changed from time to time, or does he want to tie the definition down to its present form, which will stand forever—imagine that! The minister should get the full flavour of "forever". In short, is the definition always to relate to the 1971 census?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, it is the definition used by Statistics Canada from time to time, and it is therefore subject to change. It seems to me that would be desirable, and that is what the legislation provides.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make some comments about some matters which have not been raised in questions to the minister. There are a number of small municipalities which may have railways running through their boundaries but which may not be able to raise enough capital to cover their share of railway line relocation. My first comment is that the bill does not go far enough in providing assistance for those smaller communities. To illustrate my concern, I might use Wetaskiwin as an example. Wetaskiwin, a community of approximately 6,500 people, is not unlike other cities of the same size in Canada. Over the years the people of Wetaskiwin have become increasingly concerned because the two CPR main lines, and especially the yard in the middle of the city, have created a hazard and inconvenience for pedestrians, vehicular traffic and vehicles performing a public service which need to cross the tracks.

The lines were built about 75 years ago to provide a rail link between Calgary and Edmonton. Over the years, because the city has grown and society has become more automated, the residents of Wetaskiwin have been forced to attempt to correct the increasingly undesirable railway crossing situation.

In 1969 the city of Wetaskiwin carried out a study concerning the main problems created by the CPR lines. The study concluded, first, that slow moving potash trains disrupt movement of traffic from either side of the railway tracks for periods between 20 and 32 minutes at a time. Second, that serious inconvenience is caused to pedestrian traffic, and extreme discomfort, during the inclement weather of the winter months. Pedestrians have even been observed climbing between the railways cars. A high degree of danger has existed at all crossings in the morning, at noon and in the afternoon owing to the student population of three schools using the crossings. Third, when an alarm was given, the effectiveness of fire hall equipment located on the west side of the Canadian Pacific tracks, and fire protection to the east side of the city where the major industrial development is, was reduced to nil. Officials of Canadian Pacific advised that it was impossible to break up or separate a slow-moving train in case of an emergency. They said that separating it would take approximately as long as allowing the train to clear the crossing.

The fourth finding of the study was that the effectiveness of police protection, emergency medical and ambulance service was also reduced to nil during the passage over the crossings of the aforementioned trains.

That, basically, is the problem facing the good people of Wetaskiwin as well as the people of many other small communities.

Wetaskiwin has taken a serious approach to solving its rail relocation problems, despite obvious financial restraints placed on it because of its size. I have a copy of a detailed engineering study of the rail relocation situation which was undertaken by the city of Wetaskiwin. If Bill C-27 as drafted is passed, Wetaskiwin's concern about this problem probably has all been for naught, as it is not financially able to pay for 50 per cent of the cost of relocation.

The estimated cost of the Wetaskiwin rail relocation project is $2.5 million. The city, perhaps, can spend $400,000 or approximately 25 per cent of its annual budget on this project, but that is a far cry from the $1.25 million it would be required to pay if the legislation as drafted is passed.

The government might reconsider the financial aspects of the proposed legislation, for the sake of Wetaskiwin and for the sake of all small and medium sized communities across Canada which desperately need rail lines to be relocated but cannot afford to do so. Does the minister consider that Bill C-27 provides for sufficient capitalization for small communities, so that they will not be financially burdened? They are not asking for $35 million or $50 million. However, it is necessary for them to come up with some money to carry out such projects as I have suggested.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member raised several proposals regarding Wetaskiwin. I do not think he would expect me to reply in detail to those, as there are about 64 applications of various sorts before the CTC, including that of Wetaskiwin. That city has outlined to the CTC the railroad relocation project it wishes to see undertaken.

May I say two things to the hon. member. First, Wetaskiwin obviously will fall under the purview of this act. Clearly, it is an urban area as defined in this legislation. The hon. member referred to the difficulty of school children crossing the track in order to go to school. May I refer him to the provisions on page 20 of the bill which cover pedestrian crossings. It will be possible to build pedestrian crossings, to correct the situation the hon. member mentioned.

I may be mistaken, but I thought the hon. member mentioned that the cost of the project in his city would be $250 million.

Mr. Schellenberger: No. $2.5 million.

Mr. Basford: That is more appropriate, as a $250 million project would be more expensive than any proposed rail relocation project in Canada, including that of Winnipeg which, depending on the options decided on, may cost about $75 million.

● (1520)

With regard to whether under the legislation we would cover half the cost of the relocation, I caution the hon. member that the figure $2.5 million may well be simply the cost of removing the railway facilities without taking into account the net benefit to the railways provided by the relocation, which would be subtracted from that cost for purposes of the legislation.

Under this legislation, when we have a railroad relocation proposal and railroads are moved from one area to the other, this is done without cost or benefit. There would be real benefit in many railroad relocations which are put on to the ledger. Therefore, I caution the hon. member about using the gross figure, which is simply the cost of moving the railroad without taking into account the net benefits provided for in the legislation.

In answer to the hon. member's larger question about whether there is sufficient capital, obviously any government or any minister would like to say we have more money and we could spend more money. It is easy to spend more money. We have a formula here which provides 50 per cent of the cost of railroad relocation, and obviously people can argue it should be more.

I would hope to see the provinces and municipalities assist in relocation schemes. They should assist. In Saskatchewan, for example, it seems appropriate that the Saskatchewan government make a contribution toward the relocation. Fifty per cent is spelled out in the legislation as the federal contribution. The other parties, be they the province, city or the railroads themselves, can make up the balance of 50 per cent. Obviously my answer to the hon. member is yes, we could use more money, but within any government we have to exercise priorities as to the amount of money available or as to the formula set out to pay for the undertaking.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for his extensive answer. I hope we do not scare the Wetaskiwin residents out of their wits with a figure of $250 million. Am I correct in assuming that under the terms of the bill, after the rail tracks are relocated the land becomes the property of the federal Department of Public Works?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, in 99 per cent of the cases that will not happen. However, to give this bill any teeth, you have to put into it the power of the CTC to have the final say that something should happen. It is given the power to order that a relocation be conducted. It is given additional power to order, if it is necessary to carry out the plan, that the federal Minister of Public Works expropriate the railroad land. However, he would do so purely as a trustee for the end result or benefit of the plan. He would expropriate solely for the purpose of being a conduit. He would acquire the land from the railroad, being the only person in Canada authorized to expropriate railroad property, as a trustee in accordance with the plan and pass it on to the province, municipality or private interests that are designed within the plan to acquire and use this railroad land. He acquires it solely as a trustee.

Mr. Schellenberger: Is it correct to say the city could then become owner of part of this land to offset the cost of its 50 per cent of the relocation?

Mr. Basford: No, Mr. Chairman, it would not, because the net costs of relocation would be worked out. We would pay 50 per cent of those net costs. It would then be determined where the balance of the 50 per cent comes from. The municipality could, of course, acquire part of the railway land, and in some cases they will, but that would be put into the equation of the cost of the scheme. It is not a way by which they could acquire the land for nothing.

Mr. Schellenberger: The small communities will have a hard time finding half the capital that is required. However, if they could have assurance that part of the land the railway is vacating in the middle of the city could become city property, it could then recover some of the original capital it had to come up with for its 50 per cent. It would make it much easier for cities to relocate their rail lines if they could be assured that at least some of the land would revert to the city, for sale to private interests as well as for parks, future rapid transit or whatever happens to come forward.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that under the plan the city involved could acquire all or any part of the railroad land if that was part of the urban development plan. I thought the hon. member was referring to that as a method of acquiring the land for nothing. That they could not do. However, they could acquire the land as part of the urban development plan for disposal or use for some other purpose. There is no question about that.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Will the hon. member for Wetaskiwin permit me to enter into discussion at this point?

Mr. Schellenberger: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I am very intrigued by the minister's answers to the questions raised by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. Has the minister a legal opinion from the Department of Justice as to the ownership of the land underneath the rails? I put my question another way by saying that under the charter of the CPR and under the charter of the various railways that make up the CNR, this land belonged to the Crown and was granted to these railways for the sole purpose of transportation. When any railway gives up land and no longer uses it for the purpose for which the charter was granted, all that land beneath the rails reverts to the Crown, which was the grantee. Has he a legal opinion on that?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, ministers are not supposed to give legal opinions. I will make some inquiries about the point. In any event, I do not think it affects the operation or wording of this particular legislation because the expropriation section provides that the Minister of Public Works is authorized to acquire by way of expropriation land that is or was occupied as part of the railway undertaking by the company. The legal consequences of that expropriation, I suggest, would flow from that statement.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, that was not my question. I did not ask the minister for a legal opinion. I asked whether he had had one given to him by the officials of the Department of Justice. If he would ask for that legal opinion and read those charters again, the Justice officials would probably rule that the land underneath the rails, once it is no longer used for railroad purposes, reverts to the Crown. Therefore, it is impossible to expropriate something you already own. This is the reason I asked the question. The minister said that approximately 99 per cent of the land comes back to the Crown and the other 1 per cent does not.

This brings me to my second question. In the case of the railways taking the railway lines out of the cities of Calgary and Saskatoon, did the railways not assume that the land they had vacated in those cities belonged to them and through real estate development made a large sum of money in compensation for that sale? In the case of Calgary, I think it was over $100 million. What has been the past experience of the railways and those dealing with them concerning claims to the land beneath the right of

Mr. Basford: On a point of information, I wish to correct one thing. It is my impression the hon. member said we would be using this power of expropriation in 99 per cent of these cases. In fact, we envisage expropriation as a means of implementing relocation being used in only a minority of cases. In the vast majority of cases the process will be handled by agreement and negotiation. While we trust the process can be implemented without expropriations, we do, obviously, feel it is essential that such power should be conferred under the act. The CTC has power to order the relocation of rail lines in certain areas. Under the formula to determine the net cost of relocation, the railroads are, among other things, credited with the value of the land that is vacated as part of the net cost of the scheme. Whether they end up by owning it or not will depend on a particular scheme, but obviously it will be shown as an asset of the companies.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I did not misunderstand the minister; the figure of 99 per cent came from him, and I am in agreement. I should like to complete my questioning by asking the minister whether he would refer the question of the ownership of these rights of way to the legal officers of the Department of Justice. To whom does the right of way belong once the railway has abandoned the track? The answer may well be that the land reverts to the Crown. If this is the case, I should like an opinion from these legal officers as to who owns land in country areas, in similar circumstances when a line has been abandoned. There are miles of abandoned line along rights of way in areas which are not covered by the present bill. Do the railways claim ownership of this land or not? Or does it revert to the Crown? I believe the legal position will be that the land does revert to the Crown, in which case why should we credit the railways with the value of land in this limited area involving cities? The land belongs to the people.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, the proposal here is to expropriate not only the right of way but the land which physically affords the right of way. The hon. member began his question by talking about mineral rights. That is an altogether different thing. What is involved here is the right of way, a right to put tracks down and surface rights. This is the subject of the claim to ownership. It is certainly the view of the railway companies that they own not only the tracks on the right of way but the land the right of way covers.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): That is the point at issue. It is clear the minister considers they own the surface rights and the land along these tracks. I never mentioned mineral rights. I am dealing only with surface rights. I wish the minister would go to the legal advisers and ask them for an opinion, for an interpretation of the original charters concerning land granted to the railways, and whether this land along the rights of way belongs to the Crown when the railways, of their own volition, or on the direction of the Commission, abandon those lines. Do the surface rights revert to the Crown? I know the minister cannot answer that question until he has referred it to the legal advisers of the Crown.

Will the minister also tell us what he can about the disposition of the land in Saskatoon, Calgary, and in other cities from which the railways voluntarily removed the tracks? It is possible there is a debt still owing to the Crown. To whom was the value of the land credited?

Mr. Basford: We shall apply the legislation and expropriate only where we need to do so and in connection with land which the railways own. If it is held legally that the railways do not own the surface rights once the tracks are abandoned, then obviously this would be a matter for settlement by litigation. We certainly do not intend to expropriate rights which do not exist.

I must say, with regard to voluntarily relocation schemes, that I am not familiar with the two schemes to which the hon. member referred. In the case of the scheme which was put into effect in the national capital area the railway companies undoubtedly took the position that they owned the right of way and the surface rights. These were acquired by the National Capital Commission after payment of very substantial amounts to the railway companies as part of the cost of the relocation scheme.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): That is the point I am making, Mr. Chairman. There is evidence that the railways have taken the position that they own the surface rights in respect of the land beneath the rails. I accept the minister's assurance that he will ask for a legal opinion as to who owns the surface rights in the circumstances I have mentioned, those rights having been given to the railways by charter for a specific purpose.

Mr. Schellenberger: Mr. Chairman, the question which has just been raised by my hon. friend is a very important one from the point of view of the smaller communities. It would be much easier for them to bear the 50 per cent of the cost if they could get back an interest in at least part of these lands and, possibly, dispose of them commercially.

The point I wish to raise has to do with the amount of funds designated under this program. If Winnipeg takes $50 million and other major cities have budgets of a similar size—I do not know how many millions Toronto will need—there will only be a limited opportunity for the smaller cities to participate. Can the minister assure us that at least part of this money will be set aside to meet the needs of the smaller communities?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I want to make it clear that schemes such as the Winnipeg scheme which carry a high price tag do not exhaust the budget. It would be wrong to take $75 million for Winnipeg and assume, on that basis, that most of the money in the fund has been expended. Such schemes will take many years to complete, perhaps as long as ten years, and the budget would be spread over that period.

I might also say that the CTC is authorized to make rules and set priorities in connection with relocation plans. I can only express my hope that the CTC, having been given a certain degree of independence by the government, will deal not only with major centres when setting priorities but will also set some in respect of smaller parts of the country. In terms of ministerial assurance, I can say to the hon. member that I think the allocation of government of Canada funds should be made on a somewhat fair and equitable basis.

● (1540)

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, like many who have participated in this debate on this measure I should like to add my words of congratulation to the minister and indicate that we certainly welcome this measure presently before us.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: I appreciate that applause. I was beginning to despair that we would never see this legislation brought before parliament; when I have raised questions on a number of occasions in the past the reply was always that this legislation would be brought in a very short time, or in several weeks, or that we could expect to have it before the House very soon. Now, a year and a half after it was predicted that this measure would be before us, we are looking forward to finding out some of the details relating to its operation.

A number of questions have been raised since the bill was introduced, and, while the minister has replied to some of them, there are still some that require clarification.

In reply to a question I raised about the Chilliwack situation some time ago the minister indicated he was aware of the particular problem and had discussed it. I have already expressed through the news media in my area my appreciation for the commitment the minister has made, but I very much regret that this was done on a basis that gave rise to some serious questions of a political nature. That was very unfortunate and I do not think the minister really intended that it should come out in that fashion. In any event that is the way it happened. However, that does not detract from my appreciation for the announcement of this measure.

Having regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, who spoke about the measure as it relates to smaller communities in his area, there are two small areas in my riding that are vitally concerned with this bill. One is Chilliwack, to which I have referred, and the other is Abbotsford, both major points of population in my section of the country.

This bill proposes the expenditure of $250 million over a period of five years for track relocation. I should like to raise the same question raised by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin as to what assurance the minister can give that the smaller communities in Canada, such as those to which I have referred, along with many others, will receive the benefit of this measure. There are a number of cities which I understand have major projects on the drawing board. As has been pointed out, these will involve a considerable outlay of capital. My concern is that the major part, if not all, of these funds will be taken up by the major population areas and the smaller areas will not be able to qualify. It almost seems that many of the areas will be classed as rural and, therefore, will not have the opportunity to participate at all.

Let me point out first that not only in the major areas but also in the smaller urban centres there are major problems in respect to trackage. One to which I wish to refer is in the city of Chilliwack, which is divided by the CNR main line. Their major services such as police, ambulance and transportation to the airport are seriously hampered by railway traffic. I believe Chilliwack has outlined a very sound proposal which involves moving the tracks. I should like to ask whether this measure applies strictly to urban areas. In this particular case part of the relocation suggested would be in the urban area, but part would also involve tracks in the rural area adjacent to the city. If this bill applies strictly to urban areas, I think there will be serious difficulty in working out this program.

This program should not be retained for the benefit only of urban areas. A great deal of discussion has taken place in the last while about the quality of rural life, about making it more attractive to many people who have an appreciation for that kind of life by providing them with a certain quality of amenities, and so on. If we are going to help the rural areas we must look at this program as it applies to them. In order to make rural life even more attractive perhaps some of these rail tracks should be moved to other sections.

When speaking to one of the mayors in my community just over the week end he voiced the suggestion and belief that the time had come when there must be transportation corridors instead of chopping up the country according to sections. He suggested there should be corridors in which all communications facilities could be located. This is one of the things that should be considered in light of the measure currently before the committee.

Let me refer to another matter which might go beyond the reference of this bill. I have received a number of communications regarding a coal dust situation adjacent to our rail lines. This subject perhaps comes within the jurisdiction of the Minister of the Environment, but since we are discussing rail transportation and the responsibility of rail companies to communities and community living, I think this matter should be considered now.

In spite of the fact there have been a number of studies, a great many communications and an extensive lapse of time, these companies do not seem to have come up with any solution to this coal dust problem. I suppose this problem affects major areas as well where rail lines pass through areas of concentrated population. These people are subject to a great deal of pollution which the railways should have some responsibility to correct.

This minister as well as the Minister of the Environment and others engaged in or having some influence in this particular area should lend their weight and prestige to the finding of a solution to this coal dust problem. This may involve relocating the tracks in some areas, and this certainly should be considered within the terms of reference of this bill.

There is one other point I should like to raise, and this relates to the principle of a 50-50 division of cost. It does not seem that the railways are to assume any responsibility for this particular project, that this is all going to be done by the government. In view of the fact that the railway companies have gained considerably as a result of government co-operation in the past, possibly they should be called upon to bear some of the cost of relocating these tracks, particularly if this is to be for the benefit of the communities, their further development and their general standard of living.

Perhaps these companies should be called upon to pay 10 per cent, 15 per cent or 20 per cent of the relocation costs, as this would make them a little bit more responsible in respect of some of these areas of concern.

Those are just a few of the thoughts I would raise. There is this matter of allocation of funds and recognizing the legitimate claims of smaller communities, even some that are classified rural. This is one of the major concerns of a great many people in this country, and certainly of a great many people in my particular area.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, may I just respond very briefly to the hon. member by assuring him that while we may like to think of urban areas as referring to Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, the definition of "urban" within this act is a very wide one. In fact, it covers all of the populated areas in Canada. Without question it would cover the cities of Chilliwack and Abbotsford to which the hon. member referred in that, for one purpose of the definition, it is any municipality with a population of 1,000 or more people having the legal status of a city, town or village. So there is no question that the centres within the hon. member's riding would be covered by the Statistics Canada definition. However, the point he makes is a good one and we have put forward a definition which will cover all the populated areas in Canada.

Second, I refer the hon. member to the fact that what many of the smaller towns and villages of this country need is not a railway relocation proposal but an underpass or an overpass on the railroad's track itself. That is covered by Parts II and III of the bill which make no distinction between urban and rural. So the cities he refers to could take advantage of Part I in the railroad relocation proposals and, without question, take advantage of Parts II and III for the construction of grade crossings, underpasses and that type of work.

I appreciate the hon. member raising those concerns and I think that we have tried to respond to them in this legislation.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment on this bill for a few moments. First, I should like to join my colleagues who have already congratulated the government, particularly the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, for finally bringing forward Bill C-27. It is difficult not to agree with the bill whose stated purpose is to facilitate the relocation of railway lines, particularly at a time when the redesigning and reconstruction of our major cities is so much a matter of concern to those of us who have the honour of representing large urban centres.

However, I must express a concern which I feel rather personally. It stems from the fact that, while we welcome this legislation, we cannot help but be concerned about ensuring that the government does carry forward its promises with some degree of efficiency and speed. Having regard to the responsibilities that are incumbent upon a government introducing such major legislation, speed is, of course, a matter of concern.

I think that a measure of any department's efficiency and concern for people's problems is shown to a member of parliament when he deals with a particular department on behalf of a constituent. Because here you have a small matter affecting an individual person whose member of parliament has decided to contact a minister responsible for a department to see what can be done on behalf of that individual citizen.

With regard to the Department of State for Urban Affairs, I must say to the minister that I cannot be overly confident about the manner in which his department will proceed with the implementation of this bill on the basis of my personal experience in making representations on behalf of a particular constituent. I wrote to the minister on behalf of a Mr. Dean Knowles on February 19 of this year, and have yet to receive an acknowledgement or a substantive reply in any form. On March 26, over a month having passed, I sent the minister a copy of a letter I had sent to my constituent indicating that no reply as yet had been received. Still no acknowledgement or response was received by me. Last Thursday, in fairness to the department and to the minister, I decided to call his office to see if the correspondence had been mislaid. I was told by a secretary there that they prided themselves on the efficiency and speed with which they dealt with correspondence. She said that the correspondence would be checked and that an assistant to the minister would telephone me back. That call never came.

So, having listened to the congratulations of other hon. members, I join with them with regard to the specific legislation, but I have to express concern that my own personal experience in making representations on behalf of constituents does not give me much confidence with regard to the efficiency with which this minister will implement this piece of legislation.

This legislation interests me in particular, coming as I do from the great city of Hamilton, because, as do other urban centres, we welcome it. The city of Hamilton is served by the CNR, the CPR and another railway called the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo railway. So we have more than our share of railway lines. Both because we are serviced by them and because we are an industrial city, this type of relocation will be something we welcome and can certainly use.

I think it is important to note that what we are talking about is not the removal of railway lines, but their relocation because they are still needed. In addition to the cost factor involved in such a move, we should be taking a very close look at what the environmental and social effects of relocating these railway lines will be. You cannot simply solve a problem by relocating the particular cause of it to another area, not expecting some other type of problem to be caused in the area where those lines are relocated. In a city that is industrial, that accepts some of the disadvantages along with many of the advantages of being an industrial city, we have a right to expect of this ministry a full study into the environmental and social impact of any move before such move takes place.

I also hope that the ultimate decision will be made at the local level. Because in looking at this piece of legislation we see that at least three ministries, the Department of State for Urban Affairs, the Ministry of Transport and the Department of Public Works, will be involved in its implementation. If there is one thing we do not need any more in this country it is a continuation of or an addition to the process of decision making by bureaucrats in Ottawa which affects people in Wetaskiwin, Hamilton, Vancouver, Montreal, and in many other places. We have much too much of that already, we do not need any more of it. If this legislation is to be effective, then the ultimate decisions will have to be made at the local level.

I noted with interest that some city mayors, including His Worship the Mayor of Hamilton, were in Ottawa not so long ago to request funds of the federal government. This legislation, which does assist cities, is a step in the right direction. We must be moving in these times toward giving more financial assistance to the cities. I recognize that under our system of government the federal government has a perfect, tailor-made excuse when it says: "We cannot give money directly to municipalities; we must deal through the provinces". If that is the case, so be it. But let it deal with them through the provinces. Our municipalities are so large, they have to carry so many services, and their base for revenue is so small in comparison with that of the federal and provincial governments, that it is incumbent upon all these levels of government to join together in programs for better revenue sharing such as the one in Bill C-27 and the one that was brought in in the United States not so long ago, whereby the federal government can assist to a much greater extent the large urban centres.

I am also concerned about the substantial power which has been given to the Canadian Transport Commission. Again based on my personal experience and knowledge of this branch of the government I cannot have great confidence in the CTC. They are simply too powerful and their jurisdiction too centralized.

If we are going to have any degree of success with this legislation, then in addition to consultation we must have co-ordination. This is something the CTC does not seem to know exists or, if it does know, it shies away from it. That is a concern I wish to register with the minister.

About nine months ago the Minister of Transport claimed that Canada's total transportation system "represents perhaps one of the best, if not the best, in the world." But earlier this year he changed his mind and described Canada's transportation system as being in a mess. What he clearly admitted is that Canada does not have a real transportation policy. Such a policy was promised, but it does not exist.

If the government goes ahead with its grandiose plans and schemes, however well intentioned, they cannot succeed unless we have a co-ordinated and unified transportation system. The best intentions of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs will fall by the wayside because of the lack of a transportation policy and because of the mess that exists in the Department of Transport.

Every day in the House of Commons the Minister of Transport is questioned about what the government's plans will be for such things as the future of the railroads, particularly in the west, and about the government's decisions in regard to airports. We simply do not know, Mr. Chairman, and the people affected do not know. I believe we should be taking a definite look now at the whole future of railroads in Canada because, as my colleague from Central Nova pointed out in the latter part of last week, a survey has been conducted which is not very encouraging to those of us who wish to place reliability in our railroad transportation system.

The "Modernization of Railways in Canada", a survey completed by the engineering faculty of Carleton University, reveals that utilization of railways in Canada and levels of investment are similar to those of other industrialized nations, but that passenger rail service performance in Canada is far below that of other countries.

It also reveals that although technologies superior to those in Canada have been developed for traction, suspension, track construction and traffic control, the manning of Canadian railways is still based on the steam tradition and does not allow efficient operation of modern equipment. In effect, it says that Canada's railways compared with those of other countries are slow, are usually not on time, and are unsafe particularly when the weather is bad. It also refers to statistics which show that our railway lines, compared with those of other countries, are not as sage, and in fact are becoming more dangerous.

A special inquiry into railway safety, commissioned by the Canadian Transport Commission, reported last December that the number of derailments caused by poor track conditions on both Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways in 1972 was three times that of 1959, and nearly double that of 1969, despite the fact that improved technology with respect to mechanical means of transportation is at our disposal.

Obviously, if anything is to be done about this matter the leadership must come from the federal government. And leadership must come in a co-ordinated fashion, not just from the Minister of State for Urban Affairs but from the Minister of Transport, co-ordinating all the different ministries and programs that are concerned with these matters.

I have already mentioned concern for safety on our railways. My concern also extends to pedestrians and travellers in cars. One of the reasons for the relocation of tracks from major urban centres is to provide a greater measure of safety, particularly in a city like Hamilton where the tracks cross main thoroughfares, endangering the lives of pedestrians and car travellers.

In a particular instance in the city of Hamilton, a railway crossing located in a high density population area has been a hazard for some time, and in fact has already claimed one life. At the urging of the aldermen for the area we arranged a meeting with CTC representatives from Ottawa to show them how this railway line was endangering the lives of the young school children and apartment dwellers in that area of east Hamilton. We urged that if they could not relocate the line immediately—something which may be possible following passage of this bill—in the meantime they should provide the maximum amount of protection possible for pedestrians and people riding in cars.

But the CTC hid behind its big rule book and pointed out that since there was only one railway track involved, not two, there was no requirement that safety guards be placed there. Mr. Chairman, many urban areas simply cannot afford to provide the full protection that is necessary at crossing levels, and the CTC should assist them so that they may buy the necessary equipment. Such equipment could then be removed and used elsewhere once a particular rail line had been relocated in a safer place.

I hope the minister will comment on the possibility of taking such a suggestion into consideration, and will also let us know what he has in mind under Bill C-27 for the city of Hamilton. As I have already mentioned to him, those of us who have the pleasure of living in Hamilton have a particular concern about railway lines. Indeed, we may have more than our share of them. We would like to know what information he can provide us with with respect to the benefit that the city of Hamilton can expect from implementation of this legislation.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has raised several matters. I find his reference to correspondence with my office shocking and disturbing, because I have a rule that correspondence must be answered within ten days. I have already sent off an inquiry to find out what is involved in the situation to which he refers.

The hon. member also said that in any relocation scheme environmental and ecological considerations must be taken into account. I agree with him. As the legislation provides, before the CTC can act an urban development plan must be laid before it, and I find it inconceivable that any such plan would be drawn up without taking into account the ecological and environmental aspects of the proposed relocation scheme.

The hon. member was also concerned about the application process and the cost sharing formula. He will note from Part I of the bill that any relocation or rerouting proposal will require the closest degree of intergovernmental consultation and co-operation. As we see it, the urban development plan and the transportation plan will be drawn up at the initiation of the municipality or province involved. It will be referred to the CTC with comments on any federal programs that my ministry is involved in to ensure co-ordination, and the Department of Transport will concern itself with the transportation aspects of any relocation. I think in this legislation we have tried to provide for good interdepartmental and intergovernmental consultation and co-ordination.

The hon. member referred to the Canadian Transport Commission. Their role is provided for in the legislation for obvious reasons: they are the regulatory agency at the federal level with jurisdiction over railroads, railroad rights of way and railroad activities. I think the hon. member will agree that it would have been wrong to set up another federal regulatory body to deal solely with railroad relocation.

I agree with the hon. member on the point he and a number of other members raised, namely that the municipalities, the provinces, members of parliament and the government are entitled to expect the CTC to operate efficiently and effectively and with speed when dealing with applications. Several hon. members have said that the CTC needs a good shaking up. I believe we are entitled to expect it to deal with applications made under Part I in an effective and an efficient manner, and I think the Minister of Transport can be relied upon to ensure that this will be done.

With regard to questions of safety, I would refer hon. members to Part II and III of the bill. Part II provides for special expenses for grade crossings and grade separation schemes, and Part III provides for amendments to the grade crossing fund, doubling—and I am speaking loosely—the federal contributions to grade crossings and grade separations.

The removal of grade crossings has made an important contribution to safety. Statistics show that while automobile accidents have increased over the last few years, the percentage of automobile accidents at grade crossings has decreased. This is largely the result of safety work at level crossings and also the large numbers of grade separations that have been constructed.

The amendments to Parts II and III, which allow the CTC and the grade crossing fund to work on a great many more safety features at level crossings by way of safety devices, also allow for the building of more grade separations, and thus make an important contribution to safety.

I am not familiar with the case referred to by the hon. member as I am not responsible for the grade crossing fund, but I will give instructions that this be looked into. I do not understand why action was not taken because there was only one track and not two.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I cannot say what the particular plans are for Hamilton under this legislation, but knowing the leadership of that city and the representation it has in this House I am sure the case will be put very effectively and vigorously before the CTC. Indeed, if we are not very careful Hamilton will manage to get the bulk of any moneys provided under this legislation.

Lastly, Mr. Chairman, I can advise the hon. member that with regard to the first point that he raised about the mortgage dispute of a Mr. Knowles, this does require extensive research by CMHC but the hon. member will be getting a letter from me tonight.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Chairman, I want to participate in this debate at committee stage because I could not participate during second reading. I had to attend a most successful and encouraging convention of the Liberal Party in Ontario. I bring that to the attention of the committee because during that convention the bill was discussed quite extensively and I received a number of comments from interested participants. The bill was also discussed at a convention of northern Ontario municipalities and there was the unanimous feeling that this is a very strong piece of Liberal legislation.

I should also like to participate at this time because I feel this is a non-partisan bill and one that should be passed with all speed.

The city of North Bay is interested in this bill, Mr. Chairman. I know that the hon. member for Hamilton and the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth love the city of North Bay, and when they come there I should like to show them tourist facilities that are unequalled. We would like to have the rails in North Bay relocated in order to free about three miles of sandy beach on Lake Nipissing for tourists and residents.

One thing that gives me some concern about the bill, Mr. Chairman, is the fact that there is no requirement for the railway companies to become involved at the outset in the negotiations with the CTC. In North Bay we have the ONR, the CPR and the CNR and I feel it is essential that they get involved in the initial planification, that they get involved in the financing and that they provide information. The information they have could be of considerable assistance in the preparation of the plans, and the plans may have ramifications with respect to the economic life of the community. It is essential that the railways disclose their ideas with reference to relocation and its effect upon their own operations.

The city of Sudbury, only 80 miles from North Bay, is also interested in this bill. It would be interesting to know the attitude of the railways toward relocation in that city and how it may affect operations in North Bay. I would hope that, in view of the beneficent influence of the CTC in the determination of the acceptability of the plan, it would persuade the railways to become involved at the initial stage of planification. I know it would be difficult to pass legislation which would force the railways to be involved. I am sure the railways recognize that such ventures, especially in communities like mine, are community efforts. We need community involvement, but the three companies ought to be community participants too and be involved initially.

I hope the bill will be passed quickly at this stage and at third reading. The constituency of Nipissing looks forward to receiving favourable consideration with regard to any application which may be submitted.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I must apologize for not being quite as well prepared as I might be. I was forced to be away from the House last week and, unfortunately, have not had a chance to study this legislation.

Belleville, the major city in my riding, has for many years considered that the CPR tracks running through it should be removed. It is fair to say that, even if the majority of the residents favour the removal of the track, the official town plan and the revision do not speak at length of removing these tracks, because for many years this course has been thought of as being too expensive. Seven or eight years ago when I was mayor of Belleville I discussed with senior officials of the CPR the possibility of moving these tracks. They felt this would be possible, although the cost was prohibitive. The railway would not undertake the removal, and the city could not afford to do it as the cost of removing the track was equal to the entire city budget for one year.

The tracks traverse the entire south boundary of the city, right along the shore of the beautiful Bay of Quinte. History says that the CPR forced that particular track location on the city. I would not say the city was blackmailed, but the city fathers were told that if they wanted to be served by the railway the rail lines would need to run along the waterfront. We can understand the reasoning behind that. As the railway was necessary for the development of the community and industry, which in those days tended to locate along the waterfront for reasons of easy access, it did not seem unreasonable to build the tracks on that valuable property.

As the years went by the city grew to the north. The Montreal-Toronto CNR railings bisect the city. Citizens accepted that development as reasonable. There are, across the CP tracks at the south end of the city, seven or eight level crossings. Despite many of these being equipped with signals—some are just now being so equipped—there was this past winter an unfortunate death at one of these crossings. So the removal of these tracks or their relocation would make life safer for the people in the city. It would protect them and would be a convenience. Once the tracks are gone, property values in the area would increase, and that would help the city coffers. If it were not for the tracks, some of that land would be the most valuable in the city. Its value will be greatly enhanced by the removal of the tracks.

I should point out that the tracks run north of the city on the west and on the east, and only dip down to the south as they go through the city. So the physical relocation would not be unreasonable. Some provision would need to be made for those industries which would remain in the south end of the city until they wished to move. In the interim those industries would need to be protected.

I wish to ask the minister some questions. As I say, I have not digested the legislation thoroughly; I only looked at it briefly this afternoon, after returning to Ottawa, I am somewhat concerned about the cost of the preparation of an urban development plan. Clause 3(1) and 3(5) provide for such plans to be presented. There is provision for their enactment, after proper study. That is, the plans can be carried out. The bill provides for cost sharing and goes into detail as to how such plan is to be implemented. However, I do not see any provision allowing for the application for such study.

I note the words in the recommendation of His Excellency calling for not more than 50 per cent of the cost of urban development plans and transportation studies to be paid. I would be most surprised if the city of Belleville does not almost immediately ask for assistance to study this subject in detail. Of course, whether it could afford to carry out the proposed relocation would depend on the result of the study. This question has been in the minds of the mayor, members of council and many citizens for a long time, and they would be most interested in knowing how the city could apply for assistance for undertaking a study.

I will ask the minister some questions, wait for him to reply, then perhaps think of some more questions which may clarify this matter in my mind.

Having been mayor of Belleville and having had to deal with both CN and CP, I have learned several things about the railways. The CNR is a major employer in Belleville; at one time it was the major employer. Its importance as an employer has lessened somewhat, but it still is a major employer.

The CPR lines run through the city but the company is not as physical visible as the CNR is. Having dealt with the railways from time to time, I have found that CN and CP argue quite a bit and that the spirit of co-operation between them does not exist in the way we think it should. May I ask the minister if, in his opinion, the railways will be invited to participate in the planning of any relocation?

When I was mayor of Belleville we removed an anachronism of Southern Ontario, that portion of railway line which had run down the second main street of Belleville for many years. We finally got rid of it. Frankly, co-operation between the two railways was not evident and it took an awful lot of pushing on our part to get that line out of there.

Travelling back and forth from Ottawa to Belleville on the CN, I find that where the CN passenger train travels over the CP track, it is held up by a slow CP freight. I would not say that is done purposely, but it is done frequently. It seems for the sake of three or four minutes that the passenger train could be allowed through rather than made to wait for 30 minutes, as is frequently the case. The co-operation I expect between these two companies, both of which receive support from the federal government, although one to a much greater degree, is much better. Sometimes I am very disappointed.

I want to know whether the railroads will be involved in the planning and whether the CPR, if a plan were developed and approved, would under its legislation be voluntarily asked to co-operate in the disposal of its property. Or would there be legislation forcing the disposal and relocation? If we get that far, how would the lands be disposed of? Would they be left in the hands of the railway to dispose of as they see fit, or be sold or in some way deeded to the municipality to be disposed of as they see fit? Or would there be some different means of disposal? Some of the lands on the shores of the Bay of Quinte are extremely valuable. Others will obviously revert to road allowance and other natural uses.

Perhaps I might have answers to at least some of these questions. I am sure that many of my constituents in the city of Belleville will be most anxious to hear more of this legislation. I share the concern of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. The millions of dollars necessary for such relocation to take place in Belleville would be minuscule in comparison with the cost in the major centres across Canada. None the less, the matter is very important. I want the assurance of the minister that some funds will be made available to us should a decision be made.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the four questions raised by the hon. member, payment for transportation plans and urban development plans is provided for in clause 3(3) on page 3 of the bill. Upon application, the Minister of Transport may pay 50 per cent of the cost of preparing the transportation study or plan and 50 per cent of the preparation of the urban development study or plan. That is the answer to the first question.

With regard to the second question concerning the participation of the railroads, that question was raised by the previous speaker. There is no way of forcing them to participate, but I certainly think they would. In fact, as one member interjected, the problem would probably be that they would want to take over the whole process.

I would certainly hope that in any relocation planning process the railways would participate. That has certainly been the experience with some smaller relocation schemes. In the studies in Winnipeg—and up until now they have only been studies—the railroads have been extremely active participants in the study and planning process. On the other hand, if people endeavour to exclude them from the planning process, they would have their full rights in front of the CTC to be heard and to put their point of view.

With regard to the third matter of how the land that is freed by relocation is disposed of, this will probably vary from plan to plan. Each city is different and the railway situation in each city is different. It is clearly spelled out in the bill that the plans put before the CTC must spell out specifically how the land is to be disposed of and by whom. It could well be that as part of the plan it is disposed of through the municipality on the private market, or by the railroad. Various combinations and permutations could be developed in any given urban development plan. The plan is subject to hearings and approval by the CTC as well as challenge by those who disagree with the disposal process. It will really depend on each plan.

I make the point, however, that if there is an unwillingness to carry out the disposal plan, the bill provides that the federal Minister of Public Works is given the authority to expropriate the land in order to carry out the urban development plan, which includes the disposal plan. I think in most cases there will be a voluntary arrangement worked out as to what is going to happen. If that is possible, there is power in the legislation to provide for expropriation and disposal.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I have one further supplementary question for the minister. In the request to the Minister of Transport for payments to prepare a plan, would the municipality be expected to submit the name of a planner, and would they be allowed the choice of a planner to prepare such a document?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, the legislation does not specify that and I think it would be unwise to do so. The initiation of a process will require a very high degree of consultation between the municipality involved and the province. There will undoubtedly be consultation as to who will do this. Before a grant is made toward some study, it will be necessary to have assurance that it is being done by competent people. This is really a matter for close consultation and agreement, I think it would be wrong to spell it out.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak very briefly on Bill C-27, a bill to facilitate the relocation of railway lines, in order to bring two very precise points to the minister's attention.

First of all, I wish to say that I gladly support this bill, because I feel it is necessary and must be urgently enforced. It is clear, as indicated by the minister and a number of other hon. members, that the railways have contributed to the development of Canadian towns.

In many communities, however, railway lines have become either a source of danger or an impediment to urban development and renewal, especially where railway lines run through center town districts and are a source of a great many problems.

Contrary to what one of my colleages in the Progressive Conservative Party did, I contacted personally the hon. minister some time ago about a legitimate application made by the municipality of Victoriaville which wants to avail itself of the benefits of this bill.

The minister replied quickly and promised to follow up this matter. I want to congratulate him and tell him that I am eager to see the result of the attention he will give to this very important request from the Victoriaville municipality whose development and planning are slowed down by this railway in the centre of town.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw the minister's attention on two matters related to the bill under consideration. If we refer to clause 4 we may read and I quote:

(a) how the costs and benefits of the transportation plan included in the accepted plan are to be shared by the province, the municipalities concerned . . .

—and the federal government. So, in paragraph (a) of clause 4, a function is assigned to the province. In clause 8, page 8, a function is assigned to the province as follows:

An order under clause 6 shall be issued only after the Commission is satisfied that the government of the province and each municipality that has agreed to the accepted plan have caused such laws to be passed or such orders to be made as are necessary . . .

Therefore there is reference to the necessity to pass that legislation in agreement with the province.

I would like also to quote from the speech of the minister of the House of Commons on April 25, 1974, as recorded on page 1757 of Hansard:

A railway relocation and rerouting project is to begin with provincial and municipal initiatives and calls for participation by all three levels of government.

● (1640)

I want to compliment the minister for acting in co-operation with the three levels of government, but I would express my misgivings concerning the implementation of this legislation. And I wish to remind him of a rather distressing experience that the province of Quebec is undergoing now.

The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) is aware of what I am talking about, that is famous Bill C-133 that was passed on the National Housing Act. The province of Quebec is one of the provinces that has not benefited as yet from this legislation. Negotiations are still going on. It is not known whether the federal or provincial government is responsible for impeding the implementation of the act, ensuring urban renewal and assisting low income housing construction. Moreover, we all recognize the importance of this legislation in Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to obtain from the minister specific assurances with regards to the method of implementation of the act so that municipalities, big or small, can benefit from it in spite of the little support that could be given by one province in particular. That application may seem strange to people in other provinces but we in the province of Quebec are faced with this problem, and if the province does not agree or drags a leg the other provinces will benefit from it while we in the province of Quebec wait.

Mr. Chairman, I would find it unfortunate if a province should have a right to veto and refuse it. The minister stated in his speech, and I quote:

. . . When a province and involved municipalities wish to redevelop a specified urban area, . . .

—they send an application to Ottawa. Let us suppose a municipality applies to the federal government. What would happen? Is provincial agreement absolutely mandatory? What means do we have available to us to speed up bargaining between the province and the federal government so Quebec municipalities will not be penalized? I do not want to raise a political issue, but strictly an administrative one.

We spend a lot of time in this House passing legislation which I think is good. The one now before us is excellent. But that requires over a year of bargaining between the federal government and the provincial government, and once the bargaining is over municipalities cry for help and the provincial government drags a leg for so-called reasons of autonomy, on the pretext of autonomy.

Mr. Chairman, if I knew that under this act the government of the province of Quebec would have any direct or indirect power of veto I would vote against it because it would be another source of frustration for Quebec municipalities.

I would like to get positive assurance from the minister that he has the true initiative to ensure that municipalities can benefit from that act the implementation of which is absolutely necessary and urgent.

Knowing the interest the minister takes in urban development, urbanization in general and related problems, I am convinced that he understands the kind of question I am now putting to him and that he will provide an adequate answer.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate him again and draw his attention to the important application from the municipality of Victoriaville, and I would like him to know that I appreciated his expediency of answering previously and I would appreciate it even more when the time comes to finalize that application.

[English]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the hon. member's comments but I think it would be quite wrong to attempt in this bill, or in the planning which it involves, or in inter-governmental relationships, to try to bypass the provinces. There are many reasons for this, but one of them is that the provinces have clear jurisdiction over many of the ingredients of a railway relocation plan. The CTC and federal government have authority over the railroads themselves, but it is the provinces, through provincial jurisdiction and regulation, which have control over many of the other aspects of land use planning, zoning, and so on. So it would be a mistake to try to exclude them.

I am as concerned as is the hon. member about possible delay, and my department will do everything possible to make sure that red tape is cut to a minimum. There is one provision here which may help speed up the process. Take the hypothetical case which the hon. member raised of a province which is unwilling to participate in a scheme. Under clause 3, the municipalities themselves are entitled to place applications before the CTC and the provinces concerned indicating their approval or disapproval at that stage. Thus, the municipality would be able to make its application directly, bypassing a three-tiered approach. However, as I say, I think it would be quite wrong to try to exclude the provinces.

Mr. Towers: I do not intend to hold up this legislation, Mr. Chairman, because a great many Canadians have been waiting for it for a long time. On the other hand, I think we would be remiss as members of parliament if we failed to call the minister's attention to one very evident failing, as I see it.

The hon. member for Nipissing, I believe it was, suggested this was a strong piece of Liberal legislation. Well, if this is a strong piece of Liberal legislation I should certainly hate to see a weak piece. I suggest the minister has turned over too much authority and control to the CTC. He would do well to remember that one of his colleagues, the Minister of Transport, said the transportation system was in a mess, and it is in a mess because of the CTC. Yet here we find the Minister of State for Urban Affairs turning over the administration of yet another program to this same body.

I believe the minister would do well to retain a measure of control over this legislation with respect to its administration. It is simply not good enough for him to say he hopes the CTC will administer the program in a capable manner. This is the type of program which should be well conducted in the interest of the people of Canada. What assurance will we have as members of parliament that it will indeed be administered in accordance with the minister's hopes?

The minister has suggested that perhaps one or two areas might assume a major role in respect of this program, leaving the smaller centres across the country to suffer as they do at the present time. I feel the minister should have brought in along with this bill a program of priorities and a set of guidelines for the CTC in its administration of this measure. I also feel the minister should have retained certain control in order that the people of this country might have access to a medium which would allow them a say in how this program should be administered and how the people should benefit.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say a few words on Bill C-27. Many members have said, as I am sure the minister is well aware, that there has been a patient and pregnant pause between the conception of this measure and its finally reaching the House. We are now considering it in the Committee of the Whole and I realize that there is some disposition to moving it forward. But in my particular area of the country the relocation aspect is not as important as safety features at crossings. This particular aspect is of very great concern and interest to the people of eastern Canada, and specifically to the people of Nova Scotia and the Annapolis Valley.

On this occasion I should have liked to refer to this matter of priority, as did the hon. member for Red Deer, but perhaps I would be precluded from doing so by the rules. I had in mind a particular reference to an Atlantic transportation policy.

The Minister of State for Urban Affairs, who is piloting this bill, made an interesting contribution when the bill first came up for consideration. Representatives from the Atlantic provinces have not been as vocal as we might have been in past years when transportation matters were before the House for consideration, and this is perhaps true particularly in respect of this part of this session and our consideration of certain transportation matters.

The discussion of certain aspects of transportation can be likened almost to the waving of a red flag in front of the proverbial bull. No matter how meritorious and justifiable is this matter of railway relocation and safety at crossings, we from eastern Canada see this as a piecemeal operation in spite of the fact there has been a lot of groundwork. Many of us on this side of the House from eastern Canada recall the great concern about Atlantic transportation expressed during the time when the former minister of transport, the present Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, brought forward a bill dealing specifically with land transportation and an amendment to the maritime freight rate structure.

We have waited for too long and too patiently for the development and announcement of further policy planks to build that platform which could properly be called an Atlantic transportation policy. While I cannot make a speech about Atlantic transportation policy today under the auspices of this bill, although I would dearly like to, I should like to know what the Minister of Transport and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs have to say about this subject.

While a program to re-route some of our railway lines in cities in Canada may be esthetically desirable, we in the east are more concerned with safety at unmarked crossings, or at crossings that are marked but inadequately so. I have not been able to find any reference to a schedule of costs applicable to the railway companies in respect of relocation. I have not found any specific reference to the proposed disposition of what might be called special purpose buildings located on railway property in various areas across Canada.

In this regard I have particular reference to water towers, water tanks or even old roundhouses which were constructed to serve specific purposes. Ordinarily under our laws of expropriation the railways are justified in requesting a replacement value for those special purpose buildings, even though the railway companies as well as municipal and provincial authorities know that these buildings are redundant and that the railways should not be allowed to follow the normal expropriation proceedings in asking for full replacement value. As a result of technological advances these buildings and facilities have become redundant.

Without getting into the whole question of whether the CTC chairman should allow relocation, or perhaps should relocate himself off on a spur line, throwing the switch so that he never comes back, I might say that this gentleman has been a very controversial figure, although he was a charming gentleman when he was here in the House. I do not want to get into all that at this stage, but I should like to know whether the minister contemplates some rationale in respect of the special purpose buildings which are in fact eyesores in some of our cities and towns.

Under our present expropriation laws the railway companies can say to the municipalities, the provinces or the CTC that it cost X number of dollars to construct these water tanks or roundhouses and, in spite of the fact that they are redundant today, they should be allowed to recover that same amount.

I am not sure at this stage whether I should continue on this line, or should now call it five o'clock, continuing again at eight.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, as a result of discussions through the usual channels I think there is a disposition to give clause 2 passage at this point. In answer to the hon. member's question, I can assure him that the schedules are designed to reflect current conditions in the determination of net costs. My short answer would, therefore, be yes; and I would be happy to answer at greater length and in greater detail when we come to that particular clause.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the minister for that explanation. I was at another place earlier this afternoon so I am not aware of the disposition to give passage to clause 2. That being the case, I will defer my remarks until a later time. Perhaps I should call it five o'clock.

The Chairman: Does clause 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Is it my understanding that clause 2 is carried?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: It being five o'clock, I do now leave the chair in order that the House might proceed to the consideration of private members' business.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Air Transport—Status of proposed passenger head tax; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Pensions—Possibility of legislation to provide greater protection and escalation for persons in private plans; the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—the Canadian Economy—increase in corporate profits and decrease in labour's share of national income—government action.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motion. Is there an agreement as to the item to be dealt with?

Mr. Lefebvre: Number 7.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that item No. 7 is the item to be pursued during private members' hour?

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED NATIONAL CAMPAIGN TO PROMOTE HIGHWAY SAFETY

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should immediately initiate, in co-operation with provincial governments and appropriate organizations, a national campaign to promote driving safety throughout Canada in the interests of preservation of human life and courtesy among the driving public.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to propose this motion, I wish first to deal with a fundamental question that will trouble at least some hon. members. At the outset I wish to state that this motion is presented with deep seriousness and strong conviction. In this milieu we are often tempted to approach the actions of other members with scepticism bordering on cynicism. Perhaps this is an unavoidable aspect of partisan policies, but it is unfortunate and I hope will not taint consideration of a motion that I can solemnly assure hon. members is not presented as a so-called "motherhood" issue.

Along these lines perhaps I might be permitted to give the background to this resolution. It is customary, Mr. Speaker, for a private member to use his one motion per session to advance a personally felt cause, often based on a particular need of his constituency. Last session, in keeping with that practice, I used my motion to call upon the government to conduct a full inquiry into its plans for an expanded Hamilton civic airport. Although the motion, again in keeping with custom, did not come to a vote, I was indeed pleased when the government finally acted and implemented that suggestion.

Accordingly, it might have well been anticipated that my motion for this session would deal with an issue of special concern to Hamilton-Wentworth, such as the failure of this government to deal adequately with the high water levels on the Great Lakes. Instead, I have chosen to deal with a most grievous situation which affects my constituency as it does all others, and one which should be of special interest to none less than every member of this House.

Last August, The Spectator, the daily newspaper of the Hamilton area, contacted local politicians, including myself, to obtain their reaction to the appalling increase in traffic fatalities and to ask what these elected officials could or would do about the situation. The report on this survey reads as follows:

> Local politicians expressed shock and horror over the people killed on area roads so far this year. And a number pledged action on the ever-mounting massacre.

I was quoted later in that same report as saying:

> One can't be oblivious or complacent about these statistics—

—referring to the traffic death totals, and I went on to say:

> The fact that there needs to be many things done is a demand upon every member of parliament.

My feelings about our common responsibility have only grown in their intensity as I have examined this issue further, and that is why I have chosen this opportunity to fulfil, in some measure, the commitment made those many months ago. That is why I am inviting this House to join me in urging the federal government to initiate a co-ordinated program with the provinces to promote highway safety and driving courtesy throughout Canada.

This, in turn, raises the question as to the efficacy of such programs. These have recently been brought into question as the result of a recent story in an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail on April 19 of this year. But just this morning, in that same newspaper, Dr. G. J. S. Wilde, a professor of psychology at Queen's University at Kingston, dealt with the question of the efficiency and efficacy of safety minded programs. He said:

> A road safety campaign is not necessarily a waste of money if one considers the benefits during the time before the effects wear off. Several examples of cost-effective campaigns are known to professionals who work in the field of road accident prevention. The savings in medical expenses alone outweigh the publicity costs of campaigns such as The Green Cross Code and the Newcastle seat belt campaign in the United Kingdom. In addition, major reductions in human suffering were achieved.
> Closer to home, the campaign directed against drinking and driving in Edmonton in 1972 significantly reduced blood alcohol levels in drivers. Sweden saved 20 per cent of its road deaths immediately following the changeover from left-hand to right-hand traffic, and road fatalities in Britain were reduced by more than 1,000 after their law of .08 blood alcohol came into effect.
> Thus, short-term effects may be considerable even if they do not last.

More important to bear in mind is that at stake are the lives of Canadians, both those foolhardy enough to endanger their own lives and the lives of their all-too-frequent innocent victims. The Canada Safety Council, in a report giving the latest available figures, which covers the year 1972 and which was sent to every hon. member, provides us with disturbing data that indicate the gravity of the situation.

Of the 12,825 total accidental fatalities, the leading cause, by far, was motor vehicle accidents, which accounted for 48.6 per cent of the total. The motor vehicle fatality rate increased from 26 per cent per 100,000 population in the previous year to 28.6 per cent.

[Mr. O'Sullivan.]

In less statistical and perhaps more real terms, 6,237 men, women and children died in 1972 from motor vehicle accidents. And while the data is not yet fully compiled, the numbers, the deaths, keep rising.

Most distressing of all is the grim picture of 771 young Canadians under age 15, looking forward to a full life in a nation that could offer them so much, a nation desirous and deserving of their unique contributions, dying, together with their dreams and their promise, in that same year. Of all accidental deaths involving young people in 1972, 43 per cent were attributable to traffic tragedies, thus reflecting a continuing trend.

We cannot bring back those victims, but neither can we justify those murders. We who remain can do a service to those victims by recalling their passing with a horror that compels each of us to do everything within our personal and collective power to avoid the future loss of lives in such an inglorious and unnecessary cause as the automobile.

My resolution does not pretend to be an ultimate solution. Nor does it attempt to suggest that the federal government has been derelict in its responsibility. I have no doubt that spokesmen for the government will rise in this debate to proclaim the efforts of the federal government to promote traffic safety. In anticipation of those comments I do acknowledge and commend those responsible for safety minded programs such as the promotion of child safety week during the first week of May.

If this chamber had representatives of our provincial governments and the various safety agencies, we could also expect them to rise and rhyme off their individual contributions to driving safety. Again these activities are worthy of commendation.

But my point is that all these governments, agencies and their respective programs would have greater effect and greater chances of success if their efforts were better co-ordinated. A national conference to share the experiences of their individual programs could benefit all participants in their common goal of traffic safety and driving courtesy. I mention driving courtesy in my motion because I believe it to be the very basis of safe driving. The machines and roads we use are meant for living, not for dying, when used properly and in accordance with the laws experience has helped to develop. It is concern for others that prompts driving courtesy and which in turn makes the roads safe.

It is my fervent hope and belief that a great common effort would be more effective and would be justified if its outcome were the saving of even one innocent life from yet another traffic calamity. And so, Mr. Speaker, I present a motion that is non-partisan and constructive the federal government. It might truly be said that this motion is deadly serious in its intent. I hope that the House will consider and endorse this motion in the same spirit with which it is presented.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member no doubt proposed this motion in the express hope that a nationwide effort to combat the road safety problem would lead to a lessening in the number of casualties suffered on our roads each year. I wholeheartedly support this basic intent, as I am sure do all Canadians, particularly in face of the mounting toll of road casualties now exceeding 6,000 persons killed and 200,000 persons injured each year.

The motion as proposed recommends "a national campaign to promote driving safety." There is a certain ambiguity in the use of the term "campaign". It may, for example, simply imply a propaganda or public education campaign. Or the term may be used in its broader sense implying an integrated program.

If we are to interpret "campaign" in the narrow sense of a propaganda campaign, then I submit that this in itself is not the best approach to take in combatting the road safety problem. Road safety campaigns can be very expensive to develop and run. And they can, with distressing frequency, be totally ineffective in meeting their objective of reducing road casualties, as witness an American campaign sponsored by the National Safety Council to increase seat belt usage levels. This campaign cost over $50 million, and had no measurable effect on the proportion of vehicle occupants wearing seat belts.

An international group of experts in public education reported in 1971 that "many safety campaigns of the last decade or so simply could not have the desired effect because they were not planned in accordance with what is presently known about behavior modification through mass communication." The group, which met under the auspices of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, reviewed the effectiveness of many public education campaigns and concluded that such campaigns are more likely to be effective when co-ordinated with other road safety programs, such as legislation and enforcement.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, despite the best of motivations on the part of the developers of public education campaigns, and in spite of the most lavish of expenditures, we cannot expect that public education will be effective just as a matter of course. We must not panic and, like the proverbial headless chicken, scurry around demanding that somebody do something, regardless of its ultimate worth, just so that we get some action.

On the other hand, if the hon. member's intention was to recommend an attack on road accidents on all fronts, then he is on the right track and I would agree with him. I can assure the hon. member that the government is greatly concerned over the road safety problem and considers the development and implementation of proven counter measures to be a top priority.

In February of this year federal and provincial cabinet ministers responsible for road safety and motor vehicle administration announced their intention to increase co-operation in the form of a co-ordinated five year program to improve highway safety in Canada. In a press release on February 22 it was stated that the goal of this program is to reduce the nation's road traffic fatality rate by 15 per cent over the next five years.

Senior officials from the 11 governments met in Ottawa in March to discuss Canada's road safety programs in the light of this goal. As expressed in a joint statement on March 29 at the conclusion of their discussions, agreement was reached that the greatest potential for reduction in the fatality rate lies in:

1. Increasing the use of seat belts.

2. Reducing the extent of driving while impaired by alcohol through changes in the Criminal Code and increased public education.

3. Identification and correction of hazardous road locations.

4. Emphasis on improving the safety of trucks, buses and school buses through the motor vehicle safety standards program.

5. Improved vehicle maintenance particularly for commercial vehicles through public information and improved service of vehicle inspection.

6. Extension and improvement of driver education programs.

7. Increased police presence.

It was the opinion of these officials that progress must be made in these areas if we are to meet the road safety goal of a 15 per cent reduction in Canada's road traffic fatality rate over the next five years. Despite major efforts to date in safety regulations, road improvement and vehicle design, further action by all levels of government, safety organizations and individual drivers is necessary if the annual escalation of road casualties is to be reversed.

The House will note that public education was mentioned in a number of contexts in the program areas recommended at the federal-provincial meeting. There is no doubt that public education will play a very significant role in the co-operative road safety program that will be implemented over the next five years.

Allow me to elaborate further on those road safety counter measures which offer the greatest likelihood of improvement in our road fatality rate. First of all, there is the question of seat belt usage. There is no doubt in my mind that increasing seat belt usage would be the single and most effective advance that could be made at this time. Seat belts have been required to be installed in all seating positions of new motor vehicles since 1971 in Canada. In practice most automotive vehicles have been equipped with belts since 1966 or even earlier. However, belt usage rates are disappointingly low.

The problem of increasing usage rates has most frequently been tackled by mass media campaigns exhorting people to "buckle up," or asking "Are you putting me on?" This type of public education campaign has been largely ineffective. Public education is more likely to change the public's awareness of the value of seat belts and to make them more receptive to other counter measures that may be introduced, such as ignition interlock systems or possibly seat belt use legislation.

The second area recommended for high priority attention by the federal and provincial road safety officials is the alcohol impaired driving problem. The Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1969 made it an offence for a driver of a motor vehicle to have a blood alcohol content in excess of .08 per cent. The same amendment made it compulsory for a driver to submit to a breath test, when the request to do so is made by a police officer on reasonable grounds.

The federal Department of Transport conducted an expensive public education campaign at that time to inform the public of the amendment and its provisions. Before and after telephone surveys evaluated the effectiveness of this campaign. The results were impressive. The public's knowledge of all the amendment's provisions increased substantially. For example, whereas in the before study only 12 per cent of persons responding were aware that the legal limit was .08 per cent, in the after group 72 per cent of the people could quote this figure.

As effective as this campaign was in informing the public, it should not be assumed that a change in knowledge on the part of the driving public will necessarily result in a change in behavior. A recent study released by the Department of Transport indicates that the so-called breathalizer legislation was largely ineffective in reducing the involvement of alcohol in serious accidents. So while the campaign succeeded in imparting knowledge, it did not succeed, in conjunction with changes in legislation and enforcement methods, in producing the desired behavioral change, namely a reduction in the amount of alcohol-impaired driving in Canada.

The impaired driving problem will not be easily resolved. However, it will retain its position as a priority research and program area because of the seriousness of the problem. It has been demonstrated in numerous excellent studies that alcohol is a factor in fully 50 per cent of all fatal road accidents on this continent.

The road safety officials also recognized the role played by the road network itself in contributing to the occurrence and severity of road accidents. Most highway departments have ongoing programs to identify and treat hazardous road locations. Whether the hazard be a roadside obstacle, a geometric design feature of the roadway—I mean the dangerous curve or hill—or a maintenance hazard dealing with ice or snow, of prime importance to the highway department is the accurate identification of the location and its hazardous features. Once the problem has been identified, the most appropriate remedial action can then be taken to alleviate the hazard.

Of major importance is the effect of hazards on the roadside on the severity of accidents. Eighteen per cent of all road accidents in Canada during 1972 involved single vehicles which ran off the road and rolled or struck an obstacle. However, 27 per cent of all fatal accidents were of this type.

Specifically, a list of counter measures proven effective includes the removal of unnecessary roadside fixed objects, the protection of necessary fixed objects with energy attenuation devices such as collapsible barriers at gore areas, improved guardrail design, and the replacement of structures with solid bases by those with breakaway or frangible bases.

Of course, these are expensive solutions, so it will be necessary to establish priorities and to correct those hazardous road locations that will return the most benefit per dollar expended. The Department of Transport is presently engaged in a research project specifically designed to establish procedures for developing these priorities. A number of provinces have already committed major sums of money for the removal of road hazards.

I am told that consideration was also given at the meeting to priority areas involving the vehicles that use the road system. A specific concern was expressed for the safety of commercial vehicles, including trucks, buses and school buses. More rigid safety standards can be expected for these vehicles through the motor vehicle safety standards program. The safety standards deal with motor vehicles at the time of their manufacture. The extent to which these vehicles retain their safety characteristics depends to a great degree on how they are maintained. The provincial officials reported their considerable interest in improving the level of vehicle maintenance—particularly for commercial vehicles—through augmented public information and vehicle inspection programs.

It should be noted that the federal government has responsibility for but a portion of these priority road safety program areas. The provinces and municipalities have major areas of responsibility in road safety, such as driver licensing, training and police enforcement, as well as those mentioned previously. Therefore it is heartening to see the importance placed at all levels of government on co-ordination of effort in areas of both safety research, program development and program implementation. The provincial and federal governments are committed to documenting their existing road programs with an eye to improving the exchange of program information between government levels and among many countries on an international basis. More attention will be put on program evaluation in the future, with the intention of continually refining and developing those program areas that show themselves most effective.

I think we must face the fact that the road safety problem is not an easy one to solve. There are no simplistic solutions; there are no royal roads to safe driving. Through the "fifties and" sixties progress has been made in improving the road and the vehicle. The continually increasing demand for vehicular transportation in this country, as in all the world, will continue to make it exceedingly difficult to make absolute reductions in the number of road casualties. However, the government believes that it will only be through an integrated and well-developed road safety program, with major effort from government, industry and the general populace, that possible improvements can be realized.

I am advised, Mr. Speaker, that it is precisely this approach that the government is taking.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address a few remarks to the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan), I do so with a deep appreciation for the importance of driver safety counter measures. I share the concern of all members of the House, I am sure, when it comes to the problem of traffic safety. I rise to speak today with the confident knowledge that Canada, and the government in particular, has not been remiss in its duty to deal positively with the problem of traffic deaths and injuries.

As my hon. colleague has just mentioned, the representatives participating in the recent federal-provincial meeting on road safety identified a number of areas for concentration. One of the areas singled out for special attention was the need for reducing the extent of driving while impaired by alcohol. I wish to discuss this problem today in light of the hon. member's motion for a national road safety campaign.

The effects of alcohol in traffic accidents have been well documented and there can be no doubt left in anyone's mind as to the seriousness of this problem. It is estimated that in Canada 50 per cent of all driver fatalities can be linked to the effects of alcohol. Of these, roughly 80 per cent have a blood alcohol content of .10 per cent or greater, even though the law in Canada states that it is illegal to operate a motor vehicle if the blood alcohol content is .08 per cent or more.

Before I describe a few of the steps that have been taken to find solutions to the drinking and driving problem, I would first like to ask, "Who is the drinking driver"? As a recent Department of Transport report on alcohol and highway safety points out,

> There is strong evidence from existing studies, that while the problem drinkers and alcoholics make up a small proportion of the total population, they account for a very considerable part of the over-all problem of traffic fatalities.

The results of past studies on criminological, sociological and psychological factors relating to drinking drivers have revealed a character analysis of the drinking driver as predominantly male, and if I may quote further:

> The highest levels of blood alcohol are frequently found, not in the very young, nor in the older drivers, but in persons between the mid-twenties to the mid-fifties. Those drivers who are divorced, separated, or have relatively low levels of education, are also more likely to drive after drinking. Personality studies of individuals apprehended for driving after heavy drinking have pointed at the high incidence of paranoid ideation, self-destructiveness, suicidal tendencies, hostility, obsessional rumination, manual occupation, criminal records, neuroticism, extraversion, social immaturity and willingness to accept risks.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to reach these individuals by mass publicity or any other device presently available for use.

The government is continuing research into the study of types of drinking drivers and it is hoped that the results will enable more effective programs to be designed. The drinking and driving problem has been approached in two ways. The first is in the legal area of strict laws and enforcement. The second is an extensive national and international research program.

The .08 per cent or breathalyzer section of the Criminal Law Amendment Act became law in December, 1969. The effects of this counter measure have been monitored to determine the results. It was anticipated that we would find a reduction in fatal accidents. A recent Department of Transport survey indicates that a small reduction in fatalities was realized the first year, 1970, but unfortunately the law is no longer effecting a decrease. In the light of the situation it is clear that we must continue to search for more effective methods. The representatives at the federal-provincial meeting agreed that changes in the legislation, together with a major education campaign to gain support from the public, might be an effective means of overcoming this problem.

In saying this, I do not wish to imply that the law enforcement officials have been lax in their duty, for we all know the tremendous and difficult task they face in identifying the drunk drivers. Because a person is charged with a criminal offence when his blood alcohol content is over .08, per cent law enforcement officials have to be extremely cautious before they submit someone to a breath test. Consequently, the average readings across Canada for those persons being charged is .16 per cent, double the legal level of impairment.

What I would like to suggest is that the police need help in more accurately identifying the offenders. To this end research on roadside screening methods is continuing, and hopefully it will have two worthwhile outcomes. The first is to assure that a suspected drinking driver is not unnecessarily inconvenienced and, secondly, to assure that those at the lower levels of impairment are not escaping detection.

Canada had responsibility for the alcohol and highway safety sub-project of the NATO Pilot Study in Road Safety and has completed a report which reviews the alcohol/driving countermeasures that have been tried in many countries and suggests which ones warrant further examination. It is clear that there is no one solution to this problem and that much more information is needed about the extent of drinking/driving before valid comparisons of countermeasure effectiveness can be made. The study therefore recommends that roadside surveys, designed to obtain a measure of blood alcohol in drivers, be conducted in all member countries. A protocol for conducting these roadside surveys was developed and is included as a part of the final report.

Roadside surveys have been used in Canada to evaluate the effectiveness of drinking and driving campaigns as well as to gather information of the blood alcohol content of drivers on the roads during the day and evening hours.

In 1971, for example, a roadside survey in Alberta was conducted in conjunction with a public education campaign to discourage drinking and driving over the Christmas season. This was a joint effort between the federal Ministry of Transport and the Canada Safety Council. The measure of success obtained indicates that this method of public education campaign may be a potentially effective means of lowering the incidence of drunk-driving over the critical Christmas season.

So far I have confined my remarks to the Canadian government's national and international activities, but let us not forget the dedicated involvement of each of the provincial governments in designing provincial programs, or the Canada Safety Council, the Traffic Injury Research Foundation or the various other safety-minded groups too numerous to mention who have worked dedicatedly across Canada to increase Canada's awareness of the problem and to encourage us all to make a concentrated effort to lower traffic accident statistics.

Although, Mr. Speaker, I have restricted my comments to the problem of drinking and driving I am well aware that this is but one element of the federal-provincial co-operative program already referred to by my hon. colleagues.

Road Safety

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, although I shall speak for only a moment or two, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan) on using his one and only private member's motion during this session to raise the important subject of driving safety. I commend him for the forceful speech he made and hope that by the time he has been here for as long as some of the rest of us, the picture regarding deaths on our highways will have altered greatly.

I suppose one could predict, as the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth did, that spokesmen on the government side would give us a list of all the things the government has done in trying to cope with motor vehicle carnage; yet I enjoin my good friend from Hamilton-Wentworth not to be cynical about it. I say that because the list of things mentioned by spokesmen on the other side underlines that there are many factors which contribute to automobile accidents and to the loss of life. It is good to know that there is concern about all these important causes and problems.

Both of the members on the government side who have spoken thus far said a good deal about the part alcohol plays in automobile accidents. Certainly, the statistics tell a gruesome story in that respect. There was reference to the efforts to lay down standards for the manufacture of cars, so that they will be built with safety features. There was reference to making more universal the use of seat belts, to extensive driver training and driver licensing programs, and there have also been comments on the need for intelligent and effective engineering of our highways. A great deal has been done in this area in recent decades in terms of making highways more safe, getting rid of obstacles to vision and getting rid of those things which increase the number of accidents.

I hope my friend from Hamilton-Wentworth joins me in welcoming the list of things to which attention has been paid. We also make the point that the incidence of deaths which take place because of automobile accidents is so high, so serious, that we need to double and redouble our efforts to prevent accidents. The extent of loss of life because of motor vehicle accidents is one of the most gruesome scandals of the twentieth century. When one considers the number of human beings who have lost their lives in motor vehicle accidents since 1900, one wonders whether the human race is as sensible as it claims to be.

Regardless of what happens to the present motion raised in today's private members' hour, the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth has done a service by raising the issue. I join with him in calling for doubled and redoubled effort in all ways that can cut down the loss of life on our highways. I say to the hon. member that he has done well to raise this issue. I call on him to stick with it.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak about the bill before us as I consider it is a matter of general interest. I entirely agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that it is our duty, not only as members of Parliament but also as Canadian citizens, to strive harder than ever to reduce the mortality rate on Canadian highways. I wish to commend the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan) who in his bill, gives hon. members an opportunity to discuss during this hour the problem facing us.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, even if I entirely agree with the motion, I have some reservations because I do not think that the general education programs and the publicity made through television, radio and so on will change the attitude of Canadian citizens about highways and the way they are used.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, I think it is essential that we teach the youth at the primary or secondary education level and pursuade them to take the necessary precautions for using the transportation system at our disposal.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, everyone knows that it is at this level that preventive action is most efficient. In fact, it is at the age when children are rather impressionable that we must direct our efforts. I entirely agree that it might be profitable for publicity agencies to receive contracts from provincial and federal governments to communicate information concerning road safety but nevertheless it is in the present educational system and within the existing framework that we should concentrate more and more our efforts.

● (1740)

There is another problem with regard to the instruments we have for transportation purposes. We have our roads and our automobiles. I come from an area that is discriminated against in so far as road safety is concerned. Indeed, in my area of northern Ontario, the roads are horrible. Most accidents are not caused by driver neglect, but the condition of the roads.

Highway 64 which runs from the southern to the northern portion of the province connects with highways 17 and 11. I am sure I am accurate when I state that road has been responsible for more deaths in the past generation than any other stretch of road in Canada. The portion between Sturgeon Falls and Field is one of the worst pieces of pavement ever constructed and maintained by man. I admit that road comes within provincial jurisdiction, but in his motion the hon. member recognizes that the provincial government has to be involved in this particular program. Numerous representations have been made to the Ontario government, but they have refused so far to improve that road. They have refused to consider the essential nature of transportation in northern Ontario and the necessity of maintaining highways in good condition.

Although this did not relate to road safety, I might indicate that during the months of March and April the only industry in the town of Field, Field Lumber, was closed because of the half-load limit imposed by the Ontario government on that road. They will impose a half-load limit, but refuse to improve the condition of that road to make it useable by industry and private citizens.

There is also considerable difficulty as a result of automobile design. This, too, results in discrimination with regard to road safety in Canada. Indeed, the fact that automobiles used in Canada are designed in the United States is detrimental to road safety. There is no doubt that American cars, which are used predominantly in Canada, are great for the toll roads and main highways in the United States, but they do not do the job when transplanted to northern Ontario.

I have a Pontiac Ventura. I find it necessary to carry about 250 pounds of bricks and concrete blocks in the trunk in order to maintain the stability of that car on icy roads in northern Ontario. I might also point out that when driving in the snow in northern Ontario, the ventilation system sucks the snow that is flying around into the cab, completely fogging the inside of the windshield. If these are not errors in design of major proportions, I do not know what to call them. Accepting American design without question contributes more to danger than any other factor. Because of unsafe roads such as highway 64, and the design and engineering of automobiles, residents of northern Ontario are further discriminated against.

I am sure that the automobile insurance rates are higher in my area of northern Ontario than anywhere else in the province. I do not relate that to the quality of driving. Surely, drivers in northern Ontario are as qualified as those in southern Ontario. I relate this directly to the unsatisfactory conditions of the roads in northern Ontario and the unsatisfactory design of the automobiles that ply them. I suggest that greater attention be given to those two faults.

Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that we would all like to live in a country where going from one place to another poses no problems. I know that courtesy on the road leaves much to be desired. It is imperative that Canadian drivers acquire better habits. We must also consider as essential the implementation of an information program to better educate the public and instil in it a greater respect for our driving laws and human life.

Mr. Speaker, in our area, few families have been spared the tragedy of a fatal accident on the road. Those tragedies must of all necessity be avoided. At one time, we thought that by imposing limits to the level of inebriation tolerated on the road we would reduce somewhat the number of fatal accidents. There was considerable publicity about the measures the police would take to prevent people from using the road and their car when intoxicated or almost. Unfortunately, in spite of the relevant publicity, we notice that proceedings, because of the breathalizer test, did not have the expected effect. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that this is so, but I am coming back to my first remarks saying that it would not be through legal sanctions that you will stop people from abusing the transportation system. Neither will it be through a system of general education applied through a means of information that the situation will be changed. You must first return to the young and educate them within the prevalent educational system. We should ask the governments of Ontario and of the other provinces, and the federal government, to save some funds for this purpose.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, in a nationalist context such as ours, we must also prepare cars for our Canadian climate to carry us from point A to point B in total security. Mr. Speaker, I would like to invite the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth to encourage his fellow members of the provincial party to take measures to improve roads, the pavement so that we in northern Ontario could enjoy road safety. All citizens of Ontario should benefit from cars equipped for winter, cars which can stand two winters and, furthermore, should have insurance rates comparable to southern Ontario. This comes under provincial jurisdiction; however, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth for giving me the chance to show the provincial governments that it is necessary to improve road conditions. It is also a provincial responsibility to see that cars come under road security standards.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate on the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan). Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I wish to congratulate him for giving us this opportunity to discuss a serious matter, one which affects the safety of so many of our citizens. Members in all quarters of the House are much concerned about the numbers of people who are killed or injured every year on our highways and we are all in accord, I think, in our views on this important issue.

We have at hand the single, most effective weapon for combatting the tragic loss of life on our nation's highways. I am referring, of course, to seat belts. The evidence is unanimous that seat belts work, that they are effective in reducing deaths and injuries resulting from traffic accidents. Recent Canadian research on seat belts gave rise to the following conclusion:

> The studies which were reviewed generally agree that with total usage of lap and shoulder belts, fatalities could be reduced by half. This means that in Canada, in 1972, more than 1,700 vehicle occupant fatalities would have been saved if everyone had been wearing the seat belts available.

No similar claim can be made with regard to any other immediately available counter measure. There is no other readily available measure to reduce the toll of death and injury from traffic accidents which could approach the potential to be realized by the universal use of seat belts.

In fact, the Canadian government, through the Motor Vehicles Safety Act and regulations, has recognized the importance of seat belts by requiring their fitment in all new automobiles sold in Canada after January 1, 1971. These regulations are continually being up-dated to take account of new technology. The latest change, effective January 1, 1974, required fitment of the best currently available seat belt design, the three-point lap and shoulder combination with inertia-reel, a truly comfortable and easy-to-use system.

Current seat belt research is aimed toward developing "passive" seat belts. Such a belt deploys automatically about the occupant as he seats himself in his vehicle and stows itself automatically as he leaves the vehicle. In its other aspects it is similar to the belts currently being installed in new vehicles. Prototype models indicate that these belts retain all the advantages of the conventional belt yet dispense with the requirement for any action on the part of the driver or passenger, at a relatively low cost. This system holds great potential and it is my view that its development should be hastened, perhaps by government action.

Even though it is indisputable that the wearing of seat belts reduces the risk of death and injury, and even though seat belts are available today in the vast majority of cars, the percentage who actually wear these devices is still very low—probably no more than 10 per cent or 15 per cent of vehicle occupants. Fully aware of this, the government has sought to influence usage by direct, legislative means. Since July 1, 1972, legislation has required that automobiles be equipped with a buzzer-light warning system which activates if seat belts are not fastened while the car is operating. However, due to the relative ease with which these devices can be by-passed, they have not proved particularly successful in promoting usage.

Public education campaigns have long been regarded by governments as a method by which the wearing of seat belts is encouraged. Unfortunately, most of them have been based on an incomplete understanding of the processes at work, and, hence, have failed. In the words of the review of seat belt usage habits in 16 European countries:

> The information and education campaigns so far conducted have been largely successful in convincing drivers and passengers of the usefulness of seat belts, but have had limited effect in inducing vehicle occupants to actually wear them, doubtless because insufficiently strong motivation exists.

Governments have available to them a method for providing this motivation. Laws prescribing that seat belts shall be worn have proven effective in several countries, notably in Australia. The director of the New South Wales traffic accident research unit said in July, 1972:

> Surveys of seat belt wearing . . . showed that the percentage of those wearing seat belts in front seat positions rose from around 25 per cent before legislation to around 75 per cent very soon afterward.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The hour provided for private members' business has now expired. Perhaps the House would agree to go back into committee before I call it six o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RAILWAY RELOCATION AND CROSSING ACT

PROVISION FOR PLANNING, ACQUISITION OF LAND, GRANTS, GRADE CROSSING ASSISTANCE

House again in committee on Bill C-27, to facilitate the relocation of railway lines or rerouting of railway traffic in urban areas and to provide financial assistance for work done for the protection, safety and convenience of the public at railway crossings—Mr. Basford—Mr. Boulanger in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo).]

The Committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: When the committee was interrupted at five o'clock this afternoon clause 2 of the bill had been carried. Shall clause 3 carry.

On Clause 3—Application to commission.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I know there are other members who want to speak on this as well as other clauses of this bill, so at this stage I will keep my remarks short. Clause 3 under Part I, respecting joint urban development and transportation plans, begins to outline a litte more fully the objectives of this bill in respect of relocation of rails in certain urban areas of the country, along with the development of more safety features at railways crossings. I understand that this plan also applies in respect of rural areas.

Before we recessed for dinner, I had referred to transportation in this country as being somewhat symptomatic of the lack of transportation policy in this country. I appreciate that this is perhaps not the time to make a comprehensive speech on transportation matters throughout the country, and specifically in Atlantic Canada, but I should point out in passing that the Minister of Transport confessed not long ago that transportation was in a mess.

After 11 years under this present government, perhaps the Minister of Transport is to be complimented for his frankness as exemplified by his confession that transportation generally, and specifically in respect of policy, was in an absolute mess in this country. I do not think he used the word, "absolute", but he certainly said it was in a mess. As we sit on this side of the House considering different piecemeal approaches under different ministers of transport to this whole matter of transportation, we can only echo that transportation is in a bad way across the country. Whether this particular bill should be supported by all members of this House because it will help unify safety features in respect of railway crossings in various cities is a matter for debate, nevertheless this bill does not offer any solutions for the fundamental problems of transportation.

This country was born, grew and developed on the basis of its transportation, and whether we are free enterprise socialists, liberal socialists, as we call them today, or Conservatives we must all agree that it was the CPR, the link between the east and the west, that finally drew this country together. Ironically, in this day of communications and increased technology, it is perhaps the problems of transportation or the lack of a transportation policy in the national sense that is really causing some of the divisiveness and disunity in this country. But here we have Bill C-27 which will make more beautiful some of our urban areas in Canada, which will perhaps take down some water tanks, shift some roundhouses and engage in other like ventures as well as perhaps help to improve safety on the road and relocate railway crossings across the country.

The Minister of Transport who is not in the House right now, confessed that Canada has no transportation policy. I wonder what was the reason for this confession. I was a member of this House, as were other members on this side and some on the opposite side, when that great bill on the national transportation policy was brought to the House. It was supposed to revolutionize the concept of transportation in this country. All modes of transport were supposed to charge what the traffic would bear. As a result of that bill the Canadian Transport Commission was established headed by the former minister of transport, Mr. Pickersgill, at a very interesting and rewarding salary. Then, we went from the Pickersgillian pork barrel to the late minister of finance—I say "late" although he is still very much with us but is no longer minister of finance here—who became the next chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission.

I wonder if perhaps one of the problems of transportation—be it railway crossings or relocation of railway crossings in the centre of the city—is that politics, political appointments and political necessities have been the dominant considerations governing many of the decisions of this government. Regardless of the personalities of the chairmen of the CTC, whether it was Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Benson or whoever else may become the next chairman, this is not the way to decide the transportation policy and the future of our railways.

Speaking of railways, there is something that has not received much attention since the recent appointments. We have two national railroads, the CPR and the CNR, and here again one wonders if perhaps politics are not influencing the decisions that are being made in the running of these two corporations. We have a brand new president and a brand new chairman of the CNR. The former president, Mr. MacMillan, was evidently doing a good job so that he has had to be replaced by two individuals. One would have thought that this government might have learned from the experience of Air Canada that when you diminish the responsibility of a chief executive, and this is especially true in transportation—on when you start to divide that responsibility, you find that the organization does not have the drive that it would have had under one chief executive officer. Personally, I do not know the two new gentlemen who are running the CNR, but judging from the experience of Air Canada and the fact that two individuals were appointed by this government to run that corporation, this mistake should not have been made again because Air Canada has run into a lot of problems.

If we really wanted to look into the problems of Air Canada tonight, I would have to go into greater detail to outline them than I am permitted under this bill. But here we are doing the same thing with the CNR. I do not know the background of these two gentlemen who are now replacing the president of the CNR and I do not know whether they were formerly CNR vice-presidents, but I do know that one of them has not been very long with the railway. However, I wonder whether that is the way to solve some of the problems of the CNR. So, here we have the Canadian Transport Commission, which is one of the main bodies responsible for implementing the policy under this bill, and the CNR, which is one of the two main railways affected by this bill. We will put a postage stamp here, do a patchwork job there, but in terms of a fundamental transportation policy we are not facing the realities and putting forward solutions that some of these pressing problems deserve.

I am sorry to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare leave the House, but may I suggest that with his great experience in piloting the football legislation through the House, and having been the grey eminence behind the throne before he was elected, he might have been useful in curing some of the sicknesses in the transportation system of this country. Perhaps instead of concentrating on football and worrying about health and welfare, if we are really going to carry this dual concept to an extreme—the Russians wanted a troika at the head of the United Nations so that no one could do anything but we prefer dual authority in the CNR and Air Canada—perhaps we could have the minister move out of his legislative role and help Mr. Benson. Perhaps, we should have him move into the CTC to help balance the Benson rudder with a Lalonde rudder.

Mr. MacKay: Perhaps we could do the same with the Minister of Supply and Services.

Mr. Nowlan: No, I would not want him to go anywhere.

I know that there are other hon. members who want to speak on this bill. I do not have anything critical to say of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs who is piloting this bill. This is basically a transport bill, a transport problem. Although it affects cities it also affects many rural parts of Canada. I know that the Minister of Transport, who has a lot of intestinal fortitude, is not hiding behind the skirts or the suit of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, but when you have the Minister of Transport in a government that has been in power in this country for 11 years confesssing that our transportation policy is a mess and that the only thing we can do is to adopt a bandaid approach to certain localized problems, then I say it is time something was done. The eastern part of Canada is dependent on a viable transportation policy, something we were promised in 1969 by the then minister of transport.

Our problem is centred around the maritime freight rates policy. I say that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will have real problems on his hands with regard to that. I am glad to see him come into the House—there must be some telepathy between us. If the maritime freight rates subsidy, which is as basic to Eastern transportation as are the Crowsnest pass rates to the west, is affected then the shipment of goods from one part of the country to another will also be affected so that viable industry will be hard pressed to continue, let alone to expand, on the basis of this type of policy. I say that this government has grave problems, and yet here we are talking about railway relocation and the safety of railway crossings.

I know that there are other hon. members who want to say a few more words on this bill. All I have to say about railway safety and railway relocation is that the sooner we come to grips with the fundamental problems in the country, the better off we will be. The most fundamental problem right now is to find out where the government of this country is and who is running this country so that we can have a government making decisions on basic questions in all areas, not just on transportation policy. Canadians will really only have real safety when they relocate this government on the opposition side and have this party go to the government side. Then a policy will be adopted affecting railway crossings, affecting urban beauty and improvement, but fundamentally creating a viable transportation system and making this a better country for all Canadians.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, thank you for recognizing me. I would like to speak about clause 3 of Bill C-27.

Before the dinner hour, I asked the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) to give me a guarantee or a concrete assurance about the bill we are studying and I hope we will pass it so that it will apply from one ocean to the other, and make all Canadians equal under the law, in spite of often hardly inexplicable wills in certain provinces.

The minister did not well understand what I said, i.e. what would happen if a municipality located in another province wanted to benefit from the bill under study. Could it do it? The minister answered that this was against the principle of consultation with or intervention by the provinces.

But this was not the question. I was only repeating what Hansard said he said on page 1757.

The House is now studying clause 3. I would like to be very exact about this. It is said and I quote:

3. (1) Where, in respect of an area in a province that includes or comprises an urban area . . . the government of the province and all the municipalities within that area have agreed upon an urban development plan and transportation plan (hereinafter in this Part called an "accepted plan") . . .

—up to then, all goes well, there are no problems. I continue quoting clause 3:

. . . for that transportation study area, the province or a municipality . . .

—this is what the minister told me before lunch. In answer to my question, he referred to clause 3 where it is stipulated that "the province or a municipality—"

But the minister did not then continue the quotation. But, if you continue, you can see on line 10—

. . . the province or a municipality acting on behalf of the province . . .

Which means, Mr. Chairman, that a province, no matter what its needs, its situation or the common interests of the people living in this urban area, will not be able to avail itself of the benefits of this bill which, I hope, will be endorsed by the greater majority of hon. members. Therefore, the people living in this municipality will not be treated on an equal footing with the rest of the Canadian people.

In my opinion, once it has been passed by Parliament, an act should apply to the whole of Canada, without consideration of language, race, creed, or province of residence. Because Parliament is the supreme body, such an act should be recognized and adhered to by the whole of Canada. When Bill C-133 was adopted by this House, granting the provinces $250 million with which to improve abandoned or outdated neighbourhoods and develop low cost housing, we sincerely believed that this legislation would apply universally to the whole of Canada.

This legislation was adopted in June 1973 and it has not yet been implemented in Quebec, while in Ontario, over $36 million have been spent up to now. Mr. Chairman, I think this is not acceptable.

I do not cast any blame on the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) for this, because I know very well who is bluffing in the implementation of this law. The point I want to get across to him is that we, in Quebec, wish to be considered Canadians and respected as all other Canadians; we do not want to be set aside because some government puts peanut politics and autonomy ahead of its citizens way of life.

Mr. Chairman, Bill C-27 comes as the normal and logical sequence of Bill C-133. And because the latter supplements the former, to promote urbanization, mainly in the core of cities such as Winnipeg, Toronto and in small municipalities, this means that if tonight, as member for Lotbinière, I vote in good faith for the bill, I have to bear in mind that one or two years hence neither Bill C-133 nor Bill C-27 will be implemented in Quebec, and this I cannot accept.

I would like the minister to give me some guarantee tonight that Bill C-133 will bring some advantage to the people of Quebec as much as to those of British Columbia. And I would like him to say what mechanism he provided for in the implementation of Bill C-127 so relocations of railway lines could take place in Quebec, Ontario or Manitoba.

Mr. Chairman, I am not a separatist, I am a Canadian, and proud to be one, but I am sick and tired of voting legislation in this Parliament which has no effect in my own province. I would like the provinces to be consulted before a bill is brought in before Parliament so that when it is passed the bill previously agreed to by all provinces can apply from one coast to the other without distinction.

When under clause 3 the right of a municipality is limited to "acting on behalf of the province", that means—and I draw the minister's attention to that—that the province has a right of veto on the application of this act.

Mr. Chairman, that is not true federalism since any province could decide as it pleased under the opting out rule to withdraw from the legislation voted by the supreme institution that is Parliament. The time that the minister and his officials will have spent implementing or see this legislation through will be time lost.

Mr. Chairman, I would have several questions to put to the minister. What progress has been made in the discussions on Bill C-133 with the province of Quebec? Who is blocking the decisions? The provincial government or the federal government? What relationship is there between Bill C-27 and Bill C-133 and is there any relationship in the setting up of urban planning areas, such as the minister wants, and I congratulate him for that, what guarantee can he give me that Bill C-27 will be more respected in the province of Quebec than Bill C-133? Have there been up to now any discussions or negotiations with any or all of the provinces before this bill was tabled for first reading on April 22 last? Were there discussions with the provinces? If so, what was the provincial response? Did they give their sine qua non agreement? Did they object or did they tell the minister he had their support? What was Quebec's answer on this bill? I would like the minister to put that down in black and white, tonight or tomorrow, to protect me against the Quebec government, who in six months time, for petty reasons of partisan policies, will object to this bill on the grounds of autonomy and small politics.

Mr. Chairman, this is my position. I strongly support this bill since it meets a real need and places at the disposal of our municipalities the money that they need to promote urban development zones. However, because of certain foolish members of our provincial gouvernements, including the Minister responsible for Urban Affairs in Quebec, Quebec will not benefit from this bill and this money. This, Mr. Chairman, is no longer profitable federalism. For my part, I do not believe in politicians, but in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I am counting on the good will of the minister to reassure me and my colleagues on this point. And because I am not confident that the Quebec government will respect the laws of Canada, because I accuse the Bourassa government of being more separatist than the Parti québécois of René Levesque, I say that Premier Bourassa is even more separatist than the separatist party, this is why he does not have my confidence. This is why I would like removed from clause 3 the phrase which says that a municipality will be able to benefit from this biil provided it acts on behalf of the province.

For my part, I say that a municipality that needs federal assistance for the common good should be able to act as far as possible with the agreement of its provincial government. Otherwise, a financial mechanism should be provided to ensure that the municipality will benefit from the assistance, not in a tripartite way, but bilaterally, that is, by the action of the municipal government in association with the federal government.

● (2030)

There is no reason why Victoriaville, Warwick, Princeville or my whole riding should be deprived of those amounts of money, when cities like St. Boniface, Sudbury and Hamilton benefit from them. We would be lucky if we had a provincial government that truly believes in Canada, but we do not have that in Quebec, and we too would like to benefit from those advantages. That is why I move the following amendment to clause 3:

That clause 3 of Bill C-27 be amended by deleting the words "on behalf of the province" in line 11 and substituting therefore the words "on its own behalf".

That means, Mr. Chairman, that from now on we are going to build a strong Canada, and make participants of Canadians, municipalities and governments. We are going to make responsible governments of our municipalities and no longer have governments that suffer the unfortunate decisions of some provincial governments. That means, Mr. Chairman, that those of our provincial governments that are not Canadian will have to choose between separatism or reintegrating the ranks of Canadians. Mr. Chairman, the Quebec government which gargles with great literary quotations and autonomy, will have to take advantage of federalism, will have to decide where it belongs in Canada, or else separate. I therefore ask my colleagues of other provinces to support me in this, in order that all Canadians, from sea to sea, be placed on an equal footing.

[English]

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in this debate for a brief moment, a number of questions have been forming in my mind as I have listened to it and read those parts which I did not hear. The bill suggests to me that a lot more power will be given to the Canadian Transport Commission. I always thought the Minister of Transport felt that the Commission had much power already and he had none at all. If I am correct in my interpretation of his remarks with regard to transportation in Canada, it is no wonder he is neither taking part in this debate nor in the House listening to it. He probably detests every word of it, seeing more power being given to the CTC and less possibility of a modern transportation system in Canada. Perhaps even a little bit more power is going to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, although I do not see how he enters into the picture other than that he might be the kind of person who can pilot the bill through the House without too much difficulty. The other minister who appears to have some power under the bill is the Minister of Public Works.

As I interpret the amendment put forward by the previous speaker, the onus is upon the municipality to apply for restitution for some kind of improved transportation system. I do not know how many municipalities there are in Canada, but if each one puts forward suggested improvements in the transportation system, we may find ourselves in greater trouble than we are in now, so perhaps we should take a little bit more care to analyse this bill.

Clause 3 (1), of Part I specifically provides "hereinafter in this part called an 'accepted plan'. I looked through the bill to find out what would constitute an "accepted plan", in the eyes of the commission, for an urban transportation development system. I find that the clause goes on to say:

... for that transportation study area, the province or a municipality acting on behalf of the province may, subject to subsection (5) ...

So a municipality may submit what it considers to be an "accepted plan" for a rail grade improvement, a rerouting of present highways to have an overpass on a given railroad or, even, to develop what might be considered as urban transportation within that urban community.

First of all, one should assess what is meant by urban area. In his speech the minister gave the Statistics Canada definition of any area of 30,000 or any community of 1,000 square miles. But that is not the problem facing the major cities across Canada today, Mr. Chairman. They want some kind of study which will determine whether it is feasible for them to develop an urban transportation system within cities with a population of 250,000, 500,000, three-quarters of a million, one million or better. The question is, for which size of city would it be economically feasible to develop an urban transportation system? The bill does not answer that question at all, and I wonder if the Minister of State for Urban Affairs who is piloting this bill through, has an answer. When discussing that part of the bill between clauses 3 and 9, or even 7 and 9, the minister should tell the committee how large those urban areas will be which may qualify for assistance with urban transit systems. I ask the minister to spell out clearly whether he considers an urban transport system economically feasible for cities of one million, 750,000, 500,000, or even 250,000. How big must a place be before it can qualify for aid. So far in this debate he has not told us.

Clause 3 deals with the transportation study area. Is the federal government leaving it to the municipalities to say they need urban transit and is it saying, "We will give you X dollars if you think you can build an urban transit system?" Or, does the federal government intend to establish the same kind of urban transport system for all urban centres of Canada? If so, the government ought to lay down guidelines with regard to criteria and size. I do not want to see happening what I have seen in the United States. In some cities there are, on the same street, streetcars, a trolley bus system, a diesel bus system and, in some cases, a subway system underground. There might even be a monorail system above ground. Under this legislation as drafted, municipalities could set up whatever systems they please. If the system is accepted, they would get a contribution from the government. Which system does the government favour? Is it monorail, the subway, the diesel bus, the trolley bus, or the streetcar which is still plying some streets in Canada.

The government will pay 50 per cent of the cost of a relocation study. How will that affect the CNR? That company, according to the former president, owns 190 choice acres in downtown Toronto. The president could not give the transport committee the value of the land; I suggest that its value is astronomically high.

Mr. Alexander: It could be as much as $2 billion.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): My hon. friend from Hamilton West suggests it could be worth $2 billion. Perhaps he is right. The government should spell out in the bill the conditions under which it will pay 50 per cent of the cost of the relocation study. I am not overly favourable towards the idea of giving the CNR 190 choice acres in downtown Toronto, which is some of the most valuable real estate in Canada. I am not in favour of my constituents' money being spent to provide the CNR with millions and millions of dollars from the sale or use of land in downtown Toronto.

The bill should be more specific as to what plans will be permitted. Under the bill a certain percentage of the cost of relocation programs will be borne by the government. It is designed to pour oil on troubled waters, in this case the railways, in the hope of placating them. This is a motherhood bill. It even makes provision for railway crossings in small municipalities. If I were not so certain there is not going to be an election I would be inclined to think that this bill has been introduced to foster the hopes and aspirations of many municipal councils, but not to satisfy them.

The bill does not spell out which plans will be accepted. If we are to overhaul the Canadian transport system, we should not overhaul it municipality by municipality or city by city; we should overhaul it from coast to coast. We must overhaul it with a view to improving transportation, not with a view to creating a hodge-podge system, under which different transport systems will be accepted by different municipalities. That is why I suggest that there should be across Canada one universally accepted mode of urban transit. We do not want to see a monorail system in Toronto, a subway in Montreal, and some other surface system in Edmonton, be that diesel bus, trolley car or streetcar. We want to see the same kind of system serving the entire country, which will make for ease of maintenance and economy of repair.

I suggest the federal government should say, "The same kind of system will operate across the country", instead of saying, "We accept the Toronto plan and system but we do not accept the Edmonton system, and therefore will not help Edmonton." The federal government should lay down criteria for acceptable plans and systems. It should award money according to a points system. If a city meets certain of the requirements, it should score so many points and qualify for a certain level of aid. I think that there should be a limit to the percentage of aid for which one can qualify. I readily concede that it would cost more to build a transit system in a larger centre than in a smaller, that it may cost more to relocate railway lines and build grade crossings in large centres than in small.

I am not enthusiastic about paying the railways 80 per cent of the cost of marking railway cars and locomotives. I think the railways should devise a system for marking their cars clearly so that they are visible by day and by night, but do this without asking the CTC to pay 80 per cent of the cost. In my opinion that would not be proper.

Before we build major urban transit systems, we should study the likely effect of these systems. According to the Financial Post of November 3, about 1.4 billion people in the early 1950's were using some kind of urban transit facility. By 1974 the figure had dropped considerably. In the same period the number of people travelling by car on urban roads had doubled. So, we must assess the effects of any urban transit plan and ask, will the population of a given area support such a plan, and how large must a community be if a plan is to be successful.

I may refer to some of the programs which have already been carried out, within the city of Vancouver the CPR has evacuated a large amount of right of way in that city. A rapid transit system could be developed to bring people from near airport to the centre of Vancouver along that CPR right of way. This minister comes from Vancouver. That is why I draw this to his attention. As of this time, the government has failed to made a proposal, to the province concerning the amount it is prepared to contribute to the cost of an urbanized transit system within that city. Is it 50 per cent or 30 per cent? The government has failed to state what percentage it is prepared to pay.

It is interesting to note that under this bill the government will pay 50 per cent of the cost of a study. As members of parliament, we know how long studies can take. They take as long as politicians and the government wish them to take. If the governments reach a decision, somehow or other the study comes to a close. By the time these studies are completed, the minister may or may not be re-elected. If I were a Vancouver voter, I would want more information before the election. I would want to know what portion of this cost the federal government is prepared to offer the British Columbia government. What portion will the city of Vancouver have to pay?

I have specifically referred to Vancouver. I can also mention Calgary and Edmonton. Both of those cities are attempting to devise an acceptable plan in their eyes for some kind of modernized urban transit system. This bill does not spell out what is, in fact, acceptable. It merely suggests that something acceptable to the province or the municipality on behalf of the province may be accepted. It does not even say will be accepted.

Clause 6 does not set out in detail what is meant by a rapid transit system. It only suggests that it must be rapid. Clause 7 does not say what the government or the railways intend to do with the acquisition of land. I was interested in hearing the minister say this afternoon that the government does not have a ruling on that. I suppose that will also involve some great study.

Clause 9 states that the Minister of Public Works will have the power to dispose of this land in any way he sees fit. I suppose it depends on whether the Department of Public Works goes into the business of providing some kind of rapid transit system.

As far as I am concerned, I do not think the bill is absolutely wrong. However, I suggest the minister must answer a number of very pertinent questions if he wants speedy passage of the bill this evening. No municipality should hold its breath until it gets some funds under this bill because the main purport of the bill is studies first. Mayors and councillors of municipalities will grow gray and long in the tooth before some of the studies this bill purports to involve them in have finally reached a conclusion. I believe the major intent of this bill is to hold out a carrot to those municipalities in dire financial straits in the hope they may think kindly of the present minister. The minister is not taking the city of Vancouver for granted. He is holding out a carrot to them as well as the other cities across Canada.

I wish the minister would set my fears at rest, if not those of others, before we move on to any other clause.

The Chairman: Before I recognize the hon. member for Timiskaming, perhaps the Chair might be permitted to present the proposed amendment by the hon. member for Lotbinière as translated by the Chair's adviser. The English version of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lotbinière reads:

That clause 3 of Bill C-27, to facilitate the relocation of railway lines or rerouting of railway traffic in urban areas and to provide financial assistance for work done for the protection, safety and convenience of the public at railway crossings, be amended by deleting the words "on behalf of the province" in line 11 at page 3 and substituting therefor the words "on its own behalf."

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I realize there are difficulties with this amendment. I have the honour of representing part of the city of Timmins. For a considerable period of time, that city has been concerned with the matter of relocation. Timmins is faced with a problem that is somewhat similar to a problem being faced in Quebec where, if there is going to be anything done, it does not matter if the federal government wants to put up the money. The province wants all the kudos for the money it has expended. With regard to the relocation of the yards in Timmins, the province is involved in two ways. Because of the British North America Act, the municipality is a creature of the province. Secondly, it is a provincially owned railway. Because of that, the provincial government would be involved in any case.

If this amendment were to pass, it would have the effect of saying that once the federal government agreed to the criteria, they would make the decision as to the advantages of relocation in a particular area. If the provinces and the municipalities agreed with the criteria set by the federal government, that would result in a study. Once those conditions are met, the province would no longer be able to say "no, we will not." The municipality, not in the name of the province but in its own name, would be able to take advantage of the program and the agreement resulting from the criteria set by both the federal and provincial authorities. The municipality would have the final say as to whether the study and relocation would take place.

We have often been plagued, not only in Quebec but also in Ontario, by the fact that the federal government has time and again proven to be totally ineffective and inefficient in providing any type of assistance which would help a large part of the province because the province itself has a designation which strengthens the priority of the province. In my experience, this does not apply to northern Ontario and it has not applied in DREE, ARDA or any of the other federal programs designed to assist the people in norhern Ontario because that has not been the wish of Queens Park.

In the area adjacent to mine in northern Quebec, the problems are very similar. There is a great objection by the province to allowing a municipality or area to take advantage of programs unless the provincial government is given full authority to undertake them. The people mainly affected are those in the municipalities, that is the people directly involved in whatever redevelopment takes place in transportation. After the federal government and the province have made the overall agreement, it is my opinion these people should have a say as to what the criteria will be. The provinces still demand control over programs made available through federal assistance. For example, under the DREE program agreements are made, not with the people who need assistance, but between interested parties in the provinces and their counterparts in the federal government. This system means that very few of the things people in northern Ontario wish to get done are, in fact, accomplished. For many years the people of Timmins have wished to get rid of railroad hazards in their city, to reroute spur lines and, in particular, reconstruct an overpass which creates a dangerous situation since several times a year, when flooding occurs, three or four feet of water covers the road, washing out vehicle transport.

As the hon. member for Crowfoot has pointed out, though, there are certain advantages. Some of us who have been here a long time remember the machinations which took place in Ottawa when it was decided to relocate the rail system of this city. The changes eventually made affected not only Ottawa, but the City of Hull, as well.

They meant that a large part of the Province of Quebec could not be served as it had been served by the railway in the past. The National Capital Commission traded off land to the railway, and received land in exchange. The province, it seemed, was in no way concerned with this relocation project.

I do not deny that when new arrangements of this kind are made the consequences of changes brought about by developing an alternative system of transportation must be taken into consideration. But should we not, in keeping with the terms of the British North America Act, reach agreement with the provinces as to the type of program they can implement, or agree to on behalf of their municipalities, and then allow the municipalities to take advantage of the program in their own right without the provinces being called upon to agree to each specific project? It is true that large sums would be required to carry out relocation schemes and rapid transit schemes but on the other hand many of these projects will affect only those who live in the municipality concerned—there will be only a limited effect on the transportation system of the province, and no effect at all on the national transportation picture.

Reading the bill over, I came to the conclusion that the government has been very careful to avoid dealing with the municipalities as powers in their own right. Last week I had the opportunity of attending the annual meeting of the Reeves and Mayors Association attended by representatives of all the municipalities in northeastern Ontario. A general complaint I heard there was to the effect that the municipalities had no say in the implementation of schemes agreed upon between the federal government and the province. Decisions whether or not developments would be carried out in any particular area were made by the province and in any case very little money was usually available for the smaller communities. I suspect this will be true of the relocation proposals. It is all very well for the minister and his officials to word things in such a way that there can be no appeal to the Supreme Court under the British North America Act. This has the effect of making the provinces more powerful and renders less effective efforts by the federal administration to equalize conditions in all parts of Canada in the interest of good order. In the United States laws have been passed by the federal authority in many fields, and such legislation has often been challenged by the state authorities. Very often, the states have lost ground and the federal authority has been able to exercise a much greater influence than it has been possible for the federal government to exercise here.

Like the hon. member who moved this amendment, I come from a part of Ontario which is distressed, which more closely resembles the maritimes than the Golden Horseshoe which controls most of the wealth of Ontario. If we are to have a relocation study and project in the town of Timmins under this legislation we must provide the municipality with the wherewithall to conduct its end of the study because the people with whom they co-operate, and who are at the same time the antagonists, are the agencies of the provincial government. Their aims are not necessarily the same.

You have allowed this amendment, so I presume you agree it is in order. I would strongly urge that we proceed on some other basis than on an archaic interpretation of the British North America Act, because in the past the people in various parts of Canada have not been getting a fair shake from the provincial government. They are only able to take advantage of this kind of legislation to improve their lot if they receive assistance and leadership from the federal government.

I hope the minister will give consideration to this amendment, which in my opinion carries with it the right of the province to set the criteria under which it will participate, as well as giving the federal government the right to set the criteria under which it will participate. Now, in addition, the municipalities will have a say as to whether they will participate in what is to take place. That being so, I hope the minister will see fit to agree that once these criteria are set in accordance with the wishes and desires of the municipalities, this will be sufficient to motivate the passage of this clause which allows these municipalities to participate under federal legislation without the provincial government having a veto.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might just say a word or two about the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lotbinière. I realize that in the impassioned speech he made there was the suggestion that this legislation be in effect for all provinces, all parts of Canada and all Canadians, and that certainly would be my wish. He asked some specific questions, particularly what was the link between Bill C-133, covering amendments made last fall to the National Housing Act, and this legislation. There is no legislative link as the bills are somewhat different and the procedures are considerably different.

That hon. member in this House and privately expressed his disappointment, which I share, that certain programs under the National Housing Act are not operative in the province of Quebec because the law requires that there be a federal-provincial agreement in order that the programs apply, particularly the neighbourhood improvement program. The housing act says that the program will not apply unless there is federal-provincial agreement, and up until the present time we have been unable to negotiate or finalize an agreement on that matter with the province of Quebec, hence it does not apply there at the present time. This legislation does not make that requirement. It does not say that before this program applies there must be a general federal-provincial agreement. It applies when royal assent is given and the measure is proclaimed.

Part III of the bill, which includes amendments to the grade crossing fund, makes no reference to provinces or provincial approval. The province which the hon. member represents so ably in this House has taken full advantage of the grade crossing fund and the program envisaged in this legislation. For the current year 1974, in the first quarter the province of Quebec has had a commitment from the grade crossing fund in respect of projects within that province amounting to $2.2 million as compared to $1.3 million for the same period in the province of Ontario. So the municipalities in Quebec are now taking very active advantage of the provision relating to grade crossing and grade separation under this legislation.

The hon. member is correct in respect of proposals relative to railroad relocations. Under Section 3 of the act the province, on behalf of a municipality, may apply to the Canadian Transport Commission, submit an urban development or transportation plan and obtain a relocation order from that commission. Regardless of what the constitution may say, it is our obligation as a government to propose legislation which is constitutional, and I think we have endeavoured to observe that obligation.

There are a number of practical reasons that the provinces must be involved in the preparation of urban development plans for presentation to the Canadian Transport Commission. Some of the elements of an urban development plan that would be put before the Canadian Transport Commission will undoubtedly involve such items as municipal goals and objectives, growth forecasts and regional or urban area land uses, and in addition, as one hon. member mentioned this afternoon, questions of environmental and ecological protection. Many of these things are joint responsibilities. Environmental and ecological protection are clearly under provincial responsibility.

Questions of growth and growth strategy are intimately involved with provincial jurisdiction, policies and programs. Unless regional development plans are worked out in close co-operation with the provinces they are not worth anything. They would be prepared in a vacuum if prepared without reference to one of the parties which has most of the power and most of the instruments with which to implement regional development plans.

The Canadian Transport Commission has a clear authority over railways, and clear authority under this legislation to order their relocation, expropriation, and other matters clearly falling within federal jurisdiction. If we are to have regional development plans it is essential that we involve the government which has most of the power and jurisdiction relative to that development, and that is why the section is worded as it is.

I would emphasize that this legislation is not similar to the National Housing Act which in respect of some of its provisions says that before a program can apply there must be an over-all federal-provincial agreement relative to rehabilitation, neighbourhood improvement or land assembly. That is not the case here. In this case we deal on a project by project and proposal by proposal basis. The province of Quebec, in which the hon. member is most interested, although I recognize he was speaking on behalf of municipalities in all provinces, has taken full advantage of the grade crossing provision, and I expect it will take full advantage of the railway relocation proposals. I suggest this is demonstrable by the fact that the city of Quebec has one of the most imaginative and thoughtful railroad relocation proposals to be presented. It has been worked out and studied in co-operation with my seat mate, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

One of the more interesting proposals is the one in respect of Petite Bourgogne in the city of Montreal. The province of Quebec has agreed to that proposal, as have the residents of that neighbourhood and the federal government. But to relocate and reorganize the railroads in that area of Montreal would seem to me to be a very silly thing to do unless the provinces, which has much of the jurisdiction in terms of the urban policy, were intimately involved in the preparation of the urban study and urban development plan. Therefore, I think it is essential that the wording of this legislation as proposed be carried.

The Chairman: Before the Chair recognizes the next participant in the debate on this particular matter may I point out that I have had some reservations concerning the acceptability of the amendment of the hon. member for Lotbinière. However, a point of order has not been raised in connection with it. I utter these words because I—as might be the case with another Chairman,—may not wish to be bound in the future by the nature of what has passed so far without challenge.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Chairman, the logic of the minister's last remarks would fall with thunderous weight on the committee if the minister were addressing himself specifically to the words of the hon. member for Lotbinière. We all realize that there is a first part to subclause (1) of clause 3, to which apparently the minister is not paying any attention at the moment. Let us look specifically at what the hon. member for Lotbinière is proposing in his amendment. He is not saying that the province should not be involved in the application of the provisions of this bill; he is not saying that there should be no urban development approved by the municipalities and the provinces jointly; he is not trying to cut out the provinces. All he is trying to do is to allow a little initiative to the municipalities.

Let us look very carefully at the fine, chiselled language of subclause (1) of clause 3, particularly the first part which the minister ignored in his remarks, which reads:

> Where, in respect of an area in a province that includes or comprises an urban area (hereinafter in this Part called a "transportation study area"), the government of the province or the municipalities within that area have agreed upon an urban development plan—

Where this is the case, where the government of the province and all municipalities have agreed upon an urban development plan, it goes on to say:

> —and transportation plan (hereinafter in this Part called an "accepted plan") for that transportation study area, the province or a municipality acting on behalf of the province may,—

Here is where the hon. member for Lotbinière suggest that either the province or the municipality may instigate an application. He does not suggest that they carry out a plan which they cooked up by themselves separately, but that they instigate an application for a plan which both entities, the province and the municipalities involved, have worked out together and agreed upon. I say "instigate an application", not carry out a plan because they are still going cap in hand to the Canadian Transport Commission; they do not utter the fiat.

It seems to me that the idea and spirit behind the amendment is a very good one, where two entities, such as the province and the municipality—and this according to the subclause—have agreed upon a plan. You know what that entails—months, probably years of study. When they have agreed upon a plan of development, either one of the entities may instigate an application. Surely, we are not running afoul of the constitution because we are not allowing the municipality or the province to make the final decision; we are leaving it up to the commission which can only act if there has been an agreement between the two entities and a decision.

I like to read the constitution every once in awhile, and I say that this is indeed clearly within the provincial field. There is nothing unconstitutional about the amendment. Let us look at section 92 of the BNA Act, subsection 10 paragraph (a). I will read the whole thing so that we know what the words of section 92 say. It reads:

92. In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated . . .

Then, you have a list. Under it we find subsection 10 which reads:

Local Works and Undertakings other than such as are the following Classes:—

(a) Lines of Steam of other Ships, Railways Canals, Telegraphs, and other Works and Undertakings connecting the Province with any other or others of the Province, or extending beyond the Limits of the Province;

I know that there are railways in Canada that do not extend from province to province; some operate totally within the province. But the railways with which the hon. member for Lotbinière is concerned operate from province to province. Most of the railways with which I would be concerned operate from province to province, and certainly would be covered by subsection 10. So I do not think we are violating the constitution. I think that the amendment of the hon. member for Lotbinière is so well contained and constrained by the extremely thoughtful language which the minister and his minions have put into the bill, it is such a tender little offering to the initiative of municipalities, that we should pass it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words about the amendment put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). I support that amendment for two quite specific reasons which greatly concern me as well as the Quebec municipalities which are willing to discharge their duties and their responsibilities towards their ratepayers.

The constitution of our country is a question often referred to, but less during the past few years. Nevertheless, the constitution remains and we must live under three different governments: federal provincial and municipal governments.

I would like to mention more particularly the responsibilities of municipal governments. We know that in each municipality, the authorities must do their utmost to assure to ratepayers essential public utilities such as aqueducts, sewers, streets, sidewalks and fire protection. We can even add recreation and other services which municipalities are compelled to provide to ratepayers.

Municipal authorities are complaining, rightly so, that they lack revenue to fulfill their responsibilities, their duties.

[Mr. Harney.]

Recently, the Canadian Federation of Mayors submitted, in a brief to the cabinet and opposition parties, that the revenues of municipalities are not consistent with their obligations. The Quebec mayors are tired of making representations to the provincial government and always being refused, under the pretext that the province does not have enough money and is unable to bow to their requests.

They have decided to appeal to the federal government for a fair share of tax revenues. That is an indication that municipal administrations want to take their role seriously, to meet their responsibilities without violating the constitution.

On December 6, 1972, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) announced a very specific policy. Under this policy the federal government, in order to help solve the unemployment problem and create jobs, made funds available to the provinces and the municipalities enabling them to do public works likely to create jobs and ensure services.

● (2130)

On page 2 of this statement, we can read the following:

a provincial-municipal fund of $350 million for investment programs for the winter in order to provide provinces and municipalities . . .

This is very precise.

. . . loans and grants for financing investment projects for the winter and the next two years.

And further, Mr. Chairman, the idea which inspired the publication of this statement is precise. On page 6, we can read this:

Each province will have full freedom to administer the amount allocated, including the distribution of funds between the province and its municipalities, and among the municipalities.

. . . if required.

Should a province prefer not to undertake the administration or distribution, the funds will be made available to the municipalities directly . . .

Therefore, the object of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) is not to create a precedent.

Therefore, the cabinet then recognized the possibility of funds being made available directly to municipalities. And one can read further:

. . . subject to the approval of the provincial government.

I agree with that, but I do not agree whenever a government uses its authority to prevent municipalities from taking advantage of federal funds that could help them reach certain objectives while creating employment.

As for me, Mr. Chairman, I am a little fed up of hearing about provincial autonomy and the Constitution, while the development of municipalities and provinces is being crippled through the use of such terms. I would like us to be more up-to-date than that in 1974. There was a time when one could fight for principles. I agree, but since that has been recognized by the people as a whole and the authorities at all levels, I believe we should go ahead.

I keep on with the quotation:

Although the funds are made available to provinces and municipalities, considering the needs and relatively favourable financing conditions, it is believed that most of the funds will be in fact assigned to municipalities by provincial governments.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on November 23, 1973, in the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, as one can read in Issue No. 51, I asked the Minister of Finance if he could give us a report on the use of funds in the province of Quebec concerning this program. The minister graciously accepted to table the report on the funds used between December 6, 1972 and October 31, 1973. And in that report, which is public, one can see that out of 43 projects enumerated, the province of Quebec got the lion's share.

The province of Quebec appropriated 70 per cent of the funds for 27 projects, leaving only 30 per cent for all Quebec municipalities which at that date had been able to achieve only 16 projects. I very much regret such a situation, because after all this program was specially designed to help municipalities undertake works that would have created jobs in these centres.

In considering the development plans of the Quebec government, we find that bridges have been built as well as approach works to highways, viaducts, service roads and what not. Furthermore, I would be tempted to believe that these funds have been used for some political purposes on the eve of the provincial election that took place last fall and to fatten the political partisans and the party's servants. We have to call things by their name in such circumstances and be prudent concerning what we are to do in the future.

I would also like to bring another question to the attention of the hon. minister and of this House, that is Bill C-133. Although the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) has just stated that there is no relation between Bill C-27 and Bill C-133, C-27 will however be subordinated, in its application, to the provincial administrators' good will. And it is in the interest of those municipalities that will have set out plans and projects, that the amendment brought forward by the member for Lotbinière must come into the picture, after the difficulties presently experienced by the federal government with the government of Quebec with regards to the signature of a standard agreement so that the population of Quebec can benefit from this legislation which I have supported because I consider it valuable and because I think it can help municipalities play their role and meet the objectives established by the taxpayers. But, almost a year after the adoption of that legislation, we are still at the negotiating stage and I think that the difficulties must be on the financial side. I suppose that the government of Quebec must ask the federal government: give us the millions, and we will distribute them. I suppose that is where the problem lies.

Mr. Chairman, I agree that the lines of hierarchy must be followed, that the Constitution must be followed, but not that a part of the population has to suffer even though it lives in the province of Quebec. We still want that within Canada, the total wealth of the country serves the whole population independently of where they live.

That is why I would like to ask the minister responsible for Bill C-27 whether he has consulted with the government of the province of Quebec before drafting this bill. If so, could he tell us whether the government of Quebec has given its approval for the adoption of the bill?

If not, does the minister anticipate meeting as humanly as possible the same difficulties he met with Bill C-133?

These are all questions that we can ask ourselves in an objective manner and, believe me, Mr. Chairman, I am asking them in all honesty because I am interested in the municipal field where I spent 30 years of my life. I am probably not as knowledgeabe as the experts, but a bit. This is why I have a right to know the feelings of the authorities of the various municipalities, in the province of Quebec and in the rest of Canada, which really want to go ahead.

We have advocated and we will continue to advocate a solution aimed at helping not only the municipalities, but also the provinces and the federal government, in order to find financing sources which would avoid difficulties. It is in fact a question of money, of income.

I was present at many conferences between the Quebec government and municipalities where they were asking the provincial government to grant them more revenues so that they could meet their responsibilities. The provincial government said: We cannot give you more, the federal government takes everything. It is still the same.

I also attended two federal-provincial conferences where the provincial premiers and ministers of finance told the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner): Give us a larger share of revenues so that we may meet our commitments. And the federal government answered: We do not have enough for ourselves, how can we give you anything?

Mr. Chairman, it is time we changed in depth our financing procedure in the public sector, and serious consideration should be given to our proposal urging a greater use of the bank which belongs to Canadians, the Bank of Canada. This is our institution, and if we must amend the act that governs it, let us start as soon as possible so that the federal government may have a source of financing at a lower cost than at present. This would give the provinces a larger share of revenues. If we could do this, we could eliminate several problems and accomplish many things.

In conclusion, I should like to commend the hon. member for Lotbinière for moving this amendment designed to foresee, if possible, and prevent a problem like the one that arose with bill C-133. I would also like to ask the minister responsible for Urban Affairs to continue and speed up if possible the negotiations on the subject. If we could obtain a reasonable agreement, it would ensure justice for French Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Chairman, while it is not my intention to hold up a committee decision on an amendment moved by the Social Credit Party, if I understood the ruling of the Chair correctly, it appears there is some uncertainty as to whether the amendment is in order. I do not know therefore, whether I would be assisting the Chair by discussing clause 3 until ten o'clock, in which case the Chair would have until tomorrow to decide whether the amendment was in order. If I am wrong in my assumption, Mr. Chairman, please correct me.

Assuming that my interpretation is correct, I wonder if I could outline again some of my problems. I assume that the moneys set out in the recommendations are the total moneys allocated for a single project, not the total moneys allocated for all projects under the specific definition. If the minister believes I am wrong in this, I encourage him to correct me.

If I am correct in this, then there is no end to the amount of money available in a given situation, specifically in the studies proposed, specifically the relocation grants, specifically the painting of boxcars and engines—the whole list of possibilities where moneys may be allocated to municipalities or railroads. If this is the case, could the minister give the House an explanation as to why the government did not feel it necessary to specify the criteria so that we could be assured there was no partisanship on the part of the three ministers involved, the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, the Minister of Transport, or even the CTC?

This question is prompted by the example of the LIP program. The riding of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs received seven times more LIP money than a riding in Vancouver which is adjacent to his. What criteria were used? Under the LIP program a certain amount of money was allocated to Canada as a whole and lists of projects were compiled. Yet, in a city comprised of six or seven ridings, the minister's riding received seven times the amount allocated to the riding represented by one or other of the opposition parties.

If I am correct in my interpretation of the regulations for this bill, there is no limit on the amount of money but there is an "accepted plan". It is spelled out very clearly in line 11, page 3, in Part I, clause 3, and again in subclause (5) on page 4, line 8, which reads:

● (2150)

Where an application to the Commission under subsection (1) is made in respect of an accepted plan that contemplates the use of federal programs . . .

In view of the partisanship shown by the minister and the cabinet, the committee should be told what constitutes an accepted plan. For instance, the CPR has removed certain tracks in the Vancouver area. Will the federal government give the city of Vancouver money with which to buy that right of way from the CPR? Or, will Saskatoon be reimbursed for its previous purchase of CNR right of way? Will retroactive actions be considered, or will the bill apply only to plans which will be carried out in future? The minister has remained silent on that aspect. The subclause provides that the urban development or transportation plans shall not be received by the commission unless it is shown to the commission that, as clause 3(5)(a) says:

(a) the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is satisfied that the federal programs contemplated for use in the urban development plan forming part of the accepted plan are available and would contribute significantly to the improvement of any urban area within the transportation study area in respect of which the application is made; . . .

According to the bill, the government will pay not more than 50 per cent of the amount of the cost of preparing urban development plans and transportation plans. Such plans, as I have mentioned just now, must contribute significantly to the improvement of an urban area. What criteria will be used to determine if a plan contributes significantly? Will there be environmental considerations? For instance, carrying out a plan might mean that the CPR will not pollute the Fraser Valley with coal dust from coal cars. What will be a significant contribution? I can imagine many transportation studies, particularly in the Vancouver area, which would contribute significantly to improving the urban area in respect of which the application is made. I am not a lawyer, but I suggest that "significant" could mean more than 50 per cent in this case.

I remember in the debate on the farm marketing bill the minister of agriculture of that time said, "significant" means more than 10 per cent of a certain figure. I do not know what the words, "contributes significantly to the improvement of any urban area within the transportation study area" mean. The minister should explain the criteria which the government will apply. For instance, will the federal government accept transportation studies into which it has had no input but towards the cost of which it is expected to pay. Further, will the federal government in some cases pay 50 per cent of the cost of relocating tracks; will it, in other cases, contribute only, say, 37 per cent of the cost, or 25 per cent?

I know that both Edmonton and Calgary are studying urban transport. Once the bill is passed, can they apply to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and say, "Our transportation study was not comprehensive enough. As the government is paying 50 per cent of the cost, we want to do a new, more comprehensive study, which will cover our needs for the next 20 or 30 years; our current study covers a much shorter period." The minister should spell out clearly what is meant by transportation study. Will 50 per cent of the sort of study I have just mentioned be covered? Once a transportation study for a certain area is approved, will the federal government automatically pay a portion of the cost of such study?

The minister does not seem willing to rise in his place and answer. He seems reluctant to speak. I notice the Minister of the Environment moving over to converse with him. That minister was involved in a transportation study involving the Vancouver area which created all sorts of pollution, so to speak, in that area. The interests of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and The Minister of Transport conflicted. In the result, coal coming from the interior of British Columbia and Alberta could not be unloaded at Squamish even though the natural harbour was ideally suited for the handling of coal. Because of the conflicting interests of three ministers, and their embarrassment and indecision, the greater Vancouver area suffered a loss. May I call it ten o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, is there any brave soul on the government side who can speculate on what the business of the House may be tomorrow?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the House leader indicated earlier that we would be proceeding with the legislation introduced today. We had agreed last week that all parties would put up only two speakers on second reading of Bill C-27, which would then be referred to committee of the whole House. It was thought that in the committee of the whole we would make considerable progress with Bill C-27. So, subject to further communication in the morning from the President of the Privy Council, (Mr. MacEachen), I suggest that the business will be consideration in committee of the whole of Bill C-27. I hope we can make considerable progress with the bill tomorrow in committee of the whole. After that the House leader would proceed with the anti-gouging bill. That is to be the business, subject, as I say, to further communication from the President of the Privy Council in the morning.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps if the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) confers with the government House leader he will find that his bill will be followed by the Federal Business Development Bank bill.

● (2200)

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, it is on the basis that we make substantial progress.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIR TRANSPORT—STATUS OF PROPOSED PASSENGER HEAD TAX

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, like many other members of this House, I was rather curious as to what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and the department were doing with the proposed airport head tax on passengers. Accordingly, I asked the minister what I thought were a couple of reasonable and sensible questions as to why there were delays, and what was now the status of the tax. I received a very unsatisfactory response, which is why I wanted to bring the matter forward for debate this evening. The Department of Transport has been so kicked around lately that one almost feels sorry for having to say anything more about it. I guess everything has been said that can be said. However, even with a situation like this, it has to be pointed out that if there ever was a do-nothing department, it has to be this one, at least at the present time.

How can the Minister of Transport and the department seriously purport to be working on a meaningful transport policy for this country when they cannot even bring forward an administrative measure that was proposed with great fanfare last December? How can the department under present conditions, do an efficient job of providing Canadians with efficient transport when a matter as routine as a proposed airport head tax cannot be resolved, explained or apparently dealt with in definitive fashion? As far as this tax is concerned, we on this side of the House are not convinced it should be implemented at all, but having brought the measure foward with such great fanfare, and having done so in a very tactless and bumbling manner, at least after this many months the situation should be clarified.

Just how bad the minister's timing and sense of propriety was is illustrated in the proceedings of the standing committee for last December 6. At that time I had occasion to question Mr. Pratte of Air Canada. After a bit of preamble, we discussed the imposition of the tax and the announcement, about which he knew nothing until he had it reported to him or read it in the paper. I said, and I quote:

> Well, Mr. Pratte, I do not know how you feel about the situation, and I do not want to be unfair to you or express feelings that I have no business expressing, but I am indignant on your behalf, that you, as President of our national airline, had to learn from very indirect sources of this type of major decision that is going to affect you and so many of your employees.
> Is this the type of thing that you are reported as expressing dissatisfaction about in the past? Are you satisfied that there is sufficient communication between yourself and the Ministry of Transport not only out of ordinary business courtesy but so your airline and your top management can prepare most efficiently and most directly for this sort of thing? Are you happy with this situation?

Mr. Pratte replied:

> In that particular case I thought there should have been more consultation not only with Air Canada but with industry generally. You know, all carriers relatively speaking are going to be hit to the same extent as we are, except that in our case since we have a greater proportion of short-haul passengers than others this is probably going to hurt us more than it would a long-haul carrier due to the fact that the tax is on a per-passenger basis.

Mr. Pratte and Mr. Baldwin then went on to illustrate just how terrible communications were and how ill conceived, bumbling and lucicrous the minister's attempts to that point were to implement this administrative measure. I said to Mr. Baldwin:

> So I suppose not only will you have the fare increase that you were proposing to have but the administrative details and complications involved in this will result in a larger fare increase than you otherwise had planned.

Mr. Baldwin replied:

> Well, we will have to recover, if we move in this direction, not only the amount to be paid to the government but there will be added administrative costs within the airline in terms of procedures and staff work.

The dialogue goes on and on. I do not want to take the time of the House to illustrate how terrible and ridiculous this situation is at present. Now, after months and months of questions, we find that the minister is continuing to make a complete fiasco out of this affair as he has done with so much of his department's administration. He succeeded in alarming the Canadian public, the domestic air transport industry, in alienating the international aviation organizations to which Canada belongs, IATO and ICAO, and, most of all, in refusing to clarify what is going on. Now, he adds to the confusion by saying the matter is being discussed within the department. At least the department is finally being given a voice, but why was this not done last December?

When the people of Canada and the industry continue to expect something which they should know better than to expect from this government and this minister, why does the government continue to indicate it is not prepared to give us any answers? I believe the minister said to me, when I asked him a question on April 22: "If we were in a position to give all those details the matter would not be under discussion in the department; it would have been discussed." I say to the government and to its spokesman tonight: Is it not high time that this matter was discussed and that this do-nothing department brought forward a definitive policy? It is perhaps too much to ask them to produce a general policy, but could they not give us some indication of the proposal which will be produced to implement this tax? Will they go ahead with it or will they withdraw in their usual confusion? Do they know? That is my question, tonight.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it may be a do-nothing policy, but it is the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) who wants to impose a tax on the people a lot earlier than it might otherwise be imposed, as a result of his insistence. He wants the people of Canada to be taxed, and the sooner the better. That is exactly what we get from members of the opposition: how soon can you impose a tax.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order! That is from the Official Opposition.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is correct.

A final decision has not yet been made by the government in respect of either the airport fee which was announced in December 1973 or any other of the various alternatives which could be implemented as a means of generating the same amount of additional revenues.

However, I can confirm that the Air Transportation Tax Act, which all hon. members will recall was passed by parliament in December, 1969, appears to be the preferred measure, at least as viewed by the Air Transportation Association of Canada, the Air Transport Association of the United States, the International Air Transport Association and the air carriers.

I wish to assure the House that very careful consideration is being given to all factors associated with additional cost recovery policies in the Ministry of Transport, not only to determine measures which are administratively feasible but, more important, measures which are economically and socially desirable. For example, special attention must be given to the circumstances of people living in the more remote areas of Canada in terms of providing transportation to them at a cost which will not result in discrimination simply on the ground that they live too far away from the major metropolitan areas of Canada which are serviced, for example, by big, international airports with their related sophisticated air services.

We must also pay particular attention to some of the harsh realities in respect to air transportation in Canada, and one of these is that air transportation cost per seat-mile is significantly higher in the northern parts of Canada as compared with the more southerly parts. We are examining ways to make sure that any additional cost recovery measures will not impose undue hardship in the north while at the same time maintaining the principle of equity between all users of air transportation services and facilities in Canada.

As hon. members are aware, the Air Transportation Tax Act provides for a per cent ad valorem rate to be levied on the price of air tickets paid, or payable, in Canada. Anyone can appreciate that such a tax could result in additional costs of about $18 on a return air journey from St. John's to Vancouver. All members could easily work out further illustrations by applying a 5 per cent rate to the price of various air tickets. This unlimited application of a percentage rate has been causing some concern and we are seeking solutions to this problem.

I am grateful to members of this House for having made various suggestions to the minister over the last several months and these suggestions together with all other factors which have been brought to our attention, keeping in mind that our officials have been conducting extensive consultations with the air industry associations, the carriers and the public, will be evaluated in order to allow the government an opportunity to make a decision based on all relevant information.

Speaking personally again, I for one would not at the moment wish to impose that tax as I always feel these taxes come too soon.

Mr. MacKay: Do you want to withdraw it?

PENSIONS—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE GREATER PROTECTION AND ESCALATION FOR PERSONS IN PRIVATE PLAN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday March 21, as recorded in Hansard at page 727, I put a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) the first part of which was in these words:

> Is the government giving consideration to making amendments to the Pension Benefits Standards Act or to introducing any other legislation to provide greater protection for those who are enrolled in private pension plans?

That was the main thrust of my question put in general terms. The fact is that I am concerned about the many ways in which those who are in private pension plans need greater protection. Then I went on to put a specific question. I stated it twice, but perhaps I may quote it tonight in the words I used when I got to my feet the second time. I put it in this way: will the minister:

> —take steps to provide in the legislation that all private pension plans must escalate their pensions, during the years of retirement, according to the rise in the cost of living?

As I have already indicated in raising this question, I am concerned in a general way about the protection needed by persons in private pensions plans. They need protection to make sure that the funds are there, that the pensions they are supposed to get will be payable to them when the time of retirement comes and so on. But the grievance which is being felt most strongly these days by recipients of pensions from private plans has to do with the matter of escalation.

The government has done fairly well, with a little prodding from some of the rest of us in Parliament, in providing annual escalation on a cost of living basis for just about all pensions that come under federal government responsibility, but private plans are lagging very much in this respect, and it does seem to me that the time has come for the government to make it clear that private pension plans ought to follow suit.

Late in 1973 the income tax regulations were amended to permit private pension plans to escalate to the full extent of the cost of living, not just 2 per cent as had previously been the case, and still get income tax deductibility, but that is all the government has done thus far. It has just put this on a permissive basis. There is the Pension Benefits Standards Act which controls and regulates pensions that come under federal responsibility. I think the time has come for the Pension Benefits Standards Act to say that all pensions that come under federal jurisdiction or responsibility should be required to be escalated after retirement by the full amount of the cost of living.

Let me give an example, and I mention it not because I generally think that banks are bad boys but because they are an example that comes to mind. Let me give the example of chartered banks. Many of them have reached the point where they are providing some escalation of the pensions of their retired employees. In most cases it is a 2 per cent escalation or an ad hoc amount; in very few cases is it an escalation equal to the actual rise in the cost of living. But what really concerns and annoys some retired bank employees who have been in touch with me is that when a bank provides an escalation in the pension of a retired employee, it does so subject to that escalation being cut back when there is an escalation of old age security. So the whole idea of pensioners getting an escalation in their income so that they can keep up with the cost of living is nullified when a pensioner gets an escalation in one pension but has his other pension cut back by that same amount. He ends exactly where he started. I say to you, sir, that that is actually happening in the case of some chartered banks in this country with respect to their retired employees. Banks do come under the Pension Benefits Standards Act. They are under the jurisdiction and responsibility of the federal government.

I suppose I should simply say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) that I hope he will have a talk with some of these banks and help them to see the light with respect to this matter. But so far as I can tell from other talks that he has had, not a great deal has resulted from them and I think the time has come for something more than talk. That is why I urge legislation to protect those in private pension plans and in particular to protect their right to escalation of pensions and their right not to have their escalation nullified in the way that it is now being done in so many cases.

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am rising in connection with the inquiry from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who wanted to know whether the government would introduce a piece of legislation to force private pension plans to escalate their benefits during retirement years in line with the rise in the cost of living index. I should like to make a few remarks concerning the federal and provincial legislation in this area.

Let us not forget, when we receive inquiries such as this, that the federal government is empowered to act only in connection with pension plans in areas of employment under the jurisdiction of Parliament, as listed in the Schedule to the Pension Benefits Standards Act.

Most pension plans for workers in Canada come under the jurisdiction of the provinces, four of which have adopted provisions similar to those in the Pension Benefits Standards Act.

The only way whereby the federal government could try to obtain the escalation of pension benefits in all pension plans would be indirectly, through the Income Tax Act. Normal penalty for violations of this requirement could then be a withdrawal of registration in the plan, which would prevent both employer and employee contributions from being deductible under income tax legislation. The end result for employees could be still lesser protection of their future than they now enjoy.

Any federal action in this direction would materially alter the agreed roles of the two levels of government under federal and provincial pension plans that have come into being during the last ten years, in order to improve on private employers' pension plan transferability and solvency.

None of these legislations force employers to offer pension plans, nor prevents them from ending plans, considering employers had enough difficulty in financing pension plans without benefit escalation, such a requirement could very well force employers into terminating existing plans. Hon. members will no doubt understand that such measures can only be envisaged with utmost caution.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—INCREASE IN CORPORATE PROFITS AND DECREASE IN LABOUR'S SHARE OF NATIONAL INCOME—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on April 15, as recorded at page 1415 of Hansard, I asked two questions of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

The first dealt with the fact that the labour component of the national income in Canada had fallen to 70 per cent from 75 per cent, while the corporate share of our national income had risen in the same period by approximately the same number of points, that is, by 5.3 points to 12 per cent of our national income. Here I am referring to the corporate profit after tax.

Then, not being satisfied with my first answer I asked the minister a second question, as to whether or not he was aware of the fact that in Canada corporate profits were running at "12 per cent of total Canadian income compared to 6.6 per cent for corporations in the USA." I asked him:

—does the minister still believe it is necessary to continue his liberal tax concessions to Canadian corporations bearing in mind such

Canadian corporations now earn more after tax than American companies earn before tax in relation to national incomes?

I raise this question because I feel that it is dramatically shown, in the figures now coming out of the various statistical agencies, that there has been a very deliberate shift on the part of the government with respect to the sharing of national income in Canada.

Since replying to those questions in the House the minister had an opportunity to speak in Winnipeg on April 19, to which speech I wish to make reference, and today we were furnished with the Economic Review dated April, 1974, from the minister's department. I find this review extremely interesting because at pages 52 and 53, in effect, the minister confirms the point that I had raised. Here I refer to the fact that he says, according to page 52, that the "before-tax profits accounted for a larger share of the nation's gross income in 1973 than the average since 1958." I am disappointed that in making that reference the minister was not more explicit and did not refer to the actual figures.

In his answer to me on April 15 he indicated that he could show that my figures were reversed in the previous decade. At that time I indicated that that was not so, and I reiterate it tonight.

At page 53 of the Economic Review which came out today, the minister says:

In 1973, wages, salaries and supplementary labour income was down to 70 per cent—

That is actually the figure I had used.

—of net national income—

He then says:

Thus in real terms, average increases in labour income per employee or in wages and salaries increased very little or actually fell in 1973.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize that I believe the minister has been most unfair to the people of Canada and to this House in referring, from time to time, to real disposable income for the average Canadian going up 6.8 per cent in 1973. I say this because it was known privately that the minister could only justify that figure by using a deflator which has rarely been used up until now by statisticians as opposed to using the customary consumer price index deflator. I hope that the minister will explain this to the House. I am pleased that in his review tabled today he at least shows the two deflators in action. They point out, Mr. Speaker, that if the Consumer Price Index deflator is used Canada's real growth was 4.8 per cent in 1973, not 6.8 per cent, which is the figure that the minister has bandied around for some time. If you use the CPI deflator, the effect is shown in the review at page 53 where it is pointed out that the average workman's wages have actually decreased by .9 per cent.

I mention this because I hope that the parliamentary secretary will explain to the House why they have chosen to evade my question when it was put in the House and subsequently to use a deflater, which I feel is not relative, when the minister spoke in Winnipeg.

There is a footnote on page 52 explaining the difference between the CPI deflator and what is generally known as the consumption inflator. I find the minister's suggestion truly remarkable. He states that he thinks it is preferable to use the consumer deflater in that it does not allow for shifts by consumers toward less expensive goods and services as price structures change.

In plain English the minister is saying that inflation in this country has become so devastating that people are having to give up good food and shift to less expensive food. Then, the government has the colossal gall to come to this House and indicate that it wants to use the deflator to show that the lower costs are in truth there because people are giving up the better quality foods in order to eat the less expensive. This is a very, very sad testimony of the mismanagement of this government in our economic affairs. In short, they are saying, "if you cannot eat beef, turn to spaghetti and macaroni or any other cheap food and we will use a deflator to make the over-all economic performance look better". I hope we have an explanation of this tonight, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member states that in the past three years, profits after taxes have jumped over 5 points of national income while the labour share of the national income has declined 5 points.

The published data do not indicate such a substantial alteration as suggested by the hon. member. In 1973, the profits share was 3.8 points higher than in 1970 and the labour share was lower by 2.8 points.

In percentage of the net national income in relation to cost factors, I would like to quote a few figures for the average period extending from 1965 to 1973: profits after taxes, 9 per cent and labour income, 70.9 per cent. The average for 1970-73 is 8.8 per cent and 72 per cent. For 1969, it was 8.4 and 71.2 per cent; for 1970, 7.3 and 72.8; for 1971, 7.9 and 72.9; for 1972, 9 and 72.2; for 1973, 11.1 and 70 per cent. The difference between 1969 and 1973 is 2.7 for benefits after taxes and 1.2 per cent for labour income. From 1970 to 1973, there was a difference of 3.8 per cent and —2.8 per cent.

The years chosen by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) give a highly exaggerated idea of the evolution, 1970 having been characterized by an exceptionally low rate of profits, and unusually high income. In 1973, profits were 2.1 per cent lower than the average for the period 1965-73, while the percentage corresponding to salaries were 0.9 lower than the average. In fact, profits as a percentage of the GNP were lower in 1970, shares reaching their lowest level since 1949.

It is true that profits, before and after taxes, were higher than usual in 1973. Before tax deductions, they amounted to more than $14.5 billion, that is 12.5 per cent of the GNP. Profits after tax deductions were slightly more than $10 billion. Still, it must be noted that companies did not increase their dividends by much in 1973. The greater part of their additional profits were kept to finance investments, and retained earnings amounted to $7.8 billion that year. Those retained earnings, added to depreciation amounting to $6.5 billion, provided $14.3 billion in cash flow for investing. In 1974, businesses expect to invest $18.5 billion in Canada. As the minister said in reply to the hon. member, those investments will mean more production, employment and income for all Canadian workers.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.34 p.m.

HALIBUT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to seek the consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the catastrophic decline of halibut stocks off the Pacific coast and in the Bering Sea and the need for the government to make some public statement of its intentions. I would not intend to debate the motion if it is accepted and take up the time of the House. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That at eight o'clock this day the House revert to motions to provide an opportunity for the Secretary of State for External Affairs or another member of the government to make a statement regarding the government's position with respect to the halibut resource of the Pacific coast and the Bering Sea.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Skeena under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not consent. The motion cannot be put.

SUGGESTED LOANS BY BANK OF CANADA AT ADMINISTRATIVE COST TO PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a very urgent question.

To control the frightening rise in the cost of living and the exorbitant interest rates, I move, seconded by the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House unanimously recognize the necessity of amending without delay the Bank of Canada Act, so that the latter be authorized to provide loans to provinces and municipalities at an interest rate equivalent to administration costs.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43 to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the recent announcement by the British Columbia's Minister of Lands, Forests and Water Resources that the province of British Columbia will be making application to the International Joint Commission for a further order regarding the Skagit Valley, requesting that the commission should revoke its 1942 order in view of the irreparable damage to the province of British Columbia which will occur if the natural level of the Skagit River at and above the international boundary is allowed to be raised above its present level, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Nelson):

That this House endorse in principle the application of the British Columbia government to the International Joint Commission in an endeavour to stop the flooding of Canadian territory by the proposed raising of the Ross dam.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT

PROVISION THAT TOTAL OF DEFINITE AND INDETERMINATE SENTENCES IN ONTARIO AND BRITISH COLUMBIA SHALL NOT EXCEED MAXIMUM PRESCRIBED FOR OFFENCE

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-283, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, the Prisons and Reformatories Act provides for the imposition of sentences of definite and indeterminate terms on young offenders in British Columbia and in Ontario for offences under the Criminal Code which in the aggregate can exceed the maximum term fixed by the Code for these offenders.

The purpose of the Prisons and Reformatories Act is to reform and train young offenders and not to impose harsher punishment upon young offenders in British Columbia and Ontario. However, this appears to be the effect of this legislation at the present time as it has been interpreted by the Supreme Court of Canada in the recent Burnshine decision, and just as justice should appear to be done—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member to remind him that under the terms of Standing Order 68 he can only give a brief explanation and indication to the House of what the subject of the bill is. He should not make a speech on first reading. Perhaps the hon. member will limit his remarks to that aspect of the matter.

Mr. Atkey: In one sentence, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to clarify what appears to be an anomaly by putting before parliament an amendment to the Prisons and Reformatories Act so that parliament may make the decision, in the context of that act, as to what constitutes equality before the law as contained in the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

ISSUE OF BOOKLET IMPLYING THAT NAME OF CAPITAL IS "OTTAWA-HULL"

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 26 I ask permission to make a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the persistence of the government of Canada in continuing to publish and to cause one of its agencies to disseminate and keep for sale a pamphlet, some of whose statements contain grave errors in fact and are in direct contradiction of articles of the British North America Act and the National Capital Act, and which statements are being promulgated to citizens of Canada as government policy despite the fact that a minister of the Crown has described the contents of the pamphlet as unfortunate and not representative of the policy of the government.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West has sent the notice required under the provisions of Standing Order 26, which has given the Chair an opportunity to consider the interesting suggestion to be raised by the hon. member. I wish to thank him for his courtesy in providing the Chair with extensive background notes which have been of value in considering whether the ordinary business of the House should be set aside by virtue of the provisions of Standing Order 26.

As hon. members know, the criteria to be taken into consideration by the Chair in making a decision under the terms of Standing Order 26 are basically to be found in the Standing Order itself. In addition, decisions have been made from time to time which may give some indication as to some of the factors to be taken into consideration in reaching this kind of decision.

One of the main problems facing the Chair is to be found in the wording of Section 16(a) of the Standing Order which states clearly that "the matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency, calling for immediate and urgent consideration". In my opinion, the test of a genuine emergency calling for immediate and urgent consideration is one which can only be overcome in relatively extreme circumstances. Is the question submitted by the hon. member a genuine emergency? I would find it difficult to hold that it is, particularly as the matter was first brought to the attention of the House last Wednesday, almost a week ago. I might say that there appears on the notice paper a question, No. 872, in the name of the hon. member for Leeds bearing on the same subject.

Another factor that must be considered by the Chair in arriving at a conclusion on the acceptability of a motion under Standing Order 26 has to do with other opportunities for debate. As the hon. member knows, section 5 of Standing Order 26 sets up a number of considerations to be borne in mind, and one of them is that the Speaker shall have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within a reasonable time by other means.

An announcement has already been made by the government that the House is to enter into debate on the budget of the Minister of Finance, with the presentation of that budget to be made on Monday next. In view of the fact that six and one half days will be allocated in the ordinary course of events to the budget debate, coupled with an additional 13 days which will be made available for supply proceedings, it follows that every second sitting day between now and June 26 will be a non-legislative day providing opportunities to debate important and urgent issues at the initiative of hon. members of the House. The Chair must conclude that one and perhaps two of the basic requirements of Standing Order 26 are not met in the present circumstances.

In view of what I have said and taking into account all the circumstances, including both the provision of the Standing Order and the practice, I do not think the Chair is at liberty to propose a motion for the adjournment of the House this day to discuss the matter raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West.

LABOUR'S SHARE OF NET NATIONAL INCOME IN 1973—POSITION OF MINISTER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance relating to the Economic Review tabled by the minister yesterday which shows that the share of labour income fell to 70 per cent of the net national income for 1973 from the exceptionally high shares of 1971 and 1972. Is it the position of the minister that the working people got a more proper share of the net national income last year than previously? If so, does last year's proportion which was received by the working people of Canada represent the basis for economic policy for 1974?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Not necessarily, Mr. Speaker. That statement is merely a statement of fact in the Economic Review.

