POETRY.

True Philosophy.

His years were not so many, nor his stature very big; His eyes required no glasses and he did not wear a wig; Yet answering every problem with a remedy sage, We found that true wisdom does not always spring from age.

He tried it in his lessons, and he used it in his play; It won the highest honors, and brought trophies of the day; And when we gently asked him for a basis of his plan, He said, "You can't do better than the very best you can."

We've used it since in worry, and it works just like a charm; It saved a deal of trouble, and has calmed down each alarm; When bothered by misfortune, when sick or e'en perplexed, If in a press of business you can hardly tell what's next— Then pause for just a moment and take comfort in the plan: "You can't do any better than the very best you can."

SELECT STORY.

HIS OPPORTUNITY.

BY HENRY CLEMENS PEARSON.

CHAPTER IX.—Continued.

The address, which was brief, but full of information and power, made itself felt. The firemen expected to hear a milk-and-water appeal that would convince them with laughter. On the contrary, they heard liquor-drinking and liquor-selling arraigned with such power, that they were dumfounded. The shambling, awkward minister, whose manners even they could criticize, stood before them the most eloquent man they had ever heard. They drank in his words with eager attention, and forgot the secret purposes that they had cherished.

When the speech was finished, Sam called for a vote of thanks, which they gave. He then abruptly closed, alleging a private business meeting of the engine company to follow directly. After which he hurried the minister away, down the stairs, and out into the night, going part of the way home with him.

When he returned the men were still there, although remarkable quiet. "Don't do that again, Sam, you'll break us up entirely," said one of them. "Hump," was the testy reply, "you must be a fool if you can't stand it to hear both sides of a question."

"That parson ain't no slouch, fur all he toot out so," said another. He laid it right down in fine shape. Still I wish you hadn't done it, Sam. It's just took all the taste outen my beer."

"Nonsense, what could I do? Warn't I sweating fur fear some of you fellers would give him some lip and show him what a fool I had made of myself in inviting him? You would have insulted him if he hadn't been too smart for you. You are wrong in thinking all ministers fools. As a rule they are smarter than any of us; but that is no reason that we should get down on our knees when they tell us to. I'm going home," responded the leader.

Sam went, and the meeting adjourned; but thereafter the engine company were dubbed the "Reform Club," much to their disgust.

Thrilled with a great exultation over his reception at the engine-house, Mr. Saw was gone home to tell his wife of his hopes, and to pray earnestly that more light might come to those whom he considered seekers after it. That these prayers were not heard and answered, in spite of the minister's mistaken ideas of the "Reform Club," cannot for an instant be claimed.

When next he saw his deacon, Mr. Lamson, for whose energy and consolation he had sincere respect, he hailed him with a joyous ring in his voice.

"I have good news for you, my brother," he said, shaking him heartily by the hand, and forgetting for the once his bashful frigidly.

"Very glad to hear it," was the suave reply. "What is it, another hundred thousand given to missions?"

"This is something right at home; a chance for rejoicing in your own mill village."

"Indeed," said Lamson, with less enthusiasm.

He was not at all anxious to discuss the affairs of his operatives, even with his pastor, and was heartily regretting that it was not some missionary donation.

"I addressed a large meeting of the mill-men, last evening, and was most pleasantly received. I honestly believe that many of those men are not far from the Kingdom."

"Where did you hold the meeting; open air?"

"No; in the engine-house, by special invitation. Mr. Putnam secured me, and the enthusiasm was very great. The men seemed deeply interested in the few facts that I was able to bring them, relative to liquor-drinking. I took occasion, also, to arraign both the liquor-dealer and all who were accomplices in selling the deadly stuff; and, by the way they listened, I am sure it was a revelation to them."

"It must have been," was the mechanical reply.

"By the way, your action in arresting the liquor-selling in your village, pleased me exceedingly. Prad has long been a curse to the place; can you not drive him out entirely?"

"Not as yet; I have been watching for the opportunity, that occurred last week, for a very long time. When things of which I have not a right to speak are at last settled, I can do as I would like to do now," was the vague reply.

