Let us see what those paragraphs are. Paragraph (a) is: "Importing or exporting drug without a license." Paragraph (d) is: "Unlawful possession, manufacturing, selling or distributing drug without license." Paragraph (e) is: "Unlawfully selling, giving away or distributing any drug to any minor." Now, were a charge laid under any of those paragraphs:

The onus shall be on the accused to establish that he had lawful authority to commit the act complained of.

That is to say, the act having been established—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, no; only a charge laid. Laid and established are two very different things.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If that is the complaint or the grievance, it can be cured.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I contend that when a man is charged with any of these offences, it should be provided in the Act that if it is proved that he has opium in his possession or that he gave opium to a child, a prima facie case should be established.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You do not need to provide that: it is a prima facie case.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I do not agree with my honourable friend that it is, unless the statute says so. You must show that he had intent. If you amend the clause to say that possession of these articles or the giving of them shall be prima facie an offence, that is a different matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under the procedure laid down in the Bill, it is simply provided that the Crown shall lay a charge; it is not necessary to prove that there was importation or possession.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I quite agree with the honourable gentleman. But they must prove these things.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Is it not reasonable to infer from that clause that, if the charge is laid, there will be proof?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No. There are charges laid every day under the Ontario Temperance Act, and this is just a copy of that.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: If a charge is laid, there must be some foundation upon which to lay it.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The honourable gentleman is a politician, and ought to know that charges are often laid without foundation.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Paragraphs (a), (d) and (e) specifically provide for certain things. If a charge is laid against a man that he has been doing thus and so, and he has not provided himself with a license or with any kind of authority whereby he might do that thing, then the onus is upon him to show that he had these goods in his possession lawfully.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Even though the charge were only laid?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And no proof offered?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: If the charge is laid, it is on some fundamental principal.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, lack of principle.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: A charge may be laid without any foundation at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Or without any proof.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: If the section has the effect which my honourable friends say it has, then it ought to be remedied; but I do not just see it that way.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I suggest this: "Where a charge is laid and proved before the court, the onus shall be on the accused."

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is upon the accused. That section is not necessary, because if a charge is laid and proved the onus is upon the accused to put in his defence.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The difficulty we are confronted with is that a number of us are opposed to calling upon the accused to enter into his defence merely upon a charge being laid. I suggest that that can be gotten over by adding the two words, "and proved;" then the onus of showing his authority is upon the accused.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But it is not necessary to provide for that: the law already provides for that. If a charge is laid and proved the onus is upon him. As my honourable friend knows, the onus of proof shifts during the course of a trial.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would draw attention to the fact that the charge laid states that the accused did certain things without a license. Of course, it must be made clear that he did a certain thing which contravened the Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How is that to be done?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is a question of fact. He is accused of having imported, or of having in his possession, or of having given to a minor.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The charge says, "without a license." In many instances it has been held that the onus was upon the Crown to establish the charge that the accused had done certain things without a license; and it has been necessary to communicate with Ottawa, and to have an officer of the Department come and declare that according to the books the accused had no license when that charge had been laid. At all events, I am giving the Department's version. So the reason for this clause is that when the fact has been established and the defendant's plea is that he did it under a license, the onus will be upon him to prove that. My honourable friend may say, "But it is not for the Crown to prove a negative." Yet the Crown alleges that the defendant contravenes a certain section. Even if the Crown alleges only that, what does the section say? "Without a license." So the defendant may say: "But you have not proven the allegation that I had no license and violated the Act." In any event, what harm is there in this section? During the last twelve months representations have come to the Department from all over the Dominion asking that this clause be re-enacted. We shall see. I will ask that the clause be allowed to stand. However, I would like to make it clear that once the fact of contravention is established, the onus of proof as to the license is upon the accused.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would have no objection to that; but that must be clear. There must be a prima facie case made out by the Crown.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Undoubtedly.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The mere laying of a charge should not be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Will the honourable gentleman permit this to stand in order that I may draft a clause to submit?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: Before we leave the section, I desire to point out that it would be better to substitute another word for "either" in the first line. It should read:

> Where a charge is laid under any of the paragraphs (a), (b), (d) or (e) of section four of this Act....

"Either" refers to only two.

Section 14 stands.

On section 15—burden of proof on pleas of medicinal purposes or medical treatment:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is no alteration, except that this was section 10 of the old Act, and it is broadened to include medical men, dentists, and veterinary surgeons, who will have to justify themselves.

Section 15 was agreed to.

On section 16—burden of proof on charge of unlawful possession against persons occupying or in possession of premises, etc., where drug is found:

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I think that is reasonable. If the person pleads he has a license, he has to prove that he has.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is all right.

Section 16 was agreed to.

On section 17—certificate of Dominion Analyst evidence of content of drug:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The words "or Provincial Analyst" are added.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Should the section not say "a duly qualified Provincial Analyst"? He might be an analyst in blood tests, or something of that kind.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Of course you would have to prove that he is qualified.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, you would not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would draw the attention of my honourable friend to the interpretation clause, subsection (i):

> "Provincial Analyst" means any analyst appointed by the Government of any province and having authority to make any analys's for any public purpose.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: "For any public purpose." He might analyze anything—aniline dyes, for instance—and yet might not be competent to analyze this drug. I think he should be "duly qualified."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that those Provincial Analysts are qualified analysts under the Act.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But not to analyze everything.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: You must place some confidence in the authorities for the carrying out of the Act.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Does this section mean that under any circumstances the certificate of a Dominion or Provincial analyst must be taken? Suppose there is a difference of opinion between analysts. The Provincial analyst says the substance does contain morphine or opium, and the defendant's analyst says there is nothing of the kind in it. Does this section mean that under these circumstances the evidence of the Dominion Analyst must be taken?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is simply prima facie evidence, and it can be contested. The analyst is brought into Court and cross-examined, and other analysts may be brought in.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is that section necessary at all? Would not the court give to the certificate of the Dominion or Provincial Analyst the character which this section gives to it? It would be authoritative before the court without the section. I do not think the section is at all necessary. Surely the certificate of a licensed analyst would be accepted by the court.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This provides that the certificate of a Dominion or Provincial Analyst shall be accepted as evidence, because if the certificate were valueless the witness might have to be brought a hundred miles or more.

Section 17 was agreed to.

On section 18—power of peace officer to search for drugs:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Section 18 is amended simply by adding after the word "vessel" in the fourth line the world "vehicle."

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You are giving power under this clause for a constable, who is not always the most intelligent person in the world nor the most tactful, to enter anybody's house at any time of the day or night.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Without a warrant?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: There must be reasonable cause.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, there must be reasonable cause; but what would appear to a constable as reasonable cause might not appear reasonable to a good many other people. You are violating the sanctity of a man's home, which is supposed under our law to be his castle. To permit an ordinary constable to walk into that house day or night to make a search for drugs, is, it seems to me, unnecessary. The second part of that section is bad enough, but it is not too bad, as he has to establish reasonable cause and get an order from a magistrate. I certainly would be opposed to the first part of that section.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What is the meaning of that section? Does it mean that the officer may search without a warrant?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, it says so.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: There is a proviso that would contradict that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He may search any place but a private dwelling house. We had a considerable discussion on this last year, and the clause was amended. This section is in the form as we passed it last year.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The officer should have power to search any place except a private dwelling house.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: If you establish reasonable cause upon oath and get an order from a magistrate, then a private dwelling house can be entered.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Is not that sufficiently protected?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes. I was mistaken at first. I thought the power to search without a warrant applied to a dwelling house.

Section 18 was agreed to.

Sections 19 and 20 were agreed to.

On section 21—proceedings; no certiorari:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No change.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not see why the ordinary remedies of the law should not be left open to persons charged with these offences.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Neither do I.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Take care that you do not do more harm than good when you interfere with the general course of the law and with the rights of defence that every British subject is supposed to have.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is there no appeal in this case?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, there is no appeal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There has been no change since 1911.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No, there has been no appeal.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: There is no appeal by way of certiorari.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am speaking of section 21.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Since the last decision of the Privy Council, there is no longer any certiorari in Canada. No matter what the evidence is, there is no removing it by certiorari, under that last decision.

Section 21 was agreed to.

On section 22—regulations:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If I am not mistaken, there is no power in the Governor in Council to repeal any licenses that have been issued. If so, I would suggest adding at the end of clause 22 the words, "and for the repeal of licenses," because when an offence has been committed, the license, I think, should be repealed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is provided for by section 3:

With the approval of the Governor in Council the Minister shall have power to issue licenses for the import, export, sale, manufacture and distribution of any drug, to name the ports or places in Canada where any drug may be exported or imported, to prescribe the manner in which any raw opium, prepared opium or any drug is packed and marked for export, to prescribe the record that shall be kept by any person in connection with the export, import, receipt, sale, disposal and distribution of the drug or drugs mentioned in the schedule to this Act, and to make all convenient and necessary regulations with respect to the issue and duration and the terms and forms of the several licenses that may be issued hereunder.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That does not apply to the case.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No. I would suggest the addition of the words, "and for the repeal of licenses."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Or "revocation."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Or "revocation."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is provided by regulation that where there is an offence the license may be cancelled.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is the license issued by regulation or by statute? The power to license is given by statute, is it not?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the form and terms and duration of the license are dealt with by regulation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the power to license is granted by statute, the revocation of the license will have to be by the same authority.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. The authority is given the Governor in Council by section 3.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it is, that is all right.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Clause 3 authorizes the Minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to issue licenses, and among other things to determine the duration, etc.; but there is nothing in that clause that would authorize the Minister, even with the approval of the Governor in Council, to cancel.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In conformity with section 3 regulations were passed under P.C. 2392, which says:

All licenses issued under this Act are subject to cancellation in the event of the licensee being found guilty of an offence against any provision of the said Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But the difficulty is that the regulation does not seem to be within the power of the statute and does not seem to be authorized.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Yes, it gives the power.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I know the regulation does, but the regulation would be ultra vires of the Act.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Minister is given power, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to make regulations "with respect to the issue and duration and the terms and form of the several licenses." That is provided for in the latter part of section 3.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Duration would not cover revocation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But this deals with the terms and form.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is all right. Cancellation is covered.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Section 3 deals with the issue of licenses. Those words relate to the issue of licenses, and not to anything else; so clearly there would not be power to revoke.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Section 3 covers the duration.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That power has not been challenged.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Well, it will be.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It may be.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I move that the word "and," in the last line but one, be struck out, and that after the word "purposes" the following words be added: "and for the revocation of licenses."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Hon. Mr. Béique that clause 22 be amended to read as follows:

The Governor in Council may make such orders and regulations as are deemed necessary or expedient for carrying out the intention of the Act; for the seizure of any drug that there is reason to believe is liable to forfeiture under this Act; for the use or sale of any drug for scientific purposes, and for revocation of licenses.

The amendment was agreed to, and section 22, as amended, was agreed to.

On section 23—additions to schedule:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In the fourth line there are to be added the words, "or similar synthetic preparations."

Section 23, as amended, was agreed to.

On section 24—except in cases tried before two justices, no appeals in cases taken under section 4, (a), (d), and (e):

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is the view of the Department on section 24:

This is a new section and designed to limit the right of appeal to a stated case on a point of law, with respect to offences under paragraphs (a), (d), and (e) of section 4 of the Act, which deals with persons importing, having in possession without a license, or selling to a minor (drug smugglers and peddlers), except where the case is tried before two justices of the peace.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Do you allow of any appeal?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No appeal except where the case is tried before two justices of the peace, and except on a stated case.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That does not say so here.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It says:

Except in cases tried before two justices of the peace, sections seven hundred and forty-nine to seven hundred and sixty, inclusive, and subsection two of section seven hundred and sixty-nine of the Criminal Code shall not apply to any conviction, order or proceedings in respect of any offence under paragraphs (a), (d) and (e) of section four of this Act.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The memorandum proceeds:

This section is made necessary through the fact that the right of Appeal is being greatly abused. It is the general practice in most of the large cities for these drug peddlers, when convicted, to immediately serve notice of appeal. This is done as a matter of course, in the hope that the Crown witnesses may disappear, or that time may operate in their favour A large percentage of these drug peddlers convicted under paragraphs (a), (d), or (e) of section 4 of the Act, never appear in court on the date set for the hearing of the appeal. While it is true that the bail is estreated in cases of this nature, as a rule the amount is not very large and has no deterrent effect on the guilty party. This practice has become so common that the law is being evaded by large numbers of this class of criminal who as a rule has no fixed residence or place of abode, and operates under various aliases, thereby making it very difficult, if not impossible, for the police authorities to apprehend the offender with a view to having him serve the penalty imposed by the lower court.

It should be kept in mind that this section does not affect a physician, druggist, dentist or veterinary surgeon, or in other words, persons who have some place of business or interest in the community, and are not likely to disappear before the hearing of the appeal. This section as drafted still allows, to all persons, the right of appeal by way of a stated case, or on a point of law, and also provides for the right of appeal in any case where an accused person is tried before two justices of the peace. The sole purpose of this section is to prevent the right of appeal being abused, and to prevent these drug traffickers from escaping the penalty of the law, as is being done to an alarming extent at the present time.

Paragraphs (a), (d), and (e) of section 4 cover the following cases:

Every person who—

(a) imports into or exports from Canada any drug, or, not being a common carrier, takes or carries, or causes to be taken or carried from any place in Canada to any other place in Canada, any drug, without first obtaining a license therefor from the Minister; (1911, c. 17, s. 3, am. 1920, c. 31, s. 5 A (2) (a).)

(d) has in his possession any drug without lawful authority, or manufactures, sells, gives away or distributes any drug to any person without first obtaining a license from the Minister; (1920, c. 31, s. 5 A (2) (e).)

(e) unlawfully sells, gives away or distributes any drug to any minor; (1921, c. 42, s. 1 (e).)

shall be guilty of a criminal offence, and shall be liable upon indictment to imprisonment for any term not exceeding seven years.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: And to be fined.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What is the effect of allowing an appeal to these people? It is that the law, which has been made a severe one for crimes that should be driven out of the community, is made void, and the sentence is set aside by the accused themselves, who transform a conviction for five years or seven years into a fine of a few hundred dollars, which they deposit, and under cover of that deposit they disappear. They have thus thwarted the judgment of the court. They are not citizens of repute, of standing, or of known residence. They move from one city to another to ply their trade, and thus alter the law of Canada in their own favour, instead of standing the penalty.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I think it is quite right with that explanation.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I wish to point out that there is a very easy remedy. You have your Act by which you say that a man who commits any of those offences is liable on indictment. Well, why not indict him? Then there is no appeal, except on a stated case by the judge himself; but if you select for his trial an inferior court of magistrates, who have no training and no knowledge of these things, then you must provide some means of appeal.

Hon. Mr DANDURAND: I may say that in the city of Montreal there were last year some four hundred cases. Is it just that the Crown should be put to the necessity and expense of indicting?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Why not arrest the accused, and then when he comes before the magistrate he is sent down for trial, and he remains in jail until he gets his trial. Then there is no appeal after he is tried on an indictment.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: There are not sufficient judges to try them all.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I am not going to argue the question of appeal, but I think you should not take away the right of certiorari, no matter how regular the conviction may be, if it is made before anybody but a judge on an indictment. It now stands without an appeal on the merits, or on any question of validity in law.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: If one of those fellows happened to be honest, he could always appeal to the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes.

Section 24 was agreed to.

Sections 25, 26 and 27 were agreed to.

On the schedule:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is only one addition to the schedule:

Cannabis Indica (Indian Hemp) or Hasheesh, or its preparations or compounds or derivatives, or their preparations and compounds.

The schedule was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: As a suggestion to the Department of Justice on section 14, I submit the folowing:

The onus of poof of the existence of a license or of lawful authority to do any act complained of under this Act shall be upon the accused.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: That is not sufficient.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: It was decided that section 14 should stand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is simply a suggestion made by the honourable gentleman, for the Department to consider.

Sections 4 and 14 stand.

Progress was reported.

FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 82, an Act to amend The Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the object of consolidating this Act in this way, in a Bill of over 40 pages?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The schedule is a new description of each of the 39 reserves which come under the Dominion Forest Reserves Act.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: And which are new reserves?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, which are new reserves. No change is proposed in the areas comprising many of those reserves. The re-writing of the schedule was approved owing to the fact that the original description in the 1911 Act was made by the metes and bounds system, which is a very cumbersome and complicated method, and also in view of the fact that in the numerous amendments to the original Act the lands added or withdrawn have been described by section, township, and range. The result is that it is a very difficult matter for anyone not familiar with the Act and all its amendments to determine the lands which are included in forest reserves. In the schedule, which forms the principal part of this Act, each reserve has been described by section, township, and range. All previous withdrawals, or additions have not been taken into consideration, and provision has not been made for such alterations as are proposed in the present Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The question in my mind is as to the expediency or propriety of including within our statutes an Act such as this, reaching 42 pages, with nothing but a description of land within its four corners. It seems to me this might be done by Order in Council or by some regulation of the Department. It is not like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unalterable, because it will be found that in almost every Session we shall have to amend it. It does not give any greater guarantee to the Crown to have this Act in the statutes than if the discretion were exercised by the Minister, because on the recommendation of the Minister or the Department we change this from time to time without making any inquiry into it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Bill has for its object the withdrawing of certain lands from the Dominion Forest Reserves Act, and adding other lands thereto. It is quite a cumbersome document. I have a memorandum from the Forestry Branch. I am not familiar with the existence of these reserves, which are all in the western provinces—because I see here Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia. Then, each of the reserves is described. If any group of Senators coming from those provinces and interested in this matter want to form themselves into a Special Committee, I will hand them the whole memorandum, and they can work at it to their heart's content.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will be shorter to do it in this way.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: If the honourable leader will, when he comes to each reserve, give a statement of the lands that are withdrawn or added, or both, I think that will be all that will be necessary.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think my honourable friend might constitute himself a Special Committee, and I will hand him the memorandum.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I might suggest to my honourable friend that he will find all the information in the Bill.

Section 1 was agreed to.

The schedule, the preamble, and the title were agreed to.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: Can the honourable leader tell us how many square miles are covered by this whole Bill? I just want to know the acreage that the Government own.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: While we are proceeding with another Bill my honourable friend might perhaps look through this memorandum, and he will find the answer.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: When he goes down to Bermuda he can figure that out.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 115, an Act to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Hon. Mr. McLennan in the Chair.

Sections 1 and 2, the preamble, and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS (INSURANCE) BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 116, an Act respecting the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1—agreements to restore or make good loss or damage by fire, etc.:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I was asked for some information when this Bill was up for second reading, and I have received the following from the Deputy Minister of Railways:

> The undersigned is advised that the decision of the Canadian National Railway Management to carry its own insurance will not mean any additions to the staff. On the contrary, it should be possible to effect reductions in consequence of the new arrangement.

The methods of insurance heretofore in force necessitated much clerical work, not only as to policies, but as to adjustments of losses and payment of claims. This work will now be concentrated and consolidated, and be entirely within the control of the Canadian National Railway Company, with consequent lessening of work.

However, any question of staff increase or reduction is a matter resting entirely with the Management.

This Bill applies also to the Government Merchant Marine.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think we ought to have more information in regard to this matter; we ought to have the annual cost of insurance to the present time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I furnished that information to the Senate some days ago in answer to a question put by the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain).

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Briefly, how much of a saving is to be effected?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know that the question has been put as to what amount would be laid aside each year to create an insurance fund.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is it the intention to create an insurance fund?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I take that for granted, inasmuch as the Canadian National Railways, or the management, will henceforth carry their own insurance. Any well-established organization can only do so by laying aside each year a certain amount.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I am glad that my honourable friend put in the words, "well-established organization," because we will have to have more evidence before we are convinced that it is a well-established organization.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend must not forget that there has been an overwhelming expression of public opinion that the Railway Management can only hope to make a success of its administration if it is given a free hand. We must not interfere too much, or we will be told that we have not been giving them a fair chance—a sporting chance, as the new Chairman of the Board has put it. I hope that within not many years they will have demonstrated the effect of their management. I may say that one of the high officials of the administration, in answer to my anxious inquiry: "How many years will you need to demonstrate that national or public ownership can pull it out of the mire?" answered, "Three years."

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think we will be very lucky if we get that information in three years, judging from the length of time it has taken me to get some very slight information in regard to motor cars and private cars.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is not the same department.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: If this institution is as well established as my honourable friend would intimate, surely they could have supplied that information before this.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The part of the information relating to railways was before us months ago.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then the Militia Department was in default.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I was informed that there was only one defaulting department.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Which one was that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Public Works Department.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: When my honourable friend says that we should give them a free hand, I agree with him—with certain reservations. Judging from the proposition of theirs to purchase a ticket office that is absolutely not needed in the city of Toronto at a cost of $1,000,000 for the site, and probably $1,500,000 for the building, I think we had better modify the idea of giving them a free hand, and had better limit it, in view of the fact that the city of Montreal has a railway station which is a disgrace.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: I call the honourable gentleman's attention to the fact that clause 1 is under discussion.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I am replying to the honourable leader of the Government. He said we should give these people a free hand: that was in connection with this Bill; surely I have a right to speak with regard to that. I say that when the city of Montreal is without a proper railway station, and that when people have to disembark in rain or storm at the city of St. John, it does not look as though we should give a free hand to this well-established organization which we now have.

Section 1 was agreed to.

Section 2 the schedule, the preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

MILITIA PENSION BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Griesbach, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 118, an Act to amend the Militia Pension Act.

Hon. Mr. Taylor in the chair.

Sections 1, 2 and 3, the preamble, and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THE PORT OF SYDNEY, N.S.

SALE OF LAND TO IMPERIAL OIL COMPANY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from April 19 the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. J. S. McLennan:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to a sale of land at Sydney, N.S., to the Imperial Oil Co., and will ask the Government what action it will take in the matter.

Hon. J. D. REID: Honourable gentlemen, I understand that the honourable leader of the Government moved the adjournment of this debate, and that when he concludes his remarks the debate is closed. I would like to say a few words in reference to this matter, as my name was mentioned in the discussion which took place the other day, so I would ask the leader of the Government to allow me to do so before the debate is closed.

I am sorry that, owing to conditions over which I had no control, I was not able to be present when the debate took place a few days ago; and as the House may have received a wrong impression from the statements made, I would like to give my views in regard to this matter.

From the remarks made by the honourable Senator from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan), one would come to the conclusion that a great wrong had been done and that the public interest had not been properly looked after. Insinuations were made against the officials of the Canadian National Railways—Mr. Hanna, Mr. Hungerford, and others—and statements were made reflecting upon their honour and integrity. One might also conclude, from the statements made, that the Imperial Oil Company were a party to a dishonest transaction, and that injustice had been done to the city of Sydney. Passing reference was made to myself as Minister of Railways, and to Mr. McCurdy, also a member of the Government. We of course had nothing to do with the final settlement of this matter, and therefore the only reflection there could be in regard to us was that we were lax in the performance of our duty while negotiations were being carried on. The final action was taken by the late Mr. Kennedy, late Minister of Railways, and, according to the statements made, he and the employees of the railway, along with the Imperial Oil Company, must have been in some great conspiracy so far as the interest of the public was concerned.

As I go along, I want to take issue with many of the statements made, and I want to try to show that if any wrong has been done, or if there has been any laxity, it was on the part of the member for Sydney himself rather than on the part of those whom he accused.

The conclusion we would come to in reading his speech is that the Imperial Oil Company was starting a new business in Sydney. The fact is that the Imperial Oil Company has been in Sydney for a number of years, and has had a large business there. On account of the growth of their business, it became necessary to get additional land for extensions; and accordingly, after consideration, they came to the conclusion that a piece of the land belonging to the Canadian National Railways would provide a suitable place.

The Imperial Oil Company first took this matter up with the head of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Hanna, and he, as I understand, asked his officials to look into the question and see whether the land was required for railway purposes. After having made inquiries, the officials—who, I believe are upright, honourable men—reported that the land was not required for railway purposes, and that its transfer would not interfere with the railway situation at Sydney. This information was conveyed to the Imperial Oil Company. But, before any action was taken, Mr. Hanna and his officials informed the Imperial Oil Company that they must get the consent of the citizens of Sydney through their Municipal Council. I believe honourable gentlemen will agree with me when I say that in dealing with a municipality you must deal through the municipal council. The council, by a vote of 7 to 5, passed a resolution in favour of the Imperial Oil Company purchasing this piece of property. It was passed subject to the condition that the property should not be required by the Public Works Department or by the Department of Railways and Canals. A copy of this resolution came to the Department of Railways and Canals and to myself as Minister at that time. The action I took was to submit the resolution to the Railway officials. They in turn reported to the Department that the property was not required, and I accordingly advised the Municipal Council to that effect. That was about the extent of what I had to do with the matter while I was Minister of Railways and Canals. A copy of the resolution was likewise sent to the Minister of Public Works, who took a similar position, stating that the property was not required by the Public Works Department That satisfied the Municipal Council.

However, an agitation was started by some people in Sydney against the Imperial Oil Company taking over this piece of property. The railway officials did not rush through with the deal. They hestitated before taking any action, and the matter was left in abeyance for about a year. The railway officials said to the Imperial Oil Company: "Go before the Council again and see whether they are still in favour of this piece of property being taken over by your Company." For the second time, about a year later, the Council by majority vote stood by the resolution, declaring that the town of Sydney was not affected by the Imperial Oil Company taking over the property.

But the railway officials went forther, in order, I suppose, to satisfy themselves in every possible way that the proposed transfer was not detrimental to the interest of the town of Sydney or to the public interest. Complaints were being made that the Marine Hospital and the park would be interfered with, and that the proximity of the oil plant would constitute a menace in case of fire. All these objections were placed before the Management of the Railway, and rightly so, by persons who wished to raise objection. Now, here is what was done in order that the railway officials might be sure that they were right as to the effect on the city of Sydney. In the first place, at the time the application was made, or shortly afterwards, the City Council passed a resolution in favour of the transfer. Then, after all the agitation by the persons who were opposed to the deal, the public were invited to attend the Council meetings, and again Council passed a resolution in favour of it One would naturally think that the representatives of the city ought to know what the majority of the people thought about this matter. After all, I think everyone will admit that any proposal to locate a manufacturing industry near some person's property would always meet with some objection. It is almost impossible to avoid objection in locating such an industry. However, the City Council gave its decision. Then the City Engineer of Sydney was consulted and he approved. The matter was referred also to the Fire Chief of Sydney, and he approved of the proposal from the standpoint of safety. Then the question as to the Marine Hospital came in, and it was referred to the Superintendent of Public Health for the Province of Nova Scotia. He visited Sydney, and he had no objection to offer. Then they got the Provincial Fire Marshall for Nova Scotia and he also approved. I cannot see where the railway officials were lax in their duty. They took every precaution they could to see that the interests of the city of Sydney and of the Marine Hospital were protected. I do not see what further they could have done to get evidence that there was nothing in the complaints that had been made by, I suppose, a minority of the citizens of Sydney.

The matter did not again come before the Government of which I was a member, or before the Minister of Railways and Canals who succeeded me, the late Mr. Stewart. I supose the Railway officials, after obtaining all possible information, had satisfied themselves that there could be no further complaints from any source. However, the matter finally came before the late Hon. William Kennedy, Minister of Railways and Canals in the present Government. Mr. Kennedy was making a trip down to the East, and decided to go on the ground himself. He visited the city of Sydney and went over the situation personally, right on the ground. It was after he came back that he signed the recommendation to Council and the Order was passed by the Government.

I have myself visited Sydney. I know the locations, and in my judgement, for what it is worth, no injustice has been done the city of Sydney in transferring this piece of property to the Imperial Oil Company. By the way, while I am on the subject, let me say that, although I have always been opposed to the late Mr. Kennedy, still I believe that there was no more upright and honourable man in the Dominion. I do not think that any action of his in connection with this matter was dishonest. And, as for the Imperial Oil Company, I believe the men who are connected with that concern and operating that plant are upright and honourable. They have been doing business in Sydney for many years and I cannot believe that they would take any unfair advantage or try to do an injustice or place their industry in such a position that it would be against the interest of Sydney as a whole.

Then the valuation comes in. The insinuation is that the Government that concluded this deal did not get a proper sum for the property. The valuation, as I understand, was based on an investigation made by the local valuator for the railways in Nova Scotia.

a gentleman who, I understand, has since died —the late Mr. Humble, of Truro. Honourable gentleman from Nova Scotia will know this man. I never knew him. His valuation was the basis on which the price was fixed. As I understood the discussion that took place here, it was stated that the property, if sold for town lots, would sell at something like 9 cents a foot, whereas it was sold to the Imperial Oil Company for 7 cents. It is of course to be remembered that if the property had been sold for city lots, the streets would first have had to be taken out, and the price of 7 cents a foot for all the property is at least equivalent to 9 cents for the property exclusive of the streets. In my judgment the price obtained by the Department was a fair valuation.

Complaint has been made also that the transfer of this property would interfere with the development of Sydney in connection with export or import business, or with shipping as a whole. It was stated that Sydney was the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway, and if you sold the property around the teminals its development would be interfered with. In my judgment there is nothing in that argument, and I will give you the reason why I think so. The long wharf, which has fallen into decay because there has been so little shipping done at that point, is still owned by the Government. The tracks that were originally laid run down to the wharf. If at any time in the future more shipping should come to Sydney and it should be decided to increase the accommodation, the Railway would still own the wharf—which of course would have to be rebuilt—and there is an area extending for 400 feet back from the wharf to the Imperial Oil Company's location, and in that area there is plenty of room to build warehouses, etc., for the transhipping of traffic. We all know that it is on the wharf that any warehouses are built, and not 400 feet back from the wharf.

Honourable members of this House might infer that it was at Sydney that all the export shipping to Newfoundland and other places was done. Let me tell the House that the export shipping from that part of Nova Scotia is done at North Sydney. It is at North Sydney that all the traffic that has come by rail for shipment to Newfoundland is placed on vessels. It is at North Sydney that the big warehouses for exports to Newfoundland are located. The boats of the Reid Newfoundland Railway Company come to North Sydney. It is there, and not at Sydney itself, that the traffic has been transferred for very many years. There is of course a large traffic at Sydney, but it is done by the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, or, as they are now called, the British Empire Steel Corporation, and all their transhipping is done on their own docks, on which of course the Intercolonial Railway have their line. If a vessel did come along to the city of Sydney, there would be no trouble about the transhipment of goods, because the Steel Corporation and the Intercolonial allow the transfer to be made at the Dominion Iron and Steel Works. But North Sydney is 18 miles from Sydney, and when freight is consigned, as we may think, to Sydney for transport to Newfoundland it goes to North Sydney, because, as the Railway officials say, there is a rail haul of 18 miles further and because North Sydney is considered to have a better harbour all the year round. Whether it has or not I do not know, but the traffic has been established there for very many years and for that reason I should judge that it must be better.

The honourable member from Sydney also stated that some time Sydney might be a port for transatlantic trade, because it affords a shorter route to Liverpool than Halifax—I suppose it is 175 to 200 miles nearer. But if freight is shipped by rail to Sydney, to be carried by ship to Liverpool, the distance to Sydney is 150 or 200 miles longer than to Halifax. The railway people, when they want to ship goods in winter through one of our own Canadian ports, for export, would prefer to use St. John or Halifax, which are much closer by rail. So that, I cannot see how either Sydney or North Sydney, as a future great exporting port will ever take the place of Halifax or St. John. It can only be an exporting port for products of the eastern part of Nova Scotia. Of course, there are large exports of coal and iron; but, in my opinion, it will be a long time before Sydney will be much larger than it is. I have no desire to belittle that port, because it is one of the best ports in the Dominion, situated in a great industrial part of Canada; but in my judgment it will never take the place of the two cities I have mentioned as a terminus for goods for overseas.

The Imperial Oil Company, in enlarging their business, of course provided an additional feeder to the Intercolonial Railway. It is true, they bring their oils and gasoline and other products into Sydney, and they are remanufactured or shipped. They bring them in by vessels from foreign countries, and the Intercolonial has reaped great advantages from their traffic; and, so long as the railway officials took ever precaution to see that no injustice was done to the city of Sydney, and that the land was not required for railway purposes, I cannot find anything wrong in letting the Imperial Oil Company have this land.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: May I ask the honourable gentleman whether the Imperial Oil Company are manufacturing oil there, or refining, and whether they are now bringing in by water what previously they brought in by rail?

Hon. Mr. REID: Of course the honourable gentleman can answer that question himself. All I can say is that I am informed that they have a large industry at Sydney. It may not be for manufacturing; it may be for distribution; but whether for the one or the other, the very fact of them wishing to extend their industry convinces me that it must be of some magnitude.

What I find fault with in the position taken by the honourable member is this. I was a member of the Government, and Mr. McCurdy also was a member. When I ceased to hold office Mr. McCurdy took my place, and when this matter first came up Sir Robert Borden was Prime Minister of Canada. I took it for granted that the honourable gentleman was a friend of that Government. Now, the Session of 1920 was in progress when this matter started. I was here; Sir Robert Borden was here; Mr. Stewart was here. I met the honourable gentleman many times; but he never mentioned anything about this matter during the year 1920. If any injustice or harm was being done to the city of Sydney—and he knew all about it from the day it started—would not honourable gentlemen think that he would have said to me as a friend, "This is unfair"? But that was not the only thing that happened. The Session of 1921 came on; the Government was still in power; we had a man in this House who was a great friend of ours, as we thought—a man who was looking after the interests of Sydney, where he lived—and it was his duty to look after not only the interests of the city of Sydney, but the public interest everywhere. If any injustice was being done, or any land was being wrongly sold, who was the first man who should have looked after that interest? The man who knew all about it, and who was getting $4,000 a year as a Senator to look after it. Yet he never mentioned anything during the whole year 1921; he never referred it to Sir Robert Borden, to myself, or to any member of the Government. Perhaps that might have been too much trouble, but he never even mentioned it to one official of the Railway Department, or to Mr. Hanna.

Then, when there was a change of Government in 1921, if he did not wish to help his friends to protect the city of Sydney, but is anxious to do so much now, why did he not take up this matter with the Liberal party, when Mr. Kennedy was in office as Minister of Railways, and not allow him to do an injustice to the Dominion of Canada? But he never said a word to Mr. Kennedy. Now, after 1922, he comes to this House in 1923 and tells us what an awful injustice has been done, although up to this minute he has never mentioned the matter to a single individual of any Government or of any Department, or to the Minister of Railways and Canals.

The honourable gentleman mentioned in his speech that Mr. Mckenzie and Mr. King, two members of the present Government, objected to this sale. Well, I suppose someone must have drawn the attention of those two gentlemen to it, and they mentioned it to the Minister of Railways and Canals, who went down there. But Mr. McKenzie and Mr. King had had the matter up before them in Council, and they must have stood up like men and voted for it, and therefore they sanctioned this sale. If there was a wrong being done, I do not think those two Ministers would have voted for it. I think they would certainly have insisted on it not going through.

Now, surely I am not speaking too strongly when I say that when all this was going on, from 1920 until 1922, being discussed in the public press and in the city of Sydney, the honourable gentleman must have known all about it. I charge that he certainly did know; and, that being so, was it not only fair and just that, even if he did not wish to tell me, he should have gone to the Prime Minister and told him what was being done to Sydney? If there had been such an interview from him, who is so anxious now, after the door has been locked, to let the people know what a great injustice has been done to Sydney, I might not have reason to complain to-day.

I will conclude by saying that, so far as this transaction is concerned, or any other that was carried out by Mr. Hanna, Mr. Hungerford, Mr. Hayes, or Mr. Bell, the Deputy Minister, or Mr. Fraser, I never heard any charge made or believed that any charge could be made, against those men for dishonesty. While I know that the late Mr. Kennedy was a strong party politician, I do not believe any man can stand in this House and accuse him of having done any dishonest act, or allowing any dishonest act, either publicly or privately, and I would not make any insinuation of that kind against him.

This transaction was not finally concluded while I was Minister of Railways, nor while Mr. McCurdy was in office; but I repeat that I think it was a fair and right transaction, and the officials I have mentioned took every precaution to see that no injustice was done to the citizens of Sydney. I will add that when any person makes an insinuation of dishonesty against any officials of the Railway or any Minister who puts through a transaction, if he is in a position to do it inside of this House, he should do it outside, where those who are interested would be able to take up the matter.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: As I have gone to the trouble of reading from beginning to end the long correspondence in regard to this matter, I would like to say a few words; but, as the debate would not be concluded before six o'clock, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

The debate was accordingly adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, May 7, at 8 p.m.

THE RED FLAG IN CANADA

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. LORNE WEBSTER: I wish to draw the attention of the members of this House to one or two items that appear in to-day's press. One in the Herald, of Montreal, reads as follows:

Red Flag Hoisted at Calgary Park.

Calgary, May 7.—The red flag was hoisted and the Internationale sung at a May Day meeting held in St. George's Island Park here yesterday, under the chairmanship of Fred J. White, labor member of the Alberta legislature. Four hundred people attended the meeting.

Mrs. William Carson, local labor leader, advocated the abolishment of the National Anthem for the Internationale song.

Two city aldermen gave addresses.

In this afternoon's Montreal Star appears the following:

Cheery Hopes at Sydney Meeting

Sydney, N.S., May 7—(Canadian Press).—"I hope to see the day when the Union Jack will be dragged in the mud and the Red Flag will be flying in Canada as the standard of freedom for the workers."

So declared Malcolm Bruce, of Toronto, addressing a mass meeting which jammed the Savoy Theatre at Glace Bay yesterday afternoon. His statement was greeted with applause.

"The only thing worth while that came out of the last war was Soviet Russia," he assured his hearers, "and Russia is to-day lighting the path that leads to a life of enjoyment for the working class."

I would like to draw the attention of the Government to these speeches, as they speak for themselves.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not suppose I can do anything more than refer the remarks made by the honourable gentleman to the Minister of Justice.

FRUIT BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 11, an Act to regulate the Sale and Inspection of Fruit and Fruit Containers.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—interpretation:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I have a number of Bills that conform to our regulations. This one does not, but I will try to make the changes clear. Paragraphs a, b and d are new. Paragraph e says:

"Closed package" means any package the contents of which cannot be seen or inspected when such package is closed.

The Act says "boxes and barrels." Paragraph f is new. "Properly packed" has been defined in a foot-note in different issues of the Fruit Marks Act for a number of years. The definition is now included in the Act.

In paragraph g the words "affected with side worm" are new. It has always been understood that an apple affected with side worm was a cull, but these words are inserted to make the definition of culls more specific.

Paragraph h is not changed.

Paragraph i is completely new. "Slightly affected," as used in the definition of "domestic" grade is defined in order to secure uniformity in packing under this grade.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: Has this Bill, which is a very lengthy one, and which contains many changes, been submitted to any committee or organization of fruit-growers for their approval?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It has been considered by a conference of fruit-growers' associations of all the provinces, and has been unanimously agreed to.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: I would like to ask the leader of the Government if this Bill has been submitted to the public. Some of the apples we buy by the barrel in Nova Scotia are a disgrace to any packer. I know a dealer who got a number of barrels of apples marked No. 1, and he had to sell many of them as No. 3 or No. 4 for whatever he could get. I asked why he did not report the matter, and he said it was of no use. Will this legislation apply to that case?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Act covers that point, and recourse could have been had.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: This dealer told me he had reported to the inspector in Nova Scotia and could not get any action. He had not reported to Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department would like very much to be informed of such difficulties in order to give redress.

Section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3—grades:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In subsection 1 the following words are new: "except as is hereinafter by subsection 2 of this section provided with respect to apples, crabapples, and pears." Special definitions have been provided for apples, crabapples and pears when packed in boxes in accordance with the recommendation of the Sixth Dominion Fruit Conference.

In paragraph a the words "handpicked" are new. It is generally recognized that only handpicked apples may be included in closed packages, all others being culls; but it has been deemed advisable to make this specific in defining the various grades.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Can my honourable friend at this point say to what extent this is based upon the regulations which obtain in the United States? United States fruit comes into Canada and competes very seriously with Canadian fruit. One would fancy that our regulations should approximate as closely as possible, without inflicting any hardship upon the Canadian producer, the regulations of the United States Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: These grades have been in effect in Canada since 1901 and have worked very satisfactorily. There has been no complaint. The boxes which are covered by this Act are made to conform with the American regulations and practice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How will these grades compare with the United States grades? Do they impose greater restrictions?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, they are practically the same.

On paragraph c:

"Domestic" which shall include only handpicked specimens of not less than medium size for the variety, sound and not less than ninety per cent free from wormholes (but may be slightly affected with scab and other minor defects), no culls, and properly packed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The change from 80 to 90 per cent has been made in accordance with a resolution to this effect passed by the annual meeting of the Nova Scotia Fruit-growers' Association and following similar recommendations from individual growers. This change was concurred in by a staff-meeting of the District Fruit Inspectors, and an expression of opinion is also being asked from the Ontario Fruit-growers' Association. The original intention of the Dominion Fruit Conference in 1918 in creating this grade was to provide a place for oversized, poorly coloured or slightly scabby or otherwise defective apples which would be thrown out of the No. 1 grade, but which constituted a valuable grade for many purposes and particularly for immediate use. The grade has undoubtedly been abused and the market flooded with apples marked "Domestic," but of such poor quality that they were not only unsaleable themselves but prevented the profitable sale of apples of better grade and quality.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: In the second line of paragraph b are the words "not less than nearly medium size," and in the second line of paragraph c the words, "not less than medium size." What is the object of using the word "nearly"?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It would be in order that a somewhat smaller apple could be put in No 2 than in No. 1.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: If that is the case, should not the word "nearly" go into paragraph c also?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The explanation is that the Domestic is supposed to be a No. 1, except that it has not the colour.

Subsection 1 of section 3, was agreed to.

On subsection 2—grades for apples, crab-apples and pears in boxes:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: All this subsection 2 is new. It is submitted in order to meet the American competition. It is simply to cover the boxes. These grades are exactly the same as those of the principal Western States.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Does the word "boxes" include barrels?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Not in this section. This just applies to boxes.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I would like to ask the leader of the Government if this Bill has been considered by any public body in Canada other than the growers themselves. It seems to me that the Bill is framed altogether in the interest of the fruit-growers. The consuming public in Canada has suffered severely for many years from the manner in which apples are packed. I know of cases in this city where apples came from Ontario, and some of the barrels were half full of very ripe apples, but the balance of the apples were green, consequently they did not keep. The same thing applies to our smaller fruits. It seems to me that a measure of this kind, in which the public are so directly interested, should go before a committee that would give the public an opportunity of appearing here in their own interest. I understand the Bill has been submitted to a committee of fruit-dealers, men who are directly interested in this trade, and I feel that the public interest is not being served.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, it is difficult to reach the individual consumer, but there was a conference in Ottawa on the 22nd of February last year, and of the 32 official delegates 20 were fruit-growers and representatives of associations, 6 represented the wholesale fruit trade, 9 were package manufacturers, one was a jam manufacturer, one was a nurseryman, and one represented the retailers. They all represented provincial organizations—men of the trade who had the greatest interest in standardizing their own trade and protecting themselves.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: That is exactly what I object to.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: When I say protecting themselves, I mean increasing guarantees for themselves which involves guarantees for the public. The honourable gentleman has mentioned a grievance. Well, this Bill tends to cure the evil he mentions, and provincial associations that are solely interested in furthering the public interests, as well as delegates from the provinces, have been examining this Bill and passing upon it, so that we have the opinion of the official representatives of the various provinces that are interested in fruit-growing.

Subsection 2 was agreed to.

On section 4—marks required:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In paragraph a, only the first five words are new: "if packed in barrels or half-barrels." Paragraphs b and c are absolutely new. The changes in connection with marking are necessary in order to correspond with the new grade names for boxes. The balance of the section, except subsection 7, is not altered. Subsection 7 is new:

(7) Fruit packed in open packages bearing any of the grade marks defined in section three, must comply with the said grade requirements.

This added subsection is necessary to keep up the standard of grade requirements. For instance, if a grower packs apples in a bushel basket, and marks them No. 1, the fruit must correspond with No. 1 grade. This principle has been in effect by regulation of the Fruit Branch for a number of years.

Section 4 was agreed to.

On section 5—regulations:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There are but two words added in paragraph b—the words "packages and." This is done in order that there may be some regulation over the kind of packages. Heretofore we have been able to control and regulate our own packages, boxes, and barrels, but we have not had power over the regulation of packages, barrels and boxes coming from the United States. This will give the Governor in Council the right to make regulations for those various importations. The United States has taken control of such imported goods, and it is deemed proper that we should act in the same direction.

Sections 5, 6, 7 and 8 were agreed to.

On secton 9—fruit over-faced:

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like to ask what procedure is taken to see that these regulations are carried out.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department sees to the carrying out of the whole Act, and it has some 70 inspectors all over Canada.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: With the permission of the House, I would like to go back to section 3, subsection 1, paragraph a. I would like to inquire if it is thought that this definition of "No. 1" is not too lax. It appears to me that if this grade is not made higher it will be a bad thing for the trade. In apples shipped from British Columbia to Ontario I do not believe I saw any that were not much better than what would be permitted under this definition of No. 1. I am under the impression that if the British Columbia growers did not ship better apples than this paragraph calls for, they would not be able to sell them in Ontario. Therefore, when those shippers are making a better grade than is defined in this paragraph, it would be good business to raise the grade somewhat higher. This paragraph permits 10 per cent of scab and worm-holes and bruises; but if a customer opened a box and found that percentage of defects, he would not consider that that was No. 1 grade, yet this definition would allow of such defects.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This description of No. 1 has been the subject of considerable discussion, but it has been deemed proper to retain it, because crops vary from year to year, and there must be a little lee-way, and this 10 per cent covers all possible defects, including bruises. It has been the experience of the Department that this grade has compared favourably with apples supplied in Great Britain. People have made no complaint, there or in other countries to which they have been exported, and this description of grade No. 1 seems to have given satisfaction.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I submit that it must have given satisfaction just because none of the dealers were taking advantage of this paragraph and making the grade as low as it would allow. If the grading complied only with the description in this Act it would not be satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that there are a considerable number of violations of this grade, under this description, and these are followed up by the Department.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Do they not come largely from Ontario?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department would not like to express an opinion on that question.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: What I am trying to impress on the Department is that, owing to this description being so lax, the dealers are losing trade, and I am satisfied the British Columbia apples are being shipped to Ontario because the growers are putting up a better grade than this section calls for. I believe it would be wisdom to have the same thing done all over the country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that the British Columbia mode of packing has given greater satisfaction because of the box used, and by this Act we are giving a special grade to boxed apples.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: But you are allowing a very poor grade to be called No. 1, and I am satisfied that if this grade is lived up to, and apples of this description are exported, it will be to the detriment of Canadian growers.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I can see the necessity of allowing considerable leeway for the grade that is used more than any other—called No. 1; but my criticism would be that there should be a higher grade than this No. 1. In boxed apples there are two grades, fancy and extra-fancy, above No. 1; in other packages there is only No. 1, which must necessarily have a certain amount of leeway; but if there were other grades higher, fancy and extra fancy, I suggest the Bill would be more nearly perfect.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I would like to inquire as to the chance of having an amendment to that effect brought in and adopted, because I can see that the suggestion of my honourable friend would cover what I mean.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department would not like to take upon itself to submit an amendment before it is discussed at a future conference of the fruit-growers.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I submit that the Department should give some consideration to the consumer as well as the packer. I think what has been suggested is in the interests of both.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But after a conference has been held for the purpose of discussing this matter, and has reached a conclusion, it would be hardly proper for the Department to introduce an amendment which would not be in accord with the conference's decision. That would not be keeping faith with the members of the conference. I think the only thing the honourable member should suggest is that the Department take the matter into consideration and bring it to the attention of interested parties at the next conference.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: With all due respect to the opinion of my honourable friend, I would like to ask if the consumer was represented at that conference.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Perhaps it would modify the opinion of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Gordon) to take into consideration that bruises are denominated as one of the defects. A bruise may be something which destroys an apple entirely, or it may be so slight that it is comparatively of no disadvantage. In the handling of these packages over long distances it is almost impossible, however well the fruit is packed, to avoid some slight bruises. If you take that into consideration and say that the bruises which very slightly modify the quality of the apples are not more than five per cent, and other defects not more than five per cent, that standard brings the quality up pretty well towards perfect. After the matter has been very fully discussed and a conclusion reached, I can quite see how difficult it is for the Minister, or for the Department, which has made up its mind because of the very thorough consideration by representatives from all parts of the Dominion, to make a change without making further inquiries of the interested parties.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I am quite in accord with what my right honourable friend says with regard to bruises, but when there is 10 per cent of worm-holes it is a different matter.

Right Hon Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: The worm-holes would not be the whole 10 per cent.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The 10 per cent would include worm-holes, bruises, and other defects.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: You must make some allowances for bruises as well as worm-holes.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: If I understand the clause aright, there may be 10 per cent of scab and worm-holes.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: And bruises.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Ten per cent altogether.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Well, what does it say?

(a) "No. 1," which shall include only well grown hand-picked specimens of one variety, sound, of not less than medium size and of good colour for the variety, of normal shape and not less than ninety per cent free from scab, worm-holes, bruises and other defects, no culls and properly packed.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is, 10 per cent altogether.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Does not that mean that 10 per cent may be scab?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It means that altogether it may be 10 per cent defective.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: It is the same as with lumber. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Gordon) knows what that it.

Section 9 was agreed to.

On section 10, subsection 1—packages:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The change in "a" is simply that the word "pear" is added, so that it reads:

All pear and apple barrels manufactured in Canada shall have a capacity measurement of—

The rest of that paragraph is not changed.

Paragraph b is all new:

All apple and pear half-barrels manufactured in Canada shall have a capacity measurement of, and all half-barrels containing apples or pears packed in Canada for sale, shall contain as nearly as practicable three thousand five hundred and twenty-eight cubic inches;

The half-barrel for apples and pears is standardized in accordance with the resolution of the Sixth Dominion Fruit Conference, which reads as follows:

That the half-barrel be made a standard for apples and pears; that the capacity should be one-half of that of the present standard apple barrel, and the specifications be referred to the Fruit Branch to work out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is known as a box, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; it is a half-barrel.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Barrel-shaped?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Barrel-shaped.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How will that compare with the capacity of a box?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: About a box and a half—three boxes to a barrel.

Paragraphs a and b were agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Paragraphs c, d, e, f, g, and h have not been altered.

Paragraphs c, d, e, f, and g were agreed to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How will these dimensions compare with the United States package dimensions?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They are the same as the American half-barrel.

On paragraph i:

(i) All plum or prune boxes manufactured in Canada shall have a capacity measurement of, and all boxes containing plums or prunes packed in Canada for sale, shall contain as nearly as practicable six hundred and seventy-two and three-quarter cubic inches;

These sizes have been brought in to conform with those of the American boxes.

Paragraph i was agreed to.

On paragraph j:

(j) All cherry boxes manufactured in Canada shall have a capacity measurement of, and all boxes containing cherries packed in Canada, for sale, shall contain as nearly as practicable seven hundred and twenty-nine cubic inches or three hundred and sixty-four and one-half cubic inches;

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Again to conform with the American package.

Paragraph j was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Just here I would like to draw the attention of the Government to a practice that is very much in vogue among fruit dealers who handle cherries, strawberries, and other kinds of small fruit. While you may prescribe a standard size for boxes, I claim that many of these boxes are tampered with, and as a rule the public do not receive all the berries or cherries that comes in the box. I submit that small fruit should be sold by the pound and not by measurement in a box. If it were sold by weight, that would preclude the possibility of the dealers tampering with the boxes. There is no doubt that this practice has been going on in Ottawa and other cities for years, and there seems to be no redress except to require that for the protection of the public small fruits be sold by the pound.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We are now standardizing the box in order to overcome that difficulty.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I do not see how you are to overcome it. You say a box shall be of a certain standard size, but there is nothing to prevent a dishonest dealer from taking some of the cherries, or some of the berries, out of that standard box; and that is what takes place. The box is not full.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It has to be, according to this.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Usually the boxes are not full. What good objection can there be to the principle of selling small fruit by the pound? I think the only way to overcome the difficulty might be to have a box of a certain weight—a pound box or a two-pound box, so that a person buying a box of berries would have a guarantee that he is getting a pound or two pounds, and he can demand that quantity.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would draw the attention of my honourable friend to clause 6, which says:

6. No person shall sell or offer for sale any fruit in any package in which the faced or shown surface gives a false representation of the contents of such package; and it shall be considered a false representation when more than ten per cent of such fruit is smaller in size than, or inferior in grade to, or different in variety from, the faced or shown surface of such package.

And subsection 2 of section 4 reads:

(2) Every person who, by himself or through the agency of another person, repacks fruit in a closed package intended for sale, shall cause such package to be marked in a plain and indelible manner, before it is taken from the premises where it is repacked with the words "repacked by" followed by the initials of his Christian names and his full surname and address or in the case of a firm or corporation with the firm or corporate name and address, together with one of the nine grade marks prescribed in subsection one of this section.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: That clause really referred to the jobber and not to the retail fruit-dealer on the street who juggles with the boxes or baskets. That is going on all the time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In the past we had no grade for the basket.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Oh, yes, we had. Last year we had a grade.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We are now standardizing the box to conform with the American box. That will prevent the temptation to take two American boxes of berries and make three Canadian boxes of them.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Can the Minister give us the mathematical rule by which the cubic content of an octagonal berry box could be measured?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is a good deal easier than the measurement of the barrel.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think it would be necessary to be able to measure the standard box. I am sure I could not measure it.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: If you could not measure that, how would you measure a barrel?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That would be the work of the seventy inspectors.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think my honourable friend stated the other day that the proposed new box in which fruit was to be packed was larger than the one heretofore in use in Canada. Now I understand him to say that the reason the boxes are to be standardized is to prevent abuses such as the honourable member from Selkirk (Hon. Mr. Bradbury) has mentioned, whereby three American boxes are filled with two boxes of Canadian fruit.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; the contents of two American boxes are transferred into three Canadian boxes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Which is the larger—the American box?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The American box is the larger.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I would refer my honourable friend to almost any store now handling fruit. You will see a little box with about six sides to it and with the bottom half way up, and containing about two teacupfuls of strawberries—certainly not half of what are contained in the ordinary box that is used as a standard in Canada. That can be verified by a visit to almost any fruit store in this city any day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Those small boxes to which my honourable friend alludes are pint boxes.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Half-barrels, in other words?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And they are covered by a description in this Bill.

Paragraphs j and k were agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 10:

(2) On and after the first day of October, nineteen hundred and twenty-four, all berry or currant boxes manufactured in Canada shall have a capacity measurement of, and all boxes containing berries or currants packed in Canada for sale, shall contain when level full as nearly as practicable one or other of the following quantities;

(a) 67.2 cubic inches;

(b) 33.6 cubic inches.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: When are these inspected—at the time they are sent out to market, or after they arrive at their destination?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The inspection is made generally at the point of distribution, but so far as possible at the point of shipment also.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: My honourable friend will see that there might be a great difference. You might have the box level full of blueberries when it started, but it might not be level full by nearly half, after it had been shaken down by five or six hundred miles of railway travel and various changes. How does the Department get over that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Naturally allowance would be made for that condition of things. The box was full when it left.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: How does the inspector know?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It has not been touched. The bulk has not been broken. The box at destination contains all that was in it at the start; the contents are a little more compact, that is all. Allowance is made for such a state of things.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: But how does the inspector know when the box arrives in Montreal that it was full when it started from New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He has enough experience to judge of the condition.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Does not that very illustration demonstrate the reason why small fruit should be sold by the pound? If you want to protect the consumer, that is the proper way to sell small fruit.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I might point out in that case that a basket of very soft, over-ripe fruit of poor quality weigh very much heavier than an equal bulk of fruit of good quality.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that the matter has never been seriously discussed—

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I can understand that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: —because of various difficulties which should be met, but could not be overcome.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: My impression is that nearly all small fruits, including strawberries, are sold by the pound in England. That was my experience when I was in London. Why should it not be the practice here?

Hon. Mr. THORNE: Any dealer who would cheat in measurement would cheat in weight. you could not prevent dishonesty that way.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would like to know why the words, "shall contain when level full as nearly as practicable one or other of the following quantities," are contained in subsection 2, and are not to be found in paragraphs i, j and k.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw my honourable friend's attention to the fact that it is to be found in nearly all those subsections of Clause 10.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: In this section there are both the cubic inches and the quantities.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I do not think you can make any improvement on this so long as you adopt the system of selling by measurement. But, if you adopt the system of selling by weight, the package when it arrived would contain about the same weight as when it started, although there might be a settling. The juices might be expressed to a larger extent and so permeate the whole mass; but there would be very little difference in the weight. So long as you keep to the measurement basis and only inspect the fruit at the place of arrival, it is a rule of thumb kind of thing—it is only approximate.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I submit that when packages are standardized, as they are under this Act, it is impossible to cheat anybody. Standardized packages are so widely different in their sizes that the consumer cannot make any mistake. If he is fooled, he is fooled with his eyes wide open. If the fruit has settled down and the container is not full, and the consumer is fool enough to pay full price for it, it is his own fault.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: That is a very good argument from the fruit-grower's standpoint, but I contend that it is no argument at all so far as the general public is concerned. This House can protect the public, if it will, by insisting that small fruit shall be sold by weight. As my honourable friend said a moment ago, if a basket or a crate of berries is shipped from Ontario, it is shipped full; when the berries get to their destination, if they have not been tampered with, they have not lost weight; consequently there would be no hardship worked upon the fruit-dealer.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: The amount of work involved in weighing all the fruits handled would be tremendous.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I submit, honourable gentlemen, that you could have a standard box which would hold a pound of berries. All I want to insist upon is that when the consumer buys it he gets a pound of berries. I presume the packer is honest and puts up a pound of berries, but very often before it reaches the consumer there has been a great loss somewhere.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think the difficulty is that the seller does not sell a pound, but a box of berries: and if the consumer gets a box full, that is all he asks.

Subsection 2 of section 10 was agreed to.

Subsection 3 was agreed to.

On subsection 4 of section 10—packages manufactured for sale outside of Canada:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is new.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: What is the meaning of it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is to allow of manufacturers accepting orders from other countries on some other standard.

Subsection 4 was agreed to.

Subsection 5 was agreed to.

On section 11—powers of inspectors:

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I notice that this Bill refers several times to inspectors, and "inspectors appointed under this Act," but I see no clause empowering the Government to appoint them. Where does the Government get the power in this or in any other Act to appoint inspectors?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My attention is drawn to paragraph b, which says:

"Inspector" means any person charged by the Minister with the enforcement of this Act.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: But that does not authorize the appointment of inspectors.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: How do they determine the qualifications of the inspectors?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They come under the Civil Service Commission and have to pass an examination.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I ask that question because I happen to know at least one inspector who has no qualifications at all and never had any experience in the packing and marketing of fruit.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think it would be the duty of my honourable friend to let the Department know of any lack of qualifications on the part of officers of the Department.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Do you not think it would be the duty of the Department to see that such a man was not appointed, rather than that a Member of Parliament should have to tell them?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If the inspector has been selected by the Civil Service Commission, the fault is not at the door of the Department.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Are the inspectors supposed to inspect among the retail fruit-dealers, or just among the wholesalers?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is their duty to inspect fruit wherever they see it, from the orchard to the retailer.

Section 11 was agreed to.

On section 12—violation of Act:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No change.

Section 12 was agreed to.

Sections 13 and 14 were agreed to.

On section 15—certificate prima facie evidence:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is a new clause. Certified reports of food-products inspectors in the United States are received in court as prima facie evidence, and it is felt that similar provision should be made in respect of our inspectors' reports, thus preventing the necessity of subpœnaing inspectors in prosecutions made by the Department, which are defended.

Section 15 was agreed to.

Sections 16 and 17 were agreed to.

On section 18—unlawful use of mark:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is a new clause. Under section 4 numbers or marks used by members of co-operative associations, when shipping to a wholesale firm, must be approved by the Minister of Agriculture. This requirement is met by having these marks registered with the Fruit Branch. This clause is included to povide a penalty in the case of any such mark being used by any person other than the person to whom it has been assigned.

Section 18 was agreed to.

On section 19—unlawful use of brand:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is a new clause. It has been found in rare cases that a growers' or a shippers' brand has been used by a person not entitled to it. This section provides a penalty to cover misrepresentation of this kind.

Section 19 was agreed to.

Section 20 was agreed to.

On section 21—penalty for destroying or pilfering fruit:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The first part of this section is new. The section was originally passed to assist in preventing rough handling and pilfering of fruit, particularly in transit. It has been found, however, that a great deal of the damage to fruit, resulting in slack packages and generally inferior quality on arrival at destination, is due to careless handling during the picking and packing processes. The inspectors have had no jurisdiction over that, but the amendment as proposed will give them power to assist owners in preventing careless and rough handling of fruit in orchards, packing-houses, etc.

Section 21 was agreed to.

Sections 22 to 25, both inclusive, were agreed to.

On section 26—remedies preserved:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is a new clause, which merely states specifically what is sometimes not recognized, namely, that a prosecution under this Act in no way prevents any person taking civil action to enforce a contract.

Section 26 was agreed to.

On section 27—repeal:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Section 27 is new. In the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, the Fruit Marks Act of 1901 was codified in the Inspection and Sale Act, Part IX. Section 27 of the Fruit Act, therefore, merely repeals certain specified sections of the Inspection and Sale Act, Part IX.

Section 27 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

PATENT BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 20, an Act to amend and consolidate the Act relating to Patents of Invention.

Hon. Mr. Bradbury in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have received a number of copies of memoranda from the Department indicating and explaining the changes that are made by this Bill. This document I have had distributed. It contains simply a reproduction of the old clauses, which members of the Senate can refer to and compare with the Bill. There are two main changes, and if the Senate is not disposed to discuss thoroughly this matter now, we may go through the Bill and defer consideration of those modifications that are important in their application.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—definitions:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Paragraph e is new. It is added for the purpose of making it clear that the term "patentee," which is used throughout the Act, includes the assignee or legal representative of the grantee.

Sections 2, 3 and 4 were agreed to.

On section 5—powers of Commissioner:

Hon. G. V. WHITE: It seems to me the words "or clerk" in line 15 should be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is no special objection except that this is the expression used in the Civil Service Commission Act.

Hon. G. V. WHITE: The point I would make is that naturally an officer of the Department would have certain technical qualifications, whereas a clerk might not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the distinction between an officer and a clerk? I am not aware of any. I think one term should be used.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We are using the language of the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: What is the change in this section?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The power was given to the Minister, but the old Act provided that it could be exercised by the Commissioner. This section gives power direct to the Commissioner.

Sections 5 and 6 were agreed to.

On section 7—who may obtain patents:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the difference between the two sections?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In the old section the word "process" does not appear in the list of inventions for which patents may be granted. Patents for processes were supposed to be included in the term "art" in the old section, but this having been questioned, the insertion of the term "process' in this section makes the matter clear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the distinction between an art and a process? Is there any judicial authority?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. That question was raised, and it is sought to make it clear.

Section 7 was agreed to.

On section 8—inventions for which foreign patents have been taken out:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This change is for the purpose of preventing undue extension of the term of protection of inventions. A case was reported to the Patent Office in which an inventor, by taking advantage of the delays afforded by the rules of the United States Patent Office, kept his application before that office for 10 years. The application was not filed in Canada until about the expiration of the year allowed by the old section, as some time was necessary to deal with the application, and the life of the Canadian patent is 18 years, so that from the date of the filing of the application in the United States until the invention became open to use by the Canadian public over 30 years elapsed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But how is the applicant protected in the meantime in Canada during the 10 years of preventing the protection in the United States? By caveat?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He had always 12 months after the granting of the United States patent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But what if applications had been made in the interim by other parties for a patent on the same article or art? How would it be determined? Surely we have not been living under an infirmity of that kind, by which for a period of 10 years it would be impossible to secure recognition of a patent?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The applicant in the United States whose application had hung fire for so many years could come here and claim his prior right to the invention, and even if another party obtained a patent in the meantime the Court would confirm his prior right.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But surely there must be some practice by which, when a man makes an application in a foreign country for a patent, it becomes a matter of publicity or notoriety that such a discovery has been made. I would think there should be a caveat simultaneously placed on record in Canada, in order to protect the applicant when the matter properly comes before the Department; otherwise it seems to me the way is open for anyone to apply in Canada for that particular patent.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: I understand the Minister to say that if he did apply for that patent, and if in the meantime a patent had been granted, the only course would be to go to the Courts and have the patent nullified.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is unsatisfactory.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND Under this Bill he would have to come within a year from the moment he had applied in the United States or other foreign country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would it be an unreasonable thing to engraft upon our law a provision that when a foreign patentee makes an application in his own country or in a foreign country for a patent, he should simultaneously file a caveat in another country, particularly in our own, showing that he is the applicant for the particular patent?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why should he be allowed to have a year?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not see why he should, unless he placed something on record to show that he was the applicant for the patent.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: The section says "two years."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We are now legislating under the International Convention, which covers the case of nearly every country to-day, and which allows to an inventor twelve months from the date that he applies in his own country to make his demand for a patent in other countries.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is this section in accordance with any international agreement?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is, and the change is made for the purpose of conforming to the International Convention.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think it is an unreasonable length of time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is to say, 12 months from the time he makes his application, not from the time his patent is issued?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Twelve months from the time he makes application in his own country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the explanation of the two years clause in subsection 2 of section 8?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The last clause of this subsection reads as follows, at line 15:

> But no patent shall be granted on an application for patent for an invention which had been patented or described in a patent or printed publication in this or any foreign country more than two years before the date of the actual filing of the application in Canada, or which had been in public use or on sale in Canada for more than two years prior to such filing.

This subsection 2 will put our law in harmony with the terms of the International Convention as to the protection of industrial property, to which reference will appear later in the Act. At present the publication of an invention before filing an application is a bar to a Canadian obtaining a patent in most countries. For instance, if a patent is published in the Canadian Patent Record before the filing of an application for the patent in Great Britain, the application will be refused. If Canada should decide to adhere to the Convention, this subclause would be necessary, and a Canadian would have one year from the date of filing his application in Canada to file it in other countries, and publication in the meantime would be no bar.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But it seems to me that does not deal with this last part of the subsection—the two years clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would draw my honourable friend's atention to section 7, which provides that no patent can be granted in Canada for any invention that has been in use for over two years.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I ask this question, which may not seem pertinent: If an article has been in use, say for one year, and has been generally adopted as an article that can be used by the public, and is not part of a patented article, why should a patent be issued for it? It seems to me that, if an article is in general use for two years, or even for a lesser period, then it is not the right of anyone to make an application for a patent.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I thought the party owning the patent had only a year from the time he applied first for the patent. You are giving him two years by this section.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: It certainly conflicts with the other.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Act does not contemplate patenting an article that has been in general use for even a year.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No. We do not have to follow the American practice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under the present law one year is allowed. It is now made two years.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: For what reason?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that there has been a general request to extend the time to two years, and the time allowed conforms with that of the American Act.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: From whom is the general request? From the general public?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I should say the general request would come from the people interested in patents.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Exactly, but not from the general public, who are interested in the use of patents. There are three reasons why, in my opinion, this should not pass. In the first place it does not come from the great general public, who have the largest interest in the matter. The second reason is that it is not necessary for us in this legislature to follow American precedent. Thirdly, this conflicts with another section and practically gives a man two years instead of one, and during that second year, he may roll up a number of lawsuits against people. I think this is very ill-digested legislation, and I shall certainly oppose that section.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is it a principle of the patent law that an article may be in public use—I am now using the term of the Bill—that an article may be in public use either for two years or for a lesser period,—say, for one year, before a patent is applied for? That according to the principle of the patent law, as I understand it, a person who has invented a device should make his application for a patent immediately. In the meantime the article does not come into public use, but is practically proscribed until he gets his patent. When the article has come into public use or becomes public property, no one is entitled to a patent on it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend is under the impression under which most people have been labouring, but I am informed that for the past fifty years the law has been that an inventor may put his invention on the market and at any time within twelve months thereafter may ask for his patent.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, within twelve months.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But that is not the case suggested by my honnourable friend.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let me ask this question. Here is an article in public use. The assumption is that the public have the right to use it. Some enterprising manufacturer enters upon the manufacture of that article, investing a considerable sum of money in building, plant, etc. Now is he to be protected? No application has been made so far as he knows; and in fact, so far as the law is concerned, no application need be made. I think the principle of the patent law should require the inventor to make application for a patent for his device before it comes into public use.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: I think that is the practice. I have to do with a great many patents on rolling stock. In case a thing is to be patented and there is a desire to use it before the patent is issued, it is customary to stamp right on the article: "Patent applied for." You will see that on a great many Pullman cars, and passenger cars generally.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And on agricultural implements.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: When an improvement is invented and it is desired to place it on the market, if the article is of brass or bronze there is cast right on it the notice, "Patent applied for."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that the practice of marking on an article "Patent applied for" means nothing under the Act. That has been the practice.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: It shows who claims it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But nothing can be claimed legally by it. Section 7 of the present Act reads as follows:

> Any person who has invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement in any art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter, which was not known or used by any other person before his invention thereof, and which has not been in public use or on sale with the consent or allowance of the inventor thereof, for more than one year previously to his application for patent therefor in Canada, may, on a petition to that effect, presented to the Commissioner, and on compliance with the other requirements of this Act, obtain a patent granting to such person an exclusive property in such invention.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Exclusive property from what time? From the time he made the application, or from the time he invented the article? There is a very important difference.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The all-important words of the old section are omitted from the new section:

Which has not been in public use or on sale with the consent or allowance of the inventor thereof.

These words are left out, and the omission changes the section entirely.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The section which is now in force, and which I have just read, entitled an inventor to twelve months before he applied for his patent—twelve months in which to put it on the market or offer it for sale.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But now you are giving him twenty-four months.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes; the present amendment gives him twenty-four months.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And for a year longer everybody is tacitly invited to use the patent, and a number of lawsuits may be rolled up. Under the attempted improvement—which is not an improvement at all—the inventor has only to lie back and wait the second year, and in the meantime he accumulates a fine crop of lawsuits against people who have infringed the patent. Thinking it was not his intention to take out a patent in this country, because he had passed twelve months during which he might have taken it out, they have proceeded to use it as common property.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Furthermore, under the new Act, apparently, the consent of the inventor is dispensed with. He can allow the article to go upon the market and public use to be made of it, and can thus ascertain whether it is going to be popular or not, and at the expiration of two years he may make his application.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: It means there is no restriction at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. The principle has been entirely departed from.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is simply ridiculous.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The principle is the same.