EFFECT ON REAL INCOMES AS CANADIANS SHIFT TO PURCHASE OF LESS EXPENSIVE GOODS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the report explains why the minister does not use the consumer price index to calculate real personal disposable income. The report states as follows:

> ... the CPI does not allow for shifts by consumers toward less expensive goods and services as price structures change.

Is it the view of the minister that real incomes actually rise as Canadians shift to less expensive goods as more and more of the goods they used to buy are priced beyond their reach?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would put it a little more simply. Probably the widest indicator of the movement of prices in this country is the GNE deflator against which the calculation of personal disposable income is made. The CPI does have certain limitations in economic terms, such as were set forth in the Economic Review.

RATE OF INFLATION IN CANADA COMPARED WITH OTHER COUNTRIES—MEASURES TO DECREASE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Since the minister has referred to the gross national expenditure deflator which corresponds to the definition of price change in the economy used in the course of the review, and since the review admits that last year Canada had a greater inflation problem than any other major OECD country with the exception of Japan and this is the inflation index preferred by the review and by the minister, is this insidious position for Canada acceptable to the minister and the government? If not, what direct and comprehensive measures does the government propose to take to start to correct it?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is not the current comparative position. I will be dealing with the current figures next Monday evening.

FISHERIES

PACIFIC AND BERING SEA HALIBUT—REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADA TO JAPAN, RUSSIA AND SOUTH KOREA RESPECTING OVERFISHING

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in connection with a matter which has been brought seriously to the attention of members of the House by west coast fishermen. Arising from an answer the hon. gentleman gave to a question last Friday concerning the International Pacific Halibut Commission meeting held on April 16, can the minister tell us what representations he has made to the governments of Japan, the Soviet Union and South Korea requesting them to curtail their fishing activities, particularly their take of halibut off the Pacific coast and in the Bering Sea? If representations have been made, what answers have been received and have the fishing activities actually decreased?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall be meeting representatives of the west coast fishermen myself this afternoon to discuss this matter. Approaches have been made to the Soviet Union, Japan and Korea in connection with the halibut situation. Japan has already responded by taking some voluntary measures in the Bering Sea and has indicated its willingness to discuss further co-operation. The Soviet Union has also agreed to discuss the situation, and we expect the Republic of Korea will fall in line.

Mr. Lewis: The minister will no doubt recall receiving a letter in March from the chairman of the International Pacific Halibut Commission in which the chairman said there had been catastrophic reduction in the halibut stock. Were the hon. gentleman's representations made following receipt of this letter from the chairman to the effect that fishing must be restricted wherever it adversely affected the halibut resource? Are the responses he mentioned today responses in reply to representations made in consequence of the chairman's letter?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. There is general agreement with the position expressed by the leader of the New Democratic Party. There has been gross overfishing. Our interest is the same as that of all the fishing nations in bringing about a reduction in fishing and restoration of the halibut stocks.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister whether he is taking steps to do what seems to me as a layman in this area the obvious thing, which is to request the Soviet Union, Japan and South Korea to meet with the United States and Canada—we are members of the International Commission—in order to have this matter discussed jointly by all five governments involved instead of making these bilateral representations?

Mr. Sharp: A meeting of the five governments is one of the possibilities. If that turns out to be the most useful approach we will follow it. Otherwise, we shall take action which might be more effective.

INQUIRY WHETHER FARM LABOUR AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC HAS BEEN RENEWED

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Can he tell us if the federal-provincial agreement with the Quebec government about farm labour ending March 31, 1974 has been renewed and, if not, are negotiations in progress between the two levels of government with a view to continuing this agreement?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check and find out and let the hon. member know.

FISHERIES

HALIBUT—SUGGESTED IMPOSITION OF 200-MILE JURISDICTIONAL LIMIT OFF COAST TO SOLVE PROBLEM OF OVERFISHING

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact the halibut catch off the coast of British Columbia has declined by more than two-thirds since 1969, is the minister willing, in view of the emergency, to impose a 200-mile limit arbitrarily so that we can solve this problem and negotiate with the other countries?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): No, Mr. Speaker.

PACIFIC AND BERING SEA HALIBUT—POSSIBILITY OF UNILATERAL ACTION BY CANADA IF NEGOTIATIONS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES TO PREVENT OVERFISHING FAIL

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a supplementary question about the halibut situation. Inasmuch as the chairman of the International Pacific Halibut Commission on March 15 in a letter to the minister suggested the possibility of even unilateral action on the part of Canada to prevent a continuation of the catastrophic decline of halibut stocks in the Bering Sea and off the Pacific coast, can he tell the House whether, if nothing arises in a concrete way out of meetings to take place with other countries, Canada has a contingency plan or is contemplating the taking of unilateral action? I am not asking what that unilateral action might be but whether the government is planning to take such action.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think we should try to solve this problem by co-operation rather than by threats, in the first instance at least.

An hon. Member: But you are not going to.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE FURTHER INCREASE IN BANK INTEREST RATES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In light of the fact the Bank of Canada raised the bank rate some two weeks ago with government approval in order to contain lending by banks, would he care to say what the views of the government are on the report that the banks may again increase their prime rates so they can increase their deposit rates in order to cope with the excessive demand under the inflationary pressures today?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have had a very close relationship with the hon. gentleman over the years and I do not think he would really expect me to comment on interest rates or exchange rates.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I realize that the minister is on the eve of his budget. On the other hand, two weeks ago there was a great deal of approval by the minister for this move which was meant to curtail inflationary pressures, and we hear now that the move is afoot again. I should like to know whether he feels that the move is successful in containing inflation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the only frank answer I could give the hon. gentleman would be speculative, and I would not like to speculate.

ENERGY

SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN FEDERAL SALES TAX ON OIL AND OIL PRODUCTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the federal sales tax on oil and oil products increased by more than 60 per cent when the federal government raised the price of oil from $4 to $6.50 a barrel, does the minister not agree that he should have urged his own government to reduce the sales tax on oil and oil products instead of suggesting that the government of Ontario—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: —reduce its sales tax which it has maintained at the same figure as it was before the federal oil price was raised?

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that a question asked in those terms is debate. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would like to rephrase the question or ask a supplementary; otherwise I will recognize the hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if he will take the first opportunity on motions to explain to the House what justification he has for suggesting on Saturday that the government of Ontario should cut its sales tax which has remained stationary since well before the latest oil price increase, whereas the federal government sales tax on oil has increased by more than 60 per cent since the government raised the oil price? Will he make a statement on motions in the near future?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should remind the hon. gentleman that the Ontario tax is 19 cents while that of the federal government is two to three cents. I would also remind him that on Saturday I pointed out that if the Tories are serious about wage and price controls, the provincial government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to ask the minister whether he did not learn from the last election that you cannot fool many of the people much of the time.

An hon. Member: We sure fooled you.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is why you are in the opposition, George.

Mr. Hees: You are going to wind up as nothing after the next one.

Mr. Trudeau: You need another five days off.

An hon. Member: How was your vacation, Pierre?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INCOME TAX

EFFECT OF PROVISION OF FAST WRITE-OFFS AND TAX REDUCTIONS TO MANUFACTURERS ON CREATION OF NEW JOBS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. As the Economic Review indicates that most of the major sectors of the economy advanced in the creation of new jobs as much as manufacturing, and in some cases much more, is the minister still of the opinion that the fast write-off and corporate tax reductions to manufacturers were the major reason for the performance of that sector as far as the creation of new jobs is concerned?

● (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will, of course, allow the minister to reply, but a question in those terms invites the minister to express an opinion. I do not want to be unfair to the hon. member for Dauphin. If the minister can reply briefly he will be recognized for that purpose.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will have to read that question in Hansard because I really could not hear it through the fog emitted by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising for a supplementary?

Mr. Ritchie: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister any further plans to research the fast write-offs and tax reductions for manufacturers in view of the discrimination against other segments of the economy in certain areas?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): At this stage in the session, Mr. Speaker, it might be a little awkward for me to answer that question.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR PROGRAM TO PROVIDE RENTAL ACCOMMODATION FOR LOW AND MODERATE INCOME FAMILIES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In light of the cutback in apartment construction in Canada's major urban centres, does the minister plan to announce at an early date new plans for a large-scale program to provide rental accommodation for low and moderate income families?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are supporting through the provisions of the National Housing Act the construction of a large number of family income units and are supporting the implementation very vigourously of the whole non-profit sector of the National Housing Act. We are also supporting provincial action as it exists in this regard.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): In view of the chronic reluctance of the building industry to use the funds allocated for public housing, would the minister now consider taking direct action by having the government move directly into the building field as it did so successfully after the second world war?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the federal-provincial partnership operating in most provinces to develop public housing is not having difficulty in finding people to build houses.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): How does it happen that so many people are unable to get rental accommodation in spite of what the minister says?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lisgar.

FINANCE

ACTION TO ENSURE BANKS MAKE MONEY AVAILABLE TO FARMERS UNDER FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that some banks at least seem to be unwilling at the present time to lend money by way of farm improvement loans, has the minister had discussions with the officials of the banks in Canada with a view to ensuring that under the Farm Improvement Loans Act money will be available for farmers to use this spring?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will take that suggestion under consideration, particularly in view of the fact the House has just passed amendments to that act.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CURRENT STRENGTH OF ARMED FORCES—NUMERICAL FLOOR

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I have given him notice. Will the minister inform the House what the current strength of the armed forces is? Will he also advise the House whether there is a numerical floor beneath which he does not intend to let the strength of the forces sink and, if so, what is it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With respect, I suggest to both the hon. member and the minister, in spite of the consultation that may have taken place before, that this question asks for statistical information and should normally be placed on the order paper. I believe that the hon. member for Athabasca has a supplementary to a previous question. He will be recognized for that purpose and then there will be another supplementary.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway).]

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

LAWYERS SELECTED TO PROCESS MORTGAGES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Can the minister say why the government follows the practice of appointing only certain lawyers for the processing of CMHC mortgages rather than using any qualified lawyer who is licensed to practice? Further, how and by whom are these lists arrived at?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the appointment of lawyers by the government and Crown agencies has been explained many times in the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: —by a series of Ministers of Justice, and that same procedure is being followed today.

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubt that the hon. member's question was supplementary to a previous question. I would hope the Chair would be allowed to proceed as quickly as possible without too many supplementaries, especially those which are perhaps related but not genuine supplementaries. I will recognize the hon. member for Athabasca and then the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister explain to the House whether it is the policy of the government to give CMHC work only to lawyers who are members of the Liberal Party?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, but it often happens that the best lawyers are Liberals.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This exchange of questions and answers may be interesting to members but I wonder it is getting us anywhere. I recognize the hon. member for Athabasca for a last supplementary.

Mr. Yewchuk: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think this form of open and blatant patronage is scandalous and should be stopped.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. That is debate and not a point of order. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has been recognized.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF DIFFICULTY IN OBTAINING FARM MACHINERY

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Lisgar. I would direct it to the Minister of Agriculture. While the reluctance of the banks to lend money in the form of farm improvement loans is being investigated, will the minister also investigate the circumstances now existing in many farm areas where it is almost impossible to obtain farm machinery and where the prices of both machinery and repairs are rapidly escalating, almost moving out of sight?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the last part of the question. I was just referred to a document about the price of farm machinery and the price, unless the hon. member has other evidence, is not what he has presented to me. I will investigate the other suggestion. We are investigating it now. If there is anything we can find we will make further representations to the banks to find out if there is any truth in the suggestion that they are refusing to lend money to the producers of this country to produce food.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO RECOGNITION OF PROPOSED ONTARIO LAND SPECULATION TAX AS BUSINESS COST IN COMPUTATION OF FEDERAL TAXES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. With reference to the projected Ontario land speculation tax, can the Minister of Finance confirm that it is the continuing policy of the government to recognize such provincial taxes as a cost of doing business in the computation of federal taxes?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are still examining that piece of legislation to see whether it will achieve the purposes for which it was introduced.

Mr. Lawrence: Can the minister tell us when his consideration of this bill, which has been public knowledge now for at least a week and is going through the second reading stage in the provincial legislature, will be completed and he will be in a position to tell the people of Ontario?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is hypothetical until the bill is passed.

AIR TRANSPORT

ALLEGED IMPROPER PACKING OR LABELLING OF DANGEROUS AIR CARGO—MEASURES TO PROTECT TRAVELLING PUBLIC

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In light of the fact that dangerous air cargo is often improperly packed or wrongly labelled at the origination point, can the minister inform the House whether he will undertake action to blacklist effectively the transportation of air cargo derived from originators who in the past have been proven faulty in their preparations for transport in order to protect the air travelling public from any future breakdown in safety regulations of this kind?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, everybody will understand that I will have to verify many of the facts alleged by the hon. member and then I shall be glad to answer him.

● (1440)

Mr. McKenzie: Because of the fact that the transportation of dangerous, improperly packed or labelled cargo has been allowed as a result of the lack of supervision and improper training of the personnel responsible, will the minister immediately undertake to formulate measures that will upgrade these procedures?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, before I take measures I think I will have to doublecheck the facts.

GRAIN

FEED GRAINS—SUGGESTED ACTION TO ENSURE PRICE PARITY BETWEEN EASTERN AND WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

As the measures taken since September about feed grains and price parity between east and west have not had the expected results, will the minister announce soon what measures he intends to take during the coming months to reach this goal?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the premise of the hon. member's preliminary because the present policy has produced parity in prices of feed grains across the country, although those prices are significantly higher than people might have anticipated a year ago. However, it is our anticipation to announce the final form of the feed grains program for next year and for the future in the next few weeks.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

I do not accept either the arguments on which is based the answer I have just been given. In view of the fact that the representations I receive every day from feed buyers prove that prices have continued to rise and the margin to widen, I should like to put to the minister a very direct question hoping to get a very frank answer. Will he soon advise the House of the steps he intends to implement to give eastern producers equal chances with western producers?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that is what I said, that within the next few weeks we would expect to indicate the feed grains policy for the future. But I would again say to the hon. member that the basic price of grain available to producers in the prairie region is itself the monitored price on which grain is offered into the eastern region, and there is therefore the assurance of equity in grain prices with, of course, cost differences and transportation between them. However, I do say to the hon. member that prices are a lot higher than anticipated a year ago by some people, but that really reflects a lot of circumstances, including world pricing conditions.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATE PAID BY COMMERCIAL LENDERS FOR SHORT-TERM MONEY

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware that commercial lenders, by one method or another, are presently paying up to 12 per cent for some short-term money, and is it the opinion of the minister that that short-term rate is a fair market rate for these commercial lenders to pay?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to analyse the particular deal involved, the particular circumstances under which it was made, in order to give an opinion of that sort.

Mr. Blenkarn: Is the fact that lenders must pay up to 12 per cent on short-term money—these are the commercial banks of the country—an indication that we have a new tight money policy?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, sir, and I am not sure that the hon. gentleman is right in the totality of his premise.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF RALPH STEINHAUER AS NEW LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF ALBERTA

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which I believe is of fairly general interest.

Mr. Hees: Is this one you sent him?

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I gave him notice of it. Can the Prime Minister advise the House whether he has yet appointed the new Lieutenant Governor of the province of Alberta?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say that was done at a cabinet meeting this morning and that the appointee will be a native Indian. This will be the first time in Canada that an Indian has occupied that function. I think this completes the record since we now have native Canadians in the judiciary, in the legislatures, and from now on we will have some in the executive. I hope there will be an increasing number. Indeed, perhaps the next prime minister could be either a woman or an Indian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: You should have seen John Turner's face on that one. It turned absolutely black.

Some hon. Members: His name?

Mr. Trudeau: His name is Mr. Ralph Steinhauer of Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CN-CP STUDY ON FEASIBILITY OF AN ARCTIC RAILWAY

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It has reference to the one I asked recently regarding the feasibility study carried out by CN-CP on an Arctic railway. Now that his department has had the CN-CP study for some weeks, and further to the commitment made on March 27 by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, would the minister say when this study will be made public?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check to see exactly when we got the report or, if we do not have it, when we think we will have it. Maybe I will be able to inform the hon. member exactly tomorrow.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Would the minister also be prepared at that time to say when it will be made public?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I will be prepared to say that if I know it.

ENERGY

SUGGESTED LOWERING OF COMPENSATION TO OIL COMPANIES ON IMPORTS IN LIGHT OF PROFITS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the exceedingly high profits being made by the oil companies in Canada this year, is the minister contemplating lowering the compensation rate paid to oil companies for eastern oil imported from offshore? Is he considering asking them to absorb some of the price increase on that oil?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I responded to that question in committee last week.

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the fact the minister's response was in the negative, and in view of the fact Imperial Oil has deferred taxes of over $150 million, does he intend to recommend to the Minister of Finance that we now collect those deferred taxes?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): At such a sensitive moment I would hate to suggest anything to the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ABSENCE OF CANADIAN COAT OF ARMS FROM DESIGNS FOR NEW PASSPORT COVERS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It refers to one I asked previously. In view of the fact more than half of the proposed designs for new passport covers now on display in his new office building bear no evidence whatsoever of the Canadian coat of arms, may I ask the minister how he could say in reply to a question of mine last week, as recorded on page 1672 of Hansard, that he had not heard of any such suggestion?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when I gave that answer I had not heard of these suggestions. I had not examined the covers that were on display. May I add that the government did not ask for any of these mock-ups to exclude the coat of arms or any reference to the Queen, and certainly I would never approve a passport that did not include the coat of arms and a reference to the Queen.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I thank the minister for that reply, Mr. Speaker, but I am a little confused about the need for a new design. Can the minister tell us why the present form needs to be changed? Is it because in its present form the Canadian passport can be easily counterfeited and, if so, will he not concede that the removal of the coat of arms, which in itself is an intricate engraving, would make counterfeiting easier?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I have no argument with the hon. gentleman on this point. I do not intend to remove the coat of arms from any Canadian passport cover that I would approve. I agree with him that that is a minor consideration, however. The reason for asking for new designs really had to do with the cover rather than with the contents, and I think we could improve the cover.

AIR TRANSPORT

CARRYING OF POTENTIALLY DANGEROUS CARGO—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PILOTS AND GROUND CREW WILL BE INFORMED OF CONTENTS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief supplementary to the question asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. While the Minister of Transport is checking into the various matters raised by my colleague, will he give the House the assurance that in future, when potentially dangerous cargo is to be transported, both the pilots and the ground personnel will be informed of the contents so they can effectively deal with a crisis situation if one should arise?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think there is a committee studying this very important matter and I think we will be much more strict in the future than we were in the past. However, I am not in a position to state exactly what the future regulations will be.

RATE OF INFLATION IN CANADA INDICATED BY ECONOMIC REVIEW VIS-À-VIS STATEMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER AND MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. He has said that the most reliable measure of inflation is that used by the Economic Review, the gross national expenditure deflator. Inasmuch as the review shows that for the second half of 1973 compared with the first half there was 9.2 per cent increase in Canada against 7 per cent in the United States and 6 per cent in the United Kingdom, would the minister explain briefly to the House why he has gone around the country with the Prime Minister saying that the Canadian performance is significantly better than that of the United States and even the United Kingdom when these figures in his own review indicate that this constituted a very substantial misrepresentation of the facts?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no misrepresentation whatsoever.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If the hon. gentleman looks at the deflator as it is applied to recent months, he will see that the rate of increase in the deflator in the United States and Europe has been higher than in any year in Canada. If he looks at the Economic Review he will also find some interesting statistics as to how the deflator is broken down into its foreign and domestic components, showing conclusively that the prime thrust of inflation in this country is foreign induced.

Mr. Stanfield: Will the minister please answer the question I asked? In view of the representations he and the Prime Minister were making all through the second half of 1973, will he answer the question I asked and give the House an explanation rather than try to change the ground and talk about something different from what he was talking about all last year?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is being selective in his citations in the sense that he is comparing the second half of 1973 with the first half of 1973. If he compares the second half of 1973 with the same quarter or the same half of 1972, he will see that what the Prime Minister and I have been saying is accurate.

Mr. Stanfield: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The figures for 1973 over 1972 show Canada at 7.2 per cent, the United States 5.25 per cent, and the United Kingdom 5.75 per cent.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have not got the figures with me but I will be addressing myself to the up to date figures on Monday night.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has he received complaints from the publishers of weekly newspapers that the increases in the cost of newsprint which have been implemented by all producers of paper are of a nature that makes it virtually impossible for them to continue publication? If he has received such complaints, has he looked into the combines situation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, such complaints have not been drawn to my attention recently, but I will be happy to have them looked into from the combines point of view.

INCOME TAX

EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR FILING RETURNS BECAUSE OF RECENT POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the settlement of the postal strike, has the minister changed his attitude to give ease to those of us who may be late in filing our tax returns?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think most people have no difficulty in complying with the deadline of midnight tonight, but it does appear that some Canadians would have difficulty meeting the deadline. Therefore I have decided to give some period of grace. Income tax returns of individuals that are postmarked not later than midnight, May 21, should be accepted as mailed on time.

Mr. Hees: Why don't you make it July 8?

HARBOURS

REQUEST THAT AMOUNT ALLOCATED FOR EXPENDITURE ON SMALL CRAFT HARBOURS BE INCREASED

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact the proposed expenditure during the present fiscal year in the area of small craft harbours is $18 million or less than the amount requested by his officials—pretty well half—and $7 million less than the amount requested by the minister, and in view of the motion that was presented to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry this morning by his parliamentary secretary, would the minister agree to discuss the matter with his colleagues and recommend that the amount allocated this year for the provision of small craft harbours be increased?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

LAWYERS SELECTED TO PROCESS MORTGAGES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs now that he is back in the House. It is related to the very important matter raised by the hon. member for Athabasca. In a situation where only two lawyers are recommended to a constituent by an official of CMHC and he has had an unfortunate experience with one lawyer but not with the other—they are both good lawyers despite what the right hon. gentleman may say—and both are not qualified as far as he is concerned, is this constituent, as a Canadian, to be blacklisted from doing business with CMHC because of this decision by the government to use only Grit lawyers?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): No, he can make his wishes known to the corporation.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES ACT

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO OFFSET EFFECT OF INFLATION ON PAYMENTS TO ANNUITANTS OR PERMISSION TO TRANSFER TO OTHER PLANS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is responsible for the administration of the Government Annuities Act. On behalf of thousands of Canadians who bought government annuities in good faith for their retirement hoping that they would be a good investment but who now find that because of inflation it is one of the poorest investments they could have made, I should like to ask the minister whether he is giving consideration to amending the act so that the government will no longer be able to use that invested money at the ridiculously low rate of 4 per cent? If the government will not agree to do that, will they give permission to the holders of government annuities to transfer them to some other registered retirement savings plan that will give them a good return on their investment?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take note of the hon. member's representation and discuss it with my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

PROPOSED SALE OF MONTREAL ALOUETTES FOOTBALL CLUB—POSSIBILITY OF SUBSIDY OR PURCHASE BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the franchise value of the Montreal Alouettes has been so adversely affected by Bill C-22, particularly, according to the owners of that team, because of his policy, is it the minister's intention, in his efforts to keep the Canadian Football League intact, to consider subsidizing from federal funds the operations of that or any other CFL club or, indeed, to purchase the Montreal club outright?

● (1500)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of the question, surely the hon. member cannot be serious about his assertion. As for the second part, the answer is no.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary and then the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I simply ask the question out of fear. Since the introduction of the football bill, nothing the minister can do would surprise me. As the Montreal Alouettes are enduring operation losses of approximately $500,000 per year and as that team and other CFL teams may lose players to the World Football League, is the minister now prepared to see the Montreal Alouettes cease to exist or, if the occasion arises, purchased by foreign interests?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: In my opinion it might be better for the hon. member to wait for developments. He may be in for surprises.

HARBOURS

HALIFAX-DARTMOUTH—LOCATION OF CONTAINER FACILITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the expansion of container facilities in the port of Halifax and Dartmouth. Has the minister received communications and telegrams from interested parties in the two communities with respect to the proposed location of such facilities? More specifically, has he replied to such communications and can he give some assurance that no final decision has been made with respect to the development of the Fairview site, which is in the middle of a settled private home area, as opposed to the development of Navy Island Cove which is far more suitable?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in order not to give a vague answer I will have to check again and give a more precise answer tomorrow. I should like to find out exactly where we stand on this matter.

FINANCE

POSITION OF GOVERNMENT ON INCREASE OR DECREASE IN RATE OF INFLATION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Given the fact the Prime Minister said recently that "we can say with great confidence that the rate of inflation will probably decline later this year" and yet the whole thrust of the Economic Review, particularly with reference to commodity prices and oil, is that inflation will increase, can the minister tell the House which is the official position of the government?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression the hon. gentleman quoted the Prime Minister out of context.

Mr. Bell: He said inflation was licked.

Mr. Baldwin: Now we see the second coming.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I said to the House that the increases in food prices, world commodity prices and now in petroleum prices would have to work their way through the Canadian economy before any relief from inflation is felt. Certainly, it is within the realm of possibility that commodity prices might break in the latter part of the year.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary and then call orders of the day.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I assure the Minister of Finance that I am not quoting the Prime Minister out of context. I am just repeating his speech.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member was quoting me out of context.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I wish to read from page 11 of the speech of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure hon. members would like to hear the hon. member read that page of the right hon. gentleman's speech, but I wonder whether that would be in order. If he has a supplementary he will be recognized for that purpose before we call orders of the day.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I have a question of privilege, but the fact is that the statement was not taken out of context. It is here, in front of me. The important issue is this: in making and formulating economic policy, is the government working on the premise that inflation is declining or increasing because the Prime Minister said it is declining and the Economic Review says it is going up? Which position is the government taking on this question?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is no difficulty in reconciling those statements. The Economic Review states, as I stated in the House, that food prices, commodity prices and petroleum prices have to work their way through the economy. After they do so there is the prospect of a moderation in prices. That is exactly what that statement says.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that we are engaging in a budget debate during the question period. The hon. member indicates he has a supplementary. Perhaps hon. members will allow the Chair to recognize the hon. member for Don Valley for that purpose. However, it seems to me we are hearing debate between the hon. member and the minister and that has nothing to do with the question period.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, thank you for your indulgence. I think this is a most important question. Again I ask the Minister of Finance, in making economic policy in this country for this year is the government assuming that the rate of inflation is going down or going up. It is a simple question and I ask for a simple answer, yes or no. What is the assumption?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it depends very much on what the hon. gentleman means by the rate of inflation and in which part of the year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am saying to the House that the country will have to absorb in an economic way the rises in basic commodity prices, both agricultural and non-agricultural, and in petroleum. When they work their way through the economy it will mean that toward the end of the year we will see some moderation in that rate.

Mr. Hees: You mean, the rate is going up and it is going down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume that problem will not be resolved at this time so the Chair will call orders of the day.

PROVISION FOR PLANNING ACQUISITION OF LAND, GRANTS, GRADE CROSSING ASSISTANCE

The House resumed, from Monday, April 29, consideration in committee of Bill C-27, to facilitate the relocation of railway lines or rerouting of railway traffic in urban areas and to provide financial assistance for work done for the protection, safety and convenience of the public at railway crossings—Mr. Basford—Mr. McCleave in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening, clause 3 of the bill was under consideration, together with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lotbiniere. The hon. member for Crowfoot had the floor.

On clause 3—Application to Commission.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Chairman, the significant part of Clause 3 has to do with the accepted plan of a transport system within a study area. It is well known that the former president of the CNR, Mr. MacMillan, said that he could move people between Montreal and Toronto much more quickly by train if the track were straightened and the level crossings on the route removed. This bill deals with all of Canada. I remember members of the National Harbours Board appearing before the transport committee in 1968 or 1969. They had a plan or map drawn for the relocation of tracks around and into the port of Vancouver. I think the minister piloting this legislation in the House was a member of that committee. He stoutly defended the wisdom of that plan. I wonder about the wisdom of that plan and how it fits into the present system.

It is a well known fact that the trackage into and around the port of Vancouver leaves something to be desired. Money appropriated under this bill is for the removal of trackage, if necessary, or the relocation of trackage or the dividing of highways and trackage where they meet. It is also well known that only seven cars can be put into the elevators in Vancouver. The freight trains must, therefore, be broken apart, which involves a lot of shunting with an engine and six cars repeatedly moving across or through part of the Vancouver area.

It is also a well known fact that the CNR uses the Burlington Northern yards to store and group their boxcars. These yards are in the United States. The CNR uses them to group their cars before moving them to the harbour. Some time ago I made a speech in this House on transportation. I stated that a harbour must have two facilities. It must be easily accessible to large ocean vessels and easily accessible from inland.

The Minister of Transport called a transportation conference here in Ottawa on April 10. The CNR and CPR submitted detailed maps. There were lengthy talks about the difficulties they could see in the trackage for the movement of grain and equipment. It was interesting to note that the average CPR car cycle from the prairies was 18 days. Once loaded and booked on to the CPR train in Calgary, it took 4.4 days for that car to move from Calgary to Vancouver, an unusually long time for the average boxcar loaded with grain, potash or whatever. Mr. Martinelli of the CPR appeared before that transportation conference. He stated that the reason for the 4.4 days for the movement of grain from Calgary to Vancouver was the continual build-up of loaded boxcars in Vancouver which blocked the track. He said the greater the blockage of track the more difficult it was to move in cars.

Some members have suggested that the bill before us is designed to assist in the improvement of trackage between Montreal and Toronto. I do not think that is the only area in which it could be used. I suggest it could be used in Vancouver. I hope the hon. member who represents a part of that city will look at that car cycle and the problems outlined by the CPR at that transportation conference on April 10 of this year. The reason for the 4.4 days required to move cars from Calgary to Vancouver is strictly because of the backlog of cars on the tracks around the port of Vancouver. It takes another 4.4 days to unload the cars in Vancouver. To show the ease with which the cars move away from Vancouver, it takes an average of 1.7 days to move a car from Vancouver to Calgary. There is no backlog in the movement away from, just the movement into Vancouver.

We hear great explanations about what is the matter with the grain handling system on the prairies, how in many cases trackage has to be abandoned and how there must be primary elevators and central delivery points in order to speed up the movement of grain. If one looks at the CPR car cycle chart, it can readily be seen that it takes an average of 2.9 days to load a car and on two out of seven of those days the men do not work. The CPR also complained about that. They said they could reduce that 2.9 days if the elevator operators would work seven days a week rather than taking off Saturday and Sunday. Even with taking off Saturday and Sunday, it only took 2.9 days for a car to be loaded and moving again. It took 1.5 days for the car to get to Calgary where it sat for 1.7 days. It took a total of 1.8 days to get in and out of the port of Vancouver. I suggest that quite a bit of the congestion in and around the port of Vancouver could be eliminated if additional trackage were built and some of the present trackage in and around that harbour removed.

We all know about the tunnel. We have been told that CPR uses the CNR tunnel to get close to Burrard Inlet. Is additional track going to be built around Port Moody over what might be called the Indian Arm Inlet? If this were done, it might facilitate the movement—

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him under the Standing Order has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: If there is unanimous consent, the hon. member might be recognized again.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I can assure the minister that as soon as he answers some of the questions I put to him last evening and today, this legislation will be readily passed. However, one should point out the significance of the port of Vancouver and the need for track relocation to facilitate movements into that harbour. As I pointed out, the backlog of cars on the tracks in Vancouver is causing a delay in the movement of grain into that harbour. The slowness of the movement of cars over that track to the elevators in the harbour causes a delay in getting the cars unloaded.

What about the tonnage handled at the port of Vancouver? How important is it to Canada? I have a press release from the National Harbours Board dated March 17, 1972. It is a tabulation for the year 1971. I think perhaps the same figures hold true today, with perhaps a little larger tonnage. The total tonnage handled by all major ports in Canada was 93 million tons. Vancouver handled better than 35 million tons, well over 30 per cent of the total. The next largest port was Montreal, which handled 23 million tons. It is reported over the radio almost every day of the week that at least 18 ships are waiting to be loaded. The next day the ships move to Seattle to be loaded because they cannot get the grain cars, boxcars or containerization. It is a well known fact that the port of Seattle has 11 container handling devices. Vancouver has one and is hastily building a second. I have added the words "hastily building a second".

The minister should be able to tell us what he has in mind, what he regards as being an acceptable plan. Can just any plan qualify for 50 per cent of the cost paid by the government during the study period? Are there any criteria set out? If there is no relocation whatsoever, is 50 per cent of the cost still paid for by the federal government? Can any city in Canada, regardless of its size, no matter how small the railroad, qualify for assistance? Should the British Columbia Railway wish to relocate within a city, would it qualify for assistance in the same way as the CN in the middle of Toronto? As I said last evening, the CNR owns 190 acres in downtown Toronto. Take the tracks off those acres and one has the most valuable piece of real estate in Canada. I am really not sympathetic to the idea of the federal government paying 50 per cent of the cost of getting the track off such valuable property. Mr. MacMillan, when he appeared before the committee, could not and would not try to estimate the value of that 190 acres in downtown Toronto. He said it couldn't be valued accurately at today's prices.

There are certain aspects of this bill which may involve extensive developments throughout the country by way of computerization and rapid transit systems. In these circumstances, it is hard to imagine that the government would not have some kind of plan. The minister told us nothing in this connection. For example, will there be a monorail system in Edmonton and a similar system in Toronto or should we expect a hodge-podge of transit systems to develop across Canada? Some might ask: what difference does it make? Well, it makes a very big difference. It is interesting to note that the mobile lounges being built for the Montreal airport will probably be identical to those used in Toronto. They are experimenting with two in Toronto at the present time. Preferably, a Canadian contractor would do the building, because our aim should be quantity as well as size.

I propose to read, now, from the Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada for 1969. Here is what the Council had to say about the shape of our major cities in 1975 and the need for some kind of plan. I am not a great planner, Mr. Speaker, but I believe that if the government intends to pay out taxpayers' money it should lay down certain criteria in respect of rapid transit systems. If the program adopted by each of our cities had a basic similarity there would be a major saving in purchasing, since we would then be purchasing in quantity, in the first place, as well as greater ease of maintenance. Here is what the Economic Council forecasts:

> By 1980, eight of every ten Canadians—some 20 million people—may be living in urban areas, with almost two-thirds of the population in about 29 major cities. In the past, our urban growth has generally proceeded in a haphazard, unplanned manner. In the future, we need greater attention focused on the adaptation of cities to people and not the other way around. Such an emphasis can be translated into demands for collective services and social capital of many kinds, for transportation, health, education, public utilities, recreational facilities, protective services, waste disposal and pollution abatement—demands that tend to increase more rapidly than income.

In that chapter dealing with transportation, the Council holds there must be some kind of initial concept. In this bill, the minister has held out a carrot to every major city. As I said last evening, one would almost think an election was coming on, and that the minister wanted to visit every city personally and say to them: Build your own transit systems if you like; when the legislation is passed we will give you 50 per cent of the cost. He would not say how these systems were to be maintained or what cities would qualify, whether they would be cities with populations of 250,000 or 500,000 or a million.

The minister might be slightly annoyed because I am taking a good deal of time over this clause. I do so because I think it is important he should realize the need to give the committee some answers to the questions I have raised. I could resume my seat now, and speak again on clause 4, making virtually the same speech as the one I have just made. If the minister wishes me to repeat myself, I shall do so. But he must answer some of these questions if he expects this measure to proceed through the House as no doubt he would wish.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Chairman, yesterday I had the honour to move an amendment to clause 3 so as to enable municipalities, once the province approves the program, to co-operate directly with the federal government, if necessary, and this without any prejudice to the provinces' rights.

With the unanimous consent of the House and after consultation with the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) as well as our NDP colleagues, I would like to withdraw my amendment and move another, which would seem more agreeable to the House, in order to improve this bill. I therefore move:

> That clause 3(1) of Bill C-27 be amended at lines 11 and 12 by deleting the words "acting on behalf of the province".

And in English—

[English]

> That clause 3(1) be amended by deleting the words "acting on behalf of the province".

The Chairman: The committee has heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Lotbinière which amounts to the withdrawal of the amendment offered last evening and substitution therefor of a new amendment. First, we shall proceed with the withdrawal of the amendment. This would require unanimous consent. Is it agreed that the amendment as offered by the hon. member last evening be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Fortin) withdrawn.

Mr. Fortin moved:

> That clause 3(1) be amended at lines 11 by deleting the words "acting on behalf of the province".

Mr. Peters: I do not want to make a great issue of this, but the new amendment does amount to an amendment of substance, and I believe it is a retrograde step as compared with the amendment which has just been withdrawn. It only means that a municipality can act on behalf of a province. This could happen at any time if the province allowed it—

Mr. Fortin: It is entirely the opposite.

Mr. Peters: I do not see that it is. The other amendment was complicated, but I believe it accomplished exactly what it was intended to accomplish. A city or a community could bring forward a plan, and the province might well say it is a wonderful plan—we have seen this happen in northern Ontario on a number of occasions. But these expressions of approval do not prevent a province from dragging its feet, which means that the project never gets ahead as well as it might have done.

● (1530)

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. While I am in sympathy with the amendment proposed by the hon. member, I feel I must caution you that it appears to be out of order and unconstitutional. I do not have a copy of the amendment before me, but I noted that the sentence in part would then read:

—for that transportation study area, the province or a municipality may, subject to sub-section (5)—

Municipalities are the children of provinces, and I would caution you to study that amendment very closely as I seriously think it is out of order.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should deal with the point of order raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot. In a way it does resemble the point I had doubt about last evening when the original amendment was suggested. I have given some careful consideration to that in the hours since then, and on balance I thought that both that amendment and the one before the committee now would be in order. If there are further points to be made about it I would be glad to entertain them, but the hon. member for Moncton has been so patient, perhaps he could be allowed to have his say. If a point of order really does arise, then we will get to it and dispose of it.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Chairman, I thought I should rise and speak on this bill because, even though I am fully in accord with the principle of this legislation and do not want to see it unduly delayed, there are certain features which are not quite palatable. I should like to see some changes made, and Clause 3 is the clause I really do not like. Before I get into that in detail, I should say to the committee that I welcome this legislation, which is so long overdue. It is something that we on this side of the House have been pressing on the government for at least six or seven years. The fact that it is overdue, I suppose, makes it no less welcome, but this does make one wonder about the priorities of this government, and why it would shilly-shally and delay for so long without coming to grips with these problems.

I am pleased that the government has finally realized that there is a correlation between urban development, growth and transportation. This is something we in the Maritimes have recognized for a good many years, probably because our growth, not only urban but industrial, is so dependent upon transportation, and because transportation means so much to us. It has always been very puzzling to us to note the utter disregard, if you will, by the government of the fact that growth and transportation are so closely related. In addition, the government does not seem to want to adopt any constructive measures to tie one in with the other.

The city of Moncton, which I represent, has had this transportation problem ever since the railway came to Moncton. I do not want to leave the impression that we do not appreciate the railway, but because the railway was responsible for the growth of the city, and because the growth of the railway was haphazard and without planning, we have found that as the railway continued to grow and expand it did not do too much for the urbanization or industrialization of the city as a whole. So we have over the years tried to impress upon governments the fact that urban growth and transportation are closely related, and you cannot have one unless you tie it in with the other.

In the city of Moncton, for example, depending on whether you count every crossing or just crossings over major arteries in the city, we have anywhere from 12 to 19 level crossings in the centre of the city. It is not difficult to realize what this does to the whole growth and development pattern in the city. We have been trying for years to get assistance from the federal government to overcome this difficulty, but we have always been told that the only funds available are those earmarked for grade separations and grade crossings. As the committee knows, the grade crossing fund is designed primarily for the elimination of dangerous crossings, and while some of those crossings in the city of Moncton could probably be classed as dangerous, there are not that many level crossing accidents so they really do not qualify under the grade separation fund.

I recall raising the first question back in 1969 with the then Minister of Transport as to what the government had in mind, and whether there were any plans for legislation to assist cities in the relocation of crossings to aid urban growth. At that time, the answer was that plans were being drafted and something was underway. Again in December 1970, the then Minister of Transport, Mr. Jamieson, in reply to a question in the House, said that the government had started a pilot project in Winnipeg and he hoped there would be legislation within the next few months. Those few months have since stretched out into almost four years.

I did have some hope around the middle of October 1972 when the Minister of Urban Affairs and the Minister of Transport made an announcement in glowing terms that there would be immediate legislation, if they were returned, to assist the cities in the relocation of tracks. We all know now that was just what it appeared to be at the time, nothing but an election promise in the hope of gaining votes, because nothing was done, in spite of many questions in the House. Then again, the throne speech of that year contained a reference to this legislation, but nothing happened until there appeared again in the throne speech of this session a further reference to this legislation.

I do not want to be too critical of the government over the fact that it has been so slow, as I do not want to deter or discourage it from now going ahead with this legislation. I would like to see the legislation go through, but one of the things that disturbs me more than anything is Clause 3. This is the first clause which lets us see just how much power, responsibility and authority is being delegated to the CTC. If you look through Clause 3 and the following clauses, you find that the Canadian Transport Commission is the body that receives applications and determines, in the first instance, whether an application should be considered. It then checks with the Minister of Urban Affairs and the Minister of Transport to see whether funds are available, and so on.

In addition to that, the CTC, as I read the act, is the sole judge of which applications should be approved. In other words, it is the sole judge in respect of the allocation of funds. I have been critical of the CTC in the past, and I think the criticism which has been raised in respect of this bill by some of my colleagues is well founded. This criticism relates to the danger of giving this authority to the CTC.

In the case of my own city of Moncton, there is a study underway now jointly financed by the federal government and the government of the province of New Brunswick. This Damas & Smith outfit, whose name seems to appear in regard to all these studies, is one of the consultants involved. There is a consultant for the province as well as for the railway. I think there are about four different concerns involved. That study has been underway for some two or three months, and I think it is expected that the report will perhaps be finalized by the end of the summer or early fall. In any event, the consultants are presently studying four different proposals for the relocation of tracks.

The city of Moncton has filed an application for track relocation. I questioned the minister about this and he assured me that the application from the city had been received. What disturbs me now is how much more delay will be experienced even after this proposal has been finally agreed upon by both the provincial and municipal governments. I would be much more confident and happy if this were being handled in the normal manner through the minister's department, because the speed with which applications are processed by the CTC in my experience is similar to that which has been suggested by my colleague, the hon. member for Central Nova, and others in this debate. I have not been too happy about the speed with which the CTC proceeds in respect of any application, although we do know that it proceeds quite quickly in respect of abandonment applications. Anything a little more complicated, such as freight rates and appeals under section 16 of the act and so on, seem to require a little more deliberation by the CTC.

It has been my experience in committees of this House that there is absolutely no way to get through to members of the CTC. This commission cannot be hurried up. I am surprised it has been given all these powers because it will have the power to decide where the allocations are to go. We have been told over and over again by the president of the CTC that the functions of this commission are merely regulatory. We are told that this House makes the decisions and that the commission carries them out according to our wishes. It seems to me that we are departing a long way from a regulatory body when we give this body the power to actually decide what areas will receive funds under this bill. If the CTC were responsible to the House and if we had any control over it I would not be too concerned. However, in my experience the CTC has become a body which is independent of the House. If we try to obtain any decisions from the CTC, we are told that all it does is carry out the rules and regulations. One just cannot get through to the commission.

[Mr. Thomas (Moncton).]

I notice in reading the report of the debate that the minister of State for Urban Affairs, in respect of some of the queries raised by different members about the fact that the CTC is being given so much power, had this to say as recorded at page 1836 of Hansard:

> I might also say that the CTC is authorized to make rules and set priorities in connection with relocation plans.

Well, the power to set priorities is far from being a regulatory power. That is what I would call a matter of policy. But here is the shocker. A question was asked by a member who was afraid that only urban areas would receive the funds and that rural areas would not. The minister went on to say:

> I can only express my hope that the CTC, having been given a certain degree of independence by the government, will deal not only with major centres—

And so on. Then, he continued:

> In terms of ministerial assurance, I can say to the hon. member that I think the allocation of government of Canada funds should be made on a somewhat fair and equitable basis.

Certainly, it should be made on a fair and equitable basis. I do not see the need for the minister to confirm that unless he is not too sure of the power he has over the CTC and is not too sure how the CTC will handle the allocation of funds. I think every member of this House should be a little disturbed about handing over this wide ranging power after the astonishing statement made by the Minister of Transport to the House earlier in the month to the effect that he had no control over anyone. He said he did not have any policy and that there were those who do did not pay any attention to him. I asked him several times what the CTC did, and he said he would discuss that with the president. Surely, in light of the statement made by the minister, that there is no transportation policy and that he has no control over whatever policy there is, this is not the time to be handing out such wide ranging power to the CTC.

Still referring to this problem, a little further on at page 1840, when the minister was answering the suggestion that the CTC was not doing its job properly, he said:

> I believe we are entitled to expect it to deal with applications made under Part I in an effective and an efficient manner, and I think the Minister of Transport can be relied upon to ensure that this will be done.

Well, the Minister of Transport told us not once but many times that he has no control over the CTC. Yet, we are now giving the CTC all this power and the difficulty we have is that if it does not properly use this power the Minister of Transport will slap the wrists of the members of the commission. It is amazing that in respect of legislation of this type, which involves the disposition of hundreds of millions of dollars, the government is prepared in effect to take the control of these funds from parliament and turn them over to a so-called regulatory body.

Another thing that is a little disturbing to me in respect of this legislation is the change in policy from what I understand has been accepted practice. In the allocation of railway lines, the railway to date always has been prepared to participate. I know that with regard to the original plans for the city of Moncton the railway indicated publicly it was prepared to pay part of the cost because it felt relocation of the tracks would improve service and would be desirable from a railroading point of view. Now under this legislation, however, there apparently is no provision at all for railway participation and this is strictly a federal-provincial deal.

When the fact that the railways are not participating was brought up by some of the previous speakers, the minister said that there is no way to force them to participate. Then, he added he certainly thinks they would. Perhaps my whole concept of governmental control of railways and the CNR is all wrong, but I am amazed at the statement that the government cannot force the CN to participate. This is beyond my comprehension. It seems to me that the railways are deriving a benefit. I am not speaking of a monetary benefit. If the railways, through relocation, are able to speed up traffic and do a better job of railroading, not only should they be made to participate but really from my experience I believe they are willing to participate. So, I should like the minister to explain this statement because I cannot see why one partner to the enterprise should be allowed to get off scot-free. I cannot understand why they should not be told to pay a share of the costs. These are my main criticisms of the bill.

Certainly, so far as clause 3 is concerned I think the principle of the legislation is good. It has been long awaited. I know my community wants it. I hope they can come up soon with a proposal that will be acceptable to the municipalities involved. There are half a dozen small municipalities in the area that are involved. I certainly hope that once an application gets to the CTC, if it is going to be made the sole arbitrator, it will be processed with a great deal more dispatch than the government has shown in introducing this legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to participate in this debate on Bill C-27 which I think is extremely important for several hon. members, and particularly my riding.

When the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) tabled this bill he had certainly been receiving many complaints for several years about the relocation of railroad tracks.

In my riding there were several fatalities caused by tracks completely outdated and inadequate to meet the needs of our municipalities.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to spend too much time on the value of this bill or the necessity for railways to modernize and adapt to current times.

I was pleased to note that the minister accepted the amendment introduced by my colleague the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) the purpose of which was to give autonomy and more latitude to municipalities which want to relocate railway tracks.

We admit that the province together with the municipalities must have a word to say in the relocation of railway lines but only when the province accepted an overall track relocation plan with the municipalities concerned. The purpose of the amendment of my colleague for Lotbinière which the minister accepted is to stop a province from vetoing a project approved by a municipality.

If a province accepted a relocation plan a municipality should not be afterwards paralysed by being forced to act on behalf of the province. That is what was contained in the bill and that is what we disliked. That is why my colleague for Lotbinière introduced his amendment to allow a municipality to receive grants. Once the plan has been accepted by the province it will no longer be possible for it to paralyse a municipality by stopping it from acting on its behalf.

The bill, as presented by the hon. minister, could allow a province to stop a municipality from acting on its behalf when the general plan had already been approved by all municipalities and the province.

By removing from the bill these six words, which were not only useless but were also completely to the disadvantage of municipalities, it is now possible to prevent that an essential project, desired by all rate payers of a municipality and contained in a general plan accepted by all neighbouring municipalities and by the province itself, be paralysed for several years. Before the amendment of my colleague for Lotbinière, the bill allowed the province to prevent a municipality from realising this plan by not authorizing it to act on its behalf.

Since we are and always have been in favour of decentralization and autonomy, we say that when all the municipalities and the province in particular have accepted a railroad relocation plan, it is up to the municipality concerned to implement as soon as possible a plan that everyone has already approved.

Mr. Chairman, unfortunately for too long we have accepted joint provincial and federal plans where the bureaucracy and the policy of some provinces has paralysed the initiative of our municipalities, which urgently need this type of development. However, since the province intervenes between the municipalities and the federal government, we are now witnessing in the province of Quebec a waste of the funds placed at the disposal of municipalities, which cannot be used because the province stops the implementation of these projects. The province of Quebec has not yet signed the agreements, which means that in the other provinces, at the present time, the federal government invests and grants millions of dollars for reaching community objectives, while in the province of Quebec, because it refuses to sign agreements with the federal government, the municipalities are paralysed in the face of immediate and urgent needs.

Mr. Chairman, we do not want a repetition of this in the railway field. And this is why my hon. colleague from Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) insisted, as we all did, on amending the bill so that when the master railway relocation plan is adopted by one province and the municipalities, one province will not be able to paralyse railway development by preventing one municipality from acting on its own.

Mr. Chairman, thanks to this amendment, the municipalities will be able to act in their own name and claim the credits granted for railway developments and go ahead without waiting for the slowness of provincial bureaucracy, as we have seen too often, unfortunately, in Quebec for some years.

On Clause 4—Financial Plan to Accompany Application.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some desire to carry the whole bill. I wonder why the government did not put all the provisions in clause 3.

Clause 4 concerns the financial plan which is to accompany the application, and I should like some clarification on this. We all know how costs are rising these days, so one would assume that the plan would merely be an estimate and not in any way final. Would the minister agree with that? Surely, many projects have been undertaken by municipalities across Canada from time to time where study groups have considered the relocation of a roadbed or the building of overpasses or underpasses separating the railroads and the highways, and generally all that can be submitted with the application is an estimate of the cost. Before the bill passes, I should like to hear the minister say that all he is asking for is a financial estimate along with the application, and not necessarily a financial plan to which the government would be bound. It is a simple question and I hope the minister can answer it so we can proceed to clause 5.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, obviously any relocation or rerouting proposals could, as the hon. member for Crowfoot points out, occasion expenditures in rail or transportation facilities and consequential changes resulting from that in street or highway linkages, if the area is turned into a public area for public transit terminals, and so on. It is the intention of clause 4 that the financial plan should show all those expenditures and how the relocation or rerouting is to be financed.

Basically the financial plan would document what the costs and benefits of the transportation plan are and how they would be shared among the various participants, what the sources and applications of the funds required by the transportation would be, and what the schedule of payments of the transportation funds would be, as well as any other information that might be required by the CTC.

The hon. member has raised the question of the federal contribution. Under this legislation the federal government may make a contribution of up to 50 per cent to the cost of railroad relocation and rerouting. He was concerned that out of this the railroads could net great benefits. The purpose of the rather intricate method of putting forward a transportation plan, the power given to the CTC to appoint appraisers and evaluators and the whole method of valuation set out in the act and provided in the schedule to the act, are designed principally to assure that the principle of this bill is carried forward, namely that the railroads will not lose nor benefit by reason of the relocation order or by reason of the infusion of public funds. That is the principle of the bill and that is why these financial requirements are provided.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Chairman, I listened very closely to the minister's answer. Usually, he answers directly the question put to him but on this occasion he did not appear to understand the question and therefore, I suppose, could not answer it.

The question was: if the application by a municipality through a province is accompanied by a financial plan, in view of the escalating costs we have today, would the federal government hold the municipality or province to that financial plan or would it be considered an estimate and so have adjustments made to it after the application has been approved. It is a rather simple question and I see no reason why the minister should attempt to hedge. He can say yes, the financial plan will be adhered to or no, there can be adjustments and we will take it only as an estimate. That is all I am asking for. It is a simple question.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Yes, what? Yes, we will take it as an estimate or yes, we will hold them to it?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, obviously some aspects of the financial plan will involve estimates because they will be estimates of future expenditures. However, any good financial plan will undoubtedly have contingencies and allowances for escalations in costs. The hon. member will note that one of the jobs of the CTC is to assure that all assistance provided for in the financial plan is in fact planned for, is in fact provided for, one way or another. This will be one of the jobs of the CTC. If there are estimates that are subject to escalation they have in their orders provided for them.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, a question in regard to clause 4 where, as outlined, the federal government will be responsible for 50 per cent of the cost. I am interested to know whether other government departments will assume some responsibility. For instance, in my own constituency there is a plan to relocate the rail lines going into Sault Ste. Marie and immediately adjacent to the city boundary. The rail relocation would have to pass through the Garden River Indian Reserve and, closer to the city boundary, the Rankin Location of the Batchewana Indian Reserve. I am wondering, where a relocation passes through an Indian reserve but where there is not an actual municipality to assume some of the responsibility, whether federal funding in such a situation would go above 50 per cent? Granted the main advantage of this relocation would accrue to the city of Sault Ste. Marie and not to either Indian reserve, although there is the possibility of sidings and an industrial park there. I am interested to know if the federal government would assume any portion which would normally be assumed by municipalities where a relocation passes through an Indian reserve?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, without specific reference to the case raised by the hon. member, the details of which I am not familiar with, and in reply to the question of whether there are funds available from other departments and programs, the answer is yes. What is provided here is a federal contribution of 50 per cent toward the net cost to the railroad of relocation. That does not cover nor provide for, because they are provided for under different statutes, any moneys available under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for infrastructure, moneys for housing under the Housing Act or Central Mortgage and Housing, or moneys available under any appropriate program. For example, if land freed by relocation were to be used for housing, the programs under the National Housing Act would apply in that area. If it were to be used for the erection of a federal public building, the funds of the federal Department of Public Works would be spent.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about definitions. I notice that the act does not define railway. It is important for the purposes of this bill that we understand clearly what a railway is. In my search for enlightment I consulted the Revised Statutes of Canada (1970) and therein found an act respecting railways. The definition section reads in part:

... "railway" means any railway that the company has authority to construct or operate, and includes all branches, extensions, sidings, stations, depots, wharfs, rolling stock equipment, stores, property real or personal and works connected therewith, and also any railway bridge, tunnel or other structure that the company is authorized to construct and, except where the context is inapplicable, includes street railway and tramway; ...

Often, when we deal with railway companies, we are dealing with lists of articles and entities which go beyond the definition in the act respecting railways.

I raised this point for another reason. We speak of railway companies. Clause 5(1) of the bill mentions "railway company" twice. Is there a difference between the railway and the railway company for purposes of this bill? Do either or both of those terms include, for purposes of this bill, subsidiaries or affiliates of railway companies, whether wholly or partly owned by the companies. Obviously, in many cases of relocation, the benefits will not accrue to the railways as such but could affect the well being of companies owned by railways. I wonder if the minister would respond to my preliminary questions?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I suppose we are transgressing against the rules by going back, but "railway" as mentioned in this bill has the same meaning as it has in the Railway Act. The Railway Act has been in existence for a good many years and definitions and explanations with regard to that act have been enforced by the CTC, in dealings related to the Railway Act, without any difficulty. The hon. member asked, does the bill define railway company. It does not. A railway company is defined in the Railway Act, which I do not have in front of me.

The hon. member referred to something he raised the other night. He spoke about the lands of the railways and the subsidiaries of the railways. For the purposes of this bill, railway lands are those lands owned by the railway company which are used for activities directly associated with the operation of the rail transport services of the railway company, such as railway rights of way, marshalling yards, terminal facilities and lands used for maintenance and repair depots for the servicing of equipment.

The hon. member asked about the subsidiaries of the railways or affiliates of the railways. The lands of such companies would be railway lands, clearly under the jurisdiction of this bill and clearly within the jurisdiction of the CTC when it acts for the purpose of enforcing a transportation plan. If the lands are owned by non-railway subsidiaries, and I am not supposed to give a legal opinion, those lands would not be deemed to be railway lands, but would be subject to ordinary municipal ordinances, bylaws and regulations. So, the railways could not escape coverage. If they attempt to shift land back and forth between themselves, the railways, and non-railway subsidiaries, they would be covered either under this bill or under municipal laws. That is to say, railway operations with respect to railway lands would be covered by this statute and by the Railway Act, or in the case of non-railway lands, by the ordinances of the appropriate municipalities.

Mr. Harney: For the minister's information there is no definition of railway company in the act respecting railways. The act defines a railway but not a railway company, unless such definition has not been included in alphabetical order, according to normal usage. On the other hand, the bill before us talks about railways and about railway companies.

Mr. Chairman, you, I and the minister know that at some time in the future when the courts are asked to interpret parts of this bill, the minister's words as to what certain words in this bill mean will not be considered. I am not a lawyer, but I know that in court you cannot quote from House of Commons Debates and say, "That is what those fellows intended when they passed the bill." The judge will look at the language of the act, in English or in French, and interpret its meaning. That is why he has so much power.

There need be no difficulty with regard to definitions. Yet I am considerably worried about how this bill will apply if, for instance, there should ever be an argument about railway property which is not held as property for purposes of railway operation but which is held, directly or indirectly through an affiliate or subsidiary, for the sake of owning it and making a profit on real estate.

I am not worried about the definition in clause 4(a) which says:

(a) how the costs and benefits of the transportation plan included in the accepted plan are to be shared by the province, the municipalities concerned, the railways affected by the accepted plan and any other interests that may be affected thereby;

The subclause speaks of any other interests that may be affected. That is universal language, and that part is fine. On the other hand, clause 5 leaves room for confusion. It talks about railway companies, but the sort of universal definition found in clause 4 is not found in clause 5.

I know that we are slightly in disorder, if not out of order, in talking about definitions. On the other hand, we have been in disorder all afternoon, and I suggest that we are just reverting back to an earlier part of the bill. Hitherto, speakers have been wandering all over the place in their remarks. Perhaps the minister will say that, if the committee agrees, we shall go back to the definition part of the bill and amend the definition, so that once this bill is passed we shall know what is meant by a railway and by a railway company.

Relocation of Railway Lines

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the hon. member, I really do not see any difficulty at all. "Railway" is defined in this bill by reference to the Railway Act. I must admit that I am not sure whether the word "company" is defined in the Interpretation Act. Even if it is not, no CTC or no judge will have any difficulty defining the word "company" in giving to it the meaning ordinarily attributed to it, which is the common standard on interpretation. With all due respect, those meanings and the meaning of railway company in clause 5(1) will create no difficulty and there is no need to go back to clause 1 to put in a definition. A "company" is a legal institution and recognized word which has not created any difficulty in interpretation whatsoever.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief. I am not upset that I have not aroused too much concern in the minister, but I may be upset that I have not aroused much concern among other members. Maybe the point I am raising is too legalistic. I wish it were possible to wager across the House. I hope I meet the minister some 20 years from now. If he can tell me there has been no trouble with this definition or lack of definition, I will applaud him. Perhaps the only authority we can refer this matter to is Pierre Berton. He knows much more about the operations of railways and railway companies than many of us around here. Perhaps I can raise the matter again under clause 5. By that time, other members may have the same worry.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, it is certainly not my intention to delay progress of this bill. At the same time, I do not think it is necessary to remind the minister of my interest in Bill C-27. I have expressed interest on behalf of the city of St. Thomas and the constituency I have the pleasure of representing in the House of Commons. Perhaps it is appropriate for me to say that that city of 25,000 people carried out a railroad relocation study in 1971. It is probably the most comprehensive study that has ever been completed, certainly by any city of comparable size in Canada.

I am concerned about a couple of matters. I will keep my remarks to the bare minimum. The officials of the city of St. Thomas paid some $100,000 for the study. It was underwritten 75 per cent or $75,000 by the province of Ontario and the taxpayers of that city paid the remaining $25,000. The results of that study indicated that in 1971 the railroad relocation project would cost over $18 million. As the hon. member for Crowfoot indicated a couple of times today, with increased costs and the increase in the rate of inflation, $18 million in 1971 could well be turned into $25 million or $30 million by the time the project is carried out. I therefore think it is obvious that 50 per cent of the cost is too low.

Because of the long delay we have experienced in having this bill brought before the House, I think it is a case of being satisfied with half a loaf rather than nothing at all. Will the minister or his department consider any payment toward the study that has already been carried out by the city of St. Thomas or any reimbursement on studies that have been carried out by other cities across the country prior to the passage of this bill?

[Mr. Harney.]

I have a second question for the minister. From reading the act, I realize that the federal government has a fund. I think it is called the railroad crossing fund. I believe there is between $15 million and $18 million in the fund. Over the past few years, this amount has been decreasing. Are the funds to pay for railroad relocations in Canadian cities to be taken from that railroad crossing fund by simply increasing it or is a new fund being set up to pay for these costs?

My third question may have been asked earlier. Is it necessary to receive provincial approval prior to a municipality making application to the federal government for funds?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the hon. member's interest in this legislation. I know he has been asking questions about it for some time. I appreciate his interest in the fact that the city of St. Thomas has done a great deal of studying and work on this project, which I hope will come to quick fruition under this legislation when it is passed.

In answer to the first question as to whether funds will be available retroactively to pay for studies already completed, as much as I would like to say yes, I think I should say no. In fact, I must say no because cities have been making studies and plans for many, many years. If we applied this provision retroactively, we would exhaust whatever funds we have on retroactive studies. However, such plans would be eligible for 50 per cent of the cost of whatever studies might be necessary to put their work into shape for presentation under this new legislation.

In answer to the second question as to what funds will be available for relocation of grade crossings, there are budgetary projections which will be voted for each year by parliament. I am giving what are projections only. They are subject to being submitted and voted by parliament year by year. Over a five-year period, the funds for relocation would start out in one year, which is either late this year or next year, at $10 million and rise to $25 million for grade crossings and grade separations under Parts II and III going from $25 million to $30 million over the five year period. I emphasize those are solely projections which will have to be voted year by year and which will undoubtedly be varied, depending upon our experience in the application of this legislation when it is passed.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister misunderstood my second question with regard to funds. Are the funds to come from the existing railroad grade crossing fund, or are we to set up a new fund for relocation?

Mr. Basford: The answer is no, Mr. Chairman. The funds for Part I, which is the railroad relocation and re-routing proposals, will not be coming from the railroad grade crossing fund which is Part III. They will be coming from funds provided for in the estimates of the Ministry of Transport voted annually by parliament. The expenditures I mentioned include expenditures from funds available under Part II of the act and for relocation schemes under Part I.

● (1630)

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity to ask the minister a question on clause 4. The clause concerns the conditions which are laid down and which must be met before an application can be considered. I am wondering about the status of studies already under way, for example, the study being conducted at Moncton and financed by the federal government and the province. Have those responsible for this study been advised of the conditions in clause 4? Is there any danger of this plan being submitted, and of the CTC saying: You have failed to meet the conditions of the act.

Mr. Basford: I am trying to avoid becoming involved in the specifics of individual applications because, obviously, I am not familiar with all of them. However, I recognize that work has been going on at Moncton for some time. Those concerned are, of course, aware of the legislation which is before the House. I hope that all the studies under way will be made to comply with the conditions of this legislation in anticipation of its passage.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Submission to Commission of Transport Plan.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Chairman, during my speech on second reading I told the House I was interested in proposing an amendment to clause 5(2) and that its purpose would be to ensure that the Commission would be obliged to hold a hearing before making an order under clause 6. As it stands, the bill simply says the Commission may make such an order.

The reasoning I put forward was that the whole question of the relocation of rail lines, the new use of properties which would be liberated by relocation, and, indeed, the whole direction and shape our cities might take as a result of major relocation was an extremely delicate one. I argued that in most cases it would take a good deal of time for interested parties—and in that term I certainly include the general public, the citizens of the urban areas affected—to find out what was going on, to determine what the implications of relocation were.

We know from experience that any change in the shape of a city is bound to affect many people, and thus it is extremely important to give citizens a chance to have a say. It is all very well for the minister to tell us that in the formulation of the original plan the public has an opportunity to make an input. I have no doubt the railways will be making an input and I have no doubt the municipalities will be making an input. However, I am afraid the nature of this input will be understood only by specialists. In the City of Toronto we have had experience of planning by specialists. All the specialists agreed, for example, that the Spadina Expressway had to be built. Only recently, there was no doubt in the minds of all the specialists, whether municipal or provincial, that the Scarborough Expressway had to be built. For years these views were unchallenged until citizens began to wake up to the implication of the construction of these expressways. After a long time, and after making many appeals, the people were finally allowed to express their feelings as to whether these auto routes were in fact as necessary as the specialists believed.

I do not see what harm could possibly be done by making it mandatory for the Commission to hold a hearing. If we decide to leave the clause as it is, citizens will have an opportunity to express their opinions only if they are allowed to do so by the Commission; the Commission itself would be in the position of deciding whether the public interest would be served by a hearing. I say: let the public itself decide whether its interests will be well served or not.

I know the minister may object to my proposal on the ground that it might give rise to a multiplicity of hearings. But, as I suggested in my comments on second reading, I do not think the number of relocation projects undertaken is likely to be large. I say this on the basis of the amount of money which the minister suggests should be spent over the next five years, and in the light of the sums likely to be needed by Winnipeg and Toronto. What will be left for St. Thomas or Wetaskiwin? I have the feeling there will be very few relocation programs carried out, so we ought not to be taken in by assertions that my amendment, if adopted, would lead to a tremendous number of hearings.

I maintain we would be honouring the needs of urban communities if we were to agree now to make the holding of public hearings mandatory, not simply a matter for the judgment of the Commission. Whether we like to think so or not, to a lot of the people in our communities the Transport Commission is an awfully distant institution. I should like to see the clause redrafted in such a way that there would be no going to the Commission, cap in hand, for leave to make representations at an inquiry, but there should be an automatic hearing. The administration need not be difficult. Already, in many of our cities, when rezoning is contemplated a public meeting has to be held. Advertisements are inserted in the newspapers announcing the purpose and date of such a meeting, and if there is no interest, if no one attends, there is, in effect, no hearing, and that is the end of the matter. But an opportunity for the public to protect its interests is always provided.

In his remarks the other day, the hon. member for Calgary North expressed great interest in supporting the amendment I suggested. I know, from discussions I have had with a member of the Social Credit party that there is interest on their part as well. I trust and hope that members of the Conservative party will continue to have this interest and that members of the Social Credit party will continue their interest. Whether the minister agrees with it is another matter, but I know he is certainly interested in it. With that appeal I should like to put forward an amendment which will read very simply this way. I would move, seconded by the hon. member—

● (1640)

An hon. Member: You don't need a seconder.

Mr. Harney: Not even if I want one? I don't need a seconder, but it is nice to have one. I am informed I don't need a seconder, therefore I will not be seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming, but simply move the following amendment on my own:

That sub-clause (2) of clause 5 of Bill C-27 be amended on page 6 at line 17 by changing the word "may" to the "shall" and by inserting a period after the word "thereon", and also by deleting lines 18 and 19.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member has proposed an amendment to Clause 5. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to hear a representative of the New Democratic Party say in the House that "may" and "shall" have different meanings, because it seems to me at an earlier time the leader of that party argued that "may" and "shall" might have the same meaning under certain circumstances. I suppose it depends—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the context.

Mr. Baker: —on the context and also upon whose ox is being gored as well. Nonetheless, I want to say that we support the proposition advanced by the hon. member for Scarborough West in respect of this matter, for one very important reason. Whatever is done in respect of relocations of railway lines can have a very profound effect on the community, and can amount to a very significant intrusion into the way of life or lifestyle and, indeed, the composition of a particular community.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): And the value of property.

Mr. Baker: And the value of the property as well as all the other factors that may have influenced the inhabitants of that particular area to chose that area in which to live. It is important that there be the ability on the part of the general public to express themselves publicly and formally in respect of the position the commission might take on a particular application.

This does not mean putting the CTC or any commission in the position of counting heads in terms of which way they choose to decide. Certainly, at present there is no opportunity at all for public viewpoints to be expressed, and they could vary and be as many as there are individuals. There is no danger that this viewpoint could be ignored with a reliance on such a trite phrase that, if it is in the interest of some invisible commission it is desirable in the public interest, then perhaps hearings will be held.

The hon. member for Scarborough West mentioned the Spadina matter and I could mention another one in the Ottawa area regarding the location of Highway 416 in respect of which I do not think there has been that type of public participation in the steps leading to the decision making. I do not know what will be the final decision as to the location of Highway 416, but I think if there were, a section in the statutes regarding a construction of this kind, which is an intrusion into the lifestyle of the area I represent, I am sure no one would be able to stand up in this place or anywhere else and fault the kind of public participation in the decision making process that would occur.

I support completely, as I think my colleagues do, the amendment advanced by the hon. member for Scarborough West. It is very interesting when you consider other statutes. The Ontario Municipal Board Act of the province of Ontario has a provision which does in fact leave a discretion with the board to decide whether there is to be a hearing. I forget whether it is in the public interest or otherwise, but there is this element of discretion in that statute.

However, the Ontario Municipal Board, and the Ontario government in land use and planning matters, have decided it is so important that there be public input with the board, as a matter of practice and procedure, if one of a possible thousand or 2,000 objectors file a written objection in answer to a notice that has been filed, that is sufficient to call a hearing. It has been my experience that quite often when there has only been one objector to a certain action a municipality proposes, the members of the board will come from Toronto to Ottawa, to Cornwall or to anywhere the hearing is to be held and convene a hearing. When they explain to the objector the purport of the by-law to be considered, the objection if often withdrawn. I suppose that is something that could be done by telephone or by mail, but there is such an adherence to the principle of the right to a hearing when something affects proprietary rights, or even seems to, it has become the practice of the province of Ontario and that board to do no less than that. I believe it ought to be the practice of any agency of the Crown in the right of Canada, and I certainly would hope the government would not see fit to argue with this, but would agree to this amendment.

If the argument advanced by the government is that there may be a lot of hearings and delays, then I think the question as to whether there are to be delays should not be laid on the public, on the property owner or on the person who sees fit to object. I think it ought to be laid where it belongs, namely, on the shoulders of the government or a commission which is responsible to the government. The minister could get on the telephone to the chairman of the CTC or of any other government board but particularly the CTC because of the intimate connection its chairman has with the minister as a former colleague, and urge as a matter of convenience and necessity that this matter be speeded up and that a hearing be held.

In conclusion may I say I do not believe that policy, expediency, or any other reason should allow the government to say it is not prepared to agree with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Scarborough West. If his motion did require a seconder and he wanted one, in the circumstances I would be prepared to second it because I think it has great merit. I commend it to the House and hope the government will see fit to adopt it.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, may I just indicate that I think the present wording of the bill, not only this subclause but clause 8, which requires that all provincial laws be passed, ensures that the public interest and welfare is totally and completely protected under this legislation, but if there is any question on that, which obviously there is on the part of the hon. member for Scarborough West, I am happy on behalf of the government to accept the amendment to make sure that there is no doubt on this point.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Harney) agreed to.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Chairman, just before clause 5 carries, I should like to stress once again the purport of the remarks I was making earlier on this whole question of relocation of rail lines. The minister has failed as yet to comment on the question of the Vancouver harbour, and the proposed relocation of some of the rail lines connected with it as well as the financial plans that have been brought forward from time to time. Will these plans have to be reshaped or redrawn by the National Harbours Board? Would a government agency be responsible for this? Would the municipality of the city of Vancouver or the province be the one to do it? The minister has failed to deal with these questions.

I should like to quote from an article by Mr. Mark Wilson of January 9, 1974 concerning these problems. The article is headed "Roundtrip over Burrard Inlet takes 14 days". That seems like an unusually long journey for a boxcar. The article goes on to say:

> We are just not adapted to moving a car from say North Vancouver to Marpole. Besides, 95 per cent of the traffic coming from the North Shore is moving east like the potash, coal and sulphur trains returning empty to Alberta or Saskatchewan.

Then, further we find this:

> CP Rail says the CNR service poses a problem, but it looks for long-term relief to the eventual relocation of North Shore bulk loading facilities at Roberts Bank.

The article goes on to suggest that there should be a great deal of relocation of trackage in that Vancouver area. Is the government aware of the existing change of the plan for the Vancouver area surrounding Burrard Inlet? There is a suggestion made with regard to the location of a new CNR marshalling yard which would do away with the Burlington Northern Railway marshalling yards. Surely the minister, who represents the city of Vancouver, could advise us whether or not there is an over-all plan now either by the National Harbours Board or the city of Vancouver that would follow up this relocation of tracks in and around that harbour.

I cannot see for the life of me why we should be forced to use an American marshalling yard. In fact the CNR uses two marshalling yards, one a great distance out of the city of Vancouver and the other the Burlington Northern. The CPR really uses a small marshalling yard near the Alberta wheat pool operation and one at the end of Moody Bay. I do not know why we cannot have a greater amount of cohesion in respect of traffic. I do not suggest that there should be a terminal railway company operating at the port, but I suggest there should be a greater relocation of trackage to facilitate the movement of boxcars in and out of that terminal which would assist in the movement of grain as well as, of container cars. I am sure the minister and his department could investigate to see what is being done with regard to an over-all plan for that harbour. There was a study in 1969. I am wondering whether it is still around or whether it is necessary to have another study made.

I see it is five o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, it being five o'clock it is my duty to leave the Chair in order to permit the House to consider private members' business.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard)—Health—Shortage of medical manpower—Government action to alleviate; the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Grain—Request that feed grains be marketed by Wheat Board; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Air Canada—Alleged layoffs of employees in violation of collective agreement—Government action.

The House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, today according to the order paper we are scheduled to consider bills, but as a result of some discussions which have gone on and because the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Nesdoly) graciously gave up his time two weekends ago we are ready to bring forward, with the consent of the House, private members' notice of motion No. 6 in the name of the hon. member for Meadow Lake.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed to by the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL CATTLE MARKETING BOARD

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider introducing legislation to provide for a National Cattle Marketing Board which would operate in concert with a cattle marketing board established by any province.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the above notice of motion appeared on the order paper over my name on March 7. In view of the serious situation that we have had with regard to cattle in this country in the last year, and more recently with regard to pork products, it seems to me it is about time that our country rationalized the whole system of handling products which are derived from cattle, hogs and sheep. In other words, perhaps the motion should be extended to include a national meat products marketing board.

I realize that before the government could act on this suggestion the provinces would have to agree to delegate powers to the federal government, or the federal government could pass enabling legislation on which the provinces might then act. Perhaps some members would say that this would be another intrusion into the free enterprise system, another example of socialist planning. Perhaps many cattlemen would not agree with this motion. But I point out that when prices are not stable cattlemen become very concerned. I, myself, am particularly concerned about the small beef producer, the one who raises 50 or 100 head of cattle. He is the one who is usually caught in a pinch when there is price instability. In fact in our so-called free enterprise system everything the producer buys is bought at an administered price. No one can tell me that the ordinary forces of supply and demand are really operating.

Some two or three years ago when farm income was at extremely low levels farmers were not buying any new farm machinery, or very little. They did not have the money. Farm implement agencies were experiencing difficulties. Farm implement manufacturers were having difficulties. But the prices of tractors and other implements required by farmers did not go down in accordance with the reduced demand. The same is true with respect to many other materials required by farmers.

I should mention that an integral part of a successful meat products policy or of a cattle marketing board should be a feed grains policy that would enable farmers to produce at a profit animals that are consumed for meat. At the present time, livestock producers are experiencing a disastrous period of price instability, a large measure of which can be directly attributed to the ill-conceived feed grains policy of the past year which has been very destructive and disorderly for producers of cattle, hogs and sheep. The government has moved from crisis to crisis in a series of somewhat disjointed and unrelated moves. Let me summarize these very briefly.

First the United States imposed price ceilings on finished beef. Then, Canada applied export permit regulations in August of last year. This was followed by the United States consumer boycott on beef, which resulted in a build up of finished cattle in the United States. Then, higher Canadian prices attracted heavier U.S. imports. Of course, this was affected by export controls on Canadian cattle going into the United States and, as a result, Canadian market prices slumped sharply in September.

The import duty on U.S. cattle was re-imposed last fall to protect beef prices to producers in Canada. This import duty did little to stop the flow of beef from the United States and, as a result, a special 3 cents per pound surtax on live cattle and a 6 cents per pound surtax on processed beef was applied last November. I believe that this surtax slowed down imports.

The surtax was phased out in January and February, and imports again flooded in, forcing cattle prices to new low levels, with little or no price relief evident for consumers. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), on March 15, introduced a beef subsidy program of 7 cents per pound for Grade A cattle and market prices to producers promptly dropped by amounts equal to or almost equivalent to the subsidy within a matter of days. The next step came when the subsidy was altered to 5 cents per pound, and extended to lower grades of cattle. The final step came when the minister required certification from U.S. health officials guaranteeing that U.S. imported cattle and beef had not been administered the growth hormone DES.

With imports of U.S. beef almost shut off, market prices are again rising in Canada, at least for beef. In the last several days the minister reduced the subsidy to 3 cents per pound, I suppose having the ultimate aim of eliminating the subsidy completely. The results of the federal government's attempt to stabilize beef prices to both producers and consumers through tariff manipulation have been largely unsuccessful, because control of the market and prices has rested elsewhere. As a consequence, for the last ten months price patterns for livestock have been extremely unstable.

Basically, I have no quarrel with the beef subsidy program. However, I must point out that there should have been a number of safeguards put in place when the beef subsidy program was introduced. First, there should have been a floor price for producers, related to costs of production. Second, direct payments should have been made to the producers. Third, some restrictions, or control methods should have been designed to prevent the packing companies from making effective confiscation of the subsidies. In view of the way that all the programs were handled, I am of the opinion that they represented a measure of desperation rather than a firm commitment to stabilize prices. I have no argument with the banning of the importation of DES cattle from the United States. But what happens when the United States ceases using DES in its cattle? Has the government got a plan to stabilize meat prices both to the consumer and producer at that time?

It should be mentioned also that the economic loss problems encountered by producers of cattle, hogs and sheep over the past year could in large measure be traced back to the introduction of a feed grains policy that legalized an open market and an exploitive system of pricing in that area of Canada where the Canadian Wheat Board retains jurisdiction for orderly marketing. The intent of the policy, introduced on the pretext of creating equity, was to permit exploitation of grain producers by buyers outside the Canadian Wheat Board area on the same basis as had been practised within the Canadian Wheat Board area. However, it seems to me that this policy backfired on the government because world market conditions for grain were too high to permit profitable production of livestock based on open market prices. The federal government abrogated its responsibility for keeping its own house in order by exposing the producers of cattle and hogs to forces which in effect had been imposed upon grain producers in the prairie region and, which it was to be hoped, had gone forever. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, these forces are returning with the open market introduced for feed grains.

It seems to me that a rational and orderly marketing system for feed grains could establish a true cost-price relationship for the cattle industry, under which a program of price stabilization could function. The four western provinces, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba have hog marketing boards. In Saskatchewan in particular, with the subsidy or floor price available there, the hog producer has been cushioned from any harmful effects. However, it should be mentioned that in reply to a question yesterday about disastrously low pork prices, the Minister of Agriculture indicated that Ontario should establish a hog marketing board such as the other provinces have.

I think the minister is being rather contradictory. In a speech a few days ago he said that Saskatchewan's hog support program was ill-advised because it placed Saskatchewan in a favoured position and disrupted hog production and marketing in Canada as a whole. If this is the case why doesn't the minister come up quickly with a cattle marketing board or, better still, with a meat products marketing board which would be responsible for the marketing of all red meats? Subsidy programs for prices can only work properly if they are national in scope so that producers, in fact, in one region are not economically disadvantaged as compared with producers in other regions. The only advantages they would have are the natural advantages. Farmers on the prairies have many natural advantages since they can grow most of their feedstuffs and there are vast areas of grasslands available as well.

● (1710)

In my opinion, a national meat marketing board would have the following main functions: (a) It could act as a regulatory body or agency with the authority to issue import permits and export permits. With this authority it would be capable of restricting large packers from bringing in huge numbers of cattle in order to lower the returns on meat products to producers in this country. After all, the only thing that the packers are concerned with is the profit motive and nothing else, regardless of how they disturb the rest of the economy. (b) I would suggest that a national meat products marketing board could also regulate profit margins; in fact, it could regulate the price of the product right from the producer to the retailer to the consumer, as is done with some milk products in Canada today in the highly regulated dairy industry; (c) if a subsidy is to be given to the producer, this authority or marketing board could make sure that it goes directly to the producer rather than to the scions of middlemen in between.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Dairy Commission acts as a body which very closely regulates and supervises the buying and selling of dairy products in Canada. As a result, despite difficulties the dairy farmers may have had, they have still had a greater sense of security than the hog producers and beef producers in the last year. A national hog marketing and cattle marketing board, or a national meat products board would put more order into our red meats industry, and I maintain that it should lead to stabilized and fair prices to both the producer and the consumer.

Mr. Speaker, this would help particularly the hundreds and thousands of farmers from Newfoundland to British Columbia who keep a herd of 50 or 100 head of cattle or who produce 200, 300 or 500 pigs per year. I am thinking of the family farm operation, which is a way of life, by means of which the family, can make a fairly decent living if they get a fair price for their products. I think this is a necessary step toward preserving the family farm and the smaller farm enterprises.

Cattle Marketing Board

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the motion debated this afternoon states that the government should consider passing legislation to establish a national cattle marketing board. Even though I am glad of the opportunity to discuss agriculture in the House, I have some serious doubts as to the validity of this motion.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members will long remember the evening of December 31, 1971, when the House sat to give second and third reading to the bill entitled: "An Act to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council", better know perhaps as Bill C-176.

One of the amendments considered that evening had been moved by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). It is recorded on page 10880 of Hansard and reads as follows:

That Bill C-176, an act to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products, be amended by adding the following to subclause (c) of clause 2 at line 17, page 1:

"except cattle and calves and products of beef and veal".

The purpose was to exclude cattle and calves from the part of the bill concerning the control of supplies. The motion was not put that evening since the government moved an amendment to paragraph (c) of clause 2, which read as follows:

"(c) "farm product" for the purpose of Part I, means any natural products of agriculture and any part of any such product and, for the purpose of the other provisions of this act, means

(i) eggs, and poultry, and any part of any such product, and

(ii) any other natural product of agriculture and any part of any such product in respect of which the Governor in Council is satisfied, as a result of declarations by provincial governments following plebiscites, or otherwise, that the majority of the producers thereof in Canada is in favour of the establishment of an agency under section 17 with powers relating to that product;

● (1720)

That is why, Mr. Speaker, there is now a legislation providing for the establishment of a national cattle marketing agency. Rather than wasting the valuable time of the House, I would suggest to the hon. member as well as to the producers who are interested to refer to sections 18 and 23 of the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act.

However, I should like to point out to the hon. member that a request for the creation of such an agency should come from the cattle breeders themselves, and before such agency is established, the governor in council must be satisfied that a majority of the producers of each of the farm products in Canada is in favour of the establishment of an agency, in accordance with section 17.

Sections 7 and 17 describe the procedure to be followed in order to determine the producers' wishes concerning the establishment of a national agency. Although there is a legislation to that effect, beef producers with whom I am in touch keep suggesting that they doubt an agency is necessary. Should there be a major change in this situation, I would be quite willing to see that this provision of the act is implemented.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that up to now, the government has given every opportunity and all the means required to the farmers who wish to avail themselves of the marketing act. They have everything they need at their disposal to set up those marketing agencies.

If the Canadian people want the farmers to increase their production, they must see to it that farm incomes are higher. The federal government took important steps in that direction last year. When food prices skyrocketed, the government did not apply price controls.

We are now discussing two types of stabilization programs. One concerns price stabilization, and we can achieve that with programs such as those coming under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. In order to meet present needs, we would update that act by extending it to more products and by raising the support level.

The other type concerns income stabilization which can be achieved through the creation of a common fund. The producers, the federal government and the provinces could deposit money into it, and producers could draw from it whenever the total revenue for a particular product is lower than a given level. Both types of programs could be designed so as to include the production costs factor.

It is the intention of the federal government to take important steps in order to establish our agriculture on a sound long term basis. The minister introduced a new farm credit legislation to enable us to help young farmers get started and to promote farm expansion and the purchase of still better farm equipment.

The minister also wishes to set up price and income stabilization programs so as to encourage farmers to invest for the future, with the guarantee that they will not go bankrupt tomorrow as it happened in the past, when an increased production had created short-term surpluses.

In addition, the minister wants to set up a cattle-insurance program, similar to our crop-insurance program, so that society can share some of the risks taken by the farmers when they increase their cattle production to meet the growing consumer demand, not only in Canada but also abroad.

Finally, the federal government is in the process of implementing a new national feed grains policy that will ensure equal treatment to all farmers, both producers and buyers, wherever they may be in Canada.

But what may be more important than all measures put forward is that the federal government did not intervene in the control of agricultural prices. Some countries have tried it with little success: not one more cow reached the market, not one more bushel of grain was produced and efficiency did not improve by 1 per cent. Those controls have had nothing but negative results wherever they were tried out. In the U.S.A., food price controls led farmers to gas their one-day old chicks rather than lose thousands of dollars in feeding them for the market. Farmers did not ship their cattle to the meat markets, which resulted in problems in the beef industry that are still being felt today. Food price controls have had such disastrous results that they overflowed the American boundaries, upset our markets and the income of our farmers who were getting ready to increase their production in an orderly fashion.

Canadian consumers paid current prices for their food and, in return, the farmers are responding today by maximizing their returns and their production.

[Mr. Corriveau.]

In the next months, the federal government will take positive measures to insure the future of the Canadian farmers and of our farming industry. The Minister of Agriculture intends to bring down a legislation that will guarantee prices and incomes stability for the farmers, in order that they may invest capital in the farming business and increase production without worrying about a temporary excess that might disrupt the market and cause prices to decline. The consumer cannot ask the farmers to invest today to increase production if that will lead them to bankruptcy tomorrow.

The Minister of Agriculture has in mind legislation that will improve federal credit programs for the farmers and specially the young ones who want to take up farming or continue to work on the family farm.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has announced more generous compensation for farmers whose diseased cattle are condemned to slaughter under the Epizootic Diseases Act. This second increase in less than a year reflects the changes in the market value of the cattle. The change which will come into force immediately will boost maximum compensation from $300 to $450 for bure-bred animals and from $150 to $200 for the others. The compensation is added to the amount producers receive for the sale of their cattle to the slaughter house. When he made this announcement, the Minister of Agriculture insisted on the importance given by his department to the strict measures aimed at controlling cattle diseases.

Many countries envy Canada the excellent bill of health of its livestock. This is the result of stringent measures applied for quite a number of years as a means of security both for the producer, through the excellent condition of his livestock, and the consumer, through a constant supply of wholesome foodstuffs.

This is one of the reasons why last year Canada could export livestock and beef to over a hundred countries.

Moreover, the minister has announced that, effective April 7, foreign countries exporting to Canada cattle, lamb or sheep, either live or slaughtered, will have to submit a document certifying that these animals and meats have not received the DES treatment.

These documents will somehow guarantee that the imported meat complies with Canadian regulations; it has also been made necessary following the most recent changes governing the use of DES outside Canada. The only exceptions which have been authorized concern the shipments made before April 9, and animals for cattle raising purposes, the hon. Minister of Agriculture added.

During the Conference on Western Economic Opportunities held last summer in Calgary, the minister indicated that Canada was moving from a national policy on feed grains to a nationally co-ordinated policy on the livestock industry. We said the same thing in the Speech from the Throne sometime ago.

Any study of the meat industry in Canada should attach great importance to people as well as public and private organizations instead of relying on statistics.

Here is what the minister considers our objectives should be. Producers should have in mind maximum growth. He is considering a large expansion program for meat and meat products. That market is expanding in North America, Europe, Japan and everywhere where the national standard of living is above the thresold of poverty. Producers in Canada have the tremendous possibility of increasing that production and meeting that demand. So one of the objectives would be to set up a range of government programs and policies which would allow them to produce more and reach those markets. The minister further thinks that producers should protect themselves against anything that could cut the ground from under their feet. He supposes that the first thing that comes to mind when he says protection is some form of protection against cheap imports. However, that is not exactly what he means but rather that protection against disease is the all important point. He means protection through research against the possibility of the meat industry in another part of the world overtaking us by developing new production and marketing methods. He further means protection against prices and saw-toothed production which would eliminate any chance of extending our market in the long run.

A third objective would be the greatest freedom possible for producers. In other words, a strategy could not be accepted even if it could produce the greatest benefits, the biggest markets and the most efficient production if it were to turn producers into slaves of the economy.

In view of those objectives the next step is to assess the situation as it now exists. We have the healthiest herd in the world thanks to the work of the Animal Health Branch. That gives us access to a greater export market than any other country in the world. That also makes the cattle industry more efficient. Part of that policy includes a government program to import the best breeding cattle through our maximum security quarantine stations.

We have some excellent farmers and, what is more, they are the best farmers in the world. We also have evidence of the superiority of our stock breeders either exporters of pure-bred dairy cattle, beef cattle, pigs and poultry, or exporters of meat.

Our animal industry is competitive, and our exporters can prove that too. With our resources we can expect a major share of the expanding world market. We have land, water, energy, technology, money and business know-how, which all compare favourably with those in most of the other nations.

Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's motion is included in Bill C-176, and we are waiting for a request from the farmers to implement it.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria.

● (1730)

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would have gladly yielded to my colleague from Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand), but I had already advised the parliamentary secretary who has just spoken that I wanted to make a few comments on the motion now before us and which reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider introducing legislation to provide for a National Cattle Marketing Board which would operate in concert with a Cattle Marketing Board established by any province.

Once again, parts of the French version are vague. I think we can say "par la province" or "par toute province", as we say "by any province" in English.

However, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Corriveau) covered the subject very well, when he said that the legislation now in the statutes is essentially permissive allowing as it does the setting up of any kind of agency to look after the marketing of agricultural products.

Therefore I would not elaborate on the very pertinent comments by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. This is, however, in my opinion an excellent opportunity for any dedicated member to speak on matters of particular concern to him or to his rural constituents. As I said time and again, Mr. Speaker, I represent an area in Canada, an area in the province of New Brunswick where high scale production of potatoes is conducted. When we debated some years ago the act establishing the National Farm Products Marketing Council, I addressed the House a few times to support government action toward the institution of agencies for marketing agricultural products. It gives me pleasure to mention that on the current board sits a former minister of agriculture for New Brunswick who, during our frequent meetings, keeps me informed of the council's work.

For me, as a member of parliament, it is a way of finding out about the council as such.

A moment ago I was speaking about potatoes and I think that it may be possible to establish parallels with cattle, a subject that particularly worries the sponsor of today's bill. In New Brunswick, potato farming is, for all practical purposes, more or less disorganized.

In the potato industry, the producers are not properly organized. Some belong to the New Brunswick Federation of Agriculture and others to the National Farmers' Union. However, the shippers have much to say about potato marketing. Obviously, they do not cover the whole field.

In principle, I support the motion under study, but I hope that, if one day, the question of the establishment of a potato marketing agency comes up, the hon. member will return the favour and support any measure towards this.

To come back to what the parliamentary secretary said, the proposal made today by the sponsor of the motion is already covered by the law establishing the Canadian Farm Products Marketing Council. Perhaps the Standing Orders of the House might allow, on occasion, hon. members to answer the arguments that we, on this side, bring up to contradict the sponsors of some motions. Maybe this would enable us to reach some compromise whereby it would be possible to pass some motions which are excellent and very useful and intend mainly to improve the standard of living of farmers across the country.

Mr. Speaker, if I may return to my "potatoes", if you will permit me the expression, I regret the absence at the national level of a potato marketing board. I think that the responsibility for the establishment of such an agency—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member indicated, a moment ago, that he would revert to his "potatoes", but I think that if he followed the rules he would rather revert to his cattle, because I believe that cattle, or more precisely the establishment of a National Cattle Marketing Board, is under consideration. The hon. member has undoubtedly a more enthusiastic concern for potatoes than for cattle, but I would invite him, now that he has spoken of farm matters that concern more particularly his constituency, to give his attention to the motion now under consideration.

Mr. Corbin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this point of order. Sometimes we are carried away in the heat of the debate and we get too easily into digressions. It might be interesting for all the honourable members to know that potatoes are being found to have great qualities and research is currently being conducted for feeding cattle with potatoes in areas that do not produce enough feed grain.

For all practical purposes, Mr. Speaker, I want to follow your advice. I think I have pointed out a few points with respect to the study of this motion and I would like now to resume my seat to allow other colleagues to speak in this important debate.

[English]

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, your comments to my colleague, the previous speaker, referring to meat and potatoes were very good. Perhaps the only thing left out was the gravy. I like a bit of gravy on my meat and potatoes.

Be that as it may, those of us who were here in the last parliament will remember distinctly the long debate on Bill C-176, to establish a national farm products marketing agency. One of the factors around which the debate centred in a very hot and real way was that in the original bill there was some reference to cattle and cattle products. Those sections of the legislation were bitterly opposed by many people. There was a misunderstanding. Even though there were references to cattle and cattle products in the bill, there was no intention on the part of the government to apply its provisions to cattle. Later it was made very clear that any commodity group which wanted to be part of national farm products marketing legislation would have to take a plebiscite. A majority of the producers of any particular commodity would have to be satisfied before they could avail themselves of that particular legislation which is now the law of the land. It permits any commodity group to become part of the national marketing legislation if that is the desire of those producers. I want to reiterate on behalf of the cattlemen in my part of the country that it is still their view that they do not wish to become part of the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act. If at some time in the future they want to do so, they will so signify. Right now they are adamantly opposed to becoming part of the arrangements under this act. I was in touch with them only yesterday, and again today, and that is their view. I did not contact the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, but the president of that Association, Mr. Gordon Parkes, is from my constituency, from a town called Cache Creek.

To give an indication of the feeling of Canadian cattlemen toward the famous Bill C-176, I should like to read what was said at the time the bill was going through the last parliament. This was at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Agriculture held in Edmonton on February 4, 1971. Mr. Charlie Gracey, the Secretary-Manager of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, was the witness at the time, and this is what he had to say:

> Beef producers have no need for Bill C-176 and reject it both on philosophical and economic grounds. We would like to emphasize that our opposition to this bill is not simply negative thinking on the part of the beef producers. We recognize, as do the producers of other commodities, that considerable problems do exist. We differ from many other organizations, however, in that beef producer groups across Canada are actively engaged in solving problems within the present structure.

I should like to refer the hon. member who introduced this motion to sections 18 and 23 of the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act. These sections clarify beyond doubt the opportunities available to commodity groups to take part in the arrangements made under that legislation. I should like to stress that the pressure for an agency must come in the first place from the cattlemen themselves, and that before an agency can be established the governor in council must be satisfied that the majority of producers are in favour of the establishment of an agency. Sections 17(1) and 17(2) spell out the procedures to be followed.

There are others, Mr. Speaker, who wish to participate in this debate. My hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. Whicher) is champing at the bit—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh no, he's not!

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): He is a great cattleman as well. I just want to repeat on behalf of the cattlemen of British Columbia whom I have contacted that they do not want any part of this legislation.

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks made by the last speaker, but he was not completely truthful when he indicated I was looking forward with anticipation to taking part in this debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You did not want to speak at all.

Mr. Whicher: Frankly, I think everything has already been said as to why this bill should not pass. With great respect to the member of the New Democratic Party who brought it forward— incidentally, he is a valued member of the agriculture committee and I agree with him on most questions of an agricultural nature—I have to say I disagree with the measure he has recommended to us this afternoon.

As a matter of fact, if I had my way I would sit down and let a vote be called. I should like to see how members of the New Democratic Party vote on this bill, because if they voted for it they would lose the respect of 98 per cent of the cattlemen across Canada. I say this because, as the parliamentary secretary has so ably pointed out, the cattlemen simply do not want a marketing board to be established.

Being somewhat political by nature, if I had not virtually been told to say something this afternoon I would sit down and let the vote go ahead, because I imagine this would place the NDP House leader in a very difficult position, a position in which he does not very often find himself. If he does get away with it today, it is through no fault of mine.

Mr. Nesdoly: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I just want to say that 20 years ago in Saskatchewan a vote was taken on the issue of a cattle marketing board. Forty-seven per cent voted for it and 53 per cent against. It is the 47 per cent, the little guys, I am worried about.

An hon. Member: What point of order is that?

Mr. Whicher: All I can say is that in the past 20 years the cattlemen of Saskatchewan have obviously smartened up a good deal. If the vote were taken today it would not be as close as it was 20 years ago.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They have too much money.

Mr. Whicher: The hon. member did not participate in the debates on Bill C-176, though I see members of the official opposition sitting over there who did. They were very active and effect was given to many of the amendments they advocated, resulting in the improvement of the bill, I believe. I hope the present government or any future government will not force any band of farmers, whatever they produce, to join an organization in whose affairs they do not wish to become involved.

It has been shown this afternoon that under the terms of what was Bill C-176 the cattlemen have every opportunity to do what the hon. member suggests they should be forced to do. What he is saying is that legislation should be passed to set up a national cattle marketing board. He does not promise there will be a vote or anything else. He just says that the government, acting in a dictatorial fashion, should set up a board. Well, Mr. Speaker there are rumours floating around the building these days, and I hope that the motion presented by the New Democratic Party gets wide circulation across Canada through members representing rural constituencies, because I think many people would take a dim view of the fact that such a motion has been introduced. It might be regarded as a friendly gesture in the hon. member's constituency, but if it is, it is the only constituency I know in which the cattlemen would like such a board.

I come from an area in which there are large numbers of cattle. I do not want to get into a friendly scrap with my friends from Alberta because possibly there are places in Alberta where there are as many cattle as in the constituency I represent. Be that as it may, we call ourselves the beef capital of Canada. And I do not know any cattlemen, not one, who would appreciate hearing hon. members of the New Democratic Party say to them: "You must be subject to a national cattle marketing board; you have no say about it."

The cattlemen have been given every opportunity to get a board established if they wished. Under the terms of Bill C-176, as I understand it, if the appropriate steps are followed the government has no alternative but to set up an agency in any way they desire. Surely we have not reached the stage in Canada when we are going to force the cabinet or anybody else, labour unions, school teachers or firemen, in Vancouver or wherever they may be, to join something they do not wish to join.

These are the things I most respectfully wanted to point out to my hon. friend, who I presume brought this motion forward with every good intention. I have made many mistakes in my political life and I suggest that my hon. friend has made at least one, and that one has been demonstrated in the presentation of this motion this afternoon.

[Translation]

Mr. Florian Côté (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, when I read the bill introduced by my colleague from Meadow Lake (Mr. Nesdoly), I told myself: surely he did not consult with the members of his party who participated two years ago in the stormy debate on Bill C-176 to prepare that Bill. The principles which he has laid out this afternoon are described in the same bill.

But when I read the speech on the Cattle Marketing Board, I told myself: there is certainly going to be a heated discussion between 5 and 6 Progressive Conservatives and the New Democrats, because the battle, in 1971-72 opposed two philosophies: on the one hand a desire to impose marketing boards too directly, and on the other hand, an attempt to reject my Progressive Conservative friends' position concerning these marketing boards. Between the two stood the government trying to make the marketing boards operative within as mush a diplomatic way as possible. And this was done by presenting the bill in the following manner. First, it was discussed with the people responsible for the local marketing boards in each of the provinces, who then decided in a democratic way, with the people responsible for the marketing boards at the provincial level, what decisions should be referred to the federal Department of Agriculture. Following that decision or that local decision, which was not arbitrary but which came from the grass roots—

[English]

Mr. Nesdoly: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member wants to ask a question to the hon. member for Richelieu.

[English]

The hon. member may ask his question.

Mr. Nesdoly: My question very briefly is this. In view of the hon. member's exposition of the fact that there should be a vote held before a cattle marketing board is established—and I agree—once a marketing board is established and the people have accepted it, as they have the Canadian Wheat Board with its jurisdiction over feed grains, does he not think there ought to be a vote to dismantle this marketing board, it having been accepted by the farmers of this country?

[Translation]

Mr. Côté: I think so, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend is right, and this is what I am trying to explain to him. We should deal with all the other food products. Each provincial board should prepare the marketing of all foodstuffs, not only beef but also vegetables and other food products so that producers can become aware of the marketing of their own products.

This is why I would be disappointed to see this bill implemented arbitrarily, and I can see that my Progressive Conservative friends are in a very embarrassing position; earlier, when my hon. friend made his speech, they dozed. They just did not want to understand. They did not want to listen to the explanations given up to now because these were completely opposed to what they proposed. However, each time we discuss agricultural problems in this House, se are faced with the famous problem of marketing.

Those who questioned the government and harass the ministers are precisely the ones who denied the farmer the right to get marketing boards and to receive the help of the federal government. In fact, we are ready to assist them through Bill C-176 that have been presented precisely for that purpose. I wish I could have told several things to my hon. friend. Even though it is six o'clock I wish I could explain to him that it would put the farmer in a position directly opposite the one suggested by my Progressive Conservative friends. We should even not succeed in establishing it because the Progressive Conservatives would vote against us. It is bound to occur particularly under a minority government. When you wish to do a good deed you have to face a political party that, for the sake of its electoral interest, remain seated like my Progressive Conservative friends did this afternoon and so the governments cannot operate efficiently.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is six o'clock and I resume my seat.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the hour for private members' business has expired.

[English]

It being just about six o'clock, the House will now resume in the Committee of the Whole.

RAILWAY RELOCATION AND CROSSING ACT

PROVISION FOR PLANNING, ACQUISITION OF LAND, GRANTS, GRADE CROSSING ASSISTANCE

House again in committee on Bill C-27, to facilitate the relocation of railway lines or rerouting of railway traffic in urban areas and to provide financial assistance for work done for the protection, safety and convenience of the public at railway crossings—Mr. Basford—Mr. Turner (London East) in the chair.

[Mr. Nesdoly.]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Turner (London East)): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair. The committee will resume at eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The Committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose at five o'clock it was considering clause 5, as amended, of Bill C-27, to facilitate the relocation of railway lines or rerouting of railway traffic in urban areas. Shall clause 5, as amended, carry?

On Clause 5—Submission to Commission of Transport Plan.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Chairman, at five o'clock I was attempting to sum up my anxiety and slight agitation about the minister's reluctance to speak about the area he represents, a portion of Vancouver, and basically about the shortcomings, which are obvious to me as a person from the prairies, in the transportation system feeding the harbour of Vancouver. I have almost begged the minister all this afternoon and last evening to speak and to point out clearly that there is a master plan, that the harbours board and the city of Vancouver have agreed upon and accepted a plan which will fall within the ambit of this piece of legislation.

I questioned the minister in this regard on clauses 3 and 4. We are now on clause 5. I could go on and question him again and again, particularly on clause 10. My basic anxiety lies in the fact that the port of Vancouver is poorly served by the present railway network.

• (2010)

It is poorly served as clearly exemplified at a transportation conference on April 10, when the CPR said it took four days to send a boxcar loaded with grain from Calgary to Vancouver. This was caused by slowness in moving cars into the port, with a build up of cars moving into the terminal elevators at Vancouver. One of the marshalling yards at Vancouver belongs to an American railroad, and the Mann marshalling yard, some distance from the outskirts of Vancouver, is owned by the CNR.

In considering this bill, which suggests that the federal government will have money to relocate trackage, we should be told exactly what marshalling yards can be affected by it, what rail grade crossings come under its ambit, and what road and highway separations will be affected by it.

We have seen the Minister of Transport stand up in this House and say that transportation in Canada is in a mess. He does not have a transportation policy. Now we see the minister of state responsible for urban affairs introducing a piece of legislation that specifies the percentage which the federal government will pay to improve part of the mess, but we still have no over-all concept to tackel the entire problem.

I have pointed out the delays. I have said that there was an all-encompassing plan proposed for Vancouver. I zero in on Vancouver because the minister should be more aware of this plan than he seems to be. Just to give an example, I would like to read again from an article by Mr. Wilson, which was published on January 9 of this year. In it he points out that the British Columbia railroad also serves the port of Vancouver. I have asked the minister what railroads come under this legislation, but he has not even answered that question. He sits over there like a bump on a log, trying to get this legislation passed.

Mr. Wilson points out in his article that the British Columbia railroad claims there have been delays of 14 to 15 days in handing over cars to the CNR in north Vancouver for delivery to consignees in and near the Fraser Delta. For example, the British Columbia railroad moves lumber cars destined for mills on the Fraser River. When its cars can best be interchanged with those of the CNR they are tediously trundled over the Second Narrows Bridge to the CNR yard in Port Mann. All this takes somewhere in the neighbourhood of 14 to 15 days.

One did not have to belong in the House of Commons this past winter to realize that lumber cars were in short supply. Here we have trackage congestion which has caused a great delay in the delivery of lumber cars on the CNR, the CPR, and the British Columbia railroad. Further, grain cars have been in short supply on all three railroads.

I ask the minister whether this legislation will facilitate the relocation of the trackage. Is there a plan already accepted for the city and the harbour of Vancouver? I could quote from the record of committee proceedings in April, 1970, when the then chairman of the harbours board stated there was a major plan in existence for the harbour of Vancouver, Burrard Inlet and the whole complex.

I do not want to take up any more time in this debate, but I do not want the minister to get up and say if this legislation will assist in improving trackage facilities north and south of the Burrard Inlet? Will it facilitate the building of a railroad around Port Moody over the Indian Arm Inlet?

The minister remains silent in his seat, failing to defend his own area, where this harbour handles well over 30 per cent of the total tonnage entering and leaving Canada, according to a National Harbours Board press release dated March, 1972. I will do my best to make the Vancouver harbour authorities aware of the minister's silence. His silence means that this legislation will not alleviate the difficulties that have become apparent to all people who move tonnage in and out of Vancouver. I will make that abundantly clear to the authorities in Vancouver if there is an election in the very near future.

The minister has been asked pertinent questions concerning the area which he represents. He has failed to reply yes to any of the pertinent questions I have asked him; let that go on the record. The people of Vancouver will clearly hear the record. Like a lot of other members of the cabinet, the minister's tongue is tied. They can only do what they are told, and they have not yet been told to defend Vancouver harbour. They have not yet been told to improve the trackage at Vancouver harbour.

I only hope that some day representatives who are sent here from Vancouver will be subjected to sufficient pressure that they will have the intestinal fortitude to defend their area. If the minister would say that he apologizes to me because this legislation will not alleviate the lumber and grain car problems at that port, I would accept his apology. He could say that the next piece of legislation to be introduced would do so. But from his silence I can only conclude that he has no defence. The people of Vancouver should be made aware of this.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, up until now I have not replied to the hon. member for Crowfoot because I wanted to have his case fully on the record in all its glory and fulsomeness. He has now placed his remarks before the committee on clauses 5 and 6.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): And 7, 8, 9 and 10 are yet to come.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I am a very modest minister. I am very hesitant to mention Vancouver in relation to this bill because, if I do, the hon. member will probably say that I am using my position as a minister to favour my own city. But as I said on second reading and throughout the various stages, this bill will be of immense value in improving major urban centres across the country such as Halifax, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, and that jewel on the Pacific, Vancouver.

● (2020)

The hon. member for Crowfoot asks if we have a plan for Vancouver. His complaint is the same as mine. In the city of Vancouver, in terms of the movement of goods and the movement of people, we have had study after study after study. We have had studies by the National Harbours Board, by the city of Vancouver, by the B.C. research council, by the provincial government, by the two national railroads and the provincial one, all of which have made recommendations for the improvement of the movement of goods and people around the city of Vancouver. Until now, however, none has provided the mechanism for this, as we now have under the aegis of this legislation.

This legislation arms the Canadian Transport Commission with the authority to implement a transportation plan for a given urban area. For the first time it will have authority to order a co-ordinated, consistent transportation plan for the movement of goods and people in and through the port of Vancouver. As Minister of State for Urban Affairs, if I do nothing else but succeed in passing this legislation through this House, giving the cities of Canada the benefit of it, I will be very happy and proud of that. I know that the hon. member, in supporting the legislation, will be equally proud.

The hon. member for Crowfoot is concerned with the shipment of prairie products through the Rockies to the port of Vancouver. He says Vancouver has been poorly served by the railroads. In some respects the railroads are badly organized; in some respects the time taken for switching cars from one side of the harbour to the other, from CN to CP and to B.C. Rail, is a long, expensive, complicated and delaying process as he has suggested.

This legislation can provide a means for the city of Vancouver and the National Harbours Board to work out a railroad relocation, rerouting, rationalization plan and to put it to the CTC and the railroads. Hearings can be held and for the first time we can get beyond the stage of plans and studies and projects. We can now get down to the nitty gritty and reorganize railroad traffic through Vancouver to ensure an efficient, effective system for the movement of goods and people in and through the port of Vancouver.

The hon. member mentioned several projects, one of which was the moving of the Burlington Northern Railroad. The hon. member for New Westminster, who has taken a great interest in this legislation, is also interested in that particular aspect. How can the Burlington Northern be moved inland from the shores of White Rock, giving back to the waterfront area of White Rock the use of their beach property? Well, Mr. Chairman, this proposal can be put forward under this legislation.

The hon. member raised the question of the waterfront at Vancouver. The Department of Urban Affairs and the city of Vancouver currently have financed jointly a waterfront study in the city of Vancouver which, among other things, is putting forward proposals for the rationalization of the rail lines on the waterfront. Rather than being one of a series of studies, concrete proposals can now be put forward and implemented under the railroad relocation plan.

There are some projects that the hon. member did not mention. For instance, under this legislation we can rationalize and remove the railways from the area of False Creek, which is the heart of Vancouver. By that method the heart of the city of Vancouver can be rebuilt under an accepted urban and transportation plan.

Under clause 6 of the legislation the Canadian Transport Commission can order the use of railroad rights of way for rapid and public transportation systems. We can therefore use this legislation to provide public and rapid transit from Stanley Park through downtown Vancouver out to Marpole and the International Airport on the one side, and through Burnaby, New Westminster and the Fraser Valley on the other. That would be a tremendous move, a plan of incomparable value to the city of Vancouver and the lower mainland of British Columbia.

I have remained silent because I have not wanted to brag too much about the value of this legislation to the city which I represent; but the hon. member wanted an exposition of how this could bring about an improvement and a rationalization of the transportation system in the port of Vancouver. This legislation for the first time gets us beyond the stages of studies and rhetoric and gives us a concrete mechanism for implementing and improving transportation facilities to move western produce to Vancouver and to move people in the lower mainland.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a couple of questions in order to clarify his remarks, if I may. The minister said that the legislation encompassed a lot of things, but he failed to recall that at the beginning of my remarks I suggested it looked as if there was an election coming. This legislation will encompass almost everything, and so the minister could go through the country waving a magic wand saying "This is possible". I never doubted that he could say that in Vancouver. Indeed, he went through a long list of things that he could say it about in Vancouver. No doubt if there is an election he will go there and wave his magic wand.

Who is going to initiate this action? Is it a new policy of the government that the CTC shall initiate it? Will the CTC have the authority to go to the CNR and tell them that they can no longer use the Burlington Northern marshalling yards, that they are to be forced to move and that appropriate action will now take place?

Is the CTC to be given the power to tell the CPR that they must build a railroad around Port Moody and over the Indian Arm causeway? Is the CTC to have that authority under this legislation? I think the country and the House should know if that is the case, because the Minister of Transport has said repeatedly in this House and in the transport committee that he has no power, that the CTC has all the power. I think that members of this House who are concerned about transportation in this country should know whether we are giving the minister, who is responsible to the people, more power under this legislation, or whether we are giving it to the CTC, which is responsible to no one, as somebody suggests. I do not know to whom they are responsible. I read an article which said that Mr. Benson is not the father of the child of the CTC, that Mr. Pickersgill, a former minister of transport, was. It is said that Mr. Benson is the adoptive father of the child, that as such we believe he will treat the child well. I suggest such belief is not true. I suggest he feels like the adoptive father, and he will gobble up more and more power.

In a democracy, elected members are answerable to the people. To whom will the commission answer? If the bill empowers the CTC to direct the railways to make improvements in Vancouver, for instance, we should be told, so that we know what provisions we are passing. If we agree that the bill should do this, then the clause should pass. On the other hand, have the railways power under the bill to go to the CTC and ask for changes? Suppose the CNR is tired of using the Burlington Northern marshalling yards at Vancouver and wants its own yards built. Can the company go to the CTC and say, "Pay us 50 per cent of the cost of building new marshalling yards in the Vancouver area so that we can serve the port better and load and unload our cars more easily"? Do the railways have such power? Have the cities such power?

The bill refers to a transportation study and to plans which must be accepted. I know that the minister, representing the people of the Vancouver area, may wave his magic wand and say, "We will spend $1 million on this job and $1 million on that." Promises will be made, elections will come and go, and in the end the people will wonder where the money went and why the yards were not built. In the last election we saw cabinet ministers running here, there and everywhere, offering to build a new port in Toronto, a fancy facility here and another there. Some of those facilities still have not been built.

By whom is the transportation study to be initiated? Is it the CTC? Is it government policy to empower the CTC to make decisions which may affect the National Harbours Board, or will such decisions be made on the basis of political expediency? Will the political party in power direct the CTC to do these things? These things are not clear.

According to the committee proceedings I referred to, $11 million was appropriated for the development of Vancouver harbour in 1969. We were told by an official of the board that $3 million was spent on the development of Roberts Bank. Clearly somebody said that that money must be spent on Roberts Bank. Under the bill we are discussing, who will say where money is to be spent? Will it be the CTC? Will it be the Department of Urban Affairs? Will it be the Department of Public Works? Or will it be the Minister of Transport, who already is sceptical about the role of the CTC? The minister should answer these questions. Who will direct whom with regard to improvements to Vancouver harbour, improvements which he suggested are possible under this bill?

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Chairman, in speaking on clause 5, I allude again to remarks I made this afternoon when I said that although I am reasonably satisfied with the purpose of this legislation, I am disturbed at the vast powers given to the CTC. As I said, members on my side do not place too much confidence in the Canadian Transport Commission. We are disturbed to note the speed, or lack of it, with which it acts on applications, and at the lack of parliamentary control ove the CTC. The situation is manifestly ridiculous. We are asked to pass a bill which will make available hundreds of millions of dollars to a body over which parliament has no effective control.

Let me explain what I mean. Clause 3 gives the CTC power to consider applications and determine if the applications are valid. Then the commission must determine whether funds are to be provided with respect to the financial plan and transportation plan. There is a study under way in the Moncton area on which $150,000 has been spent. It follows other studies, and before they are all completed we shall have spent perhaps half a million dollars on them. That may be fine, but I wonder what is the purpose of clauses 5(1) and 5(1)(c), where provision is made for plans to be altered. Clause 5(1) reads:

> The accepted plan, together with the financial plan, shall be filed with the Commission and the Commission may accept the transportation plan and the financial plan either as submitted or with such changes in either of them as the Commission considers necessary, . . .

Subparagraph (c) of clause 5(1) says, in so many words, that if the municipality or province applying for assistance does not agree with the changes the commission has made to the plan, the whole thing shall be tossed out. Why provide government funds for an exhaustive study of a financial and transportation plan, which we assume will be done by reputable and responsible people, if the whole thing can be tossed out? Why include such a provision which negates the entire thrust of the statute? I think I have read the bill correctly.

Let me ask the minister, why is it necessary to give the CTC power arbitrarily to alter a financial plan or transportation plan as it sees fit? If we intend to give the CTC veto power, provision should be made for arbitration and consultation. If the CTC suggests certain changes, they should be referred back to the applicant, who may or may not agree. This clause, as I read it, provides that the CTC can make any change it deems necessary, and only after the plan has been agreed to will the CTC approve it. Such language is not necessary. Why spend a lot of money on a plan which the CTC can toss out at will?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, the answer is simple. Obviously, we must start from some base. So we provide for federal contributions for the development of a transportation plan or proposal—"proposal" may be the better word—and for an urban development plan or proposal. The municipality and the province must agree on the transportation proposal or the urban development proposal, and that proposal goes by way of application before the Canadian Transport Commission.

The Transport Commission has to hold hearings on that plan or proposal, because if it does not have the right to vary the plan, the hearings would be a nullity. There would be no purpose to them. The hearings are held on the initial plan, or on the initial proposal, which is a better word. The parties which may be affected by the proposal are heard from, after which the CTC makes an order carrying into effect either the original proposal or a variation of the proposal which may be necessary as a result of the hearings.

Let me give the hon. member an example. Moncton, from which he comes, is a crucial transport link in the Atlantic provinces. If someone were to come along and say, "We want to relocate the railroads and take them out of Moncton," the result would be the virtual destruction of the transport system of the Atlantic provinces.

The CTC must be empowered and able to make such variations in the plan to ensure that after relocation there is a viable transportation system for the Atlantic provinces and that communication through Moncton is not completely destroyed by reason of the relocation scheme. That is why they are given the powers they have.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Chairman, the answer the minister has given me has shed some new light, but I am at a loss to understand where the authority or direction is given to the CTC to hold a hearing. The minister said they must hold a hearing. The only clause I see that refers to a hearing is the one we are talking about amending. It says they "may" hold a hearing. There is nothing to compel them to do so. If there is a public hearing, that is fine.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I know the hon. member was engaged in another committee this afternoon, but clause 5(2) was amended this afternoon to make it mandatory that the CTC hold hearings.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask the minister if, under clause 6 of Bill C-27, problems such as the one that occurred in Quebec City will be solved. You will all remember the struggles of Parish of Saint-Roch Pastor Msgr. Lavoie for the removal of the rails located in this area of Quebec City.

Does clause 1 give enough authority to the Canadian Transport Commission to order CN or CP to stop using all rails located in the study zone provided in the bill and to which the plan refers? For example, if, in a plan put forward by Quebec City, it is established that the rails in this zone will have to be removed to allow the city to implement an urban plan, as accepted by the province and responding to the needs of the district and to the needs of the city, does this clause give enough authority to force the railway companies to remove the rails and the buildings located on the land? I would also like to ask the minister if, under this clause, a city, in this case Quebec City, can be exempted from going to civil courts? Can the Canadian Transport Commission demand the implementation of its orders to simplify procedure, that its decisions are expeditious, and that the taxpayers as well as the city involved are saved additional expenses?

[English]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, a very quick answer to the first part of the hon. member's remarks is yes. The CTC is empowered to order, for example, discontinuance and vacation or discontinuance of railway operations and the removal of the railroad facilities from that land, relocation of the lines and use of rail lines belonging to one company for another. Under clause 6 it is fully empowered to carry out the purpose to which the hon. member has referred. Knowing something of the Quebec city relocation proposals, although not in detail, I am quite satisfied that the legislation contains sufficient power to emplement these schemes.

With regard to the second part of the question, the answer is no, they do not have to go to court. The CTC has full authority in its own being and statutory existence to make orders and enforce them against the railways, which come fully within their jurisdiction.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, while we are dealing with this particular clause I must say I am very pleased the minister has accepted the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Scarborough West. As I study the provisions in this bill, I must say I find it very difficult to pass judgment on this piece of legislation before knowing what the overall transportation policy of the government is going to be.

I share the concern expressed by other hon. members about the very wide powers the CTC is being granted, powers which in my opinion go well beyond the matter of regulation. This was alluded to by the minister in previous discussion.

It is very difficult to know whether to take seriously some of the statements by government spokesmen which suggest that inter-city transport, particularly in high density areas, will revert to a large degree to rail transportation. That strikes at the very heart of this bill.

What concerns me even more is the procedure with regard to appeal provisions. I wonder if the minister can explain whether section 64 of the National Transportation Act, which gives the governor in council the power, at any time at his discretion, or upon petition of any party, person or company, to alter, vary or rescind any order or decision that has been proposed by the CTC, would apply to the provisions of this particular bill. I think that section is very important, particularly when we consider the vacuum in the entire transportation policy throughout the various modes of transportation in this country, especially in the field of urban transportation.

I do not think any area of transportation is more important at this time, as far as the future of transportation is concerned, than urban transportation. It is quite clear to many members that we probably stand on the threshold of many new, innovative and technological concepts in the field of inter-city and urban rapid transportation. We hear talk of 300 miles per hour trains in high density areas such as Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal, magnetic levitation trains.

We hear of the importance of surface transportation by rail as being something of very major importance in respect to fuel economy, having regard to the energy situation. It seems that at this time we are granting a tremendous amount of authority to a body, which is largely a regulatory body, to pass judgment on the future development of our transportation network in this very critical area. I believe there is a great future in surface transportation, particularly inter-city rail transportation.

At the moment we find the government spending huge sums to develop STOL aircraft for inter-city travel. We shall have to make up our minds soon whether to develop an efficient surface transportation network, or whether to rely on the STOL transportation system. The minister has often suggested that the CTC is an all-powerful body over which he has no control, save in exceptional circumstances, and we still do not know what those circumstances are. I am wondering whether section 64 of the National Transportation Act which set up the CTC would apply in this case, whether there is a right of appeal and, if so, what is the proper appeal procedure to be followed.

We know that the CTC has moved very slowly in implementing some of the sections of that act. I need only mention the famous rapeseed case which was brought to the attention of the commission in 1970 and with respect to which a decision is still awaited. It was demonstrated to the commission that the freight rate being charged was inequitable and prejudicial to the public interest. Yet after four years this case has still to be resolved.

Surely when we embark on legislation which is so important to the development of effective urban transportation, these questions should be settled before the legislation is allowed to pass. The bill is basically a good one and the government is to be commended for presenting it, but there are areas which need to be clarified and there is no better time to do so than the present. Having served on the transport committee for some time and having heard both the President of the CTC and the Minister of Transport give evidence before that committee, it is my impression we still cannot form any clear picture of the relationship.

The minister suggests the CTC is holding him up and preventing him from doing things he wants to do. The CTC, on the other hand, says there are matters of policy involved and that it has no control over policy considerations. In any case, I feel that adequate appeal procedures should be established, and if the minister can tell us what mechanism can be used for this purpose he would be doing the committee a service by clarifying an important part of the bill.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I am advised that section 64, which relates to the general operations of the CTC, would apply to orders made under this bill. That is one method of control. I agree with the hon. member when he emphasizes the importance of developing our urban areas to the best of our ability and the part rail relocation can play in such development. Then again, if the hon. member would look at the financial formulae for which provision is made in the legislation he will see that, as far as other federal programs are concerned, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs must advise that they are co-ordinated and that moneys are available. The Minister of Transport responsible for the relocation aspect must indicate that a relocation grant is available and will in fact be paid. These funds are provided annually by parliament and in this way parliament can exercise control over the operation of this statute. The estimates of the Minister of Transport will provide an opportunity for members to examine this particular vote and ascertain the progress of the various applications before the CTC.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I shall comment only briefly on the remarks of my Progressive Conservative colleagues who fear that the Canadian Transport Commission will have too much power.

I do not agree with them and once again I congratulate the minister for having introcuced this bill, because I think it is important that the Canadian Transport Commission should have the necessary powers to implement the regulations it passes.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) earlier pointed out a problem that occurred in Quebec City. The problem was a very serious one, but the Commission, slow in its administration and encumbered by its bureaucracy, worked in such a way as to be detrimental to the Quebec City ratepayers.

Unless I am mistaken the Canadian Transport Commission is a Crown Corporation. I would like the minister to say what legal ties exist between the CTC and himself. And I ask those questions to enlighten our Progressive Conservative colleagues so they will understand the importance of the objectives to be achieved through this bill as well as the importance for the people of this country to be able to really benefit from this legislation by giving the CTC tools to work with.

Consequently, as a member of the opposition, while I agree that the CTC should be given the power to act effectively to solve the problem as they occur I would like to have the assurance from the minister that the Commission could be regularly accountable through its spokesmen in this House, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford). I would like the minister to give us his assurance on that, to say what legal ties exist between the Commission and the Department with respect to the implementation of this legislation so two absolutely basic objectives can be reached.

First, that Bill C-27 really meets the needs involved. A step forward was made this afternoon when it was recognized that municipalities are responsible governments. Tonight it would appropriate Mr. Chairman, for the minister to assure this House and particularly our colleagues in the Official Opposition that that Commission will also be accountable to Parliament through the minister.

I have examined the status of Crown Corporations, considered agents in some cases and not in others and in any case, in all classes, these Commissions are supposed to be accountable to the House for the public monies they spend and the decisions they make.

Some difficulties are encountered with CBC but seldom with the Canadian Transport Commission, apart from the fact that it is much too slow to act.

Mr. Chairman, I think the minister is right in maintaining clause 6 as introduced as long as he gives us the assurance that the legal tie binding the Commission and the Department will ensure that Parliament's foremost requirement is met. Compliance with the law is essential provided that our fellow citizens be assured of the right or the privilege to really take advantage of this legislation. If our friends from the Progressive Conservative party understood Quebec, they would easily understand this section. We should see to it that from now on any law and regulations of the Canadian Transportation Commission can really be used and can deal with the problems facing Quebec in particular.

I understand that for our friends from the Progressive Conservative party Moncton, Vancouver, and the West are important, but it is about time that they should have a national view of the transportation problem and therefore they should recognize the importance of giving powers to a Commission by showing confidence in the Minister; it will always be time for a change of either the Commission or the Minister if this does not work.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I want to be very brief. I have already had the opportunity of speaking on this bill during second reading, but I do want to ask the minister a brief supplementary question or a question further to the point brought out by my colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville.

I do not have section 64 of the National Transportation Act before me, but having regard to the answer he gave my colleague I am wondering about section 64(2), which is to the effect that an appeal lies from a decision of the commission to the Supreme Court of Canada on a question of law or jurisdiction, upon leave being obtained from a judge of the supreme court. I believe there is a period of 30 days within which this process can be instituted. I am wondering whether the minister would not agree that if section 64 does apply—and I am happy that in his opinion and the opinion of his advisers it does—it would be better to have a specific section expressly setting this out in the act. Perhaps we should spell out some of the provisions so that we are not caught up with this question of jurisdiction and so it does not turn out that, in theory, this section might apply but in practice is difficult to implement.

What I am really suggesting is that, if this particular section is to apply, then there ought to be some effort made through this legislation to tailor it so it can apply as quickly as possible, without any problems arising as a result of the transposition of the provisions of this legislation to that area of the National Transportation Act where section 64 was originally intended to apply.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, the commission referred to in this section is the Canadian Transport Commission, which would be subject to all the rules of its founding statute, namely the Canadian Transport Commission Act. So the answer to the hon. member's question is in the affirmative, namely that the rules and regulations set out in the National Transportation Act relative to the composition and rights of the Canadian Transport Commission would apply to the commission as spelled out in this legislation.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I do, of course, accept what the minister says, and it may well be that he is perfectly correct. But I think section 64 does refer to a question of law or of jurisdiction. What is the situation if there is an appeal under this legislation by one of the parties which does not specifically fall within those two categories? Perhaps there are other considerations that the commission might decide to follow. Is the minister satisfied that the definition in section 64(2) is sweeping enough to take into account the purview or, if you will, the spirit of this bill, subject to this particular clause?

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied on that point.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, as I pointed out in my remarks, paraphrasing the words of the Minister of Transport, he has suggested that only in very exceptional or rare circumstances does he exercise this right of appeal under section 64. I see the Minister of Transport in the House at this time and I am wondering whether he or the Minister of State for Urban Affairs could outline precisely what may have been meant by the phrase "exceptional circumstances". Because it appears that only under certain conditions does the governor in council deem it proper or advisable to exercise this right under that particular section. If this should become a loophole in respect of which this right of appeal can be exercised, perhaps it would be worthwhile to have that statement of the Minister of Transport clarified at this time.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I am advised that the governor in council under the law would intervene at all times. But obviously that would not be a very satisfactory situation; otherwise we might as well not have the Canadian Transport Commission. The commission is appointed to perform certain functions under this legislation and it would seem proper that it should do so except in exceptional circumstances, in which case the governor in council would have to make the determination.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong this discussion unnecessarily, but I think the hon. member for Vegreville has raised an important point regarding what are exceptional circumstances. Since the Minister of Transport is here in the House perhaps he might indicate to his colleague why there seems to be such consternation on his part as to the powers of the commission concerning matters of transportation. And perhaps the minister for urban affairs could put our minds at ease by assuring us that these appeal provisions will in fact be less onerous than the Minister of Transport indicated when giving testimony before the committee.

Mr. Basford: Without going into the whole operation of the Canadian Transport Commission or the relations between it and the governor in council, I think it would be wrong to try in any precise form to spell out what are exceptional circumstances because then you would be foreclosing on the ability of the governor in council to intervene and hear an appeal in an appropriate case. Obviously the intent of the legislation is that the governor in council should feel free to intervene in exceptional circumstances. As I say, there would be no point in having a regulatory agency if the governor in council intervenes in every case. To spell out the precise set of rules which would govern this intervention would foreclose on any intervention in exceptional circumstances.

Mr. Mazankowski: I really hesitate to belabour the point, but we are dwelling on this particular section simply because the Minister of Transport has indicated on several occasions in the House and in the committee that he really lacks the authority in this respect, and that the CTC has more power than does he. It is only in rare and exceptional circumstances that he can exercise his authority over the CTC. It is all well and good for us to be brainwashed with this phrase "exceptional circumstances", but perhaps we should find out how many times these exceptional circumstances have occurred during the time the National Transportation Act has been in effect.

The Minister of Transport has indicated on several occasions that the National Transportation Act is an ineffective piece of legislation, that it does not work because the principle of competition is wrong. In view of that I think it behooves us to take a second look at this particular provision. I am sure the Minister of Transport has been frustrated in his attempts to do certain things in the field of transportation because his efforts are hampered by certain legislative measures. I see the Minister of Transport in his seat and I would really appreciate his comments on this matter. Perhaps it would ease our minds if he commented on this, because it seems we could be involved in a set of circumstances in which the minister's hands are tied so that he cannot discharge the provisions of this act in accordance with its principle and spirit. If the minister is hampered because these exceptional circumstances do not apply, we could find ourselves being strangled because of the absence of policy and the very broad and far-reaching powers being delegated to the CTC by this piece of legislation.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, I do not have any specific comments to make. The only thing I might say is that there is no doubt that the CTC has great powers in this field and that I am not sure it can be overruled.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I think it is fair to say to the minister who is piloting the bill through the House, in view of the comments we have had, that the CTC, which is already immensely powerful and is the subject of a lot of consternation, I think, from members on all sides of the House in terms of this very ambitious and worthwhile bill, in many respects is being given still more power. At the same time we are still not sure, particularly in light of what the minister just said, that we have an efficient and practical way to appeal from the decisions of the commission. I think this is a very serious situation.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering whether the Minister of Transport can tell the House the number of cases in which the governor in council has established its right of appeal under the provisions of section 64 since the enactment of the National Transportation Act. Has it been frequent?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Offhand—

The Chairman: Order, please. I think that this is more the type of a question which should be placed on the order paper when the House is sitting rather than in the committee. However, perhaps the minister wishes to reply.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, the most recent case I can recall is the Bell Telephone Company case where there was an appeal by the governor in council. The rights of the governor in council are clearly set out in section 64 of the National Transportation Act to which the hon. member referred. Orders of the commission under this measure, Bill C-27, are subject to section 64, as I have pointed out.

In addition to that, the funds payable under Part I of this legislation are voted annually by parliament through estimates both of the Ministry of Transport and the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. So the control, it seems to me, is additionally there in that the Canadian Transport Commission, the Minister of Transport and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs will annually appear before the standing committees of this House under estimates for examination of the various proposals put forward under clause 1 of this legislation.

I think hon. members in the essence of their questions are concerned about the authority of the Canadian Transport Commission and how in fact they as members can ensure the effectiveness of the CTC. I think that is provided for under the National Transportation Act and under the budgetary provisions of this legislation, which provides for an immediate review by parliament of the funds spent and the allocation of funds.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the minister's comments. It is quite obvious that in only one instance has the governor in council exercised its authority under section 64. I was waiting for him to provide other examples, but it seems that the case of the Bell Telephone Company is the only case in which the governor in council has established its right under section 64.

There have been many shortcomings in respect of the CTC and many criticisms about its operations by members in this House and indeed by members of the cabinet. Therefore I would simply say that if in the course of the life of the National Transportation Act we have had only one appeal under the provisions of section 64, this does not really offer much hope for an effective appeal procedure under the aegis of this particular bill.

I would urge that the minister seriously consider a more effective appeal procedure than that contained in this particular section 64, which the Minister of Transport has pointed out is very difficult to exercise. It would seem that only under exceptional circumstances is the governor in council able to exercise its authority. If this piece of legislation is to be workable and meaningful to the municipalities for whom it is basically intended, I would feel much more comfortable if a more effective appeal procedure were provided within the bill. I urge the minister seriously to consider the suggestions put forward by myself and the hon. member for Central Nova.

The Chairman: The discussion is on clause 5, as amended.

Shall clause 5 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 5, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

On clause 7—Acquisition of railway land.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, again I do not wish to take up too much time on clause by clause consideration but I have a few comments to make further to a point first raised, I think, with the minister by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain regarding the particular status of the lands in question with which the minister may deal pursuant to this clause. I do not believe the minister gave a specific commitment to the hon. member, although I have the impression that he asked for it, that he would obtain an opinion, or at least a statement of policy, concerning the exact status of the rights of way and other lands the railways have which in fact were granted to them for railway purposes.

I think this is a very important and fundamental part of this bill. Although the situation may vary from province to province, I suppose, depending on the history of railways that were built at various times since confederation and even before, if in some provinces the specific grants of land to the railways were for the purpose of providing a transportation system and it turns out that there is an opinion which may have some weight that the rights of way should revert back to the Crown when the railways cease to make use of them for railway purposes, then as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain pointed out we are in a somewhat absurd situation if the government purports to appropriate land which it may already own by virtue of this conversion.

I should like the minister to comment on this particular point, which was raised earlier in the discussion, and let us know whether in the meantime he has obtained information to the effect that there is some jurisprudence on this point and whether or not he is satisfied that in all parts of the nation to be affected by this bill the railways will in fact be the recipients of compensation for the loss of rights of way.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I did make some inquiries further to our discussions in the House the other day, only to be advised that any generalized opinion on this subject was impossible and impractical because of the great variety of original conveyancing clauses covering mineral rights, including reversionary rights relating to mineral claims. These vary according to the incorporating statutes and according to the grants made, which in turn vary from railroad to railroad and even from section to section. There are literally hundreds of documents and statutes which cover this point, and before being able to give a precise opinion one would have to know the precise railroad, the precise time of its construction, the precise time of the conveyance, and its precise location in Canada.

However, I would point out to the hon. member that since 1903, under section 136 of the Railway Act railroads do not acquire mining and mineral rights unless specifically mentioned in the grants to them. So all I can say by way of general opinion to the hon. member is to give him the assurance I previously gave him in the House the other day that we would use the expropriation power to acquire all the rights that were necessary to carry out the transportation plan, but would acquire no more rights than we felt the railroads were entitled to under law.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister to specify the exact meaning of clause 7. For example, we read the following:

7. When the Commission makes an order under subsection 6(1) requiring a railway company to cease to operate over a line within a transportation study area, the Commission may . . .

Not "shall"—

. . . recommend that the Minister of Public Works acquire any land that is or was occupied as part of its railway undertaking . . .

Since the commission is free to decide whether the Department of Public Works shall acquire the lands occupied by the railway companies involved, if the commission does not decide whether the Department of Public Works must do the acquisition, can the minister say whether the lands occupied by the railway companies will automatically become the property of the city or municipality which has made an application for the relocation of the railway to carry out an urbanization plan as provided in Bill C-27? Mr. Chairman, it would be convenient to be enlightened about the provisions of clause 7 and the fact that commission may act but is not compelled to do so under the legislation. The said provision should then read as follows: "the Commission shall". Now, Mr. Chairman, if it was possible to give us some information, we would greatly appreciate it.

[English]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, if voluntary sale of the land could not be carried out as part of the plan, it was necessary to put some expropriation power into the legislation that could not be given to a municipality or a province, which would not have expropriation power over a federally incorporated and controlled railroad. Therefore it was necessary in this clause to confer power within the federal government, namely on the Minister of Public Works, to expropriate land used for railway purposes as part of the railroad relocation scheme. The Minister of Public Works would expropriate it, using the federal jurisdiction and federal power solely as trustee for those who were ultimately to acquire the land pursuant to the urban development plan. That could vary from city to city. It could be the municipality, it could be the province. The land could be sold to the general public or commercial interests, or assigned to recreational interests. Clause 7 is simply necessary to provide somewhere in the legislation a federally constituted authority, if need be, to expropriate a federally incorporated railroad property.

Mr. Mazankowski: Could the the minister explain the meaning of land that is or was occupied, as part of the railway undertaking, by the railway company? Does that simply mean the right of way, or any land adjoining the right of way?

Mr. Basford: It would mean generally lands used for railway purposes, railway lands owned by railway companies which are used for activities directly associated with the operation of the railway transport services of the railway companies. As I made clear this afternoon, these lands could be for rights of way, marshalling yards, terminal depots, etc. Lands unconnected with railway purposes which might be owned by the railways would be covered by normal laws, by municipal ordinances and provincial powers of expropriation.

Mr. Mazankowski: I appreciate the minister's answer, but in a number of smaller communities the railways own a great deal of land now occupied as empty lots, usually rented to customers of the CPR who ship their products by the CPR or CNR, and who in turn lease this property for storage purposes or other temporary purposes to their customers. Would that be considered as part of a railroading operation?

Mr. Basford: I am not able to be precise in reference to any given city or situation, but what I would want to make clear is the intent of this legislation, namely that under clause 7 and other clauses it is designed to cover land which is designated as railway land and under the jurisdiction of the CTC. All other land would be covered by municipal ordinances and provincial laws, the intent being that the lands owned by the railroads, whether for railway purposes or for other purposes, under one heading or the other, are totally controlled.

Mr. Yewchuk: Further to the questions asked by the hon. member for Vegreville I would like to give the minister an example so that he may clarify the matter a little further. I can think of a town in my constituency that has approximately 30 acres of land, in a strip 30 feet wide, running parallel to the railway tracks. It is not used for railway purposes. It is just sitting there awaiting possible future use. What would happen to that?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can be called upon to give what might be used as a legal opinion on the standing of certain lands. It would depend on whether or not in fact that land was being used for railway purposes within the meaning of this bill and the National Transportation Act.

I repeat what I said before. The purpose and intent of this statute is that that part of the land falling within the definition of railway or "used for railway" is covered by CTC; other lands are covered by the usual municipal ordinances.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I just want to try the minister's patience one more time and ask for a further definition. In committee we had a lot of discussion about the status of hotels vis-à-vis the railway. How does the minister envisage the situation where a hotel might be situated quite close to a railway right of way and perhaps have some railway facilities in it or adjoining it? Is this going to be considered as railway property in the sense that the minister has just discussed?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, again it would depend. The hon. member said a hotel owned by a railroad, and then he said a hotel with railway facilities in it. They are two different kinds of hotel. If it is a hotel owned by a railway and not connected with railway lands, then it would not be on railway lands within the meaning of this act and would obviously be covered by a municipal ordinance. If it is a hotel over a railroad station it is obviously built over railway lands.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 8 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 11—Recommending Relocation Grant.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, with respect to subclause (3) on the matter of the interest rate, may I ask if there are any guidelines or any formulae that the government has in mind to establish the rate of interest?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, the intention would be to set the interest rate from time to time to reflect the general state of the national economy and the financial situation of the railway company involved. I am advised by the financial managers that the Department of Finance has a well-established practice in matters of this type and has set interest rates for this purpose in a variety of circumstances.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, would that be established on a semi-annual or on an annual basis?

Mr. Basford: I must admit, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot answer that precisely. I hazard a guess that it is done quarterly.

Mr. Mazankowski: Are we dealing with a certain percentage over the prime rate here, a formula something similar to that in use in farm improvement loans or Farm Credit Corporation loans? Is this a rate established at a certain percentage above the government bond rate or the prime lending rate? I wonder if the minister might elaborate so that we can determine precisely what the formula is.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this section on the interest rate is to reflect the fact that modern capital investment techniques will be used in determining the net cost of the relocation. The purpose of determining the net cost of railway relocation is to determine an "as is" value for the assets to be taken into account. To determine the capital value, it is necessary from time to time to set an interest rate pursuant to that order and this section. That is done in the usual and normal way by the Department of Finance. It is not related to such cases as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation where there is a borrowing rate and a lending rate, with a margin established by statute. This is a rate set by the Department of Finance for the purpose of determining capital values.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. minister to shed some light on clause 11(2) of the bill which reads as follows:

> A relocation grant shall not exceed fifty per cent of the net costs of railway relocation as determined pursuant to section 13.

Since the federal government will assume only 50 per cent of the costs, can the minister advise the House who will assume the responsibility for the remaining 50 per cent? Will these costs be shared equally by the province and the municipality where the relocation is to take place, or will they be entirely the responsibility of the municipality and, in this case, who will submit the necessary application?

[English]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, what we have spelled out in the legislation is that 50 per cent of the net cost of the railroad relocation would be paid by the federal government. We have not tried to spell out any strict cost-sharing formula, as I think this would be a mistake and add an inflexibility that we do not want. We spelled out that we would pay 50 per cent; the remaining 50 per cent is to be found elsewhere. It will be spelled out in four ways: a contribution from the provinces; one from the municipalities; it is conceivable that the railroads will make some contribution; and it is conceivable that some private, non-railway interests will make a contribution in order to get some schemes going. For example, if the railroad land was to be developed for commercial purposes, it is conceivable that the commercial interest would be prepared to make a contribution to the municipality toward the contribution they would pay. We have not tried to spell out where the other 50 per cent should come from. Without wanting to establish some strict cost-sharing programs I would think that provinces would assist municipalities generously in supporting these railroad relocation schemes.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 12—Valuation of Lands.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could give an explanation of this clause, which states:

> Where pursuant to this act a determination of the value of any land is required to be made by the commission ... the commission may appoint such qualified land appraisers as are necessary to determine the value of such lands.

What does an interested party do if he is not satisfied with the valuation placed on a particular piece of land? What is his remedy under this section? I should like to comment that I would hope that the land appraiser's qualifications will not be determined by whatever political persuasion he happens to hold.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, the answer to the latter part of the question is no. That party would have the right, of course, to appoint his own evaluators, to establish his own case with regard to evaluation and put it forward at the public hearing. The determination of land values would be involved in any financial plan. Such determination would form part of the financial plan of the relocation, and would be taken into consideration in the order of the CTC with respect to the relocation grant. All of these areas are subject to public hearing. So valuations put forward under this section would be subject to challenge and to cross-examination by the party which feels its property is being undervalued. That party would be free to bring whatever evidence is available to support any different appraisal or valuation.

● (2140)

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, if all this has been done, if all available persuasion has been brought forward and the commission has made its ruling but the parties are still aggrieved, what must they do next?

Mr. Basford: The remedy—I hope we are not going back in our discussion—would be the provisions pursuant to section 64.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 13 and 14 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now consider Part II of the bill. Shall clause 15 carry?

On clause 15—Definitions.

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question relative to definitions contained in clause 15. Definitions are important to my community, where there are more than 30 crossings, where there should be grade separations, and where such work has been held up for several years because of inadequate funding, particularly on the part of the federal government. This has happened because the formula, which when initiated by the Diefenbaker government, represented something like 50 per cent of the cost of building the separation, has become eroded through inflation so that it provides only about 25 per cent of the cost. Therefore, I welcome the initiative the minister has taken and which the bill represents.

I want to ask one question about the definition of costs. I refer to the first paragraph of clause 15. Do the costs of construction directly involve only those costs having to do with the actual construction of a grade separation, or do they include costs which are necessary to the project but which do not necessarily form part of the construction? For example, some land acquisition might be necessary; some damages might be involved in the work. All these could represent reasonable and unavoidable costs.

My question to the minister is this. When a municipality draws up its plans for a separation of grade and makes a cost proposal to the CTC—that is, to the authority which designates what will be the federal share of the financial burden—will the costs figure include all reasonable costs, including those to which I referred, or will costs be confined simply to actual costs of construction?

The answer to my question is of concern to every municipality, and certainly my own, where 400,000 people live in 72 square miles and where, because there is a lack of grade separations, there are fatalities and traffic congestion and tie-ups day after day. I hope the minister will give a favourable reply.

[Mr. Basford.]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I am informed that the wording of clause 16 refers to costs, and that is to be interpreted as reasonable costs.

Mr. Stackhouse: Would the minister mind repeating what he said? I could not hear.

Mr. Basford: Costs, as referred to in clause 16 of the bill, will be interpreted by the CTC, as I am informed, to mean reasonable costs.

Mr. Stackhouse: In view of the minister's answer, would he be willing to include the words "reasonable costs" in the legislation, either in clause 15 or clause 16?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is necessary, as that would be the judicial interpretation given to the word "costs". The definition of costs in clause 15 is specific. It relates to the costs of public utility plans. There is a reference in clause 16 to costs which would be interpreted as the hon. member wants, because the judicial interpretation would be that costs are reasonable costs.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 16—Application for special grant

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Chairman, may I continue my dialogue with the minister relating to the definition of costs. I take seriously what he said about the interpretation of costs under clause 16 and I wish to make this point. If the judicial interpretation of costs will be as the minister suggests, it seems reasonable to make that definition the legislative definition as well. In order that there shall be no doubt in the minds of municipalities and government officials as to what the legislation spells out, I propose that clause 16 be amended by adding in line 4 of the clause the words, "all reasonable". The clause as amended would read:

> Where a proposed construction or reconstruction of a grade separation of a railway crossing is desired in a province and all reasonable costs thereof, excluding the costs of relocating any public utility plant, appear likely to exceed one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars . . .

And so on. This amendment ought to be acceptable to the minister as it does not affect what he suggests is the intention of the government and of the CTC. It would clarify the intention for any people reading the act. It would clarify it for any local official and make it abundantly clear to every interested party that this is the intention of the government.

If it is not the intention of the government, that is something else. If the minister does not intend "costs" to mean "all reasonable costs", I can see why the government would resist my amendment. But if the government means exactly what the minister has said it means, and the amendment is not accepted, then I am forced to wonder why. I hope the minister will accept the amendment, as he has accepted other amendments which have improved the bill and made it easier to interpret. Therefore, I move my amendment, hoping he will find it acceptable.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I would be quite happy to amend the clause or have it amended, with the addition of the words "all reasonable" costs. I accept the hon. member's suggestion. I do not know whether I should move the amendment or have the hon. member move the amendment and I second it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It will be easier for the Chair if we proceed normally and consider a written amendment, to make sure there is no mistake. In the meantime we can proceed with the discussion on clause 16 while an hon. member or the minister sends a copy of the proposed amendment to the Chair.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I shall become involved in this debate for a few moments only. May I ask the minister why, in a bill that has to do with relocation, there is a special clause having to do only with grade separation? It provides that the municipality has to go through the province to apply for grade separation. It changes the ground rules for the grade crossing fund, which state that funds may come from some source other than the grade crossing fund. It seems incongruous that this particular clause should be in this legislation. I wonder why it is, and not in the other legislation that now administers the grade crossing fund. Why is it necessary to have a province involved when a municipality can now go directly to the CTC under the provisions of the grade crossing fund? Why are we talking about amounts of money here?

As a municipal politician, I have been involved in a number of grade crossing funds and separations. I recall one that was over as many as seven tracks. The cost did not go as high as half a million dollars. All of a sudden, we are now talking in terms of $1¼ million. I am trying to conceive of what type of grade separation could cost that amount of money. I have raised a number of questions; I will wait for some of the answers and then follow them up.

Mr. Basford: As the former mayor of Belleville, the hon. member would have been involved in several grade crossing matters. I refer him to Part III of the bill, with which he will be familiar. It is a re-enactment, with increased financial limits, of the historic grade crossing fund. The procedures under Part III are exactly the same as they always have been, namely that the municipality can go to CTC and get a grant from the grade crossing fund for its grade crossing and grade separation proposals.