"I am sure you will; the Lord bless you, my brother," was the earnest response, as they parted, the pastor to write a glowing letter to a brother minister, on the indications of an approaching revival, in which he was wiser than he knew; and Lamson, to hurry down to the mill and summon Sam.

"Did you invite Mr. Saw to come to the engine-house?" he demanded.

"I guess I did," was the slow reply.

"What for? Arn't we bothered enough now by outsiders, without having him around; what has come over you?"

"It was a mistake—a joke," answered Sam, more humbly than he had spoken for some time.

"Let's know just how it happened," demanded the lawyer; and Sam told the whole story.

"Now, what about the young upstart; does he still get on well?" said the agent.

"The men like him better every day; I like him myself. He has got the make-up of a man."

"Never mind that; is he going through it all; the puddling, and all mind?"

"I think he is, and if he don't know all there is to be known in the mill before his time is up, my name isn't Putnam."

"Nonsense," was the impatient reply. "I am not afraid of so much as you think. There are things he can never know, unless your admiration for him leads you to tell him."

"I ain't a traitor," was the short reply.

"Well, what is to be done with him? Can you think of any scheme that shall lead him to get disgusted with the whole business, and throw it up?"

"No, I can't. His habits are perfectly good; he has no vices, and is spite of his efforts at self-control."

The old man adjusted his glasses and looked searchingly at his companion.

"Man! He is but a boy," said Lamson. "Yet he has beaten you at every move, so far,—kinder rough for you to be beaten by a boy, when all of the advantage is on your side, too."

The other bit his lips wrathfully, but said nothing, and Putnam continued.

"I tell you, there is no hold to be got on this young feller, because he don't drink, nor gamble, nor care a snap for any kind of dissipation. If he had one vice, you could ruin him, and would, I suppose. I wouldn't help do that; but as it is, he can't be touched by you."

"I will endure him yet," said the agent.

"I doubt it; you are cunning, but he's what is better,—he is shrewd. My idea is, that he has got the whole situation in his grasp, and can read us all like books. When he pulled Temple out of drunkenness and set him on his feet, he secured the friendship of one of the most level-headed men in the mill; and when he—when he—"

"That's a good sentiment; stick to it," said Lamson, with an inscrutable expression. "I have it now. He is a generous fellow,—a good fellow. As soon as it can be arranged so that he will not suspect too sudden a move, we will seek his friendship."

"No more treachery with him," was the warning.

"Bless you, no! I have been harsh with him because it looked like ruin to me, if I did not use such measures; but I see a better way. Let me do all the acting hereafter; you just keep quiet, and wait for orders."

CHAPTER X.

An old man, gray, wrinkled, but vigorous, was walking rapidly down the main street of the upper town of Steelville. In front of him trotted a characteristic dignity that led people to step out of their way. The man, noticing no one, went into the post-office, looked on the list, and as there was no letter for him, turned to depart. As he did so Tom Chamberlain entered through the single door. The dog pricked up his ears, wagged his tail, and made straight for him with extravagant expressions of joy. The young man patted his head, and the dog kissed his hand affectionately.

"Be careful," warned the old man, seeing the motion. "Turk dislikes strangers."

The mastiff's actions, however, contradicted the statement, for he continued to show his delight.

"How did you make friends with him, Mr. Chamberlain?" asked the postmaster, who was looking on with interest.

"Oh, we are old acquaintances," was the reply.

Leaving the office he started up the street for a walk, and had gone but a short distance when he noticed that Turk was following contentedly. Turning to send him back, he encountered the old gentleman.

"Did I understand your name to be Chamberlain, sir?" he asked, courteously.

"Yes, sir."

"You remind of a gentleman whom I once knew of the same name,—George Chamberlain. He married a sister of Robert Plint. Perhaps you knew him."

"I have heard of him," said the other, his color rising at the sound of the familiar name, "but do not remember ever to have seen him."

"He was a fine young man, and Miss Alice, his wife, was a lovely lady. They are dead now."

"You knew them both, you say?" asked Chamberlain, wiping the perspiration from his forehead.