Hon. Mr FOWLER: It is lack of principle.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This amendment is more restrictive in its terms, only the period of delay is doubled.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, no; quite the contrary.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: More restrictive? It is less restricitve.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The element of consent is dispensed with.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under the Old Act the inventor must have consented to the public use of his invention, or the use of it by a third party.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Formerly it had to be done without his consent.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: And now it has not.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Of course, if he consented he would not have any action under the law—I mean not the Act, but the common law.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The public use had to be without his consent. The language is:

And which has not been in public use or on sale with the consent or allowance of the inventor thereof.

Now you have left that element entirely out. So he can throw the article on the market for public use, and at the end of twelve months or two years can apply for his patent. I think my honourable friend had better allow this Bill to stand until we can peruse the different clauses, and particularly acquaint ourselves with the memorandum. Men spend a whole lifetime studying the patent law and then do not feel themselves equipped with an adequate knowledge of it. Copies of this memorandum have been distributed among us within the last half hour, and we are expected to familiarize ourselves with this, the most complicated branch of law that I know of.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Let me make this suggestion to the honourable minister. Why not compel the inventor to file a caveat? That is not an expensive proceeding. It would cost only $5 to file it, and the preparation of the papers is very simple.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me a caveat should be filed at once—immediately he contemplates an application.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the Minister whether or not there is a standard form of legislation which has been adopted by a convention, and if there is, to what extent must we adhere to the form of this Bill in order to obtain the protection provided by the convention? That is a very important point.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will ask that the Committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress was reported.

IRRIGATION BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 112, an Act to amend the Irrigation Act.

Hon. Mr. Bennett in the Chair.

On section 1—water areas may be leased for mining purposes:

Hon. Mr. REID: I would like to know what is the purpose of this Act. The reason I ask the question is that, as I understand, it has been decided that the provinces own the land under water.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, not under the Irrigration Act.

Hon. Mr. REID: I wanted just to be sure that this was not interfering with provincial rights with regard to land under water.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have already given the following explanation:

Section 7 of the Irrigation Act provides that no grant shall be made by the Crown in such terms as to vest in the grantee any exclusive or other property or interest in or any exclusive right or privilege with respect to any river, stream, watercourse, lake, creek, spring, ravine, canyon, lagoon, swamp, marsh or other body of water, or any exclusive or perpetual property, interest or privilege in the land forming the bed or shore thereof.

Under Section 37 of the Dominion Lands Act regulations have been established for the leasing of mining rights, and the Deputy Minister of Justice holds that such leases are grants of land, and that the issue of a mining lease comprising a submerged area is a violation of the provisions of Section 7 of the Irrigation Act.

As mining locations leased under the provisions of the regulations frequently comprise an area of 1,920 acres it is practcially certain that almost every location so leased includes within its boundaries water areas as defined by Section 7 of the Irrigation Act.

It was suggested that legislation be introduced which would admit of lands defined as water areas in the said Act being leased for mining purposes, and made retroactive, and Mr. Chisholm of the Department of Justice, after consultation with his Deputy Minister has submitted the attached draft amendment to Section 7 of the Irrigation Act, designed to overcome this violation.

Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. REID: Are there any lawsuits in connection with this?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: None whatever.

Hon. Mr. REID: So that the retroactive right under this Act would not jeopardize any person who would have a claim or who had been working for years?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, there is no claim before the Department; and this legislation may affect some 50,000 leases.

Section 1 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

ADMIRALTY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 117, an Act to amend the Admiralty Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill proposes to give to the Governor in Council power to appoint deputy local judges to act as judges in Admiralty, and provides for a salary to be paid to the deputy judge, which is not now provided for.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How much?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not see any figure mentioned.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What do you mean by a "deputy local judge"? Is this for the purpose of giving the present officers jurisdiction in Admiralty?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: For example, the province of Quebec has two divisions of the Admiralty Court, one in Quebec and one in Montreal. At the present time the judge in Admiralty is a judge of the Superior Court of Montreal. There is no deputy for the district of Quebec: there is only one registrar, whose office is in the city of Quebec, and no deputy registrar.

It is also provided that, when the local judge resides in Montreal and receives the salary which is provided for in the general statute, the deputy local judge residing in Quebec shall receive the same salary; and if the deputy local judge resides in Quebec, the deputy local judge residing in Montreal shall also receive the same indemnity.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: When you say, "deputy local judge residing in Quebec," do you mean a deputy local judge appointed exclusively for or having jurisdiction in Admiralty proceedings?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The practice has been to add these jowers to those of a judge of the Superior Court.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What is the salary of an Admiralty judge in Montreal?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And how many deputy local judges would be appointed? It seems to me that this means practically the creation of a new court.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If the honourable gentleman will look at the statute, he will find that it transfers the power of appointment to the Governor General, whereas under the present Act the appointment is made by the judge in Admiralty on the approval of the Governor in Council. This provision will allow the Governor in Council to appoint the deputy local judge directly.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And you are giving him the same salary as a judge in Admiralty?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Coming from the prairies, I have not a knowledge of judges in Admiralty. Is it intended simply to confer jurisdiction upon existing local judges, or is it the intention to appoint judges for the exercise of this particular jurisdiction? If the latter is the case, one would wish to know how many judges the Government proposes appointing, what their salaries will be, and what will be the cost to the country.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: This is a jurisdiction exercised only by special judges appointed for the purpose.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will get the statute.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Are they to be judges appointed exclusively for this purpose; men at present not occupying judicial offices?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: They may occupy judicial offices.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What has the Government in view in this legislation? I think my honourable friend had better secure the information the Act as at present on the Statute Book will not disclose that to us. I hope I am not too inquisitive but I should like to know whether we are establishing practically a new court.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, we are not.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The practice in my province, which is washed by the sea, is to appoint one of the judges of the Supreme Court a judge in Admiralty. At the present time the chief justice is also the judge in Admiralty. I presume that in Montreal one of the Superior Court or High Court judges is the judge in Admiralty. I take it that this Bill proposes to appoint a judge for the city of Quebec at the same salary, and to call him a deputy. It is not usual to put a deputy on the same plane financially as his principal. It is the intention to appoint a new person, one not necessarily now holding judicial office.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the way I read it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The salary in St. John is $500 or $1,000, I have forgotten which—it is only a small salary.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The judge in Montreal is Judge Francis Maclennan, and I think he receives $2,000 a year in addition to his ordinary salary. Before he was appointed Sir Adolphe Routhier was the judge in Quebec; and I know he was getitng $2,000 additional as judge of the Admiralty Court

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But this is not for Quebec alone; it will be in force throughout Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I told my honourable friend that there was but a slight change. The Bill says:

> Chapter 141 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, is hereby amended by repealing section 11 of the said Act and substituting therefor the following:

What does the Act say? It says:

> A local judge in Admiralty may, from time to time, with the approval of the Governor in Council, appoint a deputy judge; and such deputy judge shall have and exercise all such jurisdiction, powers and authority as are possesed by the local judge.
> 2. The appointment of a deputy judge shall not be determined by the occurrence of a vacancy in the office of the judge.
> 3. A local judge in Admiralty may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, at any time revoke the appointment of a deputy judge.

As I have explained, the amendment seeks to withdraw from the local judge the appointment of the deputy judge, and to vest it in the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But this is not a judge for all Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: For any Admiralty district.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There will be none in Calgary.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not until it becomes an ocean port.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Suppose there is a collision between prairie schooners, who is going to adjudicate upon it?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend's statement does not throw any light upon what is in the contemplation of the Government. How many judges are to be appointed?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: One.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is to be found in clause 3 of the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That deals only with Montreal and Quebec.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. I may say that the explanation which I have given is the only explanation the Minister of Justice gave in the other House.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The other House does not require as much explanation as we do.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I should think they would need more.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They need more, but they do not ask for more.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Take the case of Ontario. Mr. Justice Hodgins, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario, tries all the cases in Admiralty. I take it that under this provision the Government can appoint someone else as his deputy, who will then come in for a salary.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: In my province conditions are vry much the same as those in the province of New Brunswick. Heretofore the chief justice of the Supreme Court was always the judge in Admiralty, and he received an additional salary of $500 a year. On the death of the late Chief Justice, Judge Stewart was appointed, and he was also the judge in Admiralty. Is there any reason for the appointment of these extra judges? Why should not the judge in Quebec be able to carry on the functions of the judges in Admiralty?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The power is only shifted; it is given exclusively to the Governor in Council, whereas previously it was shared with the local judge in Admiralty. It is for the Senate to say whether the change is a good one.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I have not read the Bill, so I am not speaking with a very certain knowledge of it; but is it the intention to dismiss all the present judges in Admiralty throughout Canada and to make new appointments? Is that the game?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Power is taken to do it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The Bill may contain a bit of a joker, the Government having changed within the last twelve months. I trust the leader in this House would not be a party to it. It lacks his usual frankness.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Subsection 3 of section 11 of Chapter 141 of the Revised Statutes read as follows:

> A local judge in Admiralty may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, at any time revoke the appointment of a deputy judge.

If this Bill passes, clause 3 will read:

> The Governor in Council may at any time revoke the appointment of a deputy local judge.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But have you the two amending Acts of 1920 and 1922? This again shows the necessity of our having before us the law as amended.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I got the impression from what the honourable gentleman said in the first instance that this only applied to the difficulty in Quebec and Montreal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It applies all over?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. The Governor in Council may appoint from time to time one or more deputy judges for any Admiralty district. If the chief justice of a province or a Superior Court judge is the Admiralty judge, discretion is vested in him as to the assistance which should be given him in the different districts, and he will exercise that discretion moderately, and presumably disinterestedly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: With the consent of the Governor in Council.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. We would look with every confidence on the exercise of such a discretion by a Superior Court judge; but now the Government takes the power to revoke the jurisdiction of all judges in Admiralty and appoint deputy local judges for all districts—and not only one for each district, but more than one if necessary. That might result in the organization of an Admiralty court with a couple of dozen judges created exclusively for that particular purpose. If that is the policy of the Government it is very desirable that we should know it. It may not be objectionable; but still, being possessed of an inquisitive mind, we naturally ask the question.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Could my honourable friend tell us what is the necessity for the change?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: There is very great necessity for it as I know from my practice before the Admiralty court. At the present time in every Admiralty case that is to be tried we have to go to Toronto. There is no reason at all why that should be so: it is an absolute system of centralization and one which I have several times complained about.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Could not jurisdiction be given to the County Court judges?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Is that not what this means?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. That is where the mystery of the problem lies. If the Bill provided that jurisdiction be given to district or County Court judges it would remove all objection.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE (reading):

The Governor in Council may, from time to time, appoint for any Admiralty district one or more deputy local judges, and any such deputy local judge shall have and exercise all such jurisdiction, powers and authority as are possessed by the local judge.

The appointment of a deputy local judge shall not be determined by the occurrence of a vacancy in the office of the local judge.

The Governor in Council may at any time revoke the appointment of a deputy local judge.

No judge, local judge or deputy local judge shall take or receive any fee of office upon the trial of any cause.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: He gets a salary.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: No, I do not take it as such.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He does not take any fee from the litigant.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Nor is there any provision for a salary.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is provided somewhere else.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He shall be paid a salary.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: It does not say so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I did ask the question of my honourable friend, if it was intended to give jurisdiction in Admiralty to existing judges. If that is the case, it removes all criticism, and I am perfectly satisfied that the Bill should go in that form; but if it means the creation of new judges exclusively to act in this capacity, that is a different matter.

Hon. Mr. REID: I do not agree with the honourable Senator from Sarnia (Hon. Mr. Pardee) about the great difficulty of trying a case in the province of Ontario. Even if it were necessary to go to the city of Tornoto, I do not think it would be a very great hardship, Toronto being the centre of the province. But, as I understand the Act, if it were necessary to try a case in Sarnia or any other place, the judge in Admiralty would go wherever it was nost convenient or where it was necessary to try the case. I never yet heard that because the judge appointed happens to reside in Toronto, therefore every case must be tried in Toronto.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Yes, the Admiralty judge lives there now—Judge Hodgins.

Hon. Mr. REID: Does the law say that the case must be tried in the city of Toronto?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: We have to go to the city of Toronto with all our witnesses, which is surely unfair.

Hon. Mr. REID: Cannot he go to other places than Toronto?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: He does not go.

Hon. Mr. REID: In Nova Scotia we had cases in which the judges went from one part to another.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The Bill provides for a salary only for the local judge in Quebec or Montreal, not for other local judges.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is a clause dealing exclusively with Montreal and Quebec.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, but there is no other provision for salaries.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think you had better let this stand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. I confess that I have received no memorandum from the Department of Justice; but, in answer to my honourable friend who has asked me what were the changes brought about by the statutes of 1920 and 1922, I may say that section 11 of the 1920 Admiralty Act, chapter 141 of the Revised Statutes, was amended by repealing section 11 of the said Act, and substituting therefore the following:

1. The Governor in Council, or a local judge in Admiralty, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may from time to time appoint a deputy judge, and such deputy judge shall have and exercise all such jurisdiction, power and authority as are possessed by the local Judge.

2. The appointment of a deputy judge shall not be determined by the occurrence of a vacancy in the office of the judge.

3. The Governor in Council, or a local judge in Admiralty, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may at any time revoke the appointment of a deputy judge.

The statute of 1922 again amends chapter 141 by inserting the words, "a deputy registrar" immediately after the word "registrar," in the third line thereof. But section 11 is again tampered with as follows:

Section eleven of the said Act, as enacted by chapter thirty-three of the statutes of 1920, is hereby repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

The Governor in Council may appoint a deputy jusdge of admiralty and such deputy judge shall have and exercise all such jurisdiction, power and authority as are possessed by the local judge.

So that we did last year eliminate the action of the local judge and the appointment of his deputy, and transferred the appointment to the Governor in Council.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It may be that the Interpretation clause of the Admiralty Act defines what the deputy local judge is. I have not the statute before me, and I do not know what the term means.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Governor in Council; that is the provision of the Act. I draw the attention of my honourable friend to that, because we are now starting from there to further legislate in 1923:

The Governor in Council may appoint a deputy judge in Admiralty and such deputy judge shall have and exercise all such jurisdiction, power and authority as are possessed by the local judge.

The appointment of the deputy judge shall not be determined by an occurrence of a vacancy in the office of the judge.

Such deputy judge shall hold office during good behaviour and may be removed by the Governor in Council.

So that all the fear that my honourable friend had that so many heads should fall into the basket could have been realized since June, 1922.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Why is that not good enough?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would need to examine the amendment which I am moving in order to compare it with this one.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Perhaps they found they were not able so surely to decapitate, and so they want further powers.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Get us full information on the subject, and we can then discuss it more intelligently.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Might I ask the honourable leader to inform the House if there is any qualification required for the position of a deputy local judge?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Should he know the bow of a ship from the stern?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Or know an ordinary schooner from a brig?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would like to know if there is any qualification required of the appointee, such as whether he can read and write, whether he is 21 years of age, and belongs to the male sex.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I can quite understand my honourable friend putting such questions, since he informs us that most of the magistrates in the west can neither read nor write.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No wonder he wants a Court of Appeal.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the debate was adjourned.

LIVE STOCK BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 10, an Act to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting Live Stock.

He said: The Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, 1917, is designed to provide for the improvement in the marketing of live stock, through a regulation of maintenence, construction and operation of public stock yards and standarization of stock yards charges, commission charges, etc. And further, it is intended to provide protection for the shipper of live stock, whose product is consigned on commission for sale. It also provides for regulations under which live stock products shall be graded, branded, marked and offered for sale. The Act has been in operation since August 1918, was amended on June 6, 1919.

The main changes made in the Act by Bill 10 are as follow:

1. Providing for an extension of the meaning of the word "stockyards," so as to include any area of land used for live stock at ocean ports of export.

2. In making it a part of the regulation that every dealer doing business at the stock yards, as well as every commission merchant, must become a member of the Live Stock Exchange. This is to protect the shipper.

3. In providing extension of privilege of membership in the Exchange to all persons who desire to carry on business as dealers under the by-laws of the Live Stock Exchange.

4. To provide that the Minister may require Live Stock Exchanges, operated under the Act, to adopt and amend such by-laws as may be in force.

5. To provide for regulation as to the manner in which live stock products, imported into Canada, shall be inspected, graded, branded or marked.

6. To provide for the manner in which complaints against traders shall be made and investigated.

7. To provide for ante-mortem inspection, and the kind of inspection, on all calves offered for sale.

8. To provide for the manner in which live stock products, imported into Canada, shall be graded, branded, or marked, offered for sale, and the manner in which certificates shall be prepared in reference to same.

9. Also the manner in which eggs found to be unfit for human consumption shall be valued and disposed of.

10. To provide that no persons shall offer or accept live stock or products for shipment unless requirements regarding inspection of branding and marking have been complied with.

This Bill consists in the main of a consolidation of the original Act and its amendments. It also more clearly defines the powers of the Minister under the Act.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

COLD STORAGE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 9, an Act to amend The Cold Storage Act.

He said: I would like to give a few explanations.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED. Do it without explanation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then I move the second reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

EXPLOSIVES BRANCH

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. BOYER inquired of the Government:

1. What are the names of the officers and other employees of the Explosives Branch of the Department of Mines?
2. What is the salary of each of them?
3. What is the object of this Branch and the duties pertaining to it?
4. What places were visited by the officers of this Branch during the past year and what were the travelling expenses of the officers who performed these inspections?
5. How many manufactures of powder, dynamite and other explosives in operation presently are there in the country?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, as this answer is somewhat voluminous I will lay it on the table of the House.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATION

MOTION

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I gave notice of this motion, and left a blank or two in it. I desire to move it in this form:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that they will concur in the appointment of a Joint Committee, to be composed of an equal number of members, not exceeding five of each House, to consider the following matters:

1. The forms of Bills and the best means of affording information and assistance in the consideration thereof at all stages of legislation in both Houses of Parliament;

2. The better distribution of the work of legislation between the two Houses;

3. The practical operation of the provisions of The Senate and House of Commons Act, R.S.C., 1906, Chapter ten, respecting the attendance of Senators and Members of the House of Commons, and the expediency of making any alterations in those provisions.

And that the Hon. Messrs. Béique, Belcourt, Calder, Green and Pardee have been apointed by the Senate to serve as members of such Joint Committee, if appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY RATES FOR THE MARITIME PROVINCES

MOTION

Hon. J. A. McDONALD rose to move:

That in the opinion of this House the railway freight rates now effective on consignments from the Maritime Provinces are proportionately higher than those effective in regard to consignments from the western provinces and seriously handicap the industries of the Maritime Provinces and should be substantially reduced and that the Government should take steps forthwith to cause such reduction.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, in discussing my motion regarding freight rates, I am going to open up the whole Maritime Province situation. The people are getting tired of expensive commissions, delegations, examinations, with no results and no action. Somehow I feel that I am doing right in placing the case of the Maritime Provinces before this House. We have some of the ablest men in Canada here, and I want to, if possible, interest them and show them how serious our condition is. More and more the people are looking to this Chamber for justice, and I hope I may be able to place before the honourable gentlemen a few facts that will justify my action in taking up their time to-day.

The Maritime Provinces, in entering Confederation, did so with a purpose as honourable and as conscientious as can inspire any solemn pact. We considered that Confederation would increase the prestige, nationally and commercially, of the Dominion of Canada, and form within the Empire the basis of a nation. What prompted the Maritime Provinces to enter Confederation no doubt prompted the other Provinces as well, all living in the hope that the ideals and aspirations of Confederation would be fulfilled. I do not wish to dwell upon the loyalty of the Provinces to the Crown of England, or to minimize the loyalty of the Provinces to-day to the Dominon of Canada, although some misguided enthusiasts seek notoriety in propagating and endeavouring to raise a feeling against Confederation. It is our wish, and the wish of all, that the Dominion of Canada grow, that the citizens be a happy and contented people, and that nothing will emerge from any province to disturb the rapid progress Canada is making.

In the British North America Act it is distinctly stated that a railroad would be built from Halifax to some point on the St. Lawrence River, and it was intended that that railroad should be connected with a large centre and terminus at Montreal. This point is borne out by the utterances of the big men of that day, and particularly by the actual accomplishment of extending the old Intercolonial to Montreal city. Both the spirit and the letter of Confederation in that regard were amply fulfilled in the building of the Intercolonial Railway and the acquisition of another road connection with Montreal, which right we enjoyed for years; but to-day we find ourselves retrograding, and, instead of our Atlantic region terminating in the city of Montreal, it is ended in the woods of Rivière du Loup.

We have suffered tremendously from having our ports at Halifax and St. John robbed of the exporting of our Western grain. We have borne these iniquities with patience and fortitude, but we do not wish to be treated as vassal states. We have not complained at the tremendous expenditures for canals in Upper Canada; we have not complained at cheaper freight rates for western products over the Government roads as enjoyed by the western farmer. We are not complaining to-day. We are demanding our right that on the question of railway freight rates, commercial privileges, and expenditures the Maritime Provinces be justly dealt with.

The products of the Western farmer are given consideration in railroad freight rates. I want special rates for our lumber, our minerals and our fish. Last year about $80,000,000 of Canadian money was sent to the United States for American coal. The Maritimes are fairly teeming with the best grade of coal. Why not cheaper freight rates on coal? The same applies to fish and lumber. Make the freight rates attractive enough so that the $80,000,000 spent for American coal will be spent in the Dominion of Canada.

Supposing, for instance, that $80,000,000 worth of wheat was purchased in the United States last year, the freight rates on wheat would be so reduced so as completely wipe out foreign competition. I think that would be done, and as a true Canadian I would concur in keeping our dollars in Canada. We are willing to pay our share, and we are willing to unite with all to advance the whole of the Dominion of Canada; but we want justice. There must be a remedy such as I suggested, and it is in the hands of the Government, and we are going to demand it in the strongest terms and most forcible manner, and I believe our appeal will be heard by every patriotic legislator.

I find that the average man is willing to give the Maritime Provinces fair play, but does not appear to understand what our claims are. I take this opportunity of explaining the situation as I see it. I wish honourable gentlemen to bear with me in my endeavour to sound a warning that some effort must be put forth to maintain in some degree a standard of justice and equality in the commercial relations of one province with another.

The situation in the East is critical. I can understand the anxiety of the Government, and it is perfectly legitimate to try to make these 22,000 miles of railroad pay, but that was not the understanding when we entered into the pact. Manufacturers built their factories and investors invested their money in industry counting on the promises made that we would have the market west when we lost our market south. We are told that it is a question how we must raise money for these enormous deficits. In any business that I am associated with we try to overcome our overhead either by increasing our products or by reducing expenses.

I would like to ask if prohibiting trade by excessive freight rates on shipments East-West and West-East, is increasing production. I would like to ask if the present Government considers making presents of fortunes to wealthy men, economy. I refer to the bonuses and presents given the late President of the Canadian Government Railway and other officials. I have seen some statement that this money should be paid back; I have not seen any official statement as to when it was received. When we understand that hundreds of families are being taken from their homes in Moncton, leaving their money invested in Government property, making sacrifices and suffering as a result of this change, I would like to know if there is any effort being made on the part of the Government to compensate these people. Is it fair when the deficits on the road are so great that freight rates are charged that make transportation impossible, and firms are becoming bankrupt? Is it fair, when these same rates are ruining the East and the West, that one million dollars should be paid for a ticket office in Toronto? When the workingman of to-day sees the spectre of starvation and want staring in his window, is it any wonder that these gifts and extravagances have, to say the least, not a beneficial effect, provincially or federally?

Upon representations from the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta, the Government has reduced the rates on staple articles produced in these Provinces, notwithstanding the fact that such matters ordinarily fall under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. If the Government was right in so helping the prairie people and enabling them to obtain a higher price for their products, then it is doubly under obligation to aid the Maritime Provinces, because of their equal or greater need, and because the Maritime Provinces came into Confederation, as I said before, with the full assurance of favourable conditions as to freight rates over the Intercolonial Railway, then being built to establish railway communication and transportation facilities with the other Provinces. There is a serious and alarming depopulation now in progress in the Maritime Provinces, due to the stagnation of industry and consequent unemployment. Surely it is the duty of the Government to relieve conditions in the Maritime Provinces.

Now, to make one point very clear. In 1876 there was a differential or through rate arrangement made to assist the Maritimes and to carry out the pledges made at Confederation; for instance, a differential or through rate was fixed at 20 cents first-class and 10 cents fifth-class with a difference of one cent between Halifax and St. John. This differential was added to the Montreal rate, and constituted the through rate. There was no particular percentage in which this rate was figured out; it was merely carrying out the Confederation pledges in giving the Maritimes this differential, and for forty years this was in existence. Trusting to the Confederation promises, trusting to them being honourably carried out, and trusting to the permanency of this differential, manufacturers built up their industries, investors put in their savings, and business was in a fairly prosperous condition. In 1916 the trouble began. They commenced to make the Intercolonial Railway a commercial proposition; freights were raised 15 per cent, then 25 per cent, and then 45 per cent. I consider that they had no right to put up the rates on the Intercolonial Railway. They were prohibitory, and absolutely built up a railway wall so that we could not use the market promised us when we were induced to enter Confederation. But, worse than this, if there was any excuse for raising these rates on the Intercolonial Railway, there was certainly no excuse for raising the differential which had remained unchanged for forty years; but they did this. They increased the differential correspondingly with the rates, and that completed the obliteration of practically all our trade.

Honourable gentlemen, as I said at the beginning, I hope I have made clear to you the cry that has come up from Eastern Canada for fair play. I hope that this Chamber will see its way clear to call on the Government, not to appoint any commission, not to send any delegates, or to waste two or three years in dickering with the problem; but, if my statements can be verified—and I will be pleased to furnish all data necessary—that the arbitrary or differentials be restored to what they were in 1916; that the Government of Canada be called upon to carry out the promises and pledges given and the bargain made, when New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island entered Confederation and became a part of the Dominion of Canada, and that rates be arranged so that we can reach the market west promised us in exchange for the southern market we had at the time we entered the Dominion.

Hon. O. TURGEON: Honourable gentlemen, I trust you will grant me your indulgence for a few moments if I take the liberty, in the exercise of my duty, to add a few remarks to those just made.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend will allow me, I will, with some diffidence, draw the attention of His Honour the Speaker to the fact that there is nothing before the Chair. The honourable gentleman from Shediac (Hon. Mr. McDonald) has presented to us the grievances of the East, but he has not moved his motion. I am glad that he has not done so, because he cannot expect that this Chamber will pass judgment on the question of freight rates throughout Canada. If we did, an honourable member from British Columbia might likewise rise and ask for a reduction of the mountain rate. This is not the tribunal to decide the question, although it is a forum in which grievances may be expressed. Those grievances will be conveyed through Hansard and through my instrumentality to the management of our National Railways. That is all that I can promise. But I would draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that no motion is before the Chair and that no discussion can ensue.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: Honourable gentlemen, I may have erred in the manner which I have presented the matter; but if a serious situation exists in any part of this Dominion, should its interests suffer because I have not represented them properly? Has the matter proceeded too far for me now to make that motion? Is it possible that, by insisting on the procedure of the House, you will disallow my claim because I am technically in error, and will not allow me to present our case in a proper way?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: Then I will make my motion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I thought the honourable gentleman had purposely refrained from moving it.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: I certainly did not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman may move it.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: I intend to make my motion. I now have the honour to move:

That in the opinion of this House the railway freight rates now effective on consignments from the Maritime Provinces are proportionately higher than those effective in regard to consignments from the western provinces and seriously handicap the industries of the Maritime Provinces and should be substantially reduced and that the Government should take steps forthwith to cause such reduction.

Hon. Mr. TURGEON: Honourable gentlemen, I am pleased that, after all, the honourable leader of the Government in this august assembly has given me the opportunity to make the few remarks which I wish to add to those already made in such a timely and impressive manner by the honourable gentleman from Shediac (Hon. Mr. McDonald) with regard to the present transportation situation, more particularly as it relates to the Maritime Provinces. The question of freight rates is, however, one which affects the whole Dominion. It is the most substantial matter to-day affecting every portion of Canada.

My honourable friend has mentioned the Pact made at Confederation, when the Maritime provinces were invited to join with Upper and Lower Canada in the union of British American possessions, not under one flag, but in a common purpose—the creation of what may in the near future be called another British Empire on the Western continent. I wish to point out that without the adhesion of the Maritime Provinces there would have been no Confederation. Nor would Confederation have been brought about without the construction of the Intercolonial Railway or without the concessions made by the provinces at that time. Therefore when the Maritime Provinces desire to be heard, their views are entitled to consideration by the people of the great province of Ontario and Quebec, and the West as well. Without Maritime Province ports such as St. John and Halifax, ready to receive in the coming years the expanding trade of Canada with the same facilities as exist to-day—without those ports, Ontario would still be the hinterland of the United States. Therefore we have a right to be heard, and we know that our prosperity means the prosperity of Canada as a whole.

My honourable friend has mentioned the differential of rates, which to-day makes it practically impossible for the producers or manufacturers in the Maritime Provinces to send their goods to the markets which are awaiting them. It was understood from the Confederation pact that rates on the Intercolonial would be such as to permit the flow of products from the Maritime Provinces towards the great markets of Canada, more particularly Montreal, and thence to Toronto, to Hamilton, to Buffalo and other American centres, which are ready to receive our natural products. Unfortunately, a few years ago rates were raised so high that production in the Maritime Provinces has been, we might say, reduced to nothing.

In the exercise of my duties as a member of the Lower House at that time, I expressed my opinion in reference to those rates. I have at times criticized, perhaps severely, but always honestly, my honourable friend from Grenville (Hon. Mr. Reid) when he was at the head of the Railway Department. But, before going any further, I may say to him, and to this House as well, that, for all that, I owe him a debt of gratitude for the sympathy and interest he has manifested, in some portions, at least, of the Maritime Provinces, more particularly the County of Gloucester, and because of the fact that he took under his direction that branch of the National Railways known as the Caraquet and Gulf Shore Railway. That will certainly prove to have been good policy on his part; and I may tell him while I have the opportunity, that the people of the county of Gloucester still thank him for his generous and timely idea of giving them a chance to expand further their industries by a better service along that railroad of 85 or 86 miles, bringing thousands of tons of freight every year to the Intercolonial. I hope that the wholesome breezes of the Gulf may bring the messages and an echo of the prayers of the people of Gloucester as far as Grenville to add to his domestic felicity.

I criticized at the time that increase of rates, not only from the point of view of the Maritime Provinces, but also in the interest of the country at large. When it was rumored in 1920 that the railroads intended applying to the Railway Commission for an increase of rates, I warned the honourable the Minister, the Government, and the House that there should be no application for a further increase, because our industries could not afford to pay any higher rate.

Of course, the railway representatives appeared before the Commission. I have always thought that it had been the practice, particularly in the United States, when rates were to be increased or there was supposed to be a need of increase, that shippers would be brought together to consult with the managers of the railroad, and come to an agreement according to the ability or otherwise to make the projected increase. I am positive that if the shippers of the Maritime Provinces had met with the representatives of the C.P.R. and Canadian National railways at that time and conferred together, such an increase would never have taken place, because the shippers in the name of the producers and the customers would certainly have convinced the members of the Railroad Commission that such increase in freight rates should not be made. The increase certainly did not encourage industry, but on the contrary paralyzed it, and created stagnation in the Maritime Provinces as well as other places. We were actually put in such a position at that time that our lumber camps were closed, our lumber mills were stopped, because there was no possibility of our lumber products reaching Montreal and Buffalo and other places where there is a market for them. During the course of a whole year our industries were practically paralyzed.

I have always taken the ground that freight rates should be adjusted with the view to the greatest development of the natural resources of the country, and to the products of our manufacturers reaching the markets where they are needed. It is of no use to produce lumber or agricultural products if they cannot be marketed. In the Maritime provinces our lumbermen can in one day produce and manufacture all the lumber that would be required in those provinces for a year, and they must find an expanding market for their labour for the other three hundred days of the year. Our fishermen along the coast can catch in one morning all the fish that would be required by the population of the Maritime provinces in a year, and therefore the results of the labour of the balance of the year must find a market. Our railway system should be so arranged that our farmers, labourers, and men engaged in industry would receive all the products of their exertions and patriotism; and we know how much the eastern provinces can contribute to the happiness and prosperity of the people of Canada if we could only find the necessary market for the development of our resources.

There are regions throughout Canada where prosperity is absolutely dependent upon freight rates, and one of these regions is the Maritime provinces, which contain all the products and resources I have enumerated. But the same remark applies to the prairie provinces, which must be in a position to transport their grain over great distances in order to reach ocean ports and foreign markets.

To-day we hear a great deal about conditions in the West, to which no doubt the heavy freight rates have contributed, and the problem to-day is to find the most rapid and the cheapest channel for the products of the prairie provinces to the seaboard in order that Western farmers may be able to compete in the markets of the world. Of what use it is for the people of the prairie provinces to give their time, labour, and ambition to produce wheat if excessive freight rates handicap them in marketing those products, so that they have to accept 5, 6, or 10 cents a bushel less than they otherwise would, and thus not be able to enjoy the prosperity which their labour deserves?

My honourable friend has referred to the divisions into which the National Railway System has been arranged. I have always contended that under our circumstances the railway should be divided into three or four regions, and I was pleased with the announcement last year that there would be three divisions, which would counterbalance the centralization, and give every portion of this Dominion the possible means of reaching satisfactorily the various sections of our people.

My honourable friend has mentioned that the Maritime division, or, as it has been officially named, the Atlantic region, only extends as far as Rivière du Loup. I must say that the people of the Maritime Provinces were amazed when they heard that announcement from the National Railway management. The newspapers had stated that Rivière du Loup was the original terminus of the Intercolonial Railway for collecting the products of the Maritime Provinces. That statement is quite erroneous. In 1832 a movement was made to have a railroad connecting Halifax with Quebec by the shortest possible route. It was intended to bring Halifax and St. John together, not Halifax and Rivière du Loup; and a portion of that railway had been built before the understanding had been reached between the different provinces and the Government.

While waiting for the decision of the British Government as to whether they would give assistance to that railway scheme, the Government of Nova Scotia and the Government of the old provinces of Canada commenced some portions of that railroad themselves, hoping that the time would come when the Government of the Empire would assist them in building that road. In 1832 that commencement was made, and later on, in 1836, an engineer started at Point Levis to make measurements; but at the time there were civil troubles in the country, and everything was stopped. The province of Quebec gave a subsidy to the Grand Trunk Railway to extend from Quebec to Rivière du Loup the line they had been building from Sarnia to Quebec, in the hope that the Government would be able to come to an understanding with the Imperial Government. Meanwhile the Government of Nova Scotia had also started the Intercolonial, and built as far as Truro before Confederation. A few months after the British North America Act had been passed, namely, on the 12th of April, 1867, the Imperial Parliament passed a second Bill in the interest of Canada, entitled. "An Act authorizing the guarantee of interest on a loan to be raised by Canada for the construction of a railway connecting Quebec and Halifax." It appears from all this that the railway had been built temporarily, merely awaiting the decision as to assistance from the Imperial Government; so that it is misleading for any person to mention that Rivière du Loup was the original terminus of the Intercolonial Railway.

As soon as the Intercolonial Railway was completed, the Parliament of Canada in 1879 voted immediately the amount necessary for the purchase from the Grand Trunk of the portion of that road which had been built from Quebec to Rivière du Loup. The same thing was done for the section from Halifax to Truro. Hence one might as well say that Truro would have been the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway as to say that Rivière du Loup was the terminus of the western district of the Maritime provinces.

I do not say this with the idea of condemning or criticising Sir Henry Thornton, the new President of the Canadian National Railway System; but I want to impress the people of Canada with the facts, and show that Rivière du Loup was never contemplated as the terminus of the Intercolonial. No one has more confidence than myself in the ability of Sir Henry Thornton, who has before him a task of great difficulty, namely, to place our National Railways in a condition acceptable to the people of Canada and to the financiers of the world. Such an achievement would be nothing less than marvellous.

Some people have no faith in the ability of the Government to administer railways; but for my part I have always said that there was a possibility of having a good service from our railways given to the people at cost without imposing any further taxation upon the people of Canada. I have the same faith to-day, notwithstanding the opinion of some strong men in business and finance, in Montreal, Toronto and other places. I believe that the railway situation to-day is not due to the national operation of the road, or to the deficits which have been produced by national conditions during the last two or three years; but it is the result of the lack of ability of our railroads under private enterprise to meet the necessities of the commerce of the Canadian people, so that the Government had to come to their assistance, and take the railroads and make the best of them. It is true that some one has suggested giving our National Railways for a dollar to the Canadian Pacific Railway; but I notice that those men are very careful in expressing their willingness to accept the roads and operate them. Even if we could hand over our railways, we would have to assume the millions of dollars of fixed charges as part of our national debt without any hope of return, and we would have to offer to those who took the roads, above the cost of operation, a surplus of 7 per cent, amounting to seventy or eighty million dollars yearly. If we, in operating the National Railways, could possibly bring them to the same standard of efficiency as the Canadian Pacific, we would save for ourselves that 7 or 8 per cent, and add it to the profit of the enterprise.

It is difficult for the people of Canada to be hopeful, but our present conditions are not without hope. For myself, I take new courage when I see some expressions made by the director of our railroads, in whose hands largely rests the prosperity of the country. Only yesterday I noticed that in an interview which Sir Henry Thornton gave, he said that he proposed to expend in the Atlantic region at least seven million dollars this year in the purchase of steel rails, and that an honest endeavour was to be made to have freight rates on coal so apportioned that Nova Scotia coal would shortly reach the Upper Canadian markets.

Certainly by such measures we would put what is called the Atlantic region in a position to contribute not only to its own prosperity but to the prosperity of Canada. It is only by putting our railroads in such a condition that they can carry a large amount of traffic, with big trains and big cars, as fast and as many as possible, that they can possibly bring the resources of one portion of the country to another with the least possible cost of operation. It was with that object in view that in 1903 that great Canadian, whose memory is still living and will live for centuries in the admiration of every man in Canada, to whatever party he belonged, conceived the idea of bringing closer together the prairie provinces to the Canadian ports in order that they might produce to greater advantage. That railroad not only contributed to the better distribution of the products of the West, but, being 215 miles shorter than any other line between Winnipeg and the ports of Quebec and St. John, enabled our ports to compete with the American ports. That road was scientifically built, and the grades were such that a train of 75 or 80 or 90 cars could be transported over it as easily as could a train of 40 or 45 cars be hauled on the Canadian Northern or the Grand Trunk. If it were used, there is no doubt that the expenses of transportation would be reduced by 25 per cent. Therefore it is time for the people of Canada to look to the past in order to secure the future.

It was my pleasure last year to read the report of a Committee of this august assembly presided over by the honourable member from the Gulf (Hon. Mr. L'Espérance). There is a time when considerations of party have to be effaced, and when we have to look solely to the future prosperity and interests of our country, and I was pleased to read the evidence given before that Committee and submitted with its recommendations to this body in the month of June last—evidence which should convince members of the Senate, regardless of the party to which they may have belonged in the past. This evidence, given by authorities on transportation not only in Canada but also in the United States, was to the effect that the Transcontinental Railway from Winnipeg to Quebec would have been of the greatest possible benefit to the people of this country if the railroad had been used for the purpose for which it was built. I trust that this House and the people of this country will conduct themselves in accordance with the recommendations made in that report, which has commanded not only my attention but my admiration. The utilization of that road would enable the Maritime Provinces to enjoy the same advantages which the West enjoys to-day, and would enable the West to enjoy the benefit of our ports, and the reciprocal trade which would come from Halifax and St. John, and would soon put an end to these millions of deficits which occur from year to year.

When the Transcontinental Railway was built, it was said that we had too many railroads. Time has already proved to people who make a study of transportation conditions in Canada that we did not have too many railways, but that we did not use the railways we had, and that from 75 to 90 per cent of our grain had gone to the ports of New York, Philadelphia, Portland, and Boston, instead of going to Quebec, Montreal, St. John, and Halifax. We have lost not only the shipment of that grain, but the return trade which would have come in imports if the exports had been made in that way. Import trade follows export trade. We have been contending that the reason why we could not use Canadian ports to advantage was because of the high rates the insurance companies put on ships travelling the St. Lawrence route in summer, or from St. John and Halifax in winter. As I have had occasion to say several times in the other House, let the Government that has control of that railroad tell the world and the producers of the West that the Transcontinental Railway will be used exclusively, or as much as possible, to carry grain to the coast, and they will soon find that the producers of the West will not use the ports of the United States because of the overwhelming advantages of the Transcontinental line from Winnipeg to Quebec. It was proved before the Committee to which I have referred, and whose report I have read with much satisfaction, that for a few months in 1916 the traffic agents of the railway had given a special rate of six cents a bushel to Quebec. During that period the grain was shipped on the Transcontinental. If a rate of six cents caused a loss, why did they not make the rate eight cents or nine cents; and then the people of the West would have saved from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000 every year, and there would have been no deficit, and to-day we would not hear so many complaints from the West that we hear in the other House, because our farmers would have been able to establish themselves on a good footing and would have been able to stand a bad year or two. I think the directors of the Canadian National Railways would be well advised to look into the best means possible of putting our Canadian National railways in such condition that they could haul larger trains of freight at less expense, more particularly in the winter-time. What would be the saving in fuel from Winnipeg to Quebec on the Transcontinental as against the other railroads? There would be not only a saving of fuel, but a saving of time in carrying the products of the West to that port.

To-day the Canadian National railways are operated under the control of the Government, and, although we do not interfere with the Management, still we are responsible to the people of Canada for what they do. We hear it said that profitable Government operation of railroads is not possible, and will never cease to bring deficits and increased taxation. It is said that other countries have tried it, and have made a failure of it: it is said that France has made a failure of it, and that Germany and Austria before the war were not successful; it is said that when the United States undertook the Government operation of their railways, they made a worse mess of it than other countries had done. Every time I hear such statements I ask myself how it is that the people making them do not remember that the railroads in France and Germany and Austria were military railroads, and were used for the mobilization of their armies. That is one of the reasons why those roads were not a success. They were kept ready for military operations, and were engaged in the transportation of munitions and similar products.

Then, it is said that the experience of the United States is convincing proof to the rest of the world that Government operation should not be practised. When I read in our Canadian papers articles blaming the Government of the United States for the deficit on the operation of the railroads during the war, I say they do not do justice to the American Government and the American people of the day. They took over the railroads because of the war, in order to serve the Allied nations to the best of their ability. They were taken over from private corporations, because those corporations could not meet the demands made upon them. The Government unified the railroads at great expense, their only consideration being the successful prosecution of the war to which they gave all their energy. I know the people of the United States to-day look upon the deficit in the operation of the railways as an addition to their contribution to the war, and glory in that contribution. That was not a time when we could judge of the success of national operation.

It is true that, so far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, we find ourselves in a worse position than we have been in in the past.

because by the acquisition of the Grand Trunk Railway we have also acquired an American port which will be to the detriment of the ports of St. John and Halifax. I for one cannot be blamed for that, because when the question came before the lower House, of which I was a member at the time, I made it clear that we should settle with the Grand Trunk so far as the western portion, the Grand Trunk Pacific, was concerned, and should let the Grand Trunk proper look after its own future. My honourable friend the ex-Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Reid) will remember that I put him on his guard against the acquisition of certain portions of the road because of the port of Portland, which would be particularly detrimental to the Maritime Provinces. He said that he would do all in his power to prevent any such condition. Unfortunately, the people of Canada did not give him time to put his views into effect. I warned him that once that port was opened to Canadian trade it would be very difficult to close it. To-day some of the people of the Maritime Provinces say that we must sell the Grand Trunk in order to stop the flow of the grain trade of the West through Portland.

We must make the best of conditions as they exist. It has been said by men of higher repute than the honourable member from Gloucester that we should dispose of that portion of the Grand Trunk. But I say now, as a Canadian, that by opening the Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Quebec we should control the trade that has previously gone from Port Arthur across the Lake to American ports; and if we can only gain for our National Railways those hundreds of millions of bushels of grain and bring them to the ports of Quebec, St. John and Halifax, we shall be able to stand the onus of the port of Portland. So, after all, although we hear bitter complaints from the Maritime Provinces, complaints which come from the heart of the people owing to present business conditions, I am as hopeful as I have ever been that Canada will soon be in a state of prosperity. We want immigration; we want good immigrants—immigrants who will stay in Canada; we want immigrants from the British Isles and from France and from Belgium and from Finland; and I for one am always disposed to do all that I possibly can for such immigrants, whether they come from the British Isles or from other countries. At the same time, I cherish the hope that we may keep them in this country, and I contend that while we are expending large amounts of money to bring in immigrants, we should devote our efforts not only to that but to keeping our children at home, and to bringing back those who have gone from us during the past few years. It would cost less money to bring back 10,000 or 20,000 Canadians who have gone across to the other side during the past few years than it would to bring in 5,000 or 10,000 immigrants from other countries. Therefore let us do the best we can to awaken the people of Canada to expectation of prosperity in the near future, which is dependent, as I say, upon the transfer of the products of the people of this country to their markets. It is only by unity that we can possibly become a happy people.

I thank my honourable friend from Shediac (Hon. Mr. McDonald) for having brought up this subject to-day. I have been frank in my expression of opinion, and have spoken the feelings of my heart and my aspirations as a Canadian.

Hon. E. L. GIRROIR: I am sure, honourable gentlemen, that if this House were holding its session in the city of Halifax or in St. John or Charlottetown and had an opportunity of getting close to the situation in the Maritime Provinces, it would realize how grave and important the question is. We from the Maritime Provinces who are naturally in close touch with our people, being advised day after day, week after week, as to the commercial and business situation in those provinces, are perhaps in a better position to judge of the necessity for some effort by the Canadian Government, which is charged with the conduct of the affairs of this country, to remedy conditions if it is possible to do so.

The situation is a very simple one. If we remove from our minds the differences that are involved in the main question, and get down to the real point at issue, there is not so very much to discuss; but, while there is not much to discuss, it is of great importance, because the very moment that we permit conditions which force upon any one part of this country a situation calculated to do grave injury to its business and commercial interests, then we are attacking the very groundwork of Confederation.

Everyone knows that Confederation arose from a spirit of compromise. The Fathers of Confedration, looking upon the situation in Canada, found what? They found that the people of this portion of the continent were conducting their trade through the natural channels of trade. They found that Halifax, St. John and Charlottetown could trade more cheaply and more easily with the United States than with Toronto, Winnipeg, or Vancouver. They knew that the central provinces could trade more easily and more advantageously by dealing with manufacturers and business people in the United States. The farmer of the West found that he could export his wheat through American ports more cheaply, more easily, and to better advantage than through Canadian ports. So—without going into further detail—what could they expect would happen if these conditions continued to exist. If our people, instead of trading with each other, instead of holding together and working together to build up a great country here, continued to do business on a very large scale with the United States, they knew that the result would be that in years to come the people would find that their commercial interests were so bound up with those of the American people that they might look for a closer union between Canada and the United States. Therefore the leading men of the various provinces met and sat down in council and conference and endeavoured to find some solution of the difficulty; and the solution of it was Confederation.

There were two things that the Fathers of Confederation built upon for the purpose of enabling the scattered colonies to hold together. These two things were transportation and a tariff. They said: "If we open up this country and build railways, we shall have an interprovincial trade; we shall enable the provinces that are far away from the sea to ship their goods down to the sea and on to the market. If we build up a tariff wall against imports from the United States and other countries, we shall foster our home market and enable our people to manufacture and build up in the country industrial concerns that will eventually redound to their great prosperity."

Confederation having been brought about, these things having been accomplished, we having gone on for a number of years, each part standing loyally by Confederation, we find ourselves to-day in a situation in which a large part of this Dominion is practically unable, owing to the very high freight rates on our railways, to do business with other parts of the country.

The people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island were in no great haste to come into Confederation. I know that in the province of Nova Scotia the great leader Sir Charles Tupper was afraid to put this question before the people. With a wider, greater vision than the ordinary voter could have, he decided that in the interest of the whole country it was necessary to force the plan through, and therefore he called upon his majority in the provincial House to vote for Confederation. There was great opposition to Confederation, and at the election held immediately after the vote for Confederation was forced through the provincial House only one man was left of those who had supported it. But, as I have said, the men of broader and greater vision wanted to accomplish Confederation; they wanted to build up a great country here; they wanted to unite this country, to hold it together, and preserve it to the British Crown. They wanted to make this forever a British country. They said to Nova Scotia: "You will lose your trade with the United States, but we will give you transportation so that you may sell your products in the central and western provinces of Canada. We will build up a tariff wall which will prevent American goods from coming in and competing to too great an extent with your manufactured products." Finally the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island made up their minds that in a big, broad and great way Confederation was perhaps after all the very best thing for this Dominion.

Now, the situation has so developed that the people of these provinces are absolutely shut out from doing business with the United States, because of the high tariff, which possibly would not exist as against this country if we did not have a high tariff as well. They are shut out from trade with the United States. They cannot trade with central Canada, because of the enormous freight rates. Business is practically at a standstill. They are looking to the Government of this country to give them some relief, and I think it is only the duty of the Senate, the highest Court of Appeal in Canada, to discuss this question with a view of seeing if there is not some way by which freight rates can be lowered so as to allow goods to move from point to point and give the people of these provinces an opportunity of getting into business again.

We are not asking any more than that the agreement and promises made at Confederation be kept. It is not the first time that this country has been asked to make some little sacrifice for the general good. Not many years ago we had in this country railway situations which threatened the western part of Canada. The Canadian Northern was in such a state that no one knew how long it would continue to run. Later on the Grand Trunk became almost bankrupt, and had it not been that the people of all Canada were ready to put their hands into their pockets and pay millions of money, in an earnest desire to give railway transportation to the people of the western provinces and continue the conditions as they were, where would we be to-day? Again, when the people of the Prairie Provinces desired assistance for the purpose of buying seed, financial assistance was given them. After all, it is the duty of Governments—and, thank God, they usually perform their duty well—to assist the country in any great crisis. They have to govern the whole of Canada, and unless each part is properly protected and given such assistance as is possible, we cannot have Canadian and national prosperity. If there is some way that can be worked out whereby cheaper and easier transportation can be given to the people of the Maritime Provinces, I think it should be given. We have a great debt, and we have every year a large railway deficit; but, after all, people who are doing business must make investments: they must put their money out and take a chance on it, in the hope and expectation that some day returns will be received which will justify their investment. Now, we in Canada have invested in a great railway system which I hope and believe will one day become a paying system. It will take time and it will take effort. I do not believe this system is going to be made to pay any better by having railway rates so high that people are unable to do business on the railways. The railways need all the business they can get, but if they do not charge reasonable rates, such as will justify the people in shipping their goods, then they cannot get business.

I do not know that there is anything more for me to say at the moment. We should not forget that this country has to be kept alive artificially. If you look at the map of the country, what do you find? A stretch of country running across the North American continent from coast to coast. It is bounded on the south by the United States with its excellent harbours, its great national prosperity, its tremendous transportation systems, with their lines of railway looking in over the Canadian border and inviting more freight, more business and yet more business. We cannot possibly live as a country and become a great and prosperous part of the British Empire unless we are able by artificial means to stimulate trade along the channels from west to east and from east to west. If I were a shipper with a lot of wheat in Winnipeg, I would certainly want to ship through an American port. There is no sentiment in trade. The business people of Canada will ship by the easiest, cheapest, and best possible route. But the country as a whole, if it is to keep together, be prosperous, and become great, must to a certain extent regulate these matters so that our Canadian ports will be used, and American ports only to the smallest possible extent.

We from the Maritime Provinces have the reputation of very seldom saying anything in this House, and it was with some diffidence that I rose this afternoon. I did so only because I felt it my duty, in this crisis which has arisen in the eastern part of Canada, to say something in an effort to cause everyone to realize that the situation is so grave that something should be done. If we fail to realize the importance of this question and the gravity of the situation, if we fail to realize the feelings that exist in the Maritime Provinces to-day, we may live to regret it. The men who built up Canada and made a great Dominion of it laboured night and day, unceasingly, to achieve that great purpose. They have done good work, and their work is in our hands. It is for us to carry it on and bring it to successful completion. We can never make Canada a great country if we allow unrest, ill-feeling, and suspicion to be aroused or to continue in any part of this country. It is our duty, and it should be our greatest effort by every means in our power, to convince the people of the West, the people of central Canada and the people of the East that the Government of this country are ready and willing to do all they can to remedy conditions that arise from time to time and upset the industrial stability of any part of the Dominion. I feel that the Government of the day are seized of the importance of this question, and I believe they will do their utmost to remedy the existing conditions. There is only one remedy, and that is a lowering of freight rates. You cannot force people to ship their goods to certain centres and endeavour to sell them when conditions are such that the goods on arriving at their destination cannot be sold at a profit. Unless we can transport our goods in such a way that the manufacturers can make a profit, we will not ship at all. To-day the business of the Maritime provinces is bottled up. The manufacturers cannot, at present costs of production, sell their goods at a profit in central or western Canada, and they will never be able to do that until the freight rates are lowered. The freight rates were raised during the war, but although the war is over they still remain. The great boom that swept over the country at that time has passed away, and now we are back to conditions as they were before the war, yet we have to carry a very much higher freight rate. There could be no other result than what has happened—manufacturers trying to put their goods on the market; but being up against this enormous freight rate, which eats up their profits and more.

You cannot expect people to do business under those conditions, and they will not do it. I am sure that other members of the Maritime delegation, if I may call it such, will be able to throw better and clearer light upon this question than myself; but I have placed the matter before the House as it appears to me, and I have confidence that the representatives from all Canada will take a lively interest in this debate, with the sole object of finding some solution of a very difficult and embarrassing situation.

Hon. F. B. BLACK: Honourable gentlemen, I have no address prepared, but as a member coming from the Maritime provinces I feel that I owe it to those provinces as well as to the rest of Canada to express my opinions briefly.

The question of the conditions of Confederation have been so frequently discussed in this and another Chamber that it would be only waste of time to refer to them. Ontario and Quebec at the time of Confederation found themselves entirely subject to their neighbours to the south. Their only method of getting their products to the ocean and Europe, which was their big market, was through the St. Lawrence river during five or seven months of the year, according to the severity of the season. The rest of the time they were entirely dependent on United States ports for getting their products to market. I am quite aware that the chief idea which dominated the fathers of Confederation was that of creating a great Empire on the northern half of this continent which would be British in its aims, its ideals and its future; nevertheless the people of Ontario and Quebec were animated greatly by the commercial idea. They saw that they would be entirely dependent on our neighbour to the south for the control of their trade unless they got a permanent means of export for their products the year round. It was as much a necessity for the people of Ontario and Quebec, therefore, to get the use and control of the Maritime ports as it was necessary to have bread in order to live. That is the commercial reason why those two great provinces of Canada favoured Confederation.

As far as the Maritime provinces are concerned, there was a bond given, upon condition of which those provinces entered Confederation. That bond was the Intercolonial Railway. True, it was only to have gone to Levis, and until the time that we had a Railway Commission the rights that were given to the Maritime provinces—given tacitly, because of an unwritten agreement, but as binding as any agreement could be or ought to be —were observed fairly well. Up to that time we of the Maritime provinces had at the head of the railway system a Maritime Minister, a man who knew the conditions under which we came into Confederation, who was subject to the influence of the people of those provinces, and was therefore ready and willing to carry out the Confederation agreement. I may say frankly that, in my opinion, since we ceased to have a Maritime man as the Minister of Railways, those provinces have never received justice from the rest of Canada. I am not going into details, but I want to put the blame where I think it belongs—not that the action is intentional, but rather perhaps because the attention of certain people has not been called to the matter frequently and closely enough.

We have heard in this House and in another place various remarks as to dissatisfaction with Confederation. I want to say that I deplore in the extreme any utterance that would suggest that any part of this Dominion desired to separate itself from this Confederation; nevertheless we hear it from the East and from the West. One would almost be led to believe that what Kipling suggests—

> East is East, and West is West,
> And never the twain shall meet,

—might apply to this Dominion of Canada. In my opinion the reason why there is some difference between the East and the West is because the two great central provinces of Canada do not realize what the East and the West are sacrificing because they belong to this great Dominion. It is true that Ontario and Quebec are great provinces, with immense natural resources and large manufacturing industries, and with our ports East and West they are able to get along, and because of the magnitude of the area which they have developed and of that which is to be yet developed, they are inclined to lose sight of the fact that the two extremes of this Dominion are, after all, just as important as the centre. If the people of these two central provinces, which have the majority of the voting power in any House of Parliament, and which at the present time control very largely the industry of this country, would realize a little more fully than they now do what transportation means to the East and the West, I think some of our problems would be solved very much more easily and readily than appears at the present moment.

The West has the same kind of problem that we have—that of transportation. The West had a solemn agreement on freight rates, the violation of which was attempted last year, in my opinion; and no violation of such an agreement ought to be made except with the consent of both parties. If the Crow's Nest Pass agrement was wrong, if it was made at a time when everybody believed that freight rates would go down rather than up, nevertheless it was made by two contracting parties—the people who are settled in the West and the Government who were representing the railways that were doing business in the West. No Government can afford to break its word, any more than can any individual. The Government of Canada cannot afford to break its word so far as the Crow's Nest Pass agreement is concerned, and that agreement should not be changed except by consent of the other contracting party. Neither the Dominion nor the other provinces of Canada can afford to violate an agreement that was made with the Maritime Provinces at the time of Confederation, without the consent of the Maritime provinces themselves. If they do, they violate that very pact of Confederation, and they give a sound and just reason why the Maritime provinces should, at their discretion, sever themselves from the rest of the Dominion.

I am quite aware that the Government will say that this matter is entirely in the hands of the Railway Commission, and that therefore that Commission is responsible for what happens to Canada. Now, the representatives of the people are the persons who must see that both East and West get their just deserts in any adjustment or readjustment of freight rates.

I am aware also that, even if we return to the rates established under those differentials which were mentioned by the honourable member for Shediac (Hon. Mr. McDonald), we would still only get into certain markets of Canada which buy only under certain conditions. Still they would be a great boon to Eastern Canada, and would give us at least an opportunity to hold on to the manufactures which we now have, and to continue to do business. But we want more than that, and we are entitled to more; and if we do not get it we shall not receive justice—and if there is anything the British race stands for on God's green earth, it is justice. That alone is what the people of the Maritime provinces ask, and nothing else. You who are under the Anglo-Saxon flag, being Frenchmen and Englishmen, both of whom fought and bled and died for justice, hand in hand and shoulder to shoulder, know what it means as well as the rest of us, and we depend on you, and we ask for fair play from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

There is another matter closely tied up with this, which was mentioned in this House by the honourable member from the West a day or two ago (Hon. Mr. Barnard), and which would be of very material assistance in the readjustment of present conditions which are causing decidedly strained relations both east and west. That is, the connecting of the East with the West by water transportation.

With regard to railway rates, I am quite aware of the enormous expenditures facing the Government, and the heavy deficits which the Canadian National Railways are experiencing year in and year out. In the face of these things, we can only ask for what would give us the advantages offered at Confederation, and nothing else. Beyond that we ask no special favour. It was suggested that the establishment of boats to ply between the Pacific and the Atlantic through the Panama Canal would be of great benefit to both East and West, and give us an opportunity to exchange products which we do not possess and which we cannot get under the most favourable rail conditions. One very high official of the Railway Commission is said to have expressed the opinion that this was entirely out of the question; but I want to say that no railway official or other official who makes that statement can have given consideration to the facts and carefully calculated the financial trend at the present time, or knows the difference between rail rates and water rates.

I want for a moment to tell you what would occur. We cannot now get our products to the West by water because we cannot pass through the Panama Canal in our own boats, as we have not boats running on that route. We cannot ship goods to New York and then forward them by the boats running from New York and through the Canal and up the Pacific coast, because we have no means of getting those goods through free of duty. We have no Customs agent representing Canada either at New York or Boston, and therefore goods going around that way in the United States bottoms and through United States ports of export have to pay duty. But we could have a line of our own boats running from British Columbia and through the Panama Canal and around the Atlantic coast, and bringing cargoes of timber for as many boats as could be put on the route. We could put 36 of our steamers on that route, and 10 of those 36 would be going to United States Atlantic ports, with cargoes of Britsh Columbia pine and similar products. This year already three large cargoes from British Columbia have passed through the Panama Canal and into the port of New York; and if we had regular lines of boats running they would get cargoes this way year in and year out, month in and month out. True, they would not bring to Canada very much of that timber, because we have timber of our own in the East; but they would bring timber that we do not produce, large square timber in great lengths, and kinds of timber which are very largely used but which we do not produce in the East. They could bring also enormous quantities of canned salmon and such goods from the Pacific coast around to the Atlantic coast, and supply eastern markets with goods which now come by rail. Here you have the reason why the railway authorities said they could not listen to the proposition—because it would deprive the railway of a very large volume of freight. I quite agree with this, but the whole country should not be penalized merely because some freight may be taken away from the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways.

It has been said that we have no goods on the Atlantic coast to be shipped to the Pacific; but every steel rail, every bit of woven wire fencing, practically all the nails, galvanized iron wire, and steel and iron rods that are used on the Pacific coast go from the United States of America—why? Because transportation rates by rail from the East are so great that we cannot send our products to the Pacific coast. We have at Sydney some of the finest steel mills in the world that produce steel rails, bolts, iron sheets, galvanized wire, galvanized fencing, and all that sort of thing. At New Glasgow we have another steel mill producing all kinds of steel products. We have mills and industries producing the very things the West wants, and of which the West to-day is buying 90 per cent from the United States. Therefore, we have the products of the East to go to the West, and products of the West to come to the East. We have the ships built by the Government, which are rotting at their ports or losing money on their present routes and this route could be developed at least as an experiment, and give to the East and the West some of the facilities for transportation to which we think we are entitled.

Railway rates on lumber are 90 cents per hundred pounds, or $27 per thousand feet, computed on the basis of heavy timber that weighs 3,000 pounds to the thousand feet. Carried by water to New York with a percentage allowed for transportation from that port to our ports, the rate would be 50 cents per hundred pounds, or $16.20 per thousand feet. Comparing $16.20 with $27, you have a saving of $10.80 per thousand feet of lumber. In the matter of iron and steel which the West wants, and which the West is to-day buying from the United States, these goods could be supplied by the industries of Eastern Canada—in Montreal, in Quebec, and even in Toronto—taken to St. John and Halifax, and shipped through the Panama Canal by our own boats and up the Pacific coast. They could be laid down there much cheaper than by rail, and at a price that would pay, and give us a business over the American business. Steel and iron by rail costs to-day 65 cents per hundred pounds in carload lots. By water it would cost 48 cents, or 30 per cent less. As 10 per cent or 12½ per cent is a good wholesale profit, the 30 per cent saved would give shippers from 12½ to 17½ per cent margin over the stocks they buy from the United States, which would give them a fair profit. Ordinary shelf hardware such as goes into buildings and all kinds of household uses, can be laid down by water for 40 per cent less than by rail; and those same figures apply to every item of commerce or trade to be exchanged between Eastern and Western Canada.

It may occur to some people that these remarks are irrelevant to the question under consideration; but, after all, transportation is the question under consideration—the means whereby we can get the products of one part of Canada to another part where they may be required.

I do not desire to take more of your time, honourable gentlemen, although I would like to have more time to go into this matter in greater detail; but that has been done already, and others are going to speak. With respect to the differential rates established on the Intercolonial Railway—which, it is true, were created, not at the time of Confederation, but in compliance with and in the carrying out of the agreement of Confederation—those rates as they were applied before the war should be re-established so far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned. In asking that, we are not asking for any bonus or gratuity: we are simply asking for that which is our due and just right. Give us that, and you will not hear much of this criticism and this talk by people who may be irresponsible, but not altogether irresponsible, as to separation from this Confederation of ours.

Canada a few years ago had a national spirit, and, if this is going to be a great country, it has to develop a national spirit. If you go into the United States you will find there a real national spirit. It was not so after the American war, it is true; but to-day, no matter where you go in that country, you will find a loyalty to everything that appertains to the United States—its flag, the country, and its institutions. I regret to say that there is not so much national spirit in Canada as there was six or eight years ago. That is a most deplorable condition, and it exists because the people of the East and the West and the middle portions of our country do not work hand in hand, and do not endeavour to understand each other's difficulties and each other's requirements. If all will give consideration to requirements which relate solely to the East or to questions which pertain solely to the West, then we may reasonably look forward to the time when we shall have a real national spirit, when the aims which were in the minds of the founders of this Confederation will be carried out and we shall have on this continent a group or provinces forming one harmonious whole working together for one common object. Then, and only then can we confidently look forward to the time

> When, as their varying hopes unite
> They will form in heaven's light
> One arch of peace.

Hon. G. W. FOWLER: Honourable gentlemen, I must congratulate the members of this honourable body on the intense and overmastering interest which they take in this question, as is evidenced by the fact that about twenty-five per cent of the seats are occupied and the balance are vacant. It is a matter of some importance to a very considerable part of this country of ours. Three provinces at least are interested in this question that is being discussed this afternoon, and I regret that there is not more interest shown on the part of members from other provinces. If it were a question of one of the larger provinces that was being discussed, there would be scarcely a vacant seat in the Chamber; but the extreme East seems not to be able to arouse that interest and enthusiasm which the centre of Canada arouses among the members of this House, when matters pertaining to either of the great provinces are under discussion.

Now, as there is considerable business on the Order Paper, and as a number of other persons wish to speak, and as I suppose the House wishes to adjourn at six o'clock, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to, and the debate was adjourned.

GOVERNMENTAL PRIVATE CARS AND MOTOR CARS

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Has the Minister received any information with regard to the return for which I moved?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may say that I have that report, but as I looked through it I received the impression that the report from the Department of Militia was not complete, although it had been sent before all the others. Looking at the questions put, it seemed to me that there were one or two to be answered. I telephoned the Department, and I thought I would have got the answer before six o'clock. If I get it before eight o'clock the honourable gentleman shall have it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is rather unfortunate that you had not examined it when you first received it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I did; but when the various Departments were circularized, I expected I would receive a new report from the Militia Department.

THE COPYRIGHT BILL

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: I would like to ask the leader of the House whether, previous to the second reading of Bill 24, an Act to amend the Copyright Act, he will place on the Table of the Senate a statement defining the status of Canada, Great Britain, union and non-union countries respectively on the matter of copyright.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If it is available, I will try to have it for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: I am informed that it is available.

FRUIT BILL

THIRD READING POSTPONED

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of Bill 11, an Act to regulate the Sale and Inspection of Fruit and Fruit Containers.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like to ask the Minister whether he is quite satisfied that the wording of the interpretation clause gives the Government authority to appoint inspectors. I am not a lawyer, but I asked a lawyer whether in his opinion the interpretation clause, which was only explanatory, was sufficient to authorize appointments—mandatory, in other words; and he said no. I do not see where you get any authority to appoint these inspectors. I think you ought to put something in the Bill to give you authority.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The same as in the Patent Act. You will find a clause making provision for the appointment of officials. There should be a clause of that kind.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I find that there is none, except in the interpretation clause. To this day it seems to have been sufficient to maintain the whole corps of inspectors. I think we should allow the Bill to go through, and next Session, if some amendments are brought in, that one may be considered.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Meanwhile these men are appointed illegally: you have no authority to appoint them; and if a case should come up in the courts, I think probably the inspector would be knocked out.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would be inclined to think the power is there. It is an implied power, and is sufficient to authorize the Minister to appoint inspectors, because "inspector" is defined in the Act—he is the person appointed by the Minister.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend pardon me for interrupting him? According to the policy of the law, it is not intended that the Minister should appoint the inspectors. Those officers should be appointed by the Civil Service Commission. There certainly should be a clause in this Bill giving the Government power, through the proper channels, to apoint the necessary officers to administer the Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My impression is that nearly all the Acts that govern departments preceded the beginning of the Civil Service Commission, and that they have not been amended, while the Civil Service Act, which we have deemed it to be sufficient, has clothed the Civil Service Commission with the powers which formerly belonged to the Minister or the Governor in Council.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I recall that a Session or two ago we had a discussion in this Chamber upon that very subject. The Bill before us was silent as to the appointment of officials to administer the Act, and it was deemed necessary by the Government to give express power for the appointment of officers. If my honourable friend will have that looked up, I think he will find that it is apropos of the discussion on this Bill. I think my honourable friend should postpone the third reading to get information on that. Let us have the opinion of the Department of Justice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no objection to placing the Bill on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday next, although I may say that I have been informed that the regulations have to go out before the first of June.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Bill will not come into force until the Governor's assent is given to it.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Get the information before Monday.

The order was discharged.

DIVORCE BILLS

THIRD READINGS

Bill M4, an Act for the relief of Edgar Lindsay.—Hon. Mr. Reid.