Part II is a totally new procedure. It is designed to deal with grade separation and highway relocation proposals that cannot be dealt with even under the increased amounts in the grade crossing fund. It is a design to cover what I can call special expenses and especially large grade crossings and grade separations or highway relocations. I think the procedures set out here should be different from the grade crossing fund procedures in Part III, simply because they are so big and designed to be so major that it is essential that we avoid any conflict between a municipality and its province with regard to these major undertakings and major highway relocations. That is the reason for the difference. I underline and emphasize to the hon. member that the procedures he is familiar with under the old grade crossing fund are duplicated or repeated in Part III of this legislation with increased limits.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I have one brief supplementary. Do I understand from the minister that this is the reason for requiring that the municipality go through the province, that it cannot apply in its own right?

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacKay: On clause 16, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would be disposed to accept a very simple amendment to coincide with the one proposed earlier to clause 5(2) by the hon. member for Scarborough West. If so, would he consider substituting the word "shall" for the word "may" on line 26 of page 12 in respect to holding a public hearing?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. We should try to proceed in an orderly way. Maybe we should dispose of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Scarborough East before we get involved in any other suggested amendment. I hope the hon. member for Scarborough East will allow me to make a slight correction to his amendment. His amendment still has the word "the" which does not make any sense. The amendment suggested by the Chair would read as follows:

That clause 16(1) be amended by deleting the word "the" after the word "and" and substituting therefor the words "all reasonable".

Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Amendment (Mr. Stackhouse) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 16 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I want to be fair to the hon. member for Central Nova, who is suggesting another amendment. I want to give him the chance to present the amendment.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the committee it would be constructive to amend clause 16(e) at line 26 of page 12 to provide for a public hearing. Rather than "may", I suggest it should read the commission "shall", as was the case in respect of clause 5(2) to which the hon. member for Scarborough West made a similar amendment. I would like to propose this amendment at this time. It is a very simple amendment; it involves substituting the work "shall" for the word "may" on line 26.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to discuss this because I want to move along as quickly as possible. I would like to accept the amendment if I could, but the situation this afternoon was not entirely the same. I agreed to an amendment which made holding a hearing by the CTC mandatory, but under Part I of the act. The scheme here is a little different in that when the commission is conducting an inquiry, there could be a hearing held by the commission itself or by the applicant. Under Part II, the applicant will invariably be a municipality. The commission can do two things; it can either order that it itself hold a public hearing, or that the municipality or applicant hold a public hearing. The amendment would provide that there be a public hearing, possibly by the applicant and by the commission. I think this gets somewhat complicated. I implore the hon. member not to complicate it in this way.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the minister to clause 16(1), which says from line 1 on:

... appear likely to exceed one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, an application may be made to the Commission by the province or by any municipality on its behalf ...

The English version says:

... the province or by any municipality on behalf of the province ...

I should like to ask the minister whether that means, as was the case with clause 3, that the municipality can apply to the commission for a grade separation otherwise than with the agreement of the province, on behalf of the province, or does it merely mean that the municipality is acting on its own behalf?

Mr. Chairman, the explanation of the minister becomes extremely important because it will create a logical tie between clause 3 in Part I and clause 16 in Part II.

● (2200)

[English]

Mr. Basford: Again I say to the hon. member that Part II is somewhat different from Part I. This afternoon I accepted on behalf of the government the submission the hon. member made; but here in Part II we are dealing with matters which intimately involve the province. For example, clause 17 concerns highway relocation schemes. It is the province which organizes and conducts such schemes. I think it would be quite improper to pass legislation saying that a municipality could go before a federal board with a provincial highway relocation plan.

Again I implore the hon. member, it being five minutes after ten, not to complicate the matter in this way. I acceded to his request this afternoon, which I thought was well put, and I urge him to accede to mine this evening. I say that here, in clauses 16 and 17, we are dealing with matters which intimately involve the province.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: I should like to tell the minister that I accede to his request and agree with his explanation.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I have been asked whether I should not put the amendment. There has been discussion of an amendment but a copy was never brought to the Chair. Although it is a very simple amendment, I think we ought to proceed in an orderly way, and that the amendment should be in writing. As far as the Chair is concerned, there is no amendment before the Committee at the moment.

Mr. MacKay: I have given some consideration to what the minister has just said and discussed the matter with my hon. friend, a former mayor of Belleville. In the circumstances, I believe that what the minister has said is correct, and I should like to withdraw the amendment in any case.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and myself I should like to express to hon. members of the House, as a matter of privilege, our very great thanks and gratitude for the special arrangements which have been made for the passage of this bill. We have heard from many speakers during the committee stage and there have been many members of all parties who have resisted the temptation to speak. I know, as does the Minister of Transport, that there are members of all parties who have a very deep interest in railway relocation in their cities and who, in order to get this bill through to the advantage of their cities, have remained silent. To those who spoke and to those who did not, I offer my very great thanks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): That will be considered a question of consideration rather than a question of privilege.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—SHORTAGE OF MEDICAL MANPOWER—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I want to follow up a question I asked the minister regarding the inequity in medical services across Canada and the methods of overcoming this problem. The minister was kind enough to state that he would talk to his counterparts in the provinces, as they were reviewing the matter, and would let me know what can be done. Surely this is the eleventh hour in respect of this matter and the answer should have been given long ago.

There are many areas across Canada without doctors. There are areas where nurses alone do the medical work hundreds of miles from any doctor. How can the academics come up with an intelligent answer when only the provincial registrars know the number of doctors under registration?

The establishment does not even know how many doctors are in active practice, part-time practice, occasional locum-tenens, administrative positions, research and teaching, part-time teaching and practice, how many specialists are doing only referral work, private practice and referred work. How, then, can we know if we have too few doctors or too many doctors when we have no national figures compiled by the Canadian government or the Canadian Medical Association? In addition there are no official figures on the increasing number of older people in Canada, which means an increase in the workload on the doctors. Who has the figures in this regard?

The federal government brought in medicare to establish equality of medical care to the rich and the poor across this land. Just as in so many good intentioned schemes on the part of the government, the poor have suffered the most. The government has done nothing to cure uneven geographical distribution of medical care.

Medical schools have not dealt adequately with inequality of medical care and its uneven geographical distribution, or the over-production of specialists at the expense of training general practitioners.

Medical schools could have made dedication instead of academic qualification the number one requirement. Academic qualification means very little in respect of the kind of doctor who will be turned out in the field. In any event it would seem that a higher priority is given to academic answers than to judgment and dedication in the work field.

The powers that be state that without the immigrant doctors we would be worse off than we are now because many of these doctors serve in outlying areas. We certainly would be in an unthinkable position without all the foreign doctors who come to our shores to practice. However, more Canadian boys and girls should be admitted to our medical schools. We should not be stealing students from India and other countries which are much worse off than Canada. We should not be rejecting our own boys and girls. What kind of foreign aid is this? The Canadian students could be admitted and their fees paid, if necessary, if they are willing to serve in those areas which require medical practitioners. The minister says that we have over-production. He said that we have one doctor for every 633 people. How does he know this?

We are told that in the province of Ontario 25 per cent of all registered doctors do not practice medicine. I challenge the minister to give us accurate figures on how many doctors nationally are engaged in full general practice, part-time practice, administrative positions, government employment and so on. Yes, we have those academics who believe they can solve the problem by removing local hospital boards and administrators and putting in regional directors, by establishing clinics of about five persons and by establishing a quota system and a 24-hour service. What a day the bureaucrats would have and how expenses would skyrocket with doctors on salary administered by the bureaucrats! The bureaucrats apparently do not realize that in the area where I live and practice one can now see a doctor 24 hours a day just by going to the emergency department of the local hospital where a specialist is in attendance when necessary.

How will the situation change? Only by having more doctors. Let us return to the statement that there is an ample supply of doctors in cities. If this were the case then medical services would be competitive and the people would have a free choice in respect of doctors. After all, the taxpayers are paying for these services and have that right of choice. If you do not consider your doctor to be satisfactory then you should have the opportunity to change to another. I always hope this will be the situation. After all, the taxpayer is a little closer to the doctor. He is not out of touch, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and the provincial ministers appear to be.

In an effort to increase the number of graduates the federal government should pay the university so much per graduate and increase the amount paid in respect of every medical student who practices in an outlying district. This would increase the output per university. The university could give the doctor a temporary certificate which would become permanent after five years of general practice. After all, courses at medical schools are expensive. The expense per year in respect of Ontario universities is about $6,000 per student. Five years in general practice would equip a doctor very well, and if he cared to go on he would become a much better specialist. Alternatively, loans could be considered for a needy student which would be forgiven in five years if he qualified. Or a straight tax incentive could be given.

If the government is as concerned as it appears to be, the problem of supplying Canadian graduates to understaffed medical areas could easily be accomplished by these methods, instead of by pushing the immigrant doctor into these areas. After all, it is not quite fair to take from the underdeveloped countries the cream of their crop because such people are badly needed in these areas. India has one doctor for every 6,000 people. I wonder what the situation would be had we not sponged all these immigrant doctors, one half of whom have come here in the last ten years. The influx of doctors from outside Canada between 1950 to 1960 was one-third of our registered doctors per year, and from 1960 to 1970 it was one-half of our registered doctors. Just a little over one-third were registered to practice in the province of Ontario. Those doctors on the whole practised good medicine. Most were from Great Britain, the USA, Europe and India, and they made a great contribution not only in the teaching field but also in the actual field of practice.

Next to immigrant doctors from Great Britain was the American physician. We will always remember names like Penfield from the United States, Austin from Guys Hospital, Miller from Edinburgh and Melvin from Aberdeen—all great teachers. What would medicine in Canada have been without them?

Let us stop this arbitrary nonsense now. We have grown up. The Canadian people have a right to know facts, not platitudes or guesses. They are paying the cost, something that sometimes the academic establishment forgets. People expect to be able to see a doctor when they are sick. They have that right.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the question of the supply of physicians is one presently under active consideration. It was discussed at the recent meeting of federal and provincial ministers of health in February, at which time a consensus was reached on the necessity of achieving certain objectives: first, a better balance between the requirements for physicians of all kinds, taking into account the role of allied health workers and the two sources of supply, Canadian medical schools and immigration; second, to give a higher priority to Canadian students aspiring to a medical career and to Canadian graduates wishing to practice in Canada; third, to promote a better distribution of physicians' services, particularly to serve rural areas as well as to relate specialty training to community needs. In the minister's view, well co-ordinated measures must be taken to achieve these objectives, considering the particular circumstances in each province.

Some of the options to be considered include physician quota systems by regions, restrictions on immigration, and appropriate medical school enrollment. Physician quota systems are being considered by certain provinces in conjunction with other measures to regulate the supply of health manpower.

The hon. member is also undoubtedly aware that new regulations have recently been drafted which have the effect of limiting applications in occupations which have no general demand for them in Canada unless they are destined for pre-arranged employment, or there is a demand for this occupation in a certain location in Canada and the applicant agrees to proceed to that location.

The federal government will be meeting with the provinces to determine better their manpower needs in the medical profession. We believe that, for the present at least, these measures can do much to assure a proper flow of doctor immigration and protect opportunities for our own qualified Canadians entering this profession.

Subsequent to the hon. member's question of March 27 the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) received the report on the planned intake of Canadian medical schools that he mentioned in his answer of that date. Between 1966 and 1972 the number of physicians graduating from Canadian medical schools rose from 881 to 1,292. This increase in output is expected to continue until 1976, and then level off at nearly twice the output of 1966; that is, at over 1,700 medical graduates per year.

Further, we are creating a reserve capacity to produce many more physicians if necessary. It is estimated that by 1982 the output of Canadian medical schools could be increased by another 23 per cent, to cover 2,100 physicians per year.

Having said all this, may I conclude simply by stating that the government shares the hon. member's concern that all Canadians have access to equitably distributed and high quality health services at reasonable cost. For this reason it is actively involved with the provinces in the review of physician supply.

GRAIN—REQUEST THAT FEED GRAINS BE MARKETED BY WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, on August 1 of this year feed grains in this country will be going on to the open market. This is a policy put forth by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) who is in charge of the Wheat Board, despite the fact that the farmers on the prairies are very much opposed to it.

The wheat pools, the Farmers Union, the farmers involved in the co-operative movement, and most farm organizations across the prairies are opposed to putting feed grains on to the open market. In the last few months I have received many letters on this topic, many petitions signed by farmers in my area, as well as having many conversations with individual farmers, not just from my area but from right across Saskatchewan.

On April 2 of this year I moved a motion in this House that had been suggested by many of the farm organizations, namely:

> That this House support the principle of orderly marketing and instruct the government to maintain the Canadian Wheat Board as the sole marketing agency for feed grains.

Unfortunately that motion did not carry. Later in the agriculture committee members of my party put forward another amendment, namely that the committee go on record as advocating that the Canadian Wheat Board be the sole marketing agency for feed grains in this country. Every single Conservative member of the committee voted against the motion and that is why I am pursuing this matter tonight.

● (2220)

A few days after April 2, I put a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). To the Minister of Justice I put the question that, in view of the fact that prairie farmers were so upset with his proposal would he withdraw it and maintain the Wheat Board as the sole marketing agency for feed grains? He would not give that commitment despite protests from the prairies. When I asked the Prime Minister, he refused to intervene on behalf of farm organizations and prairie farmers.

I have a letter from the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) which puts the Conservative Party on record as encouraging the minister to put feed grains on the open market.

I think this matter is of vital importance to the farmers of this country who fought for years for the formation of the Wheat Board so that it could act as an orderly marketing agency for them. It took a war, a depression, hard times and many, many farm bankruptcies to get the Wheat Board established. Now we are seeing feed grains taken away from it. Farmers are afraid that this might be the first step toward dismantling it and be the end of orderly marketing in this country.

That is something that this party will not tolerate and that farmers' unions, wheat pools, co-operative organizations and almost all farmers on the prairies will not tolerate. They remember the open market, the grain exchange, the grain buyers in Winnipeg and the fluctuations in price. They would sell grain at a particular price, and when they got it to market the price had changed. They do not want that again. They do not want to work to a gamble by dice in the casino. It is immoral that such a thing should happen and this party will not tolerate it.

People who play the commodities market speculated in flax and rapeseed last year. I read of one person who said that by investing $1,000 in flax and buying on margin, a million dollars could have been made in the last year and a half. This is the sort of thing that will happen if feed grains are placed on the open market. The farmers do not want to see that happen after all their work.

I think, Mr. Speaker, it should be the policy of this country to market all grains through the Canadian Wheat Board. Why should farmers have to speculate? They are already speculating with the weather. We should have orderly marketing in this country, which in the long run would help the consumer because of stability of production and prices.

My time is up, Mr. Speaker, so I will anxiously await the Minister of Justice's announcement that he is going to withdraw his proposal and keep the Canadian Wheat Board as the sole marketing agency for feed grains. I know that is what he is going to say so I shall take my seat.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I regret to see the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) fall into a pattern that was fairly common to certain members of his party in days gone by, those who associated themselves with the leadership of such groups as the National Farmers' Union in the Saskatchewan area and who discredited that movement. The technique is the one adopted by the Stalinists and the followers of Hitler, that of putting up a straw man and then saying that is a horrible thing and everybody should be against it.

The hon. member says we should have feed grains in the open market notwithstanding the fact that we have pointed out time and time again that there is no question whatever that the bulk of feed grains, as presently being marketed, will be changed in any way. The bulk of feed grains will be sold through commercial channels under Wheat Board control. They will continue under Wheat Board control. The Wheat Board will exercise the full and complete control which is evident now.

He also says he is in favour of orderly marketing. I tell him I am as much in favour of orderly marketing as he is; but I will do more about it—I will see it happen. Any proposal in relation to feed grains that we have made includes maintaining full control of the Wheat Board over the movement of the grain. The board must also know where the grain is going, from where it has come, and, therefore, what can be done with respect to marketing. We shall make sure that the board retains full knowledge.

The hon. member asks farmers whether they are in favour of orderly marketing. I say that I am as well. He says that the Wheat Board should be retained as the sole marketing agency for Canadian grains. I say to him that it is not now the sole marketing agency, never was, and never can be, as neighbour will sell to neighbour and grain will move about on the prairie regions.

That is the source of his problem. He and the NFU socialists who lead that organization—I refer only to the leaders and not to the rank and file—agree that equity in pricing is desirable in our current handling of feed grains. They then put forward proposals which will not create equity in pricing. We are looking at certain proposals and have looked at modifications of them in the year of discussions which is just coming to an end. We are at the point of decision. We are looking at proposals which will maintain in full the control of the Canadian Wheat Board over the export market, the quality of grains, and over bulk movements in the market. The board will retain the control it presently exercises. The only thing in question is the domestic market and how to obtain equity in pricing within the prairie region for farmers who buy grain there to feed animals and for farmers in other parts of the country who also buy their grain there.

The hon. member says he knows how farmers stand on this issue. Quite recently he raised another issue. He was sure he knew where the farmers stood on it. I am referring to the rapeseed plebiscite. He thought it was a simple, straightforward issue. It turned out that the farmers were seriously divided, but, on balance, were in favour of maintaining what he called the open market system for that particular product.

I do not doubt that one or two years from now the hon. member will admit that all his fears and doubts meant nothing, as usual, and will have to agree that we produced the policy which is best for the prairie farmer and for Canadian agriculture as a whole.

AIR CANADA—ALLEGED LAY-OFFS OF EMPLOYEES IN VIOLATION OF COLLECTIVE AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my remarks tonight will be brief and to the point. They centre on Air Canada's recent violation of their collective agreement with the unions. I am referring to the lay-off early last week of some 4,800 employees by Air Canada as a result of the airport firefighters' rotating strikes. While this strike is now over and most Air Canada employees are back on the job, the lay-off was in violation of a collective agreement and is indicative of the disastrous manner in which this government deals with strikes in the public sector.

On April 23 in this House I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) the following question concerning the lay-offs:

> As Air Canada has laid off some 4,800 employees and these lay-offs have been labelled as a complete violation of the collective agreement, what action will the government take to rectify the violations of the agreement by Air Canada management?

The parliamentary secretary to the minister answered, in part, that:

> —the unions involved can follow the grievance procedure provided for in the collective agreements. However, Air Canada does not feel it is in violation of any provisions of the collective agreements.

This is the type of answer one would have expected from a government whose transportation policy is, to quote the minister, "a mess". What the government is saying is that if the unions do not like the lay-offs they can file a grievance. What sort of an answer is this for the 4,800 who were laid off without pay? This attitude almost precipitated another strike in Canada, this time by air line pilots. The pilots felt, as do I, that Air Canada's lay-offs were a contravention of a collective agreement.

As many of us know, Air Canada employees, especially those at Dorval, have much to grieve about. With regard to these layoffs, Air Canada's management clearly ignored the longstanding principles and precedents relating to seniority, resulting in a violation of the contract; that is, in staff reduction of the lead mechanics, without normal options. For example, article 12 on page 53 of the agreement states clearly as follows: first, that the principle of seniority shall be based upon the principle of preference consideration for employees with long service and, second, that seniority privileges, as governed by the provision of this article, shall be a factor in reduction of forces. As well, page 65K of the agreement states that staff reductions will be made strictly on the basis of seniority.

This brief examination of parts of the agreement shows the longstanding principles related to seniority of Air Canada employees. The basic union agreement has over the years guaranteed the protection of seniority rights, and any new interpretations deriving from letters of understanding, and so on, clearly should not override basic principles. Something is wrong when men with over 30 years' experience are laid off. Such layoffs create morale problems. Surely poor morale is a sufficient enough problem within Air Canada. This loss of rights only serves to further lower morale and standards.

Furthermore, the addendum letter of understanding, page 93 of the agreement, was a result of union concern over discriminatory practices; for example, the company retaining managers and clerical staffs on duty while reducing union staff. I am not saying that there should never be layoffs. Obviously they are an economic necessity in certain strike situations, but they should be conducted according to agreements and longstanding practices. One has to wonder why only union employees were laid off and not foremen and supervisors. Is there a two class system of layoffs? If so, what protection does this give the little guy?

That which I have discussed to this point is, as I mentioned, merely a small example of the manner in which Air Canada and the entire government handle labour relations. Witness the recent rash of strikes by public employees. First the airport firefighters, then the river pilots and postal workers. While the pilots did not walk off the job, the air traffic controllers plan to very shortly.

What does all this say? Well, to me and most other Canadians it says that a definite communications barrier exists between the federal government, the Treasury Board and their employees. This is especially pronounced in the Department of Transport. The government does little to deal with labour problems until it is confronted with a crisis situation—for example, strike. Then the government acts.

In light of this recent plethora of strikes and the accompanying government inertia, the idea of a public interest disputes commission is indeed a sound one. No wonder, it is a Conservative idea. The present methods of dealing with labour problems in the country seem to have failed dismally, for we are guaranteed at least one postal, air or rail strike annually. Such a commission could deal with labour disputes not only in the government sector but in all areas of public services. The feasibility of establishing such a body should be given serious consideration by the government so as to minimize these labour disputes that tend to disrupt the country.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, may I say in the first place that the government does not negotiate agreements between Air Canada and its employees, and never has done so. The Canadian Airline Pilots Association and the Canadian Airline Flight Attendants both have collective agreements with Air Canada. As a consequence of a walk-out by firefighters, Air Canada was faced with the situation of having a great many employees with no meaningful work to perform. Under these circumstances, certain employees were placed on off-duty status.

A similar situation occurred in 1971 when the air traffic controllers went on strike. Air Canada has recognized the hardships created for its employees by third party strikes and has established a policy which has the full support of the Canadian Airline Employees Association and the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers.

Briefly, the policy is that, in the event of a third party strike affecting Air Canada's operations, where meaningful work is available the company would try to keep employees on the payroll. Where employees had to be placed on off-duty status, the company would, on application by an employee, grant a week's compensation which could be repaid by cash, payroll deductions over three months, subsequent overtime, or, in some cases, vacation credits. This policy would be reassessed at the end of each succeeding week of a third party strike. Neither CALPA nor CALFA find this arrangement satisfactory, as they feel the company should continue to pay salaries in such a situation.

Provision is made within the respective collective agreements for third party arbitration of differences. This is an inherent part of the collective bargaining process. Air Canada, on legal advice, is convinced that it has not violated any of the provisions of the collective agreements. If the employees in question are convinced that Air Canada is incorrect, their agreements provide a means of recourse to them, one which is not only legal but is their right.

I am sure all members of the House will agree that where collective agreements are in force between Crown corporations and their employees, and when well-established means of settling differences are available, it would not be proper for the government to intervene on behalf of either party.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.39 p.m.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE OF $500 IN ANNUAL COMPENSATION OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement to the House on the subject of the wages and salaries of employees of the government of Canada. As I said in this House the other day, the government has been giving this matter serious consideration. I am sure you are aware that an increasing number of employers across this country, as well as in most other industrialized countries, have been taking special action to adjust their employees' wages and salaries to meet the effects of unusual rises in costs. Since the first of this year, major employers outside the federal Public Service have, as a result, begun to adjust wage ranges, provide their employees with lump-sum payments, re-open wage agreements or adopt other measures to increase employee compensation.

The government of Canada has always had a policy of paying its employees at levels which compare fairly with those of other employers. We closely monitor pay movements outside the Public Service to maintain our position in this regard. In arriving at pay settlements with various groups of Public Service employees during the course of 1972, 1973 and the early part of 1974, both parties at the bargaining table relied on wages and salary data as to future increases outside the federal Public Service.

Mr. Paproski: You will not get their votes, so don't worry.

Mr. Drury: Of course, the outside settlements relative to the future increase were reached at a time when it was not possible to fully foresee the degree of escalation in costs brought about by international conditions.

It is apparent, however, that in recognition of the upward movement in prices, wages and salary increases in the country generally have been adjusted more rapidly than anticipated in order to protect the real purchasing power of employees. The government has concluded that it is inappropriate to deal with this development only through the process of collective bargaining as agreements come up for renewal. Instead, special action is required in order to ensure that the pay levels of public servants will maintain their relative positions with those of persons performing similar work outside the Public Service.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that the government has authorized an increase in pay ranges of $500 which will have the effect of increasing the annual rate of compensation by this amount as of April 1, 1974, for all its employees, including members of the RCMP and the Armed Forces—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Watch out! The old pork barrel is rolling.

Mr. Drury: —and excepting those in groups where notice to bargain has been given but no settlement has yet been reached and those in groups in respect of which an arbitral award was rendered or a settlement reached after April 1, 1974, the effective date of this general increase.

This adjustment will be added to employees' pay ranges and will become part of their regular compensation rather than take the form of a lump-sum payment. It should also be noted that this type of adjustment provides the greatest percentage increase to lower paid employees.

We took this pay action because it is our policy to maintain comparability and also in response to representations from the Public Service Alliance and requests from other Public Service unions.

There are exceptions to this general pay adjustment, Mr. Speaker, as I have said. Recent Public Service pay settlements and offers have recognized the unusual wages and salary escalation in the private sector, and I am confident that the settlements for those groups where an agreement has not yet been concluded will be reflective of current wages and salary patterns in Canada.

The government believes that this measure reinforces its policy of paying compensation comparable to that paid for comparable work elsewhere and will reflect positively in the achievement of good staff relations in the Public Service of Canada.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset that the announcement which has been made today is an insult to lower paid civil servants. In terms of their needs, I am being charitable if I describe this action as inadequate. I received the minister's statement just a few minutes before coming into the House, but from a preliminary examination it is obvious that the fact that this increase is going to apply to deputy ministers now receiving a salary of $60,000 a year is an insult to the Canadian people.

● (1410)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: At the very best, in terms of the problems that are facing Canadians, particularly those in the Public Service, the RCMP and the Canadian Armed Forces, I can best describe this action as tokenism and an election promise that is crass, if anything.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: Somebody behind me says that the six-buck boys are riding again. I guess that is so. The very fact the government has had to at least begin in a very minuscule way the process of indexing salaries—this is what they are beginning to do—is an indication how deep the cancer of inflation has become in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: The government of Canada has recognized that one of the cornerstones of our enterprise system, namely, the right of collective bargaining, has become inadequate to meet inflation which they like to blame on international conditions but which rests firmly on their doorstep.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: It is interesting to note that in recent history it is a fact that public servants in Canada have become discouraged with the slowness and unresponsiveness of the bargaining process. As a result, they have lost faith in the Treasury Board and in this minister. If any evidence was brought before this House in the last few days of the inability of this government to recognize inflation, or to it, it was the blush on the face of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) yesterday. I am certain he must be blushing for many of his constituents today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is always true that we have to be grateful for small mercies. I suppose the public servants who work for the government and the people of Canada will take that view. However, the announcement that they are going to receive an increase of $9.61 a week in light of today's rising cost of living will not exactly cause them to jump for joy.

I am glad to note that the government has been given a bit of a green light by my friend, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). At least he is not proposing that the salaries of public servants be frozen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The President of the Treasury Board told us in his statement that this action is being taken in response to representations from the Public Service Alliance and requests from other Public Service unions. I hope that, in addition to any response which is being made to such requests, discussions have taken place with those organizations concerning the details of the announcement that has been made today.

There is always a difficulty about cost of living adjustments inasmuch as they have an effect on future collective bargaining negotiations. I hope it will be crystal clear that this increase of $9.61 a week does not detract from the urgency of carrying out collective bargaining so as to put those who work for the government and the people of Canada in the best possible position. Although I have referred to this $9.61 a week as being grossly inadequate for those in the lower and middle brackets, I must echo the statement made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that it is hardly necessary to give this increase to those whose salaries are $40,000, $50,000 or $60,000 a year. I noted the pride with which the President of the Treasury Board said that on a percentage basis this method of distribution favours those in the lower brackets, but these other points must also be taken into consideration.

I note also that there are certain exceptions. This announcement has been sprung on us and we are not quite sure whether those exceptions are justified; we shall have to look into that aspect as time goes on.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am wondering about those who work for this institution, the House of Commons. I see I am getting an answer already—the President of the Treasury Board is shaking his head horizontally. Therefore the increase applies only to those who bargain with the minister as President of the Treasury Board. I remind the House that the President of the Treasury Board is also a member of the Internal Economy Commission of which Your Honour is the chairman. It seems to me that if this policy is being adopted in respect of those who work for the government and people of Canada in other buildings it should also be applied to those who work for this institution, namely, the Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The only other comment I wish to make is that if the government is recognizing that the pace of inflation is now so serious that the normal increases which come about as a result of collective bargaining come too slowly, the government should also realize that the same is terribly true in the case of the pensioners and veterans. The escalations that are taking place involving a couple of dollars every three months for old age pensioners and once a year for veterans are not sufficient to enable them to keep up with the cost of living and if the President of the Treasury Board feels that the policy has to be reviewed I submit that the whole policy should be reviewed right across the board.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, as the minister indicated, it is the present situation which quite clearly prompted the minister to make this statement.

It is essential that public service employees be properly remunerated so as to carry out their duties efficiently and satisfactorily.

I think that the hon. member who blamed the minister a while ago for not having escalated these salaries right from the start in line with the cost of living increase, had not taken into account the fact that a number of public servants in the over $50,000 salary bracket would indeed have been entitled to an exaggerated increase.

On the other hand, we must realize that the government is following instead of leading the way, as evidenced by the following statement by the minister:

> Of course, the outside settlements relative to the future increases were reached at a time when it was not possible to fully foresee the degree of escalation in costs brought about by international conditions.

The government continues to claim that our present situation is attributable to international factors and that it must blindly keep up with the salary trend outside the public service; it is because of this, Mr. Speaker, that we can say and emphasize in this House that the government is following instead of leading the way. I would like to take this opportunity to point out that we should pause and try to identify in the first place the malaise and it is easy enough, since it is generally detected. However, we have to try to deal adequately with those basic problems giving rise to those various increases worsening inflation which could suddenly engulf us in complete bankruptcy. We have the opportunity to become aware of the problem and once for all to see the economic problems such as they are, to find popular economic solutions and not to trust exclusively experts, the so-called experts who are counselling the government in economic matters and are thus destroying in an extremely rich country such as ours, the financial and economic opportunities given each citizen to live decently with even a minimum comfort, taking into consideration the fact that Providence has bestowed upon us more than the necessary wealth, so that we are in a position to help other countries.

HEALTH

TABLING OF DOCUMENT "A NEW PERSPECTIVE OF THE HEALTH OF CANADIANS"—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a working document entitled "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians".

Mr. Speaker, in bringing this working document on health to the attention of the House, I would like to say a few words on why the document was prepared and on its significance.

Canadians traditionally rely upon the personal health care provided by hospitals, doctors, nurses, and other health professionals to protect them from diseases and death. While the importance of such personal health care is beyond question, Canadians should be aware of how they themselves could help safeguard and improve their own health by determining how their own chosen lifestyle and their environment affect both physical and mental well-being.

The need for a new perspective on health is evident from an examination of health data. Statistics show that the five most important causes of death before age 70, measured by potential years of life lost, are automobile accidents, coronary heart disease, other accidents, respiratory diseases—including lung cancer—and suicides.

Sickness treated in general hospitals shows a similar pattern. Measured by the days of hospitalization, the main causes of illness are coronary heart disease, all accidents, and respiratory diseases.

There is little doubt that improvements in the knowledge of the level of risks imposed by the lifestyle of individuals, of human biology and of environmental factors are important elements in helping to alter this pattern of disease and death.

The approach suggested in the working paper is to identify "high risk" segments of the Canadian population and to devise programs aimed at reducing these risks. By identifying the underlying causes and taking corrective action the health of hundreds of thousands of individuals can be safeguarded before disease is sufficiently far advanced as to require expensive medical care.

It is proposed, therefore, to divide the broad field of health into four basic elements. This division, which I outlined in a speech to the Pan-American Health Organization in September 1973 is referred to as the Health Field Concept. The first of the four elements of the concept is human biology. The second is the environment, next is lifestyle and, finally, health care organization. We also suggest a regulatory strategy consisting of eight proposals aimed at using federal regulatory powers to reduce health hazards and at encouraging and assisting provinces to use their regulatory powers to achieve this end. For the research strategy there are fifteen proposals designed to help discover and apply the knowledge needed to solve health problems. It is my hope that the possible courses of action suggested for the research strategy will enable the federal and provincial governments to jointly review research funding with a view to increasing their respective contributions.

Health

The health care efficiency strategy includes twenty-one proposals to assist the provinces in re-organizing their health care delivery systems so that cost, accessibility and quality are balanced in the best interests of all Canadians. Finally, the goal-setting strategy is made up of seven proposals to set, in cooperation with others, specific goals to be attained in improving the health of Canadians and in increasing the efficiency of health care systems.

Authority for the pursuit of these objectives is widely dispersed among governments, professions and organizations. Limitations on the availability of additional funds and differences of opinion as to priorities will, naturally, require careful consideration, consultation and planning.

The basic approach of the working document was outlined to the provincial ministers of health in February of this year. The provinces unanimously endorsed it and felt that it offered great opportunities for raising the health of Canadians.

The working document will be the subject of careful review and analysis with provincial governments in the months to come in a way analogous to the study of the Working Paper on Social Security in Canada. I have asked that the working document be included on the agenda of the federal-provincial meeting of deputy ministers in June and I am planning to discuss it with my provincial colleagues at our next meeting.

It is hoped that the working paper which has been in preparation for several months will help to develop a high level of general public awareness of its objectives and will generate informed discussion among all Canadians—individuals, groups, professions as well as governments.

This working document, therefore, is not limited in its scope only to matters where federal initiatives are needed. We hope it will not only appeal to all hon. members but to the general public as well. Most important, we offer it as a rallying point for all sectors of Canadian society who have a role to play in improving the physical and mental well-being of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for sending me the statement and the document. I have not had a chance to study the document fully but I think I get the general purport of it. No one is likely to be a champion of poor health; therefore the working paper is solidly in the motherhood realm. It states in part:

1. It is better to be slim than fat.

2. The excessive use of medication is to be avoided.

3. It is better not to smoke cigarettes.

4. Exercise and fitness are better than sedentary living and lack of fitness.

5. Alcohol is a danger to health, particularly when driving a car.

6. Mood-modifying drugs are a danger to health unless controlled by a physician.

7. Tranquility is better than excess stress.

8. The less polluted the air is, the healthier it is.

9. The less polluted the water is, the healthier it is.

I thought we had agreed on those points some time ago. Instead of this document, interesting and acceptable though it be, perhaps it might have been wiser for the minister to aid the health of Canada by restoring the Medical Research Council of Canada to its proper function—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: —a thing about which the whole country is well aware because the standing committee has been dealing with this very serious subject for a long time. If, however, this paper and this presentation helps in any way to focus the attention of Canadians on the need and the possibility of improving their health, certainly I am all for it just as Calvin Coolidge said the minister was against sin. We need to be awakened to the urgency of the physical fitness or rather the physical unfitness of our population. We Canadians are one of the world's nations most affected by spectatoritis, with thousands of people sitting in the stands or by their television sets watching a few professionals performing for the entertainment of the masses. The masses should be in the arena.

● (1430)

I have grown sick and tired of the weeding out process which begins not at university, not at high school but at the elementary school level where the best survive in athletic contests and what is left for the rank and file of our young people is merely to get into the cheering section and to applaud loudly for the elite. That does nothing for the physical development of our young people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: All the evidence calls out for mass participation programs, and I am happy to announce that I have joined in the program in the Confederation Building. I do not know whether the young people there are involved in the minister's department but they are the finest diplomats in Ottawa because when I took my first test I knew it would be an achievement to get down for the push-ups, and a triumph to get up, but they said I did well.

While this document is welcome I must confess to you, sir, and to the minister that a more important document came to me today, a document on prices and the poor, the report of the National Council on Welfare on the low income consumer in Canada. How in the name of heaven can the people of Canada be healthy if a great proportion of them cannot buy proper food? We have now learned what we have always suspected, namely, that the surrender to inflation on the part of this government causes the worst victimization of the poor of this country.

This document outlines this very matter grimly and very painfully. It states that the cost of the food which the underprivileged and the poor most rely upon is rising fastest, such as hamburgers, weiners and so on. How can we talk about health if we cannot nourish our people because of the economic situation? The most grievous problem facing this nation today is that the economy is not healthy and therefore the people are not healthy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: So I would say that if the minister and his colleagues can neither diagnose nor cure the ills of the economy they should not prevent someone else from doing so. As amateur psychologists, both the minister and I know that there is nothing better for health than a happy state of mind, and I would say that a new government would bring about that state in this country.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with all these statements and announcements being made these days, one wonders what is happening.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is happening with the NDP?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In this instance, for some reason an advance copy of the statement did not reach me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As for the booklet, when the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) referred to it I turned around and picked up a copy from a colleague's desk. The page I opened, page 17, warned me against overeating because it leads to obesity. I assure the minister I will take that warning seriously.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The importance of the subject of the health of the people of Canada cannot be overstated, and on that basis we welcome the study that has been made and is now presented to us. We also welcome the fact that this study is the result of discussions among the governments of Canada, indeed, all 11 of them. We are interested in the minister's analysis of the situation that what counts is to be concerned about human biology, the environment, and our life style. We are also interested in the various suggestions that are contained in the statement and, I presume, in the booklet itself. Like the hon. member for Hillsborough, I would feel happier if at a time like this the minister had not withdrawn funds from the Medical Research Council of Canada. It is actions like this that raise questions about a document such as this.

I am also aware of the fact, after 90 seconds of examining this booklet, that there is a significant difference between it and the working paper on social security in Canada, that orange paper that the minister tabled in 1973. That paper had in it specific proposals, specific dates by which those proposals would be implemented, and references to cost and to where the money would come from. Even with the specifics that are in the orange paper we are having trouble getting action within the time frame in which some of us think such action should be achieved.

But when I look at this statement and this document I find very little that is specific. I find no dates at all by which these various improvements are to be achieved, and I find no reference to the cost except for one ominous sentence in the statement the minister made a few moments ago. He said that "the limitations on the availability of additional funds and differences of opinion as to priorities will naturally require careful consideration, consultation and planning". I suggest that that sentence by the minister is fair warning. We must not leave here today thinking that the ball is rolling for great improvements in the health of Canadians. He has warned us that there is no money, he has warned us that there are differences of opinion among the various governments, and so these things will be a long time coming. All that we have here are some ideas that make very good reading. However, they are in an important field. We shall study them with interest and, in so far as they are in these documents, we will press whatever government is at Your Honour's right for action with regard to the specific proposals contained in this document.

Whenever I am on my feet I manage to bring in a certain subject which I regard as relevant to the one on which I rose to speak. In terms of health one of the tragedies of our time, with all of our affluence, all of our resources and all the money we have, is the number of people past the age of 60 who are finding it so difficult to keep going until the age at which pensions are available. I think that if the Minister of National Health and Welfare would like to do something for the health, physical and mental, of those people who are 60 years of age and over, he could do something very specific and very real by lowering the pension age to 60.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, obviously health is the most precious possession of each individual and as the government is concerned with improving the health of the population, we hope that the minister, through his publication "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians" will reach, at least partly, his objectives.

Mr. Speaker, we understand the need to improve the health of Canadians, since international statistics show that we are not at the top of the list in this regard.

Consequently, we must act without delay and the government must direct, for instance, that harmful medication be taken off the market.

Moreover, there is today the famous drug problem. I see that the abovementioned publication makes reference to it. I wonder whether we should not move further in this area. Drugs are deteriorating the health of part of today's young population. A serious approach to this problem is therefore required to protect future generations from nightmares.

Mr. Speaker, prevention is better than cure; this proverb continues to be true, and I think that all the medical profession will agree that the major cause of ill health is nervousness. God knows that Canadians are getting increasingly nervous. So that people will not have ulcers, heart attacks or even car accidents, they must feel secure. And since the minister is responsible for social security, I wonder if he could not improve the health of Canadians, first, as the member who preceded me said, by ensuring those who are 60 years old a decent income, in granting them a sufficient old age security pension that would free them from the financial worries that lead them to doctors, hospitals and drugs. The same thing should be done at all other levels of government; that is why one of the first measures to improve the health of Canadians would be to provide for a real minimum annual guaranteed income, at least to eliminate all those illnesses and causes of poor health due merely to the fact that people are insecure. We give this advice to the minister in the hope that he will give it the consideration it deserves.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I wish to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the Bank of Canada, from its inception in 1934 up to 1956, has maintained its interest rate at 2 per cent, considering that chartered banks have agreed to a maximum of 6 per cent during 33 years, from 1934 to 1967, considering also that as of today, the interest rate is raised to the usurious level of 13.5 per cent and is one of the major inflation causes—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must stop the hon. member for Rimouski, who shall return to his seat, to remind him that the preamble of the motion proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 does not abide by the rules of the House. I think that he should indicate without delay what is the motion that he is putting to the House, avoiding all those "considering" and this preamble which, in my mind, is perhaps too long.

Mr. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I apologize.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That this House take immediate measures required to direct the Bank of Canada to restore its rate at 2 per cent and the chartered banks to come back to the 6 per cent ceiling.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS PENSIONS

Question No. 30—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. How many retired employees of the Canadian National Railways are in receipt of pensions of less than $25 per month?

2. How many are in receipt of a pension of $25 per month?

3. How many are in receipt of pensions of $25.01 to $29.99 per month (b) $30 to $39.99 per month (c) $40 to $49.99 per month (d) $50 to $59.99 per month (e) $60 to $69.99 per month (f) $70 to $79.99 per month (g) $80 to $89.99 per month (h) $90 to $99.99 per month (i) $100 to $124.99 per month (j) $125.00 to $149.99 per month (k) $150 to $199.99 per month (l) $200 to $299.99 per month (m) $300 per month and over?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. Number of pensioners receiving less than $25 a month, 258.

2. Number of pensioners receiving $25 a month, 130.

3. Number of pensioners in receipt of: (a) $25.01 to $29.99 a month, 579; (b) $30.00 to $39.99 a month, 430; (c) $40.00 to $49.99 a month, 601; (d) $50.00 to $59.99 a month, 1,699; (e) $60.00 to $69.99 a month, 753; (f) $70.00 to $79.99 a month, 606; (g) $80.00 to $89.99 a month, 517; (h) $90.00 to $99.99 a month, 523; (i) $100.00 to $124.99 a month, 1,428; (j) $125.00 to $149.99 a month, 1,615; (k) $150.00 to $199.99 a month, 3,537; (l) $200,00 to $299.99 a month, 6,500; (m) $300.00 and over, 6,736; Total 25,912. In a number of cases the amounts of pensions paid by Canadian National Railways do not represent the total pensions payable to employees for railway service. Pensions payable by the CNR to international employees (service in both Canada and the United States) relate to their service in Canada only. Such employees also receive annuities payable under the U.S. Railroad Retirement Act or the Social Security Act for service performed in the United States. For example, in the group receiving pensions under $25 in 1973 there are 23 former international employees who also receive U.S. Railroad Retirement or Social Security annuities in respect of CN service rendered in the United States. The balance of this group consists of employees who elected early retirement (before age 65) with reduced basic pensions ($25)

and employees who had very short service and small contributions. In addition, there are various pension agreements between CN and other Companies, such as Canadian Pacific Ltd., CP Telecommunications and the Ontario Northland Railway, where each Company issues separate cheques for its portion of the total pension. Only the pension payable by CN is in this statement.

EXTRACTIVE BASED SHIPPING IN CANADIAN ARCTIC ARCHIPELAGO

Question No. 196—Mr. Forrestall:

Is it the intention of the government to reserve to Canadian corporations and vessels the extractive based shipping in the Canadian Arctic Archipelago and, if not, what is the basis for such decision?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): As announced on September 24, it is the intention to implement the recommendations of the Darling report restricting coasting trade activities to Canadian flag vessels. This restriction will include vessels operating in the Arctic Archipelago. It is not, however, the present intention to limit international shipping in the Arctic Archipelago to Canadian corporations and vessels. Following World War II, Canada has pursued a general policy of utilizing the most economical bottoms available for all international shipping and this policy applies in the Arctic, as in all of Canada. This policy is under continual review and may be changed to meet altered economic or national circumstances.

CENTRAL TRAVEL SERVICE

Question No. 211—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What has been the total administrative cost of the Central Travel Service to date?

2. What has been the total amount collected from departments, agencies and branches of the government to date?

3. What has been the estimated saving to date to the government by having this service available in terms of money saved by the taxpayer?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The Central Travel Service is in two parts. The first is a reservation service which is derived from the air carriers and involves no cost to the government and, thus, no charge to departments. The second part involves the auditing and payment of government personnel transportation accounts and the negotiation of rates with hotels and car rental services. The administrative cost of this part of the service for the first eleven months of the 1973/74 fiscal year was $125,287.

2. In the first 11 months of fiscal year 1973/74 which is the first year in which charges have been levied, Central Travel Service billings on departments at the initial rate approved for revenue dependency have totalled $192,679.

3. Direct savings to government departments resulting from the efficient auditing of accounts and reduced hotel rates during the first 11 months in fiscal year 1973/74 are estimated at $326,205. In addition, indirect savings occur as a result of the sharp reduction in the number of individual departmental travel invoice payment transactions which are replaced by a consolidated monthly transaction per carrier.

Order Paper Questions

CONFIDENTIALITY OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ADMINISTRATIVE SYSTEMS INFORMATION

Question No. 217—Mr. Forrestall:

With reference to page 1.58, paragraph 5.2 of Volume 1 of the Official Languages Administrative Systems Manual, what are the security policies for the Department of Supply and Services as directed by the government guidelines for EDP operations?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): The general security policy for DSS in all areas, including EDP operations, is as specified in Chapter 90.11 of the departmental Administration Manual. These comprehensive over-all security regulations will be followed by the Personnel Application Centre and additionally, in the case of the Official Languages Administrative System, access to data will be restricted to authorized recipients only. This will be achieved through recorded control of both input and output distribution so that only approved agencies and individuals will have access to the information. The list of the authorized agencies and individuals is determined by the Treasury Board Secretariat, Official Languages Branch. The security policy will be reviewed to ensure full compliance with the guidelines for EDP Operations.

DEPARTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL—USE OF ADVERTISING AGENCIES

Question No. 306—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What are the names and addresses of all advertising agencies used by the Department of the Solicitor General since the present Minister assumed his portfolio?

2. (a) What are the amounts of all advertising contracts given such agencies during this period of time, what are the dates such contracts were awarded and in each case, were tenders or competitive presentations of any kind requested and, if not, who authorized in each case the expenditure of public funds without such tenders or competitive presentations (b) in each case, what was the general subject matter of the advertising contract?

3. What are the names and addresses of all advertising agencies used by the Department of the Solicitor General during the term of the Minister's immediate predecessor and if any of these agencies has not been used since then, for what reason and on whose decision were changes made?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Ministry Secretariat: 1 and 2. Nil.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police: 1. B.C.P. Advertising, Dominion Square Building, 444-1010 St. Catherine St. W., Montreal, Province of Quebec; Denton Ogilvie Advertising Ltd., 620 Cathcart Street, Montreal, Province of Quebec.

2. (a) B.C.P. Advertising, $67,300; Denton Ogilvie Advertising Ltd. $54,900. The above amounts are the total amount of contracts awarded at various times throughout the year. Contracts were in every case awarded in accordance with the Government Contract Regulations, and referred to higher authority when this requirement was necessary in the proper format (e.g. T.B. Submission). (b) The general subject matter was recruitment for regular members, special constables and civilian members in technical and professional categories.

AIR CANADA PLASTIC HEAD SETS

Question No. 334—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What is the name of the company which supplies Air Canada the plastic head-sets used for in-flight movies and stereos?

2. With reference to the answer to Part 2 of Question No. 2,952 (a) what is the cost of the plastic head-sets (b) if this information is proprietary, could the government advise on what date these head-sets were put out for tender and/or if they are put out to tender (c) could the government advise the names of all the companies who bid on the plastic head sets and the names of all the companies to which the tender was sent?

3. With reference to the answer to Parts 4 and 5 of Question No. 2,952, what is the reason for the loss in profit of $320,000?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. In-Flight Motion Pictures Inc.

2. (a) The cost of these headsets is considered proprietary information. (b and c) Headsets are supplied as part of a total in-flight entertainment package purchased from In Flight Motion Pictures Inc., which includes projection equipment, films, sound tapes and head-sets. Because In Flight Motion Pictures Inc. was the only established supplier of an in-flight entertainment package when Air Canada first made this service available in 1971, the contract was not put out for bids.

3. The reduction in net revenue between 1971 and 1972 was due primarily to increased cost of supplies, reduced flying because of strikes by government air traffic controllers and radar technicians in January and February, 1972, and a substantial increase in the number of charter flights which provide complimentary bar service.

AIR CANADA FREIGHT RATES

Question No. 424—Mr. Schumacher:

1. What measure does Air Canada use for assessing freight rates from (a) Europe (b) the United States (c) Asia?

2. What is the cost in each case, per unit of weight, for (a) commercial imports (b) goods and belongings of tourist Canadians returning to Canada (c) goods and belongings of immigrants to Canada (d) gifts from foreign citizens to resident Canadians (e) goods and belongings of returning Canadian citizens who have been employed for a period of time overseas?

3. What monetary unit is used for payment of such costs?

4. What basic rate of exchange applies?

5. Do freight rates reflect fluctuations in bank rates of exchange?

6. What guidelines are used in making changes in rates?

7. Do the same rates as above apply to shipments from Canada overseas to corresponding destinations overseas and, if not, what is the variance?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. The basic measure used by Air Canada for assessing freight rate is the weight of the shipment, with the resulting rate reflecting the distance involved. Depending upon the size of the shipment, a container rate, a specific rate for the commodity in question or general rate may be offered.

2. Air Canada is a common carrier which means that rates apply equally to all consumers who meet the conditions applicable to the rate, i.e. shipment is the same commodity, shipment is the same weight, shipment is the same origin and destination.

3. Price quotations are given in local currency or their dollar equivalent.

4. The basic rate of exchange which applies is the IATA set of rates of exchange or the bankers' buying rate, whichever provides the greatest revenue.

5. The freight rates are changed to reflect fluctuations in bank rates of exchange when the variance exceeds 2.5 per cent up or down.

6. Rate changes are generally made on the basis of changes in costs of handling and carrying the traffic involved, or to fill aircraft space which under certain operational conditions is difficult to fully utilize.

7. General commodity rates are essentially the same to and from Canada. However, in order to correct directional traffic imbalances, a number of specific commodity rates are available which are directional in nature and generally result in lower levels from Canada compared with to Canada.

SERVICE FLIGHTS OVERSEAS

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence):

4. (a) What were the operation costs of each airport for the year 1973 (b) what were the total revenues of each?

5. How many employees in all these airports speak (a) French only (b) English only (c) are bilingual?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. (a) The Department of Transport owns and operates ninety airports. (b) Charlottetown, P.E.I.; Deer Lake, Nfld.; Fredericton, N.B.; Gander Intl., Nfld.; Goose Bay, Nfld.; Halifax Intl., N.S.; House Harour, P.Q.; Moncton, N.B.; St. Anthony, Nfld.; Saint John, N.B.; St. John's, Nfld.; Sydney, N.S.; Stephenville, Nfld.; Wabush, Nfld.; Yarmouth, N.S.; Baie Comeau, P.Q.; Cartierville, P.Q.; Fort Chimo, P.Q.; Frobisher, N.W.T.; La Macaza, P.Q.; Mont Joli, P.Q.; Montreal Intl., P.Q.; Québec, P.Q.; St. Hubert, P.Q.; Schefferville, P.Q.; Sept Iles, P.Q.; Earlton, Ont.; Gore Bay, Ont.; Kapuskasing, Ont.; London, Ont.; Muskoka, Ont.; North Bay, Ont.; Ottawa Intl., Ont.; Sault Ste. SURVEY TO EVALUATE ECONOMIC IMPACT OF SPECIAL TAX MEASURES FOR MANUFACTURING AND PROCESSING INDUSTRIES

Question No. 479—Mr. Alexander:

1. How many companies were asked by the Department of Finance to complete a survey or were interviewed as a means to evaluate the economic impact of the special tax measures introduced for manufacturing and processing industries?

2. (a) Has the government prepared a report as a result of such survey and/or interviews from information disclosed (b) will it be made public and, if so, on what date?

3. For each province and the territories (a) what was the number of companies involved (b) what was the result of any economic impact in terms of employment?

4. Was the survey made by personal attendance or by forwarded questionnaire and (a) if by the former, how many persons were involved (b) if by the latter, how many questionnaires were forwarded and subsequently received?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. The Department of Finance did not undertake a survey to evaluate the economic impact of the tax measures introduced for manufacturing and processing industries. The Minister of Finance did, however, supply a covering letter for a survey undertaken by an interdepartmental committee, known as The Tax Measures Review Committee. The committee reported that 1,088 questionnaires were mailed to manufacturing and processing corporations.

2. (a) The Tax Measures Review Committee prepared a report which was based on the above survey. (b) The interim report of the Tax Measures Review Committee was tabled in the House of Commons on Friday, March 29, 1974.

3. (a) The following is a breakdown of the number of questionnaires sent to firms in each province in connection with the tax measures review survey: Alberta, 37; British Columbia, 95; Manitoba, 37; New Brunswick, 28; Newfoundland, 6; Nova Scotia, 28; Ontario, 514; Prince Edward Island, 1; Quebec, 330; Saskatchewan, 11; Yukon Territory, 1; Total 1,088. (b) A regional estimate of the employment created as a result of the tax measures is not available.

4. (a) Interviews were requested with 250 companies of varying size. A total of 21 interviewers were involved. (b) A total of 1,088 questionnaires were sent to manufacturing and processing firms. The companies which were not interviewed were requested to forward their questionnaires by mail. The committee's report states that information from a total of 782 responses was included in the report. No separate breakdown is available for the response rate from the companies which were not interviewed.

2. What was this in per capita terms for each region?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1 and 2.

TOTAL STRENGTH OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Question No. 509—Mr. Boisvert:

According to the latest figures available, what is the total strength of the Canadian Armed Forces and, of this number, how many are French Canadian?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Total strength of the Canadian Armed Forces, 81,875; number of Francophones within the total, 17,319.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—SURVIVAL EQUIPMENT ON EAGLE RIVER

Question No. 526—Mr. Rowland:

How many boats, outboard motors and other similar items of survival equipment are held on the Eagle River or SAR I inventory?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): There are no boats, outboard motors or survival equipment on the SAR 1 Eagle River inventory. No equipment is procured specifically for use at SAR 1 Eagle River, however required equipment is provided on short period loan from Canadian Forces stocks at other bases. Normal survival equipment carried on Canadian Forces aircraft is used for Search and Rescue Training.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—EAGLE RIVER FISHING CAMP

Question No. 527—Mr. Rowland:

1. Does the Department of National Defence intend to operate again in July and August 1974 the VIP fishing camp in Labrador known as Eagle River or SAR I?

2. What has been the dollar cost of the camp's operation to the public for each year 1968 to 1973 in terms of (a) transportation costs of servicemen volunteer camp staff from their home units to and from Goose Bay (b) extra costs other than salaries for servicemen participating in the operation (c) aircraft operating costs shuttling guests and equipment between Goose Bay and the camp site (d) total repair costs to aircraft damaged in the operation?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. There is no present intention to close down SAR 1 Eagle River which has been operated each summer for several years.

2. (a) Nil. Servicemen proceed to and from their home units to and from Goose Bay via scheduled or training flights which operate within the monthly flying rate and annual budget rate established for these aircraft. (b) For 1973 the ration cost was $2,268 and the outboard motor fuel cost was $306. Military and government hosts pay personally for incidental expenses of staff, as well as for all direct camp costs for themselves and their guests. (c) Bush training for SAR Helicopter Crews is included in over all annual operating funds allocated for these aircraft. Total annual allocation for SAR Labrador helicopter is 3,600 hours. Of this amount, approximately 1,080 hours are allocated to crew training. This training includes cross-country and bush-type flying in conditions similar to those found in Labrador. Approximately 150 flight hours per year are utilized for transportation of personnel and equipment between Goose Bay and SAR 1. (d) On July 22, 1969, a CH 113 Voyageur aircraft conducting a training flight to SAR 1 was damaged as a result of engine failure, but no aircraft has been damaged on flights related solely to operations at SAR 1.

LOANS INVESTMENT PROGRAM, 1973-75

Question No. 536—Mr. Godin:

1. In how many provinces is the Loans-Investment Program 197375 in effect (a) for each province, what amount did the government grant (b) have the provinces used such grants in whole or in part?

2. During the negotiation stages of this Program, did the provinces undertake to approve its application and, if so, in what percentage?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. See Reply to Question 136.

2. The terms of the Winter Capital Projects Fund, including the amount of loans available to each province were described in the form of guidelines which were approved by the Provinces.

FIXED CROSSING BETWEEN NEW BRUNSWICK AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Question No. 544—Mr. Howie:

What studies, if any, into the merits of a fixed crossing between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are now under way and on what date was the latest such study completed?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The most recent study into the merits of a fixed crossing between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island was completed by the Stanford Research Institute in July 1968. Reviews of various aspects of the problem have been carried out subsequently at frequent intervals, for example, the 1971 Wilbur Smith and Associates study of traffic and revenue forecasts.

"IRVING WHALE"

Question No. 566—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. In the past 12 months what underwater surveys and/or inspections have been made of the Irving Whale?

2. What is the currently estimated cost of raising this ship and/or its contents from the bottom of the Gulf of St. Lawrence?

3. What are the present intentions of the government in reference to this pollution threat?

4. From what groups or individuals has the government sought advice and technical assistance on this problem?

5. What representations have been made by the Government of Prince Edward Island on the matter and on what dates?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. On October 13, 1973, the Department of National Defence Submersible SDL-1 descended to the deck of the Irving Whale.

2. In October 1971, the lowest tender for the removal of this vessel and contents was $1.7 million. The present price would probably be between $2.5 and $3.5 million, allowing for the present inflationary trends on similar kinds of work.

3. The government is presently planning to make a very complete survey of the Irving Whale this year. At the same time, investigations are being carried out to determine more fully the effects of temperature, time and pressure on heavy oils with a view to determining the courses of action to be taken, even whether the oil is a pollution threat under these conditions.

4. During late 1971 and in 1972, the ministry prepared a form letter which was sent to a large number of experts around the world for advice or comment on the rate of biodegradation of the oil in the vessel and rates of corrosion of the hull in that depth and temperature. As a follow-up to these inquiries, two officials of Marine Services of this ministry proceeded to the United Kingdom and Holland to speak to other experts in the field of salvage, as well as of oil and steel, to ascertain whether attempts should be made to raise the Irving Whale or leave it where it is. The replies to the form letter indicated little information on either subject is available. Without exception the salvage experts, and others, recommended that the Irving Whale should be left where it is.

5. (a) On June 7, 1973, the province requested a copy of the Divers Report, of a proposed dive in the summer of 1973, be made available to the province. (b) On March 26, 1973, the province acknowledged receipt of a letter from the minister relating the outcome of its world canvass of authorities on oil degradation, steel corrosion and salvage of the Irving Whale. (c) on March 6, 1973, by telegram, the province requested a meeting on the outcome of the Ministry of Transport's findings on additional information; and stated the conditions under which the province would be a party to any decision to raise the Irving Whale. (d) On February 6, 1973, the province requested action on the raising of the Irving Whale, in citing representations by the Tourist Association of P.E.I. (e) On June 12, 1972, the province forwarded a letter containing a suggestion from a citizen on the disposition of the Irving Whale. (f) On May 17, 1972, the province refuted statement that province would not approve raising of Irving Whale in summer, and requested issuance of a press release that the vessel would be salvaged that year. (g) On February 16, 1972, the province acknowledged conditions under which it would agree to the raising of the Irving Whale. (h) On January 7, 1972, the province acknowledged receipt of a set of contract documents relating to the proposed raising of the Irving Whale, also requesting an understanding of the conditions under which such a project would be undertaken.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No.

2. What amount has been expended in the Ethnic Press to date?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): 1. (a) $231,000; (b) nil.

2. $231,000 for the fiscal year 1973-74 under the Multiculturalism Program.

POLLUTION OF WATERS OF THE ST. LAWRENCE AT MONTMAGNY

Question No. 629—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Has the action taken against the owner of the ship that polluted the waters of the St. Lawrence at Montmagny, in October, 1970, produced any results and, if so (a) has there been a judgment (b) what is the nature of the judgment (c) has it been effected (d) on what date?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The incident referred to involves the former Quebec City ferry Cité de Lévis, which was being broken up at Montmagny, P.Q. and occurred at a later date than that referred to. On September 28, 1972 oil entered the waters of the St. Lawrence River from the Cité de Lévis and the vessel's owner, Mr. Angelo Nittolo, was summoned to appear before the court on that date; but the hearing was postponed until April 6, 1973. The hearing was postponed on four subsequent occasions and at the present time the case is due to be heard on May 17, 1974.

TAX DEDUCTIBLE EXPENSES

Question No. 652—Mr. Herbert:

Will the Minister of Finance, in an effort to encourage healthy family relationships, give consideration to permitting the same tax deductible expense privileges to the spouse as are accorded to secretaries that accompany company personnel when they travel on business?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Under the Income Tax Act as it now stands, there is no discrimination as between secretaries and wives in deducting travel expenses. If the secretary or wife is travelling to, in the words of the act, "gain or produce income" for the taxpayer's business, the expense is deductible as long as the amount is not unreasonable. If the secretary or wife is travelling simply as a matter of pleasure, then the expense is not deductible in either case. The Department of Finance is prepared to give consideration to any suggested amendment to the Income Tax Act.

CBC—LOST REVENUE RESULTING FROM COMPLIANCE WITH REPORT OF CRTC TO REDUCE ADVERTISING

Question No. 657—Mr. Herbert:

1. What are the estimated totals of lost revenue to CBC in each of the next five years resulting from compliance with the report of CRTC to reduce advertising?

2. Would the responsible Minister recommend less programming, reduced quality of programming or increased appropriations in order to meet this loss of revenue?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): In reply to Part 1, I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: The report of the CRTC includes proposed conditions of licence only for the CBC. It is not yet certain that the proposed conditions will pertain. The CBC, as provided by section 17 of the Broadcasting Act, has requested consultation with the CRTC with respect to these proposed conditions. The results of this consultation will determine the next step to be taken. Assuming the imposition of such proposed conditions the loss, plus the increased expenditure to the CBC, would total many millions of dollars, the approximate amount of which is now being calculated. The estimated gross advertising revenue for radio, for example, for the fiscal year 1973-74 is $3,410,000. The estimated gross advertising revenue for television for the same fiscal year is $56,930,000.

2. Should reduced involvement in advertising be attached as a condition of licence and should the CBC agree this would not unreasonably impede the provision of the national broadcasting service, it would appear increased appropriations would be required. I would support neither less programming nor a reduction in the high quality of current CBC programming.

HEADQUARTERS BUILDING, RIDEAU CANAL SYSTEM

Question No. 673—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Part 3 of Question No. 2,845 of the First Session of the 29th Parliament to the effect that final architectural plans had not been completed for the construction of a Headquarters for the Rideau Canal System at Smiths Falls, Ontario, what is the nature of all plans that have been made to this date, what are the names and addresses of all engineers or architects involved and what fees have been paid in each case for services rendered?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Plans have not been developed for a new Rideau Canal Headquarters at Smiths Falls. No outside consultants have been retained and therefore no fees have been paid.

COST TO FEDERAL TREASURY OF TAX ALLOWANCE AND REDUCTION

Question No. 685—Mr. Nystrom:

What is the estimated cost to the federal treasury, in terms of revenues foregone, of (a) the two-year capital cost allowance (b) the reduction in the corporate tax rate, in each year 1972 to 1975?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): There has been no breakdown of estimated cost as between the two year capital cost allowance and the reduction in the corporate tax rate. There is an unusual measure of uncertainty with regard to the direct or indirect effects of the corporate tax measures as a whole on revenue because of the lack of historical record of the taxes paid by manufacturing and processing industries as now defined in the regulations. Because introduction of the legislation was delayed, a relatively small number companies took full advantage of the two-year write-off in 1972. Thus, the tax data for 1972, when it becomes available, will not be representative. We are likely to have some idea of the direct effect of the tax measures on revenues only when the 1973 tax data is available which will not be for some time. The direct impact of the measures provides only a limited indication of their total consequence. The corporate tax reduction has contributed to increased business and investment and the overall scale of industrial activity. The consequent growth in incomes has had a beneficial effect on revenues which reduces the cost of the tax measures themselves.

BIDS FROM PRIVATE SHIPPERS RELATING TO EASTERN ARCTIC SHIPPING CONTRACT

Question No. 692—Mr. Andre:

Did the government solicit bids from private shippers prior to its awarding of the Eastern Arctic shipping contract via the Port of Churchill to Northern Transportation Company Limited and, if so (a) how many bids were received (b) what was the highest bid (c) what was the lowest bid (d) which company submitted the lowest bid?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Bids were not solicited prior to authorizing Northern Transportation Company Limited to establish the Keewatin resupply service based at Churchill. (a) N/A. (b) N/A. (c) N/A. (d) N/A.

BANK OF CANADA—NUMISMATIC COLLECTION

Question No. 695—Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra):

1. What is the value at current market prices of the numismatic collection of the Bank of Canada?

2. For what reason did the Bank of Canada acquire a numismatic collection?

3. For what reason does the government not direct the Bank of Canada to sell its numismatic collection and remit to the government the money derived from the sale, in order that the government use the money to help the people survive the inflationary monetary policy of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. No attempt has been made to determine the current value of the Numismatic Collection of the Bank of Canada. A large part of the collection had been in the hands of the Federal Government for many years and was transferred to the Bank of Canada from the Public Archives of Canada in 1965. Other considerable portions have come to the Bank as gifts from public-spirited Canadian citizens and institutions. Part of the collection, predominantly Canadian numismatic items, has been acquired by purchases form private collectors and numismatic dealers in Canada and other countries during the past twelve years. Many of the items in the collection are unique and others are so rare as to almost never come on the public market. It would therefore be almost impossible to calculate a realistic market value for the collection.

2. Having the sole authority for the note issue the central bank has a natural interest in Canadian paper money and over its earlier years it gradually accumulated a limited collection of numismatic materials related to this interest. Aware of this, finding no comparable interest or expertise elsewhere and deeming the development of a collection not to be part of its responsibility, the Public Archives, with the approval of the Secretary of State, in the mid '60's. turned over its substantial but unorganized volume of numismatic holdings to the Bank with a view to the establishment of a comprehensive representative numismatic collection. The Bank's collection, now regarded as the National Numismatic Collection, is an important part of Canada's heritage. Almost every political, social and economic event in our history is reflected in the coins, tokens and paper money which have been used in Canada during the past 300 years and plans are under way for a money museum in the Bank's new Head Office building project in which the Collection will be displayed for the benefit of the Canadian public.

3. It is considered to be in the public interest to have a national numismatic collection.

PRESIDENCY OF CBC AND CHAIRMANSHIP OF CRTC

Question No. 732—Mr. Reid:

1. Has the government given consideration to requesting the resignation of Mr. L. Picard, current President of CBC and the appointment as President of CBC of Mr. Pierre Juneau and, if not, for what reason?

2. Has the government given consideration to requesting the resignation of Mr. Pierre Juneau, current Chairman of CRTC and the appointment as Chairman of CRTC of Mr. L. Picard and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Secretary of State and the Minister of Communications as follows: 1. The government has not given any consideration to requesting the resignation of the current President of the CBC, Mr. Laurent Picard, and the appointment of Mr. Pierre Juneau as President and is not aware of any reason which would necessitate such a consideration.

2. No. There is no reason to do so.

ESTIMATED COST OF PICKERING AIRPORT

What is the estimated projected cost of the Pickering Airport?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The estimated cost of the initial phase of Pickering Airport, based on the same development plan as used in the estimates Blue Book, shows in addition to the $389,684,000 on page 27-40 of the Blue Book the following items: Operations Building, 9,465,000; Aprons, 25,000,000; Electronic Aids and Installation, 10,280,000; Additional amount, 44,745,000; Per Blue Book, 389,684,000; Total, 434,429,000. These costs are in 1973 dollars.

1. As of January 1, 1974, by province, how many physicians are actually practising medicine in Canada (a) full-time (b) part-time?

2. By province, what is the distribution of specialists and general practitioners in Canada?

6. What is the total number of doctors, by province, employed in administrative positions by (a) industry (b) insurance companies?

Return tabled.

Mr. Reilly: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Again I point out that I have a question on the order paper—in fact, I have several—No. 552 which has now been there for pretty close to six weeks. I pointed out to the hon. parliamentary secretary a few days ago that it is not one of those questions he complains about which cost $1½ million to answer. He could get the necessary information by picking up the telephone. This matter is important to some of my constituents and I wish he would get on with it.

Mr. Stevens: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to point out that I have two questions on the order paper, No. 222 and No. 225, which were originally on the order paper in the last session. They remain unanswered although they are relatively simple questions. The first asks for the disclosure of who exactly has been hired with respect to the sale of Olympic coinage. We know it is being sold but we have asked for information about it. The other question deals with information service officers of the government.

INCOME TAX

EFFECT OF CUT IN PERSONAL INCOME TAXES REFERRED TO BY PRIME MINISTER IN LIGHT OF INCREASE IN RATE OF INFLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. When the right hon. gentleman says that the government cut personal income taxes last year by about 12 per cent, does he mean that the average taxpayer will be paying roughly 12 per cent less in actual dollars during 1973 than was the case in 1972?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I mean something to that effect—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —if I can find it, Mr. Speaker. It is a figure which reflects the benefit to the taxpayer of the various actions we took last year. I am sorry I do not have the detailed explanation but that is the general import of the figure.

Mr. Stanbury: Put a question on the order paper.

Mr. Stanfield: The hon. gentleman would like to have the question on the order paper out of the way but it is not going to be put on the order paper. Perhaps the Prime Minister can help me. In view of the Minister of Finance having recognized, when he introduced the indexing concept, that inflation actually increases the effective income tax rate under our system of progressive taxation, can the Prime Minister indicate whether the cuts in nominal tax rates of which he speaks, and to which he was referring I suppose, exceed for 1973 the effective increase in the tax on real income which resulted from the increase in the rate of inflation to nearly 10 per cent? Did the cut in the nominal rate exceed the actual increase resulting from inflation and, if so, by how much? Comment faire!

● (1450)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking me to computerize some very difficult statistical questions. I will take note of his question and make the calculations he asks for. But the effect of my statement, as borne out by statistics, is something I am prepared to repeat. It is borne out by the statistics which are official documents of the government of Canada.

Mr. Hees: That sounds like your Rotary Club speech.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is one way of indicating that the assertions I made in the speech which the hon. member was good enough to refer to are correct.

Mr. Hees: You bored the Rotarians silly.

Mr. Trudeau: It is quite possible, but I am glad I have the attention of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. I am glad to see him back in the House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: The Rotarians tell me they yawned their way through your speech.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the impression we are not making much progress by this exchange. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition might be recognized for a supplementary.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it is clear that we are not making much progress.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You are not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I wonder whether it would be satisfactory to the Prime Minister if I returned to the subject tomorrow after he has had a chance to have himself briefed. I took it for granted he knew what he was talking about.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I take it that the Leader of the Opposition knows what he is talking about.

Some hon. Members: Right.

Mr. Trudeau: I am glad he has the support of his colleagues—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —when he says they are not making much progress.

Mr. Muir: That's not funny, Pierre.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON SALMON STOCKS—REVIEW AND POSSIBLE ALTERATION OF CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to say that that sort of exchange proves figures do not lie. I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the position of Canada in its negotiations with the United States with respect to salmon stocks in each country. Has the government already reviewed or is it contemplating a review of the position Canada is taking in those negotiations? If so, can the minister tell the House what that new position is?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, and I am sure the House is aware, these negotiations have been going on for quite some time and they are extremely complex. Our general purpose is to try to ensure that we have control over the salmon that spawn in our streams. That is our over-all objective. We are engaged in extremely tough bargaining and we do not intend to hurry this bargaining at the expense of the Canadian position.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased with part of the response. Am I to take it from that remark of the minister that the government is now going to withdraw the sell-out proposals it has made to the Americans and revert to the position of June 17 and 18, 1971, when we, as Canadians, agreed with the Americans that the fish of each nation belonged to the people of that nation? Is that going to be the position we will put forward?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the position the government of Canada has always maintained is to get to a situation where we have complete control over the fish spawned in our respective streams. We have never sold out, we do not intend to sell out, and I hope my hon. friend will not encourage us to sell out.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Skeena for a further supplementary and then the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, may I put the question more directly to the minister. Will the record of agreement reached between the United States and Canada in Seattle, Washington, on June 17 and 18, 1971, on salmon problems of mutual concern, which enunciated the principle of ownership of the salmon stocks by each country, be the basis of the position which the Canadian government now intends to present in these negotiations?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this has always been our position. As the hon. gentleman knows, the United States has certain rights that have been acquired over the years. The endeavour on our part to get those rights withdrawn remains the centre of our policy.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate that the hon. member has a supplementary. He will be recognized in due course after we have completed the first round of questioning.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ELIGIBILITY FOR BENEFITS OF LAID-OFF JAMES BAY POWER PROJECT WORKERS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Is the minister aware that the Unemployment Insurance Commission refuses to pay unemployment benefits to workers having lost their jobs not because of some labour conflict but because of vandalism in James Bay? Does the minister intend to take action so that people laid off in James Bay will receive the unemployment benefits they are entitled to?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if there is no evidence of direct participation in the dispute and they are otherwise entitled I am sure, though I will check further, that those people applying for benefits will in fact receive them, but they will be subject to the normal conditions that apply to entitlement.

FINANCE

INCREASE BY BANKS IN INTEREST RATES ON CONSUMER LOANS—POLICY OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the Prime Minister's somewhat generous admission in the House on April 19 that the government has over-all responsibility for the general monetary policy of the country, including bank interest rates, and in light of today's announcement that several major banks are increasing the consumer loan rate to as much as 13.9 per cent because of the general shortage of money and increasing costs since the last move by the Bank of Canada, can the Minister of Finance tell us specifically, are these increases in consumer loan rates in line with the policy of the government? If not, would he tell us what that policy is?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the monetary policy of the government reflects action taken by the Bank of Canada. The Prime Minister was quite specific when he said that the government has to be in accord with the general monetary policy set by the bank, although it does not take responsibility for specific rate movement either up or down. The monetary policy of the government, as I have stated it and will state it again on a future occasion, is sufficient to accommodate the efficient and reasonable expansion of the economy.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Perth-Wilmont will be recognized for a supplementary. I have not forgotten the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, who has a supplementary to another question.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that businesses are finding it increasingly difficult to secure extended bank credit loans and people in many areas, indeed most areas of the country, are also finding it increasingly difficult to obtain mortgage loans even at 11 per cent, may I ask the minister if this situation is acceptable to the government and part of government policy? If not, what is the government's policy? Specifically, does the government intend to permit loan rates and mortgage rates to seek world levels which may be as high as 17 per cent, as in the case of the United Kingdom?

● (1500)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, with the economy expanding as rapidly as it is, obviously the objective of the Bank of Canada and the banking system is not overly to increase the money supply. There then has to be some selection in the according of credit. As I understand it, that selection is being made by the banks, subject to the moral suasion that I put upon them in favour of small businesses, farmers, fishermen and those areas of the economy encouraging capital expansion rather than outright consumption.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON SALMON STOCKS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CANADIAN POSITION PRIOR TO SIGNING OF ANY AGREEMENT

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We are somewhat reassured by the fact the minister has told us Canada does not intend to depart from the principles articulated in 1971. Does the government intend to make a statement on motions at an early date outlining Canada's stance in somewhat greater detail than was the case with those principles dealing with salmon fishery negotiations well prior to any signing of a further United States-Canada fisheries treaty?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should ask my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, to answer this question. He has been engaging in these negotiations and doing very well. Perhaps he should answer.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There have been similar statements and more detailed statements made in relation to the forthcoming Law of the Sea Conference. The basic principles contained in the 1971 preamble to the Canada-United States agreement on salmon are also contained in our proposals for the Law of the Sea stance.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I said I was reassured a little earlier because after the statement by the Minister of Fisheries I am not reassured at all. What I am really asking is whether the government intends to bring to this House its position as a result of the outcome of these negotiations before any signing takes place?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, negotiations are proceeding. The next such negotiations are set for September. No real progress has been made in these negotiations with the United States. Until we make progress, we do not see any point in reporting further.

OVERFISHING OF BERING SEA HALIBUT—GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIONS TO SOVIET UNION—POSSIBILITY OF CONFERENCE TO REACH AGREEMENT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In order to resolve the present overfishing of halibut stocks in the Bering Sea by the Soviet Union, have any steps been taken to arrange a conference with a view to securing agreement with the Soviet Union that they will enter into agreements which come under the North Pacific Fisheries Commission and abide by the terms of that treaty?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that I answered a similar question yesterday. The answer to the question is yes. We and the United States have approached the Soviet Union and Japan. Both of them have indicated a willingness to discuss the question. The problem with Korea is there are no diplomatic relations between the Soviet Union and Korea. Therefore it would be very difficult to arrange a five-power conference. We are therefore proceeding otherwise. If we can arrange an international conference to make greater progress, we will certainly do so.

HIGH INTEREST RATES ON MORTGAGES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It is supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot. I direct the question to the Minister of Finance because the Minister of State for Urban Affairs never differentiates between insured and uninsured loans. In light of the fact that on insured loans under CMHC and conventional loans the interest rates are 10½ per cent, 11 per cent or higher on first mortgages and 15 per cent on second mortgages, does the minister or the government have any program in mind to hold down or reduce interest rates which are very oppressive not only with regard to purchasing and making payments on housing but with regard to rentals which are so oppressive that people cannot afford the rents at this time?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best answer I can give the hon. member is to suggest that a subsidization of interest rates along the lines he suggests would just add to the demand for housing and be reflected in higher capital values and prices of houses. I can refer him to no better authority on the subject than the hon. member for Don Valley, not just myself.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I bring to the attention of hon. members that we are still on the first round of questioning. I hope we can get beyond the first round. The hon. member for Calgary North will be recognized for a supplementary followed by the hon. member for Mississauga.

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the announcement of an increase of $500 in the salaries of public servants, which of course will almost be cut in half after deducting income tax, will the minister advise whether that token increase is being given to those people because there is no control now on interest rates whatsoever and the sky is the limit?

EFFECT OF POSSIBLE TIGHT MONEY POLICY ON AVAILABILITY OF MORTGAGE MONEY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Finance is also supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot. Are we to take it from the minister's response to the hon. member that we are now in a period of restriction of credit by the Bank of Canada or a tight money policy? Does that tight money policy mean no mortgage money will be available for building this year, or will the minister give an undertaking to the House that he will interfere in the system to persuade lenders to allocate at least as much funding as usual to mortgage companies and mortgage investment this year so that we can depend on a supply of new houses to help solve our housing shortage?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with the way the hon. member phrased the question, since the answer to the first part is no the answer to the rest becomes non-applicable.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION PROMISED IN SPEECH FROM THRONE

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the government has given first reading to only 19 bills out of 46 items of legislation promised at the time of the throne speech in February, a record of performance of only 41 per cent of what has been promised, will the Prime Minister indicate when he plans to introduce some of the important legislation promised such as that dealing with unemployment insurance, the status and rights of women, young offenders and the Criminal Code so that the House and the country can have a look at these items and perhaps come to some basic decisions in the national interest.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Some of these items will indeed receive first reading within the next three or four days. I remind the hon. member that the throne speech was at the end of February which gave us March and April, two months of sitting. The hon. member will recollect that of that time most of the days in March were opposition days. Consequently, I am very pleased that he has drawn to the attention of the House the record we have put forward in introducing so many bills in such a short period of government time.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, noting the fact it takes about two minutes of the time of the House to give first reading to a bill, I wonder whether the answer the Prime Minister has just given is reflective of a shift or change from government priorities announced in the throne speech last February, or does it merely mean that the government is saving up its election goodies for the last few days of this parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATION PROHIBITING MEMBERS FROM JOINING UNION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of the fact it is federal government policy to allow federal public servants to belong to a union or association of their choice, and in view of the fact that some members of the RCMP are showing an inclination toward forming some type of organization, will the minister give favourable consideration to amending the present legislation which prohibits the RCMP from this action so that these federal public servants can enjoy the same privileges as all others?

● (1510)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, when parliament passed the Public Service Staff Relations Act in 1967 it deliberately excluded the RCMP as a group of employees from qualification for unionization under that act. In the last two years we have held meetings with representatives of the constables, corporals and sergeants of the RCMP in Ottawa for a week each year, and they have shown no interest in the formation of a union. We know there is an information meeting to be held by the police association in Vancouver tonight and there is to be another in Toronto tomorrow night. We shall be watching these meetings with interest.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Well, I have been asked to send somebody from my office to the meeting in Toronto and I am doing so. As I say, the law now forbids the RCMP from forming a union. I personally believe it is not in the public interest that members of the RCMP should belong to a union, but we shall be watching the situation closely.

POSSIBLE HARASSMENT OF MEMBERS INTERESTED IN FORMING UNION

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Would the minister instruct the commissioner in charge of the RCMP to stop any harassment of members of the force who have publicly shown an interest in forming such an association?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): I am sorry, but I did not hear the beginning of the hon. member's question. Would he put it to me again?

Mr. Neale: Would the minister instruct the commissioner in charge of the RCMP to stop any harassment or disciplinary measures being taken against those members of the force who have publicly shown an interest in forming such an association?

Mr. Allmand: This question was put to the commissioner last night in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and he said there was no harassment or interference with those members who would be going to the meeting. I would hope there would not be. The two meetings in question are merely information meetings, not organization meetings.

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Solicitor General. In light of news reports that members of the RCMP who participate in the formation of this proposed association may be disciplined, will the minister assure us it is his policy that no member of the force participating in these events will be disciplined?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I cannot make that commitment. It depends on what is done by the members. I repeat that at the present time it is illegal for members of the RCMP to belong to unions, and the administration of the force is left to the commissioner. I cannot give a commitment that the law will not be followed if the law and regulations laid down in the RCMP Act and other statutes are not complied with.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ATTITUDE OF MINISTER TOWARDS FORMATION OF ASSOCIATION BY MEMBERS

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that in many municipalities across Canada the police belong to associations not necessarily defined as unions, may I ask whether the minister is opposed to members of the RCMP having the right to form an association which in some way might speak for them to their superiors?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): It would depend on the terms of reference and the constitution of such associations. The Public Service Staff Relations Act defines employee organizations. It would depend on whether those associations constituted an employee organization under the terms of that act or whether they attempted to do other things. I would have to study that aspect. That is a legal question the hon. member is asking.

RIGHT OF MEMBERS TO ADVOCATE CHANGE IN LAW CONCERNING UNION MEMBERSHIP

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Even though the law as it now stands forbids the formation of unions among members of the RCMP, is there any reason why they should be denied freedom of speech to advocate a change in the law without, as a result, being penalized under the mounted police act?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, they are not. I tried to convey to the House a few moments ago that in the last two years the men of the RCMP, the non-commissioned officers and the men, have freely elected representatives from each division in Canada and sent them to Ottawa to discuss their problems with the administration. I have personally met with them privately and I asked them this very question. They spoke to me very forcefully and articulately on many other subjects, but they told me at that time that of the 16 divisional representatives only one favoured a union. The other 15 did not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like an answer to the question I asked. The question is simply this: are the mounted police to be denied freedom to advocate changes in the law or are they to be subject to penalties for exercising that freedom which every Canadian has a right to exercise?

Mr. Allmand: No. No penalties will be imposed upon them for exercising their freedom of speech.

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): With regard to those officers seeking some kind of alliance with the police association, or the formation of a union, can the minister advise us what he is prepared to do to deal with the underlying discontent within the force which prompts such action on the part of the RCMP?

Mr. Allmand: I have met with many groups within the RCMP. As a matter of fact, when I visit detachments I make a point of discussing matters with the men. I must say that on the whole there is no discontent; the morale is quite high. There have been problems among individuals and we are hoping to meet those problems. We are trying to implement many new methods of dealing with this question of morale, arrangements for consultation and so on with the men in the force. In the past year we have taken a number of measures to that effect.

MANPOWER

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPLICATIONS APPROVED OR DISAPPROVED

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration regarding the Opportunities for Youth program. I understand there was supposed to be an announcement by April 26. Can the minister bring us up to date and tell us whether he has completed his investigation of the applications and when the notices will be going out both to those whose applications have been approved and to those whose applications have been denied? Can the minister give us some information?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have dealt with some 95 per cent of the applications, I imagine. The few that are left will be resolved, I hope, within the next 48 hours and an announcement can be expected very shortly indeed.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH AND LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAMS—INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT AS TO CONTINUANCE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In light of the fact that the minister has now brought forth a new community employment program or work program, can we assume that the government has made up its mind as to the future of the OFY and LIP programs? Are they to be discontinued as a result of the new direction taken by the government?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I have referred publicly to our enthusiasm for the development of the community employment program which is an extension of the proposal made in the orange paper put forward by colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare. That position stands. In my public comments about it and, indeed, before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration the other day I have indicated that we hope to produce some pilot projects this fall and winter involving community employment which would lead, after evaluation, to a more formal program for the future. But this does not indicate any final decision in the interim with regard to the Local Initiatives Program.

Mr. Alexander: I wish to pose one further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, I appeal to hon. members to limit the number of supplementaries.

Mr. Alexander: I am very sorry. I do not ordinarily take advantage of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: The minister has indicated that the cabinet is deciding the future of the LIP and OFY programs. All I am asking the minister is whether he has reached a decision as to the future of these programs?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I put it very simply in the last sentence of my answer. No, we have not made that decision.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PORTUGAL—POSSIBLE CANADIAN RECOGNITION OF NEW REGIME

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The minister has from time to time laid down, as a basis for official recognition of foreign governments, that they should be in effective control of their country. On this basis, is the government now prepared to recognize the new regime in Portugal?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are still watching developments in that country. So far there seems to have been a fairly peaceful take-over, but we would like to be absolutely sure before we extend recognition.

Mr. Brewin: Can the minister confirm that the new government of Portugal has promised free elections within a year, that it has released political prisoners and taken steps to abolish PIDE, the political police, in that country?

Mr. Sharp: I have received reports of that kind from our embassy in Portugal and they confirm newspaper reports. I share the hon. member's enthusiasm.

VETERANS LAND ACT

SUGGESTED REPEAL OF 1968 DEADLINE, INCREASE IN LOAN CEILING AND LOT REQUIREMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the fact there has been widespread support of the extension of the deadline under the Veterans Land Act, would the minister now say whether he is considering repeal of the 1968 deadline so that more veterans will be able to take advantage of the act, and will he indicate also if consideration is being given to increasing the mortgage loan ceiling and the minimum lot requirement?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. gentleman, this is a matter of government policy and if anything is done it will be announced in due course.

Mr. Marshall: In view of the fact there are only 11 months left following the extension of the March, 1974, deadline, would the minister indicate if consideration is being given to changing the whole act to suit today's needs on behalf of the veterans?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, as I have said on many occasions in the House, as far as veterans are concerned we are reviewing all our programs and projects at all times and if there is any announcement to be made, and the government has approved it, I will make it.

HOUSING

STUDENT CO-OPERATIVE PROJECTS—REQUEST FOR COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it deals with the matter of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation funding of so-called student co-operative housing projects. In view of the evidence that CMHC exceeded its authority in granting loans to several of the co-operatives, would the Prime Minister consider convening a royal commission inquiry into this matter so we can get all the facts?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would begin by conveying to me the facts he has I will look into the matter.

Mr. Scott: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would have the appropriate House committee conduct an inquiry into the matter of granting loans to Rochdale and other co-operative housing projects?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure now whether the hon. member wants a royal commission inquiry, a House committee inquiry or both.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROTEST AGAINST PROGRAM "LES BEAUX DIMANCHES"

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

Does the minister intend to contact personally the CBC authorities to put an end to these disgusting wild shows such as those presented on the French network of the CBC last Sunday night as part of the program "Les Beaux Dimanches"? Such things are unworthy of the CBC whose main objective should be to maintain Canadian unity?

Hon. Hugh James Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will make sure that the hon. member's views are made known to the corporation.

TRADE

RATE OF INTEREST PAID BY EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION COMPARED TO RATE CHARGED—REQUEST FOR LESSENING OF ACTIVITIES OF CORPORATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. With the Export Development Corporation now having to pay 11⅛ per cent for short-term funds which it is borrowing on the street and yet it is continuing to lend money at 7 per cent, will the minister inform the House if he has instructed the officials of the EDC to at least restrain its aggressive lending activities in present money market conditions?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Export Development Corporation is governed by the ceilings in the existing act, amendments to which the House passed a year ago. Very shortly I hope to be able to bring forward further amendments at the second reading stage.

Mr. Stevens: Would the minister indicate to the House if he is co-operating with other export nations which have indicated a desire to enter into a world agreement to try to bring some sanity into the export financing field inasmuch as some of the richest countries in the world are getting loans at rates such as 7 per cent from Canada?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I know there have been discussions, but I do not think any conclusion has been reached yet. I am hopeful there will be some progress in this direction.

AGRICULTURE

SUBSIDY PROGRAM FOR PORK—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT AND AMOUNT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the minister has already said publicly that we are going to "bring in a program of subsidies to pork producers", I should like to ask when he will be introducing this program, and will the money, which appears to be in the $7 per hundred weight range, to be paid by the government be paid directly to the producers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as was pointed out in the House the other day, several provinces have different programs and it is difficult to work out an over-all program as there is no national organization. I can say this, though, that provincial pork marketing boards, hog marketing boards, etc., are well enough organized that pork is sold on the rail and the grade, and it would not be difficult at all to pay the producers. I do not know where the hon. member got his $7 figure.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, we will have to wait and see just how close my figure is. When does the minister expect that this subsidy, this program, is going to start?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, as soon as a workable program can be developed it will be announced.

HEALTH

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO DEAL WITH ALCOHOLISM

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the galloping increase in alcoholism, and the fact that because of a lack of funding there are only a few detoxification centres where these people can be treated for their sickness, whereas in other areas they are treated as common criminals and put in jail until they sober up, and since this is a national social health problem and recognized as such, I should like to ask the minister what part the federal government is playing in meeting this problem?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all, we have an innovative service contribution program under which we may contribute to the funding of detoxification centres of an innovative nature. We also share in detoxification centres which are operating with hospitals on the basis of 50 per cent. We share in the cost of medical care up to 50 per cent. In addition, we are funding some 27 homes for special care as a constructive service in respect of alcoholism under the Canada Assistance Plan.

AIR CANADA

POSSIBLE LOCATION OF CERTAIN OVERHAUL FACILITIES IN WINNIPEG—DATE OF DECISION

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I believe it was last week that his parliamentary assistant provided the House with some details about the department's thinking in respect of the possible location of part of Air Canada's overhaul facilities in Winnipeg. What was lacking in that response was any kind of time frame within which Winnipegers can look for that decision to be made. Can the minister now give us a more precise date in respect of the time span involved before a decision is made?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the only thing new since that answer is that I met with the president of Air Canada and we discussed this matter. He was supposed to supply me with information, data and projections with regard to what Air Canada intends to do.

INFORMATION CANADA

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON SENATE COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS CONCERNING DEALING WITH OUTSIDE AGENCIES

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. I should like to ask whether he proposes to implement the recommendations of the Senate finance committee which recently completed a review of the operations of Information Canada, particularly those in chapter nine which point up the dangers inherent in dealing with outside agencies. The report says among other things that they tend to have the distressing smell of pork about them and should be very carefully vetted by Information Canada, with that agency acting as a screening body. Does the minister propose to adopt that policy?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for Information Canada. I did receive the report yesterday and I am studying it, but perhaps the Minister of Labour might like to reply.

Mr. Reilly: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I should have directed the question to the Minister of Labour.

[Mr. Rynard.]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. member repeat his question?

Mr. Reilly: I would be pleased to do so. I wonder whether the minister intends to adopt as policy any of the recommendations of the Senate committee on finance which recently concluded a review of the operations of Information Canada? I am particularly interested in the recommendations contained in chapter 9, which warn that dealings with outside agencies, particularly advertising agencies, could be left open to charges, although not always, of political patronage.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing the recommendations of the Senate committee to which the hon. member has referred. I have met with officials of Information Canada concerning this matter. I hope to have a more detailed report from them as to what the implications are of some of these recommendations within the next week or two, but obviously we will need a little time to study them.

REASON FOR CONTRACT WITH MACLEAN-HUNTER—RESTRICTION ON TENDERING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): That being the case I wonder, having in mind that a previous minister responsible for Information Canada described its co-publishing operations as having been designed to assist Canadian publishers, particularly those in financial trouble, how it is that the agency has recently signed arrangements with the biggest Canadian domestic publisher, Maclean-Hunter, through its subsidiary publishing company, to publish an atlas in a situation in which only two publishers were invited to tender, the other being one owned by a British company?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am in a sense pleased that the hon. member has raised this question. I have also read the article in question. I want to assure the hon. member and the House that it is not the policy of the government, nor of Information Canada to restrict proposals for outside work of this kind involving co-publishing with the government of Canada. I suppose that automatically leads to the question, why was it done in this case? It was an intricate and complex publishing job. It involved a value judgment at the time by an official who felt he had his reasons. However, I want to assure the House it is not the policy to continue this type of procedure in the future.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

POSSIBLE AMENDMENT RELATING TO CADETS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has he prepared any amendments to the National Defence Act which he plans to submit to the House at an early date relating particularly to the cadet movement, and has he received any assurance from the House leader that the measure will be given some priority?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have already indicated that I intend to bring in a recommendation to the House concerning cadets and particularly that girls can be members of cadet corps equally with boys.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT MAKE EVERY EFFORT TO ACHIEVE SETTLEMENT OF CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS WITH PILOTS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Labour. In view of the fine record that Canadian airline pilots have had in their contractual relations with Air Canada, a perfect record, is the minister aware that this record may be in jeopardy because of dissatisfaction with the methods that Air Canada used in laying off pilots during the recent curtailment of operations because of the firefighters' walkout, and will the minister use every option available to him to expedite current contractual negotiations to replace the contract that is due to expire on June 1 before trouble develops?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should be aware that disputes involving employees of the government as such, distinct from employees in the private sector falling under federal jurisdiction, do not fall within my purview as Minister of Labour. Having said that, I think it is fair to say that I am aware of the implications the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vegreville has a supplementary. The Chair will recognize the hon. member and then call orders of the day.

STATUS OF CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Can the minister bring the House up to date on the status of negotiations involving the air traffic controllers, and can he give the House any assurance that a walkout will be averted?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations are continuing satisfactorily at the moment in Quebec where the controllers' association is having a convention.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. Will the air traffic controllers have an offer in their hands tonight so as to avoid a strike this Sunday?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, under the services of a mediator offers and counteroffers are continually under discussion.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REGIONAL WAGE DISPARITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ELIMINATION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact the government has now announced a salary increase for the Public Service, can the President of the Treasury Board indicate what action, if any, will be taken by the government to eliminate wage disparities existing between certain areas of the Public Service? I am thinking, for example, of the disparity existing between personnel on ships owned and operated by the Ministry of Transport operating on the Atlantic coast as opposed to those operating on the Pacific coast?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the choice as to pay dispensation at the present time is left to the employees collectively to choose the alternative of either national rates of pay across the country or regional rates of pay adjusted to different circumstances. That is the employees' choice.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PROFITEERING PRACTICES AND PERMANENT AND TEMPORARY MEMBERSHIP OF COMMISSION

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill C-29, to amend the Combines Investigation Act in relation to profiteering practices, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a point of order?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief point of order by way of caveat so as to not hold up these proceedings. I want to point out to Your Honour, and to the House, that as a result of the legislative delay in doing anything useful for the country, the government is now engaged in spewing out trickles of hastily conceived and ill-prepared legislation. With particular regard to this measure, I want to point out that three clauses of Bill C-29, clauses 7, 8 and 9, are directly linked to Bill C-7 which is now before a committee of the House, and that while there would be a strict right to rely upon that constitutional concern I want to file a caveat by pointing out that our party will feel free at some future stage in the proceedings, if necessary, to apply either to consolidate the bill or ensure that this bill does not conflict with Bill C-7. I am filing that as a caveat at this time.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to move second reading of Bill C-29, to amend the Combines Investigation Act in relation to profiteering practices. This bill will enable the government to temporarily freeze prices on goods where there is evidence of profiteering and will provide a means to roll prices back in these circumstances. The bill reflects the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) commitment to Parliament and Canadians made last year when he said the government would be prepared to introduce measures to protect the consumer against those who may attempt to take advantage of the present situation by unwarranted price increases. The Prime Minister further stated during the throne speech debate in February that:

We will not allow corporate profiteers . . . to pile up unearned windfall profits at the expense of the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the government has already applied a broad set of policies to attack inflation and reduce its effects on Canadians. Along with this, by introducing Bill C-29, the government is carrying out the commitment as expressed in the Speech from the Throne to stop business from taking advantage of current economic conditions to unduly enhance profits. The legislative proposals would stop, in specified circumstances, a producer or merchant from exacting, on the sale or distribution of an article, a profit margin greater than that customarily obtained. The bill would also stop attempts to enhance the price at which an article is eventually sold by withholding from sale or distribution an inventory of that article substantially in excess of that normally held. Such practices defined in the proposed legislation as exceptionable trade practices are generally regarded by Canadians as particularly unacceptable in inflationary conditions. These practices would become unlawful in the circumstances set out in the legislative proposal now before the House.

● (1540)

The bill proposes that the exceptionable trade practices provisions would come into force on declaration by the governor in council. Such declarations would be made by the governor in council normally after consideration of reports issued by the Food Prices Review Board or such other boards as might be established under the authority of the Inquiries Act or other legislation to inquire into the causes of particular price increases, actual or proposed.

Before making a declaration, the governor in council would have to be satisfied that a situation existed or was likely to exist which would have a substantial effect on the price of an article or a class of articles, thus tending to seriously affect the living costs of all or a great majority of Canadians. But in emergency cases, declarations could also be made by the governor in council without first having had a board report, where it was satisfied that such a situation existed and that immediate action was required to protect the public interest.

Declarations made under the proposed law would be specific, applying to a particular article or articles at all or any levels of distribution. The order giving effect to the declaration would specify the period of time during which the declaration was to be effective up to one year. However, the governor in council could extend the period of time initially specified for further periods of up to six months if satisfied that the situation giving rise to the declaration continued to exist. In making a declaration, the governor in council could also invoke the price notification provisions set out in the legislation. Under these provisions suppliers could not increase the price of the article in question over its base price unless the director of the combines investigation branch was notified 30 days in advance of the proposed increase or such shorter period as may be specified by the governor in council.

The application of these provisions will have the effect of imposing a temporary freeze on the price of the articles in question during the notification period. The governor in council would prescribe by regulation the definition of the base price for the purpose of this notification procedure.

The definition of base price prescribed could vary in accordance with the article declared and the practices under which it is normally sold. For example, the base price might be the price charged on a certain date, or such higher price as the firm can demonstrate that it customarily charged during the preceding 30 days. The reason for this wording in this hypothetical example would be to avoid forcing firms who happened to be having a sale on a certain date to use the special sale price as the base price. It is important to note that the base price is prescribed only for pre-notification purposes and does not necessarily have a relationship to a customary profit margin.

Under the bill, the governor in council would also have authority to make exemptions from the pre-notification requirements. Depending on the circumstances, one would expect that for very small firms, for example, it would be possible to exempt them from pre-notification rules as such a procedure could impose an unreasonable and onerous requirement on such small firms. However, such an exemption would cover pre-notification requirements only and the price of the article or articles supplied by the exempted firm would still be required to meet the customary profit margin test.

The new measures would not apply to agricultural produce in an unprocessed state when owned or sold by the primary producer or to unprocessed fishery products when owned or sold by a fisherman. It could apply, however, at other levels of distribution for such products. The governor in council when making a declaration would issue guidelines specifying the manner in which suppliers would determine the profit margin that they customarily obtain and which they could not exceed.

Customary profit margin could be defined differently for each level of distribution. For example, the method to be applied could be different for a manufacturer as opposed to the retailer of a product. The term "customary" could be prescribed to the margin realized during a given past period of time. For example, the guidelines could stipulate—and this is only a hypothetical example—that the customary profit margin would be based on the average profit margin of three years in a specified five year period, which could exclude the immediately preceding year.

In setting out the manner of determination of customary profit margin, consideration would be given to the prevailing economic climate and the business cycle of the particular sector. In addition, the guidelines would be sufficiently flexible to take into account their application to firms operating at low levels of profit or at a loss, or to new businesses.

The administrative and investigative machinery required to administer the proposed legislation would be provided through the office of the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act. Immediate steps are being taken to provide additional resources for these new duties. To ensure administrative feasibility, the legislative proposal would broaden the powers of delegation of the director so that responsibility for administering the exceptionable trade practice provisions could be fully delegated to a deputy director. In conducting inquiries, the deputy director would exercise the same powers as those conferred on the director and the Part I of the Combines Investigation Act.

The director would be required by the legislation to conduct an inquiry where he had reason to believe that a supplier was engaging in or was about to engage in an exceptionable trade practice. Inquiries would also be initiated by the director when directed to do so by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Such inquiries could only be instituted, of course, where a declaration from the governor in council was in effect covering the category of article or supplier in question and would be a key step in the process of enforcing the revisions in the law and regulations against those not complying with them.

In determining whether to initiate an inquiry, the director under the act would have access to the information and research obtained by the original board of inquiry, if there was one, unless it had been collected on a confidential basis. Information on supply and prices normally collected by various departments and not otherwise confidential in the government would be available to him. He would also be able to evaluate and compare the information in the price notification notices of all firms supplying the article or articles covered by the declaration.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if I may ask the minister if the lack of any other minister in the House at this moment is an indication of the enthusiasm of the government for this bill and their support of it or lack of support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: I think it indicates the confidence of the government and of the backbenchers in the measure, unlike my hon. friend's party which has to travel in packs. They have to keep an eye on one another to make sure they are not stabbing each other in the back.

Mr. Hees: They walked out on you.

Mr. Gray: As I was saying, he would also be able to evaluate and compare price notification notices of all firms supplying the article or articles in question. It is expected that the public would also bring information to the attention of the director, which would assist him in deciding whether to carry out an inquiry or continue it if the information came in the course of one being carried out.

Once a declaration was made, firms would calculate their customary profit margins and their base prices in accordance with the guidelines established by the Governor in Council. If a firm found that it is within the profit margin guidelines, it would not be required to take any action until it wished to raise a price above the base price. Before giving notice to the Director of Investigation and Research, which would have to be done 30 days prior to the price increase, or such lesser time as is specified, it would have to ensure that the new price would not result in a profit margin in excess of that customarily obtained.

However, if the firm calculated its customary profit margin and found that it was exceeding the guidelines, it would be expected to roll back its price. Failure to prenotify a price increase after declaration with regard to the product covered by it, could result upon indictment in imprisonment for two years or, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding $10,000 or to imprisonment for one year or both.

The Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, reconstituted as the Trade Practices Commission, would hear complaints from the director about exceptionable trade practices; for example, that a person was selling or about to sell the article so as to obtain a profit margin greater than the one prescribed by the act and regulations. If on the basis of the application made by the director, the commission was satisfied that the person to whom the application related was engaging in or about to engage in such an "exceptionable trade practice", it could order the person to cease and desist from engaging in the practice. Such an order, in effect, would roll back that person's prices to the appropriate level to meet the customary profit margin requirements.

In addition, the commission could require the supplier to give up all or any portion of the excess revenues he had realized as a result of his engaging in the "exceptionable trade practice". The commission could require the supplier to give up this excess revenue in one of three ways: either by refunding it to the person from whom he derived the excess revenue or, if those persons were not reasonably identifiable, by an appropriate reduction in the sale price to persons thereafter acquiring the article from him or finally, if neither of the first two methods were practicable, by paying it to the Receiver General. The Governor in Council would also have the authority to vary or rescind any order of the commission.

Once a declaration was made, superior courts would be authorized under the legislation to issue interim injunctions at any time on application by the Attorney General of Canada enjoining suppliers from engaging in exceptionable trade practices with respect to declared products. These injunctions would preclude firms from taking action which may be unwarranted until the director had an opportunity to carry out an inquiry or for the commission to reach a decision on a matter. Non-compliance with such court orders could result in a fine or imprisonment.

Also, orders of the commission would be enforceable through the courts with non-compliance resulting in the imposition of fines or imprisonment. Persons found guilty of non-compliance would be liable, if convicted on indictment, to imprisonment for two years and on summary conviction, to a fine of up to $10,000 or to imprisonment for one year or to both. Commission orders would also be subject to review under section 28 of the Federal Court Act.

It can be seen, Mr. Speaker, that the legislation provides a mechanism which will permit the Governor in Council to act promptly once there is a report by a board of inquiry, such as the Food Prices Review Board. Boards of inquiry could be set up in other areas as required with instructions to report within an appropriately short period of time. Furthermore, if necessary, the Governor in Council could declare the powers of this act in force without a board report on the basis of information available generally to it from normal government sources.

It is the government's intention, following enactment of this legislation, to proceed to establishment of other boards to inquire into pricing practices in certain areas that have a pervasive effect on the economy. I say this to answer those incorrect assertions made by some who have suggested that the government would be prepared to take action only with respect to the food area. In fact, the government would be ready, where necessary, to make use of the authority it is seeking in this bill as soon as it is finally approved by parliament and proclaimed in force. In any event, the existence of this legislation should act as a deterrent to those who might otherwise feel they can engage in profiteering with impunity.

In addition to the temporary freeze resulting from the declaration, an interim injunction could be obtained at any time to prevent the continuance of profiteering practices until the inquiry can be completed and the commission has dealt with the matter. This means that this legislation would have an immediate impact the moment a declaration is made.

Also, there would not be uncertainty after a declaration has been made. The declaration itself would specify the levels of distribution and the products to which it applies. In addition, specific guidelines for the determination of base price and customary profit margins will be provided by the Governor in Council. Therefore, any businessman affected would be able to determine when to give advance notice of a price increase to the director. He would also be able to determine whether he was exceeding customary profit margins and should therefore roll back his price.

Attempting to provide a single definition for customary profit margin in the bill would, I submit, not be practical nor could it be fair or effective. I say this because no single definition would always be correct for each and every sector of the economy. That is why we believe it is necessary that the Governor in Council have the authority to establish guidelines for determining a profit margin based on a determination of what is appropriate for the product and sector in question.

Mr. Speaker, we believe the measures in this bill have general support and approval among Canadians. They would provide an instrument not now available, to permit the government, on behalf of the people of Canada, to deal with pricing practices, which are particularly unacceptable during inflationary periods. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge this House to give prompt second reading of this bill and to enable it to become law at the earliest possible date in the interests of all the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the minister I can understand in a way why he was deserted by his colleagues in what surely must have been his finest hour. I was intrigued to hear him make the kind of statement that should more appropriately have been made before a committee when it is examining a bill of this kind, because there was no reference whatsoever to the philosophy, if there is any, behind the bill. I doubt if there is any. The minister made some reference to this bill being a part of the government's policy to deal with inflation. What policy, Mr. Speaker? It is certainly not apparent to this House and it is certainly not apparent to the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The minister likened himself to a traffic cop making selective arrests here and there. That is consistent, because obviously the government has no policy and the minister is like a traffic cop making arrests in a situation where there is no speed limit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the bill before us today will do nothing to bring relief to the people of this country who are suffering under a record high inflation of 10.4 per cent—let us make no mistake about that—notwithstanding any empty, high sounding phrases which the minister brought in today from the Speech from the Throne which opened this session because this bill and government action to date bears no relation to, and indeed is consistent with, the pious platitudes of the government made through the mouth of His Excellency.

• (1600)

Neither will this bill bring down food prices which have increased at the unbelievable rate of 18.6 per cent over the last year. Neither will this bill do anything about the serious situation in housing in Canada. The bill does not refer to housing. It specifically excludes housing. The minister said during his press conference that food prices are the principal objective of the bill. We have heard this before, in the Speech from the Throne opening this session and in the Speech from the Throne opening the session prior to this one, when there was talk of setting up a food prices committee.

What do we have at this time for dealing with food prices. We have the Food Prices Review Board. It has been in existence for just over one year and has been described by the Consumers Association of Canada as a useless, expensive appendage. What relief has the Food Prices Review Board brought the Canadian consumer.

An hon. Member: None.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, we believe it is necessary to limit profit margins during periods of high inflation. We believe it is necessary to limit profit margins to a level which enables industry to earn a rate of return sufficient to encourage new capital investment but, at the same time, to prevent windfall profits or uneconomic returns inherent in periods of inflationary expectations and new competitive market situations. This is inherent in our prices and incomes policy which was placed before this House more than one year ago.

What will this bill achieve? The difference, of course, is that ours is a comprehensive program. We do not intend by our program to fix the price of individual articles, as this bill sets out to do, and this, I might add, is one of the basic weaknesses of this bill. It is clear that the government does not intend to use this legislation to deal with inflation. Obviously, this will amount to a selective control policy. That is what the bill sets out to do. It will enable the new and very powerful Trade Practices Commission to freeze and roll back prices of every product or class of products, if it is found that their suppliers are making more than the customary profit margins or have withdrawn this product from the market to raise prices. This amounts to nothing more nor less than a selective price control policy. We reject that.

It seems most irregular to me that there should be such a dichotomy between what the government says and what it does. For example, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), who is a former minister of finance, told this House on March 15, 1974, in his capacity as acting minister of finance, as recorded at page 570 of Hansard that:

> ... selective controls ... are bound to be arbitrary. They are bound to have a selective effect which may not be acceptable.

He went on to say:

> Selective controls are likely to single out particular groups for government action, and to leave others untouched. That is fine in theory, but the trouble is that it leads the government into a general program because every group in the community wants someone else to be the target of government action.

It is worth continuing to read from this speech. The minister went on to say:

> The second point is one of general application ... It is the problem of anticipation ... All of the people selling goods in the country would be inclined to say, 'Let us get our increases put into effect before the government takes these measures.'

I suggest that the Minister of Consumer Affairs would have done well if he had read the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs before introducing this bill. On the occasion in question, the minister condemned the use of selective controls because of Canada's large dependence on foreign trade. He said:

> One would be forced, from putting on selective price controls, into selective export controls.

I commend those words to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray).

The use of selective controls by this government is nothing new. We are all well aware of the government's bread and milk subsidy programs, two programs which by the end of March had cost Canadian taxpayers $120 million and $87 million respectively, but did nothing to hold down prices. The government announced on September 4 of last year that milk prices would remain at current levels for 12 months. Notwithstanding that statement, milk prices to consumers rose last month, despite the subsidy, by about four cents a quart. We are told by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) that we can expect further increases in milk prices. Bread prices also rose from two cents to four cents a loaf last March, despite the $1.25 per bushel wheat subsidy which was imposed on September 4 to hold down prices, and despite the unheeded mumblings and grumblings of the relatively impotent Food Prices Review Board. Of course, the crowning failure of selective controls by this government was in its attempt to control beef prices and increase production by introducing a beef subsidy last March 15. The result was a complete disruption of the cattle market and even heavier losses to cattle producers.

This is the kind of result selective controls have on producers and consumers. Yet this is the kind of control the government is opting for under this proposed legislation. I wonder when the government will finally wake up to the fact that selective controls are inherently unfair, in view of the fact that they tend to discriminate against certain sectors of Canadian society and certain products. Only a comprehensive price and income stabilization program could hold the line on inflation while not jeopardizing any particular group.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been referring to this bill as an anti-inflation measure. Really, a most careful scrutiny of the contents of the bill would cause even the most objective observer to harbour the gravest doubts about it. I doubt if this piece of legislation will do anything at all to combat inflation. If the government's past performance can be used as an indicator, it is easy to see that it has consistently refused to accept the recommendations of various agencies to hold down even the most blatant examples of price increases.

Consider the report of the Food Prices Review Board on eggs. This report was made by the board on January 9. At that time the board said that egg prices were too high, and it recommended that the government take steps immediately to roll back the price of eggs. The following day the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said he would do something, that he would take action on the report. When the House resumed, the buck was passed by the minister, who is the best buck passer in the government—and God knows we have a cabinet of buck passers—to the Minister of Agriculture, who is no mean performer himself when it comes to buck passing. He, in turn, passed the buck to the Farm Products Marketing Council, where the buck has stopped. We have not heard from that body since then, notwithstanding the fact that eggs have risen in price over 31 per cent in 12 months in Canada, and no action has been taken to date. Surely the minister knows that eggs are a most important source of protein for low income earners of this country.

The situation with regard to rising bread prices was identical. The Food Prices Review Board stated that any increase beyond two cents a loaf would be unwarranted. The government refused to take any action and prices went up in some cases as much as four cents a loaf. With the labour unrest in the country and the difficulties of the small bakers, we can expect even greater increases in the price of bread this year. In light of this experience, it seems to be too pious a hope to expect the government to now change its stance and start accepting the recommendations of its various boards and agencies.

It is important to note that this bill merely gives the government the option of acting to prevent price increases. There are no built-in guarantees that the government will do so. Even if the Trade Practices Commission recommends a price roll-back or price freeze, cabinet may choose to ignore it. In view of so many past examples of just this kind of thing, we are really not expecting much from the government if this bill in fact ever becomes law.

As it stands, this bill seems to be a mere piece of fluff and unworkable in its present form. It gives all the appearance of being hastily contrived and a measure of political expediency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The determination of what are excess profits is so vague as to be almost meaningless. The bill says that the excess profit margin of a supplier is one which is greater than he would customarily obtain. Just how "customary profits" are to be determined is anybody's guess. We had hoped the minister would enlighten us on that today.

Mr. Stanfield: How could he when he doesn't know?

Mr. McGrath: That is right. That is why we got no further enlightenment from him today.

Another point of vagueness in the bill is the determination of the base price of a commodity under examination. This is to be up to the discretion of the governor in council. In addition, the cost of a product is to be computed on a basis consistent with that used in the last completed fiscal period of the supplier. A determination of profit margins using these criteria could result in gross injustices, both to the producers and to consumers who have to pay the price. So much depends on how cabinet interprets the margin of profit that nobody will know where he stands.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, has this government really envisioned the possible implications of its definition of excess profits? According to one economist, it would require a very large group of well informed bureaucrats, each having a sound knowledge of a particular industry, article or product to be able to give proper advice to the government. God knows that bureaucracy is large enough under this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Surely, the minister knows that profits are a cyclical phenomena and that establishing a customary profit margin for a product based on the last decade may not be an easy task. In fact, it may be impossible.

If you base your measure of customary profit margin for a firm on last year's performance, for example, it would not be appropriate for every industry. Some were depressed while some were having a bumper year. Therefore, this government will only be increasing an already large bureaucracy, and God only knows what the result will be. The Food Prices Review Board is a good example. When the Food Prices Review Board was set up on May 28, 1973, its initial budget was $500,000 and its permanent staff numbered about 20. Since then its budget has quadrupled to the point where it is almost $2 million and its staff has more than doubled to 48. In addition, the Food Prices Review Board has entered into 29 contracts for 31 studies, thereby further increasing its bureaucracy.

Let us take a look at the power of this bill. The cabinet is given the ultimate decision as to what action to take with respect to demanding payment from suppliers or price roll backs and freezes under this bill. It may, on its own initiative, declare an emergency situation and refer the pricing policy of a particular supplier to the Trade Practices Commission.

Again on its own initiative, it may order the supplier to pay the Crown what it has decided are undue profits. In my view, that constitutes an arbitrary imposition of tax without reference to a ways and means motion of this House. I hope the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) will have an opportunity to say more about that later.

In order for the cabinet and/or the proposed Trade Practices Commission to exercise the discretionary powers under this bill, it will be necessary to closely monitor the market place. The minister may say that this role will be carried out by the Food Prices Review Board. I see the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), a distinguished member of the food prices committee, smiling because he is skeptical. He knows whereof I speak. If we had to depend on the Food Prices Review Board to do the monitoring necessary under this bill, I would tell the House that this speaks for itself. Furthermore, the process by which this bill would become operative could be a long and cumbersome one which would considerably diminish its effectiveness.

Editorial writers and columnists all across the country have either dismissed the bill as so much political puffery, which it is, or have described it as bad law, which it is, that should never find its way as presented into the statute books of this country. The bill is imprecise in its application and vague in its definition. We have a responsibility to all our constituents. It would hang like a sword over every business person in the country because it could be selectively applied at any time. In the words of today's lead editorial in the Globe and Mail "There would be no fair warning". After the contribution by the minister today, he would do well to sit and ponder what he has produced before this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: We believe that if this bill ever passes, and we doubt very much whether it will become law, it should be subject to regular parliamentary review. Let me make it clear that this party utterly rejects the position that it should stay on the statute books of this country in its present form. If the opportunity presents itself, we will be moving amendments to try and strengthen and improve what is good about the bill and delete what is bad.

My point is that this bill is unacceptable to this party in its present form. We merely look upon it as another half-hearted attempt by this government to hang on to power, another half-hearted attempt to fill the shopping basket of the NDP in order to buy time while the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) keeps telling us the worst is yet to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1620)

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friends and I have given the bill now before us very careful study. Indeed, we gave it very anxious study to determine whether it is a measure which can really help Canadians, which can really reduce the heavy burden of the increasing cost of living under which Canadian families now labour.

I want to emphasize that this is the only test which should be applied to this bill: will it in fact be of value to Canadian families? The ingenious framework underlying this measure—and it is extremely ingenious, so ingenious that it is a maze rather than a process—can obscure the issue, but cannot help it. We have also studied, for reasons I shall explain in a few moments, statements made by government spokesmen with respect to this bill—statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and by the minister who introduced this legislation and who will carry the responsibility for its implementation.

In view of the nature of the bill, we wanted to find out what the intentions of the government as to the application of the bill when it becomes law are likely to be. Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you immediately that on the basis of the bill which we have studied and on the basis of the timid statements made by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray), statements which I shall outline during the next few minutes, we find it impossible in conscience to support this measure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: So long over there, its been nice seeing you!

Mr. Lewis: I want to say to members of the Conservative Party on my right that they would be in the same boat if they were across the aisle, because if legislation is to bring effective results for the benefit of the people of Canada at this stage in our history it would be necessary for the government to possess the will and the courage to challenge and reduce the powers of the corporate market. Unless a parliament and unless a government has the will to challenge corporate power in this country, whatever is presented will inevitably be mere window dressing incapable of any effectiveness.

Mr. Speaker, I said we have paid particular attention to statements made on behalf of the government with respect to this bill. Why have we done so? We have done so because this bill, unlike many others, depends entirely—I repeat, it depends entirely—on the manner in which it is implemented by the government. I remind members of the House that the proclamation of the bill is of no effect. If this bill were passed today and proclaimed tomorrow, proclamation would have not the slightest effect. None of the bill applies to anything when it is made law. This is literally the case. None of the bill applies to anything, because before it can make any impact a second step is required—a declaration, as the bill calls it, a declaration by the government making the provisions of the bill applicable to an article or class of articles. The government can either declare the entire bill applicable or they can declare only part of the bill to be applicable; they are not obliged to declare sections 51, 52 and 53 which deal with a price freeze and with notification. They are not obliged to declare those sections if they do not wish to do so.

The bill gives the government a further power, the power to define what is meant by customary profits. This definition is binding on the director of research, binding on the commission, and, presumably, binding on the courts, if an issue gets to the courts. The government is the body which makes the decision as to what is the base price under sections 51, 52 and 53. It is the government which has the power to apply or not to apply the terms of the bill to an article. It has the power to apply the whole bill or to apply only part of it. It has the power to define customary profit, the power to define what is the base price. I say the bill is not worth the paper it is written on unless the government is prepared to take action. In these circumstances, the intention of the government—what the Prime Minister said when he told us the bill would be introduced, and what the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said when he introduced the bill and made statements to the press outside this chamber—are of great importance in considering whether or not we can support this legislation, since they indicate what the intentions of the government are.

I turn, therefore, to a report in the Montreal Star of April 25, a report which appeared in a number of other papers. Here is part of this report. I quote:

> The Prime Minister indicated that the legislation might not be proclaimed until needed. He suggested that the threat of it would be enough to stop companies from profiteering.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has been making these threats for months. I have not noticed that profiteering has stopped, and to suggest that this might happen is sheer silliness.

Then, I note what the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said, according to a recent report. Again, I quote:

> The minister indicated, however, that the powers were to be used sparingly. "They would only apply to the most serious and obvious cases".

So those are the intentions of the government. They bring down a bill which gives them the power to act and they inform the people of Canada that they do not intend to act, except, possibly, in the most serious and obvious cases. In other words, a little profiteering is okay, you can get away with it; only when there is immense profiteering on a scale that even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) cannot deny, will the government act. And the Prime Minister says: Maybe we shall not have to act at all.

When the government tells us they are concerned about profiteering I cannot help recalling that both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) have been going about the country in the last little while telling everybody within earshot and everybody who can read that profits and high profits are a good thing because they encourage investment and create jobs. Am I supposed to believe that a government consisting of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who made the statement to which I referred a few months ago, is likely to make this bill work except in cases no one could possibly overlook?

In fact, in one of the supporting documents the minister issued when he introduced the bill—and listen to this, Mr. Speaker; how can the minister expect us to support the measure in these circumstances—the statement appeared: "Available evidence does not suggest widespread abuses". I do not know what the minister means by the word "abuses". All I know is that a report in the newspaper this morning of a private survey of 111 companies in this country showed an increase in corporate profits for the first quarter of this year amounting to 70 per cent over the first quarter of last year. Part of that increase was undoubtedly connected with exports going outside this country but a major portion was made out of the hide of the Canadian consumer. What more evidence does the minister require in order to show that there had been abuses?

We have placed on record on a number of occasions in this parliament the profits made by various sectors of the economy including, for example, figures showing that the profits made by Westons had risen 86 per cent in 1973. When the minister gave us an example in one of the documents he presented—I know he changed it today—he said the customary profit would be the profit made a year ago. That is not going to make George Weston cry or tremble in his boots. He is going to laugh all the way to the bank with that kind of active profiteering. I emphasize again my reference to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as that is of particular relevance and particular emphasis because of the fact that under the act he is to administer this bill; he is to implement the bill. If this government continues and the job is left in his hands, in view of the statement he has made, that alone is reason enough for voting against this bill.

● (1630)

Members of my party and I have frequently emphasized that we are opposed to over-all price and income freezes and controls. I could not help but feel a little amused when the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) was castigating the government for the relatively small bureaucracy the bill might produce, and when he was suggesting a comprehensive price and income freeze and control. Really he ought to have had his tongue in his cheek, as I cannot think of anything that would require a larger bureaucracy, than that kind of policy.

An hon. Member: It would help the unemployment problem.

Mr. Lewis: We have opposed this and so have members of the Conservative party in spite of what they say. At one moment they say they want comprehensive price and income controls. At the next moment they say there will be no price control at the farm gate, and that is a pretty good exclusion. At the next moment somebody says that, of course we cannot freeze all wages and we will have to let somebody have a little more flexibility, and at the next moment somebody mentions some other exclusion. The reason they make these exclusions one after the other is that even they realize when they state it that their policy is either unworkable or unjust, and is most likely both unworkable and unjust.

There are a lot of people who claim that certain workers in Canada should be prevented by law from striking. We have had evidence of the fact that because there is a law that makes striking illegal does not necessarily mean some people will not in the tragedy they find themselves, and in the distress from which they suffer, take action which may be unlawful as far as the law is concerned. To suggest that those people should have their wages frozen, that the hospital workers in Ontario should have their wages frozen for even 90 days, and for another year and a half or two years, is really too uncivilized.

We have equally rejected the idea that the government can do nothing, because there are areas in which action is possible. We have suggested among other things four ways in which to ease the pressure of inflation in Canada, and I have chosen my words carefully. I do not think any policy can, in the present international situation, remove the pressure of prices, and anybody who suggests that he can wave a wand and end inflation in Canada completely, does not know anything about economics, or is dishonest, or is both lacking in knowledge and dishonest. It cannot be done.

There are ways in which the burden of the cost of living can be reduced and there are ways in which profiteering at the expense of the people can be effectively stopped. We have suggested an effective agency with power to roll back unjustifiable increases in prices. We have urged an excess profits tax and we have urged a two-price system for a number of major commodities so that Canadians are not forced to pay the price for their own products that the international markets can now command. We have also urged on the government and on the country a policy on mortgages that would reduce mortgage rates to 6 per cent, which would be of immediate assistance to every family seeking a house and to every family renting a unit.

Of course, I appreciate that this bill does accept the idea that there is profiteering and that profiteering should be stopped, but I have no illusions about the fact that it was intended at least in part, before anybody on the Liberal side jumps to his feet, and I would even be inclined to suggest in major part, and even go further than that and suggest a significantly major part, as a sop to the NDP members in this House. But we do not intend to accept a piece of legislation that plays a hoax on the people of Canada.

Let me now deal with the bill itself. Why do I say it is a hoax? First, please note that it does not cover services, and that plays an important part in people's lives, because what is involved in services are not merely lawyers, doctors, engineers and architects, important as they are, but also involves banks, insurance companies, loan sharks, mortgage corporations, restaurants and transportation, although transportation has its own CTC, and all of these areas affect the cost of living directly. I simply do not know what kind of timidity prevents the bill from applying on a selective basis in all the areas that affect the living of Canadian people.

• (1640)

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in more than one newspaper report I have read is quoted as having said that this bill does not apply to housing. If that is true, that alone condemns the bill as worthless.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Just imagine pretending to deal with profiteering and leaving the builders and developers to do as they like with the Canadian people and the lives of Canadian families. That is my first objection, that it does not apply to services, housing and that kind of area. Second, the minister has made clear in introducing the bill that the sections which give the government authority to invoke the provisions of the bill on its own without a prior inquiry would be used only in emergency cases. Those are his words.

In an emergency the government could itself without any prior inquiry declare the application of the bill to an article or class of articles. In order to do that the government would have to have some information. If it is to rely on information from the Department of Finance, from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce or Statistics Canada, if that is to be sufficient to deal with the situation, why in heaven's name do we have all this rigamarole about people making inquiries under the Public Inquiries Act? I ask the minister whom he is trying to fool. If it is possible to act on the basis of information already available through the normal departments of government, why is there this rigamarole in respect of this bill? The fact is that it is impossible for the government to act really on the kind of information that is available through the various departments. Therefore, I come to a very major omission in this bill which makes it exceedingly weak if not worse; that is, it does not provide for a continuing agency monitoring and inquiring into prices right across the line in this country.

If one meant business, if one were serious about this, obviously what one would do is have a continuing monitoring agency to see what is happening in respect of prices with the power either under the Public Inquiries Act or special powers, I do not care which, to look at the books of the companies enterprises and concerns involved so that there would be on a continuing basis the kind of information on which a government might quickly act. But we do not have that. We have no monitoring device which has any power. The government is to act on some information undefined at some time, God knows when. That is a big hole in the legislation.

I object as strongly as I can, thirdly, to the fact that the bill is given into the hands of a part-time commission. I just cannot understand that. I cannot understand it because it indicates to me a lack of seriousness. The job of implementing or administering this bill is given to the Trade Practices Commission as it is now to be called, the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission as formerly called, which has an immense job now under the old act. The new competition bill will add tremendously to its duties. It will be very busy dealing with all sorts of things that are now described and defined in the old act and in the new competition bill. We therefore ask whether giving that commission the job of looking after the cost of living of the Canadian people makes any sense to anyone who is serious about the matter.

The government realized what it was doing and in part tried to put somewhere in the bill a clause which says that any application by the director of research to the commission should be given priority insofar as is practicable. Insofar as it is practicable—who is to decide that and when? I suggest it is a sign of a lack of seriousness that the government could not establish a special commission full time that would be allocated to this important job, to this most important job so far as the lives of the Canadian people are concerned. If the government wished to make this a permanent commission, why does it not have a second chairman so that there would be a separate panel of the commission to deal with nothing else but the application and implementation of this legislation. It is my feeling that the absence of a full-time commission to deal with this simply fails to show seriousness.

Then, when we look at the way in which the information is to be gathered, again I cannot understand that. I may be missing something, but I studied the bill for two days. I have re-read it thoroughly until I know it almost by heart, and I just cannot see it. What is the normal process? Remember that the minister said that only in an emergency would the government act on its own motion. The normal process is an inquiry by someone under the Public Inquiries Act, either the Food Prices Review Board or the other inquiry that the minister said the government comtemplates appointing. So, you have one inquiry and on the basis of a report from that inquiry the government makes a declaration applying the act to certain articles. When it has done that there is another inquiry by the director of research and investigation of the Trade Practices Commission and when he has finished there is a third inquiry by the commission itself.

By the time this elongated process ends the skin of thousands of consumers will have been completely taken off.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I have asked myself a dozen times since I read the bill, if these people mean business why is there this elongated complicated process. You appoint someone to make the inquiry and on the basis, of that inquiry you make a declaration and shoot it to the commission to make the order. If the commission feels it is necessary to have a hearing the parties concerned will have their day in court. This I fully support because it is part of our law and tradition. I have no objection to that. The commission has that hearing by appointing an inquiry before the declaration and after the declaration and then that is followed by a further inquiry by the commission. At every stage there is delay because of the way in which a company could withhold its books, lose its invoices or lose its bills and the way in which it can obfuscate and obscure the facts from the inquiry. The delay at every stage of the process makes this bill not a serious bill.

Then, we have an important part of the bill, clauses 51, 52 and 53, which contains the germ of what we in the New Democratic Party have been after for a couple or more years; that is the power to stop a price increase if it is undesirable and anti-social. Heaven's above, the steel corporations have increased steel prices half a dozen times in the last 12 months, and steel enters into the construction of homes and of every appliance we use. The nickel manufacturers have increased the price of nickel. The prices of copper, lumber, bricks, cement have all increased. All of these things that enter into the cost of living have been increased immensely in the past 12 months. In our submission, these firms should be made to give notice in every case that they intend a price increase.

● (1650)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: When a thorough but quick inquiry is made and a price increase is found to be unjustified, there must be immediate authority to tell the company that they cannot increase their price. I invite members of this House, members of the press and the public to read sections 51, 52 and 53 carefully. What you will find is, first, as I have already said, that the government does not have to declare those sections; it can declare the rest of the act without them. Second, you will find that even when they declare those sections, all that will happen will be that the firm will have to give notice within 30 days or an earlier period. There is nothing in those sections that gives anybody except the court the authority to say to the firms: the price increase you propose is unjustified and you cannot have it.

Neither the commission nor the government is given the power to do that. So, in order to freeze the price after notification of a price increase, the minister was bold enough to say that he had the power to freeze the price. I tell him he is talking through his hat. He does not have that power. In order to freeze the price, the attorney general of Canada (Mr. Lang) will have to go to court and make an application for an interim injunction, which he could get ex parte under certain conditions.

I have practised enough law, not for very many years of my life but enough of it, to know that when you start on that road, the consumer will not get any help. There is a hearing in court and probably an appeal from the decision of the court, and God knows when the price freeze will actually apply. Why is that? If the government provides in the bill a way in which people must give notification of a price increase, then what is it that prevented this government, other than its lack of seriousness, from adding a subsection saying that in such cases the cabinet, the governor in council or the commission will have the authority to say: You cannot increase your price unless we give you permission to do so.

Mr. Gray: That is what it says.

Mr. Lewis: It does not say anything of the sort. Let the minister read his own bill. In order to get that, he will have to go to court.

The kernel of the bill, of course, is the definition of customary profit and the definition of base price. Why did the government make reference to what they call "customary profit"? This is where I think my friend, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), is wrong when he says that this bill represents selective price control. It is nothing of the sort. It is an ill-digested attempt to stop some obvious, serious and visible profiteering, and that is all. If it were going to be a selective price control bill with any meaning, then I suggest that the criterion should have been a reasonable price in the light of increased costs of production, taking into account inflationary influences on the cost of production. An assurance should have been given to the consumers in Canada that the profits which have been made in the last two years at their expense will not be the guide as to what they are to pay after some law comes into effect, but the guide will be the price they paid before inflation became unbearable to the people of Canada, say two or three years ago, adjusted to the increased costs of production including the weight of inflationary influences.

That is not a complicated concept and it could have been written into the law so that everybody would know, not only the consumer but the supplier, exactly what it is we are after, and no selective price control mechanism is of value if the price is held at the level which it has already reached in relation to the profits that the corporations have already made. For heaven's sake, how much more are you going to let the corporations make at the expense of the people of Canada?

I want to express one more criticism of the bill and then make a few more general comments before my time expires. I object to the fact that the bill says that inquiries are to be in private and that even the commission may, if it decides, hold its inquiries in private. One of the values of this kind of legislation is that the people of Canada know what is happening to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Once the cabinet makes the decision that there is enough reason to declare the act applicable to certain suppliers and certain products, there is no excuse for having the inquiry in private, other than the protection of the profiteers.

Over a year ago we urged parliament and the government to establish a Food Prices Review Board with power. We got a Food Prices Review Board without power, and all the time that very intelligent chairman of the board goes around the country babbling things, the prices continue to go up. We agreed to the foreign investment bill, and after urging that it be strengthened we succeeded in having it strengthened, but so far only a part of it has been proclaimed. The most important part has not even been proclaimed, and I do not know what has happened to it. With regard to the Trade Practices Commission, let us remember the years that that commission has taken to deal with anything concerning the Canadian people. Let me remind you of the sugar cartel in Canada. After the three firms involved had already been fined, it took the commission ten more years before they got them into court again, and in the meantime there have been absolutely criminal increases in the price of sugar to the Canadian consumer, while the commission took ten years to find out again what it had found out ten years earlier.

I state to the government, to my friends in the House in all sections through you, Mr. Speaker, that we are not prepared to accept the kind of sop that the Food Prices Review Board has turned out to be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The points which I made with regard to the bill, the statements of the government to which I referred, indicate clearly that neither the bill nor the government are serious about assisting the Canadian consumer in a meaningful and effective way. It is a sop to us which we are not accepting. It is a piece of political windowdressing that attempts to tell the Canadian consumer that something is being done for him when in fact nothing is being done for him.

Finally, we reached a decision, not with any glee because the condition of the Canadian people in the present situation deserves the attention of this parliament and of this government. Canadians deserve legislation that will reduce the burden of the cost of living on the Canadian family, that will really hold prices in selective areas at a reasonable level, and that will really hit everybody who is trying to profiteer at the expense of the Canadian consumer. We need such legislation, but we need legislation that is good, that is tough, that is effective, that is serious and that is meaningful. We cannot let the government get away with the kind of legislation it has now proposed, mere gestures in an area which is too serious to be treated with the contempt that, in my view, this bill suggests.

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, once again we find that this government is not interested in solving problems. In an article published in La Presse the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) is reported as saying that this bill is first and above all intended as an instrument in the fight against inflation. Going through the bill clause by clause we realize that it will not solve inflation problems but change the name of the "Restrictive Trade Practices Commission" to the "Trade Practices Commission." It is fantastic to see how a name change can help people!

Furthermore, the number of standing members will be increased from 4 to 7. That might at least help create three more jobs but what will people derive from it? Absolutely nothing, probably a little less money. Three jobs will be created at the expense of the people of this country who will have to pay further taxes to pay for those three jobs. People did not benefit from it yet.

What about the authority to appoint five temporary members if necessary. The bill indicates further that that will not be used often.

Third, the commission has no other power than to inquire and report its findings to the minister but not on its own only after securing leave to inquire. They cannot even inquire on their own. They have to secure permission to inquire from the government. And there is still talk about wanting to solve inflation problems, those of the years 1980 or 1985 and not those of today. But when permission has to be secured to do a rush job type of inquiry as witnessed in recent years I am sure that people will feel the taste of inflation problems for a hell of a long time yet.

Fourth, the Governor in Council determines what products will be investigated. It seems to me this bill would allow for pressure to be applied on companies.

Go and see them before the election with the bill and tell them: If you do not contribute to the election fund, your production will be declared under the legislation. If you contribute, we will let you go. The Liberal party is sticking a knife in the manufacturers. No provision of that bill deals with sectors which precisely contribute to inflation in Canada. Service industries, banks, finance companies and real estate operations are left out. Recently, the Bank of Canada was allowed to increase its interest rates. Now automatically, the chartered banks increased theirs, thus raising production costs in Canada. The government is not considering a review of that practice. If it prevented the banks from exaggerating, prices could be reduced and the public would be satisfied instead of leaving the so-called inflation die out, as it is now, but nothing is done.

Finally, the bill states that if there are abuses—after three series of inquiries, as was suggested by the hon. member who spoke before me—if the government decides that abuses actually took place it can force the manufacturer or the company to pay back the excess profit not to the consumer but to the government. This is a new method of taxation. They do not have the guts to go and tax people because it is not politically advisable but they found a new way of levying a new tax through companies. And who is going to foot the bill? Still good old John Q. Public because of shameless gouging not abusive practice on the part of companies but intellectually abusive practice on the part of this government. There is no proposed solution, nothing specific in the sense of facing any or all sectors of the economy with the possibility of consumer protection. The bill says only that if a government feels it should apply the act at some point it will do so but if it does not feel it should at some other point it will apply it in part or not at all. In other words, as was so properly suggested in the heading of a column by an economic critic, "An act that will check absolutely nothing." A non-act. We waste our time discussing pious wishes, leading Canadians to think they will be able to meet all their needs with their current purchasing power. If but a ray of hope could allow them to look forward to that then we could say an effort was made to help them. But Bill C-29 now before us indicates in no way any possibility or ray of hope for Canadians that their current purchasing power will enable them to meet all their needs. As I said earlier, banks and finance companies are allowed to increase their interest rates. There is complaining about higher salaries but the cost of production and production financing is allowed to go up to such an extent that no increase in salaries will ever catch up with production cost. In other words, the government cannot give any guarantee whatsoever, it is not seeking any means to ensure that $1 in wages will equal $1 in production. The situation is allowed to deteriorate and when we compare the figures with those of 1940, we realize that today $1 does not buy $1 in production, but 18 cents. There are loud complaints about inflation, international inflationary pressures, while in our countries, the cost of houses is allowed to get higher. For instance, we still have an 11 per cent tax on building materials that is another factor in price hikes. Nonetheless, we complain about inflation!

Legislation like Bill C-29 is introduced, a bill which is not really a bill, but simply a sheet of paper to make the population believe that the minister did finally wake up. However, we can be assured that such a bill will represent a considerable amount of work for the members of parliament during the next few days, if only to convince the minister to make some useful suggestions, because it is easy to see that Bill C-29 has missed the boat and missed it lamentably.

These, Mr. Speaker, were the few comments that I wished to make and, in closing, I should like to tell the minister that he should not only try to put the population to sleep but to wake up himself and as soon as possible, because it is not with a bill like this one that he will stop the inflationary price increase and the arrogance of certain companies like the oil product companies, for instance, or the sugar manufacturers, who, as was stated a while ago, could not care less about the government and continue to increase their prices. However, the government helps indirectly these companies to laugh at the government by introducing a bill like Bill C-29, in which they are told quite simply: We are here, but we shall not bother with the problem and if, at any time, we feel that you are acting up too much, maybe then we can apply a little pressure to scare you.

But the government is not at all serious in introducing such a bill, and I hope that the minister will at least have the decency to wake up before third reading and propose amendments to the House or accept amendments which will at last enable the population to have if not a satisfactory legislation, at least a partly logical one instead of a nonsensical one.

[English]

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I believe that, once again, the government has introduced a good bill because one hears from the other side of the House speeches of contradictory indignation. The NDP contends that this bill would tie the hands of business and inhibit its ability to compete in world markets, an ability which is important as we are an exporting nation. Presumably the NDP is thinking of the way business should be run under an NDP government. I suggest that under such a government, unemployment would rise to over 20 per cent, and that government would be kicked out, as well it should be. I am referring to the tying-of-the-hands-behind-the-back of business approach of the NDP.

On the other side of the record, we hear the contradictory indignation of the Conservative party. What does the leader of the party suggest we should do with regard to those exorbitant or unconscionable profits being made by a very small segment of our business community. We should, as the Progressive Conservative party suggested in British Columbia, hold an informal inquiry. This bill occupies ground somewhere in between those two positions. We say that in cases where business is making an unconscionably large profit the government is obliged to act. That is the philosophy behind the bill.

I was surprised to hear the leader of the NDP this afternoon say that he could not understand why inquiries in relation to excess profits should be conducted in private. I think he has been a politician too long, and too far removed from the courts and the days when he was a practising lawyer. He stated that if there were some suggestion of some particular business making unconscionable profits, that business should be deemed to be guilty and be required to prove its innocence in the full glare of publicity. I suggest, with respect, that is contrary to everything we have been taught under the British system of justice. The hon. member, after the next election, will be given the opportunity to return to the practice of law and learn what justice under our constitution means.

Mr. Baldwin: Has the hon. member some clients from his side of the House lined up?

Mr. Cullen: We also heard members say that the government has done nothing to fight inflation in Canada. We can take that to be nothing but political rhetoric, because when such people are faced either this year or next, with a list of the things the government has done, they will be forced to admit it has done a tremendous amount to combat inflation.

What does this bill endeavour to do. As was indicated in the Speech from the Throne and in speeches of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) before and since that time, the government has been actively exploring the means to prevent profiteering from increasing prices. As a result, we have the bill before us to amend the Combines Investigation Act in relation to profiteering practices. It will provide the government with authority to protect Canadians from certain price gouging and profiteering practices which can occur in present conditions of inflation. I submit the government is carrying out its responsibility in this area because it is concerned that certain business enterprises have been taking advantage of current economic conditions and unduly enhancing their profits.

The available evidence does not suggest that these abuses are widespread, but if one listens to the political rhetoric of the opposition one might think that they are extensive. I submit that the proposed measure will enable the government to deal with these abuses where they are found to exist. No such legislation now exists, and the government is obliged to bring forward a measure such as this. This is not the only measure, but is one of the measures in this area.

In my view, this bill will be a boon to those businesses making large but not excessive profits, because they will be given the opportunity to put before the commission or tribunal facts and figures to show that their profits are not exorbitant. They will be able to deal with political rhetoric as practised by the NDP, and the NDP will learn that you cannot fool all the people all the time, a message they have been slow to learn.

Recently, the position adopted by the NDP with regard to percentages was attacked by the Ottawa Journal, which showed how ridiculous is the approach of that party when it considers increased profits in percentage terms. That newspaper mentioned a mining enterprise which had lost substantial sums of money for 10 years and in one year, according to the criterion of the NDP, had increased its profits by 4,000 per cent. It asked, would this increase in profits be challenged as exorbitantly large in view of the losses sustained over the last 10 or 15 years.

It is interesting to note that when we deal with small amounts of money, or small increases in profits, percentages are quoted. When we speak of return on investment, and there is a minimum return on investment, we hear millions of dollars mentioned, not percentages.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) indicated that the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices met several times and made excellent recommendations, most of which the government accepted. Probably only one has not been accepted, the recommendation with regard to establishing the standing committee on consumer affairs. I bring that recommendation to the minister's attention. It was an excellent one.

It was suggested that the Food Prices Review Board is a monitoring board. The food prices committee did not reach its decision lightly. Our terms of reference said that we had to confine our recommendations to the food industry. It was a Progressive Conservative government of Alberta which recommended that it not be a tribunal with powers to roll back or fix prices. Their recommendation was a monitoring board. In effect, that recommendation came also from other sources. It was solely the decision of the food prices committee. It was the decision of the committee based upon evidence presented to it by no less an authority than the Progressive Conservative government of Alberta. This Food Prices Review Board came up with excellent reports. I am not surprised that it is being attacked by the Progressive Conservative party because it showed the temporary wage and price controls policy of the Conservatives for the sham it is.

In times of shortage, we bring in this kind of legislation to cope with someone who might gouge as a result of the inflation which exists today in Canada. However, in times of shortage you do not put on controls. You do not try to control the import of foodstuffs from outside the country. The Conservatives have yet to indicate how they would control prices established in the international market.

A careful reading of the report of the Special Committee on Trends and Food Prices will indicate that among the recommendations there is a suggestion that one of the causes of inflation, particularly in the food industry which probably has the greatest impact, is the effect of increasing production. It is spelled out throughout the Speech from the Throne that this, in fact, is an area in which we must be moving. We must increase production, not only on the farms, but in the manufacturing industry. That is the approach that will win in the long run, not some temporary panacea such as wage and price controls.

The political speeches we heard this afternoon were almost a gasp of desperation from the opposition. It is interesting that one member says there is no place for a westerner in the Progressive Conservative party. On the other hand, we find that in Quebec there is a place in the Conservative party for a candidate judged to be too separatist by the Union Nationale party.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. How can the hon. member who has the floor relate those remarks to the bill before the House?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to do so. Apparently the hon. member was not listening to all my speech. He only listened to a part of it. I indicated that the official opposition party, in its attack on this bill, was not making a sincere attack. It is really a desperation measure brought on by the splits within that party. The are not attacking the bill on its merits, but are simply trying to nudge their new-found NDP friends into an election.

No one suggests that this bill is the complete answer to the problem of inflation and rising prices. It is simply an attempt to attack one area where individuals might be taking advantage of the present situation. It is wrong to suggest no other measures have been taken. I could just list a few things. We have lowered income tax, particularly for those at the lower end of our tax scale. We increased family allowances, old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, veterans pensions and the Canada Pension. This is only one more measure in the attack we are making within the scope of an individual country to fight inflation.

If this bill and the other steps I have suggested are not the answer, we have to look to other parties for alternatives. What would be the situation if the official opposition had been the government for the past 16 months? We certainly would not have had a bill like this, although most assuredly we would have needed it. That party was advocating a deficit of $2 billion to $5 billion. It has not made up its mind how far it should go. What would that have done to inflation in this country? We are a trading country. That measure would have induced inflation.

The official opposition has talked of a 90 to 120 day freeze. When criticized, they decided it would not work too well and opted for 90 days until my colleague, the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) pointed out that if you interfere in the market place to this extent, you cannot do it on a temporary basis. He said that price increases and production would simply be held back, and we would be hit with their full effect at the end of the 90 or 120 day period. We heard suggestions from time to time that the measure that should be taken would be to put on wage and price controls for a period of two years. I must say that 33 per cent of the young Conservatives had the good sense to realize this was not the policy to combat inflation, particularly the kind we have in Canada today.

We hear the opposition parties talking about the fact that interest rates have been on the increase and should be lowered. They say that money should be lent at lower rates. Who would lend? When I hear that, it reminds me of the story that has been told in this House about the lady who went to a store and told the storekeeper she could buy bananas down the road for 20 per cent less. When the chap asked why she did not go down the road to buy bananas for 20 per cent less, she said they did not have any. The storekeeper told her that when he did not have any bananas, his price was 50 per cent less. That seems to be the philosophy of the opposition party.

Mr. Dick: What is the point?

Mr. Cullen: I am surprised the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) does not understand. He was not listening.

Rather than surrender to inflation, there has been a recognition by this party of that particular factor in our economy here today. Where most parties in past throne speeches have tried to hide behind things difficult for the country or any political party to face, we spelled out the problem in the throne speech. We indicated the measures to be taken. Just as important, we indicated some of the measures not to be taken; certainly not the imposition of wage and price controls.

This bill is complicated. We are dealing with a complicated situation. We recognize that the majority of businessmen in Canada are not taking advantage or charging exorbitant prices. We have to deal with a very small segment of the community. Sometimes large businesses make excessive profits. These have to be identified and price gouging has to be stopped. This bill is one step in that direction. I am prepared to support this bill, not as the be-all and end-all, and not as the way to stop all exorbitant profits, but certainly as one weapon in the arsenal we are using to fight inflation in Canada.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians are asking why the government had the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) bring in this bill as an amendment to the Combines Investigation Act. I suppose some might suggest that this measure is given an aura of respectability in the sense it is not a new act, but an amendment to a long-standing and existing act. It may gain some respectability by appending these new powers to an existing tribunal, the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, which will now become known as the Trade Practices Commission.