"Many a time have I carried Miss Alice in my arms all over the garden when it was damp, that she might see the flowers. She was very fond and proud of my garden. And her husband I knew as well as if he had been a relative."

"And do I appear like him?" said the poor fellow, with brimming eyes, in spite of his efforts at self-control.

The old man adjusted his glasses and looked searchingly at his companion.

"Are you George Chamberlain's boy?" he asked, sharply.

"Let us go inside, and I will tell you," was the answer, for they were already at the high gate that opened into the Plint grounds. When they had entered, the gardener eagerly put the question again.

"Yes, I am his son," was the reply. "I know it! I know it! You are little Tom," throwing his arms about him in excess of joy. "You look like him, you speak like him, you have his whole bearing. You are Miss Alice's boy. Did she never tell you of old Allan?"

"She died a year after father. I was barely three years old, and can remember but little about her."

"To be sure! to be sure!" said the other, wiping his eyes. "And then you were placed under a guardian to be educated. Oh, but my lad, I'm right glad to see you. It does my heart good!"

"I didn't intend at first to tell of my relationship, but when you spoke of my father and mother, I could not bear to go away without hearing more of them."

"You are not in any trouble that you are—forgive me, Master Tom, but you are not hiding for any reason?" asked the gardener, anxiously.

"No, indeed, nothing of the kind. I will tell you in part what I am doing. Only, what I say must not be repeated till I give you permission. It is quite important that it should be kept secret."

"Very well, sir," was the respectful reply.

"I am in the file-works as a common laborer. Every one in town, who thinks of it, supposes that I am like all the rest of the hands there, and that is just what I wish."

"No word of mine shall undo you, sir," said Allan.

"When I was at school," continued he, after a pause, "all the other fellows had fathers and mothers who were often writing and sending them things,—little things they were many times, but I would have given all my pocket money for the love that accompanied them. Doctor Ponsoby was kind, but he never knew how I longed for some real flesh-and-blood relatives."

"It must have been hard. My woman and I used often to wonder how Miss Alice's boy fared. But we heard little or nothing from you. Master Robert had some sort of feeling against your father, and would not talk about any of you. Now, Master Thomas, won't you come to our cottage and let the old woman have a sight at you? She isn't very well, and it will be better than medicine for her."

There was such entreaty in the tone, and hospitality had been so frugally bestowed since he had been in Steelville, that Tom accepted and crossed the grounds toward the vine covered cottage. As they passed the apple tree containing the rustic seat, Chamberlain halted and told the gardener of his adventure, and how he had made friends with Turk.

"Ah, that is why he was so glad to see you. He was conquered, and was willing to own it. These mastiff never forget. I don't suppose any power on earth could make him attack you again," said Allan.

The dog seemed to know that they were talking about him, for he looked from one to the other, then pushed his cold nose into the young man's hand, as an oath of fealty, and trotted ahead toward the cottage. At the door stood a wee, bent figure,—faded and wrinkled, but still kindly and beaming.

"Who, think you, this gentleman is?" asked Allan.

"I'm sure I cannot tell, with these last glasses ye brought me, Allan, dear; but whoever he may be, he is welcome."

"This is Miss Alice's boy," said he, with a tremble in his voice.

"The Lord be praised!" ejaculated the old lady. "How I have longed to see you, dear lad! Come in, come in. You may not feel acquainted with Allan and me, but we know you. Your mother and father have spent many pleasant hours in this little house."

So deeply was Chamberlain stirred by the simple-hearted hospitality, that it brought a big lump in his throat, which he tried in vain to swallow. He had in his loneliness longed for the home element that other boys were so rich in: They had brothers, and sisters, and parents, but he had none.

It was not wonderful that he had become reticent, and was in the habit of looking on both sides of a question before he became enthusiastic over it. His friendship for Will Marshall was the only real affection he had as yet felt for any one, beside the vague feeling that haunted him when he tried to recall the face that had once leered over him in his cradle, and had soothed his baby troubles. The misty memory-picture had grown so faint as to be almost obliterated, and of late years had become blended with a miniature of his mother that he possessed. He strove to keep the two separate, for he felt that when they blended he should lose the last real look of the mother he so longed for.