Bill V4, an Act for the relief of William Francis Rafferty.—Hon. Mr. Hardy.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG BILL

FURTHER CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

The Senate again went into Committee on Bill 72, an Act to prohibit the improper use of opium and other drugs.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 4—offences and penalties.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I move that section 4 be amended by striking out all that part of the section from the word "upon" in the twenty-fourth line thereof to the word "month" in the twenty-eighth line thereof and substituting therefor the following:

Shall be guilty of a criminal offence and shall be liable—

(a) Upon indictment to imprisonment for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than six months and to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars and costs and not less than two hundred dollars and costs, or

(b) Upon summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding eighteen months and not less than six months and to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars and costs and not less than two hundred dollars and costs;

Provided that—

And the rest of the clause is not altered. This proposed amendment is in accordance with one of the suggestions made.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Are you quite sure now that the accused has not a right to elect by whom he shall be tried?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This deals with summary convictions, not summary trials. There is a distinction between summary conviction and summary trial.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Oh, yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is all summary conviction.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I do not understand. I supposed the one who lays the complaint would select the tribunal or decide whether he would go before the magistrate or before a judge.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would depend on the charge.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The defendant does not select. It is the prosecutor who selects.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: That is what I say. So a man charged with a crime might be in one section of the country indicted, and in another section be sent before a magistrate.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Let him move into the other section, then.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Personally I think that the man accused of the crime, no matter where the charge is laid, should, if found guilty, receive the same penalty as if he had been accused in another part of the country, and I think it very easy for the Government to arrange that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Are not the different methods of trial for different charges?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The prosecutor judges of the circumstances and the heinousness of the offence, and if the circumstances are very glaring and it is a very serious offence, he chooses indictment; but if it is a small affair and not very glaring he takes the other method. He should not be restricted in his choice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that from 75 to 80 per cent of the offences are minor ones, and they are prosecuted summarily.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Carried.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I do not like to press this matter, but I desire to have it clear in my own mind. What I do not understand about it is this, that if a man is indicted and goes before a judge he may get a lesser penalty than he would on summary trial before a magistrate. Am I right in that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; that is amended.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The complaint of my honourable friend has brought about the amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) read that amendment again and state its application, please?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Read the section as it will be.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND (reading):

(e) Unlawfully, sells, gives away or distributes any drug to any minor;

shall be guilty of a criminal offence,

(a) and shall be liable upon indictment to imprisonment for any term not exceeding seven years, and not less than six months and to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars and costs and not less than two hundred dollars and costs, or

(b) upon summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding eighteen months and not less than six months and to a fiine not exceeding one thousand dollars and costs and not less than two hundred dollars and costs;

Provided that notwithstanding the provisions of section ten hundred and twenty-eight of the Criminal Code.....

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What is the minimum of imprisonment?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The minimum is six months in both cases.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: On indictment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: How does this work out? Take an actual case. A policeman detects a crime. He goes for the magistrate. In nine cases out of ten, in Ontario, the magistrate would then consult the County Attorney, and the County Attorney would decide whether to press for the adjudication and final disposition of the case by a magistrate or simply for a committal, followed by an indictment before a judge. Is that not the way it would actually work out, may I ask?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Then what happens? As I understand it, he is liable under an indictment to a sentence of seven years, but in a summary trial before the police magistrate the limit of imprisonment is only eighteen months. So it depends on what the County Attorney does. That is the position. If the prisoner is not conversant with the law, he may be indicted and may get seven years, whereas on a summary conviction he would get only eighteen months.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, but he has not the choice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then you are vesting the choice in some officer of the law. That is entirely wrong. When my honourable friend read that, I was under the impression that the offence which would be dealt with under a summary conviction would be a different one from the offence triable by indictment, but apparently from the amendment which has just been read, and from the restatement of the case, it is the one offence. The judge does not decide it. It may be decided by the constable who arrests the man. He may lay the information and bring the accused at once before a magistrate. In the next block another man may be arrested for precisely the same offence, and he may be tried by a judge under indictment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is the case today.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Surely a distinction of that kind is illogical and does not contribute in any way to a proper administration of justice. It seems to me that the offence triable under summary conviction should be entirely different from, and much less serious than, the one triable by indictment. That is the policy that runs through the whole Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Surely.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Distinctions are drawn. For instance, a common assault is triable by summary conviction, but an assault with intent would not be triable by summary conviction: it would be an indictable offence. Therefore there should be a grade of offences, the more serious ones, triable by indictment, and another grade, the less serious, triable by summary conviction. I have never seen this so-called principle of placing both on a parity ingrafted upon the Criminal Code. I do not think my honourable friend will find any parallel case in the whole Code.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You can find plenty of cases in which you may proceed either by indictment or by summary conviction.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Can the honourable gentleman think of any just now?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes: the case of an assault.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: A common assault, yes.

Hon. Mr FOWLER: The honourable gentleman asked me to think of one, and I thought of one.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But that is a very general term. Common assualt would be triable by summary conviction, but the more serious offence of assault with intent would not.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: An offence like murder could not be tried by summary conviction.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Here it is practically the same offence. The Government have been complaining that they are not able to stamp out the trade in dope, yet at the same time they are introducing what to my mind is the most illogical principle that I have seen—the principle of penalizing the offender without any distinction between the very serious class of offences and the less serious.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You must put some confidence in the officer.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What officer?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The officer who is entrusted with the enforcement of the Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but he will not know anything about it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He does.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In this case the ordinary policeman will determine whether the accused shall be tried by the magistrate or by indictment. You should not vest the administration of criminal law in that class of officer.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You give a great deal of power to the policeman; therefore the policeman should be a very intelligent man, in order to exercise that power in a proper way.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He has his proper functions, but it is not a function to determine the seriousness of an offence.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: My honourable friends, it seems to me, are exercising a great deal of ingenuity to try to assist the fellow who is peddling dope.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would exercise whatever ingenuity I possess in trying to tangle him up and catch him and punish him; because this is much more serious than the liquor business. It is much worse. A dope vendor would do a great deal more harm than a bootlegger, because if a bootlegger bootlegs good whiskey it may not do very much harm, but the dope vendor is vending something that is destroying people, and the dope evil is becoming very widespread. I think we should not scan too closely the authority that we give to these people who are endeavouring to carry out the law. I am very strongly in favour of that.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would much prefer to see the section drafted in such a way that a vendor would be liable to the seven years in penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: He is not before the magistrate.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: No, but he is before the judge, and I do not see why you should draw a distinction between a magistrate and a judge.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is entirely wrong.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The last subsection says that he must be tried by indictment, but it leaves other subsections—a, b, c, and d—so that it all depends whether he goes before a magistrate or an information is laid in which the court will send him up for trial. It seems extraordinary that you cannot punish a man properly without drawing the distinction that there shall be a different punishment whether he is tried before a magistrate of before a judge. I quite endorse the remarks made by the Senator from New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. Fowler): we want to stamp this crime out, but we ought to do it properly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not see that there is any difficulty in this Act. The minimum is the same in both cases—six months, before a judge or a jury. If the Crown Attorney or the Department feels that the offence is so serious that the accused must be tried before a judge or a jury, they so direct. Of 1,850 convictions last year, perhaps a maximum of 20 per cent of the cases went to a jury.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Might I ask what the charges were? Did they come under subsection e?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Principally under subsection d.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I hope my honourable friend will not think I am interrupting him when I ask this. Let us assume the charge is under paragraph e; that is a very serious offence—selling to minors.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is no option in that instance; it must be tried by indictment. That is at the end of the section.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, let us go back to d. A constable in the prosecution of his duty finds an offender violating the law, and he arrests him on sight, and at once brings him before a justice of the peace. The Department knows nothing about this. The officer who is charged by the Government with the administration of this very important statute knows nothing about it. The case comes next morning before the justice of the peace, on summary conviction, and is disposed of. Now, it may be the most serious case in all this calendar of crime, but the offender cannot be tried twice, and nobody can intervene, because he has been tried.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No; the magistrate decides whether he will try him by summary conviction.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have not been attributing any too much intelligence to these magistrates and the magistrate proceeds to deal with the subject—in fact, is flattered that the case is brought before him, and he proceeds to deal with it. A summary conviction is made, whereas the man should be tried by indictment. I say that the Department does not appreciate the seriousness of the duty imposed upon them, and if they fail properly to prosecute, it is entirely owing to their own ignorance, and they have shown a degree of ignorance in asking us to deal with the Criminal Law in this way.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Take, for instance, a case in the county of Simcoe. The Crown Attorney resides at the town of Barrie, and there are police magistrates at Collingwood, Penetanguishene, Orillia, and Midland. Assuming that a man is caught in the act of selling by the local constable, who takes him to the police magistrate in the town. If he secures the services of a lawyer the latter will say at once: "You go before the police magistrate; we will hurry the case on, and he will give you only 18 months, if he gives you the limit." But if the case is not hurried through, it may come to the ears of the Crown Attorney, and he will come up, because he is paid fees for going, and when he comes up he will say: "This is not a case, Mr. Magistrate, for you to dispose of summarily; this is a heinous affair; send him down for trial." Then an indictment follows, and he may get 7 years; but it is only a question of activity whether the man gets eighteen months or seven years. I appeal to my honourable friends, the lawyers from Ontario, if I do not state the matter correctly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may inform the Chamber that this Act has been on the Statute Book for the last 3 years. It was my honourable friend who convinced us that this was the proper way of dealing with this question and defining the offence, because my honourable friend, if he looks at the clause we are now discussing, will see that it was passed under his direction on the 4th of June, 1921.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But my honourable friend will pardon me if I say this —that I took what was handed me, just as he is doing to-day, and I venture to say that I knew as much about the Act then as my honourable friend knows about it to-day, and I will not say that that is very much. But not having the responsibility of putting through this House everything that has been handed to me, I have looked into it critically, and I am satisfied that this is entirely wrong.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, I may tell my honourable friend that he did no wrong. His legislation was good. It has been applied through the whole length and breadth of Canada, and it has served the purpose. The hypothesis which my honourable friend from Midland (Hon. Mr. Bennett) states would cover minor offences. The Federal Government and the Department watch the whole trade and assist in arresting all the small traders and traffickers, but they are mostly brought before magistrates. You could not think of having 450 cases, as they did in Montreal last year, before a judge or a jury.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are not complaining about that. We are complaining about disparity between the two sentences for the same offence.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the disparity is only on the surface. In reality the minimum is six months, and if the Crown believes that an example must be made, and that a trafficker, for instance, who had 400 pounds of opium, and who is a large distributor and trader, should be punished in a more severe way, then a charge is laid and the Crown proceeds by indictment against him.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But what if the trial takes place before the Departmer knows anything about it? Suppose a local constable hales an offender before the magistrate; he is arrested to-night and appears before the magistrate to-morrow morning; the magistrate disposes of the case summarily, and even goes to the extent of the maximum; can it be said that that is a proper administration of justice? In the next block a man may be arrested by another policeman, who may consult the Crown prosecutor, and the latter may say, "We won't allow this man to go before the magistrate: we will treat it as an indictable offence."

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: If you were to make the limit seven years in both cases, would not that be better?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department has no objection to drawing attention to the danger of a magistrate coming down very heavily and sometimes fining or judging very severely cases which are of a minor order. Of course, you are putting into his hands the right of giving 7 years. The Department has no objection to drawing that to his attention.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: But the offences are of such a nature, and the people who commit them are of such a quality, that I do not think they ought to get much sympathy for their hard pleas.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is not a question of sympathy.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Make it 7 years, and you have it logical.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But police magistrates are selected from men trained in the law; almost invariably they are lawyers.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: That is not the case always.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But what they do in the wild West does not indicate what they do in the cultivated provinces.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: But I am taking the city of Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is the custom in the Maritime provinces to appoint lawyers; consequently the difficulty which my honourable friend has pointed out would not apply. If you are going to make the penalty 7 years in the penitentiary, and have no summary conviction at all, it seems to me you will throw upon the courts a tremendous amount of work, particularly in the big centers like Montreal and Toronto, where this vice is rampant.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Do you think any of those courts are overworked?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They are not down in our country, because we are a law-abiding and God-fearing people, but in the great centers like Montreal and Toronto the courts are worked hard, and have a great deal to do. It seems to me we have it pretty well fixed now just as it is—seven years as a maximum, with a minimum of six months, and eighteen months with a minimum of six months.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: And a fine of $1,000 isn't it?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes; and $200 minimum. Now, you cannot put any fine by indictment?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes, the fine is by indictment. Will my honourable friend read again about the summary conviction?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is as follows:

Upon summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding 18 months and not less than 6 months, and to a fine not exceeding $1,000 and costs, and not less than $200 and costs.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That was not in before?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Does anybody suggest that all those crimes should be indictable?

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, that is not the suggestion at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The suggestion is that the same maximum should prevail, and that the magistrate should have a right to sentence to 7 years, as in the case of a jury trial.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Then you might as well do away with the indictment altogether.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think if you get $1,000 out of them, and eighteen months in jail, they will probably stop doing it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We discussed here at very great length—I think we took several days to discuss it—the desirability of uniformity of sentences; and upon the very first occasion we are implanting on the statute a provision by which the greatest disparity as to the same offence may be had in the sentence.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I will venture to say that this would happen in the county of Simcoe or any other county in the province of Ontario where there was a lawyer with any brains at all. He would understand that section, and if he were at the county town in Simcoe, the Crown Attorney would hear of the case, and he would go down there to the magistrate; and when one honourable gentleman talked about those magistrates being lawyers, it is not so in Ontario.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is not so in the West; they are nearly all laymen.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There is only one lawyer in the whole list that I named, and he is not in the county town. The result would be this—that the Crown Attorney, having heard of it, would very soon load up the police magistrate with the indictment idea. Pointing it out to him, he would say, "The Act contemplates indictment; there it states indictment;" and the result would be he would commit the man for trial, and the indictment would follow in the Superior Court. But if anyone consulted a lawyer he would say: "You are in custody now, but we will have you out by night before the Crown Attorney hears about it."

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You would wipe out the indictment altogether?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Make it 7 years each.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend is not stating the true state of things in Ontario. Of 350 convictions last year in Ontario only 5 cases were by indictment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then, let me ask, why make a provision as to indictment at all, if you are not going to make use of trial by indictment? I say with every confidence that in my own city the police magistrate is a layman, and a very good magistrate at that; and if the most serious offences covered by this Bill should be committed I know the accused would be at once brought before the magistrate, not before the judge; and the magistrate will continue to try all those cases. Now, it seems to me it is a farce to talk of trying these cases by indictment, and imposing such a sentence as is mentioned, if it is not intended to make use of that particular machinery of the law. I say without any hesitation that in the West all those offences will be tried by magistrates.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Does the honourable gentleman forget that that is just exactly what the law is now?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But we are amending the law.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the law has been that since 1921.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It appears to me that there may be some very important and serious cases that it would be proper to try by indictment; but unless there has been some dissatisfaction with the administration of the law as we put it through before I do not see why we should change it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I take it for granted that the Department is here to get more drastic remedies for enforcing the law. If that has been the law I would like to know why they are here to-day seeking to amend it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, this is an edition of the Act with a few changes.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I agree with the honourable leader that we should be given some reason why we should change it at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There was no desire expressed to change it except by the representation of some members of this House as to the minimum penalty, and there has been a modification just to meet the wishes of the members of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I should have thought these people would be treated, as the honourable leader says, as vagrants, who are all tried by summary conviction; but some person must have had some reason why some of these cases should be made indictable. I cannot see any particular reason why they should be indictable.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Suppose a man were found with 400 pounds of opium, would not that be an indictable offence?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: If he is found with 400 pounds of opium he could get a larger sentence; that is the only distinction.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: A man found with a pipe smoking opium should not get seven years.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I think it would be the public desire that they should all be indictable.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think a man who is an habitual offender, who kept on breaking the law again and again, should have a heavier punishment than a first offender.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Look at subsection e: you must try that case by indictment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: A habitual offender who had been prosecuted, paid his fine, and was going on again with the same trade, should be indicted.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Is there not provision made for whipping in this case?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that in Vancouver just such a case was mentioned. A man had been convicted and on the third time he was tried he got seven years. I am informed that one of the best magistrates who tries cases to the satisfaction of the Department and of the city in which he lives, is the magistrate my honourable friend mentioned, from Calgary. The vast majority of cases fall under the minor penalty; but surely it should be left to the Department to decide when they shall proceed by indictment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My contention is that you should state the class of case to be tried by indictment; you should draw a distinction, because 90 per cent of these cases, I don't care how serious they may be, will be tried by a magistrate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend will notice that it is only under paragraphs a and d that there is any option: under e there is none.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: May I ask what becomes of a fine? Does part of it go to the municipality?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, the whole of the fine goes to the party that prosecutes —either the municipality or the province or the Federal Government.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: That is, the informer.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No informer gets anything.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The magistrates dearly love to deal with these cases. The constable goes to the magistrate in the evening and says: "I have a man in the coop accused of dealing with opium;" and he tells a lawyer, and the lawyer goes and sees the accused. "Well," he says, "we had better get you before the magistrate before the Crown Attorney hears of it, because then I can get you off under the eighteen months' clause, perhaps; but if the County Crown Attorney hears of it he will be up and will persuade the magistrate to indict you."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: For the first offence, 99 per cent get the minimum.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let it go. The Department will be back next Session asking for an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

The Committee resumed at 8 o'clock.

On section 14—onus of proof on charge of importing, etc.:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I stated that I would move to strike out the words: "that the accused did not commit the offence or". I now ask leave to withdraw that amendment, as I am moving to strike out the whole clause and to replace it with the following:

Where any person is charged with an offence under paragraphs a, d or e of section 4 of this Act—

b is dropped—

it shall not be necessary for the prosecuting authority to establish that the accused had not a license from the Minister, or was not otherwise authorized to commit the act complained of, and if the accused pleads or alleges that he had such license or other authority, the burden of proof therof shall be upon the person so charged.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Why do you not use the word "onus"?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: "Burden" is better. "Burden" is Saxon; "onus" is Latin.

The proposed amendment was agreed to.

The title was agreed to.

The Bill was reported, as amended.

ADMIRALTY BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from May 7, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand for the second reading of Bill 117, an Act to amend the Admiralty Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I stated last evening that the information which I had furnished to the Senate had been secured from official reports, and that I had received no direct memorandum from the Department of Justice. I read the Revised Statutes, Chapter 141, to indicate that the object of the Bill seemed to be to give exclusively to the Governor in Council jurisdiction which previously had been divided between the local judge and the Governor in Council. As the discussion proceeded I cited the Acts of 1920 and 1922, stating that the latter seemed to have already given the authority to the Governor in Council; but I find from the memorandum handed me that such was not exactly the situation.

There was some confusion about the former legislation. According to the Admiralty Act, Revised Statutes, Chapter 141, a local judge in Admiralty was authorized to appoint a deputy judge with the approval of the Governor in Council, and the appointment might be revoked in the like manner. By Chapter 33 of 1920 it was provided in alternative that the Governor in Council, or a local judge in Admiralty with the approval of the Governor in Council, might appoint a deputy judge, and that such appointment might be revoked in the like manner. This Act however was not brought into force.

Then, by Chapter 4 of 1922, it was provided that the Governor in Council might appoint a deputy judge; that such deputy judge should hold office during good behaviour, and might be removed by the Governor in Council. This Act also has not been brought into force.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would you state the reason? Was it to come into effect by Order in Council?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Perhaps by proclamation.

By the present Bill it is proposed to repeal both the Act of 1920 and the Act of 1922, neither of which, as I have said, has come into operation, and to vest the power of appointment as well as the power of removal, in the Governor in Council, so that the effect of the proposed legislation, so far as section 11 is concerned, will be to leave the law as originally enacted in the Revised Statutes, except that the appointment of a deputy judge will be made direct by the Governor in Council and not through the medium of the local judge. The former method of appointment, I may say, was found cumbersome and dilatory as it depended upon the exercise of two distinct authorities, the local judge and the Governor in Council, and the proposed amendment is designed to simplify and accelerate the procedure.

Some years ago the judge of the Exchequer Court made rules authorizing local or deputy judges to receive fees of office. This was done principally to provide some compensation for the deputy judge at Montreal, who was transacting considerable business there, while the local judge resided at Quebec. More recently the judges salaries have been raised, and by section 2 of Chapter 59 of 1919 it was provided that no salary shall be paid to any local judge in Admiralty who is a judge of any provincial superior court, although this provision was not to apply to local judges appointed before the coming into force of the Act. In view of this provision and of the increase of judical salaries, and in view of complaints made by suitors against the payment of fees, it is considered advisable to abolish these fees.

In the Province of Quebec there are two large shipping centres at Montreal and at Quebec, and presumably there would always be a local judge or a deputy judge at each of these places. It is considered that they should be on the same footing with regard to remuneration; and therefore, while the judicial fees are abolished, it is provided by section 3 of the proposed Act that a deputy judge at Montreal or Quebec, when the local judge resides at Quebec or Montreal, shall receive the same salary, if any, as if he were the local judge.

As to the Senate questions: the salary of the local judges is regulated by the Judges Act, Chapter 138, Revised Statutes, section 5, and is $1,000, except for the Toronto Admiralty District, where it is $600. This, of course, is subject to the said Chapter 59 of 1919, subsection 2; that is, the new appointees are not entitled to remuneration.

A deputy judge will not receive any salary except one in the Province of Quebec, and then only if he be not a judge of a superior court.

There is no power given by this Bill to dismiss any judge except a deputy local judge, and the tenure of the local deputy judges has always been during pleasure.

This is signed by the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is a deputy local judge? That is the question I was particularly anxious to get some information upon. The memorandum which my honourable friend has just read, except in the last line or so, uses the term "deputy judge." From my observation, the only time the term "deputy local judge" is used, is towards the end of the memorandum. Clearly this Bill would permit of the appointment by the Government of deputy local judges with jurisdiction in Admiralty in all Admiralty districts, and there is nothing in the Bill to signify in any way what is the intention of the Government as to local judges. That is to say, at the present time, as I understand, most of the county court judges living in Admiralty districts in Ontario have Admiralty jurisdiction attached to their office. This clearly would give to the Government power to appoint one or more local judges in every Admiralty district in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, deputy judges.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: But how can you appoint a deputy judge if there is no judge?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: "One or more deputy local judges." What is a "deputy local judge"? I have not seen the phrase used elsewhere. I can understand what a local judge is, but I do not understand what is a deputy local judge.

Hon. G. G. FOSTER: Is not Judge McLennan a deputy local judge in Montreal?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I remember that Sir Adolphe Routhier was the local judge in Admiralty, and then under section 11 of chapter 141 of the Revised Statutes he had a deputy judge appointed in Montreal.

Hon. G. G. FOSTER: Judge McLennan.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am under the impression that Judge McLennan was appointed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Shortly before the late Government went out of office he was appointed.

Hon. G. G. FOSTER: I am quite certain he acted as deputy judge before the death of Judge Routhier.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then probably he has become the local judge, and the one to be appointed in Quebec will be a deputy judge. I am not absolutely au fait. I am under the impression that there is at present no deputy judge in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: Is there any judge at all? Formerly we had for a good many years a Judge of the Admiralty Court in Quebec—Judge Black. There was no judge in Montreal at that time.

Hon. G. G. FOSTER: There was a deputy judge, though.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: Not at that time. All the business used to be done in Quebec. Judge Black was succeeded by Judge O'Kill Stuart. But now is there a Judge in Admiralty? I do not see how you can appoint a deputy judge if there is no judge. It would be nonsense.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think that goes without saying.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If you will allow me, I will refer to Chapter 141 of the Revised Statutes—section 11:

A local judge in Admiralty may, from time to time, with the approval of the Governor in Council, appoint a deputy judge.

The honourable gentleman (Sir James Lougheed) asked, what is a deputy judge.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: Deputy judge of what—Admiralty?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He may appoint a deputy judge, but it does not say he shall be a deputy local judge.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Section 8 provides for the appointment of local judges in Admiralty, and section 11 provides for the appointment of deputy judges. Section 11 continues in this way:

and such deputy judge shall have and exercise all such jurisdiction, powers and authority as are possessed by the local judge.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think my honourable friend will find that the situation is not peculiar to Montreal and Quebec.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, it is not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He will find that there is a local judge in Admiralty in Halifax. and that that local judge in Admiralty has a deputy at Sydney, where such a court is neded. That deputy judge at Sydney may be a county court judge residing in that district.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: I think that where the appellation "local judge" comes in, it is on account of the county judges being local judges of the County Court.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, they would be.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Is it contemplated that in Ontario these so-called local judges may be, as read from the memorandum, either judges of the Superior Court or judges of the County Court?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: That is what it means. That is where the appellation "local judge" comes in.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It does not say so. I think it would be at the discretion of the Government to appoint anyone a deputy local judge. The Act is quite silent as to its being limited to members of the judiciary. It is simply a matter of designation, and the Government may say by Order in Council: "We appoint John Smith a deputy local judge in Admiralty."

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: There is no qualification.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under section 11 there is no change as to the jurisdiction or the payment of the local judge or deputy judge. Clause 11 simply transfers the powers which were held jointly by the local judge and the Governor in Council to the latter exclusively. That is all there is in section 11. Section 2 says:

No judge, local judge or deputy local judge shall take or receive any fee of office upon the trial of any cause or upon any other judicial proceeding.

As this is an amendment to the Admiralty Act, I take it for granted that this applies to the Admiralty judges.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But you will come down by and by with an estimate for the payment of something to the local judges.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. My honourable friend will find that section 3 declares that there is to be a payment, but only in Quebec and Montreal. We are privileged.

Hon. G. G. FOSTER: That is special.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There will be a payment if the deputy judge is not a judge of the Superior Court. I do not know why this clause provides for the possibility of a deputy judge not being a judge of the Superior Court, but this is the clear explanation that the Deputy Minister of Justice gives. He indicates that under this Act it is impossible for a judge of the Superior Court to receive any fee or salary.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: But in the memorandum from which the Minister read it was stated that the judge to be appointed might be either a Superior Court judge or a County Court judge. Now I ask, is that same principle to be followed in the province of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Why not?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: To my mind it is a great mistake to appoint County Court judges in Ontario to take the place of the Superior Court judge who now presides.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will the honourable gentleman tell me if there are County Court judges already acting as deputy judges to the Judge in Admiralty?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: No.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: No, I do not think there are. This must be borne in mind, that the litigation that comes before the Court of Admiralty is very often of a serious nature. I saw reported only the other day a case tried by Judge Hodgins. He is the only judge in Admiralty in Toronto and for the province. It was a case in which a dredge had been sunk. The question was which of two tugboats or steamers had sunk the dredge. I have no knowledge of what damage was done. My recollection is that no amount was stated in the verdict, but that a reference was to be made to ascertain the damages. Now, Judge Hodgins in his position as the sole Admiralty judge acts in all cases that come up.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And he has no deputy?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: No.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I have never heard of any complaint. He has become conversant with the law. I assume that if this Bill goes into force in its present form there would be in all probability a judge appointed to reside at Kingston and dispose of business in that district of the St. Lawrence river and Lake Ontario; then there would probably be a judge for either Welland or Lincoln, those districts being adjacent to the Welland Canal; and of course there would be one at Sarnia, which is on the main artery; and it might be that the judge of the county of Simcoe would be appointed too, because the main port of the C.P.R. and the G.T.R. is situated on the Georgian Bay. Here you are going to appoint four County Court judges—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Where does my honourable friend get that?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Well, you are to have the power to appoint local judges.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is the law as it stands. It is not changed.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: But the appointments have never been made, apparently.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Why should we make them now? Why should the Governor in Council appoint deputy judges in Ontario if there have been none so far?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Then why take the power that you do in the Bill?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, no; the Act is not changed in that respect. The power is vested in the Governor in Council to-day to appoint deputy judges in Admiralty.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The chief cause assigned last night during the debate was the difficulty in having cases tried outside of Toronto, owing to the fact that the judge resided there; and the honourable gentleman seemed to assent to that view as showing a very good reason for having this power in the Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, no, I did not assent.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I will not say the honourable gentleman assented, but at all events he did not demur.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I know nothing about Ontario, and would not venture to express an opinion about the needs of that province.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: But the honourable gentleman would take power under this Bill to appoint four salaried judges, who may be County Court judges and exercise the same power as Judge Hodgins has to-day. Experience in the province of Ontario has shown that by the increase of the jurisdiction of County Court judges, whereby they have become entitled to try cases involving much larger amounts than formerly, there have been a lamentable number of appeals to the Supreme Court judges at Toronto. I do not think that a County Court judge, who is not conversant with admiralty law at all and who may try an Admiralty case only once in twenty years, should have handed to him for trial a case that may involve thousands of dollars, when you have in Toronto to-day a judge who tries all the cases that come up and who must of necessity be more conversant with the law than a judge who has hitherto had no cases at all before him. Yet this Bill is going to provide that the Government may appoint, if they so desire, say half-a-dozen local judges, County Court judges, in the province of Ontario; and, furthermore, they will be salaried.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: With regard to the honourable gentleman's remarks as to the extension of the jurisdiction of County Court judges in Ontario, I desire to say that I cannot agree witih him in the least. He says there are more appeals.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: From County Courts.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: That argues nothing whatever. The same cases would have been tried before the Supreme Court judge, and appeals might have been made in exactly the same way. I have had some experience with the enlarged jurisdiction of the County Courts, and my observation is that it has given the utmost satisfaction. It provides a better opportunity for the more rapid trial of cases, and almost invariably you get the same amount of satisfaction from a County Court judge as you would from a Supreme Court judge. The experience in our part of the country under the enlarged jurisdiction of the County Court has been extremely satisfactory.

With regard to Admiralty practice, in my experience County Court judges as a rule are quite as capable of trying the class of cases that are brought up under Admiralty as they are any other class. There are not, as a matter of fact, very many Admiralty cases tried in the province of Ontario. I firmly believe that it would be far better for the litigant—much less expensive and much more convenient—to have these cases tried by the ordinary County Court judges than to send them to Toronto for trial. The one thing needed in litigation these days is to have excessive costs done away with. This is absolutely a step in the right direction. My experience of County Court judges is that nine times out of ten you get just the same degree of satisfaction and just the same careful consideration of the law as you do from Supreme Court judges.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The only difference is that they make the first guess.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Perhaps they all guess to some extent; but a good many of us, even lawyers, do guess.

I may say, along this very line, that at the time when Sir Allen Aylesworth was Minister of Justice I tried to impress upon him the fact that centralization in the city of Toronto for the trial of Admiralty cases was entirely wrong, and that, so far as he possibly could, he should extend the jurisdiction and have someone appointed in the local district to try this class of cases. It is not breaking confidence to say that Sir Allen Aylesworth would not listen to me. He said no, it was wrong—that this class of cases ought to remain just where they were. To that I took strong exception, and I take exception to-day. I am absolutely convinced that this Bill is exactly on the right lines, and for that reason I will support it as strongly as I can.

I might point out to the honourable leader on the other side of the House where, in my opinion, the difficulty as to the appellation "deputy local judge" arises. It did bother me at first, I must say. I believe that is due to the fact that in the counties of the province of Ontario the judges are termed local judges of the County Court. That in all probability is the reason the expression "deputy local judge" has crept in. I cannot see any other reason for it. I do not think that I should be in favour of granting the Governor in Council the right to appoint any person at all as a deputy local judge. I think the appointment ought to be strictly confined to the Bench itself.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think so too.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The fact that this is the law, as it has been for many years past, certainly proves—

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I would point out to the honourable gentleman that this is a discussion on the second reading.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: With the indulgence of the House I may add just one word by way of explanation. This law has been administered under the Government of both political parties, and neither of them have, so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, appointed any of those judges. My honourable friend from Lambton (Hon. Mr. Pardee) has stated that Sir Allen Aylesworth, who was no mean authority, was very strongly against conferring the power on County Court judges.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: No; he was against taking it out of Toronto.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: It was then relegated to one Superior Court judge. Now, if the House approves, there are to be at least five or six Admiralty judges appointed in Ontario. However, there will be leave to appeal.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

LIVE STOCK BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 10, an Act to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting Live Stock.

Hon. Mr. Smith in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would ask leave of the House to bring in Mr. Arkell.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is a consolidation of the present Acts, with the additions which I indicated last night.

Sections 1 to 8 were agreed to.

On section 9—regulations:

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: I would ask the honourable leader of the Government, what relation has wool to poultry, eggs, etc.? Wool is not eatable.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is because it is a live stock product.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: So are hides and feathers. There is too much regulation in all departments now. People don't know where they get off at.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, we have provided for an egg-smashing machine.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like the Minister to say what it is proposed to do with eggs which are not fit for human food—make fertilizer of them?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They are to be destroyed. I hope they may be turned into good fertilizer.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The Bill speaks of valuing them. Are you going to value them if you are going to destroy them?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is in order that judgment may be passed upon them, declaring them to be valueless.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I do not see that there is much value in them if they are going to be destroyed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: So that it will be stated in the judgment.

Section 9 was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 10—inspectors' certificates:

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Where does the Government get the authority in this Act to appoint inspectors?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is it in the interpretation clause?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: There is no authority in this Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We have just the same form as the one the honourable gentleman objected to in regard to fruit inspectors. Section 2, paragraph b, says:

(b) "Inspector" means any inspector or other officer or person appointed by the Minister to perform any duty under this Act or under any regulation.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: That is only the interpretation clause, which is merely an explanatory clause; it does not authorize anything.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND. It is supposed to illuminate and explain the clause that is to be found in the Act.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: What clause authorizes the appointment of inspectors?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The answer I get from the Department is that there is an amount in the Supply Bill providing for a certain number of inspectors to be appointed by the Governor in Council. That is the regular procedure.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Does that mean that the Government can put anything in the Estimates that they please, to pay for appointments anywhere and everywhere, whether authorized or not? I do not think that is correct.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend will recognize the supremacy of Parliament, and, if Parliament so decides, there is nothing to be said. By whatever instrument or Act Parliament decides to do a thing, then it supersedes any regulation or Act to the contrary.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, if expressly stated; and it must be expressly stated in order to operate as a rule of an existing statutory provision. As I said this afternoon, we discussed this matter either last Session or some Sessions ago, and it was quite recognized that there must be a special provision inserted in the Act, and that has been done in the Patent Act which was before us yesterday, and which is on the Order Paper. It will be found in subsection 2, of section 3, reading as follows:

(2) There may be appointed from time to time, in accordance with The Civil Service Act, 1918, and any amendments thereto, such officers and clerks as are necessary for the purposes of this Act.

It is manifest that there must be some statutory authority for the appointment of the necessary staff. Moreover, it is very desirable that there should be some uniformity about our statutes. Unfortunately every Session there is scarcely a Department that does not come here and ask us to amend or consolidate its Acts. There is no attempt made to scientifically draft Acts of Parliament. Each Department has its own legal adviser, and he drafts an Act, it is put in the hands of a representative of the Department, is brought up here, and Parliament swallows it holus bolus almost invariably, instead of there being one law adviser of the Crown through whose hands every Act should pass. We pay no attention to uniformity, and the consequence is that our Statute Book is being filled to overflowing with all kinds of amendments, and complexities proceeding therefrom, and it is difficult for the public to know what the law really is.

Now, there should be uniformity in the drafting of statutes. There should be certain standard clauses, which manifestly must be applicable to all Departments. It is idle to suppose that one Department requires a clause such as I have read and other Departments can do without it. I do not wish to hark back to what took place this afternoon, but there was another example of the disparity which exists in our statutes—the absence of anything like scientific exactitude in the drafting of statutes. You have, for an offence, a magistrate imposing one penalty and a judge imposing an entirely different penalty; and notwithstanding the attention Parliament gives Session after Session to these matters, they are passed idly by. It seems to me that my honourable friend could not do any public service so valuable as to direct the attention of the Government to the necessity of adopting some method of preparing our statutes that would result in uniformity about them, and likewise in other matters which apply to the public service.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I call attention to paragraph j of section 9. Section 9 begins, "The Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing"—and then we have:

(j) Generally for carrying into effect the provisions of this Act.

Then paragraph b of section 2 defines "inspector or other officer or person appointed to perform any duty under this Act or under any regulation."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw the attention of my honourable friend to subsection 2 of section 10:

(2) Inspectors shall issue certificates for all live stock or live stock products inspected and approved or branded or marked by them. Such certificates shall be in such form as may be prescribed by regulation.

There is a very broad general power for carrying into effect the provisions of this Act, but there is no reason, since there is a definition of the word "inspector," why we would not have a clause in the Act giving the power to appoint the inspector. If my honourable friend thinks—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say that the references made by my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) are not sufficient. That is simply an interpretation. The Governor in Council certainly cannot exercise greater powers than the Act itself, and the authority given to the Governor in Council is simply to carry out, by Order in Council, the provisions of this Act. But if there is no provision in the Act for the appointment of staff or of clerks, it is manifest that he cannot pass an Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: At all events, there is no objection to taking the clause from the Patent Act and incorporating it. We will go through the Bill and report progress.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will put that in the Bill it is quite satisfactory to me.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: There seems to be an overlapping between the Live Stock Act and the Inspection of Meats Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What clause is my honourable friend referring to?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I am speaking of the Act in general. You are taking the power to appoint inspectors to inspect live stock. But you have an Act already with inspectors, governing the inspection of all canned meats and all products of animals. Would not that be an overlapping of the two Acts?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Act my honourable friend refers to concerns exclusively health, while this simply covers trade. This Act has not the same object in view as the other. This is trade, while the other is a sanitary Act.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: The other Act refers to trade also. It refers to every product of an animal—to all canned meats, to carcasses killed and shipped out of this country when inspected by this Department. They have a staff of highly trained inspectors, I think 80 or 90, from one end of the Dominion to the other, and surely those inspectors would be able to inspect any products of animals.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that the training required is absolutely different.

Sections 10 to 18, inclusive, were agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

Progress was reported.

SEEDS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 12, an Act respecting the Testing, Inspection and Sale of Seeds.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the Seed Control Act of 1905 restricted the weed-seed content in grass and clover seeds and seed grain. The Seed Control Act of 1911 established compulsory grades for timothy, alsike, red clover and alfalfa seed; and by regulation optional grades were established for seed grain and other kinds of grass and clover seeds. It also established standards of vitality for all kinds of field seeds and also for garden vegetable seeds.

The new Bill aims to make a further substantial step in advance by providing for the compulsory grading of all kinds of grass and clover seeds and seed grain, and also, at the option of the seller, for the grading as to quality of field root and garden vegetable seeds. In addition, provision is made for controlling the vitality of all kinds of field and garden seeds, and provisions were introduced by the provisional Seed Board which have for their object the restriction of the use of spurious variety names and the multiplicity of new variety names, which it is proposed shall be licensed for the future. Also in clause 7 it is proposed to suppress false representation in any form of advertising.

Wise and necessary exceptions contained in the old Act, as applied to the farmer, are carried forward into the new Act; and also the general provisions which give directions to the public or to the inspectors for carrying the provisions of the Act into effect.

A new principle is introduced in the establishment of an Advisory Board of experts, which Board will have to do with the making of necessary regulations. Experience in the administration of the Seed Control Act, the Feeding Stuffs Act and the Fertilizers Act, has shown that more efficient service is provided to the better satisfaction of the interested public by the adoption and application of this principle.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am not at all opposed to the policy of the Bill. I think it is an excellent one, and should receive the support of this House. However, I would desire, as an example of what I pointed out to the House a few minutes ago, to direct the attention of my honourable friend to paragraph e of section 2, which says:

"Inspector" means any inspector or other officer charged by the Minister with the enforcement of this Act.

The other Bill has an almost similar paragraph, which reads:

Any inspector appointed by the Minister for the enforcement of this Act.

There is clearly a distinction between the two. One pre-supposes that the appointment shall be made by the Minister; the other that the appointment shall be made by the Civil Service Commission, I apprehend, and that the Minister shall charge the appointee with the performance of his duties.

There is another rather singular section in this Bill, dealing with the same subject. I fail to understand why there should be so much dissimilarity in these Bills as to the appointment of staffs. Section 25 of the Bill reads as follows:

Such inspectors and official analysts may be appointed as required for the purposes of this Act.

What that means I cannot say. My honourable friend will probably look into the matter before we go into Committee so that there may be some clarity about the subject which will enable us to deal more intelligently with it than if we had not any information upon it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My knowledge of the matter dealt with in this Act is rather limited. If there is any honourable member of this House who takes a special interest in these matters, and who has read the Bill, I shall be very happy to have him by my side when we go into Committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will look around for him.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

TRADE MARK AND DESIGN BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 21, an Act to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill is for the purpose of bringing our law in respect of registration of industrial designs into harmony with the Articles of the International Convention for the protection of Industrial Property, to which Canada has decided to adhere. Article 2 of the Convention is in the following terms:

The subjects or citizens of each of the contracting countries shall in all the other countries of the Union as regards patents, utility models, industrial designs or models, trade marks and trade names, indications of origin, and the suppression of unfair competition, enjoy the advantages that their respective laws now grant or may hereafter grant to their own subjects or citizens.

Our Act at present allows only residents of Canada to register industrial designs. There is no reason for this restriction, and it should be removed in any case. Under our law all applicants, without regard to residence or nationality, may obtain patents and register trade marks. There is no reason for the distinction.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I ask my honourable friend, while he is on his feet, what countries adhere to this particular Convention? We are now permitting foreigners to come into Canada and to enjoy all the privileges which to-day are confined to Canadians. It seems to me that we should assure ourselves that we are obtaining reciprocal advantages.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I read from the British ratification deposited at Washington on April 1, 1913. We may find references to some people who have changed their vocations since then. I shall not personally shed any tears over the loss of some of the crowns that are mentioned in this preamble:

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India: His Majesty the German Emperor, King of Prussia, in the name of the German Empire; His Majesty the Emperor of Austria; King of Bohemia; etc.—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are gone.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, they are gone.

—and Apostolic King of Hungary, for Austria and for Hungary. His Majesty the King of the Belgians; the President of the United States of Brazil; the President of the Republic of Cuba; His Majesty the King of Denmark; the President of the Dominican Republic; His Majesty the King of Spain; the President of the United States of America; the President of the French Republic; His Majesty the King of Italy; His Majesty the Emperor of Japan; the President of the United States of Mexico; His Majesty the King of Norway—

Hon. Mr BEIQUE: That is enough.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All those countries belong?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

—Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands; the President of the Provisional Government of the Republic of Portugal; His Majesty the King of Servia; His Majesty the King of Sweden; the Federal Council of the Swiss Confederation; and the Tunisian Government.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL

SECOND READING POSTPONED

Hon. Mr. PARDEE moved the second reading of Bill 102, an Act to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the memorandum which the honourable the leader of the House has asked me to take shows that the purpose of the Bill is to repeal certain sections of the Criminal Code dealing with opium joints, so as to bring the Code into agreement with the provisions of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act; to prohibit the furnishing of any tips, selections, odds, winning money prices or other similar intelligence with respect to horse-races, or intended to assist or to be used in connection with bookmaking, pool selling, betting or wagering upon any fight, game, sport, or race other than a horse-race; to raise the age of consent from 14 years to 16 years with regard to certain offences against young girls; to make it a criminal offence to obtain a passage on any carriage, tramway, railway or vessel by the fraudulent use of a badge; and to extend the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada given by section 1024A of the Code to cases of acquittal as well as conviction. This is a rather large programme.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Would the honourable gentleman explain what is meant by the appeal in cases of acquittal?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: It is an amendment to section 1024A, Chapter 43 of the Statutes of 1920. The present Act reads:

Either the attorney-general of the province, or any person convicted of an indictable offence may appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the judgment of any court of appeal setting aside or affirming a conviction of an indictable offence, if the judgment appealed from conflicts with the judgment of any other court of appeal in a like case—and so on. The amendment proposes the insertion, after the word "conviction," in the fourth line, of the words "or acquittal." In other words, as I take it, it would mean that even in the event of an acquittal there might still be an appeal taken to the Supreme Court of Canada from the Court of Appeal. I do not know what the House may say regarding the matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is that again?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: It means in certain cases, if there has been an acquittal, although no appeal is possible to the Supreme Court, that by this legislation, which would become ex post facto, as I understand it, an appeal might be taken to the Supreme Court in order to upset the acquittal. As I say, I do not know what the House will say in regard to this legislation. Two or three honourable gentlemen expressed themselves with regard to it this afternoon. I leave it in the judgmet of the House whether the Bill should stand in the meanwhile.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) takes a very deep interest in this Bill, particularly in relation to certain sections of the Criminal Code, and has given a great deal of attention to the law as it stands to-day upon the Statute Book. Session after Session attempts have been made to repeal the legislation which, after very great thought and deliberation, this Chamber has framed and placed upon the Statute Book. In the absence of the honourable gentleman from Middleton, I should not like to see any disposition made of the Bill, particularly of those sections in which he is deeply interested. I expect that he will be here to-morow; certainly he will be here when we resume our sitting after the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: We might take the second reading of the Bill, and then consider it in Committee.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would like to hear the principle of the Bill discussed, because I must confess that I do not understand the explanation given by the honourable gentleman. A man is acquitted after trial by a jury, and there is an appeal to the Court of Appeal, and he is acquitted there; and now you provide that an appeal can be taken to the Supreme Court. If a man is charged with an offence, when is he ever going to get free? You may ruin a man by simply bringing a charge against him. It does seem to me to be opposed to every principle of British justice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that there is more than one principle in the Bill—it is an omnibus Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It covers almost every conceivable offence.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, there are three or four clauses. Of course, if a majority of the Senate were to dissent from the principle contained in each and every clause, that would settle the Bill on the second reading. I may say that I was spoken to by a representative of an association whose name I now forget, and I stated that I did not intend to bring before the Senate the clause that had already been rejected two or three times.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Half-a-dozen times.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But he informed me that he had seen some of the leading members of this Chamber, and that he had asked for a reference of this Bill to one of the Standing Committees or to a Special Committee of the House, in order that he might lay before the Committee the reasons for the legislation. If we decide to give a hearing to outside parties upon one or two or more of the clauses of this Bill, perhaps we could take the second reading and send to to Committee.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: The honourable gentleman from Lambton (Hon. Mr. Pardee) says that to some extent this is ex post facto.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: What particular act or circumstance was in the mind of the honourable gentleman when he made that observation?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: I would rather my leader would explain that part of the Bill. There is some special case which this is intended to cover, in regard to some device—a slot machine or something of that kind—in which there has been a conviction, and this legislation aims at that particular class of case. An acquittal, I understand, has already taken place. If this Bill is to hark back, then I describe it as I have done.

While on my feet I should like to say also that there is something further in this programme. A memorandum has been handed to me, which states:

> The Minister of Justice desires that if convenient the above Bill be amended in the Senate by adding thereto the following clause:—
> Section 242A of the said Act, as enacted by chapter 13 of the statutes of 1913, is amended by inserting the words "upon indictment or" after the word "liable" in the first line thereof.

So the section would read as follows:

> Everyone is guilty of an offence and liable upon indictment or on summary conviction to a fine of five hundred dollars, or to one year's imprisonment, or to both, who—
> (a) as a husband or head of a family, is under a legal duty to provide necessaries for his wife or any child under sixteen years of age; or,
> (b) As a parent or guardian is under a legal duty to provide necessaries for any child under sixteen years of age.

The memorandum then goes on to say:

> The purpose of the amendment is to remove a doubt which exists as to whether the provisions of the recent Supplementary Convention with the United States by which the offence of wilful desertion or wilful non-support of minor or dependent children was added to the list of extraditable crimes can be made effective in Canada. The offence covered by the Treaty is contained in section 242A of the Criminal Code, as enacted by chapter 13 of the statutes of 1913, and is punishable on summary conviction. Since the ratification of the Supplementary Convention representations have been made that the Treaty applies only to indictable offences, and that in order to make the Supplementary Convention effective it is necessary that this particular crime be made an indictable offence in Canada. While the question is not free from doubt, it is not unlikely that this view would be given effect to by the courts, and it is considered advisable, therefore, to amend section 242A so as to make this offence punishable upon indictment as well as upon summary conviction.

That will be added as an amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, it seems to me that some further consideration should be given to the entire Bill before the Senate approves of the principle of it. There is a well-established practice that upon the second reading we approve of the principle of a Bill. I quite appreciate the difficulty pointed out by my honourable friend the leader of the House. Where there is so much difference of opinion and where there are so many principles involved as are embodied in the many sections of this Bill, it is not easy to apply the principle generally. At the same time, in view of the action taken by the Senate in the past upon some of these sections, which may be said to be very contentious, one hesitates to permit of a second reading without feeling assured as to what will be the ultimate step the Senate will take. The reverend gentleman to whom my honourable friend the leader of the House referred waited upon me, and what I said to him was this, that if the Government in its wisdom saw fit to send this Bill to a Committee for the purpose of hearing evidence upon those clauses to which the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) has given special attention for several Sessions past, I ertainly would not object to such a reference being made. However, I speak only for myself and not in any sense for other members of the Senate. They may exercise their own judgment upon that. It seems to me that it would be very much better, if my honourable friend proposes sending this to a Committee, that the Committee should consider the entire Bill and submit a report to the House. Possibly many of the sections would be eliminated and we might then agree to some extent upon a general principle applicable to the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There would be this advantage in sending such a Bill to a Committee, that the Department of Justice, from whom this legislation emanates, would have a representative there to explain and justify these amendments to the Criminal Code. I have already had occasion to say, and I repeat, that it is very unsatisfactory to have such legislation passed in the House of Commons without one word of criticism or one question put.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: That is right.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The burden is thrown on us. That is the intention.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And year after year the Bill comes to us, for the Senate to deal with as it pleases. If we had that reference to a Committee, I think we should have much better information from the initiator of all this legislation, the Department of Justice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I suggest to my honourable friend who has charge of the Bill (Hon. Mr. Pardee) that he permit it to stand until to-morrow and in the meantime give some consideration to the appointment of a Committe for that purpose?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Most certainly.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the debate was adjourned.

DOMINION LANDS (COAL) BILL

CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved concurrence in the Report of the Special Committee to whom was referred Bill E2, an Act to amend the Dominion Lands Act respecting the sale or other disposal of coal lands and coal mining rights.

He said: The report of the Committee is to be found at page 295 of the Minutes of the 3rd of May, instant. For the information of this House it will be sufficient for me to refer to the latter part of the report, at page 300, which, I think, adequately explains what is contained in it:

> Following an interview with the Committee on the 18th April, 1923, Mr. Newcombe, Deputy Minister of Justice, considered the agreement between the Isenberg Estate and Mr. Murdoch of the 18th July, 1922 (Exhibit 5), and also the testimony of Mr. Murdoch given before the Committee. In a letter dated 23rd April, 1923, directed to the Committee by Mr. Newcombe, he states:

Honourable gentlemen will remember that this deals with those mining rights which have come before this honourable House on several occasions, and the question is whether they shall be conserved or not. Mr. Murdoch, acting on behalf of the Isenberg estate, who had been granted the leases, obtained a fiat authorizing the estate to bring a suit before the Exchequer Court, and the suit is now pending. Mr. Murdoch was examined before the Committee and was asked to produce the papers relating to the matter. Among them he produced an agreement between himself and the Isenberg estate, and the letter of Mr. Newcombe, Deputy Minister of Justice, is in reference to that agreement, which it criticizes. Here is Mr. Newcombe's letter:

> According to the narrative of the agreement Mr. Murdoch had previously been acting as agent of the estate for the purpose of having the leases recognized or restored, and it is implied in the arrangement as concluded that Mr. Murdoch shall have the direction of the petition which was then afoot, although in the name of the estate, he assuming all costs and expenses, and to be indemnified out of the proceeds of the property if successful.
> In these circumstances the arrangement under which these proceedings are being carried on offends against the law respecting maintenance and champerty. It is said that transactions of this character are specially discouraged as tending to pervert the due course of justice in civil suits; that no encouragement should be given to litigation by the introduction of parties to enforce those rights which the persons in whom the rights are alleged to exist are not disposed to enforce; and, quoting from Sir Frederick Pollock's 9th edition of Principles of Contract, p. 406—'The modern cases proceed not upon the letter of the statutes or of the definitions given by early writers, but upon the real object and policy of the law, which is to repress that which Knight Bruce, L. J. in Reynell vs. Sprye, 1 D.M.G. at pp. 680 and 686, spoke of as the traffic of merchandising in quarrels, of huckstering in litigious discord, which decent people hardly require legal knowledge to warn them from, and which makes the business and profit of 'breedbates, barretors, or counsel whom no Inn will own, and solicitors estranged from every roll.'

Remarkably enough, the authorities appear to be against the right of a defendant to plead a champertous agreement, illegal and void though it be, as a defence to an action maintained by the Champertor to recover the claim or property for the purposes agreed; but nevertheless it is obvious that the Crown cannot very respectably continue voluntarily to be associated with the project of this action which, as it now transpires, has in view the re-establishment of the leases under the stipulations of a huckstering agreement.

Certainly His Excellency would not have been advised to grant a fiat upon the petition if the facts disclosed by the agreement and Mr. Murdoch's testimony had been before the Department when the petition was considered, and therefore if there be power to revoke the fiat I would think this is a proper case for the exercise of the power. The Petition of Right Act however makes no provision, and so I venture to repeat the suggestion which I made to the Committee that it would be advisable to provide generally for such cases by apt amendment of the Petition of Right Act, and I submit herewith for consideration draft clauses which I have prepared to give effect to this suggestion.

Then follows the draft Bill as suggested by the Deputy Minister of Justice. The last clause of that draft Bill is:

2. Nothing in this Act shall be construed or interpreted as a legislative interpretation, declaration or limitation of the prerogatives of the Crown in dealing with the issue or revocation of any fiat granted upon petition of right.

I was somewhat surprised when the Deputy Minister of Justice made this statement:

Remarkably enough, the authorities appear to be against the right of a defendant to plead a champertous agreement, illegal and void though it be, as a defence to an action maintained by the champertor to recover the claim—etc. I have a case in point, which is reported in the Supreme Court Reports, volume xxxiv, page 24. It is, in fact, a case in which I appeared for one of the parties—the case of Meloche vs. Déguire, wherein the champertous agreement was expressly pleaded, and the plea was maintained by the Supreme Court, the judgment of the lower courts, and especially the judgment of the court of appeal in Quebec, being reversed. The person who had advanced the money for the purpose of the litigation was the husband of one of the parties interested, and therefore a member of the family. So there seems to be no question under our jurisprudence that the plea can be made. However, the Committee has acted on the suggestion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, and has reported the draft Bill as suggested by him.

The report proceeds as follows:

Your Committee was informed by the Minister of Justice that this Bill will be forthwith introduced as a Government measure.

The Deputy Minister of Justice has also suggested, and your Committee concurs in the suggestion, that Bill E2. "An Act to amend The Dominion Lands Act respecting the sale or other disposal of coal lands and coal mining rights," referred to the Committee on the 21st March last, be amended as follows

Then the amendments follow. The Bill would take this form:

(1) Section 37 of the Dominion Lands Act, Chapter 20, 7-8 Edward VII, is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:—

"(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in the Dominion Lands Act, or in any Act amending the same, lands containing coal, and the coal mining rights therein, situate or being within townships 55, 56, 57, 58 and 59, in ranges 7, 8 and 9 west of the sixth Initial Meridian in the Province of Alberta, shall not be sold, leased or otherwise disposed of in whole or in part, or as to any right, title or interest therein, except by the special authority of the Parliament of Canada to be hereafter enacted."

If, as your Committee hopes and strongly urges upon the Government, the fiat granted on October 9th, 1922, is withdrawn, and the above mentioned Petition of Right permanently stayed, the question may arise whether under the special circumstances disclosed by the records of the Department of the Interior, an indemnity should be granted to the Isenberg Estate. In the opinion of your Committee such indemnity, if deemed advisable by the Government to be paid (as to which your Committee expresses no opinion), should be paid to nobody else but the Isenberg Estate, and should not exceed one hundred thousand dollars.

In closing this report your Committee deems it proper to state that in trying to dispose of the leases in question, Mr. William Murdoch has very improperly and unwarrantedly made use of the names of Ministers of the Crown, of Departmental Officials and other persons, as was conclusively established before your Committee.

Several witnesses were examined before your Committee and their evidence is reported herewith.

All which is respectfully submitted.

I move that the report be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Béique, the Senate went into Committee on Bill E2, an Act to amend The Dominion Lands Act respecting the sale or other disposal of coal lands and coal mining rights.

Hon. Mr. Bennett in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, in conformity with the report of the Committee to which was referred Bill E2, now under discussion in Committee of the Whole, I move the following amendment. For clause 1, I move to substitute the following:

(1) Section 37 of the Dominion Lands Act, Chapter 20, 7-8 Edward VII, is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in the Dominion Lands Act, or in any Act amending the same, lands containing coal, and the coal mining rights therein, situate or being within townships 55, 56, 57, 58 and 59, in ranges 7, 8 and 9 west of the sixth Initial Meridian in the Province of Alberta, shall not be sold, leased, or otherwise disposed of in whole or in part, or as to any right, title or interest therein, except by the special authority of the Parliament of Canada to be hereafter enacted."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think I would let the Bill go just as it is. Why amend it at all, in view of the other?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think it is better. We have adopted the report, which contains the suggestion of the Deputy Minister of Justice that we amend the Bill in this form, and our Committee concurred in that suggestion.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was reported as amended.

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

FIRST READING

Bill W4, an Act to amend the Petition of Right Act.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of the Bill.

The motion was ageed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill W4, an Act to amend the Petition of Right Act.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Sections 1 and 2 were agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to, and the Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of the Bill.

He said: Of course I realize that we have proceeded quite rapidly in disposing of this Bill, which will not appear on our Order Paper, yet it has been for a certain number of days in our Minutes, as forming part of the report which came from that Special Committee.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I do not think there will be anyone to object.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 9, 1923.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DISMISSAL OF MAURICE JOBIN

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC inquired of the Government:

1. Has Maurice Jobin been dismissed as Postmaster of Scott Junction, in the County of Beauce?
2. If the affirmative, has an investigation, concerning his behaviour, been held, previous to his dismissal?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

1. Yes.
2. No. Postmaster dismissed on statement of Member of Parliament that to his personal knowledge Postmaster engaged in acts of partisanship.

ADVERTISING IN C. N. R. DINERS

DISCUSSION AND INQUIRY

Hon. F. B. BLACK rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate and the Government to the advertising of a foreign product on the menu card of the Canadian National Railways, and will inquire:

1. Is it the intention to use the menu cards of the Canadian National Railways' diners for advertising purposes?
2. If so, has the advertising privilege been offered to the public generally and particularly to Canadian producers and manufacturers?
3. When and by whom was the order issued to use the menu cards of the Canadian National Railways' diners for advertising raisins during the week April 22nd to 28th?
4. What price or remuneration was received for this advertising?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. The week in question was known and featured as national raisin week during which dishes containing raisins were featured on the special "To-day" slips. This was done by certain other railways and the Canadian National considered it advisable to do the same.
4. Participation was voluntary.

Hon. Mr. BLACK: Honourable gentlemen, If I am in order, I desire to say a few words, regarding the reason why I make the inquiry in this chamber. I am glad to have had the advantage of hearing the answer read before speaking on the subject.

My attention was called to the subject-matter of the question on the Sunday of the week beginning April the 22nd. I was travelling east that morning and in the dining car I noticed a disturbance. One gentleman had just taken his menu card, torn it in two, and thrown it on the floor. I asked the conductor what was the trouble, and he said the gentleman had taken objection to the menu of the dining car being used as an advertising medium. I then picked up the menu card and found on it such statements as this: "This is National Raisin Week. Everyone is being urged to become acquainted with the deliciousness of raisin products as an energy-producing food." The items on the bill of fare were interlined with the advice, "Eat more raisins;" and you were invited to drink raisin coffee, eat raisin porridge, and have for dessert raisin pudding, etc. The porridge with which I was served that morning was spoiled by having raisins mixed in it.

I assumed that perhaps this was the result of a kindly act on the part of the Canadian National Railway or some person connected with it, who desired to give free advertising to a product not grown in Canada, and I supposed it was only for the one occasion; but when I went to lunch I found another menu card which was almost covered with the advertising of this same American product. Every dish in that particular menu that could have raisins in it had raisins mixed up with it. I had to go again to the dining car for dinner, and the very same condition existed. Returning three days later from the East to this city, I found the same condition again. I asked the conductor of the dining car—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Did they charge you extra for the raisin porridge?

Hon. Mr. BLACK: Not that I know of. I asked the conductor of the dining car if this advertising applied only to his particular car or if it was nation-wide, and from whom the authority came. He said that he had received an order dated the 17th of April, which read in part as follows:

> The management is desirous that raisins be featured one week on the menus in all dining cars on the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. Mr. BLACK: I suppose that if the same policy is followed, the next time I go down I shall receive for breakfast pink pills and tanlac mixed up with breakfast food, corn cure and pile remedies for lunch, and something else for dinner. However, what I do want to point out is this, that if the people of Canada are going to be insulted by having advertisements of that kind put for one week on every menu card on the Canadian National Railways, then the Company should get some benefit therefrom.

I have the opinion of advertising publicists in Canada as to the value of advertising of that class given for one week. Do you realize what it is? When you consider the number of dining cars there are in use on the Canadian National Railways for three meals each day, and the number of people who go into each one of those cars for each one of those meals, you will find that this is one of the most intensive advertising schemes that could possibly be devised. Do you know that a page in the Saturday Evening Post, published in the United States and circulated in Canada, is worth, according to its location, from $2,000 to $3,000 for one issue. That advertising on the menu cards of the Canadian National Railways for one week reached more people directly than would be reached by a week's advertising in the Saturday Evening Post. In other words, some official of the Canadian National Railways gave to a product which is not produced in Canada, free advertising worth at least $5,000, and for which, according to the answer given by the honourable gentleman, the people of this country received absolutely nothing.

Hon Mr. BRADBURY: Is the honourable gentleman sure that someone was not paid for that advertising?

Hon. Mr. BLACK: I only know what is contained in the answer that was read. I have no doubt that is the information possessed by the leader of the House. Many inferences may be drawn. But I consider that that kind of thing should be brought to the attention of the public. We are not only spending money day in and day out on this railway of ours, we are not only not getting the transportation facilities which we ought to get, but we are giving away freely an advertising asset which, if it is to be used at all—and I do not think it should—should be given to the producers of Canadian products. If you are going to permit advertising on the railway dining cars in Canada, well and good; but let Canadian producers know that the menu cards are available for advertising. A man who travels represents the interests of the country; therefore our own producers ought to have that opportunity placed before them first. If we are not going to advertise, let us put on the menu cards some forest protection propaganda: "Preserve our forests," "Reforestation," "Prevent fires," and that kind of thing; then we shall get something of national benefit. But to gratuitously insult our travelling public and give an American raisin producer—who, I understand, is the proprietor of Sun-Maid Raisins—free advertising to the extent of $5,000 is another of those things that bring very forcibly to the people of this country the reason why the Canadian National Railways are in debt and do not pay.

I trust, honourable gentlemen, that you will not think this is trivial. May I say further, that I asked this same conductor if he had many complaints about this, and he said: "There has never been anything in the dining car service since I have been on the cars that has been so objectionable to the people coming into the car as these advertisements." I have some information, but I do not care to give the source from which it came. Here are three menus pinned on the ordinary dining car menu handed around, and everyone is covered with these advertisements: "Eat more raisins," and so on. The conductor told me that people had repeatedly taken their menus and torn them up. One said: "I will not buy a meal in this car unless you give me a menu without advertising on it." I saw two instances of this advertising, one going down and one coming up, and that is the reason I have taken the time of the House to lay this matter before it.

The Government is not to blame in this case, but there is some person connected with the Canadian National Railways who, for some reason unknown to most of us, has been gratuitously advertising American products.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Not gratuitously.

Hon. Mr. BLACK: Gratuitously so far as the revenue of the Canadian National Railways is concerned; and if there is such an individual, he should be brought to book.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I hope it is not the intention of the leader of the Government to permit this matter to drop after simply bringing down to the House an answer to the question stating that there was an agreement between the railways that there should be a Raisin week. I hope Parliament will not be considered by the public so credulous as to be led to believe that a substantial sum was not paid to somebody for the use of the menu cards on the Canadian National Railways as an advertising medium for an American product. While we have all agreed to the policy of not interfering in the operation of our national system of railways, yet Parliament has never abdicated its function of making inquiry into administration of this kind. This is the most extraordinary thing that has been done in connection with advertising that I know about, and I say unhesitatingly that it is the duty of the Government to prosecute the fullest inquiry into the matter and to furnish this Chamber with full information as to how it has come about, because I fancy that not a member of this Chamber will believe that it was simply the outcome of a burst of generosity on the part of the management of the railways to advertise an American product in the very extensive way in which it was done.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to the statements that have been made in this Chamber this afternoon, and through him I hope that Sir Henry Thornton's attention will be drawn to the facts, so that we may have a full and satisfactory explanation.

Hon. Mr. L'ESPERANCE: Before this matter drops, I want to call the attention of the leader of the Government to the fact that as a rule Canadian fruits are not placed on the bills of fare on the Canadian National railways. They have bananas, California prunes, figs, and other kinds of American products; but it is very seldom that one can get a good Canadian apple.

FRUIT BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of Bill 11, an Act to Regulate the Sale and Inspection of Fruit and Fruit Containers.

He said: It has been agreed that we should amend one or two of these Bills which contain no clause authorizing the Department to appoint inspectors.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I beg to move that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by adding, as clause 27:

27. There may be appointed from time to time, in accordance with the Civil Service Act of 1918, and any amendments thereunder, such inspectors as are necessary for the purposes of this Act.

The proposed amendment was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was read the third time, and passed.

LIVE STOCK BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of Bill 10, an Act to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting Live Stock.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I beg to move that this Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by striking out the words "by the Minister" in subsection b of section 2, and by adding the following after section 9:

9A. There may be appointed from time to time by the Civil Service Commission, with the approval of the Governor in Council, such inspectors as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this Act.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I do not rise for the purpose of raising any objection to this amendment, but the proceeding seems peculiar to me. The principle in legislation is that it shall proceed gradually, and from stage to stage, with due notice being given so that no person may be taken by surprise. As has been shown to-day in the amendment that we are now proposing to pass, and to which I have no objection, all these safeguards are taken away. You go through all the forms of legislation, by resolution if that be necessary, on to your second reading, then to a third reading, by proper stages, and no person is taken by surprise. All that has been done, and the proposed legislation has come to the point where the House has agreed upon it, and it stands for its third reading. Then, without any notice at all, no matter who may be interested in it and may be absent from the sitting, a Senator may move any kind of amendment to the Bill, whether the House be full or not. The present amendments are, of course, matters which we agree upon, but there might be amendments which would strike at the very foundation of the Act. It seems to me that if that is the practice in the Senate it gets away from a very healthy method of procedure in making legislation really the outcome of deliberate and well-noticed conferences with reference to the subject-matter. I have been informed that that has been the custom in this House, but it is not the custom in the lower House.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think that the rule of this House is that, as regards private Bills, a notice must be given of any amendment to be made on the third reading, but no such notice is required for amendments to public Bills; so that if there is objection to that method the proper course would be to amend the rules of the Senate. As the honourable gentleman properly stated, in this case it was understood when the Bill was in Committee that these amendments would be brought in at the third reading.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: But it is difficult to understand, is it not, if you make a rule applicable to private Bills, that notice must be given, why you should be allowed to put through public Bills, which are, or may be, infinitely more important, without giving the notice? It strikes me as being an odd method of procedure.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My right honourable friend must remember that, if an amendment is proposed on the third reading, it is quite open to any member to ask that the Bill stand over.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: But suppose the party interested, and who has had no notice of it coming up, is not there to do it?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is why the notice is required in the case of private Bills; but, in dealing with a public Bill, any member of the House may ask for further information, or that the Bill stand over for one day or two so that the House may be given explanation; so that I should think the rule is quite all right. I do not think it leads to any misconception, because it is always in the power of any member to ask that the third reading be postponed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say for the information of honourable gentlemen who were not in their places yesterday when these Bills were being discussed, that it was arranged that the Government would amend these Bills to-day on their third reading, and they have done so.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, as amended, and passed.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG BILL

THIRD READING

Bill 72, an Act to Prohibit the Improper Use of Opium and Other Drugs, as amended.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

COPYRIGHT BILL

SECOND READING POSTPONED

On the order:

Second Reading Bill 24, an Act to amend The Copyright Act.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would ask that this stand until Monday. At the same time I desire to place on the Table a memorandum regarding the status of Canada and other countries on the matter of copyright. As many honourable gentleman have asked me for the advantage of seeing that statement, which has been prepared by the Department, I think it would be opportune that it be given to Hansard. I have therefore asked Hon. Mr. Belcourt to take charge of this Bill, and I would request him to kindly read the memorandum.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it is to appear in Hansard, we will take it as read.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We have generally maintained a different procedure.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The memorandum is as follows:

THE COPYRIGHT QUESTION

The assertion, either direct or implied, that the Copyright question is so involved and complicated as to be practically incomprehensible to any person who has not made an exhaustive study of it, has so frequently been made that it is generally accepted as axiomatic.

A careful perusal and consideration of the following observations will convince any fair-minded person of ordinary intelligence and education that the issue raised by Bill 24 is clear-cut and definite, and not difficult to understand.

Copyright legislation is undoubtedly complicated owing to the many conflicting interests involved, and owing further to the fact that a statute of the Dominion of Canada dealing with copyright protection not only provides directly for rights throughout the Dominion of Canada but also for obtaining Imperial rights extending throughout the rest of the Empire, and International rights—the latter being twofold, those extending throughout the countries belonging to the International Copyright Union, and those extending to each of the several countries outside the Union.

Four fundamental principles may be laid down as follows:

1. Copyright legislation passed by the Parliament of Canada must afford satisfactory protection to the author throughout the Dominion, and also enable him to obtain Copyright protection outside Canada.

2. The author obtains Copyright protection throughout the Empire under the provisions of the Imperial Copyright Act 1911.

3. The author obtains Copyright protection throughout the countries belonging to the Copyright Union under the articles of the Revised Convention of Berne, upon the adherence of the Dominion of Canada to that Convention.

4. The author obtains Copyright protection in the United States of America, the only important country outside the Copyright Union, under the provisions of the Copyright Act of the United States.

The Copyright protection afforded by the Copyright Act 1921 covers every form of reproduction at present known, with the possible exception of broadcasting by Radio, and it is possible that even this is covered.

The Imperial Copyright Act provides that in order that the Canadian author may obtain copyright protection throughout the Empire, the British author shall enjoy within the Dominion of Canada rights substantially identical with those conferred by the Imperial Act. This is evidenced by the publication of the Secretary of State, in the London Gazette, of a notice to that effect.

The British Government, which is in control of the situation, after an exhaustive examination of the Copyright Act 1921 has intimated by despatch dated 13th October, 1921, that unless certain sections of the Act making provision for the issue of compulsory licenses, as will be more fully explained, are modified, it will not be possible to apply the whole Act unconditionally to Canada.

The Berne Convention is an International Treaty, entered into by most of the civilized nations of the world, under the terms of which an author belonging to a signatory country obtains copyright protection in all the countries adhering to the Convention. The essential article of the Convention at present to be considered is numbered 4, and provides that the enjoyment and exercise of the rights granted shall not be subject to the performance of any formality.