There is another explanation that may have more credibility and which is receiving a much wider degree of acceptance in Canada. It is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), who might normally be expected to introduce a legislative measure of this nature, wanted to get as far away from this piece of legislation as possible. Indeed, I think that the presence or lack of presence of ministers in the House this afternoon is a clear indication that the government has some reservations about this legislation. They have thrown it out as a trial balloon. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) called it a sop to his party. The government has made a scapegoat of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs because it now appears he will fall flat on his face.

The other significant aspect of this debate is a statement made today by the leader of the New Democratic Party. I do not have the advantage of the Hansard record of today's proceedings, but I will quote the statement as accurately as I can. I think it is important, not only in the sense that it tells a story concerning this piece of legislation and the evolution of the NDP, but because it tells the story of this 29th parliament and what has been going on, if the people of Canada do not already know. The leader of the NDP said "We are not prepared to accept again the sort of sop that the Food Prices Review Board turned out to be". To my way of thinking, that is a candid admission that they have been handed sops in the past. They have accepted them, they have been had, and the people of Canada now know that. I do not really want to gloat and say "We told you so" but maybe this is the importance of the conversion we have witnessed today. It is a sign that a minority party in this House, a party which has for so many months prevented the people of Canada from having a say concerning the economic questions confronting this nation, has at last admitted that it is time for a change.

● (1730)

The leader of the NDP attached a good deal of importance to statements made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs since this bill was given first reading on Monday. He also referred to statements made by the Prime Minister. Since the powers for which provision is made in the bill are powers which are delegated to the executive, and to a tribunal, and since they do not become operative automatically, but at the pleasure of the government, the hon. member for York South was correct in saying it was important to take these statements into account when assessing what the government will likely do following the bill's enactment. That is a responsible position and it is one which members of my party will take.

I am glad to see the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in his place because I want to throw out some challenges to him. Perhaps he can arrange for some answers to be provided. Can the minister indicate who are the suspected offenders in terms of gouging and profiteering? What are the mischiefs to which the legislation is directed? Is it the price of oil, is it the oil companies which the government intends to reach through this legislation?

Now, if we look at the bill carefully we find that oil may be exempt. The bill refers constantly to "articles", and the term, "article" is defined in the present Combines Investigation Act as meaning "an article or commodity which may be the subject of trade or commerce". Mr. Speaker, there is another bill before parliament, presently in committee, Bill C-7, an Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act, which extends the definition of "article" and included in that extended definition is "energy, however, generated". We can only conclude that if the government found it necessary in Bill C-7 to extend the definition of "article" and if the bill now before us were to receive speedy passage before Bill C-7, and we had to rely on the old definition of "article", then "energy, however generated" would be excluded.

Let me suggest some further examples. Does the government have in mind the price of eggs? The price of eggs may be exempt under this legislation because it relates to an agricultural product. There may be profiteering on the part of those who sell eggs, but they are exempt. What else does the minister have in mind? He has declined to give us any of the necessary information. The whole philosophy of this legislation, if there is any, is to place these powers in the hands of the Governor in Council, the cabinet, which in turn may seek the advice of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. Trust us, they say, and somewhere along the line we may take action. In my view, this is not good enough. It is too arbitrary. It runs contrary to a fundamental rule of law, a fundamental principle which should be contained in all legislation which receives the approval of the House.

Consider certain other sections of this legislation. What about services? Services were mentioned by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and by the hon. member for York South. Now the minister certainly mentioned them when he spoke not long ago in the debate on Bill C-7. They are included in that bill. He said that 20 per cent of the gross domestic product of this country was comprised of services, and that this percentage figure was increasing. Yet for some mysterious reason which the minister could have explained in the last two days, services are not included. Is the minister suggesting that there is no possibility of profiteering or gouging on the part of the professions in Canada? Is he suggesting that management consultants, accountants, those involved in private transportation enterprises, advertising agencies and consumer finance companies are incapable of engaging in profiteering or gouging? Why were they excluded? Again, this is a selective policy, and it is one which should not be supported by members of this House.

Reference has been made to the cost of housing. Again, I refer to the definition of "article" as contained in the Combines Investigation Act. If this bill were to be dealt with expeditiously and passed quickly—I hope it will not—the word "article" which would be applicable would not include housing. There is a new definition of article in Bill C-7 which may include aspects of housing. I quote:

"article" . . . includes:

(b) deeds and instruments relating to or evidencing the title or right to property . . .

(c) deeds and instruments giving a right to recover or receive property . . .

It may be that under the new definition control over inflated housing prices could be brought, partly at least, within the purview of the bill. But they would be exempt under the existing definition. That gives rise to a further problem of legislative structure causing confusion not only to members of this House, who for the last two days have tried to come to grips with legislation and attempted to understand what it is supposed to do, but causing confusion in the sense of putting this bill in the framework of the existing Combines Investigation Act and other proposed amendments to that act.

● (1740)

Bill C-7 was introduced in this House first on March 11, and the second reading debate commenced on March 13. It received second reading approval and was referred to the standing committee on finance on April 1. There have been three sessions of the finance committee to deal with the provisions of that bill at which the minister and his colleague have attended to give evidence. Now, we have this bill given first reading in the House on Monday and brought forward for debate today, and it includes some definitional changes when compared to those in Bill C-7. The point is that there is an overlap, and there has been no attempt to coordinate the two pieces of legislation.

Not only do we have that confusion, we have an indication from the government that this Bill C-29 is not going to be referred to the finance committee which is geared up for the next two months to deal with the very complex provisions of Bill C-7. It is to be referred to the justice committee. That is the committee which the government hopes will give it quick and easy treatment. To confuse the matter further, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs last Thursday and again last night indicated that there are further amendments to Bill C-7, some of which will muddy the waters a little more because these amendments to Bill C-7 will have an effect on Bill C-29.

Profiteering Practices

The point of my remarks in this area is to suggest to the government that it should try to pull it all together. The government is confusing members of this House and the people of Canada. If it is going to proceed under the Combines Investigation Act it should present us with a package that has been carefully worked out, giving us some examples of where it is going to apply it, and giving us examples of the sort of mischiefs that it is trying to overcome, and some of the alleged abuses existing in the market place. It should tell us how it will work out, and then let the House of Commons and the people of Canada make their judgment. It should not proceed as it has proceeded with Bill C-29 and Bill C-7, and the amendments to Bill C-7, in this haphazard fashion which gives the appearance at least that someone hurriedly drafted the bill on the weekend preceding the day it was introduced.

The most charitable thing I can say about this bill and the way it was introduced is that it was either put together by somebody who really did not know what he was doing or, alternatively, and this may probably be the case, the form of the legislation was lifted from some wartime legislation introduced in the early 1940's or, indeed, in 1916 or 1917. It looks suspiciously like wartime legislation, and the form is very much akin to what Parliament introduced in that period. Certainly, it is not relevant to the real problems of today.

The hon. member for St. John's East pointed out that the substantive difficulty with this bill is that it represents a form of selective price controls and the focus of the legislation is on profit margins in respect of a particular article or class of articles. This tends to be selective because the choice of products or articles is left up to the governor in council. This may go too far. However here we find the nub of the inconsistency between this bill and the prices and incomes policy that has been recommended by the Progressive Conservative party, because that prices and incomes policy, if the hon. members opposite took the trouble to read what that policy is, focuses only on profit margins in industrial sectors, and it is temporary in nature. It represents a more comprehensive approach which does not attempt to single out or select particular articles of trade or particular products for discriminatory treatment.

Indeed, the nature or scope of the term "industry" could be so broad as to include all processing and manufacturing industries, and it would affect profit margins of those industries only in the broad sense, allowing the price of individual articles or products within those industries to be determined by the people who run the industry and who know best through experience and through vigorous competition in the market place, what will sell and what will not sell, and at what particular price.

Where the role of the government comes in with our prices and incomes policy is in setting reasonable profit margins for a given industrial sector, based not necessarily on the difference between a base year and the subsequent year, which could build in all sorts of inequities for both consumers and businessmen, but based on profit margins measured by return on investment. This may involve a "return on investment" concept which is measured over a much longer period of time than one year. The base year concept which is really the basis of this particular bill, and which will be determined by regulation of the governor in council, may well be a period involving just the year 1973. Indeed, the example which the minister has touted in his press release involves a one-year period, which may be last year, as determining the base year on which profit margins are determined.

What if you have a company, and we have some particularly in the food retailing field, which showed a tremendous profit last year, and that becomes the base year? What this bill suggests to the company is that their profit for that year, will be entrenched into the system and that as long as the company does not exceed that rate in the following year it is okay. But supposing that company in 1973 had been engaging in profiteering and gouging? The mechanism which the government is setting up here might operate to exempt the company from the price freeze and rollback treatment that is proposed by this bill. That is why it is inequitable.

I suggest to hon. members in all seriousness that the bill should not look at particular articles or particular products, but at industrial sectors. The bill should also look at profit margins over the long haul and should key on return on investment. There may be companies that have experienced a loss position for three or four years, and suddenly through changes in the market they may have a good year in terms of profit. That good year may be necessary if that company is to survive, just to recoup its losses for the previous three or four years. One should look at margins over the long haul, and look at them through return on investment. Any governmental agency worth its salt could work with that concept and it is far more equitable.

Quite often not only members of the Liberal party but my friends in the New Democratic Party as well, look at this in an overly simplistic way, taking prices one year and prices the next year, figuring out costs for that very short-term period and arriving at respective profit margins for those years. That is not how the system should work. The system should be based on the concept of return on investment, and it is that concept which determines whether capital is attracted into any industrial sector, whether it be the service sector, the manufacturing sector or the processing sector.

Some mention has been made in the context of this debate of the exemption for agricultural products and fish products. I suppose one really cannot quarrel with these exemptions, except that in this particular bill the existence of exemptions points out the selective nature of the bill. While agricultural producers will be exempt in terms of the products they produce, at the next level up, and I am talking about the distributors of agricultural products, they are going to be subject to the price freeze and rollback regime of government under this bill.

Anybody who knows how a system of this sort has operated in the past, how it has operated in the United States and Great Britain, will know that if the mechanism is invoked in terms of distributors it will only take a matter of a week or two weeks before the freeze or rollback works its way back to the primary producer. Some hon. members opposite may ask: So what? I will tell them "so what". With this bill which is selective in its application the primary producer may find himself frozen in terms of the price of his product, but he gets hit on the other side because his costs are not frozen. That is the inequitable result of a selective policy of this sort.

● (1750)

That is the reason it is so necessary that any major piece of anti-inflation legislation purporting to authorize price freezes or rollbacks must be comprehensive in nature. It must not be selective. It must cover all aspects of the economy in a broad sense. In case some hon. members might think such a policy as our party has recommended is interventionist in nature, and perhaps as interventionist as the administrative framework which will be set up under this bill, let me again emphasize that it is not necessary to go into an industrial sector and pick out selective products or articles or classes of articles for specific treatment. Indeed, the whole basis of our policy is to preserve the free enterprise system and give it some broad guidelines in terms of return on investment and let it work out its own pricing policy within its own sector. I think our prices and incomes policy is the salvation for business in Canada, small or large, and ultimately the consumer.

I for one would not favour this bill becoming a permanent feature of the statute law of our country. The concepts which were introduced for the first time in this House on Monday are untried and untested. I think at the very minimum, as suggested by the hon. member for St. John's East, there must be some form of parliamentary review. Perhaps we should even consider the concept of a self-destruction clause after a period of one or two years when the bill has had an opportunity to run its course. The point is that Parliament must have an opportunity to look at this sort of legislation if, as appears unlikely, it should pass. This review should be, compulsory because the legislation is dangerous in its delegation of powers to the executive, is untried, and because the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today, yesterday and on Monday refused to provide an adequate explanation as to how this legislation will achieve the particular goals that are sought to be achieved and failed to demonstrate an understanding of the nature of the inflationary problem and how to deal with them.

There are some very real, practical legal and substantive difficulties in relation to the specific provisions of this bill. Without wanting to take up too much time I wish to review some of these difficulties because I think it is important that they be placed on the record for Canadians to see. In many respects this bill is an unprecedented delegation of arbitrary power to the executive of this country. Comparisons have been made, suggesting this is almost like wartime legislation, that it is almost like an economic War Measures Act. That may be too strong a comparison. I think it does, however, contain an unprecedented delegation of power which should be of concern to members of this House.

In the first instance, the act may be invoked through the process of a cabinet declaration respecting an article or class of articles. The minister indicated that in the usual case it would be expected that this declaration would not be invoked until after there was a report or recommendation by a body acting under the Inquiries Act such as the Food Prices Review Board. But if one looks at section

50(2) one can see that the Governor in Council can circumvent the section whereby the process is initiated by the report of a body under the Inquiries Act. This is the situation where the cabinet can decide that to "await the outcome of such an inquiry and report would not be in the public interest".

In such a case the cabinet could make the declaration unilaterally without the report merely because, in its own opinion certain pricing practices would be likely to have a substantial effect on the price of an article or group of articles which would seriously affect the living cost of a majority of Canadians. That is a pretty fantastic power. Some may say there is a time limit, and that a declaration is effective only a year. However, in section 50(3) one can see there is a possibility of an extension for a period not exceeding six months. However, that is for only one order for extension. If one reads the section closely it is clear that there could be one for six months and a second order for another six months. It would be very easy for the cabinet unilaterally to keep that declaration in place ad infinitum; in other words, to provide a permanent measure of control for a certain article or class of articles. This is getting as close to a managed economy as one can get all in one fell swoop.

I think that would be a dangerous situation and one which would be seriously debated. I have another concern that the government can exempt any class or classes of persons or transactions from the 30-day reporting requirement under section 52. No standards or guidelines are given concerning the conditions or criteria under which such exemptions could be granted. Would the exemptions be granted to certain industries dealing in products subject to a declaration because they were in financial difficulty and should be allowed to increase their prices without having to give notice to the Director under section 51, or would it more likely be the case that only the friends of the government could secure an exemption.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask if someone on the government side is able to confirm that we will continue with this legislation tomorrow?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that we will be continuing with this bill, subject to any discussion between house leaders tomorrow morning.

Mr. Bell: Could we have an undertaking in these particularly trying times that if there is a change we will be notified very early in the morning.

Mr. Foster: I will give that undertaking.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think this House would like to have drawn to its attention that approximately one and a half hours ago a former member of this House for many years, and a public servant in Canada for most of his life, passed away, George Doucett. George Doucett was born on May 16, 1897. He was first elected to the Ontario House in 1936. He was re-elected in 1943, 1945, 1948, 1951 and 1955. As a minister of the Crown, he was first appointed in 1943 and re-appointed in 1948, 1949 and 1955 as Minister of Highways and Public Works in the province of Ontario. He resigned in order to run for the House of Commons and was first elected in 1957. He was subsequently elected in 1958 and in 1962. He passed away in Carleton Place an hour and a half ago. I call this to the attention of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I am sure all hon. members appreciate the remarks of the hon. member and feel the same way he does. I think we must proceed with the adjournment at this time, and this question could be brought up on motions tomorrow if the hon. member intends to get other messages of appreciation from different parties.

It being six o'clock this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

On the order: Motions:

April 30, 1974—Mr. Fairweather—That the third report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on Tuesday, April 30, 1974, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member for Fundy-Royal may gather, the Chair has had an opportunity to consider the terms of the report whose adoption he wishes to move at this time. I have to tell the hon. member and the House that in certain respects, in my view, the report as drafted contains terms which are absolutely without precedent in Canadian procedure and practice. I have no doubt whatsoever that the matter has been the subject of serious consideration by the Chairman and his advisers. I might mention in particular that the report, at least in appearance, seems to set up a new authority to authorize expenditure of public funds, an authority which is currently held by the Commissioners of Internal Economy by virtue of the House of Commons Act.

I want to be fair to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal. This is really a caution I am advancing at this time. I would like to have an opportunity to have a discussion with the hon. member for Fundy-Royal before we proceed with the motion. If the hon. member would agree, I would rather do it on this basis.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, wording for the report was suggested by officers of the House of Commons in a form which would allow our committee to have six law students employed should there be a dissolution of parliament. Although I have never been one who is particularly bothered by precedents, I did check with the government House leader and the House leader of the New Democratic Party and assumed there would be no trouble in employing these six students. However, if the motion is in terms that are not proper, I will take other advice.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the comments made by the hon. member. I know how strongly he feels and how important it is to get the committee, of which he is a joint chairman, going. I am anxious to co-operate with him in this regard, but I do feel that in its present terms this report may cause some slight procedural difficulty in the future. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal will, I am sure, not deny the Chair an opportunity to discuss the matter with him before the motion is put.

STATEMENTS PREPARED FOR CLAIMANTS BY INVESTIGATORY OFFICERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of present procedures whereby investigatory officers for the Unemployment Insurance Commission occasionally prepare statements for claimants in circumstances which call into question the voluntary nature and the accuracy of the information obtained, and which are often used to the detriment of the citizens concerned, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration reaffirm his directive that no statement obtained by investigatory officers would be used against a claimant in terms of disentitlement or disqualification until the claimant had confirmed the accuracy of the statement.

This practice does not appear to be followed in my constituency.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Alexander: Shame!

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ALLEGED AGGRAVATION OF FIRESTONE AND GOODYEAR LABOUR DISPUTES BY TIRE IMPORTATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move under the provisions of Standing Order 43 a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to my part of the city of Toronto. In view of the fact that serious labour disputes at the Firestone and Goodyear plants in Hamilton and Toronto are being aggravated by the large-scale importation of tires from parent companies in the United States, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House request the Minister of Finance to investigate whether anti-dumping regulations are being violated, and to consider imposing a temporary tariff to make sure that further tire importation does not prejudice the outcome of these legal strikes.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-PROFITEERING BILL AS PART OF GOVERNMENT CONTINGENCY PLAN TO CONTROL INFLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether Bill C-29, the so-called anti-profiteering bill, represents a part or the whole of the contingency plan the minister has frequently talked about since as long ago as the last budget in connection with the control of inflation? Is this bill part of the contingency plan?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not. It is a measure aimed at profiteering and gouging, as the bill itself sets forth.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not blame the minister for disassociating himself from the bill.

Mr. Hees: As did all other members of the cabinet when it was presented.

Mr. Stanfield: Since this bill purports to deal with excess profits or profiteering, would the minister tell us whether his budget has been prepared or is being prepared on the assumption that bill will pass or that it will not pass?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I never make presumptions as to what parliament may or may not do with a bill.

Mr. Stanfield: I take it from the minister's response that he does not think the bill has anything to do with any contingency plan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In the interest of all of us, and particularly in the interest of the history of the country, perhaps the hon. gentleman might tell us whether some time this month he would not send the so-called contingency plan to control inflation over to the Public Archives.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Grier.]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROSPECTIVE INCREASE IN PRICES OF CANNED AND FROZEN VEGETABLES—STEPS TO ASSESS JUSTIFICATION

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs arising from the statement made on more than one occasion by representatives of the food processing industry that prices of canned and frozen vegetables will rise between 20 and 30 per cent in the next few months. Will the minister tell the House what steps are being taken to assess whether these increases will be justified?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, apart from the fact that the Food Prices Review Board is available to do that work, one important step is the presentation of Bill C-29 which the hon. member and his party are opposing, thereby showing they are not willing to support efforts to prevent profiteering in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the minister is under some tension these days but I am surprised that he would stoop to such a low political response. Since he made reference to the Food Prices Review Board, may I ask him whether he has been in touch with the Food Prices Review Board in connection with this matter and, if so, can the minister comment on the statement made by the president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture to the effect that only a small fraction of the proposed increases in the price of vegetables could be attributed to increased receipts by farmers? In view of the clear contradiction between the assertions of the processors, which I understand the Food Prices Review Board has partly substantiated in a recent statement, and the statement of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, is the minister in a position to indicate to the House whether he can comment on that position or has had any discussions with the board on this matter?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the food processors made an informal presentation to the board on this matter. The board has the matter under advisement and we are looking forward to receiving the final conclusions of the board as soon as they are available so as to provide a basis for government action. Certainly the action taken will be in the public interest, not in the way my friend suggested, on a narrow political basis, which is the only way for his party.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore on a supplementary, then the hon. member for Temiscamingue, and we will have other supplementaries on this subject later.

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, one final, brief supplementary. Is it the intention of the minister to make a statement on motions within the next few days in regard to the matter I have raised?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, it will be my intention on behalf of the government to make appropriate comments once the Food Prices Review Board issues a report containing findings and recommendations.

DAIRYING—INCREASE IN PRICE OF MILK—CONTINUATION OF SUBSIDY TO PRODUCERS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): I have a supplementary for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Since yesterday, rumour has it that the price of milk will increase by 5 cents a quart before the end of this month. Is the minister in a position to assert that the 5-cent a quart federal subsidy will continue to be paid as usual even if there is a price increase, so that farmers may receive at least the minimum to continue their production?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the subsidy will continue to be paid because this program has been established on the basis that it was possible to accept a cost increase beyond a certain level and that is what has happened.

EGG PRICES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING COUNCIL ON CHARGES MADE BY FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who has referred to the findings and recommendations of the Food Prices Review Board. I ask this question in view of the criticism levelled at the minister and his colleagues by the board yesterday with respect to the slowness of the government in acting on recommendations of the board. Specifically, the chairman of the board referred to the report on egg prices which was given to the minister on January 9 and subsequently referred to the Farm Products Marketing Council for investigation. May I ask the minister when that report will be released in view of the very serious charges made by the Food Prices Review Board in its report, and more particularly in view of the findings of a Canadian Press survey yesterday that eggs, among other things, are going up in price?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am glad my hon. friend has again confirmed his conversion to becoming a supporter of the Food Prices Review Board and its work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: The hon. member might well come around to agreeing that his program of price and income controls is faulty. The major recommendation of the board that there be a special inquiry into the way the egg marketing system is being carried out by the Farm Products Marketing Council, a body set up by parliament for this very purpose. I am advised by the Minister of Agriculture that we can expect their report very shortly.

● (1420)

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the minister has demonstrated that he has no confidence in the board, by ignoring the main recommendation in its report which was for an immediate reduction in the price of eggs notwithstanding any investigation that might be made, I would ask him when he proposes to act on this recommendation to bring down the price of eggs or else make a statement to vindicate the egg producers of this country?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I am advised by the Minister of Agriculture that the price of eggs has gone down since the beginning of the year. In addition, the recommendation involves action by provincial marketing boards as well as the federal board. The basic recommendation for an inquiry is being carried out. I would advise my hon. friend to take another look at the recommendations.

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING PROCEEDING WITH ANTI-PROFITEERING BILL

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As every other member of the cabinet absented himself from the House when the minister presented Bill C-29 yesterday, is it the intention of the government to pull this bill out quickly because it realizes it is a sham and a farce and will not do the job it is supposed to do?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to speak actively on behalf of this bill and to demonstrate the unwillingness of members of the hon. member's party and the NDP—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair seeks the assistance of hon. members in moving on to the next question. I note there are several members who wish to ask supplementary questions. I will recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar on a supplementary question.

EGG PRICES—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT ON SUPPORT FOR INDUSTRY AND ASSURANCE OF SUPPLY AND PRICE TO CONSUMERS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a further supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has been recognized and he should be given an opportunity to ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Gleave: In view of the chaos that now exists in the egg industry, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether decisions have been made as a result of recent consultations to give some support to the industry and some assurance to the consumer as to supply and price?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I only want to say that, contrary to what the hon. member for St. John's East and others have said, egg prices have gone down nearly 15 per cent since the first of this year. The egg industry is in utter chaos and nearly going broke. The producers are marketing eggs below production cost at the present time. We are working on a program with the CEMA group, the Canadian egg marketing group. We are meeting with them and I think we are very close to a solution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar for a last supplementary on this matter, and then the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, after the long lapse of time and hardship to producers, will the minister now tell the House when he will be able to announce what the policy of the government is with regard to egg producers in view of the fact they have organized themselves and are now trying to bring some order into the market?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I would agree 100 per cent with what the hon. member says, that they have organized and have tried to bring stability to the market. We are going to do everything we can to help them, and it would help us if the House would pass the import-export bill as quickly as it can.

An hon. Member: Bring it on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

REASON FOR REDUCTION IN GOVERNMENT CASH BALANCES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. With government cash balances down $1.5 billion in the last quarter including $800 million in March alone, with the result that government cash is now only 4 per cent of government yearly spending, which I think the minister will admit is one of the lowest levels in history, would he indicate to the House if this is the result of government fiscal planning, or has the redemption of Canada Savings Bonds and the Canadian dollar exchange drain taken the government really off guard?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that question is highly argumentative, but I will say this in answer to it. The government consciously drew down its cash balance last year as part of its debt management policy. This had the effect for most of the year, in fact most of 1973, of relieving pressure on interest rates and keeping them lower than they otherwise would have been.

[Mr. Gleave.]

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I was, of course, speaking about this year and the critical situation in which the government finds itself right now. Has the minister given any consideration, for instance, to indexing the interest rate on Canada savings bonds, or any other such measures to try to alleviate the situation in which it now finds itself?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I may have something to say about the entire position of the government in 1973, 1974 and 1975 and I will deal fully with these matters on Monday night.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

USE AS FISCAL TOOL TO REDISTRIBUTE MONEY IN DISADVANTAGED AREAS OF ECONOMY

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In light of the fact the Unemployment Insurance Commission is part of the government's social policy, can the Prime Minister indicate to the House if the member for Verdun was stating government policy when he said, "Think of the UIC as a fiscal tool"?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows the rule, and I am sure all hon. members do, that a member cannot ask whether a statement made by a member of the House is government policy. Such a question be asked in relation to a statement made by a member of the government outside the House but not in relation to a statement by a private member, albeit the hon. member for Verdun.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could rephrase the question. Is the Unemployment Insurance Commission in fact a fiscal tool for redistributing money in the most disadvantaged areas of the country and the economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, obviously redistribution of money through the Unemployment Insurance Act from those who pay insurance to those who are unemployed and drawing payments has very serious and important fiscal effects. This was stated when the bill was presented in the House and it is with this knowledge, I hope, that the opposition parties supported it.

Mr. Ellis: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he feels this is a crucial part of the social policy that gives the government flexibility to deal with such issues?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it has important macroeconomic effects in those parts of the country where unemployment is high, and I would hope it would be the desire of the country to see this happen.

Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet perhaps the Leader of the Opposition would want me to answer some of the statistical questions he asked yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I thought not, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF SUBSIDY—REQUEST FOR EXPEDITING OF PAYMENTS

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact many applications for beef subsidy payments have been in the hands of the department responsible for payment since at least April 1, well before the postal strike, can the minister advise these individuals, many of whom now have several thousand dollars in accounts receivable, when they can expect to receive payment?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, they are being processed very rapidly. I am sure the hon. member knows that no government mail was dispatched during the slowdown in the handling of mail at the post office in the capital city. I checked the figures the other day and I think we have paid out nearly $8 million.

Mr. Frank: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he will get together with his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, and trade some of the interest that department will pick up by reason of people sending in cheques before the May 21 deadline and give it to some of these people who have these receivables?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the people receiving this premium money on beef are only too happy to get it because they will be in a position that they may well be submitting cheques to the Department of National Revenue.

● (1430)

EGG PRODUCTION—INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF PLAN TO PROTECT PRODUCERS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is in a sense supplementary to a previous round addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. Inasmuch as the Canadian egg industry has been losing approximately $100,000 a week in sales for the past month because of cheaper United States imports, the price of which, incidentally, has not been reflected in lower retail prices, can the minister tell us when he will be in a position to give us the details of his plan to protect Canadian producers through import controls, limitation or increased support prices?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the hon. member has so many ideas—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: —and I do appreciate receiving them even at this late date. But I can only say to him that he must be patient. All I can say to him is, soon.

Mr. Rose: I am pleased that somebody around here has some ideas.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rose: Can the minister indicate whether or not his assistance to the egg industry will be in the form of either increasing the support price from 28½ cents, which is ridiculous at this time, or in the form of an export limitation?

Mr. Whelan: I am sure the hon. member would not want me to make any announcement now which would make it possible for shylock importers to take advantage of the situation and get an unwarranted rip-off.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO ENSURE THAT MARRIED WOMEN WILL BE ABLE TO OBTAIN INDEPENDENT CREDIT RATING

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Will the minister, on the recommendation of the National Council of Welfare, introduce immediate legislation to end discriminatory practices which now cause married women to lose their independent credit rating and acquire that of their husbands?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a very meritorious recommendation and I also think it should be brought to the attention of the provinces within whose jurisdiction that particular matter falls.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR SUBSIDY TO HOG PRODUCERS—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the House is really interested in the meat problem today. I wish to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

After representations he received from hog producers as well as those I made some weeks ago, can the minister tell the House whether he will be announcing shortly the measures taken to give financial assistance to hog producers?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I was asked the same question yesterday and I answered that we are considering the different programs in Canada. We have to come up with one that will replace all the programs that the different provinces have. That is not easy, but we hope to be doing something in the near future.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

In view of the fact that heavy losses have been suffered by hog producers, in particular since January, would the minister say if he had been advised by his officials of some policy that would offer some compensation for these losses, especially those suffered since January?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we are considering many suggestions that have been made by different farm organizations along with the suggestions the hon. member has made. However, I am sure he is aware of what the Minister of Agriculture from la belle province has done so far as hog producers in his own province are concerned.

TURKEYS—ACTION TO ELIMINATE DIFFICULTIES OF PRODUCERS CAUSED BY IMPORTS

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to others directed to the Minister of Agriculture and has to do with the importation of United States turkeys. Does the government intend to take any action to correct this situation which is causing great difficulty to Canadian turkey producers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this matter is being considered together with the programs we are trying to work out with the egg producers of the nation.

ACTION TO REDUCE COST OF BALER TWINE TO ASSIST FARMERS

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Agriculture. The price of baler twine has increased to a level beyond all reason and will result in unreasonable increases in the cost of baling this year's crops of hay and fodder. Can the minister and his department take any action to reduce these costs to a more realistic level and thus assist the farm economy?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can say that the United Co-operative Growers of Ontario have told me that they have a boatload of baler twine on the way here. We are checking all the world's supply of the sisal product that is used in the manufacture of twine. If we can have it here before the real season is upon us, we may be able to assist farmers a lot more than some of us thought we could a few weeks ago.

Mr. Alkenbrack: May I ask the minister if the price of this new twine will be more realistic and more economical than present prices?

Mr. Whelan: It will be better than has been suggested. I am told by some people that the price has been as high as $26 a bale. It will be substantially less than that.

HOUSING

ALLEGED SHORTAGE OF MONEY FOR HOUSING—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Is the minister aware of the fact that money for housing has dried up, particularly in British Columbia, because of abnormally high interest rates and, if so, what does he plan to do about it?

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is not my information, although recent actions have caused a slowdown in the building of rental accommodation. As I indicated in the House in a speech not long ago, within the budget of CMHC we are giving priority attention to markets such as Toronto and Vancouver to ensure a supply of government funds in those areas.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Do I understand the minister to say he is prepared to admit that in the present circumstances NHA loan ceilings are too low to be practical in large urban centres and that he has a policy in the works to do something about it?

Mr. Basford: I indicated two weeks ago that the loan levels under the National Housing Act and other lending statutes were under review. I hope to make an announcement on this very shortly.

APPROVED LENDERS NOW MAKING LOANS UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, can the minister advise the House which of the approved lenders are presently making loans under the National Housing Act?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): A great many of them are. If the hon. member is referring to one particular company, obviously I would not have details of that in the question period, but all classes of approved lenders are making loans under the act.

ACTION TO ENSURE STEADY SUPPLY OF MORTGAGE MONEY TO BUILD HOUSES

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact numerous indications have been received that approved lenders are not in fact making loans at present for mortgages, in particular under the National Housing Act, because of the uncertainty in the financial markets, and in light of the minister's statement last year recorded during the budget debate in Hansard, page 1431, which reads as follows:

> If nothing is done, there is a prospect that inflationary expectations will rise. This could disrupt financial markets, drive up interest rates, disturb the exchange market and impose a brake on the economy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member ask his question.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The question is: what does the minister propose to do immediately in the short run to ensure a consistent supply of mortgage money for building construction in Canada and at interest rates which are agreeable to both the lender and the borrower?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the private market is pouring about $2 billion more into the conventional mortgage market than it did last year.

APARTMENT CONSTRUCTION—POSITION CONCERNING DEPRECIATION NO LONGER ALLOWED INVESTORS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of his answer that there is some indication of a slowdown in housing, is the government now reconsidering the position that it took concerning the depreciation that is no longer allowed to investors in that sector in terms of apartment construction?

● (1440)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that question relates to the application of the Income Tax Act and is properly answerable by the Minister of Finance.

MANPOWER

LAY-OFFS OF EMPLOYEES BY GENERAL INSTRUMENT CORPORATION, SYDNEY, N.S.—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Some days ago I again raised the question of the announced closure of General Instrument Corporation in Sydney and at that time asked the President of the Privy Council what the government was planning to do to assist those people who were affected in regard to future employment. The President of the Privy Council advised that he had discussed it with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and he said he hoped he would put in place all the available instruments to assist the people so affected. May I ask the minister if these available instruments consist of processing unemployment insurance claims, something which is normal, or does he have other ideas to provide employment for the 600 already laid off and the 400 others who will be laid off?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I had an updated report the other day for the hon. member in anticipation of this question. Unfortunately I do not have it with me now. If my memory serves me correctly, our manpower consultative services met with the principals of the firm in question some time ago and have been working with them to implement all the measures that can be taken, including training, the availability of mobility grants, the development of alternative employment where possible and, of course, the provision of unemployment insurance claims processing. If the hon. member has any further information which would indicate that there is any deviation from that in recent days, I will be very pleased to hear it and I will move on it, but that is the state of affairs as I recall it.

Oral Questions

INCOME TAX

EFFECT OF CUT IN PERSONAL INCOME TAXES REFERRED TO BY PRIME MINISTER IN LIGHT OF INCREASE IN RATE OF INFLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct to the Prime Minister the questions I asked him yesterday and which it seems he would like to answer today. My first question was:

When the right hon. gentleman says that the government cut personal income taxes last year by about 12 per cent, does he mean that the average taxpayer will be paying roughly 12 per cent less in actual dollars during 1973 than was the case in 1972?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): What I mean, Mr. Speaker, and what I said in my text, is that the measures in last year's budget provided for a reduction in personal income tax equivalent to 12 per cent lower than otherwise would have prevailed if we had not brought in those budgetary measures. Of course, Mr. Speaker, this is not and cannot be described as an average figure. This is the over-all effect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Here comes the weaseling.

Mr. Trudeau: I can understand the uneasiness of the opposition, Mr. Speaker, because for some people, especially those at the lower end of the scale, the reduction was not 12 per cent but 100 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the second question was—

An hon. Member: Three strikes and you're out.

Mr. Stanfield: You want more than three strikes or this government would have been out a long time ago. My second question was:

In view of the Minister of Finance having recognized, when he introduced the indexing concept, that inflation actually increases the effective income tax rate under our system of progressive taxation, can the Prime Minister indicate whether the cuts in nominal tax rates of which he speaks,— —and to which he was referring——exceed for 1973 the effective increase in the tax on real income which resulted from the increase in the rate of inflation to nearly 10 per cent? Did the cut in the nominal rate exceed the actual increase resulting from inflation and, if so, by how much?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is linked to the first question and the reply to the first question. Since there was a very highly progressive cut in personal income taxes, the effect was to leave in the hands of Canadians more money, more take-home pay, than they would have had otherwise had there not been these budgetary measures. I must add that this is not only highly progressive but in terms of effect it has a considerably better effect on the people at the lower end of the income scale than the straight across the board 7 per cent cut that was proposed by the opposition at the time of the last election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the Prime Minister refers to the last election because both he and the Minister of Finance said that any cut in income taxes would be irresponsible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the cut in nominal rates to which he refers offset the increase in taxes that actually took place as a result of inflation? Can he say yes or no, and never mind all the skating around?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, precisely because there was a very progressive cut I repeat that there is no yes or no for the whole group of taxpayers. We would have to take each one in turn and calculate the effect of the tax cut on them and the effect of inflation on them. I repeat that when some taxpayers, because of this progressive measure, saw their taxes cut 100 per cent, then obviously they are much better off than those at the high end of the income scale.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SOCIAL SECURITY

RECOMMENDATION BY NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WELFARE THAT BENEFITS BE ESCALATED IN ACCORDANCE WITH INCREASE IN NATIONAL INCOME

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the government giving active consideration to the recommendations of the National Council of Welfare, which were published a day or so ago, especially the recommendation that social security benefits should be escalated according to the rise in the national income of the country and not just on the basis of the rise in the cost of living?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, from time to time the National Council of Welfare has come forward with reports and recommendations that have always been extremely helpful to the social security review we are undertaking with the provinces. Obviously this report will also be considered by the federal-provincial conference reviewing our social security at the present time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question. In view of the time that will be taken by that review, will the minister give immediate consideration to the suggestion made by the council that there be established a special cost of living index for pensioners and others, an index related to the goods that they actually have to buy?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I can only give to this supplementary question the same answer that I gave to the first one.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

FLOODS

PRAIRIE PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR EARLY PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION—DISTRIBUTION OF COST BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. While everyone is pleased with the fact that flooding conditions within the last few days on the prairies have greatly subsided, there is a widespread demand on the part of those who have suffered damages to learn what are the possibilities of early compensation for their losses. What distribution will be made in respect of the total amount of the losses in each province as between the federal and the provincial governments?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, so far as I am aware we have received no official request from the province of Saskatchewan or the province of Alberta. They told us they were going to appraise the situation and then let us know. We have not received this yet. I am sure the right hon. gentleman knows there is a program in which we will participate, a program that has been used by all governments, formulated on a per capita basis, with the provincial government and the federal government paying up to 90 per cent of the losses, and the municipal people paying 10 per cent or the producers paying 10 per cent. This has to be worked out with the provinces.

● (1450)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether or not PFRA officials have been asked to make an investigation of the losses and an estimate of the damage done in the provinces, because there is a great deal of uncertainty on the part of those who have suffered damages as to exactly what is going to happen.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get a detailed answer for the right hon. gentleman. I know that at the height of the problem PFRA officials were at the various sites, particularly in Saskatchewan. Whether they will be asked to carry out additional work I am not sure. I can assure the right hon. gentleman and the House that if their services are required they will be made available.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of the uncertainty of the life of the government, would either minister make a general statement before the orders of the day as to the present position on the prairies and give an estimate of the damage and also a general outline as to the probability of early settlements being made?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I might do better than that. I may go to Saskatchewan on Friday and say it right there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. There are just a few minutes left before the end of the question period. I shall recognize the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, but I believe the right hon. gentleman has a further supplementary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should not have to remind the minister that announcements such as that should be made in the House of Commons and not outside the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege, if it were a new policy I would agree with the right hon. gentleman, but as I would be restating the government's program I am sure the right hon. gentleman would not object. Furthermore, I invite him to come with me to Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I always like good company, and I think the minister would be good company.

URBAN AFFAIRS

DEMOLITION OF BUILDINGS BEFORE COMPLETION OF VANCOUVER WATERFRONT PLANNING STUDY

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, assured residents of Vancouver that no federal agency will be permitted to bypass the planning process relating to Vancouver harbour and that he was completely opposed to proceeding with any Vancouver waterfront proposals until the joint federal-city waterfront planning study had been completed, and in view of the fact that demolition of buildings and property under the control of the Minister of Transport took place late last month, would the Prime Minister tell the House which of his ministers is indicating government policy in this area of great importance to the people of Vancouver?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take notice of the question and inquire of both ministers what the position is.

ENERGY

LACK OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS FOR OFFSHORE OIL EXPLORATION ON ATLANTIC COAST

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On December 6 the Prime Minister said in the House that offshore oil exploration on the Atlantic coast had not proceeded as rapidly as the government would have wished. As lack of regulations creates uncertainty and is a disincentive which is setting back Canada's goal of self-sufficiency in eastern Canada, will the Prime Minister say why the government has not brought in regulations for federal lands as it is now four years since the previous regulations were withdrawn?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House has had a report from me previously about the negotiations the federal government has entertained with the five easternmost provinces. I believe it is now known that one of those provinces has decided to go its own way and not to continue negotiating with the group. As a result I told that premier that we would be prepared to take the matter to the Supreme Court with, hopefully, a form of reference that would be jointly submitted. I have not had any response from him yet. I am referring to the Premier of Newfoundland.

Mr. Bawden: Would it not be possible for the federal authorities to make known their regulations and decide at a later time how the royalties or proceeds would be divided?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would certainly consider that, but I hope that we would not be accused then by any Tories opposite that these were tactics of confrontation. However, I thank the hon. member for suggesting that.

AGRICULTURE

ALLEGED LOSSES OF PORK, EGG AND BEEF PRODUCERS—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Does he know that at the present time pork, egg, beef and milk producers are losing money and also that we are now seeing many more auctions than ever before in our history, because farmers are auctioneering to discharge their debts? Could the Prime Minister tell us whether it is government policy to let things go on as they are now so that in few years Canada will have to import all its food?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The minister might attempt to reply briefly to the question, but it seemed to me to be more a speech than a question.

[Translation]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I thought that the question was put to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: The question was indeed directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I was not sure whether the hon. member's question was addressed to me or to the Prime Minister. All I want to say is that the record shows that the government does care.

Oral Questions

FISHERIES

CANADIAN POSITION AT FORTHCOMING ICNAF MEETINGS RESPECTING HADDOCK QUOTA

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. Has the Canadian government yet taken a position with regard to what quota for haddock will be sought for the Atlantic area at the upcoming ICNAF meetings?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, Canada's position in respect of these negotiations is currently being developed in close consultation with the industry and fishermen; and the negotiations will take place in about a month's time.

POSSIBILITY OF UNILATERAL ACTION BY CANADA TO PROTECT MARINE RESOURCES

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries. Can the minister tell the house what action he intends to take with respect to the recommendation presented to the Standing Committee on Fisheries yesterday by the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union and also with respect to the resolution adopted by the standing committee having to do with the taking of unilateral action by Canada to protect our marine resources?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, Canada has never taken unilateral action when there was a possibility of resolving differences with other countries through negotiation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period. Perhaps with the co-operation of the hon. member for St. John's West we might have time for two or three quick questions without supplementaries.

COMMUNITY EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR DETAILS ON PROJECTS PLANNED, NUMBER OF PEOPLE TO BE EMPLOYED AND FUNDING

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. If there are only four or five community employment programs planned so far for the next couple of years, how many people will be involved in those four or five programs, how many will be employed, and what is the funding?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, discussion of the community employment program has been taking place between the federal ministers, myself and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and provincial welfare ministers. At the last meeting on February 20 it was agreed that we would begin to develop and explore through negotiation between the provinces and ourselves 10 to 20 pilot projects for this fall and winter spread across the country, which would then give us a basis for expansion, if it were thought desirable, into a formal program next year. I do not know where the hon. member got his information about four or five programs. We are not in any position to indicate what the funding will be—

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE SUBSTANTIAL INCREASE IN PRICE OF PROCESSED FOODS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has the minister now fulfilled his commitment, given in the House on Monday, to take a quick look at the brief submitted by the Canadian Food Processors Association and, if so, what action is the minister going to take on the disturbing submission of that report that the price of processed foods will have to be increased by a minimum of 24 per cent?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I checked and was advised that the association did not submit a formal written brief to the commission but made an informal presentation. The action I propose is Bill C-29, which the hon. member's party opposes and therefore is along with the NDP siding with the gougers and profiteers.

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO DEAL WITH ALCOHOLISM

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I am sure it will be of interest to all parliamentarians. In view of the fact that Canadian consumption of alcoholic beverages has reached an all-time high—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mitges: —a most unenviable record, I must say, and it has been admitted that the control of alcohol abuse in Canada is fragmented and weak, has the minister any plans to step up all programs in order to try to counteract some of this abuse for the betterment of the health of Canadians at large?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member look at the working document, "A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians", which was tabled in the House yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate there are a number of hon. members who wish to ask questions. However, I have stretched the situation as much as I can. With the co-operation of hon. members, the Chair will now call orders of the day.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been communications between representatives of the parties and as copies of the National Petroleum Company bill are now in the hands of the staff

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader the regular Thursday question about the order of business, perhaps very sadly for the last time in the twenty-ninth parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, today we will continue with the second reading debate on Bill C-29 to be followed tomorrow by the report stage of the Canada Pension Plan. This will be followed by the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act and the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act. Do not be sad, my hon. friend, we are going to be here for a little while yet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader if we will be officially starting the budget debate on Tuesday of next week or has a final decision been made on that?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it had been my intention to call the budget debate on Tuesday. However, since that time I have had further representations. I will probably notify the House on Monday, maybe late on Monday but nevertheless on Monday.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since there is still time for consideration of an important bill, when will we see the War Veterans Allowance Act amending bill?

Profiteering Practices

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the House will have an opportunity to deal with that bill this session. I also remind the House that there are two bills in the standing committees, one dealing with the export-import situation and the other the oil bill, which we really ought to deal with as quickly as possible.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader whether he will consider defeat on Bill C-29 as being non-confidence in the government? If so, is the minister prepared to test the confidence of the House before bringing down a budget?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have not consulted my colleagues about that question of confidence. It is highly speculative and hypothetical. I think the proper position would be to decide these matters after the vote rather than before.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PROFITEERING PRACTICES AND PERMANENT AND TEMPORARY MEMBERSHIP OF COMMISSION

The House resumed, from Wednesday, May 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray that Bill C-29, to amend the Combines Investigation Act in relation to profiteering practices, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, in calling this bill today I wonder whether the government House leader is really a masochist or not. Yesterday at the time of adjournment I was discussing the unprecedented delegation of arbitrary power to the executive under this bill. One of the key phrases contained in this bill is, and I quote:

—profit margin . . . that is greater than he would customarily obtain on such sale or distribution;

It is to be the cabinet alone that will determine in its own way what this phrase means.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) is having serious difficulty being heard. Perhaps we could have a little co-operation from hon. members.

Mr. Atkey: There are no standards, no criteria or no guidelines in the legislation. The discretion in the cabinet is completely unfettered. Yesterday the minister tried to provide some sort of explanation. I quote from his explanation which is recorded at page 1938 of Hansard:

Customary profit margin could be defined differently for each level of distribution. For example, the method to be applied could be different for a manufacturer as opposed to the retailer of a product.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

● (1510)

For example, the method to be applied could be different for a manufacturer as opposed to a retailer of a product. The term "customary" could be prescribed to the margin realised during a given past period of time.

He then went on to say:

In setting out the manner of determination of customary profit margin, consideration would be given to the prevailing economic climate and the business cycle of the particular sector. In addition, the guidelines would be sufficiently flexible to take into account their application to firms operating at low levels of profit or at a loss, or to new businesses.

Again, this does not tell us what guidelines the cabinet will follow. It is an example of arbitrary discretionary power.

Mr. Gray: How would you define them?

Mr. Atkey: It does not tell us what research work the cabinet will take into account when setting these guidelines or what opportunity will be provided for those affected, such as manufacturers and distributors, to make their views known to the government when a proposed profit margin is to be put in place. Will they be given an opportunity to be heard? None of this is provided for in the legislation and no guarantee was contained in the undertaking given by the minister yesterday. More important still, there is no procedure for reviewing a cabinet decision. It is an arbitrary determination by cabinet, that is all.

I would ask hon. members to consider the powers proposed to be given to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. Section 56(1)(b) gives the Commission power to impose what is, in effect, an excess profits tax. This is no ordinary tax. It is a tax imposed in an arbitrary and possibly discriminatory manner, and, as was pointed out yesterday, by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), it is a tax introduced without reference to a ways and means motion. It is a tax of a nature which provides revenue to the Consolidated Revenue Fund and, as such, it should have been introduced in the course of a budget.

The bill also gives the Restrictive Trades Practices Commission power to accept a report of any government-appointed body or person relating to price increases. It gives the Commission power to accept the results of research and investigation and inquiries leading to related reports. All this information is admissible in evidence before the Commission. Again, no person affected or likely to be affected by an order of the Commission has the right of cross-examination, the right of access to the persons who prepared any of these reports or conducted any of these investigations. There is no right to challenge the validity of any of the information which is placed before the Commission. This is a further example of arbitrary power conferred, in this instance, on a Commission. It is a power which I, for one, will oppose.

But the most arbitrary power of all is the discretionary power of the cabinet under section 58 to vary or rescind any order of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. Moreover, changing an order made by the RTPC involves no right to a hearing, no right of defence, no right of review. All the procedural rights given to the parties before the Commission are over-ridden and usurped when the cabinet steps in to vary or rescind an order. The cabinet has complete discretion in this regard. There are no standards, no criteria, no due process of procedure. It is just gut reaction, and that is exactly what the bill involves.

Our concern in attacking the bill from this side of the House is not founded in any way on a desire to condone profiteering or gouging by big business. The point is that the bill does not do the job. As the leader of the New Democratic Party correctly stated, its proclamation will do absolutely nothing to stop inflation. More important, it may lull Canadians into a false sense of complacency; it may lull them into thinking something is being done about inflation when in fact nothing will be done. To the extent that the government proposes to apply this bill to certain industries or articles, or classes of articles, it would represent an unprecedented exercise of arbitrary executive power, uneven, inequitable, and, in some cases, counter-productive.

I should like to repeat what was said by my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) after the conclusion of the last session of parliament, on January 17:

> My concern and the concern of the Progressive Conservative Party is not for the big interests and the highly organized groups which have enough muscle and financial reserve to remain comfortable through periods of escalating inflation—those which can stabilize their own situation sufficiently to ride high and relatively unscathed through endless boom-bust cycles.
> Our concern is for the unorganized worker who sustains terrible losses in real income in today's circumstances and who always faces the threat of unemployment as the cycle moves on. Our concern is for the small Canadian business and for the diligent Canadian salary-earner who has struggled to put a modest amount into savings for his family's future needs and for his own retirement.

That is the concern of the Progressive Conservative Party and the bill before us will do nothing to meet that concern.

In summary, the bill reflects a government without leadership, a government which lacks a firm hand at the tiller. The performance yesterday of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) prompted an exodus of other ministers from the chamber reminiscent of rats deserting a sinking ship. It is bad enough that the bill was not presented by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), as it should have been had the government been really serious about it. But for the minister to be left alone in the House at the peak of his presentation yesterday was the ultimate insult; it supposes the virtual collapse of the government. The bill was hastily conceived and thrown together as a sop to the NDP. It was not carefully thought out either as to substance or as to procedure. It gave no evidence of leadership or firm direction on economic questions and the statements of the minister and of the Prime Minister subsequent to its introduction have done nothing to correct that failing. But most important, it will do nothing to tackle the real problems of inflation.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate for two reasons; first, to reply to some of the rather hasty criticisms which have been made by spokesmen for the opposition, and, second, to expand upon the remarks made by my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) as to the purpose of the bill and the intentions of the government with respect to its application.

Let me begin by saying this categorically: the Government of Canada is determined to deal with profiteering and gouging.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: If parties opposite wish to take a contrary position, which means taking a stand in opposition to this bill, that is their business. To say the bill is inadequate or imperfect is one thing; there is always the possibility for improvements to be made in committee. But when the opposition simply opposes the bill, I suggest their attitude is hypocritical.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1520)

Mr. Sharp: I interpret that opposition as being political manoeuvring which indicates there is no serious concern for the problems of profiteering and gouging that is basically the reason that this government has introduced this bill. The government has only one purpose in this bill, and that purpose is to deal with profiteering and gouging, nothing else. It is not meant to be a substitute for over-all price and wage control. It is not meant to be a substitute for selective price and wage control, or selective price control as advocated by the NDP. We have taken a position that is in opposition to the application of over-all wage and price control under present circumstances. We are still of that view, though I am not quite sure whether the party opposite is. During this debate I would certainly welcome a clarification of the position of the Progressive Conservative party on the problem of controlling inflation.

One of the reasons I take this position, Mr. Speaker, is this. Yesterday I listened to the reaction to the announcement made by my colleague the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) of an increase in salary for public servants to reflect, and to adjust their salaries to, the recent unprecedented inflation. What was the attitude of the spokesman of the Progressive Conservative party, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), when this position was placed before the House by the President of the Treasury Board? He said it was inadequate. This, Mr. Speaker, is the party that is in favour of wage controls.

Does this mean that the Progressive Conservative party is in favour of wage controls for the private sector but not for the public service? Is that what is meant by his statement? Certainly, that is the implication of the position taken by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. I suggest this shows that the party opposite, which has pretensions to power, has no policies and does not intend to enunciate any, and hopes that it will drift into office. I doubt whether that attitude is going to appeal to the people of Canada who want action.

I should like to have the positions taken by the various parties clearly defined. Would the Progressive Conservative party let us know now whether they are still in favour of over-all price controls, whether they would still freeze prices for 90 days, or 120 days, whatever period it is; and since they have had a couple of years to think about this idea, would they let us know what is going to happen after the 90 or 120 day period? It seems to me that a party which is criticizing the government for bringing in a bill to deal with profiteering and gouging, not with price control, should define its own position in relation to these central questions.

Mr. Stanfield: Let us hear from the Minister of Finance on this subject.

An hon. Member: You will on Monday.

Mr. Sharp: Bill C-29 before us is a complicated bill because it is dealing with a complicated question. But may I say this in reply to some of the criticisms that have been made. The bill was not hastily drafted; it was not hastily considered. It has been under consideration for many weeks and months now. I can assure the House that it has been under consideration, not in response to suggestions that have been put forward in the House particularly, but ever since the government announced through the Speech from the Throne that legislation of this kind would be brought forward. This bill is in direct line with the Speech from the Throne and the policies enunciated at that time.

Although this bill was considered over a long period of time, Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that it cannot be improved. I have had long enough experience in this House and in the business of government to know that all legislation can be improved. Not only that, but I have great respect for my hon. friends opposite. I am sure they can offer some very interesting and constructive suggestions, whether they are members of the Progressive Conservative party, the New Democratic Party or the Creditiste party.

I should like to deal generally with the procedure that is contemplated in the bill because it seems to me there has been a good deal of confusion which has been compounded by some of the hasty criticisms made by hon. members opposite. Let me refer to the Food Prices Review Board, which is now in place and established. That board has been monitoring food prices now over a considerable period of time and has operated by persuasion. It has had a considerable number of successes and it has also had a large number of critics. But there is one point upon which all parties are now agreed, and that is that the time has come to put some teeth into the recommendations of the Food Prices Review Board. That is what this bill will do. This bill will establish the enforcement machinery.

On paper, the procedure that is outlined in the bill may appear rather cumbersome.

Mr. Baker: That is the understatement of the year.

Mr. Sharp: However, I regret to say that opposition spokesmen, either deliberately or otherwise, have made it appear much more cumbersome than it actually is. The reason for the procedure in the bill is that the government is concerned to be both fair and effective at one and the same time. I make no apology for an attempt to be fair. I do not want this piece of legislation—and I know the government does not either—to be categorized as a witch hunt. That is not its purpose. We have no intention of penalizing the manufacturer or the merchant who is making an honest living and taking a normal profit. Indeed, we on the government side want to encourage business of this kind and will take all measures that are reasonable to encourage businessmen who are honest, who are not profiteering or gouging. Our target in this bill is the manufacturer or merchant who is profiteering and gouging. That is the purpose of this bill and is why I said at the beginning that those who are opposed to the bill are opposed to the attack on profiteering and gouging.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: The second point that I should like to make is that, contrary to the assertions that have been made in this House, the government can act quickly on a report of the Food Prices Review Board recommending action. A price stop can be put into effect immediately without any cumbersome machinery. The opposition has misrepresented the bill in this respect, either deliberately or, perhaps, inadvertently. I am not going to attribute motives here but I can assure the members of the House that the bill is quite clear on this point. A price freeze comes into effect at the time of the declaration if we so wish. There is no cumbersome machinery to be dealt with. There is, however, machinery to protect—

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he would be good enough to read the clause in the bill that provides what he says is provided—that is to say, that without any further hearing a declaration is made and the price is frozen. Would he please read the clause in the bill that makes that provision?

Mr. Sharp: I have read it, Mr. Speaker. It would not be appropriate for me, on second reading of the bill, to read clauses of the bill, but I can assure the hon. gentlemen that there is provision for this procedure. As soon as a declaration is made, a price freeze can come into effect, and no one can raise prices for 30 days without notice. This effectively freezes prices for 30 days.

It is also important—and this is why I emphasize the point of fairness—that Canadian businessmen should be enabled to raise their prices if this is warranted by cost increases, and normal mark-ups and profits should be permitted. To act otherwise would be grossly discriminatory. And not only that; it would, of course, act in opposition to what I am sure every member of this House wants, and that is to encourage honest businessmen to produce as much as possible. That is our purpose, and I am sure it is the purpose of everyone in this House. So, we have to establish procedures to ensure that the action we take is fair and legitimate, and that all the merchants concerned have an opportunity of appealing if they disagree with the judgment of the officials.

● (1530)

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that food products are not our only concern. There are other products in respect of which the government believes action may be required and where action will be taken. May I deal briefly with the suggestion made by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), not only on this occasion but on other occasions. I think it is part of the official platform of that party, this idea of a general prices review board.

It was suggested that this is an alternative the government could have employed instead of using the procedures established in this bill, that is the government might have appointed a general prices review board. We looked very carefully at that alternative and we came to the conclusion that this would have produced unnecessary bureaucracy. Moreover, it was suggested that we could have included a number of other things including services. It seems to us that the reaction to such a proposal would justifiably have been that this is political window dressing. That is the charge that has been made against this bill. I can assure the House that if the government had brought in a general prices review board which purported to have all these powers which were directed at only the question of profiteering and gouging it would have appeared as an inflated proposal that should be condemned out of hand as unnecessary bureaucracy, and that is why we proceeded as we did.

The basic assumption underlying this bill, and I believe it is a justifiable assumption, is that profiteering and gouging are the exception and not the rule in Canada. It is also assumed that the particular circumstances which have led to recent rapid increases, and that facilitate profiteering and gouging, are of a temporary nature, and, although they will persist for some time, we believe they are not of an indefinite duration. The government therefore decided to monitor pricing practices in areas other than food products by a selective approach, by instituting inquiries in important areas where profiteering and gouging could have widespread and pervasive effects, but also, and this is an important provision of the bill, retain freedom of action to act even without an inquiry.

So this machinery which has been described as cumbersome could in fact be put into effect quickly, and could be very effective in dealing with the only problem with which this bill is concerned, namely that of profiteering and gouging.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. Sharp: I do not mind.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister has indicated that it would be possible to move very quickly without an inquiry, and he has also suggested that the bill was given considerable consideration over an extended period before it was drafted and presented to the House. Is he in a position, in view of what he suggests actually took place, to lay on the table at the present time a list of those articles or classes of articles or companies which, in the government's opinion, should be subject to this kind of action in the immediate future?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I deal with this question very directly as it is an important one. If the government were to institute a number of inquiries, which it could do under the Inquiries Act, into areas where profiteering and gouging were suspected to arise, then unless we had this bill there would be no effective action that could be taken against those industries or those corporations. I suggest to the hon. member in answer to his question that we should get this bill through so the government will be able to act effectively against profiteering and gouging, because without this bill it cannot. That is the situation and that is why I say the members of the opposition have a responsibility to the people of this country to support effective action against profiteering and gouging, and the most effective action that can be taken is to support this Bill C-29.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I submit that while the action that we are taking looks less impressive than the establishment of a general prices review board, in fact it is likely to be more effective. It is likely to be more effective because it will be a good deal less wasteful and less bureaucratic for the intended purpose.

Now, I come to the question of services. This is another major question raised by spokesmen for the opposition. I would like to deal briefly with it as I would like the opposition to know that we did very seriously consider whether or not we should include services within the scope of the legislation. They were omitted for three reasons. In saying that, I would like to make it clear that if a case can be made for putting some of these services back in the bill, because there are serious omissions, the government would not be strongly opposed. Indeed, we would look sympathetically at any suggestion that would be made in this field, if it were constructive. Let me explain why at the initial stages we took services out.

If you look first at services like hairdressing, laundries and things of this kind, the government was very doubtful whether one would want to proffer charges of profiteering and gouging in service industries of this kind. Then we come to the major service industries in the financial field, like banking, money lending and other financial institutions. The problem here is that they do not lend themselves to the kind of procedures provided in this bill. Moreover, many of them are under the supervision of government agencies and to add them to this bill might create some confusion, and probably would not add to the effectiveness of what is being done now.

The third class, of course, includes services such as transportation, telephone rates. These kind of services are now under public control and certainly there would be no point in putting them under this bill. As I say, these are the reasons we left services out, and if the House or parliament decides in its wisdom that services should be included, the government is not particularly opposed. What we did not want to do was mislead the people. We want this bill to be effective, and the place where it can be most effective is in the field of goods.

We now come to the question of land. Everyone will agree that probably the greatest inflation we have seen in this country is in respect of the price of land. Again, when we looked at the machinery for controlling the price of land we doubted whether the kind of machinery in this bill which is to deal with profiteering and gouging could be applied in any very simple way, at least in respect of the transactions by individuals in land. Moreover, we know from our own experience, and all of us know this, that the provinces in many ways are in a better position to deal with questions of land prices than is the federal government. As I say, we are not opposed to taking action against or in respect of land prices, but we are a little doubtful whether this is the place that action could be most effective. The main element of increased prices of housing is the increased cost of land. We can take action where the price of building supplies and materials are concerned as that does lie within the ambit of this bill. Therefore, housing is included. The price of land does involve a difficult problem.

In brief, this bill, although far-reaching, and one of the most far-reaching pieces of legislation brought before this House in recent years, is nevertheless limited. It is specifically limited in its approach not because the government is timid, and not because it is lacking in seriousness, but because it wants to concentrate its efforts where practical results have some chance of being achieved. That is the purpose and the philosophy of the bill. That is why I reject the charge of the hon. member for York South that this bill is a piece of political window dressing. It is put forward, I can assure the House, after mature consideration of the alternatives. All the alternatives that have been put forward by the opposition were considered by the government before this particular approach was decided upon. These alternatives were rejected not because the government lacked courage but because, to use the hon. member's own words, we thought it might look like window dressing.

Now, on a subject like profiteering and gouging it is easy to be demagogic. I do not know of any subject on which it is easier to make a rousing speech, but it is not so easy to devise fair and effective measures to cope with unwarranted price increases in a free and open society. This bill may be imperfect but I can assure the House that such imperfections as it may have are not deliberate. It may be perhaps that we have not been able to foresee every issue and circumstance, but I can assure the House that the government intends to use the machinery to do everything reasonable to curb profiteers and gougers starting from the day the bill becomes law.

In this connection I was somewhat taken back looking back at the speech made by the hon. member for York South when he was dealing with this issue. He said he is not opposed to the principle of this bill. He said he is opposed to profiteering and gouging but that he does not think the government is serious about it. He quoted the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), as recorded at page 1943 of Hansard:

> I turn, therefore, to a report in the Montreal Star of April 25, a report which appeared in a number of other papers. Here is part of this report. I quote:
> The Prime Minister indicated that the legislation might not be proclaimed until needed. He suggested that the threat of it would be enough to stop companies from profiteering.

I would have thought the hon. gentleman would have checked the accuracy of the report or if he did not want to do that that at least he might have looked at what the Prime Minister really said in this House of Commons when similar questions were put to him and in that way he might have ascertained what was the attitude of the Prime Minister and the government. I read from Hansard of March 13, 1974 at page 473 where the Prime Minister is recorded as saying:

> When gouging or profiteering has been established before the independent board and those who are alleged to have gouged have been given a chance to state their case, if they do not take corrective action that is when we will act and not on some arbitrary suggestion by the hon. member.

That is the attitude of the government. We would not have brought this legislation forward if we did not intend to use it. Why would we have gone to all that trouble?

An hon. Member: Yes!

Mr. Sharp: I will come to that question immediately. The hon. member for York South referred to this bill as a sop to the NDP which he is not accepting. On reflection the hon. member, I am convinced, will wish he had not uttered that unfortunate remark. Until he said that I had assumed that the support of the NDP was not for sale on any terms, and that no sop of any kind regardless of how enticing it might be would ever be accepted by the NDP. I still believe this because I am a friend of the hon. member for York South, and I believe essentially in his integrity.

I still believe that the NDP support is not available at any price. I am sure the NDP, like the members of this party, try to act in the public interest and that is why I believe he will regret that kind of remark. We on this side of the House have never offered any sop to any party or to any member in order to gain support for the measures we have put forward. We offer legislation which we believe to be in the public interest and it is up to hon. members to decide whether they will support it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: That is the basis on which we present this bill to the House. In our judgment, it is useful and constructive and indeed essential legislation to curb profiteering and gouging. We do not contend for one moment that it is adequate legislation to deal with inflation. We never said that and I do not say it now. We do not contend that it meets all the problems arising from inflation. No single piece of legislation could possibly do that. We have approached the problem of inflation and are dealing with it through a many-sided program.

We are dealing with it through measures which are in the hands of my colleagues the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis). I could name dozens of ministers who are trying to cope with the problems of a society suffering from inflation. Our attack on inflation is many-sided. The opposition know this. When they characterize this piece of legislation as the government's answer to inflation they know this is not true. This bill is directed toward gouging and profiteering and should command the support of every member of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: So I say to hon. members opposite; let us stop playing politics with this issue and approve this bill in principle, then get it before the committee where members who have ideas, some of them good ideas, can put them forward. Then, we can get this bill into action so that we in the government can deal with the profiteers and gougers. If we are not in that position we know who will be to blame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, for the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) as a person I have the highest regard and, as a friend, I value him highly, but as for the speech he has just delivered, by jove, Sir, he blew with an uncertain trumpet if anyone ever did. I do not know how the minister's speeches are constructed, but I would not be at all surprised if his chief advisors and writers would be some of those who helped him deliver such pusillanimous missiles as when the French were shooting the Greenpeace all over the ocean or when speaking up magnificently and strongly—

An hon. Member: You are full of prunes.

Mr. Macquarrie: A brilliant remark. One of the uncertain members of the House opposite said I was full of prunes. How brilliant can they get on that side in times of extremity! I think, too, of the occasion when we had such strong notes about the sale of locomotives to Cuba and the pusillanimous patty-caking that went on over that episode.

What interests me is that this minister of all ministers should be rushing to the aid of the embattled minister of yesterday. Where is the Minister of Finance? Is this not a matter of finance? Why is he not speaking? Where was the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson)? Why is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) not dealing with this measure? The Secretary of State for External Affairs comes in as the one supporter of the embattled minister of yesterday. We might even have heard from that super-oil purchaser, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) who, if he is on the bit, can get it for 99½ cents a gallon when it is going for 30 cents everywhere else. These are the economic giants who should be speaking. I think there is some rule that even if you are interrupting you do not do so from your seat.

● (1550)

An hon. Member: Where is Gillies?

An hon. Member: Where is that front bench power?

Mr. Stanfield: There is nothing to deal with.

Mr. McGrath: Where were you when you were needed?

Mr. Stanfield: I stay here as a matter of courtesy to the minister.

Mr. Speaker: May we have order please! Perhaps the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) is at the point, now that we have had all these pleasant exchanges, of being given an opportunity to make a speech which, I am sure, will address itself to the bill before us.

Mr. Macquarrie: Methinks that horrendous coming events are having an effect upon the manners of the hon. gentlemen opposite. It is not my fault that these things are happening. I am a mere contributor to bringing about a better day and times.

I was impressed by the minister's unkindness to the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Lewis). Is there no place for gratitude in public life?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macquarrie: What did he mean when he said that the hon. member would regret that kind of remark? I felt quakes and shivers way up in this part of the House.

The minister did say, and I noted this, that the measure before us was not hastily drafted. It might have been better had he admitted it was because, as my colleagues so brilliantly pointed out yesterday,—the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey)—it is in fact an horrendous piece of legislation unworthy of any government, and certainly one which no thoughtful parliament would dare adopt in its present from if they wanted to keep their respectability and responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: But if the minister suggested that this was not a hasty response to the economic problems of this country, he was most certainly correct in that. There has been no haste in dealing with inflation by that government, far from it. We have had the Prices and Incomes Commission, we have had the Food Prices Review Board, we have had suggestions that inflation was going to be dealt with, that the whole settlement was just round the corner, and we have gone around in circles. There has been no haste in dealing with the egregious problems facing this country.

I am saddened particularly by the document which came in yesterday, the report of the National Council of Welfare on low income consumers in the Canadian marketplace, Prices and the Poor. Here we have documentation by a government appointed body that inflation is so serious in this country that thousands and thousands of Canadians have the nutritional elements of their diet so seriously affected that their health is being impaired. That is the kind of country in which we live and the kind of country which we see being poorly and inadequately governed. I say certainly there was no haste in trying to deal with these situations. This council asks for aid for thousands and thousands of Canadians who cannot continue under the present situation of prolonged inflation.

The minister was a little more political than he usually is. He endeavoured to take a crack at the parties on this side of the House, using such words as "hypocrisy". He made reference to some of the situations dealt with by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). I would say to the minister: had he listened more carefully over the past many months to the consistent and straighforward suggestions of the Leader of the Opposition on a comprehensive program to control the rampant inflation, we would not be in the situation where the group opposite has failed so sadly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: He even took a swipe at the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who happened to speak with great clarity yesterday on the inadequacy of the aid which was being offered to public servants in these days of crippling inflation.

Mr. Sharp: What about the wage freeze?

Mr. Foster: The aid is not inadequate, it is your speech.

Mr. Baker: At least we don't have to listen to you.

Mr. Macquarrie: I am enjoying the dialogue so much that I hesitate to resume the monologue.

I do take considerable exception to my former professorial colleague, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) who enunciated an interesting theory today that you vote on a measure and then you decide what you voted for and what were the parameters of the vote. If it is confidence, you do not know until after the vote has been taken. This really stands Beauchesne and Bourinot on their heads and starts them spinning. The minister knows this as well as I do, because he used to study and to teach from such learned treatises as MacGregor Dawson's Government of Canada. He pointed out very clearly that if the House should decide to reject a government bill or to amend it in a way unacceptable to the cabinet, then "Her Majesty's government will consider that it is relieved of the duty of carrying on any longer the government of the country." That is what the constitutional truth of the whole matter is, and if in the latter days of its existence this government will proclaim that this is its best effort, that this is its major contribution, that this is its onslaught against profiteering, that this is its major attack on inflation, then I say: woe to them if that is the best they can come up with. I do not think they will find any constitutional device to allow them to have second thoughts.

An hon. Member: What is your alternative?

Mr. Macquarrie: I hope that before too long the people of Canada will have an opportunity to see what it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: Surely, the vote of the people would be acceptable even if a vote in the House might be questionable in the constitutional theory of the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. MacEachen: I can quote you Tory prime ministers who made the same statement and lived up to it.

Mr. Macquarrie: I will hear from the minister later because he may need to render his assistance to the embattled minister as well. We may be approaching the time when speeches, even brilliant ones, might not be as useful as the determination by the House. If that is what is desired by the government, I will be glad to surrender some of my time so that we may make a decision upon this matter.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs says that this legislation is pretty good but that we can improve it. I agree with my colleagues who spoke yesterday, and I agree with the Leader of the NDP, that the bill is outrageous, that it is a travesty, that it is inadequate and that it will not do that which the press release accompanying it proclaims. I oppose it. I think the people of Canada will oppose it and if the government stakes its claim to perpetuity on this, it will have a weak and fragile claim.

● (1600)

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) who has just spoken on this bill has made a useful contribution in that while he may not have told us what the bill will do he certainly clarified what it will not do. He has told us that it is not going to resolve the problem of inflation, that it is not going to provide selective price controls, and that it is solely aimed at stopping undue profiteering, despite the fact that he then went on to say that profiteering in Canada was the exception rather than the rule, and that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) has already said that there is no evidence of widespread abuse in the country.

So here is a minister seeking to defend a bill, and doing it very poorly, who has only succeeded in telling us that the bill will not do most of the things that the government has been trying to persuade the public it will do, namely, help in the matter of inflation and provide some protection with respect to price controls.

The minister says that the government has introduced this legislation in order to stop some forms of profiteering. He has made a very poor case to prove that. He says that upon a declaration prices will be frozen. I ask him to find where there is any such provision in clauses 51 and 52? Prices cannot be frozen without a reference to the courts. The minister should know that, if he has read this legislation. I suspect he has not studied it very closely.

He has been dragged in to defend this legislation because the two ministers who are the arch apostles of high profits would cut very inconspicuous figures in this debate trying to prove that we should stop profiteering, profiteering which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs says does not exist, and which the Secretary of State for External Affairs says is the exception rather than the rule.

I think we ought to take a look at this bill, which is supposed to deal with profiteering practices, in the light of the total picture which faces the country with respect to inflation. I think every member will recognize that the rapidly escalating cost of living is one of the two major problems disturbing the Canadian people. The other, of course, is unemployment.

The problem of rising living costs has aroused the Canadian people as nothing else I have seen in many years. When you have an increase in a living cost of 10.4 per cent, an increase in the price of food of 18.6 per cent, and when you have the cost of living for hundreds of thousands of workers rising faster than their real income then you have a crisis which is stirring this nation as nothing else has done for many years.

Since the beginning of this parliament the members of the New Democratic Party have taken a very realistic approach to this problem. We have recognized that inflation is part of a worldwide trend, and that there are factors which are beyond the control of any national government. We have said repeatedly that just a freeze on prices and wages is unrealistic and could be very unjust, that there is no way in which the government of Canada can fix the price of imported products—citrus fruits, coffee, tea, cocoa, bauxite, natural rubber, and certain sophisticated machinery which we must buy outside this country. The prices of those commodities are set by the countries that produce them, and we must pay those prices or do without those commodities. There is no way that we can freeze those prices.

We also recognize that merely to freeze wages and prices is to lock in a great many injustices on the one hand, and a great deal of excess profiteering on the other. The report of the Senate Committee showed that there are 500,000 families in Canada, called by that committee the working poor, whose incomes are lower than if they were on welfare. To freeze their incomes is to freeze them into unconscionable poverty. And at the same time to freeze the profits of the banks and the oil companies is to put them in paradise. Therefore, we have suggested a two-pronged attack on this whole question of the rising cost of living.

Since the beginning of this parliament we have first of all suggested that parliament and the government must make provision to help those who are most vulnerable to the rising cost of living. The government has responded to some extent. There were increases in old age pensions. The old age pension was put on the basis of the rising cost of living rather than being limited to a 2 per cent increase. There was an increase in veterans' pensions. Last year there was some reduction in personal income tax for those in the lower and middle income groups. Increased family allowances are another example. These things have helped, but I want to point out that the rising cost of living in the meantime has eaten up all the gains that these people have made.

We pressed for other things. We suggested that commodities which are essential for every family, and particularly for those on lower incomes, ought to have assistance by way of subsidies or by way of reduced sales taxes. Some of this has been done. The government did introduce subsidies on milk, beef and bread. Whether they have reached the consumer or not is something we are waiting for the government to discover because it has not yet completed its studies in that regard. And some sales taxes have been reduced on items like children's clothing. We have not reduced such things as the sales tax on building materials. We have not provided any tax credits for people in lower income brackets. But the government did move, and I want to give it credit. It moved, sometimes reluctantly, sometimes on being pushed very hard, and it did take steps to cushion the effect of rising living costs, particularly on those in the lower income brackets.

But when we come to the second prong of the attack which the NDP had been advocating with respect to the rising cost of living, the government has been adamant in its refusal. Broadly speaking, we suggested four things. First of all, we suggested the setting up of a prices review board to monitor prices, with power to freeze prices where increases were unjustified, with power to roll back prices, and to move into certain areas and hold prices at a level that would be fair and just.

Profiteering Practices

We have said that along with this it would be necessary to establish a two-price system for a great many commodities. If this government merely fixes the price of a commodity and that price is less than the one producers can get on the world market, that commodity will go out of the country. Therefore, we require a two-price system, with export controls and, in some cases, an export tax. There is little value in fixing a price if the commodity is not available. Many commodities are made in this country which bring in substantial profits if they are sold on the world market. I do not see why Canadians should be required to pay high prices for steel, lumber, cement or anything else produced in this country merely because corporations can obtain a higher return if they ship such commodities out of the country. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), when answering the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), has completely rejected a two—price system for selected areas which should be brought under control.

● (1610)

The third thing we have suggested is the reduction of mortgage interest rates to 6 per cent; and the fourth thing, an excess profits tax to siphon off some surplus profits being made at present.

The government should realize that the people who work with hand and brain in this country to produce its wealth, and whose real income in the last quarter of 1973, compared with the last quarter of 1972, was down by $5.50 per week, will not tolerate that situation. When the working people note the distribution of our gross national product and see that the share for corporate profits has gone up and the share for wages and salaries has gone down, they will not accept it. That kind of redistribution of income in reverse will not be condoned or accepted by the Canadian people.

Although the government has moved on the first prong of our attack and cushioned some of the effects of rising costs of living on those who are most drastically affected, it has consistently refused to intervene in the economy, something it must do if the ordinary people of this country are to be protected against profiteering and against the high prices corporations can charge and demand if they threaten to ship their products out of this country.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs who spoke this afternoon said, in response to my leader, that he was sure the NDP is not for sale, that the government did not throw sops to the NDP or anyone else and had acted according to its conscience. His conscience must be guilty.

Mr. Bawden: You must be feeling bad, too.

Mr. Douglas: In the last year, the government has had to be shoved and pushed into accepting changes. Except when it was talking about increasing the old age pension, family allowances or oil policy, the government has always been reluctant—

Mr. Sharp: We were always ready to listen to advice and to recommendations.

Mr. Douglas: The government could respond to the first of the two prongs of the NDP program and raise old age pensions and other allowances without arousing criticism, but it is not prepared to challenge the corporate structure of this country.

The member who preceded me wondered why the Secretary of State for External Affairs had spoken in this debate, since its subject matter is not within his purview. I suggest he entered the debate to assure the Bay Street barons that they need not worry about this bill because, after all, profiteering is the exception in this country, not the rule. The government's attitude with respect to intervening in the economy to provide equity and economic justice has become increasingly apparent in recent months.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), addressing a joint meeting of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Manitoba and the Law Society of Manitoba at Winnipeg, on April 19, 1974, said in part:

> One of the red herrings injected into this debate, particularly by the NDP, is that the corporate profits of Canada's manufacturers and processors are now so high that the reduction in their tax burden is completely unjustified.
>
> Certainly there has been a substantial improvement in business earnings, an improvement in which Canada's manufacturers and processors have fully shared. Certainly there is some point of proper balance to be struck. But profits cannot be considered in a vacuum. They must be considered in relation to our urgent requirement for sharply increased capital investment . . .
> It must be obvious to nearly everyone other than Mr. Lewis and followers that the money to finance this huge increase in capital investment by Canadian manufacturers must come from somewhere.

It is apparent that the money is to come from the consumers of this country.

An hon. Member: From ordinary taxpayers.

Mr. Douglas: Yes, from the taxpayers of this country who have had to pick up the burden of the corporate tax concessions which this government provided last year, with the help of the Progressive Conservative party.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) sings a similar song. Speaking to the conference board in Canada in Winnipeg on April 3, he said in part:

> Of course, the problem, according to the New Democratic Party, is profits. The NDP believes profits aren't really necessary. This government knows profits are necessary to continued industrial growth—provided that a significant share of these profits is pumped back into expansion and employment.

Later in that speech he said:

> Putting it another way, the proportion of earnings retained for corporate purposes was at an all-time high. Our manufacturers are using their profits to finance expansion—and that's what we want.

That is the government's position. I can understand why neither of those ministers wants to defend this bill. How can they talk about wanting to stop profiteering when they tell everybody that profiteering is marvellous, that the more profits you make the more jobs you create. It is dangerous to suggest the thesis that the consumer of this country, when he purchases an article, should provide for its cost of production, for the servicing and retirement of capital debt and for a reasonable return to shareholders, and, in addition, enough money to enable the corporation to retain sufficient earnings for future capital expansion. When a man buys a pair of shoes, he can legitimately be expected to pay for overhead and return to the entrepreneur on capital investment. Should he also be required to pay, in addition, for the construction of a new plant or the expansion of an existing plant. That is the thesis the government is advancing.

● (1620)

Now, let us look at another aspect of the government's approach to intervention in the economy. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) made reference to the fact that the Food Prices Review Board was set up. He said this act will now put teeth in the Food Prices Review Board. I ask him what prevented them from putting teeth in that board when it was established.

As a matter of fact, when this matter was before the committee on food prices, representatives of the New Democratic Party moved that the Food Prices Review Board be given the necessary power to freeze and roll back prices where it was found necessary to do so. That amendment was defeated by both Liberal and Conservative members.

When the matter was before the House, the members of this party pleaded with the government to put some teeth in the Food Prices Review Board. The government refused. Why did they refuse? If they now believe the Food Prices Review Board should have teeth, why did they not give it teeth a year ago? The fact is they had no intention of the Food Prices Review Board having teeth. The Food Prices Review Board was set up because there was public clamour for the government to do something. That piece of deception not having worked, they are trying a second piece of deception, that is giving the Food Prices Review Board rubber teeth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The government is not going to fool anybody by the kind of statements that were made this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The fact is that this piece of legislation is a last act of desperation. This bill is an attempt to perpetrate a cruel hoax on the people of Canada by seeking to convince them that the government intends to do something when it is increasingly apparent they do not intend to do anything about the large scale profiteering that is going on by the corporations of this country. If the government wanted to deal with profiteering, why has it taken so long?

It is very interesting that when we argued about putting teeth in the Food Prices Review Board, it was the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) who said the government did not have the constitutional authority. That is what he said a year ago. He now finds it has constitutional authority.

I was tremendously impressed by the answer which the minister gave when questioned by the press on this matter. They asked how come he said they did not have constitutional authority a year ago and now he brings in a bill that he claims gives them constitutional authority to do something about profiteering. The minister's answer should be put on the record because it is one of the great and immortal sayings of all times. This is his answer:

> It doesn't appear to me now the way it appeared to appear to me then.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The minister outdid himself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs on a question of privilege.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say I was adopting the wording of a learned judge who was asked a similar question. Therefore, I cannot claim originality for that phrase. I also want to add that there was a part of my answer which indicated the views I expressed then were based on advice I received. I think what we are doing is consistent with advice on constitutional authority, especially since we are not attempting to apply this bill solely in a very limited and localized situation.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, all I can suggest to the minister is if he acted a year ago on the advice he was getting, he was getting very bad advice. I do not see any indication that his advisers have improved, judging by the legislation he is now trying to put through this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: As a matter of fact, the most damning thing about this bill is not just what is contained in it. It is the attitude which the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have taken toward the bill.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs chided the leader of our party about the Prime Minister's statement as quoted in the Montreal Star of April 25 in which the Prime Minister indicated the legislation might not be proclaimed until needed. He suggested that the threat of it would be enough to stop companies from profiteering. The Prime Minister did not deny that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, when I made that comment in my address, I did it on the advice of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who denies he ever made any such statement. I suggested the leader of the New Democratic Party should check his sources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: If we were to try to check the sources of all the off-the-cuff statements which the Prime Minister makes, we would be very busy people because he makes off-the-cuff statements which contradict themselves from day to day. Let's take the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Alexander: You take him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Are his statements equally unreliable when the press quotes him as saying this legislation is going to be used sparingly.

An hon. Member: Sit down, Herb.

Mr. Douglas: We might as well take it all at once, but let me finish the quotation. He said the legislation is going to be used sparingly and only where the problem is serious and obvious. Is that what the bill is for? That is the minister's own statement.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think if you check the press story, you will find the word "sparingly" is not included in the quotation. That is the interpretation of the journalist who wrote the article. With regard to the other part, I think it flows from questions I was asked at the time as to the approximate number of times it might be used. I was attempting to indicate it would be used officially in a certain number of circumstances without making it a form of general price controls to which my hon. friends party objects.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not denied it. He merely wants to get it in context. I suggest the context makes it even worse. May I also point out that the background document, which he himself put out, says that the available evidence does not suggest any widespread abuse or profiteering.

Today the Secretary of State for External Affairs said in the House—it cannot be denied because it is on the record—that profiteering in this country is the exception rather than the rule. Therefore, we are going to have legislation to deal with profiteering that is not widespread and profiteering which is the exception rather than the rule.

An hon. Member: And temporary.

Mr. Douglas: And temporary. As a matter of fact, I wonder where these people have been. Look at the oil industry profits for the first three months of this year. Imperial Oil had profits of over $1 million a day for the first quarter with $4 a barrel oil. Imagine what their profits will be with $6.50 a barrel oil.

The minister says that profiteering is the exception rather than the rule. This country today is riddled with profiteering. As the hon. member for York South pointed out yesterday, in the first three months of this year, 111 companies in Canada showed profit increases of 70 per cent over last year. Is that not excessive profiteering? Apparently the Secretary of State for External Affairs does not consider that profiteering.

The fact is this government considers profits to be a good thing. Both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce have said that profiteering helps to create jobs and therefore it is a good thing. Then why this bill? We have this bill because the government knows the public are fed up with seeing the workers' share of the gross national product going down and corporate profits going up. This government knows it has to do something. It is doing something by perpetrating a farce. I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that we in this party will not be accomplices to a farce of this kind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1630)

Mr. Douglas: This legislation is brought in after one year during which the government has consistently refused to do anything about these excess profits. It is brought in now because the government faces the prospect of going to the country. I have never had much faith in a deathbed repentance and I do not think the electorate will have any faith in a deathbed repentance, either. We in this party do not believe this bill was ever seriously intended as a measure to stop gouging and profiteering. We think that in the main it was an attempt to convince the public that the government was keeping a commitment made by the Prime Minister on February 28 when he said his administration would not allow gouging and profiteering through windfall profits at the expense of the Canadian people.

Yesterday, the leader of our party dealt with his act very effectively. Let me just reiterate three points which I believe ought to be reinforced in view of the statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs—they relate to three of the basic weaknesses of the bill. First, it can be put on the statute books without becoming effective in any way, shape or form until a declaration is made by the cabinet. It could sit on the statute books as a monument to the government's good intentions, and nothing more. It could, of course, as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has suggested, be a deterrent. I notice he said this outside the House, but so that he will not deny it, let me quote what he said inside the House as reported in Hansard at page 1940:

> In any event, the existence of this legislation should act as a deterrent to those who might otherwise feel they can engage in profiteering with impugnity.

Mr. Gray: Would the hon. member read what I said just before that, so as to put it in context?

Mr. Douglas: I think most of the members on this side of the House are quite capable of reading.

An hon. Member: There are exceptions, then?

Mr. Douglas: In essence, the minister said the bill might not be very effective, but it could prove to be a deterrent. And that is exactly what the Prime Minister had said outside the House.

An hon. Member: He did not!

Mr. Douglas: I suggest the deterrent value is negligible.

Mr. Gray: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In all fairness, ought not the hon. member to read what I said just prior to the passage he quoted, which was that the government would be ready, where necessary, to make use of the authority it is seeking in this bill as soon as it is approved by parliament and proclaimed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: I will deal with that part of the minister's speech in a moment. I am dealing, now, with statements made by the Prime Minister outside the House and those the minister made yesterday. I am saying to the minister that the deterrent value is negligible. The corporate structure in this country doesn't scare worth a damn and it will not be scared by a bill which is nothing more than a paper tiger. These people are certainly not going to be scared by the kind of statements which were made yesterday by the Minister of Consumer Affairs and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) today. They have already been promised by the minister that the legislation will be used sparingly.

Mr. Gray: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the hon. member—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair has been lenient, but I do not think that each time one hon. member takes objection to what another hon. member is saying a question of privilege should be raised.

Mr. Douglas: I can understand the minister's concern. He produces a piece of legislation, then he goes outside the House and says he will only use it sparingly and that it will only be called upon to deal with serious and obvious cases of profiteering. When he had damned his own legislation with faint praise I can understand his concern when it is brought to the attention of the House of Commons and the people of Canada. I think the Canadian people will be quick to realise that this legislation is a sham, a snare and a delusion.

The second obvious weakness is that there is no provision for any monitoring agency in this process, though we have talked over the years about a Prices Review Board, about a continuing and on-going process of canvassing prices; about a board with power to impose selective controls, freeze prices and roll back prices. There is no such power here. This legislation covers only a limited field. The Secretary of State was really talking with his tongue in his cheek when he said the reason the legislation did not cover services was that the government did not wish to deal with hairdressers, barbers, people in the service industries. He knows this is not mandatory legislation but permissive legislation and that if the bill covers services, as it should because services represent about 25 per cent of the Canadian economy, the government could be selective. Nobody expects the government to interfere with hairdressing, for example. But it could interfere with interest rates; it could interfere with the profits made by the land developers; it could interfere with what is going on in connection with house-building programs. The reason services are left out is that the government does not want to tackle this important field.

My final point is this. The nub of this legislation lies in the fact that when the minister talks about ability to freeze prices or roll back prices—and I deny he possesses that power, except through the courts—he fails to tell us at what level prices should be frozen, or to what level prices should be rolled back. The words in the act are "to a customary margin of profit". And what is that? The bill does not say. It does not specify a certain return on capital investment. It does not specify a certain return related to the percentage of sales. Not at all, Mr. Speaker. When the minister himself put out the explanatory information for the edification of the public, the information talks of levels of profit for the previous year.

● (1640)

Mr. Gray: That was a hypothetical example.

Mr. Douglas: Indeed, it was a hypothetical example. But why did the minister choose to do that? Surely, the minister did not pull the figures out of the air. The year 1973 was the highest profit year in history. Is that to be the level of profit to which profits will be rolled back? Neither the minister nor the bill has told us that. There is nothing in the bill to indicate that the level of profit will be restricted to a reasonable return on capital investment. All it says is that the cabinet—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him by the standing orders, plus a certain extension because of various points raised during the hon. member's speech, has expired. He might, however, continue if there is unanimous consent. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gray: Agreed in spite of his lack of fairness.

Mr. Douglas: I will take only a moment to conclude, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the House for its indulgence. What I am saying is that unless the government is prepared to stipulate some framework within which customary profits will be defined, some basis upon which the government will act with respect to fair and reasonable return on capital investment, then the bill is meaningless. If we were to follow the hypothetical example that the minister himself put forward, that profits at their 1973 level are to become the norm, then we are thrusting upon the Canadian people for the future a distribution of national income in which the corporate sector will have an increased return and the people who do the work in this country will have a lesser return. I say that is not acceptable to this party and I do not think it will be acceptable to the great mass of the Canadian people.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I suppose in light of the queries that have been raised earlier as to why certain member on this side of the House are participating in the debate, someone will be asking what am I doing becoming involved in this particular discussion as well. It is a good question and one I am happy to answer.

In the first instance, my own personal responsibilities in the cabinet have me very much involved in economic matters. Secondly, and more importantly, I take second place to nobody in this House, including the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), in having concern for the people of this country. The "holier than thou" attitude that shines forth, as I have had occasion to say so often, is one that, of course, we can sympathize with, and I am not suggesting that the concern of these hon. members is not genuine. What I do resent is that there is no one else in this House, in their view, who appears to have any concern for the people. I deny that, and our record shows it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: The second point is that while I normally have a profound respect for the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, because not only is he a classic debater but he is one who, by and large, respects the decent rules of debate and also decides, generally speaking, to make his arguments on the basis of conviction, if we have 24 hours to analyse the record in Hansard, we will see that this afternoon there were more distortions, more half-truths, more repetitions of things that have been repeatedly denied by respected members of this House than I have ever heard before.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and his leader yesterday made the case that this bill was such that they could not vote for it, even in principle. I say to them, having just heard from them that our attitude is a hoax, that the greatest hoax of all is that phony approach which refuses to let the bill go to committee, where hon. members would have the opportunity, as they have had the opportunity for a year and a half now, and with frequent success, to improve the legislation.

What is more, Mr. Speaker, if hon. members look at the excerpts of Hansard that I have here, but which I will not take the time to read, they will see at least 50 requests from that corner of the House for roll-back provisions, for some kind of improvement in the functions of the Prices Review Board, for the establishment of another kind of agency, for a whole range of things for which we have now provided the basis.

Hon. members may not like all of the provisions of the bill, and we have said that it may still contain inadequacies, but the biggest hoax, the biggest phony, is that hon. members will not put the bill into committee where they will have a chance to make improvements to it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: What they are essentially saying—

An hon. Member: Have you read the bill?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, I have read the bill, and this is the other point that I would like to make. Whether it is by accident or design—and I choose, because of my friendship with hon. members, to assume that it is by accident—they have completely distorted the concept of the bill; for example, the reference by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands that the courts would have to put it into action. That is simply not true.

If the bill were to go to committee, if there is an honest doubt on the hon. member's part or there is an ambiguity in the legislation, then such questions could be resolved. The government's intention is not that action should be triggered only by the courts, but that in fact, as the bill is now presented, it does not require to be triggered by the courts. Nevertheless, if hon. members have any doubts on that matter, surely the place to clear them up is in committee. But hon. members will not let us put the bill in committee, because then they would have to give us credit for having done something with regard to this whole profiteering question. Talk about deathbed wishes, Mr. Speaker! They do not want this bill passed by this House just in case we did go to the country, because the bill once again would be to the credit of the government. That is the real reason.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Jamieson: I think you have had your innings.

Mr. Alexander: Let the minister go ahead. Be fair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Douglas: No, Mr. Speaker. I merely asked the minister whether he would permit a question, and I see he has graciously acceded.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, the minister said that it was not true that the act stipulated that the commission could impose a price freeze without going to the courts. I wonder whether he would give us the section or the clause under which that is found?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I was not going to go into the details of the bill and I do not propose to take up my time on matters which, I repeat, should be raised in committee. However, I think that any straightforward reading of the proposed section 51, linked with I think, section 50 ahead of it, will show quite clearly that when there is a declaration a 30 day freeze goes into effect. I do not think there is any argument on that point.

I say again that it would take a very long time to explain the technicalities of the bill, and that this can be done in committee. But personally, I am satisfied, and I think all of my colleagues in government are satisfied, that that provision is in the bill. If there is any ambiguity in the bill, then we are prepared to remove it.

The other point that I want to make has to do with the first 10 or 15 minutes of the hon. gentleman's speech of about 45 minutes. During that time there was a period when I was almost prepared to concede that he thought we were doing some of the right things over here; and indeed he said so. But what was brought out in that period, which again tends to annoy me I must confess, was not a question relating to profiteering alone. Going back to my quotations from Hansard, all that was really talked about was profiteering and a means of getting rid of what is known as gouging. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands opened up the whole question of high profits, big business and uneven distribution. God knows, coming from the province of Newfoundland I am as aware of that as he is, and I say again, nobody in this House is more concerned to see that there is a decent distribution of wealth and that these people at the lower end of the scale get a decent break. I am glad to see finally that they are getting it.

● (1650)

Let me go on to make one point clear, with which I think hon. gentlemen will be in agreement. Newfoundland for the first time, indeed all of Atlantic Canada, specifically the fish plant workers and the fishermen, are getting a decent wage for their work and decent prices. I see that as being just one of the finest breakthroughs we have had in a long time. I am surprised by the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) that we ought to have wage controls in a province like Newfoundland or on the east coast. I thoroughly agree with what another hon. member has said in this regard, that this would be a disaster for the poor people of this country, and I reject that out of hand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I realize that my time may be limited somewhat as a result of the private members' hour, but I do want to say this. I fail totally to understand the attitude of people in that party, particularly that of the hon. member for St. John's East who, as I have said on many occasions, has made significant and important contributions and comments with regard to how this whole problem of prices ought to be dealt with. He himself said yesterday that they had important amendments they believe they could make to the bill if it went into the committee. Other people over there have said that they are looking for clarification in respect of the bill, yet on both sides we hear hon. members saying that they do not want to even look at it in the committee. They want to throw it out before it gets there. That to me is a completely irrational attitude which means only one thing so far as I am concerned. It is pretty hard to believe that this party is genuinely concerned about gouging and profiteering—pretty darn hard to believe it—if they will not take this bill and bring it together in a co-operative way in the committee in order to see what can be done with it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I repeat that it is a much stronger bill than the NDP party in particular has talked about. With his particular kind of rhetoric, and I admire it, of course, the leader of the NDP yesterday talked about the so-called elongated process. Well, it may not be an elongated process, but in his mouth it was a distorted process. What he said was that so many steps had to be taken before a price freeze could come in that it would literally take the skin off the Canadian consumer, and I remember that phrase. He is wrong about that; he is completely wrong. The freeze can be put on, and I hope that if I do not have the opportunity other speakers will go into this in more detail. It is misleading of our position and it is misleading of this bill.

Let me now deal rather quickly with the three points made by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. He talked about the ineffectiveness of this measure. What he really said was that this is some kind of smokescreen we are putting up. I say to you, that is not so. I say to you that if this House passes this bill I am satisfied this government will act and act at once.

An hon. Member: What about the prices review board?

Mr. Jamieson: My hon. friend uses the prices review board to his advantage when he wants to dismiss it, yet we hear 50 questions asking about what we are going to do, and in some respects praising the prices review board. This is such a double standard I have never seen anything like it for years. I can agree again with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands as I have very little confidence in the business community being threatened by a big stick. I perfectly agree with him that the wagging of a finger is not likely to have much effect.

I repeat that it is our intention, and it will be our intention when this legislation passes, to move and to move decisively. Once this order is issued this price freeze becomes effective. Furthermore, there is the mechanism here for rolling back those prices. I am talking about gouging and the things which the NDP party in particular has emphasized for so long. I am not talking about the whole range of what my friend might regard as inequities in the economic system. There are other measures and other methods of dealing with those. He touched upon some of them when he talked about our bolstering incomes at the lower levels of our society.

I do not question the suggestion that there should be ways for us to get after some of these corporations. Does my friend think that I and a great many of my colleagues here are immune to some of these kinds of things or are unaware of them? That is nonsense. Just put this bill in operation and I will assure you that you will see things move very quickly.

The hon. member talks about continuity once again. I am not sure what he means by continuity, but I do know that mechanisms in the bill provide for an ongoing organization as he will see if he studies the bill objectively. The hon. member's leader yesterday said something about a part-time board, or something of that sort. That is just not the case. It is part of the organization but it will be full-time in the sense of its own activity.

If the hon. member means by continuity a continuing review of prices, we do have a prices review board and other mechanisms through which to do that. The hon. member talks about the complexity of this bill, as have others, and of putting into the piece of legislation one guide as to what constitutes an appropriate level of profit, or whatever one wishes to call it. That is, of course, the height of impossibility. It just cannot be done. Surely, one has to look at each industry, one after the other, in order to determine what represents an appropriate level of profit. For some industries it may very well be a reflection of the investment on earnings, or whatever the case might be, but to suggest that a bill can in fact spell out just how profiteering or gouging shall be measured in all industries, and perhaps do it in one or two sentences, is unrealistic. That merely reflects the total unreality of the arguments that have been coming from the opposition with regard to this measure.

I repeat that hon. members of the opposition said at the initial stages, and I think one or two of their members have said it recently, that our actions in this regard are a hoax. I reject that, and I say that to prove this is not a hoax, let us give second reading to this bill and get it to the committee where perhaps we can bring about the improvements that hon. members would want to see.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair will see the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick), and call it five o'clock.

Vancouver National Harbours Board

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Housing—Newfoundland—Possible extension of residential rehabilitation program to rural areas; the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight)—Agriculture—Threat of grasshopper infestation in western Canada this spring—Action to control; and the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Haliburton)—Post Office—Proportion of employees working on mechanical sorting devices recruited from within service.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, notices of motions (papers) and public bills. There being no private bills, the House will move to notices of motions (papers).

PRIVATE MEMBER MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

REQUEST FOR COPIES OF CONTRACTS BETWEEN VANCOUVER HARBOURS BOARD AND CERTAIN FIRMS RESPECTING USE OF PIERS IN 1973 AND 1974

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all contracts between the National Harbours Board in Vancouver and the following firms (a) Empire Stevedoring Co. Ltd. (b) Canadian Stevedoring Co. Ltd. (c) Canadian National Railways respecting the use of Ballantyne Pier, Lapointe Pier and Centennial Pier for the years 1973 and 1974.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out at the beginning of my remarks that I placed Motion No. 10 on the order paper because I am concerned about the future development of the port of Vancouver and also about the manner in which Mr. William Rathie, the local member of the National Harbours Board and Chairman of the Vancouver Port Authority, is acting in administering that port and its facilities. I might also point out, Mr. Speaker, that I asked to have this matter posted for debate because I am not in the least satisfied with the answer I received from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Guay).

The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) stated:

Mr. Speaker, the documents requested are private and confidential. They are contracts for operating certain shipping terminals in the port of Vancouver which actively compete for business with the port of Seattle, and making them open for public inspection could prejudice their position. I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Vancouver National Harbours Board

Mr. Speaker, it is beyond my understanding why the parliamentary secretary could come to the conclusion that these contracts are of a confidential nature as they have, to the best of my knowledge, been signed between the National Harbours Board and the stevedoring companies. There can be no question that the release of this information can in any way jeopardize the public interest or Vancouver's competitive position with the port of Seattle. You see, Mr. Speaker, the rates charged for stevedoring are already public knowledge and the contracts signed by the NHB and these companies can have no bearing on these rates.

It is my belief that Mr. Rathie made the unilateral decision to have the NHB operate these facilities simply to allow the companies named in the motion to opt out of their responsibilities to pay the general purpose and business taxes to the city of Vancouver. What happened, Mr. Speaker, was that Mr. Rathie arbitrarily and without consultation with the Vancouver city council changed the operating nature of these facilities by cancelling the contracts in force up to October 31, 1973. This is what Mr. Rathie did on November 19, 1973: He wrote to the Vancouver city assessor stating that the facilities in question, which were under lease from the NHB to these companies, had been cancelled effective November 1, 1973, and further stated that the National Harbours Board was now the owner and occupier of these premises.

In his reply of November 30 to Mr. Rathie, Mayor Art Phillips of the city of Vancouver took the position, with which I fully agree, of supporting the findings of the Vancouver Court of Revision that the companies in question had been properly placed on the city's assessment rolls. The mayor further stated that the current practice could only be regarded as an effort to avoid taxes to the city of Vancouver, as there was no visible change in the use of the properties. I stress that—no visible change in the use of the properties. In his reply of December 10 to the mayor, Mr. Rathie took the position that these changes had taken place on November 1, 1973 and there was nothing further he could do.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the minister the result of this shady deal between Mr. Rathie and these stevedoring companies. The 1973 general purpose tax assessment, a realty tax for all purposes, was deemed to be $518,781, while the business tax in that year was assessed at $98,940, for a grand total of $617,721. From the position the city has taken, the estimated revenue for 1974 is as follows: General purpose taxes would have been $537,536 and the business tax $110,580, for a total revenue of $648,-156. Under the existing granting formula for grants in lieu of taxes the city expects to receive in 1974 the paltry sum of $153,536, for a loss of revenue of $494,620, nearly half a million dollars the city is being cheated out of by this bit of chicanery.

As you can realize, this is not an insignificant amount. It is close to one-half million dollars. I would point out that in his address to the Vancouver Merchants' Exchange Limited on February 19 of this year, Mr. Del Taylor, Chairman of the National Harbours Board stated:

> . . . about one-half million dollars goes to the municipalities around the Port of Vancouver for our grants in lieu of taxes to pay for the federal government's share of the services we use . . .

[Mr. Neale.]

While Mr. Taylor may be proud of the fact that all the municipalities concerned receive some half a million dollars collectively, I must point out that due to Mr. Rathie's machinations, the city of Vancouver alone stands to lose just about the same amount of money per year. Unless the city fathers can ascertain how much these stevedoring companies, namely Empire Stevedoring, Canadian Stevedoring and the CNR are paying the National Harbours Board per year, they cannot ascertain how big the rip-off is.

Because of the fact that Mr. Rathie is in the position of being a tsar with regard to the port of Vancouver, and because he has consistently acted in that manner ever since his appointment to his present position to the detriment of the port, I am convinced that a totally new structure is needed to administer the affairs of one of the most important ports in Canada. To ensure consultation with the surrounding municipalities and to allow for input from them I would propose the following new administrative structure. I would hope that the parliamentary secretary to the minister would draw this to the attention of the minister in case he does not read this in Hansard. Vancouver should be removed as a designated NHB port and reconstituted under the provision of the 1964 Harbours Commissions Act similar to the Harbour Commission operating in New Westminster, the North Fraser Harbour Commission and the South Fraser Harbour Commission. It should be composed of seven members, four from the federal government to ensure federal government control, with one or more of these from the prairie regions because of their concern for grain movements through the port of Vancouver; one from the south shore municipalities; one from the North shore municipalities and one from the western area transport council.

Under this arrangement the port manager would not report to Mr. Rathie but to the assistant deputy minister of marine administration in Ottawa. I might point out that the two Fraser Harbour Commissions operating in this fashion have shown more than marginal profits in recent years, unlike the deficits continually reported for the port of Vancouver. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been in contact with the Vancouver city council and this proposal has the complete support of Mayor Art Phillips and Alderman Setty Pendakur, who is the chairman of the Vancouver City Waterfront Committee.

There is now information circulating in Vancouver that the National Harbours Board, under Mr. Rathie's guidance, is considering an offer to purchase Empire Stevedoring's operation at terminal pier. Because I know that Mr. Rathie is personally involved in a number of stevedoring businesses, I am concerned with a possible conflict of interest in this matter. I am also concerned that Mr. Rathie is using his authority to assist his friends on the waterfront by eliminating their responsibilities to the city of Vancouver and, therefore, I must insist on the production of the contracts, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not exactly surprised that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Neale) is proposing a motion to the effect of which would be to make public contracts between the National Harbours Board in Vancouver, the Empire Stevedoring Company Limited, the Canadian Stevedoring Company Limited and Canadian National Railways. However, I doubt very much whether my hon. colleague has directed much thought to the long-term repercussions of taking such a step. After all, regardless of other considerations, we must ask ourselves whether in this House we want to open to scrutiny all documents which have been drawn up on the understanding that they would be immune to public disclosure. Does this House want to set a precedent which might undermine the whole system under which so many of our vital Canadian Crown corporations have negotiated their business in the past.

● (1710)

Does my friend not appreciate that by disclosing the nature and content of contracts between the National Harbours Board and other companies this House might find itself in an irreversible and embarrasing situation? I do not want to believe that this House would seriously entertain a motion which in the long term might seriously jeopardize Canada's ability to compete actively with our trading neighbours to the south, and that is very important.

I am aware of the fact that there is a very legitimate reason for us to be concerned about whether a Crown corporation is operating in the public good. I am certainly not suggesting that there should be any suppression of disclosure regarding the conduct and viability of our Crown corporations. Contrary to what the hon. member said a few minutes ago, there is no purpose served in divulging the details of a grievance between the NHB and private companies which would quite seriously compromise the relatively competitive standing of the port of Vancouver with respect to competitors in the United States.

Surely, we do not want to publicize the details of arrangements between the NHB and private companies, arrangements that by their very nature are designed to give the port of Vancouver special privileges to make it an economically prosperous alternative to ports in the United States. There is nothing insidious or underhand in maintaining this kind of privacy with respect to these agreements. There is, however, a great danger that by disclosing the kind of information proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Neale) we will be taking, quite unwittingly, action which could permanently damage our ability to compete on a free and open market.

I know that there are a number of other considerations implicit in the motion before us today. For instance, a number of people have expressed concern regarding the question of the NHB paying grants in lieu of taxes. The matter is long and involved, but the NHB has always taken the position that it would pay grants in lieu of taxes as required, but subject to any right of appeal available to any other taxpayer. In the current situation, the NHB has changed its contractual arrangements with operators of terminals in Vancouver so that only grants in lieu of taxes and not full municipal taxes should be assessed. In fact, the city has been collecting full taxes for three years. A judgment was just handed down recently from a provincially appointed hearing and it was in favour of the NHB.

Vancouver National Harbours Board

The NHB has entered into contracts with Empire Stevedoring Company Limited, Canadian Stevedoring Company Limited and Canadian National Railways. In accordance with these contracts, the three companies will provide, perform and carry out services for the NHB incidental to and arising from the operation by the NHB of its premises and facilities as public terminals for the handling, loading and unloading of cargo. In consideration of the said services, the NHB will pay each contractor an amount directly related to the amount of cargo handled by each contractor.

The NHB is the operator and occupier of each facility with supervisory and accounting staff located on the premises. The maximum charges paid by the shipper or steamship line for the use of an NHB facility are controlled by the board. None of the board's facilities is leased and the maintenance of the same is the responsibility of the NHB. As operator and occupier of its own facilities the NHB expects to pay grants in lieu of taxes to the city of Vancouver with respect to each of the three facilities related to the three contracts.

I do not want to get any further involved in the details surrounding these contracts for reasons that I am sure are obvious to all concerned. Various articles have appeared in the press dealing with the subject of taxes paid to the city of Vancouver by the NHB or by tenants of the board. It is quite apparent that these newspaper articles are confusing to the public and some statements have been made which are incorrect.

I do not think that there can be any question that the arrangement which exists between the city of Vancouver and the NHB is an equitable one which allows the NHB to operate a major port facility while extending annual grants to the city. This arrangement has existed for some time and I cannot understand why the status quo has to be upset by speculation alleging that the NHB is somehow deriving benefits from the city of Vancouver at the expense of the taxpayer. Any honest and realistic assessment of this arrangement would prove the contrary, and the port of Vancouver can hardly be considered a liability in terms of its massive and positive impact on the economy of Vancouver and the country as a whole.

Tonnage handled by the port of Vancouver has increased from 35,300,000 tons in 1971 to 36,700,000 tons in 1972 and to more than 40 million tons in 1973. Vancouver is the second largest port in North America. It is rated by the International Association of Port Authorities which met in Amsterdam in 1972, as being the thirteenth largest port in the world based on 1971 figures as compared with Seattle rates as number 25. Vancouver does not want to falter in her position as a major port facility. I believe it should be brought to the attention not only of the hon. member but of all hon. members who may not know that so that they can take it into consideration and understand some of the reasons why the answers were given as they were.

Two new major facilities have been constructed in the inner harbour. Vanterm, a 76 acre container facility, will be one of the most modern in the world and will cost some $30 million. In addition, Lynnterm, on the north shore, a general cargo facility with container capabilities, is being built at an estimated cost of $23 million. As an aside, Mr.

Speaker, construction of a modern dock facility has started at Prince Rupert, and it will comprise 43 acres and cost about $23 million.

● (1720)

In the last two years the National Harbours Board has initiated, and has underway $76 million in facilities. In addition, studies regarding development of the second stage at Roberts Bank, at an estimated cost of some $20 million, are well in hand.

The Port of Vancouver must compete with the port of Seattle where port facilities pay no taxes and a 2 mill levy is applied to property in King County to support that port. It must also compete with Harbour Commission ports in British Columbia where no taxes are paid—New Westminster, Nanaimo and Port Alberni. Thus the Port of Vancouver must keep its costs down.

The National Harbours Board does pay taxes to municipal governments. In 1971 as a system NHB paid $7,418,321, and in 1972 paid $6,640,359 in tax grants to Canadian municipalities. Comments relative to the equipping of the port of Vancouver are not well founded. As a container port it has lacked certain facilities, but in fact Vancouver is bigger, is growing faster and is more efficient than Seattle. The two are not truly comparable. Vancouver is a very big export port. Seattle is very largely a container port.

Comments regarding relatively cheap facilities at Seattle are not well founded. The American Mail Line leases a modern container facility in Seattle, but with no rail connection and no de-stuffing facility. It covers about 20 acres, speaking from memory, and the cost is $1 million per year. That is hardly cheap. No doubt other facilities in Seattle are comparable. They are financed by a tax levy on property and by tax exempt municipal bonds.

It is not the policy of the National Harbours Board to safeguard private companies from taxation. It would be most improper for the board to have such a policy. This is the role of the government, not of Crown corporations unless so directed by government, and this board has not been so directed. The city of Vancouver is in favour of port expansion, and has obvious gains to make. To insist on taxation that would force prices up to a level not competitive with already established west coast ports would be self-defeating.

The board is charged with the responsibility of operating the ports under its jurisdiction in the best interests of Canada. It is under many restraints. Many demands are made upon it by many varied interests. In fact each one of its major decisions is subject to review, and is either authorized by order in council or by Treasury Board. For example, it is required to justify investment of taxpayers' dollars in the major facilities under construction as being in the best interests of Canada and of the port of Vancouver.

The whole subject matter of the National Harbours Board and municipal governments with respect to taxation has been a long and complicated problem for both sides. If we are to take economic estimates of the value of port activities to a municipal area as being equal to $20 per ton of cargo handled, the port of Vancouver meant an annual economic benefit to greater Vancouver of some $840 million in 1973 alone. With co-operation from municipal governments, railways, industry and other levels of government it is suggested that the port of Vancouver will have an impact of at least $1,600,000,000 plus a year by 1980.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention that Canada has played an extremely active and aggressive role in terms of promotion of her ports. It would be a sad day indeed if we were to allow this posture to be compromised by the disclosure of documents and information passing between the National Harbours Board and private companies. I strongly oppose the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver East. It would serve neither the best interests of Vancouver nor those of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the hon. member wish to ask a question?

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): Would the hon. member for St. Boniface accept a question?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Yes.

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): Do I take it from the hon. member's remarks that the decision by Mr. Rathie, representing the National Harbours Board, to change the structure of these three companies, was deliberately taken to save them the taxes they were paying to the city of Vancouver, or rather the difference between the grants and what they were paying to Vancouver, so that they could become more competitive with the port of Seattle, despite the fact that they paid those taxes for years and remained competitive with the port of Seattle?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): First of all, I would like to say that whatever Mr. Rathie has recommended is at this moment in the hands of the department and has nothing to do with the point of view I expressed, although I am aware of what has taken place. I would also like to point out to the hon. member that I recently entertained a delegation from the city of Vancouver, which included its mayor. I am fully aware of all the details of the problem, and took these matters into consideration in the remarks I made.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House this afternoon moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Neale) reads as follows:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of all contracts between the National Harbours Board in Vancouver and the following firms (a) Empire Stevedoring Co. Ltd. (b) Canadian Stevedoring Co. Ltd (c) Canadian National Railways respecting the use of Ballantyne Pier, Lapointe Pier and Centennial Pier for thhe years 1973 and 1974.

As I listened to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), it seemed to me that the crunch argument in this whole matter is whether or not these internal agreements will be made public or kept confidential. As I listened to the hon. member, it seemed he was saying that for the sake of the competitive position of the National Harbours Board in Vancouver vis-à-vis Seattle and other Pacific coast ports, the Board wanted to maintain the confidentiality of these documents so as not to reveal input costs. This is a standard business practice. One does one's best not to reveal input costs to a competitor lest he be placed in a position to better them. I have sympathy for the position put forward by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) concerning the confidentiality of agreements between the National Harbours Board and private companies.

● (1730)

I wish to add briefly to the discussion which was well covered by the hon. member. It would be fitting for me to deal with the ports of Canada with particular reference to our western gateway, Vancouver, one of our largest and most important ports. Canadian ports are an integral part of our national transportation system, linking water and land modes of transportation. Therefore, policy direction, planning and co-ordination are essential to ensure effective and efficient utilization of port facilities to the optimum benefit of all Canadians. In a trading nation such as Canada a port system is essential as an intrinsic part of a national transportation system. I think we in Canada can be very proud of the initiatives we have taken to promote a sophisticated ports system.

In this regard, the National Harbours Board has been singularly effective and any attempt to limit or modify the role it plays would surely be regretted at a later stage. Efforts to capture markets and traffic have been rewarded by increased cargo volume, and this trend should not be interrupted by misguided notions that public airing of private agreements is in the interest of Canada's transportation development.

The National Harbours Board has been extremely flexible in its response to changes in world shipping trends, technological development and international trade patterns. It has ensured that Canadian ports have been established and maintained in terms of both national and international interests and in keeping with Canada's constitutional responsibilities for navigation, shipping and national defence. It has planned carefully but boldly to ensure optimization in recovery of investment as well as allocation of resources, thereby providing maximum benefit to the country.

The National Harbours Board has also provided an organizational framework which is responsive to our national political, economic and social needs and is capable of operating within a highly competitive commercial environment. Vancouver is gradually emerging as a viable container port. The expanded use and level of acceptance of this dynamic breakthrough in the shipment of goods has terminated the revolutionary phase of its promotion. Import-export trade has demonstrated quite clearly that both shippers and receivers want the container: the list of commodities it can carry seems almost limitless and other benefits abound. The principal advantage to the transportation industry of the use of systems based on the intermodal freight container lies in the potential for increased productivity of capital, coupled with reduced labour costs. For equivalent cargo throughputs, the capital costs for container ports are lower than the capital costs for conventional break-bulk facilities.

Of far greater significance, however, is the dramatic increase, through mechanization, of labour productivity. Estimates indicate that labour at a container port is between 7.5 and 15 times more productive in terms of cargo volume than labour at a comparable conventional port. An equally dramatic decrease is realized in the time required for ship to port transfers of cargo. This is important, as all the time a vessel is tied up in port unloading, the person using the transportation facility incurs costs. So unloading time is an important aspect of containerization. Similar savings can be realized on ocean transport costs through the use of large, high-speed container ships: the sizeable capital costs are more than offset by the economies of scale associated with large vessels and by the increased utilization of container ships resulting from significant reductions in transit and in-port times.

Because of the lowering of costs incurred at interchange points, opportunities for alternative transportation routings are increased with the adoption of container transport systems. Direct ship service between Europe and the Far East by services incorporating a North American land bridge could reduce the total distance by about 2,500 miles. Of course, any system using this land bridge would need to be highly automated and organized. Ships would bring cargoes to our east coast ports, those cargoes would be transferred to unit trains or similar trains, taken across the continent and loaded on other ships. Another example would be the provision of container feeder services to smaller ports from major container facilities, possibly offering a better service than could be achieved through the continued use of conventional shipping.

The shipper of cargo benefits through the security and structural protection provided by the container. Substantial reductions in damage and cargo loss result in greater reliability and a potential for reduced insurance costs. In addition, shipping costs are lowered in many instances because of a reduced requirement for protective packaging of cargo within the container. The advantages of containerization have far outweighed the disadvantages and dramatic increases in the use of containers by the developed nations of the world have been observed over the last few years. At Canadian ports, container handlings have increased in the short space of six years from 8,700 20-foot equivalents handled in 1967 to 316,000 20-foot equivalents handled in 1972. Last year's figures and future projections are equally impressive and encouraging.

The success of containerization in both our international and domestic trades will depend upon a number of factors, including the regulatory environment, container rate structures, competition from existing conventional facilities and possible use by external markets of our facilities. Certainly the publication of private documents relating to agreements between the National Harbours Board and private companies will not help the port of Vancouver exploit the manifest benefits that can accrue to Canada in this regard.

I would now like to move into an area of containerization that concerns all of us, that is, its impact on Canada-United States trade. In this regard there can be no question that Canada is finding herself in an increasingly advantageous position relative to her southern neighbour. The proportion of the diversion accounted for by container traffic diversions is not known but is thought to be significant. Furthermore, it has been suggested that diversion of United States container traffic through Canada could increase in the 1970s. United States imports and exports are attracted to Canadian routes because of fast transit times, reliability in transportation services, lower rates due to more flexible rate structures applied on Canadian routes and the aggressive marketing policies followed by Canadian port authorities. Among the rate advantages on Canadian routes is the availability of volume rates for rail transportation which offer significant reductions for shipments of over 200 containers per week. The lower rates reflect the higher utilization of equipment and, hence, lower costs associated with larger volume. In general, however, trade diversion between Canada and the United States is a cyclical phenomenon. In any case, the existence of alternative routes outside the home country places some competitive restraint on rates charged to cargo shippers.

I must emphasize that the development of containerization has been assisted considerably in Canada by the maintenance of a relatively regulation-free environment for transportation activities. Multimodal transportation companies are not prohibited under Canadian legislation. The integration of transportation services through such companies has simplified the provision of complete door to door transportation to Canadian shippers. In this case we have a transportation system which can deliver from door to door in Canada, handled by only one carrier.

The shipper also benefits from the effective use of a single, through bill of lading and the simplicity of a single through rate. The development of integrated transportation services is also assisted through the existence of a single body for the regulation of all modes of transportation whose stated aim is the co-ordination of transportation services.

We are looking at a situation here where we have to decide whether we are going to make public the cost inputs of the National Harbours Board, revealing these to other ports with which the board might be competing. There is an old saying that Eaton's doesn't tell Simpsons. I think that is the situation here: one port does not want to reveal its input costs to another. In circumstances where there is no competition, this would not be a factor. In my own constituency I am familiar with the input costs of operating the Tobermory-South Bay Mouth ferry and ports maintained by the Department of Public Works. These documents are necessary to determine the viability and practicality of establishing a new ferry service between the port at the west end of Manitoulin Island, Meldrum Bay and Detour, Michigan. These figures are available because they are not in competition with any other country or company; there is not the competitive factor to be taken into consideration.

With regard to the port of Vancouver on the west coast, we are trying to develop a more effective port which handles more goods and services, including containerization. For this reason I am sympathetic with the view expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport that these private, internal input costs should not be made public because of the disadvantageous position in which it would put that port vis-à-vis ports in the United States with which it is in competition.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the motion before us. From time to time in this House we debate requests for the production of papers. I suppose motions like this are as old as parliament itself, and the process is about the same; many motions are placed on the order paper which would prove very detrimental if accepted and the information made public. Nearly everyone in this House has a reasonable knowledge of transportation costs in a country the size of ours and some of the difficulties we face whether on the basis of regionalism or nationalism. Any information made public that would tend to increase costs and prevent competitiveness on the part of Canadian companies, cities or transportation facilities would only make matters worse for Canadian business in general. We must remember that these businesses pay taxes as well as their employees.

When speaking to a motion such as the one before us we are not just dealing with the companies mentioned in the motion or the National Harbours Board as it pertains to Vancouver harbour; we are speaking about jobs for Canadians. Hon. members are quite familiar with the operations of many Crown corporations. There is a large one in my constituency. It pays grants in lieu of taxes to the municipality in which it is located. At times when I have asked about particular information I have been informed that this type of information is not made public. I am given very good reasons for this, and I accept them.

Looking at the history of transportation in Canada, I think we have come a long way. We have developed new companies and techniques in order to stay in this highly competitive market. Any information made public about the port of Vancouver might be detrimental to the operations of the National Harbours Board, the exportation of Canadian goods and the importation of goods. It would be not only detrimental to the Vancouver area but to a large area—indeed, to Canada in general.

What are some of the competitive factors with which we have to live? We are selling over 15 million tons of coal a year to Japan, and I understand that Japan has built special ships to carry this coal to factories where they manufacture products competitive with our own. This has an effect, of course, on the amount of traffic in imported goods which flows from the port of Vancouver. The enterprising Japanese community has also built ocean-going ships specifically to carry logs. They carry timber to Japan, where it is made into plywood and veneers and brought back to Canada and the United States where it is sold more cheaply than we could manufacture it at home.

I do not think the Canadian public would support an attempt to give out information which would, for example, help the city of Seattle to compete more favourably with the city of Vancouver. Hon. members have heard from two of my hon. friends sound and logical objections to the motion before us. I wish to endorse the position taken by those speakers. We are not dealing here with any partisan issue but with an issue which has a direct economic effect on Canada in general and Vancouver in particular. No one, surely, would wish to see the government establish a precedent which might be dangerous in the future and seriously hamper the efficiency and freedom of not only the National Harbours Board but of Crown corporations in general. Those corporations having been set up to operate in a businesslike manner, it is surely the duty of parliament to back their efforts and make sure they are protected and placed in a position to conduct their affairs in an honest and profitable manner.

I do not wish to speculate as to the dire consequences which could result from a decision that operating schemes negotiated between the National Harbours Board and private companies could be made public. The only way in which the National Harbours Board at Port of Vancouver, and other ports for that matter, can remain productive is for their operating agreements with private companies to remain confidential in the interest of preserving competitive advantage. If a Crown corporation happens to be located in a particular community, the community will not object to receiving grants in lieu of taxes. These books are audited. Does General Motors in Oshawa pay taxes to all the communities surrounding Oshawa, or does it pay taxes to Oshawa alone?

It seems to me to be futile to make public declarations which would not create a better opportunity to compete with the maximum impact on the international market related to port traffic. To back up this statement I should like to remind hon. members that 25 cents of every dollar Canadians have in their pockets today comes from international trade. For this reason the National Harbours Board plays a very important role in getting goods out of Canada as well as in bringing goods in from other countries.

For all its excellence in the provision of port facilities, Canada does not hold a copyright of expertise and efficiency in harbour operation. We must continue to improve our facilities so as to remain competitive with other countries in the world, in particular on the west coast where competition can become intense. It would be foolish to take action which would fetter our freedom to compete successfully for the cargo traffic which comprises such an important part of our transportation system.

In addition to the principle of confidentiality which is involved here, the motion contains a practical flaw. Information is a delicate commodity and is useful only if it fits the purpose. It is easy to have too much information and not enough knowledge.

In calling it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Neale) who is sponsoring this motion has not been in the House during the course of my speech.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Do you want us to call a quorum?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being six o'clock, the hour set aside for private members' business has expired.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PROFITEERING PRACTICES AND PERMANENT AND TEMPORARY MEMBERSHIP OF COMMISSION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray that Bill C-29, to amend the Combines Investigation Act in relation to profiteering practices, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am rather glad that I am speaking after the dinner break, because a speech immediately following one by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) would be a hard act to follow. It was an excellent act: the style was great, he waxed magnificently in eloquence and delivery but he waned badly in content. In the first half of his oration he attacked his former friends in the party to our left, the members of the NDP. Like a rejected, jilted lover he cajoled and pleaded for a reconciliation. Perhaps the reconciliation has been made; time will tell.

He claimed annoyance that the NDP consider themselves the only people in Canada to be the protectors of the individual rights of Canadians. He says that his party has been against profiteering for a long time. I ask him where, and when? Perhaps he is suffering from selective amnesia, for he seems to have forgotten that his party brought forth a policy to increase the profits of manufacturing through the corporate tax incentives of the last budget. Perhaps he does not understand what it is his colleagues have been saying. They have been saying what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) indicated in Winnipeg in the last week in April when he denied there was any corporate rip-off; the minister said that profits were being properly used to expand capacity, output and jobs. Perhaps he did not understand the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) when he indicated there was no profiteering on a general basis in Canada.

What the minister of Regional Economic Expansion said was mainly an attack on his former friends of the New Democratic Party. But then I think he misconstrued something in his bout of selective amnesia when dealing with what a member of our party said, indeed what our party has stood for for some time. He said that his party had brought about increased wages for the fishermen of Newfoundland and increased wages generally across Canada, and he thought this was great. He said that the Progressive Conservative Party wants to control wages. As I have suggested, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion suffers from selective amnesia, for indeed he forgot to say how his party has also watched and stood by while prices have risen faster than wages. he forgot to say it was a prices and incomes policy that the Progressive Conservative Party advocated so that prices could be held down.

It appears, Mr. Speaker, that an election must be called in the not too distant future. Yesterday we first heard that the Liberal government was going to try to buy the votes of its employees by arbitrarily giving them $500 each, while at the same time failing to bargain in good faith in contracts presently being negotiated with civil servants.

The government is offering today 2 per cent to 4 per cent increases for openers, finally settling for 7 per cent to 8 per cent, whereas the cost of living nationally is 10.4 per cent and in Ottawa, where most public servants live, it is 11.4 per cent.

Bill C-29, which allegedly deals with profiteering, is in reality a bill dealing with prices and profit margins. These two actions, along with a public-paid junket by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last weekend, indicate, to me at least, blatant pre-election politicking. The new rules of procedure in the House which were introduced, and the supposedly better committee system which has been set up, as a result of which the government would have plenty of time to introduce bills and allow for public scrutiny for a week or two between first and second readings, are once again being short-circuited as this government rushes to put supposedly attractive legislation on the order paper for debate less than 48 hours later.

This government is not interested in governing for the betterment of Canada and Canadians. It is using its authority and power for blatant politicking, trying to put the Liberal Party ahead of the interests of Canadians, merely trying to hang on to power and thus perpetuate itself in office. Unconscionable, undoubtedly; but the Canadian public will not be fooled, for they are intelligent and will think of this bill as the cosmetic farce that it really is. It falls into the same type of political manoeuvre as the announcing of a Lake Ontario park in Tronto by the Secretay of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) during the last election, the increasing of wages for the armed forces which was announced during the last election, and even the announcement of the Minister of Finance of redevelopment of Ottawa's historic marketplace, again made during the last election. Where has the government been for the last 18 months, Mr. Speaker? Under what bush has the Liberal Party been lost? Lost in what forest? For surely they cannot see the forest for the trees. Behind whose skirt has the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs been hiding, or should I say jostling for position with the Prime Minister?

Here we have a government which has faltered in its handling of the economy for some six years now, bouncing from pillar to post like a drunken sailor first during this parliament's encouragement of higher profits in the manufacturing industries in order to bring more investment through the corporate tax concessions of the last budget and now with a bill allegedly to control profits, or excess profits. Which is it they really want, as they speak out of both sides of their mouth at the same time? For the last 18 months, since the people of Canada gave notice to the government on October 30, 1972, of their dissatisfaction, the inept handling of the economy has led to a virtual raping of the low and middle-class wage earners' ability to maintain a decent standard of living.

Inflation, which was just over 5 per cent 18 months ago, has rocketed to the uncharted waters of 10 per cent, and now the government, with its own report tabled Tuesday by the Minister of Finance saying that the worst is yet to come, has finally awakened from its arrogant cocoon to say that it must do something about inflation. This is something the Progressive Conservative Party has been saying for well over a year in crystal-clear terms. What a half-hearted, timid approach. The government says this bill is a new instrument in its line of defence against inflation. What other instrument does the government have, and what is its line of defence? What other anti-inflationary policy has this government espoused? I suggest there is none. The only thing the government has done is introduce some measures to relieve the painful symptoms of those who need relief from the pain of the inflation the government has allowed to run out of control.

I say that Bill C-29 is on one hand a timid, half-hearted approach, while on the other hand it is unconscionably dangerous, severe and autocratic. Indeed, on the one side it is timid and is, allegedly, to deal with profits only, with possibly some selective rollbacks, and I emphasize the word "possibly". This government now, some 18 months late, is talking about controls, a freeze on prices and rollbacks, when our party long ago advanced a prices and incomes policy not dealing just with profits but with dividends, rents, salaries, wages and prices. Even the NDP, the timid tigers of this parliament, have gone further than this Liberal government now proposes. That party has for some time talked about price rollbacks and selective controls even though it has not put forward a completely progressive program.

I should point out that last year both the International Monetary Fund and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development suggested that Canada should introduce a prices and incomes control policy. The International Monetary Fund, in September, 1973 said:

> Besides cooling off their economies through use of their federal budgets and control of money and credit, nations should supplement these anti-inflationary tools with wage-price controls or other policies affecting income.

In addition, it stated:

> —wage increases were likely to remain high in Canada in the absence of any official action to directly control them.

In December, 1973, the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development stated that Canada's over-all rate of inflation for 1974 would be higher than in 1973, and that inflation in Canada had developed a momentum of its own and could only be offset by a concerted anti-inflation program. Further, it reported that no such program existed in Canada and that inflationary psychology was so solidly entrenched that Canada needed a comprehensive anti-inflation program that included wage and price controls if inflation was to be licked.

On the other hand, as I have said, this law is too dangerous, severe and autocratic. This legislation on profiteering would make bad law because it is imprecise; it does not say who the law will effect. An accused would not even know he was accused until the government, acting on information provided by those it had appointed to look into price increases, declared the law to be in effect. As a matter of fact, there is some suggestion that this legislation could be retroactive.

This legislation is penal law, and penal laws are interpreted in the strictest manner by our courts, in line with our democratic philosophy that we as a free people are free to do whatever we wish unless it is explicitly prohibited by law. If this ever became the law of the land, I doubt whether there would be a successful prosecution and it is doubtful if there would ever be any imprisonment. This bill could well be interpreted as a denial of natural justice under which a person is entitled to know in advance what the law is, to know what charge he is facing, to know, prior to the hearing, the case against him, and to be represented at his trial which should be open to the public and to the press.

This proposed legislation by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is not explicit as to what the law will be. It lacks definition as to what the article is. It does not define "customary" profits, and it does not explain what is an "excess" profit. It gives no idea what the base price would be or what might be an appropriate profit margin. How would a person or corporation charged under this legislation know what the law was and what had to be avoided? The fact is that a company probably would not know what the charge was, whether it was profiteering through inflating prices, too high a mark-up, or whether it had lowered irresponsibly its cost of production because it became inefficient.

As this legislation is proposed, it would discourage a company from becoming efficient and perhaps increasing its profits, because the profit margin that was set would be increased and the company might be prosecuted, whereas a company which is inefficient could charge more for its goods in order to receive the same profit margin. It is suggested that this law could be hashed out in what is really a secret, star chamber cabinet meeting. The fact that a case could possibly be put to the cabinet, sitting as sort of judge and jury without the company or person knowing, with no provision for representations to be made on behalf of the company or person before the cabinet or executive body, is also wrong; it is a denial of the principle of natural justice for the cabinet to wear three hats, one as informant, one as prosecutor and one as judge. This proposed legislation is autocratic and it is wrong.

Why does this government, now 18 months late, bring forth a bill that is badly drafted, ill-conceived and largely unworkable in its present form? If it feels it can calm the people of Canada with cosmetic legislation, it is wrong. The Progressive Conservative Party and, I believe, the voters are too wise for that. This bill, as has been explained by others before me, deals only with a portion of those things which are causing inflation today. It deals only with unidentified articles, whatever they may be. It does not deal directly with services, housing, rents, incomes—all major factors in our ever escalating cost of living. This bill could well prove to be a bureaucratic nightmare.

Even the Liberal Party has not tried to tell us how this bill fits into the over-all philosophy or direction they are aiming for. It is floundering around, attempting to reach out and clutch at something, anything; the government knows not what. At best, it could be considered a vague, ill-conceived attempt to do something about inflation, but one knows not what for sure. It should have been introduced as a budgetary measure, if it is really to be what the government claims, that is, an anti-inflation measure, with possible taxing provisions, in view of the fact that it does have an impact on the country's economy and business and investment communities. The government is not even sure what this bill is designed for. The government, and the minister who introduced this bill and is responsible for it, can only give legalistic, clause by clause statements as to how it might work.

As the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and others have said, there have been no policy statements of any significance or depth to which we can look to see how, or if, this bill will ever be put into force. I note there is no certainty as to when the bill will be proclaimed and no statement of assurance as given in the election expenses act. In fact, this bill, if it were to pass, could stay on the statute books for years and never be proclaimed as the law of the land. If the bill were to become part of our law, it would be left open as to when, if ever, it might be proclaimed.

At the very last, the bill needs a time limit on it, and expiry date of, say, 18 months or two years after its proclamation so that if the government of the day wanted it to continue it would have to seek parliament's approval. If this bill by some miracle ever gets to committee, it needs drastic changes by way of amendment. This should be done only after this House is given more guidance as to the government's intentions for this country which, hopefully, will be revealed in the forthcoming budget.

If this bill should go to the committee it should be noted that clauses 7, 8 and 9 are directly related to Bill C-7 which is now in committee. These two bills should be consolidated or at least considered jointly in Committee. The clauses which relate to offences under the Combines Investigation Act and changing the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to a more powerful Trade Practices Commission should be dealt with at one time. The bill should be expanded to include services and housing. Services have been included in Bill C-7: why have they not been included here?

In respect of the clause dealing with natural justice, all inquiries under this legislation should be conducted in public. This bill is vague, as I have indicated. I do not think there could be a successful prosecution or any imprisonment whatsoever. Bill C-29 is expected to be referred to the committee on justice and legal affairs, whereas Bill C-7 is before the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs. If this bill should ever go to committee, it should be considered by the committee that is considering Bill C-7 and at the same time.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in this evening's debate because, the more progress we make in the debate, the better the climate will be. Before the debate began, the two main opposition parties had already taken very strong positions towards this bill. But after listening to the hon. members who spoke in the House today, I think that the debate has been very useful because several questions have been asked. In my opinion, everyone agrees today on the principle of this bill. Everyone is aware that there are profiteers who make windfall profits. However, when the government decides to act, we can see how the House is divided on this issue.

Profiteering Practices

I listened a while ago to my friend the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick), who nearly made us cry by saying that the bill was going to be extremely dangerous, that it would affect the rights of Canadian citizens, that action would be taken against people without benefit of trial, that people would be penalized and indicted without any advance notice, and even that this bill is autocratic. I could find the words that the hon. member used to say that we should not support this bill because it is too harsh. I also heard the hon. member for York-South (Mr. Lewis) and his colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) say that this bill has no teeth, as we say in English, that it did not provide the necessary coercive powers to be effective, that this bill—

[English]

The Tories, on the one side, say it is too strong and the NDP, on the other side, say it is not strong enough. Again, this is a good sign that we are moving in the right direction.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising either on a point of order or a question of privilege?

Mr. Dick: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I would like to point out that it appears I have been misunderstood, or misquoted, or that the minister is suffering from selective amnesia. I said this bill was a very timid, half-hearted attempt. I also said it was too strong in the sense of denying natural justice in certain respects. The minister should speak of the whole and not just of half.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member. Once again, he admits that we are right. He confirmed what I said namely that the bill, from a certain procedural point of view, was too difficult or too hard on the citizens. On the other hand, the NDP member stated that it was not hard enough. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it must be another one of those fine measures, as advocated by the philosophy of the Liberal party, which tries to find natural justice in a middle course.

For months, Mr. Speaker, we were told that the Food Prices Review Board, the Plumptre Board, was not strong enough, had not the necessary coercive powers to be efficient. Amendments were introduced. It would perhaps have been advisable then to carry the amendments and grant coercive powers. However, we did not want to follow that policy. We thought that the people indulging in fraudulent and profiteering practices to make profits understood they could not take advantage of the conditions in the country.

Today, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) upholds a bill to meet requirements made by opposition members, particularly the NDP. Today, they say this is a timid and complicated measure. They suggest there is no authority to freeze prices. To suggest things like that is to distort the facts. Provision is made in the act that the government can at some point declare that prices are immediately frozen. The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) is opposed to that because he suggests that it might be too strong a discretionary power in the hands of a government.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

On the other hand, the NDP do not see any real power in the hands of anyone. And that freeze for 30 days, Mr. Speaker, will be followed by inquiries and could in instances of non-compliance be followed by injunctions from the courts. If a company or its directors are found guilty of profiteering the act states that they are liable to fines of up to $10,000 and, if required, to imprisonment for up to two years. I for one feel that that is going quite far. And if NDP members are not satisfied all they have to do is to move on second reading that the fine be increased from $10,000 to a maximum of $50,000, or $100,000, if they can manage to convince all hon. members that the $10,000 fine is inadequate. If they feel that the present term is inadequate they can try and move amendments.

Hon. members will have an opportunity to improve the bill. But to say that it does not provide for any penalty and any authority for enforcement, that it is toothless is I think an exaggeration. This bill goes as far as saying that if a company or a director is found guilty of profiteering and found guilty by the commission they will be paying back the excess profits to the consumers. If this were to prove impractical because, for instance, an individual or a company having charged 3 cents too much on each tin of canned tomatoes sold in Canada it would be difficult to reimburse 3 cents to each consumer, the government could then order the manufacturer or the officials of the company to pay the government the excessive profits, in addition to incurring possible personal fines and prison terms.

Mr. Speaker, if that makes a bill timid, such timidity worries me. Had the hon. members of the opposition only taken the trouble of reading the bill, the might have come to the conclusion that—

● (2030)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Blenkarn: I was wondering if the minister would permit a question. Could he tell me where agricultural products are included in this bill? I thought that tomatoes were an agricultural product. Where are they covered in this bill?

Mr. Chrétien: I am sorry; perhaps I used the wrong example when I spoke of a can of tomatoes. I should have used the example of a pair of shoes; the hon. member would have had no problem with that. Your party says you would freeze the price of everything in this country, but you start by excluding agricultural products. You are not very logical in your policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, had they only read the bill they would perhaps have reached a very simple conclusion, that found in the editorial of the newspaper Le Devoir on April 30, 1974, and I quote:

To those circumstances . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I am sorry to interrupt the minister but I must remind the hon. member that the minister, who has the floor, has the right to be heard by the Chair and the other hon. members.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at all at the attitude of the opposition: they do not want to hear anything about this bill. They want an election as soon as possible in order to, as we say in Canada, "patch up their problems".

Le Devoir said, and I quote:

> To those circumstances we owe the fact that even today we have a bill capable of stirring a salutary fear in industry, as well as bringing to their knees those who are too stiff-necked. The reform presented yesterday by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) offers the advantage of not doing away with what already exists; for example, the Plumptre board will go on with its work.
> On the basis of a report of an inquiry commission, the Cabinet will have the power, through an official proclamation, to freeze temporarily the price of some given article and request intervention by the director of research and inquiries. After investigation, the director will submit the evidence to the new Trade Practices Commission, which in turn will have the power to put an end to the objectionable trade practice and to force the supplier to roll back the prices or to refund customers or, if this is not feasible, to pay to the Crown its surplus profits.

Mr. Speaker, this bill must be examined, but both opposition parties refuse to give it second reading to amend it. We do not think this bill is perfect. The hon. member for York South said that its operation seems too complex.

If such is the case, it can be improved at the committee stage. But what we want, and I think we all agree on that, is to catch as soon as possible those who take advantage of the situation and make excessive profits.

I do not understand why the bill cannot be studied in committee and amended. The procedure may be complicated but on the other hand we must be careful. One should not convict everybody in advance and without trial.

The corporations as well as their directors have a right, like every citizen, to present their case before being convicted. That is why they are called to appear before the commission. I do not agree with the NDP theory that they must be convicted more or less without trial, without knowing exactly their position.

I think that the rights of citizens apply to everyone, the poorest as well as the richest, because we are all equal before the law in Canada and that is why we prefer to live here.

On the other hand, there are certain points which could be clarified. Dissatisfaction has been voiced because the bill excludes certain services. However it must be understood that they are services and often we have absolutely no control over services.

Let us take the example of bus tickets. The price of tickets is determined by the transport commissions. The federal commission cannot intervene in an area of provincial jurisdiction.

The same thing applies in the area of trucking, hospital services, telephone rates and other public services. It would not be appropriate for a federal commission to intervene in areas of provincial jurisdiction. If there are abuses it is up to the provincial governments to take their responsibilities.

Reference has also been made to housing. To my mind, the legislation covers also the field of housing, and profiteering on building materials, for instance, would then be corrected.

On the other hand, the housing problem has many elements that cannot be controlled by such a commission. For instance, wage earners have negotiated collective agreements, approved by provincial governments. It would be improper, by passing federal legislation, to try to intervene in those areas which have a strong impact on housing costs.

The same can be said of utilities related to housing: water and sewers. Such services are often provided by municipalities and these are autonomous. It is not the role of federal government to tell municipalities what to do in their own jurisdiction.

However, as I have said, if this measure can be improved upon, let us give the House at least the opportunity to do so by sending this bill to committee after second reading. Notably in the speeches of our friends at the far right of the House, the New Democrats,—

An hon. Member: Of the far left—

Mr. Chrétien: Of the far left. No, they are sometimes confused; one would not know.

Benefits are all they talk about. Such company made 25, 30, 40 or 50 per cent more profits than the year before, but that does not mean anything or almost, because for instance a company whose capital would have yielded 40 per cent in 1972 would have made excess profits. The same company which, the following year, 1973, would have had profits of 36 per cent would effectively have suffered a 10 per cent decrease and would still be making excess profits. So the fact that the company received less profit would not be a good enough reason not to submit it to the control of the board.

On the other hand, if the profits of a company amounted to 2 per cent of its capital in 1972 and to 4 per cent the following year, that means there was an increase of 100 per cent, but it would not be considered sufficient.

We must therefore stop using slogans such as those, to be fair to everyone. As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands suggested, we should consider the return on the capital, not only the profit realized compared with the preceding year.

Even then, there could be hidden facts. Excessive profits might have been hidden in the figures of executive salaries or in inflated advertising contracts or subcontracts which could be a temporary camouflage of the profits of the company. Mr. Speaker, the opposition baffles me. Frankly, I am rather disappointed to see that opposition members do not even want to give the House an opportunity to study the bill.

● (2040)

[English]

The leader of the NDP, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), has said that this legislation is a last minute sop offered to the NDP. Mr. speaker, we are not afraid of an election. We were returned to office in 1973, and everyone predicted that we would not last one week. Now we have been here for a year and a half, and we have not "sopped" anybody. We have passed good law for the benefit of Canadians, and that is why we are still here today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: In a time of inflation the people of Canada want the members of this House to do their best. They want us to try to cope with the problem, as we are doing through this bill. But if hon. members opposite cause an election, we will not mind. We will be back on this side. We are not afraid of that. The government is fully dressed, fully prepared with this piece of legislation. It is the NDP that has been caught naked, with its pants down. Its members are unwilling streakers. They are not really prepared to accept effective legislation.

Canadians want the government to crack down on price-gouging practices. This legislation provides the necessary powers, machinery and penalties. Why are the members of the NDP so upset because the government is doing its job? As usual they are all talk. They are afraid of losing one of their handy slogans. They could not continue to barrage the Canadian public with inflated verbal rip-offs. Slogan politics fall apart when faced with effective government action.

The government has every intention of using the new powers proposed under this bill to protect the Canadian consumer from unfair trade practices. But, Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to go on a witch-hunt. I recognize that business depends on profits for growth and investment. This bill does not outlaw profits. It gives the government the power to freeze and roll back prices where suppliers are taking unfair advantage of the consumer. A businessman is entitled to profit but he has no right to use the present situation to abuse the consumer. We will put those guys in their places with this bill. Both the Conservatives and the NDP want to go in another direction. The answer of hon. members opposite is to freeze everything but they opposed the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) when he gave an increase to the civil service. They said what he was proposing was not enough. Others said it was far too much. Hon. members opposite have their own internal problems.

I think that this piece of legislation is good. Of course, it is not perfect and we are willing to discuss amendments, but the public should not be left with the impression that there is nothing in this bill. We do not want to create injustices in this country, but we will not permit profiteers to exploit the situation.

Some hon. Members: Who are they?

Mr. Chrétien: The gougers.

Some hon. Members: Name them.

Mr. Chrétien: If we want to get them, we will get them. We must have inquiries. Of course, the NDP would like us to do things right away. But there must be investigations. Then those found guilty will have to pay a fine or be put in jail. As a result, more people will not abuse the situation. We will always allow a fair margin of profit for business people. They are entitled to that. But we want to get at the gougers, and to do that we want this bill to receive second reading. Then hon. members will have plenty of opportunity to make suggestions for amendments. But the public should not be deceived. Hon. members opposite are afraid of the effectiveness of this bill. That is why they do not want it passed. The people of Canada would then see them in their true light.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, the minister who preceded me suggested that members on this side had not studied the bill. I suggest to him that we have indeed studied it very carefully. We studied it to see if it had anything worth amending in it in the first place. Unfortunately, the bill is so hoary-minded, so vague, so incomprensible in its details that it is not worth sending to committee.

The problems that this country faced prior to October 30, 1972, were inflation, unemployment insurance, the unemployment problem itself, lack of industrial growth, lack of processing of raw materials in this country and development of a nation. The country still faces those problems. We have the answers to solve them and we will let the minister hear those answers on election platforms. And if he is successful and returns to sit in this House in opposition, we will also let him hear them here.