The old couple, in their quaint little home, telling him of his mother, seemed to bring the past nearer. At last he had found friends who could talk sympathetically of his parents. It seemed to him, in his thankfulness, as if he would not exchange their simple, heartfelt affection for anything on earth.

Old Allan told his wife about his employment in the works, and she was filled with kindly concern.

"I fear you will never stand it. Do you feel well, dear?" she said.

"Yes, indeed; it is toughening me. I am a great deal stronger than I was when I entered."

"Where do you board? At the hotel?" she inquired.

He told the name of his humble boarding place, and Allan's wife lifted her hands in astonishment.

"Do they cook to suit you?" she asked.

"I have had better meals," was the laughing reply; "but they do the best they can. The food is plain and wholesome. It is such as the rest get, and possibly a trifle better. I can stand it."

"I have been thinking, Allan, dear, that we have a spare room, and could have him with us,—if you would be willing to come here," she said, turning to the visitor.

He saw the eagerness in her eyes, and the pained look in her husband's face, and he thought how delightful it would be. There would be the whole range of the garden; he could enter the mansion, unobserved by prying eyes, and have access to the library. These possible enjoyments flashed over him at once, but he put them aside.

"Thank you," he said, sorrowfully; "I wish I could come, but it is impossible. I am performing a difficult mission, and my place for the present is among the operatives; working as they work, living as they live."

"But you will come often to see us," said Allan and his wife in a breath.

"I will, you may be sure; if only to get some of these buns," he answered, with a jolly laugh.

The old couple laughed joyously with him.

"That is a family taste. I never knew one of your kin who did not like them, and they always said that Martha's were the best ever made," said Allan.

"I don't know, Allan, dear, but maybe the lad would like to

What it Costs at the Fair.

Had I been writing two weeks ago about coming to the Fair, I should have given familiar advice and said, "Don't you do it" - until the weather grows cooler.

Perhaps to an intended corner the most interesting question is, what does it cost? There has been much inflated talk over this very point.

To room-rent board must be added. This is whatever the visitor wishes. If he chooses not to eat, it is well. If a good meal is desired this can be secured at regular prices.

Each and every admission to the Fair grounds costs half a dollar. This entrance fee admits to all the main and state buildings.

As the autumn draws near the farmer's prospect of a profitable harvest becomes more and more apparent.

Although the apple crop is not up to the average of former years, yet during the few past weeks they have developed so far as to promise a fair yield. Plums will be quite abundant and vegetables of all kinds are promising.

To-day (Wednesday) was the hottest day of the season, the thermometer registering 90 degrees in the shade, yet the Sons of Temperance picnicked at Oak Island, a small party went to Black River Lake for blueberries, and it is reported that a couple from the Southern hills passed through this valley en route for Kentville, there to be united in the sacred bonds of matrimony.

A good audience greeted the Eolian quartette, of Beverly, Mass., last evening.

The ladies of the quartette have sweet and fairly strong voices and some of their selections aroused no little enthusiasm and all were enraptured. Annie Laurie and Ave Maria were perhaps the most popular. Miss Alice Biddle, as a Yarmouth member of the company, received a very warm reception. Her fine contralto voice showed to advantage in her solo. Miss Lane, the cornetist, has a very agreeable presence and manner and plays admirably. Every selection of hers being a signal for a recall. Miss Goodridge's soprano solo, "The Chalet Horn," with a cornet obbligato, by Miss Larcom, bore very favorable comparison with the rendering of the same selection by professional companies we have had here. Miss Flint's readings formed one of the most attractive features of the evening. She is a clever reader whose unpretentious, natural style and diction has not destroyed. Pleasing presence, magnetism and good voice are strong points in her favor and her selections were well chosen and held the closest attention of her audience. A second concert will be given this evening with an entire change of programme. We congratulate the Y. M. C. A. on securing so pleasant an entertainment and trust the venture will be a financial success.—Yarmouth Times.