Articles 21 and 22 of the Convention provide for the International Office of the Union, which is placed under the high authority of the Government of the Swiss confederation, and publishes a monthly organ in the French language. The number of this publication dated the 15th of July, 1921, contains an editorial covering eight pages, dealing exhaustively with the Canadian Copyright Act 1921, and definitely expressing the opinion that the licensing sections of the Canadian Act are not in harmony with the said article 4.

The adherence of Canada to the Revised Berne Convention must be signified to the Government of the Swiss confederation through the British foreign office, and the British Government in the despatch above referred to has further intimated that the licensing provisions of the Canadian Copyright Act of 1921, are contrary to article 4, of the Convention.

The Copyright Act of the United States provides that the Copyright secured by it shall extend to the work of an author or proprietor who is a citizen or subject of a foreign state or nation, and not domiciled within the United States, when the foreign state or nation of which such author or proprietor is a citizen or subject grants to citizens of the United States the benefit of, (1) Copyright on substantially the same basis as its own citizens or (2) Copyright protection substantially equal to the protection secured to such foreign author under the United States Copyright Act.

The existence of the reciprocal conditions aforesaid shall be determined by the President of the United States by proclamation made from time to time as the purposes of the Act may require. In order to comply with the foregoing requirements, it will be necessary to enter into negotiations with the United States, and make an arrangement by which the Minister of Trade and Commerce will publish in the Canada Gazette, under the provisions of sub-section 2, of section 4, of the Copyright Act 1921, a notice certifying that for the purposes of the rights conferred by the said Act, the United States is to be treated as if it were a country to which the said Act extends. This ministerial notice and the presidential proclamation shall both become operative as on the day on which the Copyright Act 1921, comes into force.

It is hoped that the negotiations referred to may be satisfactorily concluded before the 1st of July next, but to provide against any unforeseen delay, a further amendment to Bill 24, will provide in case of necessity for fixing by Order in Council a later date on which the Act shall come into force.

The issue between the authors and publishers is as follows, The authors contend that Copyright should be entirely free of all formalities and conditions, the author being at liberty to have his book printed in any country he may select,, and to determine the format, type, paper and binding of his book. This contention as shown above is accepted both by the British authorities and by the authorities of the Berne Convention. The publishers on the other hand contend that it is reasonable to impose upon the author the condition that if after having obtained Copyright he does not desire to have his book printed in Canada, and refuses to grant to a Canadian publisher a license to print and publish an edition of the book for circulation in Canada, the Canadian publisher may obtain from the Government a license to print and publish such an edition of the book, paying the author an adequate royalty. This is briefly the substance of the licensing sections of the Copyright Act 1921, which Bill 24, as originally introduced, repealed.

It has been found quite impossible to get the authors and publishers to agree, consequently Copyright legislation has always been a matter of compromise with an attempt to get the parties as near to an agreement as possible. Bill 24, as amended by the House of Commons, while it removes objections both of the British and International authorities, still affords the publishers the protection of the licensing sections of the Act both as against the resident Canadian author and the author of the United States.

It is not thought that the consideraion further of the question by a Special Committee would alter the position as between the authors and publishers.

In conclusion it is strongly urged that it is more in accordance with the dignity of the Dominion of Canada to fulfil her moral obligations as to Copyright legislation and adherence to the Berne Convention, and that Copyright in Canada should be governed and regulated by a satisfactory up-to-date Copyright Act rather than by an obsolete statute passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom in the year 1842.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the order was discharged and placed on the Order Paper for Monday next.

RADIOTELEGRAPH BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 144, an Act to amend the Radiotelegraph Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this is an amendment to the Radiotelegraph Act, Chapter 43 of the Statutes of 1913, and provides that the Governor in Council may authorize the payment of a portion of the license fee to a Provincial Government, a private company, or other parties for services rendered. I have an extensive memorandum on the question, and some inquiries may be made. I would suggest that we pass the second reading and thresh out the whole matter in Committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

HIGHWAYS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 151, an Act to extend the period of the Canada Highways Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the Canada Highways Act appropriated $20,000,000 to be expended within the period of five years ending April 1st, 1924. All the provinces have prepared and have had approved the general plan required by the Regulations. All the provinces are now working under the Canada Highways Act with the exception of Alberta. The sum of $15,123,529.18 has been covered by agreement; $13,422,731.89 has been earned, and of this $9,788,404.98 has been paid. The balance to be placed under agreement is $4,876,470.82, comprised as follows:

Alberta—$1,477,810. It is expected that some of this will be earned this year.

Manitoba,—$792,134.46, available when the reduction of estimates is approved by Order in Council. The Province has written that they are forwarding project statements at an early date for this amount.

Nova Scotia,—$49,293.84, all applied for.

Ontario,—$507,547.58, all applied for.

Prince Edward Island,—$254,644.73. About half of this will be earned this year. Projects on which the Federal aid amounts to $125,-996.90 are under consideration now.

Saskatchewan,—$539,994.12. About half of this will be required to cover this year's work.

Quebec,—$1,885,554.41. Project statements on which Federal aid amounts to $755,699.64 of this amount are now under consideration. It is expected that the balance will be covered by agreements this year.

New Brunswick,—Amount all placed under agreement.

British Columbia,—Amount all placed under agreement.

Much of the work now under agreement in several of the Provinces will not be completed prior to April 1st, 1924, and it is estimated that the amount of the Federal appropriation which will not be used prior to the expiration of the term, April 1st, 1924, is as follows:

Alberta	$1,200,000
Manitoba	500,000
P. E. Island	125,000
Saskatchewan	700,000
Quebec	800,000
Nova Scotia	Nil
British Columbia	Nil
Ontario	Nil
New Brunswick	Nil
	$3,325,000

The amounts to which each Province is entitled is:

Alberta	$1,477,810
British Columbia	1,251,955
Manitoba	1,602,265
Nova Scotia	1,468,720
New Brunswick	1,163,845
Ontario	5,877,275
P. E. Island	603,455
Quebec	4,748,420
Saskatchewan	1,806,255

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS (EXPRESS) BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 152, an Act respecting the Canadian National Railways.

He said: Section 1 of this Bill authorizes the Canadian National Railway Company, which is now operating the Canadian National Express Company, to do an express business and to handle express money orders or other methods of transmitting or handling money securities or other articles of value. It also provides the same form of liability as the Board of Railway Commissioners exacts with respect to similar traffic handled by express companies.

On September 1, 1921, the old Canadian Northern Express Company, which by Order in Council No. 1989, dated October 18, 1919, became the Canadian National Express Company, was amalgamated with the Canadian Express Company, and since that time they have been operated as one.

It is as to this consolidated company that the annual statement refers. The agreement merging the two companies provided that the surplus earnings, if any, should be pro-rated in the same proportion as the gross earnings for each company for the year ending June 30, 1921. Under this arrangement, 70 per cent of the profits go to the Grand Trunk Railway, and 30 per cent to the Canadian Northern. Deficits if any, will be pro-rated on the same basis. As you will see, the Company has been making a little money.

There are approximately 2,850 employees.

I will lay on the Table of the House:

1. Memorandum as to the Canadian Express Company;

2. Memorandum as to the Canadian National Express Company;

3. Agreement providing for the combination of both companies;

4. Comparative statement of revenues and expenses for last two years.

If honourable gentlemen are interested in these figures they may have them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask my honourable friend, what is the reason for apportioning the revenue between two companies which are now combined in one?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I shall be in a better position to answer my honourable friend in Committee. I have not yet a full memorandum on this point.

Hon. Mr. REID: Honourable gentlemen, perhaps the House would give me a few minutes to make some remarks on this Bill, as I can make them now just as well as at some other time, and I may not be present when the matter comes up again.

This Bill opens up a new era for a part of the Canadian National Railway System, and in this respect it may do no harm to give my personal opinion for what it is worth. In the first place, this Bill puts the express business under the Board of Railway Commissioners. The Intercolonial Railway is now under the Railway Commission. It was never under the Commission until a short time ago, when the Canadian National Railways were brought into existence by Order in Council. Formerly, before the Grand Trunk was taken over and while the railways were being operated by the Government, rates of any kind on the Intercolonial were subject to adjustment by the Department of Railways and Canals, though the Minister of Railways and Canals did refer to the Board of Railway Commissioners to get their opinion as to what the rates should be. Now they are all subject to approval of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

The point I wish to raise with regard to freight rates, and, I must say, other rates as well, is this. The Board of Railway Commissioners must carry on their work under the laws passed by Parliament, and Parliament has not given them any special instructions to treat the Intercolonial Railway or the Canadian Government Railways differently from any other part of the railway systems of Canada. So far as that part of the Intercolonial between Sydney and Montreal is concerned, an agreement was made at the time of Confederation to build that railway to connect the lower provinces with the West, and it was understood that it was not built for the purpose of making any money—in other words, that transportation would be provided at exactly the cost of operation.

Some honourable gentlemen may say, "But that was not put into the British North America Act." That is correct, but I think it has been admitted by both political parties, in all the discussions that have taken place from time to time in either branch of Parliament, that that was the agreement reached at the time of Confederation, and, in my judgment, according to the statements that have been submitted to Parliament from time to time, that agreement has been carried out. In other words, no money has been made out of the Intercolonial Railway. The people in the Eastern provinces have had their transportation at the actual cost of operation, or perhaps a little less. There have been grievances in the lower provinces, but they have been caused, in my judgment, more by the manner in which the rates have been adjusted by the officials than on account of extra charges for the purpose of making the Intercolonial Railway pay.

Now that all these matters are being brought under the Board of Railway Commissioners, I believe it is the duty of the Government to notify that Board that in making rates from the Eastern provinces to the West, and vice versa, the Commissioners should base the rates on the actual cost of operation, so far as the Intercolonial is concerned. That road was paid for long ago out of the revenues of the country. There are no bonds or interest charges payable on the Intercolonial Railway System. Unless the Government or Parliament gives some direction of that kind to the Board of Railway Commissioners I cannot see how they can do otherwise than put the rates on the same basis as those in other parts of the country. In the agreement made with the Canadian Northern and passed through Parliament many years ago there was a clause providing that all traffic orginating on the Canadian Northern system should go to St. John, Halifax, or some other Canadian port. In fixing the rates on the Canadian Northern, Montreal was made the starting point, and the rate between Montreal and Portland was to apply to traffic between Montreal and St. John or Halifax. True, there is a much longer haul from Montreal to St. John and Halifax than to Portland; but, as I understand, the rates allowed would pay the cost of carrying the traffic over the Intercolonial. If we do not carry out the arrangement made at Confederation, of course the rates on the Intercolonial section may be higher than they were prior to the arrangement that was made.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask my honourable friend what he means with regard to the arrangement that was made?

Hon. Mr. REID: I stated that a moment ago. I thought I made my meaning plain; but I will repeat. Ever since Confederation it has been understood by Parliament that an agreement was made between the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island on the one hand and Ontario and Quebec on the other, that the Intercolonial Railway would be built and operated without profit.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What is my honourable friend's authority for that statement?

Hon. Mr. REID: My authority is the discussions that have taken place in Parliament, and the fact that neither party has ever disputed that arrangement.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend is speaking of legend now.

Hon. Mr. POPE: No, he is speaking of the facts.

Hon. Mr. REID: I am speaking of what I take to be a fact. In other words, if both parties in the House of Commons and in the Senate unanimously agree that there was such an understanding—and their words appear in the Hansards of both Houses—I take it for granted that the Parliament of Canada will carry out the understanding.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Can the understanding be found anywhere?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Yes. It appears in the Confederation discussions.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is the legend, of course.

Hon. Mr. REID: I have heard the discussion myself during my 30 or 33 years in Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I believe we have all heard it; but I have never been able to find any authority for it.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It appeared in the Confederation discussions.

Hon. Mr. REID: As I have stated, even though the agreement does not appear in the Act of Confederation, the fact that Parliament has agreed to the understanding every year is evidence that it must have been part of the original agreement. Therefore I say there should not be any difficulty at all in operating the Intercolonial Railway or the whole Canadian National System in such a way that each part of the system shows the operating charges. I do not, of course, wish to suggest how to operate the railway; but I am asking that the Government, in view of the discussion which has taken place in Parliament, should be authorized to say to the Board of Railway Commissioners: "In making your rates, stand by the agreement made at Confederation"—If that is done, the good feeling which has existed between the East and the West for so many years will continue.

The advantage of that to the western uart of Canada, and I may say to the eastern part too, is apparent. I will give you one or two examples. At certain times, in Ontario and Quebec, we have been troubled with the fuel problem: we are dependent on fuel from the United States, or from the East or the West. If we could get coal from Nova Scotia, we would not be in such a serious position as we are in to-day. I have heard it said by people who have used it that the coal produced at Sydney or Stellarton or Springhill, for instance, is among the best that are produced in any part of the world. The price of such coal is around $5 per ton at the mine. The freight rate used to be 9½ cents per 100 pounds, or $1.90 per ton. Of course, the rate has been advanced since before the war, because the cost of operation, so far as labour and supplies are concerned, has gone up. But what are the rates on coal to-day? The rate from Springhill or Stellarton is $3.90 per ton. With the price of $5 per ton at the mine, and a freight rate of $3.90, we would have been able during the last winter to lay down coal in Montreal for about $9 per ton. That would be a great benefit to the people, and it would be of benefit to the Intercolonial Railway to have that traffic. But if the rate fixed by the Railway Commission is to be based on rates paid on coal on other parts of the system, and on the C.P.R., it would of course be higher.

My object in taking part in this discussion is to point out that in fixing rates the Railway Commission should have in view the discussions which have taken place in Parliament, and that the Government should advise them to act in accordance with the understanding or agreement that I have mentioned. We should keep faith, and should observe any agreement made with any province when it became a part of the Confederation. In doing so we would not be doing an injustice to any other part of Canada, because it was never expected that any money would be made out of the Intercolonial Railway. In my judgment, if we start out now with a view to making the Intercolonial Railway pay not only the operating charges but the fixed charges, such action will cause ill-feeling and trouble, and, in addition, will prevent interprovincial traffic between the lower provinces and the western provinces.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Were there in Nova Scotia any railway lines other than the Intercolonial?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No.

Hon. Mr. REID: I will come to that. There was one owned by the Canadian Northern Railway, which is now a part of the Canadian National System.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: If freight rates are based on the mere cost of operation, there never can be any other railway in that province. By the adoption of such a scale of freight rates that province precludes itself from further railway development.

Hon. Mr. REID: There have been some changes in the railway situation in the lower provinces since Confederation. At one time the Intercolonial was the only road in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island; but since then the Canadian Pacific Railway has gone in. It has to-day what was formerly the Dominion Atlantic Railway. The Railway Commission, without authority from anyone, should fix the rates on a basis that would be fair and just to the C.P.R., if they are going to include fixed charges. If they do that and put them on an equal basis—

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: How can you fix rates on both railways at the same figure if the basis of computation is entirely different?

Hon. Mr. REID: Of course, you cannot: that is exactly the point. The arrangement made at Confederation was that the rates charged would be based on the cost of operation. Now it is up to the Government and Parliament to say: "Because the Canadian Pacific Railway has its line between Montreal and St. John, we are going to fix the rates on a basis that will pay the fixed charges on the C.P.R." The point I want to make is this: we should fix the rates on the Intercolonial Railway on the basis of cost; then in my judgment, the Canadian Pacific Railway will fall into line and will accept the same rates.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: In talking about the cost of the Intercolonial, and later on arranging the rates on that line, do you mean to take into account the deficits that have accumulated on that road?

Hon. Mr. REID: I am not taking into consideration at all what the road actually cost. I say that what should be taken into consideration is the cost of operation of the Intercolonial Railway—the cost of equipment, keeping up the roadbed, and so on—and then put the freight rates, passenger rates, and express rates on such a basis that at the end of the year there would be no deficit on the cost of operation.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Would that be fair to the C.P.R., for instance, which has to pay fixed charges?

Hon. Mr. THORNE: The C. P. R. is in another district.

Hon. Mr. REID: Part of the Canadian Pacific Railway goes through Maine. The Intercolonial Railway was constructed on the understanding that certain rates would be charged, and if any private corporation goes into any part of those provinces it should be on the understanding that its rates are to be based on the cost of operation on the Government railway.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: No railway will ever go in on those terms.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: So well was it understood that rates would be established which would enable traffic to come to the upper provinces when it was thrown out of its natural channels, that those rates and differentials and arbitraries were maintained in the face of deficits, which were paid out of ordinary revenue.

Hon. Mr. REID: If we can maintain the rates on the basis agreed upon since Confederation, a great deal more traffic will be directed to Halifax, St. John, and Sydney; more traffic will be handled on the Intercolonial Railway, which will decrease the cost of operation, and may enable the Railway Commission to give even lower rates, and will, at all events, keep the traffic in our own country.

In connection with that traffic I would refer to the great advantage to all the provinces from freight being carried between Sydney and Montreal and some Ontario ports by fuel vessels whose rates do not exceed a dollar per ton, and I would urge the Government not to allow those vessels to be taken off that route. Only a few of them would be required to bring coal in summer from Sydney to western ports. Before the war there was a fleet of vessels chartered which made profitable trips in carrying coal between Sydney and western ports; I believe they were Norwegian boats.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I rise to a point of order. I was out when this discussion started, but I was informed that the debate was on Bill 152.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: He is talking good stuff, though.

Hon. Mr. REID: Perhaps the honourable gentleman does not wish to hear about the vessels, and their advantage in helping traffic between the provinces; so I will confine myself to the railway question.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Bill 152, as far as I understand, refers to express traffic.

Hon. Mr. REID: Express is part of railway traffic.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Coal does not generally go by express.

Hon. Mr. REID: As the honourable gentleman objects, I can bring in the question of the vessels on another motion which is on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I desire to say a few words in reference to the proposed drastic changes in the method of operating the express business on the lines of railway owned by the people of Canada. I may be pardoned for assuming to have a definite opinion on this subject, because for many years I was in a position in which I handled both express and freight business on four railways. In my opinion it is absolutely impracticable for a railway company to operate express business, and if attempted it will be unsuccessful. There is to-day not a single railroad in the United States attempting to handle express business. There used to be a number of express companies in the United States—the American, the Wells-Fargo, the Adams, the United States, and several smaller ones; but in late years these have all been merged into a great organization called the American Railway Express Company, and the United States railway companies make contracts with this company on a percentage, based in most cases on the earnings.

The Canadian Pacific Railway management found it absolutely impracticable to operate express business as part of their railway system, that business being highly specialized, and dealing with customers who are largely different from those interested in freight. The Canadian Pacific Railway has never even dreamed of consolidating its express business with its railway operation, notwithstanding that it owns the Dominion Express Company.

I have had some experience and knowledge of these matters as a railway employee for many years, and in my opinion it will be absolutely ruinous to have the express business on the Canadian National System run by the Railway Management; and express people to-day are laughing at what the results are going to be. I think it would be one of the greatest mistakes that could possibly be made my this Parliament, to approve of any such move as is now contemplated—the handing over of the express business to the operation of the Canadian National Railways.

The honourable leader of the Government has outlined in a memorandum the information that there are over 2,000 employees engaged in the various branches of the express business now handled by the Canadian National Express Company. He did not for one moment intimate, nor does he expect, that there will be any decrease in the number of employees required, because those men who are trained to handle express business are entirely separate and apart and engaged in a different line of business from those who handle and solicit passengers and freight. It is also to be noted that the Canadian National Railway, as such, owns the Great North-western Telegraph Company, now known as the Canadian National Telegraph Company, which is a consolidation of the Canadian Northern and Great Northwestern Telegraph Companies. It has not been suggested yet that the telegraph companies should be operated by the railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway owns its telegraphs, but operates them under a separate management, because it is a distinct and separate line of business, requiring experts who have been trained for many years in order to secure intelligent and economical administration. If the Canadian National Railways, as a railway system, undertake to operate the telegraphs and the express business, they will make a failure of both. I am satisfied that this House would make a very serious mistake in endorsing the principle of this Bill, as far as I am concerned, I am absolutely opposed to it, for the reasons outlined.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is rather difficult for some of us to reconcile the views of some gentlemen who speak on these subjects. I do not know any stronger or more persistent advocate of government and municipal operation than my honourable friend who has just spoken. He wants the railways administered and operated by the Government, but he does not want the things which are being administered by all the railways along with the railways themselves, such as telegraph and express business, to be administered by the Government at all, because he says that is impossible. I would like to see a little bit of logic.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My honourable friend is stating what I think he has no right to state. I hold still that there is no obstacle to successful operation of the express business and the telegraph business and the railway business simply because the Government happens to own these services. But I say that the railroad management is not qualified to handle express business or telegraph business, and that the organizations that have been built up both in Canada and the United States regard it as essential to the success of telegraph and express business that they shall be operated under separate identity, and separate skilled management. The proposed experiment has no precedent in North America, and will, in my opinion, result in failure.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not understand the Bill to mean that at all. I understand that the express business on the National Railways is to be managed by the present Board of Directors.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If my honourable friend will read the Bill, he will see that the express company ceases to exist, and that the National Railways will handle the express business.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is exactly the same thing. The Board of Directors of the National Railways is going to administer one of the incidents of railway operation, that is, the express business. That is what the Bill provides for.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The Bill does not say that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend is determined that the business of passengers and freight on the railways must be handled by the Government, but he objects to the telegraph and express business being handled by the same people.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My honourable friend states exactly the opposite of the fact.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If I understood my honourable friend, he objects to this Board of Directors managing the telegraph or express business.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: As a part of the railway business, yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: How does that fit in with my honourable friend's theory that all these things are better administered by Government operation?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It fits in exactly.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I cannot see it.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I would ask my honourable friend how he would propose having the express business operated.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I would respectfully suggest that the express business on the National Railways should continue to be handled by a separate and distinct management, as has been the case since the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern existed. Mr. Pullen was the General Manager of the old Canadian Express Company, and Mr. Muir of the Canadian Northern Express Company at Winnipeg. Those were merged in recent years, but the express company should continue to be handled, as in the past, by officers especially charged and trained, who will be responsible for the express business. The business should not be submerged by turning it over to railway officials whose training has been in freight and passenger lines and who have only a secondary interest in express business, so long as there is a competing company who are awake day and night getting it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does this Bill provide that Mr. Pullen and other gentlemen who managed those express companies in the past are not going to manage the express business under the present Board of Directors?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It is not stated that they will.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It simply becomes a department of administration for this Board.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I would like to ask for information. I have always understood that the Dominion Express is owned and operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It is.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Whether they have a different set of officers to operate it or not I do not know. If that is the case, and we believe that it has been done very successfully, what objection is there to the Canadian National Railway having an express business under the same conditions? I do not quite see the point that my honourable friend is trying to make.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: In the course of this discussion one important party has not been mentioned, and that is the public. The express companies have charged extortionate rates, and they do so now, and I understand that there is an opportunity for the Government to take the matter in hand on behalf of the people and restore reasonable rates. It may be very desirable for those who favour express companies to show a continuous traffic management under the same or similar control but, in view of the abuse which has been occasioned by these companies, the unfair use that has been made of their privileges on the railways to charge the public extortionate rates, I think the time has arrived for some remedy now to be applied by the Government to restore some degree of parity between the rates charged and the wishes and needs of the people of the country.

I heard the ex-Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Reid) a short time ago express the opinion that the Canadian Pacific Railway would come into competition with the Intercolonial Railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway runs what was formerly called the Dominion Atlantic Railway, extending from Yarmouth to Halifax, but it does not run in the same direction as the Intercolonial, neither does it go outside of the province of Nova Scotia. The Canadian Pacific has no connection with Nova Scotia and Cape Breton further east than St. John, N.B., but it has running rights over the railway from St. John to Moncton and from there on to Halifax. The Canadian Pacific has no road that parallels the Intercolonial, which is the only road running through from the extreme east of Cape Breton, and connecting at Montreal with the West.

In reference to the coal-producing business, I might mention that there are many mines on the line of the Intercolonial Railway in Cumberland county, farther west than Springhill, which was mentioned by the ex-Minister, where there is any amount of coal that would be valuable for transport to Quebec, and to Ontario if necessary. It is on the line of railway, and could be carried at a low rate by rail. I might add that the benefits of the Intercolonial Railway are enjoyed not only by the eastern provinces, but even to a great extent by Ontario and Quebec, for there is more down-traffic than up-traffic, I believe, and a great portion of the trade of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and also Cape Breton, is done by Toronto and Montreal.

Hon. Mr. TURGEON: My object in rising a few moments ago was simply to express my appreciation of the statements made by the honourable member for Grenville (Hon.

Mr. Reid) in calling the attention of the Parliament of Canada to the fact that the Intercolonial Railway was built with the object of guaranteeing to the people of the Maritime provinces that their products would reach the Canadian markets instead of going to American markets, as had inevitably been the case before Confederation; and that those provinces would have the development of the whole of Canada for their future market. I would like to add that the different railways that are being operated by the Government of Canada are not being run for private gain, as is the case with enterprises of individuals. Government operation is done at cost, and anything that can be given in the way of service to the public is given at mere cost. That this service can be maintained only by the action of the Government is an evidence of the understanding between the Maritime Provinces and the whole of Canada.

Let it be remembered also that in 1903, when the Parliament of Canada created a Railway Commission to control rates on Canadian Railways, the Intercolonial Railway was exempted from control by the Railway Commission and the adjustment of rates and transportation matters on that railway was left to the discretion and judgment of the Minister of Railways and Canals. If it had been the desire of the Government or of Parliament at that time, the Intercolonial Railway also would have been placed under the control of the Railway Commission.

Yesterday it was my privilege to call the attention of this honourable House to the interests of the Maritime Provinces as affecting the general interests of Canada. I expressed amazement at the fact that the present railway management had made the Atlantic Division to comprise only a part of what I claim to be the original Government Railways, in making the terminus at Riviere du Loup instead of Levis or Quebec, the original Intercolonial Railway terminus. One of the reasons why I appeal again to-day to the Directors of the National Railways is the fact that this division cannot possibly remain permanent, because it takes away a portion of the Intercolonial Railway, which belongs to the Maritime Provinces and the Government of Canada. While I am ambitious to see the Canadian National Railways a perfect system, and one which will not continue to be a drag upon the people of Canada, I have also considered the opinion existing in many minds, particularly among the commercial people of the great cities of Canada that we may never make a success of national operation, and those railroads which have been joined together under the Canadian National Railway System may possibly in the future be detached. Perhaps the Grand Trunk may be handed over to some company, and in the course of years the Canadian Northern may be returned to its original owners. I say that is a possibility; but the Intercolonial Railway can never be sold, because it is the possession of the Maritime Provinces and the rest of the Canadian people. Therefore, although in the future there may be a return of some of the railroads now comprised in the Canadian National system, the Intercolonial must always remain the property of the Government of Canada and be operated by the Government in fulfilment of the promises and agreements made by the Fathers of Confederation to provide a service, which should be not for gain, but for the general advantage of the provinces.

With regard to the point raised by the honourable the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon Mr. Robertson), having had my attention called to it before I do not see that there would be, after all, any difficulty about the Canadian National Railways operating an express business as well as freight and passenger traffic. As we know, the Canadian Pacific Railway controls and operates an express business under the name of the Dominion Express Company. It should be just as easy for the directors of the Canadian National Railways to operate an express business as it is feasible and perhaps lucrative for the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway to do so on their lines. I believe that the Bill will pass.

Hon. GEORGE GORDON: Honourable gentlemen, we have had in Canada two express companies—the Canadian Express, owned and controlled by the Grand Trunk, and the Dominion Express, owned and controlled by the C. P. R. Both these companies have been successful and have made money. But now that the Canadian National Railways wish to own and control an express company, they are opposed. I cannot for the life of me understand why this is so. We have at the head of that immense institution of the National Railways an executive, and, if they are at all capable of doing their work, they can surely manage properly an express company. I cannot see any reason why this Bill should be opposed at all, particularly by those who were responsible for the taking over of the railways by the Government. For my part, I only wish that the leaves could be turned back, and that instead of having to acquire the railways we had only to acquire the express companies.

Hon. E. D. SMITH: Honourable gentlemen, I quite agree with what the honourable member for Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson) has said, that the management of the express companies in the past has been excellent and that to change the method of conducting express business would be undesirable. I do not see that this Bill is necessary. I would like to ask the honourable leader of the Government what is proposed. Is it intended that the express business shall be conducted in a manner different from the past, or is it intended only to place the express business under the same Board of Directors as the Canadian National Railways, allowing it to be conducted as it has been? I do not think there is any intention to change the method, and I cannot see any need for the Bill, because when the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk were taken over, the express companies were bought with them and now belong to the National Railways. Is it proposed to change the method of management of the express company? I understood the honourable gentleman from Welland to say that the management of the express companies in the United States under one executive was efficient, but my experience of express companies there is that the management, although it is separate from that of the railways is absolutely abominable. It is not much better than our freight. I have had a good deal of experience with express companies in the United States, and by none of them can you get express goods moved any faster than by a fast freight in this country. However, I want to say that the Dominion Express and the Canadian Express in the past have been very well managed. The conduct of the express business has been excellent, and I hope there will be no change in it when the express company becomes part and parcel of the National System.

Mention has been made in this debate, and quite properly, of the question of what should be the rates in the Maritime Provinces. Honourable members from the Maritime Provinces claim that since Confederation it has been conceded and agreed by the people of this Dominion that the rates on the Intercolonial shall not exceed cost. It was stated in a previous debate by the honourable gentleman who introduced the subject that there should be a differential. Differential and cost are two different things. If the rates are to be at cost, then they will certainly be no lower than they are at present; and this applies to express as well as freight. The express business is a part of the business of the railways. I cannot see how the rates can be fixed at cost for those railways in the Maritime Provinces that are owned by the Government, while the C.P.R. is allowed to charge what it may consider fair. If the Canadian Pacific is to be placed upon the same basis as the Canadian National, and goods are to be carried in the Maritime Provinces at cost, that will be different from anything that has been done hitherto. In the rulings by the Railway Commissioners the cost of operation by the Canadian Pacific has been taken as the basis, but in this case, if goods are to be carried at cost on the Intercolonial, I do not see how the Commissioners could take any other basis than that of the Intercolonial, and therefore the C.P.R. also would have to carry goods there at cost. That would be a fine thing. But what seems to me as most important and essential is to establish that a bargain has been made. That has not been established yet to my satisfaction; but if it can be established, then I say it is our duty to carry out the bargain, so long as the rates do not go below cost of operation. If the rates have been as it has been claimed they should be only as high as cost, I do not know what may occur in the future in this respect, but we certainly have lost nothing up to the present time.

Hon. P. C. MURPHY: Honourable gentlemen, it is probably not in order to discuss ordinary freight rates in connection with this Bill to amalgamate the express company with the Canadian National Railways. There is no question at all that, although the concession regarding freight rates was not written in the bond, in the discussions that brought about Confederation it was not only implied, but absolutely stated, as an inducement to bring in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Prince Edward Island came in later. It was understood that, on account of the Maritime Provinces losing the business which went to the New England States, the Intercolonial Railway would be built and such rates put into effect as would enable our products to be transported to the upper provinces. That implied and stated agreement was carried out for forty years. As is well known by every honourable member of this House, the Railway Commission had no authority over the rates on the Intercolonial until two or three years ago, when an Order in Council placed the Intercolonial under the Commission. For years the rates were maintained, not at cost at all, but at a loss. As members of the House of Commons knew full well—and among them the honourable gentleman from Wentworth (Hon. Mr. Smith)—there were deficits year after year, and these were paid out of ordinary revenue.

The question of express rates is a different matter. Express rates never came under that agreement and have never been taken into consideration in the same way as freight rates. So far as the express companies are concerned, there is no kick coming from the Maritime Provinces. There is a kick, and a very serious one, with regard to the advance in rates, which has crippled, in fact paralyzed, every industry in the Maritime Provinces. We were shut out from the American market as a result of Confederation, and we cannot ship out produce or manufactured goods to the upper provinces on account of the prohibitive freight rates. As I have said, this discussion of freight rates under this Bill is out of order. So far as express rates are concerned, we have no objection and no complaint to make.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: May I ask the honourable leader of the Government a question? At the present time the Dominion Express is operated on the Intercolonial Railway in the Maritime Provinces between St. John and Halifax. Is that operation to be discontinued?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It has been recently discontinued.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that it has been discontinued.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would like to ask the honourable Minister, is it the intention to shut out all other express companies from operating within the territory of the Canadian National?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. The main object of this Bill is to place under the Railway Management the whole express business of the enlarged Canadian National System. It would be administered by a department, just as the C.P.R. administers its express business through a department called the Dominion Express. If the Dominion Express Company has other shareholders than those of the Canadian Pacific Railway itself, it is bound to remain a separate entity; but if, as in the case of the express company transferred to the National Railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway owns all the stock of the Express Company, it may to-morrow declare that it will operate its express business as a department of the C.P.R., and in that event I wonder what change there would be, since the Dominion Express Company would then be, as it is now, part and parcel of the C.P.R. and administered by officials appointed by the C.P.R.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I have heard it stated that the Canadian Pacific will not give the Canadian National Express Company running rights over its road, and that this is the reason why the Canadian National had refused the C.P.R. rights in territory which the Government railways have always had. I would like to ask the honourable gentleman if that is true.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will inquire and get the information.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: As a matter of fact, the Canadian Pacific will not give to the Canadian National Express any rights whatever in territory where the C.P.R. operates exclusively. In my own town there is the Dominion Express, which is the C.P.R. Express, and the Canadian Express, the two dividing the business. But in any portion of the country that is served only by the C.P.R. you will not see the Canadian Express operating at all, and I supposed that this measure was to eliminate the C.P.R. from operating in what is exclusively Canadian National territory. That should be done, because dividing the business in territory belonging exclusively to one railway makes the rates higher, and there is an additional burden on the people. The more you can eliminate that sort of thing, the cheaper rates you will get for the people. It does seem to me that, particularly when the C.P.R. in its exclusive territory will not permit the Canadian Express to operate, the Canadian National should not permit the C.P.R. to operate in territory which belongs exclusively to the National.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Let me cite an example, honourable gentlemen. In the last few years the two express companies have been running side by side in our province. One company, the Canadian Express, could do all the business, but under prevailing conditions the C.P.R. was allowed running rights over the Prince Edward Island Railway, and as a consequence you saw two express agents in the one express car—one at one end, with the Dominion Express Company's goods, and the other at the opposite end with the goods of the Canadian Express Company. The Canadian, as I say, could have done the whole business and eliminated the Dominion Express, which they are doing now, and which, to my mind, they have a perfect right to do.

Hon. J. S. McLENNAN: As I understand the situation, honourable gentlemen, there was a time when the Candian Pacific Railway had running rights over the Intercolonial down as far as Halifax. Those rights were abrogated, but subsequently the Dominion Express—the subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific, owned, I believe, exclusively by the Canadian Pacific—retained the right to run a car, for which presumably it paid, and you had an extra car in every train on which express shipments were carried. There was one car for the Canadian Express and one for the Dominion, going down as far as Sydney and Halifax. Now the Canadian National has taken it all, and I suppose, on express goods originating on the C.P.R. and going to some point on the Canadian National in the Maritime Provinces, they prorate, instead of allowing both express companies to operate, for which one cannot blame them; it will give them more business.

As this discussion has wandered so much, I may just as well add another gyration to it. My deskmate (Hon. Mr. Smith) who speaks from the standpoint of the shipper, says that the express business has been extremely well done. I do not doubt that at all; but if he were a passenger on a train in the lower provinces he would wish there had never been such a thing as an express company or express business in the world. I have noticed over and over again that the loading and discharging of passengers and baggage takes only a fraction of the time during which the trains stand at stations in order to handle express goods. There has been a good deal of amateur railroading done in this country and elsewhere; but I believe there will some day be an entire elimination of the express business from passenger trains, and that fast freights, which could be run more cheaply and almost as fast as our passenger trains to-day, will take on express goods.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Wait until we get more population.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: If the fast freight rates were a shade lower than the express rates I believe such a business would not be unfeasible.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SEEDS BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 12, an Act respecting the Testing, Inspection and Sale of Seeds.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have asked Mr. McCoig to explain this Bill.

Hon. Mr. McCOIG: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill combines all the good parts of the Acts of 1905 and 1911, along with some changes and alterations which are necessary to give us a better class of seed. The Bill was thoroughly investigated by the members of the House of Commons Agricultural Committee. There is nothing very contentious in the Bill, but I shall be glad to give further explanations from time to time when called upon.

Sections 1 to 22, both inclusive, were agreed to.

On section 23—who shall be prima facie liable:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What is meant by section 23?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: A clerk might sell the seeds or plants.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That does not mean the grower.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: No, the person who offers for sale.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The dealer, I should think.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does it mean the merchant or the grower?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: The merchant.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This does not deal with the grower.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Supose some plants were sold for charity, or a certain quantity of vegetables were donated to the Red Cross, and sold by them, and they were bad, would you hold the Red Cross liable?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Such an instance as my honourable friend mentions is not likely to occur. If the seed is offered for sale by A's clerk, A should be held responsible for the act of his clerk.

Section 23 was agreed to.

Sections 24, 25 and 26 were agreed to.

On section 27—commencement:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Should not the old Act remain in operation until the proclamation brings the new one into force?

Hon. Mr. McCOIG: The seed trade is practically over at this time of year. It is hardly necessary to put the Bill into operation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: So long as it is proclaimed almost at once, it is all right.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am under the impression that it would be a mistake to repeal the old Act before the new one comes into operation; it would have no retroactive effect and would cause confusion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The repeal should not be effective until the new Act comes into operation.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think section 26 should be struck out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That can be attended to when the Bill comes up for third reading.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The section does not say by whom appointments shall be made.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It means the Civil Service Commission.

Section 27 was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The title was agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

The Senate adjourned until Monday next at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, May 14, 1923.

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

IMMIGRATION BILL

FIRST READING

Bill 136, an Act to amend the Immigration Act.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

DIVORCE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill E5, an Act for the relief of Winifred Scatcherd.—Hon Mr. Taylor.

POSITION OF WALTER DUNCAN

INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: A few weeks ago I asked a question with reference to one Duncan, and the honourable leader of the Government promised me a fuller reply than that which he gave. When may I expect the complete reply?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think I shall be able to give the whole reply by to-morrow. I received a second part this evening, but I have not yet brought the different parts together.

COST OF THE CIVIL SERVICE

INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I would like to direct the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to the fact that an order of this House was passed just one month ago, which reads as follows:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a return showing the total cost of the Civil Service for the year ending March 31st, 1919, and for the year ending March 31st, 1922.

By the Civil Service is meant all the Government employees affected by the provisions of the Civil Service Act, 1919, and its amendments.

I do not know why I should have to worry the honourable leader of the Government about a return of this kind. Surely there must be some machinery by which the members of this House can obtain information. I have been trying ever since the House met to obtain this information. Why is it not available?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I surmise that the Finance Department would be the proper department to give us that answer.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I submit that the Departments should obey the order of the House, and if the Government cannot compel them to do so, then the Government had better get out and let some other Government in that can.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will make an effort to ascertain if anybody is working on that order.

SEEDS BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of Bill 12, an Act respecting the Testing, Inspection and Sale of Seeds.

He said: I would point out to my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), who was somewhat exercised over the fact that the Seed Control Act of 1911 was being repealed, that the present Bill will perhaps come into force at later date.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, it comes into operation by Order in Council. In the meantime the present Act is repealed. Consequently there would be an interim during which there would be no Act dealing with this subject.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I am informed that, so long as this Act is not proclaimed, it does not come into operation—its operation is entirely suspended.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes. And the repealing clause is not operative until the Act is proclaimed.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 45, an Act respecting Chinese Immigration.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the Bill which is now before us is intended to regulate the immigration to Canada of persons of Chinese origin, and partly to implement the promise of the Government on May 8, 1922, to effectively restrict the immigration of Orientals to Canada, and includes the following:

(1) The head tax on persons of Chinese origin is abolished;

(2) The entry to or landing in Canada of Chinese is confined to the following classes:

(a) Members of the diplomatic corps and other Government representatives, their suites and their servants, consuls and consular agents;

(b) Children born in Canada of Chinese race or descent, who have left Canada for educational or other purposes and are returning to Canada;

(c) Bona fide merchants whose entry would be likely to promote trade between China and Canada.

There has been considerable discussion as to the interpretation of the word "merchants." It will be noticed that under clause 5 of the Bill "merchants" will be "as defined by such regulations as the Minister may prescribe."

(d) Students coming to Canada for the purpose of securing a higher education in Canadian colleges or universities, and while in actual attendance;

(3) Provision is made for Chinese to travel in transit through Canada en route to other countries;

(4) All Chinese in Canada, irrespective of allegiance, to immediately register.

(5) All Chinese lawfully resident in Canada, who wish to leave this country with the declared intention of returning, upon registering outwards in the manner prescribed by the Act, will be permitted to return any time within two years as at present.

These are very important changes, and of course the Senate is entitled at this stage to discuss the underlying principles of this Bill; but honourable gentlemen will have a better and fuller opportunity of examining the merits of each clause as we take it up in Committee.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill is a very important one, dealing with a subject that has been under discussion more or less at different times for a great many years in Canada. It affects a large number of Chinamen in this country—probably 50,000. If they have any objection to this Bill or any suggestions for striking out any of its provisions or amending it in any way, it would be wise, I think, to give them an opportunity of being heard, and I would suggest to the honourable leader of the Government that, instead of referring the Bill to the Committee of the Whole House, we should send it to a special committee, by whom Chinese or their friends or counsel could be heard. It is not convenient to have this Bill considered in Committee of the Whole House. The Bill is a very important one, as it involves our relations with a foreign nation.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does the honourable gentleman make a motion to that effect?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I have great pleasure in seconding it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We ought first take the second reading.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. W. B. ROSS moved that the Bill be referred to a special Committee consisting of Hon. Messrs. Calder, Dandurand, Dessaulles, Fowler, Macdonnell, McDonald, McMeans, Prowse, Robertson, Sharpe, Taylor and the mover.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Last week, as we were separating, a question was put to me as to the urgency of sending this Bill to a Special or Standing Committee of this House. I had an open mind on the question until I received two memoranda from two different sources urging the importance of amending the Bill in various particulars. Upon reading these documents very minutely, I came to the conclusion that the questions involved could very well be discussed by a Committee of the Whole House. In the main they were questions of policy, and I cannot see that any discussion in a Special Committee will enlighten the members of the Senate to a greater extent than any memorandum that could be circulated among them. Yet if there is a large body of opinion in the Senate in favour of the other method, I will yield to the suggestion of my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross). I only feel that we may be dragged into longer sittings in that Committee than we would desire; but it will be for the Committee to try to restrict the discussion in order that we may have a report in due time.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMIRALTY BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 117, an Act to amend the Admiralty Act.

Hon. Mr Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—deputy local judges:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is my honourable friend prepared to say yet whether it will be the policy of the Government to appoint judges as the local deputy officers in Admiralty, or whether it is the intention of the Government to make appointments entirely irrespective of the judiciary?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may say that the Government has not been consulted in this matter, and that this Bill is absolutely a departmental Bill, coming from the Department of Justice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But may I say to my honourable friend that the Government is responsible for this legislation, and the Government should certainly know its own mind, and this House should know the mind of the Government, upon so important a question as the appointment of deputy local officers in Admiralty in every district in this Dominion. This House cannot catechise the Department of Justice, or any other Department. This is a question of governmental policy, and we should have a straighforward answer to a straightforward question, because the Bill proposes a very radical departure from the well-recognized principle, which has been observed for years, of appointing judges and giving them Admiralty jurisdiction in the districts in which they live. In my judgment this practice should not be departed from.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that this is a general Act—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: So much the worse.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: —which is already on the Statute Book, and we are face to face with certain amendments to a general Act which will serve for all time, or at least until further amended by Parliament; so that all I can tell my honourable friend is that the Government has no policy, and has not had occasion to examine any policy, in the matter. That question will undoubtedly come up from time to time when the Minister of Justice makes reports to Council upon the necessities in certain districts as he sees them. I may tell my honourable friend that Council has no policy on this matter at the present time. The only question for the Senate is as to whether these amendments to a general Act are judicious.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Have you section 11 of the Admiralty Act—the present section that you are repealing?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: While that is being looked up, I would say that it appears to me after reading the Act for the first time, that the Government must appoint somebody who is already a judge.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That is the point—to find out.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It seems to me that the interpretation of this Act conveys that meaning, if you read section 2:

> No judge, local judge or deputy local judge shall take or receive any fee of office upon the trial of any cause or upon any other judicial proceeding.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But my honourable friend will observe that under section 1 the Governor in Council "may from time to time, appoint for any Admiralty district one or more deputy local judges." That is to say, they can appoint John Smith to be a deputy local judge in Admiralty entirely irrespective of his occupying any judicial position at present, or entirely irrespective of his being a professional man. All they have to do is to designate him a deputy local judge in Admiralty.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Why not add the words, "being a judge?"

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I shall be very glad to support an amendment of that kind if my honourable friend will move it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Let us have that section II as it now stands.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have now in my hands the Revised Statutes of 1906, chapter 141.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is the last revision?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, the last revision, Since 1906 two Acts have been passed, in 1920 and 1922, but they have not been put into force. Apparently they were to come into force by proclamation, and they were not proclaimed, so we are back upon the statute of 1906.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But these amendments refer to section 11. If they do not refer to section 11, it does not matter.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw the attention of my honourable friend to clause 5, chapter 33 of the statutes of 1920, and chapter 4 of the statutes of 1921, which are hereby repealed. That makes it clear that we are back to section 141, which says:

A local judge in Admiralty may, from time to time, with the approval of the Governor in Council, appoint a deputy judge; and such judge shall have and exercise all such jurisdiction, powers and authority as are possessed by the local judge.

2. The appointment of a deputy judge shall not be determined by the occurrence of a vacancy in the office of the judge.

3. A local judge in Admiralty may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, at any time revoke the appointment of a deputy judge.

So that under chapter 141 a local judge could appoint deputy judges with the approval of the Governor in Council. This Act seeks to give to the Governor in Council alone the initiative.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is there anything said in that about salary?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Has any difficulty arisen?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Is there any qualification required by an Admiralty judge or a local Admiralty judge?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, there is none.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I read last week a statement from the Deputy Minister of Justice on this very question, to which I will draw my honourable friend's attention. I will read it again for the information of the Committee:

There was some confusion about the former legislation. According to the Admiralty Act, Revised Etatutes, Chapter 141, a local judge in Admiralty was authorized to appoint a deputy judge with the approval of the Governor in Council, and the appointment might be revoked in the like manner. By Chapter 33 of 1920 it was provided in alternative that the Governor in Council, or a local judge in Admiralty with the approval of the Governor in Council, might appoint a deputy judge, and that such appointment might be revoked in the like manner. This Act however was not brought into force.

I draw attention to the fact that this first Act of 1920 was brought to this Chamber by my honourable friend opposite.

Then, by Chapter 4 of 1922, it was provided that the Governor in Council might appoint a deputy judge; that such deputy judge should hold office during good behaviour, and might be removed by the Governor in Council. This Act also has not been brought into force

By the present Bill it is proposed to repeal both the Act of 1920 and the Act of 1922, neither of which, as I have said, has come into operation, and to vest the power of appointment as well as the power of removal, in the Governor in Council, so that the effect of the proposed legislation, so far as section 11 is concerned, will be to leave the law as originally enacted in the Revised Statutes, except that the appointment of a deputy judge will be made direct by the Governor in Council and not through the medium of the local judge. The former method of appointment, I may say, was found cumbersome and dilatory as it depended upon the exercise of two distinct authorities, the local judge and the Governor in Council, and the proposed amendment is designed to simplify and accelerate the procedure.

Some years ago the judge of the Exchequer Court made rules authorizing local or deputy judges to receive fees of office. This was done principally to provide some compensation for the deputy judge at Montreal, who was transacting considerable business there, while the local judge resided at Quebec. More recently the judges salaries have been raised, and by section 2 of Chapter 59 of 1919 it was provided that no salary shall be paid to any local judge in Admiralty who is a judge of any provincial superior court, although this provision was not to apply to local judges appointed before the coming into force of the Act.

They apparently had acquired rights.

In view of this provision and of the increase of judical salaries, and in view of complaints made by suitors against the payment of fees, it is considered advisable to abolish these fees.

This is what the present Act aims to do.

In the Province of Quebec there are two large shipping centres at Montreal and at Quebec, and presumably there would always be a local judge or a deputy judge at each of these places. It is considered that they should be on the same footing with regard to remuneration; and therefore, while the judicial fees are abolished, it is provided by section 3 of the proposed Act that a deputy judge at Montreal or Quebec, when the local judge resides at Quebec or Montreal, shall receive the same salary, if any, as if he were the local judge.

But if he is a judge of the Superior Court he is not entitled to any remuneration whatever.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not quite understand that point, because the judge in Admiralty in the province of New Brunswick is the judge of the Supreme Court—in point of fact I think the Chief Justice—and he receives a salary in addition to his salary as Chief Justice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Where?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: In St. John.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But he has been a long time a judge in Admiralty, has he not?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It is the same in Nova Scotia; the judge gets $1,000 extra.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I draw the attention of my honourable friend to this fact, that section 2 of chapter 59 of 1919 provided that no salary should be paid to any local judge in Admiralty who was a judge of any provincial superior court, although this provision was not to apply to local judges appointed before the coming into force of the Act. So that if they had that fee, or that increased indemnity at the time of the passing of the Act of 1919, that would explain why they have it still. That is why I say that if the judges in Montreal or Quebec are superior court judges, and appointed after that Act of 1919, they would not be entitled to receive any salary.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But this is all beside the question which I have inquired about, and to which I regret to say I have not yet received an answer. Section 1 proposes to give the Government authority practically to cancel all Admiralty appointments up to the present time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: As it had before.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; but express power is given to the Government to appoint for any Admiralty district one or more deputy local judges. Consequently I say that in an Admiralty district the Government has power to revoke all appointments in Admiralty, and to appoint the class of officer mentioned in this section. I further say that the employment of the term "deputy local judge" is unknown to the statute, and it is unknown in the memorandum furnished by the Deputy Minister of Justice, because he speaks of a local judge, or a deputy judge, but there is no such officer as a deputy local judge. This term has been employed by the Government, apparently, in this Bill, and will permit the Government to revoke all appointments in Admiralty, and create new appointments, those new appointees to be known as local deputy judges in Admiralty for the districts which may be designated.

Now, what I want to know is whether that is the intention of the Government. It has been expressed in the most general terms in this Bill, and may result in a wholesale sweeping out of existing Admiralty judges. Is it the intention of the Government to create a new batch of Admiralty judges, to be known as deputy local judges, in all Admiralty districts? As to the matter of salary—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Where does my honourable friend find in the Act that the Government may revoke the present appointees?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They can do it. In the first place, the Governor in Council may at any time revoke the appointment of a deputy local judge; and they have the right now to revoke an appointment in Admiralty. But the question of salary is not one which should agitate us at this moment because of any absence of mention of it in the Bill. The Government can place in the Supply Bill an estimate for all the new appointments which they purpose making, entirely irrespective of the statutes. This Bill contemplates such very wide powers that it is not unreasonable that we should press our honourable friend to let us know what the policy of the Government is upon this very important question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: To-morrow I may be able to inform my honourable friend that it is not the intention of the Government to make a certain number of appointments; yet, I may tell my honourable friend, that will fall short on any control that the Senate might like to exercise, because, although it is not the intention to-day, it may be the intention of this Government next year, or of the succeeding Government, to follow a different policy. So the inquiry, although interesting as explaining present policy, does not go to the root of the question.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does my honourable friend see any objection to amending the Bill by providing that the local judges shall be members of the judiciary; that is, that the jurisdiction in Admiralty shall be exercised by the same class as those who exercise that jurisdiction to-day? My honourable friend opposite (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) made a suggestion a moment ago which would clear up the whole situation.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: That is what I have been endeavouring to impress upon the Minister right along. On several occasions I have asked whether certain qualifications are required in an Admiralty judge. I take it that under this Bill the Government can appoint any individual, no matter whether or not he can read or write, or has a knowledge of law, or ever sailed a vessel, or anything else. I think the honourable leader of the Government should state whether any qualification is required. If no qualification is required, I for one will vote against the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It may be interesting to this Chamber to have a list of the deputy judges that are in existence to-day and to know their qualifications; it also may be interesting to frame an Act in such a way as to provide from amongst whom these deputy local judges shall be selected. If they can be had from amongst the judges of the Superior Court—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not necessarily—the judges of the County Courts or District Courts.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw attention to this difference: the Superior Court judges would be obliged to do the work without any increased indemnity, whilst any other class of judges may be entitled to some kind of supplementary indemnity.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: You could amend the Act so as to require them to serve without increased salary.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Give them a reasonable remuneration: they are not too well paid now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The County Court judges?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does that remark apply also to Superior Court judges?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will allow my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) to answer that question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will move that the Committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again. The Department of Justice will take note of the suggestions offered by the Committee.

The motion was agreed to, and progress was reported.

COPYRIGHT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. N. A. BELCOURT moved the second reading of Bill 24, an Act to amend the Copyright Act, 1921.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, we must admit that there has been apparently considerable confusion and some misunderstanding in the other House with regard to this Bill. The Bill was introduced for the purpose of putting Canada on the same footing with regard to Copyright as the British Isles and the other Dominions, having regard more especially to the revised Convention of Berne of 1908. In 1921 we passed an Act purporting to grant to Canadian authors the benefits of copyright as defined by that convention. In that Act we included sections 13, 14, 15, and 27 with considerable doubt. Honourable gentlemen who were in this House at the time will remember that those four sections were the subject of considerable debate. Because of that, the Act of 1921 was not proclaimed, the idea being that in the meantime the opinion of those responsible for the administration of the Berne Convention might be obtained, so that we might know definitely to what extent the sections I have mentioned militated against the full enjoyment of copyright by Canadians. As the Act of 1921 was never proclaimed, Canadian authors were left in exactly the same position that they had been in since the original Act of 1886, and have been without any copyright protection whatever.

Since the passing of the Act of 1921 the Berne Convention has expressed its opinion with regard to sections 13, 14, 15 and 27, and has definitely taken the position that those sections militate against Canadian authors and really prevent them from enjoying the full benefits of the revised Berne Convention of 1908. The British authorities took the same view, and in 1911 the Imperial Parliament adopted an Act which gives to the citizens of the British Isles complete copyright as understood by the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Why was the other Act not proclaimed?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: As I said a moment ago, the Act of 1921 was not proclaimed because it was thought by many members in both Houses of the Canadian Parliament that, with the inclusion of sections 13, 14, 15 and 27, it would not afford full copyright protection to Canadian authors.

Since the British Act of 1911, the other Dominions have adopted similar Acts, Canada alone not having done so. Attempts were made on several occasions to have a Bill passed by this Parliament with a view to granting to Canadians the same rights as those enjoyed by citizens of the British Isles and of the other British Dominions. It is now manifest that the Act of 1921 is not going to give Canadian authors the protection of the Berne Convention; the Convention has condemned that Act and has declared it to be inefficient; and because of that and the opinion of the British authorities, and the fact that the other Dominions have adopted legislation in conformity with the views of the Berne Convention, Bill 24 was introduced into the House of Commons by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Section 2 of the Bill as introduced provided:

Sections 13, 14, 15 and 27 of the Copyright Act, 1921, are hereby repealed.

Those are the provisions to which I referred a moment ago as standing in the way of full enjoyment of copyright by Canadian authors. If the Bill had passed the Commons as introduced, there would be no difficulty; but during the discussion in the Commons certain gentlemen who were interested as publishers, printers, and so on, and especially manufacturers and sellers of phonographs, claimed that the sections should remain in order to compel the Canadian author who wishes to have his book reprinted, to have it done in Canada so that they might reap the benefit. They succeeded in creating considerable confusion and misunderstanding in the House, as any honourable gentleman who will take the trouble to read the Debates of the other House will observe. It would seem as though the Commons had once more relied on this House, which generally considers these matters with great care and attention, to rectify the matter if it had gone wrong. As I say, the whole trouble arises because section 2 was amended so as to read as follows:

Sections 13, 14, 15 and 27 of the Copyright Act, 1921, shall not apply to any work the author of which is a British subject, other than a Canadian citizen or the subject or citizen of a country which has adhered to the Convention and the additional protocol thereto set out in the second schedule to the said Act.

The effect of that amendment is to leave the Act of 1921 unchanged in any way with regard to Canadians, and Canadians only. Instead of repealing them, the amendment continues them in force with regard to Canadians; all other British subjects or adherents to the Berne Convention are not affected by those provisions.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: May I ask my honourable friend whether or not the Bill as it is now before this House conforms to the requirements of the Berne Convention?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No; with the amendments, it does not. The Berne Convention authorities have declared that the Act of 1921, in that it contains sections 13, 15, 16 and 27, is not in conformity with the Berne Convention. The Bill as introduced in the House of Commons provided for the repeal of those sections purely and simply in order to comply with the decision of the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Was not this a sort of compromise between the contending parties?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There is no doubt about that; it must have been that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Are you opposing that compromise?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not know that I should extend special thanks to my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) for having handed this Bill over to me, and I think I owe it to the House to review the opinions given in the past with regard to these sections. I want the House to be seized of the difficulty, and want to have full discussion. This was a compromise which I do not think was made by the several parties themselves. It was a compromise thought of and imposed by the Commons.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is what is commonly known as the printing or manufacturing clause?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes, the licensing clauses, or the manufacturing clauses.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: May I interrupt the honourable gentleman a moment?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I think there has been an expression of opinion by the official publication dealing with the rights of authors, that if these licensing clauses were made applicable only to those who are not members of the Berne Convention there would be no objection to them. I am not defending them at all, but would point out that that is not quite the position as the honourable gentleman put it in addressing the House. I have read an expression of the opinion that it would be perfectly proper, and within the limits and powers of the Berne Convention, to have those licensing clauses apply only to any country which is not a member of the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: As I understand it, the decision of the Berne Convention is that, with the sections included which were in the Act of 1921, Canadian authors, or members of the Union which would be subject to similar provisions, would not get the full benefit of the Berne Convention. The effect of the amendment, as I take it, is to have these sections remain with their full force and effect so far as Canadians are concerned.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: And so far as nationals are concerned who are not members of the Berne Convention, it applies to them also, does it not? It applies to Canadians, because it says so.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: It applies also to nationals of countries not members of the Union.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My duty is to endeavour to have the House understand exectly what is the effect of the Bill as it was introduced in the House of Commons, and the entirely different effect of the Bill as it came from the House of Commons to us.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: We can understand the effect of the Bill as it was introduced in the House of Commons, but what I think we cannot understand is the effect of it now as it has left that House. What is the effect of the Bill in its present form?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The effect of the amendment made in the Commons is that sections 13, 14, 15 and 27 are still part of our copyright law—

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: With respect to Canadians.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: With respect to Canadians.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: And with respect to nationals not members of the Union.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Would that vitiate the Bill as far as the Berne Convention is concerned?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not think it would. I suppose that any member of the Union may impose certain restrictions; but the point is that with these clauses the Canadian author is not going to get the protection which British subjects in the British Isles and in the other Dominions of the Empire are today enjoying.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: If they adhere to the Convention.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There would be a discrimination, and the only country in the British Empire discriminated against would be our own country.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes. My honourable friend should read that again.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We would be the only ones adhering to the Berne Convention who would be discriminated against; but it would discriminate against the United States.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No; they are not members of the Union. It is of members of the Union I am speaking. Of those who belong to the Union, I say, Canadian authors will stand in a position entirely different from that occupied by authors living in the British Isles or in the other Dominions. Of course, as far as the United States are concerned, they are not members of the Union at all.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: This is a certain concession to the United States. There is no doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is the very opposite.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is the very opposite.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is reciprocity in ill-will.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is a concession to the printer.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No; it puts us on the same footing as the United States. That is why I say it is a concession to them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No; it imposes on us the same distinctions as are imposed on people outside. The United States is not a member of the Convention.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: If a Canadian author were to write a book, take it to Great Britain and publish it there, would he be in any better position than if he had it published in Canada?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No. If a Canadian author goes to London and gets his book printed there, and then wishes to come back to Canada and secure Canadian copyright and have it reprinted here, he must submit to the provisions of sections 13, 14, and so on.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, if he wants to get a copyright in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If he wants to get copyright in Canada—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He has to do this.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He has to make an agreement with some Canadian publisher or printer; and if he cannot make an agreement with the printer, then he must go to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who makes the agreement between them. You are imposing upon the Canadian author a restriction, obligation, or burden to which any other member of the Berne Convention is not subjected.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Then I understand that if a person born in England wrote a book there, he would occupy a better position than if he were a Canadian.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It would not necessarily matter whether he was born there or not; but if he lives there, or chooses to go over there to have his book printed.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: If he publishes it there.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: This applies only to reprinting. If anyone who comes from England or any other country adhering to the Berne Convention has his book printed, he is entitled to all the benefits of the Convention. If he comes to Canada, he is not subjected to these provisions. The Canadian author alone is.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The Britisher is not?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No. That is what I say. The national of any member of the Berne Convention can come to Canada without being subject to these provisions which I have mentioned. The Canadian is subject to them.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Why?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Because the Bill says so: the amendment provides that.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If a Britisher were to come to Canada and publish here, and then went back home, what would happen to him?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not know. I cannot answer that question. That is beyond me.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman if the force of those amendments would not compel Canadian authors to have their books published in Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, that is the object.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Those sections compel any Canadian author who has published a book in any country, a member of the Berne Convention, to make an agreement in Canada with some printer for the reprinting of his book.

Hon. G. G. FOSTER: If he wants copyright here.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If he wants copyright here, he has to go to some printer and submit to that printer a bargain. If they cannot agree, then the Minister of Trade and Commerce makes the bargain for them. I say therefore that you are imposing upon the citizens of our country an obligation from which every other member of the Union is exempt. I hope I have made myself clear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I ask my honourable friend, can we not get over that difficulty by extending the obligation to all authors?

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: That would be contrary to the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is the answer, of course. The point for this House to decide is whether, on the one hand, they are going to insist upon the Canadian author who wishes to get copyright in Canada being obliged to go and make a bargain with a printer, or whether, on the other hand, they will give him absolute freedom to make such a bargain as he can make anywhere else for the reprinting of his book, and at the same time get the benefit of copyright.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend has not yet stated what he purposes doing

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Just moving the second reading—no more.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And does the honourable gentleman propose that the Bill be amended?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, no. I am inviting honourable members of this House to take part in the discussion to see if they can throw any light upon the matter.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Could a Canadian author get a copyright for his work say in England or in the United States—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Not in the United States.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: — without having the book printed there?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The United States is not a member of the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: How about England?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He may get a copyright and is not bound to go to anyone, but may make his own bargain with regard to printing.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: He would have to get his book printed in England, would he not, in order to get copyright there?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No. That is exactly the distinction I am trying to draw between the law as it exists in the British Isles and what exists in the different Dominions.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The honourable gentleman speaks of the amendment. I am not quite sure that word may not be used in a double sense. Has the honourable gentleman been speaking of the amendment to the Bill as introduced this Session into the House of Commons, or of an amendment of the Act of 1921?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend is generally sharper than that. Let me read section 2 of the Bill as introduced.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: You had better emphasize that expression "the Bill as introduced in the Commons."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Section 2 of the Bill as introduced in the House of Commons reads:

Sections thirteen, fourteen, fifteen and twenty-seven of the Copyright Act, 1921, are hereby repealed.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That would repeal those sections of the Act of 1921?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Act of 1921. Now a Bill comes to us in this form:

2. Sections thirteen, fourteen, fifteen and twenty-seven of The Copyright Act, 1921, shall not apply to any work the author of which is a British subject, other than a Canadian citizen, or the subject or citizen of a country which has adhered to the Convention and the additional Protocol thereto set out in the second schedule to the said Act.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They apply to a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That is to say, the Commons amended the Bill that came in this Session, or put a qualification in it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Certainly. The Minister of Trade and Commerce introduced Bill as I have read it, simply repealing the objectionable sections. Later on, in Committee or in the House—

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: On the third reading.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes—on the third reading, I believe it was—the Bill was amended by allowing these sections to remain so that they may be made applicable to Canadians, and to Canadians only.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the authority of my honourable friend for saying that section 2 as we have it before us in the present Bill will be more in accordance with the Berne Convention?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I said the opposite.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. As I understood him, my honourable friend said that Canada will not be precluded from becoming a member of the Berne Convention, notwithstanding that section 2, as it has been passed, imposes upon the Canadian author the obligation of having his work printed in Canada. My honourable friend has said that sections 13, 14, 15 and 27 of the Act of 1921 precluded Canada from becoming—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, no.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understood my honourable friend to say that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend misunderstood me. What I said was that the publication issued by the Berne Convention declared that the inclusion of sections 13, 14, 15 and 27 in the Act of 1921 prevented Canadian authors from enjoying the full benefits of copyright as understood and carried out by the Berne Convention. That is all I said.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then my honourable friend takes the same position as to the legislation now before us—that the Canadian author is deprived of the full advantages by reason of having imposed upon him the printing clauses.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think I rather implied that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. Then, as I understand the provisions of the 1921 Act did not prevent Canada from becoming a member of the Berne Convention, notwithstanding the obligations imposed upon the Canadian author.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They did prevent Canada.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: They did prevent Canada from becoming a member. We are not a member of the Union to-day.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understood my honourable friend a moment ago to say that he had not made that statement.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, no. I said this, that we passed the Act of 1921 in considerable doubt as to whether those sections would not prevent Canadian authors from reaping the full benefit of the Berne Convention.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, that is not the question. The question is—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Let me complete my statement. Then, because of that doubt, we put in section 50, which suspended the operation of that Act until proclaimed. We never proclaimed it. The Act of 1921 is not in force, and we are not to-day a member of the Berne Convention.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The question is, do the provisions of the Act of 1921 prevent Canada from becoming a member of the Berne Convention?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is not whether they deprive the Canadian, or any other author, of the full benefits of the Convention; but can Canada become a member of the Berne Convention under the provisions of the Act of 1921, if proclaimed? Now, I see no substantial difference between the Act of 1921 and the Bill before us at the present time, and I want to know from my honourable friend what is his authority for saying that there is a substantial difference—a difference to the extent of precluding Canada from becoming a member of the Berne Convention under the former Act, and permitting of our becoming a member of that Convention under the Bill now before us.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will my honourable friend allow me to give him my impression? I give it with some diffidence, not claiming to have a complete grasp of the whole legislation and question. However, I would first make this point clear. The Berne Convention is not at all concerned with the way a country treats its own Nationals. Let me add, with less emphasis, that it is not interested in countries not belonging to the Union and not coming under the Convention. The manufacturing and printing clauses of the Act of 1921 apply to everybody. Then, the interpreters of the Berne Convention declared that we fell short of the International Convention and legislated ourselves out of it—or rather that we did not legislate ourselves in.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, that is better.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This Bill legislates in such a way, I am informed, as to allow us to come within the terms of the International Copyright Convention.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend, just at this point, say what is his authority? Is it the authority of duly qualified officers of the Convention?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have it here. If the honourable gentleman will allow me, I will give it to him.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The honourable leader of the House (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) is absolutely right.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Now, we declare by section 2 of the present Bill that all but Canadians and nationals of countries who are not members of the Union, shall enjoy under our Act the full advantages of the Copyright, and shall not have applied to them those four objectionable clauses. This brings us very near the terms of the Berne Convention. With this explanation I now ask my honourable friends to listen to clause 2:

> Sections thirteen, fourteen, fifteen and twenty-seven of the Copyright Act, 1921—

—which were those which prevented us from enjoying the advantages of the International Convention—

> —shall not apply to any work the author of which is a British subject, other than a Canadian citizen—and that is our lookout;

> —or the subject or citizen of a country which has adhered to the Convention and the additional Protocol thereto set out in the second schedule to the said Act.

Consequently these four sections shall not, under this Bill, if it becomes law, apply to members of the Berne Convention, or members of the Union. That is, I am informed, all that the International Convention exacts. It is not interested in the restrictions which apply to any national, and apparently, as I am informed, is not interested in parties or countries that do not come under the Berne Convention—which means, in order to speak clearly and come to realities, that the four manufacturing clauses will still function as between Canada and the United States.

Now, it is for the Senate to say whether these compromising clauses shall stand. The United States may to-morrow bring in such legislation—and as a matter of fact it has brought into Congress such legislation—as will, if enacted, enable it to become a member of the Berne Convention. Then we would have the extraordinary situation of the United States joining the Berne Convention and the Canadian authors standing under the disability of those four clauses. It would then be for us to withdraw this disability which affects the Canadian author.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We have till the first of July, under this Bill, for these things to happen; that is, for the United States, which is already preparing to enter the Berne Convention, to do so. If that is done before the first of July, this drops, and everything is all right.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Here is the authority for my statement. It appeared in the July, 1921, number of Le Droit d'Auteur, the organ of the Berne Convention, published in Geneva. I will translate as I go along, and I will read the conclusion of the article:

> The result of what precedes is that, according to our conviction frankly expressed, the accession of Canada to the revised Convention of Berne which the Law of the 4th of June—

—that is, the 4th June, 1921; that is our Act—

> —is supposed to bring about, will not be announced by the Government to the central Government, and by the latter to the Swiss Federal Council, only if articles 13, 14, 15 and 27 are eliminated from the law. If Canada desires to maintain these for special reasons, they will have to be declared inapplicable to the countries which are members of the Berne Union by a formal disposition. In the latter case they would apply, for example, to the United States, but they would automatically lose their effect also towards this country the day the Washington Government would adhere, in its turn, to the Union Treaty.
> A declaration of adhesion to the Treaty without these matters of so-called obligatory licenses determined in the sense here indicated, and without other ameliorations being brought to the law in accordance with suggestions contained in the first chapter hereof, could not be reconciled, according to us, with the primordial engagement of every Unionist country to assure the legal protection of the rights which are the object of the revised Convention. (Article 25).