This bill seeks to amend the Combines Investigation Act. It is the second amendment to that act introduced since the Speech from the Throne was delivered last February. The first amending bill, No. C-7, is still before committee. Clearly, if the present bill had been intended to be part of the government's strategy in solving inflation problems, it would have been introduced with the previous bill as one package and would have been introduced earlier this session. But the truth of the matter is that this bill was flung together over a weekend. It was dumped on this House to appease the NDP, to suck them in so they could say they were doing something about profiteers and price gougers. But the members of the NDP are a little smarter than that. Opposition members as a whole are a little smarter than that. The government must think we are pretty foolish if it pretends that this bill will do anything about inflation and price gouging.

We are all interested in stopping profiteering. We are all concerned about inflation. But this bill is merely fluff; it is merely bluff. It does not do anything with respect to these problems. It does not do anything about house prices, about the price of houses already built, for which the materials have already been paid, yet the prices of those houses are raised by as much as $3,000 to $4,000 over one weekend. That may be gouging, that may be an unrealistic price increase and certainly it cannot be treated as conscionable, yet this bill does not touch that problem. Actually, it deals with hardly any problems.

● (2050)

What is the bill supposed to attack? It purports, to deal with the price of articles which seriously affect the living costs of all, or a great majority of Canadians. Therefore, the bill applies only to those articles which seriously affect all Canadians, or the great majority of them. A few weeks ago our newspapers spoke of a certain optical company which manufactures eye glasses: it was accused of gouging. Do eye glasses affect the living costs of all, or a great majority of Canadians? I suggest that the majority of Canadians do not wear eye glasses, not even the majority of the members of this House. So eye glasses are not included. The minister who spoke before me mentioned shoes. Are we talking about men's, or women's, shoes? If we mean women's shoes, they certainly do not affect living costs of a great majority of Canadians. Perhaps of half the population, but not the great majority. The same applies to men's shoes. This bill is to affect the price of articles used by all, or a great majority of Canadians. Remember that.

What about the price of bricks? How many Canadians actually use bricks? I suppose those who are thinking of buying or building a house need bricks. But do all Canadians, or the majority, use bricks? No, sir. And what about lumber? Lumber is not included, if we apply the same definition. How many things are included? Food is not. Yet we all eat, I trust.

Mr. Stanbury: It is included.

Mr. Blenkarn: What about agriculture? That is not included.

Mr. Stanbury: Read the bill.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Is the hon. member not aware that the bill provides that only agricultural products, when they are in the hands of primary producers or at the moment they are sold by them, are not covered and that the bill covers these products at every level of trade beyond that?

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, with respect I suggest that the bill covers only the processing of agricultural products, at the processing stage, but does not include agricultural products as such. For instance, it does not cover tomatoes sold by the greengrocer who may have overcharged you, unless they happen to be in a can or soup or something like that. It does not cover agricultural products. It does not cover the vast majority of things.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member accept another question?

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes, Mr. Speaker; the minister may tell us what the bill does cover.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, may I refer the hon. member to section 50(5) which states unequivocably that the natural products of agriculture are not included. The subsection reads in part:

—this part does not apply to an article . . . that is owned by a primary producer or fisherman or to any sale or distribution of such an article in an unprocessed state by such a primary producer or fisherman.

Does he not realize that such language makes the bill apply to those products at every further level of trade beyond that?

Mr. Stanbury: No; he has not read the bill.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I do not accept that suggestion. How can the bill attempt to control the price of agricultural products when it obviously does not cover fertilizer and other things used by the farmer. In fact, it covers hardly any product. This bill does not include very much. It covers only articles which are consumed or used by all, or a great majority of Canadians. That puts a serious limit on the scope of the bill.

What does the bill require? With respect to those articles on which excessive profits are being made, the bill says that two things must happen. First, the commission or board to be set up must recommend action to the cabinet, and the cabinet must decide if something is seriously wrong. When it is so satisfied, it may invoke the act and direct that guidelines shall be established to deal with the industry or product in question. Remember, it must be a product which is used by all, or the majority of our people. Then the director must inquire as to what action must be taken, then the company involved may be taken to court. That is the sort of bill this is—and this sort of legislation is supposed to control the price of certain articles.

Clearly, as the Globe and Mail said today, this bill is a paper tiger. Earlier today a minister of the government, using all his rhetoric said, "Fellows, why hold the bill up in the House? Would it not be better to send the bill to committee, where it can be fixed." This bill is so bad that we despair of fixing it. The bill is a sham, notwithstanding all the rhetoric of ministers who have spoken today. The government should withdraw the bill. I suspect that after tonight it will be filed away under the table. Probably it will never see the light of day again. It has been shown to be a sham and a sop to win the support of the NDP.

In this country we need some method to control inflation. The government could use several such methods. We have suggested an income policy and a commodities policy under which more commodities would be processed in Canada. As well, we support a monetary policy which would separate our money supply from the New York market. We would attack government expenses. This bill represents the beginning of an incomes policy. Sir, we need a comprehensive incomes policy. Our program would begin with a 60 to 90-day freeze on wages, prices and profits and would be imposed for two reasons. First, it would show the country that we really mean business and that those who are anticipating further price rises are likely to be disappointed. We would want to curb inflationary expectations in society.

Second, we would need time to develop, with the provinces and other bodies, a comprehensive program to control basic costs across the board. That is what our incomes program would involve. We would set up an incomes and prices review board which would set up realistic guidelines to cover wages and salaries, including salaries paid to executives. We would not be concerned only about the poor guy who works on the line but would include the executive who draws a large salary. The board would determine the profit that a company would need to attract further capital and to expand. It would determine what the real input costs are and what the real price structure should be on a fair basis. However, this proposal by the government does not do anything of the kind. The program at the outset suggested by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on a comprehensive basis would probably be for 18 months to two years. It perhaps might even have to be longer than that. Indeed, it might have to become part of a permanent competition policy.

In that regard, may I point out the difference between the philosophy of an incomes policy as prescribed by this party and the woolly, button-down, wing collar approach or look of society as visualized by the government party. We do not live entirely in a marketplace economy. We do not live in an economy of open and complete competition. Certainly some parts are open, in complete competition. Small stores compete with other small stores perhaps; small businesses compete with other small businesses in the same trade, perhaps. But the great part of our industrial might is involved in large organizations that have a monopoly or oligarchy position in our society, where the price they charge for their product does not necessarily bear any true relation to cost.

We have a situation where big industry, big labour and big government are not subject to the marketplace forces of competition. In the past, the answer by the government to this condition has been the Combines Investigation Act. I say that is a useless act in the ultimate. It really has not done anything to affect the oligarchies or to create competition. It may well be—and I will speak about this later—that it is not necessarily desirable in some fields that there be competition. Under the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, the only people who have been caught have been stupid. People who make mistakes are caught under that act, but by and large it is only when they make a goof that they are caught.

Prices are charged by big business and big labour on the basis of what the traffic will bear. It is almost ridiculous, but the bill refers to profit margins that are "customarily" obtained. The bill even recognizes that it is all right to have these profit margins. If your profit margin is always 100 per cent, that is all right. But if you make 200 per cent, that is bad even though possibly you should not have made 100 per cent in the first place.

We must recognize the realities of 1974. Big business operates on a price leadership basis. Does anyone here seriously believe there is any competition between our big banks? Just a week and a half ago the Bank of Canada raised the re-discount rate. Suddenly the Royal said, "ten and a half it is," and five other banks instantly said it was 10½ per cent. The Commerce took another day and a half to get to 10½ per cent for the prime rate. Does anyone believe there is real competition between the banks? The only competition is in the advertising—Susie of the Commerce and little Mary of the Royal Bank.

Is there any real competition in automobiles? Is there any real competition between the oil companies? I was in Saskatchewan recently. I noticed oil company prices posted on the five pumps were about the same as I pay in Ontario. In fact, in one town it was a little more. I happen to be at this end of the pipeline, and they are at the other. The price in the Texaco pump in Mississauga is 59.9 cents a gallon. The refinery is right in Port Credit, in Mississauga. When I travel 60 miles to my cottage, the No. 2 Texaco gasoline, which comes from the same refinery, is 54.9 cents a gallon—what the traffic will bear.

This government has to understand the whole question of competition and the kind of society in which we live. This government is completely out of it. Last fall there was a strike in the oil refinery at Port Credit. I went to see the strikers and talked to them and their union leader. The leader of the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers Union said they were not fighting over money. They had agreed on that. The oil companies and the union had already agreed on the wages for refinery workers. That was agreed in the package. What was the strike about? It was about safety conditions in that particular refinery, and the way the supervisory force acted. The wages had already been settled. They had been determined by big labour and big business operating in concert, quite able to pass it on right through the system. They are able to do this because of their size.

Within the past week or so we have witnessed an example of price leadership. Many of us applauded the activities of the Steel Company of Canada saying to its union that it was necessary to increase wages for its employees. Immediately, Falconbridge, Inco and Westinghouse increased wages. It went right through the big structures in society. Perhaps it was necessary because of inflation. But what do we have? We have bigness. We have the large, uncontrolled organizations in our society able to do just about what they want.

The purpose of an incomes and prices review board is so that we, the public, have some say because there really is no competition in the market that will control prices. It has been suggested we can control prices by bringing in imports and creating foreign competition. However, when Ford and General Motors have plants in every country, do you really control prices by allowing imports? Not on your life!

We need big corporations, oligarchies and monopolies. There is nothing wrong with Canada having these. After all, Canada is a nation of only 22 million people. It needs an economy on the scale that bigness gives. It needs the R and D expertise that can be developed in big corporations. But there has to be some control over their activities. That control has to be a comprehensive incomes policy applied to the oligarchic and monopolistic situation in our economy. We need something to replace competition. Competition to control these things went out with the wing collar. That is the philosophy of the Liberal Party—wing collar, button-down shirt, dickie and big, starched cuffs. They have not had a new idea in years. They keep bringing in amendments to the Combines Investigation Act.

Big business, large unions combining together can pass on their costs and take all the traffic will bear. They can exact an ever increasing share of the economy. They can use their price leadership and power to take over small corporations. This is part of the reason we need an incomes policy, to make things fair, to give the rest of us more protection against the taking of more and more from the total pot.

An incomes policy is not just an attack on profits. Profits are not the total picture. A small corporation may not make any profit at all. The chief executive may own a yacht and receive a salary of $100,000, but the company may not make any profit. Suppose there is no actual figure below the line, but the controlling corporation in some other country takes a royalty which makes sure that the company concerned never actually makes a profit. The whole picture must be kept in mind, including wages and salaries, including whatever is paid in directors' fees, compensation, royalties and expenses for travel, and so on. The bill before us acknowledges the existing accounting system and says, "As long as you comply with that system, you are all right." The bill does not really get at the problem.

We need a comprehensive policy, a policy which covers, or is capable of covering, the entire system. We need a policy which is not confined to those few articles which are consumed by all Canadians, or by the vast majority of Canadians. After all, we live in an interdependent society and if I get ripped off for glasses, somebody else may get ripped off for a wheelchair. These articles may not be covered by the bill, yet all of them add to my cost of living or to my neighbour's cost of living. So a selective approach of the kind contemplated can do nothing. It is merely window-dressing.

As the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) said, the bill sets up a bureaucracy with a star-chamber procedure; the star-chamber, or commission, is policeman, judge and jury, and it is under the control of a political cabinet. Isn't that a fine state of affairs in a free country? On this basis alone, the bill constitutes an attempt to deny natural justice.

The problem we should be attempting to meet is the menace of inflation. This is the problem which occupies the thoughts of my constituents; this is the topic about which I am continually hearing from those who come to my office, from my employees, from my wife. They see the cost of ordinary things going up from week to week. It used to be one could buy a Volkswagen for $1,600. Now the price is $3,200.

Inflation is the challenge, but the bill before us does nothing to meet that challenge. We are asked to send it to committee for second reading. But before this is done, the House must approve the principle, the general design of the bill. And when the general design of the bill is so fraudulent and so misleading, how can it possibly be corrected or improved in committee? Surely the supporters of the government know this. Surely they have read the bill.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, they know.

Mr. Blenkarn: My hon. friend says they know. Mr. Speaker, this bill is proof they are bankrupt of ideas, that they are full of puffery. They know their bill is a fraud and they know their government is a fraud. They have introduced this bill as a last straw to grab at as they prepare to go before the people in a general election. They want to say, "We intended to do something about profiteering and gouging, but the opposition would not let us." Mr. Speaker, they have no intention of doing anything. They know they have no such intention; and even if the bill were proclaimed immediately and action were taken immediately, it would not succeed. After all, the legislation covers only a limited range of articles, and of these government spokesmen have not mentioned one; they have not told us what articles they would go after or what companies they would go after. They have shown no reason for advancing this proposition. The bill is a fraud, the government is a fraud, and the government must go.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. speaker, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) pre-empted the phrase with which I intended to open my contribution to the debate. It was a good phrase, it aptly describes the situation, and with slight variations I want to use it now. In my view, the legislation before us is a snare, a delusion and a trap and we do not intend to fall into it. It is clear that the legislation is both too little and too late. The barn door has been locked long after the horse has been stolen. Without attempting to go into details of the bill, it seems to me it is cosmetic in nature and designed to win the support of this party at the last minute, and it will not be used in any effective effort to stop inflation or prevent profiteering.

Our leader, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), in his usual clear and forceful manner exposed the major and overwhelming weaknesses of the bill. I fully agree with his criticism and with his conclusion that we cannot possibly support such a measure. Nor do I think this conclusion requires us to make any apologies for trying to make parliament work as we have over the past 18 months. If I thought for one minute that the bill would work and that it would make any contribution toward solving the problems of inflation or profiteering, I would be glad to support it, but I do not see how I can support a measure which deals so ineffectively with such a crucial subject. We have voted for other government legislation on its merits, and we have voted against government legislation on its merits. I refer to the reduction in the corporation tax as an illustration of this. We will vote against this bill because we do not think it has any merit.

One has to remember, of course, that the wording of the legislation is not all-important. What is important is who is responsible for the enforcement and carrying out of the act. It was pointed out earlier in this debate that the act's enforcement depends entirely on the Liberal cabinet. Its real intent and the real content of the legislation have never been revealed. We have not been told, even in outline, what policy the government intends to adopt in regard to declaring that the bill applies to any article or articles. We are told nothing of this. The procedure is to be based, in part, on reports under the Inquiries Act. At the present time the only authority to make such inquiries is the Food Prices Review Board, whose jurisdiction is confined to food prices. It is true that proposed section 50(2) of the bill gives the governor in council authority to make a declaration, notwithstanding that there is no report and inquiry. But this, as the marginal note to the section says and as the minister himself has said, is only to be employed in cases of emergency for very unusual circumstances.

The key phrase in the act is "exceptionable trade practices". These are partly defined in section 54 as the exacting of "a profit margin on the sale or distribution of the article that is greater than he would customarily obtain on such sale or distribution". The words "customarily obtain" are completely vague. Here again, the government is required to step in and issue guidelines relating to the manner of the determination by the supplier of an article of the profit margin that he would customarily obtain.

However, the government has not seen fit to tell this House what sort of guidelines it has in mind. I have not heard a word about that in this debate. It seems to me to be an insult to parliament to ask parliament to pass legislation conferring wide powers on the government without indicating in any way, shape or form what the government's intentions are with respect to the exercise of those powers. We do not know in what type of cases it proposes to make declarations. Nor do we know its thinking as to the definition of the guidelines which will set the standards to be applied. We are, indeed, being asked to buy a pig in a poke.

I have already mentioned that the important question is, who is responsible for enforcing and carrying out the act? In this case it is in the hands of the government itself as to whether the act will ever be enforced or carried out. The likelihood of its ever being effectively carried out must be considered in light of the statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the minister which were recited to the House by the hon. member for York South yesterday.

The minister has told us that in his opinion there has been no profiteering up to the present time, or at any rate no proof of profiteering, and that he only intends to apply the act sparingly and in serious and obvious cases. That alone indicates that there is no intention to enforce this act. This attitude is, of course, on a par with the record of the Liberal Party in this field for generations. A Combines Investigation Act in various forms has been on the statute books for roughly 50 years. Its proposed purpose was to deal effectively with combines and monopolies. Its effectiveness can be judged by the fact that according to "Reynolds on Competition", and to our common knowledge, as well as in the views of other authorities, no modern country has been so ridden with monopolies or oligopolies as Canada.

The legalistic steps provided for in the Combines Investigation Act have turned out to be ineffective. Corporate organizations which are in fact combines have been prosecuted at great expense and with great delay. Even if convictions are registered and fines are paid, a new form of organization has been thought up by some well-informed, astute lawyer, has been established and an effective monopoly has carried on restrictive practices untouched by the legislation.

This bill, like the Combines Investigation Act, shows very little evidence of serious intent behind it. It has glaring gaps and omissions. Services, as has been said before, are not included, and unless the definition in the new competition act is enacted and applied to this act, the act will not apply to housing, interest rates, and many other important services. As the field of services in our economy expands, this means that some of the most important items which enter into the inflation picture are not covered by this measure at all.

The hon. member for York South has said there is no continuing monitoring agency to act in the field of profiteering. This bill, as is obvious to anyone who has read it, is highly complex. It provides for a complex and tangled process which may take months, indeed years, to work out. One starts in the ordinary case with an inquiry. Inquiries are often prolonged. If you hire a good lawyer, he is quite expert at prolonging inquiries. The inquiry is followed by a report, which may in turn be followed by a declaration by the governor in council. Finally, this may lead to a hearing before the Trade Practices Commission and some direction from them.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Involved in the process, of course, is the issue of guidelines. This will be no simple task since the guidelines will presumably be applicable to each class of goods covered. There is ample provision in the act for exemptions by the governor in council. Interim injunctions, which are the only effective method of getting an immediate price freeze, can only be issued as a result of proceedings in the courts. Those with court experience know that you do not get an injunction just like that. The power of the Trade Practices Commission to make a cease and desist order is limited to the stage following the hearing and determination that an exceptionable trade practice has occurred. The Trade Practices Commission has no power to freeze prices while the investigation is going on.

There must be very few of us in this House, Mr. Speaker, who are not conscious that spiralling inflation and the cost of living present to very many Canadians a situation of tragic hardship. I know in my own constituency of rising cost of rentals which has completely eaten away the increases that this parliament voted our old age pensioners and other people dependent on small and fixed incomes. Escalation in accordance with the cost of living, a provision we have legislated, is not sufficient for those who have not the means to buy houses, who cannot pay large rentals and are being forced out of homes that they rent at the present time. Every weekend when I go home I hear of instances of this tragic situation. It is my view, Mr. Speaker, that if we supported this bill we would be deceiving our constituents. We would be building up a hope for them, a hope that would inevitably turn out to be a false hope. I, for one, do not wish to have any part in such a deception.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) made a good, fighting speech this afternoon which we all enjoyed. The only real point that he made was that the opposition parties should accept the bill on second reading and let it go to committee where it could be improved by amendment. The trouble is that he missed the point entirely. This bill is so bad, so amorphous that it cannot be effectively amended in committee. You cannot write a bill in committee, Mr. Speaker; you have to have some principle on which you can graft amendments that are proposed. Committee is a place to improve the details of a bill. It is not a place to write a bill, to put principles into a bill which has none. What is needed is a totally new bill. We need a new start on this effort to deal with profiteering and gouging.

We cannot be asked to accept this bill in principle, because there are no principles in it. Or if there are, they are concealed behind these phrases which nobody in the government has taken the trouble to explain to us. I want to make it abundantly clear that to say this is not to approve of gouging or profiteering. It is to demand that if you go out to fight such an all-pervasive institution as profiteering, you choose weapons that can do the job. This bill is like using a peashooter to destroy a tank: it simply will not work.

● (2130)

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it is customary on this side of the House to hear two members of the Progressive Conservative Party expressing conflicting views. It has happened on a number of occasions.

Recently, on the question of transportation and the Canadian National Railways, we heard the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter) asking for a reduction in fares, and a member of the same party, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling), asking that the Canadian National be run in a businesslike manner.

There have been conflicting positions taken by members of that party also on bilingualism, unemployment insurance and a score of other things. But yesterday the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) outdid his own colleagues by performing the acrobatic feat of condemning the bill while at the same time declaring his readiness to move amendments so as to improve what is good in the bill and delete what is bad. Having done that, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's East attacked the selective price control policy because he is in favour of a comprehensive policy, and shortly after expressed his dismay about the size of the bureaucracy and suggested that bureaucracy was large enough as it is—all this within the same half hour.

I would ask the hon. member for St. John's East whether he realizes that he will need a larger bureaucracy, about which he is so upset, in order to implement the comprehensive policy he is advocating. Does he not realize that? This is typical of members of the opposition. But yesterday he really outdid his own colleagues by this phenomenal feat, in the same speech—expressing a policy position and an objective, and then expressing dismay about something he will definitely need in order to implement what he wants to achieve.

Conservative speakers have criticized the lack of more precise definitions in our proposals for customary profit margins and a base price.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: I hear hon. members agreeing. However, they do not put forward any alternatives indicating how these terms could be more precisely defined or what these definitions should be. If there were a general system of prices and income controls, which they have been proposing, definitions of base prices and customary profit margins would be required for the entire economy and not just for particular sectors as proposed in this bill. Yet the Conservative members have said nothing about how they would do this, whether by regulation or by definition in the law itself. Instead, they say they would have a general freeze and then they would figure out what to do.

The hon. member complained, also, that there were no discussions about philosophy in the speech by the minister yesterday on second reading. This is not correct. The philosophy was set out in the opening portion of the minister's speech. We all know that the Canadian public wants action more than just philosophy, and that it will not accept and put up with the nonsense put forward so far by the opposition during this debate.

There have been complaints on the part of spokesmen for the Conservative Party on consumer affairs that there has been no action on reports by the Food Prices Review Board, yet the government's decision to put in place special subsidy programs to restrain increases in the price of bread and milk, and the government's decision to advance the timing of the increase in family allowances, came from recommendations of the Food Prices Review Board. Contrary to what the hon. member for St. John's East said yesterday, bread and milk subsidy programs did restrain increases which otherwise would have taken place. Contrary to what he said, the government has carried out the basic recommendations of the Food Prices Review Board in respect of the egg marketing agency, that is, that a special inquiry be held into the entire operation of the marketing plan. The government gave this task to the Farm Products Marketing Council and the inquiry is under way. Contrary to what the hon. member for St. John's East said yesterday, the bakeries did agree to abide by the Food Prices Review Board findings. They did, in fact, restrain or roll back prices at the request of the minister, on a voluntary basis, to the levels considered acceptable by the Food Prices Review Board.

We also heard the hon. member for St. John's East yesterday speaking against the proposal that the Trade Practices Commission order a profiteer to pay back excess gains. What does the Conservative Party want to do with excess gains? We have not heard any submission on this aspect of the proposals contained in the bill. Having not heard what they want to do with excess gains, I think we are reasonably and legitimately entitled to think that this indicates support by the Conservative Party for big business and for excessive gains.

The final part of the criticism put forward yesterday by the hon. member for St. John's East was in the form of a quotation from Tuesday's Globe and Mail editorial which expressed skepticism about Bill C-29. He evidently forgot to mention that in the same editorial there was complete rejection of the Progressive Conservative proposal for a general system of price and income control.

Yesterday we heard the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and we were rather surprised, I must say, because he either did not understand or did not want to understand what is contained in this bill. For a long time that hon. member has been calling for a means to enable the government to take action against profiteering, but when he and his party are put to the test they reject the chance to enable a bill for this purpose to become law. That hon. member takes the position that no bill and no action is preferable to the government's proposal because he disagrees with some of its details, mainly because of misunderstanding.

The hon. member went on to say that the government does not indicate any intention to use the law it passes, yet the minister in his speech yesterday specifically said just the opposite. If the hon. member for York South really wanted to enable action to be taken against profiteers now, he would support the bill basically in its present form, giving the government the responsibility for using the powers provided in this bill. He would be putting the government's intentions to the test; and if he were not in agreement with the way the government used the law when it should have done so, he and his party could vote no confidence in the government. This would seem to me the more sensible line of approach for the NDP to follow, rather than to prevent even the likelihood of action that is now intended in this very important field of endeavour.

There were comments made yesterday about the question of monitoring price development. The minister did say in his opening remarks that the government was prepared to set up additional boards immediately upon passage of the bill to monitor certain sectors where such action appeared necessary. Contrary to what the member of York South was suggesting yesterday, this government is not proposing to wait for a report of a board of inquiry. If the government has adequate information from other sources, this bill would enable the government to act without waiting for such a report.

● (2140)

Again, contrary to what the hon. member for York South suggested yesterday, the proposed Trade Practices Commission is not, and will not be a part-time commission. The proposal in the bill would enable a sufficient number of full-time members to be available to carry out the work required by the bill, and anyone with eyes to read can look up section 16(1) in the bill which contains the definition of temporary additions. There is definitely a distinction in the English language between "part-time" and "temporary" which perhaps escaped the hon. member for York South who, by the way, seems also to misunderstand the proposal in the bill for dealing with profiteering.

The inquiry and report of a board prior to a declaration, the inquiries by the director and the hearings by the Trade Practices Commission are not the same thing and are not for the same purposes. The inquiry and report by a board prior to a declaration would be about a sector, industry or class of products generally to help provide the kind of general information which would provide a basis for the government to decide on the making of a declaration. The declaration, once made, and accompanied by or including the three notification procedures and definitions of customary profits, would immediately create a 30-day freeze on the products covered and would create the legal obligation that all suppliers of the products not sell them at prices that would cause the customary profit guidelines to be exceeded.

The procedure set out in the act for inquiry by the director, the hearings and orders by the Trade Practices Commission, would be the procedure required to enable appropriate accumulative, punitive action to be taken against individual suppliers who do not live up to the legal requirements created by the declaration, guidelines and regulations. There must be some procedure for determining who is not meeting the requirements of the guidelines and regulations—a good, sound and fair procedure—in connection with a declaration and for then going on to impose the sanction of the law against that person. Our system of law must ensure that the alleged lawbreaker has a hearing before the sanction of the law is imposed on him. This is the purpose of the inquiry by the director and the hearings by the commission.

The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) yesterday stressed very well the necessity and importance in principle of this kind of approach in our legal system. The director's inquiry would determine whether there is evidence of an offence sufficient to bring the matter before a body which could make a decision about it. The bill does set out the kind of approach the hon. member for York South said is necessary. I quote from page 1946 of Hansard where he is recorded as having said:

When a thorough but quick inquiry is made and a price increase is found to be unjustified, there must be immediate authority to tell the company that they cannot increase their price.

Those are the words of the hon. member for York South. This is the effect of a declaration with accompanying prenotification requirements and customary profit margin guidelines. Once they are provided, they would apply to all firms selling the category of goods at the level of distribution mentioned in the declaration, and not just one firm.

The hon. member for York South was completely wrong yesterday when he said that the bill does not give the government, a commission or anyone the power to freeze prices for 30 days. These powers are spelled out in section 51 very clearly. No one could raise the price without first giving the required notice up to 30 days and this means, as the section says, a freeze for the period of the notice.

With regard to the method of determining or defining the customary profit margins, the government never said that one should compare current profits only with the immediately preceding year. The speech made by the minister yesterday suggested the opposite approach. The example used was just a hypothetical one for the sake of explaining the matter, but evidently it was not understood. The hon. member for York South is concerned that it would be up to the government to decide whether a declaration should be made to bring the powers of the act into force for any class of article or sector. Surely such an authority to intervene in the economy with what possibly could be disruptive effects must be in the hands not of an appointed body but one accountable to the public through parliament.

This approach very often has been raised as one of the basic principles in our democracy. Very often we hear members opposite complain about the fact that there are too many bodies not directly responsible for their actions to parliament except once a year when they appear before the committee. Here the government has met that criticism in sections 51, 52 and 53 by saying it should be the decision of the governor in council and that this power should not be made available to a body removed from parliament itself.

If action had to be taken automatically on the request of an appointed board, what would the NDP say if the board was not willing to make the kind of recommendation that parliament and the public generally felt would be required? The NDP would be the first to object to this approach. The NDP criticism, unfortunately, means that the government should not be given the power to take action against profiteering, something directly opposed to what the NDP claims is necessary for the protection of the public. In conclusion—and this is a very sad conclusion because we had thought a matter of this importance, in the interests of the Canadian people, would have received support from all sides of the House—I can only say it is my distinct impression that the Canadian people will not take lightly the fact that both the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party backed off with excuses when the crunch came to deal with profiteering in a serious and responsible manner.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to say a few words about the bill before us because I think it is tremendously important. I also think that it might not be necessary to discuss it because even if it were passed, this bill would not remedy the situation or save the victims of the system.

Mr. Speaker, even if this bill is not really important it is considered as such. At least it is very important for the New Democrats. I think myself that it is a minor issue but the government intends to prevent some businesses from making undue profits. We have to define profits and establish who makes such big profits, who will be taxed, who is responsible. Mr. Speaker, if this bill were comprehensive, it would benefit the whole economic sector and the whole business system. This bill will cover only some of the citizens while others who might be making 100, 200, 1000 times more profits will not be affected at all.

Mr. Speaker, any legislation must be as fair as possible. I find this measure unfair because it does not meet our needs.

The bill before us should include some provisions to lower prices and the cost of living at the consumer and producer level. If we want the cost of living to be reduced at the consumer level, it must first be reduced at the producer level.

And the cost of production is increasing, as it has always increased because of various factors, economic factors particularly, which are attributable to the governments, since several governments are involved in this "economic affair".

Mr. Speaker, if we really want to have just and reasonable laws, we shall never achieve our aim by imposing surtaxes on those who make profits to develop their business, and create new institutions. If we prevent them from making certain profits, we shall also be preventing them from developing, and when they need this development, they will be told to go to the Industrial Development Bank and borrow at 12 per cent, or to go to the new Business Development Bank that we are now establishing, where they will again borrow at an interest rate of 12 or 13 per cent. There is undoubtedly no limit to this type of thing. Therefore, the intention is to restrict profits by other means, but not to restrict the action of the government, and more specifically that of the Industrial Development Bank or of the new bank which will be established, or of all the financial institutions which make undue profits and exploit Canadians. Let us compare these profits with those of companies or associations. Who do we want to tax now? Whose profits do we want to cut? It is easy to see that other institutions depend on them and make two or three times as much profits, and even more. These institutions are not bothered, they are sacred, holy.

Yet all that boosts the cost of living because the manufacturing companies that make profits are indirectly financed by the financial institutions. Financial institutions make profits, not companies involved in production. They are the ones that deal with the capital, make the capital, handle the capital and turn in the profits. This is where the money and the profits go. This is what nobody attacks!

Mr. Speaker, we should like to be on the side of those who support this bill; we do not object completely to the bill, but we know that we work for nothing. We know that what we are doing will not matter at all, that it will not improve economic conditions but will worsen them. Mr. Speaker, the more we cling to the present system. the more we support and enforce it, the more we contribute to the imbalance of the economy. The more also we thus contribute to inflation, rising prices and the increased cost of living.

Inflation is due to the fact that the financial system is not consistent with the realities of production or consumption. The monetary accounting of the system is wrong and only honest accounting would correct inflation without being prejudicial to the legitimate individual interests. We would need an accounting consistent with reality. This would entail the application of financial data stated by the economic expert C. H. Douglas fifty years ago and known under the name of Social Credit. If those financial data had been applied, such a reform would have avoided many troubles to the people.

Mr. Speaker, if the rise in price shows that the system is lacking and should the financial system were in accordance with reality, not only would there be no inflation but on the contrary prices would gradually decrease as technical progress and manufacturing processes would facilitate production.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, due to the indefinite nature of activities tomorrow, may I ask whether we will be debating the pension plan bill first?

Mr. Foster: Tomorrow we will continue with the report stage and go on to third reading of the Canada Pension Plan bill. If we complete that, we will go on to the Prairie Farm Advance Payments Act and, depending on the progress that has been made, if the import-export permits bill is reported back from the committee we will go on to that bill.

Adjournment Debate

HOUSING—NEWFOUNDLAND—POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION PROGRAM TO RURAL AREAS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, as is customary I want to state that my reason for rising at this time is to try to impress on members of the House the need to emphasize the question that I put to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) on April 15. It had to do with the announcement of the minister to extend the residential rehabilitation program for housing beyond the restricted policy under the act to qualify citizens in neighbourhood improvement areas.

When the minister gave us particulars regarding the new rural and native housing program under which some 50,000 homes would be built over the next five years to enable citizens within that category to build a house in rural areas, he stated that under that new policy citizens in rural communities would qualify beyond the provisions of the National Housing Act. Furthermore, the new rural and native housing program would allow citizens in rural communities to take advantage of the residential rehabilitation program. I can only say that this program would benefit my constituents, and that it is certainly what is required.

With regard to the original program, I have been one of the minister's most staunch supporters in the introduction of this program and even more so when he extended the program to those in rural Canada, because it lifted the restriction which required those benefitting under the program to live within a neighbourhood improvement area which had to be designated by the province concerned. Furthermore, only $10 million was provided for this program across Canada, and for Newfoundland only some $660,000 was provided. I mention this because the housing situation in Newfoundland can only be classified as disastrous.

It is obvious to everyone that with rates of interest advancing it will be almost impossible for those on low incomes to acquire new homes. But as is provided by the amendments to the act, this program would provide an opportunity for those living in substandard homes to improve the condition of their homes, homes which are deteriorating due to the fact that with the cost of building materials rising because of inflation the occupants on the lowest income scale cannot afford to improve them. I maintain that every effort should be extended to make funds available to allow every Canadian falling within this category to take advantage of the $5,000 loans available, with the forgiveness of $2,500 if their income falls below or is equal to $6,000, and beyond that to reduce the forgiveness by $1 for every $2 of income in excess of $6,000.

I realize that the minister is restricted in directing this program until agreements are signed with the provinces and until minimum standards are laid down by municipalities or by the provinces. But when I am overburdened with letters from constituents begging me for assistance to improve their homes it is most frustrating that these restrictions exist. I can show you, Mr. Speaker, from applications made to housing corporations in my district, that literally thousands of citizens are living in the most precarious circumstances even beyond the control and the ability of those who are designated to help. It becomes a frustrating experience trying to help alleviate a problem which is beyond anyone's power to control.

If I can use only one example, one does not have to go beyond increases in the cost of home heating oil. Citizens on welfare, who live mainly in substandard homes, cannot even cope with the cost of fuel, especially in the winter months. And the provinces are unable to cope with the cost of the increase in home heating oil beyond the increases which are extended to citizens through social assistance. I therefore suggest that the residential rehabilitation program should be extended to provide insulation for such substandard homes. This would not only save money for the citizens affected, but if one adds up the thousands of homes falling within this category it would save the government millions of dollars and many millions of gallons of fuel.

Probably I should not even say this, Mr. Speaker, but I feel very strongly that the residential rehabilitation program is admirable. I give full marks to whoever was responsible for introducing it. But when one experiences the bureaucratic nightmare that exists, one doubts the sincerity that is extended to those to whom the program is directed. Realizing the problems that the minister faces in dealing with provincial and municipal regulations, my main task is to try to impress upon him that every effort should be made and every initiative used to come to an agreement with the provinces concerned, so that this program can be put into effect at the earliest opportunity. I ask the representative of the minister here tonight to reply to me in earnestness on the progress made up until this time to help relieve the burden of low income earners in whatever category they happen to fall.

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): First, Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) that he has the minister's full sympathy. I know the minister fully desires to do something as quickly as possible about the extremely serious conditions which a large number of the hon. member's constituents face with respect to housing. As quickly as I can, I will run over what has happened and what is likely to happen.

Since the announcement of the rural and native housing program, several federal initiatives have been taken in order to get this program under way. Provinces have been contacted in order to further explain the program, and meetings are being arranged with the provinces in order to discuss the content of the program. Meetings have already been held with the officials of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. At these meetings several subjects were examined and tentative agreement was reached.

The main points which have been covered in our discussions have been area designation for program implementation, definition of targets, maintenance and occupancy standards applicable to rural and remote areas, participation of local organizations in the program delivery system, the relation of RRAP to other NHA programs, budget allocation, the innovative features of rural rehabilitation association programs such as delivery, trades and local involvement, the meshing of federal-provincial programs whenever possible, the best form of agreement to facilitate program flexibility, and the establishment of a federal-provincial committee to co-ordinate the total activity of the program.

The minister will be meeting shortly with the officials of the province of Ontario, and meetings are now being arranged with the Atlantic provinces through the federal-provincial committee being set up for the co-ordination of this program. Officials at CMHC are in the process of producing guidelines for rural community standards and general instructions for program delivery.

Interdepartmental committees are planned so as to bring together federal and provincial departments who may have relevant programs to support the successful delivery of the rural and native housing program. Efforts are being made to obtain successful agreement on this program. The minister hoped, when we visited the three prairie provinces, to have this matter tied up by the end of April. Unfortunately, that has not happened. We hope that by the middle or the later part of May the program will be under way across Canada. The minister recognizes that the program should be in effect so that we can take advantage of this year's construction season.

Officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are presently having discussions with the province of Newfoundland concerning this program. Negotiations are progressing well, and the minister hopes to meet again with Newfoundland officials in the very near future to discuss all matters related to the program. The interventions of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe since the introduction of the legislation have been most helpful and the minister has not forgotten this.

AGRICULTURE—THREAT OF GRASSHOPPER INFESTATION IN WESTERN CANADA THIS SPRING—ACTION TO CONTROL

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I see that one of my fans is still here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Knight: I rise tonight to expand on the question I asked of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) several weeks ago concerning any controls the minister may have in mind for dealing with the potential outbreak of grasshopper infestation which this year could destroy a major portion of the crops in western Canada. When I raised this matter which is of concern to my constituents, the minister said, as recorded at page 1120 of Hansard for April 3:

> —we are offering to the provinces to set up control centres, with equipment and insecticides, and people who are willing to staff these centres, to make sure we are in a better position than we have ever been to control grasshoppers

I am awaiting the response of the hon. member who will reply on behalf of the minister and who has some farm background. I shall be interested to learn details as to how the program for controlling grasshoppers is to be administered across Canada. People in Canada may wonder why grasshoppers should be discussed in the House of Commons. May I point out to those who live in urban areas and have expressed concern about food costs and supplies that Mother Nature has played a dirty trick on us. I am talking of what has happened with regard to food production within the last four or five years. In the Peace River country wheather conditions have been such that millions of bushels of Durum and hard wheat have been lost. A map showing areas of potential grasshopper infestation will show that we stand to lose further hundreds of millions of bushels of western grain used for bread.

This infestation is not new. When I came to the House in 1971 I told the House that there were was the potential for an outbreak of the grasshopper plague and that measures should be taken to help affected areas and municipalities fight this outbreak. The outbreak was worse in 1972. It was again worse in 1973. In 1974 we will be faced with a severe situation. I have raised this question with the minister on previous occasions. In spite of opposition from the Conservative Party, the agriculture committee passed a motion that the funds remaining in the old PFAA fund be put into a disaster fund to help fight regional disasters in this country, such as severe outbreaks of grasshoppers. I might point out to the hon. member who will be replying this evening that in the southernmost part of my constituency grasshopper eggs have been hatching at a tremendous rate. Later in the spring we will see the serious results of this hatching. There seems to have been very little winter kill.

Recently I sent a questionnaire to my constituents which was responded to in large numbers. I asked the following question:

> The Prairie Farm Assistance Act has some funds left in its account in spite of it no long being in total operation. Would you agree with these monies being used to establish an emergency fund to assist with regional disasters such as severe grasshopper infestation?

These funds were collected from farmers in the prairie region; therefore, it was not an easy question in the sense of knowing what the response would be. The response was that 83.5 per cent of the producers in my area said yes, 7 per cent said no, and 9.5 per cent did not know one way or another. I suggest to the government that in the time frame of this year a concerted effort will have to be made to bring this pest under control, otherwise we will stand to lose millions of bushels of wheat and millions of dollars.

There is the long-range question involving the grasshopper problem. It may seem preposterous—and there was great hilarity when I raised this before, including members from western Canada on the agriculture committee, but not from the minister because he knows these studies are taking place—but one aspect of interest to people in the Far East is the fact that the grasshopper is edible. It is a delicacy on the Japanese market. Many people have been critical of me for suggesting that with a long-range program we may be able to avoid all the insecticides and debate about the harmful effects of insecticides. We could use a mechanism to harvest grasshoppers, turning them into a marketable commodity for the Far East.

I want to point out, in the few moments I have left, that I have not gone completely "bonkers" as a result of working too hard in the last couple of weeks. I quote as follows from an article in the Western Producer:

> Grasshoppers will probably never make the Winnipeg Commodity Exchange—

We should not put anything else on the exchange, either.

—as an international crop but there is a good chance that Manitoba—

This bothers me, because they leave out Saskatchewan.

—grasshoppers can be sold directly to Japan.

I want the hon. member to pay particular attention to this passage:

More than 500 metric tons of grasshoppers are eaten annually as a delicacy in Japan. And the market is still growing.

A representative of one of the major trading companies in Japan has been in Canada to speak to the Manitoba government on this matter. What I am seeking is some assistance at the federal level to take seriously the concept of marketing this pest. If we can get over floods such as we had this year, fertilize our crops and market grasshoppers at the same time as wheat, the producers in my area will feel we have gone a long way. There is a trading company which is involved in this industry. I will not try to pronounce the name because I do not want to mispronounce it. It is prepared to seek to market grasshoppers in the Far East because they have high protein and are marketable.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, one has to witness the damage done by vast numbers of grasshoppers in order to understand in all its seriousness the situation we are discussing. There is not much I can add to what the minister said in reply to this question by the hon. member on April 3. The federal government has offered to co-operate with the provinces in establishing some type of federal-provincial pest control group or groups within each of the three prairie provinces. One function of these groups, as we see it, would be to make sure that pesticides were available, that equipment was in readiness and that the logistics of the operation are studied and worked out so that in the event we are faced with a grasshopper problem the most effective means possible will be in place to combat it. The minister has heard recently from two of his provincial colleagues and they advise him that their departments have made, or are making, all necessary preparations. The minister's offer to co-operate with the provinces still stands.

The hon. member has suggested that we sell grasshoppers to Japan. This may not be such a bad idea, but I suggest he direct questions on this subject to my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie).

Mr. Knight: You'd never believe it.

Mr. Hopkins: I might say the minister did discuss this possibility with the Japanese minister of agriculture—

Mr. Knight: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hopkins: —when they met some months ago. The research which has gone into this subject is very revealing. I am informed that one steer weighing approximately 1,000 pounds consumes only half as much grain to produce the same amount of protein as thousands and thousands of grasshoppers consume to produce an equal amount; that is, Mr. Speaker, the little hoppers eat twice as much per pound of protein produced.

[Mr. Knight.]

POST OFFICE—PROPORTION OF EMPLOYEES WORKING ON MECHANICAL SORTING DEVICES RECRUITED FROM WITHIN SERVICE

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pursue a question which I directed to the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) on April 1 requesting him to advise us what proportion of code operators had been recruited from within the postal service. At that time it was Your Honour's pleasure to say that it was a question asking for statistics and one which the minister could not be expected to answer during the oral question period. With all due respect to Your Honour, the question was not statistical in one sense, because the answer was "none", and I believe the minister could easily have answered it. Not a single full-time postal employee accepted the offer made to people within the service to operate the machines.

The reason was obvious. They were offered a lower paying job. This has led to one of the most urgent and demoralizing problems within the Post Office. The minister established a new category of employment for code operators. As I understand it, it is the lowest category of all. In spite of repeated evidence of basic union objection to this new and lower classification, in spite of the fact that other countries operating coding machines pay operators more, rather than less, than manual sorters, and in spite of the fact that being a code operator is a much less desirable job because of noise, isolation and boredom, the minister has refused to reconsider his position. He refused to classify code operators as sorters. He refused to have meaningful discussions with the representatives of the employees. He insisted that they be paid 50 cents to 70 cents an hour less. I am not sure of the exact statistics because there are some conflicting figures on this.

I know that the minister was perfectly within his rights. I also know job classification is a matter for management to decide. But it was patently irresponsible for the minister not to read the storm warnings. Morale is low in the Post Office and it is getting lower. The minister did nothing to defuse the power keg; he just put his fingers in his ears and waited for it to blow. And as we all know, it blew.

The minister had one very important way in which he might have eased the tension. He wrote into the collective bargaining agreement of May, 1973, a provision for a manpower committee. I gather it met once or twice some time ago, but the committee spent its time haggling about organizational matters and never did discuss the real problem affecting management and employee relationships. That committee could have provided an excellent opportunity to work out any differences between management and labour, but the minister did not call it.

The people of Canada have now had to pay with a strike, a strike that should never have happened. They have had to pay a heavy price for the arrogance of a minister who looked so promising when he came to his post a couple of years ago. I remember very well, as will many Canadians, his promise at that time that a new day of co-operation and consultation with his employees had dawned. The Canadian public has had to pay the price, Mr. Speaker, and that price, as we all know, is pretty high—millions of dollars of lost mail service and, to add insult to injury, during the strike thousands of dollars spent to advertise the minister's excuses for a strike by his employees.

Canadians are anxious to have an efficient and economic mail service in Canada. Naturally they are angry with the postal workers for their actions of a few weeks ago. Moreover, they are angry with the minister for having failed entirely to deal with the obvious problems with the postal service. The minister represents to the Canadian public that this code sorting system is the answer to all our postal problems. Well, Mr. Speaker, if he could not sell the code, and the jobs it offered, to his own employees, it will be interesting to see how he expects to sell it to the Canadian public.

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to reply to the question asked tonight by the distinguished member for South Western Nova (Mr. Haliburton). The minister would have wished to be here himself, but has gone to Winnipeg tonight to launch a new stamp tomorrow morning. The question that the hon. member raised is, as we all realize, a very important one, and as we all realize relates to the national postal conflict during the last few weeks. The matter is still under study by representatives of the ministry and those of unions under the direction of Mr. Eric Taylor.

If the hon. member would switch on his simultaneous translation, I will give him the balance of the reply tonight.

[Translation]

The Post Office Department has only two highly mechanized offices at the present time, one in Ottawa and the other in Winnipeg. When the automation process is completed, there will be 26 such offices altogether. In the two offices where the mail is sorted automatically, there are 67 coders, 43 of them in Ottawa and the remaining 24 in Winnipeg.

How many coding machine operators are former Post Office employees? Out of the 43 operators working in Ottawa at the present time, 26 were not employed by the Post Office Department, while the remaining 18 were casual or part time employees.

As for Winnipeg, while five coders are former casual or part time employees of the department, the remaining 19 were recruited outside the department.

[English]

In closing, Mr. Speaker, the minister has asked me to extend his gratitude to the member for South Western Nova for having last week, when the matter was scheduled to be before the House, abstained from pushing the question. This would have meant possible embarrassment to the minister in his negotiations, and he is most appreciative of the hon. member's patience in this regard.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.26 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

On the order: Motions:

April 30, 1974—Mr. Fairweather:

That the third report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on Tuesday, April 30, 1974, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday, when the hon. member for Fundy-Royal proposed to move this motion, the Chair drew the attention of hon. members to a difficulty in relation to the form of the third report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments.

I think I should insist on the fact that it is not the substance of the report which concerns the Chair, but rather its form. As I stated yesterday, there is a procedure established by the House of Commons Act and the supply legislation for the employment of committee staff. The method suggested in this case appears to the Chair to be inconsistent with that observed in the past. I am aware, however, that arrangements have been made in the other place to overcome the difficulty, and I would think that in the circumstances it would be in order to put the motion.

I might also add that, as the hon. member for Fundy-Royal pointed out yesterday, there have been consultations of which I was not aware, which puts a different complexion on the situation. I have to assume that this motion is being put by consent, so it will not necessarily constitute a precedent. This having been said, I am sure hon. members will expect the Chair to put the motion.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal) moved:

That the third report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on Tuesday, April 30, 1974, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN INTEREST RATES ON LOANS TO FARMERS AND SUBSIDIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of importance and urgency.

In view of the present inflation and constant increase in prices generally, in view of the absolute necessity that foods be available in sufficient quantities and at reasonable prices, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette):

That this House recommend to the government that it immediately lower the interest on farm loans in addition to subsidizing farm production needs where the threat exists of shortages or excessive price increases.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

ILLEGAL STRIKES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to request the consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the growing number of illegal strikes which have had the effect of completely paralysing major sectors of our economy, and in view of the fact that no steps have been taken by the government to prosecute individuals disregarding legal contracts or back-to-work orders, and inasmuch as this has had the effect of encouraging future actions of this sort, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie):

That immediately upon the next such violation by any individual or group of individuals so involved, the Solicitor General be instructed to proceed with charges against them and that maximum penalties be sought, and that all matters pertaining to illegal strikes be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: This motion, put forward under the terms of Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF CONTINGENCY PLAN TO DEAL WITH INFLATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has said that Bill C-29, the so-called anti-profiteering bill, is not an anti-inflation bill and is not a price control measure. On the other hand, the Minister of Finance has told the House that it is not part of the government's contingency plan. I ask the Prime Minister whether it is still the government's intention to institute its contingency plan dealing with inflation rather than limiting itself to a bill such as Bill C-29 which has found so little favour in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the logic of the question escapes me because it assumes that price and wage control, which is the contingency plan, would find the favour of the House and I am doubtful also that that would happen. Perhaps the Tories will have a chance to speak about it on the hustings. I am quite certain it is not the right approach to inflation and, more importantly, it is not the best approach to profiteering.

As the hon. member knows, the bill is attacking special cases of gouging or profiteering, whereas the approach to which he alludes, that of the contingency plan, is an over-all freeze. As the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion indicated yesterday, it is not an approach that we favour. We do not want to put a freeze on the wages of the small earners.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Is there still in the mind of the government an anti-inflation contingency plan, and is it still the Prime Minister's position that the government will institute such a plan at some undefined or indefinite time during an inflation emergency?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What is it?

HARBOURS

CONSTRUCTION OF CARGO VESSELS BY KAPOOR HOLDINGS LIMITED ON BURRARD INLET WATERLOTS WITHOUT PERMITS AND CONTRARY TO STOP-WORK ORDERS

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Transport and his parliamentary secretary, who may be away nationalizing the CPR, I should like to direct my question to the Acting Minister of Transport, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that bulk cargo facilities are being constructed on Burrard Inlet waterlots by Kapoor Holdings Limited without the permits required under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and in view of the fact the work is proceeding illegally over stop-work orders issued by Burnaby municipality, does the minister intend to contact National Harbours Board officials instructing them to investigate this disturbing local situation and to report to the minister whether Kapoor Holdings are in violation of any federal act or regulation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to investigate both of these matters. My recollection is that the Navigable Waters Protection Act is not administered by the National Harbours Board, but I can see the relationship between the two and I will have the matter investigated.

Mr. Nelson: In view of the fact this activity contradicts the municipality's plans to develop this area as a marine park facility, and in view of the fact there are awesome powers given the board under sections 9 to 12 of the National Harbours Board Act, including expropriation powers, does the minister intend to instruct the National Harbours Board to meet with the Burnaby municipal council with a view to acquiring the Kapoor site for the public recreational benefit of all lower mainland citizens?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the objectives of such a meeting I cannot comment, but I am quite sure that the National Harbours Board, if it has not already done so, would be glad to meet with any representative group such as the one the hon. member mentions. I will call it to their attention.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING REAPPOINTMENT OF WILLIAM RATHIE AS MEMBER

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the total dissatisfaction on the part of the Vancouver city council with recent decisions of Mr. William Rathie in regard to the port of Vancouver, and in view of controversy over the recent decision of Mr. Rathie to allow three companies operating in the port of Vancouver to opt out of paying their fair share of city taxes, has the government made a decision whether to accept the recommendation of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs not to reappoint Mr. Rathie or the recommendation of the Minister of the Environment—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): —that Mr. Rathie be—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I had the impression that the hon. member was rising on a supplementary question. The question has been asked and perhaps the minister might reply briefly, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Champlain. I apologize to that hon. member.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It's a mischievous question.

Mr. Speaker: I gather that the import of the question has been missed. Perhaps the Chair might be allowed to see the hon. member for Champlain and return to the hon. member immediately after.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBILITY OF LOWERING AGE OF ELIGIBILITY FOR OLD AGE PENSIONS TO 60 BEFORE ELECTION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell us whether his government is considering a reduction of the eligibility age for the old age security pension to 60 before the next election?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have three or four years to think about it. I will let the hon. member know my answer in due time.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister.

Can he tell whether this problem will be settled once and for all three or four years from now?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in view of the rapid pace the Liberal government has set for itself in the adoption of social measures to help Canadians in need, I think chances for this are good.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING REAPPOINTMENT OF WILLIAM RATHIE AS MEMBER

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister is a very simple one. I just want to find out, without going through the preamble again, whether the government has made a decision concerning the reappointment of Mr. Bill Rathie as one of the four members of the National Harbours Board in view of the controversy surrounding the gentleman?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware that his appointment is up for renewal, but I will certainly look into the matter. If the hon. member will indicate the date of that reappointment and if it is very urgent I will try to answer it tomorrow. If not, perhaps he could put the question on the order paper. I did not mean tomorrow, Mr. Speaker. I forgot that this was Friday because we have had such a peaceful and short week.

MANPOWER

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPLICATIONS APPROVED OR DISAPPROVED

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but in his absence I shall direct it to his parliamentary secretary. It has to do with the very disappointing press release issued on May 2 indicating that a total of 661 jobs have been created through 102 OFY projects. As it appears that approximately 24,000 jobs are to be created and as the announcements were supposed to have been made by April 26, I would ask the parliamentary secretary what is the reason for the holdup? What is the problem, and when can we expect an announcement indicating full approval or disapproval of the projects which have been submitted to the minister's department?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the latest figures are as follows: number of applications approved, 1,353; number of jobs approved, 8,559, and the number of man-weeks of work approved, 82,623. We hope to be able to announce all the remaining projects at the first of the week.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary for that answer, but I would remind him of the precarious position of this parliament—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Alexander: Well, that does not need any explanation. I think all hon. members know what I am talking about. I hope the parliamentary secretary can give us some assurance, as a matter of fact, complete assurance, that the announcement which will be made next week, I hope before Wednesday or Thursday, will deal with the matter in its entirety. Can he give us that assurance, because these young people are looking for this money?

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member realizes that these announcements do not depend on the continuation or non-continuation of parliament. I can give him the assurance that by the first of the week the vast bulk of the applications will be approved or rejected, that is the decisions will be made by that time.

FINANCE

POSITION OF MINISTER ON AMOUNT OF INCREASE IN MONEY SUPPLY—RESPONSIBILITY FOR ACTIONS OF BANK OF CANADA—POSSIBLE TIGHT MONEY SITUATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. On May 1, as recorded on page 1931 of Hansard, the minister said that "the objective of the Bank of Canada and the banking system is not overly to increase the money supply". Would the minister indicate to the House if the increase of 80.2 per cent in currency and total deposits from March, 1970, to March of this year reflects the objective he mentioned on May 1 ?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the governor of the Bank of Canada in his recent annual report dealt with that situation adequately and I would refer the hon. gentleman to it.

Mr. Stevens: In view of the minister's statement, does he categorically accept responsibility for the actions of the Bank of Canada, including interest rates?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has read the relevant statute. The government must be in general accord with the monetary policy as set by the bank. Individual, specific movements of interest rates or bank rates are, of course, his responsibility within that general tack. If the minister were to disagree with the monetary policy under the amendments that were prompted by an incident some years ago, he would have to address that difference of opinion by a memorandum in writing to the governor.

Mr. Stevens: With chartered bank liquidity in April at an all-time historical low for Canada, with the banks having borrowed up to this week over $2.5 billion, $450 million alone in the last week, in foreign currencies, an all-time high, and with federal bonds now yielding 9 per cent, would the minister indicate if he is in agreement with the Bank of Canada action resulting in higher interest rates and if in fact the expansion of our money system is topping out and we are in for tighter credit?

Mr. Sharp: Ask Jim Coyne.

Mr. Stanfield: One might as well for all the answers one gets.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my colleague was more direct in the allusion which I think has already reached the attention of the hon. member for York-Simcoe. The governor of the bank has made it clear that the money supply is being increased only at a rate sufficient to accommodate the necessary expansion in the economy and that, in so far as the liquidity of the chartered banks is concerned, the accommodation of loans should be directed first to capital investment and then to the range of small businesses and those areas of the country with a less rapid rate of growth.

Mr. Stevens: In short, tight money.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND DEVELOPMENT PLAN—SUGGESTED PUBLICATION OF SECTOR EVALUATIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and it relates to the Prince Edward Island development plan. Has the minister yet reached agreement with officials of the government of Prince Edward Island with respect to the publication of the extensive evaluations of the various sectors of the P.E.I. plan in light of the conclusion of the first phase of the plan in March of this year and the present negotiations, I assume, with respect to the second phase?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker, during the past month I have not had any discussions with Premier Campbell with regard to the release of the documents. I am not sure what will happen now that the election is over in that province. No doubt the negotiations will be resumed. But up to the present time I have not had any talks with him with regard to the ultimate disposal of these papers.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Would the minister indicate whether he or his officials have taken the position that it is important for the people of P.E.I. as well as the people of Canada, in view of the extensive commitment of both financial and human resources to this plan, that there be full publication of these objective evaluations before the negotiations are substantially under way and certainly before they are concluded on the second phase of the plan?

Mr. Jamieson: In principle, in so far as the federal government is concerned of course we want to have as much public disclosure as is possible. But in matters of this kind, if my memory serves me right, there is an understanding that any publication would have to be approved jointly, and I will be glad to discuss that. I would not be surprised if there were a willingness to do so. Since some people chose to put out all the negative ones, maybe it would be a good idea to make the full story public.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND DEVELOPMENT PLAN—POSSIBLE RENEGOTIATION OF FINANCIAL ASPECTS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. As it seems to be indicated that the tax base in Prince Edward Island has not expanded at a rate adequate to finance the province's share of the cost of the remaining years of the plan, is it the intention of the government to agree to renegotiate the financial aspects of the plan with the government of the province?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, apart altogether from the premise of the question respecting the tax base, with which I am not personally familiar, renegotiation and the beginning, if one wants to describe it that way, of phase two are already under way as was required when the plan was initiated some years ago. Since that renegotiation is now taking place, the vast majority of the issues involved are all subject to renegotiation.

ENERGY

SEEKING OF FURTHER FUNDS BY PANARCTIC OILS FOR GAS EXPLORATION—POSSIBLE INVOLVEMENT OF MORE COMPANIES AND COMMITMENT OF FUTURE SUPPLIES TO UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development arising out of a report from Calgary to the effect that Panarctic Oils Limited over the next few weeks will be offering "outsiders a piece of the action" in order to secure funds for further gas exploration. In view of the fact the government has a 45 per cent equity in Panarctic Oils I want to ask the minister if this solicitation of capital funds involves more companies coming into the picture, thereby reducing the government's equity in the company, or whether the company intends to secure loans on the basis of committing future supplies of natural gas to American gas companies?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the proposition of Panarctic Oils Limited does not in any way lessen the Canadian government's participation. The percentage of actions in the company will remain unchanged, at 45 per cent. The proposition made by the president of Panarctic Oils Limited is to invite other companies to participate in exploration projects in the Arctic to hasten the pace of drilling and discoveries. All this is done on a basis of sharing in the formation which is explored rather than in the company's assets.

[English]

POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SUPPLYING ADDITIONAL CAPITAL TO PANARCTIC OILS FOR GAS EXPLORATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I take it the minister is suggesting common procedure. In view of the fact that in 1971 Panarctic committed itself to hypothecate very large quantities of natural gas to American gas companies in return for a $75 million loan, which has been criticized very severely by Canadian gas companies, does the Canadian government intend to supply additional capital, either through the government directly or through the Canada Development Corporation, in order not to commit any future Canadian supplies of gas to the American gas companies?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct the impression that the hon. member is creating. In the 1971 deal there was no commitment of gas to the American companies. Those companies were given first refusal rights if Canada decides to export. If Canada decides not to export we have only to pay them back their money. We have not put a mortgage on anything. We have given them the right to acquire gas in the United States if the Canadian government decides to export. Canadian interests are completely protected in that deal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I think that in terms of the financing of Panarctic—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I rise simply to express the wish that the minister will reply briefly and quickly to the hon. member's supplementary, because we should try to get on and move a little more speedily without these lengthy supplementaries and replies.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: As to the financing, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government intends to make in Panarctic Oils Limited investments proportional to those of private participants.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN QUEBEC AND SAUDI ARABIA FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF OIL REFINERY IN PROVINCE

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Can the minister tell the House whether Canadian diplomats who have been approached by Arab officials have advised him of Quebec's negotiations in Saudi Arabia concerning the establishment of Arab oil refining and processing facilities in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have been familiar with this proposal. I do not think it was necessary for any one of the Arab countries to notify us about it. It has been common knowledge.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who seems to be more knowledgeable of this subject.

Has the minister been officially advised by his officials of SOQUIP's Arab projects and does he intend to consult in some way with his Quebec counterpart and to assure the Quebec authorities of federal government assistance in this matter?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have heard that some discusions are taking place between SOQUIP and Saudi Arabia's Petromin. We have not been informed of the details of such a project, but we have been in contact with Quebec officials on this subject. During my visit to Saudi Arabia, I had the opportunity to speak with the president of Petromin and with my counterpart, and they both indicated that such projects concerning the refining of crude oil in foreign countries had very low priorities for them.

INCREASE IN FERTILIZER PRICES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. On March 15 the minister, speaking at Wyoming, Ontario, said that ammonium sulphate was available at $32 per ton, which resulted in a price of fertilizer to the farmers of $52 per ton. Since then the price has gone up, according to his own statement, to between $85 and $92 per ton. As a result of his back to the wall, ear to the ground, shoulder to the wheel, nose to the ground, eye on the ball, finger on the switch, and foot in the mouth—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Korchinski: —can the minister indicate what are the results of the investigation that he has conducted pertaining to fertilizer prices?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say to the hon. member that if the bill that is before the House at the present time is passed, and if our investigations show that there has been exorbitant profiteering, something that has not been shown yet, I will be able to do something about it. At the present time there is not much we can do with legislation we have to make them roll back their prices and stop them from taking excessive profits. I point out that this minister has always said that any producer in this nation is entitled to a reasonable profit, and I still say that no matter what the hon. member's party contends.

Mr. Korchinski: Does the minister intend to drop the whole matter now and allow the prices to go up?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the bill is still before the House and the hon. member, I hope, knows that.

AIR TRANSPORT

STEPS TO ENSURE SAFETY IN EVENT OF SUDDEN INTERRUPTION OF SERVICE BY AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Transport. Can he assure the House and the country that the ministry has taken the necessary steps to make advance preparations for a possible walk-out by air traffic controllers, since it is obvious that if there is a sudden interruption in the services of these men aircraft in Canadian air space at that time will be in jeopardy if the ministry has not made proper arrangements?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as of this morning I have not had an opportunity to be fully briefed on the contingency plans. However, I do know there is a standing arrangement in relation to these matters which is always operative, and I think it is safe to assure the House that any operations affected by the air traffic controllers in Montreal would be entirely safe.

STEPS TO RESOLVE DISPUTE WITH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that answer. I understand some of the controllers may be out at the present time. I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board to indicate briefly what steps he has taken, formally or informally, officially or unofficially, to resolve this dispute, keeping in mind that the margin of dispute between the two parties appears to be around 2 per cent?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think most hon. members will be aware that an eminently fair and just offer was accepted by the air traffic controllers' executive. They have proposed its acceptance to their membership. The current events in Montreal are a withdrawal of services for the purpose of considering this offer, and the normal procedures of union consultation and intercommunication are taking place. I may say, in line with the motion that was introduced at the beginning of today's proceedings, that the government has indicated in respect of the mail strike that acts which are illegal and endanger the safety and health of the public henceforth will not be tolerated.

● (1140)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Minister of Labour rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could quickly clear up an unintentional error on my part when a question was put along these lines by the hon. member for Central Nova the day before yesterday. I indicated in answer to the question about pilots that it did not fall within my jurisdiction. Of course, that is not correct. I thought he was referring to air traffic controllers but he was not.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta has a supplementary and will be recognized for that purpose and then the hon. member for Lafontaine.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, it was really a point of order but I will put a question to the President of the Treasury Board. He said that the members had withdrawn their services to study the offer made. Is it not a fact that 86 per cent of the air traffic controllers in Montreal voted against acceptance of the offer and the reason he gave is not the reason they are having a study session?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I do not know precisely what went on within the union discussions. No such result has been officially communicated to the government.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO LOWER MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs I will put my question to the Prime Minister. Considering that NHA lending rates went up to 11 per cent last month, an increase of one per cent over the previous month, and considering that the amendments to the National Housing Act in the bill introduced by the minister today for first reading contain no reference to interest rates in any form, is it the government's intention some time in the future to introduce a bill that will have the effect of bringing down interest rates so that the average Canadian can once again buy a home?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the time of the House is pretty well occupied in the next several days, but if the hon. member wants me to consider introducing such a bill a few weeks from now I will undertake to look into the matter.

Mr. Broadbent: Since most Canadians still have the naive assumption that some day soon they will be able to find a house under the present government, would the Prime Minister disabuse them of all such illusions by announcing that the official policy of the government is to have interest rates at 25 per cent so that Canadians can forget about homes?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether that question is in order. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

TRADE

NEGOTIATIONS WITH ISRAEL CONCERNING PURCHASE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR FROM CANADA--PRESENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and concerns the negotiations with the Israeli government about the purchase of a nuclear reactor by that country. What is the present position of the discussions?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the latest information but I would be pleased to make inquiries and provide information to the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister's recent safari to the Arab countries to promote the sale of STOL aircraft, nuclear reactors and the like apparently was not as successful as the minister had hoped for. Under the circumstances, is the government giving consideration to providing for the sale on credit of a nuclear reactor to the Israeli government rather than asking for cash, which of course is impossible for that country to consider in its present circumstances? Is the government willing to give favourable consideration to this type of assistance by way of a loan, particularly at a time when all over the world we are pouring out money to countries that would not show the appreciation that Israel would if this were granted?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the right hon. gentleman would want me to correct an inadvertence on his part. I should like to reassure him that the trade mission to the Arab countries was indeed a great success. Further, I should like to say that very substantial interest was shown in the CANDU system. There will be negotiations with them also on the sale of Canadian reactors. On the second point the hon. gentleman raised, I can tell him that I believe officials will be coming from Israel to Canada in the very near future to discuss the possible acquisition by that country of a Canadian reactor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister regard it as a success that he was not able to induce any of the Arab countries to purchase a nuclear reactor or the STOL plane that he placed before them? Does he call that success?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would commend to the right hon. gentleman's attention the communiqué that was signed with the Iranian government—

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the minister resume his seat. This is obviously debate between the right hon. gentleman and the minister. We are running short of time. The hon. member for Compton.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member will be in his seat Monday night. I will then try to give a more specific and general answer to his question.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member to allow him a supplementary question. I hope that in the next few minutes, because we only have a few left before the end of the question period, we will all try to limit the supplementary questions.

The hon. member for Compton.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, would the minister tell us how he intends to intervene and counteract the decline in the standard of living of Canadians and the high rate of unemployment which result, in spite of the economic growth of the last few years, in the fact that the average worker and a large number of companies did not reap their share of the profits?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST THAT BILL AMENDING EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT BE GIVEN PRIORITY

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the President of the Privy Council I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the fact that Bill C-4, which encompasses amendments to the Export and Import Permits Act, is an urgent priority for the House as well as for the Minister of Agriculture, and as it was passed by the committee last night, will the Prime Minister permit this bill to be the first item of business on Monday?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we on this side and I think many members of the House would be glad to agree to pass this bill forthwith without debate. If that agreement can be achieved, I would be delighted to do so. If there is agreement generally to deal with the report stage and third reading forthwith without debate after calling orders of the day, that might be made an order of the House.

Mr. Frank: In the event that may not happen, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact the Prime Minister has been saying emphatically that he will not call an election, and consequently we could be here for some time, when does he foresee Bill C-4 receiving third reading?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think the acting House leader has made it very clear that the government is prepared to see it go through right now this very minute.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rises on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I say that there have been discussions and so far as this party is concerned we are prepared to give this bill the report stage treatment and third reading as the first item of business today without any further debate.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, we will need more consideration of what the total package is going to be in these few days. We are not putting one bill here and one bill there. We want the business conducted in a sensible, businesslike way in the days that are left.

● (1150)

In view of the impending increase in fishing activity, will the minister indicate to the House if there will be an increase in the capability of air surveillance over the east coast in order to give our fishermen protection against foreign draggers, which they have not had in past years?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member knows that the Department of National Defence responds to the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Transport. We have recently increased air surveillance over the fishing fleets.

Mr. Marshall: Will the minister indicate whether he has received representations from the province of Newfoundland requesting that deployment be effected of the air rescue element of the services to the province of Newfoundland in order to be able to react more quickly?

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I was going to direct this question to either the Minister of National Health and Welfare or his parliamentary secretary but as they are not in the House I will direct it to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware that the Deputy Minister of the Department of National Health and Welfare forbade scientists in the health protection branch from attending a professional forum on science policy now being held in Ottawa on the ground "that this whole area of science policy is one which is in such a ferment at the present time and so deeply tied in with basic government policy that it would be inappropriate for our scientists to be in attendance"?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard of this. I would certainly want to make sure that the form in which the question is put is accurate. Perhaps the hon. member could let me see the exact quote. I must say I have very great confidence in the ability, integrity and dedication to Canada of the present deputy minister of health.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I am only too happy to let the Prime Minister see the document. As a supplementary I want to ask the Minister of Science and Technology whether it is a fact that at this forum one of the prime topics under discussion will be the total absence of a national science policy on the part of the government?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of State for Science and Technology): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that is one of the main questions being discussed. I am aware that they are discussing science policy.

PENITENTIARIES

NUMBER OF INMATES RELEASED ON PAROLE UNLAWFULLY AT LARGE—POSSIBLE DANGER FROM THOSE CONVICTED OF NON-CAPITAL MURDER

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General whom I thank for information I have received. My question arises from the small fact that as of February 28, 1974, a total of 79 inmates who had been released on temporary absences were unlawfully at large and three of those 79 had been found guilty of non-capital murder. Have any corrective measures been taken to avoid this large number of people unlawfully at large? Second, are the three who were found guilty of non-capital murder in fact dangerous criminals?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a letter I sent him in answer to a question he asked me earlier. I do not have the letter before me or the details. I know we are continually taking steps to tighten up and improve our temporary absence program. On the whole, the percentage of those at large is small. However, there have been, and in fact still are, some people at large. I can get more details for the hon. member.

Mr. Woolliams: When providing the information would the minister be prepared to name the three found guilty of non-capital murder? As the Solicitor General knows, there are two kinds that are convicted of murder. Will the minister set out very clearly for the protection and security of society that these three are not in fact the kind that would be very dangerous to the community if they were unlawfully at large, as the minister has admitted?

Mr. Allmand: I will check into that, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ASSIST BRITISH COLUMBIA IN HEARINGS BEFORE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION INVOLVING PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT VALLEY

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the letter the Minister of Lands, Forests and Water Resources of British Columbia has forwarded to the chairman of the International Joint Commission requesting that the commission revoke its 1942 order with respect to the raising of the Ross Dam and that the commission direct the city of Seattle to take no steps pursuant to the order until the commission has heard and determined the province's application, will the minister advise whether he has received a copy of the letter and will the federal government support and assist the province of British Columbia at the proposed IJC hearings as requested in an attempt to stop the proposed flooding of thousands of acres of Canadian territory in the Skagit River area?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have received a copy of the letter that was addressed to the Canadian chairman of the IJC. It is my understanding that the commission is going to give consideration to the application. We have not yet, of course, received the supporting material upon which British Columbia is asking for a re-opening.

Mr. Harding: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I again seek the co-operation of hon. members in limiting supplementaries. We have now reached the end of the question period. The hon. member will be recognized and then the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley.

Mr. Harding: In view of Premier Barrett's request that the province of British Columbia's complete concurrence with the federal government's March 15 statement to the U.S. Federal Power Commission on the Skagit be transmitted by the minister to the U.S. State Department with a request that this concurrence be placed before the U.S. Federal Power Commission's hearings regarding the Skagit, will the minister advise if this communication to the U.S. State Department has gone forward from his department?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We were very happy to have the full support of the British Columbia government at last.

LABOUR RELATIONS

GOVERNMENT ACTION FOLLOWING ILLEGAL STRIKES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. Can the minister advise the House why no action has been taken against those individuals or groups of individuals who have taken part in recent postal and other illegal strikes, upsetting major sections of our economy and thus encouraging similar action by other groups? At the same time, will the minister advise why the government cannot make up its mind, since they went against my motion to take action against illegal strikes and the President of the Treasury Board said some action would be taken? Can they make up their minds and tell us what the situation is?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, under the law I have no responsibility to take action in these matters. I would have to ask the hon. member to provide me with details of the strikes to which he is referring.

Mr. Jelinek: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be recognized for a supplementary. I again remind hon. members that when so many supplementaries are asked to every question it is sometimes unfair to other members who have not had a chance to ask their questions.

● (1200)

Mr. Jelinek: Excuse me for seeking to ask a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, but the reason we have to ask supplementaries is that we never get answers from the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: My supplementary is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Maybe he can clarify the matter and tell the House why no action is being taken against illegal strikers while others who do illegal things are charged with offences?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I do not think it is correct to say that no action is taken. Take the Post Office strike, for example. A number of acts were committed during the course of that strike which were contrary to the law or regulations. The union did endeavour to secure an assurance that the government would withdraw all disciplinary actions which had been taken. The government declined to do so. It merely undertook not to take further punitive or retaliatory actions. But all the actions which were taken are continuing to their conclusion, and in relation to other unjustified or unjustifiable work stoppages the actions we institute will be pushed through to their conclusion and not abandoned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South Shore.

Mr. Jelinek: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member now rises on a point of order. I have to recognize him, and I will then call on the hon. member for South Shore. However, I will then have to call orders of the day. I apologize to hon. members who will not be called because of this situation.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I rise on a point of order, but the President of the Treasury Board said earlier that some action would be taken against illegal strikers and he did not answer my question by telling us what this action would be, and earlier in the question period he said—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is the third time the hon. member has asked the question. Possibly he is not satisfied with the answer, but I think I have to recognize the hon. member for South Shore.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ADHERENCE OF RUSSIA AND JAPAN TO INTERNATIONAL WHALING COMMISSION QUOTAS—REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When the government closed down the Canadian whaling industry it was stated that this action was necessary to restrict the slaughter of this endangered species. Would the minister indicate whether the 14-nation International Whaling Commission's ruling that quotas must be cut by 25 per cent has been adhered to by Russia and Japan, or whether these two nations are still indiscriminately overfishing endangered species such as Atlantic sperm whales and mink whales? If so, would the minister tell the House what objections have been raised concerning this practice with the countries I have mentioned?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of that question and give the hon. member a reply, I hope on Monday.

PHOSPHATE FERTILIZERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSURE SUPPLY

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Agriculture will return to his seat, I have a question of vital concern to all Canadians to put to him. For two days I have been trying to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, in order to ask a question which at this time of the year is a most important one. On earlier occasions, the Minister of Agriculture assured the House there would be ample fertilizer available to farmers to serve Canadian needs this spring. Yesterday I was informed that quotas of phosphate fertilizers allotted to some dealers are being cut by as much as 40 per cent compared with last year. I also understand—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should come to the point.

Mr. Scott: What action has the minister taken to assure that Canadian corn producers in particular will have an abundant supply of phosphate fertilizers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I am sure the hon. member knows that everybody is doing everything they can. There are some dealers—not the companies but some dealers—and some farmers too who are actually exporting fertilizer to the United States where they can get a 50 per cent price increase. There are no export controls at the present time. The United Co-operatives are unloading a boatload of rock phosphate in Toronto; another is on the way and possibly a third. This, we hope, will offset any shortage affecting the supply situation in Ontario. Supplies are, I am told, up by about 38 per cent in Ontario at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott: Is the minister aware that rock phosphate is coming into Canada and being processed here, causing a high degree of pollution, and is then exported to the United States by some manufacturers?

Mr. Whelan: There are some manufacturers in Canada who could not even operate if they could not count on the export portion of their production. Their plants were built with that in mind. However, total exports have been cut back across the nation by approximately 30 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) made some remarks casting aspersions upon the Conservative Party and its attitude toward legislation. He has no right whatsoever to do this. He has no right to cast aspersions upon any political party in connection with their desire to pass legislation or not. If the government wishes to deal this afternoon with Bill C-4, as far as I am concerned I can see it passing very easily today. It is the government's prerogative to determine what legislation the House shall debate.

An hon. Member: What about the Conservative Party, though?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA PENSION PLAN

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING RELIGIONS SECTS, EARNINGS FORMULA, BASIC EXEMPTIONS, ETC.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-19, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before proceeding to the consideration of the four motions to amend Bill C-19, the Chair would like to express some concern as to the regularity of motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher). As the hon. member knows, a similar motion was submitted on October 24, 1973, and was ruled to be irregular. I thought I should mention this immediately so that the hon. member, whenever we reach motion No. 2, might be prepared, if he so wishes, to attempt to convince the Chair that on this occasion it should be accepted.

There may be some reservations on the part of the Chair in relation to motions three and four—I do not think they are so serious that we ought to embark on a procedural argument at this point; in due course they might be put, unless objection is taken to doing so. For the moment, the Chair will put motion No. 1.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot) moved:

Motion No 1.

That Bill C-19 be amended by deleting clause seven and renumbering the subsequent clauses accordingly.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising once again to debate this subject, which, as you know, was raised back in October of last year, let me begin by saying this: it is my view that any time a piece of legislation fails to pass in a given session, then no matter what its political complexion might be, the government should at least consider seriously the criticisms which have been directed toward that legislation, and some attempt should be made to reach a compromise.

Needless to say, I am very disappointed that no effort has been made to reach a compromise in this situation, though I believe one could have been achieved. Someone once said that politics was the art of compromise. This may or may not be true, but if legislation is to get through in a minority House a certain amount of compromise is sometimes necessary. No effort whatsoever has been made in connection with the subject before us.

I was unable to attend the proceedings during committee stage because that committee sat at the same time as the transportation committee of which I am the chairman. But I did read the committee reports dealing with clause 7, the subject of the motion now before the House. Here again I was utterly amazed to find there were no questions asked. No member from either side of the House attempted to make a compromise with the opposition on this particular clause of the bill. Clauses 8 to 12 were passed with the chairman of the committee asking "Shall sections 8 to 12 pass?" As I say, those clauses were passed with not a question asked.

I came to parliament some 16 years ago as a naïve westerner, a country boy or whatever other term might be applied. But I came here with a deep trust and belief in democracy.

Mr. Rose: You are just like every other country boy, Jack.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I believed that if a person had a point of view, in a democracy that point of view should be heard. If there is a point of view across the country, then in a democracy that point of view should be heard. Needless to say, I was deeply disappointed with the members of the Conservative party who were in the committee and who failed to mention clauses 8 to 12 when they knew in their hearts they had made no effort to compromise on this particular part of the legislation.

They knew of their failing at the first attempt to pass this bill. On that occasion I said that the two religious sects to which clause 7 gives exemption from the Canada Pension Plan should appear before the committee and state why they felt they should get out. On the first hearing of this bill in the last session, the committee thought they were very clever. I left the committee on the wishes of the Conservative party whip to come to this House to make a speech on the CNR financing bill, and as soon as I left the committee said no, they did not want the Hutterian sect from Alberta to appear before the committee, that they would pass the bill. They did not say that verbally but that was the upshot of it. They said "That maverick Horner from Crowfoot," as the press calls me, "has gone, so we can now pass the bill".

On second reading of the bill in this House I said that I would attempt to block the bill again. I had nothing below the table. I had hoped at that time that the leaders of the Conservative party, the House leader, or somebody, would attempt to reach a compromise. I had hoped that the member in charge of health and welfare in the shadow cabinet would attempt to reach a compromise. I also said at that time that I hoped they would not make the mistake that they made in the last session and would have these two religious groups appear before the committee to state why they wanted out of the plan. As I said earlier, I did not have the chance to attend the committee because I had certain obligations as chairman of the transport committee.

I must say I am sorely disappointed in the so-called art of politics, the art of compromise, that exists among the parties on this particular measure. I have no hesitation in saying that, having read the press clippings of the debate in the last session when I spoke on this issue. I have before me a press clipping from the Globe and Mail for September 15, 1973 which states this:

> Hutterites are the "very finest of Canadians," Heath Macquarrie (PC, Hillsborough) said yesterday in a Commons speech apparently intended as a rebuff for fellow Conservative Jack Horner (Crowfoot)—
> —the Hutterite tradition of providing for their older members is a practice that has disappeared throughout society in general.

I thought that an interesting remark for the hon. member to make. The hon. member spoke in the House on the guaranteed annual income measure. Few of us today, outside of the Hutterian sect, care for our elderly citizens and leave that for the government. It is not the fault of the people that some of them have failed to take care of their elderly; it is the fault of the politicians who say: "We can do better, leave it to us. We can tax you and make certain your elderly will be taken care of". That is really what the Canada Pension Plan is saying. It is not saying: "You have a choice to be taxed or not to be taxed". It is saying: "You will be taxed". It is saying: "We the government, we the politicians, know you will not look after your elderly; we are going to make certain that they are looked after because we will tax you as you go along through this life of ours". The government has made that choice.

The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) might like to come out to southern Alberta if he thinks it is only the maverick member for Crowfoot who is speaking this afternoon. If he thinks that I am not representing the voice of a group of concerned people across the prairies, then I welcome him to come out to Crowfoot if an election is called next week. I will not sit on the same platform with him, but I welcome him to come to Crowfoot and to speak out for the Hutterites. I would even rent the hall for him. I will not heckle him but I will be there as an interested representative of the people so I can see their reaction to his remarks. So I issue that invitation to him. I know he is in the shadow cabinet of the great Conservative party and that the party will pay his expenses, so no expense will be incurred by him.

What are these people, Mr. Speaker, who are they, and how large a group are they? The government by this bill has declared their religion to be better than all others. First of all, who and what are they? I am dealing explicitly with the Hutterian group, because the Amish are a completely different group. While both might have come from the early Mennonite religion, the Amish are completely different because they ask nothing from our society. They take no advantages from our society. The Hutterites take every advantage that is available in our modern, technological age. If an acreage payment is due from the government, if there is a guaranteed wheat payment due from the minister representing the Canadian Wheat Board in this House, then they accept it. If there is a subsidy paid on butter, cream or something else by the government, then they accept it.

They are a religious order; there is no question of that. I have studied their religion and I find it quite interesting. They carry on a heavy farming industry. I just want to quote from the judgment of the Federal Court in which their case is presented. I am quoting from the Hutterians, own presentation to the court:

> The Hutterites are organized in colonies of approximately 100 persons each. When the members of a colony decide that it has become too large for effective operation a small number of them will break off from the "mother" colony and with the financial and other material assistance thereof form a "daughter" colony. In the various documents which were tendered in evidence on the trial of the actions the colonies are described as congregations or communities and these congregations or communities are associated in groups known respectively as Darius-Leut, Lehrer-Leut and Schmeid-Leut. Generally speaking, residents in the colony are members of the Hutterian Brethren Church which was incorporated in Canada—

The judgment then goes on:

> The objects of the Corporation shall be to engage in and carry on the Christian religion, Christian worship and religious education and teaching and to worship God according to the religious belief of the members of the Corporation . . .
>
> Each congregation or community of the Church is empowered, inter alia, as follows:

● (1220)

> To engage in, and carry on farming, stock raising, milling, and all branches of these industries; and to manufacture and deal with the products and by-products of these industries;
> To carry on any other business (whether manufacturing or otherwise) which may seem to said congregation or community of the said Church capable of being conveniently carried on in connection with its business or calculated directly or indirectly to enhance the property or rights of the congregation or community;

That makes it pretty clear. They, themselves, admit they are prepared to carry on the business of farming, of stock raising and manufacturing. We recognize that many other people in our society are prepared to carry on the business of stock raising, farming and manufacturing, in many cases in opposition or in competition with them. I have maintained right along that Canada Pension Plan contributions are a form of tax placed upon all those doing business. During the last speech I made on this subject matter in this House I quoted from two dictionaries as to what the word "tax" meant, and I think I substantiated my case. Let me go a little further in my explanation of what I believe a tax is.

I believe that in essence this is a tax, and that a tax is something levied against people whether or not they themselves make a contribution. If I were an employer and hired men to work on my farm or in my manufacturing plant, I must make a deduction from the wages or salaries of those people for the Canada Pension Plan. I must do that whether I want to or not. The government of Canada has said I must make that deduction from those people I have working for me on my farm ranch. I must tax them under the Canada Pension Plan and send that to the government. Because I have them working for me I must take 1.8 per cent out of their salaries or wages and send that in, and another 1.8 per cent out of my profits and send that also to the government because this government believes it is its duty to take care of these people when they get old. To my way of thinking that is a tax. They are asking everyone to take a portion of their salaries or wages, and that is a tax. The Hutterians do not disagree about this question of paying taxes. The reason they want to get out of the Canada Pension Plan is based on something else, and I will get to that a little bit later.

In my last speech I quoted from a well-known author of Hutterian teachings and religious beliefs. He stated that they do not in any way disagree with having to pay taxes the governments levy upon them. This former writer of Hutterian teachings, Mr. Rideman, stated that quite clearly. He said this:

> Since governmental authority is ordained by God and hath its office from Him, the payment of taxes for this purpose is likewise ordained and commanded, as Paul saith, "Thus ye must also pay tribute." For this reason we, likewise, willingly pay taxes, tribute or whatever men may term it, and in no way oppose it, for we have learned this from our Master, Christ, who not only paid it Himself, but also commanded others to do so, saying, "Render unto Caesar what is Caesar's, and to God what is God's."

One could go on reading from their teachings, but I want to make it abundantly clear that they, themselves, do not take any objection to the paying of taxes. They want out of the Canada Pension Plan for another reason, and not necessarily because of their own religious desires. They want out because under the Canada Pension Plan everyone must have a social security number so that contributions under the Canada Pension Plan can be properly recorded under that number. The Hutterian people do not want social security numbers.

How many thousands of other Canadians across Canada do not want a social security number? I would suggest there are thousands and thousands of Canadians across Canada who were repelled, and to this day do not like the idea of carrying around with them a number which is recorded in the computers of this and other governments. Many Canadians outside of the Hutterian religion have as yet not taken out a social security number. The government knows this. It writes them threatening letters telling them to take out social security numbers or action will be taken against them. Such a letter has been written to my sister because she never took out a social security number. She never bowed to the big hand of the government, and to this day I do not think she has a social security number. She still makes contributions to the Canada Pension Plan as she has an income and she must under this law, but what happens to that money? I suggest it goes into the coffers of the government, into the Canada Pension Plan fund, but it will never be paid back to her and she knows that just as thousands of Canadians who have not taken out social security numbers know they will never receive benefits under this plan. Lots of lawyers across Canada have not got social security numbers and they know they will not receive the benefits of the Canada Pension Plan. These people feel this is their prerogative, that they have freedom of choice and they are prepared to pay something for that freedom. However, they are still being taxed.

The minister says that this involves only two small groups, so let us give them this privilege as it really will not matter very much. I do not intend to deal with how large the Amish group is but, as I have said before, they are quite different. They make no demands on our society. They do not make any contribution toward the development of new technology, but they do not take advantage of it either. The Hutterian people are completely different. They take advantage of every modern convenience available.

Let us consider how large a group this is. Let me start with Manitoba. There are approximately 5,000 Hutterian people in that province. They own or lease 178,000 acres, or did in 1972, and perhaps the figure is greater now. They practically own 170,000 acres and lease an additional 8,000 acres. They have 48 colonies in the province of Manitoba, or did in 1972, and that works out to an average of 3700 acres per colony. I would like to set my family up on 3700 acres of that rich heavily productive land in Manitoba. I would like to use the facilities of the hospitals and roads in Manitoba without having to pay taxes toward this Canada Pension Plan as do all the people in every province of Canada, except the province of Quebec which has a different system. The province of Quebec uses this pension fund very wisely and receives a 10 per cent return. I do not know whether that is an excess profit, but I will leave that to the government to determine.

In any case if my conscience would allow me I would like to farm on 3700 acres of that rich land in Manitoba. I could then provide well for my children, and I am sure they would provide for me when I get older, particularly if I did not have to pay taxes and could use the roads, the hospitals and other facilities provided by the Manitoba government. My conscience would not let me do that. My religious beliefs may not be as good as those of many other people in this House, or any better than those of the Hutterian people, but my conscience would not allow me to do that.

In the province of Saskatchewan there are 30 colonies, or were in 1972, with a total population of 2,500 people. They have 294,500 acres which works out to an average of 10,000 acres per colony, or just a shade under that. That is a very good sized operation, and what I said about the Hutterian situation in Manitoba applies equally in Saskatchewan. These people, too, use the hospitals and the roads that the province of Saskatchewan builds from moneys borrowed from the federal government.

They fought to avoid paying income tax until last year when the income tax department ruled against them. They are ordained by this government as having some religion that is superior to that of anybody else. It may well be that it is superior to mine, but my conscience would not permit me to ask what they are requesting and what the government would give them under this piece of legislation. The government is capitulating in respect of their wishes. It may be that many people think their religion is better than mine, but as I have said my conscience would not permit to do what they are doing.

Let us look at the situation in the province of Alberta. One might study the history in respect of these people in the province of Alberta going back to 1923, 51 years ago. Anybody who has studied the history of the province of Alberta knows that this question has been a political thorn for every political party that has tried to function in that province. This government, which probably has studied this question a little, should have known about that history. It should have known this when it attempted to pass this bill the first time and failed. It should have known that it would have some difficulty if it attempted to do so a second time. There has been a failure even to attempt to reach a compromise on this situation. That has destroyed a little of my faith in the principles of democracy because certainly politics, as often has been said, in essence is the art of compromise.

In the province of Alberta, there were 82 colonies with a population of a little over 7,000 people in 1972. These figures may not be considered to be large in a province the size of Alberta. However, they control and own practically one million acres of land in that province. This is not a million acres of bushland or rock land. It is probably the best land available. It is the irrigated land in the south and the heavily productive land in the parkland regions of Alberta. This history of these people has not been one of pioneering the bushland or of going into the Peace River country. Because of the limitations in respect of land, over the years they have been forced to push their way into the Peace River country, but that has not been their custom. The Hutterite people know I speak the truth in this regard. The average colony occupies an area of approximately 20,000 acres or better. That is a nice size.

I might refer to the Alberta study in respect of the Community Properties Act of 1972. There is no suggestion that this is an anti-Hutterite report. Many people in Alberta might say it is the opposite. That report states quite clearly that the Hutterite population doubles every 17 years. We have heard much about a corporate rip-off and many people will wonder if the member for Crowfoot is trying to build a mountain out of a molehill or might suggest there are not that many of these people and, therefore, they do not effect society very much. This report states that the total produce sold by the Hutterite colonies in the province of Alberta in 1972 amounted in value to $23 million. The report also indicates that the total expenses of the Hutterite colonies in the province of Alberta were $17 million.

I know there was once a great politician, and in the eyes of many people perhaps a great Canadian, who stated, "What is a million". Well, here we are talking about a concern in one province, not in the three provinces I have mentioned, which sold produce with a value of $23 million. The report came out in 1972, but I think the figures cited are 1971 figures. I do not have to explain to anyone the comparison between the value of a dollar today and the value of a dollar in 1971. If they sold $23 million worth of produce in 1971 I do not think I would be out of the ball park if I said in terms of today's values that they sold about $35 million worth of produce. It might also be considered that their expenses have risen as sharply or more sharply, but I point out these figures so that the House may be fully aware of what we are talking about. There is no question in my mind that we are dealing with a large enterprise. I dealt with the subject matter of whether it is a tax that is involved. I also dealt with the question of whether or not these people are willing to pay a tax. Then, I dealt with the amount of money and land involved.

Now I should like to refer again to the 1972 report. The $23 million worth of produce to which I referred in the year 1971 was equal to 3 per cent of the agricultural products produced and sold in that year in the whole province of Alberta. Well, we all know what 3 per cent is. If you take three times 30 the figure is close to 100 per cent. In the agricultural area of Alberta 7,000 people produce 3 per cent of the total agricultural produce sold in that province. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that I as a man who has throughout all his life been deeply interested in the agriculture industry should not be worried about competition in respect of agriculture? I am not afraid of competition, but I think it is the duty of the government to lay down rules so that competition is fair. If this is a tax upon me and my operation, then it should be a tax upon their operation. I do not deny these people the right of freedom of religion. The judge who presided over the court proceedings in September last year ruled that in no way would the income tax interfere with their right to carry on their religion.

If a judge of a federal court can decide in this regard that this does not in any way effect their freedom of religion, then that division has been made. One may ask why we should be concerned about this small amount of tax in respect of the Canada Pension Plan. It may be said that surely in a free enterprise society we can give our competitors a little bit of a leg-up and still survive. Undoubtedly all that is true.

However, it is the government's duty to lay down the law fairly. Many of my socialist friends in the House have suggested that we should all be given everything equally. I know we are not all born equal but in my opinion we should all be treated equally before the law in a democracy. The exemption granted to these people demonstrates clearly that we are not all treated equally before the law. In my opinion this is a mistake in a democracy. People should be treated equally no matter what their religion may be. The government is well aware of this. They took the Hutterites to court on a matter of income tax and the judge ruled in the government's favour.

I know that there is difficulty in taxing the Hutterites both under the Income Tax Act and the pension plan, because they do not allow their people to have any income. I do not deny that there is such a difficulty and, as I said in my earlier speeches on the subject, that is why the minister does not know how to go about taxing them. Well, it is pretty clear that the Department of National Revenue has not had that difficulty. At page 10 of the decision of the Federal Court of Canada of September, 1973 we find the following statement:

> The Hutterites carry on efficient and successful farm operations. Financial statements filed, assuming they are typical of all or most of the colonies' operations, indicate that they have substantial net profits each year the taxability of which has led to these proceedings.

Apparently until 1960 the colony paid no income tax of any kind. I might point out that the Hutterites lost the case, and they will now be subject to income tax going as far back as 1961. I am thankful that the government proceeded on an issue which I started in the House in 1961. I saw the culmination of it 14 years later when the agricultural industry started being treated with greater fairness. The judgment goes on to read:

> However, some time after 1960 assessments were levied at least against the corporate entities from which appeals were taken. Ultimately an agreement of understanding was entered into in 1968 between the Minister of National Revenue and certain of the appellants for and on behalf of the Hutterian Brethren colonies in Canada.

If this session lasts longer than we expect, I will put a question on the order paper requesting a copy of that agreement. I might find it interesting reading and I might find that they are all treated fairly. But to give you an idea of the size of their profits, in this particular case the judge stated that one colony, the Wilson colony in southern Alberta, had a net profit of over $1 million. I am searching for the facts here to make sure that my memory does not play tricks on me. It reads:

> The balance sheet as December 31, 1970 shows assets in the amount of $1,235,855, liabilities in the amount of $1,060.

I wish that my little farm had so few liabilities. They had a net profit for that year of $107,697. So let us not be led astray by some bleeding hearts who think they know about religion and who feel akin to the Hutterites because they may have stemmed from Mennonite stock. We all stem from one stock or another but we are not all in competition with our brethren in the field of agriculture as these people are, and without a doubt they are in the business. When I can pick up a judgment and quote from it a statement that one colony alone had a net profit in 1970 of $107,000, we know we are not really dealing with a small entity. This is the profit of just one out of 83 colonies in the province of Alberta, and there are some 78 other colonies in the other two prairie provinces.

In other speeches I have dealt with whether or not one could call the Hutterites good citizens and whether or not they accept Canadian citizenship. I will not go into that subject because each man can form his own opinion as to what makes a good Canadian citizen and what does not. In my opinion, they do not fulfill the requirements of a good citizen. My three sons all grew up and went through 4-H. They recited the 4-H pledge pretty regularly, and they were told by their instructors that that is what constitutes a good citizen. The very attempt not to pay Canada Pension Plan contributions suggests to me that they are not good citizens. But I do believe that parliament was very negligent in not calling them as witnesses before the committee and asking them what in their minds constitutes good citizenship so that they could defend themselves.

I began my remarks by making the point which I just made. It is a habit of mine in making speeches to conclude by returning to the point I made at the beginning, and that is what I am doing on this occasion. I hope that throughout this speech I made members aware of what the problem is. This bill will not pass today, I can assure the House of that, but it may be passed next week if this session carries on that long. I hope that future members of parliament will not have to take action similar to the one I had to take in 1961 to correct a wrong which had been perpetrated on the agricultural industry until 1961 which allowed a segment of the agricultural industry to grow, prosper, and yet pay no income tax. We should make sure that restitution is made and that everyone is taxed for the purpose of the Canada Pension Plan.

I see Mr. Speaker is about to rise to point out that my time has expired. I have spoken on this subject at length, and I do not suppose that much more would convince those members who have failed to even attempt to compromise in this difficult situation. I do not suppose that many more words would change the minds of members of this House, but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I will continue to attempt to change the minds of hon. members this afternoon at greater length than I have this morning.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I would like to spend a little time supporting the amendment, which I had the honour to second, proposed by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). First of all, it is with some trepidation that I will attempt to correct the record as laid down by the hon. member for Crowfoot, but I think that in all fairness the House should be aware of the full import of the bill before us when we consider the amendment.

● (1250)

The hon. member for Crowfoot mentioned the requirements of the law with regard to social insurance numbers. When I spoke on the predecessor to this bill in July last, when the government made its first attempt to exempt these religious sects, I pointed out that I was a contributor to the Canada Pension Plan but probably would not be able to receive any benefits from it because I have always been opposed to the idea of a social insurance number. Personally, I have not applied for or received one, notwithstanding the strictures of the law as it reads at present.

At that time it was my understanding that the Department of National Revenue was responsible for enforcing this provision. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) was in the House on that occasion, and I challenged him to prosecute me, if he wished, for failing to obey the law. As a matter of conscience, Mr. Speaker, I do not see why I should be required to have a social insurance number.

As I understand the provisions of the bill now before us they remove the requirement that one must have a social insurance number in order to receive benefits under the Canada Pension Plan. That at least should remove some of the objections raised by the Hutterian brethren to this plan. I gather their main objection was that they, too, felt they should not have social insurance numbers, yet were obliged to support this plan from which they would get no benefit, and they felt they should be exempt from the program. As I say, if the government now recognizes that people should no longer be compelled to have social insurance numbers, that goes a long way toward meeting the objections of the Hutterian brethren.

I think that confirms the mistake that this parliament has made so far in dealing with this bill because, as pointed out by the hon. member for Crowfoot, the Hutterian brethren and the other sects that wish to be exempted should be called before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to make their positions abundantly clear, and to give the facts on which they base their requests for exemption. This information should be made available to members of the House. I suppose those sects have already made it available to the minister, because somewhere along the line this idea germinated in the minister's mind. I would not suggest that it suddenly appeared like the electric light bulb that is switched on in comic strips to indicate the birth of an idea. There must have been some pressure applied from some place. Generally, the government does not initiate action without some reason, but so far I have been given no information to indicate why these religious sects should be exempted.

The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), when he spoke on this subject on second reading of the bill, displayed an abysmal ignorance of the situation, something which I found quite surprising because he is supposed to be the official critic on this side of the House.

He talked about the Mennonites who are so active in religious work in India, and he said that this was a wonderful thing they did. Mr. Speaker, it is a wonderful thing. I happen to have the honour to represent a great number of people who adhere to the Mennonite religion, and as I have said previously I cannot think of a finer identifiable group in my constituency. These people pay their way. They do not cause trouble. They are great adherents to the principles of voluntaryism. I cannot think of a better community in my constituency than the community surrounding Acme and Linden, but I do not think the people who go to the Mennonite church at Linden are the ones who want to be exempted from the Canada Pension Plan. Neither do I believe that the people who are doing such good work in the mission field in India and other places are the ones who want to be exempted from the Canada Pension Plan.

The hon. member for Crowfoot has referred to those who want to be exempt as the Amish people from western Ontario. He has made certain remarks about that group. I, for one, am unfamiliar with them, but if he is correct in saying they neither contribute to nor partake in our system of government, there could be some reason for exempting them from this program. But I think it would be a terrible mistake for us to proceed on an incorrect understanding of the facts.

I think that our spokesman on this side of the House, the hon. member for Hillsborough, has done a very poor job in researching the position of this party with regard to this bill, and I must take exception to him. As I have said, these people should have been called and made to justify their position, because I think it is quite clear to anybody who has studied the Canada Pension Plan that it is not an actuarially sound program. And if it is not actuarially sound there will have to be extensive subsidies pumped into it in order to keep it afloat. Where are those subsidies to come from? They have to come from the general taxpayer, from the consolidated revenue fund. May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

• (1410)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. When the House suspended sitting at one o'clock, it was considering the report stage of Bill C-19, in particular the motion of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose for lunch at one o'clock, I was dealing with the motion before the House, and particularly the actuarial soundness of the Canada Pension Plan. It is my opinion that the plan is not actuarially sound and further, the more the base is narrowed, the less sound the plan becomes.

I readily admit that the number of people we are considering in this part of the bill is not large. The Old Order of Mennonite Brethren is not a large group. The Hutterian Brethren is another matter. During his remarks, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) gave some information about the number of people involved in that sect. While it may not be large now, it is a rapidly growing group, particularly when one considers that that group doubles in size every 17 years, according to the information given by the hon. member by Crowfoot. I presume that if the facts the hon. member has given are wrong somebody more learned than he, and with some basis for saying so, will stand up in this House and put the record straight. Until that happens, I guess we will have to accept the information given by that hon. member.

With regard to the actuarial soundness of the plan, I wish to quote from an article that appeared in the October 20, 1973 edition of the Financial Post and headlined "Happy Birthday, David, and congrats". The article was written by James L. Clare, a Toronto actuary and corporate tax consultant. I quote:

> Federal NDP leader David Lewis could ripoff the Canada Pension for at least $14,157.
> David Lewis turns 65 on June 23, 1974, and will then be eligible for a $99-a-month CPP pension. Statistical odds suggests he can then expect to live 14 years, or 168 months.
> His CPP contributions for the eight and a half years since the plan began, Jan. 1, 1966, will then total $1,435. These contributions will pay for almost 15 of those $99 monthly benefits. Interest will pay for about another 10 months of benefits. For the other 143 remaining months he can expect to live, his benefits will be paid from the CPP funds contributed by us folks still working, as a subsidy or gift to David Lewis, i.e., as a ripoff. The 143 months of $99 ripoffs come to a total expected ripoff of $14,157.

Rather juicy, what?

Consider a Canadian of the same age who has been paid much less, and covered by the CPP for the same 8½ years, but who year by year has earned one half of the CPP maximum covered earnings. His total contributions of $626 will pay for almost 13 of his $49.50 monthly benefits. Interest will pay for about another nine months of benefits. The benefits for the remaining 146 months he can expect to live will give him a total expected CPP subsidy of just $7,227.

David Lewis will be subsidized much more than the poor man—$6,930 more.

In a word, the CPP is "upside-down welfare."

Mr. Trudeau, why are the proposed CPP amendments of your government aiming at ballooning the subsidized ripoffs to the rich still further, with crumbs from the CPP to the poor and to the elderly? Why are you in such a hurry to line the pockets of Mr. Lewis still more?

Mr. Davis,—

I presume he is referring to the premier of Ontario.

—the CPP cannot legally be amended without the consent of your Ontario government—so why are you even more enthusiastic than Ottawa in urging even bigger subsidies and windfalls to the rich? What has Mr. Lewis done for you lately?

The CPP subsidies are silly, and if amended will be even sillier. Would it not make sense instead to amend the CPP so that the monthly dollar subsidies are (a) at least as much for the poor as for the rich, and (b) at least as much for older pensioners as for younger pensioners?

Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Davis, do your men really know what they are advocating? Maybe someone, somewhere, should look at all the facts first, before the CPP is changed in any way?

I think it is clear there is a serious problem with this plan. However, I think there is an even more serious problem facing the country today. The egg producers of Canada are suffering as a result of the importation and dumping of eggs in this country. The government says it needs amendments to the Export and Import Permits Act and has proposed Bill C-4. They made some reference to being willing to proceed with this piece of legislation today. I do not know whether the amendments are actually necessary before the government can act, but the government says they are. That legislation is of much higher priority than the legislation we are now discussing. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Horner):

That this debate be now adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member's motion was proposed under the terms of Standing Order 25 which permits such a motion to be made. Under Standing Order 32, the motion is not debatable. I will therefore put the motion at this time. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

[Mr. Schumacher.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost.

● (1420)

Mr. Norval Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Well, we have certainly proved that point. The government is not prepared to debate Bill C-4. The government had the opportunity and they failed to take it.

There are other things far more important than the measure we are considering. Members on this side made it clear months ago that this legislation would not, in all likelihood, be passed unless clause seven concerning special exemptions for religious sects was removed. But the government carried on with it. Today it is wasting time again, though it could be getting on with other legislation of greater importance. I think the minister responsible for arranging the business to come before the House knows this bill is put forward as a filler while the House is waiting for the budget to be brought down. They are afraid to bring anything else forward.

A motion has been put forward to delete that part of the bill which would give special consideration to a religious sect. I fully support the idea that special consideration should be given to religious sects in certain circumstances. After all, I grew up with a community of people who had emigrated here from Russia, the Doukhobors. They were granted special consideration based on their religion. They have contributed a tremendous amount to this country, and I think they are fairly happy about their freedom to practice their religion. But the crux of the matter is this: we are dealing with a bill concerning contributions to the Canada Pension Plan. In no way does this interfere with anyone practising or maintaining a religious belief. I can mention other things which are contrary to Hutterite practices—I mention the Hutterites because they are primarily the people involved in this case. It is contrary to their religious beliefs to watch television or listen to radio. Yet they pay taxes which go, in part, toward the maintenance of the CBC. They do not watch CBC programs because, in their minds, it is very sinful to do so. They may have a point there, Mr. Speaker. But ought we to rebate to them that particular portion of the tax?

To say they must contribute to the Canada Pension Plan in no way infringes upon religious freedom. And we are not talking about a poor, struggling people trying to maintain churches or build church halls. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) mentioned 73 communities numbering, possibly, six or seven thousand people, and reporting a net profit of some $6 million. These are the people who are asking that they should be exempted from the Canada Pension Plan provisions.

This is what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) stated in his speech, as reported at page 1482 of Hansard for April 16:

I may say the government still firmly believes in the universal application of programs such as the Canada Pension Plan. It firmly believes in the universality of a pension plan. But it considers an exemption should be made because it is in keeping with a strong tradition of freedom and tolerance which exists in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I am a great one for tolerance and personal freedom, like many other farmers. But I, like many other farmers, was given no choice about whether or not I would keep books for my operation. I was forced to do so by law. We were not asked whether we wished to deduct income tax with respect to the people who work for us. This duty was forced upon us and we had no choice. The government talks about treating these people with tolerance because there is a tradition of freedom. No one else has individual freedom. Certainly I think we should show them tolerance as far as their religion is concerned, but what we propose would in no way prevent them from practising their religion. Besides, it is basic to what democracy means. Democracy means going along with what 51 per cent of the people want. People who do not drive cars are still called upon to pay for the highways. I would point out, also, that these people are not bound to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan. They can choose to earn less than $600 a year. If they decide to earn more, they should fall into the same category as everyone else.

I could list a variety of examples. Suppose I had a choice of being exempt from education tax. If I could get back what I pay in education taxes I would be only too willing to educate my children myself. But I do not have that freedom. I live in a democracy, and democracy demands that 100 per cent of the people should do what 51 per cent of the people want to do. The Hutterites live in Canada and they are good citizens. But why exempt them while trying to carry on the principle of universality in all the other cases? It is a bad precedent, it is not necessary, and it is amazing to me that so few members can get up enough energy or enough courage to speak against it.

The Hutterites have been given special consideration with regard to education. They have been given the right to educate their children in their own way, on their colonies. I do not say it would be impossible for others to do something like this, but I believe it would be very difficult if I were living on a farm and said to the local school board: Please send me out a teacher; I have 21 children here, my own and those of a few people around here; we shall provide the building, you should provide the teacher. I think I would have a fair amount of trouble getting that privilege.

I have no quarrel with the Hutterite people. That is not what is at stake here. They raise a tremendous amount of produce and they use the land to the best of their ability. On the other hand, they contribute very little to our society. They stand in line outside the doctor's office, when necessary and they are right ready to buy the latest machines if they are likely to help them earn a faster dollar, but none of their children go to universities; none of their descendants become doctors. None of them try to solve the mystery of what causes cancer, or anything else. None of their children get past grade eight. Thus, they do not contribute to the country in the way many other people do and for this reason alone I find it difficult to understand why they should be granted special exemption from a scheme which is supposed to be universal.

On the same page of Hansard, page 1482, the minister is recorded as saying that religious sects formed after 1966 will not be exempt should they make a similar application. So, this bill practically singles out the Hutterites and a few others in the Mennonite and Amish sects, but primarily there is a strict exemption of a very small group of very, very wealthy people. Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, having one million acres in the province of Alberta. What would that land be worth in a few years? Perhaps $500 an acre, with land today selling anywhere from $150 to $250 an acre. I will leave hon. members to figure it out.

● (1430)

These are the people asking for, and the people the government is anxious to grant to, special consideration because they are a religious sect. It is not that their paying into the Canada Pension Plan would in any way prevent them from carrying on their religion. As I have said, it puzzles me greatly. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) has legislation ready to increase the cash advances on grain. I am ready to speak on this legislation. We have the import-export bill, too. Then he introduced a bill which was given first reading this morning to put into legislative form the September 12 last announcement with regard to government subsidies for grain consumed in Canada, to ensure that the farmers obtain $5 maximum for wheat consumed in Canada. So I fail to understand why the minister is prepared to sit all afternoon while we debate this particular legislation, and while it fails to pass the House.

Mr. Lang: Let it come to a vote.

Mr. Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): We did let it come to a vote. The Minister of Justice says we should let it come to a vote, but we have urged that this debate be adjourned so we can go on with other matters. Those on the government side have chosen not to do this, and not to pass the import-export bill today.

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in this debate will be extremely brief and probably will not last 60 seconds. At the end of that time, I hope this matter does come to a vote and pass the House.

I merely rise to dissociate myself formally from the remarks of several members of this party I have heard today. Particularly I dissociate myself from the remarks made by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) with reference to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), who is one of the finest men I have ever encountered in public life and a man with whom I am proud to share the appellation "Progressive Conservative".

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The remarks made by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) cannot go unchallenged. In making them he implied that the hon. member for Crowfoot in some way or other made some disparaging remarks about the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), that I said something that was defamatory of his character, that I questioned his integrity, and other things such as that.

I should like the hon. member who made those remarks to consider them seriously and very closely, and perhaps to withdraw them. He can check the record of Hansard, but I disagreed strongly with the hon. member for Hillsborough. I invited him to come to my riding. I said that I would not sit on the platform with him but that I would sit in the audience and watch the reception of his words by my constituents. I did not say that my constituents would disagree with him. I did not say that they would think he was right or wrong, or would question his character. I said that since I was the representative here of my constituents I would sit among them so I could better understand their feelings toward his remarks, whether they agreed with him or not. I said I would even pay the rent for the hall, and knowing how well the hon. member stood within the Conservative party, that the party would pay his transportation out there.

In the whole of my remarks, in no way did I cast reflection upon his character—whether he was honest or dishonest, whether he was the greatest man I have ever met in society. I have met many great men and he would have to be judged as ranking among these many great men. I have not taken the trouble to assess his particular position, whether it would be at the top or at the bottom of the ranking.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I want the hon. member to withdraw his words, if he said in any way that I was casting reflection—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Would the hon. member resume his seat. The standing order provides that an hon. member can clarify expressions of opinion or the remarks of other members that might reflect on some of his own comments or personal opinions, but I do not think an hon. member can start a debate on such questions. If the hon. member wants to clarify his point further, I hope he will do it very quickly so we can proceed.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I quite agree with those remarks, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Ottawa West began his remarks by saying that he was not going to speak for very long. He did not speak to the amendment, motion No. 1, or to the subject matter of the bill we are debating. He said that he would only speak for 60 seconds, and if he had done so I would have risen on a point of order. He tried to implicate me in some kind of name calling game, for which I take no responsibility whatsoever. I suggest his remarks were completely out of order. If he is questioning my remarks about the hon. member for Hillsborough, he is quite out of order in attempting to raise what is really a point of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the hon. member for Ottawa West rising on the point of order?

Mr. Reilly: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Not only will I not withdraw what I said, but I want to assure the hon. member that only the gentlemanly tradition of this House allows me to forbear saying what is precisely in my mind.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, that is not a point of order. I suggest the hon. member is not debating the motion that is before the House and that he has not said anything that contributes to the debate at all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I think we had better consider the case closed. The hon. member for Ottawa West rose on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot and I think this should close the matter at this time. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Mr. Horner (Crowfoot).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost on division.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Horner, Crowfoot) negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The next motion is No. 2 appearing on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher). The Chair does question the acceptability of the motion which is brought forward as an amendment at the report stage of the bill. The hon. member for Palliser will recall that a similar motion, one in the same terms as the one now proposed, was put by him when another Canada Pension Plan amending bill was being considered a few months ago.

The record at that time shows, at page 596 of Journals for October 24, 1973, that the Chair decided the proposed motion was defective in two regards. The hon. member is probably well aware of the remarks of the occupant of the Chair at that time. If the hon. member wishes, I am ready to comment as to the acceptability of his motion at this time, and I must say I have very strong reservations about it.

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my motion is to allow married women to contribute to and receive benefits from the Canada Pension Plan. When I moved this amendment to the amending bill last year, I recognized then that it probably was not in order, but I moved it to bring attention to the problem. I think I have to say that some recognition has been given to this problem since the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has produced a discussion paper on the subject of housewives contributing to the Canada Pension Plan. The bill in relation to which the amendment was put before was pretty narrow, and I can understand why it was not found in order. I did not quibble with that ruling as I thought it was a proper one at that time.

However, Bill C-19 with which we are dealing is a much broader piece of legislation, and we find in the recommendations the following words:

● (1440)

—to provide in the manner prescribed for equality of status for males and females under the Act—

For that reason I feel my amendment is much closer to being in order this time than last time. Of course, it can probably be argued from the other side that 100 per cent or 300 per cent of nothing is still nothing. I recognize that the words "in the manner prescribed" are rather limiting, but I have always understood in respect of these recommendations that they should not set out the particulars of the bill before us. I would urge that because it is recommended there be equity of status as between males and females under this bill consideration should be given to my amendment. There is a large number of housewives in this country who are female citizens and should have the right to expect coverage under the national pension plan.

I am attempting to bring this idea before the House by referring to that part of the recommendation which says that one of the purposes of this bill is to provide equality of status. In no way are we going to encourage that equality of status between males and females if we do not include housewives. Unless we include housewives, we will not meet the requirements of that recommendation and that recommendation will, therefore, be meaningless.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, before you rule on the amendment I should like to speak on this point of order. You are quite correct in that the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) did move the amendment in respect of Bill C-90. Mr. Speaker at that time felt that it did not fall within the ambit of the bill then before us. I draw to your attention that in this particular case we have a bill with a great deal more depth and one which particularly deals with the spouses, their contributions and the benefits these spouses may collect. One can look at Clauses 26, 27, 28, 29 and 30 and see that we are in fact dealing with contributions that a spouse may or may not make, and the benefits that one of the survivors of a marriage may collect.

I would also bring to your attention, before you make your ruling, that during the committee study of this particular bill more time and paper was used on the questioning of this aspect of what the amendment suggests than on anything else.

It is interesting to note also that at the time of the committee study the minister did not say he was opposed to this aspect, but said he felt the government needed more time to study it. He did not say he could not fit it into this bill. Many of the members of that committee wanted it fitted in and the minister said that he had discussed it with the provinces and wanted more time to study this aspect. In view of the desirability of getting this bill through before the election everybody seems to be talking about around here, I would urge that you not rule the amendment out of order.

During committee proceedings there was wide acceptance of the principle enunciated in the amendment. We could incorporate it in the bill and the beneficiaries of the act, particularly the housewives across Canada, would be better off. Before making your ruling on the grounds the last amendment was found out of order, I would urge that this bill is completely different and much broader in scope. I think this amendment does fall within the ambit of this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I wish to thank both hon. members who have expressed opinions as to the acceptability of the motion before the House at this time. I hope the two hon. members concerned will understand that the Chair is not here to judge on the merits, the value or the sincerity of the amendment or motion put forward by the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher), or on the opinion or views of the minister. The Chair is restricted by the rules of this House which provide for limitations which are meant to assist in the progress and workings of this parliamentary institution.

Perhaps at this time I should refer to Beauchesne's Fourth Edition in respect of relevancy, specifically section (1) of Citation 203 which states in part:

> It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed.

I would refer, in addition, to Citation 406 at page 285 of the same author which lists reasons amendments would be ruled out of order. It reads in part as follows:

> Amendments are out of order if they are
> (a) irrelevant to the bill, or beyond its scope, governed by or dependent upon amendments already negatived;

There is another point I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members, and this relates to one of our well-known references, Erskine May's Eighteenth Edition, at page 508, with reference to the same matter:

> An amendment which is out of order on any of the following grounds cannot be proposed from the chair:
> (1) An amendment is out of order if it is irrelevant to the subject matter or beyond the scope of the bill—

If hon. members will turn to page 510 of May's they will note in paragraph (12):

> Amendments or new clauses creating public charges cannot be proposed, if no money resolution or ways and means resolution has been passed, or if the amendment or clause is not covered by the terms of the resolution.

● (1450)

These are the two main points I wish to bring to the attention of the mover. In fact, the motion now before the House goes behind the bill which is being considered. It endeavours to amend provisions in the main act which are not contained in the bill under consideration. The hon. member, by his amendment, is attempting to amend the act itself not by adding a subclause to clause 7 but by trying to reach the act which is not before the House at this time. Secondly, the proposed amendment is not in accordance with the financial recommendation in respect of the bill as it was not in respect of Bill C-90 in the previous session, so the same consideration applies at this time. It is with regret I must decide that this motion cannot be accepted at this time in its present form.

The House will now proceed to the consideration of motion No. 3 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot) moved:

> Motion No. 3.
> That Bill C-19, An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be amended in Sub-clause 15(2) by deleting the words 'prescribed rate' at line 25 and substituting '7%'.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this motion one tends to become involved in the whole question of interest rates. In the old bill the rate was 6 per cent. The change that this bill is attempting to bring in is to a prescribed rate. Someone across the way said that is very commendable. I have always been interested in the Liberals and their interest rates, because I well remember the debate of 1966 when the Liberal government took office and placed a freeze on the interest rate of the banks. The government at that time then decided to have a floating rate. One could look up the debate, and some of the new Liberal members should do so.

At that time it was decided to have a floating rate which would be 1¾ per cent above the short-term bond rate. Now, we are dealing with a prescribed rate. The prescribed rate is bound to be the floating rate. In 1966, the bank rate was 6 per cent but the government decided to float the rate at 1¾ per cent above the rate on short-term bonds. I well remember the debate. The present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was Minister of Finance at that time. He said that the interest rate might well go below 6 per cent. That was the wishful thinking of the Liberal government at that time. The short-term bond rate in that particular year went as high as 7.72 per cent and then fell to 4.3 per cent. So, the government said that 1¾ per cent above 4.3 per cent would place the prescribed rate at 6.05 per cent. It is interesting to note that the bill at that time was to apply for an interim period with a rate fixed at 7¼ per cent. Then, it was decided that the Bank Act should be amended to allow the bank to bring in any rate it saw fit.

Then, it was decided that for the first year of the freeing of the bank rate a prescribed rate of 7¼ per cent would be arranged. The government went on to explain how the rate would fluctuate after that on a formula of 1¾ per cent above the short-term bond rate. However, the short-term bond rate and the 1¾ per cent were below the 7¼ per cent rate so the government was in an embarrassing position at the time. Several members from the Conservative Party and some from the socialist party to my left spoke against the freeing of the interest rate for the banks. When one looks at corporate profits one finds that in the past seven or eight years it is the banks which have had the greatest profits. The major shareholders of the banks have reaped the benefit of these higher profits earned by high interest rates.

The amendment I am presenting today is the same amendment I filed in this House I believe in the debate in the fall of 1966 when the 6 per cent interest rate freeze was removed from the Bank Act. I said that the rate should be frozen at 7 per cent. This is what my amendment in this case says. If a person should be late in respect of his payments he should be charged a rate of 7 per cent and not a prescribed rate. I have a dreadful fear concerning what a prescribed rate means in the mind of the present Liberal government. The Liberal government of 1966 said that a prescribed rate was 1¾ per cent above the rate on short-term bonds. Whenever I see a bill come before this House which gives the Liberal Party the right to decide the interest rate I become concerned. The rate in the old act clearly is 6 per cent per annum. In this case it is a prescribed rate. Recently we have seen the banks of Canada increase their interest rate by 1½ per cent approximately. Everyone in Canada, except perhaps a person with a great deal of security, is paying between 10½ and 11½ per cent for money. There are members of this House who believe that under the present government the prescribed rate could go to the sky.

I believe everyone should examine this question. The Bank of Canada recently announced that it would increase its rate on loans to the chartered banks to 8¼ per cent. Perhaps no one has looked up the amount of money the chartered banks have borrowed from the central bank. In 1973, they did not borrow a red nickel or any other kind of nickel, but because the central bank raised its rate to 8½ per cent the chartered banks took it upon themselves to raise their rate by 12 per cent. Although I do not have the exact figures, I would estimate that there is a total debt of approximately $40 million across Canada, and if one calculates a 1½ per cent increase on that one can see that interest rates are a very important subject. All of a sudden in order to cure inflation, so we were told, a higher interest rate was imposed.

I do not know what effect this will have on payments made under the Canada Pension Plan. I think most mistakes are made honestly and without deliberate intent. I think most late filings are made honestly without deliberate intent. Why do we have to give power to the government to establish a prescribed rate? This government believes in high interest rates. If they want to curtail inflation, there are plenty of ways of doing so without increasing interest rates. When I speak of interest rates I cannot help going back to the debate when we started this cycle of high interest rates in the fall of 1966.

What was Canada's problem in 1966? At that time we were mighty concerned about the rate of inflation. Inflation was running wild. The Bank of Canada wanted to charge a higher interest rate and so did the chartered banks. That was their cure for inflation. It was argued by others that higher interest rates do nothing but increase inflation. It is not my fault, not this bill's fault, and not necessarily the Liberal government's fault that high interest rates increase inflation. The reason for inflation is the credit economy in which we are living. How have we evolved this type of economy? Goods and money became plentiful, and we borrowed. Our credit became good and people lent us more and more money. Interest rates are part of the cost.

I say that putting a prescribed rate into this legislation will only increase the cost of the entrepreneur doing business in Canada today. In 1966 the argument was used that interest rates would curb inflation, and there is no question in my mind that at that time they contributed to inflation because the entrepreneur makes them part of his cost and wherever possible passes on that cost to the buying public. The small portion of the debt in Canada will also be passed on to the consumer in the end product. In fact, 3.6 per cent of the cost of the labour force in a given business is deducted or charged against the product that the business produces. The interest rate on that money is charged to the product. There is no question in my mind that we cannot suddenly stop the credit economy that we have evolved. One member of the Liberal Party was concerned about our credit economy and tried to start a cashex system—a novel idea, but for one reason or another it did not catch on with the public.

We have been led down the garden path, or hornswoggled, to use a good western expression, into believing that a credit economy is a good thing. I find myself in that position. I have many debts. Because the interest rate went up, I, along with everybody else, will have to pay. The argument for the high interest rate in the fall of 1966 when the Bank Act was before parliament was that it would curtail inflation. The evidence is before this government that it did not curtail inflation one bit; in fact, it contributed to it.

I do not want to make a speech today on the increase in the interest rate and what steps could be taken to cure inflation. That is not the purpose of our debate this afternoon. But surely we should consider what my amendment would do. It provides clearly that in a small way it will curtail the rate of inflation. It is the old story. If you watch the little things, the big things will take care of themselves. That is an old and wise philosophy expressed to me by many old homesteaders on the prairies. There is no question that if we look after the pennies the dollars will accrue. How many times have you heard that expression? If we look after low interest rates we will be proving this point without a doubt. Banks will have to lend money to the entrepreneurs.

It does not concern me if the government sets out its principles in pieces of legislation and states that it believes in a 7 per cent rate of interest. I would appreciate it if parliament accepted this amendment and stated that we believe it would be one small step in the direction of reducing interest rates and inflation. If the government wants to curtail inflation, if they want to bring the banks into line, why do they not change section 72 of the Bank Act which allows banks to charge an interest rate as low as 12 per cent on what might be called negotiable reserves? If they want to tighten up the economy, let them increase that rate to 15 per cent or 16 per cent. I will listen with interest to the budget to see whether the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) suggests that. If he does, he will be taking a concrete step toward curtailing inflation without increasing the burden on the taxpayers as this bill will do and as the Bank of Canada did some months ago.

Why do interest rates mean so much with reference to the Canada Pension Plan? I wonder how many Canadians have ever asked themselves who uses all the money that has been amassed under the Canada Pension Plan. Every province in Canada except Quebec has the opportunity to borrow money from the Canada Pension Plan, that portion of it which is over and above the amount needed to pay the premiums in the province. Every province has the right to borrow that money at the rate of about 5 per cent. It is interesting to note the heavy borrowings over the years by the provinces. I should point out that the province of Quebec pays at the same rate but collects its own contributions and does not have to borrow this money from the federal government at 5 per cent.

It is interesting to point out that when the question of interest rates came up in the committee, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) readily admitted that Quebec has a different rate of interest on their bonds. They collect a 10 per cent return on the money they lend under the Canada Pension Plan. All that my amendment does is to signify that the interest rate which the government should establish on all borrowings under the Canada Pension Plan should be 7 per cent. This is not impossible to achieve. It is an acknowledgement that 6 per cent interest rate may be too low and might have to be changed. But I am very afraid of legislation which will pass this House providing that there shall be only a prescribed rate, because in all the time I have been in Ottawa I have not been convinced that the Liberal Party understands the meaning of interest rates. There is no question about it; they believe in high interest rates. They have allowed the governor of the Bank of Canada to increase interest rates. For the first time in Canadian history, bank rates are 10 per cent to 11½ per cent, depending on the borrower's credibility, the security he can offer and the amount of the loan. Let me assure you that most people pay 11½ per cent.

The Canadian banks, among the best banking businesses in the world, are making all kinds of money. The government has a moral obligation to tell the banks that it does not approve of this. Months ago the government should have called in the governor of the Bank of Canada and told him it would not approve the 8¼ per cent interest rate that he proposed at that time. The government could begin to move on interest rates this afternoon by accepting this small amendment which proposes quite clearly that the interest rate shall be 7 per cent.

I well remember when the Bank Act was amended to remove the freeze on interest rates which then stood at 6 per cent. The whole argument in favour of a floating interest rate was that the rate would come down. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, who was minister of finance at the time, said the rate would be pegged at 7½ per cent for a year but after the year we could conceivably see interest rates going below 6 per cent. What kind of folly was that? Does that kind of folly still exist in the government's mind?

The government has not learned anything, because it is still trying to cure inflation by increasing interest rates, rather than increasing the percentage of funds which banks are obliged to keep in reserve. The Canada Pension Plan has become one of the greatest sources of funds for the provinces. Most provinces used to go to New York for their financing. Now, with the exception of Quebec, they come to Ottawa. The province of Ontario has borrowed huge amounts of money from the Canada Pension Plan fund. It has borrowed as much as $590 million in one year at an interest rate of 5 per cent. Certainly it is getting a good deal in this way, using the Canadian taxpayers' money. I should not say it is using the Canadian taxpayers' money, but the Ontario taxpayers' money, because the contributions of provinces are accumulated in separate funds from which the provinces can borrow at 5 per cent.

If the government allowed a prescribed rate, this could provide greater contributions to the pension fund. In fact, we might be able to increase the amount of pension payable without increasing the premium. But we have decided that the rate should be pegged at 5 per cent. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything wrong with pegging it at 7 per cent. That is slightly more than the provinces have to pay for money now, but surely we do not have to enforce a higher penalty than 2 per cent in this respect. The amount of money saved by the Ontario government because of the prescribed 5 per cent rate on borrowings over $500 million a year would be astronomical. I am using Ontario as an example because it has the biggest population and borrows the most money from the fund. On average it has borrowed more than $590 million each year for the past few years. I admit that back in 1966 it did not borrow so much. I am looking for the exact figures but I cannot lay my hands on them. In any case, by now the point should be clearly understood by hon. members that it is quite proper to provide in a piece of legislation that there be a fixed interest rate. Of course, as we read the bill now it suggests a 6 per cent rate. I am suggesting a 7 per cent rate.

I well remember during debates in 1966 that we were told we had to raise interest rates otherwise money would not come into Canada. We were told that if we maintained a low interest rate, foreign money would not come into Canada, that American money would stay in the United States and Europe would attract investment because interest rates there were increasing. Since that time the complaint has been that we have too much foreign investment in Canada and should do something about it. If the government had accepted the advice offered by some of us in 1966 and frozen interest rates at 7 per cent, we might have encouraged a little foreign money to come to Canada but not as much as is now flooding in, with interest rates going to 11½ per cent. You cannot blame the free enterprise society in which we live if money pours into a country where interest rates go to 11½ per cent. I repeat that we would not have the large foreign investment that Canada now knows if our advice had been accepted in 1966. In this debate I am offering the same advice. I maintain that the rate should be frozen at 7 per cent. Let this bill be a signal to our society that we are going to freeze interest rates at 7 per cent, that we are going to take steps to bring down interest rates.

I well remember that in election speeches in 1957 and 1958 the Liberal Party was charged with being a high interest rate party. I was just a young fellow at that time and was not certain whether the accusation was true. But having spent a number of years in Ottawa I am convinced beyond the shadow of a doubt that it is a high interest rate party. One of the beautiful things about democracy is that governments must obey the wishes of parliament. This is particularly true of a minority government. We see compromises. We see agreements being reached. Back on the farm we would even say that deals were being made. Politicians are not supposed to use that expression, but with this minority government we see deals being made. Why can't the government come down off its high interest rates? I was going to say "high horse", but we are debating interest rates so I must stick to that subject. Why can't this government come down from their high horse? There I go again with a slip of the tongue. My hon. friend says it is the wrong horse too, and there is no doubt about that, Mr. Speaker. If we go to the people next week, I hope they bear in mind that the Liberal Party has been responsible for high interest rates ever since it removed the freeze in 1966. It is still the party of high interest rates. If they reject this small amendment which I propose, it will signify again that they want high interest rates on even the smallest loans.

● (1520)

In this afternoon's debate I shall take time to drill this point home because I really believe there will be an election next week. I know the Liberal Party wants to continue to govern. This morning I listened to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) speak about Petro-Can and I realized that he wants to govern. He is throwing out a compromise, a deal with the NDP right now. He wants to continue to govern. Nothing would do the Liberals more good on the hustings next week or next month than to wave a little piece of paper saying, "We are a party of lower interest rates. We are starting to bring down interest rates. We took this prescribed rate out of the act and froze it at 7 per cent. That is where interest rates should be frozen today. And when we go back we are going to freeze the rate of the banks at 7 per cent." They are on their high horse and believe in high interest rates. They believe that somehow they have an exalted right to rule. They really do not care how badly they bleed the public, because they believe in the theory: Bleed them well and give them back the concentrated blood mix and they will somehow survive.

[Mr. Horner (Crowfoot).]

An hon. Member: Are you the only good Canadian in the House?

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): No, I do not think that at all. In fact, I am certain there are many members who think I am practically the worst Canadian in the House; but that does not bother me. I ask the hon. member to read the debates of 1966 when I attempted to freeze the bank rate at 7 per cent and was told that the foreign money we needed would not come into Canada.

Mr. Railton: We needed it at that time.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Now people wonder why we have so much foreign investment and ownership in this country.

Mr. Railton: Because of our good economy they want to invest here.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Yes, because of our good economy we have to sell it. But the place is not for sale, Mr. Speaker. Have you ever driven by a beautiful farm and wanted to buy it, and on the gate was the sign "Not for sale"? Canada is not for sale to the Americans—and I like Americans—to the Germans or the Japanese. The sign on our gate should say that this place is not for sale, no matter what interest rate they want to pay. I can hand out all the advice I like about what interest rates should be, but the government will not accept it. They will not accept this small amendment. They have gone through every act of parliament, and wherever the rate was pegged at 6 per cent they changed it to allow it to float. That is what this bill is doing, Mr. Speaker, changing it from 6 per cent and allowing it to float.

Mr. Railton: What about CMHC?

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what they are doing with CMHC, floating an interest rate which has been far too high for home owners. That is why we have so many people living in apartments and townhouses. There is a shortage of houses because they are charging too much interest. There is no doubt in my mind that this is probably one of the last statutes on the books that has a fixed interest rate of 6 per cent. They have caught up with that now and are allowing the interest rate to float.

Why do we have a prescribed rate? How does the central bank's rate of interest affect a prescribed rate formula? Recently the governor of the Bank of Canada increased the interest rate to 8¼ per cent, and immediately that became the interest rate on the government's short-term borrowings. The Bank of Canada does not lend money to the chartered banks. Only 1 per cent of the money the chartered banks lend to the people is borrowed from the central bank. Indeed, in 1973 the chartered banks did not borrow one cent from the central bank. If you follow what I am saying, Mr. Speaker, the governor of the Bank of Canada, on the advice of the Minister of Finance, increased the rate to 8¼ per cent and that became the short-term borrowing rate on government bonds.

The Bank of Canada is the buyer of last resort of government bonds. They will buy them at 8¼ per cent, and if anybody wants to pay a slightly higher percentage rate they can have them. Every Thursday at five o'clock the bids are open on government short-term bonds, but the Bank of Canada is the buyer of last resort. So automatically, if you take this prescribed rate formula that was developed in 1966 in the change to the Bank Act and add 1¾ per cent to it, you get the bottoming-out rate that banks can charge of 10 per cent. What happens is that many investment houses bid on government short-term bonds, so that you actually have a rate on short-term bonds of slightly above the Bank of Canada rate.

I see the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) is in the House. If he wants to correct my limited knowledge of the financial system, he is welcome to do so. He has been around here longer than I have and probably will be around much longer in the future. In any case, in the years I have been here that is how the prescribed interest rate that this bill speaks of has been arrived at. In this bill we are really not talking about a prescribed interest rate; we are talking about something better than 10 per cent. The bottoming-out rate is 10 per cent. If nobody bids on government bonds, then it might be 10 per cent; but the Bank of Canada will take them up at 8¼ per cent.

The whole purpose of high interest rates, according to the Minister of Finance, is to discourage inflation in our credit society. I am not blaming anybody for getting us into a credit society. As I said earlier, I too have been hornswoggled in that respect. A fellow once told me that everybody likes spending money but very few like making it. This government cannot be accused of that because they also like printing money. That is why we have the present rate of inflation. If this government wants to curtail inflation, it will not do it by increasing interest rates. That is the wrong way. They contribute to inflation. One step they could follow would be to increase the 12 per cent reserve that chartered banks must hold in negotiable securities. The banks might have less money to lend and their profits might not be so great. We all know the banks have made substantial profits since the interest rate was taken off, but that is the formula of the prescribed rate system. There is no doubt in my mind that my amendment will fix the rate at 7 per cent. It is the same kind of amendment I attempted to move to the Bank Act in 1966. If history had shown me wrong in the past seven years, I would gladly go along with letting this bill pass.

I said at the beginning of my speech that I would take the full 40 minutes I am allowed. That is because I want the backbenchers of the Liberal Party—and there are a lot of good ones—to know the high horse of high interest they are riding. I want them to think about their policy, particularly if we are going into an election next week. I want the good Liberals to look at this piece of paper and say they voted for a 7 per cent interest rate. They do not have to go into detail as to how small a bill it was. It will stand them in good stead on the hustings next week, the week after, next month or, for that matter, next year.

Why do we religiously have to bring forward every statute on the books? It does not matter whether it is so small a thing as the debt under the Canada Pension Plan and whether we should freeze it at the 6 per cent rate. Why can't we signify to the people that we believe high interest rates contribute to inflation, in no way attempt to control inflation and must progressively be brought down from 10 per cent or 11 per cent?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). The 40 minutes assigned to him under the Standing Order has expired. Of course, with the unanimous consent of the House he can continue for another 40 minutes. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not appear to be unanimity in this respect.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, the motion before us strikes me as the kind of motion which would strengthen and improve this bill, which I think is a bill many members would like to see passed before events which may overtake us next week. I appeal to whichever minister is piloting this legislation through the House to accept this very reasonable suggestion whereby we could improve the Canada Pension Plan and assist the many people who will benefit from the passage of the bill.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this motion which relates to the penalty section of the act. As I understand the legislation, at present employers making late returns on behalf of their employees as required by the Canada Pension Plan are subject to a penalty of 10 per cent of the amount, or $10, whichever is the greatest, and interest at 6 per cent per annum on the amount that should have been paid. This bill purports to take away a certain penalty and insert an uncertain penalty; that is, changing it from a fixed rate of 6 per cent to what is called a "prescribed" rate. That rate is prescribed by the minister on the advice of the bureaucrats in his department. They indicate to the minister what they feel should be the penalty because of an oversight, carelessness or some other reason in failing to make the proper remittance on time.

As far as I am concerned, this is another step along the road of delegation whereby this House of Commons in particular, and parliament in general is letting go of more and more responsibility in the day to day governing of Canada. That is a disgraceful situation whereby the executive has a completely free hand with regard to what is going on in this country, without any reference to the parliamentarians. I am sure Your Honour has heard many times over the years complaints from members of parliament that they do not have any say in certain matters; they are always delegated to the bureaucrats. This is going on at an ever increasing rate. We have had examples of this during past sessions, and this session. In response to practically every problem that arises, it is proposed that a new board or tribunal be established. That is the prescribed solution. That is a typical of the present administration.

The government says it will make the proper prescriptions. However, at this time the country is suffering from a malady that in large measure results from prescriptions we have already received. It has been pretty stiff and bad medicine. I do not think the great brains on the treasury benches should be allowed to prescribe any more bad medicine for the illness we are suffering at the present time. The law should be certain. People should know what the punishment will be if they do not obey the law. It is a very bad situation when we continue to allow the executive to act with complete immunity and without any responsibility to the legislators who are supposed to represent the feelings of their constituents. I am ashamed that more senior members have not taken strong exception to the wide discretion that is being given in this case and in many others.

During the past winter the energy allocation board was set up and measures have been taken to set up a restrictive trade practices tribunal with greatly extended powers. Bill C-29 relates to excess profits and use will probably be made of this same tribunal. I could list a great many cases in which the government has asked parliament to give it the right to act as it thinks best, and in 90 per cent of those cases I suggest the confidence of parliament has been misplaced.

There is much to be commended in the suggestion of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) that a certain penalty should be specified. I do not know whether 7 per cent is the correct figure or not. However, I say it should bear some relationship to the rate at which money is borrowed from the fund when it is used by the provinces. The hon. member for Crowfoot says the rate is 5 per cent. By anybody's standards, that is very cheap money for the provinces. The fact that the borrowing rate is so low indicates what the thinking of parliament was in 1965—a 1 per cent spread was charged to those who were late in paying. I do not know why the government wishes to change to a prescribed rate, except that it may be hoping to try to get in through the back door what it could not do by the front door. They want to do it by regulation. A notice will appear in the Canada Gazette and no one will be able to do anything about it. No one will know there has been a change until they are hit by it. The new rate will probably be between 11 per cent and 12 per cent as charged by CMHC on first mortgages: it is a rate of which the government seems to approve. What a difference there is between the rate at which funds can be borrowed and the rate late payers must accept. This indicates that money can be borrowed from the fund at too low a rate for the well-being of the plan.

The hon. member for Crowfoot pointed out that Quebec accepts different rates in connection with its own fund and that the performance of the Quebec plan is substantially better than that of the federal plan. I should like to quote from an article written by Bruce Whitestone and dated October, 1973. Mr. Whitestone is an economist. He suggests there should be further restrictions on provincial borrowing from the fund. The article reads:

> The Canada Pension Plan is in danger of becoming something like Frankenstein's monster, a runaway spending machine. Provincial use of Canada Pension Plan contributions has become part of a mechanism which affects not only the pension plan but also provincial government spending and the entire investment process.
> What emerges here is a pattern of borrowing from the Canada Pension Plan by provincial governments and increased spending by those governments because of easy access to the pension fund money.
>
> The legislation which set up the Canada Pension Plan provides for the investment of the funds which accrue from monthly contributions, less the estimated amounts needed to pay benefits and costs. These funds are made available to each province, based on their contributions. The provinces are able to borrow from these funds, subject only to the supervision of the federal Department of Finance to ensure that proper controls are maintained. In general, this easy access to funds by provincial governments leads to unwise spending programs; there are not the normal constraints imposed by lenders. In other words, provincial governments do not need to go through the process or cost of borrowing money on the market, using underwriters to market bond issues. As a result it is an almost foregone conclusion that governments are tempted by an "easy-come, easy-go" attitude. The money burns a hole in the pockets of many provincial treasurers.
> The huge reservoir of funds generated by the Canada Pension Plan provides a cash flow which continues almost independent of the business cycle. Hence, over-all government spending and taxing measures are out of control of the normal constraints of the legislature.
> Many who favour government control and operation of various parts of the economy criticize free enterprise for its failings and then engage in operations which undermine the free enterprise system. Intragovernment borrowing and the process of short-circuiting the free market by borrowing from the funds of the Canada Pension Plan illustrate this trend. If a province needs funds, it should deal directly in the market. Borrowing from the Canada Pension Plan funds represents an intermingling of two different functions—the needs of the provincial treasuries and the rights of the provincial treasuries and the rights of the pension fund contributors. If a provincial government borrows at an advantageous rate, obviously the pension fund is lending at a disadvantageous rate.

It is extremely important that the savings of Canadians which are collected by way of premiums should be invested at a proper rate of return for the benefit of the contributors. For many citizens the Canada Pension Plan will be their main source of income when they retire and they have the right to receive the best possible return on their money. As has been stated, the regulations governing borrowing from the Quebec fund are different and result in a greater flow of income to that fund. Quebec is to be congratulated in this respect. If similar measures are not taken by the federal government, Canadians in other provinces should demand that their provinces set up separate funds, as has been done in Quebec. If people in the rest of Canada are to receive benefits similar to those paid in the province of Quebec, contributions will need to be raised. I continue to quote from the article as follows:

> If the provinces did not borrow these funds there would be an incentive to maximize the yield of them and the money would obviously flow to the most productive and rewarding sectors of the economy. All pension funds should be encouraged to "work harder." They should be invested as efficiently as possible. The entire economy would benefit if these funds were handled by the free market in place of the bureaucrats.

The Canada Pension Plan would have to be amended to permit each province to run its own fund. If the yields on the pension funds could be improved, a near certainty under a free enterprise regime, contributions could be decreased or benefits raised.

If the Canada Pension Plan were revised and each province were able to operate its share of the pension fund independently of governments, pensioners no longer would be deprived of a fair return on their savings. However, such an arrangement could cause difficulties with respect to portability as individuals move between provinces. Under the national medicare plan, contributions vary from province to province and the same could apply under the Canada Pension Plan. To prevent pensioners from flocking to provinces paying the highest benefits, there would have to be some residence requirements so that, for example, a person would draw benefits from the province where he made the majority of his contributions for the last five years of his working career.

The beneficial effects of decentralized control as they could develop here are well known. The free market could provide very beneficial results, not only to the pensioners, but to the Canadian economy as well. At the present, there is real irony in a situation which allows governments to disregard the best interests of pension plan contributors. After all, the only purpose of government should be to help its citizens, not unnecessarily harm them.

I think that what we have here is careless handling of the contributions of a great number of Canadians to a national program to which they have no choice but to belong, unless they happen to be members of the Old Order Mennonite Brethren or the Hutterian Brethren sects at the present time. The plan is compulsory. If you offend against the legislation, you should know what the penalty is in advance. I suggest there is no more public document than the statutes of Canada and that the penalty should be written into those statutes. The government should not be able to lend money at ridiculously low interest rates on the one hand, and be able arbitrarily to charge extremely high penalties against those who may, for any number of reasons, have neglected to make the contributions required under this generally compulsory piece of legislation.

Mr. Norval Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my remarks with regard to this prescribed rate. It does not apply to a great deal of money, but I am concerned really with the principle of the matter, with the fact that the government insists on a prescribed rate rather than, as suggested in the motion, a rate of 7 per cent. The government appears to be preoccupied with high interest rates. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) pointed out in a speech made a week end or two ago, he is out to lick inflation. I think he used even stronger terms than that and said he practically had it licked already. He has said that before, so I suppose it is easy for him to do this. This follows the pattern of the increase in the interest rate of the Farm Credit Corporation on April 1 from 7 per cent to 8¼ per cent. I am sure the farm improvement loans people are very anxious for October 1 to come so they can increase the interest rate on farm machinery and equipment loans.

It is very unfortunate, but high interest rates that are intended to slow down inflation only work if the amount of money lent decreases. If the amount of money requested and granted continues to flow at the same very high rate, then a high interest rate is a real contributor to inflation rather than being something that slows down or stops inflation. High interest rates mean increased cost for producers. Particularly at a time when everyone is concerned about the cost of food in Canada, we have the government actually increasing the cost of food by increasing the producers' cost of production. The producers are caught in a bind because they are trying to spend large sums of capital to bring down the cost per item, per bushel or whatever it is. These producers are faced with a labour shortage because people will not work in the agricultural industry. This government is really preoccupied with high interest rates and with trying to lick inflation by increasing the cost of money.

As the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) mentioned, each province is allowed to borrow money from the Canada Pension Plan fund at the low interest rate of 5 per cent. It is of interest to note that the government insists on having a prescribed rate in this legislation, yet provinces are able to borrow at 5 per cent. My own province of Saskatchewan appears to have borrowed almost every dollar the people of the province contributed to the fund. They borrowed $24 million in 1966-67, and in 1972-73 they borrowed from the fund $43.2 million, precisely the amount paid into the fund by the residents of Saskatchewan in the form of contributions.

If we are to get things back on the road and stop inflation, I doubt very much whether we can get food costs down by increasing production if we have a tight money supply and a high interest rate. This simply adds to the cost of everything produced. Thus, I caution the government against high interest rates in these areas. I think the people in the prairie provinces—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member, but I have to interrupt him since it is four o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether there would be consent to continuing long enough to finish debate on motion No. 3.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): No, Mr. Speaker. My reason is that other members of parliament who do not happen to be here this Friday afternoon are also interested in the debate and should be given an opportunity to participate. If they had known the debate would continue, I am sure they would have been here. Since they are not here, I do not think we should take it upon ourselves to exclude them from contributing to the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Nonsense.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): In your opinion, Stanley.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous consent, the Chair will call it four o'clock. The House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

Mr. Foster: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there are a couple of private members who have bills before the House to change the name of their ridings, namely, Bill C-277 and Bill C-281. I wonder whether we might deal with those two bills before going on to the notice of motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas). I think there is general agreement to do this, if it could be put to the House.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to accommodate the hon. members who have private bills, but on the understanding that it will be a very short debate and that we can then proceed with the debate that has been scheduled.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make the same condition. We are prepared to agree to this, but I think in fairness to the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) it should be on the understanding that we put those two bills through their various stages without debate.

Mr. McKinley: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is quite agreeable. I want to assure Your Honour and the House that in the absence of the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Frank) I have his written consent to move the bill on his behalf.

● (1600)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding is that there is unanimous consent to proceed as suggested by hon. members who have taken part in the discussion on the point of order, that is, these bills be considered immediately, without debate, through all stages including committee of the whole.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) has volunteered to act as Chairman of committee of the whole when we reach that stage in a moment.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER TO EVALUATE PENSION FUND

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of appointing an independent commissioner to make a full evaluation of the benefits structure and financing of the Canadian National Railways pension fund, such evaluation containing recommendations on the benefits structure, including the retired pensioners, and methods of financing its benefits recommendations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to ask for any concession in exchange for my co-operation, but I do hope the display of co-operation and efficiency we have just witnessed harbours the acceptance of my motion by the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): I have one supporter anyway, Mr. Speaker. At the outset I want to emphasize that although in my motion I refer specifically to the CN pension plan, what I have to say is equally applicable to the Canadian Pacific pension plan and the CP pensioner. I would also point out that the severe restrictions placed on private members proposing anything that might be construed as a charge on the public purse hampered me considerably in the wording of my motion. Had I been sure that it would have been acceptable to the chair, I would have move that the government immediately appoint a commissioner, etc.

The minister has been considering the advisability of this for far too long. What the pensioner wants now is action to help offset the erosion of his pension by the increasing cost of living. When an opposition member files a notice of motion of this type, the odds are less than 50-50 that it will ever be debated. It must survive the draw and come out with a fairly high priority to have even a chance of coming up for debate. While my motion survived the lottery with a reasonable placing, I still felt that by the time it was called for debate the government would have ordered such an inquiry and this motion would be redundant.

Surely a government which professes such concern for the workingman would long ago have taken steps to order such an inquiry—an inquiry which was approved, in principle at least, by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) last August 31 when the House was discussing the back to work legislation. The minister has since then indicated many times in the House and at public meetings that he recognizes the necessity of such an inquiry and seemed prepared to appoint a commissioner. It appeared that action was imminent and that this motion would be a fait accompli.

On February 11, 1974, in Edmonton, the minister said:

I am giving full consideration to the calling of a complete inquiry into railway pensions. In scope, it would cover all the details of benefit cost and funding. Through this vehicle of inquiry, I would hope that the parties concerned would then be in possession of all the facts. Then when the bargaining is once again opened, they would be able to sit down at the bargaining table with the findings and recommendation at their disposal.

It is now very apparent that the minister is in no hurry to initiate such an inquiry, for on April 11 his parliamentary secretary, in the adjournment debate, made it very clear that the minister is prepared to toss the whole matter of pensions back to the railways and the unions before he makes any recommendation. This is a direct contradiction of the minister's statement to which I have just referred. The parties involved have argued the pension issue for years and have always ended up at loggerheads over the issue of cost. This is why the unions wanted the Deutsch terms of reference broadened to determine the costs of the various proposals and the ability of the fund to carry them.

Until these facts are known, what in the world is the point of starting further discussions—discussions, incidentally, at which the retired pensioner will not be represented? The minister seemed to recognize this when he said that only when both parties are in possession of all the facts should they again sit down at the bargaining table. By the minister's own admission, the parties involved must be supplied with further facts and figures. These can only come from a thorough investigation made by a completely independent person who is knowledgeable of pension funds. I cannot accept the minister's view, as stated by his parliamentary secretary, that the parties involved want further discussions.

Certainly from everything I have heard from the unions and the pensioner's associations they are fed up with discussion and now demand a completely independent inquiry. I strongly suspect that the minister is hedging, perhaps under pressure by the companies, and that he has no real intention of taking early action. Certainly from the mail I have been receiving from employees and pensioners there is no indication that these people want further discussion. They want action, now.

If the minister has his way, it would be a direct negation of the pious claims in respect of his government's concern for those whom inflation hits hardest, the pensioners on fixed incomes. The minister's colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), has recognized the necessity of adjusting pensions annually to meet the rising cost of living. Legislation recently passed to remove the 2 per cent limit on annual escalation has enabled the government to adjust the pensions of people already retired to cover cumulative increases built up since their retirement. More than once in this House the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has proudly proclaimed that he has eased the burden of inflation for all federal pensioners by indexing the cost of living. But, whether deliberately or not, he consistently overlooks one large group who, for all practical purposes, have been federal employees but have not received the same treatment.

I refer, of course, to the thousands of retired railway employees and their widows or survivors. These people seem to be in limbo. The companies are no longer interested in them and the unions do not worry about them once they stop paying dues. One has only to look at the recent wage agreements: nowhere is there any mention of the retired pensioner. The reason is obvious: there was no one to speak for them. This is one reason I have never been happy about including pensions in the general negotiation. They should be negotiated separately with a third party, the pensioner, given full negotiating rights.

Lest any member think that relatively few are affected, I would refer to Hansard of May 1, 1974, and the answer to question No. 20. This return shows that 25,912 people are currently drawing CN pensions. Double this figure to allow for wives, and we have over 50,000 people directly involved—not counting, of course, the children who may be involved. Remember, this is the CN only. Other railway pensioners are not included. Now for the real shocker: 258 are receiving less than $25 a month, and 130 are getting $25 a month. So a total of 400 people are getting $25 a month or less. At today's inflated prices this would barely buy one bag of groceries.

Let us look a little further. We find that there are 6,096 pensioners, or almost 25 per cent of the total, getting less than $100 a month. Surely neither the CN nor the government can be very proud of this situation. But what is the minister's reaction to repeated requests for help for these people? Nothing more than to suggest further discussion between companies and unions with the pensioner out in the cold, literally and figuratively. But this is not too surprising in view of this government's track record of treatment of railway pensioners.

Admittedly, there have been some improvements. The 2 per cent retroactive escalation announced in 1972 and 1973, while not enough to offset the cost of living, was at least a start. But now that the legal restrictions have been removed there is nothing to prevent railway pensioners receiving full cost of living escalation similar to other retired federal employees. The minister's suggestion for further discussion will not remedy this situation.

Mr. Speaker, I am beginning to wonder if the government is trying to sucker us into settling for the proposal put forward in Bill C-139 in the name of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Guay). Certainly the publicity given this bill far outweighs its importance as an instrument to improve the CN pension plan. Let us take a brief look at Bill C-139. It seeks to amend the Pension Benefits Standards Act so that the CNR will no longer be required to meet the funding provisions. The bill quite obviously has its genesis as a result of statements made by Mr. MacMillan, then president of CN, before the standing committee on transport last December. At that time, Mr. MacMillan stated that one reason CN pensions are not as good as civil service plans is that CN is required to fund its pensions annually while civil service plans are not. He inferred that if this situation were changed the CN plan would be improved. But, Mr. Speaker, when I tried to pin Mr. MacMillan down to a definite promise to improve the plan the following exchange took place:

MR. THOMAS (MONCTON): But you are saying that if you did not have to comply with that act, you could improve your pension, so what would you do? How would you improve the pension.

MR. MACMILLAN: I think the removal of us from the requirement to comply with the Pension Benefits Standards Act would be for the purposes, presumably, of our pensions coming into line with the civil service pension and in those circumstances in so far as they lent themselves to commercial activity—and I do not know whether this is material or not, because I am not intimately familiar with the civil service fund—it would be exactly the same and the rules under which we would be operating our pension fund would be those which presumably apply today to the civil service fund.

If members of the House have gathered anything from this, I wish they would let me know what their interpretation is; but certainly it is hardly a promise to improve the pension fund. It is quite obvious that Mr. MacMillan did not commit the CN to increasing pension benefits if the funding provision was removed. His position was simply that if the CN was not obligated to fund its plan annually, it would be in a position to make improvements.

So while the objective of C-139 is commendable—and I support it fully—let us recognize it for what it is. It is not fair to raise the hopes of thousands of people, those who are mailing cards to their members of parliament asking for support of the bill because it will allow the CN to improve their pension plan. I would point out that there is a great difference between "allow" and "take action". We have no assurance that the CN, having been given this financial relief, will in turn reciprocate by increasing pension benefits. I would feel much more kindly disposed toward the bill if the government had introduced it as a government bill. Then it would have some clout.

Mr. Speaker, let us not be sidetracked by red herrings across the trail. Let us stop stalling and come to grips with the situation. There is no doubt in my mind that railway pensions must be improved. As Dr. Deutsch pointed out in his report, the object of any pension fund must be to protect the purchasing power of those who are contributing. This principle has been embodied in the Old Age Security Act, in family allowances and in pensions payable out of the consolidated revenue fund. It is only logical that it be extended to all public employees, be they in the public service or in Crown corporations. We must now extend the cost of living index escalation to the CN pensioner in the same way it has been granted to other public service pensioners. But, Mr. Speaker, we must not be satisfied with merely adjusting pensions annually to meet the cost of living. Many pensioners who have been retired for some years are trying to exist on pitifully low pensions. Surely in this age of social awarenesss we cannot let these people suffer. Their pensions should be increased substantially, immediately.

● (1620)

The report of the standing committee in 1970 suggested one means of financing improved benefits. It recommended that the surplus amortization payments, at that time $7 million, be used to improve pension benefits. This report was unanimously adopted by the House and I suggest that the government now instruct the CN to comply with its recommendations.

The commission I am requesting would make a complete investigation of pension benefits, and I would suggest the following changes in addition to the cost of living escalation mentioned earlier. All participants in the pension plan should be entitled to equal benefits; therefore, the 2 per cent formula should be retroactive to the first day of service. Survivor benefits should be increased to at least 75 per cent and should be extended to the survivors of the old provident fund members who do not receive any benefits. Surely some means can be found to relieve the plight of these unfortunate people. There should be provisions in the plan for early retirement without severe penalty, and there should be some mechanism for periodic review to keep the program abreast of changing conditions. Perhaps this could be done through separate negotiations in which the three parties involved, company, union and pensioner would participate.

Mr. Speaker, these changes are the minimum required to bring railway pensions up to the equivalent of public service plans. They will cost money. How much or where it is to come from is not for me to say. I am not going to get involved in the argument between company and union over the use or misuse of the funds. I listened to this for weeks during the committee hearings in 1970 and, frankly, I was just as confused when it was all over, as were most other members of the committee. This is a task which must be done by an independent team of experts in pension problems. As the Minister of Labour has said—

Matters concerning pensions, with their complex and intricate funding systems are often confusing, not only to the rank and file, but frequently to all but a small group of actuaries and administrators.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, speaking to the Canadian pension conference last November, had this to say:

Since we are dealing with other people's hard earned money, dollars they are foregoing for present advantage in expectation of future protection during a much more vulnerable period, we owe it to our contributors to do not only what is minimally required, but what is maximally possible and feasible.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy that the Minister of Labour, in his remarks quoted earlier, has recognized the fact that reforms are necessary and because of the complexity of the problem outside expert advice is needed. Let him now heed the words of his colleague and do what is maximally possible and feasible. Let him keep faith with the railway employees and pensioners by immediately setting up the inquiry which he admits he has been considering for many months.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, first I would just like to point out that I have been paying into the pension fund since 1939, and when I was hired by the CNR I tried to emphasize that we should all do something with regard to pensions. At that time railway employees were interested in two things: miles and money. When the war was on, the mileage clauses were abolished and the requirement was for anywhere from 5,000 to 6,000 miles. The boys were not interested in pensions. This has been building up for years.

Our position on the matter is that further departmental consideration is required and that further discussions with the unions and the companies will be needed before a final decision can be made. In the latter case, the time involved in the continuing proceedings before Mr. Justice Hall is inhibiting discussions before they are arranged. The reason for this is that there were several suggestions in the Hall report. Mr. Justice Hall suggested that the unions and the company get together. This is what they are doing at present. They will take a look at pensions.

The government has been giving consideration to the advisability of appointing a commission of inquiry to review details of benefit costs and funding of pension plans covering Canadian railway employees in general, not just those employed by Canadian National Railways. A number of factors have to be weighed carefully before a final decision can be made. Not only is the Department of Labour involved, but also the Ministry of Transport through its general responsibility for Crown corporations in the transportation industry, and the department of insurance which administers the Pension Benefits Standards Act. This is the first time they have bargained for pensions. I disagree with this, but the hon. member sat in the committee with us and he knows that we lost the argument. I think it is wrong, for the simple reason that a general chairman who is bargaining for money might trade benefits for a few cents per hour increase in wages. I disagree with this because in the case of an employee who has been around for 35 or 40 years, any union representative who wants to go up the union ladder should be separate from the contract because pensions are pensions and certainly should not be the subject of bargaining in this case.

In addition, a collective bargaining relationship is concerned involving national railway negotiating groups and railway companies. A number of railway pension plan improvements have been instituted over the years. The most recent improvements resulted for the first time from a collectively bargained agreement and railway union leaders obtained significant advances for their members. However, areas of concern still remain and the following categories of complaint have been made to the Department of Labour and are listed in their order of importance. First, improvement of the 2 per cent benefit from the date of hiring rather than from 1956. Second, cost of living provision so that pensions are adjusted based on increased cost of living. Third, increased benefits for persons presently in receipt of pensions. Fourth, an increase above the present 50 per cent for survivor benefits.

All these points have merit and union leadership will no doubt pursue them in future rounds of bargaining. However, all these points have their cost and this has to be taken into account when bargaining improvements. The complexities of the costing of pension benefits is demonstrated by the need found in the recent railway arbitration proceedings to refer an examination of cost figures to a separate inquiry under Dr. John Deutsch. Some railway workers believe that pension benefits should not be bargained as such and that more could be obtained by relying on the previous system under which pensions were a distinct issue and not bargained. However, the recently bargained improvements have given railway workers pension plans which are in some ways among the best to be found in Canadian industry. In any event, to bargain or not is really an issue for the unions and their membership to decide themselves under the democratic means provided in their constitutions.

A number of individual railway workers do not fully understand the financing and funding of pension plans, and with regard to many of the figures that the hon. member quoted I may say that many of these people did not even pay into the pension fund. The Pension Standards Benefits Act requires a certain level of funding which will ensure the viability of pension plans in federal industries. Such viability entails provision for participants in the plan being assured of benefits they have paid for being available, irrespective of what happens to the company concerned.

While it is not suggested that the CNR is in danger of going out of business, to remove it from the requirements of the act would have implications for other companies in the public and private sectors, including those outside the railway industry. Naturally, the requirement to fund under the act results in sizeable accumulations of assets, particularly in large-scale companies, and some individuals feel such assets could be used to improve benefits. However, to use such assets would defeat the purpose of the act, which is to provide a fund to ensure viability.

In addition, some believe that large-scale companies can provide for improved benefits, without touching funded assets, just because they are large. In the case of Crown corporations it is felt that additional financing could be provided from public sources where necessary. However, as mentioned before, pensions do have costs. Normal business principles must be applied. The public purse can only provide so much. Likewise, private companies have their financial limitations. Furthermore, to provide benefits in the CNR which would seriously distort the relationship with benefits in other major companies, particularly the CPR, could have serious repercussions for industrial peace.

In brief, pension plans available to CNR employees, and to CPR employees for that matter, provide good benefits in relation to those offered in comparable plans. Areas for improvement exist, but future bargaining will likely take these into account along with other demands that railway workers might make. An inquiry could provide useful information to the parties involved. Consideration is being given to the establishment of such an inquiry, but a number of interdepartmental factors are being weighed. Also, as has been pointed out in the House, certain aspects of the 1973 railway arbitration proceedings are still under way and are involving both companies and unions in a heavy workload.

Regarding the history of Canadian National Railways pension plans, before 1935 the company operated a non-contributory pension plan which provided a benefit of 1 per cent of the highest ten consecutive years' earnings, for each year of service, with a minimum of $25 per month. In 1935 the company introduced a new plan which preserved the previous plan's benefits as a past service benefit based on service before 1935, and the highest ten years' earnings before 1935. The minimum pension of $25 per month was preserved for pre-1935 employees and for employees hired after January 1, 1935, who were not past age 45. The new plan provided for employee contributions up to 10 per cent of earnings by employees with ten years' service, with up to 5 per cent matched by the company. These contributions, plus interest, would provide an amount which could be purchased on approved actuarial tables.

On January 1, 1947, this plan was amended to provide for employee contributions in the first ten years, but with no contributions from the company during that period. On January 1, 1952, the plan was again amended by adding to the foregoing part I the following alternative part II:

For a contribution of 5 per cent of earnings an employee would receive a percentage of his last five or ten years' earnings, whichever was higher. The percentage was the total of (i) one per cent a year for the first 20 years, (ii) one and a quarter per cent a year for the next ten years and 1½ per cent for each extra year.

All employees at January 1, 1952, were allowed to transfer to part II and new employees could transfer within the first ten years. To receive full credit for service after 1934, the employee had to pay 5 per cent of earnings back to 1934 or date of hire. However, a reduced pension was payable if the full arrears were not met. I should like to say at this time that all the union officials went across the country and we pleaded with CNR employees to pay into the pension scheme. I had to pay back 9½ years myself. Employees retiring before January 1, 1952, were allowed to have their pensions recalculated under the part II formula. More than half of the employees did not elect to transfer in 1952. Many continued to qualify only for the minimum pension.

The part II rules were revised in 1959. Contributions of 5 per cent to part II became compulsory for new employees after January 1, 1959. All employees at December 31, 1958, not under part II were given one year to transfer to part II. The earnings base was revised to the last 60 months or any five consecutive years, whichever is larger. Part II was amended on January 1, 1961, to provide for deferred pensions on termination with 15 years' service, where service plus age totalled 60 or more.

On April 1, 1962, the Pension accumulation rate was amended to 1¼ per cent a year for the first 30 years and 1½ per cent for each extra year. Contributions were increased to 5½ per cent of earnings. On June 1, 1965, the accumulation rate was revised to 1½ per cent for each year. The contribution rate was increased to 6½ per cent. On January 1, 1966, the plan was revised to co-ordinate with the Canada and Quebec pension plans. The benefit remained at 1½ per cent for service before 1966. After January 1, 1966, the benefit became 1 per cent for earnings covered under the CPP or QPP, and 1½ per cent for earnings not covered. The contribution rate became 5 per cent on covered earnings under the public plans, and 6½ per cent on excess earnings.

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications dealt with the question of the Canadian National Railways' pension fund and tabled its fourteenth report on September 9, 1970. Further improvements to the CN plan were made during the time the standing committee was holding hearings and following this report. These recommendations were as follows.

1. Effective January 1, 1971, the pensions of 1959 plan employees retired before 1970 were increased by 2 per cent per year since retirement. The basic pensions of 1935 plan employees retired before 1970 were increased by 100 per cent for employees retired before 1966 and by lesser percentages for those retired after 1965. Survivors under the 1959 and 1935 plans received comparable increases. The company estimated the costs of these improvements at $5.2 million per annum from January 1, 1971.

2. Pensions paid on early retirement occurring after October 1, 1970, were no longer subject to reduction if retirement took place at or after age 60. For retirements before age 60 the reduction was related to the employee's potential service to age 60, and not 65 as previously. The eligibility conditions for early retirement were unchanged. The company estimated this improvement to cost $1.45 million per annum.

3. Beginning September 1, 1970, for the period up to October 31, 1971, active members of the 1935 plan and retired employees who had been contributing members of the 1935 plan were given the option of joining the 1959 plan. Of approximately 18,000 union members canvassed, 9,000 transferred to the 1959 plan. The additional annual cost of this provision is estimated at $6.6 million.

4. Age and service limitations were eliminated for employees killed in the performance of their duties.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend most warmly the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) on presenting this motion this afternoon. I also congratulate him for making an excellent speech. As for the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner), I liked the parts of his speech where he was speaking for himself and as an employee of Canadian National Railways. I cannot say that I was so enthusiastic about the statement that he seemed to be giving us, the effect of which was to excuse the delay of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) in keeping his commitment to appoint a commissioner along the lines suggested in the motion of the hon. member for Moncton.

May I join with the hon. member for Moncton in stressing the point that although his motion refers to Canadian National Railways and to the pension fund of that organization, so far as those of us who are interested are concerned, we think of the motion as including the Canadian Pacific Railway, the old ICR, the Northern Alberta Railways, perhaps the Ontario Northland, and any other railways there are in this country.

An hon. Member: The B.C. Railway?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All right, add the British Columbia Railway as well. We are concerned about the pensions of railway employees in Canada for whatever railway they worked or are working.

● (1640)

The hon. member for Moncton pointed out that the Minister of Labour made a statement on this matter in Edmonton on February 11 when he indicated his readiness to appoint a commissioner to make a thorough study of railway pensions in their entirety. That was not the first time the Minister of Labour had made that commitment. The first time was on the floor of this House at the end of August, 1973, when we were dealing with the railway strike that was then in progress. The very day that the minister announced the appointment of Dr. John Deutsch as commissioner on a very narrow point having to do with the strike we pressed him to enlarge Dr. Deutsch's terms of reference, or for the appointment of another commissioner to go into the whole broad question of railway pensions.

I think it is not unfair to the minister to say that he agreed on that occasion and asked us to wait until the strike was over. He did agree, however, to the appointment of a commissioner who would have broad terms of reference having to do with railway pensions as a whole. The minister first made that commitment in the House at the end of August, 1973, and he made it again in Edmonton on February 11, 1974. He made it on two other occasions in this House in answer to questions of mine, once on March 11 and again on March 22, and he made it again in my hearing at a meeting of railway pensioners in Winnipeg on Sunday, March 24.

I have to say that every time the Minister of Labour has made this commitment he has done a certain amount of hedging and has asked for time, for the opportunity to discuss it further with the companies and the unions; but even so, the promise was always there. The recommendation has been made that this is the sort of thing that is necessary, and the hon. member for Moncton has underlined it this afternoon. I think, Mr. Speaker, there should not be any further delay in the appointment of such a commissioner. I hope, for example, that the Canadian National Railways any day now will announce its 1974 cost of living escalation and that it will be equal to the full percentage rise in the cost of living. Even after that has been done it is not the end of the story. That is just one item and there are all the other matters relating to railway pensions that in my view need to be gone into by an independent commissioner. The very history of the Canadian National Railways pension fund given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour is not only interesting but it demonstrates that the plan has been built up like Topsy, and that it deserves a very thorough review.

Mr. Speaker, this is private members' hour when we have to watch the clock and make sure, not only that we do not talk the motion out but that we do not make it easy for someone else to talk it out—so I am going to cut short my remarks. As Your Honour knows, when I get on the subject of pensions it is difficult to terminate my remarks. But the hon. member for Moncton put the case very well today and I simply underline what he said. I think that probably the first thing that needs to be done is to get an escalation of the pensions of those now retired, for 1974. It must be equal to the full rise in the cost of living and it must come soon. When the Canadian National Railways do it, by gad the CPR had better do it too, even if we have to get Pierre Berton into the act. Perhaps he could help us.

After that has been dealt with, there is the question of the basic formula by which pensions are calculated. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour went over the details of how it has been changed, in the case of the CNR, from a non-contributory formula down through the various forms, and the difference between 1½ per cent, 1¼ per cent and 1 per cent. In my view, there is no substitute for a pension that provides for at least 2 per cent for each year of service back to the beginning—no ifs, ands or buts about it. Even after we have a proper formula for the calculation of pensions, there is the point that the hon. member for Moncton raised, and this was dealt with in the standing committee a few years ago, to the effect that many of those who are now on pension need not only an escalation of what they are getting but the basic calculation needs to be done again. The hon. member for Moncton pointed out that we have pinpointed a way in which this can be done. We pointed to certain millions of dollars that were available and we said even before arriving at a new formula that those on low pensions should have them increased. As I say, we showed where there were millions of dollars that could be used for this purpose.

Then there is the question of survivors' pensions. I have the feeling we are making headway in terms of getting public support for this idea. A few years ago it was accepted that widows on pensions, if they were given them at all, were given 50 per cent. But that is not acceptable any longer. Even now, when we say it should be at least 75 per cent, I say why not 100 per cent? If a pension has been earned by one spouse, why should it be cut to 50 per cent after death? Why should it not continue at full value, whatever spouse survives? I think this point has to be stressed very strongly. I do not see how we in this place, where we have a plan that provides 60 per cent for our widows, can countenance a pension of only 50 per cent for survivors of pensioners of the railways.

I think early retirement plans have to be reviewed and I think the relationship among railway pensions, the Canada Pension Plan and old age security, where there is integration, needs to be sorted out. That gets us back to the whole point of the motion before us this afternoon, namely, that this commissioner should be appointed. That is what the hon. member for Moncton asked for in his motion, and that is what the Minister of Labour promised this House last August—a promise which he reaffirmed in Edmonton on February 11, gave us again on March 11 and on March 22, and which I heard him enunciate in Winnipeg on March 24. I do not think there should be any further delay in the appointment of that commissioner, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to speak on this motion after such excellent proponents of a pension scheme for Canadians in general and railway employees in particular have put their ideas before us. I have heard three excellent speeches, each one different because of the backgrounds of the speakers.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is an expert on pensions. I have listened to him both in the House and in committee with interest and respect. I do not think he has said anything today with which I could disagree. In the same way, the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) has championed the need of CNR employees for proper pension plans, and I think most of his statements are also fairly acceptable. The hon.

member for London East (Mr. Turner) did an excellent job of reviewing the history of the whole matter.

There are so many facets to this whole question of pensions that if we plumped for this investigation or inquiry into the Canadian National employees' pensions it would not necessarily follow that it would look after employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway and all the other railways that come into the picture in Canada. I do not think this is a high enough term of reference. The whole question of railway employees should be looked at in a comprehensive manner and not narrowed down to employees of one company.

● (1650)

What is more, this inquiry is not only a matter of railway pensions. That is a very narrow view to take. Railway pensions are a very small part of the whole pension scheme in Canada. Railway pensions at the present time indirectly come under the aegis of the Department of Labour, although CNR is a Crown corporation. There are other matters that must fit into each other and make them dovetail. We have the instance of the unions and employees in general.

I have been talking to union representatives in my constituency. Although they are not railway unions, they have the same problems. They are pushing for proper wages and pensions for their union members. I have taken up their representations with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). Their questions were mainly about how their company plans for pension on retirement fit in with the Canada Pension Plan and old age security in general plus the guaranteed income supplement. They were worried about the possibility of a reduction in the amount of GIS. That is a very big question which worries everyone.

As we get further along with our social security program in the next few years we will realize that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been pushing for a very good point, namely, a guaranteed annual income for Canadians and lowering of the pensionable age. I am in favour of both. However, you cannot take them out of context with the other types of retirement plans, both private and those of industrial companies. The main point is not just saying we have to raise pensions to give people more money on which to retire. That has to be part of a comprehensive review of the over-all picture of inflation in the economy in general as well as the size of contributions, the rise in the cost of living and the rise in the inflationary rate. A great many things have to come into this discussion which I have not mentioned at all today.

With regard to the question of social security, as hon. members know there has been a gradual increase over the past few years. We have made a great surge forward by recognizing the needs of people through the increasing cost of living. The government has taken cognizance of these facts. Under the Minister of National Health and Welfare we have not only had the introduction of the bills which members know about, but the increase in the old age pension and the indexing. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) comes into the picture with a reduction in the number of people on the income tax rolls and increased deductions. In other words, it has been made much easier for people when they reach retirement age.

It is important to realize that the aim of the Minister of National Health and Welfare is to take a very comprehensive view of the whole matter of social security. His working paper, the orange booklet which members know about, indicates that he is taking a comprehensive view. We will be debating many recommendations contained in it. The situation will certainly change from time to time and from year to year. There is no such thing as a perfect act or policy, but it is important that we have a stable approach to the policies which envisage an improvement in our social security scheme.

On the question of railway pensions, you cannot get away from the fact that there must be a comprehensive review of the whole problem and how it relates to unions. The unions have good advice for the employees. After the rail strike settlement last summer there was good arbitration. The railway workers returned to work. They are as good citizens as you or I. They simply felt they were not being properly looked after. One of the reasons the minister has not instituted this over-all review of all the railways in the pension plan is that some things are still coming out of the arbitration process. These are being discussed with the unions and employers. In my opinion, the hon. member is quite wrong in calling for this—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. It being five o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order this House stands adjourned until two o'clock on Monday afternoon.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MacINNIS (CAPE BRETON-EAST RICHMOND)—POSITION OF CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION ON BENEFITS FOR FORMER EMPLOYEES

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the rights and prerogatives of parliamentary committees and one which reflects on the word of two ministers of the Crown.

First, the Cape Breton Development Corporation has constantly suggested, as in a release dated May 29, 1973, that the matter of the benefits for former Devco employees is "a matter of negotiation between the corporation and the union". There is no one union involved. The present Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) arranged for a delegation of five former Devco employees to appear before the regional development committee at public expense, representing former Devco employees but not constituting or representing any one union. The former minister stated in the House on January 29, 1970 that the group involved was "a small group of superannuated employees", and that they had no connection with the United Mine Workers of America who had made no request in the name of those pensioners.

Devco has attempted to contradict both the present and the former minister, and has put forward the illusion that they have things well in hand. In addition to this distortion of the situation perpetuated by Devco, the corporation has insinuated that the committee is interfering in the legitimate bargaining process by investigating the inadequacy and illegality of the pre-retirement benefits paid by Devco. As the chairman of the committee stated in a letter to Mr. Kent, the committees "are not answerable to government departments or agencies".

This question of the supremacy of parliament and its committees over government bureaucracies, and the obligation of agencies accurately to describe the situation, must be settled once and for all, Mr. Speaker. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir):

That the matter of the affront of the Cape Breton Development Corporation and its president to the Standing Committee on Regional Development, and to two ministers of the Crown, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I have sent a copy of this to the chairman of the committee and to the two ministers involved.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has provided the Chair with the required notice of his intention to raise this matter today by way of a question of privilege. The hon. member appreciates that what he is proposing now is that this motion be given priority over all other business now before the House of Commons and that a debate ensue on the suggested question of privilege.

I would hesitate very much to suggest to the hon. member that the grievance he has should be debated by the House at this time by way of a question of privilege. Perhaps he would allow the Chair to look at the matter within the next few hours and to study the notes the hon. member has submitted to the Chair for consideration before reaching a decision whether there is a prima facie case of privilege that would justify the putting of the motion proposed by the hon. member and a debate based on the hon. member's motion. Again I ask that he give the Chair an opportunity to look into the matter on his behalf and on behalf of all other members of the House.

[Later:]

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask for clarification by the parliamentary secretary. Perhaps I did not hear him correctly, but I understood that starred question No. 63 was to be answered. I see the minister is in the House. The question has been outstanding since some time in the last session. It concerns a lawyer in Nova Scotia who was listed as getting government business from the Liberal Party's slush fund and did not receive any. I think the minister should clarify for the House why he used this man's name.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, if we might return to starred questions, I now have the answer and will give it to the House.

Mr. Speaker: Has the parliamentary secretary unanimous consent of the House to return to this item of business for the purpose of allowing him to reply to the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

*INCLUSION OF NAME OF MR. A. D. McINNIS IN LIST OF LAWYERS DOING LEGAL WORK IN NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 63—Mr. Cossitt:

1. For what reason did the Minister of Justice list Mr. A. D. McInnis of Antigonish, Nova Scotia in answer to Question No. 2,279 of the First Session of the 29th Parliament as one of the lawyers doing legal work for the government between April 17, 1972 and March 31, 1973?

2. Is the Minister of Justice and his Department aware that Mr. McInnis did not do any legal work for the Department during the period of time mentioned and, if so, for what reason did the Minister state otherwise in answer to Question No. 2,279?

3. Are there any other names in addition to that of Mr. McInnis in the answer to Question No. 2,279 who in reality also did not do legal work for the government as stated?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Mr. McInnis had performed legal services in 1968 in respect of a particular property in the province of Nova Scotia. That work was completed and Mr. McInnis' account was paid. Subsequently, however, further and different legal work was required in respect of the same property and Mr. J. D. MacLennan was appointed to do that work. As Mr. McInnis' name was inadvertently left on the file the mistake in names was made.

The answer to part two is yes.

The answer to part three is as follows: Yes. The names of Mr. Edmund R. Saunders and Mr. James G. Hackett should also be deleted. Please see the answer to question No. 61.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICIAL OTTAWA RESIDENCE—PURPOSE OF CONSTRUCTION WORK

Question No. 89—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 2,601 of the First Session of the 29th Parliament what is the exact purpose of the construction work listed as being carried out in the year 1973-74 at the Prime Minister's official Ottawa residence and for what reasons is such construction deemed necessary?

2. Who made the decision that such construction is necessary and what individual or individuals will make use of or occupy any of the rooms being constructed or renovated?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. The answer to question No. 2,601 of the First Session of the twenty-ninth Parliament did not list construction work carried out in the year 1973-74 at the Prime Minister's Ottawa residence. The information on construction work is given in reply to question 87 including information on work or service performed.

2. A review of the work or service performed, as listed in reply to question 87, at the Prime Minister's residence, will reveal in detail the items of maintenance and refurbishing. The occupants of the residence, Canadian and international guests of the government of Canada as well as personal guests may from time to time make use of various areas of the residence.

2. What is the source of this information?

(c) The number of fatalities is 50.

2. Source of the above information is accidents reported to the Railway Transport Committee by the Railways.

TOLL-FREE CALLS TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Question No. 160—Mr. Forrestall:

Is it the intention of the government to give consideration to permit constituents to call the Ottawa office of their Member of Parliament toll-free?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The regulations governing the use of telephone communications are established by the House of Commons and administered by the Speaker on the advice of the Commissioner of Internal Economy. The question, therefore, is not one to which the government can respond.

NATIONAL REVENUE, TAXATION—EMPLOYMENT OF KEYPUNCH OPERATORS

Question No. 370—Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra):

On the last business day of each month from September, 1972 to September, 1973 inclusive (a) how many keypunch operators were employed in Ottawa by the Department of National Revenue, Taxation Division (b) how many keypunch operators, formerly employed in Ottawa by the Department of National Revenue, Taxation Division, were receiving unemployment insurance benefits?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Revenue, Taxation, and the Unemployment Insurance Commission as follows: (a) The number of keypunch operators employed in Ottawa at the last business day of each month for the period September 1972 to September 1973 inclusive was: September 1972, 135; October 1972, 136; November 1972, 398; December 1972, 127;

January 1973, 487, February 1973, 1101; March 1973, 1417; April 1973, 1395; May 1973, 1227; June 1973, 952; July 1973, 203; August 1973, 195; September 1973, 134. (b) Since the reply requires the identification of keypunch operators back to September 1972, extraction from the computer files is not feasible. Occupation coding was introduced only in December 1972, and became fully operational during the course of 1973. Therefore, the information requested is not readily available.

AIRPORTS—LANDING FEES

Question No. 414—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How much revenue was collected over the past three years, 1970-71, 1971-72 and 1972-73 in landing fees on private and general aviation aircraft under 5,000 pounds?

2. Under the new proposals presently being considered by the Department of Transport, which provide for a $100 annual landing fee, plus a $5 minimum landing fee at the international airports of Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver, how much revenue is anticipated on an annual basis?

3. What is the anticipated cost of administering and collecting fees under the new proposal?

4. On what date is the implementation of the new proposed regulations to be effective?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Landing fees for private aircraft under 5,000 pounds apply only at the Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver international airports. Statistical information on aircraft is compiled by weight categories of 4,000 pounds and under, and 4,001 pounds to 9,000 pounds, but is not segregated between private and general aviation aircraft. The revenue from all aircraft of 4,000 pounds and less at these three airports was as follows: 1970-71, $74,500; 1971-72, $73,500; 1972-73, $87,500.

2 and 4. Under the proposal, the anticipated annual revenue from all aircraft under 25,000 pounds for all ministry airports would have been $775,000. The proposal will not now be implemented. A study is to be made of landing fees for aircraft of all types and sizes on domestic, transborder and international flights.

3. The ministry is developing a centralized computer system for the invoicing and collection of air services fees. The allocated cost for the administration and collection of the landing fees of aircraft under 25,000 pounds would have been $35,000.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Ministry of Transport has not begun a review of its plans for expansion at Mount Hope airport, however a proposed study program and public dialogue program are being developed.

6. (a) What other methods were used in these investigations (b) what were the findings?

7. Will the findings be discussed with the individuals concerned?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): 1 to 7. It is not the policy of the RCMP to publicly divulge the names and/or details of investigations conducted in the pursuit of its responsibilities. Such a policy is aimed at not only protecting the rights of the persons concerned, but also ensuring that any inquiries or investigations are not jeopardized through unnecessary public release. However, the RCMP responsibilities in the spheres of security screening, counter-subversion, counter-espionage, and the protection of VIPs necessitates contact with various elements of Canadian society, including the mass media. Such contact can take the form of either a thorough and detailed investigation, or, it may involve the clarification of a lead arising out of another investigation. In the latter instance, the Security Service is obligated to follow up such leads to determine if they have any substances. Sometimes this can only be resolved through an inquiry with a responsible person, such as the individual's supervisor, a fellow employee or some other person who may have knowledge of the individual concerned. When such an inquiry is made, the individual contacted is under no obligation to render assistance. Furthermore, for the reasons mentioned previously, it is hoped that the person contacted will respect the confidentiality of the inquiry. If such an inquiry shows that there is substance to the lead, then further investigation is undertaken to acquire all the relevant details necessary to take whatever action may be required as dictated by the circumstances. Should the opposite be the case, then no further action is taken. Such procedure is standard whether the inquiry is of a criminal or a security nature and, as such varies little from the procedures utilized by members of the media itself when pursuing a potential news story. The undertaking of any inquiry is not an indication that the Security Service is singling out for investigation any specific individual or group.

CMHC—FUNDS SUPPLIED TO SOCIÉTÉ D'HABITATION DU QUÉBEC

Did the government, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, supply money to the Société d'habitation du Québec during each year 1968 to 1974 inclusive and, if so (a) are loans involved (b) what are the interest rates (c) what is the amount for each year (d) what are the terms of repayment?

Return tabled.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On two different occasions, April 16 and April 17, I brought up the statement the parliamentary secretary made in respect of question No. 319. On April 15 he stated that the reply to my question No. 319, which shows the inequities of this government toward the women of this country, cost the Canadian taxpayers $1.5 million. I rose on questions of privilege on April 16 and April 17 to protest that statement which represents interference with the right of members to seek information from the government. I deny that that statement is true. On April 17 the government House leader promised that the parliamentary secretary would furnish the House with an explanation of his extraordinary statement which was an attempt to intimidate me in carrying out my duties as a member of this chamber.

I ask that an explanation be forthcoming today. Failing that, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. If the statement of the parliamentary secretary cannot be substantiated, this is a serious breach of the privileges of all members of this chamber. I dislike being intimidated with impunity by this cornball from Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether we should have a debate on this matter at this time. The hon. member may have a grievance, but if he has a question of privilege he has not given notice in the ordinary way. I do not think a debate should arise on the question at this time.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, the only reason I have not brought up this matter before is that the parliamentary secretary was not in the House the last three or four times when order paper questions were called.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ACCURACY OF FORECAST BY MINISTER OF FINANCE OF RATE OF INFLATION IN 1973—FORECAST FOR 1974

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, now that we are approaching another budget and may get some more forecasts, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question about his forecasting apparatus. In view of the forecast relating to inflation for 1973 having been about the same as for 1972 or, the words of the minister, about 4.8 per cent, and the actual result turning out to be more than 50 per cent above that, according to the minister's own figure, 7.6 per cent, how is it that the minister's forecasting unit, about which he has boasted many times in the House, was so far wrong, and has the minister taken any precautions since then to improve the efficiency of the forecasters?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when it comes to the inflationary rate in 1973, no one around the world was able to forecast it in the extreme terms of world commodity prices, nor did anyone forecast the political and economic results of the Middle East war which resulted in the quasi-monopolistic practices of the Persian Gulf countries, all of which reasons in human terms influenced inflation a great deal. When it comes to the forecasting of the real growth of this country, the only institute or organization that was close to the forecast of the real growth in Canada in 1973 was the federal Department of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I watched the debate last night, and with extrasensory perception anybody is bound to be right once in a while.

An hon. Member: Even you, Bob?

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he will give us this afternoon or tonight a forecast of the rate of inflation in this country for the year 1974?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There are so many international factors involving the price of food—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: And the weather?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —and non-agricultural commodities and the way in which the prices of petroleum have to work their way through the world economy that anyone in any government would be rash to put a precise figure of the rate of inflation in 1974.

INFLATION—EFFECT OF INCREASE IN WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX ON CONSUMER PRICES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): As the Minister of Finance is well aware, the wholesale price index rose 1.5 per cent in the month of March or 25.7 per cent above the level a year earlier. This is a known factor; there is nothing unknown about it. Can the minister tell us to what extent he anticipates that this will work itself into higher consumer prices in Canada during the coming year?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Those wholesale prices will have to work their way in some ratio through the economy, not duplicating those figures, but obviously figures at that rate at the wholesale level will find their ultimate result in the retail figures. As I say, there will be a general ratio but not the same extravagant figures as we have in the wholesale index.

ENERGY

DECISION BY BOARD TO INCREASE OIL EXPORTS FOR MAY—INCREASE IN PRODUCTION—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of our declining oil reserves may I ask the minister why the government has authorized an increase in our oil exports for the month of May by approximately 200,000 barrels a day making a total of some 6 million barrels for the month of May? Since this has been a decision of the National Energy Board, was that decision approved by the government and, if so, why?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is a decision of the board on its own motivation under its responsibility to make a judgment each month on whether or not exports are surplus to Canadian requirements. I might also mention at the same time that the board has been conducting hearings as to the long-range reserve position of Canada and Canadian oil, and naturally its future conclusions in this regard will be guided by the result of these hearings.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, the long-term projections of the board have not been too accurate in the past. That surely does not deal with the matter of increasing exports for the month of May by 200,000 barrels per day. In view of the fact that half of this amount is because of the inventory that has been built up and which cannot be shipped to eastern Canada, why was it necessary to allow field production to increase by a similar amount in order to reach this 200,000 barrels a day?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member opposite remarks, of course the actual field production is a matter of judgment for the appropriate authorities in the producing provinces.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a last supplementary and will then attempt to complete the first round of questioning by seeing the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister if the right of the Alberta government, which undoubtedly it has, to set the production figures is going to determine how much our exports will be? The estimated production of crude oil for the month of May is 44.9 million barrels, and of byproducts 4.3 million barrels, which is 500,000 barrels more than in May, 1973, a record year. Does the minister consider that this is justified, or is this merely pressure from the oil industry which wants to ship out oil irrespective of Canada's future needs?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman may recall, May is not the best month with which to make a comparison because in 1973 the records were established in the later months. Basically the board's hearing are a prelude to a judgment on whether the present requirements of the law set out by parliament that exports will be allowable when surplus to Canadian requirements should be changed. As I already indicated to the hon. gentleman, this is a matter on which there has already been very extensive public testimony and on which the board is now re-examining its conclusions.

HISTORIC SITES

STEPS TO RESTORE OLD FORT VILLE-MARIE, TÉMISCAMINGUE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

In May of 1969, I asked him whether the government intended to rebuild the old fort in Ville-Marie, in the Témiscamingue region. Since five years of study have been spent on this matter, could the minister advise the House whether or not the government intends to rebuild this historic fort which is from 125 to 150 years old?

Mr. Speaker: I will allow the hon. minister to answer the question of the hon. member, but I doubt the urgency of his question. However, since the hon. member has asked it, I recognize the hon. minister.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, archeological studies have been made of this matter over the past few years. As for definite plans to rebuild this fort, we have not yet reached a final decision as to what is to be done in the immediate future. I shall inquire and advise the hon. member accordingly.

INCREASE IN WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX IN PAST YEAR—POSSIBILITY OF INTRODUCTION OF CONTINGENCY PLAN TO FIGHT INFLATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition and I would like to direct it to the Prime Minister. As the figures just produced by Statistics Canada show that the wholesale price index has gone up by more than 25 per cent in the last 12 months, does the Prime Minister not now consider that it is time to bring in the government's contingency plan for fighting inflation, which he described very clearly on Friday in the House, as recorded on page 2004 of Hansard, as "price and wage controls"?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to look at the same set of statistics, on pages 3 to 5 he will see borne out there what the MInister of Finance and myself have been saying all along, that without price and wage controls we have done enormously better than the United States with price and wage controls. Therefore the hon. member should listen to the advice of some of his own colleagues in his party and be a little less certain that wage and price controls in those circumstances will produce a better effect.

● (1430)

Mr. Hees: In view of the Prime Minister's answer, with which I agree not at all, I would ask him this question. If he is so convinced that wage and price controls will not work, why did he specify wage and price controls as the government's contingency plan when he spoke in the House on Friday?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it has been well known for at least a year that the government has set up a contingency plan which would involve—

Mr. Hees: Price and wage controls.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, price and wage controls. The government has always taken the line, which I repeated on Friday, that we would not resort to this except in extreme cases where the remedy itself would not be worse than the disease.

EFFECT OF LAST BUDGET ON FINANCIAL MARKETS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Finance. The minister was confident that his last budget would not bring pressure on the financial markets. Is he still of the same opinion, that there was no pressure on the financial markets when we have a federal interest rate of 9 per cent, a failure of the Canada savings bond issue and government Crown corporations paying as high as 11⅛ per cent—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Dauphin and most hon. members will agree, I am sure, that such a question is argument and debate rather than a question.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DATE OF BY-ELECTION IN BATTLE RIVER

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

[Mr. Hees.]

Would the Prime Minister advise the House when he plans to set a date for the federal by-election in Battle River? Would it be July 8 and, if not, why not?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as is known by the House, there are two seats in which there are vacancies, but the Tories are in the strange position of not having stood up and notified the Speaker that one of those seats was vacant. I guess they were afraid to have a by-election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

POSITION OF AVERAGE WAGE EARNER IN RELATION TO RATE OF INFLATION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance. Noting the minister's statement on February 19, 1973, that inflation in 1973 would be between 4.7 per cent and 4.9 per cent while in fact inflation was substantially above his forecast, is the minister still satisfied that the average wage earner is staying ahead of inflation as expressed by him on February 19, 1973?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply to the hon. member's question but it seems to me it is more debate than a question. I have no objection to the minister replying briefly.

RATE OF EXPANSION IN 1974

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. On June 6, 1973, the minister said that the current expansion of the economy over the past six months had been 11.6 per cent in real terms, as found on page 4491 of Hansard, and according to the Economic Council Review, page 13, the rate was in fact 9.4 per cent for the first half and 4.75 per cent for the second half. Can the minister tell the House if this trend toward a lower gross national product will continue in 1974?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is anticipating what I might say tonight. In real terms the economy grew at a rate of 7.1 per cent for the whole year 1973, which was the strongest growth in 17 years. For the first quarter of 1974 it is growing at an annual rate of about 9 per cent.

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBLE SUBSIDY TO HOG PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Agriculture in respect of hog support prices. In view of the fact the four western provinces and the province of Quebec have found it necessary to support or subsidize hog prices, Saskatchewan to the extent of almost $23 per hog, what is the policy of the federal government? Is it going to leave the provinces to carry this load or has the minister any policy on this matter?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I answered a similar question in the House last week. The province of Prince Edward Island—I might say that the premier is sitting in the gallery—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: —also has a program. As I said last week, we are trying to work out a plan with the provinces, and we hope to be able to do that in the very near future, that will be satisfactory to all hog producers across the nation.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat regrettable that the Premier of Prince Edward Island had to win an election and come to Ottawa to get the minister's attention!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: The Agricultural Stabilization Act lays on the government and the Minister of Agriculture certain responsibilities in respect of supporting agricultural prices in Canada. What I want to know is when the minister is going to discharge the government's responsibility in this regard?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to note that the reason the gentleman is sitting in the gallery as Premier of Prince Edward Island—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. I think hon. members know it is irregular to refer to the presence of distinguished visitors in the gallery. The hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I asked the minister a question and he referred to the presence of someone in the gallery. My point of order is that if the minister is going to rise to his feet I am entitled to an answer to my question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, official representation was made to the Minister of Agriculture by the hog producers council a little over three weeks ago when the whole national group made a presentation to the Minister of Agriculture, his officials, officials of the Department of the Minister of Finance and officials of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. We are trying to work out that program at the present time, and all the provinces are well aware of what we are trying to do.

POSITION OF GOVERNMENT ON ASSISTANCE TO TURKEY PRODUCERS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. Since it seems that almost all forms of animal agriculture in Canada are in serious difficulties at the present time at the producer level, what is the government going to do or considering doing at the present time in regard to the plight of turkey producers across Canada who find themselves producing turkeys at below the cost of production?

Mr. Speaker: The question is not quite supplementary but the minister may reply briefly after which I will recognize the hon. member for Champlain.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked a question about poultry in Canada. I suggest it would be much easier for us if we had the amendments to the Export and Import Permits Act. We are prepared to move as quickly as we can. We met with these people last week, and when the Export and Import Permits Act amendments are passed we can move much more efficiently and quickly.

SPORTS

REQUEST FOR TELEVISING OF JUNIOR HOCKEY CHAMPIONSHIP SERIES

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Major junior hockey is the only sport in Canada where Canadian cities are solely represented and where only Canadian amateur athletes play. In view of the present Canadian amateur championship tournament, would the minister direct the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to televise this tournament which is of interest to all regions throughout Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has asked the question in the House, the CBC will surely be made aware of his representations.

AIR CANADA

POSSIBLE LOCATION OF CERTAIN OVERHAUL FACILITIES IN WINNIPEG—INQUIRY AS TO DECISION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister inform the House if the government has reached any decision on Air Canada establishing a second overhaul and maintenance base at Winnipeg to service the new Boeing 727's and the military 707's?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question is in the process of being discussed by the cabinet.

Mr. McKenzie: Will the government overrule Air Canada's decision not to establish a second overhaul and maintenance base in Winnipeg in light of the public statement by the Minister of National Defence that he will not contest the next election unless there is a favourable decision on establishing a second base in Winnipeg?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is not true that the minister said any such thing.

FLOODS

MATAPEDIA—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO PERSONS WHO HAVE SUFFERED DAMAGES

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the right hon. Prime Minister.

Did the province of Quebec ask for government assistance after the considerable damage caused to the population of Matapédia and of the localities down stream from the Restigouche by the unprecedented flooding of the waters of the Matapédia and Restigouche Rivers last week, and which drove many families out of their homes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I see no indication of such a request in my notes but I shall inquire with great pleasure. The hon. member does know that the federal government is always prepared to participate, according to a well known formula, if there is really such a request from the provincial government.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INVESTIGATION OF FAILURE OF BENEFICIARIES TO PICK UP CHEQUES AT EMERGENCY CENTRES DURING POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration as a result of the very startling revelation that some 29,000 people in the metro Toronto area, being about 60 per cent of claimants, did not attend the emergency centres in order to acquire their unemployment insurance cheques, which certainly raises a lot of questions. Can the minister assure the House that the results of the inquiry that has been instituted will be made known to the public? Further, is the minister going to investigate the other emergency centres which were set up because of the postal strike in order that claimants could acquire their cheques? Is he going to undertake the same sort of procedure in order to obtain statistics in that regard?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the figures referred to by the hon. member are simply like a snapshot in time at that particular moment. I would want much more information before coming to the conclusion he has reached, but I am most certainly looking into it.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer certainly begs another question. Can the minister confirm or deny the inquiry? In particular, can he advise the House whether, pursuant to instructions or to the release issued by his officials in Toronto, there is or is not an inquiry going on at this time?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the very process of matching claimants to available jobs, asking them to go for interviews at Manpower Centres and placing them in jobs is the main focus of our efforts. The inquiry that follows from that can only be described in this way: if they do not conform to that or if they refuse suitable jobs then, of course, they will subject themselves to disentitlement.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, may I ask one last supplementary. I think the minister is either evading the question or he does not know what I am talking about. Let me put the question to him in this way: the former Minister of Labour, the hon. member for Verdun, has been going about the country indicating that the UIC is not an issue. I would ask the minister at this time whether it is his opinion that unemployment insurance is not an issue and, accordingly, there is no need for amendments to the act as envisaged by the Speech from the Throne?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we are proposing to place amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act before this session of parliament.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FAMINE PREDICTED FOR PARTS OF THE WORLD—REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS TO ADVANCE DATE OF WORLD CONFERENCE ON FOOD

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact many people including, I think, the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself, have predicted widespread famine in various parts of the world this year, and in view of the fact there is a world conference on food scheduled in Rome in November, will the minister see if it is possible to get those responsible to advance the date so that the emergency in food can be looked into as quickly as possible?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I recognize the concern the hon. gentleman has expressed. It is difficult to advance the dates of international conferences. As far as Canada is concerned, the situation is extremely grave. Not only do we have some questions about the date, but we also have some questions about the agenda. We are making efforts concentrated on meeting the emergency situation rather than on some future situation for which we are not now equipped.

FAMINE IN WEST AFRICA—CANADIAN ASSISTANCE

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the Canadian government preparing to provide any form of assistance to the starving populations in West Africa?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated on a number of occasions, we have a very substantial program of aid to the people of the Sahaelian area which has been suffering from unprecedented drought. This aid is in the form of food, transport and for a number of other purposes.

GRAIN

SAVING TO CONSUMERS PER LOAF OF BREAD RESULTING FROM SUBSIDY ON WHEAT USED DOMESTICALLY

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact a bushel of wheat produces between 50 and 60 loaves of bread and the government subsidy is $1.75 per bushel, would the minister explain to the House his statement that the subsidy is currently saving consumers eight cents per loaf?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether a question asked in those terms is in order or should be asked. That is clearly debate. The hon. member is inviting the minister to explain a statement. It seems to me that the question can be asked in other ways.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, I should like the minister to tell the producers exactly how he arrived at that figure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply, but I respectfully and humbly suggest that any member could ask dozens of such questions which are really debate and not questions that ought to be asked during the question period.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to keep the answer extremely simple for the hon. member and explain that the mathematics relate to the total difference between the world price and the $3.25 to the miller and not just to the subsidy. This is the over-all government program that is saving the consumer that amount of money on the price of bread.

FLOODS

MEASURES TO PREVENT FLOODING IN PRINCE GEORGE AND SURROUNDING AREA

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Are any discussions going on with the province of British Columbia in an attempt to prevent the very serious flood which threatens the city of Prince George and surrounding area, particularly in light of the flood prevention program now in effect on the lower Fraser River? Could that program be extended to the upper Fraser?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. The engineers of Environment Canada in British Columbia are working closely with the provincial department of lands and forests. We have a joint program under way for protection. We are prepared to help in any flood situation which may occur.

Mr. Oberle: Is there any program that can be of assistance in the immediate future as the flood is just a week or so away?

Mr. Davis: I doubt it very much, Mr. Speaker, other than our longer-term program. We are endeavouring to convince the province that dikes should be built upstream on the Fraser as well as in the lower mainland area.

PENITENTIARIES

RELEASE OF KENNETH LEISHMAN—SERVING OF ADDITIONAL SENTENCES CONCURRENTLY RATHER THAN CONSECUTIVELY— PAROLE PROCEDURES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Noting a recent decision by the Department of Justice authorizing the release of Mr. Kenneth Leishman some two years ahead of the normal time, may I ask the minister whether it is now government policy that certain additional prison terms should be served concurrently rather than consecutively, as was done in Mr. Leishman's case, and is a review of parole procedures taking place at the present time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it sounds to me as though this question should be directed to the Solicitor General rather than to myself. I am not aware of this case but I shall be glad to look into the matter if the hon. member will supply me with details.

Mr. Epp: I should like to redirect the question to the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Leishman was released because he had appealed to the Department of Justice to recalculate the time of his sentence, and when this calculation was made it was found that the sentence should have come to an end and he was therefore released. He was not released on parole. I might say the Criminal Code provides that a man may be given concurrent or consecutive sentences, but this is in the hands of the judge and the Crown prosecutor who presses the case. We have no plans at the present time to change that system.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—STATUS OF GRANT ALLEGED TO HAVE BEEN AUTHORIZED TO KENNETH LEISHMAN

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Since the Department of Manpower and Immigration at one time authorized a LIP grant to Mr.

Kenneth Leishman, will the minister tell us whether Mr. Leishman is now eligible for that grant of $93,000?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): With respect, I am quite sure that is a distortion of the situation, though possibly accidental. The program was for the rehabilitation of people leaving prison. Personally, I believe it is a darned sight better to rehabilitate them rather than have them come out into an environment likely to result in their return to jail. Mr. Leishman was simply one of the possible candidates for such a program.

PENITENTIARIES

NUMBER OF INMATES RELEASED ON PAROLE UNLAWFULLY AT LARGE—POSSIBLE DANGER FROM THOSE CONVICTED OF NON-CAPITAL MURDER

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Solicitor General. It deals with temporary release, periods of temporary absence and parole. On Friday I asked a question with reference to data supplied by the minister to the effect that on February 28, 1974, 79 inmates who had been released on temporary absence or parole were still at large, and that three of these had been found guilty of non-capital murder. I asked the minister whether he would give us the name of those three people, and advise the House and the community whether they are dangerous to the security of the community.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Immediately after the hon. member put his question last week I asked my departmental staff to provide me with more information in order that I might answer it. However, I have not yet received this information. I will give it to the House as soon as I get it. I shall try to pass it on as soon as possible.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST THAT $500 SALARY INCREASE GRANTED EMPLOYEES BE GIVEN TO THOSE NOW RETIRED

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board or to any other appropriate minister. It concerns the announcement last week awarding a $500 salary increase to public servants in recognition of the government's capitulation in the anti-inflation fight. Has the minister reconsidered his position with a view to awarding this $500 equally to retired public servants and Armed Forces and RCMP personnel who are also faced with the problem of inflation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I am sure the hon. member will recognize that the salaries and wages of public servants are not indexed whereas the pensions of those who are retired are indexed under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

[Mr. Epp.]

Mr. Rose: In spite of the swarm of gnats in the minister's words, I wonder whether the minister's answer is a flat "no".

Mr. Drury: The answer is not a flat "no". It is that this is already being done.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE DEFECTIVE PIPELINE AT AGASSIZ BRIDGE ON FRASER RIVER

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister heard anything from the National Energy Board about a possible defective pipeline in British Columbia about which I asked him some 11 days ago?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I did inquire and the board indicated there has been some concern about a pipe weld at Agassiz Crossing. I understand there has been no substantial loss, but an examination is being made of the pipe in question which is now about 15 years old.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In view of the fact that three doctors of metallurgy at the University of British Columbia have confirmed that at least two welds are defective, would the minister ask the National Energy Board to make a public statement as to the condition of these two welds in order to relieve the anxiety of the people in the area?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will pass the question on to the board, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): I would have to check on that, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTION THAT MINISTER HEED ADVICE OF MEMBERS FAMILIAR WITH CATTLE RAISING TO IMPROVE POSITION OF FEEDERS

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact the Minister of Agriculture, along with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, is now in a position to appraise the results of the decision-making which has taken place with regard to agriculture since September, 1973, and in view of the fact decisions made during this period have literally bankrupted a large percentage of cattle feeders in Canada, would the minister now inform the House whether he will in future capitalize on the free advice of members who have had practical experience in this field to assure cattle feeders that this will never happen again?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, without agreeing with the premise of the question, may I say we always listen to advice given by the hon. member. He knows that.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LAY-OFFS OF PEOPLE EMPLOYED UNDER TEMPORARY PROGRAM

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Defence.

As a result of the telegram sent to him by Mr. Powers, the chairman of the Union of National Defence Employees, can he tell us whether it is true that sometime this month some 2,400 employees will be laid off, of which 1,025 are in Quebec, and specifically 600 at the Valcartier base?

[English]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a federal labour-intensive program, a temporary program established for a five-month period and due to end at the end of May. The Department of National Defence received $7.5 million under that program in the same way that other departments received grants. We were successful in employing some 2,400 people on a temporary basis over the winter. We shall be able to continue the employment of some 330 under our own budget.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Can the minister tell the House what steps the government has taken to see that those employees will not swell the ranks to the already excessive number of unemployed in Quebec?

[English]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary has to do with the position the government took two or three years ago with respect to cutbacks involving approximately 5,000 personnel who were continuing but not necessarily permanent civilian employees of the government within the Department of National Defence. Can the minister assure these people that this program is in no way included within the parameters of the lay-offs that have been announced but, rather, that the policy of allowing natural attrition to lower the number will be continued as in the past?

Mr. Richardson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The program to which I have just referred, the federal labour-intensive program, is a temporary program not related to the permanent number of civilian employees in the Department of National Defence.

DOW-DOME PROJECT—RESPONSE BY ALBERTA GOVERNMENT—DECISION BY CABINET

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact the decision of the National Energy Board on the Dow-Dome application has been public for some weeks now, and since the minister has told us the government is awaiting a response from the government of Alberta, may I ask him whether this response has been received, is it in the affirmative or not, and can the minister tell us the time frame within which he expects the cabinet to reach a decision on this project?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I have received no further response from the Alberta government. They indicated one would be forthcoming. Of course, if there is much further delay the government will naturally be obliged to proceed to consider the Dow-Dome decision of the board because of the financial implications of the decision.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LAY-OFFS OF PEOPLE EMPLOYED UNDER TEMPORARY PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR RETENTION IN AREAS OF HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT SUCH AS SYDNEY, N.S.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to get your eye in regard to the question posed by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. I should like to direct a supplementary to the Minister of National Defence, having listened to his reply. May I ask the minister whether any consideration will be given, in areas where there is a tremendously high unemployment rate, to retaining employees? For example, in the Sydney area we have over 15, and possibly 20 per cent unemployment. Is there anything the minister can do to retain these workers in that area? Thirty employees there are affected.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that the funds for this program came through Treasury Board; they were not part of the budget of the Department of National Defence. However, within our own budget we are able to carry on approximately 330 jobs out of this winter program.

Mr. Muir: In view of the fact that 300-odd jobs will be retained, would the minister do his utmost to make sure the 30 in the Sydney area are included?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, we will be looking at all areas and trying to maximize the use of the funds in the areas of greatest need.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Selkirk on a supplementary and then the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): On the same subject, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether there is any intention on the part of the Department of National Defence to hire students or other people during the summer months to carry out duties in the Department of National Defence. If so, perhaps the minister would re-examine his decision. If work is to be done, then why not use the people who are already employed?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, we do have a student employment program but it is not related directly to the labour intensive program for the winter months.

INTENTION OF UNITED STATES TO REDUCE STOCKS OF ATOMIC WEAPONS—CONSULTATION WITH NATO ALLIES—POSSIBLE REDUCTION OF WARHEADS IN CANADA

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Mr. Schlesinger, United States Secretary of Defence, has announced the United States' intention to reduce its stocks of atomic weapons in Europe. Could the minister advise the House if the United States has consulted with its NATO allies, and specifically Canada, in this regard? Further, would the minister inform the House whether he has had any consultations with the U.S. Secretary of Defence concerning the possible reduction or elimination of the stocks of atomic warheads on Canadian soil?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not discussed that with the Secretary of Defence.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DEAL WITH ILLEGAL STRIKES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the minister's statement arising from my question of last Friday that a tougher stand will be taken against illegal strikers, would the minister now be more specific and advise the House what exact steps the government intends to take regarding the alarming and continuous growth of wildcat strikes in Canada?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, apart from the forthcoming consideration of the recommendations of Dr. Finkelman which deal in part with this and other problems, I am glad to report that at the moment there are no illegal strikes.

[Mr. Muir.]

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR ACTION UNDER CRIMINAL CODE AGAINST CORPORATION

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. Since the minister is inclined to apply discipline now, will he take a good, sharp look at section 107 of the Criminal Code and take some action with respect to the Cape Breton Development Corporation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to consult the Criminal Code.

REQUEST FOR GRANT TO HAVE FILM "MOCASSIN FLATS" DUBBED IN FRENCH—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. I should like to ask the minister whether he has made a decision with respect to the request by the Native Council of Canada for a grant to have the award winning educational film "Mocassin Flats" dubbed in French for the benefit of the many French-speaking Canadians of native ancestry?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am looking into this. I might also take advantage of the question that has been put to apologize to the hon. member and to the House for the consequent delay.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary before calling orders of the day.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact this application was submitted over a year ago and was lost twice in the department and the Native Council had to resubmit it twice, would the minister take every possible step to see that this bureaucratic mess is brought to an end quickly?

Mr. Faulkner: That is why I apologized, Mr. Speaker, in anticipation of the supplementary.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

POSITION OF BOARD WITH REGARD TO SIGNING CONTRACTS FOR THIS CROP YEAR AND NEXT

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact the asking price of the Canadian Wheat Board on the international market is running somewhere around $5.60, in view of the fact that the international price on the commodity market in Chicago has been running in the neighbourhood of $3.90, and in view of the problems in our transportation system, would the minister inform the House whether the Canadian Wheat Board is at the present time negotiating contracts and is in a position to sign contracts for the movement and sale of grain for the rest of the crop year and into the next crop year in the fall?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board has made substantial sales of grain for the forward shipping period in the summer as well as into the fall and, indeed, immediately beyond. It is not customary to comment on specific additional negotiations. There is a very wide price differential between the Wheat Board quoted price and the market price being offered in the United States. This kind of wide differential existed previously but the Wheat Board held its price, and subsequent events justified it in doing so.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the House leader about the business for this afternoon. May I say that we are prepared to show our usual responsible co-operation in expediting the business.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will refrain from taking up my hon. friend's comment. This afternoon we will begin with Bill C-4, the export-import bill, Bill C-20, the Federal Business Development Bank, and then Bill C-25, prairie grain advance payments.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions about the three items for this afternoon, but it seems to me that on one point we should be clear before we begin. We are prepared today, as we were on Friday, to have completion of Bill C-4, the export-import bill, undertaken without further debate. We are also prepared for there to be very limited debate on Bill C-20, the Federal Business Development Bank bill. We are concerned, however, about the time that would be left for Bill C-25, the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

May I say quite frankly that we feel it would be unfair if we were to arrive at a point where only the minister had made a statement on the bill and the other parties had not had a chance to pronounce on it. If that situation were to arise, Mr. Speaker, we would like to see the surrendering of the private members' hour at five o'clock so that at least one spokesman from each party would be sure to be heard today on Bill C-25.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the government House leader would enlighten the House as to what will follow the budget presentation tonight. I think the minister realizes that he is completely out of step with the usual practice in this regard. Will it be tomorrow or Wednesday that the House will continue the budget debate?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to call the budget debate tomorrow. That is because I interpreted the request of the Leader of the Opposition, when he asked for the debate to commence practically immediately, to mean the next day. That is why I have planned it in that way. I propose to have further consultations this afternoon, and if the situation changes I will let my hon. friend know as quickly as possible. I understand that it is his wish that we delay the debate until Wednesday.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is no question of delay, Mr. Speaker. The minister is putting words into the mouths of people. If the minister will consult the records, he will see that his administration in the past has delayed budget debates or the resumption of budget debates for up to two weeks on occasion. We are asking for a restoration of the normal practice which was enjoyed by all parties, and are wondering whether he would consider this. Perhaps the budget is not worth adopting that course.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Federal Business Development Bank

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR INCORPORATION, OBJECTS, REGIONAL ADVISORY COUNCILS, POWERS

The House resumed, from Friday, April 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) that Bill C-20, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, it is some while ago, April 26, that we were speaking on this bill and when I called it four o'clock the House moved to the private members' hour. With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, if I may I should like to review for a moment the main points I was making that afternoon.

I expressed concern that the share of the national income attributed to small business has declined 3 per cent over the period 1962 to 1973. I made the point that it was a gradual decline, or an erosion of income of the small business sector of our economy over the span of 11 years. I made the point also that it was an extremely serious matter because the small businesses of this country contribute more than 50 per cent of the gross national product, pay more than 50 per cent of the taxes to the government treasury, and employ over 60 per cent of the labour force. I went on to say that any erosion of that base will have a far-reaching and long-lasting effect on our economy and our employment pattern.

I suggested as well that I would like to see the minister have Statistics Canada bring samples of all forms they send to small businesses to the Standing Committee on Industry, Trade and Commerce, and justify both the forms and the need to send them to these business people. I further requested that any new forms be cleared by the standing committee before they are sent out to small businessmen because the paper mountain they have to climb is getting beyond all reason.

I touched as well on the heavy handed approach to collateral being taken by the Industrial Development Bank, and expressed the hope that the new Federal Business Development Bank will, in fact, take a different approach and not leave this millstone around the neck of the small entrepreneur.

Then, finally, I made the point that we need a comprehensive approach to the problems facing the small businessman, that the new Federal Business Development Bank was a splint to the small business community and that the amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act could be called a sling. What we really must do is go beyond Bill C-20 and Bill C-14, then look back to Bill C-259, and bring in the amendments promised by the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Benson, when this bill was passed through the House in 1971.

I feel the clauses of this bill dealing with the small business community must be simplified and written in a language that will be understood by the average businessman and his accountant. Small business people just do not have the resources to employ tax experts, and they are frustrated in their efforts to expand and improve their businesses because of this cloud over their heads. Of course, to parallel any changes in Bill C-259 we should have a new and simplified tax form for small businessmen from the Department of National Revenue.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I suggest to you that the long-term success of the Federal Business Development Bank depends on whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) is able to convince his colleagues in the finance and national revenue portfolios that these changes must be made. Those were the main points, I believe, I made on the afternoon of April 26 when we suspended the debate on this bill and went into the private members' hour. It is difficult when we have these delays to pick up the thread of thought, but I will press on.

The Federal Business Development Bank can really breathe life back into this vital part of our economy, the small business sector. We should really recognize the contribution that small businesses make to the economy of Canada. Small businesses provide a productive outlet for the energies of that large group of enterprising and independent people who attach great value to economic independence, many of whom may be less suited to employment in a large organization, but who have much to contribute to the vitality of our economy because of their independent, enterprising and individual thinking.

In industries where the optimum size of the production unit or the sales outlet is small, often the most efficient form of business organization is a small business. For this reason many important trades and industries consist mainly of small businesses. Many small businesses act as specialist suppliers to large companies of parts or subassemblies or components produced at lower costs than the larger companies could achieve. I think it is rather significant to note here that General Motors, in its North American operations, uses something of the order of 26,000 small businesses as suppliers that in fact employ less than 50 people in their operations.

Small businesses add greatly to the variety of products and services offered to the consumer because they can flourish in a limited or specialized market which would not in fact be worthwhile or economic for a large business to enter. In an economy in which ever larger multiproduct businesses are emerging, small businesses provide competition, both actual and potential, and provide some check on monopoly profits and on the inefficiency which monopoly breeds. In other words, they contribute to the efficient working of the economic system as a whole.

Small businesses, in spite of relatively low expenditure on research and development by that group as a whole, are an important source of innovation in products, techniques and services. The small business sector is the traditional breeding ground for new industry, and I think it is here that this new Federal Business Development Bank can do a great service through the service they are prepared to provide to the small businesses in counselling and the training of personnel to help them carry on.

I welcome this feature in the bill. I commend the minister for inserting it and expanding what I believe is the key program which I think is working quite well. I would caution the minister though to endeavour to bring into this organization small businessmen who have been successful rather than retired vice-presidents of large corporations and expect them to advise the small businessmen. There are many cases, as I am sure the minister is aware, in which they do not speak the same language. Perhaps what is most important is that small business provides a means of entry into small business for new entrepreneurial talent, and is a seedbed from which new large companies will grow to challenge and stimulate the established leaders in much of our industry.

I should like to see this government adopt a Canada-first policy even at the expense of paying a premium for Canadian goods and services. I should like to see a loan policy adopted that the percentage of the loan would depend upon the percentage of Canadian ownership. That may be difficult to define, but I put forward the idea that this Federal Business Development Bank should, in fact, develop Canadian business for Canadians.

I sometimes find it difficult to reconcile the policies of this government as they pertain to DREE grants when I hear the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) say that there is no consultation with industry groups before establishing a new industry which, in fact, competes with existing Canadian enterprises. Would it not be more sane and sensible to consult with industry to determine if there is a desire to expand into an area that is lacking industry. On the one hand, we give a grant to a United States firm—this is an actual case—in the die-casting business to open a new venture in New Brunswick, where we know industry is needed, and find it is competing in the same United States export market with a wholly-owned Canadian company in another part of Canada. What is the rationale behind this? The minister says it is not departmental policy to cause this to happen, but it does happen.

So, I wonder where the Federal Business Development Bank fits into the DREE picture. Will we be able to stack loans from the Federal Business Development Bank, commercial sources and provincial agencies to provide the larger amounts of money required for some ventures? I think it is highly important that there be more liaison and co-operation, particularly between the provincial agencies and the Federal Business Development Bank. I know from personal experience that there is an attitude of competition between the two agencies. When one speaks to officials of either the federal IDB or the provincial agency, neither have very much that is good to say about the other. So, I would hope we would have a more comprehensive approach to this, and that we might look to the stacking of loans from various financial sources, some from the commercial side, some from provincial agencies and some from federal agencies.

I am sure, for example, that a Canadian automobile could be designed and marketed in Canada, but who would venture into such a field against the existing manufacturers. It just happens to be coincidental, but I noticed recently in the trade papers that there is a Japanese purchasing group in Canada endeavouring to purchase about 1,000 used trucks and spare parts for sale to mainland China in order to help that country mobilize a portion of its armed forces. These industry people tell me this will create a tremendous shortage of motor trucks in Canada. From looking at the production and consumption figures in respect of new motor vehicles in Canada, I am confident that we could spawn an independent trucking industry in this country to the advantage of industry in general. We look ahead to projects such as the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, and if that project should get the go-ahead, the feeling among the people in the truck transport industry is that there will be a tremendous shortage of heavy duty vehicles in Canada.

I am sure there are people who are ready and willing to go into this field but you can appreciate I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the stacking of loans to provide the necessary capital must be considered. I certainly hope the minister will look seriously at this proposal. I want to see the Federal Business Development Bank succeed. I want to see it become a vibrant agency removed from the rigidity of the bureaucracy of government. I want to see it inject into the small business community a new sense of direction and purpose. I want to see it revitalize the spirit of free enterprise which built this country. I want to see it respond to the talents we have in the communities. I believe in the person who has the courage to venture forth and accomplish his dreams, who takes his load of responsibility for the community and the nation squarely on his shoulders. I want to see the country shake off the socialist lethargy that is gradually creeping over us. I want to see direction given to the new people entering the business field by the removal of the iniquitous, complex and onerous tax system.

The complexities in respect of the tax system should be removed so that these people will be able to carry on their business in a more straightforward manner without being concerned about government regulations. I want to see a government in this country that will reaffirm its belief in the free enterprise system and say that it is not wrong to acquire and accumulate assets of value. I want to see a government that has the guts to stand up to the bureaucracy it has created, and which has the courage and wisdom to change it. This cannot happen if we merely put a band-aid here and a splint there. It must all be put together so that those people in our society who are carrying the greatest tax load, who are carrying the largest risk and who are employing the largest percentage of the work force will be stimulated to venture forth and seize the great opportunities there are before us. When this bill goes to the committee—when I put these thoughts together I did not anticipate that we would be looking at events as we are today with the possibility of an election—we will put some pretty hard questions to the minister. We will want to ask the minister about a Canada-first policy in respect of loans and purchasing. We will ask that he amend this bill so that the directors of the bank will be prohibited from borrowing from the new bank. I think that is a practice that should be eliminated.

I think we will want to press the minister to lay down guidelines regarding fees required when the small businessman desires a loan from the Federal Business Development Bank. Businessmen as a rule have their own lawyers. In the past, the IDB had a legal officer and, for some reason, required a third legal counsel—let us call him a patronage lawyer—to take part in the negotiations. In any case, the total legal fees on many loans from the IDB went as high as 10 per cent or more of the loan. I suggest to the minister that we will press him in committee to lay down some guidelines because I believe that one or more of these steps can be eliminated, thus reducing the cost to small businessmen.

In conclusion, we will ask that those who head this new organization be people who are not bankers per se, but people who are venturesome and innovative so that they may give through their counsel a new sense of hope and direction to this vital part of our society. Those are the remarks that I had planned on making on April 26, so at this point I will conclude, then whoever else is next on the list may continue the debate.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-20, the bill that will create the Federal Business Development Bank. I feel that it will be welcomed in British Columbia, especially in the fast growing areas such as the one in my riding of Okanagan Boundary where there are many small businesses which look after the needs of the people in the area as well as service the industries established with the aid of incentive grants which were provided a few years ago.

There are two apparent reasons for the need for this legislation in British Columbia. One is that British Columbia is one of the few provinces with no provincial plan to aid small businesses. The other is that there is a very limited area designated for DREE grants. The B.C. government is too busy buying into or establishing industrial enterprises to worry about small businesses. It is significant to note that one third of the business carried out by the Industrial Development Bank in the fiscal year 1973 was in British Columbia, involving 2,835 loans totallying some $125 million. The reason for this is mainly that B.C. is one of the few provinces in Canada that does not have a provincial agency financing the activities of small businesses. The IDB has done a good job of assisting businessmen who cannot get help from chartered banks, but unfortunately they are restricted by the guidelines laid down in the act.

There are many areas of concern to small businesses. Small businesses play an important role in the economy, creating over 50 per cent of Canada's gross national product and paying 50 per cent of the taxes collected by the government. This is an important consideration to bear in mind if the government is to continue spending more and more money and employing more than 50 per cent of the people working in Canada. The small business is the breeding ground for new industries. What may be a small business today may well be a large industry tomorrow. Small businesses provide the means for entry into business of new entrepreneurial talent, and they are always striving to grow and to challenge large business. They provide a productive outlet for the energies of the large group of enterprising and independent people who attach great value to economic independence. They are often the most efficient form of business organization and are the reason many important trades and industries are made up mainly of small business. They add greatly to the variety of products and services offered to the consumers. The reason is that they can flourish in a limited or specialized market, an activity which is not worthwhile for a larger business.

Many small businesses act as specialized suppliers to large companies for parts or components which can be produced at a lower cost than that of a larger company. The small businesses provide competition and checks and balances on the large corporations which are often inefficient, and so these small businesses contribute to the efficiency of the economic system as a whole.

Their major difficulty is their inability to obtain funds. Sometimes, for the want of a mere $5,000 to $10,000 they are forced to go under. The banks will not take the additional risk because they do not have the staff or are not willing to take the time to help the small business; neither do they have the expertise to understand the problems which small businessmen encounter. Often banks find that they can make more money on the large and safer account. Thus, they place their efforts in that direction and let the small business go under.

The Federal Business Development Bank can certainly do much to help these businessmen, provided it has the proper orientation to do so. Nowhere in this bill is preferential treatment given to Canadian-owned firms as opposed to those that may be controlled in a foreign land. What we are seeing is a shifting of the IDB from the Department of Finance to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. We have had some experience of the way in which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) has run similar corporations in this country. I am referring to the Export Development Corporation. The minister has been quite willing to make loans to foreign governments for the benefit of the relatively large corporations in Canada, most of them more than 50 per cent foreign-owned. He has been willing to make those loans on a long-term basis at interest rates of approximately 7 per cent in contrast with the current interest rate at the IDB of 11 per cent, and for larger loans, of 12 per cent.

This brings to mind the time when the government found an excuse not to help the fruit industry in British Columbia under the export market development program. The fruit industry had a good program to put forward which would have given a great advantage to these Canadian producers. But when the chips were down and the industry asked for financial assistance, they could not obtain it. Therefore, they had to put up all the money themselves.

Another instance comes to mind of a small business in Summerland in my riding which had taken insurance against losses under the provisions of the Export Development Corporation. When this small business, which was doing as much as possible to employ people in Canada and use the product of the orchards of British Columbia, encountered a loss in its export trade, the corporation found a clause under which they denied this company's claim for losses. I believe that had this been a large company, probably 50 per cent foreign-owned, they would have been able to convince the Export Development Corporation that this claim should have been paid. However, because this was a small business, they did not have the resources to do this and thus had to take their losses. This is an example of the attitude that the government takes toward the small businessman in this country.

● (1540)

The needs of Canadian businessmen are very simple. Canadian businessmen need relatively cheap money, and they would like less interference from government. They do not appreciate having to fill out the many forms they receive from all levels of government. They would certainly like to fill out fewer forms. They would like the amount of collateral required to obtain a loan reduced. They do not mind putting up collateral, but they do not want to be harassed by having to put up so much collateral that in the end the loan they get is almost meaningless.

I do not think they would mind getting advice on management from the new corporation, but it is important to realize that the small businessman already knows his needs. In most cases, there is no point in high priced executives telling him how to run his business. His real needs are relatively cheap funds, less government interference in forms to be filled out, and a competitive atmosphere in which he can continue to grow.

This bill appears to do no more than reconstitute the Industrial Development Bank and give certain other powers to the new corporation. Let us hope that the guidelines laid down by this bill will not be so restrictive. Let us hope that when the legislation is passed the organization set up under the Federal Business Development Bank is oriented to the needs of the businessman, and that he will get the help that he has been denied for many years. A strong business community will certainly do much to help Canada in its development and growth.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to say a few words about that quite important bill since it contains provisions which would enable the small businesses of my area to take advantage of some financial incentives as well as the assistance of technicians and experts for the organization and the improvement of their businesses.

I understand that under this bill, a Federal Business Development Bank will be created. This legislation should be ratified and enforced as soon as possible so not to delay the development of rural areas where few benefits were granted in the past for such undertakings.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion is already existing. Through various measures, businesses can obtain financial benefits, but considerable capital is too often required thus preventing promoters to take advantage of it precisely due to the lack of capital.

The Industrial Development Bank grants loans, but very carefully, and representations have often been made by business owners that they were experiencing great difficulty in having their applications accepted for loans which could help them expand, create jobs and be truly competitive.

In my area two community chests work in a quite extraordinary way. Local funds were raised. People investing in those community chests would like borrowers putting those funds to use to succeed in their undertaking.

Now I see that a Federal Business Development Bank will complete the picture provided those institutions work together and supplement one another rather than tell applicants, go to the Industrial Development Bank, the community chest, the Caisse Populaire, the Provincial Bank or any other bank. I would like to see set up under this act regional advisory councils made up of responsible men, men very carefully chosen, in order to help those who still have enough initiative and courage left to set up new industries.

I often said in this House, and I repeat it again today, that whenever any government introduces legislation likely to help industrial development and small businesses in rural areas, I will support it immediately so that legislation can come into force. So for that reason I will limit my remarks to saying that I support the principle of this bill and I welcome this legislation. I hope that later we can improve it by amending it.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF ADVANCE PAYMENT

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-25, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-25 is another important step in the over-all program and policies of the government in trying to assure that prairie agriculture, that grain agriculture in Canada, is in a first rate position from the point of view of its operations, from the point of view of the business itself, and particularly from the point of view of the welfare and well being of the individuals involved in it.

Our over-all package of proposals, those either directly related to the Canadian Wheat Board or to the grain industry generally, and those being developed by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), are designed to assure that farmers do have a fair and adequate return on their work, for their families and for themselves. This has not always been the case. Indeed, farmers have gone through long periods of time when, instead of receiving a fair and adequate return per hour of work, they received far less than their fair share of the returns to all Canadians generated from the tremendous progress made in the economy throughout the country. It was only in fairly recent times that the producers of grain, particularly those who produce for export, experienced a change in their returns so that they have shared to some extent in the productivity increases which are common throughout many sectors of the economy, but which are especially noted in the field of agriculture.

In times past farmers saw year after year go by with very little improvement in their returns on any basis, and indeed struggled hard to see any improvement at all in the returns for their labour. They managed to exist where they could, partly by their own ingenuity and productivity, because they were willing to undertake whatever steps were necessary to produce more agricultural production during their hours of work, by seizing on technological change and putting it to work for the good of Canada and the good of the world.

● (1550)

In recent times an adjustment has taken place and we see grain prices giving farmers levels of returns which, in effect, do give them fairer treatment. I think it is important, as we look at this over-all situation, that we try to make the case as clearly as we can to all Canadians that a good deal of the change in price throughout the economy was due, and long overdue, to the farmers. In other words, to the extent that food price changes which result from a better return to farmers, have caused changes in price levels across the country, it should not be seen as part of the inflation which the negotiator, whether he be a doctor, lawyer or blue collar worker, tries to make up. A great deal of the adjustment which has taken place in favour of the grain producer is something which all of us ought to see as having been inevitable and necessary, and not something which we should get back.

The bill before us proposes two simple changes in the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. In the first place, a change is made increasing the $6,000 limit to $15,000; in the second place, the change allows multiple granting of advances where more than one person engaged in the business of farming is joined in the same permit book and where it would be unfair for all of them to be treated as one farm.

If we look at the history of the legislation we can see how far we have come in a number of ways. The first grain advance payment was part of the program of the Conservatives when they came to power in 1957 under the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). It showed that they had some feeling for the needs of western Canada, in contrast with the attitude and approach of that party today which does not appreciate or see the needs of western Canada. Indeed, in contrast to the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, the opposition leader does not have any appreciation of the nature of western farmers' problems.

In the 1957 bill certain cash advances were provided to farmers on their farm-stored grain for the first time. The maximum level prescribed in the bill was $3,000. We introduced legislation several years ago which changed that to the present limit of $6,000, and we are now proposing that it be increased to $15,000. This is a tremendous increase from the level of 1957.

In 1957, the per bushel advance possible was a mere 50 cents per bushel of wheat, 20 cents per bushel of oats and 35 cents per bushel of barley. Two years ago, we changed that to $1 per bushel of wheat, 40 cents per bushel of oats and 70 cents per bushel of barley. At the present time, in the elevators across the prairies, farmers with the $6,000 limit are entitled to advances of $1.50 per bushel of wheat, 70 cents per bushel of oats and 90 cents per bushel of barley. The increase from 50 cents to $1.50 for wheat reflects the changed economic circumstances, but also reflects our efforts to try to make the cash advance legislation fit the special circumstances of farmers.

We now have a system by which the farmer can receive his cash in advance of delivery in relation to the kind of delivery opportunity he is going to be given for his grain during the year. It is not, therefore, an interference in the encouragement of production or market forces working upon them, but it is an advance to him of money which he would receive otherwise when he delivers his grain. Because grain is such an easily stored commodity and the farmers involved in the program are so reliable, the program has worked extremely well. There are few programs involving as many hundreds of millions of dollars in advances and involving up to 200,000 producers which have the proud record of this one in terms of minimum of default and minimum of abuse. The producers can be trusted, the security of grain is there, and therefore money can be advanced to them ahead of actual delivery opportunity.

The key in this is that farmers are relieved of some of the distress which can on occasion occur. Although they have the grain and appear to have wealth to sustain them, they do not have delivery opportunities so have to find some other means, either borrowing money or selling grain at a low price in a local market, in order to obtain cash. It is this last point which is important in our discussion today. We do not want to see any unnecessary pressure on the producer to dispose of grain in one market because he cannot wait for quotas. It is in this connection that this particular change is introduced. We foresee a market in feed grains for domestic purposes which is less restrictive than at the present time because of the over-all need to have feed grains prices which are equitable across the country. Producers of animal products who have to buy feed grains as part of their cost of operation will be on an equal footing, separated only by what naturally separates them, geographical facts and the cost of moving products from one place to another.

In that connection the great bulk of grains delivered by farmers for commercial purposes in western Canada will continue to be delivered to the Canadian Wheat Board with delivery opportunity arranged as equitably as possible among producers. The great bulk of farmers will therefore have exactly the same choice that they have now to deliver to the Canadian Wheat Board on quotas as those quotas become available. There will be some who may choose, as they do now, to deliver to their own animals, to neighbours feeding animals or to neighbours slightly further away.

What we would like to assure is that those who want to hold their grain in order to deliver it on quotas are not forced to deliver in another manner because of any desperate need for cash in advance of their delivery opportunity. The cash advance legislation provides this kind of assurance. By its existence the farmer who has grain and who will have quotas throughout the year to deliver his wheat, oats or barley, can receive from the Canadian Wheat Board the greater proportion of his cash at the time he needs it in advance of that delivery opportunity being made available.

We see this bill as continuing the tremendous advantage of obtaining cash in advance of delivery opportunity, as having specific application to the feed grains proposal, and assuring that there will be equitable pricing of grain across the country. I commend it to hon. members in this House. Just as in 1957 it demonstrated the kind of understanding and interest in western agriculture which the right hon. member for Prince Albert has always shown, so today it carries the commitment of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) toward understanding and improving conditions in western Canada. The present Prime Minister committed this government to bringing in tremendous changes in western Canada. He committed the government to end discrimination in freight rates and to bring about diversified economic growth in western Canada. He committed the government to a new national policy which will take into account the aspirations of western Canada.

● (1600)

When the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert was prime minister, it was easy for him to be aware of the problems of prairie farmers and attempt to do something about them. He was a Saskatchewan man. He had lived for a long time in that part of the country; he had heard the problems of the area discussed in the press and elsewhere, and obviously wanted to do something about the problems of the area. It is that much more impressive that the present Prime Minister, in determining to come to grips with the problems of western Canada, made sure he understood the problems of the west, although he comes from an area of the country different from that from which the right hon. member for Prince Albert comes.

This prairie grain advance payments legislation, which is but one forward step being taken, is a further demonstration of the determination of this government, as expressed in the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, to leave no section of this country unattended, and to leave no section of the country feeling that its aspirations are being neglected. This legislation, therefore, is part of our commitment to meet the aspirations of western Canada. We are trying to change the national concept laid down by Sir John A. Macdonald under which the country was supposed to consist of hewers of wood and drawers of water. We are trying to decentralize the operations of government in the way witnessed in recent months by establishing, for instance, key offices of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in Saskatoon, in Moncton and in other areas.

This bill is a small but important step on the course about which the Prime Minister has spoken, a course which is strongly espoused within the Liberal party, a course, namely, which suggests that the government of this country must understand each area of this country, and each one of us, no matter from which part of the country he comes—

Mr. Paproski: Liberal concern stops at the Saskatchewan border.

Mr. Lang: —or which party he supports, must make sure he understands the problems of the other regions.

Mr. Paproski: What does the Liberal party know about the west?

Mr. Lang: It is tragic that there are not other parties in the House which take the same approach to national problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: It is tragic that, instead, there is a tendency for some parties in this House to fight against the interests of other regions. That tendency is shown by the regional party which calls itself the New Democratic Party and is not a national party and by the official opposition.

Mr. Paproski: And where is the main strength of the Liberal party? Is it a national party?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Instead of being hostile to the desires and aspirations of any part of the country, including western Canada, they should determine the true nature of the problems of other parts of the country.

An hon. Member: What about the government? Does it do that?

Mr. Lang: When the official opposition is not represented in any particular part of the country, it acts in a divisive and regional way.

An hon. Member: What about the government?

Mr. Lang: An hon. member says, what about the government? Let me spell out exactly what I mean. When the Liberal party, in government in this country, saw from the clearest evidence available from the electorate that its policies were not meeting the aspirations of western Canada, it did not, in 1972 do what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) had advised the Conservative party five or six years ago to do, ignore a great part of the country. That would have not been in keeping with Liberal tradition. Instead, the government determined to spend more time and effort studying western problems. It spent more time studying them than any government had in the history of this country.

Mr. Paproski: Who will believe you?

Mr. Lang: And we determined that we would not act superficially but that we would see what was wrong with our western Canadian policy, understand the fundamental nature of the difficulty and, as a result, bring in not policies which had the appearance of solutions but policies which would meet the aspirations of western Canada to the satisfaction of western Canadians. That is what we shall be doing this year and in the years to come.

Mr. Paproski: You are too late, Otto. You will have to wait until you become leader of the Liberal party.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board treated the House to another of his lectures. Everything seemed to go quite well until he tried to inject humour at the end of his speech. He tried to tell us what the government has done to meet the problems of western Canada. If he wants to retain credibility, he should examine carefully what he said in the closing minutes of his speech.

The minister said that grain farmers are now getting fair and adequate returns, that western grain producers at last are receiving the sorts of returns they have not received for the last few years. That situation is reflected throughout the whole of the economy of Canada, and not just in the economy of western Canada.

When considering what this bill does, we must look beyond the aspect of cash advances to prairie farmers and others and consider the agriculture industry in total. Grain farming is one of the foundations on which our agriculture industry is built. It is my impression that the agriculture industry is in a state of confusion it has not known for many years. This is borne out by the legitimate and well intentioned questions asked every day in this House on the subjects of hogs, livestock, poultry and government policy in these areas.

Bill C-25 is only a small step forward, granted, but it should be welcome. It provides for an increase in cash advances. The bill has nothing new or different to say about agriculture; actually, it is long overdue. It should have been introduced much earlier. Basically, the legislation proposes an increase in the cash advance with respect to farm-stored grain from $6,000 to $15,000 where one person is concerned, to $30,000 where two people or a partnership are involved, and to a maximum of $45,000 where a company or three people are concerned.

These increases are certainly justified in the light of farmers' needs. Indeed, they are long overdue. We have seen the cost of seed, fertilizer, barbed wire, bailer twine, chemicals, machinery and a host of other articles or commodities used on the farm go up by amounts which range from 20 per cent to as high as 200 per cent. The new ceilings governing cash advances are welcome, since they are based on realistic considerations.

At the present time we enjoy a relatively high price for grain and it appears as though prices will continue to be relatively high for the next few years, though possibly not as high as they are today. Thank God this is the case, because otherwise with this government's track record, we might be seeing another operation LIFT. As we move into the summer and toward the prospect of a general election, there is still no sign from the government as to what farmers may expect by way of a comprehensive agricultural policy. There is still no indication of the direction in which agriculture is expected to move. We hear muttering and hints, but that is all.

About a month ago, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was going around the country saying that if he had his way he would take over the job of the minister responsible for the Wheat Board because he felt he could operate more effectively if both portfolios were combined. The results of this uncertainty are being felt by agriculture producers all across Canada. For too long the government has reminded us of a ship lurching first in one direction and then in another, with no one in command, no one with a sense of leadership. There have been indications for some time that a move is to be made toward stabilization, but this has not gone beyond occasional references in speeches by the minister and some of his colleagues. To what extent does the government propose to intervene, if at all? What does the government have in mind by stabilization? Would any scheme which it might produce be a necessary one at the present time? These are questions which should be dealt with in the context of any bill dealing with cash advances or assistance to agriculture generally.

The minister responsible for the Wheat Board has taken his usual arrogant approach to these issues. He still gives the impression he has all the answers. He likes to tell the farmers, members of the opposition and any others who will listen what will be done. I say to him that he may be able to write intellectually stimulating notes to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) but that he leaves most of the farmers in western Canada cold.

As I say, it is a good thing that grain prices are relatively high. Nevertheless, the situation should be viewed in the light of the total agriculture picture, and the industry as a whole has nothing on which to plan its operations for the next few years. I have here a report of a statement made by Mr. Bill Stewart, the minister of agriculture in Ontario. It says:

> Agriculture Minister William Stewart said Ontario has urged the federal government to immediately increase the producer prices of butter and skim milk powder by two cents a pound. He told the Legislature on April 25 the current federal dairy policy doesn't go far enough in providing the incentive to maintain and increase industrial milk production.

This illustrates what I have been saying about the lack of leadership on the part of the government, or its agriculture spokesmen. The beef subsidy was implemented hastily without regard for its effect on the marketplace. For a while, it caused chaos, and now it appears the beef industry is in full retreat as a result of actions which compounded earlier damage done by this administration.

I turn, now, to the government's feed grain policy. The Minister of Agriculture and the minister responsible for the Wheat Board said it was the fairest policy they could devise. That is a lot of rubbish and they must know it is not the case. The policy was devised as a political half-way measure. Because of the difficulty which arises in relation to the monitoring aspect, the system of payments has not worked since the program was introduced. One of the indications of the government's lack of vision is the quantity of corn imported into Canada from the United States as a result of the unrealistic pricing of domestic feed grain.

The damage done by the federal government in the application of this interim policy, compounded by antics on the part of certain provincial governments, has led to nothing short of economic stagnation for the section of the industry engaged in animal production. Grain prices have risen so rapidly that the economics of producing milk and meat have completely changed in the matter of a few months. In addition to the confusion and uncertainty caused by the feed grain policy, the price maintenance effect must be taken into consideration. Domestic feed grain costs are being deliberately held up at a time when the last thing that is needed is a maintained minimum price.

I see that the minister responsible for the Wheat Board has left the chamber. I hope he will come back to listen to some of the remainder of the debate. If he decides not to do so, it will reinforce my comments about the arrogance displayed by the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan.

● (1620)

What we need is the only kind of workable policy, a policy based on true supply and demand requirements. As I mentioned before, a political halfway measure will not work, is not working, and I think is a true demonstration to all parties of the House that it cannot work. Political halfway measures only complicate the issue, and if introduced into this House in another form I believe will not receive the support necessary for their passage.

Another area of concern in the question of feed grain is the seeming inability of the government to make up its mind on bringing forward a new policy in plenty of time for the political parties in this House, producer groups across the country and for provincial governments, particularly in Western Canada, to have a good look at the legislation to see whether or not it is acceptable. The debate on the feed grain issue has been going on for far too long. The government should act, and should act as soon as possible, to bring the matter before the public so it can be discussed in concrete terms.

So far as a grain policy is concerned, I think it is safe to say that Canada has almost reached the crossroads at this particular point in time. In my opinion we can opt for one of two policies. We can either opt for a policy that directs us toward a complete grain economy, which seems to be the policy we are adopting now; or we can direct our energies toward devising agricultural policies that provide for a grain-livestock economy, in which for the most part we feed and process our livestock in Canada and, if at all possible, ship the processed product to other parts of the world.

I know it is safe to say that it is the opinion of the Conservative party that the latter direction is the only acceptable one to follow so far as agricultural policy in Canada is concerned. I think we view with a certain amount of alarm the kind of situation that has developed in the production of hogs, livestock, eggs, turkeys, broilers. We seem to be driving ourselves into a strict grain economy and letting the United States produce the poultry products. I suggest that is a policy that is certainly unacceptable.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, it must be remembered by consumers that the only basic method that we have in Canada of reducing relatively high food costs is to increase domestic agricultural production. The public generally must realize that the farmers are entitled to, and indeed must be able to receive, a reasonable return on their time, effort and investment. The alternative to production at a profit is reduced production and increased imports, which ultimately will result in higher food costs for consumers. I say this, Mr. Speaker, because I believe it ties all our thoughts and goals together and points us in the direction we want to follow. While welcoming the amendment the government has brought forward to the cash advances legislation, I have no faith—this has been demonstrated over the period of years I have spent in the House of Commons—that the government will give any meaningful, long-term direction to agriculture today.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the minister gave us some advance warning that finally he was going to bring some legislation into this House, for on Friday last he issued a whole clutch of news releases. I did not know which was going to come first in his plans, an election or some legislation. This House has been in session during this 29th parliament for close to two years, during which time the minister has changed the direction of the marketing practices of the Canadian Wheat Board for domestic grain, practically without the benefit of legislation. Now that the government stands on the edge of defeat because of its mismanagement of Canadian affairs, its unwillingness to meet the problems of Canadians resulting from the cost of living, and its high-handed action in regard to grain marketing, the government finally brings in some legislation to double the amount of cash advance to farmers in the event that they cannot sell their grain.

Are we being given a preview of the minister's thinking? Is the minister concerned for our future grain sales to the extent that at this point in time he doubles cash advances? Let us remember that this was a measure introduced by a Conservative government, as the minister himself has mentioned, and introduced at a time when grain sales were at a very low ebb. The measure was designed to give some cash flow relief to farmers who at that time were unable to sell enough grain to keep themselves in business.

I wondered why the minister put emphasis on this measure at this time, so I looked at the report in the "Grain Statistics Weekly" put out by the Canadian Grain Commission. In terms of commercial disappearance of domestic and export grain at this point in time, our wheat sales are something over 117 million bushels less than the same time last year. And this, Mr. Speaker, in a crop year that has seen one of the highest world demands and market opportunities for wheat for many a year. The least the minister could have done when he introduced this bill was to explain why, with market conditions as they are at this point in time and with less than three months to the end of the crop year, we are over 117 million bushels short of the sales performance of the Canadian Wheat Board one year ago. That is the result of the minister monkeying around with what was a perfectly good marketing system. He armed himself with a monkey-wrench, a pair of plyers and a bale of haywire and started to work on the marketing machinery. That is the situation we are dealing with now, and primary marketings from farmers are almost in tune with the drop in export sales.

● (1630)

It was in these circumstances that the minister put out a bunch of press releases on Friday in respect of grain stabilization, a farm income package, cash advances, two-price wheat legislation and methods to bring certainty into the timing of final payments and so on. If he gets that all before the House at least maybe there will be some legislative base to work on.

In dealing with this bill I should like to point out one or two things to the House and perhaps to the minister. The original bill was put in at a time when there was some difficulty with marketing. This kind of legislation depends on two or three basic assumptions, or two or three basic things being in place in the grain marketing industry, without which it will not work. It depends on a quota system that works, and this is pretty important because it is on the basis of a working quota system that a farmer is able to deliver his grain in an orderly fashion, and that the Canadian Wheat Board is sure that repayments can be made. This depends on a price system that works and one that is predictable so the farmer and the Canadian Wheat Board can have confidence in it.

What is the quota system to be in the coming crop year? We just do not know what it is to be. The other day I asked Mr. Jarvis, a witness who appeared before the committee, this question about pricing and the quota system, and he said we would have to wait for another month or two. He is one of the members of the minister's grains group, and that was his answer. How does the minister expect us to be happy with what he is proposing in terms of cash advances when he does not tell us what other packages of goodies he has in his pockets? We do not know what the pricing system is to be. I think the minister has in reality said that the system of pricing on August 1 is to be the Winnipeg commodity exchange. That is what he has been saying to this House, but he has not been able to come out and tell the farmers exactly what he intends to do. Can he not bear to contemplate the results of his handiwork? Are the results going to be so horrible that he will not be able to contemplate them? Why does he not say what he is going to do? Does he not have the nerve to do so?

An hon. Member: Before Wednesday night.

Mr. Gleave: He better do so soon. When the cash advance legislation was passed, it was predicated and dependent upon a stable pricing system. Whatever benefits can be claimed for commodity marketing systems such as the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, stability is not one of them. Some people claim they can make more money this way, but you cannot claim stability. How can we have a cash advance system operating when we do not have a stable pricing and quota system? What will be the effect of the present suggested pricing system? How is the cash advance system going to work when it is dependent upon a monitoring system which is now being used to establish prices of feed grains on the prairies? If the farmers borrow these large amounts of money as envisaged by these amendments, and then either through the commodity exchange system or, by the present monitoring system the minister is using, prices drop disastrously, how are the farmers going to repay those cash advances proposed under this legislation?

I think the minister should explain these things instead of giving us a eulogy in his best classroom manner at the end of his speech, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta). I think the hon. member's point was well taken. It is nice to have a euphoric dream, and it is nice to have fine words, but what we must know is what the legislation is going to do. Will the Canadian Wheat Board be able to demand payments when the quota and pricing systems of the Canadian Wheat Board are no longer working and are no longer in place? How is one going to demand payment from the farmer when quotas are not orderly or properly established? How is this all going to operate? How can you demand payment from the farmer when the bloc system, which was developed and working well, is practically destroyed? In view of the various experiments the minister is carrying out around the country, how can payment be fairly demanded from the farmer who is left in the position that he either cannot deliver the grain or the price has dropped so far down it is virtually impossible for him to repay his loans? Those are the questions that should be answered by the minister.

Perhaps the minister does not know the answers to these questions. Let me remind him that in 1971 and 1972 farmers were badgered for payments. They were suffering the miseries of persecution and dunning for payments. They could not deliver their grain and therefore could not get the money to pay the amounts they owed on their loans at that time. It is fine for the minister to stand in his place and blandly refer to the good record of payments on the part of the farmers, and that the farmers can be trusted, but I have some serious doubts as to whether we can trust the minister.

Mr. Lang: Don't criticize the Wheat Board.

Mr. Gleave: I am not criticizing the Wheat Board, I am telling the minister about his shortcomings. I suggest that the minister should be telling this House how this legislation can work. In the press release he put out he is warning farmers that export markets are not now any more stable than they ever were, and we should be prepared for drastic swings both as to price and quantity. We have already witnessed the slump in quantity. A drop of 117 million bushels in the first three-quarters of the crop year is a pretty drastic drop in the export performance.

My colleague, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight), today asked the minister why it was that the Canadian Wheat Board's selling prices were rising so high above the Chicago prices. The minister did not answer that. He skirted the question. He may have a couple of things up his sleeve. If the minister has anything up his sleeve he should bring it out and place it on the table so that we will know what his policies are. He has been operating the grain policy of the country either through Orders in Council or by making statements such as he did in Estevan where he announced that the branch lines would be closed until July 15th. When that announcement had been made the farmers, of course, wanted to know whether or not it was so. Then, it was necessary to go to the management of the CNR in Saskatchewan to find out whether or not they intented to close the branch lines until July. They said that was not their intention.

● (1640)

Mr. Lang: That is why I did not say that.

Mr. Gleave: If the minister did not say that perhaps it was said by one of his handy men, one of the smart boys who run around on his behalf.

What right has a minister of the Crown or any of these other people to go to Saskatchewan and announce that the branch lines of the railway system will be closed down until July. They have no right to tell the people this. It is just the mouthings of a dictator, a guy who operates out of his hip pocket. The farmers of western Canada deserve a better deal. They deserve better consideration than this.

An hon. Member: They deserve a better government.

Mr. Gleave: Yes, they deserve a better government. The real story in respect of the minister's domestic grain marketing policy was revealed not in this House but over the CBC by a commentator, Mr. Jim Rae, from Winnipeg. This is a government of leaks. You know, somebody gets an idea from a secret conference behind the scenes and peddles it to the press. In that way we find out what is in store for the western farmer in respect of marketing. The real story is that the Canadian Wheat Board's work will be cut severely while the work of other marketing organizations will increase. One has to listen to the public media in order to find out what the minister has in store for the farmer. The minister intends to turn much of the power of the Canadian Wheat Board over to the Canadian Livestock Feed Board.

An hon. Member: That will help the people in Quebec.

Mr. Gleave: Yes. The other day we heard demands in respect of the Unemployment Insurance Commission that the board of referees be bilingual. I told them that the language ought to be Russian or some other ethnic language because that would be a lot better in Saskatchewan. However, these are some of the policies the minister trots out. The Livestock Feed Board may even ask the Wheat Board to sell feed grains in the domestic market and cut off their export sales which have already been made. One reason we have this very poor export performance is this type of approach. Then the experts go on to say that in the next crop year if the Canadian Wheat Board does sell grain in the domestic market the only way they can establish a price is through the Winnipeg commodity exchange. This is the story that is told by newsmen on the CBC. This is the type of policy that is being worked out. Western feed grain will be bought and sold freely and not restricted to any quantity.

I got a kick out of hearing the minister say that they will be selling it to their neighbours but that their neighbours may be a fair piece away. I thought that was pretty good. This is the sort of program that is being proposed. It is the type of program we must consider in respect of this legislation. I think there are two responsibilities here with regard to this legislation. One is to see that it will operate in such a way that if the producer borrows the money he will have full expectation of being able to repay it by the only method he has, which is the delivery of grain. I think the other responsibility we have is to the taxpayer of Canada who is making the money available on an interest-free basis. These are the two responsibilities members of this House have. Perhaps a third responsibility is to see that the farmer can function in good times and in bad times without too much duress.

The point I should like to make is that if the minister intends to change the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board to the extent they have already been changed and to the extent they are apparently to be changed, then the farmer will not be in a position in which he can be sure he will be able to repay the money and the Canadian Wheat Board will not be in a position in which it can be sure that it can recover these payments due. My real fear is that this program which has been excellent, and which has served the people of Canada and the farmers very well, will come into disrepute. That is the real danger. When the minister stood up he made no attempt to tell the House how this legislation could work well under the new pricing and selling methods which will be used in respect of feed grain sales. We must not forget that feed wheat is an integral part of the industry.

This is not only a concern of mine. Other people share this concern, including the government of Manitoba. The minister of agriculture of that province even went to the extent of polling the farmers of Manitoba in order to find out their attitude concerning feed grain marketing. The federal Minister of Agriculture undoubtedly has received opinions from such organizations as the Federation of Agriculture, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and the National Farmer's Union. I am sure they told him the same things they told me. They are very concerned about the path he is taking particularly with regard to domestic grain. I am sure they expressed that concern to him as it has been expressed in this House. The minister has chosen to ignore entirely these expressions of concern.

The minister goes on his merry way and winds up making a peroration about what a nice thing it will be when all Canadians lives together in a happy community where momma loves poppa, poppa loves momma and the kids love everybody. That is the sort of dreamland in which the minister is living, but the ordinary producer and farmer must live in the real world where he has not only to borrow money but to repay it. We have not had the answers this afternoon, so I suppose we will not get them. I hope the minister will tell the railroads that branch lines will be in operation soon. It is our hope that he will get them going by June 1.

● (1650)

Mr. Lang: I did it at Lloydminster.

Mr. Gleave: That was good of the minister to unload it on Albertans as well as on Saskatchewanians at the same time. A load of so and so like that should be spread around. It is too much for one province to bear. It is the sort of thing that the minister unloads from time to time.

I am very concerned about the slump in which I find our grain deliveries. I do not believe farmers can borrow themselves into prosperity. If we are to have prosperous agriculture, we will have it because of good production, good marketing and an efficient industry all around. The minister said in his speech that the survival of farmers has been largely due to their efficiency and productivity. I agree, but I suggest that their efficiency and productivity can stand only so much badgering from the poor policies which are poorly planned from the top.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a word about Bill C-25 this afternoon.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are presently in the first round of the debate, and to be fair we should hear from the agriculture critics of all parties. I say that not because I want to cut off my friend the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton) but because it seems to me that we should hear the spokesmen of all the parties on this subject. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) was prepared to speak on behalf of his party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I am glad the hon. member reminded the Chair that this is the first round. I apologize. I should have recognized the hon. member for Bellechasse.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague of the New Democratic Party for his intervention and I apologize to my hon. colleague from the Progressive Conservative party. I understand that there had been a previous agreement, but we are aware of our responsibilities and we usually respect our engagements. The Chair was well advised to consider the point of order raised by my hon. colleague of the New Democratic Party.

I would like to take part very briefly in this debate because I want to be better informed and to be involved in improving the methods of farming used in the ridings of our Western colleagues. If I understood the minister correctly, he said a moment ago that the Liberal party is the only one able to grasp problems at the national level. I very much deplore this remark by the minister because, with today's media, transmitting news instantaneously throughout Canada, I think that every member who takes a serious interest in his country's problems can surely see that in the East as in the West, in the Maritimes or in Ontario, agricultural problems are very similar.

After listening to the speech made by the hon. member who spoke before me, who was wondering what prices grain producers will be receiving, even with this amendment to the bill, which, I hope, will pass, I am under the impression that even in western Canada, farmers would like to know slightly in advance if their future income will allow them to remain in business and meet their commitments.

About fifteen days ago, when we were discussing a bill to allow the farmers to borrow money under some legislation and talking of establishing a higher loan ceiling I said: that farmers must be allowed not only to get into debts, but also to obtain an income so that they can pay back their loans. I imagine that western Canada's farmers faced with the same problem and that this is why they are very worried about the future sales of their grains.

Incidentally, I would like to point out that this legislation enacted in 1957, as the hon. minister said a while ago. In its Annual Report for 1972-1973, on page 63, the Canadian Wheat Board makes the following statement:

> Advance payments on unharvested grain are payable only under Section 7.2 of the Act and an Order in Council must be made for its application. Grain unharvested on account of bad weather causes also under that Section which was resorted to during the crop year which is the object of this Report through Order in Council 1972-2994 which was valid until May 1st 1973.

Under the amendment to the Advance Payments Act, are any difficulties foreseen as concerns the sales of the 1974 crops? Is a loss anticipated on the international market, or is an even greater demand foreseen on the part of the farmers for the implementation of this act so that they may benefit from it?

Mr. Speaker, if I may refer also to the Annual report of the Canadian Wheat Board—

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order. In line with a suggestion I made earlier this afternoon, I may say that there have been discussions and I believe you will find there is agreement in the House for us to give up the private members hour for today so that the discussion on the second reading of this bill can continue. In that way perhaps two or three more speakers might have time to speak before six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Do I gather that we have the unanimous consent of the House to continue the debate on Bill C-25?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, although the government is a minority one, I suggest that one realises that matters can be handled very quickly, and I welcome this. I would like to see this bill carried as quickly as possible, and for this reason I shall be brief.

I would nonetheless refer to a table published in page 21 of the agenda to the Canadian Wheat Board Annual Report:

> Total Number of Canadian Wheat Board Delivery Permits Issued to Producers:

For the year 1958-59 the number was 229,844, while for 1972-73, the reported figure is 171,612. So there was a decrease of 58,232. Would the minister explain to the House in this debate the reason of that decrease in the number of permits? Did their prices go up in terms of bushels per acre or did the acreage actually remain the same despite the drop in the number of permits?

● (1700)

Those are questions about which we are greatly concerned, and I would hope that some light could be cast on that.

Coming back to the bill itself, I agree that with the devaluation of the dollar and with inflation this amount should be increased from $6,000 to $15,000. I think that would be quite reasonable. Consideration must also be given to organizations and operations and those amounts should be increased to $30,000 in the case of a two-member partnership, or $45,000 in the case of a three-member partnership.

I think those are improvements and I would like to see those contained in the bill implemented so that western farmers will benefit from them in order to ensure the survival of the important farm industry which is currently experiencing excessively difficult times, especially Quebec, Ontario and in the Maritime provinces.

It will be remembered that in recent days, particularly here in this House during the question period, the problem of beef, hog, milk and poultry producers has often been raised. That means that there are problems across Canada, and I would like to draw the attention of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang), who is also responsible for the distribution of feed grains across Canada, to the fact that the feed grain problem in my province is extremely serious. One has only to come to our ridings to hear hundreds of complaints in that respect and eastern farmers hope that the new policy referred to by the minister not too long ago will be announced soon and will bring improvements to Quebec and Maritime farmers so as to allow them to bring their production costs down without for that matter having to beg for charity from western farmers.

Mr. Speaker, we do not ask western farmers to give us their crops as a present, or to let us have their production at sacrifice prices, but we want the government to ask in such a way as to ensure eastern and western Canada equal opportunities in the areas of beef, pork, poultry and milk production.

The central government must take the necessary measures, otherwise we shall get even closer to reduced production, specially of milk, and we shall have to import more in the coming year. But who will be our suppliers? New Zealand is experiencing the same phenomenon; according to our information, milk production has decreased considerably. The same is happening in Australia. If we do not take the necessary steps for the survival of the industry, I do not know in what country we shall get the dairy products we shall need in the next few years.

The bill deals with agriculture as a whole. In my mind, when we speak of agriculture, it simply means all productions related to agriculture.

Therefore, I support the bill now before us. I endorse its provisions and its principles. I want to assure my colleagues and farmers from western Canada that even though we represent eastern parts of the country, we want to promote their prosperity and support the efforts of those who seek greater and more stable income, so that all together we can work for the survival of the Canadian agricultural industry.

[English]

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on Bill C-25 which is to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. Over the years the so-called cash advance legislation has been very helpful to western grain producers. As the minister indicated, it was introduced by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

The bill proposes to raise the ceilings from $6,000 to $15,000 for an individual, and where there are two shareholders or partners over 18 years of age to $30,000. Where there are three or more shareholders involved, and they are principally occupied in farming, the ceiling will be $45,000. These are large sums of money. They indicate just how far rising costs of production and inflation have cut into western agriculture and added to the costs of our operations out there. The minister made a great point about how far he has gone. He went to a lot of trouble to tell us of his concern and to indicate the actions he has taken to help western agriculture. I can tell him that my constituents are completely confused by this lawyer's advice. What they want is common sense advice.

To indicate the concern which we have in the west, I would like to quote as follows from a bulletin of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool issued on April 22:

> The pool directors said members are concerned that government doesn't seem to understand or listen to their views. "Right now they have the feeling they're not being heard clearly and they're talking about drastic action to make sure the government knows they are highly concerned."
>
> Reports from member meetings indicate that farmers are suggesting that their organization get more militant in dealing with Ottawa. Ideas suggested include a march on Ottawa, mass meetings in Saskatchewan to demonstrate concern, circulation of petitions requesting specific policies, a letter writing campaign to M.P.'s, enlistment of stronger prairie government support for agricultural causes.
> "Our members are asking us to be more forceful in our presentations," said the Pool directors. "They're saying we should fight openly if necessary to gain the things that are right for farmers."

I point out that this is from the largest farm organization we have in western Canada. I think it gives the lie to the minister's case. My experience over the years is that the minister has proven just one thing to the grain industry of western Canada, and that is that we are able to give our feed grain away at fire sale prices. Everyone well remembers when we were trying to get a four bushel quota and $1.25 a few years ago, and the best this minister and his experts could come up with was operation LIFT. The money that is being talked about in this bill is a cash advance on the produce that the western grain farmer must store until it can be marketed; it is not a grant from the government in any sense of the word.

● (1710)

There are a good number of reasons why western farmers cannot market their grain, and transportation is the first one. We have just come through a wasted five year freeze on transportation. Our people are desperate for some leadership, Mr. Speaker. The particular subdivision to which I deliver grain has not had a train for over four months. There are absolutely no delivery opportunities there at all, and at the end of the crop year the country elevators were filled. This indicates just how necessary the cash advances are.

I should like to read from a letter which I just received from a constituent of mine who points out that even though the rest of the country seems to think that farmers are receiving $6 per bushel for spring wheat, this is not the case. Farmers received $2.25 initial price and another $1.75 but they will be fortunate if when they receive their final payment it brings them net $4.50 for No. I.C.W., the top grade of spring wheat. My constituent writes as follows:

> Last fall, I harvested my crop but no room was available in the town where I haul my wheat for months—Estuary. As you know, the trouble was due to a lack of boxcars and then later, the rail strike.
> Now, the government knew there was a rail workers' strike coming before it ever took place. Then even during the strike, they dragged their feet and were not in a hurry to settle it. I knew what the outcome would be, so did the government. Yet they refused to hurry, even though our wheat was badly needed and winter was coming on.
> Finally, I was able to haul my first wheat for the new crop year on October 12, 1973. Then in November I was able to haul two more loads. From then on, the elevators were blocked for a considerable time and finally my farm was snowed in and still is.

This letter was written on April 1, Mr. Speaker. He continues:

> There have been times when I could not haul wheat for three or four months, due to no quotas, etc. If the grocer had not extended credit to me, it would have gone very hard with us in those past years. Yet, these things are never realized or cross the minds of many well fed and well paid government officials. If they would receive a cheque once in three months, maybe their thinking would change a bit also.

Later, the letter continues:

> I say the Trudeau government has had the poorest management and price controls we have seen in many a decade. I hope a change will come for the better, soon. I have grown up in the "dirty thirties" and I know what hard times are. I know how to save, but I have never been able as yet to even keep a life insurance policy paid up let alone have a bank account. Surely things could be managed a lot better in a country that is blessed with all the resources we have in Canada. I was born here and I am grateful for our freedom, but there are some things as I mentioned, that I say is a shame for our country.

There are many, many people who could write similar letters, Mr. Speaker.

As I said at the outset, over the years this cash advance legislation has been very helpful. From its inception in 1957-58 to the crop year, 1972-73, there has been a total cash advance to western producers of $1,042,166,054. Of that, there was owing to the Canadian Wheat Board on July 31, 1973, some $7 million—this is less than three-quarters of 1 per cent. I should like to make the case that most of this has been through loose administration by government employees and not because farmers have not repaid.

While I am on the subject of loose administrative procedures, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that we resent the harassment of producers by bureaucrats. Particularly we resent what I could call the sinister grains group that has been set up and that has ridden roughshod over some of the respected organizations administering our grain policies in western Canada. I can think of the person who set up the grains group, Mr. Rod Bryden, who is now a consultant for the government and is paid from public money to look into the question of elevators in western Canada. I was shaken the other day when a member of the grains group took it upon himself to announce that there will be a system of flexible tariffs applied to the grain industry in western Canada. We have a very respected Canadian grain commission which has the responsibility for setting tariffs. I was even further surprised when the chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board volunteered the information at a transportation meeting in Ottawa that they would spend some $130 million of farmers' money to purchase 4,000 hopper cars. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this sort of announcement should not come from government boards and commissions.

This afternoon, in reply to a question about whether the government's two price wheat program actually saved consumers eight cents on a loaf of bread, the minister in his typical roundabout way indicated that the government's program did in fact save consumers eight cents per loaf. This is utter rubbish, Mr. Speaker. Any one even slightly familiar with the industry knows that you can get about 60 one pound loaves of bread from a bushel of wheat. A table of subsidies put out by Agriculture Canada shows the posted price of wheat as $6 per bushel but our wheat is selling for about $4.50 per bushel, and the subsidy paid by the federal government is $1.25 which I calculate to be about two cents per loaf.

[Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek).]

Some things about the cash advance legislation have caused problems, Mr. Speaker. One is the business of terminating quotas. The Canadian Wheat Board has authority to terminate quotas and force the grain in. This works a hardship in a situation where an old couple may have left the farm for the winter and moved into the city or down south. I hope that the government will give more consideration to such people, and I realize that last year the Wheat Board were very responsive, realizing that the roads were snowed in. I would also urge that the government consider allowing a tenant to apply for his share of the cash advance without having the landlord sign.

Finally, I should like everyone to understand that if a farmer takes this cash advance it is only an advance on unsold produce and that he pays income tax on it.

● (1720)

Mr. Norval Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, the minister traced the history of cash advances to western producers. In the 1950's, when farmers could not find markets for their crops and asked for cash advances, they were told that such a program would be impossible to administer. Strangely, the Conservative government in 1957 introduced the maximum cash advance of $3,000, an amount the minister treated lightly. Three thousand dollars in those days would go farther to meeting costs than a like amount would today. The advance was intended to help small producers. Over the years it has helped smaller producers. Operators of larger farms have always had access to money at low rates of interest. Although I support the increase to $15,000, I think the larger sum will help operators of larger farms.

The idea behind cash advances was not the same in previous years. Cash advance legislation was introduced to meet the needs of farmers who had no markets for their wheat. Not having markets, they could not deliver their grain to elevators and get a cash ticket. Today the difficulty lies in getting grain to export position. Once more the minister has come to the aid of the railroads. If you provide the farmer with a cash advance, he will not be so worried if he does not see the train. The pressure is taken off the railroad. Of course, the cash advance will not help the farmer who has tough or damp grain, or whose grain starts to heat when the weather gets warm.

The minister operates with a method entirely his own. The Western Producer of April 25, 1974, carried an article under the headline, "Grains Council gets warning from Lang". The Council did well to heed the minister's warning, as he allows organizations and boards only so long before they are forced to agree with his conclusions. In this connection, may I refer to an article in the Star Phoenix of October 15, 1972, in which the minister is quoted as saying:

> One of the significant things about LIFT was that it was the one measure which we had to do a little harshly. We couldn't wait around and give everybody lots of choice and understanding.

Freedom of choice and understanding are what democracy is all about. In his dealings concerning the Wheat Board and western transportation, the minister has told organizations to present briefs and ideas, and then has said that those ideas are wrong and his are right. In the speech which Mr. Jarvis delivered for him, the minister said, as recorded in The Western Producer of April 25:

In the very near future, the federal government will be making known its final policy decisions for a new domestic feed grains policy for Canada.

Apparently the minister does not listen to anybody. He does not act on the basis of compromise.

The minister referred to two-price wheat and how great that was for the western farmer. When two-price wheat was introduced in January, 1972, the asking price in Vancouver for prairie grain with 13½ per cent protein content was $1.71; that represented an additional payment to the farmer of $1.28. The asking price for grain increased, until in May, 1973, it was $3.05 in Vancouver. After that the western farmer started to lose money on the grain consumed domestically in Canada. Let us assume we use about 60 million bushels a year in Canada; we use about 5 million bushels per month. If you apply the asking price to that amount of wheat, you will see that, under two-price wheat, the farmer was about 5 million dollars ahead of the game up to the end of April, 1974. Taking it in round figures, we can say the program has been operating for 2½ years and the farmer has benefitted overall to the extent of about 5 million bushels. Unless we can continue to sell wheat in excess of $5 and get it to export position, the farmer will soon run up a net loss under the two-price system. I hope the government does not try to kid anyone.

The minister, in his speech in Estevan, said how great two-price wheat was. He also said the government intended to buy 4,000 new hopper cars. That is interesting. He still has to announce the order. There are no hopper cars on order. Even if they are ordered now, delivery cannot take place until 1976 at the earliest.

The minister mentioned feed grains policy. The industry could not come up with a satisfactory pricing method for feed grains, but the minister did. He introduced a system of monitoring off board prices. There are monuments to the minister's policy which will stand for many years, and I am referring to the empty feed lots in many municipalities of Saskatchewan. You will find bankrupt feed lots in practically every municipality. They are monuments to the minister's pricing policy and methods with regard to feed grain.

A previous speaker linked cash advances with the quota system. Certainly, the minister's policy has ridden roughshod over the quota system. A quota system will not work if some deliveries come under the quota and others do not. The government's feed grain policy has created havoc in feeding operations. According to The Western Producer, you can buy an entire basic herd in just about every municipality in Saskatchewan. I looked at some herds over the weekend and talked to some of the people who are getting out of the business. The government had better take a serious look at the sorts of policies it has introduced in the past as they have practically eliminated incentives for the production of food which is needed in the world and in Canada.

The minister said that we are behind with grain deliveries, as compared with last year. Do you remember the slogan of 1972, "The land is strong"? There was talk of delivering a billion bushels. That slogan is hardly opportune today, in view of recent strikes. Consider the government's response to the rail strike last fall, and compare its attitude last fall with the attitude as shown in the slogans "The land is strong" and "grain handling strikes are a barbaric weapon which costs us sales." It is strange that on the one hand the government considers strikes barbaric and that on the other it condones strikes, legal or illegal, wildcat or otherwise. The government's position here is different from its position on the prairies. The government members here chant that it is the liberal way to allow strikes wildcat or legal.

● (1730)

As I said at the beginning, I welcome this increase. It may help some farmers, especially those who cannot sell their grain because their farms are on rail lines which the companies, for one reason or another, fail to serve.

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-25 is a simple bill. It provides for increases in cash advance payments to individual farmers on farm-stored prairie grain from $6,000 to $15,000. The ceiling has been raised to $45,000 for partnerships and corporations in which three or more farmers are involved. I welcome this legislation and think it heads in the right direction. Administered properly, this legislation has helped farmers in the past when they have found themselves in dire financial straits.

I should like to examine this bill in relation to the government's total farm package. Then, perhaps, we could discuss it with a little more wisdom. I should certainly like to know what the government's feed grains policy is to be. I think there is a deliberate policy on the part of the government to dismantle the powers of the Canadian Wheat Board, a Board which has been a good friend of the farmer for the last 35 years. Many powerful allies are helping the government to follow this train of thought. As long as a feed grains policy is not fully defined, there will be problems concerning cash advance payments.

What is to happen to the quota system? As I understand it, there is to be an open quota on feed grains but a restricted quota covering grains which come under the Wheat Board. I believe the whole quota system is likely to be a total loss, along with the transportation system which will also be affected. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) said domestic feed grain prices have been deliberately held up in price. In my opinion, it is about time they were. Present prices will at least cover cost of production as well as help farmers to repay some of the debts they accumulated during the years they were selling grain at below cost; for instance, for 30 cents a bushel to farm implement companies who were feeding it to cattle and realizing a good profit on the enterprise. I hope the price of feed grain stays up for the foreseeable future because, as I say, it is about time farmers received a fair price for their products.

I should like to point out that growing grain is one of the most efficient ways of producing protein. The feed grains industry is important, of course; and the livestock industry is important. But there is something we shall have to realize in this country within the next five or ten years, that converting the protein in grain to protein in pork, poultry and beef cattle is an extremely inefficient process. Protein in the form of beef and pork is an expensive form of protein, and as the world becomes hungrier, protein from grain will be an important factor in saving from starvation people in many parts of the world, that is, if we are concerned about people in other parts of the world. I was reading an article recently which pointed out that, weight for weight, soybean contains twice as much protein as animal products.

In conclusion, let me say we should be strengthening the Wheat Board rather than weakening it through a feed grains policy which in my opinion is to the detriment of the western farmer. At least 90 per cent of the western farmers to whom I have spoken feel that barley and oats should remain under control and that the pricing mechanism should come under the board. They are also concerned about the future of the quota system. Many farmers have asked me, "Why is the government buying hopper cars for the railway companies, when it should be the responsibility of the CN and the CP rather than an expense borne by the Canadian taxpayers?"

With regard to rail line abandonment, last summer, when the federal government held the prairies conference in Calgary and met with the western premiers, they said they would postpone railway line abandonment for 18 months. Today, the minister and other spokesmen for the government are saying the lines will be closed down until July 15. There has not been a train to Meadow Lake for about a month: there has not been a train down the Glaslyn-Turtleford line for about six weeks. The rail roads are open; there are no lines washed out there. There may be in the Lumsden area, but not in the northwest. It seems to me a deliberate attempt is being made to abandon lines via the back door, which is something the western Canadian farmer will not forget should an election come, whenever that may be.

I am prepared to see this bill pass second reading. We are in favour of it. However, I am hoping that our railroad system will be so efficient that farmers will be able to sell their grain when they need to, rather than being obliged to make use of this legislative machinery.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I find that the opportunity afforded me to take part in the debate on this bill is opportune since only today I tried to put a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board but was unable to pursue it because Your Honour, in your wisdom, did not see fit to allow me to do so. I posed that question believing it was straightforward, forthright and one which producers in western Canada could expect to be answered. I would never question Your Honour's authority or wisdom, but there are occasions when not only members of the House of Commons but people across Canada deserve an answer to questions they have raised.

● (1740)

I believe that the producers of grain deserve an answer on matters as important to them as, not only this bill, but what is happening to their product after it is produced. I have before me a report in the Globe and Mail. I trust that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board is not like his counterpart, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), who has stated that the Globe and Mail does not always print the truth, because the minister is quoted by the Globe and Mail. The article begins by saying this:

[Mr. Nesdoly.]

Parliament took a major step yesterday toward writing into law the government's two-price wheat program—

This is a program of the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, which the Globe and Mail article says is "currently saving consumers eights cents a loaf on bread prices". The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton) referred in his speech to a question I asked today, and I think fairly well explained the situation. It is not a question of who is paying for what. I am sure that the consumer is prepared to pay for his products, and I know that the producer is prepared to place his grain on the market on an equitable basis. But I believe he has the right to know what is happening to his grain.

The government is paying a subsidy of $1.25 a bushel, which amounts to approximately two cents a loaf. That is a matter of mathematics and I do not think it should present a problem to the minister. Today I was hoping the minister would rise to state unequivocally exactly how this $1.25, to a maximum of $1.75, that the government is prepared to pay as a subsidy to bread manufacturers is going to be applied. The minister may skate around this question and throw in some figures, but I believe the producer has a right to know what is happening to his grain.

The producers are also asking other questions. For example, how is the subsidy payment going to be made? Is the government making this payment as purchases are made, or is it made to the Canadian Wheat Board on a quarterly basis or at the end of the year? Then, again, how is the subsidy, after it is paid to the Wheat Board, paid to the producer? Is it going to be on a acreage basis, as it has been over the past years, or is it going to be placed in the pool and paid out on a bushel basis? On what grades will the payment be made? These are all questions that the producers are asking, and I believe the minister would be doing a service to Canadian producers if he would rise in his place and unequivocally tell the House exactly how these payments are going to be made in the days and months that lie ahead.

Mr. Lang: The hon. member should read the bill.

Mr. Towers: There is nothing about that in the bill. All the bill refers to is advance payment on grain. The question being asked today is how these payments will be made. The minister rose in his place and stated that a Conservative government years ago established, in their wisdom, a base of $3,000 for permit holders. Then in very gracious words he pointed out how much more the government today is giving the producers, namely, $15,000. I would impress upon you, Mr. Speaker, that that original $3,000 bought in those days as much as $15,000 will buy today. The Minister of Agriculture has said that some agricultural input costs have gone up 200 per cent to 300 per cent in the last year. So if you look back over the many years since a Conservative government first had the idea of instituting this type of policy, you will see the producer is just holding his own.

This bill places salve on a sore wound. The government insists on continuing its policy, or rather lack of policy, of failing to come to grips with the real problem facing the agricultural industry today. The real and long-standing difficulty confronting the farmer is the cost-price squeeze in which he continually finds himself in the present-day economy, one in which inflation is destroying the stability of the industry. Populationwise, the farmer is in the minority. It is a generally accepted fact that 7 per cent of the population is engaged in agriculture and the production of food. Yet the farmer has to compete with the other industries on the labour market, and this includes the government, attempting to hire the workers he needs. The government is causing a great drain on the labour market today. In the agriculture committee we were told there were 662 Ph.D's working in the Department of Agriculture research branch alone. Certainly there is a great demand for efficiency in the industries of the world.

No doubt this bill will be proclaimed by the government as of great advantage to the grain producer, but it certainly falls short of what the farmer could and does expect from the government. This legislation will not give the farmer any extra money for his product. I want to impress upon every urban dweller—and I include in this group the minister responsible for the Wheat Board—that this advance payment has to be repaid, every cent of it. Actually, what it does is to get the government off the hook once more, at a time when it should be going out to sell grain to the maximum potential. If the farmer were assured that there would be an opportunity for him to market his grain on a steady basis throughout the year, knowing full well that at the end of the year he would not be left holding the bag—a bag that does not contain money but only the sweat, labour and tears of his efforts of the previous year—he would not need any other inducement to grow grain.

During the past several years the Liberal government has mishandled farmers' products. First of all, there was the supposedly famous Lift program, which the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Horner) made reference to and for which the farmers of western Canada have not yet forgiven the government; nor should any consumer of this country forgive a government for establishing any plan that is detrimental to the production of food. For example, I refer to the program of a former minister of agriculture to kill thousands of chickens and hens so the producers could receive a benefit. The people of western Canada referred to this program, and still refer to it, as "henocide". It is immoral and illogical to try to justify a program of this nature, and now we are getting into a similar situation.

The Canadian Wheat Board is sending out letters urging farmers to deliver their grain. Elevators are plugged in many areas, so cannot accept delivery. There are ships on the west coast waiting to be loaded. The Canadian grain producer is paying demurrage charges. There are hungry people at the other end of the line waiting for this grain, waiting for food. Added to this confused muddle we have a Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) who admits that our transportation system is in a mess and that he does not have control.

I should like to refer to a letter that appeared in the Western Producer of April 25, 1974. A portion of this letter reads as follows:

● (1750)

A survey in early March of elevators at Indian Head, Qu'Appelle and McLean reveals the following:

McLean elevator is filled to capacity.

Indian Head elevators with approximately 633,000-bushel carry-capacity have now in storage 503,000 bushels of grain.

At McLean and Qu'Appelle loaded boxcars waited for ten days before being shipped.

In Indian Head ten loaded cars were stationary from February 11 to 25 before being picked up. Serial numbers of these cars are available.

These points are on the main line of the CPR which would therefore emphasize the fact that there is grain available at centrally located elevators waiting to be shipped to the terminals. It would appear that the responsibility for failure to meet our obligation to overseas grain markets should be accepted by the railroads as they have failed in their obligations to move the grain which the farmers have already supplied to their local elevators.

That is why I suggest we have to go along with this type of program as this government procrastinates to the point where farmers are not able to deliver their product, and they do need money with which to operate. The opposition has tried and tried to get the government to take some definite action. The government has turned transportation over to the Canadian Transport Commission, placing at its head a former member of the Liberal cabinet who certainly did not do anything to enhance his image in the eyes of the Canadian public when he was in parliament. How can he be expected to do other than create the type of situation we have within our transportation system, which the Minister of Transport has defined as a mess?

The chief commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board said earlier this month that even if the targets set by the railways for grain movement are met starting immediately, the west coast backlog will not be cleared until the end of July. Vessel demurrage will continue to cost producers hundreds of thousands, if not millions of dollars until the situation is rectified. The circumstances at the lakehead are serious also, but will not be realized until the middle of May when stocks disappear and vessels might be waiting in the St. Lawrence. If the railways do not meet their targets, insufficient grain will move to the lakehead for lake vessels to meet Wheat Board commitments. Once lake freight is lost, it cannot be recovered, and the same costs and charges of contractual default will be faced as are now being experienced on the west coast.

The railways said their targets would be met by July 31, but the chief commissioner said that is not satisfactory to our customers who expect to lift their grain between February and July. They are not satisfied to have their supplies by the end of July, especially when there are people hungry and starving in May. He also stated that with the over-all shortage of cars, grain has not been getting its fair share. Regardless of the fact that one minister is urging farmers to plant more grain, another telling them to deliver their crops to the market, and the Minister of Transport announcing the repair and purchase of additional boxcars, with contracts signed for the sale of grain, not one of these requests, pleas or statements is worth anything to the producer when his grain cannot be delivered.

Why should this government or any reasonable, thinking person expect farmers to plant one more field at the request of the minister when they are faced with the pressures and frustrations of not being able to get their grain into the elevators? Why should the farmer continue year after year to sweat it out, knowing that with luck he might break even and without luck he will be met with a loss in his operations? Granted, the farmer is the backbone of the nation and we cannot get along without him. Why, then, does this government insist upon introducing piecemeal legislation which is only a stopgap, just to make the picture look rosy in the eyes of those who do not understand the difficulties of agriculture, particularly when this serious situation is not going to disappear on its own? Until ministers responsible for agriculture, transport and the Wheat Board work together toward a sound, long-range program not just for today, this week, next month but for the future, this situation will not disappear.

At a time when the price of grain is right and it should be moved, there is a bottleneck; yet farmers are urged to plant one more field, not having any guarantee that the price will last unless this government takes some effective action. We, as Canadians and as parliamentarians, should take the initiative in setting up a world food reserve to purchase surplus grain for emergencies. Neither Canada nor any single country should have to finance such a project; all countries should support it. There should be grain on hand during years of plenty to make up the lack in times of poor harvests. Last year there was a shortfall of 5 per cent, and here we are with grain which cannot be moved but which should be moved now when the price is right.

It has been estimated that 5 per cent of the United States wheat production has already been lost due to the drought in Texas. Although at the moment the over-all picture looks promising for increased supplies of grain, that grain is a long way from the bin. Our hopes are high, and we expect the government to get busy to see that the grain is sold through the Wheat Board for export, to ensure that delivery will not be delayed and to arrange to have a sufficient supply for domestic use.

Farmers are being urged by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board to plant additional acreage in grain, but they cannot deliver the grain they now have and they have no guarantee that good prices will last, unless this government takes some effective steps. The Minister of Agriculture has said that much of the cost of production of feed grain is up, as I said earlier, 200 per cent to 300 per cent. He goes around the country telling people that farmers must have more and more money for their products if they are to remain in operation. Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board that with these programs of the Minister of Agriculture there is no end to what farmers will have to pay for the production of food and to try to keep ahead of the increasing costs of production.

On motion of Mr. Towers the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Mr. Towers.]

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we Canadians today have reached a threshold of great challenge and great opportunity.

We are thriving as seldom before in our history. Our growth of output, employment and real income surpasses that of virtually every other industrial country.

But we are confronted by the scourge of inflation, worldwide in its origins and impact. No other issue more deeply disturbs our country, this government or me, as Minister of Finance. While we have suffered less from inflation than most other nations, we can and must do better to overcome it and alleviate its burdens.

The challenge facing the country is to break the inflationary spiral. But we must do this in ways that will not erode our prosperity nor damage our growth. Let no one think that this can be done easily or quickly. It will take time and effort. And until we have brought inflation under control, it is imperative that the burdens it inflicts be equitably shared and that those people who are most vulnerable be decently protected.

An opportunity is at hand to strengthen the Canadian economy and to improve the standard of living of every Canadian. This will require the wise development of our unique storehouse of resources—both material and human. In doing this, we must not allow ourselves to be diverted by ill-considered and illusory policies that would prejudice our long-term interests as a nation.

This budget has three main purposes. The first is to reinforce our attack on inflation through encouraging increased supplies of goods and services. This we will do by maintaining the strong expansion of the economy and by increasing the productive capacity of our farms, fisheries and industries. The second is to act directly against high prices where that is practical. The third is further to alleviate the adverse impact of rising prices on all Canadians, particularly those with lower incomes.

[Translation]

International Developments

The problem of inflation is clearly world-wide in origin. The Economic Review that I tabled last week deals with this at some length, and documents the leading role which accelerating international prices have played in our domestic price experience. Indeed, world inflation can be traced to the enormous buildup in international liquidity associated with the massive deficits in the U.S. balance of payments which ultimately resulted in the breakdown of the Bretton Woods exchange rate system. More recently, the concurrence of economic expansion in most industrial countries, coupled with major crop failures, led to an explosion of commodity and food prices. Last December, the world was hit further by a cutback in the supply of oil and staggering increases in its price. With so many nations facing massive shocks to their international balances, the world community is threatened by fragmentation and protectionism.

These developments constitute a menace to all countries, and not least to Canada, given our dependence on international trade and investment. No country can long prosper in a world of unsettled international financial and trade arrangements. This is clearly a time for renewed co-operation and strenuous efforts by all countries to rebuild a viable international trade and payments system. Let me stress that Canada has been playing a full role in the broad international effort to achieve this objective.

This government came early to the conclusion that under the conditions of great uncertainty emerging in the world, floating exchange rates were appropriate. Indeed, Canada adopted this policy four years ago. This approach has now been widely adopted and seems in these troubled times to be serving us all well.

In the pursuit of international monetary reform, Canada has persistently urged that the discussions should concentrate on matters of immediate importance where progress is possible. Last January, this approach of making progress where we could was endorsed by world finance ministers at their meetings in Rome.

Canada has also urged, and will continue to urge, that the International Monetary Fund, the key international financial institution, be strengthened in order to play an increasing role in maintaining world monetary order. We support the proposal for a new council of the IMF, composed of ministers, to meet frequently to tackle directly the major international financial issues, especially world inflation.

On the trade side, we have been concerned, as the energy crisis emerged, that countries might individually take restrictive action to relieve their balance of payments deficits. I have stressed this danger at many international meetings. I therefore welcome and support the efforts being made in the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, and in the work begun at the Washington Energy Conference, to ensure that countries avoid beggar-thy-neighbour policies. Recent actions in Europe make it all the more urgent that we proceed with this initiative without delay. God and this House willing, I will be in Paris in two weeks' time to offer Canada's full co-operation in an appropriate pledge to avoid such destructive policies.

Looking further ahead, it is important that the Tokyo Round of trade negotiations proceed on schedule. We will need to address ourselves to removing unjustifiable trade barriers, improving the GATT rules governing international trade, and dealing effectively with problems of security of supply for key international commodities. If timely progress is to be made, it is critical that the United States take the required legislative action that will enable it to play its essential role in these negotiations.

All of these international efforts are especially vital to the poorer countries of the world. Many developing countries are in desperate straits because of the sudden escalation of oil prices. They need help, and they need it quickly. Canada supports the efforts of the IMF to establish a new lending facility to help countries, particularly the developing ones, to meet this major crisis. We have informed the Fund that Canada is prepared to lend to the Fund for this purpose under the authority of the Currency and Exchange Fund Act.

We are also revising and improving our own aid program to meet these new circumstances and new requirements. You will recall that in addition to our $549 million already allocated to foreign aid for this year, the government has recently announced that an additional $100 million will be made available this year in fast-disbursing forms of aid, mainly food and fertilizers.

In addition, the government, through the Estimates, is seeking parliamentary authority for the advance commitment of Canada's contribution to the Fourth Replenishment of the International Development Association. This Association is a subsidiary of the World Bank, specializing in the provision of low-interest and interest-free loans to the most needy countries.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

The shadows of international events have fallen less darkly on us than on others. The outlook for the Canadian economy is bright. Output, employment and income are all continuing to increase. I don't underestimate for one moment the plague of rising prices but even here we have been less afflicted than have other countries.

Ours is a diversified economy, capable of producing a wide range of primary products as well as manufactured goods. In particular, unlike other industrial countries, we are not on balance dependent on foreign supplies of energy, especially oil. In fact, we are a microcosm of the world as a whole in comprising both oil-producing and oil-consuming regions. But the strength of our federation has enabled us to avoid massive increases in oil prices. Such increases would have had disruptive effects on the level of output and employment as well as accelerating the rate of inflation. The agreement negotiated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with the provincial premiers on March 29 with regard to the price of oil, the export tax and the subsidy to eastern consumers struck a reasonable compromise and strengthened our national unity and purpose. We kept within bounds the increase in the price of oil to Canadian consumers. At the same time, substantial benefits are flowing to the oil-producing companies and the provinces in which they operate to encourage the development of new sources of supply.

In my last budget, I predicted that in 1973 the real growth of the economy would amount to 7 per cent. This was derided by the opposition as wildly optimistic. In fact, we achieved 7.1 per cent, the largest increase in 17 years and, Japan aside, the highest in the industrial world. My first priority has been the creation of permanent satisfying jobs for our rapidly growing labour force, to ensure that those who want work and need work can find it. In 1973, there were 430,000 more Canadians at work than a year earlier. The expansion in employment was 5.2 per cent, a record achievement for Canada by a substantial margin, and the fastest rate of increase among the industrial nations.

Mr. Speaker, I take particular satisfaction from the fact that over one-third of this increase occurred in manufacturing and construction. Manufacturing employment alone rose by 111,000 or 6 per cent, after many years during which it had been almost static. Some of this achievement comes from good fortune. Much of it comes from the enterprise of Canadian business and the efforts of working men and women in this country. But a good deal is due to the sound economic management and budgetary policies of this government.

It is also a source of satisfaction to me that employment in the Atlantic provinces and in Quebec increased more rapidly in 1973 than in the country as a whole. The reduction of regional disparities—or better put, the growing equality of economic opportunity—has been a high priority of this government. The policies pursued by my colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) are bearing fruit. But we have always recognized that an essential condition for satisfactory growth in the less prosperous parts of this federation is sustained growth in the economy as a whole.

The growth of Canadian output and employment in the early months of 1974 has contrasted sharply with the experience of the United States. In that country, unfortunately, real output dropped at an annual rate of almost 6 per cent in the first quarter. On the other hand, in Canada the production of goods and services rose strongly in the first quarter by at least 8 per cent in annual terms over the fourth quarter of last year. This was accompanied by new job creation in the same period at 7 per cent. We are now at the limits of our physical capacity in many industries. Many products, including such critical industrial items as steel, construction materials, agricultural implements, machinery and chemicals, are in short supply.

Despite the record growth of our labour force, the rate of unemployment has been brought down to 5½ per cent. I know that this is higher than at times in the past when the economy was operating at peak levels. It is certainly at a higher level than I would like to see. The fact remains, however, that the labour market is generally tight across the country, with many jobs remaining unfilled for lack of qualified workers.

Looking to the future, Mr. Speaker, I forecast that real output in 1974 will be 5 per cent higher than in 1973, assuming always that we are not plagued by serious strikes and adverse weather at home, or crises abroad. Given the fact that there is no significant amount of slack to take up, this is about as much as we are physically able to do this year. The most dynamic element of demand is now business investment. The recent survey of investment intentions indicated that business is planning to raise capital investment this year by 19 per cent, manufacturing investment by 28 per cent. These increases are on top of the substantial gains of last year. New capacity is already coming on stream to relieve shortages and to create new jobs, and this will gain momentum as the year goes on.

Consumers will be stepping up the volume of their buying as fast as the economy expands. Net farm income, which rose by 89 per cent last year, is headed for another buoyant year. Exports will grow less rapidly this year because of the international oil crisis and the slowdown in world growth. Housing starts reached a record level of 269,000 last year, well in excess of the rate of family formation. So far this year, starts are running at still higher levels but this rate may prove unsustainable in the face of the shortage of supply of labour, materials and especially of serviced land.

I expect that on top of the massive increase of 430,000 jobs in 1973, we will have a further increase in 1974 in excess of 300,000.