This paper is the recognized authority, and it is quite clear that, with these provisions remaining in the Act, we cannot be members of the Convention, because the Convention requires—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, that is not the case. We can be members of the Convention.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend says it is not the case, but I am reading that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We can treat our own nationals as we please, and we can treat anybody outside of the Berne Convention as we please; but we must not legislate—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend had better read this.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is a misunderstanding between you.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: May I have a question? I think you made the statement that we are seeking to enter the Berne Convention. As a matter of fact, we are in the Berne Convention, and have been in since 1842 by virtue of Imperial legislation; is that not so?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No. The Imperial Act of 1886 did not apply to the Dominion, as I understand it, but the British Act of 1911 could be adopted, and has been adopted by the different Dominion since then.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: The late Minister of Justice said the Act of 1842 and the Act of 1886 are both in force in this country predominantly over our legislation, where they differ from our Acts of 1889 and later on. The late Minister of Justice said:

> If those sections are at variance with the Convention we shall have to come back to the House, because the law of this country would put the Government in a position where it could not consistently adhere to the Convention, and we should have to decide the question then.

As a matter of fact we are, and have been, in the Berne Convention, and what we have done is to pass legislation which is not consistent with, shall we say, the by-laws and regulations of the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is true, in a sense, that we have been members of the Berne Convention since 1886, but it is the revised Convention of 1908 which is of any value. That is why we have been trying ever since to come within the Berne Convention of 1908. In 1921 we thought we could go into the Berne Convention with these sections included in the Bill. Since then Le Droit d'Auteur, the authorized publication of the Berne Convention, declares that we cannot come into the Berne Convention with these provisions of the Act, and enjoy the full rights granted by the Convention. That is what Mr. Doherty meant when he said what my honourable friend has just read. There was doubt: almost everybody who studied the question at that time doubted whether these sections did not prevent us from getting the benefit of the Convention. The Act was passed with the provision that it should not come into force until it was proclaimed. In the meantime the Berne Convention has given the opinion which I have just read. It is for this House now to decide whether we shall come in, or whether we shall persist in the position which the amendment proposes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We are not doing anything to any member of the Berne Convention by passing this, except it may be ourselves, and the authorities of the Berne Convention would not disqualify us by reason of something we added to our own Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I read again to my honourable friend the last few words?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I don't care if you read it four times.

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: Honourable gentlemen, will you allow me to appear on behalf of the Canadian authors? I want to make a summary of the question as short as I possibly can.

The Bill which is now submitted to this House is only a consequence of another Bill debated here two years ago, adopted then by Parliament, but never put into force. A lengthy discussion took place on that occasion. Two divergent interests came into conflict—the interest of authors and the interest of publishers—and I am sorry to say that the latter won the day, and the former was sacrificed. In my opinion such a result was to be regretted. Many members of this House—and I was one of them—contended that some of the enactments then made were undoubtedly contrary to the dispositions and aim of the famous Berne Convention, whose main object was to protect "les droits d'auteur," that is to say, literary and artistic ownership. That stand seemed peculiarly strange, from the fact that the intention of the Bill was precisely to "secure the adherence of Canada to the revised Convention of Berne, signed the thirteenth day of November, 1908, and the additional protocol thereto signed at Berne the twentieth day of March, 1914."

It was maintained that clauses 13, 14, 15 and 27 of the Bill, known as the licensing clauses, were contrary to the spirit of the Convention. Their object was to deprive the authors of their unrestricted ownership, and to give to publishers, under some conditions, the right of printing and editing the authors' works without their consent, even against their will. In the mind of authors such a privilege was nothing short of an outrage. If I may be allowed to use words uttered previously in this House, the protection of the authors' rights should be the paramount object of a copyright law. They are the producers; it is their brain, their imagination, their intellectual effort, that gives life to the book, to the statue, to the painting, or to the musical composition which is given to the public. These are their property, and nobody has a right, and nobody should be allowed the right, to take it from them. The licensing clauses of the Bill adopted in 1921 did that. We protested against their adoption, but in vain. However, the Minister of Justice at that time made the following statement:

> If those sections are at variance with the Convention we shall have to come back to the House, because the law of this country would put the government in a position where it could not consistently adhere to the Convention, and we should have to decide the question then.

It was with that understanding that the Bill was finally passed in 1921. Its last clause said that it would "come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council." That day never came; the proclamation was never issued; the 1921 Bill has never come into force; and we may assert that the failure was due to the fact that the objectionable clauses "put the Government in a position where it could not consistently adhere to the convention."

In support of that assertion, let me quote the following declaration of a publication which is the official organ of the International Office instituted by the Berne Convention:

> It is our conviction, frankly expressed, that the adhesion of Canada to the revised Berne Convention, which the law (the Canadian law of 1921) is supposed to enact, can be announced by the Governor to the Imperial Government, and by the latter to the Federal Council of Switzerland, only if clauses 13, 14, 15 and 27 are eliminated from the bill, or if Canada, whilst desirous of retaining them for special reasons, makes them inoperative for the countries adherents of the Berne Convention.

We could also quote to the same purpose a communication from Downing Street, signed by the Right Honourable Winston Churchill, and received in Ottawa on the 27th of October, 1921. Two or three lines of that document can show well enough its purport. The Colonial Secretary said:

> The only sections of the new Act, which appear likely to give rise to any serious difficulty are sections 3, 13, 14, 15, and 27.

Those are the very same clauses that we have already mentioned.

All these declarations convey to us the true reason for the non-proclamation of the law passed in 1921.

The Government now in power has taken a right view of the situation in framing originally the new Copyright Bill, that is to say, Bill 24 of the present Session, as it was read a first time in the House of Commons on February 21st, 1923. What was the main purpose of that Bill? It was to be found in section 2:

> 2. Sections thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, and twenty-seven of the Copyright Act, 1921, are hereby repealed.

These sections were precisely those which had caused the failure of the 1921 Bill. They were the objectionable, the ill-advised, the unfortunate, the outrageous, clauses which had been so strenuously opposed, which had been so strongly denounced as the stumbling-block of the law, two years ago; and the Government, in the light of information and elucidation that were perhaps lacking in 1921, proposed to purge the former law of its poisonous elements.

Unfortunately, the same influence that had been at work previously came once more to the rescue of the obnoxious clauses, and made a renewed onslaught on literary and artistic ownership. The result was that after a somewhat confused and hasty discussion in another place, the following clause was inserted:

2. Sections thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, and twenty-seven of the Copyright Act, 1921, shall not apply to any work the author of which is a British subject, other than a Canadian citizen, or the subject or citizen of a country which has adhered to the Convention and the additional protocal thereto set out in the second schedule of the said Act.

What is the meaning of that clause? Of course, it can be seen at a glance that its first result is to revive the objectionable clauses doomed to repeal by the original clause 2 of Bill 24. With the new clause 2 they shall remain in the statute book. But it will be with a reservation. What shall be the real effect of that reservation? It states that the clauses shall not apply to any work the author of which is a British subject, other than a Canadian citizen. We could infer therefrom that the clauses shall apply to any work the author of which is a Canadian citizen. This is the interpretation given by a man who has deeply studied the question—by Professor Sandwell, honorary secretary of the Canadian Authors' Association. He writes in the Gazette, of Montreal, of May 4th:

This means that the licensed piracy, while remaining in the Act, is applicable only to the works of Canadians (who naturally cannot be protected from their own government by any treaty), and of Americans, Tibetans, Siamese and other non-unionist nationals.

In connection with the new clause 2 of Bill 24, two questions arise. Is it in conformity with the Berne Convention? Professor Sandwell maintains that it is not. But supposing it were, does the new clause 2 leave the Canadian author a prey to the license depredators? Undoubtedly it does.

From the above premises we are naturally led to this conclusion: it would be wiser, safer and more just to revert to the original clause 2 as it stood on the 21st of February, when Bill 24 was first submitted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or, if this is not deemed advisable, to frame a new clause less objectionable, more clear, and more equitable for the Canadian intellectual toilers.

I firmly hope that our Committee of the Whole will see its way to such a conclusion.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: As the right honourable the junior member for Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) has asked to have the discussion on this Bill in Committee postponed until he can be present, I would move that it be placed on the Order Paper for Wednesday, with the understanding that it will be continued to a further day if the right honourable gentleman is not here.

The motion was agreed to.

RADIOTELEGRAPH BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 44, an Act to amend the Radiotelegraph Act.

Hon. Mr. McLennan in the Chair.

Section 1, the preamble, and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

HIGHWAYS BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 151, an Act to extend the period of the Canada Highways Act.

Hon. G. G. Foster in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I understood by the newspapers that it was not the policy of the Government to give grants to the provinces in connection with highways. This seems to be an extension, so that the provinces if they have not already done so, may earn their grants.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The policy expressed is for the time when this grant is exhausted. The extension given now is for the purpose of putting all the provinces on an equal footing. Distribution was made according to population. Some provinces have been slower than others in taking advantage of the Act and in carrying on their works, and this Bill gives them two years more within which to come up to their quota.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is not the intention to give any additional grants?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Section 1, the preamble, and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS (EXPRESS) BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 152, an Act respecting the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien in the Chair

On section 1—Canadian National Railway Company authorized to carry on express company business:

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Mr. Chairman, before this clause is passed, I should like to ask the leader of the Government a question which, if he can answer it, will probably clear away to some extent the objection which I raised to this Bill when it was under consideration upon the second reading. Can the leader of the Government assure the House that there is no change contemplated by the Railway Company in the manner in which the express business will be handled and supervised? If it is the intention of the Government and of the Railway Company, as I would judge it must be from a statement recently issued by the President, simply to carry on the express business as it is done at present, with one of the vice-presidents of the Railway company in charge, then the objections which I raised the other day would be largely eliminated but if it is the intention of the Railway Executive to dispose of the express management and to give the superintendents of the railway jurisdiction over express matters, I am prepared to go into a discussion of the matter and to endeavour to prove to the House that it would be most disastrous to the interests of the service and the revenues derived from the express business, and most inconvenient and unfortunate for the patrons of the company.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I could give a summary of the remarks of the Minister of Railways when he introduced this Bill, but perhaps it would be better if I were to read the intentions expressed by the President of the System as late as last week. I find this statement in the Montreal Gazette of May 11:

That the operation of the Canadian National Express Company as a department of the Canadian National Railways would not only be economical, but would also provide an improved and more efficient service, was the view expressed by Sir Henry Thornton, chairman of the board of directors and president of the Canadian National Railways, when discussing this matter last evening.

Sir Henry made it plain that in supporting the proposal to bring the operation of the express under the direction of the traffic department, he was merely following the general practice which had produced the best results in the transportation industry. He pointed out that in England, where for eight years he was general manager of the Great Eastern Railway, the express business was handled by the traffic department, and that within the last two years American railway officers have been over there studying the position with a view to introducing this system of handling the collection and delivery of express on the United States railroads.

"There seems to have developed considerable misapprehension in regard to the proposal that the Canadian National Express Company should be operated as a department of the Railway Company," said Sir Henry: "It is proper, therefore, that the public should be reliably informed upon the subject.

"The functions of the Express Company and the duties of its employees are intimately connected and interwoven with the railroad, and the work of its employees. Where express companies operate independently, as is the case in the United States, there is always a certain amount of lost motion and friction arising from the fact that there are two companies with two sets of employees trying to perform a transportation service on the same railroad. If, as is sometimes the case, the express company and the railway company are in effect the same thing there would seem to be no particular virtue in maintaining two separate companies.

"Furthermore, by operating the express company as a department of the railways, a considerable economy can be effected in administration and clerical expenses. Lastly, but by no means least, it is the desire of the administration that every employee of the express, telegraph and railway departments should regard himself as working for the Canadian National Railway System. Such a spirit provokes co-operation, teamwork, and a correspondingly improved service. These arguments are so obvious that they hardly require further elaboration.

"It has been said that no railroad operates its express company as a department of the railway; this statement can only be based upon ignorance of the conditions. The express companies which operated over the railways of the United States represented interests generally distinct from the railway, although there was usually a considerable interlocking in financial affairs. The American express companies originally were private companies, organized by private capital for the purpose of handling the express business. Moreover, when express companies first appeared in the United States, the railway systems were relatively small, and it was desirable to have one company which could transport package freight from one end of the country to the other. This is not the position in Canada, because the Canadian National Railway System reaches to practically every point of importance. In England the express business is all handled by a department of the railway; in fact, package freight, which corresponds to our express business in Canada, is handled by the traffic department, and within the last two years numerous studies have been made of the position by American railway officers, with a view to considering the introduction of the English collection and delivery system in the United States by the railways, which is nothing more or less than an express business.

"To recapitulate, it will be seen that the proposal to operate the Canadian National Express Company as a department of the railway is, in the first place, economical, in the second place, there will be an improved and more efficient service; and in the third place, it is in accordance with the trend of the best practice in the transportation industry."

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The honourable gentleman has not given any assurance on the point in regard to which I made inquiry. If

I could interpret the term "department of the railway" to mean that there would be a continuance of the present system of carrying on the express business, under the jurisdiction and superintendence of men qualified and experienced in that work, I would be inclined to withdraw the objection I have raised to the adoption of this Bill. If, on the other hand, it is the intention, as it would seem to be, to adopt the system in vogue in England—which is referred to in the statement as a package freight or fast freight system, which is represented as being equivalent to our express system in this country, and which is operated by the traffic officers of the railway—then I say to my honourable friend and to the House that the adoption of such a system in Canada will absolutely fail, and for several reasons. As I stated the other day, no railroad in Canada owns and operates an express company as a part of the railway. Our great Canadian Pacific Railway has always found that practice undesirable. In England, I am credibly informed—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Before my honourable friend passes to England will he explain to this House what virtue there is in a word? We see all around us the Dominion Express Company doing the express business for the Canadian Pacific Railway; but if the Dominion Express Company stock is entirely in the chest of the Canadian Pacific Railway, what difference would it make if the express company were called the Traffic Department or the Express Department of the C.P.R.?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I hope I may make myself clear to the extent of giving my honourable friend an intelligent answer to that question. The Dominion Express Company is supervised by a President, in the person of Mr. Stout, long experienced in that business and well qualified to perform the duties of his office.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And what if he were called a Vice-president?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: He has had no experience in railway freight traffic, and would not profess to know anything about it. Neither would the Freight Traffic Manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway undertake to attempt to direct intelligently the operations of the Dominion Express Company. One is the business of handling freight from station to station. The express company goes into homes, stores, and places of business with its delivery service, gathers together the express packages and guarantees to deliver them at the door of the home or the place of business of the consignee in the city or town. Thus the express business differs entirely from the handling of freight.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is it not a fact that the Grand Trunk Railway in Montreal has always distributed all its own freight at our doors?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The express?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No; freight.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In most cities our railway companies have contracted with certain cartage companies for the handling of freight business, because they have found that it is not profitable or desirable for a transportation company to go into the collection and delivery of goods. I submit, honourable gentlemen, that experience in transportation has taught those connected with it that from the very moment a railway company, through its freight traffic department, solicits express business and attempts to carry on the delivery of express packages, the express business starts to dwindle and to go to the competitor that is highly specialized and has an organization right up to the minute looking after it.

May I revert now to what I believe to be the English custom? The railroad over which the President of the Canadian National Railways had formerly jurisdiction, and which he managed, I understand, most satisfactorily to all concerned, is not similar to the Canadian National Railway system. It is a railroad serving a densely populated area, and the longest haul, I am informed, is a distance of 120 miles. It is practically a suburban distribution service, such as an express company performs, if you please, on the island of Montreal, only a somewhat larger scale. That is not parallel with the task of handling the express business of 22,000 miles of railroad, covering a continent. I hope I have succeeded in drawing the distinction regarding what seems to be in the mind of the gentleman who inspired that report that the English system is the desirable one. If it were, some of the United States railroads, and our own Canadian Pacific Railway, would, it seems to me, have found it desirable to adopt a system of that sort ere this.

If the Government can assure the House that it is the intention of the Canadian National Railways to continue to have its express business handled under the jurisdiction and administration of the express officials, as has been the case up to the present time, then I have no objection to this legislation; but if, on the other hand, the purpose is to dispense with the skilled officials and employees, or a large number of them, and hand over the express business to the officials of a freight traffic department, who have never had any experience, and have little knowledge of express problems, then I say that this House is passing legislation which will result in the loss of a great deal of business and in considerable inconvenience to the patrons of the Canadian National Railways, and will do an injustice to a great many employees. I hope that the honourable leader of the Government will be able to assure the House that that is not the policy which the Government has in mind.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The policy which the Government has in mind is the policy recommended to it by the present board of management, whose voice my honourable friend heard a moment ago when I read that statement. There is no policy on the part of the Government for the management of this express business. It will remain under the proper authorities, who will have the responsibility, and I surmise that the new Management, having already a complete expert staff for the handling of express business, will not throw that organization to the winds and take on raw hands, or men with little experience. They will co-ordinate the services, but will, I surmise, retain the men of experience they already have at the head of that business.

My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Robertson) has stated that he does not know of any railway companies in North America administering their own express systems. I will give him my experience, which is shared by some of the Senators who hail from my own city. About 1888 or 1892 an Act was passed, which may still be on the Statute Book, authorizing any company to do express business and to offer its express freight to any railway company handling that business for another company, or other companies. The proviso was added that this did not cover the case of railways doing their own express business.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: But there were none.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There were none at that time. A company was organized, composed of business men of the city of Montreal who claimed to have grievances against the old order of things. The Company gathered quite a large amount of capital, provided itself with horses and wagons—it was before motor trucks came in—and announced that it would start business on a front street on a certain date. Of course it took a few months for that company to organize. I can still recall the splendid show that the company made with its dozens of teams and its express wagons all freshly painted and with flourishing titles, moving about the city, to announce that on the following day it would receive freight to feed the Grand Trunk Railway Company. What had the Grand Trunk Railway Company done while all that work was going on? It had quitely proceeded to absorb the express company which was serving that railway, and when the newcomers came and offered freight they said, "You are not entitled to offer us freight, because we are doing our own express business." There was a lawsuit, the new company went into liquidation and the entire capital was lost, and it was demonstrated that the Grand Trunk Railway Company was running its own express business. Nothing had been changed. The same men were there, but they had covered themselves and prevented competition.

Now, here is an express system which is serving the Canadian National Railways. The new management under Sir Henry Thornton says, "We shall do our own express business." I surmise that it means, "We shall do it with the staff we have at present." However, I would draw the attention of Sir Henry Thornton and of the Senate to this situation, which came to my notice in the autumn and winter of 1921-22. There was a contraction of business at that time and an employee of the Dominion Express Company stated that he, with quite a number of drivers, had been laid off because work was slack. He was asked, "Is the same thing being done on the Canadian National Railways?" He answered: "No; they have quite a large staff —much larger than the Dominion Express Company, but of course, as it is the Government that pays, nobody is being laid off. They are giving Montreal a better and quicker service than the Dominion Express Company, because they are always ready to send a team out a mile or two to get a parcel, whereas we of the Dominion Express Company have to wait for a certain number of calls from one direction before we go and collect the parcels." I mention that because I think Sir Henry Thornton and his associates will have to look into every nook and corner in order to see if the system of patronage, which works into every administration supposed to belong to a Government, is not weighing too heavily upon the finances of the railway company.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My honourable friend has illustrated and emphasized the point that I tried to make, and has done so, I am sure, much more clearly than I did myself. If the executive of the Canadian National Railways will imitate the example set by the Grand Trunk Railway Company in the case my honourable friend referred to, by operating the express business as a separate entity, under a separate management, as heretofore, then it will be all right. But this legislation empowers the Canadian National Railway Company to obliterate the express company entirely, and there will be no express business. It may be called a fast freight or a package freight, or anything you like. In any case, according to the newspaper reports, it is to be operated by the traffic officials or traffic department of the railway, and with all due respect to the railroad management, I submit that that will be a mistaken policy if adopted. If the present management will simply imitate the example that my honourable friend has pointed out, owning the express business, but having it operated by a staff of experienced and capable administrators who have no interest but to make the express business a success, that will be what I want to see done. That is what I hope the honourable leader of the Government will impress upon the management of the railway as being the desire of this House, and I am sure that if that can be done, the express business and the reputation of the Canadian National Railways will be maintained. If the other system is adopted—and it seems to be the intended policy of the executive—then I respectfully suggest that failure and dissatisfaction are bound to follow.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I understand that Mr. C. A. Hayes is to be put in charge of the express business. With Mr. Hayes in charge I do not think the people of this country should fear that there will be any disruption of the express business or that it will be mismanaged in any way. He is one of the most capable men in the railway business in this country. He was at one time General Manager of the Intercolonial. He is Vice-President of the Canadian National, and he knows all the ropes. I think that the dire forebodings of my honourable friend who has just spoken will not be realized.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I understand that Mr. Hayes is not the head of the express company. I am credibly informed it is Mr. Robb, who has no express or traffic experience whatever, but was connected with the mechanical department of the old Grand Trunk. So far as Mr. Hayes is concerned, there can be no two opinions about his qualifications; but if he is controlled by a man known as the Vice-President, at a salary of $25,000 a year, it does not auger very well for the efficiency of the express service, especially as this man Robb has never had any experience with it. I do not think the placing of Mr. Robb at the head of the express service at such a salary can be justified.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I understood Mr. Hayes was to be at the head of it.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No; he is to be under Mr. Robb, Vice-President of the express company, who is to receive $25,000 a year.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In order that there may be no misunderstanding as to my feeling toward any officials of the company, may I say that my remarks have been made entirely without regard to any individual official. I have known Mr. Hayes as General Freight Agent of the Grand Trunk, Traffic Manager of the Canadian National, and for years Manager of the Intercolonial, and I will say that there is no more efficient or capable freight traffic manager in Canada. But I submit that Mr. Hayes is no better acquainted with the express business and problems than several other gentlemen who have heretofore been connected directly with them.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What about Robb?

Some Hon. SENATORS: Carried.

Section 1 was agreed to.

Section 2 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

THE ITALIAN CONVENTION BILL

FIRST READING

Bill 153, an Act respecting a certain Trade Convention between His Majesty and the King of Italy.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR inquired, of the Government:

1. Referring to the accounts of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the year ending 31st December, 1922, what amount received on account of losses paid by underwriters is included in the statement for the year?

2. In respect of what vessels were these losses paid, with amount of each claim paid for each vessel.

3. In respect of what vessels were adjusted losses of $125,898.68 due by underwriters, with amount for each vessel.

4. (a) What was the amount of insurance claims, with name of vessel and amount of claim in each case, in respect of which the estimated amount recoverable was $957,326.89. (b) Are any of these claims disputed? If so, which, and on what grounds in each case?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

1 and 2. See Statement No. 1, attached.

3. See Statement No. 2, attached.

4. (a) See Statement No. 3, attached. (b) No claim has been disputed by the underwriters.

DIVORCE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill C5, an Act for the relief of Grace Lees Smiley.—Hon. Mr. Blain.

POSITION OF WALTER DUNCAN

ANSWER TO INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have an answer for the honourable gentleman from Edmonton (Hon. Mr. Griesbach) with regard to the status of Mr. Walter Duncan. I received the following memorandum from the Post Office Department, with copies of letters attached:

Referring to the question asked by Senator Griesbach in regard to Mr. Walter Duncan, the Acting Postmaster General will find enclosed copies of two letters given to Mr. Duncan at the time he was loaned to the Postmaster General for special investigation work in connection with the theft of $50,000, from the Edmonton Post Office in August, 1919.

It will be noted that Mr. Duncan is described in the letter given him by the Postmaster General, dated October 16th, as "Federal Investigating Officer representing the Postmaster General."

As regards the allegation that he describes himself as "Chief Federal Police Investigator," that would be a matter for attention by the Department in which he is employed, namely, the Department of Finance. The Post Office Department is not conversant with the details of his employment or the title which attaches to his position in that Department.

Then follow two letters:

Ottawa, October 16th, 1922.

To whom it may concern:

This is to certify that the bearer, Walter Duncan, is a Federal Investigating Officer, representing the Postmaster General, with full authority to enquire into, on his behalf, the loss of valuable registered parcels from the Edmonton Post Office, and as it is in the public interest to clear the matter up, the undersigned respectfully requests that any assistance for which Mr. Duncan may ask will be given him.

Chas. Murphy,
Postmaster General.

There is this other letter from the Postmaster General:

To the Bank Managers of the city of Edmonton, and to each of them:

This will be presented by Mr. Walter Duncan, Special Investigator Dominion Police, Department of Finance, Ottawa, who has undertaken a special duty for the undersigned, and who may require your assistance.

In view of the importance of the investigation upon which Mr. Duncan is engaged, the undersigned bespeaks your good offices in his regard.

Charles Murphy,
Postmaster General.

Being thus directed by that memorandum of the Post Office Department to the Department of Finance, I asked that Department for information, and I was informed that Mr. Walter Duncan had been loaned to the Finance Department by the Department of Justice, which has under its jurisdiction the R.C.M. police. I then directed my inquiry to the Department of Justice, and I found that the said Walter Duncan was, in June last, detailed by the Minister of Justice for work in connection with the Finance Department, with the title of Chief Investigator, and was instructed to make his reports direct to the Finance Department.

PATENT BILL

FURTHER CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

The Senate again went into Committee on Bill 20, an Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to Patents of Inventions.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. Bradbury in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would ask Mr. O'Halloran to come to the floor of the House.

On section 7—who may obtain patents:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Can my honourable friend state the difference between clause 7 of the Bill and the corresponding clause in the present Act?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The memorandum on the Bill which has been distributed contains the clause of the present Act, which we will call the old clause. I will read it:

Any person who has invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement in any art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter, which was not known or used by any other person before his invention thereof, and which has not been in public use or on sale with the consent or allowance of the inventor thereof, for more than one year previously to his application for patent therefor in Canada, may, on a petition to that effect, presented to the Commissioner, and on compliance with the other requirements of this Act, obtain a patent granting to such person an exclusive property in such invention.

The words that are struck out of this clause are: "which has not been in public use or on sale with the consent or allowance of the inventor thereof," and "one year" is changed to "two years." There is also a change from the word "Canada."

The explanation of this change is as follows:

The principal difference between this clause and section 7 of the Act which it replaces is that under the present Act, the patent cannot be granted if the inventor has allowed the invention to go into public use or on sale for more than one year before making his application.

Under the new clause the time is extended to two years but the public use or sale of the invention for a longer period is a bar to granting the patent whether such use or sale is with the consent or allowance of the inventor or not.

Under the present law the inventor may wait for an indefinite time before applying for his patent and may obtain the patent if the invention has been in public use or on sale for say ten years, provided such public use and sale has not been with the consent or allowance of the inventor.

It will be seen that the new conditions are more strict than the old.

There is a great difference of opinion as to whether the time should be one year as it is in the old or two years as it is in the new but the majority are in favour of the two year period.

In the old, public use or sale in any part of the world is a bar to the granting of the patent while in the new, the public use or sale is not a bar unless it be within Canada. It is thought that the change gives greater protection to Canadian patentees. The old provision in this regard is said to open the door to the unscrupulous to fabricate evidence.

That is, a person could oppose the granting of a patent by bringing evidence that the invention had been seen in Europe, or elsewhere, and there would be considerable difficulty in controverting that evidence. The general opinion is that if one wants to oppose the granting of a patent, he should allege that it has been already in use in Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am sorry to say I cannot appreciate the reasons given for the change in the present law. Section 7 of the present law recognizes the right of the patentee to an invention that has been in use for not more than a year, with his consent. Now, there must be a recognition on the part of the public, in the public use of that patent, that the consent of the patentee has been given for its use. I think we shall agree upon that. That is to say, during that period there must be, continuously, recognition by the public that they are using an invention with the consent of the patentee; and he, before the expiration of a year, must make application for a patent.

The present Bill proposes to dispense entirely with the consent of the patentee: he is not a party to the public use of the article in any way; and the period of time is doubled. That is to say, the article may be in use for two years by the public without their having any knowledge of the patentee or his title or claim to a patent; therefore the element of consent is entirely absent; and during the period of two years it is quite possible for anyone to take up the manufacture of that article without being aware that latently there lies a hidden claim to that article by the patentee. In other words, he can test the sentiment of the public or the value of the article to the public by the use of it during those two years before deciding whether at the expiration of the two years he shall make application for the patent. What may happen during those two years is this. Some investor may spend a very considerable amount of money in the manufacture of that article; he is unaware, because the Act is silent upon it, that there is any claim by any person to this particular article as a patent. Then, at the end of two years, there suddenly emerges upon the horizon someone who claims that he is the patentee of the article, and the entire position is changed. The man who invested in the manufacture finds that this investment has gone for naught, and the man who lay idle for two years applied for a patent to that article, claiming that the title is his. I cannot see wherein such a patentee should have the rights contemplated by this section. It seems to me, honourable gentlemen, that we are legislating all the time in the way of granting monopolistic privileges to patentees and that class of people, irrespective of the public rights. We grant to a patentee extraordinary privileges in giving him a patent; we give him a patent extending practically over a generation, under which he enjoys a monopoly of the right to manufacture and as to the price he shall charge, and other monopolistic rights against the public. Hence there should be no sympathetic regard by Parliament for a patentee unless he makes application immediately for his grant of a patent. In my judgment the inventor of a patent ought to file a caveat at once; no extended time should be given him as against the public. He knows whether he has a valuable patent or not. Why should the public be deluded for twenty-four months with the idea that the use of it can be enjoyed without anyone in the future claiming any monopoly over it? Unless my honourable friend can show good sound policy for increasing the period of time, I am certainly opposed to it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have just read a memorandum which states that the new clause is stricter as against the inventor than the old one.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think you are warranted in concluding that that is the case; in fact, I feel absolutely sure that it is not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will read the statement again:

> The principal difference between this clause and section 7 of the Act which it replaces is that under the present Act, the patent cannot be granted if the inventor has allowed the invention to go into public use or on sale for more than one year before making his application.
> Under the new clause the time is extended to two years but the public use or sale of the invention for a longer period is a bar to granting the patent whether such use or sale is with the consent or allowance of the inventor or not.

My honourable friend urges the one-year period. The Senate may decide, if it so chooses. Under the old Act he was not debarred at all: he could wait five or ten years.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not see that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Unless he had consented to the use.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under the present law he has the right to consent to the use for twelve months. Under the new Bill he can wait for two years, and then make his application.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But he cannot wait longer.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If, with his consent, the article has been in public use for more than twelve months, he is debarred.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But he is not debarred if he has not given his consent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under the new clause he may or may not give his consent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But then he is stopped after two years. Under the new clause the time is extended to two years.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He is estopped now in one year.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If he has given his consent. In the majority of cases he has not given his consent. My honourable friend says we must protect the public. There are many instances in which an article, say a piece of machinery, happens to be tested, and very often considerable work has been done upon it, when the inventor comes to the conclusion that he has a valuable article. Sometimes it will be judged by the results produced, and considerable time elapses between the date of the original invention and the date when the inventor decides to make his application.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Why should he allow the public to perfect his invention during those two years, and then take advantage of it. If it has been in public use for those two years, it means that the public has made use of it, and every man who has made use of it has doubtless added to it, and at the end of two years he suddenly emerges and says: "This is my patent."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend will read clause 50 of the old Act, he will find this situation provided for. I am reading clause 50 of the present Bill, which is the same as the old one:

Every person who, before the issuing of a patent has purchased, constructed or acquired any invention for which a patent is afterwards obtained under this Act, shall have the right of using and vending to others the specific article, machine, manufacture or composition of matter patented and so purchased, constructed or acquired before the issue of the patent therefor, without being liable to the patentee or his legal representatives for so doing. . .

So my honourable friend will see that this case is provided for. The advantage of the new clause is that the owner or inventor is barred after the two years, whether he consents or not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would suggest to my honourable friend that we go on with the other sections of the Bill. Then we shall appreciate probably to a greater extent their application to this particular section. We can afterwards return to this, and reconsider it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Agreed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In that way we shall probably save time.

Section 7 stands.

On section 8—inventions for which foreign patents have been taken out:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under section 8 of the Act, which this clause replaces, the inventor is allowed one year after the granting of his earliest foreign patent to apply in Canada for his patent for the same invention. This has been found to be too long, as in some patent offices—the United States, for instance—applications are pending for years before being granted. Under the new clause the application must be filed in Canada within one year from the date of the filing of the earliest foreign application. For the protection of inventors whose foreign applications have already been filed, one year from the coming into force of the new Act will be allowed for filing in Canada, provided that patent has not been granted on the foreign application for more than one year.

Subsection 2 is added to meet the terms of Article 4 of the International Convention, which provides that the inventor filing his first application in any country belonging to the Convention shall have 12 months for filing in all other countries belonging to the Convention, and the applications filed in the other countries shall be given the same filing date as the first application. These words are at the end of the clause:

But no patent shall be granted on an application for patent for an invention which has been patented or described in a patent or printed publication in this or any foreign country more than two years before the date of the actual filing of the application in Canada, or which had been in public use or on sale in Canada for more than two years prior to such filing.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is made to correspond with section 7, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is made to correspond with 7. However, since we are suspending section 7, we may as well allow clause 8 to stand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, sections 7 and 8.

Section 8 stands.

On section 9—improvements may be patented:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is old. There is no change.

Section 9 was agreed to.

On subsection 1 of section 10—oath of inventor to be made before obtaining patent:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Subsection 1 of section 10 is not altered.

On subsection 2 of section 10—or of the applicant if inventor dead, incapable, or his residence unknown:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In subsection 2 the following words have been added after the word "dead" in the first line:

—or mentally or physically incapable, or if, after the assignment of his invention, the inventor refuses to make such oath or affirmation, or if his whereabouts cannot be ascertained after diligent inquiries.

Experience has shown that this addition is necessary. In a case reported to the Patent Office action was taken by way of mandamus—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the reason for mental incapacity being made a ground for this application?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under the present law, the affidavit must be made by the inventor himself, so that if he becomes mentally or physically incapable of giving his affidavit, the machinery is provided for his heirs or representatives to do so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the nature of that affidavit for which provision is made under clause 10?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The application must be accompanied by an affidavit from the inventor that he is the inventor of the article.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then the question arises whether the language is sufficient to embrace the case of an insane person. He would not have a "legal representative." There might be a committee in lunacy, but I am unaware of a "legal representative" representing a person mentally incapacitated.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In the interpretation clause "legal representatives" is defined:

"Legal representatives" includes heirs, executors, administrators, guardians, curators, tutors, assigns or other legal representatives.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think that will be broad enough.

Section 10 was agreed to.

On section 11—refusal to execute assignment; disputes between joint applicants; powers of Commissioner:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Section 11 is a new clause:

In any case where—

(a) an applicant has agreed in writing to assign a patent when granted to another party or a joint applicant and refuses to proceed with the application; or,

(b) disputes arise between joint applicants as to proceeding with an application;

the Commissioner, on proof of such agreement to his satisfaction, or if satisfied that one or more of such joint applicants ought to be allowed to proceed alone, may allow such other party or joint applicant to proceed with the application, and may grant a patent to him, so however that all parties interested shall be entitled to be heard before the Commissioner, and an appeal shall lie from the decision of the Commissioner after such notice as he may deem requisite and sufficient under this section to the Exchequer Court.

At the Imperial War Conference of 1917 certain amendments proposed to be made to the British Act were submitted for the consideration of the delegates with a view to their adoption by their respective Governments. In a memorandum prepared by the Department in connection with the Imperial War Conference 1918 it was recommended that certain amendments, including the present one, be adopted. Experience has shown that this amendment would be useful.

Section 11 was agreed to.

On section 12—address to be stated:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is a new clause. I think that the section which it replaces will be found in the Memorandum:

Every applicant for a patent shall for the purposes of this Act state in his application, if resident in Canada, his address in Canada, and if not so resident, the name and address of some person resident in Canada to represent and stand in the place and stead of such applicant or patentee for all purposes of this Act, including the service of any proceedings taken under any provision of this Act.

This clause as it appeared when the Bill was introduced was in the terms of section 12 of the Patent Act, under which the applicant simply elected domicile in some city, without giving any address therein. In consequence, the section has served no purpose. Difficulties were experienced in locating foreign patentees for the serving of papers and other purposes. It is thought this clause as passed by the Commons would overcome the difficulty.

Section 12 was agreed to.

On section 13—particulars required on application:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is the old clause.

Section 13 was agreed to

On section 14—specifications:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is an alteration in subsection 2 of 14.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is subsection 1 the same?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Subsection 1 explains more clearly the requirements without changing the sense. Subsection 2 is amended by striking out the words, "and by two witnesses to such signature of the inventor or applicant." It has been found in practice that witnesses to the signature of the applicant on the specifications are unnecessary, and are not required in Great Britain, the United States and other countries. Subsection 3 is struck out, as the purport of it is embodied in subsection 1 of this clause. The sense is the same.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Are you striking it out of this Bill?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Subsection 3 of the former section is embodied in the first subsection of section 14 of this Bill.

Subsection 4 of the old clause is changed to 3, but there is no other change in it.

Section 14 was agreed to.

On section 15—examination:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is a slight change:

On each application for a patent a careful examination shall be made by competent examiners to be employed in the patent office for that purpose.

This clause was added to the Bill in the Committee of the Commons. It replaces section 15 of the Act, which was left out of the Bill for the following reasons.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But section 15 of the present Bill is very similar to 15 of the Act. I do not see any substantial difference, except that under the old Act a thorough and reliable examination is required, and under the present Bill you require a careful examination. It seems to me the language in the old Act was more applicable to the situation than the language of the present Bill. That is to say, a thorough and reliable examination would be very much more desirable than a careful examination.

Hon. G. V. WHITE: Honourable gentlemen, would it not be advisable to add there, "careful and thorough examination"?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. A "careful examination" does not indicate anything, because a careful examination might not at all meet the purpose. It might be made by an incompetent person, or by a person failing to understand the nature or qualities of the patent. Why drop the language of the present Act, "a thorough and reliable examination"?

Hon. M. DANDURAND. It has been a source of trouble with the examining staff—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To make a thorough and reliable examination?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: —owing to the difference of opinion as to the nature and extent of the duty that it imposed on them. It is misleading and unfair to the public, who, seeing it in the Act, naturally assume that its terms are carried out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But should not the terms be carried out? Is not that the only way to protect the public?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend will allow me perhaps we shall see light. Not only are the terms not carried out, but it is not practicable to carry them out, that is, to make an examination for novelty that may be relied on as determining whether the invention disclosed in the application has or has not been previously patented or published in this or any other country. In France no attempt is made to examine for novelty. They have simply a system of registration. The patent is granted to any person complying with the prescribed rules and forms, and it is left to the court to determine whether the patent is valid or not. In Great Britain the examination is limited to the country's own records, and for not more than the past fifty years. In the United States an attempt is made at such an examination as our Act requires, but little reliance is now placed on it. Notwithstanding their enormous examining staff, in the opinion of a former United States Commissioner of Patents, recently expressed, they are slowly coming to the system of registration, such as they have in France. In order to make this exhaustive examination for novelty, the records of the patents of all countries of the world which publish them, namely, Great Britain, the United States, France, Germany, etc., etc., as well as all official publications which describe inventions must be assembled and classified. The mass of this matter is to-day so enormous that the task and expense in so dealing with it make the undertaking almost hopeless, to say nothing of the staff that would have to be built up to deal with the matter. The examining staff in the Washington office is well over 400. To make our examining staff bear the same relation to our work as the admittedly inadequate staff at Washington bears to the work of that office, our staff would have to be increased fivefold. To attempt to prepare a classification of foreign patents and publications would necessitate an initial appropriation of many hundreds of thousands of dollars, followed by many others. The nature and the extent of the examination to be made should be fixed by Order in Council instead of by statute. The Patent Office is of the opinion that the reasonable course for Canada to follow is to limit its examinations to its won records. We undertake to give the alleged inventor a patent and accept his fee. We should see that we have not already given the patent to someone else. Nothing more can be done with any sort of satisfaction either to the office or to the public. If the applicant makes a misrepresentation as to the novelty of his invention, the matter can be set right in the court.

In Canada, during the current fiscal year, over 12,000 patents will be issued. The examining staff in the United States is over 400; the Canadian is about 25. To make the Canadian proportionately equal to the Unied States, about 100 examiners would have to be added, at an annual average salary of, say $2,500, making a total of $250,000.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: At that point may I ask, is the Patent Office self-supporting? It certainly should be.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The annual net revenue, after all expenses have been deducted except the rental of the building, shows the balance to be $250,000 in favour of the Patent Office.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To pay 25 examiners?—That should leave a very substantial surplus.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In all, our annual expenditure would be increased about $500,000. And what would be the benefit derived therefrom? Our patents would only be equal to those of the United States, and no more reliance would be placed on them.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let me ask my honourable friend: is there any distinction drawn between the examination of foreign patents and that of domestic patents? It seems to me we might very well accept the finding of a foreign Government touching a patent of that particular country. I scarcely see the necessity of going into an extended examination of a foreign patent that has already been examined by a foreign state; but in respect of a domestic patent, of course it is manifest that it should be thoroughly examined. Would not the duties of the office be considerably reduced by drawing that distinction?

My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) directs attention to the fact that by reducing the duties of the Patent Office the question of controversy might be determined by the courts. It is very much better to have a congestion of work in the Patent Office than a congestion of work in the courts; and, inasmuch as the Patent Office is self-supporting and produces a very substantial surplus, apparently, according to the statement already given by my honourable friend, it seems to me that we can scarcely enter upon anything more remunerative than to extend the duties of the Patent Office, so long as there is a corresponding increase of revenue.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is just the question: would it increase our revenue? I think it would clean out our revenue.

Hon. G. V. WHITE: I would like to ask the Minister whether there is any reference library in connection with the Patent Office.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is a library: of course, more money could be spent upon it.

Hon. Mr. WHITE: I am given to understand that the means at the disposal of the examiners, in the way of library facilities, are very inadequate. I know that in both the Washington Patent Office and the British Patent Office there are very extensive libraries of research which are of inestimable value to the examiners. A recent article in the Scientific American gives a very full description of the library in connection with the British Patent Office, and it might be worth while putting an extract from it on record:

> The Patent Office Library in connection with the British Patent Office contains what is believed to be the finest collection of technical literature in existence. Including the patent specifications which go back as far as the early 17th century there are more than 200,000 bound works, embracing nearly every language. The library is also in receipt of some 3,000 technical periodicals from all parts of the world. Admission is free.

It seems to me that, if the examiners are to be enabled to carry out their duties successfully, they ought to have adequate means at their disposal in the way of books of reference.

Section 15 was agreed to.

Section 16 was agreed to.

On section 17—patents to be for special methods or processes of manufacture:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is a new clause, and the remarks which I made under clause 11 will apply.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To what extent is paragraph 2 a departure from the existing law? I notice that hereafter no patent is to be precluded free manufacture or free sale or use of an article for human food or medical purposes. Is that the law as it stands to-day?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The present Act makes no such distinction.

Various instances will have occurred in which Germans have patented a process for producing a new drug or medicine, and have also a separate patent or a separate claim for the substance produced by the patent process. The result is that nobody can, until the expiration of the patent, make the drug or medicine by any other process. In some countries the process only in such cases is allowed to be patented. In the amendment now proposed no patent is to preclude the free manufacture or the free sale or use of any article for human food or for medical purpose.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Would that authorize the Commissioner to name the price at which the article would be sold?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What about patent medicine?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Commissioner may grant a license, but will fix the royalty for the using of that process.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Inasmuch as my honourable friend has raised this point, may I give expression to a view which I hold in regard to patents? I think the Government should exercise the fullest control in regard to the manufacture and price, so as to preclude all thought of a monopoly being created by the owner of a patent. To what extent, may I ask my honourable friend, will this new Bill permit of that being done? We give a very valuable right to an inventor; we furnish to him not only our own market of nine millions of people, but we furnish to him a standing in the markets of the world, because of the rights which he may exercise under any convention which Canada may enter into. So much for the regulation of price and manufacture. These elements should enter into the policy of the law.

There is another question, that of taxation. To what extent does the Government of Canada profit by the levy of taxation upon patents? This is an age in which we have to exercise every resourcefulness and every ingenuity with a view to increasing the sources of taxation. It seems to me that if there is anything which should be made susceptible to the imposition of taxation, it is patents; at the same time, I am unaware whether we levy anything like a rate of taxation upon patents. We impose certain fees and the payment of certain rates; but a general levy of taxation is not made upon patents in the same way as it is made upon real estate, investments, or any other class of property. Here is a class of property which certainly should be made susceptible to taxation, and substantial taxation. If the Budget had not already been brought down, I should have been very glad indeed to see the Minister of Finance work out the problem of collecting a substantial amount out of the various patents which we protect in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend is touching two questions: the first is covered by this Act, and my honourable friend will find that the Department is trying, under clause 40, to obtain the right to impose conditions of sale for the protection of the public.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Are they not satisfied that they have succeeded in doing it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department hopes to have created and organized the proper machinery.

As to the other question, that about proprietary medicines, which do not fall under this Act, I cannot tell my honourable friend whether the stamps which we pay for on every bottle of patent medicine bought—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not refer to patent medicines alone; I refer to every patent in Canada. There must be in Canada patents estimated at—well, I will not say how many hundreds of millions of dollars; but there certainly must be patents the value of which would represent, I should think, at a low estimate, one billion dollars. Of course, I speak very generally, without any accurate data before me. But when one takes into consideration the very great values attached to the more important classes of patents, one can readily conceive how the value of patents within the Dominion of Canada would easily reach one billion dollars. To permit of that source of revenue to be exempted from the burden of taxation, is, it seems to me, an outrage. If there is any class of property which would readily yield to the payment of taxes, it is the patents granted by this and other legislatures. I do not know of any other class of property that should appeal to us less sympathetically than patents, and I should recommend the necessity of imposing upon them a substantial taxation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will make it my duty to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to this class of property. Of course, my honourable friend realizes that if some of these patents are coining money for their owners, that money is reached through the prosperity of the institution holding them, by one tax or another. Yet, probably it would be interesting to examine into the opportunity of taxing them further.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That argument would apply to every species of property. Any class of property, according to what my honourable friend says, might be exempt on account of the indirect or direct returns being taxed under some other head. If he took that ground, we would exempt practically all classes of property from taxation, in case they should indirectly contribute through other channels.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: If that class of property is to be taxed, there should be some arrangement whereby the tax will not be passed on to the consumer by an increase in the price of the article.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will protect the consumer under section 40.

Section 17 was agreed to.

On section 11—powers of commissioner (reconsidered):

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My attention has been drawn to an error in this clause. When it was amended in the Committee of the other House, the words were inserted in the wrong line. I move:

That clause 11 be amended by striking out the words, "after such notice as he may deem requisite and sufficient," after the word "commissioner" in the fourteenth line of the clause, and by inserting the said words after the word "commissioner" in the thirteenth line of the clause.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 17, as amended, was agreed to.

Section 18 was agreed to.

On section 19—power of Commissioner to refuse grant:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This clause is new in part, and made to conform to clause 7, so I will ask that its consideration be postponed.

Section 19 stands.

Section 20 was agreed to.

On section 21—appeal to Exchequer Court:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This clause is new. It is simply an enactment of 3-4 George V, Chapter 17, amending the Exchequer Court Act, which in effect repeals the following section:

Every applicant who has failed to obtain a patent by reason of the objection of the Commissioner, as aforesaid, may, at any time within six months after notice thereof has been mailed, addressed to him or his agent, appeal from the decision of the Commissioner to the Governor in Council.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Is that appeal, mentioned in the second subsection, final? I am asking just for information. Or is there an appeal from the Exchequer Court?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think the general jurisdiction of the court would make it appealable, though I would not be positive.

Sections 21, 22, and 23 were agreed to.

On section 24—patents for inventions by persons in public service:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This clause has been added to the Bill at the request of the Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research. It refers to patents for inventions made by scientists employed in the Public Service in the course of their employment. While allowing the inventor to obtain patents for such inventions, it establishes the rights of the public therein and conserves the same.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: What is the difference between "making" and "constructing"?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They are to cover two different operations. The word "making" may apply to one, and "constructing" may apply to another.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would the finding of the Commissioner under clause 24 be appealable to the Exchequer Court? That is to say, where a patent of invention is issued to a public servant, the Commissioner has certain powers in permitting of the public using the patent on reduced royalty, etc., and the question is whether or not that finding would be an appealable one.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Subsection 5 provides:

Any decision of the Commissioner under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is to say, it would lie under section 24?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Section 24 was agreed to.

Sections 25 and 26 were agreed to.

On section 27—re-issue of patents:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is a slight change. This clause replaces section 24 of the old Act. It is proposed to insert the words "or less" after the word "more" in the third line of this clause, and after the word "patent" in the seventh line to insert "within four years from its date." In practice it has been found that a limit of time should be fixed for the presentation of application for the re-issuing of a patent. An inventor should discover in four years whether or not his patent is defective.

Hon. Sir. JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the effect of that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under the old Act he could apply at any time during the whole 18 years of the life of the patent for the re-issue of the patent. Now he must apply within four years from its issue.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Does clause 25 limit the life of a patent to 18 years?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is it renewable after that time?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Section 27 was agreed to.

On section 26 (re-considered)—term of patents:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Returning to section 26 for a moment: can my honourable friend explain why under the Patent law the term should be 18 years, whereas under the Copyright Act it is a much longer period? Are not the cases very analogous? It seems to me they are almost parallel. Because our ancestors granted a copyright for say fifty years, there is no reason why under the extraordinarily changed conditions of society today that position should be maintained, and under the Patent Act the term should be for only 18 years, because the one is just as vaulable a property as the other.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The reason which is advanced, and which may be—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And which may not be a good one.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:—the right one, is that a patent brings more money to its owner than a copyright.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Not necessarily.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, I said it with—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend said it with bated breath.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The novels of Harold Bell Wright bring more money than most patents do to-day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friend will admit that the number who have made millions by copyright is very small indeed as compared with the number who have made fortunes by inventions.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The patentee is protected under section 27. He may surrender his patent and get a re-issue within four years from a stated period.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would give him only 20 years.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He might go 17 years and then surrender his patent and get another one.

Hon Mr. DANDURAND. No. It does not go beyond the term of the original patent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: When the Copyright Act come up again we shall have to reconsider the period.

Section 26 was agreed to.

Sections 28 to 39, inclusive, were agreed to.

On section 40—conditions:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is a small amendment in section 40. I move to strike out the word "twenty-three" in the second line thereof, and substitute therefor the word "twenty-four."

Every patent, except those governed by section twenty-three, shall be subject to the following conditions.

It should be "twenty-four." The clauses were renumbered in the Commons.

The amendment was agreed to, and section 40, as amended, was agreed to.

On section 41—revocation of patent time limit:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the purport of sections 40 and 41?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: These two clauses are the most important of the Bill, and they replace sections 38, 39, 40 and 44 of the old Act. The sections to be repealed were enacted for the purpose of compelling the patentee to continuously manufacture his invention in Canada and supply it to the public at a reasonable price, and to prevent him from importing the invention into Canada. While they have served their purpose in some respects, they have failed to do so in others. It is thought that the proposed clauses will better serve the purpose of these sections, and will be free from some objectionable features attaching to them.

There is no doubt that it is the general desire that the law should, while assuring the inventor an adequate return for his invention, enable the public without difficulty to obtain it at a reasonable price. That is the principle which my honourable friend has been sanctioning.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. Will my honourable friend be good enough to point out wherein that authority is given to the Government?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In the latter respect, the law at present fails. The sections impose on the patentee the obligation of supplying his invention, but they do not give the public the right to compel him to do so. The only right of action that the public have, by reason of the default of the patentee is for the cancellation of the patent, which is not satisfactory. As in the majority of cases the person requiring the invention is not in a position to manufacture it, the cancellation of the patent is of no benefit to him.

The law requires the patentee to furnish the invention at a reasonable price. Difficulty arises in determining what is a reasonable price. Failing agreement between the patentee and the would-be purchaser, if action be taken and the Court finds that the price asked is too high, the patent is cancelled, although the patentee might have honestly considered he was entitled to the price which he asked.

The law requires the patentee to continuously manufacture the invention and forbids him to import it. There is difficulty in determining what constitutes manufacture and importation within the meaning of the Act. In a recent case in the Supreme Court four of the judges were of the opinion that the facts as established showed that the patentee had failed to manufacture and had imported, and as a consequence the patent was cancelled. A dissenting judge was of the opinion that the patentee had complied with the law in these respects and was in favour of sustaining the patent.

Owing to these uncertainties it is frequently difficult to determine whether Canadian patents are in force or not, which reduces their value, as naturally there is hesitancy in investing money in the exploitation of a patent which may turn out to be void through failure of compliance with these requirements of the Act.

If the proposed amendments be adopted, these difficulties and uncertainties will be removed, and in case of disagreement the court will fix the price at which the invention is to be supplied, and the patent will not be forfeited unless the patentee fails to supply the invention at that price within the time also to be fixed by the court.

These amendments will involve modification of the present importation provisions, which absolutely prohibit the importation of the invention on pain of nullity of the patent The amendments, while not expressly prohibiting the importation, will expose the patent to forfeiture if the manufacture of the invention is not carried on to an adequate extent within Canada.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: "Adequate" is a very wide term.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It gives some leeway to the inventor, who, if he imports one single article, is liable to a penalty of forfeiture of his patent.

The reason that has always been given for the retention of section 38 is that over 75 per cent of our patents are granted to United States citizens, and it was said that were it not for the provisions of this section the patented invention would be imported from the United States plants, and Canada would get nothing in return for the patent. It is now thought that the proposed clause will safeguard Canada's interests in this regard. Any loss that might result from the relaxation of the importation provision, it is thought, will be more than compensated by the benefits to be derived from the adherence to the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property, for which the amendment will open the way. This Convention was consituated in 1883, and is composed of the principal countries of the world. Its whole spirit is shown in Article 2 of the constitution, which declares that subjects or citizens of each of the contracting countries shall, as regards patents, trade-marks, etc., in all other countries of the Union will enjoy the advantages that their respective laws grant to their own subjects or citizens.

In some important countries, notably the United States, Japan and Germany, Canadians are at present under certain disabilities as compared with the citizens or subjects of those countries. In 1900 Canada endeavoured to join the Union, but failed owing to the repugnancy between its importation provision and Article 5 of the Convention, which states that introduction of the patented invention made in a Union country into the country where the patent was granted shall not entail forfeiture. By the proposed amendment this repugnancy will be removed and the way opened for joining the Union, for which there is a very general demand. I am informed that the Canadian manufacturers are supporting this change.

In amending the Act in 1903, section 44 was enacted to provide for the granting of licenses in respect to certain patents covering inventions which it would be unreasonable to require the patentee to manufacture in the absence of a special demand. If the proposed amendment be adopted, this section will be repealed. The amendment will apply to all patents, without regard to the nature of the inventions covered by them.

Under the special provisions of the Act, the Commissioner may extend the limited time for manufacture and importation, and may place patents under section 44 at his discretion. The Commissioner is moved to exercise this discretion by formal petitions more or less volumnious and supported by affidavits or some declarations. These petitions require careful consideration; orders must be made thereon; and there is much correspondence therewith. In some years over five thousand were dealt with in the Patent Office These petitions would be entirely done away with by the amendments, as there would be no fixed time to extend, and section 44 would be repealed.

Now I will read the new clauses 40 and 41, so that they may be dealt with in the light of the explanation I have given.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are a bit lengthy.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friends are satisfied—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should like to ask whether the Government has ever given consideration to the issuance of licenses for the manufacture of patented articles in Canada, when the patentee himself either represents that he is unable to proceed with the manufacture, or that there is not a sufficient market to manufacture? We have always had more or less trouble with the manufacturing clause in the Patent Act. The principle of granting licenses has been recognized in the Copyright Act, and it seems to me that it is a very sound principle to adopt. That is to say, the application for a license might be made for a patented article, and the Minister or the Government might determine upon what terms the license would be issued. The terms would embrace such elements as the selling price and the royalty to be paid to the patentee. If a policy of that kind were adopted, we could easily overcome the difficulties which confront the public to-day in the use of desirable articles that are patented and are sold at almost prohibitory prices. There is no reason why the public should not have the advantage in some way of the user of these articles, which, under the policy of selfishness which prevails, are without profit to either the patentee or the public.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am told that under this very clause provision is made for the suggestion which my honourable friend has outlined.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But what about the manufacture? Suppose the patentee says he cannot carry it on? I suppose that would permit of it being done?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: When the patentee declares his inability to do so, he will be asked to give a license.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It does not seem to me that paragraph (b) covers it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Paragraph (c) contains a broader provision.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Is there any control exercised over the price at which patented articles can be sold?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is intended to cover that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is provided for, and the Commissioner will have the power.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Paragraph (b) only allows the Commissioner to grant licenses for the use of the patent of invention.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will read paragraph (b) to my honourable friend. It says:

> The Commissioner shall then consider the petition, and, if the parties do not come to an arrangement between themselves, shall proceed to hear and determine the matter, and if it is proved to his satisfaction that the reasonable requirements of the public with respect to the patented invention have not been satisfied, the patentee may be ordered by him to supply the patented article within reasonable limits at such price as may be fixed by him and in accordance with the custom of the trade to which the invention relates as to the payment and delivery, or to grant licenses for the use of the patented invention as may be fixed by him, in either case within and after such time as may be fixed by him and on pain of forfeiture of the patent.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That does not put it very clearly Why do you not say "to manufacture".

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The interpretation of the Department is that it includes manufacture.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think it is as broad a term as can be used.

Sections 41 and 42 were agreed to.

On section 43—tariff of fees:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In this section certain clauses have been wrongly numbered, and I will move:

That sub-clause 1 of section 43 be amended by striking out the numbers 16 and 23 in the twelfth line thereof, and substituting the numbers 17 and 24 respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Subsection 2 is old.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It does not seem quite fair. You will not give him back any money if he has paid too much, but you will make him pay if he has not paid enough.

Section 43 was agreed to.

On section 44—fees in full for all services:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why is that clause necessary?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am told it has been left because of its age. It can be struck out.

Section 44 was agreed to.

Sections 45 and 46 were agreed to.

On section 47—restoration and revival of patents:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Section 47 is new, is it not? The Commissioner takes the place of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We have already had a fairly lengthy discussion of this clause. As I have stated, the Department is always represented in the Private Bills Committee, to these Bills asking for the revival of patents are sent by the Commissioner of Patents, whose opinion is asked for by the members. There must be certain evidence brought in by the applicant, and the Bill must conform to certain standard clauses. When the Committee, which is composed of perhaps twenty Senators, meets, the representative of the Department states that the Bill conforms to the regulations and the traditions; the standard clauses are there, and it passes. Having been a member of that Committee for a number of years, I know that we felt that we were doing a work which belonged to the Department, since the Department had practically the first and the last word with the Committee. There was a time when two or three members of this Chamber always looked somewhat severely upon these Bills, and yet the Bills passed. They went to the Committee, were reported on favourably, and were put upon the Statute Book.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We could never do anything with the Committee; that was the trouble.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Perhaps my honourable friend has a better memory than I have, but I doubt that he will challenge my statement that not one of these Bills was stopped. The representative of the Department to the Committee was always urged to take power to cure the defects caused say by the negligence of the patentee in bringing in his money for renewals in due time. I have stated the reasons usually given—the fact that the patentee was sick, or that his agent in Ottawa had died, or was sick, or was away, or that the letter had been mislaid—any kind of evidence on the formal affidavit was accepted. The Department has come forward with this clause in order to comply with the constantly expressed wishes of that Committee that Parliament should be relieved of this perfunctory work.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I can scarcely understand a Committee being so anxious that Parliament should dispense with its authority. There is a constant encroachment upon the authority of Parliament, both by Governments and permanent officials, and I for my part protest against that. Parliament is representative of the people, and should be the last authority, and should not pass its authority over to any bureau or to any Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Where would my honourable friend stop? We have already delegated considerable work to the various Departments. Shall we reopen these statutes and reassume powers that we have delegated to those Departments? I would draw the attention of my honourable friend to this fact, that these clauses are substantially in the terms of section 20 of the British Patent Act of 1907—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I don't care anything about the British Patent Act or what it contains.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: —similar powers being given thereunder to the British Comptroller to correspond to the Canadian Commissioner.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: This citing of the authority of Britain and the United States does not go with me in the Canadian Parliament.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I give, besides, the fact that we have put hundreds of people to the trouble and considerable expense of coming to this Parliament.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is owing to their negligence.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Certainly. It is their own fault.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is owing to their negligence, or sometimes their misfortune.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Those are often synonymous terms.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We are not responsible for them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And we have generally insisted upon such evidence as would clear them of negligence. I think that the underlying principle was that they had to show a misfortune—that some thing had gone wrong for which they were not actually personally responsible.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We always whitewash them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Now that we have had that experience, is this not a matter which should be delegated to the Commissioner? We are delegating to the Commissioner far more important functions. We have had hundreds of those applications before our Parliament, and twenty members of our Senate, sitting in Committee, have asked, "Should not the Commissioner be entrusted with that work?" The Commissioner is not asking for these powers; he has been actuated simply by a desire to meet the wishes of the Senate of Canada.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not care whether the Commissioner desires them or not. It is the principle that I object to. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) bolsters his argument by saying that we have delegated our authority in other matters—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In more important matters.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: —therefore we should do likewise in this case; because we have committed a fault before, we must commit another fault.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is not my argument.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I dislike and cannot understand the attitude of a Committee that, for the sake of saving themselves some trouble in listening to a matter, will want the Commissioner to decide it. What are they here for? What are they paid for? What are they appointed for? Just to do this sort of work.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will my honourable friend allow me to say, I think it would be more just to credit his confreres with the idea that work can be done better by the Commissioner than by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then it seems to me that these gentlemen hold a very small opinion of themselves.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They are very modest.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not hold so small an opinion of myself as that, for I think I would be quite as competent to judge of a matter of that kind as any Commissioner who ever occupied that important position; and if I did not think I was competent to decide a matter of that kind, I would not feel that I had a right to be here. Now, for mere laziness, for mere desire to shirk work, this Committee—I do not know what Committee it was, but I am sure it is not the present Committee—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Private Bills.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: This Committee is trying to get rid of its work, and to saddle it on a permanent officer who is not responsible to anybody. I strongly protest against that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Perhaps we are giving ourselves a great deal of unnecessary trouble. According to the information, there is not one in a thousand of those patents that would ever amount to anything.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Not one in a hundred.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: We will say not one in a hundred. People pay their good money for a patent and get nothing in return in the long run. My information is that only one patent in a hundred is successful, and there are some who say not one in a thousand ever amount to anything.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We must look after the thousandth.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then they should not come here.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: I wish to direct your attention to the fact that there is on the Order Paper a motion referring to clause 47.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is a notice of motion. It is not moved.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman from Grenville (Hon. Mr. Reid) can move that amendment on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I want my protest recorded.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is a slight clerical error in section 47 of this Bill. I move that subsection 1 be amended by adding after "1906," in the third line thereof, the words "or this Act."

The amendment was agreed to, and section 47 as amended was agreed to.

On section 48—Government may use patented invention:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I direct attention to the principle embodied in section 48, which I think is objectionable. It seems to me that the Government of Canada should have the right to use an invention without having to pay "a reasonable compensation." I am satisfied the Government should pay a compensation, but "a reasonable compensation" would be a compensation equivalent to that which anybody else would have to pay. Inasmuch as the Government of Canada grants this right to the patentee and under extraordinary circumstances may find it necessary to use the invention—for I remember that during the war the Government found it necessary to do so—they should not therefore be called upon to pay a farthing for the use of such invention. I think any court would interpret the language in this section as being a compensation that would be equivalent to that which would have to be paid by private persons or any aggregation of individuals. It seems to me therefore that if the word "reasonable" were left out, an opportunity would be afforded the Government to use an invention without having to pay an excessive price for it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know why this clause comes to us in its present form, but, in my opinion, after reading it, it will not increase the amount that should be granted the patentee.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It might.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes. "Reasonable compensation" means the value of that particular property, and I do not think that it is the intention of the Government that it should pay a compensation of the same amount that any individual should pay. I cannot recall at the moment the particulars, but I remember that during the war the question came up on two or three occasions as to the use of certain patented articles which the Government found it necessary to use. Inasmuch as the government grant extraordinary rights to the patentee, it should not be called upon to pay the full value of the patent.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not quite agree with my honourable friend. I am sorry to disagree with him. The Government grants patents to every person who makes a proper application and complies with the requirements. It does not grant the patent as a special favour, but grants it to any of its citizens or to citizens of other countries, under the law. If it were a special favour to a certain individual, it would be right for the Government to receive a corresponding compensation in the way of reduced price; but the Government should be treated in the same way as any other customer when it is doing for the patentee only what it does for everybody else. That would be my idea, and I do not see why it is necessary to have that section at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But it is not a new section.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not care whether it is new or not. There it is. Does my honourable friend think that simply because a thing has been there it must therefore remain? If it is nonsensical, for Heaven's sake strike it out. There is an appeal from the decision of the Commissioner, and any court would say, as my honourable friend from Calgary (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has said, that a reasonable compensation would be what everybody else paid. So it is not necessary to have the section at all unless the Commissioner has power to reduce the amount. When you put in the word "reasonable" and leave it to the court to interpret, the court would interpret it as meaning that the compensation should be the same as everyone else pays. Therefore it seems to me that you should either strike out the word "reasonable" or strike out the whole section.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may state that this is the old clause, modified by the addition of the last words, which give an appeal to the Exchequer Court from the decision of the Commissioner. Up to this time, under the old Act, the Commissioner himself fixed the amount. The purchase or expropriation or compensation was not contemplated, but simply the fixing of the royalty to which the patentee should be entitled when the Government happened to make use of the patent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But the Government would not use it except under extraordinary circumstances—under circumstances of public emergency or something of that kind.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I can give you an instance.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot clearly recall, but I know that during the war the Government found it necessary—I do not say actually to use, but to consider the propriety of making use of certain patented articles, which were not made on a sufficiently large scale to meet the emergency which had then arisen, and the question came up whether the Government would be justified in using those articles in view of the compensation which it would have to pay to the patentee. The patentee might be an absentee: he might be a foreigner.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That was a war measure.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend is in error. He has that personal experience in mind, but the Department has had much longer experience, and I am informed that the use of patented articles by the Government is of very frequent occurrence. They are used in the Printing Bureau the Marine and Fisheries Department, the Militia Department, and the Department of Railways and Canals, and the Commissioner is very often called upon, when the Department cannot agree with the patentee, to fix the amount.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But you tie up the Commissioner to an arbitrary standard in this clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But it is under that standard that the Commissioner has been operating for years, and he has been called upon only when there was a disagreement between one of these Departments and the patentee. Of course, he was the supreme judge.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Strike out the word "reasonable," and then you have some sense in your clause.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. The patentee could not recover for that a reasonable compensation, and it might be desirable that the Government should pay less.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But what objection is there to stating what is a matter of course—that the compensation shall be reasonable? Are we objecting to the expression, or to what it implies?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It implies an arbitrary standard of valuation.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Does it?

Hon. Mr BEAUBIEN: It seems to me that the word "reasonable" is a moderating term.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think so.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I think so too.

Hon Mr BEAUBIEN: We may give it different interpretations; if I read a provision that the Commissioner should fix a compensation and if it were not qualified by the term "reasonable," I for one would certainly consider that the Commissioner had been given an absolutely free hand—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: To go to the limit.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: —to give to the patentee the price that would be paid by anybody else. I think the term "reasonable" is a moderating term. That is my interpretation of it, and I certainly prefer to see the section remain as it is.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Have you not the power already, under section 41, to issue a license?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not think the Government should be treated differently from the individual.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am told that section 41 would not cover that.

Section 48 was agreed to.

Section 49 was agreed to.

On section 50—patent not to affect a previous purchaser:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have an amendment to propose. I move that the section be amended by striking out of the 13th and 14th lines of the following words: "with the consent or allowance of the inventor thereof."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Section 50 is an old clause, is it not? Are you changing it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am moving an amendment, but I will ask that section 50 be allowed to stand, because it works in conjunction with clause 7. This amendment is proposed in order to have the section conform to section 7. We will deal with section 50 when we have disposed of sections 7 and 8.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All right. You may have to restore those words if we change the other sections.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND. I move the amendment so as not to forget it.

Section 50 stands.

On section 51—patented article to be stamped or marked:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is an old clause.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why should it be necessary to put that stamp on each patented article? There are some articles that cannot be stamped. (Reading):

or when, from the nature of the article, this cannot be done, then by affixing to it, or to every package wherein one or more of such articles is or are enclosed, a label marked with a like notice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is a warning to the public.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Take, for instance, an artificial nose.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We have got rid of so much of our work now by handing it over to Commissioners that we can afford to take time on this. I think that is going to be pretty awkward. It is all right where it is possible to stamp it on the article itself; but what is the good of stamping it on the package? Once the package is broken, who is to see the stamp? Suppose you have 200 patented articles in a package: To make a sale of them you take them out of the package; you must. Are you going to exhibit the stamp on the package to everyone to whom you sell?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is very difficult to do away with a regulation which seems to have worked no hardship and which has been accepted by the public.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It has not been accepted by the public; it has not been followed. That is the reason why it has worked no hardship. Some busybody might make trouble.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: You have the proviso where possible.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What would you do with the patented head-dress known as the "transformation"?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Or the Marcel wave?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You would tie a notice to it, and cut it off.

Section 51 was agreed to.

Sections 52, 53, and 54 were agreed to.

On section 55—seal of Patent Office to be evidence:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is that new or old?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Old.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then it cannot be changed.

Section 55 was agreed to.

Section 56 was agreed to.

On section 57—register of attorneys:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is new. For many years past there has been a strong desire on the part of the patent attorneys practising in Canada that the Patent Act should provide for the registration of patent attorneys practising before the Patent Office, and since the Bill was printed further pressure has been exerted to have such a clause introduced in the present Bill. The Patent Office is strongly in accord with this proposal.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am unaware of any authorized body of patent attorneys. This is certainly a new graft of power.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Should not everybody have a right to do that work?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Certainly. You will have a close corporation authorized or formed at once.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is the dodge.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think I have a good client and a good cause. There are throughout Canada a number of dishonest persons who parade under the guise of patent attorneys and who are constantly defrauding the public and enticing innocent inventors whose minds are working in other channels to advise them of the value of their patent. These men ply their trade in every city, and the larger the city the more remunerative is the trade. The idea is to protect the public against those men who are tricksters, and to provide a register wherein only men of repute may be registered and classified as patent attorneys. My honourable friend will see that under clause 58:

For gross misconduct or any other cause which he may deem sufficient, the Commissioner may refuse to recognize any person as a patent agent or attorney either generally or in any particular case.

I have had within my own experience at the Bar at least a couple of glaring cases of poor people who thought they had a fortune in their hands in inventions that were absolutely worthless, and they were being made to pay their money in weekly instalments from their wages to men who had done nothing and could do nothing for them.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not see how the Commissioner is going to prevent the manipulation or machinations of the dishonest attorney. Does this mean that nobody except men who are registered in the Commissioner's office can act as an attorney?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is the intention.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: To shut out the whole mass of lawyers in this country unless they are registered as patent attorneys in the Patent Office? For one I protest against it. This Commissioner is to be the judge of who shall obtain a patent, or who shall act as an attorney for a patent?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may inform my honourable friend that regulations can and will be made to cover the standard of attorneys who will be admitted; and members of the Bar who want to register will only need to ask, so on that score their standing cannot be questioned and will not be questioned. But I believe that is an evil—I have seen it with my own eyes—which should be done away with, and that this is a proper move.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not think any such evil is widespread. There may be some dishonest patent attorneys as there is an occasional dishonest clergyman. But to talk about dishonesty being rampant is absolute nonsense. If an attorney of the supreme court of any province acts in the way which my honourable friend has mentioned, the courts of the land are open to the inventor and he can get redress; it is not necessary to appoint this great high mogul of a Commissioner to attend to that duty. To say that the lawyers of Canada have to pass the scrutinizing eye of this gentleman is an absurdity.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not said that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is what you are saying, or what he is saying, or what the Bill says.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. I say members of the Bar will only need to send their demands for registration.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think my honourable friend had better allow this to stand. When you take into consideration the fact that there are many thousands of practitioners in Canada, all of whom have a right to, and most of whom do, practise in patent matters, it will at once be seen how impossible it will be to establish a register of lawyers from the Atlantic to the Pacific who will have the right to perform any patent business; and as to suppressing the immoral or unmoral practitioner, that is utterly impossible. The Commissioner of Patents or the Government of Canada will never be able to separate the wheat from the chaff so far as legal practitioners are concerned. We have to put up with both. We would not be labouring under human conditions if we could purify the profession to such an extent that those practising before the Commissioner of Patents would be without spot or blemish. It would require a register probably larger than any used at the present time within the Dominion of Canada to register everybody who has and should have the right to represent an applicant for a patent before the Patent Office. I think my honourable friend should strike this out, and should rely upon the Patent Office to suppress as far as they can any crooked dealing in the way of these applications.

Hon. W. B. ROSS. I think we ought to go further than that. An applicant for a patent, of course, would have a right to state his case himself; but I think that he should have the right to take anyone else with him to represent him, whether he is a barrister or attorney or not. Very often an engineer or a scientific man could put up the case much better than any barrister could do it. I do not see why you should put a limit on a man. I object to a man being handicapped by anyone saying who he is to take with him to present his case.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We will let these two clauses stand.

Sections 57 and 58 stand.

Sections 59 and 60 were agreed to.

On section 61—cost of proceedings before the court.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is this new or old?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is new.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Has the Commissioner been stuck for costs any where?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is it not within the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court now to say who shall pay the costs? They could only be adjudged, I apprehend, by that Court.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I should think that in case of gross misbehaviour the Commissioner should be made to pay the costs.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think this calls for any particular legislation; the Department would surely indemnify the Commissioner if he should be called upon to pay the costs.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And if there is ignorance and gross negligence, he ought to pay them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend will not lose sight of the fact that he and I will then be paying.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I say that if by his gross negligence and ignorance he is stuck, he ought to pay.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does not the Department to-day indemnify those officers for any costs which they may be called upon to pay?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: In the lawful discharge of their duty, yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: These are appeals from the Commissioner.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Notwithstanding their being appeals from the Commissioner, they are really appeals from the Department. The Commissioner represents the Department. I cannot conceive of a case in which the Department will not indemnify the Commissioner.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: If you bring an action against the Government in the Exchequer Court, and you appeal, you get your costs. Why should you not get your costs in a patent case?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Much to my surprise, the Commissioner tells me that not long ago, in Toronto, he was added as a personal party to an action.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: For what purpose?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: I suppose because he had not lived up to what the other party had asked him to do. In any event, he was made a party. Suppose the appeal had gone against him, and the Department had said: "No, we will not indemnify you."

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The only way they could drag him in would be by his acting outside of the statute; then he would be a wrongdoer, and would be responsible for his wrongful acts.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: In many cases where a conviction by a magistrate has been quashed by the court of appeal, he has been made to pay the costs out of his own pocket because of his misconduct You can take proceedings against a judge of the highest court in the land, and if there is malfeasance of office he is responsible.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Are we going to put the Commissioner of Patents on a higher pedestal than all the judges of the land?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The Bill speaks of the Commissioner. When he would be added personally, he would not be included in section 61 at all. Perhaps that is the real explanation of it. When you dissociate him from the office, he is not within the section at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In the case cited by my honourable friend from Lambton (Hon. Mr. Pardee), the Commissioner was made a party to the suit, as Commissioner and personally.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why would the court add him? The court added him in his personal capacity.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, not the court.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: There was a motion to amend, and he was added.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Therefore he was added by the court. Was that the Exchequer Court?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Supreme Court; but the order was set aside on appeal.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The honourable the leader may consider that section 61 will not protect the Commissioner at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, it will not.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If you want to give him any protection, you will have to give him some new law dealing with the matter whether he is sued in his official capacity or personally. This only deals with the office.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then, if we pass section 61, a man will not get his costs even if he recovers.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We will let 61 stand, then.

Section 61 stands.

On section 62—practice on appeal:

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I wish the honourable gentleman would let that section stand. I would like to see whether the appeal clauses in the Exchequer Court Act are wide enough to cover this appeal to the Exchequer Court. If this is a judicial proceeding, of course there is an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. I will find it in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This clause has been added in Committee in the other Chamber after certain inquiry as to its legal validity and operation.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: You are providing for an appeal to the Exchequer Court, and I want to find out whether there is an appeal from the Exchequer Court to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Could the appeal be taken to the Exchequer Court in any other way than pursuant to the Exchequer Court Act and the rules and practices of the Court? It seems to me this clause is entirely unnecessary, because that is the only way you could have an appeal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It was said to be important that this provision should be in the Bill, for the information of the public.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If there is an appeal, then any lawyer will know and advise his client.

Section 62 stands.

On section 63—patented articles to be stamped or marked:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I object to that clause, because it provides for a very big penalty in cases where the article cannot be stamped with the year of the patent. It does seem to me that to stamp the package is a foolish thing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This clause is there mainly for the protection of the patentee.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I know, but still it subjects him to a pretty severe penalty in case he does not stamp the package.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It does not seem to have operated injuriously in the past.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I know myself of a patented article which could not possibly be stamped on the package.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: A label may be attached to the package when it cannot be stamped.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I know, but it seems to me to impose a duty that could have no possible advantageous effect.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is one of those formal provisions.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I understand the intention, but in trying to help out the patentee you are sticking him.

Section 63 was agreed to.

Sections 64, 65 and 66 were agreed to.

On section 67—status not affected:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is that new?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: These are the saving clauses for the protection of rights:

No relief, right or privilege granted to or acquired by any patentee or other person in respect of any patent or application for the same under chapter forty-four of the statutes of 1921 shall be affected by the repeal of said Act but such relief, right or privilege shall continue as if said Act had remained in force.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is all right.

Section 67 was agreed to.

Section 68 was agreed to.

On section 69—notice of appeal:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have an amendment to section 69—that it be amended by adding thereto the following words: "Unless otherwise herein expressly provided," at the end of the clause.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I do not understand the section itself.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You might explain that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND (reading):

Whenever an appeal to the Exchequer Court from the decision of the Commissioner is permitted under this Act, notice of such decision shall be mailed by registered letter addressed to the interested parties or their respective agents, and the appeal shall be taken within three months from the date of mailing of such notice, unless otherwise herein expressly provided.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: What does that mean in a case where an individual is appealing? It would seem that the notice is mailed only where the Commissioner is appealing. Is that the meaning of it?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: It means an appeal "from the decision of the Commissioner."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Mr. Chairman, I will let the amendment drop. I withdraw the amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Do not the rules of the Exchequer Court make provision for such an appeal? This, it seems to me, would add to the rules of the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It does not seem intelligible. Perhaps it is my lack of intelligence.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I cannot understand it. Who gives the notice?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Do not the rules of the Exchequer Court make provision for these appeals? If so, it is entirely unnecessary and would be repugnant, it seems to me, to the rules of the Exchequer Court to do so.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that by this Bill we are allowing a number of new appeals to the Exchequer Court—appeals for which there is no provision in the Exchequer Court Act.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But who sends this notice? It does not say.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It does not mean the parties appealing?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To what does "notice of such decision" refer? Is it the decision of the Commissioner?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: The Commissioner.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the "notice of such decision"? The party appealing would not send a notice of such decision. That is unintelligible.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It had better be re-drafted.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is the Commissioner who sends the notice, is it not?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Section 82 of the Exchequer Court Act provides for an appeal. I think it would be sufficient to say that the appeal should be to the Exchequer Court Judge. If you do not, you are overlapping the provisions of the Exchequer Court Act, section 82.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friends will look at section 21 of the Bill, they will see that we have a similar provision.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That does not make it any better.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is taken from the Exchequer Court Act itself.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Nor that either.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is entirely different.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

21. (1) Every applicant who has failed to obtain a patent by reason of the objection of the Commissioner as aforesaid may, at any time within six months after notice thereof has been mailed by registered letter, addressed to him or his agent, appeal from the decision of the said Commissioner to the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is a different thing altogether.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This could be made quite intelligible if it said: "Notice of such decision shall be mailed by registered letter by the Commissioner."

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: "By the Commissioner," certainly.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Put in those words, then you will know where you are at.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will ask that clause 69 stands, so that it may be redrafted.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: That is better.

Section 69 stands.

Section 70 was agreed to.

COLD STORAGE BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 9, an Act to amend the Cold Storage Act.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—contracts for cold storage warehouses:

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: This section makes provision for the construction of cold storage plants throughout the country, and for Government assistance thereto to the extent of 30 per cent of cost of the construction of the building and equipment. The principle of encouragement of this kind on the part of the Government dates back for a considerable number of years, having been first inaugurated at the time the Hon. Sidney Fisher was Minister of Agriculture in the Laurier Administration, and has worked out very satisfactorily ever since.

Some four or five years ago, during the period of the war, the late Administration thought it wise to curtail the operations under this Act, and it was accordingly amended at that time, confining the assistance by way of bounty or bonus to applications made by municipalities. The Act remained on the Statute Book in that form for four or five years, but in no single instance was it taken advantage of, the municipalities apparently having no desire to avail themselves of the opportunity offered under the Act. The Act has therefore remained practically a dead letter upon the Statute Book until the proposed Bill now before us, and which has added to the institutions which are entitled to Government assistance, co-operative societies, or associations, as they are called in section 2 of the Bill.

I have no objection whatever to the principle of this Bill, or to the extension of the privileges under the Act to co-operative societies; but I do object to its stopping there, and to the fact that the provisions of the Act are not extended to other interests. It seems to me, honourable gentlemen, that the question Parliament will have to decide, before enacting a measure of this kind, is whether this is a desirable enterprise to encourage. Having answered that question, we may apply ourselves to such legislation as is deemed advisable. There can be no question as to whether or not encouragement of this kind for this particular class of enterprise is wise, because it has been the common policy of three successive Administrations to grant subsidies; and it is certainly the policy of the present Government, because in the Estimates this year they are appropriating the sum of $50,000 to be spent in this way. My objection, therefore, in this instance is that the Bill does not go far enough—that it is class legislation inasmuch as it singles out co-operative societies and extends to them Government assistance while at the same time it totally disregards other institutions or private capital which may be disposed to enter upon such enterprise.

We have on our Statute Book to-day, under the Customs Act, provision for refunds of duty paid on raw materials entering into certain manufactures. I think we would be very much surprised if any Government should contemplate limiting the privilege of those refunds to any particular institution or class of institutions. If, for instance, they extended it to co-operative societies and not to private capital such as is invested in incorporated companies, what would we think? At one time bounties were paid on iron and steel, but the Government of that day did not contemplate paying them to co-operative companies only, or liminted liability companies, or any other particular class of company. The provision was wide open, and notice was given that in order to place these enterprises on their feet, Government assistance would be extended. This principle is carried out further in the bonuses provided for in the Budget brought down by the Minister of Finance a few days ago, for the copper industry, and also in connection with the manufacture of hemp, which would encourage the growing of flax. The Government do not propose that these bounties should be extended to any particular class of the community. It would be ridiculous to do so. The result is that the principle underlying all the other legislation of which I have spoken is suddenly changed, and in the case of cold storage plants, one particular class of institution is singled out to which is extended the helping hand of the public treasury.

What would be the result under the suggested section 2? Take the case of Nova Scotia, where there is a very large fruit industry, and where the co-operative principle has not yet been developed, private capital being wholly relied on to provide institutions of this kind. That fruit industry would remain unassisted; it would have no opportunity to take advantage of this legislation; and yet it would be taxed in order to provide assistance to other parts of the country where the co-operative principle has been developed, and where it is sought to develop it still further. Take the fruit districts of Ontario, where there are privately-owned plants giving service to the fruit-growers. Under this legislation it would be possible for a co-operative society to plant themselves alongside a privately-owned company and, by reason of Government assistance, to practically put it out of existence; and yet the privately-owned company, through taxation, would be paying for the establishment of the competitive plant alongside of them.

What, in fact, is the difference between a co-operative association and an incorporated company? Getting right down to the meat of the matter, in the case of a co-operative society, ten or fifteen or twenty men band themselves together and each put in $1,000 or $2,000 or $5,000 and provide a cold storage institution. In the case of an incorporated company the shareholders take $1,000, $2,000 or $5,000 worth of stock, and the incorporated company provides exactly the same services in exactly the same way. It surely cannot be argued that the farmers or others interested in a co-operative company will put their hard-earned cash into such an institution without expecting to get anything back.

That is not reasonable; it is not sensible. So as a matter of fact there is actually no difference in the services which either of these classes of institutions, whether co-operative societies or joint stock companies, can provide. For that reason I submit that this is class legislation which should not be encouraged. The result would be that in certain parts of the country, where the co-operative principle has not been worked up, no cold storage plants would exist in the future, because they have to rely on private capital, and private capital would not be able to take advantage of this Act. The cold-storage business is a precarious one; it does not always pay; and if it happened that the Government-aided institution should drive out all private enterprise and should then be unable to make a success of their own business, the result would be that the public in that community would be entirely deprived of cold storage facilities.

I understand, from the discussion that took place in another Chamber when this Bill was under consideration, that it was strongly urged upon the Government that the principle of the Bill should be extended to incorporated companies. This was agitated, not by opponents of the Government, but principally, by the Government supporters, and it came from all parts of the House. It was very strongly urged upon the Minister that the scope of the operation of this Act should be extended to include private enterprise as well as co-operative societies. The only reason which was given for not so extending it was that, in the first place, only the sum of $50,000 was to be appropriated this year, and it would be possible for a large private company to come in and gobble up the total amount of the grant. I can see nothing in that argument at all, because it would be equally possible for a large co-operative company to do so; and in any case experience has proved during a number of years past that the larger companies do not take advantage of the bonus principle which has been on the Statute Book. The Act is largely taken advantage of by smaller companies, and if large amounts have not been requisitioned in the past, I think it would be fair to assume that they would be no more likely to be in the future

Furthermore, the first section provides: "The Governor in Council may enter into contracts," etc. The Minister practically has it under his own control to do as he likes. I understand that the legal interpretation of the word "may" is that it means "shall" in some cases. I am not prepared to say to what extent that interpretation would go, but, even supposing it did mean "shall," yet, by means of the regulations governing the conditions on which advantage may be taken of this Act, the Minister could make it inconvenient for any concern to avail itself of the Act if he was not favourable to it. I contend that the whole operation of this Act is in the hands of the Minister, and there is no danger of any company coming in and acquiring the total amount which has been set aside for cold storage warehouses this year.

As I said before, I have no objection to the principle of this Bill. I think it is right. I think that the service the Government are performing to the public under this Act is a good one and is worthy of being extended; but I do object to the assistance being offered to only one class in the community, the individual efforts which private companies are always more or less prepared to put forth being entirely ignored. Therefore, in order to test the feeling of the House, I move that the words "or incorporated companies" be added after the word "associations" in the tenth line of this section, so that the section would read:

The Governor in Council may enter into contracts with properly constituted co-operative societies, associations, incorporated companies, or municipalities, for the construction, etc.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This Bill aims at amending two clauses of the Act. If any other honourable member of this Chamber has any observation to make upon one or other of the clauses, I would ask him to do so now, because I shall afterwards ask that the Committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, for the simple reason that I have no authority to accept in the name of the Government the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Regina (Hon. Mr. Laird), which would alter the principle of the Bill. The purpose of the Bill is to give help to institutions, societies or municipalities that are not working for gain. My honourable friend proposes an amendment to cover institutions in private hands, which are working for dividends. The amendment is so much at variance with the object which the Minister had in mind, that I must ask time to consult him, and perhaps Council, before I express an opinion upon it. In order that we may be fully seized of any other objections or recommendations that might be made in this Chamber, I would suggest that they be made now.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I have no objections to offer to granting aid to the organizations referred to in the Bill, but I do wish to support the amendment that has been moved by the honourable Senator from Regina. It seems to me the most unjust thing that could be imagined that public money should be taken to support one class of people to the detriment of their neighbours. It would be easily possible for a co-operative society to have a cold storage warehouse in direct competition with a cold storage warehouse operated for the same purpose by a private company, whether in the immediate neighbourhood or not, and the fact of a private incorporated company having to pay taxes into the Treasury for the purpose of enabling a bonus to be granted to their rivals seems to me outrageous.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But does the honourable gentleman really believe that any body of men would organize and have the audacity to ask the Government for help in the erection of a cold storage plant at a place where the needs of the people in that community are already provided for by private capital?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: The private concern might not be in that neighbourhood at all; it may be fifty miles away, and yet be in direct competition in the markets of the world.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am under the impression that the sole purpose of this legislation is to help districts where no cold storages exist and private capital will not provide them.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: That may be so, but nevertheless the effect would be that the aid given to a co-operative company in one neighbourhood would be used to the disadvantage of a private company operating a cold storage in some other section. It might not be near by at all. It does seem to me to be a most unjust measure. Why should not the assistance be extended to private concerns? It would not be thrown open to everybody: it would still be left to the discretion of the Department to whom the bonus should be given. There may be several co-operative companies, and the Government picks out the one to which aid is given. They might easily do likewise, for they have the power under this Act, in the case of a private company. If there were several organizations incorporated, the Government would still have power to select those which they thought it necessary or advantageous to bonus. The principle is entirely wrong, it seems to me, to take taxes from one man to bonus another, his rival.

It is said that co-operative companies are not operated for gain, whilst incorporated companies are operated for gain. What is the object of a co-operative company if it is not gain? The co-operation is simply a different form of distributing that gain. Co-operating is effected in the hope that by combining individuals may make larger gains. That is where the gain comes in. The co-operative company is just as much a rival of private incorporated companies as though the members of the co-operative concern operated as a private company. The fact is, as the honourable Senator from Regina (Hon. Mr. Laird) says, there is very little difference between them. The stock company may have 100 shareholders and the co-operative may have a couple of dozen. Both are operating for gain, only in ways that are just a little different, that is all. I cannot for my part see the logic of the argument that a co-operative company should be bonused, but not an incorporated company.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The objection of the honourable member applies to the present condition of things. Cold storages are already erected by private capital, and there are cold storages in other municipalities that have been helped by the municipality itself. The situation will not be different if, instead of being helped by the municipality, the cold storage concern is helped by the Government. I understand that the aid given will not be so much as to create an injustice to parties who are in competition with such associations as may receive Government aid. I appreciate the reason which was given by the honourable leader of the Government that the Act is intended merely to assist in municipalities where cold storage warehouses are needed in the interest of public health, and where the population is not sufficient for private capital to erect the cold storage. In such a case the Government may come to the rescue and help to a certain extent. I am quite sure that the Government will see that it would be opening the door too wide not to limit the subsidy to co-operative societies of a quasi public character and to municipalities, but to extend it also to private companies.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Do you bonus a co-operative company under the existing law? Without this Bill, a bonus could be given to a co-operative society, could it not?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under the Act of 1907, as amended by the Act of 1909:

> The Governor in Council may enter into contracts with any persons for the construction, equipment and maintenance in good and efficient working order, of public cold storage warehouses equipped with mechanical refrigeration, in Canada, and suitable for the preservation of any food products.

That is the law to be repealed by this clause:

The Governor in Council may enter into contracts with properly constituted co-operative societies, associations or municipalities for the construction, equipment and maintenance in good and efficient working order of public cold storage warehouses equipped with mechanical refrigeration, in Canada, and suitable for the preservation of any food product.

I have under my hand a certified copy of a report of the Committee of the Privy Council approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 26th of May, 1919. It is P. C. 1103:

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a Report, dated 20th May, 1919, from the Minister of Agriculture, submitting as follows:

The Cold Storage Act of 1907 as amended provides that with the approval of Your Excellency in Council contracts may be entered into by the Department of Agriculture to pay subsidies on Cold Storage Warehouses to the extent of 30% of the approved cost;

It is also provided that the rates to be charged on goods in storage, the location of the warehouse, and the plans and specifications shall be approved by the Minister of Agriculture;

Under the provisions of the said Act, 34 cold storage warehouses have been erected, located in different parts of Canada;

The total refrigerated space thus provided was 4,928,304 cubic feet, and the total cost of the warehouses was $2,408,354.85.

The total subsidies so far paid by the Department of Agriculture amount to $722,506.41 made up as follows:

Subsidies paid..	$690,640 97
Instalments withheld..	14,024 00
Instalments not yet due..	17,841 44
Total subsidies..	$722,506 41

Only one contract has been entered into since the beginning of the war, and the said contract was for the revival of an old one.

It was originally intended that the said subsidy should be paid only to public warehouses, but as all the attractive locations had already been occupied before the said Act came into force, it was found that it was hardly possible to operate a warehouse strictly on a public basis, that in order to make these warehouses successful, the owners were obliged to engage in trade to fill the space.

Difficulties have arisen, in this connection. There has been a tendency on the part of owners after the four year period has expired, during which the said subsidy is paid in instalments, to restrict the use of the warehouses to their own business and thus exclude the public.

In view of the above, it would appear unadvisable to continue the payment of subsidies, except in the case of warehouses to be erected by municipal or other public governing bodies.

The Minister, therefore, recommends that in future subsidies under the Cold Storage Act be paid only on Cold Storage Warehouses that may be erected by municipal or other public governing bodies.

The Committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

The Bill which is now before the Senate simply continues that policy.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: And adds the co-operative societies to it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My impression is that when the Bill was introduced into the other House they were not mentioned. Honourable gentlemen will notice that this Act is the result of the experience of the Department, that the attention of the Government had already been drawn to the situation, and that the policy of the Government in 1919 was the same as that which is being embodied in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: I think the honourable leader of the Government must be mistaken in that, because the memorandum which he read a moment ago confined the bonuses to municipalities; and under that Act not one single application was made from one end of Canada to the other.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What I mean is that it is on the line of the associations that are not working for gain. The principle in this Act is the same as that of the Order in Council of 1919.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: Surely the leader of the Government would not say that a co-operative society was not operating for gain. Does my honourable friend mean to say for one moment that the farmers or anybody else are going to subscribe $40,000 or $50,000 or $100,000 to build a co-operative plant unless they expect to get their money back?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My impression is that they are working for the purpose of creating a cold storage plant which is needed in the community—of course, in such a way as not to lose any money thereby.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I would like to ask the Government how this measure will affect a province such as mine, where there are no municipalities, and whether, if this amendment had not been placed in the Act in the other House, we would not be able to partake of the benefits of cold storage. I have under my hand all the correspondence in the case of a firm in Prince Edward Island that would be in accordance with the amendment moved by my honourable friend. In 1919 there was a kind of co-operation between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Marine and Fisheries in granting a bonus under the amalgamated Act. A cold storage plant was built, subject to Government inspection, and when it was completed according to specifications and approved plan, the Department refused to pay the bonus. I contend that the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Regina (Hon. Mr. Laird) is necessary, and that so far as my province is concerned the Bill would be an injustice unless some such amendment as the honourable gentleman proposes is incorporated in the Bill. In my province we have a very large dairying community and a fresh fish community, and under such conditions cold storage is a necessity. I hope the leader of the Government will see his way clear to incorporate the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Regina in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. GILLIS: As to co-operative companies not operating for gain, let me point to the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company, which was organized a few years ago. The subscribers were asked to put up 15 per cent of the amount of their subscriptions. That company has been operating for a number of years, and up to the present time no further calls have been made, and the shares to-day are worth at least a dollar, and probably a good deal more. That is one incident that clearly goes to show that the co-operative companies are not organized for charitable purposes. They are organized to produce dividends, like any other business concern.

This Bill is distinctly class legislation. Any number of men in any particular community may organize themselves for the purpose of establishing a co-operative company to carry on a certain class of business, and their object, as I think everyone must admit, is gain; otherwise they would not bother organizing. If a similar number of men in the same community organized themselves under the Companies Act for the purpose of carrying on the same line of business, one concern would receive 33 1/3 per cent on the cost of its plant, and the other would be entirely ignored. This is not fair legislation, and for my part I cannot support the Bill as it now stands before the House.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: I wish to say a word or two further in view of the arguments advanced by the leader of the House, and in the light of what the honourable gentleman from Whitewood (Hon. Mr. Gillis) has said. The honourable Minister said that under the proposed Bill this bonus was to be applied only to co-operative societies which were not organized for gain. Let us see how these co-operative societies have worked out in this country. I will just elaborate for a moment on what the honourable gentleman from Whitewood has said, and then I will ask the leader of the House whether he thinks co-operative societies do not operate for gain.

Take the case of that enormous concern in the western provinces, the Co-operative Elevator Company. They started out by saying to the local people: "Now, you incorporate a local elevator company and pay up 15 per cent of the stock, and the Government will guarantee the balance, and the profits of the company will be taken to pay off the amount guaranteed by the Government." What is the result? That company has a string of over 400 elevators extending from one end of that country to the other; they have a property which is to-day worth probably $50,000,000, in addition to terminal elevators at Fort William, which have been paid for by the provincial Government of Saskatchewan. And who owns it? It is owned by the co-operative society; the people of Saskatchewan who guaranteed the undertaking and backed it up, and practically paid for it, do not own it. When we speak of co-operative societies not being for the purpose of gain, we do not speak by the book and we ignore precedent, at least as far as it has been observed in Western Canada.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The honourable gentleman would see the injustice of this. While these people would be getting the advantage of the Cold Storage Act, a company in my own province, a limited company founded under the Companies Act, would be debarred from building a cold storage plant and partaking of the subsidy in order to save their own property. It seems to me that section 1 would be an absurdity in its practical working, and it would impose a great hardship, so far as my province is concerned. I do not think my honourable friend should insist upon our passing the Bill without incorporating the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Regina.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I can only repeat the statement that this paternal legislation is undoubtedly, on the face of it, for the purpose of helping those who cannot help themselves exclusively and completely. I do not believe for one moment that the Department would entertain an application for aid in constructing a cold storage plant where one already existed. This measure will help to develop the cold storage business where it needs to be developed, not where it is already developed. It is for this reason that the Department, with but a modest subsidy, desires to help as much as possible the various municipalities or other co-operative societies who are able to show the need in certain districts of cold storage plants.

The Minister of Agriculture, having laid down his policy, and having explained how he will apply it, may be unwilling to go further for the moment. He may withdraw his Bill. That is the reason why I must return to the Department for consultation. Furthermore, I am not quite sure of my ground in moving an amendment to this Bill, which involves the expenditure of money. That is a matter which I shall have to examine into.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: That difficulty could be overcome by dealing with the matter on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I submit that it would not be necessary for the Government to spend another cent: they have it entirely to their own power under this Bill to grant aid to one and no more than one. If the amendment is inserted, there is nothing to compel the grant of a dollar to aid any more than one company, but it would take away the appearance of injustice and unfairness. I have no objection to granting aid to co-operative companies; I think that is all right; but the Bill is unjust in that it restricts the aid to one class of the community.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Surely the Government does not wish to put a province in such a position that it cannot take advantage of an Act passed for the common good. When the Bill was introduced in the Commons it mentioned only municipalities, we are told, and for that reason we in our province could not participate in its benefits.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But it has been widened.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Our co-operative societies—usually cheese and butter factories—are not in a position to build cold storage plants. We want cold storage more particularly for our fish. The fish business is usually carried on by not very highly capitalized organized companies, and I cannot see what objection there would be to adding ordinary incorporated companies, as has been suggested by the honourable gentleman from Regina. That would remedy the whole trouble. As the honourable gentleman from Wentworth (Hon. Mr. Smith) has said, it would do no harm. The Governor in Council has the matter in hand, and the subsidy need not be granted to any one company. I would ask my honourable friend to consult with his colleagues and see if the Bill cannot be made to apply properly to my province.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I move that the Committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Before the Committee rises, may I inquire whether in the opinion of my honourable friend Chapter 6 of the Statutes of 1907 is still in force?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not see that it has been amended.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Is it not correct to say that the Order in Council of 1919 must have been pased under the War Measures Act, and would automatically cease to be effective when the War Measures Act no longer governed, and that therefore Chapter 6 is still in force, section 2 of which reads:

> The Governor in Council may enter into contracts with any person for the construction, equipment, and maintenance in good and efficient working order of public cold storage warehouses—and that this Bill proposes to repeal that, so that the Government has no power to enter into contracts with anybody except co-operative societies, in municipalities or associations? The purpose of this Bill is not only to extend this assistance to co-operative societies and municipalities, but to take it away from those who under the present law are entitled to it; and is it not obvious that the present Act can be construed to include co-operative societies and municipalities when it specifically says "any persons"? I hope my honourable friend will pardon my ignorance of the law; but it would seem to me that the term is wide enough to cover all classes.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: This Bill does not repeal that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I believe that this is a limiting amendment. The Act of 1907 was much broader. While reading the Order in Council, I was wondering whether the Council had taken power under the War Measures Act.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: What the honourable gentleman from Regina desires to accomplish is already fully provided for under the present law if it is not repealed, so the negativing of the proposed Bill by this House will accomplish what the honourable gentleman proposes to do.

Progress was reported.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 84, an Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.

Hon. Mr. Taylor in the Chair.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I thought it was understood that this Bill would not be taken up to-night.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: On the contrary, I mentioned two Acts which would be dealt with, the Cold Storage and the Industrial Disputes Act.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: A number of members who are interested in this Bill are not here to-night. I think they will be taken by surprise.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I mentioned these two Bills, and I think Hansard will bear me out in that.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is true.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would ask that Mr. Acland come to the floor of the House.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—relation of parties pending proceedings:

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Better read section 57 as it would be when amended.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I have had a vague impression that some of my honourable colleagues here thought there was in this amendment now under review by the committee some extraordinary change or departure from the existing law. I would like to explain it and try to demonstrate that there is no change in principle, but a clarification of the clause in the present law. Now, I will read the Act which stands on the Statute Book.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Would my honourable friend pardon an interruption for a question? Is the Bill now before us in exactly the same form as it was on its first reading in the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Then, for the information of honourable gentlemen present, I may say that I have in my hand about thirty copies of the Bill as introduced into the House of Commons, which have printed on the opposite page the Act as it stands to-day, with the changes shown in italics, and it may be of interest to honourable members and help them to follow the discussion intelligently to have these copies distributed among them.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I understand that when a Bill of this nature, containing so many amendments, was to be brought into this House we were to have copies showing on the opposite page the existing clauses and the amendments.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will read the Act as it stands on the Statute Book, and then we shall examine the amendment proposed in section 2 of this Bill. Honourable members can follow by looking at the Bill as introduced in the House of Commons. In reading section 57 I will skip the phrases in italics, representing the changes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: As you read you might state them.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think it will be better just to read the section without the amendment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND (reading):

> Employers and employees shall give at least thirty days' notice of an intended change affecting conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours; and in the event of such intended change resulting in a dispute, until the dispute has been finally dealt with by a Board, and a copy of its report has been delivered through the Registrar to both the parties affected; neither of those parties shall alter the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours, or on account of the dispute do or be concerned in doing, directly or indirectly, anything in the nature of a lockout or strike, or a suspension or discontinuance of employment or work, but the relationship of employer and employee shall continue uninterrupted by the dispute, or anything arising out of the dispute; but if, in the opinion of the Board, either party uses this or any other provision of this Act for the purpose of unjustly maintaining a given condition of affairs through delay, and the Board so reports to the Minister, such party shall be guilty of an offence, and liable to the same penalties as are imposed for a violation of the next preceding section.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What are those penalties?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The penalties are to be found in section 58:

> Any employer declaring or causing a lockout contrary to the provisions of this Act shall be liable to a fine of not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars for each day or part of a day that such lockout exists.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What about the employees?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Section 59 governs the employees.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Is that here?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, because we are not touching it. Clause 59 says:

> Any employee who goes on strike contrary to the provisions of this Act shall be liable to a fine of not less than ten dollars nor more than fifty dollars, for each day or part of a day that such employee is on strike.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: There is quite a disparity in the penalties.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is quite a disparity in the penalties, and quite a disparity in the status of the men facing each other.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Quite a disparity in the ability to pay.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And in the ability to pay.

Now, if section 2 of the Bill before us does not meet with favour and is rejected, the Act will still provide that employers and employees must give thirty days' notice of any intended change affecting the conditions of employment, and that neither of those parties shall alter the conditions of employment in respect to wages or hours, or, on account of the dispute, do or be concerned in doing, directly or indirectly, anything in the nature of a lockout or strike. The principle there is that employers and employees must give thirty days' notice of any change in conditions affecting them, and until a Board has reported on the dispute, conditions must remain as they were before the notice was given.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman a question right here. Would he, first of all, give the reason why it is desired to make these changes that are proposed? From whom has there been a demand? Is it just something that is devised by the Department, desiring to do something to earn their money, or is there a call from the employers or from the employees? Why, or how, or wherefore the proposed change?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: There is practically no change.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would like to ask the Minister.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If the honourable leader of the Government will permit me, I could perhaps answer the inquiry of my honourable friend from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler), because of the fact that the difficulty which this amendment is intended to remedy commenced during the time when I had the responsibility of administering the Act. Having personal knowledge of the situation of the difficulties that arose, I could possibly make the matter clear to my honourable friend and to the House.

But first may I observe that the provisions of this Act apply, not to employers and employees generally, as some honourable members of this House, I know, believe, but only to those industries which are specified in the interpretation clause, section 2 of the Act, namely, public utilities, such as transportation and mining. The Act does not apply in its compulsory features to ordinary industries at all. When the Act was passed in 1907 it was sought in the public interest to prevent strikes and lockouts, in order that the public might not be inconvenienced by the results of such actions on the part of either employers or employees. The law provides that whichever party desired or intended to make a change in the conditions, whether the employer or the workmen, they should first attempt to negotiate with the other side; and, if the parties could not agree and a dispute arose, it must be referred to the tribunal provided by the law, before either side could take decisive action. Thus it was hoped that the strike or lockout, and the consequent public inconvenience, must be avoided. That law was passed in April, 1907.

It so happened that I was a member of the Committee of Railway Employees who made the first application for a board under this Act, in August, 1907, and I want to show the manner in which the law works. Prior to its enactment, the railway organizations at least—and, in fact, I think all labour organizations—opposed it for the reason that they believed that its operation would entail serious delays and the postponement of the adjustment of their dispute with their employers, and consequent loss. Let me illustrate to honourable gentlemen how the law worked out. In May, 1907, the Canadian Pacific railroad telegraphers sought a change in their agreement with the employing company. They were unable to reach a new agreement by direct negotiations, after several conferences, and, this Act having been passed in April previous, they were compelled as law-abiding citizens to make application for a board. That application was made. The right honourable the present Prime Minister was the Deputy Minister of Labour who received the application, and was registrar under the law at the time the board was established. It held an extensive inquiry. Dr. Shortt, now in the public service, was the chairman of that board. After a very careful, courteous inquiry into and hearing of all that both parties had to advance in support of their contentions, the board finally, in the month of October, 1907, made its recommendation. If I remember correctly, it was recommended that the findings should become effective on November 1st, 1907. The recommendation of the board was accepted by both parties, and resulted in an increase of compensation to a couple of thousand employees in that class of service on the Canadian Pacific railroad at that time, the increase being 14 per cent over what they had previously been receiving.

Now, this is the point, honourable gentlemen. Had it not been for the existence of this law, an adjustment would in all probability have been made, by direct negotiation or otherwise, in June or July. Those two thousand men suffered the loss consequent upon the delay in the coming into force of the settlement from June until November.

There have been, I think, an average of about fifty boards a year appointed since 1907, and it is not only safe but true to say that in every case history has repeated itself in that regard, and the workingmen of Canada have now for a period of 16 years suffered that disability, because they were law-abiding citizens and respected the law of their country, and bore the consequences of abiding by it and suffered the losses resulting from their action.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would they be any better off if they had taken the law into their own hands?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I agree that they would not. I want to show the House the other side of the picture. I think it is true to say that from 1907 until 1921, a period of 14 years, every application made to the Department for a board of conciliation came from the employees, because during that period the cost of living was gradually but constantly rising, and the tendency was toward increased compensation and improved working conditions.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Did every one of those boards increase the wages?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In most cases wages were increased

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Down to what period have those boards been functioning?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Down to the present.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: When was the last board?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The last board is in session now.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The cost of living has risen steadily.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There are two or three boards in session at the present time.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If the honourable member from Sussex will permit me—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I am trying to help you.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: —I am coming to the point that I want you to understand.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You are coming too slowly.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In July, 1920, the peak in the cost of living was reached in this country. By May, 1921, all the railway companies in Canada had come to the conclusion that it was time to reduce wages, because wages had been advancing from 1918 up to 1920, supposedly in keeping with the increase in the cost of living. The railway companies, on the 16th of June, 1921, gave arbitrary notice of an intention to decrease wages to the extent of about $13 a month to something like 150,000 railway employees in Canada, on all railroads, without any regard to whether or not it was right and proper, whether it was satisfactory or acceptable to the employees, or whether it was in keeping with the requirements of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act or not. On the 16th of July, 1921, that reduction actually went into effect. The railway employes took this objection to that action. They said: "For fourteen years we have complied with the requirements of the Act and suffered the losses consequent upon awaiting the investigations and decisions of the board, and now we think that the railway companies ought to do the same when the shoe is on the other foot." The railway campanies declined.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think it was in 1922.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No. I beg pardon. It was in 1921. I am coming to 1922.

Hon. LORNE C. WEBSTER: May I ask the honourable member whether at the time the McAdoo award was made effective any warning was given to the railway companies of Canada?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Oh, yes. I hesitate to mix up answering two inquiries at once. The honourable member from Stadacona (Hon. L. C. Webster) inquired whether or not the railway companies were given notice of intended changes in 1918, when the McAdoo award became effective. In reply to that, I desire to say that the railway employees, through their various organizations, made practically no demands or requests for changes of conditions and pay, until the spring of 1918; and at that time the cost of living had so advanced, and the purchasing power of their earnings had so declined, that they approached the railway companies seeking an adjustment and revision of their agreement. During April and May negotiations continued between the railway companies and the so-called shop trade organizations, but the results were unacceptable. The disputes were referred to a board, and the board's report was rejected by the employees, and a strike vote was taken, and 96 per cent of some 35,000 voted to retire from the service in the month of July. So I think it is clear that due and ample notice of the desired change had been given before the McAdoo award came into effect.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: Did that apply to Canada without some of our railways ever being consulted?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No. The fact is that our Canadian railways were involved in those negotiations with all their employees in 1918, and took the ground that their employees should be satisfied to accept what had been accepted or might be accepted by the same class of employees of the United States Government, which was administering the United States railways. I know it is the generally prevailing opinion among our railway employees that the results of their negotiations should have been more satisfactory to themselves than was the case.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Was this threatened strike before the Armistice or after?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Before.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: While we were still at war?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes. In 1921, as I have pointed out, the railway companies made an arbitrary reduction without referring the dispute to a Board of Conciliation. The employees forthwith complied with the law, even though the obligation should have rested on the parties seeking a change in conditions, and made an application for a board, and the present Deputy Minister, as Registrar of Boards of Conciliation, after consultation with the Minister of that day, established a Board of Conciliation, and the railway companies declined even to name a representative on the Board. That was in September, 1921.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You did not explain how you got away from that strike when 96 per cent voted for it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I did explain that in July, 1918, the Canadian railways, through the Canadian Railway War Board, decided voluntarily to adopt the McAdoo award and subsequent amendments that might be made in the United States, believing and holding that the Canadian railway employees must accept whatever was accepted by the same class of employees in the United States.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You need to mark an interrogation after the word "voluntarily."

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Coming to the fall of 1921, all the railways in co-operation declined to name a representative on the Board. It then became the duty of the Minister to appoint someone. A gentleman who I am sure was satisfactory to the railway companies was appointed. The Board sat under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Maclennan of Montreal, and, after some weeks of negotiation, the Board succeeded in bringing about an agreement between the Railway organizations and the railway companies which, in effect, resulted in the employees accepting the reduction that the railway companies had put into force in July.

In December of 1921 a change of Government occurred. I am free to say to this House that had that not occurred the amendment now proposed to section 57 of the Act would have been proposed one year ago, because the Government of that day felt that it was not fair, or equitable for the law to apply in one way to the employees and not in the same manner to the employers.

In 1922, about March, the railway companies of Canada, again acting in concert, proposed a reduction in wages to the shop trades, representing some 35,000 men and the maintenance-of-way employees representing some 20,000 men. Honourable gentlemen may remember that about a year ago the employees in those branches of the service strenuously objected to a wage decrease being put into force without the matter being referred to a Board of Investigation as the law required, and that the companies again declined to join in the reference to a Board. The employees thereupon again made application, and the Board was established, A Mr. Smith of this city had his first experience, I think, as Chairman of the Board, in one of the most important cases that ever came before a Board of consideration. The employees at that time notified the railway companies and the Government that if they proceeded to put into force the reduction in wages before the Board sat and investigated the case and make a report, as the law required, they would refuse or decline to appear before the Board The result was that the Board met, and it was found that some reductions had been put into effect, and the right honourable Prime Minister went to the railway companies or asked them to see him, and by reason of his persuasion the companies backed up and agreed to maintain the existing situation until the Board made its report. That is the history, honourable gentlemen, of what has occurred leading up to this amendment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Has the Board made its report?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The Board made its report last July.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What did that result in—a reduction in wages?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Partially so, and a subsequent increase a little later on, restoring part of what was taken away at that time.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why was that?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Because the investigation developed the fact that the railway companies were not justified in going to the lengths to which they had gone; and the Board so found

The purposes of this amendment, honourable gentlemen, as I know them to be, arise out of that situation, and are the result of requests made by the representatives of all the railway organizations in Canada, as well as other organizations of workmen engaged in industries that fall within the scope of the Act.

May I respectfully point out this fact to honourable gentlemen: that for years after the Industrial Disputes Act became law there was a persistent and continued opposition to it on the part of organized labour in this country, and that every year from 1907 to 1912, at the annual sessions of the Labour Congress of Canada, resolutions were passed demanding the repeal of the law—in fact, I think I am safe in saying up to 1917. More recently, by reason of efforts that have been made by succeeding Administrations to administer the law fairly and impartially and to show no favouritism to either party, Labour slowly and surely acquired some confidence in the honest intentions of the law and the gentlemen who placed it upon the Statute Book. As I have pointed out to you, for sixteen years the labour organizations affected by this legislation had suffered, consequent upon the operation of the Act, all the losses that were entailed thereby, and all they ask, and all the Government asks in presenting this amendment to Parliament, is that the employers to-day be required to do likewise. The law as it stands now contemplated that the employers would respect it in that respect. But in 1921, when the general reduction was threatened, the Department of Justice was consulted, and said: "Yes, the employers are undoubtedly violating the spirit of the Act, but we are afraid that they cannot be brought to book or penalized in any way"—Why? Because the penalty clauses of the Act only provide penalties for two offences: one, if employees go on strike contrary to the provisions of the Act; and, two, if the employer indulges in a lockout. In this case the employers were not locking out anybody; they were simply saying: "We are going to reduce your wages; we are not violating the law." But undoubtedly they were violating the spirit and intent of the law; so the Government to-day ask Parliament to endorse an amendment to the Act which will cause it to be interpretated as it was always intended that it should be, in such manner that will work equitably and fairly to all parties concerned and affected by it.

I think I have fairly covered the situation, and hope my honourable friends will accept the amendment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would the honourable gentleman allow another question? Have the employees always accepted the findings of the Boards?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The findings of the Boards are not imposed upon either party.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Assuming that an ordinary mercantile industry has 90 men in its employment, and those 90 men agree to a reduction, if this Bill is passed is the employer still bound to go to a Board?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No industry outside of transportation and coal mining, which are called public utilities within the interpretation clause, are affected by this Act at all.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is it confined to coal mines?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Coal mines and transportation—public utilities.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think it would help, perhaps, to an understanding if we—

as to the right of the railways to so act. The report of the Department of Justice, which starts by explaining all the facts as we have them from the lips of the honourable the ex-Minister of Labour, concludes by saying:

Upon consideration of these provisions I find it difficult to escape the conclusion that the intention of Parliament in enactinog this legislation was to prevent the doing of that which the railways are proposing to do; that is to say, that the making of a reduction in the actual amount of money paid out to employees on pay-day is making an alteration in the conditions of employment with respect to wages within the meaning of the statute, notwithstanding the fact that the intention of the railways is to account to the employees for the difference if and when a report in favour of the employees has been made by the Board.

This goes to support my statement that in the clause at present in the statute an obligation is imposed by Parliament upon the employers and employees to maintain the situation, pending an examination and report by the Board.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think so.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: After that report is made both parties are free to disregard it and to proceed on their way; but up to that moment it is the will of Parliament that the conditions of the parties should remain unchanged.

Now, what is there in the amendments now proposed which alter the principle now embodied in the law?

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: Then why are they suggested?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will come to that. I have read clause 57; I will now embody the amendment in it.

Employers and employees shall give at least 30 days notice of an intended or desired change affecting conditions of employment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why "desired?" Explain that, please.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The reason is that "intended" covers the action of the employer who can carry out his intention; "desired" covers the action of the employees, who can only aspire.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Oh, what a fine distinction.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Well put.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: At all events, we shall not quarrel over that. I pass on.

And in the event of such intended change resulting in a dispute—and here the following words are added:

—it shall be unlawful for the employer to make effective a proposed change in wages or hours or for the employees to go on strike.

This is clarifying and emphasizing the intention of Parliament as expressed by the phrases that follow, which I have read and which the Department of Justice declare to be the enactment of the will of Parliament, that the conditions be not changed. I do not see that the words I have read do anything more than repeat in another form the following phrase from the old Act:

Neither of those parties shall alter the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours, or on account of the dispute do or be concerned in doing, directly or indirectly, anything in the nature of a lock-out or strike, etc.

I wonder why there is any emotion rising in the breast of any honourable member of this Chamber when the amendement is simply to make clear and to emphasize the will of Parliament.

Now I come back to the old clause, which it is proposed to amend by the addition of the words:

It shall be unlawful for the employer to make effective a proposed change in wages or hours or for the employee to go on strike—

The old clause proceeds:

—until the dispute has been finally dealt with by a board, and a copy of its report has been delivered through the Registrar to both the parties affected;

Now here is another amendment:

The application for the appointment of a board shall be made by the employers or employees proposing the change in wages or hours.

I ask any honourable gentleman, what wrong is there in declaring upon whom shall rest the obligation of applying for a board? This amendment seems to place upon the shoulders of the parties asking for the change the obligation of taking the initiative in asking for the appointment of a board. I believe, too, that it is perhaps more in the interest of the employer that this amendment should be made than in the interest of the employee for this reason. It has been alleged that the employer should know what would be his wage scale before sending out this price-list or his travellers to seek orders, inasmuch as the price-list would be conditioned by the wage rate, and that the obligation to apply for a board and to wait until the board had investigated and reported would prevent him from preparing his price-list and sending out agents to seek orders.

Now, what is the situation to-day, without this amendment embodied in the Act? The employer decides that in order to compete with his rivals in other countries he must have a lower wage scale. He gives thirty days' notice that the wages will be cut down, and in nine cases out ten he waits until the employees again consult each other. Time is lost while the employees are conferring among themselves and deciding to ask for a board; but when they do make application, the employer is blocked and cannot decide upon and issue his price-list, but must await the result of the investigation and the report of the board.

Under the proposed clause it will not be so. The employer is told that he must himself ask for a board, and, being himself obliged to make the application, that factor will enter into his calculation as to the date at which he should notify his employees thirty days ahead that he intends to reduce their wages.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Can he ask for a board before a dispute has arisen?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He can.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: That is not the law as I read it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But he may have the dispute in 24 hours if that is necessary. He can give notice to his employees of the proposed reduction and ask for their answer.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is right.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And he will do so in good time to enable him as soon as he pleases to ask for a board. The average time that a board has occupied in its deliberations, according to the statement I have from the Department, is about 42 days. The employer knows also that he must prepare for that delay, and, knowing that, he takes time by the forelock and gives his notice in good time. He knows when he must fix the price-list, and he arranges to give notice of the intended reduction in wages in time to permit of a response from his employees, and, if they do not accept the reduction, an application on his part for the establishment of a board. I do not see that there is any harmful effect upon the employer from the fact that this Bill declares that the party asking for the change shall make application for a board.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why should there be 42 days' delay?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is the time it takes to constitute the board, call the parties together, take their evidence, hear their arguments, and make a pronouncement.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The great flood lasted only two days less than that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, but my honourable friend has attended many a trial which lasted more than forty-two days.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Is that the minimum period or the average?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is the average.

I have now given all the amendments proposed to be made to section 57. The first amendment, declaring it to be unlawful to make effective a proposed change before the dispute has been finally dealt with by a board simply emphasizes a principle or declaration which is already in the Act by the will of Parliament, including this branch. It is further provided in the amendment that the application for a board shall rest with the parties asking for the change. These are the only two amendments proposed, and I have yet to hear a good argument against either of them.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Carried.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: Honourable gentlemen, I do not wish to discuss this question from the legal side. I am satisfied that there is enough legal talent in this Chamber to do that properly. But I wish to say this, that the present Bill has been considered by many of our industrial institutions, and they take a different view from that which has been stated to the House this evening by the honourable leader. The changes suggested, they claim, are a hardship on the employers who wish to continue operations and market their product in competition with other products to be put on the market later on, when perhaps wages may have been reduced.

It is also felt that the suggested change is not entirely in the interest of the employees either. It is known that in the coal fields of Cape Breton the agreement between the employers and the miners, who are part of the international United Mine Workers' Association, with headquarters in the United States, will expire in January, 1924. Against that, the agreement with the United States mineworkers expires on the 1st of April, 1924. Now, if the wage question is not adjusted during the winter, as it usually is, then there is an interregnum, a period of uncertainty, and it may be that not sixty days but four months' time elapses before a settlement is reached. The parties are prepared to abide by the decision of the Conciliation Board, and if the board feels that the wage scale should be retroactive, then the employees and the mine owners are quite willing to abide by that decision, but they cannot mine and bank their coal owing to the risk and uncertainty in not knowing what that coal must meet in the way of competition from coal from the United States, Great Britain, and other countries. It would be perhaps well on in April when the question of what wages would be paid for the mining of that coal from the preceding January would be settled. If the employers are unable to state what the wages are, or to put a reduced scale of wages into effect, it means that they have either to run a risk and get what price they can for their coal, or else to take means to close down the mines.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I should like a little more light on this subject. I see that this amendment applies to all gas companies, mining companies, tram companies and other transportation companies.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does it apply to all mining companies?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: To all kinds of mining people, whether they are companies or not. When I was first spoken to about this law I thought it applied only to railway companies, but I now understand that it applies also to the mining industry. The people of Nova Scotia seem to me to have troubles enough. Why could not a law be made to provide that when a reduction of wages is put in force by any company and the matter is referred to a board, the findings of the board shall be retroactive to the day of the declaration of the reduction of wages?

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Or the increase of them?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Or whatever it is. The award of the board should be retroactive and apply from the date upon which the change in wages was made.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is exactly what occurred last year.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: If it did, I do not see that there was injury done to anybody.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It seems to me that this Act was intended to apply to all disputes, and it seems equitable that some provision should be made compelling the employer to go to arbitration on matters in dispute. However, there are many serious difficulties in the way, as has been pointed out by the honourable member for Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Webster). If the Act permitted of the award being made retroactive, no mischief would be done to the employee.

I am not at all sure, from the hasty glance I took at the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, which allows of employers and employees voluntarily coming within the ambit of the Act, that the provision authorizing the Minister to order a reference would not bring every industry in the country under the law, at the will of the Minister. The case which I mentioned a little while ago might be one of those which would, under the stress of political considerations, he brought within the operations of the law.

Now, while I have a good deal of sympathy with the intention, so far as it applies to great corporations like railways, I do not feel the same with regard to gas companies and small concerns of that description, because there are a great many of these people whom it would be a great hardship to compel, at the instance of perhaps a small minority of their employees, to go to all this expense and trouble.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Before the honourable gentleman leaves that point, I would like to ask him this question. In case of a proposed decrease in wages and its reference to a board of conciliation, the board might take three or four months to come to a conclusion, and the conclusion might be in favour of the decrease. How would you proceed to make the decrease retroactive and collect from the employees?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: In that case there would be no wrong to remedy.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Why?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Because the findings would be retroactive and there would be no arrears of wages to pay.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Yes, there would, because the Act provides that the wages shall remain the same until the board of conciliation has given its decision.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: That is where I think it is improper.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is what the Act says. If the decrease that the company decreed should be put into effect were justified by the board of conciliation, how would the honourable gentleman proceed to make the retroactive collection from the employees?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I have not made myself clear. My thought was this. Assume that a railway company reduced the wages 10 per cent, and assume that a board was applied for and investigated, and that as a result of their deliberations they concluded that the reduction should have been only 5 per cent. In that case the railway company would be obliged to pay to the workmen the 5 per cent by which they had reduced the wages in excess of what the board said was proper.

In the case suggested by the honourable gentleman who has just spoken, if the railway company for three or four months is not allowed to reduce the wages at all, and it is then found by the board that the company were justified in desiring to reduce the wages, they would have to whistle for their money.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: There it is. That is just the point.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I quite agree with that.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: May I point out to my honourable friend that railway employees are permanent in almost every case, and that if a board brought in a recommendation of that sort, there would be nothing whatever to prevent the railway company, as the employer, from deducting from the monthly pay cheque of the employee the proper amount.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH STAUNTON: I quite see that. But what about mining or other companies who employ men who are not permanent like railway employees?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In most cases they are. But I would like also to emphasize to my honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) the very serious difficulties that would arise if his idea were adopted. I have pointed out to the House—I think my honourable friend was here—that for sixteen years hundreds of thousands of employers in Canada have suffered the results of complying with the requirements of the Act.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Suffered in what way?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In that they have waited in many cases for months from the time they desired and sought a change in conditions before the procedure was fulfilled and the board's recommendation received. In every case the employees have had to await the postponed date when the procedure was finally tried out, before they could reap the results.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I really want to understand this. How, if my suggestion were adopted, would any of those persons be injured in the future? Let the past bury the past.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: They would be injured in this way, that the employer would have a distinct advantage in the operation of the law. The law would operate in one way for the workmen and in another way for the employer.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: How would they lose any money?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I do not think any Parliament in Canada could ever convince the citizens of Canada that that was just legislation.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Will the honourable gentleman explain—because it is all a question of money—how would they lose any money if my suggestion were adopted?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If my honourable friend had had the experience that I have had—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is not it. That does not answer the question.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: —with Boards of Conciliation and decisions of Boards, he would realize how impossible it would be to make an award retroactive except under the most extraordinary circumstances.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: How many of the awards made in railway matters, if any, have been retroactive?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In the terms of the McAdoo award, and in those of the decision of the Chicago Railway Board of 1920, which again was followed by our Canadian railways, there was a retroactive feature; but in no individual dispute in Canada that had not reference to the United States situation, so far as I can recall, has there been a retroactive award.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The McAdoo award was not made by a Board of Conciliation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department states that outside of cases in which both parties are responsible by consent, delays have practically always been caused by employers, and largely disappear when the employers have a direct object in expediting procedure.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: As I understand the suggestion of the honourable member for Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), it is that the law be framed in such a way that the employer shall be at liberty to reduce the wages on a given date, but that, if the reduction be not made with the assent of the employees, it shall then be incumbent upon him to at once apply for the appointment of a Board for the purpose of passing upon the advisability of the change; and that the Board shall have power to render an award that shall be retroactive, and shall compel the employer to pay any back wages to employees from the date at which the change was made. Likewise, if employees desire an increase of wages, that unless the desire meets with the assent of the employer, it be incumbent upon them to demand at once the appointment of a Board for the purpose of passing upon their demand, the Board again to have power to give retroactive effect to its decision to the date of the demand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What would be the situation if the award or report were rejected by the party that would suffer under it?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I do not understand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If the award is rejected by the party that suffers under it, then there is no question of retroactivity.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: If I understand the honourable gentleman, the award in any case is futile, because there is no power to enforce it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is no compulsion.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Then, what is the use of the award in any case?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is simply to enlighten public opinion, because either party can reject the award of the Board and proceed on its way. The suspension provided for by section 57 continues up to the moment when the Board reports; when it has reported, there is no more suspension.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: If that is so, it seems to me most unjust to expose the employers to all these serious penalties when it is utterly impossible to enforce an award against the workmen.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The whole object of the Act is to bring the parties together on matters that concern the public and in which the public is interested, and from which it may suffer, in order that the public may know the facts and bring its moral influence to bear on the parties towards conciliation.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Will the honourable gentleman allow me? Assume that the National Railways, for example, desire to reduce wages, and apply for a Board, and the Board makes an award which the railways think utterly unjust, and which they refuse to observe. Are they open to all these penalties?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, no penalties.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman is losing sight of the fact that by the proposed amendment it is made unlawful.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. It shall be unlawful to alter the conditions pending the arbitration and report.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It shall be unlawful for the employer to make effective the proposed change in wages or hours or for the employees to go on strike until the dispute has been finally dealt with by the Board and a copy of its report has been delivered through the Registrar to both the parties affected.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is all.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But after that has been exhausted, we shall have to commence over again.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: A change has been made, and the Board passes upon the change.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, the intention or desire for a change is declared.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But the Board decides against it, and it will be unlawful to repeat the operation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. The Act does not go further than to stay the hand of the employee or of the employer, and to maintain the condition of things existing until the Board has heard the parties and has filed its report. When the Board has filed its report, then the parties are free to act as they desire—to reject the report and proceed on their way and declare a strike or impose a reduction in wages.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Would it not be a new offence? Assume that the Board has made an award: the day after it makes its award, the railway company reduces wages. Surely that is a new offence, and they would have to go to another Board.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: The result of it is that the case would proceed and result in a judgment which would be no good and could not be enforced.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No judgment can be.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: But pending the proceedings—it may be three months, four months, or six months—it would be different. Then the law would be maintained in such a way that it would have a good solid grip on one party.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: On the two.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Excuse me. The other one cannot be gripped. The honourable gentleman from Hamilton it absolutely correct. Suppose, for instance, a reduction is imposed to-day—it is never imposed at pleasure. Competition is such that a public utility—and there are a great many others than railways—finds a reduction necessary. But the employees say: "No, you cannot do that." Then a Conciliation Board is appointed, and week after week and month after month the wages are paid. At the end of months what is going to happen? The wages which have gone to the employees, and which should not have gone to them because the Board has approved of the reduction, never come back.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Why?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Because you can never collect.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Why not?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I do not need to answer that question. Anybody who has had any experience with labourers knows that it cannot be done and never has been done.

I will give another example of how the law, as it has been contended, has been observed by employees. My memory goes back to a few years ago when I travelled as a pilgrim from the good city of Toronto to Ottawa to oppose a demand made against a public utility for a Board of Conciliation. The year before, in 1919, the men had obtained an increase in wages of $1,500,000, and they had agreed to work for those wages for twelve months. Three months afterwards the men tore up their contract and said to the public utility: "You will pay us additional money, but we won't call it additional wages, but a bonus." The public utility said: "Bonus or additional wages always come out of our treasury, and we cannot afford to pay." "Well," said the men, "if you cannot afford to pay it, we will journey to Ottawa and ask for a Conciliation Board." "Very well," said the public utility, "you cannot get a Conciliation Board. You are violating the agreement; you are repudiating an honest undertaking you have signed with us." What happened? Who do you think was given the decision? Was it the men who laid on the table a signed contract, which could not be denied, agreeing to work for a whole year at those wages, or was it the public utility which said: "That was our only guarantee, and we are asking that that contract be respected"? The workmen got the decision. But let me proceed. They got the Board of Conciliation. What did the Board of Conciliation say? They said to the workmen that they were wrong—that they had no right to an increase. Therefore there were two reasons why the employees should not insist: first, because they had agreed to a certain wage; and, secondly, because their demand for an increase had been turned down by the Board. What happened? Do you think they were satisfied? No, sir. They said to the public utility: "Notwithstanding our contract, and notwithstanding the verdict of the Board, you are going to increase our wages, and we give you twenty-four hours within which to do it." They gave twenty-four hours within which to accede to their demands, and then they quit, and the public utility was at their mercy, and had to fork out practically another $1,500,000. That is one instance with which I was personally connected, and which I followed up from day to day.

I can give another illustration, this time in Montreal, in which forty different classes of workmen got together and made a contract to work for a year at certain wages. In a few months the most important class, not in wages, but those who performed the first operation, upon which all the other operations depended, said one morning at 11 o'clock: "We want more wages." "But," it was said, "you agreed to work for a whole year at the same wages." They said, "We don't care. It is 11 o'clock. At 12 o'clock, if we do not get what we want, we will walk out." "But," it was argued, "you cannot do that. In case of disagreement you have bound yourselves to an arbitration; surely you are going to wait for that." They said: "We are going to wait until the hand of the clock points to 12," which they did; and then out they went.

Did they respect their contract? I think it is very imprudent for anyone to say that human nature ceases to be human nature; and I do not know of any place in which human nature is more thoroughly represented than in our labour unions. The labour unions here are answerable to nobody; and when you make legislation like that, which is supposed to be binding upon both parties, what is the result in fact? We in this House are not obliged to abide by political influence; this is a place where we have the right to be independent whether we step on the feet of 50,000 workmen or not. The labour unions are not bound in this country. In England, where the associations are obliged to have capital, they are answerable; but here, how can they be? They are not; and for that reason I am against this law which cannot but work an injustice. If there is a decrease in wages, the extra wages paid are gone, and you can never bring them back, and by the time the judgment is rendered under which you have the right to get them back, the judgment is worth nothing at all.

But there is another reason why I am opposed to this legislation. Do you think the public utilities can be fettered and chained for three or four or five months without any danger to their existence? Why, if there is a change in the scale of wages in the United States, with which we have to compete, our wages must go down immediately, not after four months. What is the use of discussing that? Everybody knows it. Take, for instance, the coal of Sydney. I am interested in Sydney coal, and know whereof I speak. Do you think that if wages in the States go down, Sydney can afford to wait for four months before bringing down wages there? What are we going to do with the coal?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: May I ask my honourable friend a question?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yes, you may.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Is it not true that the wages paid in Sydney have never aproached the wages of coal miners in the United States—that the wages in Sydney have always been substantially below those paid in other fields?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Very well, sir. Is it not also absolutely true that it is very much cheaper to live in Sydney than in places in the States where higher wages are paid? As everybody knows, it is the difference between wages and cost of living that matters. However, that does not change the situation. When the big competitors on the other side of the line bring down the cost of their labour and their product we must bring down the cost of ours, and not wait four months to do so. Are the labourers going to compensate for the loss that will be incurred by the company if the coal is banked for four months at exhorbitant wages? No. So what will it mean? If you pass this legislation, honourable gentlemen, the only prudent thing that a company can do is to get the assent of their men to a reduction, or else close down. There will be no other alternative. The company must know what they are doing and what their product will cost them. So they will say to their men. "Will you or will you not accept a reduction of 10 per cent? You will not accept it? Then out you go." That is the only thing that can be done. The company cannot afford to do otherwise. The labour people know very well that it suits no industry to close down; to lock out their workmen, and companies do that only when forced to do it.

In short, honourable gentlemen, this Bill is legislating for the time during which the trial of the dispute will last, and it is a trial leading to a judgment which is of no value. By this legislation, if passed, you want to make sure that the status quo shall be maintained during the time the trial lasts, and that the interest of the workmen will not be injured, but you are making no provision—and, may I say, you cannot make any provision—to give a similar guarantee to the employer or the public utility corporation. For that reason I do not think this legislation is fair. Not only is it in my opinion unfair, but it is not advisable even from the point of view of the economics and good administration which ought to govern any business in this country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is not the honourable gentleman addressing his objections to the clause as it is already in the Statute Book, containing all the elements against which my honourable friend is arguing?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Clearly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And not to these merely consequential amendments to the Act which are being suggested?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: The honourable gentleman, with the help of my honourable friend from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson), has made it quite clear that the intention of the clause as it now exists is to grip, but that it does not do so. You are putting the teeth into it now with this amendment. What I object to is that the clause, the spirit of which is unjust, would become unjust in practice because of the teeth that you are just going to put into it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I am not disposed to go as far as my honourable friend who has just spoken. I understand that he is against legislation of this kind in toto. As far as I am concerned, I am in favour of legislation for the purpose of bringing the facts of an industrial dispute before the bar of public opinion. I think public opinion is the best judge and will have the best influence upon employers and employees in matters of this kind. But I invite the honourable leader of the Government again to read his amendment, and I think he will see that if that amendment is passed employers will be forever, unless this Act is repealed, under the impossibility of making any reduction in wages.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Oh, yes; absolutely.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Absolutely.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Absolutely; because they cannot make a change before the matter has been passed upon by the board of conciliation, and they can make no change at all, but fall again under the Act; and if they proceeded 2 times in succession they would occupy the same position.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Surely my honourable friend does not advance that suggestion seriously.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, seriously.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The law has always been interpreted, and always—

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But my honourable friend refers to the clause without the change. I am speaking of it with the proposed change.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The section of the Act referring to the acceptance or rejection of a board's recommendation is not in any way changed, and is not under consideration.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But this is a change. I base my assertion on these words: "It shall be unlawful for the employer to make effective a proposed change in wages or hours or the employees to go on strike."

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Until?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: "Until the dispute has been finally dealt with by a board."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: By a board, yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, "and a copy of its report has been delivered through the Registrar to both the parties affected."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Full stop.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Then it goes on: "The application for the appointment of a board shall be made by the employers or employees proposing the change in wages or hours," and the board shall decide. But when the board has decided, no change has been made, and it will again be unlawful to make a change.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Impossible.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 be adopted?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: One moment. I suggest that the amendments be taken seriatim. Section 2 contains three amendments. The first one is to provide that——employers and employees shall give at least thirty days' notice of an intended or desired change affecting conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours.

There is in that simply the addition of the words "or desired." I suppose that amendment is harmless.

Now, coming to the argument of my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique), to whose opinions I always listen with close attention and attach due weight, I cannot accept his interpretation. My honourable friend says he relies on these words:

It shall be unlawful for the employer to make effective a proposed change in wages or hours or for the employees to go on strike until the dispute has been finally dealt with by a board, and a copy of its report has been delivered through the Registrar to both the parties affected.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If you stop there, it is all right.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, I stop there; or I will go further:

The application for the appointment of a board shall be made by the employers or employees proposing the change in wages or in hours; neither of these parties shall alter the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours, or on account of the dispute do or be concerned in doing, directly or indirectly, anything in the nature of a lockout or strike, or a suspension or discontinuance of employment or work, but the relationship of employer and employee shall continue uninterrupted by the dispute, or anything arising out of the dispute; but if, in the opinion of the Board, either party uses this or any other provision of this Act for the purpose of unjustly maintaining a given condition of affairs through delay, and the Board so reports to the Minister, such party shall be guilty of an offence, and liable to the same penalties as are imposed for a violation of the next preceding section.

Now, honourable gentlemen, if the Act which is before us is read through, from the first section to the last, it will be seen that the whole purport and intent of it is to avert strikes or lockouts which would cause injury to the public, and the whole effort made under the Act is to bring the parties together in order to have them agree, if possible, and, if after the report of the board they do not agree, then to give the public at large, who are interested in the dispute, a knowledge of the facts, so that the moral influence of public opinion may be brought to bear on the dispute.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Right.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The dispute is made the subject of investigation, and when it has run the gauntlet of that investigation the trial is at an end, for the reason that the law is not made compulsory beyond the time when the board has made its report. The law does not declare that the employees must against their will give their services. The same principle is recognized and treated in that solemn document known as the Treaty of Versailles, containing the Covenant of the League of Nations, which declares that labour is not a commodity, but the work of human beings, and those human beings must remain free men. That is the reason why the arbitration stops at the board's report. But when it stops there, I venture to assert, it has done its work, inasmuch as it has brought together employer and employees and has investigated their differences. The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act has brought about this result in Canada, that of 580 disputes referred under the terms of the statute from 1907 to 1923, there have been only 36 cases in which the threatened strike was not averted. I maintain that this is a very important result. One of the late Ministers of Labour, who was not from the labour world, the late Hon. Mr. Crothers, stated in 1917, after having had the administration of this Act under his supervision, the following opinion:

> One sometimes hears it said that the labour laws of Australia are far in advance of ours, and I wish to say a word for the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. Although the Act is not a child of mine, I have never lost an opportunity of giving credit to those who succeeded in getting this Act placed upon the Statute Book of Canada. I believe the principle involved in it is good, and I am sure that it has been the means of preventing large numbers of strikes. This Act has saved the wage earners of this country millions and millions of dollars. It has maintained industrial peace in scores of cases where very serious troubles would have developed but for the provisions of this or some similar Act.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If it is so good, why change it?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: We are not changing it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The answer is simple: the effect of these amendments is simply to emphasize the good that is in it, and clarify it. That is all there is in this Bill. The amendment in the last clause simply extends the penalty to cover any change that may be made, contrary to the law which we have passed and which is now on the Statute Book. It provides a penalty for making a change effective before the parties have been brought together.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I beg leave to move that the Committee rise.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Carried.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, I can explain what the motion means.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: There can be no discussion of that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The adoption of the motion means that the Bill is rejected, and that the Act remains as at present, that is, without the teeth, as my honourable friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien), has said.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: But with the spirit, as the honourable leader has said.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Two and a half per cent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It remains with the spirit, but I would draw the attention of honourable members of the House to this fact—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I call the attention of the Chair. This cannot be discussed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I can continue to discuss the Bill on the motion that the Committee rise.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, you cannot.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think I can. At all events, I would draw the attention of this Chamber to the fact that we are examining a Bill which has passed the other Chamber unanimously.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Order.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We have, it is true, a right to reject it, and everyone must take his own responsibility.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We are willing to take it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Will the honourable leader—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The honourable leader of the Government has not yet indicated to the House—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Order.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: —the effect of the Committee adopting the motion of the honourable member from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler).