[Translation]

The Issue of Inflation

I turn now to the issue of inflation. We all know the harsh facts. The consumer price index rose by 7.6 per cent in 1973 and by 10.4 per cent in the 12 months ending March, 1974.

I have stressed that the inflation is world-wide in origin with the major source of upward pressure being the explosive upsurge of prices of agricultural and industrial commodities in international markets, as a result of rising demands and limited supplies. Since mid-1972, international commodity prices have doubled. The increase in the price of oil, which quadrupled, is only the most spectacular example of the general problem. Other commodities which have more than doubled in price during the past two years include wheat, barley, corn, soybeans, coffee, cocoa, sugar, hogs, rubber, tin, copper, zinc and lead. Only recently have they shown any tendency to peak or turn down. All countries have been affected, most to a greater extent than Canada because they have been less able to protect themselves against the rise in oil prices. According to the latest figures available to me, in the 12-month period ending February, the cost of living rose by 12 per cent in the OECD countries as a whole. It was up by 26 per cent in Japan, 13 per cent in Australia, Italy and the United Kingdom, 11½ per cent in France and 10 per cent in the United States. For Canada the comparable figure was 9.6 per cent.

In our fight against inflation. I have rejected two possible approaches. One is the deflation of demand by severe measures of fiscal and monetary restraint. The effect of this would be stagnation and rising unemployment. In my judgment, such a cure would be worse than the disease.

[English]

The second approach, urged upon us by the official Opposition, is to impose a general system of price and wage controls. This would be totally ineffective in overcoming the kind of inflationary problem we have been and are still facing. What we need, still, is not controls but an increase in supply. The United States, Britain and other countries have found to their frustration that controls disrupt supply. In these countries the enthusiasm of even the strongest supporters of controls has been cooled by the hard realities of their recent experience. I am not saying that general controls over prices and incomes would be a cure worse than the disease. I am saying that in the present circumstances where the prime causes of inflation are shortages of supply, controls are no cure at all.

A variant of the general controls advocated by opposition members is selective controls reinforced by a two-price system for those internationally-traded commodities of which Canada is an important producer. This approach would have us control the prices for these commodities in Canada while leaving their export prices free to rise to world levels. Quite clearly, such a system would lead quickly to the drying up of supplies in Canada unless backed up by a battery of export controls. This would not only jeopardize markets we have built up at great effort over many years but it would invite retaliation through imposition of controls on imported goods we require. For Canada, so dependent on trade, to lead the world into this kind of protectionism would be the height of folly.

Mr. Speaker, this government has not reached for the bludgeon of deflation or for the illusory magic of controls. We have not played either draconian or cosmetic politics with the Canadian people.

In my view, what we have to do is this. First, we have to keep this economy rolling ahead and pouring out the goods and services our people need. Second, we have to reduce the strains reflected in particular market prices where this can be done in a practical way without harmful side effects. Third, we must help those Canadians least able to protect themselves from the hardships of inflation. My purpose tonight is to propose policies and measures which will round out and reinforce all three facets of this strategy.

Fiscal and Monetary Policy

The development of this strategy must be carried out within the framework of an over-all monetary and fiscal policy. Let me therefore explain here my views of the kind of framework we need.

The forecast I have given earlier tonight anticipates that demand in the economy will expand in line with our capacity to produce. In terms of the total demand required to keep the supply of goods flowing at capacity rates, we are on the right course now. We do not require additional stimulus. Neither do we need any severe contraction of demand. I agree with the Governor of the Bank of Canada that the rate of monetary expansion should now be moderated to the pace just sufficient to sustain continuing growth at the levels of our physical capacity. Rates of interest are painfully high, but the way to bring them down is to slow the rate of inflation. This will take time. Meanwhile, I expect the banks to continue to give preference in their lending to small businesses, mortgage finance for housing, and borrowers in the less favoured regions of the country.

On the fiscal side, what is required is that we hold our cash requirements, excluding foreign exchange, to much the same effective level as last year. Given our programs of government lending, this implies a reduction in the budgetary deficit and in the deficit computed on the national accounts basis. In the absence of new policy initiatives, my fiscal forecast indicates broadly this result. In choosing tonight's measures to extend our specific policy thrusts against inflation, I have therefore had to find additional revenues to pay for the costs of new initiatives.

REVENUE-RAISING MEASURES

I propose to find those revenues in ways that hurt least, and I propose to apply them to help people most in need. This must be done without damaging the over-all thrust of the government's budgetary policy. Clearly, additional revenues cannot be obtained without imposing a burden somewhere. I have selected measures which will give us the revenue required, but which will not in my judgment contribute to price increases on essential goods or impede the expansion of supply.

Petroleum and Mining Corporations

The major revenue-raising measures are in the field of corporation taxes. The most important of these relates to the taxation of the petroleum and mining industries.

In the tax reform of 1971 a new regime was established for the taxation of these industries. Since then there have been dramatic changes in the world and in Canada affecting the fortunes of these industries. For one, with respect to oil, I do not have to recall the phenomenal price increases and their potential for profit during the past year. The response of governments around the world has been to review their taxation policies and to strike a new balance appropriate to these changed circumstances. In mining, less dramatic but major price increases have occurred due to shortages and inflationary expectations. Here too, a re-examination of tax regimes is called for.

● (2030)

In Canada our provinces have adjusted royalties, mining taxes and other arrangements to derive what they perceive to be a fair share for the benefit of their people. However, a provincial resource is also a national resource, and the federal government has a responsibility to see that a reasonable portion of this gain is shared by all Canadians. In these circumstances, the federal government has had to reassess its over-all taxation policy with respect to this key sector of the economy. In doing so, we have had the following objectives in mind.

First, it is essential that this sector bears a burden of tax on profits that is reasonable relative to the share borne by other sectors of the economy. Second, it is essential to ensure that all the people of Canada derive a fair share of the substantially increased revenues that flow from the higher value placed by the world on these resources. Third, the federal government should recognize the special position of the provinces with respect to the taxation and charges on resources within their boundaries. Fourth, the federal government must ensure that provincial royalties, provincial mining taxes and other arrangements having similar effects do not unreasonably erode the corporate income tax base. Finally, over-all Canadian tax policy must have regard for the position of these industries in terms of international competition and in terms of the financial resources they require to bring forward the supplies needed in the years ahead.

Taking all these considerations into account, I have the following proposals to make for a revised regime of taxation for these industries.

First, I am proposing that the basic rate of corporation tax applicable to production profits from minerals, oil, and gas be increased to 50 per cent. Because of the gradual reduction in the corporate rate under the tax reform schedule this will mean an increase of 2 percentage points of tax for the balance of 1974, 3 points in 1975 and 4 points in 1976 and thereafter. I believe that a 50 per cent rate of corporation tax for this type of income is appropriate to the new circumstances, rather than the 46 per cent rate which otherwise would have applied by 1976.

Second, I am proposing that revenues derived by provincial governments in respect of production from a petroleum or mineral resource should no longer be deductible in computing the income of the operator of the resource. At the same time, in recognition of the special position of the provinces in relation to natural resources, I am proposing that, effective immediately, there be an extra abatement from federal income tax in respect of taxable production income derived in Canada. The extra abatement will be 15 points in the case of mineral profits and 10 points in the case of petroleum profits. For mineral profits, the combination of the new abatement, together with the standard provincial abatement of 10 points, will reduce the effective statutory federal rate from 50 to 25 per cent. In the case of petroleum, the result will be to reduce the federal rate to 30 per cent.

The question of the provincial abatement with respect to mining income requires some elaboration. In August, 1970, at a time when the basic corporate tax rate was 50 per cent, the then minister of finance announced that commencing in 1977 the federal government would abate 15 points of corporate tax in respect of mineral production income. At the same time he indicated that commencing in 1977, provincial mineral taxes and similar payments would not be deductible for corporate tax purposes. Provincial mining royalties were not mentioned because provinces traditionally relied at that time on mining taxes to derive revenues from the industry.

Subsequently, many important changes have occurred in provincial tax policies. In particular, provinces have begun to make use of royalties of many different kinds to increase their revenues. I am not opposing this. But I am saying these developments are making it almost impossible to arrive at a meaningful distinction between mining taxes and the varying types of royalties or arrangements which have similar effects in terms of what is or is not allowed as deductions for corporate income tax purposes.

Hence, I propose that with regard to the taxation of mineral resource profits, none of these payments to provinces be recognized as deductible in determining corporate tax. I point out, moreover, that this bears not only on the federal corporation tax but also on the provincial corporation tax for those provinces for whom we collect this tax.

In respect of petroleum, the additional provincial abatement is an entirely new feature.

It is also apparent that the petroleum and mineral resource industries in Canada have reached sufficient maturity that the existing tax incentives are more generous than is needed to encourage continuing development. Accordingly, I am also proposing to cut back immediately on some of the existing incentives. Henceforth, depletion can be claimed only if it is earned and only up to an annual maximum rate of 25 per cent of production income rather than 33⅓ per cent. Canadian exploration and development expenditures have in the past been deductible immediately. If incurred in the future, they will be amortized at a rate of 30 per cent calculated on the diminishing balance basis.

Earned depletion which can presently be accumulated at the rate of $1 for every $3 of eligible exploration and development expenditure will continue. With rising resource profits, and the discontinuance of automatic depletion, this earning of depletion will be very effective incentive for encouraging exploration. Similarly, I propose to retain the immediate deductibility of the cost of capital assets invested in a new mine or a major expansion of a mine because of the incentive it provides to new development.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

I believe these proposals accomplish the objectives we have set for ourselves. Given the circumstances of the day, they establish an improved and not unreasonable position for the federal government on behalf of all the people with respect to the taxation of this sector of the economy.

I estimate that these measures will increase the federal tax liability in 1974 of the mining industry by $40 million, and that of the oil and gas sector by $410 million. For the eight provinces with whom we have collection agreements, the comparable amounts are $5 million in respect of mining and $115 million in respect of oil and gas. Ontario and Quebec, of course, collect their own corporation tax, and therefore I have not attempted to estimate any revenue increase with regard to these two provinces.

Financial Institutions

Mr. Speaker, another major sector of the business community which has been very profitable in recent years is the financial area. This has been particularly true of the larger institutions. I have had the occasion to examine their position and I have reached several conclusions. First, the volume of business of financial institutions, and consequently their profit-ability, has increased substantially. Second, during the last decade the loss experience of these institutions generally has been less than 1 per cent and with regard to the larger institutions, the loss experience has been less than 4/10ths of 1 per cent.

In October of 1968, the then Minister of Finance changed the tax treatment of these institutions by reducing their tax-free reserves from 3 per cent to 1½ per cent of eligible assets. Tonight, I am proposing to reduce the level of tax-free reserves from 1½ per cent to 1 per cent of eligible assets for all financial institutions such as banks, trust companies, insurance companies and any others who are required to compute their reserves on this formula basis. This measure will be applicable for taxation years ending after tonight.

At the same time, I recognize that the loss experience of the smaller institutions is greater than that of the larger ones. Therefore, I am proposing that the present reserve of 1½ per cent be retained in respect of the first $2 billion of eligible assets and that the 1-per-cent rate apply to the excess. This new regime will yield the federal government $40 million in fiscal 1974-75. It will ensure that the large financial institutions bear their fair share of the tax burden, and yet avoid an adverse effect on the smaller institutions and any new institutions.

[English]

Other Corporate Measures

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to turn to corporate tax measures of a more general nature.

Corporate profits have risen sharply in the last year or two. In part, this has been a recovery from earlier depressed levels, but companies have benefitted from the strong economy and from inventory gains enjoyed during a period of sharply rising prices. I have said before, and I reiterate tonight, that I welcome the improvement in the position of Canadian corporations so essential to their continued expansion and the creation of new job opportunities. At the same time, I have pointed out on several occasions, both inside and outside the House, that there is a proper balance to be struck.

Given the level of profits Canadian corporations are enjoying, it is appropriate that as a temporary measure some additional tax revenue should be obtained from such corporations. Subject to certain important exceptions which I will outline in a moment, I am therefore proposing a temporary 10 per cent surtax on federal corporate income tax for the period from May 1, 1974, to April 30, 1975. The obligation of corporations to pay monthly instalments in respect of their tax liability will be adjusted to reflect the imposition of this surtax and the other measures introduced tonight.

This surtax will not apply to small business corporations. I am attempting to do all I can to encourage the growth of small business corporations which are largely owned and controlled by Canadians.

Because of the major changes I am proposing for the taxation of mining and petroleum corporations they also would be exempt from this temporary, one-year measure in respect of their production profits.

● (2040)

In addition, the surtax will not apply to the profits from manufacturing and processing in Canada. I believe it is essential to maintain the reduction in the tax burden on that vitally important sector to enable it to strengthen its international competitive position. Canadian manufacturers and processors continue to be vulnerable to foreign competition as a result of the extensive use being made of the U.S. DISC tax provisions, the favourable tax treatment provided to manufacturers in other countries, and the intensified pressures they have faced from abroad more recently following the increase in our exchange rate.

The manufacturing and processing industries are not only a major source of employment directly, but they also provide a strong underpinning to the burgeoning service sector of our economy. The importance of bolstering manufacturing and processing is by no means confined to the central provinces where the greater proportion of those industries is now located. It is of equal or even greater importance to the Western and Atlantic Provinces, all of which are giving top priority to broadening the base of their economies through the large-scale development of secondary manufacturing and processing operations.

The measures which we introduced are doing exactly what they were intended to do. After years of slow growth, Canada's manufacturing and processing industries are rapidly expanding. Profits of manufacturers and processors have improved substantially, but they are being plowed back into heavy new capital investment to increase productive capacity, the supply of goods required by our expanding economy, and employment for our rapidly growing labour force. As I recalled earlier, manufacturing employment last year rose by 111,000, which was 8,000 more than the total increase in the previous six years combined. Manufacturing output rose by 8 per cent in 1973, the largest increase since 1965. Manu- facturing investment in new productive facilities rose by 19 per cent last year and this year is expected to grow by an extraordinary 28 per cent, the greatest increase in more than a decade.

Under these circumstances, and in view of the vulnerability of this sector to competition from abroad, I am convinced that it is in the national interest to maintain the reduced tax rate on manufacturing and processing profits which parliament adopted last year. Members will recall that in my last budget I indicated the companion measure implemented by order-in-council providing for a rapid two-year write-off of machinery and equipment acquired by this sector would be put in place for an initial period ending December 31, 1974. It is my intention to reassess this provision toward the end of this year when I have the benefit of the review now under way of the capital cost allowance structure and the further report on the impact of the tax measures on the manufacturing and processing companies.

Let me add a word, Mr. Speaker, about why I rejected proposals for an excess profits tax put forward by some members of the opposition. Hard, practical experience with such a system in the past has made it clear that it has major defects. In the first place, it is extremely difficult to define excess profits—as distinct from blatant profiteering—in a way that is equitable and workable. Any excess profits scheme is full of loopholes, with the result that some companies escape taxes otherwise payable. Secondly, imposition of a heavy tax on profits above some level that is defined as normal or reasonable, removes substantially the incentive of business to hold down costs and maintain or improve efficiency. The result is that instead of reducing inflationary pressures, as it is intended to do, an excess profits tax tends to increase those pressures. It is for these reasons that I rejected the idea of erecting a complex excess profits tax system and chose instead to propose a temporary, one-year surtax that is reasonable and administratively simple, but which still maintains the incentive for business to operate as efficiently as possible.

[Translation]

A further measure that I am proposing tonight will ensure that corporations not only pay their fair share of taxes, but also pay it promptly. I am advancing the timing of the final payment of a corporation's tax to the end of the second month rather than the third month after the end of the corporation's fiscal period. This change in tax payment date will not apply to a small business corporation.

The effect of all these measures in the corporate income tax field is to provide a significant increase in federal tax collections in 1974-75. In the absence of the changes affecting the petroleum and mining industries, the advancing of the final payment date would have yielded $200 million. The measures affecting the resource industries would have yielded very little in 1974-75 unless the final payment date had been advanced, because in their case the payments would not have been received until the next fiscal year. But in combination with the advancing of the final payment date, I estimate that these measures will yield $400 million. The proposals regarding financial institutions are estimated to yield $40 million. The temporary 10-per-cent surtax is estimated to yield $150 million. The combined effect of all these measures on federal corporate income tax collections this fiscal year amounts to an increase of $790 million.

Excise Taxes

Mr. Speaker, I now turn to other sources of revenue. I have already made considerable reference to the energy crisis with which we struggled this past year. All of us have become more conscious that we need to economize in our use of energy, particularly petroleum. I propose a measure which will make some contribution to this end.

Effective tonight, a special excise tax is to be introduced on high-energy consuming passenger cars and other types of energy-consuming vehicles. This will include large, heavy cars, high-powered motorcycles, privately-owned aircraft and large power boats. The tax will yield the federal government an additional $10 million of revenue in 1974-75.

I have stressed that one of my requirements in this budget is to raise in revenues an amount at least equivalent to the tax reductions I will propose shortly. It seems to me that an increase in the tax levied on liquor and tobacco is an appropriate source to look to for some increase in revenues. Specifically, the proposed changes, which come into effect tonight, will raise federal levies on cigarettes, cigars, tobacco, spirits other than beer, and wine other than cider, by approximately 15 per cent. This measure will yield the federal government an additional $100 million of revenues in fiscal 1974-75.

These increases would be implemented by a number of measures, details of which will be found in the Ways and Means Motion.

THE PROGRAM AGAINST INFLATION

Mr. Speaker, I have explained that the fiscal framework needed for this period is one that maintains about the same level of cash requirements as last year. I have described how I propose to raise additional revenues. I now wish to outline how these revenues might be applied within such a framework to finance measures which best round out and reinforce our policies to deal with inflation.

Measures to Increase Supply

The first element in our strategy against inflation has been and continues to be the expansion of supply. The central features of that policy have been in place for some time. Our fiscal and monetary policies have been designed to bring the economy up to full capacity growth. We have taken measures to increase the capability of the economy to produce efficiently the goods and services which are needed. This not only increases our production capacity, but it also creates remunerative and satisfying jobs, relieves shortages and reduces costs. The reduction of taxes on manufacturing and processing is clearly bringing about just such a massive increase in capacity.

Further, as part of the agreements reached with respect to oil, the governments of the producing provinces will channel substantial funds into the encouragement of exploration and development. The National Petroleum Corporation will serve the same objectives. In facing the growing need for electrical energy, we have announced a major program of federal aid for inter-regional transmission lines. We are also well-launched on a nation-wide policy of support for nuclear power plants, utilizing the highly successful Candu reactor, developed by Canadian science and technology under the aegis of the federal government.

Wide-ranging measures have already been taken to assist and encourage farmers and fishermen, with assurances that they will be able to market their increased production at fair prices. In this regard the government will undertake further major financial commitments under new farm stabilization measures to be introduced shortly and, of course, the House has just recently approved important measures to increase the effectiveness of the Farm and Fisheries Improvement Acts.

My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), will also be introducing extensions to the Farm Credit Act to enlarge the flow of capital investment in food production. One amendment will increase the total amount of federal loans available for expansion and improvement of agricultural output to well over $2 billion. Moreover, special provisions will be proposed to make it easier for young farmers to purchase farms and get into the business on their own. Last year total lending activity by the Farm Credit Corporation more than doubled to some $400 million in loan approvals. For this fiscal year, the corporation's capital budget will jump again to well over $500 million.

Later, when I deal with tax reform, I shall be proposing an important measure of relief for small businesses to encourage them to contribute further to the increase in supply.

The over-all fiscal and monetary policy proposed in this budget, by providing for adequate over-all demand, will ensure that new output of goods and services will flow on to the market in as abundant a volume as the economy is capable of producing.

Measures to Hold Down Particular Prices

The second element in the strategy against inflation is to dampen down the prices of particular products where this is feasible. Here, the government has already adopted a number of measures. The most important of these has been the holding down of domestic oil prices to about 55 per cent of the international monopoly price. Subsidies have also been provided on bread and milk to help all Canadian consumers. The Food Prices Review Board has been focusing public attention on pricing and marketing practices in problem areas. Powers are being sought to enable the government to deal with particular cases of profiteering. In my last budget, I eliminated the sales tax on children's clothing, all remaining food items and non-alcoholic beverages, and certain other products. Tariffs were also reduced on a wide range of consumer goods.

Tonight I propose to remove the sales tax on all clothing and footwear. Clothing and footwear account for a significant proportion of the budgets of most families and this action should significantly reduce the prices of these products. This measure will affect about $5 billion in family expenditures annually. It will save consumers directly $280 million in taxes this year, and on top of this the substantial markups on these taxes which result from the normal business practice of calculating percentage markups on tax-paid costs.

Let me say to the business community—and to wholesalers and retailers particularly—that the purpose of this measure is to help the people of this country by reducing prices. I am confident that in most cases these benefits will be passed on to the consumer. However, I intend to ask my colleague, the Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) to monitor prices of clothing and footwear and to report his findings to me. If these tax cuts do not get reflected in prices, then I undertake to recommend that the government take action, in one way or another, to ensure that the consumer does gain and that others are not allowed to appropriate the benefits.

Complementing the tax increases I announced earlier on high-energy consuming vehicles, I propose to remove the sales tax on buses and other public passenger transportation equipment purchased by local governments. This will provide important assistance to municipalities in supplying more effective transit systems to reduce reliance on the private car, reduce total energy consumption and abate pollution.

Further in the sales tax field, I propose to abolish the tax on bicycles. The advantage of this will be self-evident to Canadians in large numbers who are adopting this popular and healthful form of recreation.

Tariff Changes

In last year's budget there was a reduction in customs duties for a one-year period on a broad range of consumer goods. These reductions affected trade valued at about $1.6 billion in 1973. There is before the House Bill C-21 which, if implemented, would continue most of these temporary reductions until June 30, 1974. Given the delay in proceeding with the GATT negotiations, I am now proposing that except for one item only, these reductions should be extended until December 31, 1974.

Exchange Rate

Some further relief on our price structure is resulting from the rise of the exchange rate on the Canadian dollar, which stems from the good over-all performance of the Canadian economy and world confidence in our future. The government has not sought to bring this appreciation about; it has resulted from the underlying forces at work in the exchange market and we have intervened in this market only to maintain orderly conditions. We will continue to be concerned that the competitive position of our industry is not impaired. However, there can be no question that the appreciation that has taken place is providing some relief in moderating the increase in the cost of living.

Housing

An important aspect of the recent inflationary experience in Canada has been its impact on the cost of housing and the ability of the average Canadian, particularly young people and people of modest income, to meet their housing needs. The government has put in place a number of important programs and measures to ease both supply and cost aspects of the problem. These measures are reflected in the expansion of the budget of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to $1.2 billion per year. Special assistance to low-income families has reduced the net cost of their mortgage financing. Indeed, in cases of demonstrated need, the amount of the assisted home ownership grant is such as to reduce the effective rate of interest paid to almost 6 per cent. The programs to assist municipalities with land development and servicing have also been extended and improved to speed up the whole process of bringing additional serviced land onto the market.

● (2100)

Tonight I wish to announce several further measures to improve the housing situation. Before doing so I should refer to certain popular suggestions in this regard, specifically the cancellation of the sales tax on building materials, subsidized interest rates, and the deductibility of mortgage interest for tax purposes. Apart from problems of cost and inequity in these suggestions, in the present environment of a sellers' market they all suffer from the fatal defect of overstimulating demand, raising prices, and providing benefits which are almost certain to be captured by builders and sellers. In contrast, my objective is to help home buyers by the following proposals.

First, one tax factor which may be holding back the flow of land for housing is that a taxpayer, personal or corporate, may claim against other income the carrying charges on land which is being held for future development. This sheltering of other income has lowered the financial cost of carrying undeveloped land and, therefore, reduced the pressure for early use.

I am proposing that the carrying costs on land awaiting development may not be charged against other income but be taken into account only as the land is sold. This new rule for carrying charges would not apply to land which is being held primarily to earn rental income in the year, or to land which is used in the course of carrying on a business other than a real estate business. This measure, which is estimated to yield the federal government about $10 million this year, will assist in bringing land for housing onto the market more quickly.

Second, I propose to remove the sales tax on a range of construction equipment including excavation and earth-moving equipment, tower and climbing cranes, air compressors and pumps, equipment for preparing and spreading concrete and asphlat, and several other categories of goods used in the construction industry. The effect of this measure will be to exempt from sales tax all major classes of construction equipment purchased by contractors and local governments.

Third, to provide assistance to municipalities which are also struggling with the housing problem, I propose to abolish the federal sales tax on articles and materials purchased by local governments for use in the construction of water distribution systems.

The foregoing two measures will reduce costs by $50 million directly in a full year, and by a further considerable amount through indirect effects.

Fourth, together with my colleague, the Minister of State for Housing and Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) I propose to take steps to assure the fullest possible allocation of mortgage funds to lower-cost housing. In addition to the use of the mortgage insurance provisions of the National Housing Act, we propose to enlist the support of the principal lenders and the private mortgage insurance corporations to adjust down payment requirements in such a way as to confine high-ratio loans to middle and lower-priced housing.

My last and most important measure in this field will greatly ease the formidable difficulties facing our young people in accumulating the savings required for a down payment on a home and its initial furnishing.

All taxpayers over the age of 18 who do not own a home will be able to contribute up to $1,000 a year, to a maximum lifetime amount of $10,000, to a registered home ownership savings plan, and these contributions will be deductible for income tax purposes. The income earned by the plan will bear no tax and the proceeds of the plan will be exempt from income tax if they are applied as a down payment for the purchase of a house and furnishing it at the time of first occupancy. This measure applies not only to urban homes but to purchases of farm homes. The mechanics of this new plan are detailed in the ways and means motion, but in large measure it will operate in much the same manner as the existing registered retirement savings plan.

I am sure that the introduction of this innovative program will encourage savings and make it easier for Canadians to acquire homes. Together with the steps to be taken in respect of down payments, this proposal should help to reduce current speculative pressures on housing prices. It is difficult to measure the cost of this new measure. But no doubt as it develops and Canadians become aware of its real value, the registered home ownership savings plan will become a source of significant tax savings to many Canadians and particularly young people.

Easing the Burdens of Inflation

The third element of the government's strategy against inflation is to ease the burdens on those Canadians who are most vulnerable. We have fully indexed old age security pensions, the guaranteed income supplement and the Canada Pension Plan. We have indexed government pensions and facilitated the indexing of private pensions. As for family allowances, not only have they been very substantially increased, but we have ensured that their real value will be maintained. The federal minimum wage has also been progressively increased. My last budget included a very substantial cut in personal income taxes of particular benefit to the lower income groups, and provided for the indexing of the personal income tax system.

Tonight, I shall be proposing a wide range of measures which will further alleviate the impact of inflation on all Canadians, particularly those of more modest incomes.

First, under the personal income tax, members will recall that just last year I introduced a measure to give all taxpayers a tax reduction in the form of a 5 per cent credit against federal tax payable, with a minimum credit of $100 and a maximum credit of $500. I intend not only to maintain this substantial tax reduction but to augment it for the lower income groups. This will be accomplished by increasing the minimum credit from $100 to $150, effective January 1, 1974.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

This change means lower taxes for everyone up to the $13,000 to $14,000 income range, and its benefits are concentrated among income-earners receiving less than $10,000. For example, a married taxpayer with two children and earning $6,000 will have his total tax reduced to $269 from $329 or 15 per cent. This tax cut removes at least 300,000 Canadians from the federal tax rolls.

The tax reduction tables will be adjusted as of July 1, 1974, so as to give the full benefit of this measure in the second half of this year. it will reduce personal taxes in fiscal year 1974-75 by some $440 million.

Members will be aware, of course, that as a result of the tax reform the rate of tax under the first $500 of taxable income will also be reduced this year from 15 per cent to 12 per cent. Even more important is the continuing benefit which all taxpayers are now enjoying as a result of the indexation of the personal income tax. The effect of this new system was to increase exemptions and raise tax brackets by 6.6 per cent for this year—and to remove a further 175,000 citizens from federal tax rolls. Under this automatic plan to relieve the burden of inflation on all taxpayers there will be a further adjustment next year to fully reflect the increase in the consumer price index currently taking place.

[English]

In our overriding concern with the fight against inflation we must not overlook the needs of those less fortunate Canadians handicapped by illness and other disabilities. In this regard we will, by regulation, broaden considerably the list of expenditures that qualify as medical expenses for tax purposes. This broader list will now include the cost of such items as heart monitoring devices, orthopaedic shoes and boots, a hospital bed required in a home, and walking aids required by crippled persons.

Moreover, I propose a change which will aid those Canadians who are confined for extensive periods of the day to beds and wheelchairs or who are so confined for periods longer than 12 months. This will permit these people to qualify for the additional $1,000 deduction now available to permanently disabled and blind persons. At present, in order to get the deduction of $1,000 per year, a person must have been confined to a bed or wheelchair throughout the taxation year. This provision will be amended in two ways. The time period will be changed to cover situations where a person has been confined for any 12-month period which ended in the year. The second change will ensure that even if a person is up and about for periods during the day, he will not be deprived of the deduction. This amendment recognizes that it is often in the best interest of the patient, whenever he can, to get out of bed or wheelchair.

I would also like to announce that my colleague, the Minister of Veterans' Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) will introduce legislation to provide further help for needy veterans, their survivors and their dependents in meeting increased costs. Effective from last October, the income ceilings applied to the war veterans' allowances and civilian war allowances will be increased by 5.3 per cent and escalated quarterly thereafter, in line with increases in the consumer price index. The pensions will be raised by the same dollar amount as the increase in the ceiling. These changes preserve the relationship between veterans' allowances and old age pensions. From April 1, 1974, the rate paid for orphans' allowances will be raised to $125 per month for each orphan, and escalated annually in line with the formula for family allowances. A new allowance for dependent children of needy veterans will be provided and the qualifying age for the allowances now paid on behalf of a child or to an orphan, as long as that child or orphan continues his education, will be extended to 25 years. These changes will cost an additional $10 million in 1974-75.

MEASURES TO ENCOURAGE AND PROTECT SAVINGS

One of the most pervasive aspects of inflation is its eroding effect on the real value of people's savings. This budget includes two major measures to relieve this effect. The first measure recognizes that the increases in interest rates which have taken place, although substantial, do not offset the decline in the real value of people's savings when they are invested in interest-earning securities, particularly after tax. I therefore propose that, effective from January 1, 1974, the first $1,000 interest income from securities such as bank and trust company deposits, mortgages, Canada Savings Bonds and other bonds be deductible in computing the taxable income of individuals. The precise details will be found in the ways and means motion.

I am proposing a limit of $1,000 per year because I want to help the average person; I have no intention of allowing the wealthy members of our society to avoid paying their fair share of the tax burden. I believe that this proposal will be a very considerable incentive for average Canadians to save. This measure will reduce personal taxes by about $270 million in 1974.

The second measure concerns a particular debt obligation of the federal government which is the instrument through which nearly two million Canadians accumulate savings. I refer to Canada Savings Bonds. Nearly $10.5 billion of these bonds are outstanding and the interest yield does not now reflect current interest rates. In order to raise the average effective yield to maturity to 9 per cent, I propose to provide cash bonuses to the holders of these bonds. More specifically, bonds maturing before November 1, 1979, will receive one bonus, at their maturity. Bonds maturing after November 1, 1979, will receive two cash bonuses; an interim bonus on November 1, 1979, and a final bonus at the date of their maturity.

For example, the holder of a $1,000 Canada Savings Bond of the 1967-68 series will receive a first cash bonus of $220 in 1979 and a second cash bonus of $30 at maturity in 1980.

In all cases these bonuses, which will have the effect of raising the yield to maturity to 9 per cent, will be taxed at the lower effective rates applicable to capital gains. All other features of the Canada Savings Bonds, including their encashability on demand and the compounding of interest, will remain unchanged. The current issue of Canada Savings Bonds, which is still on sale, will of course carry the two bonus payments. Savers who may wish to acquire this bond will know that the return to maturity on it will be 9 per cent. Action is under way to inform holders of Canada Savings Bonds of the steps to be taken in order to obtain these benefits.

Among the many Canadians who save through interest-earning investments and who will benefit from these two measures, a large proportion are older, retired people who depend upon interest earnings from lifetime savings for a substantial portion of their income. These people who have saved for themselves should be given every encouragement.

As a final proposal affecting the savings of Canadians, I wish to broaden an important existing incentive for retirement saving. As members of this House are aware, registered retirement savings plans provide for postponing of tax, up to limits, in the savings accumulated for retirement. They have become a major vehicle by which Canadians anticipate their needs for income in the years after they stop working. I have felt that we should be more accommodating in allowing a taxpayer to make provision for his or her spouse through such retirement plans. I therefore propose to allow a taxpayer to contribute to a registered retirement savings plan for the benefit of his or her spouse to the extent that the taxpayer does not use the available deductions for his own plan. This measure will allow, for instance, a husband to forego contributing to his own registered retirement savings plan and to contribute instead to a plan for his wife who carries the burden of household and family duties. It will provide the same opportunity for a wife who is the income earner for the family and who is entitled to contribute to a registered retirement savings plan.

Tax Reform

I would like to take a few moments to speak about the continuing process of tax reform. One of my first priorities has been to see that the income tax legislation is improved as experience is gained in its application. As will be shown by the length of the Ways and Means Motions which I will be tabling tonight, this has not proven to be a small task. Nevertheless, it is a task we must face if the tax system is to work well, and fairly, in today's society. The amendments being proposed reflect experience gained in the application of the new tax provisions and many useful suggestions from the public.

One of my main concerns has been with the application of tax laws to corporate reorganizations. If we are to have vital and efficient corporations, it is important that the tax system not discourage reorganization intended to help our corporations to become more efficient and to adapt to the changing needs of a competitive society. During the past year, I have conducted an indepth review of the relevant provisions and have concluded that some changes are required. I am proposing that where it is evident that corporate changes are taking place for legitimate business purposes and not to avoid tax, the existing rules should be relaxed.

With the advent of tax reform in 1972, several new rules were introduced to permit certain types of pre-1972 corporate surpluses to be distributed tax-free to shareholders. A number of corporations are still having difficulty complying with the technical details of these rules. I am therefore introducing amendments tonight further to simplify these rules and remove hardships which might otherwise have been caused by a misunderstanding of the law.

It has also come to my attention that the tax system does not apply fairly where property has been expropriated, lost or destroyed. Quite often a taxpayer may be faced with a significant tax liability long before a settlement has been agreed upon and funds are available. This seems quite unfair, and I am introducing a relieving amendment which will ensure that under such circumstances no tax is payable until the compensation has been finally determined.

I am proposing several amendments, essentially of a relieving nature, relating to the taxation of partnerships. These new rules will make it easier for partners to withdraw from partnerships, either for purposes of retirement or to accept employment outside the partnership.

Another area of tax reform which has been the subject matter of considerable controversy has been the taxation of foreign-source income. I have important changes to announce tonight with respect to the passive income rules. These rules were introduced as part of tax reform in 1971 to protect against the diversion of income that would otherwise be taxable in Canada.

The law in this area was new and inevitably complex. Its application was postponed to 1975 to enable the government to re-examine the law in light of representations. The proposed changes improve our protection against the improper use of tax havens to avoid Canadian tax on passive investment income and on income diverted from Canada. At the same time, the changes remove from the scope of these rules the income Canadians derive from their active business operations abroad. In addition, the rules will apply only to those offshore corporations and trusts that are controlled by Canadian taxpayers, and not, as at present, where there may simply be some equity interest. Canada's fiscal climate must remain hospitable to the Canadian company that competes internationally with the large multinational companies of other countries. The changes proposed in this area of the law are designed to ensure that this principle is not compromised.

Another matter which I wish to mention concerns the protection of Canada's cultural heritage. Earlier this year, my colleague, the Secretary of State, announced measures to control the export from this country of objects which are significant to Canada as cultural, artistic, historical or scientific treasures. As part of the bill which the Secretary of State will, in due course, introduce to this House, certain amendments will be made to the Income Tax Act which will create an incentive to the owners of such treasures to keep them in Canada.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce a most important change related to the existing tax system. All of us realize that the strength of our economy rests to a large measure on the efforts of our smaller independent businessmen. They provide a constant source of innovative and dynamic enterprise in our country, and play a crucial role in maintaining domestic ownership.

Members will recall that at the time of tax reform, special provision was made whereby the first $50,000 per year of business income of a Canadian controlled private corporation would be taxed at a special low rate until the corporation has earned $400,000. In order to provide further stimulus for this vital sector of our economy, I am proposing that effective immediately, the cumulative limit of earnings be raised from $400,000 to $500,000 and furthermore that the annual amount of business income that can qualify for the low rate of tax be increased from $50,000 to $100,000.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Further Tariff Changes

In view of the forthcoming multilateral trade negotiations—the Tokyo Round—I am proposing only a few amendments to the Customs Tariff at this time. Many of the requests we have received for tariff changes will have to be considered in the course of the negotiations.

One amendment worth special mention involves removal of the duty on handicraft products imported from developing countries. Selected handicrafts produced in countries entitled to the benefits of the General Preferential Tariff will be allowed duty-free entry under this new provision.

One other measure is of considerable importance. I refer to the so-called tourist allowance. I propose to liberalize the provisions in the Customs Tariff under which goods brought back by Canadian residents on their return from trips abroad are exempt from duties and taxes. The quarterly exemption available after an absence of 48 hours will be doubled to $50 from $25. The annual exemption, now available after an absence from Canada of 12 days or more, will be increased to $150 from $100. Moreover, the minimum period of absence required to qualify for the annual exemption will be reduced from 12 days to 7 days. And I should mention that the Minister of National Revenue has recently directed that the administrative requirements at the border for those claiming the quarterly exemption should be materially eased.

These changes will be of considerable benefit to the large and rapidly increasing number of Canadians who travel outside Canada.

SUMMARY OF FISCAL POSITION

Mr. Speaker, may I now briefly sum up the financial position of the government, taking tonight's proposals into account. I estimate that the cash requirements of the government in 1974-75 will be of the order of $2 billion, excluding foreign exchange requirements. Having in mind that certain substantial payments, such as the loans to the CNR and Air Canada under the Financing and Guarantee Act and other expenditure items, were scheduled to be disbursed in the last fiscal year, but were not actually made until this year, this figure of $2 billion is for practical purposes not different from that for 1973-74. The budgetary deficit for 1974-75 will be somewhat lower than in the previous fiscal year. On a national accounts basis, the deficit of $500 million which we experienced in 1973-74 will be reduced by more than half in the current year.

I must remind hon. members that these figures are estimates. The actual outcome of the financial accounts will reflect the decisions of this House respecting legislation now before it and which will come before it in the course of the fiscal year.

With the permission of the House I should like now to include in today's Hansard supplementary tables showing estimates of Government of Canada cash requirements, details of the budgetary revenues, federal government revenues and expenditures on a national accounts basis and reconciliations of these figures with those compiled on a public accounts basis. The information in these tables applies to the fiscal years 1973-74 and 1974-75.

I should also like to table, with the consent of the House, several notices of ways and means motions setting out the changes I have proposed tonight and I would ask that they be printed in the notice paper appended to Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For notices of ways and means motions, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): In conclusion Mr. Speaker, the budget I have brought down tonight is a fiscally responsible budget. It is an equitable budget, aimed at raising revenue where it hurts least, distributing it where it helps most. It is an economically sound budget which attacks the scourge of inflation at its source—the shortage of supply. It recognizes that the fundamental cure to both inflation and unemployment is to overcome the physical limits on our capacity to produce by expanding the agricultural and industrial base of the country. And this budget further extends our policies of protecting those least able to protect themselves from the ravages of inflation and of moderating price increases of a number of goods that play an important part in daily living.

I have always tried to be frank with parliament and the people. In this budget I have rejected cosmetic policies—the easy, popular course at the sacrifice of realism and of the best long-term interests of the Canadian people. I am gambling that Canadians are too smart to be taken in by gimmicks, slogans or slick jargon—that they want to know the facts, whether they are pleasant or unpleasant, and they ask only for a man's best judgment in meeting them.

This budget reflects my determination to deal with inflation. It presents a responsible fiscal and monetary policy. It recognizes the need for all governments, including this one responsible to parliament, to restrain spending. It focuses upon the pivotal issue in the economy—the physical constraints on capacity. It proposes solutions within the context of Canada's place in the markets of the world, where we are not helpless, but neither are we immune to universal price trends.

When I first faced the House as Minister of Finance, I said that no economy is working as well as it should if there are men and women earnestly seeking work who cannot find it. The scene has improved but I am still not satisfied with the results. Now that our cost of living absorbs our attention, I say that I won't be satisfied if this country merely does better than our major competitors. I do not believe that is good enough. My goals are not relative but absolute ones: to moderate our rate of inflation, to relieve the pressure of prices on incomes, on savings and on the peace of mind of Canadians.

It can be done. It will take time to do. But it will happen—partly because international commodity prices will yield, partly because this government's policies will be proven right.

I am confident that most Canadians will accept what I have been saying tonight and will support the thrust and tone of this budget. The people of this country are gifted with good common sense and an open mind. If this House can bring itself to judge my budget with the same common sense and open mind, then I am sure that the measures I have proposed will commend themselves to enough members to ensure its passage.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, if that was to be the swan song of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), it certainly was a long one. I think we must commend him for his physical endurance, and commiserate with the physical plight of the people who have had to listen to this rather long review.

The minister proposes to remove the sales tax on bicycles, but this budget demonstrates in him and his advisers the mentality of the bicycle age in dealing with modern day inflation. The minister and the government have finally come to admit that inflation is the number one problem facing this country. Last year, in February, the matter that the minister was after was unemployment. I casually looked over the motions that have been tabled by the opposition in all the budgets since 1968—the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was then minister of finance—and they all warned of inflation.

The government, outside of that halting and bungling step taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1969, did nothing to contend with inflation, and now the savings of Canadians are being eroded to the point that they must be bribed to buy Canada Savings Bonds which are supposed to be the yardstick and as good as cash. There is a cash bonus which, incidentally, when you read the fine print is a lot more complicated than the Minister of Finance indicated, that is, it is not available until maturity. Is it not a crying shame that what the public really buys must be subject to premiums during the currency of the bond and at the end, much in the way that we have seen financial institutions operate, the government is trying to bribe investors with a turkey—or a bicycle—for the opening of the new account? This is what the minister is trying to do in order to keep Canadians buying Canada Savings Bonds.

One question the minister did not answer tonight refers to whether the minister has reserved the right to close off the present series of Canada Savings Bonds. When will that happen? We know that this year an investment in Canada Savings Bonds, because of inflation and the government's lack of concern for inflation, has meant a loss to individuals. Smallholders, estates, educational funds and all who depend on Canada Savings Bonds will find that because of inflation their savings have been eroded. Is it not a reflection that the past week's Bank of Canada weekly report indicated that the average rate on government long-term obligations has gone up to 8.91 per cent, in effect 9 per cent? That is what this government must pay for its money, all because it has neglected inflation shamefully.

The budget that the Minister of Finance has presented tonight contains some cosmetic proposals that sound very nice and will appeal to people superficially. Some of them have some merit—I will concede this; I think there are some good measures in this budget. But basically the minister reminded me—I have said this before—of a man who is trying to save a patient from bleeding to death simply by putting on bandaids. The minister will run out of bandaids. He is putting on a plaster here and a plaster there without going to the root source of inflation in any way.

It was very instructive to learn that the minister has rejected the idea of a comprehensive incomes policy to turn the corner of the inflationary anticipation that exists in Canada. He is prepared to do nothing, and he has ridiculed the policies put forward by this party.

An hon. Member: What policies?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yet last Friday, when I asked the Prime Minister what was the contingency plan to deal with inflation, he said: a wages and incomes policy. Yes, there it is, when everything comes down in ruins and everything is a shambles, when this administration fails to recognize the problem of inflation, it decides that we shall have a wages and incomes policy. At the moment we are getting selective price controls; we are getting palliatives. The Minister of Finance has frankly told the Canadian people, "I am hoping that we will be able to outrun inflation. We will give you fuel and we will try to help you outrun inflation." Well, they cannot do it. In effect, the attitude of the administration is that they hope inflation will go away somehow, somewhere; that there will be an event, that someone will discover some magical formula which will relieve them of the difficult decisions that must be made with regard to inflation.

This House has been in session for over an hour and a half, and I think hon. members want to study this budget. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, there is one point that I would like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance on behalf of all members of the House. It came to my attention tonight that while members of the House were denied the contents of the budget, all that was required was for anyone to listen to radio or watch television at about 8.15 or 8.20 p.m. However, that would not have helped that brilliant member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin), because what I am saying is that a colleague of mine brought in the total of the minister's proposals by 8.20 tonight. They went out through the media—the total proposals that the minister made.

If it is to be the case—and this is not just idle carping—that members are denied copies of the minister's proposals, but all you have to do is listen to the radio and by 8.20 you have the total budget, while members here had to wait until 9.30 to get the minister's speech in total, then there is something wrong and I would suggest that the matter be looked into so there is no repetition. This would apply also to whoever may be minister of finance next year.

In the event that the government House leader has quit having fun and games with the continuation of this debate, and if he can indicate to us when the budget debate will resume, bearing in mind the traditions of the House and all that goes with the serious consideration of a budget, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell), the adjournment of this debate.

On motion of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind what the government House leader said the other day regarding debate on the budget to be announced as late as Monday, is it late enough now for him to tell us when this debate will be resumed?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In accordance with the request of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), the budget debate will commence practically immediately, which in my understanding will be tomorrow.

On motion of Mr. MacEachen the House adjourned at 9.43 p.m.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

FEASIBILITY STUDY OF PROPOSED STEEL COMPLEX IN EASTERN CANADA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion. In view of the grave concern and deep unrest that now exists in Nova Scotia as a result of the recently announced commissioning by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion of a study to investigate the economic feasibility of a steel complex in Atlantic Canada, and in light of the fact that another steel operation in eastern Canada would definitely jeopardize the future of the operations of the steel plant at Sydney and the jobs of over 4,000 steelworkers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis):

That the federal government immediately cancel the study undertaken to investigate a site for a possible steel complex in eastern Canada and instead solely concentrate on assisting the Nova Scotia government to modernize and diversify the present steel operation at Sydney.

Mr. Speaker, the future fate of the economy of Cape Breton could well hang in the balance as a result of the stupidity of the federal government in commissioning this study.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: MacEachen's boys said no.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

PROVISION TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT OF LISTS OF MILITARY VOTERS TO PERMIT COMMUNICATION

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-284, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to compel the Chief Electoral Officer to place at the disposal of members of parliament the lists of military voters electing to be enumerated in their respective electoral districts, and thereby to permit members' communication with all their constituents.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

THE BUDGET—RATE OF INFLATION ASSUMED IN CALCULATING RATE OF GROWTH IN REAL TERMS AND INCREASE IN INCOME TAX COLLECTIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this question is directed to the Minister of Finance who has forecast a rate of growth of 5 per cent in real terms during 1974 and in his budget presentation last night accompanying figures indicated that the increase in income tax collections in the current fiscal year would be $1½ billion. In making this calculation, what was the assumption as to the rate of inflation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the assumption was based on the inter-reaction between the progressive rate of tax and the expectation of receipts from that tax based on that progressive rate.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I understood the reluctance yesterday of the Minister of Finance to make a prediction as to what inflation will take place in the current calendar year, but I would like the minister to be frank with us and tell us quite frankly the basis upon which the calculation of income tax collections was made and a real rate of growth of 5 per cent. Would the minister please be frank and tell us what the rate of inflation was assumed to be for the purpose of the calculation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the rate of return on the tax is not only based on assumptions of inflation but on assumptions of the strength of the economy, assumptions of the strength of the economy in various income ranges. As I said last night I am not in a position to predict a rate of inflation for Canada in 1974 for the reasons I mentioned last night.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the minister is being difficult about this. He just said this calculation was based on other assumptions besides an assumption of the rate of inflation, indicating there was some assumption made about the rate of inflation for the purpose of this calculation. I ask the minister to give us this information so that we can judge the value of the calculation. What was the rate of inflation upon which this calculation was based? There were other assumptions as to the rate of growth and other things the minister has mentioned, but what was the rate of inflation upon which this calculation was based?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There are so many interrelated factors. We went through this exercise last year on the budget and I give the Leader of the Opposition the same answer I gave him on the last occasion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are three or four or more supplementaries. Hon. members, I am sure, will want to spend most of the question period on this matter which actually should be dealt with when we reach the budget debate, but I will recognize hon. members for these supplementaries in a moment after we have completed the first round of questioning. The hon. member for Brant.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN OLD AGE PENSIONS BY $500 A YEAR IN LINE WITH INCREASE GRANTED CERTAIN PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact the government recently gave a $500 a year increase to certain members of the Public Service, specifically to cope with rising inflation, is it the minister's intention to do the same thing for those receiving old age security and, if not, why not?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that question was put in similar terms yesterday. I am not in a position to respond to it in positive terms because they are two different types of situations.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

LACK OF NEWS BROADCAST ON FRENCH NETWORK BECAUSE OF ACTION BY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since the entire French network of the CBC was paralyzed last evening, so that the Canadian people were deprived of the national news due to a work stoppage ordered by stupid and irresponsible individuals, does the Prime Minister intend to ask a thorough cleaning of the CBC piggery contaminated by well-known separatists and leftists?

Mr. Grafftey: Incredible!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the House no doubt knows, the work stoppage to which the Social Credit leader referred to comes under the Canadian Labour Code. We hope that the CBC authorities will act firmly in that illegal strike, as the House also hopes. For the moment, I think it would be premature for the government to intervene in that strike, but once again, I hope that the authorities will find a solution to that strike which is not only illegal but whose timing strangely seems to have been in contempt of Parliament representing the entire nation.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary.

I realize that it behooves the CBC to take decisions, but I would like to know if the Prime Minister and the government intend to recommend to the corporation that it deal severely with those responsible for this absolutely illegal strike?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I suppose that the hon. member's question and the reply I just gave will be broadcast, if not on the CBC network at least on those of the other radio and television stations, and that the strikers will probably be informed of our views, mine and that of the hon. member.

PROPOSED ONTARIO TAX ON LAND SPECULATION—POSITION OF MINISTER RESPECTING DEDUCTIBILITY

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance clarify for Ontario citizens whether he is undercutting the provincial tax on land speculation by removing one of the bases of the tax, namely, the deductibility provision with regard to such tax?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, that bill is still before the Ontario legislature so there is no undercutting at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: The suggestion I have had is that the legislation has been put in a freeze in the Ontario legislature pending clarification of what the minister is apparently doing. I think it is a fairly simple question: Is government policy going to continue to permit the deductibility of such a tax at the provincial level or not? A simple yes or no will be sufficient.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is my understanding that the bill has been put in a freeze in the Ontario legislature until they find out whether or not it works.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for St. John's East, who has the next question, will allow me to recognize the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham on a supplementary.

Mr. Lawrence: I am sorry, sir, to have to do this again, but obviously the question of the workability of the provincial legislation depends entirely on the attitude of the minister, and he will not give it. I ask him again, and a simple yes or no will be sufficient: is this tax going to be deductible or not?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is repeating the question he has already asked. The hon. member for St. John's East.

MONITORING OF CERTAIN BUDGET TAX CHANGES TO ENSURE THAT CONSUMERS ARE PROTECTED

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who has been charged with monitoring responsibility in regard to the budget of the Minister of Finance. May I ask him what steps he intends to take in carrying out this monitoring responsibility to ensure that the excise tax is not used as an excuse to raise profits on existing stocks? I ask this in view of the fact that the decrease in the sales tax on clothing and footwear will not be effective until existing stocks are exhausted, probably in the fall, if ever.

● (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we carried out a successful monitoring program with respect to the excise tax and customs duty cuts in the last budget, and I hope to be announcing very shortly the details of the monitoring program with respect to the present measures. Obviously, as the hon. member suggests, it will have to be developed to take into account the very factors he has mentioned. I will be announcing the details later.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's outstanding failure to succeed in this regard with respect to the last budget, may I ask him what immediate steps he is taking to ensure that people are not taking advantage of the elimination of the excise tax on tobacco and certain other products as an excuse to make immediate windfall profits?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think that most people, perhaps with the exception of the hon. member and some of his colleagues, recognize the report on the monitoring of the cuts in the last budget as being a fair balanced and accurate statement of what actually took place and the actual benefit to the consumer. We are prepared to carry out the responsibility mentioned by the Minister of Finance in his statement last night to get the facts in order that the government can take any appropriate action that may be necessary.

THE BUDGET—GROWTH IN GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT IN CURRENT DOLLAR TERMS USED IN ESTIMATING REVENUES

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the first question asked of the Minister of Finance. Can the minister give the House the figure for growth in the gross national product in firm dollar terms which was used in the determination of his estimate of revenues for the future year?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is just another way of putting the same question.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister not feel he has a solemn obligation to parliament and to the Canadian people to tell them the growth rate on which his forecasts are based, and that it is rather contemptuous of the House and the Canadian people to try to hide exactly what he predicts to be the case for the coming year? Will he not now change his mind and come clean with the Canadian people and with parliament and tell us what the basis is?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I came clean with the Canadian people last night.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yesterday afternoon, in reply to a question from one of the hon. gentleman's colleagues, I said in the current state of the worldwide factors at play no one could accurately predict the rate of inflation in Canada or in any other country of the world.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for Trinity for the sixth or seventh supplementary on this subject, after which I will see the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, my question is simple. How can anyone estimate income revenues based on the gross national product if at the same time he is totally incapable of estimating the compound of the real growth and the inflationary growth which is going to take place? It is a fraudulent prediction.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman recognizes, by the preamble to his question, how many interreacting assumptions there are.

Oral Questions

NET VALUE TO CORPORATIONS OF TAX CUT AND WRITE-OFFS LAST YEAR

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact we have been unable to get from his officials the net value to corporations of the corporate tax cut last year as well as the tax write-offs, can the minister tell us today how much the tax cuts were worth last year, as well as for 1974?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the reason the hon. gentleman was not able to get those figures is that you have to calculate the gross effect of the corporate tax cut as against increased activity in personal employment, expansion of capacity and expanded production, all of which will bring in renewed tax revenue. So the net figure is difficult to get at.

Mr. Nystrom: Can the Minister of Finance assure the House that the people of the country will have that figure in the next few weeks? Can he also tell the House when we may expect the complete answer to that question?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the hon. gentleman that these measures have produced 430,000 new jobs in this country.

PENITENTIARIES

PRINCE ALBERT—MURDER OF INMATE—NOTIFICATION OF FAMILY—REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and concerns an event that took place in Prince Albert Penitentiary three days ago in which an inmate, Mervin Johnston, was stabbed to death, allegedly by another inmate. The press in Calgary has been very critical of the circumstances connected with the announcement to members of the family of the death of this young man. I spent yesterday trying to look into the matter and feel that it can be cleared up provided the minister will set up an independent inquiry, not an institutional one but an independent inquiry, into all the circumstances because the stories that are going around can only be detrimental to our penal institutions.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that the penitentiary authorities tried to reach the wife of the man who was murdered in the penitentiary but were unable to do so. It seems that she was separated from her husband and there was no full address on file; consequently they could not reach her. I shall refer this matter to the penitentiary ombudsman who acts under the Inquiries Act and have her investigate this case for the right hon. gentleman. She is in an independent position and will provide a report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I take it that is an undertaking that there will be an independent investigation. If it is, I thank the minister for action which can only be beneficial if the facts are as alleged by officials in the penitentiary.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Mr. Allmand: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I said, the correctional investigator or ombudsman acts under the Inquiries Act and I will refer this matter to her for an independent investigation.

THE BUDGET—APPLICATION TO ALBERTA OIL SANDS DEVELOPMENT OF PROVISION THAT AMOUNTS PAID PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS BY DEVELOPERS NOT DEDUCTIBLE IN COMPUTING THEIR INCOME

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Last night the minister said that revenues derived by provincial governments in respect of production from petroleum or mineral resources should no longer be deductible in computing the income of the operator of the resources. Will the minister tell the House whether this statement in the budget will affect the special arrangements made and being made by the Alberta government with developers of the Alberta oil sands, which exempt the company from tax on the share of profit paid to the province?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to see a competitive return for the development of oil, but that is going to take an interpretation of the provisions of ways and means motion tabled in the House and the contract between the province and the developers.

Mr. Bawden: In view of the extreme importance to Canadians in their long range energy supplies that these developments proceed and proceed quickly, will the minister confirm that the arrangements he made with the company developing the tar sands last fall are no longer valid, that is, the commitment he gave?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not what I was saying.

Mr. Bawden: When the first ministers' conference concluded at the end of March it appeared that all matters relating to petroleum revenue sharing were settled. In view of this new and serious change in the sharing of revenues, will the minister say whether it is proposed to bring the first ministers together again to discuss this matter before the legislation is implemented?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Speaker, not at this time, but the Premier of Alberta has been made well aware of the concern of the federal government as to the availability of its own federal corporate tax base.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of members seeking supplementaries. I will recognize the hon. member for Nipissing.

MEASURES TO EQUALIZE PRICE OF OIL, IF PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION BILL NOT IMPLEMENTED

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the slow progress of Bill C-18, the oil administration bill, in committee, and in view of the indication by the leaders of the opposition parties that they may not let the government proceed with its administrative measures, would the minister indicate what measures would be available to the government to equalize the price of oil and maintain agreement in the event that Bill C-18 would not be implemented?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the bill is not made law there would, of course, be no legislative base to maintain the single price for Canadians. It would, of course, be possible if the House were dissolved to provide the cushion by way of Governor General's warrants. But there would be no authority for the collection of the export charge, and as a result approximately $4 per barrel would go to the industry—

● (1430)

Mr. Baldwin: Nonsense!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —and the cost of the payment of the cushion would have to be borne by the general taxpayer.

Mr. Baldwin: Bribery!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What a red herring!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. The hon. member for Calgary North is recognized for the purpose of asking a supplementary.

OIL—PROVISION IN BUDGET THAT AMOUNTS PAID PROVINCES BY DEVELOPERS NOT DEDUCTIBLE IN COMPUTING INCOME—PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance a question along the same lines as the one asked by the hon. member for Calgary South. The minister said last night, "I am proposing that revenues derived by provincial governments in respect of production from a petroleum or mineral resource should no longer be deductible in computing the income of the operator". Was there any consultation with the provinces prior to that statement in the budget? Did any consultation take place when the agreement was made with reference to the surtax and the compensation which will net eastern Canada $1 billion out of the resources of Alberta?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the preamble to the question. There was no consultation before last night's budget statement, although the province of Alberta was well aware of the government of Canada's concern about the erosion of the federal tax base as a result of actions taken by provincial governments.

DISPOSITION OF GEORGE DERBY HOSPITAL LANDS—REQUEST FOR TRANSFER TO MUNICIPALITY OF BURNABY

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the fact the disposition of the 28 acres on which the George Derby Hospital is located appears to be virtually settled, and in view of the increasing urgency of reaching a decision regarding the disposition of the remainder of this tract of land, can the minister give any assurance that the government is willing to transfer this land to the municipality of Burnaby?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

THE BUDGET—ALLEGED EARLY RELEASE TO LIBERAL LEADER IN MANITOBA LEGISLATURE AND OTHERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Is the hon. gentleman aware that a copy of his budget was in the hands of the leader of the Liberal opposition in the Manitoba Legislature before his reading of the budget and before it was available to members of this chamber? Can he inform the House how this budget leak took place?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that but I will check it out.

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the fact that this is a fundamental violation of the rights and privileges of every member of this House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: —would the hon. gentleman in his investigation inquire as to how many copies were released ahead of his budget address and to whom they were released, and report to the House in some detail on this matter?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much the allegation raised by the hon. member. The budget was sent under security guard in national defence aircraft right across the country, and copies were released in all provincial capitals simultaneously with my rising in the House. Allowing for time zones, and I will check the particular incident raised by the hon. gentleman, it is quite possible that at seven o'clock Winnipeg time the budget would have been available to anyone who approached the Bank of Canada office or the legislature in Manitoba.

THE BUDGET—PROVISIONS RESPECTING MUNICIPALITIES AND ACCUMULATION OF FUNDS BY INDIVIDUALS TO BUY HOMES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. It deals with the very important speech he made last night and is of interest to municipalities and persons of 18 or more. I should like to be very specific. Will the removal of the sales tax on building materials mentioned on page 22 of the speech which will apply to municipalities and water distribution systems also apply to municipal sewers? Secondly, will the fiscal advantages granted persons 18 or over through a registered home ownership savings plan apply not only to the purchase of homes but also to home construction?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall allow the minister to reply briefly, but may I remind the hon. member for Bellechasse that in a few minutes we will be discussing the budget, in addition to which those questions should not really be put before we reach orders for the day. But the question having been put, the minister may want to answer it briefly.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer can be found in the document I tabled last night. The answer to the second part of the question is yes. With regard to the first part of his question, I must refer the hon. member to the document I tabled last night. In any event, I shall be in touch with him in this regard.

LOSS IN REVENUE RESULTING FROM CORPORATE TAX CUT AND FASTER WRITE-OFFS LAST YEAR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance and has reference to the question put to him by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville relating to the estimated loss of revenues flowing from the cut in corporate taxes for manufacturers and processors and the fast write-offs. In view of the fact the Deputy Minister of Finance promised an answer on that this morning at the latest, am I to take it from the Minister of Finance's response to the hon. member that he is refusing to give that information?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am saying to the hon. gentleman that in order to calculate the net tax effect of the corporate tax incentives to manufacturers and processors one has to take the gross tax receipts and set off against them taxation from increased activity in the construction industry and in capital investment, and what that means in terms of greater productivity and greater taxation, and also net out the greater personal taxation from the new jobs that are provided by that increase.

Mr. Stanfield: How was it that the minister's officials were quite prepared to give us an estimate last year? In view of this, why is the minister going through all this elaborate cover-up which is creating suspicion in the minds of people that is exceedingly regrettable? I ask the minister, will he not do what his officials promised would be done, give us this information, and prevent the suspicion developing that the minister is creating today?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am replying on my authority as minister and reporting to a fellow member of the House, and I have told him of the difficulty in supplying that answer.

ESCAPE OF TWO INMATES FROM MILLHAVEN—ALLEGED DELAY IN NOTIFYING NAPANEE POLICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General and deals with permissiveness in our penal administration. Last week two convicts escaped from Millhaven Penitentiary, enjoyed a delightful day in the county town of Napanee in the luxury of spendid anonymity at the expense of the public, and are still at large because there was no communication from the prison to the police department of the town of Napanee. What reason can the Solicitor General give for the failure of his department for 14 hours to notify the Napanee police department of the escape of these men and of their description?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will have to get the information on that question. I was expecting it a few days ago. I had the information here then but I do not have it today.

AGRICULTURE

INCREASE IN FERTILIZER AND BALER TWINE PRICES—INVESTIGATION OF JUSTIFICATION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture with regard to the recent increases in fertilizer prices amounting to 30 per cent about which the minister has not satisfied me, and also with regard to other products involved in the production of agricultural products such as baler twine which has increased in price by at least 300 per cent. Has the minister had any inquiries conducted to see whether these increases are justified?

● (1440)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows we have been checking on these prices. We know that the supply of baler twine is increasing. If there is a so-called shortage, this is one way in which unjustified price increases can be overcome. A cargo of baler twine was recently unloaded at Saint John, New Brunswick, and another is being unloaded at Toronto. If the supply becomes greater, that will have a controlling effect on prices. We know the increase will not be 300 per cent as the hon. member has suggested. According to our survey, fertilizer prices in western Canada have gone up by approximately 23 per cent. The big problem we are now facing is that some small dealers and farmers are exporting fertilizer to the United States in order to make a rip-off.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Mackenzie on a supplementary and then the hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. Korchinski: The minister may be dealing with the small problem of an increase of 40 per cent in the price of fertilizer, but the price of baler twine has gone up over 300 per cent, from $8 to at least $27 a bale. Can the minister indicate what justification there is for that in view of the fact that fuel oil and natural gas prices and transportation costs have not gone up at that rate? Why is this type of increase necessary?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, baler twine is made out of sisal fibre which is imported from Mexico and other countries. There is not much we can do but pay the price for that product and get it to Canada as quickly as possible. In Mexico, for instance, it went up by $5 a bale. I think it should be made clear that when the hon. member suggests 300 per cent—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. Korchinski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a point of order. I will allow the minister to reply to the point of order, but I am not sure it will settle very much.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, what happens in Mexico does not have anything to do with the price of twine in Canada. I am not talking about sisal twine. I am talking about plastic twine which is entirely different from the sisal twine that comes from Mexico. The price of plastic twine—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order, please. I have to be fair to the minister and allow him to speak to the alleged point of order. I hope hon. members will appreciate there are only a few minutes left before the end of the question period.

Mr. Whelan: For your information, Mr. Speaker, plastic twine is used by less than 10 per cent of those who use baler twine in Canada. Its main source is petroleum products. In the case of sisal fibre, it is all imported.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This shouting is not very helpful. In the circumstances hon. members can expect that orders of the day will be called promptly when we reach the end of the question period. If we have to go, I wish we would go in peace.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I would go in peace if the minister would admit he has not done a darn thing about the price of baler twine which has increased by 300 per cent. That is exactly what this government intends to live with.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I call on the Minister of Agriculture to give the Chair an opportunity to recognize another two or three questioners before we reach the end of the question period. I recognize the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. I hope it will not be a supplementary.

AIR CANADA

POSSIBLE LOCATION OF CERTAIN OVERHAUL FACILITIES IN WINNIPEG—INQUIRY AS TO DECISION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport to whom we wish a quick return, I address my question to the head of government.

In view of the statement made in this House by the minister on March 22, as recorded on page 774 of Hansard, to the effect that, and I quote:

"Air Canada is the one that will decide where the base will be located . . ."

Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether he agrees with this point of view and intends to confirm this decision already taken by Air Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will refer to what I said to the House two days ago, he will realize that I indicated indeed this question was before the Cabinet.

The hon. member should know that the government's and Parliament's policy is to leave as much freedom as possible to Crown corporations, but that the government, by appointing the directors of various boards and through contacts with the main administrators, can certainly influence this kind of decision.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

OIL SPILLS FROM GROUNDING OF SHIPS OFF NORTHERN TIP OF VANCOUVER ISLAND AND IN ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the reported grounding of a Canadian National cruise ship off the northern tip of Vancouver Island with a resulting oil spill, will the minister advise the House whether he has information as to the extent of the oil spill, the cause of the accident and what action is being taken to contain the oil?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the House that the spill is not serious. I do not know the cause of the accident. Staff of several departments are on the spot and oil containment efforts are under way.

Mr. Harding: Who will be responsible for the clean-up costs of this spill and for the clean-up costs of a similar grounding in the St. Lawrence River recently which I understand resulted in a very costly clean-up operation?

Mr. Davis: In the first case, Mr. Speaker, Canadian National Railways; in the second case, Imperial Oil.

IMPACT OF BUDGET ON AREAS OF HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In light of the fact that Canada's areas of regional disparity, particularly the Atlantic region, have had high unemployment rates together with an increasingly tight money situation, has the minister assessed the impact his budget will have on these regional economies, particularly in light of the forecast downturn for the latter part of this year?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I tried to make it clear last night when I referred to the policies to eliminate regional disparity or to enhance equality of economic opportunity in Canada that the budgetary thrust of the government would continue to try to spread expansion of the economy into the Atlantic and western provinces. I took some encouragement last night, as I hope the hon. gentleman did, from the fact that despite the high unemployment figures, which I regret as much as he, the rate of growth in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec in 1973 exceeded the rate of growth for the country as a whole.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Since the minister referred to the fact that he expected the banks would continue giving preference with regard to loans to small businesses, mortgage financing for housing and other borrowers, is the minister now prepared to indicate the exact capital targets that have been arrived at? Is the minister prepared to report to the House the extent to which the banks will enter into some arrangement, in view of the fact that unemployment is in fact increasing on an over-all basis in the Atlantic provinces and that often inflation is greater there than in the more affluent parts of the country?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that while monetary policy has a uniform national rate which may have different effects, depending on the strengths of different parts of the economy, our fiscal policy has a regional differentiation. I have asked the governor of the Bank of Canada, through the Canadian Banking Association, to arrange to have figures compiled on a more regular basis indicating the rate of authorization of loans of $200,000 and under and $200,000 and over, regionally differentiated. I will see what I can get for the hon. gentleman.

LABOUR RELATIONS

STRIKE AT UNITED AIRCRAFT PLANT, LONGUEUIL—RETURN OF SUBCONTRACTS FROM UNITED STATES UPON SETTLEMENT

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce concerning the strike of United Aircraft employees, in the constituency of Longueuil. Since this strike has been going on for 19 weeks now, can the minister tell the House whether he was assured by United Aircraft officials that all subcontracts given in the United States will cease as soon as the strike is over?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned about the prolongation of this strike, its effects on employment and its effects, both present and future, on supplying our customers throughout the world. My department has registered our concern and we are monitoring the situation very closely. We have received written assurances from the company that, immediately following the end of the strike, any work which has been shifted temporarily from the plant will be returned immediately to United Aircraft Limited.

DUTIES AND FUNCTIONS OF RECENTLY APPOINTED PRESIDENT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Transport, of which notice was given the minister's office this morning. Can the acting minister say whether or not the recently appointed president of Air Canada has the same duties and functions as his predecessor, or have his responsibilities and duties been lessened or diminished in any way?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I did not get the notice ahead of time. I am sure it is my own fault, but I did not get an opportunity to read this question. I will make inquiries. I think a written answer would probably be the most appropriate because the answer would be fairly lengthy.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary and will then recognize the hon. member for Lisgar before calling orders of the day.

Mr. MacKay: Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, may I thank the minister and ask him whether, when he is investigating this matter, he will also determine if fewer vice-presidents or departments within Air Canada report directly to the president than was formerly the case?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I will do my very best to have that included in the answer.

ACTION TO ENSURE BANKS MAKE MONEY AVAILABLE TO FARMERS UNDER FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. On April 30 last I asked him whether or not he would undertake discussions with officials of the banks with a view to ensuring that under the Farm Improvement Loans Act money would be available to farmers for use this spring. At that time he said he would do so. Would the minister now tell the House what has now transpired since his discussions with the banks?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I transmitted my undertaking to my officials and I hope to report to the hon. member shortly. In the last few days I have been distracted somewhat by other matters.

AVAILABILITY OF FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT AND SMALL BUSINESS LOANS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question. The minister also indicated two or three weeks ago that he would look into the fact that fisheries improvement loans and small business loans were not being directed to the Atlantic region, particularly to the province of Newfoundland. Can the minister report on the investigation that he directed the chairman of the financial administration to carry out?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I undertook to the hon. gentleman when we were sitting in committee, I sent the director of the bank down to St. John's, Newfoundland. I have not had an opportunity of receiving a report from him, not because he has not been ready to report but because I have not had an opportunity to talk to him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe all hon. members are anxious to hear the continuation of the address by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I am prepared to call orders of the day, but I see a number of members rising on points of order, beginning with the Solicitor General.

PENITENTIARIES

ESCAPE OF TWO INMATES FROM MILLHAVEN—ALLEGED DELAY IN NOTIFYING NAPANEE POLICE DEPARTMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have had my office send me the answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that is a point of order, but with the consent of the House the minister will be allowed to reply to the hon. member's question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, when there is an escape from a penitentiary in Ontario we have an arrangement to notify the Ontario Provincial Police. In this case we did notify the Ontario Provincial Police within one hour of the escape and provided them with photos and identification. I might say that these men did not escape from the Millhaven maximum security institution but were walkaways from the minimum security institution and are in no way dangerous.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington is rising on a point of order. Again I appeal to hon. members to allow the Chair to call orders of the day since I gather there is important business to be considered this afternoon. The hon. member rises on a point of order.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to explain to the House why the answer given by the minister is not satisfactory. There are other autonomous police departments in the district besides the provincial police. These smaller autonomous police departments were not notified, and I ask the minister why.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope this intervention will not go on the record of the House as a question of privilege. The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I did not rise on a point of order at the time the hon. member for Nipissing asked his question because I did not want to intervene while the question period was under way. My point of order is this. The hon. member for Nipissing dealt in his question with matters that were the subject of discussion before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works this morning, and the facts given before the committee were contrary to what the hon. member suggested. It was made quite plain that there was machinery in place by which the provisions of that bill could in fact be covered. The representative of the province of Alberta, the Attorney General, made it quite plain that the province would honour its commitment to maintain the price at $6.50, and we would, of course, agree with him. I think that fact should have been made known by the hon. member when he asked his question.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, the Attorney General also indicated before the committee that he was not concerned about whether that bill would be passed by the committee. He indicated that, in his view, there were already measures that could be implemented by the minister. That is why the question was asked of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Monday, May 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, some time ago there were written these following words: "Inflation mocks the idea of a just society". I am just wondering whether the author of those words would stand up and take a bow, because that man was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who said that in October of 1969. But strangely enough, notwithstanding that his pet theory of a just society is not only mocked but destroyed by inflation, in his own words, but this administration has been most lax and reluctant to deal with inflation in a meaningful way. This administration stands indicted before the Canadian public on the ground of its inability to deal with inflation. Thousands upon thousands of senior citizens accuse the government. They accuse the government and they use the traditional term "j'accuse". They accuse this government when they see their hard earned lifesavings frittered away, to the extent of 10 per cent last year alone.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) can consult the Bank of Canada tables if he wants, or go to any records beyond his own knowledge and memory and he will find that in one year, from the last budget in February 1973 to this present budget, the cost-price index moved upward over 15 points. In other words, it was in excess of 10 per cent. In view of that situation how can anyone look any senior citizen, a person on fixed income, anyone who holds insurance or government bonds or who has any investment, in the eye and say that the situation can and must continue? This government has been in power—

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): —since October 1972, and it has been singularly unconcerned about inflation. We have had bandaid after bandaid measures here and there. Even the move by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) at the time of the last budget in indexing personal income was a bandaid measure, and how he crawled in order to do that. The indexing at 6.6 per cent left the income earners of Canada some four points in arrears on the basis of inflation in Canada during the past 12 months. How can he give any assurance to the people of Canada with equanimity?

Possibly some bachelor members do not appreciate the situation, but any housewife could tell them what has happened in respect of shopping in the grocery stores.

[Mr. Blais.]

Bachelors do not notice the change as much, but I want to ask each and every individual member:

[Translation]

How much was the provider or the housewife spending on food, last week for instance, as compared to a year ago? It is the same thing everywhere, Mr. Speaker. Those people do not care about Canadians facing inflation. They definitely do not care, they believe everything is right; put one band-aid here, another there, this will cure everything. They should indeed put some tape across the lips of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier), this would eliminate a good deal of noise in the House, because all he says is nonsense.

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member for Edmonton West, the hon. member for Sherbrooke rose on a point of order.

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): I have a question for the hon. member, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sherbrooke rose on a point of order, but it now appears he has a question for the hon. member for Edmonton West, who has the floor.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I understood nothing of what the hon. member said. It would be nonsense, as usual.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite understood that the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member, but I believe I should try to make this clear by indicating that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) rose a moment ago with the intention of asking a question of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I reminded the House that the hon. member for Edmonton West has the floor and the hon. member can rise only with the consent of that hon. member.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly let the hon. member ask his questions when I finish my speech. I understood that he had risen on a point of order in order to ask the question.

I am sure that my good friend the Minister of Finance will agree with me that he is the one who has to provide economic leadership to the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is the nature of his job. He is supposed to be the captain of the ship.

Mr. Muir: She has gone aground.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The Minister of Finance can control only 35 per cent of government expenditure through the estimates and the rest of it is statutory. In spite of the fact the take of the GNP in 1972 and all levels of government was 37.9 per cent, only 18.7 per cent fell to the federal government. This is something the Minister of Finance did not put on the record, but these are the latest correct figures as published in the National Finances of the Canadian Tax Foundation. I doubt that the minister would doubt the veracity of those figures.

Revenues of government and hospitals at all levels in the country amounted to some $39 billion at market value. I have been studying some other tables which are very interesting. Does anyone appreciate how far inflation has gone in this country? In 1972 the GNP in market dollars was close to $104 billion. The Minister of Finance was really spraining his shoulder patting himself on the back over the strength of the Canadian economy because it had gone up to $104 billion. Let us compare that with 1961 constant dollars. In those terms the GNP was only $70 billion to $71 billion. That indicates the nature of the disparity because of inflation since 1961.

The other day the minister talked about the records of capital investment in Canada and suggested this shows there will be a great deal of investment, but it only takes a little bit of figuring, and the Minister of Finance is not able or does not want to do this, to realize that investment in 1974-75 will not, in purchases in constant dollars, amount to as much as in 1966, and 1966 was a pretty good year. Canada has presumably advanced since then, but purchasing power in 1974-75 will be less in respect of equipment and plants than in 1966.

I would ask you: Does that mean we are making progress? It does not mean that at all. I suggest there has been a standstill or a reversion back to something less than the figures of eight years ago in so far as capital investment is concerned. I do not care what kind of dollars you are talking about because that does not mean a thing. What is important is how many machines, how many plants and how many productive facilities are actually being put into place, that is what counts.

• (1510)

Yesterday the minister said, and I think we all agree with him, that Canada's number one economic and social problem is inflation. I suggest to the minister that that should have been the one and only thrust of his budgetary proposals. But, does this budget go to the root of the problem of inflation or does it do anything to reduce the inflationary expectations? Not at all. In fact, on the contrary, it feeds and nurses those inflationary expectations. What do you think this bonus in respect of Canada savings bonds is but a cushion seven or ten years down the way telling people that they need not worry about inflation because they will be paid a bonus so that the Canada savings bonds will be worth roughly the same as they are at the date of purchase. Is that not nursing inflationary expectations, because that offer is open-ended. There is no limitation concerning amount. It simply says that if inflation goes up at the rate of 12 per cent the bonus will be paid at the rate of 12 per cent. This is rather ridiculous. The same minds using the same tools and the same philosophy as last year designed the 1974 budget.

In the same way, the budget of February 1973 failed to adequately cope with inflation.

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): It did not.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It did. There is that brilliant member for Sherbrooke. The present day situation is bad enough. Since February 1973, the last budget, the Canadian cost-price index has gone from 145.3 to 160.8 in March 1974. I invite hon. members to get hold of this publication and read it so that they will be instructed.

[Translation]

Those who seek enlightenment should definitely read what the Bank of Canada report for the month of April says about the consumer price index on page 58. The food prices index, which was 151.6 before, reached 180.5 in March 1974. The overall index for food products, February excluded, was 142.9 and for the rest, 153.7. Do you need anymore? Surely not. The Liberals are too ashamed about it, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

As I said, Mr. Speaker, the same minds are at work with the same disappointing results. Canadians are to be afforded some more small cushion against inflation. There will be some transfers of income by tax increases here and there in the corporate sector and minor decreases in personal income tax. Last year there was an elimination of sales tax on children's clothing and shoes, not forgetting chocolate bars and soft drinks, but that benefit has been more than overtaken and lost by spiralling inflation. If one goes to the shelf to buy those same clothes one will find that they are more expensive now than they were with the sales tax. Now, it is to be wearing apparel and shoes. Some people will benefit. I share their satisfaction. Certainly, it is a step in the right direction. On this point I shall not quarrel with the minister, but it is only one small item. This is not an all-out attack on inflation. After all some months ago the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) proposed that the sales tax be removed on clothing.

The minister shakes his head. Last year he borrowed and stole ideas for his budget and this year he also dipped. The only difference between this year and the previous year is that the minister did not have a political campaign this year in which to go around deriding the ideas of the Leader of the Opposition and then putting them into practice. Let us have a look at some of the tax proposals the minister has made. First let me say without reservation that I think the interest exemption of up to $1,000 from whatever sources for the benefit primarily of senior citizens is a move in the right direction. It has always been difficult for these people to determine what was the purpose in saving. They wondered why they had scrimped and put aside savings so that they would have a more enjoyable and more honourable age of retirement when they saw their bank accounts whittled away by reason of the decrease in purchasing power. They also see their mortgages being whittled away in value. These people honestly earned their money. They are not Scrooges trying to grind out money from the poor. They are trying to live honestly.

That is a step part way toward alleviating the situation. However, if inflation is to continue during 1974-75 at the rate of 10 per cent or 12 per cent, which it is now in the cards it will do, then this measure itself will be seriously eroded. The minister has accelerated corporate tax payments. This is a windfall. I remember when his seatmate of the moment brought in acceleration of corporate tax payments he sort of puffed out his chest. The minister might ask me what chest, but I will not embarrass him. In any event, it was a windfall once in a lifetime operation. The only trouble is that the minister knows the string has now reached the last quarter inch because almost the next thing is that the corporations will be asked to pay their tax instantly on the completion of a transaction. The profit will be payable at that time.

The minister said he was helping housing by putting on a tax and by providing that carrying charges could not be levied against other income with regard to undeveloped land and that these would have to be capitalized. He thinks he will make some more money on this. I say, yes, he will make more money right now but every penny that is collected from the land holders under this proposal will be loaded on the back of the ultimate purchaser. There is no escaping that. The minister knows this. If carrying charges are allowed to be capitalized and are put on at the end of the road at the time of the disposition of the property, of course the purchaser will pay for it. Anyone who dares suggest otherwise is either being mentally dishonest or mentally incompetent on that particular point.

With regard to the tax upon high energy consuming vehicles, this is a return to a luxury tax. As to the tax on tobacco and alcohol, there will be some grumbling but it will be paid. I would much rather see an honest tax such as this one on liquor than the one imposed by many provincial liquor boards which, on the instruction of some cabinet minister in the province, merely jack up the price of their commodities. That tax is imposed without any representation, without any "yea" or "nay" by the legislature. I have always thought that that was the wrong way to proceed. To that extent at least, the federal Minister of Finance is honest with regard to the excise tax on liquor and tobacco. It is above board, while in the provincial field it is not. I have often said that.

The addition of the $50 allowance to the personal income tax will certainly help some people. The minister mentioned those several hundred thousand people who had been taken off the tax rolls by a previous tax cut, and he stood them alongside another 300,000 who he says will be relieved of any income tax at this time. As a result of two years of inflation, many people who formerly were not taxpayers, thank goodness, have reached the level of becoming taxpayers, so there will be a duplication. But I will tell you this much, to the person who does not pay any income tax this type of proposal means absolutely nothing. If you are not going to pay income tax, to give you $150 credit or greater exemption is of course quite meaningless.

The registered home ownership savings plan was thrown out as something novel, as though it were going to do something big. My colleagues who are primarily concerned with urban affairs will look at this in greater detail, but I will comment on it briefly. The limit is $1,000 per taxpayer. This means that persons over the age of 18, both male and female, can avail themselves of this. If they are married, they must continue to remain taxpayers. Each one contributes $1,000 to the pot for five years, and then they have this money available to purchase a house. At the price of houses today, this $10,000 will be practically meaningless. This is the big problem. I have a relative who is getting married this fall. Some three weeks ago he and his fiancee went out to look for a house in the Toronto area. These two youngsters are out of luck. Both of them have good jobs but they are both out of luck because all they can find are houses between $45,000 and $55,000.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Gillies: That is lucky in Toronto.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, my colleague is right. The price of housing is absolutely ludicrous. I know of a house that was built in 1967 in this city. I think it cost $42,000 at that time and about $1,000 was spent on landscaping, general painting, and so forth. It is on the market right now for $90,000. Who on earth can begin to look even for a new house?

Mr. Blackburn: Will you be getting that house?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, in no way, and it is not my house, either. I can tell you that a house five doors away from that one sold last week for $90,000. This is just an indication of how nonsensical the situation is. In some areas in Toronto, in Ottawa and in other major cities in Canada you can pay up to $55,000 and $65,000 for a lot. These lots are not hard to find, they are numerous at that price. What does it mean? All I am saying is that this is the result of inflation. This is a hedge. People buy lots not merely to make a speculative profit. For many people the holding of land acts as a hedge against inflation. Yet, this administration seems to feel that the best they can do is act like the ostrich, shove its head in the sand, bare its backside to the breeze and hope for the best. This is what I find so incomprehensible.

I remember seeing the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on television in 1969—he had just discovered inflation at that time—saying that this and that had to be done. The point I am making is that in so far as the public service of Canada is concerned since that time—and there was a freeze put on it—it has gone up to over 60,000. Even this year I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) at a meeting of the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee when we were considering supplementary estimates what was the purpose of these supplementary estimates, and he said that this would take care of the increases in staff. I asked him what size of an increase there was going to be in the federal civil service this year, and he said that, provided we can get sufficient inspectors for unemployment insurance and provided we can get some more people in some other department, the increase in 1974-75 will be 13,000 persons in the public service of Canada. Now, we wonder what was the resolve of this administration in trying to contain inflation.

We have here certain sales tax deductions. I will come to those when I compare revenues. We also have the tourist exemption. That is a curious one. It is very nice, but the funny point is that it allows Canadians who already have a most massive deficit on the tourist account to increase their permitted expenditures abroad by some 50 per cent. They will be purchasing foreign goods to bring them back into Canada, not for the employment of Canadians, and they will be spending money abroad, thus increasing the problem of our international trade deficit. I cannot honestly find any rationale in this. It may be that there is some undertaking with the United States government, or perhaps the government thinks they can butter up the U.S. so that pressures will come off the auto pact. I do not know what it is but in so far as Canada is concerned that proposal does not help. My colleague, the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) will be discussing in this debate later the changes in small business deductions. There will be also those with regard to the resource industries.

I should like to make one final remark about the customs changes. There are always some funny things that come up in a budget when one refers to customs changes. There are not many of them this year, with the exception of the one on facilities for orthopaedic casts, splints and other similar supports for handicapped persons. That is fine, but there is something else to do with veterinary medicine which relates to the bovine intranasal vaccines which will be admitted free. What is the particular purpose of this change leading to free admission into Canada of "amusement riding devices of the kinds used at exhibitions or fairs, ancillary equipment imported therewith; parts of the foregoing"? Hitherto there used to be some duty on this. Now, amusement ground equipment will benefit the most.

There are other things to which I am not going to refer, ranging from handicraft goods which are "designated by Order of the Governor in Council" and which are now to be entitled to the benefits of the general preferential tariff. That is a move in the right direction, but there are many other changes outside of those, which provide for the tourist returning from abroad, as well as limited changes in the customs tariff.

The minister has said that domestically one of the reasons for inflation is that industry and productive capacity are stretched to the limit, and we are feeling the effects of demand-pull. Yet one of the reasons for the limited capacity of the economy, as put by the Governor of the Bank of Canada in his last review, is "the relatively sluggish pace of investment for several years prior to 1973." In other words, the under-investment in previous years under the present administration is now responsible for the bottleneck in industrial production capacity. I cannot see the minister taking some comfort in saying that Canadian industrial capacity is right up to the collar in utilization when the only reason for that is that there was under-investment in previous years. But in any event, Mr. Speaker, historically investment follows increases in demand.

It is important to note that business fixed capital formation in 1973 as a percentage of gross national expenditure had not yet attained the level of 1965, and was considerably lower than the percentage of gross national expenditure achieved by business investment in the previous cycle of large business expansion from 1964 to 1967. The level of investment must become a source of concern for government planners if better price and employment performance are to be expected from the Canadian economy.

Concern for investment should be directed to particular sectors and regions of Canada. The minister was pretty solemn about regional disparities. There were a great number of areas in which the budget speech was rather solemn. Very little was said about the worsening trend in the international trade commodity section for the remaining quarters of 1974, if we look at this on a constant dollar basis. There is also the question of banking. It was not mentioned at all. I think the minister should have attended to Canadian banking facilities, and what have you, in his budget speech, There were many areas in which the writers were overly long in preparing the material, and I contend they could have concerned themselves with rather more pertinent facts dealing with the Canadian economy.

Here is one of the things that the minister will not tell us. Investment in new capacity, in equipment in manufacturing in 1972 was lower than in 1966, measured in current dollars. Even investment planned for 1974 in new capital equipment for manufacturing, once deflated by the change in the gross national expenditure implicit price index from 1966 to 1973, is less in terms of purchasing power than it was in 1966.

In the Atlantic region planned corporation investment for 1974 ranges from a low of roughly a 2 per cent increase in Newfoundland to a high of 28 per cent in New Brunswick. These increases will do nothing to lessen the regional disparities between provinces, and the level of investment in the Atlantic region is a cause of grave concern for the continued economic viability of the area.

Now dealing, with the budget itself we must look at the tables which were presented with it, and about which the minister did not speak. If we look at pages 31 and 32, for instance, we see that in 1973-74 the revenues under budgetary transaction were some $19 billion, and the minister expects to collect some $23,950,000,000 under his 1974-75 budget. In other words, government revenues are going to go up 26 per cent.

On the basis of expenditures there was an over-reach of more than $1 billion as contrasted with what was forecast for last year, and there will be an increase this year to $24 billion, which is an increase of 22 per cent. It is amazing when you think that the economy can withstand an increase in government revenues and expenditures at a rate of 24 per cent and 22 per cent per year.

Mr. Gillies: It cannot stand it, and that is why you have 12 per cent inflation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Right. Just look at the last Bank of Canada weekly statement which indicates that in just one year, from April, 1973, to April, 1974, there was a 20 per cent increase in the money supply, putting aside government deposits. How can this possibly continue?

The minister says that his deputy minister was at pains to explain that it was the policy of the government and of the Bank of Canada to maintain a control on the total money supply which is enough to ease an increasing economy and, of course, increased population consumption. All of us would accept that natural increase but, Mr. Speaker, there is no way that the Canadian economy can countenance an increase of 20 per cent in its money supply in one year. That is one of the reasons why we have inflation, but the minister did not talk about that.

In the same way the cash requirements of the government are going to go up about $2 billion. Again we see reasons why the coming year will not be too different from the past year, with the money supply having to be increased by some 20 per cent. I base this on the minister's own figures. This is something that absolutely shakes us. It is impossible to understand how the minister, his advisers and the cabinet can go along in this sort of smooth, unconcerned way with regard to inflation. Oh, they make polite noises, and they cluck like a bunch of old hens about inflation.

Mr. Gillies: Old roosters.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) suggests that instead of hens they are a bunch of old roosters. That may be more accurate. At the moment the members of the administration act like a bunch of tired old roosters.

The minister prided himself on taking $440 million off personal income tax, but yet if we look at the tables on page 32, the government of Canada's budgetary revenues under personal income tax are increasing to $9,500 million, up 18 per cent. Some $400 million will be saved by some people, but the total system for personal income tax is going to pay $1,600 million more during the coming year.

There is to be an increase in the tax on corporate profits. There is to be an increase in the yield of some $1,500 million, up 46 per cent.

● (1540)

Mr. Speaker, corporate income tax comes home in your pocket and in my pocket on the second run. Who is going to pay? Not the corporations, but John Q. Citizen. That is the impact of the tax increase or tax yield. It all goes back to that most infamous and unjust tax system that was foisted on the Canadian public in 1971, the notorious tax reform. The minister's predecessor, now Chairman of the CTC, said he was going to put an increase in yield in this new tax system. The Canadian public has been turned into a Holstein cow of championship calibre to provide all the milk in the way of tax money under this new system. It is almost as if the Canadian public had inexhaustible resources to pay taxes to an insatiable government.

There used to be a minister here by the name of Walter Gordon. He had just taken over when the present minister came to this House.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): And you were Speaker.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, I was occupying your chair, Mr. Speaker, and was therefore able to observe the hon. minister. At that time the budget barely exceeded $6 billion, and now we see total expenditures of $24½ billion, more than four time as much.

Sales tax is an example of how the Canadian public is taxed and of how inflation works. I suggest to the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), who is interjecting, that he look at those tables and see how much money he is being soaked, then he will complain about the inadequacy of his salary because his wife has long ago told him that it is inadequate. The deductions in the sales tax that the minister proposes amount to $390 million in his figures, mostly on clothing, shoes and other items. The funniest thing is that, because of inflation, the yield will be precisely $15 million more. This is like the old shell game and is a consequence of inflation, because unfortunately sales tax is fixed on price levels. These ad valorem taxes go on yielding and they become an embarrassment; then the minister has to give them away.

Then, there is a $1,400 million bonanza known as the oil export tax. The minister is trying to move in on the resources with this budget, particularly in a couple of provinces. I would be interested to know the minister's reaction had he been a member from the province of Alberta or even had his deputy minister come from there. I have said it before and I will say it here, that I think he has a knife in the back of the province of Alberta.

Some time ago the minister and his colleagues voted for a foreign investment review agency which was to require very few people to run it. I was interested to receive a news release the other day about the appointment of a deputy commissioner who had at one time worked in the government and was now a consultant. I was interested in what they were doing to control expenditure. We have been told about their niggardly attitude and slow progress with the lower ranks of the public service, particularly nurses in government hospitals who waited 18 months or two years to negotiate a new agreement. But here we see what happens when it is something for the boys. The other day members opposite were asking us to support the trade practices commission, another vast bureaucracy, and we have seen legislation for the introduction of Petro-Can, legislation for other commissions, boards, Crown corporations and God knows what.

I would like to read into the record an example of how this government spends public funds to set up the foreign investment review agency. This shows a commissioner in the salary range of $35,750 to $43,750; deputy commissioner, $32,500 to $41,500; director, registration branch, and there are three of them, $28,500 to $36,500; director assessment group, $25,000 to $32,000 and two assistant directors somewhat lower; three chiefs of assessment groups, $22,371 to $27,966, and then there are a couple of assistant directors. There are 14 positions altogether, Mr. Speaker, in the top level of the foreign investment review agency, and the median salary is $416,000 per annum without considering support staff.

We were to get a new trade practices commission which was going to duplicate, triplicate, refer back, refer forward, all sorts of reports and at the end of about 18 months consideration they would consider whether there had been any price gouging or improper price consideration. Then, there was to be Petro-Can, and what a refuge for jobs for the boys that was going to be and at what salaries.

If this government wants to show where it can cut expenditures, let them trim some of these agencies. For every executive in the $40,000 range there has to be a couple at $30,000, some at $25,000 and so down the line. There may be 20 or 30 people below, all the way down to junior typists. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this government has failed miserably to counter the effects of inflation. It has failed to protect the Canadian public against inflation. It has failed to go to the root of the problem in dealing with inflation, simply because it wants to buy popularity. In these circumstances, I can only say that I have lost complete confidence in this administration's ability to handle the problem of inflation.

An hon. Member: Are you not going to speak on the budget?

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I see that the "crow" from Sherbrooke has not left its post on the fence, doing nothing but croaking—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Sherbrooke rises on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I invite the "crow" on the other side of the House to come and make the same speech in my riding?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. That sounds more like an invitation than a point of order or a question of privilege.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I enjoy these exchanges with the hon. member. They show why he is sitting in the back row.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): At least the hon. member does not crawl away, as some of his colleagues do. He had a brief question he wanted to ask at the beginning of my remarks. Perhaps he might ask it now, and I will deal with it.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I have no question. I would have had one at the end of his speech, but as he said nothing, I do not have any—

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is what I thought. In any event, I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) the following motion:

[Translation]

That all the words after "That" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this House does not have confidence in the government by reason of its failure to propose effective budgetary measures to contain and reduce inflation".

[English]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, when I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), I understood why he had delayed so long in presenting his budget. Even he was ashamed of it. To suggest that the budget attacks the problem of the rising cost of living is the height of hypocrisy. To suggest that the budget helps those most hurt by the burden of rising prices is the depth of cruelty.

I have said often in this House on behalf of the New Democratic Party, as have other members of my party, that we reject the idea of over-all wage and price controls. In this we agree with the minister, so far as his budget is concerned, although I am somewhat worried about the contingency plan about which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has spoken.

We disagree with the idea of wage and price controls for reasons we have often given. Let me summarize them in one sentence. I suggest that such policy would either freeze high prices and low wages or would have to be so modified that it would cease to be an over-all plan and would become what the NDP has proposed, a selective price control system. Indeed, the members of the Conservative Party themselves have edited their proposal. First, it was to be a 90-day freeze; then it was to be for 120 days; then they were to institute controls for 18 months. Then, there were to be controls for two years. Then, there would be no freeze or control at the farm gate; then low paid workers were to have their wages lifted. I think the proponents of the idea of over-all price and wage controls have condemned it themselves, because they cannot stick with it.

But equally, we will not accept the proposition that nothing can be done for the people of Canada with respect to the rising cost of living. We reject the notion that you can let the corporations control the market at the expense of the consumer, and slap them on the wrist for so doing, as the minister did yesterday. The redistribution of income in Canada that has taken place in the last year or two has been redistribution in reverse, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gillies: That is absolutely right.

Mr. Lewis: Wages in the 12-month period between February, 1973 and February, 1974 rose by only 8 per cent, but the cost of living index rose by 9.6 per cent, leaving the worker worse off than he had been one year earlier. In 1971, sir, profits as a proportion of the Gross National Product were at 9.6 per cent; but, in 1973 they rose to 13.7 per cent of the Gross National Product. That was an increase of 42.7 per cent in the proportion that profits in our economy gouged out of the people of this country. At the same time the proportion that went to wages in 1971 was 55 per cent; in 1973, it was down to 53.2 per cent. Everywhere you look, Mr. Speaker, redistribution of income in this country has taken place in reverse. Wealth has been redistributed; it has gone in ever larger, stronger and more powerful concentrations to the centre of this country, at the expense of the average Canadian.

Just listen to the logic of the Minister of Finance in two or three places in his budget address. In comparing him with his colleagues, at least I respect him for his honesty and straightforwardness. Just listen to his logic. He said that if we have a two-price system for some of our basic commodities, we will need some kind of control over exports. That, he said with self-conscious pomposity, would be the height of folly. Let me remind the Minister of Finance that we now have a two-price system for oil, for wheat and for copper. I would like to understand the logic which suggests that if you also have it for steel, lumber and cement, it becomes the height of folly.

● (1600)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: What utter, unmitigated rubbish. Of course. you would need to have some export controls if you hold the price down in Canada to a fair price and sell commodities outside at the international price outside. If you do not have some kind of control of the exports, the commodities would flow out of this country. Why should the minister worry about retaliation? Why is it that Washington can do anything it wishes to protect the interests of Americans and the Canadian government gets down on its knees every time it has to do something to protect the interest of Canadians?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: No one suggests that export controls would be intended to interfere with normal export trade. All that would be required would be to make sure that the portion of production to stay in Canada would remain in Canada. These gentlemen are always afraid of taking steps that require courage.

The proposal we made for a national price control board with power to roll back and hold back unjustifiable price increases in areas where that control could be made with effectiveness and in a practical way would be an immense good for the people of Canada in this difficult period.

I agree with the minister that a large part of the inflation is international. Let no one suggest, here or elsewhere, in the next number of weeks that they have a wand which they will wave and the inflation will disappear. I hope that neither the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) nor any of his colleagues will descend to that kind of dishonesty because no one in Canada, or anywhere else for that matter, can wave a wand and get rid of all the inflationary pressures in the world.

We are a fortunate country in that we produce many of the things we consume. We have a wealth of resources and a well developed manufacturing industry, although it is not very rational because of the foreign control of manufacturing in many areas. However, it is a well developed manufacturing industry and we do have a well developed processing industry. The population of farmers across this country is second to none in productivity and in its ability and dedication to production.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: We have the minerals, food, fisheries, processing and manufacturing capacity. We have a people that are educated and trained. Because we have these riches, it is possible for Canadians, the Canadian government and parliament to do a great deal to reduce the burden of the high cost of living on ordinary Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: In order to do any good or accomplish anything, it is not gimmicks that are needed. The minister referred to other people suggesting gimmicks. I will have something to say about some of his gimmicks in a moment. In order to do any of these things in an effective way, what is required in a modern society is the will, courage and imagination to intervene in the market place, instead of leaving the market place in the hands of the corporations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Lewis: The reason the Minister of Finance did not do that is he is a Liberal. Because he is a Liberal, he is still governed by the old fashioned notion that the market place is free. Like hell it is, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: I use that word with deliberate intention. It is not a free market place. The large corporations of this country control the market. With their advertising campaigns and funds, they persuade Canadians to want what they do not need, to need what they do not want and to pay the sky for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: It is because the minister is wedded to the old fashioned notion that the market place is free that he wants the free market to continue. Obviously, it is not free. Because it is not free, it continues at the expense of the Canadian people.

He then threw out the idea of a 6 per cent interest rate on mortgages. I never thought an intelligent Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Finance has intelligence—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: I am not going to withdraw that. It is the truth. If it is damning him with feint praise, I cannot help it. The minister has intelligence. I never thought an intelligent Minister of Finance would give the reason he did. He said he cannot support the 6 per cent mortgage interest rate because that would push up the demand for houses and put prices up higher at a time when we in Canada have over a half a million unemployed men and women to produce the homes that are needed. We have all the materials in Canada to build the houses and housing units that are required. It is necessary to build more homes. Certainly, the 6 per cent interest rate or any other provision that would assist the purchaser of the home would not produce the houses that are needed by the Canadian people.

What did the minister say with regard to producing homes in Canada? He said he had no gimmicks. He was not using cosmetic policies. He was not using draconian policies. He was not using draconian policies as far as the corporations are concerned, but he was using cosmetic policies when he said his solution to the home ownership problem in Canada would be to allow people who can save up to $1,000 a year to a maximum of $10,000 in their lifetime to deduct that saving from their income tax.

The first question to ask is how many young Canadian couples make the kind of income that would enable them to save $1,000 a year? The minister ought to have looked into that. To save $1,000 a year on top of taxes and everything else is very difficult. I suggest the minister would be lucky if 20 per cent of young married couples could save $1,000 a year for this purpose, in addition to everything else.

The second question to ask is, what does this deduction mean? It will help the wealthier young couple a great deal more than the poorer couple. The young couple who can only save $200 a year and who pay an income tax rate of 25 per cent will only save $50 in taxes. However, a young couple who can save the total $1,000 a year and who pay a tax rate of 40 per cent will save $400 in taxes that year. The poorer couple save $50, the richer couple $400. That is exactly characteristic of the budget of the Minister of Finance.

● (1610)

What is more, Mr. Speaker, the minister does nothing in his budget to lower the cost of a house. If hon. members have followed what has happened during the last year or two, they will know what this means. By the time the young couple have saved $4,000 or $5,000, if they can afford to, over a period of five, seven or eight years, that sum is inadequate even for a downpayment. In addition, the increased price of the house will have eaten up their total savings probably two or three time over. We never suggested that 6 per cent interest is a complete solution to the housing problem.

On behalf of my party, I say that what is needed is a buying up or banking of urban land in Canada today. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that the time has come to put this kind of land under public ownership, whether under the ownership of the municipality, province or federal government, instead of letting it remain in the hands of the speculative developer. Urban development land should no longer be left in the private market for the price to be pushed up so it becomes unavailable to the ordinary Canadian family. A public agency of this kind, be it federal, provincial or municipal, should take over. We also suggest, if the provinces will not do this, that we need in Canada a national construction corporation, a Crown company, to fill in the gaps left by private builders, so as to build homes for the people of Canada which are made available to the purchaser or renter at reasonable cost.

What does the Minister of Finance do by way of assistance in this regard? He produces this gimmick of a $1,000 deduction, and then removes the carrying charges on land held for future development as a deductible expense. I agree that this is a good proposal, one that is long overdue. But we noted with chagrin and distress that there is no meaningful tax on speculative profits in the land development area.

There is no doubt that there are some goodies in this budget. I have never known a budget that did not contain favourable items with which everybody could agree, particularly a budget that it is expected might come before an election. But I must say that the niggardliness of the minister is such that even in a pre-election budget he could not let himself go. For example, Mr. Speaker, take the tax cut for individual taxpayers: an additional $50 a year. That amounts to 96 cents a week, or two cents for every hour worked by the average worker in this country. That is the kind of tax cut they are going to get. This is the extent of the relief that the minister boasted about last night, the extent of the relief to people whom, he said, were hurt by rising prices. He has given them relief from income tax to the tune of 96 cents a week.

Within a few days, Mr. Speaker, the price of gasoline will be increased by eight to 10 cents per gallon. I suggest this $50 a year will be eaten up within a few months by the increase in the price of gasoline alone, so far as the average Canadian is concerned, and not a penny will be left for anything else. The farmers of this country, as a group, are the largest consumers of petroleum products. The farmer uses gasoline not only for his car, but for his trucks, his tractors and all his other farm equipment. For him, this $50 will be eaten up within a week. That is the relief that the farmers of Canada are given from the rising cost of living. I should like to understand what kind of psychology makes a government produce this sort of niggardly, mean and cruel hoax on the individual taxpayer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Then, the minister removes sales tax on shoes and clothing, something obviously desirable. I could not help but notice last night, when the Minister of Finance read his speech, the plaintive tone in his voice when he read a particular paragraph. I am not going to take the time to read the paragraph word for word, but I can mentally visualize the minister's speaking to them and pointing his finger at them. The minister said: "I say to the manufacturers, the wholesalers and the retailers that this elimination of the 12 per cent sales tax should get to the consumers, please; and if it does not, I am going to do something about it". By the time the consumer has been had, Mr. Speaker, this Minister of Finance will have forgotten his undertaking to do something about it.

Having removed the 12 per cent sales tax on clothing and shoes, something which should have been done long ago in this period of inflation, surely one should have put a limit on it so that the people who can afford three suits a year, three pairs of shoes a year and three fancy dresses for their wives are not the ones to receive the greatest benefit from the elimination of this sales tax. The fellow who can afford only one suit a year is not going to get much benefit from this elimination of the sales tax.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dupras: Be serious for a minute.

Mr. Lewis: I am being serious. The Liberals may make a noise about this, but it is another kind of tax cut that will be of much greater benefit to the wealthy in this country than to the poor.

Then the minister introduced another provision that is supposed to help people. The minister said it is designed to help in particular people in the older age brackets—if they are rich enough, he should have added. This is the deduction of up to $1,000 of income from interest from various sources. Whom is this provision going to help, Mr. Speaker? I asked our research advisers to make a careful study and analysis of the interest income of various income groups in this country. I have looked at the working papers and I am satisfied that the results of this study are accurate. The results show that all those in Canada with incomes of $25,000 or more have an average interest income per year of about $2,100. That is the average income from interest of those Canadians who have an income of $25,000 or more a year? The tax abatement which the Minister of Finance is offering under this heading would give that group of Canadians, small but powerful, an average annual tax cut of $500, but the Canadians who make between $10,000 and $11,000 a year have an average income from interest per year of $196.

● (1620)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is pretty selective.

Mr. Lewis: The minister says it is selective, but it is not.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Damn right it is.

Mr. Lewis: It includes those who make incomes such as some of us in this House, and selects the relatively high average in cities like Oshawa, Windsor, Toronto, Vancouver and Hamilton, and it is a perfectly legitimate comparison, Mr. Speaker. The average interest income of people earning between $10,000 and $11,000 is $196 a year, and their tax saving would be $50 or one-tenth of the tax saving to wealthy Canadians.

Who will this provision really help, Mr. Speaker? I do not deny that it is of some value to some people, but to say that this is the way to help the ordinary Canadian against inflation surely is the kind of statement that can only be made by a person who indulges in hyperbole, which is as incomprehensible as it is intolerable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Then, the Minister of Finance boasts about what he is doing for small business in this country. He has redefined small businesses from $50,000 to $100,000, and increased the amount from $400,000 to $500,000, if I remember correctly. It is true that there is some improvement for some small businessmen, but I think the small business people in this country ought to realize that those of them who make profits of $50,000 or less will, in 1974, pay higher profit taxes than they paid in 1973, excluding those in manufacturing and processing which have their own tax rate.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lewis: Those small businesses which are not manufacturing or processing making $50,000 or less in profits in 1974 will pay 25 per cent tax on their profits whereas in 1973 they paid 21 per cent tax on their profits. Even in that area of small business the minister gives a much bigger break to the guys who make more than he does to the corner grocer and the other small businessmen in this country who are struggling for their lives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The really—I said I was going to use strong language, and I hope Your Honour will not mind—dastardly thing about this budget is that it—

An hon. Member: Do you spell that with a "b"?

Mr. Lewis: Someone asks me how I spell that. I spell it with a "d", in spite of what is suggested. What is really dastardly about this budget is that it offers nothing to the senior citizens of this country. It offers nothing to the working poor, and it offers nothing to the people on low fixed incomes in this country.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Lewis: It offers nothing to those people, unless they are living on low incomes but have an income from interest of $1,000 a year. Then, of course, the budget will help them. One of my assistants suggested that the person who will really benefit from this budget is the corpulant corporate executive who neither smokes nor drinks and rides a bicycle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The minister dares to say that his budget was designed to help those who suffer and need help the most. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all hon. members in this House, that at this stage in Canada's history when our country is developing a very large economy, well based and well developed, what a budget ought to be doing, every year and everytime it is presented, is progressively redistributing income from the wealthy and strong to the ordinary worker and the low paid people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: That must be one of the major objectives of every budget presented by the government at this time in our history, and when a budget fails to do that it fails to serve the needs of Canada and Canada's people both now and in the future. The opposite is what will result from this budget.

The tax cuts in respect of manufacturing and processing corporations, which the Conservatives helped the government put into effect, are to continue. Most of the tax concessions to the resource industries are to continue in the tax system. As for the fast writeoffs the Minister of Finance persuaded the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) to accept last July, they apparently are to continue. The minister, in his speech, was very careful not to say that they were going to end on December 31, 1974, even though it was intended that they would end, but that he was going to review them or reassess them after the final review which is now taking place in his department is completed. He has given a very strong suggestion to me that he is going to continue the fast writeoffs beyond December 31, 1974, because I cannot imagine any review by his department giving him any other advice than they gave last July.

We asked during the briefing that members of parliament had with officials of the minister yesterday, and even though this was in private I am sure I am not being improper when I mention this, what they estimated the cost of these concessions to the manufacturing and processing corporations was going to be in 1974. They said they did not have the figures but they were going to work on them and, if my memory serves me right and anyone who was there can correct me, they hoped to have them this morning and would provide them to the leader of the opposition and to me. We did not get them this morning. I do not know whether the leader of the opposition got them, but I certainly did not. The leader of the opposition indicates he did not get them. Then, during the question period, although I was not here at the time, I understand the Minister of Finance was asked for those figures. He did not give them either. He just said he could not give them, or would not give them.

In the absence of any accurate figures from the Department of Finance I am going to give you a figure, Mr. Speaker. I will give you a figure based on estimates made by the Minister of Finance last July for 1973 when he said that for the two concessions together it would cost about $500 million. Based on the increase in profits which is taking place in Canada now, and based on the fact that fast writeoffs are for two years instead of only one year, meaning that a piece of equipment bought in 1973 was written off to the extent of 50 per cent in 1973 and 50 per cent in 1974, and a piece of equipment bought in 1974 will be subject to the same thing; taking all those elements into account, I am confident that the loss to the federal treasury as a result of these concessions in 1974-75 will be well over $1 billion.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Lewis: What does that mean in human terms? It means that over $1 billion would be enough to increase old age pensions for every old age pensioner $45 and more a month.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: An amount of $1 billion a year in 1974-75 is more than double what it costs the treasury to give this measly $50 income tax cut to the individual taxpayer in Canada. These things are happening at a time of enormous profits in this country.

The minister said, and some of the writings I have seen since indicate that some people have swallowed it, that $450 million would be taken out of the petroleum and mining coprorations in 1974-75. May I say first that is not true. What the minister was talking about was a liability on behalf of these corporations, and when you remember the concessions to mining and petroleum are still there, God alone knows how much of the $450 million will in fact be paid into the treasury, both federal and provincial. But we have this thing at a time of immense profits.

Imperial Oil in the first quarter of this year over the first quarter of 1973 had an increase of 101.5 per cent, and in 1972 their profits were high enough. Gulf Oil in the same period had an increase of 100 per cent. Shell Oil had an increase of 78 per cent. Noranda Mines had an increase of 67 per cent. Rio Algom Mines had an increase of 74 per cent, not to mention the 700 per cent increase in 1973 over 1972 for Falconbridge or the 107 per cent increase in 1973 over 1972 for Inco. In this kind of situation I suggest that the small tax adjustments which the minister made last night in respect of these corporations are a laugh. Sure, the corporations will complain publicly. Surely, they will object to the loss of some of their gains, but I am certain that when their presidents and directors went to bed last night they included John Turner in their prayers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope, however, that they referred to him as the Minister of Finance since we usually do not designate each other by names in this chamber.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I know that of course, but I had a notion that the Minister of Finance knows these people so well that in their prayers they would simply say "John". I have not said all that I would like to say, and if hon. members would give me a little extra time I would be glad to use it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the Chair could put the request in the name of the hon. member for York South, since he has approximately 45 seconds remaining. Is it agreed that he have an extension of time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I express my gratitude to the members of this House. The minister rejected the excess profits tax mainly because he said they could not technically define what is desirable and what is excess profit. There was not sufficient ingenuity in his department to be able to solve the technical problem. I have seen the work of his department before. The people in his department have ingenuity enough when they want to do their own thing. The only time they lack ingenuity is when we want them to do the right thing. But the minister says to the people of Canada and to this House, not in these words but to this effect, that he will not bring in an excess profit tax but that he has a new one, a 10 per cent surtax on corporate taxes. That sounded pretty good until I read the entire paragraph and found that he had excluded a number of areas of the economy.

He excluded, let me say quickly so that he will not have to remind me, small businesses and I agree with him that they should be excluded. I have no argument with that. There is no end to my generosity. However, from the 10 per cent surtax the minister excludes processing, mining, petroleum, investment corporations, mortgage investment corporations, mutual fund corporations and non-resident owned investment corporations. Let us be fair—he leaves the banking and financial institutions and they ought to be kicked a great deal more than in the past, I agree. He leaves some other industries. The point I want to make is that the areas of the economy which made the largest profits in 1973-74, which had the largest increases in profits in 1973-74, are excluded from the 10 per cent surtax. The suggestion that that is an alternative to the excess profits tax is really an unacceptable thing. Then, there is the half tax on capital gains which remains.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have come to my concluding paragraph or two.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that I would be sufficiently sharp in my remarks that the Liberals would not have any energy left in their arms to applaud when I told them I was about to conclude. I am glad to see they are still there. Seriously, Mr. Speaker, when this parliament began in January, 1973, the New Democratic members of this House said to parliament and to the country that we would do our best to help parliament work; that so long as the government and parliament produced things that in our judgment—and it is only our judgment we can use, not anyone else's—were for the benefit of Canada and Canadians we would continue to help make parliament work. We did so during the last session. The session was productive and useful for the people of Canada. We in the New Democratic Party in this House of Commons are proud of the part we played in the last session of parliament.

However, in this second session of parliament we could not help but notice that a paralysis has set in in this government. In fact, Sir, the ignoble so-called anti-profiteering bill and the budget pronounced by the Minister of Finance last night are clear proof that the right wing has taken over again in the Liberal Party. There are some people in this country who suggest that the time has come for a Tory government.

● (1640)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I want to say to the members of this parliament and to the people of Canada that a Tory government has already arrived. I want to add that the people of Canada are so intelligent that they are not likely to change one Tory government for another.

Mr. Reid: Why have an election?

Mr. Lewis: So that they may elect an NDP government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: These people who have misgoverned this country for over 100 years are so determined that they will do everything possible to prevent Canada from making progress, but the people will see to that. I say, sir—

An hon. Member: With humility?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: —with regret and distress that in my view, and in the view of my colleagues, no progressive person could support this budget and live with himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: It does little if anything to combat the cost of living. No wonder the Minister of Finance keeps on repeating that he is certain things will get worse. He knows it, and he is making certain that that will happen. The budget does nothing for pensioners and low income people; it does nothing to solve the housing crisis; it does nothing to introduce real equity in our tax system; it does nothing to regain control of the Canadian economy; it does nothing to remove the regional inequalities from which this country suffers.

Because the budget fails in all these important areas, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words: "and its failure to propose any measures to assist pensioners and other Canadians on low and fixed incomes, to deal with the housing crisis, or to remove the glaring inequities in the taxation system".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Goodbye, Pierre.

Mr. Lewis: So that the amendment as amended would read:

[Mr. Lewis.]

This House does not have confidence in the government by reason of its failure to propose effective budgetary measures to contain and reduce inflation and its failure to propose any measures to assist pensioners and other Canadians on low and fixed incomes, to deal with the housing crisis or to remove the glaring inequities in the taxation system.

Some hon. Members: Question.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, having heard the speeches of the Progressive Conservatives and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis), I venture to say that we have seen it all. I never thought that one day I would see a socialist and conservative coalition in the Canadian Parliament. It is the most disgracious spectacle that I have seen in this House.

The Progressive Conservative Party which doesn't care a damn about the consideration that must be given to legislation is solely concerned about coming into power since October 1972. Mr. Speaker, the NDP members have been constantly repeating that a minority government is healthy for the Canadian people. We now have one, but they are not satisfied. Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party is now more powerful that it will ever be in Parliament. I hear them saying: "Old age pensions have not been raised, income tax has not been lowered, social measures have not been increased, this or that has not been done." Mr. Speaker, when we Social Crediters introduced in this House some motions aimed at raising pensions and granting them at age 60, the New Democratic Party voted against us. When we proposed the establishment of an annual guaranteed income to be added to earnings, the News Democratic Party voted against us. Mr. Speaker, when we urged granting interest-free loans to the Canadian provinces, the New Democratic Party voted against us, and, let us not forget it, the Liberals did also.

● (1650)

Mr. Speaker, when we suggested a compensated discount on retail prices to fight inflation, the members of the New Democratic Party once again voted against us. And today, the leader of the New Democratic Party said that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is a hypocrite because of last night's budget. Mr. Speaker, since 1972, the true hypocrites of Parliament have been the members of the New Democratic Party. There is not one of them who did not tell his constituents: Look, old age security pensions are now $190 a month because of us, the New Democrats. However, the Social Crediters have been asking for improvements in the social field for 35 years. The New Democrats are showing themselves as hypocrites and liars throughout Canada. This is so true that if their ideas were good, the New Democratic administrations of Western Canada, in British Columbia, in Saskatchewan and in Manitoba would do something, at least in these areas. On the contrary, it is worse there than elsewhere. There is now a general strike in British Columbia where there is a New Democratic government. What is done to settle it? Nothing. This is where I say to the New Democrats:

"Defeat the government, you have the balance of power." Mr. Speaker, they can defeat the government tomorrow night, but I warn them who have only 31 members in Parliament now that if the present minority government, which is doing more for the population than any other majority government before it, is defeated, they will not be more than 10 after the next election.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You may not come back either!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I will tell the hon. member which ones will not come back. Listen carefully, I am going to be frank. Obviously, in the event of an election, we Social Crediters do not expect to be in power, but I think we shall have the balance of power since, in my opinion, another minority government will be elected. Then, why another election? To have another minority government? We have one. We are going to spend $50 million to hold an election when the Canadian people are asking for action and not election.

Mr. Speaker, I said I would be frank: at this time, an election will settle nothing. I am going to be frank; it is the third time I have said this. In the western provinces, in British Columbia, where some NDP members are coming from, one NDP member will probably be elected, and note this, the other NDP candidates will be defeated by Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. Speaker, let the NDP members join together to be cleaned out in British Columbia. That is good. In Ontario, it is the opposite. Some ridings represented by NDP members in Toronto will go to the Liberals.

Mr. Speaker, I met with some York South constituents, workers who are members of the NDP and have never been Social Crediters in their lives. They told me that they would vote against the leader of the NDP, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), who will not return here after the next election.

Some hon. Members: What about Quebec?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Some NDP members are asking what will happen in Quebec. They have no need to worry, none of them will be elected in Quebec. It is not a problem in Quebec, and they know it, their own leader put it straight: There is no way in Quebec.

I am asked:

[English]

An hon. Member: How many will you get in Quebec?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I can't say but we will be more than 15 for sure.

[Translation]

In the province of Quebec, they tried everything to infiltrate the unions, for instance, with "Big" Pepin, "Big" Laberge and "Little" Charbonneau. They thought: The workers will certainly follow us! So they sent nearly all their elected members into the province of Quebec, but these all came back saying: "Our scheme did not work!"

Come election time, none of the New Democratic Party candidates ever succeed in recovering his deposit in the province of Quebec. This situation will happen over and over because the people there are in their right senses.

A moment ago, Mr. Speaker, I said that the New Democratic Party are using hypocritical means. Let us consider the gist of their amendment to the amendment. There is nothing in there which is part of their own platform.

[English]

—its failure to propose any measures to assist pensioners and other Canadians on low and fixed incomes, to deal with the housing crisis, or to remove the glaring inequities in the taxation system.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have been saying that all along for the past 35 years. I need not be a socialist for that, but why should their system—Yesterday, in my remarks to the English television network on the budget speech made by the hon. Minister of Finance, I said:

[English]

It is another budget just like the others—take away from the have's to give to the have-not's, so that in the end you will have all kinds of have-not's and no more have's.

● (1700)

[Translation]

The leader of the NDP said it does not go far enough, and, a while ago, the Progressive Conservatives, who represent big business, applauded while being robbed. How is one to understand such reasoning?

Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the NDP means nothing. One can say one is not pleased with the budget. I am not either. But instead of provoking an election which will be costly for the Canadian people, it would probably be better to wait for legislation, propose amendments and fight to get results.

In 1963, we of the Social Credit Party of Canada had the balance of power; in 1965 I was accused of having supported the Liberals of Mr. Pearson. I therefore put the following questions to the voters of Quebec and other areas of Canada: With a minority government, as holders of the balance of power is our role merely to bring about an election or to get results? What should we do? The important thing is to obtain good results for the people, to think of one's country before thinking of one's party.

I shall probably be blamed again for not wanting an election and be accused of playing politics. Mr. Speaker, whether there is an election or not I fear nothing in my riding nor in that of my colleagues. I am convinced we are up to facing an election. But for the time being, I think it would be unwise to call an election after only one and a half year of this minority government. The Canadian people can understand this.

I have one thing to say to the Progressive Conservatives. They have been demanding a budget for at least six months and they say: The government is afraid to bring down its budget, the government fears this or that; the government does not fight inflation. Would the Progressive Conservatives do any better?

Mr. Speaker, let me give one example: last week, I went shopping in Hull to buy Stanfield underwear, and I had to pay three times as much as last year.

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

Mr. Speaker, I see the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) smiling. Let him conduct surveys in his own riding so as to know the price of Stanfield underwear in Saint-Hyacinthe. He should know, for they are speaking against inflation. What would he do to deal with inflation? He does not say.

They have been clamouring for a budget for the last six months. I see the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe fairly often on television. He is a very good friend of the CBC people. Indeed, he likes that, he is always the first in line in front of room 130-S, waiting to be invited to speak on television. Moreover, he is a smart dresser.

In 1963, the Conservatives were sitting on this side of the House. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the then Prime Minister, was leading a minority government. On the night of February 4, if my memory serves me well, the government was defeated because it did not have the courage to bring down a budget. One year without bringing down a budget! Today, the Conservatives are blaming the government. Yet, in 1963, on the night of the vote, the Prime Minister rose and promised to bring down a budget within 30 days in order to save his skin. They were overthrown just the same. So, Mr. Speaker, why play that kind of politics? The Tories should at least he honest enough to recognize that all is not perfect. That is true, but all is not bad either. There were some improvements. Family allowances and old age pensions were increased. Even though the New Democratic Party voted against proposed increases, there was some improvement in the social, economic and agricultural fields.

For example, producers were asking some years ago for $5 per hundredweight of milk and the government said, it is impossible. Now, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) will have to give farmers at least $11 per hundredweight for industrial milk. It will come to this, but under a government watched by an alert and careful opposition, we stand a better chance of getting results instead of having elections all the time.

If the New Democratic Party involves Parliament and the people of this country in an election campaign, I am convinced that they will be held fully responsible. The Tories want an election since 1972 because they can see themselves in power. But I have seen them in power here with 208 members out of 264. Mr. Speaker, that was no picnic! Yet they did no lack strength. There were one million unemployed in 1961 under a government with 208 members.

An hon. Member: With a runaway inflation!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, there was unemployment, of course. There were one million unemployed and the cost of living was starting to climb. Did that government so powerful at that time curb increasing prices? Not at all. Now, Progressive Conservatives want to freeze prices and salaries. Everyone knows that the leader of the New Democratic Party is right about that. The freeze would be mostly on salaries.

With respect to prices, the black market would be rampant here in Canada as it was in the United States under similar circumstances. But they do not say so because they are not concerned with the well-being of the people of this country; they only want an election at all costs because they already see themselves in power.

Mr. Speaker, what we of the Social Credit Party of Canada are interested in is not to have someone coming into power, but to get from those who are already in power the results the people are expecting, and this for the whole of the population. Here is what we are interested in too. We agree that the pensions must be increased, and that the eligible age must be lowered to 60.

Mr. Speaker, as for the selective price controls, what is the selection put forward by the New Democratic Party? Nobody knows, nobody cares to explain anything. In my opinion, there are four major areas where we can fight efficiently against inflation.

First of all, we advocate the establishment of a guaranteed annual income for each and all Canadian citizens, irrespective of their social status or their present income; second, a 25 per cent compensated discount on the retail prices; third, a $200 monthly old age security pension at 60, and we claim—

● (1710)

[English]

Mr. Peters: We will vote for that.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): My hon. friend from Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) says:

[English]

"We will vote for that." But they voted against that when we presented it just a few months ago.

Mr. Peters: Yes, because you were trying to bring down the government.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Now, with nothing at all to gain they are willing to bring down the government. You see how intelligent they are? That is the way it is.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we ask for interest-free loans to provinces. The government may say this is nonsense. But look at what the budget provides for underdeveloped countries around the world. I would stress to the House that we approve of this measure, far from opposing it. But further, in its budgetary statement, the government seeks from the House authority for the advance commitment of Canada's contribution to the Fourth Replenishment of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, a subsidiary of the World Bank, specializing in the provision of low-interest and interest-free loans to the most needy countries. Mr. Speaker, we believe provinces, as much as any country in the world, have a need for those interest-free loans provided to foreign countries. We demand this and shall keep on fighting for it.

The budget has interesting features, and less interesting ones. My sole purpose was to place the House before its responsibilities. Let not the NDP believe it will preserve its identity by voting with the Progressive Conservatives, and vice versa.

So, Mr. Speaker, what we hope for is a positive approach from members, in order that they may give the Canadian people what it strives for, namely security with personal freedom.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise at a time when it can truly be said that a threat of a general election is hanging over this House. If I was not afraid to arouse the suspicions of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) about my readings, I would say that a ghost haunts Parliament, the ghost of an election.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to present some arguments to the House to show not only the hon. members opposite but also the whole Canadian people that the time they have chosen to provoke the dissolution of this 29th Parliament is particularly inappropriate and truly shows their complete irresponsibility.

What has brought this about, Mr. Speaker? What has brought about this threat of a general election which has been hanging over the House, not only for a few weeks but practically since the beginning of this Parliament? What has brought about this situation of a Parliament of which it might be said that it was born to be short-lived, if we remember the speeches that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) was making repeatedly at the beginning of 1973. Time and time again, he stated that the government was going to fall, that it would be for the following week. When the following week came, he made other speeches to say that it would be for the week after. And the week after, it was supposed to be for the week after that. He was always busy preparing our epitaph. I think that if he had poetic talents in addition to his other talents, he would have prepared our epitaph 18 months ago: "They are here today and gone tomorrow."

In January 1973, it was said that the government would fall on the occasion of the Speech from the Throne. And I am not speaking only of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. I must say that this was the general attitude, not only among the hon. members opposite, but also among many of the people who watch us from above your head, Mr. Chairman. The Speech from the Throne was supposed to be the crucial moment.

After the Speech from the Throne, it was supposed to be on supply days. There were some at the end of January, there were others in March. Something was really going to happen, Mr. Speaker, Parliament was through.

Unfortunately those gloomy predictions did not materialize and then the budget became the final and cut-throat moment. The budget which the government was to introduce would be the end of this 29th Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, Parliament survived that budget and afterwards, we were to be defeated on corporate taxes. It was really useless then to try to obtain the support of the New Democratic Party. The Progressive Conservatives and the New Democrats were going to defeat the government on corporate taxes.

I do not know what happened at the Conservative caucus, but they decided that it was not yet the time to defeat the government. The threat was hanging over us, but it was not the proper time. Then there were all the days for the consideration of the estimates. In June last year, on the resolution on Viet Nam introduced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) we were to be defeated and finally, summer came, still no elections.

Then summer came and with the end of summer, the rail strike, the return of Parliament, inflation. There, it was finished, Mr. Speaker. Things had come to an end, Parliament was going to fall on the inflation issue.

One may recall that that crisis was also overcome, and that the government survived. But there was the oil situation, war in the Middle East and prices skyrocketing at a bewildering rate. Oil was to be the question on which the government would not be able to stand any more. The oil problem was to mark the end of the government.

In December, Mr. Speaker, the government introduced an energy policy which was endorsed not only by members in this House but by the country as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on with a detailed account of the days when the life of my government was threatened. Then we had a new session, a new Speech from the Throne, and budget estimates. In March, we voted on the Veterans' Land Act, and last week, we had an act on profiteering practices.

At last, we have come to it, Mr. Speaker, again, we are told that the government will fall, that a general election is a settled matter once and for all.

May I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, after so many false alarms, to show some skepticism. May I be allowed to wait until tomorrow evening to see whether members opposite are not going to hedge once more in order to extend the life of this government. May I be allowed to wait until then to summon the troops to victory.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I want to insist in case they would finally have a reason to cry wolf 5, 10, 15 times, should their threats so often repeated prove at last jusitified for once and should we indeed have a general election. I would like to tell the House and the whole country that it will be them, hon. members opposite, not the Liberals or the Social Crediters who will have called for a general election after all these threats and all these subterfuges.

● (1720)

[English]

Why am I reciting this series of threats and events which were always going to weigh in on us to provoke a general election? Why? Because I want to remind this House that the attitude of this government after the election of October 1972 was one of accepting the verdict of the electorate. It was one of saying to the people of Canada "Sure, you did not give us as many members as we hoped to have. Sure, we would have liked to have a majority government, but we know we did some things wrong. We know you were telling us by voting against many of our members that you wanted to change some things." That has been the attitude of the government.

We have taken the attitude that we did not have a majority. We had a plurality. We had an obligation to try to make parliament work, to try to make the voice of the people a significant event in Canadian electoral history. We knew we could not do it alone. We knew that, in some cases, we would have to depend on the Creditistes; in other cases, the NDP; and, in other cases the Conservative party, to support our proposals and policies. We knew that because of that we would have to accept amendments to certain of our policies and legislation. We said there would be many cases where certain government proposals would not be deemed to go to the roots of our policy and we would accept defeats on them. We said that the opposition always had opportunities, if they wanted, through supply days and non-confidence motions to provoke a general election. However, in the meantime we were dedicated to make this parliament work for the good of the people.

I accept the attitude of the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) who said he saw it as the duty of his party, not to destroy the government day by day, but to make sure the government brought in amendments, changes or concessions to its policy which in its view would be for the good of the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: They voted against the government every time. They knew the government would not fall.

Mr. Trudeau: The leader of the New Democratic Party says they voted against the government every time. Quite a few times the New Democratic Party voted for the government.

Mr. Lewis: That's right.

Mr. Trudeau: I think somewhere around 1962-63, the NDP decided that in a minority parliament it might be able to play a role. I remember the speeches made by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). I was sometimes in the audience when they were speaking.

An hon. Member: And once on the platform.

Mr. Trudeau: I was wise enough in those days never to take a membership in that party because I saw very soon how doctrinaire they were.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I saw in those days that the so-called consciences of the Canadian people were prepared in Quebec to flirt with anyone, with separatism, with nationalism—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Had I had a membership in the NDP, which I never had—I don't know what light was shining on me then—I would have done like Eugene Forsey, now Senator Forsey. I would have torn up my membership card when they adopted a two-nation policy.

[Editor's Note: At this point there was a disturbance in the gallery.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if I am going to have trouble with the people in the gallery, I think I had better go back to reading my notes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1730)

Mr. Trudeau: Those were the days when the NDP was arguing, in the early and middle-sixties, that minority governments were the best government for Canada, that minority parliaments could work and that minority parties had a role to play. Let me just read something, Mr. Speaker, that indicates that in fact, in the view of one impartial observer, this parliament has accomplished something. I am not going to read from the prorogation debate and other material that I have to give the record of this government; I am going to read something which was published in the Globe and Mail on April 23, 1974.

An hon. Member: The Globe and Mail?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, the Globe and Mail, which is not always this government's greatest friend, which is why I read from it. This is what this impartial observer had to say about this parliament:

It may be useful to remind Canadians of what the first session of this parliament was able to accomplish—

Then it goes on to enumerate.

—a substantial increase in basic old age security pensions and the assurance of automatic future increases every three months in line with the rising cost of living; the expansion of benefits under the Canada Pension Plan; major improvements in veterans allowances and pensions, including the recent extension of the Veterans Land Act; substantial increases in family allowance payments; a 5 per cent cut in personal income taxes with a minimum reduction of $100 and a maximum reduction of $500 to ensure that low and middle-income Canadians received most of the benefits; subsidies to offset increases in the cost of milk and bread; changes in the National Housing Act to provide funds for land banking and home purchase assistance for low-income families; a Foreign Investment Review Act that could help stop the takeover of our industry and keep Canadian jobs in Canada—an export tax on oil to ensure better returns for Canadians and to make possible substantial subsidies for eastern consumers while a pipeline is built to Montreal; and finally, the Election Expenses Act, which marked an important beginning in controlling election spending by parties and candidates, in forcing disclosure of political contributions and in checking the influence of powerful vested interests.

The author of this article, Mr. Speaker, is none other than the hon. member for York South.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Just a fortnight ago the leader of the NDP was making great speeches and giving great enumerations indicating the achievements of this minority government. Let me quote the following paragraph:

Taken together as a package of legislative achievements, I have no hesitation in saying that they are greater accomplishments achieved in 18 months than any obtained by recent majority governments over four years.

If they want an election on that, then we will have an election on that, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The NDP leader probably had limited time and space, because there are many other items he could have listed, many of them of interest to him and his party. For example, the policy of this government to produce self-reliance in oil before the end of the decade; the agreement reached with all ten provinces in order to ensure the best possible protection for Canadians in areas of pricing and supply; the total reorganization of social security programs that was put forward last session by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde); improving housing for native people; elimination of capital gains taxes on family farms passing from generation to generation; increased feed freight assistance in eastern Canada and British Columbia; the five year period of restriction on capital punishment; the privacy and wiretap legislation; the green paper on conflicts of interest for which that party in particular had been asking for so long and about which they are completely silent as to what parliament should be doing now we have put the policy before them.

I could add the items that have been brought in in this short session of parliament thus far, Mr. Speaker: the act to amend the Fisheries Development Act; an act, to which royal assent will be given in a few minutes, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act, legislation that is so important in controlling the price of food in this country and in keeping away the effects of inflation; the act to amend the National Parks Act; the act to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act; and the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act.

There is something that has to be explained here, Mr. Speaker. According to the NDP today, and perhaps for the past few days, this is the session that has been paralysed, that has not been doing anything. We have sat only 48 days this session. Sixteen of those days were controlled by the opposition and 32 were government days. These are the bills that have been brought forward. I shall be referring later to the bills that are still on the order paper and which will disappear if this House provokes a general election.

Why the change, Mr. Speaker? What has happened? This parliament, which 15 days ago was so productive, has suddenly become paralysed. In spite of the items on the order paper and the legislation promised in the Speech from the Throne, legislation that would be introduced very soon, suddenly we discover that the NDP is withdrawing its support. The NDP has discovered that this is a paralysed government. The NDP leader is now the fastest gun on TV: he is claiming a shoot-out with every channel that wishes to focus its cameras upon him. From a former self-righteous teacher of a religion to be called "making parliament work," suddenly—overnight—what has happened? For 18 months the NDP has prospered by loudly demanding things that the Liberal government was doing anyway.

● (1740)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The NDP was loudly proclaiming that these things were happening, thanks to the NDP, and that the outstanding productions of this parliament were due to the actions of the NDP.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Trudeau: Now, Mr. Speaker, the leader of that party is popping up on television, tilting toward a forest of microphones, launching the secret weapon of his House leader which is going to destroy this government at some unknown time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Maybe we will not have the chance of ever knowing what this knock-out power was, and for that reason alone I am sure you, Mr. Speaker, and experts in parliamentary procedure will be wondering till their dying days what the secret knock-out power was.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We will save it for the Tories.

Mr. Trudeau: So we have, if I can change my metaphor, David the daisy, plucking his petals one by one: Will we have an election, will we not have an election; will we, will we not—a game which he has played on television.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Oh, come on; you are in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I know you were not in the chair a moment ago, but I think if you had been you would smile at the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) coming to the defence of the leader of the NDP who, I think from the smiles in this House, was referring to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) by his first name just a few minutes ago. The hon. member for Edmonton West was here and I did not see him express shock. He has suddenly found friends to his left and he thinks he had better be nice to them in case they might change their minds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a tone of "just under the surface desperation" about the attitude of the NDP in these circumstances. I think with this game they have been playing, of giving power and withdrawing power, with the differences with the government being reconcilable one day, another day the differences with the government being irreconcilable and the next day the differences with the government being almost irreconcilable, it must be tiring to try to be reconciling and ureconciling all the time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Why now, at this irresponsible time, on a budget which even though it is not perfect and might not go far enough still does reduce taxes, still does give benefits to the veterans and still does take $800 million away from the giant corporations they do not like?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I believe the explanation is that in this exercise of being able, as they think, to extend power or to withdraw power they have suddenly begun to feel the strain. They have suddenly realized—I am not sure if the axiom should be that power corrupts, or the lack of power corrupts; but whichever way you take it, I am not referring to any moral vicissitudes—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: You are bad enough as the Prime Minister; don't try to be a psychiatrist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are thin-skinned.

Mr. Trudeau: I must admit that I am not attacking the moral principles of the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: Just don't try to be a psychiatrist.

Mr. Trudeau: I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that when I used the word "corrupt" it had nothing to do with moral virtue or lack of it. Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that in my eyes he is still as white as a seagull.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: What is being corrupted, Mr. Speaker, is his equanimity, his sense of balance and his ability to remain cool, as we just saw a few moments ago.

An hon. Member: Some marriages just don't last.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, power weighs heavily on someone who is doctrinaire. Power is difficult to exercise for one who thinks one can only have absolute truths, absolute virtues and absolute actions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In the period of time when the NDP was sitting in this parliament and did not quite hold the balance of power, or when the government could survive with other minority parties, this was an enjoyable time for them. Of course, the period from 1968 to 1972 was a perfect time for them because then they could state truths to their hearts content; they could go to the end of every one of their principles and demand and have rejected the most outlandish requests they had made at any time upon the budget of this nation, because they knew they would not have to face the electorate as a result. What the NDP has demonstrated today is that the best parliament for them is a parliament in which we are the majority and they are a small minority, unable to influence the power and the life of that parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give in Her Majesty's name the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-4, an act to amend the Export and Import Permits Act—Chapter 9

Bill C-6, an act to amend the National Parks Act—Chapter 11

Bill C-14, an act to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act—Chapter 10

Bill C-27, Railway Relocation and Crossing Act—Chapter 12

Bill C-277, an act respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act—Chapter 7

Bill C-281, an act respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act—Chapter 8

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; the amendment of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Lewis.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, when Black Rod entered the chamber I was just about finishing off the NDP. The only thing I wanted to add was that they were suffering from the acute discomfort of responsibility; I think that is a milder and perhaps more gentle way of putting it.

[Translation]

And I would like to add that this is nothing to disgrace the Leader of the New Democratic Party. He is not a government man, he is an opposition man, a theorizer.

I wish only to express my sympathy for the embarrassment he must feel when his party comes into power in some provinces and I can give only two examples, so as not to delay our proceedings, to show what happens when the New Democratic Party comes into power.

You remember that in this House the New Democratic Party was scandalized during the last Parliament because we had raised the salaries of members. One of the first things done by NDP government in British Columbia when coming into power was to raise the salaries of members, more especially that of the Prime Minister.

Here is the second example, Mr. Speaker; it is very revealing about theoreticians who have become practitioners; when the minority NDP party was protesting here in this House against higher oil and gas prices, their brothers in Saskatchewan and British Columbia lost no time in increasing gas and oil prices.

Mr. Speaker, I wish now to turn to the other opposition party. While the NDP's position changed considerably in the last two weeks, as I said before, I must be fair to the Leader of the Opposition and admit that he never changed. Ever since we have know him in this House he has had only one goal and this is his job, that is to defeat the government. It is his task to do so and as fast as possible.

You will recall that following the last elections, when he came back to Ottawa with his somewhat too enthusiastic troops, the poor man had his picture taken—and I know he was rather the victim than the instigator of this in view of the situation—his picture was taken while he was receiving the keys of 24 Sussex Drive.

Mr. Speaker, I should tell you that I did not hasten to change the locks. As the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) would say if he was here: It was not true about the keys, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, there is a very simple reason for this change of attitude; at the beginning, power was taken without any elections. It was at that time—

An hon. Member: —the only way—

Mr. Trudeau: —yes, the only way. Today, the constitution does not seem to allow it. Therefore they ask for elections and immediately. This is the reason, it is very simple. I will quote only two members of his party, as reported in the Toronto Star of April 30, 1974. Here is what the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) said:

● (2010)

[English]

If there's no election this summer, you might see something develop along the lines of a new party.

Another Conservative, who was described as a Conservative from southern Alberta, is quoted as saying he is unhappy with his party. He says:

But I can't say anything about that now . . . I wouldn't want to be a part of any movement to be caught in the middle of an election. By the middle of May I should know better.

Mr. Speaker, he has seven days to go. By tomorrow night he may know better—we will all know better—why the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is in so much of a hurry to call an election.

Mr. Stanfield: It will save the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, for once we are in agreement, the Leader of the Opposition and I. We think an election will indeed save the country; it will save it from those people opposite. What we do not know, Mr. Speaker, is if it is going to save the Leader of the Opposition from the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) who sits two seats behind him and who two years ago left the Tory Party saying there was no place for Quebeckers in it. I do not know whether it is going to save him from the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) who says there is no place for a westerner in that party. The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan) did not go so far. He just said that he thought the party should resist control by the experts in Ottawa and in Toronto.

Mr. Speaker, this mention of control is a rather interesting one because this is one of the central promises of the Tory Party. They would freeze prices and wages. They would put controls on our country. They would bring in a system of controls so complex that they have always told us they would take 90 days to think about what they would be. They have been telling us this for a year. They would control this country, Mr. Speaker, yet they cannot control their own party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: They would control wages. This solution, we know, was hotly debated at the Tory convention a few months ago and rejected by an eminent Tory member of parliament as, to use his words, "leading straight to chaos". They would control prices and wages across the country, but they could not control their own convention too well. They cannot control government expenses, because if we look at that convention, while they were talking about controlling expenditures the same Tory convention was proposing the creation of four new departments and a host of new agencies. They would control expenses, but the first thing they would do is create a lot of new jobs for a lot of new civil servants.

They would control prices and wages across the country. But when it came to the concrete problem of how they would control oil prices in this country, at what level would they impose their controls—a subject which was very hotly debated in the country for several months; and we know, of course, the Tories of Ontario wanted it controlled around $5 or $6 and the Tories of Alberta wanted it controlled at around $8 or $9—from the Tories in this chamber who were going to control the country with a prices and wages freeze for 90 days, Mr. Speaker, we heard not a peep. You are aware, Mr. Speaker, during those fateful days which preceded what I think is an historic agreement between ten provinces and the federal government, they were busy controlling the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) about the tar sands. They cannot control their own party, so they try and control members over here.

There are minor subjects. I can recall last year when they could not even decide, this united Tory Party—united in the desire to have an election and get it over with—whether they were going to vote together on the first reading of some bill proposed by a member of parliament. When we were discussing football, the line was that this was not important and the country should be dealing with other things; so they put up a dozen speakers or more to tell us that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: What kind of control is this, Mr. Speaker, when the Leader of the Opposition cannot even control his own members and they put up 18 speakers on a subject of no importance?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: There is another subject on which the lack of control was evident, and it is one I hardly dare speak of in polite company. I will just mention it and go on to other things. It is the Official Languages Act, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

I mention it, Mr. Speaker, merely to point out that it is a topic of crucial importance to many Canadians, and if some wonder why the Tory convention held in Trois-Rivières a few weeks ago was such an abject failure, it is probably that the Quebecers are fed up with being had. They want to know what the Tories think about the matter. They were told about organization, attempts were made to lure them with all sorts of promises, but the main topic was not broached because the Tories do not agree amongst themselves on that topic. But let us see—

Mr. La Salle: Mention was made of it.

Mr. Trudeau: The member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) is back with us. I greet him on his return to the House. He will be happy—the member for Joliette cut a sorry figure according to the press clippings I read on the convention. As I can see, he has almost disappeared—

Mr. La Salle: You did not read the right papers.

Mr. Trudeau: No, I don't read Le Jour, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to read more excerpts from a Toronto newspaper, the Globe and Mail, because the reporter, William Johnson, is probably quite detached from Quebec problems. Rather than quote journalists from the newspaper I have just mentioned, who probably are prejudiced, biased, I shall read excerpts from Mr. Johnson's article. He is speaking of facts and not expressing opinions. I quote the Globe and Mail of April 30.

He speaks of the organizer of the Progressive Conservative party in Quebec, Mr. Daviault, and this is what he has to say:

● (2020)

[English]

Mr. Daviault is not a Conservative. He was a campaign manager in the 1970 Quebec election for Jacques-Yvan Morin, now Parti Quebecois House leader. Mr. Morin was narrowly defeated in 1970 but won last October. In the recent election, according to Mr. Daviault—

The chief Conservative organizer.

—he was a special counsellor to Mr. Morin.

Mr. Daviault gives his opinions on organizations, and I quote again from the Globe and Mail:

If I find a good man who is called Joe Blow, I don't care if he is Pequiste, Liberal or Creditiste, as long as he tells me: Rene, I'm going to build you an organization.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the article goes on and on. Reference is made to a certain Mr. Toutant, one of the six men appointed by the Leader of the Opposition to manage the organization. It is explained that the organization is different from the association. Well, the six men appointed by the Leader of the Opposition make up what is known as a strategy committee, and they meet every Friday to coordinate their efforts in trying to win Quebec to the Progressive Conservative party. The said Mr. Toutant emphasizes the importance of bringing people of all political creeds into the Progressive Conservative party, in order to create an anti-Liberal coalition, and once again I quote:

[English]

The Progressive Conservative Party is open to people of different parties and we welcome people of all political hues because to win we have to increase our vote, and it isn't by frowning on those of other political persuasion that we'll succeed.

That is nice: that is visionary spirit, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Among the names of those who make up this committee of six, except Mr. Toutant, there are Messrs. André Robert and Richard LeHir. In fact, as it is explained in the article, Messrs. Robert and LeHir are not even Progressive Conservatives. When questioned on his political opinions, Mr. Robert stated, and I quote again:

[English]

I rather define myself as a sovereignist.

[Translation]

I am rather a sovereignist. I expect Quebecers know what a sovereignist is, Mr. Speaker, that is the label put on by those too shy to call themselves separatists. And Mr. LeHir is only nationalist, but the depth of his convictions may be seen, and I quote again:

[English]

—I consider that, as long as Quebec remains within confederation, we must be concerned about federal politics—

[Translation]

Brave ones, Mr. Speaker, brave ones indeed! One would use the old cliché about an army of mercenaries, although "army" is too large indeed, one might call it a platoon of mercenaries, Mr. Speaker. Mercenaries without much in the nature of decent affiliations, and worse still not seeking any. They wish to work for the Progressive Conservatives in Quebec; it would seem the reason for the failure in Trois-Rivières is that the party on the other side has taken the attitude that anything is good for Quebecers, anything at all, lay it on thick, pick anybody. One visualizes the leader of the opposition coming down main street in Trois-Rivières. He looked like a cowboy, coming down the main street as in the movies. Completely alone in the street. It is probably one of the only instances where it may be said that one is a crowd, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

An hon. Member: What's wrong with cowboys?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in the Globe and Mail of April 29 last there is a priceless quotation from the Leader of the Opposition, and here again this is between quotation marks:

[English]

—a Stanfield Government—

In the words of the Leader of the Opposition.

—would show "imagination, daring, promptness, effectiveness, open-mindedness, frankness and humanity."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, in a sense we know what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) means when he talks of open-mindedness. The kind of open-mindedness he means is open-arms for any who want to help to build the Tory Party. But the interesting adjectives are the ones which follow. How does that party show daring and imagination? I read again from the Globe and Mail. There had been a question and answer session, Mr. Speaker.

—the questioners had been picked beforehand by Richard LeHir—

About whom we talked a moment ago.

The questions and answers had been prepared by several people, notably Andre Robert, a sociologist who is an adviser to Mr. Stanfield.

The leader spent much of Saturday afternoon before the session being coached on answers by his special assistant, Richard Lelay. While Mr. Stanfield worked on the answers in a third-floor suite, Mr. LeHir was coaching the questioners in a fourth-floor room.

So much for the daring and imagination. I say there is more imagination than daring in that procedure.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, they were feeling so lonely in Trois-Rivières that some jokers suggested that the name of the city be changed to that of "Une-Rivière". That would make one river, two leaders or two nations—I am not too sure—three financial critics, four Horsemen of the Apocalypse and several raccoons.

We know the whole Quebec Tory caucus would easily fit in a Volkswagen. After the next election they will have to go and look for a chauffeur somewhere.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: Tell us about the Liberal caucus of Alberta.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, even when I was in Alberta I was never as lonely as the Leader of the Opposition was in Three Rivers; I can tell you that. I never tried to fool the people of Alberta, Mr. Speaker. They might not always like our policies, but they know what they are and we do not fool around trying to kid them.

● (2030)

I spent some time, perhaps too much, describing the origin and the development of this feeling of an impending election. I would like to spend the remainder of my time trying to describe where it is leading us.

An hon. Member: What about the budget?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, I will be talking about the budget, Mr. Speaker. I think it is extremely important that we understand the effects of the vote which will be taken tomorrow night. If we are to believe the opposition, the effect will be to put an end to this parliament and have a general election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is extremely important, I repeat, for the people of this country to understand now, before the vote is put, what the effects of dissolution will be. I talked earlier about the small number of days the government has had in this session of parliament to present its legislation. I indicated the number of bills which have already received royal assent. I would now like to talk about the things that are still on the order paper. There is the budget, for one, and several other important measures which are on the order paper, all of which will disappear if this House is dissolved.

An hon. Member: Good riddance to bad rubbish!

Mr. Trudeau: I think the gentleman over there has just coined a phrase. He looked around and coined a phrase.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In his budget speech last night, the Minister of Finance went into great detail on many of the subjects covered by him. Other speakers on this side will talk at some length, as much as the rules allow, on certain aspects of that budget. Tonight I want to pinpoint a small number of measures, those which will disappear if, in fact, the government and parliament are rejected tomorrow, so that the people of Canada keep in mind what they are losing by this election in terms of budgetary measures and other measures on the order paper.

As the Minister of Finance explained last night, the reduction in personal income tax will leave more money in the hands of people so they can better defend themselves against the higher cost of living. The reduction in personal income tax will take 300,000 Canadians off the tax rolls.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: This may be unimportant to the opposition, but we consider it of some importance to those 300,000 Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The budget will remove the 12 per cent federal sales tax on clothing, footwear and other articles, to act directly against high prices.

Mr. Basford: They are opposed to that.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course they are opposed to that. It was interesting to hear why the leader of the New Democratic Party was opposed to that. He was in favour of some kind of reduction of sales tax provided it did not apply to those lucky men whose wives were able to buy, I think he said, three party dresses, or something like that. I wonder what the leader of the NDP has in mind as a reduction in sales tax that he would apply only to those whose wives have less than three party dresses. How would he administer that? However, I will not go into that, Mr. Speaker. I just want to remind this House that in the last parliament the NDP were against the family allowances that we were proposing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: There are a lot of new men over there. Perhaps some of them do not remember that. They said it would be administratively complicated, "Let's give it to everybody." With regard to the sales tax, however, they say, "Let's make sure we only cut sales tax on the articles sold to those people in the store who can presumably pass an incomes test in front of the storekeeper."

This budget would make it easier to save for the purchase of a home through tax-free savings up to $10,000. This budget would protect Canadian savings against inflation, just as personal income taxes were protected by this government against rising because of inflation. This budget would raise the war veterans allowance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I have trouble reading my own writing. I must confess it is even more difficult reading someone else's. More important to some people in this chamber, Mr. Speaker, this budget would have shifted the burden of taxation, for example, through the 10 per cent surtax to those corporate sectors most able to carry the burden while pushing ahead with expansion for increased supplies. I was rather intrigued by the expression used by the leader of the New Democratic Party to describe these corporate tax increases. The Minister of Finance indicated yesterday that, according to his estimate, this would bring in just short of $800 million for the year. That is one quarter of the $3.2 billion which was brought in through corporate taxes in the year 1973-74. In other words, this is a 25 per cent increase over last year's corporate taxes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that the NDP does not think that is enough, but I am at this point in my speech trying to indicate what will happen if the government goes down with the budget: even this modest 25 per cent increase over last year's corporate taxes does not get back. Who is giving the companies of rip-off as a result of that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: This budget does not take the easy way. It was not designed to do that. If any proof is needed to show that we do not want an election, Mr. Speaker, I think the judgment has been that this is not an election budget because we do not want an election. We want responsible economic policies. We want, not the easy way that the doctrinaire NDP or the controllers of wages on the Tory side want, but one which will keep the economy operating as the number one economy in the world, Mr. Speaker.

● (2040)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I must now ask the House to follow me into the order paper of today's date and to look at some of the measures at various stages of legislation in the House which will be disappearing if this parliament is indeed brought to an end tomorrow or this week. Let me take a few examples in various areas, beginning with food and agriculture. First is a bill of which we are proud and which we want to talk about a great deal during an election, Bill C-29, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act. We are looking forward to joining issue with those who make an easy debate on gouging and profiteering and who have easy solutions. We have a bill here that we are prepared to stand on and to put before the country at any time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The results of the non-passage of this bill will be that the power to roll back prices is lost. If the bill is lost, Mr. Speaker, the government will be denied at this time the ability to deal effectively with foodstuffs such as meat, canned fruit, vegetables, bread, and so on. I am just talking about food, but this also applies to other sectors where gouging exists. It would deny the government the means to apply strong pressure on those who profit unreasonably in the marketplace when competition is lacking.

Then we have Bill C-7, amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. This bill is based on the belief that a vigorous competition policy is fundamental to any anti-inflation program. Countries all over the world have been tightening up their laws on competition in recent years to ensure the lowest possible prices to the consumer. The government, as the House knows, has been pressing for amendments to this law since 1970. The amendments to the Combines Investigation Act now before parliament go a long way toward remedying defects and are an important part of the government's anti-inflation program. The results of non-passage of this bill would be that a powerful antidote to inflation would be lost. Failure to pass the bill would be irresponsible on the part of parliament. Failure to act on these amendments can only favour unacceptable business acts that daily harm the consumer.

Then what about the act to amend the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act? The present act provides, essentially, to producers of other crops and producers of wheat grain outside the designated areas under the Canadian Wheat Board Act what the Canadian Wheat Board Act provides for western wheat producers. Results of non-passage would be that it might hinder production because of the greater need for cash flow by producers at the present time. It would also prevent the Ontario wheat producers from having some of the advantages now received by western producers.

Then there is Bill C-25, an act to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. The results of non-passage would mean less stable marketing of grain and would create a jam in transportation, since the farmers would not be inclined to hold grain on their farms until acceptance and delivery, thus affecting 50,000 producers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Then in the area of social policy I should just mention Bill C-35 which was given first reading, I believe, only yesterday. This is the omnibus bill on equal rights for women. We on this side are proud of that bill and we will tell the country that the women of this country are equal.

Mr. Nowlan: You have had 11 years to do that.

Mr. Baker: Even the girls don't like it.

Mr. Trudeau: Then there is Bill C-19, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan. What are the results of non-passage of this measure? First, there would be the loss of increased benefits for survivors of women contributors who have died. That embraces about 30,000 people. Second, there will be the loss, through failure to remove the earnings test, of increased benefits for about 500,000 persons now retired.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Trudeau: Then Bill C-34, the National Housing Act amendments to continue and to broaden existing federal assistance for municipal sewage treatment facilities and to make trunk sewer systems eligible for assistance. The results of non-approval of this measure would mean that a major new initiative would be delayed. It is conceivable that the legislation could have had considerable impact on the availability of serviced land for home construction.

I have several more bills I wish to mention, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize for taking the time of the House. I know most hon. members are aware of the subject matter of the bills, but I just repeat that it is important to put these matters on the record so the people of Canada will know that this House has been warned, and warned very clearly, about the effects of dissolution now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In the area of industrial and regional policy we have Bill C-13, an act to amend the Bank Act. I think the attitude of the opposition is that if this bill is not passed it will only frustrate the wishes of the western provinces which want this amendment to the Bank Act so they can set up banking institutions in their provinces.

Then there is Bill C-20, the Federal Business Development Bank Act. Results of non-passage of this bill, which can be viewed as complementary to the budget statements, relating to small businesses, would mean that an extremely important service to small business would be delayed, to the detriment of an important economic sector. This is of importance to us, Mr. Speaker.

Then there is Bill C-10, to amend the Export Development Act. I am sure many members read the statements in Monday's papers about the effect of the non-passage of this bill, statements made by the Canadian Export Association of Montreal, headed by the president, Mr. J. M. McAvity. At the present time there are a number of major projects totalling $300 million being negotiated. It will not be possible to sustain these negotiations for lack of authority to make financial commitments. These projects involve manufacturers, a number of suppliers and service industries, and should these projects not proceed there is a possibility of loss of customers and of jobs for Canadians. Once again I repeat, Mr. Speaker, and I quote from Monday's papers wherein the president of the Canadian Exporters Association states—

● (2050)

If the amendment to the act does not go through in the next few months, or if it is postponed by an election, then Canadian exporters would lose business.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Trudeau: The order paper contains many more things, and I should like to talk about two additional bills in the area of energy.

An hon. Member: Talk about football.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member asks me to talk about football. I think for the first time since I have been in the House of Commons I am using the privilege of speaking without any limit on time, which is a privilege accorded the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition.

An hon. Member: It is your maiden speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Let us look at Bill C-32, an act to establish a national petroleum company. If this bill to establish Petro-Can is not passed, it means the government's program will be delayed several months and this will create needless uncertainty in the industry and leave the government without an instrument to deal with the constantly changing international situation. There is Bill C-18, the Petroleum Administration Act. The results of non-passage of this legislation are that the oil export charge would cease and no authority would exist to pay subsidies to eastern refiners. The federal-provincial agreement of March could be destroyed, and critical policy decisions to cover the interim period from dissolution to the recall of parliament would be required.

I see the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) shaking his head.

An hon. Member: He's trying to find his marbles.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps he will be good enough to indicate what will happen to oil export charges. He recalls the story of this charge which was brought in by the government at the end of last year in order to make sure that the great windfall would not accrue to the petroleum companies but would accrue to the benefit of Canadians. In the month of January we tried to bring in legislation which would have permitted the government to collect this export charge.

The House will remember that the opposition consented to permitting the government to collect this export charge only for two months, the months of February and March. For every month following March, this will be lost, that is, for April, May, June and July. And if there is an election, I suppose it is fair to presume it will be held early in July, and by the time the writs are returned, even at great haste parliament could not meet before the middle of August. So it means that for April, May, June, July and much of August this oil export charge will not be authorized for collection by parliament.

Mr. Hellyer: Nonsense. You can collect it under the Export and Import Permits Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Go back to Action Canada.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, the hon. member had better go back to Action Canada. Let me just put the figures in respect of this matter before the House. The tax is now $4 a barrel, and it probably should and probably will go up to cover appreciation and oil prices. Never mind what that increase will be, as we do not know what it will be—the tax is now $4 per barrel. Just calculating the amount on that basis, the volume of oil involved is about one million barrels a day, which would work out to between 27 million and 30 million per month. At $4 a barrel, the tax which would be forgone to the federal government if the Petroleum Administration Act is not passed would amount to about $115 million per month, for five months. That would amount to something more than half a billion dollars.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

An hon. Member: Let it rip off for the oil companies, David.

Mr. Bell: Be careful what you say about David.

Mr. Trudeau: It is true that we have heard a lot about robber barons from the NDP, but the consequence of this more than half a billion dollars which it would not be in the power of the government to collect under the law, if it is not passed, would go to the oil companies. Some 47 per cent of the oil in Canada is produced by five major companies, and we assume that the exports would be in that same area. This production is divided up in the following manner: Imperial Oil, 18 per cent; Texaco, 11 per cent; Mobil, 8 per cent; Gulf, 7 per cent; Shell, 6 per cent. That is just a rough calculation, but these are the percentages and these are the figures in respect of which the NDP and the Tories would see the government put in a situation in which it was impossible to collect as a result of the non-passage of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You fellows ought to be in the funny papers.

Mr. Trudeau: Those are only matters which are on the order paper, but there are many other measures mentioned in the Speech from the Throne which are ready for imminent introduction. I will mention just three which have to deal with the increase in food supply and stabilization of food production. One would be the amendments to the Farm Credit Act, to provide greater assistance to young farmers; another would be amendments to the Agricultural Stabilization Act, to broaden its scope; and the third would be grain marketing stabilization legislation based on cash advance payments on crops.

Mr. Hales: Tell us about the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, amendments to that act would be brought in very soon, as the hon. member suggests.

Some hon. Members: Promises, promises.

Mr. Trudeau: That was an attempt, perhaps a lengthy one, to put on the record one very simple fact. That is, that parliament is doing its job and this government would like to see this parliament continue doing its job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2100)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this record of achievement which the government has put before you tonight is an effective record. It is an effective record by a minority government that has been successful in making this minority parliament produce. It is simply not good enough for the leader of either party who wishes to destroy this parliament to say that the first session was productive but that this session was not. I have already cited legislation of vital importance to farmers, fishermen, small businessmen and consumers, legislation important to increasing Canadian activity and control in key sectors of our society, vital legislation that would die on the order paper and legislation that would have to wait, if an election were held, until a new Liberal government returns to provide it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Consistently since this parliament began, this government has attacked inflation by a several-pronged approach. The Minister of Finance was true yesterday to that approach. In legislation, in administrative action and in two budgets the government has shown its attack on inflation. It has consistently sought to increase supply, to get the farmers, the fishermen and the factories producing more. We sought to go after extremes of profit. On the one hand we have consistently sought to stop gouging. For all Canadians we sought to bring down prices, on the other hand, by subsidies and by other measures. We cut taxes, and finally, for the Canadians who are hurt most by inflation, we brought in an array of measures which increased and indexed their pensions and other sources of income.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that was an attack on inflation. It is an attack increasingly understood by farmers, by fishermen, by consumers and by producers. Very recently, even small businessmen across Canada who for a time had embraced price and wage controls reversed their opinion and stated that they were against price and wage controls. They dislike wage and price controls because they have seen the shortages that develop as a result of controls and because they know they will have to pay an inflated price for the materials in short supply. They have observed the experience of Great Britain and the United States and have said to the Leader of the Opposition, "No thanks. Not for us".

It is true that our attack on inflation is not a simple one. It is a complex one. It is a complex solution to a complex problem. We certainly reject the simple, and perhaps simple-minded, approach that has been brought to bear by the opposition on this question. These Tory controls would control the wages of the workingman. Prices have already risen very high, and controls will not bring them down. If you freeze high prices, there are still high prices; but if you freeze wages, there are still low wages.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am sure many of us on this side of the House will want to explain this at some length to the country if we become involved in an election campaign. We have explained before, and will explain again, that these simplistic solutions in reality are Conservative solutions, ones which a Liberal Party would not want to place on the workingman and the fisherman. I think perhaps the slogan I would suggest to the Tory Party for its measure would be: The price is right; let us freeze the wages.

Mr. Speaker, I was attempting to show that this parliament has been doing a relatively good job—an admission of some of the opposition parties until now. I want to conclude by asking all members of this House, including myself, to try to put aside for a moment any partisan spirit. I would ask the members of this House, as we will ask the citizens of this country if we are forced to ask them for a renewed mandate, to reflect upon the troubled world in which Canadians are living. I do not think that anyone who looks at other parts of the world would be unaware of the economic and political instability which exists in many countries. I would appeal to Canadians to consider, not that everything is fine and dandy but that Canada is doing, shall we say, relatively well in this troubled world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: The land is relatively strong.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I suppose that would be a better slogan. One might look at the economic performance of Canada viewed by people outside the country. I shall not bore the House by quoting again the opinions of the OECD, the IMF, the Wall Street Journal or the Financial Times in respect of Canada's economy. I shall not even invoke the Canada Year Book, which is something of an authority, for the hon. member for Peace River. But, Mr. Speaker, I think if anyone looks impartially at the various reports they will have to admit that in a troubled economic world, Canada is doing relatively well.

● (2110)

In a troubled political world, particularly if we call to mind the comparisons that were made after October, 1972, respecting a stable Canada and its minority government, and the great majority of the President of the United States and the successful elections of the President of France and the Chancellor of Germany, it is interesting to look back 18 months later and to see how Canada fared in political terms and that Canadians are also doing relatively well and there has been pretty sensible political stability in the past 18 months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As I was saying at the beginning of my speech, essentially I should like to show the consequences of dissolving parliament now and try to impress on the opposition and the country the effects of interrupting the business of the nation to have this expensive election of which the leader of the Créditistes spoke—interrupting the economic momentum which is making Canada a more successful economic country than other countries. And interrupting all this for what reason? For the manoeuvrings of the opposition.

This creating of uncertainty for political reasons, the deprivation of the relief that the budget would provide to the needy, this renunciation of the tax on huge corporations is all brought forward for political motives. As I indicated in the earlier part of my speech, this has been motivated by the well defined reasons of the NDP and of the Tories. My final word on this—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —is that the least we can say about this timing is that it is irresponsible. There will be other occasions later in the spring when the government can be defeated. We know that there are more opposition days coming with no-confidence votes.

Mr. Bell: You had your chance.

Mr. Trudeau: It is very unusual to defeat a government on its budget. I can understand why, because even though the budget may not go as far as the expectations of the various parties, yet it does bring relief to people, it does redistribute in one way wealth from the rich to the poor; and that is why we believe this particular timing, with these pieces of legislation on the order paper, is particularly irresponsible.

There is one final effect which I neglected to mention, and that is that the election expenses legislation, which has been demanded for so long by the leader of the NDP (Mr. Lewis), has not yet been passed. Finally, when they have a chance to have an election under this new legislation, they prefer to pull the plug before we are caught up in that legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, may I say in concluding in a very clear and final way that the Liberal government—and I think I said it often enough—does not want a general election at this time. We want to serve the mandate we were elected for by the people of this country and we share the opinion of the Social Credit Party in that respect.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to add that we will look forward to the vote on the proposed amendments. We are ready for the vote on the budget. If the Tories and the NDPs want to put an end to this 29th Parliament we will make it a point to see that they answer for it before the people of this country. Not only do we undertake to show the Canadian people that the Liberal party was ready to have all measures on the order adopted, but we promise them that they will see a Liberal party ready and able to fight in an election and to lead to victory all its candidates across the country whose heart is beating, whose brains are thinking and whose hands are working for freedom and justice.

[English]

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I did not realize, when I first got to my feet, that I had so many friends on the other side of the House, nor did I realize that I would be making the second speech in a political campaign. At any rate, I am delighted that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) joined in the debate this afternoon, although he did not have much to say about the budget. His participation explains a great deal about what has been going on and what has not been going on in the government. For the first half hour this afternoon the Prime Minister asked, why an election now? He said, "We have done this, we have done that. Why now?" The answer, of course, is quite clear. It is now, because the Canadian people really want something done about inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Having seen the budget that was brought down on Monday night, they realize that the government has neither the heart, will, courage nor the ideas to tackle the inflation problem in this country. Like hundreds of thousands of other Canadians on Monday, I waited to see what the government would do about the inflation problem. Through my mind went a variety of scenarios of things the government might try to do or suggest. Differential pricing was a possibility. Some sort of selective price controls, backed by high subsidies, such as the government has been trying in past months, might work for a time. But the one scenario that did not occur to me was that the government would come forth for another year with the same old policies and ideas and suggest that these were a modern, contemporary approach to dealing with inflation in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: It never occurred to me that we would again be in a budget debate in the House of Commons, after a year in which we had one of the most rapid increases in prices in the history of Canada, still trying to get the government to recognize that not all inflation comes from abroad, that we do have domestic inflation and that it is indeed a pervasive, significant, almost destructive force in Canada at the present time. The report of the Department of Finance which was tabled before the budget shows that with respect to the OECD figures which the government likes to quote, using a price deflator which the report indicates is the best measure of inflation, only one other industrialized country in the world, Japan, had more inflation last year than Canada. I certainly hope that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) will not be wandering around the country saying we have had a great record in this respect. We have had a terrible record. The statistics in the government's own report, at page 31, show without doubt that the rate of increase in inflation in Canada in 1973 was higher than in England, higher than in the United States, higher than in France, and that the only country which had a higher rate was Japan, which had its problem with oil.

I used to try to figure out why the cost of living increase was about the same in the United States and Canada. I would call my friends in the United States and ask how much of their inflation came from oil price changes. They would tell me it was 22 per cent to 24 per cent. Mr. Speaker, we did not have to cope with that problem in this country. It is clear that we have inflation throughout the entire economy. It is a mistake to suggest to the Canadian people that we cannot do anything about inflation. For some time the Economic Council of Canada has said that our goal should be to have an inflation rate not more than that of our trading partners. I have never accepted that. It is an absolute surrender to accept that sort of proposition. But the fact now is that our inflation rate is much higher than that of our trading partners.

However, the real issue is not what our inflation rate is compared with Japan, the United States or Great Britain: the real issue is what inflation is doing to hundreds of thousands of Canadians right now. They are seeing their savings destroyed because of the amount of inflation, 10 per cent this year, 10 per cent last year, and no one yet knows how much it will be this year. Hundreds of thousands of people are finding it hard to live on fixed incomes when faced with the rapid rises in the cost of living. The escalation in social security payments does not begin to compensate for increased price levels. Since last July the average hourly increase in wages has been less than the rate of increase in prices. For the first time in recent Canadian history, the average Canadian workman is falling behind because of inflation.

The Minister of Finance likes to talk about disposable income. Of course he knows it includes profits, dividends and other things. Real income is what concerns the man who is working and it is being wiped out by what is happening in our economy at the present time. The Prime Minister likes to say he is worried about what might happen to the low-income group because of some type of incomes policy. Yet he is presiding over a government that has allowed a massive redistribution of income against low-income groups because of inflation. This is a situation that is really intolerable.

Not only are individuals being badly hurt, but we are reaching a stage in this country where many of our institutions, many of the things that are fundamental for the well-being of the country are beginning to break down and be destroyed. Has there ever been a time before when industries such as the steel industry have had to open up their collective bargaining agreements in the middle of a contract to pay their employees more because inflation was so great? What will become of general collective bargaining agreements if this continues? Have we ever been in a situation in this country where the government has had to pay a bonus to people to get them to buy Canada Savings Bonds? At traditional interest rates the government has not been able to sell these bonds.

We are in a situation in which one of the most important institutions in the country, the whole institution for the channelling of savings into the investment market, is gone. Today in the stock market, price earnings ratios are as attractive, if you can imagine it, in terms of investment as at any time since the thirties, yet nobody is buying common stocks. Why? It is because no one has any faith that the government can get inflation controlled.

● (2130)

Clearly, we cannot ask people to pay 11½ per cent for housing loans and 14 or 15 per cent for consumer loans. Yet last night the Minister of Finance brought down a budget which, in its basic policy prescriptions, in its basic approach to inflation is precisely the same as the budget brought down a year ago; and that budget is one of the massive failures in economic policy implementation in Canadian history. It was a budget that failed in any way to halt the increase in inflation in the last year.

The minister is correct when he says that the solution to inflation has to be an increase in supply. Everyone realizes that is the critical problem, although we sometimes forget that prices are set by supply and demand and excessive demand in an economy can create problems as well as can shortage of supply. But even here the logic is somewhat mixed. The minister says that our inflation all comes from abroad and we will solve it by increasing domestic supply in Canada. I do not believe we can increase our domestic supply sufficiently, Mr. Speaker, to solve the inflation problems of the world, and I am sure the minister would agree.

The critical problem, the reason that we are in difficulty in regard to inflation in this country today and the reason the policies put forth by this government will not work, is simply that the policy for increasing supply involves placing demand into the system. What we have now is an increase in aggregate demand, but the supply it is expected to generate will not be for some time. The problem is, how do you bridge the gap? Everyone knows that if supply improves, the inflationary situation will improve. But what happens in the meantime? That is why you need a policy for the short run.

It is foolish to deny that is the situation. Examine housing. In the city of Toronto prices are increasing 20 per cent to 30 per cent and the amount of new housing being constructed is equivalent to new family formations. There is no way you need increases of 20 per cent or 30 per cent to stimulate housing supply. Prices are escalating because of the decline of investment opportunities in other areas, and particularly with the rise in inflationary expectations people are investing in the real estate market. You cannot advance any reason why housing is rising as it is, except for inflationary speculation. Such price increases do little to generate more supply in the economy, and unless you are willing to deal with the problem of inflationary expectations now, no policy will work. This country is full of inflationary expectations today, creating one of the major problems of the economy. Why else is the price of gold at $200, if it is not for inflationary expectations?

The second thing that is equally true is that once you have inflationary expectations, all kinds of imperfections develop in the market. The basic premise under which the budget was brought down a year ago and under which the budget was brought down last night is that we have normal expectations and we have perfect competition in our markets. Neither is true, Mr. Speaker. As long as neither is true we will not be able to solve the inflationary problem in the economy unless we deal with the two things directly and completely. If we had perfect competition in the marketplace, one could easily see that rates of increases in profits would be equivalent to rates of increases in sales, times past profit margins, plus increasing costs and productivity changes. The present rate of increase in profits is an indication of the imperfections in the marketplace and of groups being able to capitalize on the basis of the situation as it exists now.

What is the government going to do about the situation? Ignore it? Something must be done to prevent non-competitive situations from creating abnormal increases in prices which are not justified by any sort of competitive situation in the market. That is why we suggest an incomes policy—an incomes policy designed first to work against inflationary expectations and second to protect people from prices that result from the market because of lack of competition. You may say that there is a better way of dealing with this problem. I doubt it. I do not know what it is. But you cannot ignore the problem. If you are serious about solving the inflationary problem in this country, not by moderating demand but by increasing supply, you simply have to have policies to deal with the transitional phase, otherwise there will be as much inflation as we have already—10 per cent last year and 10 per cent this year. The tragedy in this budget is that it does not recognize this fundamental proposition.

I am sure no one in this House is more dedicated than my party to the proposition that the way in which we get maximum use of our resources is through a free competitive market operating under normal expectations. But we do not have that, Mr. Speaker. The real question is, how can we get to such a situation? I am desperately frightened that as long as we continue to have inflation at the rate we have we will be involved with 12 per cent interest rates and 15 per cent interest rates, the equity market not working and the decline of all confidence in the economy. It seems to me that we are going to be in for some difficult times that cannot and will not be solved by the temporary kind of band-aid or cosmetic—although I do not like those words—that the minister is advancing. We cannot solve the problems of poverty in Canada, the problems of housing, the problems of income redistribution and the problems of regional disparity until we do something about inflation. And, Mr. Speaker, we cannot do something about the inflation problem under the present policies being followed by this government. We must have a totally new approach if this problem is to be brought under control.

In this party we have never suggested—and I say this for the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis)—that there is any simple, easy solution to inflation. Of course there is not. It is a most difficult problem and it is not going to go away. But it is not going to be solved by the sort of policies that we have used in the past, because traditional policies do not work. For example it has been suggested that one of the ways to slow down the rate of inflation is to raise interest rates. But that does not now slow down inflation, at least not with the level of expectations that we have at the present time. Who would have thought that mortgages in Canada would command 12 per cent? Who would have thought that we would have a plethora of consumer lending at over 15 per cent, 18 per cent and up? Who would have thought that with interest rates at current levels for prime loans we would have as much capital investment as we have?

High interest rates today are not anti-inflationary; they are inflationary because they are looked on as a cost and are passed on in the price people pay for the products. The fact is, the traditional policy tools are not working. I would hate to try to speculate on what level you would have to put interest rates in this country to start an anti-inflationary movement. The government is caught in a trap. It is suggested that the rate of inflation can be slowed down by slowing down the rate of increase in the money supply. But how can you slow down the rate of increase in the money supply when inventories, for example, have to be financed at very high prices and with money borrowed at very high rates of interest? We are caught in a very difficult situation, one which can only be solved, I suggest, by adopting substantially new approaches.

● (2140)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member is saying that there has to be a better way. That is the sort of speech one hears all the time.

Mr. Gillies: I do not subcribe to the theory that inflation has been caused because, suddenly, all over the world there is a shortage of supply and suddenly the world is not producing as many goods and services as it produced in the past. If one examines the historical perspectives of inflation—the Minister of Finance mentioned this in the early part of his speech last night—one will see that inflation has come about from the great increase in world liquidity. The fact of the matter is that ever since the 1930s, and certainly since the 1940s, all governments have been willing to spend much more than they are taking in from tax revenues and other sources. They have been financing programs by printing paper money. It is as simple as that. We have seen this rate of increase in inflation and the decline in the value of currency all over the world as a result of such policies. The only way, generally speaking, to curb inflation all over the world is to bring some discipline back to government spending.

I find it incredible that in Canada, in the year in which we have inflation rates at 10 per cent, the government has increased spending by the dimensions we have witnessed. According to the budget this year, the government is to increase the tax take by 25 per cent. Yet, while taking that amount out of the economy, we are to operate with a modest deficit. One would think that if there were ever a time when expenditures might be kept down and revenues might be in surplus, that time might be the present.

The Liberal government has been operating its economic policy in the last 25 years under the modern Keynesian theory under which there is a budget deficit with slower economic activity and a surplus with higher economic activity. The fact is that the government has made no attempt at all to slow down the rate of government expenditure. Actually, never before in peacetime has Canadian government spending been growing so fast. It seems incredible to me that the government has not made a major effort to attempt to control government spending. How long can you continue to take as much out of the economy as is being taken by this government and applied to the sorts of activities which are being carried on at present, without diminishing the true productive capacity of the economy?

Surely, if there was ever a time to practice discipline in government spending, considering the rate of inflation that time is now. Governments do not exist for the purpose of collecting taxes and spending money. Governments exist to provide services for the people in an efficient and effective way. The fact is we face a very critical economic situation. There has never been as much peacetime inflation as we are seeing at present. The government is still trying to attack it with budgetary policies which are singularly unimaginative, and is afraid to tackle the problem in any direct way. It has done nothing in terms of income policy, nothing in terms of a two-price system and nothing about controlling expenditure. Unless we do this, we will see much more inflation during the coming year than we saw during the past.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Gillies: You cannot expect the Canadian people to believe or accept—nor should they—that in this country, considering our resources and energy, we must experience a rate of inflation comparable to that of other countries. The moment any government in Canada says that our rate of inflation is comparable to that of other countries, it is admitting failure. Considering the resources we have, the industrial base we have and one of the most productive agricultural communities in the world, not being able to keep our inflation rate down is totally unacceptable.

We have not seen, and I say this with great care, any imaginative approach to the problem of inflation. The government seems to believe that the economy today is operating in the same way as economies were operating in the early 1950s. Economies today are totally different. There is a change in terms of inflationary expectations in the economy. There is a change in market structures. But we are still tinkering around, thinking we can solve our problems by raising interest rates, which in themselves are inflationary, and by changing the tax structure, which can add to inflation and then wondering why inflation should be increasing and suggesting that it comes from somewhere else in the world.

If this problem is to be solved, there must be policies which recognize that if you are to use the supply increase approach and are not prepared to moderate consumer demand, you must introduce some kind of incomes policy or some policy to move the economy over the gap between the time when demand is stimulated and supply rises. If you do not bring in such programs, inflation booms, as we witnessed last year and this year. Because we lack such policies we are building all-pervasive inflation into this economy which will make ours one of the highest cost economies in the world. We are selling our products today because there is demand for our natural resources. But unless our rate of inflation is slowed down we will end up with a substantially higher cost economy than almost any of our trading partners. Will this not be tragic?

I know that government members do not believe the problem is as serious as some of us think. At least, they do not appear to believe the problem is that serious. You see, when some of our institutions are disappearing, such as the equity market, when government bonds cannot be sold because the rate of inflation is higher than the interest rate, when hundreds of thousands of people are fearful about what will happen, when people are concerned about their insurance policies and about their pension programs, the country is facing a situation which needs action to bring it under control. The Canadian people have shown today, through their representatives in parliament, that they are no longer confident that the government has the imagination or the will to deal with inflation.

I listened to the budget speech last night more in sorrow than in anger because it is inconceivable that after following a policy for one year which led to our highest peacetime inflation rate, the government has come back with exactly the same sort of policy. It is absolutely incredible. The issue in this country today is inflation. It is an issue that affects everybody and is the one on which the campaign will be fought. This country needs confidence that it has a government that cares, which has imagination and which is willing to deal with inflation in a bold fashion. This government has lost the confidence of the people. It is using higher interest rates, changes in the money supply in the short run, putting a band-aid here or there to deal with inflation. The Canadian people are absolutely right in thinking such an approach will not work. What we need is a strong, new government to tackle the problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: The one thing that can give every Canadian encouragement tonight is that very soon they are going to have it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is approximately a minute left of the time of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) wishes to ask a question.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am seeking the floor.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: For what purpose?

Mr. Sharp: For continuing the debate.

Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Nystrom: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that in rotation I was supposed to have been recognized next. Of course, I bow to Your Honour's discretion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I have about ten seconds to deal with this problem: I would like to do this properly. On reflection, the Chair will recognize the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully this evening to the speech of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), as did my colleagues the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). I was reminded of the movie "The Candidate". The candidate got himself elected to office simply by saying there must be a better way.

An hon. Member: There's got to be a better way.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, there's got to be a better way. I listened very carefully to the hon. member talking about the serious inflationary problems that exist in this country and around the world. I agree entirely with all those statements. In his budgetary address, the Minister of Finance looked upon inflation as the most serious problem facing this country and the world. So let us agree upon this issue. The issue is how best to deal with the problem of inflation.

We take this problem as seriously as the opposition. We have the responsibility of office. We have the necessity of bringing in workable solutions to this problem. We are not talking theoretically about the effect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: The hon. member for Don Valley said there has to be a better way. This problem is very serious. It requires some answers. I listened carefully to the hon. member for Don Valley putting forward the revised version of the Tory platform.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The current one.

Mr. Sharp: The current one; today's version. I have been reviewing the position taken by the hon. member for Don Valley, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and sundry speakers for the Conservative Party. They are characterized by one thing, their inconsistency. I looked particularly at the question of controls. It started about a year ago, with the Leader of the Opposition, persuaded by the hon. member for Don Valley, adopting the idea of over-all wage and price controls, starting with a freeze for 90 days, then maybe 120 days—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to end this part of my speech because I would like to take it up where the hon. member for Don Valley began to change the mind of the Leader of the Opposition and come back to the position put before us tonight, that of complete vagueness, inconsistency and incoherence.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[Mr. Sharp.]

ENERGY—ELECTRICITY—SUGGESTED NEED FOR FORMULA TO EQUALIZE COST IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will give the hon. member about 30 seconds, because of the prevailing excitement, while the House clears.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your kindness in allowing the dust to settle before we move into what can be called the last show of the late show or the late, late show. I am not quite sure who will be answering this question, but I want again to come back to the need for assistance with regard to the increasing difficulties and burden of electrical costs for the province of Prince Edward Island. I am glad I have this final opportunity, before this twenty-ninth parliament disappears into the mists of time, to raise what is a very important issue having to do with the same subject matter that, hopefully, has been the subject of discussion during this day namely, the cost of living.

Since the latter part of 1973, Prince Edward Islanders have experienced a very rapid rise in electricity prices based almost totally on the alarming rise in the cost of oil, in particular that of bunker C which is used totally for the generation of electricity on Prince Edward Island. The reason I have raised this matter on a number of occasions in this House and elsewhere relates both to the fact that there have been increases of well over 40 per cent in a six-month period, and the fact that Prince Edward Island is the only province in the Dominion of Canada that is totally dependent upon thermal-generated electricity. Indeed, if you look at the statistics for the various provinces and territories, hon. members will realize how unusual and difficult a situation the province of Prince Edward Island now finds itself in. As a matter of fact, in the whole of Canada on a percentage basis only about 2 or 3 per cent of the total amount of electricity consumed is generated by the use of fuel oil, whereas in Prince Edward Island the figure comes to 100 per cent.

Hon. members may recall that on March 28 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether or not, following the recent meeting at Sussex Street and the agreement arrived at on a one-price system for oil, there had been any formula reached so that some equalization could occur for high-cost areas in provinces that are dependent on thermal-generated electricity. I also raised with the Prime Minister at that time the need for a long-term solution through the construction of a submarine power cable to Prince Edward Island.

I waited for some time, and again raised the matter almost a month later, on April 25, when I asked whether in fact any agreement has been reached with the provinces by way of assistance to meet rapidly rising electricity costs, or whether any decision had been arrived at regarding the proposed construction of the submarine power cable. I did receive some hint at that time from the Prime Minister that there would be an announcement with respect to some aspects of studying the question. Sure enough, Mr. Speaker, on the following day, April 26, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) issued a press release announcing that the province of Prince Edward Island is to receive a federal grant of $260,000 for a study which has been made on the feasibility of an electrical interconnection between P.E.I. and the Canadian mainland. He went on to say:

> The Prince Edward Island study has established the technical feasibility and economic viability of a proposed submarine cable electrical interconnection from P.E.I. to either New Brunswick or Nova Scotia.

What is not stated, however, in light of the conclusion of that study, is when we might expect to have some decision as to action. If the Prime Minister wonders, as he did in his long soliloquy of despair today, why it is that this government deserves to be defeated, here is just one other example of the kind of inaction that has existed for far too many years—because the proposal for a submarine power cable did not suddenly spring fully formed out of the first ministers' conference in January; it was a long-term consideration dating back to the sixties. When in 1969 the proposed P.E.I. crossing project was scuttled, so also was scuttled the proposed submarine power cable.

If the decision is to be taken in the near future, such cable could in fact be in operation by the end of next year at a cost, I think, of not too much more than $10 million. The importance of this power cable, tying in, hopefully, to the maritime power grid, is hard to overestimate, because not only are we thinking here in terms of consumer costs, which of course are basic in this day and age of rapidly mounting inflation, but there is the hoped for expansion of secondary industry related to our primary industries of farming and fishing.

It is unfortunate that some of the electricity that may be generated either from the new nuclear power station in New Brunswick or from developing hydro possibilities either in New Brunswick or Labrador is talked of in terms of commitment elsewhere, particularly to the United States. It would seem to me to make much greater sense if the power that is generated could be available, by use of a submarine power cable, both to the residents and to the industry of Prince Edward Island.

I want in particular to point to the effect that has already occurred as a result of power costs. First of all, in comparison terms, residential electrical costs in Nova Scotia were around $13 a month. Up till December of last year they were around $15.80, or close to $16 a month, but have since jumped to $19, $19.50 and show signs of approaching well over $20, up to $25 a month, on an average basis. This gives some idea of the double hardship that exists for people on Prince Edward Island.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) talks about alleviating the impact of inflation, he has certainly not given much consideration, nor unfortunately has the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson), to the continued impact of high electrical costs for the province of P.E.I. I hope that we have some answer this evening from the parliamentary secretary, both with regard to an interim formula of adjustment to equalize power costs in Prince Edward Island and, more particularly, regarding a long-term solution through the building of a submarine power cable that will satisfy the long-term electrical needs of that province.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question relates to the possibility of subsidizing oil used for generation of power, equalizing the cost of electrical energy in Prince Edward Island, presumably with mainland New Brunswick and Nova Scotia costs, and the proposed interconnection of P.E.I. with the mainland via a submarine power cable installation.

In regard to the subsidization of oil, it is fair to say that the government has carefully considered representations by Premier Campbell submitted at the first ministers' conference in January, 1974, but is not inclined to adopt such a proposal in view of the financial burden it would impose. If such a program were to be adopted, it would be manifestly impossible to confine it to P.E.I., notwithstanding the fact that P.E.I. is 100 per cent dependent upon imported oil for power generation.

While the cost in respect of P.E.I. might be considered to be relatively modest, lying in the range of $3 million to $7 million per annum to maintain oil at $3 a barrel, versus a national or pegged price in the range of $6.50 to $8 a barrel, hence a subsidy of $3.50 to $5, the total national cost would range between $50 million and $200 million per annum. The provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia would each become eligible for subsidy, New Brunswick about twice that of P.E.I. and Nova Scotia about eight to ten times that of P.E.I., and by 1976 Ontario will have an oil-fired plant in service that would command a subsidy of some $80 million on the basis of $5 a barrel.

Concerning the proposed submarine power cable, this project has been under active study over the past year and there seems little doubt that there will be a decision at an early date to proceed with the project for commissioning in 1975. This project is eligible for federal financial support to the extent of a federal loan for 50 per cent of the capital cost of the project, plus a grant of 50 per cent of the investigation study costs, a portion of which—$188,852—has already been paid to P.E.I. The possibility of additional federal financial assistance through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is under consideration.

There is no program designed to equalize the cost of electricity in P.E.I. with the cost in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. However, interconnection with the mainland via the proposed cable will give P.E.I. access to a source of electrical energy, including nuclear generation, that has a degree of economy, stability and security considerably greater than is likely to prevail if the island were to remain dependent upon isolated on-island generation and imported oil.

PUBLIC SERVICE—REQUEST THAT $500 SALARY INCREASE GRANTED EMPLOYEES BE GIVEN TO THOSE NOW RETIRED

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be speaking tonight on what probably will amount to the coda of this parliament. I have a great nose for news, as I always come along to make my speeches when the old pundits have left the gallery, those loyal representatives of the Canadian press. If it were not for the Canadian press I do not think many speeches in this House would be recorded. I just had a small conversation with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) who said he could not be here but tomorrow he would read every word of my deathly prose. He had to excuse himself because he was up rather late last night.

An hon. Member: Praying.

Mr. Rose: No, not praying. I should never want to accuse the Minister of Finance of prayer. I think probably he was receiving the accolades of the very grateful members of his party for this budget of last night. I am sure a great number of defeated Liberals in Canada were equally grateful for his budget just before the 1972 election. If he has to be at home tonight early, I understand that completely and I wish him pleasant dreams.

If we are on the eve of an election, I think in many ways it is an unnecessary one because all the government had to do was indicate it was interested in even a minor way in relieving the kind of distress that has plagued so many of the senior citizens, one might even say pioneers, of my riding. Had the government last evening indicated it was prepared to increase the old age pension and begin a scheme of lowering the retirement age from 65, this would have placed my party at least in a very difficult situation in terms of our decision vis-à-vis the budget. This, of course, has not been the case because we cannot see anything in this budget to assist the people we purport to represent. Therefore, our problem is relatively minor this evening.

Aside from this preamble, the reason I am appearing here this evening concerns a question I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) yesterday. Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will permit me to quote myself. My question, which appears at page 2056 of Hansard, was directed to the President of the Treasury Board. It concerns the public servants and the government's capitulation in the anti-inflation fight which was confirmed later in the evening.

I asked whether the minister had reconsidered his position with a view to awarding this $500, which incidentally he gave to the employed public servants, equally to the retired public servants and all armed forces personnel who are also faced with the problem of inflation. If I might paraphrase the minister's remarks, he said he was sure the hon. member would recognize that the salaries and wages of public servants are not indexed, whereas the pensions of those who are retired are indexed under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. I went on to say:

> In spite of the swarm of gnats in the minister's words, I wonder whether the minister's answer is a flat 'no'.

I do not think the minister's answer was a deliberate attempt to mislead the House, but he said:

> The answer is not a flat 'no'. It is that this is already being done.

I am grateful to the muscular member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who supplied statistics on the situation which prevails in respect of pensions applying to the people with whom I am particularly concerned, the retired members of the RCMP, the armed forces and public service. On April 1, as recorded at page 1020 of Hansard, there is a response to a question which appeared on the order paper. It is a response from the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) dealing with the number of Canadian armed forces personnel in receipt of pensions.

Then on April 15, as recorded at page 1406 of Hansard, there is an answer which indicates that public servants have magnificent and generous pensions awarded to them by this government. This is dealt with in a fair amount of detail. What I would say about the public service and RCMP I think also applies to members of the armed forces. On page 1016 of Hansard it is indicated that there are nearly 42,000 retired members of the Department of National Defence. There are 42 in receipt of less than $20. I think the crucial point is that of the 42,000, 16,000 have an income by way of pension of $300 per month, which means that 26,000 retired members of the armed forces receive less than $300 a month.

I think this applies equally to the public service and to the RCMP. What I am suggesting is that when the minister says he is taking care of this through indexing, he ignores the fact that the members of the public service who are working now have, in a large measure, bargaining rights. But in addition he has given them $500 to help in the anti-inflation battle.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt, but the time of the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member spoke about the subject raised in his question. As the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) stated yesterday when this question was raised in the House, provision has already been made for the full escalation of pensions of retired public servants as well as retired armed forces and RCMP personnel through the amendments to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act which were passed by parliament last September. Previously, as hon. members will recall, the rate at which pensions were increased under that act were subject to the same ceiling of 2 per cent each year as had applied until then under the Canada Pension Plan.

The amendments introduced by this government and approved by parliament in September of 1973 provide that any increase in the consumer price index would be fully reflected in the escalation of benefits under that act in the future. In addition, the increases authorized by these amendments reflected the full change in the consumer price index since the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act was passed in 1970, or the year in which the pensioner concerned ceased to be employed, whichever is the later. As a result of this, the new pension increases which became payable in January of 1974 ranged from 6.7 per cent for those who retired at any time in 1973 to 11.9 per cent for those who retired in 1970 or earlier.

This action by the government was the forerunner of a number of similar increases in pension made by various federal agencies with separate pension plans. At about the same time, the regulations under the Income Tax Act which have effectively limited the escalation on most private pension plans to the old 2 per cent ceiling were also amended to permit similar action by private employers. While I am not aware of many private employers who have seen their way clear to make corresponding increases in the pensions of their former employees, it is quite clear that the government is the one that took the lead in providing for the regular annual escalation of pensions under employee pension plans in Canada in line with the cost of living.

These pensions which were increased in January will be subject to a further increase in January of next year in accordance with the change in the cost of living up to September 30, 1974. The same percentage increase will apply to those who retire this year and qualify for the pension escalation for the first time on January 1 next, while those who may have retired in previous years and who qualify for the first time next January will receive pension increases at a rate commensurate with the change in the consumer price index since the year in which they retired. The same applies, of course, to the increases provided for pensions payable to surviving widows and children of former employees and of members of the other groups as well as to former members of parliament and the judiciary, their widows and children.

GRAIN—SUGGESTED RELIEF OF PRODUCERS FROM ADDITIONAL CHARGES BECAUSE OF TRANSPORTATION AND CONTRACT DIFFICULTIES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, on April 22 I raised with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board some questions in connection with the serious charges which were levelled against Canada's transportation system by the chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board, Mr. Vogel, at the national transportation conference which was held in Ottawa on April 10. I refer specifically to the section of the chairman's statement which suggests that the farmers of western Canada, through the board, will face some exorbitant charges in costs caused by contractual default in the Wheat Board failing to meet its sales commitments caused by an insufficient supply of grain at export positions.

I want to know if this was an accurate assessment of the situation and if the minister thinks that farmers should be asked to foot the additional costs which have been incurred as a result of the failure of Canada's transportation system to meet its responsibilities. Moreover, it is fair to assume that in view of the statements which have been made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), who admitted that the government has failed to implement an effective transportation policy, and in view of the government's failure to compel the railways to discharge their responsibility in the field of grain movement, the additional costs, and indeed the reputation of Canada as a supplier of grain on the world markets, is seriously jeopardized.

I do not believe that the farmers should be asked to meet these additional costs. Therefore, my question was put to the minister with a view to recommending or suggesting that the government seriously consider the advisability and feasibility of offsetting these additional charges in some way, shape or form.

The second point of my question was the fact that Mr. Vogel had stated that farmers are facing additional costs, running into hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars, in vessel demurrage. At the time of this statement on April 10, 1974, it was indicated that 15 vessels were waiting at the port of Vancouver, with another 11 due. Today I find there are 11 ships waiting, 12 are loading and six more are due within the next week. It would be interesting to know what the story is on the additional cargo costs and whether any consideration is being given by the government to meeting these additional costs, or at least to offsetting them in some manner, particularly since the failure of Canada's transportation system, here again, has the result of insufficient supplies of grain to meet our export commitments.

To the present time, according to the latest James Richardson letter, something in the order of 120 million bushels less wheat have been exported this year compared with last year. The statement Mr. Vogel made indicates that during the railway strike last fall, 45,000 boxcars, representing 90,000 bushels, were lost. As of April 10, he indicated there were an additional 26,515 boxcars, representing approximately 56 million bushels, behind the railways' own minimum targets since January. The new targets of 10,300 cars per week will not be met until some time in May, if at all. He went on to indicate that even if the targets set by the railways are met, starting immediately, the west coast backlog will not be cleared away until the end of July.

The chairman of the board also indicates that this is costing producers untold millions of dollars in lost sales and, above all, the board has had to withdraw from future sales commitments. In addition, as I indicated earlier, Canada is rapidly losing its reputation as a dependable grain supplier. This is surely because of failure on the part of the government and Canada's transportation system to meet their obligations.

In surveying freight movements during the past year it is interesting to note that grain car loadings for 1973 were 20 per cent below the previous year. Looking at this year, we note that all rail car loadings are running at something in the order of 3 per cent less than during the corresponding period last year. This is a situation that simply has to be resolved, and until such time as it is resolved it seems to me fair to call on the government to take some measures to alleviate it, to offset the additional costs that have been incurred as a result of the transportation system's failure but certainly not through any fault of the farmers themselves. I do not believe it is fair to ask the farmers to pay for mistakes that have been made by the government and by the transportation system. Above all, they should not be asked to pay for government inaction and government irresponsibility.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of inaction or any lack in the field of transportation is a strange one and falls to the ground completely. The Canadian government has taken very vigorous action to analyse and develop programs for the transportation system in the grain handling field and has been taking the time to implement them, but only because of our view that producers and the industry must be fully consulted. We have purchased 2,000 hopper cars and have arranged to acquire another 4,000 because we know that is consistent with any kind of transportation system that we require.

To put the matter in perspective, it should be recognized that the railway system for four years in a row has managed to move more grain out of the country than has been produced and I am confident that it will do so this year as well. In the past three years, 200 million bushels more than the amount produced in those years has been disposed of, with the transportation system carrying the grain. In this year I am confident that we will move and transport more grain than producers have available, and the crop last year was the largest on prairie record.

It is quite clear that there were difficulties and we did not move as much grain in the middle of the winter as we had hoped. The difficulties were basically in three parts, as I have indicated. First of all, there was the strike which caused harm to a lot of innocent people—and I do not think the government could get into the position of picking up loose ends—and the problems that resulted from that. Secondly, I believe there was some neglect on the part of the railways in not putting cars into the grain industry. It was only when the government requested them to put in the proper number of cars that we obtained action. Following that, winter conditions came upon us and snow and weather were the third cause of some delay and difficulty.

I am happy to say that at the present time, as a result of the action we took to set up an emergency committee to examine the situation, the railways are in fact putting a lot of equipment into the movement of grain and are trying to turn trains around as fast as possible, and they are catching up. We will probably again see farmers having tremendous opportunities to deliver grain between now and the end of the crop year. If there is a lot of space and delivery opportunity for farmers, then the system is working to their advantage. And now, of course, it is working to their advantage with prices at record levels. Mr. Speaker, there is a very impressive record of action, not of neglect.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BREWIN—FAILURE OF PRESIDENT OF CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY TO PRODUCE TO COMMITTEE REPORT ON ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects all members of the House. The Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence had before it a witness, Mr. Paul Gérin-Lajoie, who is the president of CIDA. During the hearings of the committee he was requested, by a motion moved by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), to produce a report of Price Waterhouse, an accounting firm, dealing with the administration of CIDA which is a government agency supported by parliament. It was unanimously resolved by the committee on an amended motion that he should produce to the steering committee of that standing committee a copy of this report so that the steering committee could examine it to see whether it was relevant and important to the committee in advising the House about the affairs of CIDA. The president said he would comply with the wishes of the committee.

Subsequently, a letter was received by the chairman, the hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance), from which I should like to quote just one paragraph:

> I thought it advisable to bring this matter to the attention of the Honourable Mitchell Sharp, Secretary of State for External Affairs, through whom CIDA reports to Parliament. The minister informed me it would be preferable if the request for this document was made directly in the House of Commons.

Later the committee met and by a vote determined to ask that the report be produced by one o'clock today. The chairman, the hon. member for Lafontaine, has informed me that the report has not been produced.

I think this raises a very grave question of the privileges of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, you will be entirely familiar with the provisions of section 8 of Standing Order 65 which provides as follows:

> Standing committees shall be severally empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters as may be referred to them by the House, and, to report from time to time and—

I ask the House to note these words:

> —except when the House otherwise orders, to send for persons, papers and records—

● (1410)

This clearly gives committees of the House the right to have documents before them. The particular document does not touch on security. No question of privilege was raised. There has simply been an edict by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the committee is not to see this document pertaining to this important public agency.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Brewin: The basic principle involved in my question of privilege is whether or not committees of the House are to function without a veto from a minister of the government. That is the basic principle. It is highly important to the functioning of the committees of the House that we should not have this sort of ministerial intervention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: This intervention by the Secretary of State for External Affairs is a challenge to the privileges of the House. I ask you to rule, Mr. Speaker, that there is a prima facie case of privilege. If you do so rule, I shall move that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Greenwood has raised a question of privilege in relation to the non-production of a certain document in the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. He has indicated that if the Chair were to find that there is a prima facie case of privilege he would move a motion suggesting that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The Chair has in the past, on many occasions and based on many precedents, suggested that it might be very unwise for the House to decide that proceedings in one committee be investigated by another committee. I am sure that the hon. member would want to bear that in mind. The hon. member also suggested that there is a motion which should be put. I wonder whether it would be the wish of hon. members that we spend the afternoon debating this motion which, as a debate on a motion of privilege, might go on for some days.

I have had a few moments to look into the situation, and in a preliminary way there would appear to be at least three questions involved in the matter raised by the hon. member for Greenwood. The first is whether it is procedurally acceptable to raise in the House under the heading of privilege a proceeding in a standing committee. I suggest that this can be done only when such proceeding is presented to the House by means of a report accompanied, if necessary, by the relevant evidence. In my view, it is not possible to initiate a debate in the House on the evidence alone of a committee unless there is before the House a formal report. I mean by this that the report must state the specific question and be brought to the House by means of a specific motion to concur.

Second, there is at least implied in the question of privilege the matter of the conduct of a witness before a committee. Again it seems to me, and I believe that precedent will support my view, that the conduct of a witness can be considered by the House only on receiving a report thereon from a committee and the consideration, as I said a moment ago, of a motion to concur in the report with the required 48 hours notice.

Finally, there is the question of the extent of the power of a committee to send for papers. Hon. members are aware, of course, of the Standing Order to which the hon. member has referred and of the practice of the House. Hon. members know that a committee has the power to send for persons, papers and records. The fundamental question is whether a committee, without reference and submission to the House, has the authority to exercise that power in every case.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), in his question of privilege, suggests that the House should study immediately the problem posed by the refusal of CIDA's president to produce a certain document to the committee.

Can the committee, on its own, without reporting officially to the House, take any coercive steps against the witness? Can the committee, on its own authority, conclude in judgment: Down with Gérin-Lajoie? The Chair will have to think about it seriously.

[English]

For the moment, I think it would be the sense of the House that, rather than embark on an extended debate on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Greenwood, the Chair should be given an opportunity to reflect on the matter, taking into account the representations of the hon. member and the precedents, and then give a ruling later, perhaps tomorrow.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

First report, in both official languages, of Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.—Mr. Lachance.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine on a point of order.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, we did not hear the chairman of the committee as our electronic device was not working.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lafontaine may want to repeat the motion he made a moment ago when no one heard him.

Mr. Lachance: Yes, Mr. Speaker, provided the green light of the microphone lights up.

[Mr. Speaker.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

FAILURE OF BENEFICIARIES TO PICK UP CHEQUES AT EMERGENCY CENTRES DURING POSTAL STRIKE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. It is based on the fact that some 29,000 people, about 60 per cent of the claimants in the Metro Toronto area, as well as some 1,500 claimants in the Ottawa area and 472 in Hamilton, did not pick up their cheques which were available at emergency offices set up during the postal strike, all of which seriously questions the effectiveness and intent of the Unemployment Insurance Act as presently drafted to deal with possible abuse and misuse.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House instruct the Minister of Manpower and Immigration forthwith to give reasons in detail why he has not instituted a full inquiry under the Inquiries Act calling for an attendance at all the said emergency offices in order to investigate all circumstances surrounding the non-acquisition of benefit cheques by claimants, with specific instructions to report back outlining conclusions and recommendations, and further to give reason why no inquiry under the said act has been instituted in order to determine:

(a) whether fears about abuse and misuse under the Unemployment Insurance Act are justified;

(b) whether there are disincentives to work built into the present Unemployment Insurance Act and, if so, what can be done to remove or reduce them;

(c) whether the Unemployment Insurance Act is an insurance plan in reality, a welfare plan, or a combination of both to which contributions are simply a new kind of tax;

(d) the relationship between high unemployment insurance benefits, high job vacancy rates and high unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair takes the liberty, for the future guidance of hon. members, to suggest that it takes exception to the form of the hon. member's motion. That having been said, the House is invited to determine whether there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I gather there is disagreement.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity I move, seconded by the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Foster):

That this House expresses its desire that the proposed increases to war veterans allowances be approved at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: The motion moved by the hon. member under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: With the noise I am not sure whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I will ascertain again whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I believe there is unanimous consent, so the motion will be put. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE CENTRE

USE FOR RECENT INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF LIBERALS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek permission of the House under Standing Order 43 to move a motion arising out of a recent international conference held in the city of Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: If hon. members opposite will be patient I will read the proposed motion.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. There is noise coming from both sides of the House. In fairness, I think we should give an opportunity to the hon. member for Leeds to put his motion.

National Conference Centre

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I ask permission of the House to move, seconded by the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack):

That the Prime Minister advise the House who gave permission for use of the national conference centre for the recent international gathering of Liberals, whether or not the public treasury will be reimbursed for such use by the Liberal Party of Canada and whether or not it is now government policy to allow use of the national conference centre to international political movements at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. Prime Minister rises on a point of order.

Mr. Trudeau: It is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The House might be interested in knowing the answer to this, if it wants me to give the answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. Prime Minister has risen on a point of order. I am not sure whether the House would wish to hear him but, if so, he has the floor.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I rise to assuage the worries of the hon. member and to indicate that the Liberal Party of Canada is paying the expenses involved in the use of the centre. If the Tories ever want to do the same, I am sure they will be very welcome.

Mr. Bell: How about the second part of the question?

Mr. Cossitt: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, while I appreciate the Prime Minister clarifying the situation, would it not be in order for the Prime Minister to clarify whether the taxpayers of Canada have been reimbursed for his political flights all over the world on holidays and all over Canada to Liberal Party gatherings?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Sick!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please resume his seat. I ask hon. members for their co-operation. If hon. members want to spend the whole afternoon on alleged points of order and questions of privilege, I think that will not be conducive to any kind of constructive business. I appeal to hon. members to allow the Chair to call the next item of business. The hon. member rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I will take about five seconds to say this.

An hon. Member: Sick, sick!

Mr. Cossitt: I think I have a legitimate question of privilege when members like the Solicitor General and the Minister of Supply and Services yell across the floor, "sick, sick", and point their fingers to their heads, like this. It is they who will be sick after this election is over, good and sick.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think I might have a question of privilege, too. I do not want to go into the longstanding practice of the Prime Minister of the country being conveyed by transportation belonging to the government, whether it be by rail, by aircraft or by boat. I will stand by the accepted practice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: As I say, I will stand by the accepted practice, but I think I must add that I sometimes use commercial airlines when I find it is not inconvenient to the public, in the same way as I use my own private car. This being said, I want to point out once again that all members of the House, including Tories, use public transportation, use Department of National Defence aircraft and use Department of Transport aircraft, and not only to get to their ridings. I have seen several Tory frontbenchers on DND planes going overseas on several occasions, and I can name them if you want.

Mr. Bell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is electioneering by army helicopter that we object to.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I appeal to hon. members. It seems to me that this exchange cannot be constructive, and I wonder whether there is any point in pursuing the matter.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a point of order and of course I have to recognize him, but I appeal to hon. members to try to get on with the business of the House. It is my impression that there is important business to be transacted this afternoon.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is not a controversial one and has nothing to do with the motion that was turned down on which the Prime Minister spoke. I wish to lend my support to the previous motion moved under Standing Order 43 by a backbencher on the other side. In addition to increases in war veterans allowances, will he also press that the war veterans of this country be permitted to wear their decorations on formal occasions where the Queen or the Governor General of this country is involved?

● (1430)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order and with regard to the desire of the House to deal with the amendments improving the War Veterans Allowance Act, I would advise hon. members that the government is quite ready to put this legislation before the House tomorrow and in succeeding days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Cossitt.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Now that the House has disposed of the item, points of order, we will return to the item, motions.

GRAIN

PROSPECTIVE REMOVAL OF FEED GRAINS FROM CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to request the consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity in connection with the apparent decision of the government to undermine, if not emasculate, the Canadian Wheat Board in its equivocally worded and announced prospective policy regarding domestic feed grains. The motion I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), is:

That this House views with alarm the prospective removal of feed grains from the Canadian Wheat Board, and directs the government not to permit this to be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. member's motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Member: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I gather there is not unanimous consent. The motion therefore cannot be put. Is the right hon. gentleman rising on a point of order?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I could not hear what you said, having regard to the trumpet call of defeat that is apparent on the government side of the House today.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Assiniboia rises on the same point of order.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact we have had no legislation on this matter and in view of the fact the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) represents a grain area, as do many other members, particularly members from Saskatchewan, I wonder whether the government would reconsider its decision on the motion as the right hon. member for Prince Albert has stated a position contrary to the position taken by the official Conservative party? He is in agreement with the position of the NDP in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that is debate and not a point of order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED HOLDING OF ELECTIONS ON FIXED DATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to consider an urgent and important parliamentary matter.

Since the Canadian people wish to see the legislative action of an elected Parliament and since a majority of members have been elected to govern, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That the government introduce legislation which would enable Parliament to be elected on a set date for a determined period to ensure a satisfactory democratic operation of an elected Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

AGRICULTURE

RESULTS OF NEW DAIRY POLICY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House in order that in this spirit of unanimity and co-operation of the members, this House can hold a special debate on the impact of the new dairy policy, especially in Quebec, which is very much lacking and unsatisfactory for our Quebec producers.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that there is no unanimity in support of the motion of the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Fortin: I raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Under the terms of Standing Order 43, the Chair asks if there is unanimous consent. I have the feeling on this side of the House that it would be important to know where the opposition is coming from. I have heard that it comes from the Progressive Conservatives, but I would like to be sure, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may have heard so, but I have heard "no".

FISHERIES

GOVERNMENT POSITION IN NEGOTIATIONS FOR PURCHASE OF CASSIAR CANNERY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I seek the consent of the House to move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. The case of urgent and pressing necessity is the concern that secret negotiations may now be going on between the government and the owners of the Cassiar Cannery on the coast of British Columbia in an attempt to bring the cannery further under the control of Japanese interests. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That the government disclose forthwith the relationship it has with respect to the Cassiar Cannery near Prince Rupert, B.C., especially with reference to any current negotiations to purchase the said cannery.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Skeena?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

MARKETING OF FEED GRAINS BY CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the well worded motion of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the principle contained therein were turned down, I would like to move a similar motion. In view of the fact the official position of the Conservative party is to have feed grains on the open market, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Nesdoly):

That this House support orderly marketing of feed grains under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether the hon. member has the motion in writing. I see him writing now. Perhaps the hon. member will have the motion for tomorrow. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the twice-repeated statement on the part of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) concerning Conservative policy. I simply want to say this: While the spirit of unity moves, we have not yet come to a point where the NDP will make any announcements as to what is Conservative policy. They have been doing that for the Liberal party for some time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INSPECTION OF WEIGH SCALES

Question No. 477—Mr. Dick:

1. How many weigh scales have federal inspectors inspected in each of the past three years?

Order Paper Questions

2. How many federal inspectors does the government have for the purpose of inspecting weigh scales?

3. How much money was spent by the government for the inspecting of weigh scales in each of the past three years?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. The number of weights and measures devices inspected by Consumer and Corporate Affairs inspectors during the past three years is as follows: 1971, 324,726; 1972, 301,503; 1973, 291,606*.

2. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has 168 weights and measures inspectors.

3. Expenditures for the weights and measures subactivity over the last three fiscal years has been as follows: 1970-1971, $2,155,303; 1971-1972, $2,359,578; 1972-1973, $2,758,786.

*The yearly reductions in the number of weights and measures inspections reflects a thrust of the department in providing a more concentrated inspection coverage to those devices most commonly used or having high commercial importance in trade, with a view to reducing the potential economic inequity to the greatest degree possible. The design of commonly used devices is subject to frequent technological changes. These technological changes have brought into use electronic load cells, printout facility, etc. which greatly increases the average time required for inspection with a consequent reduction in the number of devices inspected by the same work force.

Advice and assistance have been sought as required from officials of the Department of External Affairs and the Treasury Board, during the course of the study. (b) Although the terms of reference of this study are classified, its general purpose is to identify, within the context of the broad defence objectives contained in the White Paper "Defence in the 70s", the specific objectives for the future development of the land and associated tactical air forces, and to examine choices as to the means by which these objectives might be attained. (c) There has been no participation from outside of the government Service.

Question No. 572—Mr. O'Sullivan:

1. Has the Department of Agriculture conducted a study into the availability of supplies of fertilizers using nitrogen during the current year?

[Mr. Dick.]

2. Are such fertilizers in short supply for farmers in Ontario, and in particular for those in Southern Ontario?

3. Is the Department aware as to whether such fertilizers are still being exported from Canada?

4. Has the Department of Agriculture conducted any studies into the numbers of fertilizers using nitrogen and, if so, what are the results of said studies?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Yes.

2. Demand for fertilizers, including those containing nitrogen, is greater than in previous years. The adequacy of supply to fill actual need will not be known until after planting time.

3. Fertilizer is being exported at a reduced rate to traditional markets while imports are also being made.

4. The supply and distribution of fertilizers is being monitored on a continuing basis, as to source and type of formulation, for example. In recent years there has been a trend to high nitrogen fertilizers such as anhydrous ammonia and nitrogen solutions.

Question No. 614—Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands):

1. What is the monthly allowance at the post-secondary level for Indian students who receive funding from the (a) Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (b) Department of Manpower and Immigration?

2. How much is allotted by each Department for dependents of these students?

4. Occupational Training for Adults rates are revised each July.

In so far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned, the reply is as follows:

1. (b) Nil.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

4. Not applicable.

*GRADING OF CATTLE

Question No. 622—Mr. Rynard:

1. How many cattle were graded for slaughter in the Toronto stockyards in the weeks of March 11, 1974 and March 18, 1974?

2. How many of these cattle were graded A1, A2, A3 and A4?

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the answer for this question is: 1. Slaughter cattle are not graded at public stockyards in Canada. Sorting of cattle as done at public stockyards, is referred to as "live grading", and is only an estimate of what cattle will grade when they are later slaughtered and graded at packing plants. March 11-16—5133 cattle sold; March 18-23—6587 cattle sold.

2. Sorting to estimated grades A1, A2, A3 and A4:

	March 11-16	March 18-23
A1, A2	2,724	3,930
A3	426	631
A4	27	41
Others	1,956	1,985

CBC—INCREASE IN AMOUNT OF GRANT TO MEET BUDGETARY NEEDS

Question No. 735—Mr. Reid:

Is the government giving consideration to increasing the amount of the CBC grant to meet its budgetary needs as a result of the restrictions on advertising imposed on CBC television and radio licences by CRTC and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): The report of the CRTC includes proposed conditions of licence only for the CBC. It is not yet certain that the proposed conditions will pertain. Should reduced involvement in advertising be attached as a condition of licence and should the CBC agree that this would not impede unreasonably the provision of national broadcasting service, it would appear that increased appropriations would be required to maintain the amount of and high quality of current CBC programming.

EFFECT OF SEISMIC OPERATIONS ON WILDLIFE—BATHURST ISLAND

Question No. 800—Mr. Firth:

Has the government concluded that the seismic operations planned by Panarctic Oils Ltd. on the southern part of Bathurst Island will not affect wildlife migration patterns and, if so, on the basis of what studies?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes. The conclusion was based on information provided by the representative on the Land Use Advisory Committee from the Canadian Wildlife Service and his information was founded on the research and cumulative expertise of several researchers in the Canadian Wildlife Service who have many years of field experience studying caribou and muskoxen.

REVENUE RECEIVED FROM SALE OF ALCOHOLIC PRODUCTS

Question No. 848—Mr. Howie:

How much revenue has the government received from the sale of alcoholic products for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973 and to date?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): According to our records, the gross revenue derived from excise duties and excise taxes on the sale of alcoholic beverages for the fiscal years 1972-73 and 1973-74 was as follows: 1972-73: $426,152,652.30; 1973-74: $452,477,328.41. The above amounts do not include revenue from the consumption or sales tax imposed by the Excise Tax Act, as such revenue is recorded in one account without any distinction as to source.

Question No. 850—Mr. Howie:

1. Will Canada accept an invitation extended by the Mayor and Council and be represented at Saint-Georges-des-Groseillers, France for the recognition of the wartime tragedy that was suffered by Canadian troops there on June 11, 1944 and the commemoration of Canada's wartime contribution by the renaming of one of that Town's streets "Rue des Canadiens"?

2. Will Canada send a delegation to the ceremonies and, if so, will consideration be given to including survivors of the wartime incident in the delegation?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1 and 2. As announced in the House on March 29, a Canadian delegation will participate, with other allied countries, in the ceremonies marking the thirtieth Anniversary of the landings in Normandy on June 6, 1944. These events will conclude on June 7 and the delegation will return to Canada the next day. The Department of Veterans Affairs has communicated with the Mayor of Saint-Georges-des-Groseillers, and has offered to assist the survivors of the Canadian units concerned to visit his community while they are in Normandy.

PROSECUTIONS FOR MISLEADING ADVERTISING

What are the latest statistics available on prosecutions for misleading advertising (a) the names of these companies (b) the number of times these companies have been charged and the number of convictions placed upon them?

Return tabled.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with reference to question No. 107. This question has been on the order paper since February 27. It is a very simple one. It seeks statistical information regarding the strength of federal government departments and agencies in Newfoundland, and I fail to see why I cannot get an answer.

Mr. Foster: I will be pleased to look into the matter and report to the hon. member soon.

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, on three different occasions, April 16, April 17 and May 6, I have called attention to the statement the parliamentary secretary made with respect to question No. 319. On April 15 the hon. member stated that it cost the taxpayers of this country $1.5 million to reply to this question which shows the inquiries of this government toward the women of Canada. I rose on a question of privilege on April 16 and 17 to protest the statement made by the parliamentary secretary on the ground that it interferes with the right of members to seek information from the government.

I deny that the statement he made is true. On April 17, the government House leader promised that the parliamentary secretary would furnish the House with an explanation of his extraordinary statement. I have now learned, in relation to my repeated requests for an answer to question No. 319, that answers had been prepared by departments and forwarded to the minister in March. It has since been discovered that personnel officers in the departments have been asked to inform parliamentary return officers how long it actually took to prepare the answers, the dates when they were completed, and when the answers went to the minister's office. It was also learned that there is an unwritten procedure by which, if an officer feels a question on the order paper would cost more than $200 to answer, he must inform the parliamentary returns officer who would then determine whether the preparation of an answer should be undertaken.

In the case of question No. 319 relating to salaries paid to women, no indication was in fact given that the cost of preparing the answer would exceed $200, and the answer was prepared without further consideration as a matter of routine procedure. The fact that questions were later asked with a view to finding out the date on which the answers were, in fact, ready, together with the fact that those responsible for preparing the answers did not inform the minister's assistant that the cost would exceed $200, makes it clear that the statement by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is false and misleading. If he does not withdraw, I ask the minister to apologize to the House for him, and if the minister does not have enough guts to withdraw that false statement, the Prime Minister might lower himself and withdraw on behalf of the chicken-hearted minister and his parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in regard to question No. 50. I have asked on several occasions in the House recently why this question has not been answered, what reason there was for the delay. The question has been on the order paper since away back in the last session. I had not intend to bring the matter up again today, but since the question concerns trips made by the Prime Minister to Liberal gatherings at public expense, and in light of the Prime Minister's obvious change of heart a few minutes ago in becoming price conscious on the eve of an election, I thought he might be prepared to let us know, this afternoon, when this question might be answered.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member has asked many questions about the expense of maintaining the Sussex Drive and Harrington Lake properties and all those questions have been answered except one, I believe, which concerns work that has only been completed recently. I can give the member a guarantee that, as the other questions have been answered, this one will be answered later this session.

Mr. Forrestall: Also on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I remind the parliamentary secretary that on a previous occasion I expressed concern that a series of questions on the order paper dated February 28 have not been answered, in particular, question No. 220 which asks why there is no audit of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in the report of the Auditor General. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could take note of this question, which is not starred but perhaps should be, and respond if we are here tomorrow.

Mr. Foster: I will be pleased to look into the matter the hon. member has raised. I would note that 54 per cent of all the questions placed on the order paper have been answered to date this session.

An hon. Member: Is that all?

REQUEST FOR INDICATION OF PROJECTED GROWTH IN GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT IN CURRENT DOLLARS

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the Minister of Finance refused five times yesterday to indicate the projected growth in the gross national product in current dollars, and in view of the vital importance of this information to labour, industry and consumers in formulating their plans, will the Prime Minister, as head of the government, provide the House with this information to which it is entitled?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the answers given yesterday by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the Prime Minister advise the House if there has been any other Minister of Finance in recent Canadian history who has denied the House of Commons this information, which is usually provided in the budget address and is automatically included in budget papers in other countries, including the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will permit me to take notice of that question, I will get some historians to track down the answer.

Mr. Hellyer: Is it a fact that the Department of Finance has prepared a secret report on which the budget figures are based, indicating an inflation figure so outrageously high that its publication would affect public expectations, labour settlements and the political prospects of the government?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. The only thing that is outrageously high is the smell of the questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Trinity will be recognized on a further supplementary, but if hon. members want to ask further supplementaries they will have to wait until we have completed the first round of questioning. The hon. member for Trinity is recognized for a supplementary.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, it is not a supplementary; it is a question of privilege. It does occur to me that the Prime Minister might practice being a little more gracious and reasonable if he intends to appeal to the more moderate members of the electorate.

[Mr. Foster.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to practice that advice for one more day, but I should like to indicate that many, many allegations are made in the form of questions such as the hon. member just raised—

Mr. Nielsen: They are made in answers, too.

Mr. Trudeau: —and I would suggest that these allegations, almost all unfounded, are a way of spreading rumours that is deleterious to the democratic process.

ENERGY

OIL—ACTION TO COLLECT EXPORT CHARGE IF PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION BILL NOT PASSED

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and arises from his answer yesterday to the effect that if the petroleum administration bill is not passed there will be no authority for the collection of the export charge. In view of the fact there are a great many precedents for taxes having been collected after dissolution because of a notice of ways and means motion having been filed, or even simply by announcing that legislation is to be passed and the tax collected in the meantime, I want to ask the minister what action he proposes to take to ensure that the export charge can be collected by the government?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the opinion I have is to the opposite effect, namely, that if there is a ways and means motion it will die, along with all other measures before parliament, if the government is defeated, and there will not even be a constitutional basis for collecting such taxes.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister will get an opinion from the Department of Justice because this opinion flies in the face of all the precedents. As a matter of fact, the bill has not been defeated; it is before a committee of the House. I now ask the minister directly whether he is prepared to file notice of a ways and means motion today to extend the present notice of ways and means from June 1 to September 1 or October 1?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. gentleman that we are talking about a notice of ways and means which, like all other proceedings in this parliament, will die if parliament is dissolved.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether any one of the oil companies operating in Canada has told the minister that it is not prepared to pay the export charge?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think they are waiting to see whether or not hon. gentlemen are going to carry out their threat of plunging the country into an election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FINANCE

APPLICATION OF ANTI-PROFITEERING BILL TO FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Could he tell the House whether the legislative proposals will forbid the financial institutions from making higher profits, as we are experiencing now due to the practice that consists in causing prices to rise and therefore, increasing the cost of living and inflation; in the affirmative, will new conditions be included to this effect in the bill in respect of combines investigation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would refer to the bill on profiteering practices now before the House, he would find that, indeed it contains provisions to prevent excess profits when, in certain conditions, they are being derived from the broadening of the margin between costs and prices.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Would the right hon. Prime Minister tell us also whether current financial business practices are questionable, or whether they are considered acceptable and harmless as regards the causes of inflation and rise in the cost of living?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, certain practices are no doubt unacceptable and this is why we have before the House two bills, one on profiteering and the other on competition, which would give the government authority to act and prevent such practices, and this is still another reason—and I am grateful to the hon. member for the opportunity—why we feel this legislation should be enacted before dissolution.

INCREASES IN GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES AND REVENUES—THE BUDGET AND INFLATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance that is supplementary to the question asked by my hon. friend from Trinity. It is in response to the urging of the Prime Minister that members of the opposition provide correct information. Since 1968 the increase in government spending has been 136.9 per cent, and the minister's latest budget indicates that expenditures are up by 22 per cent and revenues on a national accounts basis are up by 26 per cent. I ask the minister whether he will have one of his colleagues who is to speak this afternoon in the limited time left to the government give some reasons, other than the flimsy ones advanced by the minister, why his budget is not in fact a very inflationary budget?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will be addressing himself to that subject, and in analysing the forecast of expenditures for 1974-75 will indicate on a factual basis that the increase for goods and services projected by the federal government is 12 per cent. When he goes through the accounting for the benefit of the House and the country, I think the hon. member will have some homework done for him that he might have done before putting his question.

AVAILABILITY OF LOANS TO FARMERS—RESULT OF MINISTER'S DISCUSSIONS WITH BANKS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Some time ago the minister stated he would hold discussions with officials of the banks of Canada to ensure that under the Farm Improvement Loans Act money would be available for farmers, in view of the fact that some banks seem to be unwilling to lend money by way of farm improvement loans. Has the minister had these discussions and, if so, what was the outcome?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall be giving that information to the hon. member's colleague, the hon. member for Lisgar, and I will send him a copy of the letter.

ALLEGATION BY FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD THAT POULTRY PRODUCERS MAKING EXORBITANT PROFITS—EXPORTS OF FERTILIZER

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Because the government has based so much of its struggle against inflated food prices on encouraging in every way increased Canadian food production, does the minister meekly accept, or is he prepared to publicly challenge, allegations by the government's Food Prices Review Board that through marketing boards and other means Canadian producers are receiving exorbitant profits, especially on eggs and other poultry products?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, it would take too long in the House to correct the erroneous and inflammatory suggestions that the Globe and Mail had in its paper today. But I will be issuing a news release later today.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which has to do with food production. As food production is also greatly affected by the price and availability of fertilizer, can the minister indicate what percentage of fertilizer supplies is being exported by Canada to help developing nations, as indicated by the Minister of Finance in his budget address?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, this has been a long-standing practice by the government of Canada and a lot of plants were purposely developed to produce fertilizer for the developing countries. This is one way we can aid them in a better form than we ever did before. Exports have continued to these countries which are in need. I am sure no hon. member would want to see those countries placed in a worse situation than they are at present with starvation a reality, something we do not have in this country. The production of some of our plants this year has increased by a quarter of a million tons. Plants, to my knowledge, have been operating seven days a week, 24 hours a day to produce the products needed here and in other parts of the world. I will be making a complete statement on this matter shortly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I should bring to the attention of hon. members that a large number of members are rising on both sides of the House to ask questions and supplementaries. There will be a limited time for questions and there will be other important business later this afternoon, so some hon. members will have to be disappointed. I do not think we should have too many supplementaries. For the moment, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Lisgar.

EGGS—IMPOSITION OF IMPORT CONTROLS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Now that Bill C-4, the Export and Import Permits Act amendment, has been passed, I should like to ask whether the bill is to be used, in what manner it will be used, whether there will be controls, and what kind of controls will be imposed for the situation immediately at hand, which is the egg problem.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there should be a release in every member's mailbox at this time indicating that permits will be required for imports of turkeys and eggs as of midnight tonight, May 8, 1974.

REVENUE LOSS BECAUSE OF CORPORATE TAX CUT AND FASTER WRITE-OFFS LAST YEAR

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact the Deputy Minister of Finance said on Monday that he would try to inform us by the next day, yesterday, of the estimated loss of revenue because of the corporate tax cut for manufacturers and processors and the fast write-offs, has the minister now checked with his deputy minister and, if so, is he in a position to supply us with that information today?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I gave that answer rather fully yesterday to the Leader of the Opposition and to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Nystrom: Can the Minister of Finance assure the House that he will be giving us that figure within the next few days and, preferably, before the end of this month?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If there is a House then, I can give that assurance.

INQUIRY WHETHER BILL C-22 WILL BE AMENDED

Miss Monique Bégin (Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare to clarify the strategy with respect to Canadian football or opposition football. Would the minister explain to the House the circumstances of his statement when he suggested he was prepared to amend Bill C-22 and say what those circumstances were?

Mr. Speaker: The minister may answer briefly the question put by the hon. member for Saint-Michel. Normally, if the minister has substantive information to give to the House that should be done on motions but the minister will be recognized briefly.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the policy of this government on that was quite clear throughout the debate. The committee of the House passed the bill yesterday and I want to state categorically that I do not consider the possibility of any amendments to the bill as approved by the committee yesterday.

EFFECT OF PERSONAL INCOME TAX CUT ON STANDARD OF LIVING

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The night before last the minister stated that an opportunity is at hand to improve the standard of living of every Canadian. Is the minister satisfied that the personal tax cut, which is equivalent to a reduction of 98 cents a week for the ordinary Canadian, will fight inflation and improve his standard of living when his real wages are down by nearly $3 a week?

INCLUSION OF RUGBY FOOTBALL IN LEGISLATION BANNING OPERATION IN CANADA OF WORLD FOOTBALL LEAGUE

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is supplementary to a previous question asked on football. I direct my supplementary to the Prime Minister in respect of the fumbled football bill. I ask the Prime Minister, as a patron of rugby football in this country, why the government allowed a bill to be introduced into this House denying rugby football its rightful place, while he himself acts as a patron of that sport?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no intention to prevent the many sports in which I participate in Canada from being played in Canada. The purpose of this bill, if the hon. member wants to read the 18 speeches made by the opposition, is completely different from the one he suggests.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, apparently the Prime Minister completely misunderstood my question. In that the Prime Minister is a patron of rugby football in Canada, will he look at the definition provided in the bill which excludes that particular sport; and why is he acting as a patron of rugby football while he allows one of his ministers to deny it what is its rightful place? I point out that the Grey Cup is inscribed "for amateur rugby football" in Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I may have misunderstood the question, but I suggest that the hon. member misunderstands the bill. It is not intended to prevent any sport flourishing in Canada. On the contrary, it is to help the flourishing of sport in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. I remind hon. members that we will be running short of time very soon. The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): When I get order, I will speak, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister has indicated that probably I do not understand the bill. If he would refer to the definitions in the bill he would find out that rugby and soccer have been excluded, thereby denying to amateur sports in this country what is rightfully theirs. I am not the one who misunderstands the bill; it is the Prime Minister who does not know what it is all about.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and is supplementary to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour concerning the George Derby Hospital lands. The minister indicated yesterday he could not give an assurance that those lands would be returned to the municipality of Burnaby. Would he assure the House today, in view of the fact that the lands were obtained for a nominal sum by the federal government, that he will enter into negotiations with the municipality of Burnaby for the balance of these Derby lands?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this question with the Burnaby authorities and they are well aware that I have this responsibility. I spoke to them recently and they know what the process will be.

Mr. Leggatt: My supplementary question is exactly the same as my first question, because I did not get an answer to my first question. Would the minister indicate whether he will now enter into negotiations with the municipality of Burnaby? Will he give that assurance to the House?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Negotiations will be entered into at the appropriate time.

SHIPPING STRIKE AT WHITE PASS—ACTION TO SETTLE DISPUTE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development based on the many representations, including my own, which I know he has received concerning the very serious shipping strike at White Pass, constituting, as it does, the sea lifeline to the Yukon from Vancouver. Has he consulted his colleague, the Minister of Labour, with respect to bringing his good offices to bear and bringing the parties back together again so they will start speaking and, if so, what is happening in that regard and what is the likelihood of the parties getting together again?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to say to the hon. member that I have contacted the Minister of Labour, who is always very diligent, and I can say that the parties will be meeting on Friday, at which time I hope the difficulty will be resolved. I thank the Minister of Labour for his good work.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

RETROACTIVITY OF INCREASE IN ALLOWANCES

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I was pleased to learn of the increase in war veterans allowances, but I am anxious to know what is the retroactive increase for both single and married veterans.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the increase which will become effective retroactively will be $56 for single veterans and $96 for married veterans.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

COST TO TAXPAYERS OF MAINTAINING PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICIAL RESIDENCES IN LIGHT OF RENOVATIONS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is related to the question which was asked earlier by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka and it relates to improving the standard of living of Canadians. I should like to direct it to the Minister of Finance. In light of the fact that almost $300,000 of the taxpayers' money has been spent since 1968, at the rate of $50,000 a year, on renovating and, presumably, modernizing the Prime Minister's official residence, why is it still costing the taxpayer more than $10,000 a year to maintain that residence, not counting the one at Harrington Lake?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Can the minister indicate whether the 26 per cent increase in government expenditures forecast in the budget was to have been relfected in government expenditures on renovating and maintaining the residence at 24 Sussex Drive, in the estimates that they might have been planning?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. gentleman adopts that tack in the election campaign.

CEILING ON INTEREST RATES ON STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Since chartered banks are reluctant to make loans to students because of the rate ceiling of 7¼ p. 100 under the current legislation applying in their case instead of the generally recognized rate of 13½ p. 100 in business in general is the minister considering taking the necessary steps to remedy that situation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I will give that matter very serious consideration, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

ADHERENCE BY RUSSIA AND JAPAN TO WHALING QUOTAS—REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 3, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he could indicate if the 14-nation International Whaling Commission's ruling that quotas must be cut by 25 per cent has been adhered to by Russia and Japan, or whether these two nations are still indiscriminately overfishing endangered species such as Atlantic sperm whales and mink whales. Can he tell the House if these two nations have been overfishing, and what objections have been raised by Canada with the two countries concerned regarding this practice? He stated he would give me an answer on Monday. Today is Wednesday. Is the minister now in a position to reply to that question?

[Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan).]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada has requested that the Soviet Union and Japan reconsider their refusals to accept the International Whaling Commission's quotas, pointing out the inconsistency of these refusals with the general objectives pursued by Canada and the majority of the members of the International Whaling Commission.

SPORTS

SUGGESTED INCONSISTENCY IN GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING FOOTBALL LEGISLATION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare this question. In light of his statement in committee yesterday and his reply today, would he undertake to let us know if he changes his mind again on the football bill—although two trips to Damascus are rather rare!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to refer the hon. member to the record of the committee yesterday, where I said I did not believe that the proposal of the opposition was workable. I still do not believe it today. It is not workable, and it will remain unworkable; so far as I am concerned, the bill will remain as it is.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

POSSIBILITY OF EARLY DISSOLUTION—CERTAIN WORDS OF PRIME MINISTER DURING LAST ELECTION—PRESENT POSITION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact there has been some speculation in the papers that there might be an election in the next little while, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if those memorable words of his uttered on October 30 at the time of the last election will be repeated by him at seven minutes after six tonight, or whenever the vote is taken, to support the philosophical bent for which he has become so well known to Canadians as expressed in his words that the universe is unfolding as it should?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that if the universe were unfolding as it should members of the opposition would be asking more questions than they are about the expenses at Stornoway as opposed to those at 24 Sussex Drive.

An hon. Member: Our leader is preparing it for you, Pierre.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

MULTICULTURALISM

REQUEST FOR POLICY ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact it is a month or so since I complied with the minister's request for a copy of our background paper on multiculturalism, could the minister indicate whether today, prior to the vote or somewhere near that time, he intends to announce a meaningful policy on multiculturalism?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I found no inspiration at all in the document that was sent to me.

AIRPORTS

PICKERING—TERMS OF REFERENCE OF INQUIRY COMMISSION

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In light of growing fears that the airport inquiry commission looking into the Pickering airport question is unable to make recommendations to the government respecting the need for and location of such an airport, would the minister assure the House that the terms of reference tabled in this House on June 21, 1973, by himself will not be restricted by a subsequent document, P.C. 1973-3026, and that any such restriction will be eliminated?

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Cafik: There is a lot of order over here, but not much over there.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rose to ask a question.

Mr. Cafik: Will the minister ensure that any such restriction will be eliminated, through appropriate amendments in the latter document, to ensure a full inquiry in keeping with the commitment made to the House?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we must remember that we had to establish the commission under the Inquiries Act because certain powers were needed by the commissioners. I think the intent was to have the location and need inquired into by this commission. I will be happy to look into the order in council to see if it really reflects the resolution which was tabled in the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must seek the co-operation of hon. members because soon we will be running short of time. I would hope we could eliminate a number of supplementaries. However, with the co-operation of hon. members, the hon. member for Ontario will be recognized for a supplementary, after which I will see the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, then the hon. member for Timiskaming, and try to move on as quickly as we can.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, this is a terribly important question to the people involved, and I think it is a matter of interpretation by the commissioners as to how they interpret the original document. In response to a written request for information from them, I am led to believe that they interpret it in a restrictive way—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course, this is argument; it is hardly a supplementary.

Mr. Atkey: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am reluctant to do so but exactly the same question as was asked by the hon. member for Ontario was put to the Minister of Transport by the opposition some months ago, and the unequivocal answer of the minister at that time was no. He should have the courage to say no on this occasion.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is a fair representation. A few months ago I was asked if I was ready to change the terms of reference, and I answered no. Now I am asked if the document filed with the House is the same as the terms reflected in the order in council. My answer is that I am going to look into it and I hope it reflects this document.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR DEPARTMENTAL CO-OPERATION TO REDUCE LAY-OFFS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. It relates to the lay-off of 2,700 employees in the Department of National Defence under the federal labour-intensive winter employment program. Can the minister or any of his colleagues give the House some indication of the level of co-operation between his department and other departments which engaged temporary help under FLIP during the winter months to ensure that the labour market will not have 30,000 or 40,000 people thrust upon it who sought and gained employment under that program during the past winter? What is the level of co-operation, and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would allow the minister to reply to the question.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, I explained to the House yesterday that the program was temporary but that we are attempting to retain as many employees as possible of those who were employed under the winter works program under our regular budget, and for National Defence that amounts to some 330 people.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member is rising on a point of order, I would bring it to his attention that we have just a few minutes left before the end of the question period.

Mr. Forrestall: It is not a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask the minister whether there is any deliberate attempt to work into this program the beginning of the summer employment programs with respect to hirings by his department and by other departments.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot reply for the other departments, but in my own case we are developing a student employment program for the summer and it is not directly related to the winter program. It would not be fair to the students to have some of their jobs taken away by others who were employed in the winter.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING SUBSIDY—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO PRACTICES OF PACKING PLANTS INVOLVING COMMUNITY SALES

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture related to the subsidy on beef. Since the DES restriction has been put on beef imports the subsidy has been reduced. When does the minister intend to remove the subsidy totally, a subsidy that has been causing a great deal of unfavourable disruption in northern Ontario? Secondly, is he undertaking an investigation to ascertain whether or not unfair advantage has been taken by the Toronto packing plants with respect to those involved in community sales?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say that the price of beef has gone up only about 4 cents a pound since we initiated the subsidy program, and even with the subsidy the beef producers are barely meeting their costs of production at the present time, no matter what anyone says. The subsidy program may be causing some problems in some parts of Canada, but the response I get from most people is that they want the subsidy left on until they get their costs of production out of their product. What was the other question?

Mr. Peters: It was about monitoring the packing plants to ascertain whether or not advantage has been taken of prices at community sales that do not reflect the subsidy.

Mr. Whelan: I apologize for not answering that question earlier. A complete audit of the books will be taking place later. Some auditing is taking place at the present time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED DISCREPANCIES IN APPLICATION OF $500 SALARY INCREASE FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board, notice of which I have already given him. It concerns the discrepancies that exist between program administrators of the Economic Security Employees National Association and other civil servants in that these people did not receive the $500 increase that was recently awarded to other members of the Public Service. Can the minister tell the House if he is aware of these discrepancies, and what action does he intend to take to correct them?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think the House will recall that the $500 compensation is to be paid to those who were signatories to long-term contracts which had not yet expired. For those that had expired and in respect of which new negotiations, in light of current conditions, were taking place, the $500 was not awarded. The group in question falls into that area. The question in my mind is whether the arbitrator took current conditions adequately into account in making his award, and perhaps we should ascertain this.

Mr. Carter: Can the minister explain the discrepancies that exist with respect to the recent settlement awarded to fire-fighters at airports in that in one province, British Columbia, the settlement was 38.5 per cent for a 26-month period and in Saskatchewan and the Atlantic provinces it was 22.22 per cent over the same period?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I do not think a settlement has been reached; it is proceeding to arbitration.

HOUSING

ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES IN FINANCING STUDENT CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING—REQUEST THAT CMHC REPORT BE MADE PUBLIC

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that the minister received last September the long-awaited report of CMHC respecting alleged irregularities in the financing of student co-operative housing in Toronto and other Ontario cities, which is close to seven months ago, is the minister now willing to make that report public so that appropriate action can be taken against wrongdoers, and so those persons who are innocent and have been dragged into the mess through a public whispering campaign can be exonerated?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my answer was that it would not be made public but it would be submitted to the law officers of the Crown, which has been done.

Mr. Atkey: In view of the fact the report has been submitted to the law officers of the Crown, would the minister be willing to indicate what charges, against what persons, are going to be levelled or what other disciplinary action may be taken against any body, federal or provincial, of which he has knowledge?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I have knowledge that the association of architects in Ontario is taking action. The rest of the question should properly be addressed to my colleagues, the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would draw to the attention of hon. members that we have come to the end of the question period. The hon. member is seeking a supplementary and will be recognized for that purpose. With the consent of the House, I will recognize rather quickly the hon. member for Verdun and the hon. member for Fraser Valley East.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I take it the question has been referred to the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice. I wonder if either of those hon. gentlemen could indicate to the House and to the public the charges and the names of the individuals charged with irregularities in the financing of student co-operative housing, and perhaps the disposition of the charges that have been laid at their instance or the instance of any of the provincial Attorneys General.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I know the investigation is well under way but I am not sure now whether charges have yet been laid.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGATION THAT BENEFITS CONSTITUTE DISINCENTIVE TO WORK—GOVERNMENT REACTION

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the concern expressed earlier in a motion under Standing Order 43, and in light of the fact that in Ontario a person who is married, with two children, can draw considerably more income on welfare than on unemployment insurance, and the inference that unemployment insurance is a disincentive to the Canadian worker, can the minister tell me whether he has come to the conclusion that this is an insult to the integrity of the Canadian worker?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very definite exploitation by the actions of the few people who might on occasion have attempted to take advantage of the situation. The evidence certainly is that by far the vast majority of people are not taking illegitimate advantage of unemployment insurance and in fact wish to see it administered firmly and fairly. We think that the commission is doing a fine job in that way.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to appeal to hon. members as we have reached the end of the question period. I thought we might have a quick question from the hon. member for Verdun and the hon. member for Fraser Valley East. I know that hon. members realize we are operating on short time, but there is to be a ringing of the bells later this afternoon and if we take too much time now we are denying hon. members a chance to participate in the important debate later this afternoon. I wonder if it might not be better if we called orders of the day now. The hon. member is asking for a supplementary, and the hon. member for Fraser Valley East has been waiting for a few days to ask a question. The hon. member for Hamilton West has a question of privilege. If all will agree to wait until tomorrow, I will call orders of the day.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Alexander: No, Mr. Speaker; I just want to relate to you that I have forgone my question of privilege seeing that they are playing hanky-panky on the other side.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 7, consideration of the motion of Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; the amendment of Mr. Lambert, Edmonton West (p. 2105) and the amendment of Mr. Lewis (p. 2110).

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at ten o'clock last evening when I called the hour for the adjournment of the debate I was dealing with the speech made by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). I should like to elaborate on the general point I was making at the time.

I listened with the greatest interest, along with my colleagues, waiting to find out what it was the Tory Party was putting up by way of alternatives to the policies proposed by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). I waited in vain, Mr. Speaker. May I say that on this particular occasion the burden of proof is quite different from that of an ordinary debate in this chamber. Under ordinary circumstances, when the government is in office the function of the opposition is to try to get government to defend its policies and to explain them. On this occasion, the purpose of the motions put forward by both opposition parties is to defeat the government, to go to the country and seek a mandate from the people. Under these circumstances, the opposition on both sides has an obligation to make it very clear to the public not only where the government has failed but what they would put in place by way of alternative policies.

Yesterday I listened carefully to the speech of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and particularly to that of the hon. member for Don Valley who represents the constituency next to mine and part of which I at one time represented. The hon. member for Don Valley is a very distinguished academic, a former professor. At one time I think he was chairman of the Economic Council of Ontario. With this background, I think we could have expected something better than we heard yesterday, which was a philosophical dissertation on the evils of inflation and how there must be a better way. I sympathized with him as I listened. It is tough to move from being an academic into the realities of public office. I hope that some day my hon. friend will make the transition, because he did not get very far yesterday. All I learned yesterday is that the hon. member is worried and concerned about inflation.

I am sure he is concerned. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is concerned. The Minister of Finance is concerned. I am concerned. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is concerned. We are all concerned. We do not need to be told, in this House of Commons, to be concerned about the problems of inflation. What we want to know is what the answers are. The hon. gentleman, in the tradition of the opposition, said, "I am not going to expose my ideas and be torn apart, the way I am tearing the ideas of the Minister of Finance apart. Not for me. I am going to reserve my position." I say to the House through you, Mr. Speaker, that that is not good enough under these circumstances.

Let me give the hon. gentleman a word of advice. I agree with him that inflation is going to be an important issue in the forthcoming election, if one is called soon. The people of Canada will want to know what his party would do about it. They are not going to be satisfied that he is concerned and worried, and they are not going to be satisfied that the Leader of the Opposition is concerned and worried. They want to know.

These are some of the questions they would like to have answered. Would the Tory Party freeze wages or would they control wages and, if so, how? Would they freeze prices? Would they control prices and, if so, how? It is not good enough, I suggest to my hon. friend from Don Valley, to talk vaguely about an incomes policy. He and I both know an incomes policy can mean anything or nothing. Let me therefore go into the position of the Tory Party as it has been revealed in the past, to see if we can get any clue as to what that party would do given the responsibility of office.

At about the time the Leader of the Opposition took over the leadership of the Conservative Party he seemed to press for the acceptance of price and incomes guidelines for all sectors of the economy, on a voluntary basis. Then on January 31, 1971, speaking at the Agudath Israel's Men's Club, he said that there is——a lot of loose talk about wage and price controls—even cabinet ministers are mentioning it these days—as the answer to price stability for Canada.

● (1540)

That was the position of the Leader of the Opposition back on January 31, 1971. Then he said this about such controls:

They would cause untold resentment among groups and individuals who felt unfairly done by, and they would result in a climate of constant confrontation. In addition, of course, they would inevitably lead to a highly centralized, and therefore inefficient, form of economic planning.

That was the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Paproski: Yes, but the inflation rate then was 2 per cent.

Mr. Sharp: Let us turn to the position taken by the hon. member for Don Valley at that time. He wrote an article which was printed in the Toronto Telegram in April, 1971, in which he said he did not believe that wage and price controls were "effective anti-inflation measures". He warned that they "would create far more problems than they might solve", were extremely difficult to administer, could only possibly be effective if they were applied over all segments of the economy and were widely accepted. Furthermore, he asserted that controls "inevitably bring rationing".

Now we go to the summer and fall of 1972. The Leader of the Opposition switched his position. I do not think the hon. member for Don Valley would deny that he, personally, sold his leader and his party on a switch in policy, on a switch involving abandoning the position advocated earlier in favour of price and wage controls. So the Leader of the Opposition asserted in the federal election campaign of 1972 that a Tory government would have the courage to impose price and income controls for a temporary period if circumstances made such a course necessary.

On February 8, 1973, 11 days before the introduction of the budget, the hon. member for Don Valley acknowledged, in replying to a question, that controls could only be adopted on the basis of a national emergency and he did not think that one existed. Two weeks after that, after asserting that a national emergency required the imposition of controls but that an emergency did not exist, the hon. member for Don Valley rose in the budget debate to say on behalf of his party that a 90-day freeze should be imposed, and under a Tory government would have been imposed, on "wages, prices, dividends and incomes". During that 90-day freeze, a Conservative government would have consulted with the provinces, labour leaders and business and consumer groups "to work out an economic stabilization program that would achieve controlling the price rises in this nation".

In the same budget debate, the Leader of the Opposition suggested that his party was proposing only a temporary program of controls. But the hon. member for Don Valley did not take that position. In debating the motion on May 10, the hon. member indicated that he was proposing more than a temporary measure. He said it had become evident within the past two or three years that there was a series of power groups in Canada who did not respond as they should in a properly competitive market. He said his party believed that "an incomes policy has to be an integral part of our monetary and fiscal policy if this country is going to operate with full employment and reasonably stable prices".

Mr. Gillies: That is true.

Mr. Sharp: So, what is the position of the Tory Party on the crucial issue of controls?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It is wishy-washy.

Mr. Sharp: The conclusion I have come to is this: the establishment wing of the Tory Party—I do not know which part of the country it exists in; I know it does not exist in western Canada and I doubt if it exists in the maritime provinces—believes in over-all price and wage controls. They intend to apply them if they come to power. However, they are faced with such unalterable opposition within their own party that they suspect what is true, that if they were to reveal the intention of the Conservative government to impose over-all price and wage controls, to freeze prices for 90 days and wages for 90 days, the country would reject them; they would not elect a single member from here, east and west.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: The public would accept the analysis the Prime Minister made yesterday, that wages would be frozen at low levels and prices at high levels. At the recent Tory convention, all of us observed the problem of price and wage controls coming up, when it was decided to sweep the subject under the carpet in order not to make it too obvious and to keep the appearance of unity even though the party is deeply divided on this issue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: I would draw the attention of the House not only to the divisions within the federal part of the party, but let me read what the Premier of Alberta said on this issue. He said that the federal party's demands for wage and price controls to combat inflation would hurt pensioners and people on fixed incomes. The implication is that Mr. Lougheed would prefer the party to campaign on some other basis. So now they retreat to that vague generality, an incomes policy. I challenge the Leader of the Opposition in the speech he will be making, I am sure, after I sit down to define his position in terms which can be understood provided, of course, that he understands the advice he has received from the hon. member for Don Valley.

Now let me state the position of the government on this issue so there is no reason for any doubt as to where we stand. We are opposed to the application of over-all price and wage controls to combat the kind of inflation from which the world and this country are now suffering. In our view, the system would not work. It would produce serious social unrest since it could not be applied fairly, across the board. There would be shortages and it would soon be abandoned, leaving the situation worse than it was before the program was introduced.

Mr. Gillies: Where else in the world is there 11 per cent inflation?

Mr. Sharp: I come to the other aspect of the criticism of the Tory Party on the budget, its position on fiscal and monetary policy. Let me review briefly the stand of the Tory Party on this issue since this parliament was elected 18 months ago. I go back to November 20, 1972, when the hon. member for Don Valley was speaking to the Empire Club of Toronto. He maintained that both fiscal and monetary policy should be highly expansionary. During the budget debate on February 23, 1973, the Leader of the Opposition declared:

> This budget is not an expansionary budget, much less a visionary one . . . It is a fiction for the Minister of Finance to say that this is an expansionary budget that will generate the jobs needed to substantially cut into unemployment.

The hon. member for Don Valley contended that the deficit projected in the budget "has little likelihood of moving the country forward in the way in which it ought to go." He was particularly skeptical of the budgetary forecast of an employment increase of 300,000 in 1973. The actual figure, as the House knows is 430,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You can squirm all you like, but you are in deep trouble.

Mr. Sharp: However, he went on to say that a Conservative government would have brought down a budget providing for a deficit on a national accounts basis somewhat over 2½ times as much as the deficit which the Minister of Finance suggested.

Mr. Trudeau: No wonder he did not think much of our budgetary deficit.

● (1550)

Mr. Sharp: This is the same member who just yesterday in the course of his remarks said:

> I find it incredible that in Canada, in the year in which we have inflation rates at 10 per cent, the government has increased spending by the dimensions we have witnessed.

I come to the question that was raised earlier in the question period, to which the Minister of Finance replied and said I would discuss this increase in expenditures this year over last. The hon. member for Don Valley, like so many of his colleagues who are trying to misrepresent the situation, said this:

> According to the budget this year, the government is to increase the tax take by 25 per cent.

Let us look at the expenditure figures and the taxes he is talking about. If we look at the content of the expenditures that have been put forward by the government this year, we find that a very high proportion of them are related to measures to combat inflation by offsetting increases in prices. A great deal more is involved in expenditures which do not come from the general taxpayer, having to do with the equalization of oil prices across this country. I have had some calculations made on this question. Let us look, for example, on the basis of national accounts, at how much increased expenditure is related to the oil export tax and related expenditures in eastern Canada to equalize the price. The total amount involved there is $1,240 million. There are more expenditures that will be involved in equalization payments to the provinces arising out of the efforts of the government to equalize the cost of petroleum throughout this country and to keep down the price of oil in eastern Canada.

If you look at the other related expenditures dealing with inflation and the efforts of the government to combat inflation, and take such expenditures out of the totals—which any fair-minded critic of this government would do—the total increase in expenditures this year over last year is 10.9 per cent. It is not 26 per cent, but 10.9 per cent—just about in line with the increase in the gross national product of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: May I return to the sudden switch in position of fiscal and monetary policies. The hon. member for Edmonton West, speaking in the budget debate last year, was less conservative than the hon. member for Don Valley. He wanted to increase government expenditures up to a deficit of $2½ billion to $3 billion. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) said his colleagues were much too conservative, and he wanted a budget deficit of $4 billion. In a press release issued by the hon. member for Don Valley, commenting on the last annual report of the Bank of Canada he said this on behalf of his party:

> There is a growing evidence that the finance department and the Bank of Canada are not seriously committed to creating full employment and are going to shift both fiscal and monetary policy to fight inflation by constraining demand and stalling maximum job creation.

He further said:

> —it is nonsense to head towards restraint in fear of excess demand later this year—

This is the hon. member who is now saying that this government is making too much money. I now come to the reversal, the startling about-face on September 10, 1973, in the debate on inflation. The hon. member cryptically asserted this:

> We apparently had the incredible situation last year of operating with a deficit in the middle of a high inflationary situation because the forecasts were apparently not correct; we did not know where we stood.

That one I can underline: they did not know where they stood. They still do not know.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: It is important that the people of this country know exactly what the party opposite has been proposing. They are going to make a serious bid for the support of the people of Canada, and this is the record they are going to put before the people and demand a vote of confidence. Surely not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Maybe they can go through another rationalization and say the circumstances were different; they can change their minds in a few days or a few weeks and say that there has been a fundamental change in the position. What nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: As far as I can see, Mr. Speaker, the policies proposed by the members of the party opposite have been pure expediency. They have been thought up on the spur of the moment. They sway backward and forward from a restrictive policy to an expansionary policy, backward and forward in accordance with what they think are the winds of popular opinion.

As a former minister of finance, may I say that the task before any minister of finance is very, very difficult. May I add that the task before any minister of finance of any country, Canada or any other, in these troubled times of worldwide inflation and political and economic instability is a task of overwhelming difficulty. I want to say to my colleague that he has performed this task with great skill and courage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Sharp: If one were to listen to the colleagues of the hon. member for Don Valley who have not tried to make this transition into public life, what are the comments which the economists, who take an impartial and not a partisan view, have made? What do they say about the budget? "Sensible." "Responsible." They may have made some slight changes. There are some things which might have improved it. No economist agrees with any other economist, but a lot are agreeing with the Minister of Finance because he has produced the kind of budget that is appropriate to the circumstances facing this country at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: The opposition parties can afford to be irresponsible under most circumstances. I suggest they cannot afford to be irresponsible now, however irresponsible they have been in the past. They can talk vaguely about an incomes policy, wage and price controls, fiscal and monetary policies, restraining government expenditures, and then propose big increases in expenditures, tax cuts and balanced budgets. They can talk irresponsibly. That is part of their privilege. However, the Minister of Finance cannot do that. He has to face the country and this House, however irrational some of the discussions may be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: What he has to do at all costs is maintain confidence both at home and abroad in the Canadian economy. He does not claim, nor does this government, that every decision has been exactly right. That would obviously be a very foolish claim to make. What he can claim is that the Canadian economy has survived the shock of world turmoil with great resilience and is today recognized by impartial and well-informed observers at home and abroad as the number one economy in the world, the best managed country in the western world.

● (1600)

We are fortunate in having a Finance minister like the present one who has steered the country through these difficult shoals, because the way ahead for the world is very uncertain. I say now, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, that seldom has there been so much turmoil in the world; seldom have there been such great strains on the fabric of society, no matter where one looks. The worst possible approach to Canadian policy in these circumstances is to take a rigid doctrinaire position such as is being put forward now—though this has not always been the case—by members of the New Democratic Party. On the other hand, it is even worse to have no policy at all—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You speak with authority on that.

Mr. Sharp: —or one which bends to every passing wind of popular notions, as in the case of the official opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired. If the House agrees, he might be given a few more minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know how long the minister intends to take. After all, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke for three hours last night. I have lots of time, but there are others in the House who wish to speak.

Mr. Sharp: I was about to close my remarks. I will take half a minute.

If an election comes now, as seems fairly likely, the public will have an opportunity to judge for themselves. The Liberal Party will ask the Canadian people to reject simplistic solutions put forward by the other parties in the House and will ask the Canadian people to continue the policies which have been so successful in bringing Canada through a period of unexampled difficulty.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) will not take it personally if I refer to his expectations of hearing something better from the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). Having participated in previous debates when the hon. gentleman was minister of finance, may I say I did not expect anything better from him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I do not want to spend much time on the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs because if he did have any credibility left, he lost it by supporting that crazy anti-profiteering bill the other day. Anyway, he has not enjoyed any credibility since he was minister of finance. The only thing he knew how to do in fighting inflation when he was minister of finance was to raise taxes. We tried to persuade him that this only added to the problem, but he would not pay any attention.

It is true I suggested voluntary guidelines. I do not know whether it is coincidental, but shortly after the hon. gentleman ceased to be minister of finance, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) found it necessary to declare what almost amounted to an emergency war against inflation. One of the first things the government did, after they had got rid of the hon. gentleman as minister of finance, was to try guidelines—the very thing he had resisted.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Tell us what you are going to do.

Mr. Stanfield: It is true I advocated voluntary guidelines. I did what I could to open up the mind of the minister of finance of that day, although without much success. It is true I was opposed then, as I am now, to permanent price controls. I have not changed one iota in that respect, because I think permanent controls would lead to a high degree of centralization in our economy—far too much power in the hands of incompetent people of the type of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, for example. It is true, also, that during the campaign of 1972 when it was apparent inflation was developing in certain aspects of the economy, I said, quite properly, that if I became prime minister and sensed that an inflationary psychology was spreading through the economy, I would not hesitate to resort to temporary controls. And I have not changed; I have not backed away from that position. I said I would resort to temporary controls to meet an emergency, and in my judgment there is an emergency facing this country when the level of inflation can be measured in two figures. I will return to this subject in a minute or so.

Today, the House and the country are witnessing a very significant event. We have a complacent and callous government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Far too many Canadians have had to pay far too high a price for the delay in reaching this day of reckoning. They, and many others, will continue to pay until a responsible, Progressive Conservative government takes action to restore some sense of order, stability and purpose.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): We can take a joke.

Mr. Stanfield: There is one thing this government has behind it, and that is a very loud voice.

Mr. Nowlan: Empty vessels make the most sound.

● (1610)

Mr. Stanfield: This government has. The state of inflationary expectations in this country must be dealt with as I said they should be when I was campaigning in 1972. They should have been dealt with long since, yet this House is presented with a budget that just barely acknowledges that the problem exists, and offers nothing in the way of solution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I was hoping the minister would wait to hear what I had to say, but I suppose he has other things to do.

Mr. Hees: He is running away.

Mr. Stanfield: This is the same government that maintains still that it has a contingency plan that will be implemented in an emergency. Evidently inflation at a two-figure rate is not enough of an emergency for this government. I just want to say to the members of the government that this House has a contingency plan, too, for getting rid of governments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I believe that enough members of this House now think there is sufficient emergency to put the House's contingency plan into operation. For every minute that this two-figure inflation runs unchecked in Canada, the disparity between the have and the have-not Canadians grows greater and the dissatisfaction with our own institution grows deeper. The budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) does nothing to stop that widening disparity. It does nothing to restore confidence in the competence of the institution of parliament, as it has demonstrated itself to the people of Canada during this session. And the Prime Minister does nothing to enhance the public's perception of this chamber when he chooses it as a forum for wounded cries of desperation for almost two hours. Surely the Prime Minister could muster a little more grace in accepting that the universe is unfolding as it should in so far as his government's continuation in office is concerned.

There sits a government, Mr. Speaker, whose essential message is that inflation is an international problem which somehow domestically falls under provincial and municipal jurisdiction. The message, of course, sir, is absurd. But, worse than that, it is a message of despair. It is a message which in itself only serves to heighten inflationary expectations in our country. If the government says that really nothing very much can be done, then those Canadians who have the muscle and resources to protect and to look after themselves will look after themselves, in the expectation that if they do not look after themselves nobody else will.

I have been speaking about the danger of this mounting inflationary psychology, these rising inflationary expectations and this vigilante attitude that has developed for more than a year. As far as this government is concerned, my warnings have fallen on very, very deaf ears. This situation which I warned about is clearly with us today, and each day it continues the problem will grow worse in magnitude and it will grow stronger roots.

Consider what has happened in the field of housing. Social priorities and human needs have gone out of the window as housing has become a more attractive market to deal in than the stock market for those with capital to invest. This is a sickening thing, sir, to have happen in our country and the responsibility for this sickness, which is growing to epidemic proportions, rests clearly with members of the government opposite.

Yesterday the Prime Minister, in his typically unassuming manner, outlined a number of measures that have been passed by parliament. He tried to create the impression that these measures were originated and bestowed upon the people by the Grits. This parliament did deal with that Grit innovation, indexing of personal income. You will recall, sir, that this proposal was first mentioned in the budget debate of May 1972, and it was condemned and rejected out of hand by the Minister of Finance—Supergrit himself!

The conversion followed the 1972 election results. We dealt in this parliament with those long-standing Grit proposals to cut personal income taxes and to increase old age pensions. In the 1972 election campaign the Minister of Finance, Supergrit, and the Prime Minister, Truegrit, both said that this was the prescription for bankruptcy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I am glad to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs has returned to the House. There sits the minister, Mr. Speaker, who a few minutes ago was talking about my inconsistencies. The only thing you can say about the Grit behaviour during the 1972 campaign and afterwards is that it was consistently inconsistent. These cuts in income tax and the increase in old age pensions that we were asking for, as were the members of the New Democratic Party, were described by the Prime minister and the Minister of Finance as a prescription for bankruptcy. But, of course, their demonstration of political bankruptcy followed the 1972 election. These examples of conversion and the emergence of wonderful, new Grit policies after October 31, 1972, truly impressed them, Mr. Speaker. They are almost as impressive as they are cynical and incredible.

Surely it is a cynical and incredible stance that is taken by the government on inflation, as exhibited again in the budget. The Minister of Finance says it is an international phenomenon. Then, of course, he says we have to attack it by increasing domestic production in Canada. Surely if we can ease inflation in Canada by increasing production in Canada, the assumption is that we can fight inflation by increasing domestic supply. This assumes, therefore, that the problem is not simply one of uncontrollable international origin.

If the minister makes any sense at all in talking about the importance of increasing domestic production—and I agree it is important—there must be a significant domestic component in inflation in Canada which we are experiencing today. But the minister will not concede that. He wants to have both sides of this contradiction. Then he stresses the urgency of increasing domestic supply. He even stresses this in his budget. However, he proposes no measures to increase supply but, rather, produces measures which in their isolated effect might well have a harmful effect on supply and also drive prices and inflationary expectations even higher.

The minister did not produce a balanced budget. I thought that might have had some effect, psychologically, on the country, indicating that the government meant business. I was surprised, particularly after all the fun the government had about the size of the deficit we requested a year ago in terms of expansion, to see how far the minister was able to go in creating a budgetary deficit particularly as recently as the first quarter of this year, the last quarter of the fiscal year, of about $1 billion. Not bad for a man who is trying to show restraint, Mr. Speaker.

Then, of course, he produced a budget which has very substantial increases in expenditures, again despite the manipulation of figures by the former minister of finance, so in effect what the Minister of Finance tells the provinces, the municipalities, the people in business and the working people in this country is simply, "Do what I say, but for God's sake don't do what I do."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I had hoped we might see another Grit policy in the indexing of Canada Savings Bonds, but instead the minister chose something rather different, a bonusing plan. The main purpose of that bonusing plan is to try to persuade people who now own Canada Savings Bonds to continue to hold onto them rather than turn them in. The main purpose behind this policy is to help the government, rather than the Canadian people. The minister is simply trying to make a virtue of necessity.

The program will be of some assistance, I think, although it will be limited by the fact that the bonus will be treated as a capital gain, but it really does not provide an effective means of saving for the ordinary, small saver in Canada. It does not provide him with any means at all to protect himself against the erosion of the purchasing power of his savings as a result of the horrendous inflation we are experiencing under this government. It comes nowhere near being as effective as the indexing of bonds which I proposed and which, sir, will be implemented by a Progressive Conservative government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: And, of course, a Progressive Conservative government will also implement the elimination of the sales tax on all clothing, another new Grit policy which we have been advocating for quite some time. We will also proceed to take steps to remove the sales tax on building materials, in spite of the protest of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) that this would only increase supply. Apparently there is something wrong, in his mind—

Mr. Drury: That is not what he said.

Mr. Stanfield: The Minister of State for Urban Affairs takes a very different view of things than the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance wants to increase production, but the Minister of State for Urban Affairs for over a year now has taken the position that an increase in production would only have inflationary results.

Mr. Drury: No, that is not what he said.

Mr. Stanfield: I heard him, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: You are using subterfuge.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not need subterfuge. I read some of the remarks of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs with a lot more attention than they deserve. I want to say that a Progressive Conservative government will ensure that every outstanding penny of export charge is collected, retroactively if need be. So I am quite confident the oil companies will not be getting any of that export tax, Mr. Speaker. I do not know how the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) are telling the oil companies that if a Liberal government were to be returned, the oil companies would be able to keep all that money; but that is exactly what they are saying.

Mr. Drury: They are not.

Mr. Stanfield: I know that is exactly what they are saying, and I know that that position will get the treatment it deserves from the Canadian people. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources know full well that the collection, the compensation, the intentions and other features of the oil administration bill can be dealt with. They know full well that the province of Alberta is pledged to hold to the agreement established at the conference. They know full well, also, that last fall and winter the oil companies held to a freeze for months with no legislation in existence to force them to do so. They know full well that the companies held export tax money aside for collection later on the basis that the government said it was going to collect it. They said so time and time again in this House. I say this government is playing a very dangerous game in saying it will be powerless to collect the export charge and that a future Liberal government would be equally powerless to collect it retroactively.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I repeat our position, that the oil export charge can be collected. I repeat our pledge, that if it is not collected by the present government it will be collected retroactively by an incoming Progressive Conservative government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1630)

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the export oil tax will be collected, barring the remote prospect that Canadians do not want it collected and overwhelmingly support Liberal candidates who are running on the platform—

Mr. MacEachen: Foolish chatter.

Mr. Stanfield: —laid down by the Prime Minister last night that the charge cannot and will not be collected by the present or any future Liberal government.

Mr. Sharp: Why did you stop our legislation?

Mr. Stanfield: I know whereof I speak because I was the only one to stay awake throughout the Prime Minister's entire speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: These petulant gentlemen opposite like to call other people bigots, rednecks, nobodies.

Mr. Trudeau: Nonentities.

Mr. Stanfield: They like to say, "If you won't play it our way, you won't play it at all." These desperate, temporary occupants of the treasury benches have demanded their last ransom and have uttered their last threat. Any shred of credibility or integrity that remains has surely been consumed in the fire of their own disgusting scorched-earth policy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: —as illustrated by their approach to the oil export charge.

Mr. Hees: The campaign is on.

Mr. Stanfield: Of course, we all know what the Prime Minister was up to yesterday afternoon and last evening. He was test-flying his campaign rhetoric. That is fine, although I am sure that a number of his own members wondered why he had to read through his whole campaign speech portfolio in the course of his evening's work. I was interested in the number of times that he quoted at length from newspapers which, I understand, he started to read after the last election campaign. I think perhaps he may have been auditioning for freelance work after the next election.

An hon. Member: Or for "Laugh In."

Mr. Stanfield: No, this is serious. After the next election campaign he will contribute to "Capital Report" as somebody who does the job "peeping through the newspapers".

Then we have the old song, again sung by the Wall Street Journal and the Financial Times, about the glowing state of the Canadian economy. I will quote one item from the Financial Times of April 29 under the heading "Curiouser and Curiouser". It reads:

Mr. Trudeau's conduct was curious in more than one way last week.

An hon. Member: What week?

Mr. Stanfield: That is the week preceding April 29. I do not blame the hon. member asking, "What week?". The article continues:

At a Hamilton rally, he is reported to have said that Canada's main problem was inflation but "the opposition doesn't want to wait the few weeks or months that will make it evident that we have solved this problem."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: The article goes on:

The last time Mr. Trudeau declared he had "licked" inflation was December, 1970. In the three years since then, Canada has had a 23 per cent jump in consumer prices. No wonder we get the cold shivers every time the Prime Minister declares that the fight is won.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Virtually every responsible commentator in the country heaps scorn upon the government's alleged anti-profiteering bill. The Prime Minister says he is proud of that bill, that he is prepared to stand on it, to put it before the country. Well, I look forward to that, sir, I really look forward to it—because surely no other piece of legislation more adequately demonstrates the arrogance, the incompetence, the hypocrisy and the sheer dishonesty of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: During the 1972 election campaign the Minister of Finance steered well away from the election slogan "The land is strong". He confessed that it broke him up. It will be interesting to see just how he can keep himself clear from association with his Prime Minister's favourite bill in the coming campaign. If the Minister of Finance was broken up by the slogan in the last campaign, he should really be demolished by the bill.

The budget brought in by the minister was what he called a responsible budget. How can anyone believe that this government has any real sense of responsibility when its economic policy and its budget are associated with one of the most irresponsible pieces of puffery that has ever insulted the intelligence of the members of this House? How can anybody believe that the Minister of Finance is behaving responsibly when he refuses to tell this House how much revenue his government is dropping in the current year as a result of the tax concessions granted to the manufacturing and processing industries? That is what he has done; he has refused to give that information. His deputy minister gave us a figure last year, not in the House but to those of us who met him. The deputy minister promised us that if we did not get an answer to that question Monday evening, we would get it Tuesday morning at the latest, without fail.

● (1640)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is not what he said.

Mr. Stanfield: I was there; I heard him. I want to ask the minister through you, sir, what he is up to with this ill-advised cover-up approach, refusing to give information of the sort that was given quite freely last year. Does he not realize the seriousness of the suspicion and distrust that will follow in the wake of his refusal to divulge this information?

We already have the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) indicating a figure as high as $1 billion. The minister shakes his head. Until the minister gives us the information he is doing a very grave disservice to the manufacturing and processing industries, because suspicions will be rife. I do not know how anybody can tell the hon. member for York South he is wrong in what he is saying if the minister is not prepared to say anything. Is this an example of responsibility on the part of the Minister of Finance?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Stanfield: In his oration yesterday the Prime Minister suggested—in fact he said it, I don't know how many times—that it would be irresponsible to throw this government out. I say it would be the height of irresponsibility to leave this government in.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: But I suppose we have to make some allowances for the peculiar logic of anybody who has nothing to offer the country and so must build an election strategy on attacking the opposition and promising half a billion dollars to the oil companies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was so anxious to tell the oil companies how much they could expect to get, and how they could expect to split it up, that he gave them some figures to indicate what they could expect from the present Grit government or a future Grit government. So the Prime Minister has revealed his election platform on these two main themes—attack the opposition, and give half a billion dollars to the oil companies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I would say that his attack on the official opposition has all the staying power of a wet match. And, of course, it isn't hard to know how the match got wet in the first place: it was obviously dampened by that renowned and honourable gentleman from the other place known generally as the Rainmaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: The trademark is unmistakable. You rant and you roar, and you hope in the course of saying enough, yelling enough and saying outlandish things, that something will turn up. Under the guidance of his recycled strategist, the Prime Minister launches off attacking other parties on their divisions, as he calls them, and he tries to create the impression that his own party is just one complete blissful unit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it is all right for the Minister of Finance to dissociate himself from the so-called anti-profiteering bill; it is all right for the Prime Minister's entire loyal band of colleagues to leave the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) more alone in this House than anybody has ever been in Trois-Rivières.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Not as alone as you.

Mr. Stanfield: Those are just differences of opinion. The pristine unity of the cabinet is obvious. Any fool can see that. Then there is the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson). If he wants to keep up his long-standing discussions about a new political party, a party which would involve a couple of former Liberal members who have sat for hours with him talking about this scheme, that is not division, Mr. Speaker; that is just the minister exercising his prerogative to examine all the options that might be available to him. And, of course, when the same minister threatens to resign over a politically sensitive matter, that is just good, old-fashioned spunk.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Programmed with this rather rose-coloured strategy, the Prime Minister sees unity all around him in his own party. I would not presume to question the wisdom of the honourable senator in the other place. His record speaks for itself. But it strikes me that such an exhibition of self-delusion by the Prime Minister might just strike the electorate as ample reason in itself to extend him a merciful medical discharge.

Sir, there is one matter relating to my party that I do want to speak to, and I think this is the proper place for me to do it. I am referring to the very regrettable reference made to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) by Senator Gratton O'Leary on television last Sunday. I not only dissociate myself and my party from that kind of remark, but I take this occasion to restate our debt to the right hon. gentleman for the great service he has rendered to the country, to parliament and to our party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1650)

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the House leader seems to be upset this afternoon, and I am sorry. I want to say that when I was in provincial politics, and again in federal politics, I always received a lot of help from the government House leader and I do not want to seem unappreciative. I do want to pay tribute to the continuing contributions of the right hon. gentleman to the country, to parliament and to our party. I want to thank him for it and say long may he be active in this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: My reference to a medical discharge was in relation to the Prime Minister, and certainly not in relation to the right hon. gentleman. Canadians can look at the Prime Minister's remarks last night and see very clear signs of a failing memory. He moaned about all the latest legislation that would die on the order paper with dissolution.

Mr. Trudeau: Not all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I think it is only an act of common decency to plug one significant gap in the right hon. gentleman's memory—the Prime Minister's—in an effort to assure him that the country really will survive. When the Prime Minister sought dissolution of the twenty-eighth parliament, an act which only he could undertake and which he did undertake, the order paper was filled to overflowing—and filled notably, though the Prime Minister and all his advisers evidently forgot about it—with government legislation required to implement a budget which had been presented over four months earlier. To say that the Prime Minister forgot that is the kindest way I can put it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: Selective amnesia.

Mr. Trudeau: A better knowledge of the rules, that's all.

Mr. Stanfield: How much better to do what we are doing now. Rather than wait for four months, how much better to do it now and spare the country another experience of an additional four months of uncertainty in government. Now that I have checked the Prime Minister's memory a little about all the financial measures he left on the order paper at the time he dissolved parliament the last time, I hope he will feel a little less disconsolate about what parliament is going to do later this afternoon.

I want to believe that the Prime Minister really meant what he said last night. I have worked at this. I really want to believe that the Prime Minister was making last night, as he said he was, a sincere and non-partisan analysis. But he simply forgot what he did himself in 1972. With his well known respect for parliament and the democratic process it is surely unthinkable that he was chastising parliament about election expenses legislation, foreign investment legislation and competition legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: You refused to pass it.

Mr. Stanfield: Oh, poor fellow! Surely he has not forgotten all about that. They dissolved parliament. They left on the order paper the most prized objectives of the Minister of Finance in 1972. Surely the Prime Minister has not forgotten that. I can also appreciate that the Prime Minister might feel some distress at the prospect of entering the record book as the leader of the only government in the country's history to have been defeated on a budget. As much as I resist most temptations to be partisan myself, Mr. Speaker, I can only say that no administration more richly deserves that honour.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister gave us yesterday evening a new example of the electoralism that he does not hesitate to use to get more votes at the expense of national unity, like during the campaign of 1968 for instance. Before the beginning of the campaign, I wish to tell him immediately, Mr. Speaker, that we will see to it that people from Quebec, like all other Canadians, not be taken in by his little game that consists in passing off Progressive Conservatives as francophobes.

The Prime Minister usually makes peculiar kinds of speeches but last evening he broke with tradition and delivered a rather funny one. He has proven only one thing, but it is a certainty, he is more expert in sarcasm than in economic matters.

I shall only tell him and his colleagues that if I exert myself to speak the second language, it is because I have the honour to be the Leader of a party which, a long time ago and even before the present Liberal government, took many measures to promote equal status for both official languages in Canada. I wish only to remind the Prime Minister of the situation of the French language and the status of French-speaking civil servants in this country prior to 1957 and after 22 years of Liberal administration.

My party committed itself officially to the respect and promotion of bilingualism. The people from Quebec know that and I am sure that they appreciate what I do to understand them and be understood by them. So, I shall not let the Liberal party wave the spectre of racism for electoral purposes and thwart our common efforts towards unity.

Here is another tactic I consider petty, which the Prime Minister used last night and against which I should like to warn Canadians. The Prime Minister would have us believe that whoever is not a Liberal in Quebec is a mercenary in the pay of the other parties. That is a lie! A monumental lie, and an insult to the intelligence of Quebecers. And the government members, for a few weeks still, will be surprised to see, when the next election comes, that there are many Quebecers of good will, among whom even some Liberals, who will join force with us to put an end, once and for all to the federal Liberal hegemony in Quebec.

Let the government put an end to its partisan foolishness, let it seek to justify its administrative carelessness and economic clumsiness, rather than exploit prejudices and stir Canadians one against the other. The mountebank pronouncements of the Prime Minister cannot make the Canadian forget, and Quebecers no more than the others, the problems and hardships his government brought upon them.

● (1700)

[English]

The Minister of Finance referred to the budget as a responsible budget. I think I know what he was trying to say. He means that as a thing unto itself, as an illustration in a textbook, it could be viewed as an academically responsible illustration of how country "X" represents its sums. The addition and substraction are of adequate quality, and many of the ways and means motions relating to ongoing tax reform remain consistently as unintelligible as their predecessors. A country with no great inflation problem, no chronic distress among its working people, particularly its working poor, and a population that delighted in seeing personal tax revenue jump by $1.5 billion in a single year—any such country in these circumstances might want to consider it as a model for a budget.

It is interesting to note that the Minister of Finance referred to his last budget of one year ago as responsive and to his present one as responsible. There is a difference, as the minister well knows, and in the reality of conditions existing in Canada today the minister's change in terms constitutes an admission of his failure to produce anything that is truly responsive to this country's economic needs. Canada wants leadership to join in the attack on inflation. Nothing less than that would be responsive to the need. The Progressive Conservative Party has committed itself to offering that leadership, and in government we will implement a program which will do just that.

I want to make it abundantly clear that I will not accept, either in opposition or in power, if power is conferred upon me, the continuance of what has been done to the people of Canada by the rate of inflation which has taken place in this country. Of course there is no simple solution, but I defy the Minister of Finance, I defy the Prime Minister and I defy the Secretary of State for External Affairs to show any inconsistency in the position I have taken or in anything I have said.

We need a short-term period of controls for one main purpose. We are not going to solve the problem of inflation—

An hon. Member: That will not solve anything.

Mr. Stanfield: —but the program can destroy or can certainly be very effective in reducing inflationary expectations in this country. There is no ambiguity in what I say. I have not departed from the principle of a very short-term freeze and, after the freeze has ended, of flexible regulations or flexible controls for between 18 months and 2 years.

From its dungeon of bankruptcy, the government party wails, "It will not work." If it will not work, why is it in the government's contingency plan? Why do all political parties in Britain, including the British Liberal Party, support a policy of controls and an incomes policy?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): They have a great economic record.

Mr. Stanfield: I know it is a poor record, but it is better than the one the minister has shown in the past year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Why does the OECD recommend to its member countries that they should do something like this in order to contain their domestic inflation?

In the coming election, sir, Grits, Supergrits, Truegrits and all the other Grits will invent every conceivable misrepresentation as to what we intend to do. The Prime Minister gave us an example of that last night. Let me repeat my assurance that nobody in this country will be mistreated by the program we intend to implement. I have stated that the freeze phase of our program would apply for a maximum of 90 days. The flexible controls which would follow for 1½ years to two years—and these would assure special consideration to low income earners, as I have said many times—would also ensure that no one would be held to anything less than the cost of living increase.

An hon. Member: What about farmers?

Mr. Stanfield: And to productivity increases as well.

An hon. Member: How about farmers?

Mr. Stanfield: I can only make things so simple; apparently I cannot make them simple enough for some people on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1710)

Mr. Stanfield: The price side of the program would deal properly and firmly with profiteering, not in the absurd and ineffective way put forward by the government. I say that to work, this program has to be fair and seem to be fair. I say it will work because it is a fair and equitable program. I believe that inflation is serious enough in this country today that Canadians will welcome and rally behind this meaningful program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: We need to get on with the task of reducing inflationary expectations and the rate of inflation as soon as possible. Part of that process involves a defeat of this government, dissolution of this parliament and an election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister views this a regrettable interruption in some undefined, great process which he thinks is under way. I do not see any point in prolonging a process which features the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) throwing up his hands and saying, "It's a mess." I do not see any point in prolonging a process featuring the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) denying the country an inquiry into unemployment insurance. I certainly do not see any benefit to Canadians in prolonging the life of a government that looks at two-figure inflation and says that nothing can really be done about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we hope in a few hours time to see an end to a tired and crumbling government.

An hon. Member: A few hours?

Mr. Stanfield: I say a few hours because we have to give the man time to get to Government House and all that sort of thing. It will be an end which I am confident will lead this country to a new and better beginning. Without any presumption as to what the vote will be, Mr. Speaker, I want to take this occasion to thank you and the other officers of the House for the dedicated service you have given to this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the House for this widespread acclaim. I am not sure where the applause for the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) ended and mine began.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The House is in good humour. Yesterday and today we listened to speeches by leaders of each of the four political parties in this House. I think it will make interesting reading for the future because they characterize both the men who made them and the parties for which they spoke. I was very much interested in following the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who seemed to spend a large part of his time trying to determine who was responsible for the fact that the spectre of an imminent election haunted this House. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the person who is most responsible for the fact that we face a general election is the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: I noticed that the Prime Minister was trying to be a bit of an amateur psychiatrist. He does not do a very good job of being Prime Minister. He ought to stay out of the psychiatry business, although I must say he has excellent clientele with whom to work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: When the Prime Minister says the reason we are having an election is that the leader and members of this party cannot stand the strain of holding the balance of power, I want to point out that he has a very poor memory. With the exception of the years 1968-72 we have had a minority parliament in Canada since 1962. The only time we did not have a minority parliament was the four-year period after the present Prime Minister became leader of his party. By the way, they were the four most unproductive and arrogant years the parliament of this country has ever seen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: For the rest of the period from 1962 to the present time we have had a minority parliament, and it has worked a good bit of the time. It worked from 1963 to 1965 and from 1965 to 1968 because someone was sitting in the prime minister's seat who had a certain degree of sensitivity and flexibility. He was able to work out a consensus. He had some human compassion. During that period we produced such things as the health services act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan and a great many other programs that will be monuments to the memory of that parliament and the prime minister at that time, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: That same type of minority government could have worked in this twenty-ninth parliament. When the election of October, 1972 was over, the members of the New Democratic Party indicated that whichever of the two old-line parties had a plurality they were prepared to give it an opportunity to show what it could do.

● (1720)

As I pointed out last week in another debate, we had a two-pronged attack on the major problems of inflation and unemployment. One had to do with the social area and the other had to do with the economic area. In the social area we were pressing for legislative measures which would cushion the effects of rising living costs on people with fixed and low incomes and others most vulnerable to the inflationary pressures which were besetting this country and, indeed, the world. And the government did many things which needed to be done.

The Prime Minister said yesterday that the NDP was taking credit for things which they asked for but which the Liberal Party was doing. Well, Mr. Speaker, they could not do it alone—not in a minority parliament. Unless we had been prepared to support them through repeated non-confidence motions, they would not have been here to do the things which needed to be done, such as raising old age pensions, family allowances, veterans pensions, and so on. It is significant that in spite of the assertions of the Prime Minister that a Liberal government would have done these things anyway, in the preceding years from 1968 to 1972 none of these things had been accomplished.

My experience of the Liberal Party goes back nearly 40 years, and I have never seen them move unless they were prodded in the posterior or faced the prospect of defeat. Nevertheless, I want to say that the things which have been accomplished in the social area in the last 16 months were things we could support and, in my view, they made a contribution to easing the burden upon large sections of our people. At the same time, though, it should be remembered that since those measures were passed a year ago the rising cost of living has taken away most of those increases, and we had the right to expect there would be something in the budget to help these people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The second area in which we were pressing for action was the economic area. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) stood up today and said the opposition parties had not put forward alternative policies. Well, we have certainly put forward alternative economic measures we wanted to see introduced to cope with inflation. But nothing has happened. The Prime Minister, in a speech at the opening of the session, said the NDP were like seagulls which, because they were squawking and making a lot of noise, thought they were running the ship. Mr. Speaker, we never claimed to be running the ship, but a smart captain will listen to the seagulls warning him that he is running the ship on the rocks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: We have been signalling to the Prime Minister for the last several months.

An hon. Member: Seagulls aren't so smart.

Mr. Douglas: I will tell the hon. member something else about seagulls. They are not stupid enough to stay with the ship when it starts to sink. What were the alternative proposals we placed before the government? We asked for selective price controls. The government said no, and did so repeatedly. We asked the government for a two-price system which would enable us to keep the prices of Canadian products and raw materials at levels lower than world levels, thus protecting Canadians against artificially high world prices. But the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) repeatedly declined to follow such a proposal, and in his budget speech the other night he said it would not work. And this in spite of the fact—as was ably pointed out by the leader of this party—that he has already done this very thing in the case of oil, copper and wheat.

We asked the government for legislation to curb excess profits. What did we get? We got a bill which was an absolute farce. As a matter of fact, it was so bad that when the minister produced it in the House he was like the boy on the burning deck—he stood all alone. It is significant that the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse—the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who represent the corporate elite—were silent about this legislation.

The truth is, the government was not taken by surprise in the last few days. It has known for months there were things the NDP wanted done and must insist on having done. We wanted something done for the old age pensioners. We wanted tax adjustments in favour of people in lower and middle income groups. We wanted the government to do something about the criminal profiteering which is going on in this country.

What happened? The Minister of Finance said he was not going to indulge in any gimmickry. Mr. Speaker, one of the most extraordinary gimmicks any minister of finance has ever adopted was when on one hand he imposed a 10 per cent surcharge on certain corporations while with the other he gave them a 1 per cent reduction in taxation. The surcharge would cost $175 million, but they are to be relieved by cuts in taxation amounting to $262 million. This means they will profit from a net gain of $87 million.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Douglas: That is how we are bringing the corporations into line. Moreover, the surcharge will not apply to the manufacturing and processing industries which in addition will enjoy the benefits of the tax cuts they were allowed last year and the fast write-offs. It is significant we cannot get the minister to tell us how much reduction in revenue will follow from the concession made to the manufacturing and processing corporations by virtue of the tax benefits they were given last year. It is also significant that in return for the support of the official opposition of that legislation last year the minister introduced the provision that the legislation could be opened up for reconsideration after April 1, 1974. Yet we cannot even get the figures, although April 1 is long since past. What is the figure, Mr. Speaker? The minister does not say.

● (1730)

Professor Hyndman, in one of the publications put out by the Tax Foundation, said that for this fiscal year, 1974-75, those tax concessions will be worth over $1,000 million. Will the minister tell the House whether or not that is correct? Will he tell us what the figure was for the past fiscal year? Of course he will not, Mr. Speaker, because he knows he dare not tell the public about the kind of hand-outs that he gave to these corporations. Who are these processors, Mr. Speaker? They are the meat processors, food processors, fish processors. Look at the profits they have made. These are the people who have gouged the public and they are the people who are getting the major tax concessions.

Having signalled the government repeatedly for months on end about the disparity and inequity in our tax system and demanding some adjustments in it, we are presented with this budget. It is a budget that will perpetuate a situation in which the real income of the wage earner and salary earner is going down $5.50 a week, according to latest figures, in which the share of the national income going to corporations in profits is going up and the share of the national income going to the working people in the form of wages and salaries is going down. I ask, did the Prime Minister think that the New Democratic Party would swallow a budget like that?

There are two possible explanations for the Prime Minister's miscalculation. The first is that he may have thought the New Democratic Party were bluffing, that they really would not vote against the government, that having been close to the government for some months, supporting them in the social area, we had come to love and to cherish them. The Prime Minister himself put forth that idea in a speech he made in Sudbury, as reported in the press on April 29. According to the Globe and Mail for April 29, 1974—

—Mr. Trudeau said he thought NDP members of parliament were also reluctant to see an early election "because they are not particularly keen on losing their seats".

The Prime Minister heads a government in a minority situation. Here is a man who is trying to stay in office to do what he thinks is best for this country. A few weeks before the budget comes down, he says, "If the New Democrats vote for our budget, it is not because they think it is a good budget; it is because they are afraid to go to the country and have an election". Now, that is statesmanship of a high order!

This budget represents nothing more nor less than the Minister of Finance throwing down the gauntlet to the New Democratic Party. Everything we have asked for and everything we have advocated and pressed for has been rejected in this budget; and the budget has been even more inequitable, so far as the great mass of the Canadian people is concerned, than any budget we have had for many years. The other possibility is, not that the Prime Minister thought that the New Democratic Party were bluffing but that he had decided that sooner or later they were going to have to go to the country, and therefore it might be better to bring in a conservative budget that would please the business community, that would put them in good standing on Bay Street and St. James Street. And that is the kind of budget we got.

The Prime Minister intimated yesterday that we had suddenly made up our minds on this a week or two ago because of the strain that he talked about. The position we took throughout the whole period was that we would measure each piece of legislation on its merit, and the budget on its merit. The fact that last week we announced that we would not support the so-called anti-profiteering bill did not pledge us in any way to vote against the budget. If this budget had been a good budget, we would have supported it. We would still have voted against the anti-profiteering bill because it is a hoax and a farce, and hon. members know it. If this budget had made any provision at all that was designed to rectify the social injustices being perpetrated upon the Canadian people and taxpayers by this government, then we would have supported it. But there is no such provision.

The man who made the decision to put forth this budget, in the final analysis, is the Prime Minister. He is the man who must accept the fact that we are likely to go into a general election, because it is he and he alone who gave his approval to the budget and to the so-called anti-profiteering legislation, legislation he ought to have known we in this party could not and will not support.

The Prime Minister, in a sort of desperate attempt to stave off what appears to be the inevitable, tried to frighten parliament by saying there is a lot of legislation lying around which is not going to be passed if the government is defeated in this vote. There is no time that a government can be defeated when there is not some legislation lying around or pending. If every parliament were to make up its mind it would not be dissolved until the government dissolved it because it might end before certain legislation were passed, then, of course, there would never be a defeat of a government.

The legislation that is on the order paper is mainly peripheral legislation, and we are not prepared to vote for an unacceptable budget in order to get some peripheral legislation passed. Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) have been trying (a) to frighten the House, and (b) to scare the country by saying that if this budget is not passed, or if the government is defeated, then, of course, the government cannot collect the surcharge on exports of oil. Anyone who seriously makes that statement is either being dishonest or stupid.

● (1740)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Canadian political history is replete with precedents of taxes which have been collected, even after parliament has been dissolved, on the basis of a notice of ways and means, on the basis of an order in council or even on the basis of a mere announcement by the government. In 1947, Hon. Douglas Abbott, minister of finance in a Liberal government, announced over the radio a series of new taxes which went into effect that evening, and they were collected. There was no legislation, no order in council and no notice of ways and means motions.

In 1962-63, an order in council by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) gave it the power to collect taxes. That was validated later by legislation passed by the Pearson government when it came into office. What this government is trying to do is draw a red herring across the trail. It is trying to confuse the public, because members of the government consistently have told us that the import compensation will cost $1,400 million and now it transpires that unless cost participation is levied by the oil producing countries it will cost $925 million, and this represents $475 million in extra revenue that they do not want to give to the producing provinces. That is the real reason.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that this government has had its chance. We gave it our support as long as it was following programs we thought would help this country. They have run out of steam, they have run out of ideas and they have run out of the courage which is necessary to restructure our society. I shall close with words which are well known in British parliamentary history—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): "Go. In the name of God, go".

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 5.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty pursuant to section 6 of Standing Order 60 to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on the subamendment now before the House.

All those in favour of the subamendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Lewis) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I declare the motion carried.

[Translation]

As the curtain falls, let me remind hon. members that, true to this happy tradition, they are invited to the Speaker's room.

[English]

Hon. members should know that according to traditional custom they are invited to attend in room 16.

The Budget—Mr. Douglas

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of constitutional order. I would ask a question of the Prime Minister. I had the same experience in 1963 as he has had, and I ask him to give the assurance to the country that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him to give the assurance to the country—

Mr. MacEachen: Order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I remind hon. members that after six o'clock the Chair has no authority except to rise. I think that is the long-established tradition. I do not think I have the right to stand and listen to debate, points of order or questions of privilege: perhaps that might be the order of the day for tomorrow.

An hon. Member: There is no tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will appreciate that it is difficult for the Chair to hear what is being said. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) seeks the floor on a question of privilege. I have serious doubt whether the question of privilege can be heard. I know the precedent to which the right hon. gentleman refers, but my interpretation of the precedent and what happened before is that really the Chair must abide by the rules. I call on the right hon. gentleman to agree with the Chair and to appreciate my position.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rose to say that I always follow the orders of the Chair, but these people are afraid and they want to change the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As it is after six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At 6.27 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

———

The twenty-ninth parliament was dissolved on Thursday, May 9, 1974, by proclamation of His Excellency the Governor General.