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, he has.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, the rising of the Committee will simply kill the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is what the honourable gentleman said.

The motion of Hon. Mr. Fowler was negatived: yeas, 13; nays, 15.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out section 2.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I agree with that motion if the honourable gentleman will substitute a clause such as I suggested before. I think that, as the honourable leader has said, the Act is a very good one, and we ought to try as far as we reasonably can to make it effective in every way. I do not agree with the present clause, but I think we might amend it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I move that the Committee rise and report progress.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What is the object of that?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: To prepare an amendment and to submit it to the Government. I have voted against the motion which has been put, but if pressed to vote for the amendment as it stands, I would vote against it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is only one objection that I have to rising. We have given two hours to the study of this Bill; we have laid before the Senate the various views of the members; we will meet to-morrow with another shift or a double number of Senators, and we will again have to discuss the whole of the Bill and go through the work we have done this evening. Is that fair to those who are here?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: This is a very important measure, and I do not think it would be proper to undertake at the moment to prepare the amendment which we have in mind.

Progress was reported.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 8, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Pardee for the second reading of Bill 102, an Act to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: The other day I moved the second reading of this Bill. The honourable the leader of the Opposition said he rather objected to the Bill being read the second time, inasmuch as it might be taken as agreeing to the principle of the Bill. As it is my intention to move for a special Committee to consider the Bill, I would move the second reading now without the House accepting the principle of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: I beg to move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Dandurand:

That this Bill be referred to a special Committee, consisting of Hon. Messrs. Belcourt, Barnard, Dandurand, Hardy, Fowler, McMeans, McCoig, McLennan, Lynch-Staunton, Lougheed (Sir James), Ross (Middleton), and the mover.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m. to-morrow.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 16, 1923.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION BILL

FIRST READING

Bill 54, an Act to provide for the Investigation of Combines, Trusts Monopolies and Mergers.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

THE PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

PROPOSED CHIME OF BELLS FOR THE TOWER

Hon. GEORGE H. BRADBURY rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate and of the Government that on June 22, 1920, this House unanimously adopted a report of a special committee recommending that a carillon of bells be placed in the Victory Tower to be known as memorial bells, and inquire if it is the intention of the Government to take any action in the matter?

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I have placed this notice on the Order Paper for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the Government in regard to placing in the tower of this magnificent building a carillon of bells. I desire for a few moments to refer to the report that was made in 1920 by a Special Committee appointed by this House, which spent a great deal of time in securing information regarding the advisability and wisdom of placing a carillon in the tower. The report is lengthy, but so that the House may be reminded of its contents, I desire to read some portions of it. The report is dated Friday, June 8, 1920, and says:

The Special Committee appointed to consider the advisability of installing in the tower of the Parliament Buildings a firstclass Carillon in connection with the clock, and the cost thereof, beg leave to make their Second Report, as follows:--

In considering the matter referred to your Committee for report, the Committee examined the plans of the tower as prepared by the Architect, Mr. John Pearson, who appeared before the Committee, and gave as his opinion that the construction of the tower would lend itself admirably to the installation of the Carillon in connection with the clock.

In order to secure an estimate of the cost, the Committee has communicated with various well established firms of bell founders in the old country, and have received estimates covering the cost of manufacturing and installation of various styles and types of Carillon ranging in price from £8.165 to £40,000.

In the opinion of the Committee it is very desirable that a Carillon to be called "Memorial Bells" should be installed in the tower of the Parliament Buildings. As to the expenditure to be made in connection therewith, and the selection of the most suitable type of bells, your Committee recommend that these matters be left to the decision of a Committee composed of members of the Senate and House of Commons and the Architect, said Committee to be named by the Government.

Your Committee has been informed by the Architect that it is the intention to complete about 100 feet of the tower during the present summer and another 100 feet during next summer. The Architect informed your Committee that no changes in the construction of the tower would be necessary to accommodate the Carillon. He emphasized the fact that the bells ought to be on the ground here not later than September, 1921, so that they could be hoisted into position before the floors in the tower were completed.

Your Committee has been in communication with the largest and most reputable bell founders in the world, all of which are on British soil, in and around London. The firm of John Taylor and Company, of Loughborough, which is one of the oldest bell founders in Great Britain, has a splendid reputation. It has furnished some of the largest and greatest Carillons in the world. Its largest and greatest Carillon was furnished to the great Cathedral of St. Coleman, at Queenston, Ireland. The London Times, of 1919, speaking of this Carillon, said: "It is considered to be the largest and finest in the United Kingdom and has the most perfect set of bells in the world." This firm recommends for the Parliament Buildings here, a scale of 49 bells, being four octaves, chromatic, with largest bell about 7 tons, note "F." The total weight of these bells would be about 50 tons. In speaking of this proposed Carillon they say: "It would be a truly majestic Carillon, and we feel perfectly justified in claiming that it would rank as the finest in the world. For although the largest bell of the Malines Carillon is reputed to be heavier than we are proposing for Ottawa, still there are serious inequalities and blemishes in tune and tone in the Malines scale, which is really not a matter to be surprised at, considering the varying dates of the bells, as they are of five different centuries."

The estimated cost of this magnificent carillon involved in the tower is £40,000. Your Committee feel that some considerable reduction might be secured in this estimate by further negotiations.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY.

This report, signed by myself, was passed unanimously. Since the report was made, honourable gentlemen, I have been advised that prices of everything used in connection with the manufacture of bells has been very much reduced.

The carillon that was quoted at £40,000 can now be bought for £20,000 to £25,000.

The carillon which I recommend for this memorial tower will be one of the largest and perhaps the best carillon in the world. The tenor bell will weigh from 16,000 to 18,000 lbs.

The 49 bells will weigh fully 50 tons or 100,000 lbs. I believe this carillon can be placed in the Tower here, completed in every particular, for a sum not exceeding $120,000.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: What is the tone of the bell.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: F.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Yes, but sharp or flat?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I cannot tell you. I think it is sharp.

Right here I wish to utter a word of warning to those who may be entrusted with the purchase of arranging for this carillon. It is this: there must be an absolute guarantee from the manufacturers that every bell is in perfect tune with itself. Every bell, I understand, has four distinct notes; consequently you can see the necessity of these bells being in perfect tune. The success of the carillon depends on the individual bells being in perfect tune, so that there will be perfect harmony in the combined carillon of bells.

In view of the purpose of this proposed memorial, Parliament will not surely balk at the necessary expenditure to provide what would be a magnificent speaking National Memorial to our revered Canadian soldiers who gave all that Justice and Freedom should be preserved to the world.

And now, honourable gentlemen, that we are about to complete the Victory Tower in connection with this magnificent building, and as it promises to be one of the grandest memorial towers on this continent, within which is to be arranged a beautiful Memorial Room, finished with a stone supplied by France, as a mark of its appreciation of the noble deeds and great sacrifices made by Canadians during the late war. There is to be also an individual tablet hung on the wall of this room bearing the name, rank and battalion number of each soldier who died in action during the war. In the centre of the room there will be a beautiful stand made of a dark marble taken from some of the battlefields of France. On that stand is to be placed a large book of history containing the name and war record of each Canadian soldier who fell or died on duty during the war, and, in view of this memorial chamber in the Victory Tower, I ask this House what more fitting finish to this Tower and its sacred Memorial Room could be suggested, than a carillon of bells that would speak daily to tens of thousands of our people, of heroic deeds, and of great sacrifices made, and of a duty well and faithfully done by our splendid Canadian soldiers during the late world war.

True, honourable gentlemen, we cannot dedicate; we cannot consecrate; we cannot hallow the ground wherein the bodies of these Canadian sons lie—the flower of Canada's young manhood, who struggled and died fighting for great principles. These men have consecrated France with their blood, to the end that France and other Christian nations might carry on and perpetuate the great principles of Love, Justice and Freedom, the inheritance of all free men.

It is far above our power to add to or detract from what these gallant men have done. The world will little note or remember what we do or say here to-day, but it can never forget what our gallant citizen soldiers did for the cause of freedom and righteousness at Vimy Ridge, and at other well-fought battle fronts in France. It is then for us, honourable gentlemen, who live, rather to dedicate ourselves to the great tasks to be done—that, by and through the agony suffered, and the sacrifices made, by our honoured dead, we will seriously devote ourselves to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion, and resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain.

These proposed Memorial Bells will speak daily in martial tones to tens of thousands of our people on both sides of the river, of a great and glorious victory and of patriotism and love of country. Love of country and flag must have permeated Canadian young manhood and inspired over 500,000 citizens to leave home and family offering their lives in defence of imperilled institutions; love of country and British institutions must have sustained and inspired our soldiers who died in defence of great principles, that these principles might be preserved to us and to future generations.

Nothing less sacred than this love of country and flag, could have sustained our gallant men during the years of great and unprecedented hardships, and heroic sacrifices made in the trenches, that principles underlying Christian civilization might be perpetuated and handed down to future generations. It was a noble love and patriotism, which ought to impel all Canadians to vie with each other in measuring up to the high standard of citizenship set by these our glorious dead.

This carillon of bells will keep before us our duty; they will speak to us of the glorious victory of our men at Vimy Ridge; they will appeal not only to our memory, but to our hearts, and remind us of the debt we owe to our splendid soldiers who died that we might live.

This bell music has a wonderful charm and influence on those who listen to their mellifluous notes. While they will ring out inspiring songs of victory that will recall the heroic deeds of our splendid Canadian army, they will also at times appeal to the emotional side of our nature, and touch hearts that no other influence can touch with the pathos of their beautiful mystic messages. The possibilities of such a carillon as I hope to see on this majestic tower is far beyond my powers of description. Suffice it to say it is the most powerful and one of the most harmonious musical instruments ever invented.

Honourable gentlemen, that the House and those interested outside of the House may realize the wonderful possibilities of this carillon which I propose, I will place on record a description of the opening of the carillon built by Taylor & Co., of Loughborough, England, in the tower of the Roman Catholic Church at Queenstown, Ireland. William Wooding Starmer, one of the greatest authorities in the world on carillons, speaking of this subject, says:

> The clock and the carillon machine is by Messrs. Smith, of Derby, and the movement is the largest and most powerful in Ireland. The clock face is 7 feet 6 inches in diameter. The quarter chimes (Westminster) are played on four bells, and the hour is struck on the great bell—the first stroke being the exact time. The clock also operates a chime—tune mechanism which requisitions seventeen bells of the carillon and plays twelve tunes: (1) The Minstrel Boy; (2) The Harp That Once; (3) Let Erin Remember; (4) Faith of Our Fathers; (5) Erin, the Tear; (6) God of Mercy; (7) Adeste Fideles; (8) Hail, Glorious St. Patrick; (9) God Bless Our Pope; (10) Tantum Ergo; (11) How Dear To Me; (12) Avenging and Bright.
> The chime-tunes are so arranged that, so far as possible, the bells are used equally, such a method keeping the whole of the mechanism in working order and preventing the undue wear of any particular bells and their connections.
> The carillon of forty-two bells with clavier 3½-octaves in compass is the largest and finest in the United Kingdom, and the most perfect set of bells in the world tunes to equal temperament. The founders are Messrs. John and Denison Taylor, of Loughborough. The total weight of the bells is 17 tons 2 cwt.

It will be noted, honourable gentlemen, that the total weight of the Queenstown carillon is about 17 tons. The carillon that is recommended for our Victory tower will weigh in the vicinity of 50 tons. The musical effect when properly played would be wonderfully impressive. I desire to place on record another programme played at the opening of the Queenstown carillon. This is for the purpose of giving the House some idea of the great possibilities of a carillon of bells. There is nothing that can be played on an organ or piano that cannot be reproduced on a carillon such as I am suggesting:

Sonata	G. Van Hoey.
Ave Maria	Schubert.
Prelude in C. Major	Bach.
Adagio from "Pathetic" Sonata	Beethoven.
Neapolitan Song	Casella.
"Rubensmarch"	Benoit.
Adeste Fideles	Webb.
Song of Victory	Mestdagh.
Pecheurs de Perles	Bizet.
O Star of Eve	Wagner.
Gavotte	Vandervell.
Spring Song	Mendelssohn.
Serenade	Gabriel Marie.
Berceuse de Jocelyn	Godard.
Fantasia "Les Cloches de Corneville"	Planquette.
Flemish Songs:
(a) My Mother Tongue	Benoit.
(b) When the Swallows Homeward Fly	De Broeck.
(c) Antwerp Tower	Verhaeren.
Stances	Flegier.
Andante Cantabile	Denyn.
Intermezzo	Mascagni.
Fantasia "Carmen"	Bizet.

All this, honourable gentlemen, goes to show that there is no limit to the possibilities of a properly constructed carillon.

Honourable gentlemen: it does seem to me that as a national memorial, no more fitting tribute to our gallant men who fell in France, and on the other battle fronts, could be devised than this grand Victory Tower, with its beautiful Memorial Room, and this proposed carillon of 49 bells. These bells would keep ever before us the sacrifices made by our citizen soldiers, and would be an inspiration to future generations. Their mystic notes would whisper inspiring messages to all classes and creeds, as the language of music is universal, and the bells would draw thousands of people from different parts of this continent to hear what I expect will be one of the greatest carillons in the world, and a fitting tribute to our glorious dead?

Honourable gentlemen, I sincerely trust that the Government will see its way clear to install this carillon when the tower is completed; and if the Government decides to do so, it will be necessary for it to take action a year ahead in order to give the bell founders a chance to get the carillon in position.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I am sure we are all grateful to the honourable gentleman from Selkirk for giving us the interesting statement which he has placed on the records of the Senate. All I can say at this moment is that the tower of the Parliament Buildings has been so constructed that a carillon or chime of bells can be installed later, whenever financial conditions warrant it. I will make it my duty to transmit the remarks of the honourable gentleman to the Minister of Public Works and to draw the attention of Council to them.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND COURT OF APPEAL

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. MURPHY inquired:

1. When do the Government intend appointing the extra judge to the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island provided for in the provincial statute passed over a year ago to constitute a proper court of appeal?

2. Is the Government aware that grave injustice is being done litigants before the court awaiting this appointment?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

(1) The Government has not decided to make an appointment.

(2) No. That is to say, apparently there is nothing in the record which would indicate that there have been demands or complaints concerning this matter.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: We will have to put something in the record.

DISMISSAL OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS

DISCUSSION AND INQUIRY

Hon. W. H. BENNETT rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the dismissal of Government officials and inquire if it is the policy of the Government to dismiss officials on the statement of any Liberal Member of Parliament that such officials have been guilty of political interference without inquiry, as was done in the case of the Postmaster of Scott Junction, County of Beauce, on the statement of the present Minister of Health, Member for Beauce.

He said: My attention was drawn to this matter by the fact that on the 9th of May the following question was asked and answered in this Chamber:

Hon. Mr. Bolduc inquired of the Government:

1. Has Maurice Jobin been dismissed as Postmaster of Scott Junction, in the County of Beauce?

2. If the affirmative, has an investigation, concerning his behaviour, been held, previous to his dismissal?

Hon. Mr. Dandurand:

1. Yes.

2. No. Postmaster dismissed on statement of Member of Parliament that to his personal knowledge Postmaster engaged in acts of partisanship.

In this respect I want to point out that while honourable gentlemen opposite were in opposition there was for many years perhaps no question ever fought out more bitterly in the House of Commons than the question of the dismissal of men holding positions under the Crown. I want to say, further, that under the late Government, in the County that I at that time represented in the House of Commons, there was not a single dismissal made, and it is a large riding. One postmaster, who was alleged to have been guilty of political interference, was granted an investigation. He thereupon resigned, and consequently no investigation was held. The policy always laid down by the honourable gentlemen while in Opposition was that every dismissal must be clear and aboveboard, and in each case the employee concerned should have a chance to answer the charge.

But what is the case here? The leader in this House states that the postmaster was dismissed on the statement of a member of Parliament that to his personal knowledge the postmaster had been engaged in acts of partisanship. There could be, I assume, only one member of Parliament conversant with such an action on the part of the postmaster at Scott Junction, and that was the Hon. Dr. Béland. I hope the Minister will state who the member of Parliament was that made the complaint. But it is not only in that one riding: all over the country one hears these complaints. What I am going to ask the Minister to do when he replies is to say whether of necessity the member of Parliament shall be a Liberal, or whether an official shall be dismissed on complaint of a Progressive member or a Conservative member? There has been not only one dismissal in this county, but three—and I want to give all credit to the Postmaster General, the Hon. Mr. Murphy, for the fact that these dismissals have all been made during his absence from office: they have all been made in the month of April of the present year, during which time he has not been in the city. I presume, therefore, the acting Minister issued the orders for the dismissals, and I would like to know by whom these gentlemen were decapitated: first, at Scott Junction, Maurice Jobin, who received a salary of $753 a year, and in whose place no appointment has yet been made; second, in the post office at Bolduc, where Lucien Garneau was dimissed on the 6th of April, and where the salary was $670 a year, and where no appointment has been made; and at LeRocher, where a similar officer, Remi Bolduc, was dismissed on the 6th of April. This being a small post office, the salary was only $60. It will be noticed that none of these expulsions were made until this year, and the public might as well know that since Mr. Murphy has been out of his office, judging by all accounts, partizanship has been rampant.

I would like to ask the Minister—and he may answer this at some later time—whether it is not a fact that there are to-day upwards of one hundred applications for appointments as postmasters recommended by the Civil Service Commission, lying on the desk of the pro tem Postmaster General? Such statements are made publicly outside. The newspaper called The Veteran made the statement months ago that there were over fifty of those applications lying on the desk of the Postmaster General, and not only that, but that every applicant recommended was a returned soldier. I have reason to believe that the list has swollen until it to-day contains the names, of upwards of one hundred men.

The honourable gentleman might also tell us when we are to expect the Postmaster General back from Mexico, or wherever he may be, and whether the Government is prepared to receive him back with open arms or not. The way the Post Office Department is administered is a disgrace. Let me give an instance. In the town in which I live, a town of over 7,000 people, the postmastership, owing to the death of the late occupant of that position, has been open for over a year, and this spineless Government is afraid to make an appointment because they are terrified at the possible effect it might have on the local elections. And yet lying in the office here in Ottawa is an application from a returned soldier who was wounded, a man well qualified for the position, and who was formerly a railway mail clerk. He has not been on his run for months, but the Government is so terrified that it will not make an appointment in that town. Of all the departments, this Department seems to be the worst. For the satisfaction of office-holders all over the country, I hope the honourable gentleman will announce, as the Finance Minister of this Dominion announced the other day in regard to the tariff, that there is to be stability in this line of policy. If there is going to be stability in this line of policy of dismissing officials on the complaint of a Liberal member of Parliament, I ask whether or not the same practice will be extended also to Conservative and Progressive members of Parliament. Whenever some hankering camp-follower of honourable gentlemen opposite desires and seeks for some office, is he to have it simply on the recommendation of the member for that district? If so, will the member be restricted to that district?

I hope, if the honourable gentleman postpones his remarks, that he will look carefully into the matter, and when he makes his reply will let it be known how many applications have been made by returned soldiers for positions in the Post Office Department, and how many recommendations have been made by the Civil Service Commission for the appointment of postmasters throughout the different provinces of this Dominion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: As no other honourable gentleman apparently wishes to speak on this question, I will give the very short answer which I have; but I will preface that answer by informing the honourable gentleman that when we passed the Act constituting the Civil Service Commission, we laid down the principle that:

> No deputy head, officer, clerk or employee in the civil service shall be debarred from voting at any Dominion or provincial election if, under the laws governing the said election, he has the right to vote; but no such deputy head, officer, clerk or employee shall engage in partisan work in connection with any such election, or contribute, receive or in any way deal with any money for any party funds.

I do not know to what extent that clause has been extended or modified, but the principle is still recognized in the Act that a civil servant can be dismissed for political interference or political partizanship.

My honourable friend has travelled somewhat outside and away from his question to divulge a state of things which he claims exists in Ontario. I am not able to answer him in regard to that because I know nothing about the complaint. He may obtain information by putting questions on the Order Paper and I will see that answers are obtained, although that may take more than a day.

Of course, the speech of my honourable friend sounds a little queer to my ear, because we in this House are working in another atmosphere than the members of the other Chamber; and I would rather that members of the House of Commons who are in contact with the electorate should discuss this question than that it should be discussed in the Senate. All I can say is that it is in my memory that in 1913 or 1914 a question was put on the Order Paper, or an order was obtained, for a statement of the employees dismissed after 1911, and that up to the date of the return, 12,000 had been dismissed. But that was not the powerful part of the answer: 24,000 had been appointed in their stead.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Were not the bulk of the 12,000 who had been dismissed day labourers?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know. If the report had said that 12,000 were dismissed and 6,000 had been put in their places, I would have had very little complaint to make; and yet perhaps there was a justification for the increase. But I believe that it is not the duty of this Chamber to discuss these questions.

I must answer the question of my honourable friend. The answer is: "The Minister concerned may recommend the dismissal of a public official, if he is satisfied that to the personal knowledge of a member of Parliament that public official has been guilty of political interference."

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Is that in the Civil Service Act?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, that is the answer to the question of my honourable friend. Of course the minister must be satisfied that there has been political interference. The principle is laid down that if a member of Parliament takes the responsibility of asserting that to his own knowledge a certain official has been guilty of political interference, the Minister may recommend that he be dismissed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Which side of the Speaker must the member sit upon?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend will take cognizance of the answer, he will see that there is no qualification. I shall be free from the responsibility of applying this principle in the case of my own Department.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Will the honourable gentleman say what is the basis of the authority he has just read.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is simply an expression of policy, that is all.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Is there any stability to it?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Oh, yes, lots.

WRANGEL ISLAND

MOTION WITHDRAWN

On the Notice of Motion:

By Hon. Mr. Fowler:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate it is desirable that the Canadian Government shall forthwith take such steps as are necessary to protect the rights of Canada to Wrangel Island, and all other parts of the extreme north which by situation, properly belong to Canada.

Hon. GEO. W. FOWLER: Honourable gentlemen, I had intended to move this motion, but since the motion was put upon the Order Paper it has come to my notice that the Government have sent Mr. Stefannson to London—I do not mean in consequence of the motion having been put on the Order Paper—for the purpose of discussing with the Imperial Government the taking over or retention of Wrangel Island or the abandonment of the same, and therefore it will not be necessary for me to move the resolution which stands in my name.

I congratulate the Government upon having done this, and upon having shown themselves wide awake with regard to our northern territory. I say "our" because at the present time the title of Wrangel Island is no doubt in Canada. This island was originally discovered by a Captain Kellett, a British officer, along about 1840, I think—at all events, more than half a century ago, and for a long time was called Kellet Land after the original discoverer. Nothing was done to hold it, no settlement or anything of that kind, and it was afterwards come across by an American, Captain Long; and as Baron Wrangel had been exploring in that section of the Arctic, although he was never within 400 miles of this island, Captain Long named it Wrangel Island after him and it has been so named ever since. However, no possession was taken until Mr. Stefannson took possession of the island in 1913 or 1914, and on the 1st of July raised the British flag and formally took possession.

It is necessary, however, in order to hold territory that you should not only take possession, but should maintain possession; that is, an unreasonable time should not elapse between the taking of possession and some other act showing that you mean to hold possession. So the title that was in Canada by reason of Mr. Stefannson taking possession lapsed in 1919, and in 1921 Mr. Stefannson, who is greatly interested in the north, as those who read the papers know—and I hope that includes all the members of this House—at his own expense, and very considerable expense, sent men up there to take and hold possession; and they are there at the present time, and are being maintained at the expense of Mr. Stefannson.

Now, an unfortunate thing has occurred. One of the newspapers published in this city, a paper usually very sound and sane in its judgment as to men and things, has seen fit to speak very harshly and very wrongfully of Mr. Stefannson. Mr. Stefannson has made a boast; I may say, of his Canadian citizenship: he was born in Canada, and, although some year or two after his birth his father moved away, yet he returned to Canada and claims that he is a British subject and a Canadian citizen.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: And an American citizen at the same time.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have seen that claim made.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: At any rate, he satisfied the mind of the Government as to his Canadian citizenship; he met all the requirements and laid the cards on the table, as it were, and explained the whole situation; and, on taking the oath of allegiance here, he was pronounced a Canadian citizen, and commanded a Canadian expedition. As I say, this newspaper not only has spoken of him as not being a Canadian citizen, and as claiming Canadian citizenship under false pretences, but it has also derided his work and the efforts which he has made in the North. I want to say that he is the first Canadian explorer who has made any reputation in regard to explorations in the Polar regions, and it seems strange that a leading newspaper should wish to throw discredit upon this man and his work. He has done what no other northern explorer has ever done: he has revolutionized all our ideas with regard to the north country. I can understand how little attention some people pay to this sort of thing, because their knowledge, perhaps, is very limited in regard to what I am speaking about.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Their ideas are small.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes. The dismissal of a postmaster is more important.

future it must not be merely a narrow strip along the 45th parallel, but we must go widely to the north. We have been able to go farther north year by year, and in that work of extending northward and opening up valuable territory, one of our Canadian citizens, a citizen of Ottawa, Dr. Saunders, has played an important part by discovering, or inventing—creating would perhaps be a better term to use—Marquis Wheat. That has extended the line of wheat-growing 400 miles more to the north than it was before. The great work of Dr. Saunders has added millions upon millions—hundreds of millions—to the wealth of this country. Yet the other day he was so little regarded that he was let out of the Government service on the mean pittance of $900 a year as a pension—what would not be paid to a fifth-class clerk. That is the way men who have done great things for Canada are treated. Both Mr. Stefansson and Dr. Saunders have been ill-treated, it seems to me, by the Canadian Government.

To return to Mr. Stefansson. In the United States, in Great Britain, and in every other country interested in the exploration of the Polar regions, he has received all the honours that come to any explorer; but the only thing that he has received in Canada has been a vote of thanks passed by Order in Council. He has been placed at the head of the Geographical Society, as President; he has been honoured by Greeley and Peary and other explorers, and by the late Sir Clements Markham, of England. They have all recognized his work as tremendously valuable. Yet it remains for an Ottawa paper to deride this man, or speak in terms of ridicule of him and his work. I am very sorry that it happened to be that particular paper, because it is a paper to which I subscribe and of which I am a constant reader: and, outside of this matter, I have always enjoyed its columns.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Will the honourable gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I do not want to interrupt him, but were minerals or anything valuable found in the ground, or are they known to exist?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That portion of Canada is full of minerals—coal, gold, oil, and everything else.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: And precious stones?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, even precious stones. The whole of the northern country, so far as we know, is extremely rich in minerals. We had evidence of that before the Committee on the Hudson Bay. Very valuable mines are working in the Hudson Bay district. One of the richest copper mines in the world is not more than 150 miles from Le Pas, where I was assured by the general manager that the company had never paid a dividend of less than 50 per cent, so pure was the copper, and so rich the mineral. The country is full of minerals.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Where is this island of which the honourable gentleman speaks?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It does not lie directly north of us; it lies to the northwest of Canada.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: About 700 miles west of any territory we own.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is several hundred miles to the west. The value of it is this. It is said—and my authority is General Mitchell, who is at the head of the United States Air Service—that the Artic will be the great air route from America, and if that is the case Wrangel Island will be a very valuable strategic point. As I say, Wrangel Island lies to the northwest of Alaska. It is not owned by the Americans, but is owned by us, and the question is whether it is better to keep it or give it up. I suppose my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Roche), who asked that question, had in mind what we all learned in the old days from the school books, that that country was a frozen region and good for nothing.

We have before us the case of Alaska, an object lesson from which we could surely learn. When Alaska was purchased by Seward, shortly after the American war—I think it was in the early 70's—he paid $7,200,000 for it. He was Secretary of State at the time, and it was looked upon as a foolish enterprize. To pay $7,200,000 for Alaska was regarded as absolutely throwing that money away. What has been the result of the purchase? Hundreds of millions have come to the United States by reason of that purchase. Alaska should have belonged to us, as a matter of fact; it should have been a part of Canada, rounding out the continent and extending down that long, narrow strip to the South in front of our Canadian territory. It would have been a very valuable acquisition for us.

So, before we release any rights that we may have upon any portion of that northern territory, it seems to me we should be very careful and make sure that at no time in the future will the territory that we relinquish become valuable; for we are not living only for this day and generation, but it is our duty, as we have been heirs of those who have gone before, to leave intact to our successors the territory that has been bequeathed to us. So I say we should not give up anything that we have, but should act on the principle of "What we have we hold."

The Hon. the SPEAKER: It has been moved by the Hon. Mr. Fowler—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No. I thought I had made myself clear at the outset. In view of the attitude of the Government and the steps they have taken I withdraw the motion.

With the leave of the House, the motion was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, may I say just a word on this matter? While I agree that it is right and proper that if we have a good claim on that territory we ought to hold it, and while I endorse the remark the honourable gentleman has just made that you cannot tell at once what value a northern territory may have—and he very aptly cited the case of Alaska—I hope that Canada will not take too active a part in pressing for the retention of Wrangel Island. So far as we know now, it is not worth much, and there is a great possibility of it doing us harm in the future. Wrangel Island is situated about 700 miles west of any territory that Canada owns or ever has owned. There are two nations who have territory very much closer. It is right to the North; a few miles out in the Artic ocean north of Russia, and it is also several hundred miles nearer United States territory than it is to ours, and there is just this possibility: the Americans have made certain landings and have at times expressed certain claims on territory that lies just to the north of Canadian territory and far south of the latitude of Wrangel Island. Now, if we pressed our claim to retain Wrangel Island, and succeded in that claim, it might put us in a very awkward postion with relation to the United States or any other country claiming territory adjacent to our mainland. So I think it would be advisable for Canada to go slowly in a matter of this kind.

As to Mr. Stefansson's work, I am not greatly impressed with him as being so very patriotic a Canadian. I think you will find that for every dollar he has expended of his own money he will want to claim $10 or $20 from Canada—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He has not done so yet.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: —when the time comes. However, that may be—

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Would the honourable gentleman tell us why he thinks so? On what does he found that statement?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: For one reason, I do not think there exists in America a bigger self-advertiser than Mr. Stefansson. He has been a self-advertiser from the time he first went to the north. The officers who went with him have not so high an opinion of Mr. Stefansson as my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Fowler). All that I want to say is that this is a matter in which I think we may well go slow. I do not at all object to the measure the Government has taken in sending him to England. I think the British people will be sensible enough to keep out of any possible quarrel with any other nation which might result from claiming an island which is not a large island and which is not at the present time known to be of any value except possibly as a base for aeroplanes passing from America to Europe. So I think we can very well leave it to the British.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that there is nothing before the Chair.

COST OF THE CIVIL SERVICE

RETURN

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to lay on the Table of the House a return that was moved for by the honourable gentleman from Selkirk (Hon. Mr. Bradbury), respecting the total cost of the Civil Service for the year ending March 31, 1919, and for the year ending March 31, 1922. In connection with this return I would like to point out to honourable gentlemen that sometimes a question is put which seems very easy to answer, yet is not. I was under the impression, when this motion was put, that the Finance Department would have on hand the necessary data; but I find that the Secretary of State had circularized every Department in order to obtain the information contained in this return, and, as some of the Departments have been less active than others, the return was completed only yesterday.

THE PORT OF SYDNEY, N.S.

SALE OF LAND TO IMPERIAL OIL COMPANY

The Senate resumed from May 3 the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. J. S. McLennan.

That he will call the attention of the Senate to a sale of land at Sydney, N.S., to the Imperial Oil Co., and will ask the Government what action it will take in the matter.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, as I have taken the trouble to read the volumnious correspondence to which the honourable gentleman from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan) referred in dealing with this question, I beg the opportunity of saying a very few words. I did not understand from the remarks of the honourable gentleman that he intended to attack the present Minister of Railways or the late Minister of Railways, but I understood him to suggest that officials of the Department had been lax in the performance of their duties. On reading the correspondence, that impression has been confirmed.

So far as the inhabitants or the City Council of Sydney are concerned, I submit that they are not entitled to a great deal of consideration, because they were given warning after warning of the advisability of making their desires known and of taking action in the matter; and they rather have been inclined to remain silent with the exception of one or two occasions when resolutions were passed by the Council on which the Council itself was decided.

I understood the honourable gentleman to complain first that those lands had been sold when they should have been kept as the property of Canada. In that I think he is quite right. If it was advisable to dispose of the lands they should have been disposed of by way of lease instead of by absolute sale. I think the Government should always hesitate in selling lands, especially lands of that kind which form part of an important harbour. It is quite true that the lands are not now required for harbour purposes, but nobody knows the development which may take place in the future, and therefore whether or not those lands will be necessary in the future for the purposes of the harbour.

The other complaint was that instead of a sale it should have been a lease, and that in the Order in Council authorizing the sale provision had been made for the reservation of a street, a term which had not been observed. I think the complaint in that respect is quite well founded.

The honourable gentleman suggested also, I think, that in cases of alienation of public property, the value of the land should be ascertained by the Exchequer Court or under the machinery which obtains for the expropriation of land for railway or public purposes. Now that such valuable properties have come under the ownership of the Government, now that railways extending for some 20,000 miles have become the property of this Dominion, we should be very careful to close the door to all sales of that kind until proper precautions have been taken; and precautions should be taken to prevent officials of any Department being influenced in making over public properties to private corporations. I would have expected the honourable gentleman to follow the question further, and have it made the subject of inquiry so that officials of the Public Works Department or of the Railway Department would have been called upon to explain how they had come to suggest that the Government should part with that property.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: How much did they give?—how much money?

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: $8,000.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman stated that the money did not represent more than one-third or one-quarter of the value of the land. As to that I am not informed; but the correspondence seems to bear out that statement to a certain extent.

I would have been glad if the honourable gentleman had seen it his duty to go further and ask to have the matter referred to a Special Committee before which the employees of the Department would have been examined and invited to justify the course which was followed. I think such action would have been a notice to them to be very careful in the future, and would have shown them that Parliament, or one branch of Parliament, was keeping its eyes open for the purpose of protecting public property as far as necessary.

Hon. J. S. McLENNAN: Before the leader of the Government speaks, as I assume he will, I would like to ask the indulgence of the House to say a word or two on one of the points taken up by the honourable member from Grenville (Hon. Mr. Reid). I think anybody who happened to be interested enough to read what I said on certain points in connection with shipping from Sydney, and the impression which the honourable gentleman gave of what I had said, will find that there is a very wide difference between them.

There was another point on which I think the House ought to be put right. The honourable senator from Grenville said:

> However, the matter finally came before the late Hon. William Kennedy, Minister of Railways and Canals in the present Government. Mr. Kennedy was making a trip down to the East, and decided to go on the ground himself. He visited the city of Sydney and went over the situation personally, right on the ground. It was after he came back that he signed the recommendation to Council and the Order was passed by the Government.

I think the honourable Senator must have been careless in verifying his facts, for I find that during the whole month of January the late Minister of Railways was in Ottawa, that on the 19th of that month he made the application to Council, that it was passed in Council on the 26th of January, and that the late Minister did not visit Sydney until the 17th of February.

I am thankful to the honourable member for De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) for having brought out the fact that I made no attack on Mr. Kennedy or his predecessor, the honourable Senator from Grenville. The point, however, on which I want to say a word, because it affects one's standing as a member and supporter of a party, is this alleged remissness on my part. I regret that the honourable gentleman is not here, although I told him that on the first opportunity I would take up this matter. He said:

> Now, the Session of 1920 was in progress when this matter started. I was here; Sir Robert Borden was here; Mr. McCurdy was here. I met the honourable gentleman many times; but he never mentioned anything about this matter at all during the year 1920.

During the year 1920, as far as my knowledge goes, no person in Sydney, even the most faithful of the party then in power, knew that there were any negotiations in connection with the Imperial Oil Company site. It seems to me that, instead of me and my associates in Sydney who were interested in this matter being blamed for not having come to the Minister in regard to the negotiations, the existence of which we did not know at all, we should have some cause for resentment against the Minister because he did not tell us anything about it and ask our opinion.

Then he goes on to say that about 1921 we were here and knew about it then. As far as we knew, it began in February, and I was here in Ottawa. Since I took any interest in politics at all, I had always understood that in local matters you should first of all go to the local member and should then consult the local Minister before going to anybody else. The local member was consulted and acted in the matter; the local Minister, Mr. McCurdy, was consulted, and acted in the matter, and the thing was held up; and I do not see why I should have butted in when this had been done, and when the answer to the local member and the answer by the local Minister, Mr. McCurdy, was perfectly satisfactory to us, it being an assurance that this matter would not go through.

Again the same thing happened in 1922. To my own knowledge it was brought again to the Minister who represented that district, the Hon. D. D. McKenzie, who at once went to his colleague who had the matter in charge, and it was also brought, as I know, to the attention of the Hon. Mr. King, who acted in the matter. The local member was changed to one of a different political faith, and I am credibly informed that the local member promised to bring the matter up in the other House and ask for the papers, and it has only come up at this late date because he did not do so in 1922.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have a statement from the Department of Railways and Canals in answer to the inquiry of my honourable friend. It reads as follows:

> Memorandum for Senator Dandurand re Imperial Oil matter at Sydney
> The matter appears to resolve itself into three questions:
> 1. Whether a provident or an improvident arrangement was made by the Department of Railways and Canals;
>
> 2. Whether the arrangement is prejudicial to the City of Sydney;
> 3. Whether the conditions attaching to the permit granted the Oil Company by the City Council of Sydney are to be fulfilled.
> The Imperial Oil Company holds certain areas in Sydney for the purpose of their warehouses and storage tanks under a 99 years' lease from the Crown. Owing to the increase in their business by reason of the enlargement of the Dominion Iron and Steel works and the increasing demand for oil and gasoline by automobile owners, it was necessary for them to enlarge their plant. The property in the neighbourhood of this plant had become built up (with residences) and it was desirable to move further out from the town, and an application was made in March 1921 by the Oil Company to the Sydney City Council for a permit to erect additional warehouses and storage tanks on the property known as Barrack Point, on the lot adjoining trackage to the old Government wharf which has not been in use for many years.

The City Council, after full discussion, granted the necessary permit in April, 1921, providing that the proposal would not interfere with the possible ultimate construction of ocean railway terminals at Sydney; that a street right-of-way be reserved through the plant, and that the Imperial Oil Company should expend annually on the site an amount equal to that spent annually by the City of Sydney on Victoria Park adjoining, up to $1,000.

(1) The property in question is a rough, irregular piece of land which could not be used except for industrial purposes. The Company proposed to spend $150,000 in constructing an oil distributing plant on this piece of land, and because of the very large traffic furnished to the National Railways by the Oil Company all over Canada, and as the improvement of facilities at that point would mean more traffic for the Railway, the proposition was favourably considered.

The price of $3,000 per acre, or about 7 cents per square foot, was based on investigations made by the local valuators for the Railways in Nova Scotia from figures furnished by the Assessor in Sydney, and was considered fair and reasonable. The valuation of residential properties in the vicinity, at about 9 cents per square foot, is no better price than the 7 cents per square foot set upon the property in question. In a sale for residential purposes, allowance must be made for street reservations, etc., whereas this property, owing to its irregular shape, could not possibly be cut up advantageously into lots even if a purchaser could be found for the low land along the water front. For these reasons, it is not considered that an improvident bargain was made.

(2) Every precaution was taken to make sure that the arrangement was in conformity with public opinion at Sydney, as expressed by a majority of the Town Council and other public bodies interested, and every objection that was received was carefully gone into and disposed of before action was taken.

The site for the oil plant was approved by the City Engineer, and so reported to Council. It was approved by the Fire Chief of Sydney from the standpoint of safety; it also had the approval of the Provincial Fire Marshall for the Province of Nova Scotia; of the Nova Scotia Board of Fire Underwriters, of the Board of Trade of Sydney and the Great War Veterans. The resolution granting the permit was moved by the alderman of Ward No. 1, in which the plant was to be located, the arrangement was approved by the Railway Management, and by Hon. J. D. Reid, now of the Senate but the then Minister, as representing the Department of Railways and Canals.

Objection was made that the land in question was not under the control of Railways, but under the control of the Militia Department. A special survey was made and it was shown to the Militia Department that these lands were expropriated by the Railway Department in 1887, and plans filed in the Registry Office at Sydney. The Militia Department thereupon withdrew its objection.

Opponents of the proposal also urged upon the Federal Department of Health an objection on account of the proximity of the Oil Company's buildings to the Marine Hospital, but, on examination of the location by Deputy Minister Amyot, this objection was withdrawn.

Objection was also urged that the location of the buildings might interfere with the public wharf, in which, previous to the last election the Minister of Public Works of the late Government had shown an interest. Honourable Mr. McCurdy, the then Minister, made a personal examination of the ground, and as a result advised the City Clerk of Sydney, on December 15, 1921, that as far as the Public Works Department was concerned no objection would be made to the granting of the privilege sought as it would in no way interefere with free navigation.

In addition to the precautionary measures above referred to, the matter was not finally disposed of by the Department until it had been reconsidered and reaffirmed by the City Council. This was done at a public meeting of the City Council on January 5, 1922, and an Order-in-Council passed on January 19th.

It was afterwards ascertained that the area had been incorrectly stated in the original Order, and on June 29th, an amending Order was passed indicating the corect area, and increasing the amount to be received from $6,729 to $8,160. As a matter of fact, no less than three different plans of the area in question were forwarded by the Railways to the Department. This led to the necessity for passing the second Order-in-Council, which was entirely in the interests of the Crown.

(3) There remain to be considered the conditions attaching to the permit of the City Council, which were of a twofold nature:

(a) That a street right-of-way should be reserved across the property; and

(b) That the Company should annually spend in improving the site an amount equal to that spent by the City on Victoria Park nearby, up to $1,000.

This was regarded by the officials of the Department of Railways and Canals as an arrangement between the Company and the municipality, and the company will be expected to give effect to it. It should be borne in mind that the permit of the City Council was to the Oil Company, and it was the Oil Company that was to provide a road allowance across the property and spend thereon an amount equal to what the City should spend on Victoria Park adjoining, up to $1,000 per annum. This did not imply the dedication of the road allowance to the City either by the Crown or by the Company. Such a course of action would have placed on the Town the cost of construction and maintenance of the road or street. The City Council preferred that the roadway be reserved and improved at the expense of the Company. There is no justification for any supposition that the roadway will not be provided.

The Company has filed with the Department of Railways a plan (dated 5-10-22) showing the lay-out of its works on the property in question, including the road reservation, and there is no reason to suppose that the understanding and arrangement between the City and the Company will not be loyally adhered to. The impression created by the organized attack on the arrangement is unfortunate and unwarrranted. The policy was determined and the matter largely dealt with during the term of office of Senator McLennan's political friends. Since the change of Government, the late Minister of Railways, Mr. Kennedy, visited Sydney in February of 1922, and Sir Henry Thornton was there in recent months. If the interests of Sydney had been "betrayed" as stated by Senator McLennan, public opinion would have made itself manifest on those occasions, or at least on the occasion of the municipal election in March last. The Department understands that the new municipal council stands on this matter exactly as did its predecessor. As there has been no change in public sentiment, it is reasonable to presume that Senator McLennan does not represent public opinion of his district and that this was more adequately expressed by the petitions for and against the proposal, when those "for" outnumbered those "against" by practically 4 to 1.

Senator Tanner seems to have made a curious error in referring to a telegram from an official of the Department of Railways to the Vice-President of the Canadian National Railways, Toronto, which, Senator Tanner stated, urged the latter to "stop" the proceedings. A perusal of the telegram in question would indicate that the word "stop" was merely an expression of punctuation common to telegraphic communications.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: But after the "stop" it went on: "Hold in abeyance." So that, I think, is only a quibble.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND (reading):

Senator McLennan objects that the papers produced were not complete because they did not include any reference to a pipe line privilege to the dock. He asked for, and received, copies of the papers having to do with the sale or lease of a particular piece of land. He has since asked for the papers as to the pipe line application. These the railway has been asked to supply, and they will be brought down in due course.

Geo. W. Yates, for Deputy Minister.

I may say that I have been handed a telegram from the Oil Company, which was assailed for its activities. I give the telegram, because it contains some information bearing on the transaction.

I may say that I have no personal knowledge whatever of this transaction, but nevertheless I will draw the attention of Sir Henry Thornton, President of the new Management, to the remark that has been made regarding it by honourable members of the Senate, and to the suggestion which has fallen from the lips of the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) as to the future disposal of property belonging to the Railways.

I lay on the table a plan which accompanied this statement, and which will indicate how that piece of property is located and used.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: That rather bears out my contention that the return was incomplete, because it ought to have been included in the return.

IMMIGRATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 136, an Act to amend the Immigration Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, we have before us a Bill to amend the Immigration Act. It covers a number of sections, and I will not on the second reading explain them all. I think this will be a matter for the Committee of the Whole House. I will simply point out that among the amendments is one which has already engaged the attention of the Senate, concerning the description of persons who may be said to form the undesirable class. I refer to the amendment to section 41. Honourable members will recall that we have had more than one discussion regarding this clause, which was amended in 1919.

Section 41 of the Act now in effect defines certain undesirable classes of persons who may be brought before a Board of Inquiry for examination as provided by Section 42, which gives the machinery for examination and subsequent action as a result of such examination. The Section now in effect does not apply to any person who is a British Subject either by reason of birth in Canada, or by reason of naturalization in Canada. Section 3 of the proposed Bill, however, is applicable only to an alien who advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of Great Britain or Canada or other British Dominion, etc.

The Act as it stands to-day reads as follows:

41. (1) Every person who by word or act in Canada seeks to overthrow by force or violence the Government of or constituted law and authority in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or Canada, or any of the provinces of Canada, or the government of any other of His Majesty's dominions, colonies, possessions or dependencies, or advocates the assassination of any official of any of the said governments or of any foreign government, or who in Canada defends or suggests the unlawful destruction of property or by word or act creates or attempts to create any riot or public disorder in Canada, or who without lawful authority assumes any powers of government in Canada or in any part thereof, or who by common repute belongs to or is suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada by force or by threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining or teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to belong to the prohibited or undesirable classes, and shall be liable to deportation in the manner provided by this Act, and it shall be the duty of any officer becoming cognizant thereof and of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein any such person may be, forthwith to send a written complaint to the Minister, giving full particulars: Provided that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject, either by reason of birth in Canada, or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

(2) Proof that any person belonged to or was within the description of any of the prohibited or undesirable classes within the meaning of this section at any time since the fourth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and ten, shall, for all the purposes of this Act, be deemed to establish prima facie that he still belongs to such prohibited or undesirable class or classes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is not in the present Bill?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; this is in the existing law.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Does the law as it now stands apply to everybody except a native-born Canadian?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Except a "Canadian citizen," whatever that may be.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The present Bill, as introduced in the House of Commons, provides:

Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence . . . . .

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You strike out "person other than a Canadian citizen," and you insert "alien." That is the change that has been made in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Yes. Anybody can upset the Government if he is not an alien.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I had before me the Bill as introduced in the House of Commons. The Bill in the form in which it comes to this House reads:

Whenever any alien advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of Great Britain or Canada, or other British dominion. . . .

That is an important amendment. I move the second reading of the Bill, and we can discuss the various clauses in Committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I do not intend at this time to enter upon a discussion of the section to which my honourable friend has just alluded, save to say that on two former occasions the Senate rejected this proposed amendment but adhered to the Act as we have it upon the Statute Book, a section which, I think, is very beneficial to the public interest of Canada. It was placed there under conditions which warranted our passing the legislation. Prior to the passing of that particular section, and from that time to the present, any troubles that we have had to confront in Canada by way of sedition or turbulent agitation, or otherwise—all those movements have come from persons whom that particular section will reach. I will not at the moment designate whence those persons come, but it seems to me that the policy of this Chamber should be to retain that clause on the Statute Book. Furthermore, we should impress upon those coming from the British Isles to Canada that we look more to them for the maintenance of law and order than we do to aliens from the centre and other parts of Europe.

A change is now made at the instance of a very small and irresponsible group in the House of Commons. I am satisfied that this Bill does not represent the sentiments of that House, and it certainly does not represent the attitude of the Parliament of Canada. The small and irresponsible group in the Commons would engraft upon the statute legislation which would permit of every license being exercised in the way of agitation and sedition, and it is for the Senate to prevent anything of that kind. I am satisfied that when this Bill goes before the Committee of the Whole we shall see that the law as it stands at present is retained.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is this the section that gives the Government power to deport British subjects?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Well, we must retain that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Bill as introduced by the Minister of Immigration did not contain that amendment to the Act. The Bill as introduced read:

Section forty-one of the said Act, as enacted by chapter twenty-six of the statutes of 1919, is repealed and the following is substituted therefor—

"Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence—

This maintained the principle to which my honourable friend has just alluded.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but there is in the House of Commons a Labour Party of one—or two; I think it numbers two.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The Government showed that they had some sense in the beginning, but then they gave way to the improper gang. We get out the worst and most dangerous agitators from the British Isles—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: —because they are used to talking in Hyde Park, and everybody who knows London knows that one can say anything he likes in Hyde Park, and people only laugh and pass on. The English are a peculiar people, and if a man is attacked by the public he will be protected by the police. But that same type of agitator comes out to this country, where we have a lot of people from southern Europe, and he agitates and inflames them, and they say, "Oh, he is an Englishman," and that makes him all the more dangerous.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will draw the attention of the Minister of Immigration to the fact that the Senate has twice gone on record as being opposed to any alteration of this clause.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Tell him we are going on record a third time.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: From my recollection of what took place in this House when we were discussing the matter before, it was not so much objection to the principle involved as it was to the manner of carrying it out. I think some of us rather objected to the manner in which this deportation could be had. If I remember rightly, it did not call for any kind of investigation: any detective or police officer could administer the whole thing.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, there is elaborate machinery provided; but what the agitators and demagogues want is a trial by a jury; they would be dissatisfied with a trial by a judge.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is to be by order of the Minister.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: The Minister of Immigration.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Otherwise, I feel very much like my honourable friend with regard to the necessity of dealing with this matter in a very determined way. It was only the other day that a friend of mine returning from England had this to say to me: that outside of Moscow there is not a greater hotbed of Bolshevism than the Clyde. If he was well informed, and was speaking the truth, I think it is about time we had some strong legislation on the matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have the Clyde overflow here.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I think the honourable member for Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) has some grounds for his misunderstanding, because some of the speeches made in this Chamber would lead one to believe that these men could be deported without a trial. That, of course, is absolutely foreign to the truth.

Under the Act as it stands now, if any of these men violated section 41, they could be taken by the Immigration Department and tried by that Department. There are officers appointed for the purpose, and these men receive a trial and may have counsel. There is a report of the proceedings taken by a stenographer, and there can be an appeal from the decision to the Minister; so, although they do not get a trial by jury, they are tried and have every opportunity to clear themselves if they can. I think it was very clearly demonstrated when this matter was voted on a year ago that it would be a calamity to interfere with the present legislation. It was thought wise during the war to have legislation of this kind, and I submit, honourable gentlemen, that conditions have not improved so far as the agitator in Canada is concerned. We have this very dangerous element here; we have them down in Sydney; and invariably the leaders are British subjects, who come to our country, some from the Clyde, some from London and Edinburgh and other places, and they are men who cause the trouble. Nearly all of the serious trouble which we had in Winnipeg some years ago was fomented and maintained and carried on by men of that stamp. The foreign element of the West, who were almost in open rebellion, until it was necessary to call out the Mounted Police, were led by these agitators. Consequently I say that I am surprised at the Government introducing legislation to take out of their hands the power which they have of dealing with characters of this kind. Surely it is no justification for a man to claim that he is a British subject, and that he should be able to come into this country and commit unlawful acts and do things which foreign citizens would be deported for doing. We cannot deport Canadian citizens, but we can put them in the penitentiary, and I submit that we do not want to fill our penitentiaries with men of that stamp; on the contrary, if we have these men here, they should be deported without very much consideration.

The only objection I have to this legislation is that the Department charged with the administration of the Act has not administered it: the law has not been properly enforced. I say, honourable gentlemen, that this law is a wise one: it gives the Government a stick to hold over the heads of lawbreakers. No reputable citizen should feel at all aggrieved by reason of a law of this kind: it is not meant for him: it is for the class of lawbreakers that lead our labour men into trouble. We have in this country just as reputable a class of labour men as any in the world, but it is the labour agitators who are getting $12,000 and $15,000 a year from these poor dupes who should be deported.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

COPYRIGHT BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Belcourt, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 24, an Act to amend the Copyright Act.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—application of provision regarding licenses and importation:

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I should like to ask the honourable the senior member for Ottawa, who has charge of this Bill, a question or two. Personally I take objection to penalizing Canadian citizens, but I do not know what the practical effects may be of excluding from the benefits of our Copyright Acts citizens of other nations which are not subject to the Treaty of Berne. They are dealt with in a subsequent portion of the section, which says the Act shall not apply to the subjects "of a country which has adhered to the Convention and the additional protocol." The United States, we know, has not adhered to the Convention, and it is in connection with them that the difficulty arises. Although I have given some consideration to this matter, I do not know what would be the effect of striking out the portion of the clause dealing with Canadian citizens, which I think we should do in any event. I think it is an insult to Canadian authors to penalize them in their own country, and to put the inhabitants of all the countries under the Berne Convention at an advantage.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: The honourable gentleman gains his point if we strike out the words which were added in another place to the Bill as originally introduced. In order to bring the matter to a focus I will move:

That all the words after "1921" in the seventh line of section 2 be struck out, and that the words "are hereby repealed" be added.

That brings the Bill back to where it was when it was introduced in the House of Commons. The words added in the House of Commons are the ones which penalize the Canadian author.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I briefly answer the honourable gentleman from Moose Jaw? He is not quite satisfied as to what would be the effect of carrying out the suggestion made by the honourable gentleman frm Edmonon (Hon. Mr. Griesbach). Let me point out to him that the clause as it comes to us from the Commons is going to leave Canadian authors subject to the provisions of sections 12, 13, 14, 15 and 27 of the Copyright Act: in two words, the effect of it is that that if a Canadian author, who has published his book elsewhere wants to reprint it in Canada, he cannot do so unless he makes same arrangement with a publisher; and if he and the publisher cannot agree, they have to go to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This unquestionably discriminates against the Canadian author.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I absolutely agree with that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If everybody is satisfied, I will accept the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Edmonton.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I was going to move.

That sections 12, 13, 14, 15 and 27 of the Copyright Act of 1921 shall apply only to subjects or citizens of a country which has not adhered to the Convention and the additional protocol thereto.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is unnecessary because the United States is not a member of the Berne Convention, and that will leave the situation just as it is.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I do not think so. I think that if we adopt the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Edmonton, we give the citizens of the United States and other countries not within the Berne Convention the same rights as those who are.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: With respect to that, we have a clear-cut assurance that in the near future the United States will enter the Berne Convention. One objection to including the licensing clauses of the Bill is that if the United States enters the Berne Convention, by our own legislation we are discriminating against our own authors and our own publishers who may have purchased the copyright. I would like to read an appreciation which has come to hand in the Times Literary Supplement of April 19th, which devotes a column and a half to this bill. It says:

"Protection" under the Berne Convention means that authors shall have the exclusive and absolute right of authorizing the reproduction of their works for a definite term. The term of protection accorded is left to each contracting country. This intention is clearly expressed under Articles 8, 9, 11, 12 and 13.

The licensing clauses in the Canadian Act clearly impose a condition on the author's exclusive and absolute right. Unless he prints and publishes an edition of his book he may be deprived of his right, and further may have to place under the control of a Government department the drafting of contracts and the settlement as to the monetary value of literary property. What can a Government department know about the clauses that should be inserted or omitted from this most difficult form of contract? What as to the varying value of the property of each individual author? A's property may be worth one pound per thousand words to-day, and worth ten pounds per thousand words to-morrow.

This article is written by Mr. G. Herbert Thring, the Solicitor for the Authors' Association of England, and a well-recognized authority on this subject.

There is another aspect of the case which this section materially affects, to which I might draw attention. A scientific work, or say, for the sake of argument, a military work is written, say last year, by a soldier, based on the lessons of the war. Two years hence—and the same observation will apply to any scientific work—as a result of evidence which has recently come to hand, the author is dissatisfied with his work and desires to bring out a fresh work—a work which revises what he has previously written. Under these licensing clauses this unfortunate man may find that his previous book, which is now to his own knowledge and the knowledge of other scientists full of information which is quite unreliable, has got out of his possession and is being republished. The reprinting may be done under conditions to which he objects, but it is perhaps supported by a good deal of money, and the information is disseminated in such a way that he will never be able to overtake it with a subsequent book. I submit that under the licensing clauses it is possible not only to hinder an author in his natural development as such, but also to do him incalculable injury—injury which no subsequent legislation can undo. Consequently I urge the adoption—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would not that apply if the author sold the copyright of his book? The owner could still continue to advertise that book and sell it.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: The writer of a scientific book would, when selling the copyright, hedge it about with conditions; especially the writer of, we will say, a book on aeronautics, or war, or wireless telegraphy, or moving pictures, etc.—subjects which, as everybody knows, are rapidly developing. In selling the copyright of such a book the author would no doubt stipulate for the control of the book and for the subsequent publication of revised versions. That is true also of text books, as to which provision is always made for revision.

So I say that, if we immediately pass the amendment which I suggest, we can next year deal with any situation that may have arisen. But if we allow this clause to stand, we lay ourselves open to the charge of having thoughtlessly and carelessly done our authors, who are a large class, a very serious and more or less permanent injury.

Hon. C. P. BEAUBIEN: It seems to me honourable gentlemen, that the effect of the Bill submitted upon our existing law and upon our relations with other countries is not any too clear. So far as I am concerned, I would like to be put right if I am wrong. First of all, I understand that we are now under the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: No.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: I say yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I say yes, too.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: At any rate the House is not of one opinion on a fact on which all should be informed.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I say to my honourable friend—

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Just a second, please.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: I can authoritatively answer the honourable gentleman's question immediately.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I shall try to answer it myself, but I want to know whether I am right or not. I understand that we are under the Berne Convention of 1886, which of course provides for no licensing clauses, such as we are now discussing. That is the first point. The question put before the House in this Bill is whether we shall adhere to the amended Convention of Berne. In 1908 all the nations participating in the previous Berne Convention, that of 1886, met and said: "We ought to provide for the further protection of authors; we ought to simplify procedure for the copyrighting of books; we ought to simplify procedure for action in cases of infringement," etc., etc. They drafted a revised and improved Convention.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Requiring the adherence of those who wanted to take advantage of it.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Certainly. This revised Convention of 1908 is before us. The question is whether we want to enter into that improved Convention or not.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We are in it.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is the question.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We are in it.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: No, we are not in the improved Convention.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I say we are.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: With due deference to the opinion of my honourable friend, I think he is wrong. We are undoubtedly in the first Convention—that of 1886. When the 1908 Convention was passed we did not adhere to it, but in 1921 we had a Bill submitted to us so that we might join that improved Convention.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It was an attempt.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: A Bill was drafted containing these licensing clauses, but when it was submitted to the House in 1921, with these objectionable clauses, which the authors strenuously opposed, the Minister of Justice said: "Gentlemen, it is quite possible that these clauses may constitute an obstacle such as to prevent Canada from joining the 1908 Convention. In that case the Bill will be reconsidered and those clauses eliminated." The 1921 Bill was submitted to the authorities of the Berne Convention; those clauses were weighed and were found to constitute an obstacle such as had been pointed out by the authors at the time the sections were passed. For that reason the 1921 measure was never put into force. It is therefore for the purpose of fulfilling the promise made by the Minister of Justice, Hon. Mr. Doherty, that a Bill is again submitted to us. It was introduced in the lower House free from the objectionable clauses, in order that the promise of the Minister of Justice might be fulfilled, and the obstacle preventing us from entering the Berne Convention removed; but the same influence that brought about the insertion of those clauses in the 1921 Bill succeeded in having them included, in modified form, in the Bill now before us.

What, after all, does section 2 mean? That is what we want to know. It means this, that the objectionable licensing clauses, which prevented us from entering the 1908 Convention would still apply to Canada, and, in the second place, to all nations outside the Berne Convention—that is, Non-Unionist nations. Those belonging to the Berne Convention are called Unionist nations. But whom have we in view in drafting a provision dealing with Non-Unionist countries? Only one that really matters to us—our neighbour to the south, the United States. That is, if I understand rightly, the nation we have particularly in mind in providing that these four clauses shall not apply to Non-Unionist countries.

Now, who are the people desiring these clauses? To my mind it is most important for us to be very clear on this point. Who are the people who want to saddle the Canadian authors with that burden? They must be persons of importance, because we are making a law concerning authors, and 900 of them forming an Association have made strenuous efforts to be liberated from that burden, yet it is being fastened on their backs. By whom? Well, I am advised that it is by an association known as the Canadian Book and Magazine Producers. They are printers. I do not say that in disparagement of them at all. As we say in French, "Il n'y a pas de sot métier." Printers constitute a very respectable portion of our population. But is this the time to deal with their rights? Yes, if the rights we grant to authors infringe upon the rights of the printers, but I submit that they can hardly be said to do so. We are now dealing with the property of the author, the product of his brain. We are giving to authors the means whereby their propery rights may be protected throughout the world. The printers come and say: "Yes, your right shall be protected on condition that we print your thoughts—that we publish your works. Before we allow this law to pass, we shall require a monopoly of the printing of your works." It is nothing else.

Honourable gentlemen, if we desire to protect printers in this country, have we not means at our disposal? If we want to make compulsory the printing of Canadian thought by Canadian hands, with Canadian type, paper and machine, have we not the tariff? What about protection? That is the weapon, it seems to me, that ought to be used for such a purpose.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: The customs.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Custom duties. That is the weapon we can use to protect our printers against foreign publishers; and protection is their whole argument. I have read with care the circular published by the Canadian Book and Magazine Producers, and the gist of it was this. When a Canadian author writes a book and is attracted by the greater market across the line, he is there met by an autocrat printer who says to him: "Mr Canadian Author, I will buy your rights for the United States if you throw in with them your rights for Canada. If you will not do that, I will not buy." Therefore the Canadian author is obliged to cede also his rights for Canada. And our printers say, mind you, that the law now proposed will protect the author against himself. He may be weak: he may like to retain his rights for Canada; but he cannot drive the desired bargain, and those rights slip from his hand. Well, the proposed restriction may work both ways. If the American publisher is not willing to buy the United States rights alone, and will make a bargain only when he can publish for both Canadian and United States markets, what is going to happen? If he is precluded from doing so, he will not buy at all. He will say to the Canadian author: "You have now a law that prevents me from buying the rights for both markets; therefore I will not purchase." That is one danger of the section now before us.

But, leaving that consideration aside, what does the proposal mean? It seems to me the position is simply this—and with your permission I will illustrate it in a manner which I think the House will accept more readily than anything else I might say. The rights that we—at any rate, the great majority in this House—desire to protect are the rights of the author to the conceptions of his brain. We think that he ought to remain the sole owner of his own work as long and under as favourable conditions as authors in other lands. If the clauses that have been inserted in the other Chamber should become law, the Canadian author would cease to be the owner of his work: he must take a partner who is imposed upon him, and perhaps 20 years after writing his book, or perchance 30 years, the partner may come to him and say: "My friend, this book of yours does not exist in Canada; will you have it printed?" The author says: "No. Thank goodness, it is not in print, and I will not have it reprinted. That was an error of my youth. It was my first scribble. I would not reproduce that for any thing in the world." The printer says: "But you are not alone. We are twin brothers now. We have been united by the law, and if you do not print the book, I will, my friend. The only question between you and me is the question of remuneration. Whether that book of yours, which has been for years a source of remorse in your life, is to be kept in the dark, is a question which does not rest with you. It depends on your twin brother, to whom certain powers, in reality a monopoly, have been granted by Parliament."

Will you bear with me, honourable gentlemen, while I read a page from Bernard Shaw, which I think applies to this case. In 1905 Bernard Shaw reproduced in the United States "The Irrational Knot," a novel that had been published years before, in 1880. And this is what he says:

> This novel was written in the year 1880, only a few years after I had exported myself from Dublin to London in a condition of extreme rawness and inexperience concerning the specifically English side of the life with which the book pretends to deal. Everybody wrote novels then. It was my second attempt; and it shared the fate of my first. That is to say, nobody would publish it, though I tried all the London publishers and some American ones. And I should not greatly blame them if I could feel sure that it was the book's faults and not its qualities that repelled them.
> I have narrated elsewhere how in the course of time the rejected manuscript became Mrs. Annie Besant's excuse for lending me her ever helping hand by publishing it as a serial in a propagandist magazine of hers. That was how it got loose beyond all possibility of recapture. It is out of my power now to stand between it and the American public: all I can do is to rescue it from unauthorized mutilations and make the best of a jejune job.
> At present, of course, I am not the author of The Irrational Knot. Physiologists inform us that the substance of our bodies (and consequently of our souls) is shed and renewed at such a rate that no part of us lasts longer than eight years: I am therefore not now in any atom of me the person who wrote The Irrational Knot in 1880. The last of that author perished in 1888; and two of his successors have since joined the majority. Fourth of his line, I cannot be expected to take any very lively interest in the novels of my literary great-grandfather.

That of course is written in a jocular vein.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What is the date of that?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is 1905. Does it not show very clearly, honourable gentlemen, that after a few years an author may for very good reasons wish to prevent if he can the publication of any of his former works? What did we see a short time ago in Paris? M. d'Haraucourt, who recently presented himself for the French Academy, and who was defeated because in his youth he had published "La Légende des Sexes," which was really a parody on "La Légende des Siècles," a book which d'Haraucourt, having graduated from the frolics of youth into the dignified status of one of France's greatest poets, wanted to repudiate. He in fact did so, although to no avail. But what would have been his predicament if, instead of having one of his competitors reproaching him with this book practically out of circulation, a twin-brother, fastened upon him by a law like this very one, should have said to him: "I will publish that for you, whether you want it or not?"

The same thing can be said of Francois Coppée, the poet of the great multitude in France. In his youth he also published doubtful legends, and it took the last years of his life to repudiate and correct as best he could the folly of his youth. No man ever wrote a finer book from every point of view, I believe, especially from the moral point of view, than "La Bonne Souffrance," —"Salutary Suffering."

The same can be said also of Paul Féval. He published hundreds of novels, and to-day no man need fear that his daughter may take up one of those novels, because for years Féval called in his books and expurgated from them passages which were not without reproach.

It seems to me, honourable gentlemen, that we ought to respect the sacredness of property. We do it in every other form of property; why not in the most precious and dignifiied of all, the production of the brain? Surely we are justified in asking that the Bill be restored to its orginal form, and thus fulfil the promise made by the Hon. Mr. Doherty in 1921, and bring in legislation in every way conforming to the Revised Berne Convention. For that reason I am strongly indeed in favour of the suppression of clause 2, which was added in the lower House, and of substituting for it the original clause 2, which I understand was authorized by the Minister when the Bill was introduced in its original form.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Honourable gentlemen, as far as I am concerned, my sympathies in this mattter are entirely with the authors. I would like to see the author have an opportunity to protect himself—not but that copyright is natural; for it is a privilege which a country may grant or withhold; and if it were withheld the general public would get their books cheaper, because the publishers would then be in a position to pirate everything they published. But, after all, there is such a thing as a sense of justice and fair play, and a man should be able to protect the product of his brain.

My honourable friend who has just delivered so long and beautiful an oration (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) has felt that under this Bill we would not be members of the Berne Convention. I differ with the honourable gentleman in that regard What do we do by this Act before us? We simply impose certain restrictions upon our own nationals, and upon a country which is outside the Berne Convention; we do not impose those restrictions upon any member of the Berne Convention. We can do what we like with our own nationals; that affects no other signatories of the Berne Convention; therefore I say we can come in under it. I do not care what the official bulletin of the Berne Convention says. I am satisfied that I am right in that contention.

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: Oh, you are right.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The Bill in its present form is the result of a compromise. I have been in very close communication with a certain section of the authors, and I know that this Bill is the result of a compromise in the other House. While they did not like it they were willing to accept it on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread. Therefore, while I would be very glad to see the amendment of my honourable friend across the way (Hon. Mr. Griesbach) carried, I am prepared to vote for the Bill as it is if that will settle the question. But what will be the result if we make any change in this Bill? It will go back to the other House, and the other House will not accept it, and the result will be that there will be no Bill at all. That is the difficulty; that is the danger.

I want to point out to friends of the authors —I believe almost every member of this House has a strong sympathy for them—that there is a powerful influence working against this Bill, an influence that could not make itself felt in this House, because, fortunately, we are independent people who decide matters according to justice and the right of the case. But that is not true of the other House, and pernicious influences can and do work there, and there is a very strong influence working against the Bill as we desire to see it. For that reason I would say to the friends of the authors that we had better accept this Bill and pass it as it is rather than run the risk of making a change which would endanger the Bill in the other House.

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: In answer to what the honourable gentleman has just said, I may say that if he is in favour of the clause as it stood in the first version of the Bill, let him join us, and let us try together to amend the Bill in the proper way. Let us try to do our duty in this House, and then let us wait and see the result of our action. I hope it is the feeling of the House that we should amend this Bill in the direction of the motion proposed by the honourable gentleman from Edmonton (Hon. Mr. Griesbach).

Before the Committee is called upon to dispose finally of this amendment, I would like to make a very brief statement and appeal to the Committee. I would like to call the attention of my honourable colleagues to what I would call the normal condition of writers and literary men in this country from time immemorial. It has been their part to work for nothing; to burn the midnight oil, to strive painfully at producing works not altogether devoid of intellectual merit, with only the hope of reaping perhaps a little fame, but more likely at the risk of meeting public indifference, if not scorn or abuse. From the pecuniary viewpoint I have known more than one Canadian writer who has lost money for the silly satisfaction of giving to the public a book of poetry, of fiction, of scientific or historical research. In many instances publishers have been the sole reapers of profit from the noble toil of the writer. Of late there has been some improvement in that respect; but we are still far from the state of things which, in some countries, can assure to literary men a measure of fair reward. Of course we were a young people; big and arduous tasks were confronting us; we had to lay down the solid foundation and to erect the strong walls of our national home before thinking of painting and decorating it. And we did not care much for fine poetry, for elegant prose, for writings of a nature too remote from our matter-of-fact solicitudes. Is it not now time to care a little more? Is it not time to show a little more sympathy to our Canadian writers and intellectual producers? They are not useless citizens. They are working, and striving, and struggling against heavy odds to give Canada what is one of the characteristics of true civilization—some literary and artistic renown. And their generous ambition is to build up a literature worthy of this country of ours and of its great future. In the fulfilment of that task, they need our help, they need our protection. Let us offer them a helping hand; let us protect them; let us frame this copyright law in such a way that some harvest may come to them from their patriotic work, that they may enjoy freedom of choice in securing the lowest publishing cost, so that they can receive a better reward without being exposed to the risk of losing the unrestricted ownership of their work. In the name of Canadian authors, in the name of my brethren the intellectual workers of Canada, I appeal earnestly to my colleagues in this Senate, and I pray them to protect the literary and artistic producers of this country from the fetters and the yoke which have been inadvertently prepared for them.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Would the honourable gentleman enlighten some of us who are not literary men as to the reason why the Canadian public does not appreciate the work of Canadian authors if they have the superlative merits which he describes to us.

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: It is a very small public in the first place, and the market is not very wide; and of course there may be other reasons, but I do not intend to give them to-day before this House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) claimed that there was danger of this Bill being lost, and with it the vestige of advantage which it contains, if it were amended here and sent to the House of Commons. I simply want to make the point that whatever amendment is made by the Senate will have to be considered by the House of Commons, and the worst that can happen to the amendment is that it would not be entertained by the House of Commons. We would then fall back upon the Bill as it is to-day.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is my honourable friend justified in saying that we shall fall back in the event of rejection by the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I say the worst that could befall the authors would be to get the half loaf which is contained in this Bill.

The other point urged by the honourable gentleman from Sussex, which I would like to contradict, is that the amendment made in the other House was the result of a compromise. I am told by authors on all sides that they have not been consulted at all, that they have not accepted the amendment, and that consequently there was no compromise. The Minister gave way, thinking he could save that half loaf, and that was all. I think I am stating fairly the situation in the House of Commons.

The authors, not having been a party to the compromise, protested, and I think the Senate is free to apportion to them the rights to which they are entitled. In 1921 I objected to these four clauses, and gave many reasons why they should not be entertained. I asserted the right of the author to dispose of his own work; and, having taken that stand in 1921, I am free to say that I will support the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Edmonton.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I for the further information of the House read a telegram sent to the Minister of Trade and Commerce when the Bill was introduced in the House of Commons and before section 2 was amended and changed to its present form. The telegram is from the Chairman of the Book Publishers' Committee of the Toronto Board of Trade, and is as follows:

Book publishers approve amendment of Copyright Act contained in Bill 24, provided Act not brought into force until reciprocal copyright arrangement effected with United States.

At that time the Pupblishers' Committee of the Board of Trade of Toronto, speaking for the publishers, approved of the Bill as it was introduced.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Subject to United States legislation coming into force.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Griesbach was agreed to, and section 2 as amended was agreed to.

Sections 3, 4, and 5, the preamble, and the title, were agreed to.

The Bill was reported as amended.

PRIVATE BILL

THIRD READING

Bill A4, an Act respecting the Northern Trust Company.—Hon. Mr. McMeans.

THE PORT OF SYDNEY, N.S.

SALE OF LAND TO IMPERIAL OIL COMPANY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. S. McLENNAN: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to ask the attention of the House to a matter of privilege, in connection with the reply which was made yesterday by the honourable the leader of the Government. After a considerable delay, which was not his fault, the reply that appears in Hansard to-day was brought down. That reply is largely composed of a resumé of a memorandum by the Imperial Oil Company. Many of the phrases are the same, much of the matter is the same, and it does not touch at all the principal part of the attack—if you will put it that way—which I made on this whole transaction. I attacked what seemed to me an improvident bargain made by the Department of Railways in the alienation of this property and the giving up of valuable traffic without, so far as was shown, any compensating advantage to the railways.

The greater part of this reply deals exclusively with the relation of the transaction to the city of Sydney and this was a phase I touched on only incidentally. I was under the impression that there was a rule of this House which stated that the imputation of motives in this House was forbidden, or was not within the proper conduct of its business. I did not find that rule in a hurried examination; but I believe such is good practice in this and in every other parliamentary assembly. Still more, it seems to me, motives should not be imputed by the officials of any Department of the Government in making a reply to a question which any member of this House or the other House was within his rights in asking, and if he believed it tended to promote the public service or right any wrong, not only is it his right and privilege to make that inquiry, but it is also his duty

The reply says:

> The matter appears to resolve itself into three questions:
> 1. Whether a provident or an improvident arrangement was made by the Department of Railways and Canals.

That is not correct; it was not the Department of Railways and Canals, but the Management of the Canadian National Railways, which is not mentioned at all. The whole point of my criticism is left out. This reply is misleading in various ways. It says that previous to the last election the Minister of Public Works of the late Government had shown an interest in this question. As a matter of fact, in March, 1921, the Minister of Public Works brought down a vote for proceeding with the wharf. Again, it goes on:

> Hon. Mr. McCurdy, the then Minister, made a personal examination on the ground, and as a result advised the City Clerk of Sydney, on December 15, 1921, that, as far as the Public Works Department was concerned, no objection would be made to the granting of the privilege sought, as it would in no way interfere with free navigation.

Free navigation is not within the scope of the Ministry of Public Works. More than that, Mr. McCurdy was in Sydney in June or July of that year, and he only made his recommendation after he had practically gone out of office. He was still nominally Minister of Public Works, but the elections had taken place on the 11th of December, and he did this on the 15th. That, I think, is a misstatement on the part of the Government.

Then, again:

> The Department understands that the new municipal council stands on this matter exactly as did its predecessor. As there has been no change in public sentiment, it is reasonable to presume that Senator McLennan does not represent public opinion of his district, and that this was more adequately expressed by the petitions for and against the proposal, when those "for" outnumbered those "against" by practically four to one.

I do not quite see how he makes his calculation. Still it is not a question of me as an individual; it is a question of me as a member of this House, the senior wing of the Parliament of Canada, and whether an official of any Department should have gone beyond his rights in making criticsms of that kind of our members. Whether I misstated any facts, whether I made any wrong deductions, I feel and I think the House will agree with me, although some of our members smile, that this is not a proper way for an officer of a Department to treat the members of this House.

Again, the reply goes on:

Senator McLennan objects that the papers produced were not complete because they did not include any reference to a pipe-line privilege to the dock.

I showed over and over again, eight or ten different times, where there were documents missing that ought to be in that return, to make it a coherent and consistent account of the transaction; but this one instance is singled out by Mr. Yates, for a Deputy Minister.

If anybody will take the trouble to look at my remarks, he will see that over and over again I pointed out that letters and documents were referred to which were not in the return; yet this official singles out one thing, and says that it is the only matter.

He has since asked for the papers as to the pipe-line application.

I asked for those on the 13th of May, and those papers have not yet been handed down, although they can only consist of a document or two which should have been prepared a full twelve months ago.

I think also that the honourable gentleman that leads the Government in this House, who is courteous, and who, I am sure, yields to no one in his respect for the privileges of Parliament and of this House, overlooked the fact that a telegram—to whom it was not stated—was brought down and read by him. It is signed by Mr. Shatford, the agent of the Imperial Oil Company, and contains one statement which catches my eye, namely, that this property was within 100 yards of the Steel Company's blast furnaces. It is nearer a thousand yards. It also infers that I alleged that they obtained the water front. I never made such an allegation or statement. Then it goes on to say that this whole agitation was drummed up by Mr. Duchemin, with whom I am closely associated, and with whom I consider it a privilege to be associated, and whose ability and character, I am sure, are respected by anyone in this House who knows him. The telegram goes on to imply that I was his tool and practically in his hands in bringing up this matter. I would be glad if the honourable gentleman would consider the question of whether, I am sure by inadvertence, he did not go beyond the well-understood practice of the House in reading reflections on one of the members of this House contained in a letter attached to a return from the Railway Department.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: As a member of this House, I may be permitted to join with the honourable gentleman in calling attention to the impropriety of the Department in making the return which was made yesterday. I understand that the honourable the leader of the Government, in reading the telegram of the Imperial Oil Company to which my honourable friend opposite has just referred, read it as part of the answer of the Department. It was very improper on the part of the Department to go and borrow answers from the Imperial Oil Company or from anybody else outside of the officials of the Department, and I hope that this honourable House will not stand for anything of the kind, and will let the officials of the Department understand that when they are called upon to make a return it should be made by themselves and should not contain information borrowed from outside sources. To my mind their action adds to the faults which have been charged by the honourable gentleman against some of the officials of the Department. They should be made to understand that they should not indulge in comment, and should not reflect on the motives of members of this honourable House.

Hon. C. E. TANNER: Honourable gentlemen, I want to express my pleasure at the remarks of the honourable member from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), inasmuch as I myself am a little interested in this matter.

There is a remark in this statement which in one respect is of very little consequence, but which in the respect referred to by my honourable friend who has just spoken is of very great consequence. After a perusal of this document in Hansard to-day, I am bound to express my surprise at my honourable friend the leader of the House reading such a document in this House, although I have no doubt that he did it in good faith, and not quite realizing the infringement which I think it quite clearly makes upon the privileges of the honourable members of this House.

I am not going into any discussion of the statement at large: from beginning to end it is one which is full of evasions, full of misrepresentations, and which suppresses several of the salient points and facts in the matter. To the erroneousness and viciousness of the document which is prepared by some member of the staff of the Railway Department, is added the further affront, namely, the reading of an insulting and impertinent letter written by a man who is not a member of this House in respect to a member of the House. Anyone who peruses that letter, or telegram, in respect to my honourable friend from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan) can see that it very clearly, impertinently and insultingly, imputes motives to the honourable member. There is no clearer principle of parliamentary practice, as I understand it, than that not only is an honourable member of the House not permitted to impute motives to a fellow-member, but that a person outside is prohibited from imputing motives to any member of this or the other House, and that no such document should be read, and I would be happy to know that my honourable friend the leader of the House will see to it that that document is expunged from the records.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Bring the writer before the Bar of the House.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: I know the gentleman, and it is not worth while.

The point which I say is not of much consequence, but which characterizes the whole document, refers to a telegram that I spoke of when speaking on this subject. The telegram was sent on the 4th of June, 1921, from the late Mr. Brady to Mr. Kingsland, and I want to read it:

> Referring to my letter yesterday re sale Sydney lands to Imperial Oil Stop Hold matter in abeyance until further advice.

Now, what construction does Mr. Yates put upon what I said? If honourable gentlemen refer to the Debates, they will see that I played a little on the word "stop," but I played on the word "stop" for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that on June 4, 1921, all the proceedings did stop, and that nothing further was done in regard to the matter until after the elections of December, 1921. On this statement of facts I argued that the whole matter had been side-tracked and either dropped completely, or side-tracked without any serious intention of going on with it. Therefore I said the matter was dropped, or stopped.

The writer of this document goes on to say:

> Hon. Mr. TANNER.
> Senator Tanner seems to have made a curious error in referring to a telegram from an official of the Department of Railways to the Vice-President of the Canadian National Railways, Toronto, which Senator Tanner stated urged the latter to stop the proceedings. A perusal of the telegram in question would indicate that the word "stop" was merely an expression of punctuation common to telegraphic communications.

I can hardly characterize such a statement as that inserted by a responsible civil servant in a document submitted to this House—assuming that any honourable member of this House is so utterly stupid that he does not understand the meaning of the word "stop" in a telegram. I can only say that if the gentleman who wrote this document is so stupid as to think honourable members of this House are not capable of understanding the meaning of the word "stop" in a telegram, then that gentleman is too stupid to occupy a position in the Civil Service of this country.

But the main point to which I desire to direct attention is this. The writer of this telegram entirely suppresses the one point I was making, namely, that the proceedings in respect to the acquisition of this land were stopped—as a matter of fact were dropped—and that that telegram said:

> Hold matter in abeyance until further advised.

Not a word of that appears in this document. The writer simply attempts to turn the whole matter over on a silly joke or a piffling statement that I did not understand the meaning of the word "stop." That is all I have to say in regard to that gentleman.

In conclusion, let me again express the hope that no such document as this, from a person in the service of the country will ever again be read in this House. We quite realize that the leader of the House has a right to make his arguments and statements here; but when statements are brought in from the servants of the country, it is for them to state facts and not to enter into arguments with members of this House, or make reflections upon them, or suppress facts or exaggerate them, and evade important points, as this gentleman has done. I hope my honourable friend will decide, with respect to the letter from Mr. Shatford, that it should be removed from the Revised Hansard of this House

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I think that my honourable friend who sits opposite will have some sympathy with the situation I occupy in this Chamber, because he has had experience of the procedure through which answers from the Departments reach his hands and mine. An inquiry is made; many inquiries are made on the same day, and are distributed to the Departments. I take for granted that it is good doctrine to say that when the answer comes it is the answer of the Department, under the responsibility of the Minister of that Department. I confess that, having that doctrine in mind, I should have stopped when I came to the last words of the document which I read, and should have abstained from reading the signature of the departmental official who signed it. I take for granted that the document is supposed to be addressed to his Minister, and transferred to this Chamber, and read through my instrumentality.

I have disclosed the fact that the document was prepared by Mr. So-and-so, and he bears the responsibility for the contents of that document, but I think it is good doctrine to affirm that we cannot reach him—that this work of his is supposed to be endorsed by the head of the Department.

I may say that this query of my honourable friend from Cape Breton (Hon. Mr. McLennan) has been a long time before this Chamber, and that the telegram which was added to that document I had myself received and marked, simply to indicate that there was a statement there which was interesting, and which had not been disclosed, and—I stand corrected if I am in error—which had not been disclosed to this Chamber, namely, that the Chamber of Commerce or the Board of Trade of Sydney had approved of the transaction. I simply passed my pencil under the words "Board of Trade" and added the document to the statement, and it is that part of the statement as read that is my fault. I took the responsibility of it, and I will see that that telegram is expunged from the Revised Hansard of the Senate, and I express my regret to my honourable friend if I did read that telegram which should have been used only for taking out of it the statement that the Board of Trade of Sydney had approved of the transaction.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: Excuse me, sir, that is not in the telegram.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: Not as it is here, as you read it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: No, it is not in the telegram.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, that is my recollection of it.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: Yates said it, and it was in the return or memorandum you brought down from the Oil Company, which I was only dealing with incidentally.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is in Yates' statement.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: It is in Yates' statement, yes; but can you tell me to whom this telegram was addressed? Was it to the honourable the leader?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes; my honourable friend will find that:

> Sydney Board of Trade approved our application and sent deputation City Council support our request for property, and citizens signed petition favouring it.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: I beg your pardon; I had not read so far, just now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This telegram was handed to me by a member of this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: That is on the 24th of April.

COPYRIGHT BILL

RE-COMMITTED AND PASSED

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved the third reading of Bill 24, an Act to amend the Copyright Act, as amended.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I desire to make a slight amendment to this Bill. The Act of 1921, chapter 24, contains a final clause which reads as follows:

> This Act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

Now, this clause was amended by the present Bill which is before us, to read:

> This Act shall come into force on the first of July, 1923.

The Department has asked me to move this further amendment, which would read in this form:

> That this Bill be not now read the third time, but be further amended by adding thereto the following words to clause 5: "Unless before that date"—

That is, before the 1st of July next—

> —an Order in Council is passed fixing a later date.

The reason is that, if this Bill passes as we adopted it yesterday in this Chamber, the Department will need to negotiate with the United States in view of the new situation which will be created by this Act. The United States and Canada are working under certain regulations that were entered into between Great Britain and the United States some years ago. They will perhaps need more time than will elapse between now and the first of July, and in consequence they feel that it is prudent to add this amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In view of certain telegrams which I have received,

I desire to move an amendment to the motion of my honourable friend. It must necessarily be by anmendment, because I was entirely unaware of his intention to make the motion which he has just made. I would therefore move in amendment:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be re-committed to the Committee of the Whole House forthwith.

May I be permitted to say, in support of this amendment, that if the Senate of Canada stands for anything it stands for giving mature consideration and deliberation to all important legislation. Yesterday this Bill was sent to the Committee of the Whole House, and in the course of a few minutes was discussed, as is indicated in the minutes. Now, this Bill, when before the House of Commons, was not only the subject of very lengthy discussion, but it was represented by very important bodies of printers and publishers and others interested in the industrial life of Canada so that a grave injustice would be done to some of the most important interests in this Dominion were the Bill to be passed as it was then introduced. The result was that the Government saw fit, upon the representations which were made, to embody in the Bill what today is known as the licensing clauses, or the printing clauses, which yesterday, after a few minutes consideration, were stricken out by this Chamber.

When this Bill was sent from the Commons to the Senate, it was sent on the express understanding, as was stated in the House of Commons, that this Chamber had more time to give consideration and mature thought to the Bill than had the House of Commons itself. Yet, notwithstanding that the House of Commons had given considerable thought to it, that it had been the subject of discussion on the floor of that Chamber and in the committee rooms of the Commons, and notwithstanding the responsibility of the Government for the Bill, yet upon its reaching this Chamber, with scarcely any discussion, my honourable friends who had charge of the Bill and who represented the Government, at once destroyed the Bill. They who were the sponsors of the Bill intimated to this House that it was entirely unsatisfactory, and by their censure they struck out the clauses which had received so much discussion in the other Chamber.

My honourable friend the leader of the Government handed the Bill over to the senior member for Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), who, in presenting the Bill, at the same time denounced it, at least denounced those sections which had been controversial, and which had been the storm-centre of discussion from the time it was introduced into the House of Commons until it reached this Chamber. My honourable friend the leader of the Government in this House, who is charged with conducting the Bill through the shoals and currents of this House, also denounced the Bill, and in even stronger language than my honourable friend from Ottawa. Hence we had presented to us a most extraordinary situation.: the Government sending down from the other House a very important measure, probably the most contentious measure which has received the attention of Parliament this Session, and which I may say has been the subject of contention from Confederation down to the present time; the most contentious, the most controversial subject that has ever been before the Parliament of Canada;—because I challenge any honourable gentleman to point out any statute on the Statute Book upon which so much difference has taken place, not only within the Parliament of Canada, but between Canada itself and the Imperial authorities, as this same copyright question. Yet in disregarding the responsibility placed upon my honourable friends opposite in conducting it through the Senate, they denounced the Bill, they amended it, and then perhaps they would have sent it down to the House of Commons notwithstanding—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The House amended it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: — notwithstanding the protests that were made by various representative bodies who had waited upon the House of Commons, and whom the House of Commons considered entitled to the demands which were made.

Now, in view of what has taken place, it is not unreasonable that this Chamber should give more mature deliberation to this very contentious subject. I say that no thought was given to it worthy of the importance of the Bill. In the first place, there were not more than 25 per cent of the Senators present in their places when the Bill was considered. I do not state this as a reflection on the Chamber, because I have no doubt that those honourable gentlemen who were absent yesterday were away on very important business, otherwise they would have been here.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But they were very worthily represented by my honourable friend.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Referring to myself, I might say that, owing to the absence of about 75 per cent of the members, I kept silent upon the subject; but I noticed on the other side of the House that many of the friends of my honourable friend were out in force, and apparently had anticipated the motion that was to be made to strike out section 2 of the Bill, which was really the storm-centre.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I beg to differ with my honourable friend. I think I saw the large majority of the members of this Chamber sitting around him.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, my honourable friend's vision may be more acute than mine, but I certainly looked for them on many occasions, but failed to find them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: They were behind you, but in front of us, and we could see them better.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Now, it is desirable, apart from jocular references to the situation that arose yesterday, that further thought be given to this Bill.

The subject of copyright has been an extremely acute one in Canada since 1842. I do not purpose to go into the history of copyright, except to say this, that since 1842 this subject has probably occasioned more friction in the parliament of Canada, both in colonial days and afterwards under self-government, than any other subject with which we have been confronted.

Under the Imperial Copyright Act of 1842 the Imperial authorities ruled that every author must first publish his work in the United Kingdom. Notwithstanding the rights that we thought we had within the overseas dominions at that time the colonial author or the author living in a self-governing Dominion, was compelled to proceed to the United Kingdom, and there publish his work. That continued down to Confederation; and at the time of Confederation we took the authority to pass legislation touching copyright. We had express authority in Canada under the Confederation Act to pass legislation as to copyright; yet the British or Imperial authorities claimed and were sustained in that view by the judgment of the Privy Council—that the Imperial Act of 1842 was in full force and operation within all the self-governing Dominions of the Crown, notwithstanding our Canadian statute. We have legislated from that time down to the present, however, and permit me to say that in many Acts we have placed upon the Statute Book may be found the very same policy we struck out yesterday upon five or ten minutes consideration.

Now, there has passed to the Parliament of Canada since Confederation, with scarcely any interruption, a policy which expressly declared that any copyright issued by the Dominion of Canada should be subject to the printing and publishing clauses, and I see no good reason why that policy, which was good at Confederation and after Confederation, should not be equally good to-day. If we grant a privilege to an author in Canada, I say there is nothing unreasonable in attaching to it certain terms, namely, the term that the author should publish and print his book in Canada. They are doing that in the United States to-day. Does any honourable gentleman think that, in anticipation of the passage by the United States of a Copyright Act such as my honourable friend has suggested, and their adhering to the Convention of Berne, they will exclude the requirement of printing within the boundaries of the United States? Those who come to a decision of that kind, I venture to say, are entirely ignorant of the policy of the United States on this question. So we would be in this peculiar position, that while the United States, if they should pass a Copyright Act, would embody within it compulsory clauses insisting upon all authors printing and publishing their work first in the United States, we in Canada would be without such a provision.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Could they be members of the Berne Convention if they did?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I venture to say that if the United States will insist upon that, they will become members of the Berne Convention, and the Imperial authorities will be the first to assist them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, no.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND. No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But, according to what my honourable friend stated yesterday, the United States can do this: they can impose that obligation upon their nationals.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, they can do that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And that is the sort of thing we are doing to-day. The United States on other occasions have imposed additional obligations, and those obligations have been accepted by Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will my honourable friend be kind enough to allow me to ask him a question. I would like to be quite clear. Did I understand the honourable gentleman to say that we are still bound by the printing clauses? Is that his contention?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: At present?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: No.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will my honourable friend be good enough, to let me know by virtue of what law?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, I say that is the case.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Very well: under what law?

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: It is only after the death of the author—not during his life.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am going back now to the policy of Canada in 1889. A Canadian Copyright Act was passed, but the Royal Assent was withheld. Canada—I say it with hesitation—should have resented the Imperial Government withholding the Royal Assent to any legislation of the Canadian Parliament, as was done on that occasion. That Act provided that all printing and publishing should be done in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is, the Act of 1889?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Act of 1889.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is it in force?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It was disallowed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Royal Assent was withheld at that time. Then, in 1900 the Imperial authorities passed certain legislation in Great Britain giving power to the Overseas Dominions to impose any obligation of that kind they chose.

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: It was never done.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Act to-day, as it is in the Revised Statutes of Canada, has in it the licensing clauses. If my honourable friend will look at Chapter 70 of the Revised Statutes of Canada he will find there this provision:

> Every work of which the copyright has been granted and is subsisting in the United Kingdom, and copyright of which is not secured or subsisting in Canada, under any Act of the Parliament of Canada, or of the Legislature of the late Province of Canada, or of the legislature of any of the provinces forming part of Canada, shall, when printed and published, or reprinted and republished in Canada, be entitled to copyright under this Act.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask my honourable friend whether that is a reproduction of the statute of 1889, to which he referred a moment ago?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have sent for that statute, but have not yet been able to get it. This is the Act as contained in the Revised Statutes.

However, honourable gentlemen, what I wish to impress upon the House is this, that, after the passage by the Parliament of Canada of copyright legislation, most of the Acts have not been proclaimed; they have failed either to receive the Royal Assent, or to be brought into force by the Government of Canada; yet, from the time of Confederation down to the present they, without exception, embodied that one policy. I stand subject to correction, but that is my reading of the law—that they embodied that one policy, that the printing and publishing must be done within the Dominion. That was accentuated by reason of Imperial policy, in which, under the Imperial Act of 1842, it was declared that an author, even though living outside the United Kingdom, whether living in the British possessions overseas or living elsewhere, should first publish his work in the United Kingdom.

The United States have adopted a similar policy, and I am satisfied that the United States will adhere to it, and neither the Berne Convention nor any other national or international force will shake them in their resolve to insist upon the printing and publishing being done within their own country.

I must remind this Chamber that in 1919 the Government of the day brought down a Copyright Bill. As honourable gentlemen know, nearly every Government since Confederation, has been importuned to place upon the Statute Book effective copyright legislation. In 1919 the Government brought down an Act similar to that which the present Government introduced the other day in the House of Commons, without the printing clauses. It was impressed upon us that in order to become adherents of the Berne Convention it would be desirable for us to dispense with those sections. But no sooner had the Bill come before the Senate than the representations which were made, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, not only induced but forced the Senate of Canada to accept this policy, and we did accept it, and embodied it in the Act then passed by the Senate. And are we going to depart from the policy which after full deliberation, we adopted on that occasion? My recollection is that we sat for perhaps two or three weks, giving the closest attention to public opinion and sentiment and to public needs, and we considered that policy to be sound and passed the Bill accordingly.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: May I ask the honourable gentleman to come down to brass tacks and tell us what the argument is—not that an argument exists, but what is the argument in favour of these clauses?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The argument in favour of the clauses is simply this. If the authors of Canada make application for all the privileges of copyright, which under the Berne Convention would last for their own lifetime and for 50 years thereafter, it is the right of the Parliament of Canada to take into consideration the interests involved in condition or term of the privilege which we the granting of those rights, and to do so as a give to the author. To such an extent have many of the authors recognized it that it is the opinion, I venture to say, of the majority of the authors in Canada that this principle should be accepted. I have had representations made from responsible bodies of authors that it should be accepted. They realize full well that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to secure a Copyright Act without such a condition. Honourable gentlemen should take into consideration this fact, that the authors of Canada represent only a very small group of men in comparison with artisans engaged in the printing and publishing business in Canada, who have a right to profit by the printing and publication of the work of our own authors. If we give to those authors copyright, why should we enact any legislation whereby they may go over to the United States, as they most certainly would, and have their works printed and published in that country? Is it thus that we build up our own native industries, or are we trying to build up foreign industries?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It is no more than we exact from patentees.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. Furthermore, why should this privilege, this extraordinary benefit, be given to authors without our compensating ourselves in some degree?

Some honourable gentlemen who spoke yesterday referred to the copyright as that of the brain work of the author; but their main argument was that it was a property right, and that authors were entitled to the protection of a property right. If they are entitled to the protection of a property right, they should be subject to the obligations that go with property. I ask, what obligations are imposed in this Bill, to accompany the extraordinary rights that we are giving to the authors? Are they subject to taxation? Are they subject to all the burdens and obligations to which other property owners are liable? Not at all. If the privilege which those gentlemen seek is to be granted during their own lifetime and for fifty years thereafter, it must, in my judgment, be made subject to whatever burdens the Parliament of Canada may see fit to impose, and those burdens are, it seems to me, but light and insignificant in comparison with the burdens that other property in Canada is bearing.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? I have not had time to verify the fact. Are we to understand that the clauses referred to, sections 13, 14, 15 and 27, are incompatible with the Revised Convention of Berne?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. My honourable friend who had charge of the Bill yesterday read to us an opinion, as I understood, from the Journal of the Convention, that the legislation which came from the House of Commons was not incompatible with that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Not at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But we have the right to impose upon our own nationals the printing obligations.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, no.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I did understand that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend misunderstood me altogether in the opinion which I quoted.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Am I to understand, then, that my honourable friend's statement is equivalent to saying that the Government has deliberately sent to this Chamber a Bill embodying clauses which put it out of the Berne Convention?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I be permitted to interrupt my honourable friend? The Government Bill originally provided for the repeal of clauses 13, 14, 15 and 27. The House of Commons chose to add to the amendment to which objection has been taken.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And the Government accepted it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is not the Government in control of the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Bill that comes to us in not the Government Bill at all. My honourable friend must apportion the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is this not now a Government Bill?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There is no use in quibbling. I say that the Government Bill, the Bill introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is the Bill which provided for the repeal of those sections. It was the House of Commons, not the Government, that amended it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Did not the Government accept it?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The House of Commons chose to amend the Bill. That is the situation.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Do the House of Commons always do the amending.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Do I understand my honourable friend to say that the Government occupies so humiliating a position in the House of Commons that it can have imposed upon it an amending clause with which it is not in sympathy?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend can make any comment he pleases, but it is distorting the facts.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You are distorting the facts.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I say this Bill came down to this Chamber with the imprimatur of the Government upon it. My honourable friend the leader of the House (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) brought it down, and, according to all constitutional practice, this Chamber must regard the Bill as voicing the views of the Government. Surely the Government had the privilege of accepting or rejecting it? And it was the duty of the Government not to accept such an amendment as that made in the House of Commons if it was against the policy of the Government or against the views it entertained upon the subject. But the Government accepted it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I suppose my honourable friend does not feel himself bound by the fact that this is a Government measure.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If he does, I must hasten to free him from that bondage.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am coming to the rescue of the Government. I say it is the duty of this Chamber to accept the Bill which the Government sent down to this House, and to pass it in its entirety.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is that principle to be applied to all Government Bills?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, but it is to be applied to this Bill. However, honourable gentlemen, I think the House will agree with me in this regard, that the Bill is worthy of more consideration than was given to it yesterday. No one respects the opinions of my honourable friend opposite more than I do. We have a right to differ upon a subject of this kind. The Bill is of sufficient importance to permit of the widest difference being entertained, and it is certainly the duty of the Senate to give it full consideration. If there be a volume of public opinion expressing itself as desirous of being heard by the Senate, this Bill should be referred to a special committee, so that those who are interested—and interested to the very large extent that we know they are—should be heard before that Committee, so that the public voice may be heard and we may enact the necessary legislation to give effect to what is the real public opinion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I have been trying to understand something about this Bill, but after listening to both sides I am about as clear now as when the discussion started.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Give it up.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: You might be worse.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: What I desire to know is this. If these four manufacturing clauses are eliminated from the Bill, will the Canadian author then have the right to send his work to be printed outside of Canada, anywhere he likes?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Well, why should he not do so?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: If he can get it done more cheaply elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then you want to vote for it.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: To my mind it is just a matter of giving protection to the printers at the expense of the authors.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Exactly. That is the whole point.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What the honourable Senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) said the other day is recorded in Hansard:

Hon. Mr. Belcourt: The effect of the amendment made in the Commons is that sections 13, 14, 15 and 27 are still part of our copyright law—

Hon Mr. Griesbach: With respect to Canadians.

Hon. Mr. Belcourt: With respect to Canadians.

Hon. Mr. Griesbach: And with respect to nationals not members of the Union.

Hon. Mr. Belcourt: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Murphy: Would that vitiate the Bill as far as the Berne Convention is concerned?

Hon. Mr. Belcourt: I do not think it would. I suppose that any member of the Union may impose certain restrictions; but the point is that with these clauses the Canadian author is not going to get the protection which British subjects in the British Isles and in the other Dominions of the Empire are to-day enjoying.

The honourable gentleman has given it as his opinion that the fact of those clauses remaining in the Bill would not vitiate it, so far as the Berne Convention was concerned.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Question, question.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has not presented his motion.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I did not exactly hear the motion that was moved by the honourable member from Calgary (Hon. Sir James Lougheed).

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

That this Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be recommitted to Committee of the Whole House forthwith.

That is the amendment to my honourable friend's (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) motion. If the Bill is recommitted to the Committee of the Whole, the entire matter can be discussed—both my honourable friend's resolution and this question.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But must not that be moved by way of sub-amendment?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I moved an amendment. I have not examined this point, but if it prevents my honourable friend from moving his sub-amendment. I will gladly withdraw my motion and wait until we have disposed of that of my honourable friend.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Very well.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I thought the honourable gentleman's intention was to have the Bill referred to a special committee, so that the interested parties might be heard.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The purpose is to have it recommended to the Committee of the Whole. First of all, perhaps it should go back to the Committee of the Whole. Then it can be fully discussed, and if it is found advisable to send it to a special committee, the Committee of the Whole may so report to the House and the House may refer it accordingly.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Do I understand that the honourable leader of the Government withdraws his amendment for the time being?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend's (Hon. Sir James Lougheed's) motion will stand as a sub-amendment..

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend from Calgary (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has made a very eloquent speech, as he always does, and a very impassioned one. I wonder why he did not do it yesterday. He was present during the whole of this discussion, and it was not quite so short as he has intimated—five minutes only, in Committee, he says.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I thought it better to do it to-day.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Then, on the second reading we spent practically a whole afternoon. I am not going to question the honourable gentleman's appeal to allow anybody to change his mind, even in the short space of hardly 24 hours; that right is conceded. My honourable friend last night had either a happy dream or a nightmare: I am afraid it was the latter rather than the former. Why all this indignation to-day when we could have had it yesterday before the House had dealt with the question and voted upon it? and may I remind my honourable friend that he voted for the amendment

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There was no division, but when the question was put my honourable friend sat silent, and by his silence gave acquiescence as distinctly as if there had been a division.

Now, what is the object of this legislation, and what is the attitude taken by the Government with regard to it? The Government introduced a Bill one clause of which contains all the important matter—that is, section 2, which simply provided for the repeal of these clauses—13, 14, 15 and 27. That is what the Government wanted; that is the Government's policy. That the Bill came to us with an amendment put upon it by the House of Commons does not alter the policy of the Government at all.

I may say that before taking charge of the Bill I had consultations with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was responsible for the introduction of the Bill in the other House, and the honourable gentleman told me that what he wanted was the Government Bill as introduced into the House of Commons. The Government's policy is to protect the author—to protect the property which a man acquires in the production of his own brain. There is no inconsistency at all in this Bill coming before us. The House of Commons chose to amend it, and it had to come over here in the amended form independently of the wishes or the policy of the Minister or the Government.

My honourable friend dealt with a lot of ancient history—with the legislation of 1899 and of some other dates which I do not quite remember; but he carefully forgot to deal with the legislation of 1921, which is all-important in dealing with this matter here to-day. The legislation of 1921 was intended to do just what this Government is intending to do to-day—afford protection to the Canadian author, and hence the introduction of this Bill. Why was the Bill of 1921 never proclaimed? It was not proclaimed because it was thought, and the then Minister of Justice, the Hon. Mr. Doherty, felt, that there was a grave doubt, if these provisions remained in it, of the Bill securing the approval of the Berne Convention, and, as a consequence, whether it would afford to the Canadian author the protection which the Government intended to give him. My honourable friend will remember what the Minister of Justice said.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That may be; but my contention is that that was not the opinion of Parliament, and that Parliament must prevail.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think my honourable friend is wrong there also, if he will permit me to say so. The opinion of the Minister of Justice was adopted by the House, and it was crystallized in section 50, which suspended the operation of the Act until proclamation. What did the Minister of Justice say? He said:

If these sections are at variance with the Convention, we shall have to come back to the House because the law of this country would put the Government in a position where it could not consistently adhere to the Convention, and we should have to decide the question then.

That was the opinion expressed by the Minister of Justice,and adopted by the House of Commons by the enactment of section 50, leaving the Act in suspension until the Berne Convention pronounced upon it.

Now, we have the judgment of the Berne Convention upon the point, and there can be no doubt whatever that the inclusion of the amendment is going to deprive the Canadian author of the protection of copyright which every other member of the Convention has a right to.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: You did not say that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If the honourable gentleman will permit me, I read the opinion of the Berne Convention with regard to these various sections, and I think it will not be amiss for me to read them again.

Here is the authority for my statement. It appeared in the July, 1921, number of Le Droit d'Auteur, the organ of the Berne Convention, published in Geneva. I will translate as I go along, and I will read the conclusion of the article:

"The result of what precedes is that, according to our conviction frankly expressed the accession of Canada to the revised Convention of Berne which the Law of the 4th of June—

The law has been in suspension since 1921. —that is, the 4th of June, 1921; that is our Act—

—is supposed to bring about, will not be announced by the Government, to the central Government, and by the latter to the Swiss Federal Council, only if articles 13, 14, 15 and 27 are eliminated from the law. If Canada desires to maintain these for special reasons, they will have to be declared inapplicable to the countries which are members of the Berne Union by a formal disposition.

I wonder what language could be clearer? What language could be more definite?

In the latter case they would apply, far example, to the United States, but they would automatically lose their effect also towards this country the day the Washington Government would adhere, in its turn, to the Union Treaty.

"A declaration of adhesion to the Treaty without these matters of so-called obligatory licenses determined in the sense here indicated, and without other ameliorations being brought to the law in accordance with suggestions contained in the first chapter hereof, could not be reconciled, according to us, with the primorial engagement of every Unionist country to assure the legal protection of the rights which are the object of the revised Convention, (Article 25)."

Now, honourable gentlemen, could anything be more clearer? And what is the manifest duty cast upon this Parliament?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend is discussing something different from what I discussed. I discussed the section as it came before us yesterday, which only imposed the obligation on our own nationals. My honourable friend is referring to the obligation which extends to all nationals under the Act of 1921.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No. I am surprised that my honourable friend will not follow the clear language stated here. What misapprehension can there be?

The result of what precedes is that, according to our conviction frankly expressed, the accession of Canada to the revised Convention of Berne which the Law of the 4th of June is supposed to bring about, will not be announced by the Government to the central Government, and by the latter to the Swiss Federal Council, only if articles 13, 14, 15 and 27 are eliminated from the law.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Can our honourable friend tell us the date of that opinion?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I mentioned it here—July, 1921.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That opinion, then, can have no bearing upon the Bill now before this House—the Bill as it came over from the House of Commons to this Chamber a few days ago. Those clauses are not the same as they were in the Bill of 1921; they have been modified by the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: They are not there at all.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Admitted by the Minister of Justice to be now in conformity with the terms of the Berne Convention; and the honourable gentleman admitted that to the honourable member from Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mr. Murphy).

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Let us not play at cross purposes. As I understand it, the object of the honourable gentleman who leads the Opposition is to have the Bill sent back for the purpose of reinstating these clauses.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, but for reinstating the clauses which were stricken out yesterday in which the obligation was imposed upon our own nationals of doing the printing in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The clause of the Bill as introduced was to repeal those sections 13, 14, 15 and 27.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But it added an obligation on the Canadian author to have his work printed in Canada, and my honourable friend gave the opinion yesterday that that would be in accordance with the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I said nothing of the sort. In support of the position I took, I read the translation of the article in Le Droit d'Auteur; and if the object which is sought in recommitting this Bill is not to restore the amendment put into it by the House of Commons, I fail to see what object my honourable friend has in view.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The restoration of the House of Commons clause, namely, clause 2, which reads as follows:

Sections 13, 14, 15 and 27 of the Copyright Act, 1921, shall not apply to any work the author of which is a British subject, other than a Canadian citizen, or the subject or citizen of a country which has adhered to the Convention and the additional Protocol thereto set out in the second schedule to the said Act.

That is entirely different from the clauses of 1921.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend tell us exactly what he wants?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I want the restoration of this clause which is the Government clause.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The honourable gentleman next to him has an entirely different opinion.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: What I want to point out is this—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: You will have your chance to speak. Let me make my statement; I cannot be interrupted all the time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We apologize.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The object, therefore, is to send the Bill back to Committee in order that the amendment introduced by the House of Commons may be restored; in other words, that section 2 as it came to us from the House of Commons shall be restored by us.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am pointing out that if that is done—and that is the ground, I think, upon which the House proceeded yseterday—Canadian authors will not enjoy the full benefits enjoyed by all the other members of the Berne Convention. Canadian authors will be singled out; they will have imposed upon them a burden which is not imposed upon any other member of the Berne Convention, a burden which does not exist in the British Isles or in any other part of the British Dominions, all of which have accepted a Bill similar to the one we voted for yesterday, my honourable friend included. That is going to be the result.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Will my honourable friend permit me to remind him that in moving the amendment, the Minister said distinctly that that amendment would enable Canada to come in under the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: He said that himself.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not remember seeing the statement, but if I take it that the honourable gentleman's statement is correct, I do not think I am doing any injustice to the Minister if I say that I prefer the judgment of the Berne Convention in the matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend gave the opinion yesterday or on Monday that it would not exclude us from the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He was right when he said that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will read it:

> Hon. Mr. Murphy: Would that vitiate the Bill as far as the Berne Convention is concerned?
> Hon. Mr. Belcourt: I do not think it would. I suppose that any member of the Union may impose certain restrictions; but the point is that with these clauses the Canadian author is not going to get the protection which British subjects in the British Isles and in the other Dominions of the Empire are today enjoying.

That does not exclude us from the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It excludes us from the full benefits of the Berne Convention. Restrictions are imposed upon our authors that are not imposed upon other members of the Union. That is all I said. I did not mean to say that we would have no benefit whatever.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are agreed upon that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am not going to say to just what extent we would be deprived of the full benefits of the Berne Convention if we continued these sections, but it is quite clear that our Canadian authors will be in a different position to those of any other country which is now a member of the Convention.

My honourable friend forgets that the Act of 1921 was introduced by the Government of which he was a member, and that he himself introduced it in this House—I am speaking now of the matter of policy of which we have heard so much—and he himself was responsible for that policy. So the policy of 1921 was the ultimate policy adopted with regard to copyright. Why go back to the policy in force 30 or 40 years ago? The ultimate judgment of Parliament in 1921, after hearing a great deal of evidence in Committee, was, that if these sections put Canadian authors in an inferior position, they would be repealed. Of course, the honourable gentleman has a right to change his mind any day he likes; but I would like to have from him some explanation of why it has changed —why what was good policy in 1921 is not good policy to-day. He told us himself the matter had been very much discussed for weeks and weeks in Committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The licensing clauses are in the Act of 1921.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend forgets that he himself adhered to the doctrine that if these clauses stood in the way of enjoyment of full rights by Canadian authors they would have to be repealed

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but we accepted them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Bill was passed with the understanding that if they stood in the way they would be repealed. Am I right or am I wrong?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am not prepared to say that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend cannot repudiate the Minister of Justice in that way.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is not in the statute.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There was no contract to be revived, or no undertaking.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That may be so, but it was on that condition that Parliament accepted the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is not in the Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Bill would not have been passed at that time if that statement had not been made by the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But it is not embodied in the statute, I may say to my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am not discussing the statute: I am discussing the policy.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I say that that discloses what the policy of Parliament was at that time, and the Government of 1921 accepted that policy.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Accepted the policy that if those sections were—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, that is not in the statute. The Minister of Justice could not give an undertaking to repeal or suspend what Parliament had declared to be law.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If it had been in the statute, I do not think my honourable friend would have spent so much time or indignation as he did this afternoon. We shall have to have recourse to the Debates of the House to see upon what policy Parliament adopted this Bill, and I am only putting it to my honourable friend, when he is discussing policy, that the policy which it is attempted to enforce by this method is the policy to which he gave his full adhesion in 1921. He cannot dispute that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not agree to that at all. The statute shows what the policy was, and that is the best evidence you can have.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Minister of Justice, the man who had every right to express an opinion, said what the policy of the Government of the day was, and that was accepted by both Houses, in order that that policy might be determined, that the Act should be suspended indefinitely, that is, not to come into force until that question was settled. Now it is settled. The Berne Convention has given its opinion about it. Why not carry out the policy?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: What policy? Are we committed to anything by the Minister of Justice, or not? All he said was that if those sections prevented the Bill from coming under the Berne Convention the whole thing would have to come back to Parliament, that is all; but we were not committed either to adhering to those clauses, or repealing them. It is all open to discussion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say to my honourable friend that the more serious consideration in the suspension of the Act was the possible attitude of the United States to Canada, should the Act be put in force. The authors who attended before the Committee, and who waited upon the Government, were apprehensive that reprisals would be adopted by the United States which would be very injurious to them, and my impression is that both correspondence and negotiations were entered into with the United States as to a common understanding between the two countries in case the Act was put in force. We always looked forward to that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am putting my honourable friend up against his policy. Of course, my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) has no responsibility for that, but my honourable friend opposite had, and when he talks about policy I want to remind him what the policy has been all along, and I want to know why he has changed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There it is in the Statute Book; it has not changed.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend spoke in a way which I think is not warranted and not fair as to the right of ownership in a man who produces a book. Why should the author of a book not have in his own property the full and complete rights that anybody has in anything he acquires or makes?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He has not. The owner of any other property has not the full and complete rights, that my honourable friend would infer.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He has to pay his taxes. Does not the author pay his taxes?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not on his copyright.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does my honourable friend pay taxes on the chattels he buys, or on the goods in his own house?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, we do.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What special tax?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Most of the provinces impose taxes upon furniture—upon personal chattels.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not know of any province that does.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And a very heavy tax, too.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The case is not different from this. My honourable friend has a farm out in Alberta, and I come along and say to him, "You have got to employ me on your farm; you cannot employ anybody but me; I must do your work, and if we don't agree as to the price of my wages, we will have to go to somebody else to settle or arbitrate about my wages." That is entirely this case. The publisher in Canada says to the author, "You have produced a book, but I am going to get the printing of it, and I am going to give you what I consider fair," and he goes to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who regulates that. Why should I be compelled to sell my goods at a certain price? Why should my honourable friend be told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that his property in Calgary is to be sold for a certain amount?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is not a parallel case.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is exactly parallel. The publisher says to this author, "You have got to accept the price that is offered, or I will print it for you." I am surprised that a man of great culture should treat so lightly the productions of Canadian authorship.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend supported a similar clause in the Patent Bill which came up before us some days ago.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The difference between the Patent Bill and this is that in the Patent Bill he gets an exclusive monopoly, and why should he not pay for it? The author gets no monopoly.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, he does. There is a monopoly during his lifetime, and for 50 years after, whereas a patentee has only an 18 years' monopoly.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am afraid my honourable friend will have great difficulty in getting away from his past attitude on the question of policy which I am discussing, because, after all, that is the main thing here. He is responsible for the policy that the Canadian author should not have imposed on him restrictions other than restrictions imposed on other members of the Berne Convention. Now, the provisions added to the Bill by the House of Commons would inevitably discriminate against the Canadian author, and I thought my honourable friend was so impressed yesterday with that view that he actually allowed the Bill to be reported without any protest on his part, but by his silence gave approval to what the majority of the Senate wanted to do.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have borrowed this policy from England. Since 1842 they have insisted on that—publication in the United Kingdom.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There is no provision of that kind to-day in the Copyright Act of Great Britain, or any other part of the Empire.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I doubt that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: We are the only Dominion that has not yet adopted a Copyright Act in accord with the terms of the Berne Convention. I think it is about time we should.

Hon Mr. BEAUBIEN: I hold views so strongly on this question that I ask permission to express them briefly. The arguments that were presented by the leader of the House, with his usual skill and effect and authority, can be summarized under three heads. Let us examine them, and find whether they are well founded. The first is this: the Canadian law now comprises the printing clauses—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Licensing clauses.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Well, I understand that these terms are synonymous. Secondly, we should follow the policy of Great Britain; thirdly, there is no earthly reason why we should give the product of the brain of an author any special protection.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I take exception to that last statement. I did not take that position—no special protection. I said, give him protection, but subject to the term which we have already imposed.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I apologize to my honourable friend if I did not truly reflect his thought and sentiment, and I want my interpretation to be corrected and made absolutely in compliance with what he has just expressed. I am free, however, to state that on a matter of so great importance, when this Chamber has, after what I thought a serious discussion, made a decision which was unanimous in the presence of the honourable gentleman who has brought the amendment, really few people in this House would have the authority, the skill, the debonnair manner, the ingratiating manner, of bringing the whole matter again before the House, and changing its aspect entirely, without any reason whatsoever. The question, as it came yesterday, is the same to-day; facts have not changed in the night. For my part, I fail to understand how a discussion of this importance can be carried out in the manner we have just witnessed.

But let that go. The first objection of my honourable friend is this: copyright in Canada to-day comprises an obligation equivalent to the licensing clause. Well, I stand subject to correction, but I state that in law and in practice this is not what I understand to be the case at all. Any man who has his copyright under the 1886 Berne Convention which governs us to-day, need not print his book in Canada, and I ask any honourable gentleman to show me the clause of the statute to contradict the opinion which I hold, and have held for years. There is no obligation on any author to-day to print his book in Canada in order to obtain the protection of the Berne Convention of 1886, which protects him at home as well as abroad.

The second objection is this: why not follow the policy of England? Well, I never wished for a better cue for argument than that. I say with my honourable friend, in all earnestness, why not follow the policy of England? England had a policy in 1842, and has improved and perfected that policy since. It has adhered to the Convention of 1886, and the Convention of 1908. If we are behind the times it is because we have not followed that policy: there cannot be two opinions on that subject. Not only Great Britain, but all the colonies have done the same. Therefore I say, let us follow the policy of Great Britain, which, more and more, as time went by, showed its respect for the product of the brain, in company with the rest of the world.

That brings me to the last point: why should the product of the brain of a man be especially protected or privileged?

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN: What is the difference between the Bill presented to the other House and this one, if the Berne Convention gives all protection?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: We are now protected by the Berne Convention of 1886. We are not obliged to print in Canada, but we are now under certain disabilities, because the first Berne Convention stated that whenever a man wanted copyright protection he would have to submit to many formalities—for instance, to registration. In 1908 those were all done away with—because the 1908 Convention is a perfected Convention. An author being a subject of a country participating in the 1908 convention, can register to-day without all the troubles and annoyances of the Convention of 1886. He has the use of the modern instrument, that is all. The object of the Bill now before the House is to give Canadians the use of that perfected instrument, which does away with a lot of formalities as to registration, cases of infringement, and so on.

As to the third point: why protect in such an extraordinary way the product of the brain of man? I will leave aside the appeal made last night so eloquently by a man who had a right to make it before this House, a man whom I have known for 40 years, who has just been honoured by being named by his peers as the representative of Canada in the Academy of Belgium, a man to whom every author in Canada will extend the compliment, well-deserved, that he has had a laborious life, and has not worked to accumulate wealth, but rather to advance Canada in the literary and historical work of the world. Well, gentlemen, let me draw a parallel, if you please. One man has worked for 30 or 40 years. He has grown pale from working at nights. He makes nothing in the way of a fortune, though he gains much in the way of learning and of education for his own people and a great deal in the way of glory for his country. The other man, turning his face to the West, went forth when he was young, full of energy, courage and intelligence, and he had the power of turning everything to gold. He went West and settled there as a pioneer, and became in his district a man respected, one of those who are regarded as belonging to the privileged capitalist class. The honourable gentleman's neighbour on the left probably understands what I mean.

The produce of thirty or forty years of toil is in one man's brain in education and ability. He may express it in a few months in a work that will immortalize himself and his country. The other man has his compensation in real estate, in bonds worth hundreds of thousands, and in shares in dozens of large companies.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What about the income tax?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Tell me, honourable gentlemen, do we not exercise the utmost care to protect the property of the man who has devoted his ability to the acquisition of worldly goods? Has anyone the right to use that man's property without his permission? Mind you, I do not mean to expropriate or rob it, but simply to use it. Why, then, should not the case be the same for the man who toils with his brain? For my part, I cannot see the difference. One man's property is as sacred as the other's.

Why not take the judgment of the world on this question, honourable gentlemen? This Parliament may be too small a jury. The country may be too small a jury. Will you accept the opinion of the world? Is that too small? And what does every civilized country in the world say? Let me ask you Britishers par excellence, is the whole British Empire excepting Canada too small a jury for you? What does the British Empire say? It says: "Protect the work of the mind. The author is entitled to that protection." Why do we refrain from following the example that is set us not only by the British Empire, but by the entire civilized world? For my part I cannot see the reason.

Such were the facts last night; such are they to-day. As I understand it, this motion raises a question as important as that of the second reading, of the Bill, for it concerns the principle involved in it, and for my part I will certainly vote against it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The honourable member who has just spoken has very thoroughly and forcefully advanced an argument on behalf of the toiler—the man who toils with his brain. May I briefly refer to another side of the picture, though I realize my inability to paint a word picture as my honourable friend has done?

Without dealing with nations, and with a desire to make my remarks brief, let me recall the fact. There was introduced into Parliament, and passed in 1921 a Copyright Bill which included the so-called manufacturing clauses. The date when that measure was to become effective was not definitely fixed, because some doubt existed in the mind of the Minister of Justice of that day as to whether or not the Bill would interfere or conflict with the requirements of the Berne Convention. Subsequently the opinion was expressed by those in authority that the enactment did not fully comply with the requirements of the Convention. At the Parliamentary Session of 1923 the Government of this day introduced a Bill respecting Copyright, omitting the manufacturing clauses. When the Bill was discussed in the House of Commons the manufacturing clauses were inserted in another form, and admitted to be not in conflict with the terms of the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does my honourable friend say that they were admitted not to be?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Admitted not to be in conflict.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Admitted by whom?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: By the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No; it was the reserve.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Because, as was admitted there, and as is admitted here by my honourable friend, the Parliament of Canada has a right to place a restriction upon its own nationals, and the Bill as it came from the House of Commons contained only that restriction.

Now, why did it retain that restriction? In the first place, it is a foregone conclusion that if people are to write books there must be people to read them. If Canada needs books, there must be people in this country to peruse them. If the printing of books and other industrial activities are to carried on entirely outside of Canada, or nearly so, then what demand will there be for the product of the author here? The manufacturing clauses provide that the work of the Canadian author shall be printed in Canada, and that if a Canadian publisher demands for the printing of such work a price that appears exorbitant and unfair, the author shall have the right and may exercise the right of appealing to the Minister, who is the arbitrator. Is not that the same principle as prevails in connection with what the workmen shall receive in our public utilities? If a workman thinks he is worth $10 a day and his employer says, "You are worth $2," and they cannot agree, what happens? The Parliament of Canada intervenes and says, "You must arbitrate the matter."

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman a question, because I want to be quite clear on that point. I am absolutely sincere in this. Do I understand the honourable gentleman to say that both the workmen in the one case and the author in the other would be bound in the same way by law? Will not the honourable gentleman admit that the workman is perfectly free either to agree or to refuse to work?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am delighted to find that the honourable member who has just spoken has at least declared himself not to be in favour of compulsory arbitration, because it has been my opinion for several years past that he was.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: In favour of compulsory arbitration?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In favour of the compulsory arbitration of labour disputes.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Certainly, if both parties are to be bound, but not so long as one party alone remains free, as the labour class has been. I do not think that is proper.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Both parties are free; so they are equally treated.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: They are not.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: This Bill proposes that the work of authors shall be published in Canada. The result will be that many hundreds of men will have employment and industry in this country, will be stimulated and will flourish, instead of the work being done elsewhere.

May I illustrate just what I mean? In the year 1917, I think, a very prominent gentleman in this country wrote a book entitled, "Industry and Humanity." It was copyrighted in November, 1918, by W. L. Mackenzie King—"All rights reserved." Where was that book published?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: In the States.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: By Houghton, Mifflin and Company, of Boston and New York. Is there any reason why a book written by a Canadian so prominent as the present Prime Minister should not be printed in Canada?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I answer that question?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Is there any reason why the work of his brain should not be followed by the work and skill of the Canadian workman in the production of his books? Is there any reason why the author should be privileged in the way that the workman is not? If Parliament in 1921—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend permit me to answer that question?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The honourable gentleman has put a question and has, I take it, invited any honourable member to answer.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Right.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The reason it was published in New York—or Boston—was very likely the same reason which applies to the publication of almost any book in Canada. The fact is that you can go to London, or Paris, or Boston, or New York, and get a book printed for about one-third or one-fourth of the price that the Canadian publisher requires.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No. I will tell my honourable friend why it had to be published in Boston or New York. It was because he wanted to distribute and sell that book in the United States. You get copyright in the United States if you publish in the United States. When an author from Canada goes to a publisher there and asks to have his book published, the publisher says: "Yes, I will publish your book provided you give me also the copyright for Canada." Because of the club that the United States publisher holds over the head of the Canadian author, the publishing houses and labour in this country have to suffer and are suffering; and if the motion now before the House prevails and those clauses are restored which unfortunately were struck out yesterday, justice will be done to a great many people, and in my opinion a favour will be done to the authors themselves, because they will no longer be under the restraint which they now suffer.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I want to ask the honourable gentleman a question. If the price which the printers ask is to much and the Minister fixes a price, is the publisher obliged then to print the book?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No. The author is privileged to print it if he refuses.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Honourable gentlemen, when the Bill was up in the House yesterday, I suggested by way of amendment a different course from that which the House ultimately pursued. The Bill as it passsd the second reading makes it obligatory on a Canadian citizen, as well as the citizen or national of any country not in the Berne Convention, to be subject to the licensing clauses. I personally took exception then, and I do now, to the placing of an obligation on a Canadian citizen to be subject to the licensing clauses when there is not such obligation placed on the national of any other country under the Berne Convention—and there are 30 or 40 countries in it, including most of the leading countries of Europe and some of South America. They are not subject to the licensing clauses at all. If this Bill passes, the Canadian citizen will be subject to them. That would impose upon the Canadian author a handicap which ought not to be placed upon him. That is a discrimination against our own people.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would draw the honourable gentleman's attention to this fact, which I think would be an answer to his question. Citizens of other countries do not occupy a position similar to that which we occupy alongside the United States.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Quite true. I quite agree with the statement of the honourable gentleman. But then you have the other provision, as well as the one applicable to the Canadian citizen, namely, that the Nationals of those countries who do not belong to the Berne Convention are subject to the licensing clauses. All our copyright legislation, after our relations with Great Britain were adjusted and we obtained the power to do as we wanted, has been largely governed, of necessity, by our contiguity to the United States. I dare say the origin of the printing clauses could be traced to the United States. Back in the old land each country had its own language and there was not very much need for the insertion of printing clauses or very much advantage to gain by it. The difference in language made them unnecessary. But we are situated beside the United States, who are not under the Berne Convention, and in whose country it is necessary not only that books be printed but that the type be cast. They have overshadowed us in regard to publications as well as in many other ways, and I think that as against the United States we ought in any event to make them subject to the licensing clauses, because I believe in absolute reciprocity in that respect. If we publish over there we must have the book printed with type cast in the United States.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: Set.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I am corrected; with type set in the United States. I am sorry that I could not follow the suggestion made by the honourable leader on this side. If I understood him right, he said that these printing or licensing clauses should apply to our own nationals. As I indicated yesterday in the proposed amendment that I read to the House, any country not under the Berne Convention—and particularly the United States, whom we have in mind—should be made subject to the licensing clauses, because in my opinion that would tend to develop the printing interests of this country.

I think we ought in any event to approach this Act in a spirit of compromise. We have been for a long period of years trying to get a satisfactory copyright law in Canada. There are at present certain classes of the population. brain workers, such as song writers and composers, who have no copyright at all, owing to the defective nature of our law; because we are not up to date. For people of that class, if we cannot agree on this law, we should pass an independent Act in any event, for the protection of those whose works are reproduced mechanically—by the player piano, the phonograph, and perhaps the radiograph, and in other ways. We should protect the work of the composer's brain, even if we cannot agree in the larger field of authors.

So that while I would be quite ready to support the motion of the honourable leader on this side of the House, knowing that after all there must be a certain degree of compromise in dealing with this matter, yet I realize and appreciate the importance of what I consider the primary right of the author to protection for the product of his brain. At the same time in this country of ours, placed as we are beside the United States, with our struggling publishing interests, handicapped enormously by the vast field for circulation in the United States and the great accumulation of capital in their printing houses, I do think we ought incidentally, in connection with copyrights, to do something for the protection of our publishing interests.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Honourable gentlemen, I think that I, amongst others, shall be expected to give a vote on this question. I am disposed to help the authors to the extent of my vote and my good wishes, and I would like to know whether it would be more advantageous to the author to have the benefits of this Berne Convention or to have the benefit of publication of his work in the United States. There is the alternative. I would like to have it decided which would be more to the advantage of the author, and I will vote for that.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Discuss it in Committee.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I may tell my honourable friend that there is an association of Canadian authors composed of 900 members which has urged upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce the necessity of passing this law as it was introduced in the Lower House, without the printing clauses that we are discussing. Surely, therefore, there can be no better test of where lie the interests of the authors as between the two alternatives mentioned by the honourable gentleman.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Question.

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: Honourable gentlemen, I suppose I may be allowed to say a few words upon that question. I know something about it and will detain the House for only a very brief space of time.

I was surprised and deeply regretted to see the stand taken by the honourable member for Calgary (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), the leader of this side of the House, this afternoon. Yesterday he was in his place, peaceful, smiling, acquiescent, and everything went smoothly. There were not a great number of members in the Chamber, it is true, but we were a respectable number, and I think that on both sides we could be fairly said to represent the intellect and parliamentary experience of this House; and we debated the question fully.

This is not a new question, honourable gentlemen, but one that has been debated for many years in this Parliament. As you remember perfectly well, the manufacturing clauses were in the Bill of 1921, and we discussed that matter for many days before the Bill was adopted; and you know the result. The Bill contained these clauses 13, 14, 15 and 27, which were deemed objectionable, and for that reason the Bill was never proclaimed.

Now we have this new Bill before us. Yesterday, after having heard many speeches, we decided that clause 2 of the Bill as it was read the first time in the House of Commons on the 21st of February was to be reinserted; and now we are asked by the honourable member for Calgary to go back on what was done yesterday and to reinsert the amendment which was adopted in the House of Commons, thus reviving clauses 13, 14, 15 and 27.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I want to call your kind attention to a demonstration which I will try to place before this House. With all due respect to my colleagues, I do not think that a great many of them understand the working and the result of these clauses. I am not going to talk of myself, but if I use some words that would seem to be personal, it is only as a matter of expression. What will be the result of these clauses 13, 14, 15 and 27, as far as Canadian authors are concerned? Let us go to the bottom of the question; and if you will give me your attention for a few minutes, I think I can show you the unfairness of them.

Suppose I am going to publish a book. It may be historical or poetical or fiction, or otherwise. I have spent many months, perhaps years, in painful work, deep research, patient investigation, and my book is ready to be given to the public. Of course, it may be bad, it may be good, or it may be indifferent; but I want to publish it; and I am inclined to believe—or course authors are always a little vain—that it may be a good book for the public of this country. I go to a publisher in Quebec or in Montreal, and say: "Here is my manuscript, 500 pages; you see the notes, indexes, and so on. How much would it cost me to publish that book? I am a poor man"—authors as a rule are poor men; they may have intellectual power, but usually they are poor so far as wordly goods are concerned—"I am a poor man; I hope the book will be a success, so give me your lowest price." He goes to his office and inquires about the cost of paper and so on, and comes back and says: "I will print your book for such and such." Mind you, honourable gentlemen, it is a very costly proceeding. I do not think there are many members of this House who are in the painful position of having to print books; but if they are, they must know that it is very costly to print books in Canada to-day because of many reasons which I will not detain the House to explain.

I have been informed by a friend who has just come from Europe that in Brussels I could print that same book for half the price that is asked by a printer in Quebec or Montreal. Having received that information I tell that to my friend the publisher, and he says: "I am very sorry; I have given you the lowest price I can ask you." After thinking it over I decide that I will go and have my book printed in Brussels. It has been done; I know of Canadians who have had their books printer there. Our own Canadian poet, Louis Fréchette had one of his books printed in Paris.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend allow me to give him a very recent case of that kind? It is a book published by the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden "The War and the Future."

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: I know the book; it was printed in London—and very many others do that.

I go to Brussels and have two or three thousand copies of my book printed there, and I come back to Canada and make the negotiations necessary for the sale of my book—I go to the booksellers and so on—and while I am doing that preparatory work for the selling of my book, the publisher of Quebec or Montreal comes to me and says: "I hear you have printed a book in Paris or Brussels or London." I assent, and he says, "Has it been printed in Canada?" "No." "Ah, something will have to be done; I am going to print the book." "But," I say, "you are joking; I have my book, 3,000 copies of it, and I am going to sell them. It is my book; it is the product of my brain; I have put two or three years, perhaps 10 years, into that book, and you are coming and telling me I cannot sell it. Surely you are joking." But clause 13 of the Copyright Act of Canada says:

> Any person may apply to the Minister for license to print and publish in Canada any book wherein copyright subsists, if at any time after publication and within the duration of the copyright the owner of the copyright fails:

a. to print the said book or cause the same to be printed in Canada;

b. To supply by means of copies so printed the reasonable demands of the Canadian market for such book.

"So," says my friend the publisher, "if you don't make a contract with me for the printing of your book, I shall go to the Minister and ask for a license to print it; and I shall have the right to print 1,000 copies of it." "But, my dear friend, I have 3,000 copies of it, and I think that is plenty." "I will go to the Minister and get my license, and will print your book, with your consent if you give it, or without it if you do not want to give it." He says, "I will give you something." "What will you give me?" Of course, he may name a low figure. If I don't agree, the minister shall decide. I am in their hands. I think I am in a very bad predicament with that Canadian law so full of protection for Canadian publishers.

The other day we had a printed memorandum put before the House which came from the official of the Department that has to deal with that matter, and from which I read these lines:

Bill 24, as amended by the House of Commons while it removes objections both of the British and International authorities, still affords the publishers the protection of the licensing sections of the Act both as against the resident Canadian author and the author of the United States.

Protection against whom? Protection to the publishers against the Canadian authors.

Who needs the protection? Our literature is in its infancy; we must build it up if we want to be a great nation—if we want to be a civilized nation. We want material things, of course—railways and transportation and things of that kind—but if we have the proud ambition of becoming a great nation, we should care a little more what we do for the protection of Canadian authors and the building up of Canadian literature. And what protection are we giving them? They come to us, and get protection for the publishers. Is it fair, honourable gentlemen?

Let me go back to my demonstration. My good friend the publisher says: "I will go to the Minister and will have your book printed. I cannot agree with his as to the price he is going to give me: it may be a paltry sum, and he gets a license, and my book is printed without my consent. I have the 3,000 copies that have been printed in Belgium. What am I to do with them? I wil try, perhaps, you will say, to have my book brought here from Belgium to compete with my books printed by the Canadian publisher. But do you think I would be free to do that? You will see. Here is clause 27:

Where the owner of the copyright has by license or otherwise granted the right to reproduce any book in Canada, or where a license to reproduce such book has been granted under sections 12 or 13, it shall not be lawful except as provided in subsection 3 to import into Canada copies of such book, and such copies shall be deemed to be included in schedule C to the Customs Tariff, 1907, and that schedule shall apply accordingly.

I shall not have the right to sell my book; I shall be prevented by clause 27 from importing my own book into Canada to compete with the book that has been printed by the publisher here. Honourable gentlemen, if this is justice, if this is fair play, if this is protection for Canadian literature, I know nothing about words.

I think I am entitled to ask protection, not for myself, but in the name of the great fraternity of those good citizens who are the literary men of Canada. The authors of history, poetry, fiction, science, are great men, honourable gentlemen; other men may do great things for Canada, but these humble men who toil, who spend their nights in writing books and trying to build up Canadian literature, are worthy of protection; and it is in their name that I now ask this House not to adopt the amendment presented by the honourable gentleman from Calgary, but to stand by the action taken by this House yesterday.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: If all the printing in Canada was that of the authors, and you could get all that work done for one-third of the amount in Germany, would you have it done in Germany?

Hon Mr. CHAPAIS: Never, never, because Germany is not one of my own; but when I go to France or Belgium I go to my own—to those who were our allies in the great fight for liberty and civilization.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: Would you have it printed in Japan?

Hon. Mr. CHAPAIS: Are you going to ask if I would have it printed in Patagonia?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: If all the printing in Canada was furnished by the authors, and you could get the work done in any other country for one-third, would you do it with Mr. Fielding holding up his hands and saying: "We cannot meet the deficit," and with factories closing all over Canada? If you go to another country and get the work done for half the cost, and close up the factories and put them out of business, who will pay the taxes?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to lay clearly before the Senate the situation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who introduced this Bill in the House of Commons. Before a Bill of this importance is introduced in the House of Commons I take for granted that the general principle is submitted to Council, and that this was done in this instance. When the Bill was introduced it had for its object the eliminating of the licensing clauses. In the House of Commons, when it was examined in Committee, some objections were made to the principle of the Bill. The Minister of Trade and Commerce discussed those objections, and, remembering the difficulties which the late Minister of Justice had had in passing the Bill of 1921, came to the conclusion that perhaps, in the interest of the authors, whose interest he was championing, he should accept a compromise—I will not say really a compromise, but a half measure. I do not say compromise because the parties in whose favour he was supposed to legislate did not give their consent to that half-measure.

When the Bill thus passed the Commons I was entrusted with its fortune in this Chamber. I informed the Minister of Trade and Commerce that I stood for the authors in this matter—for the principle of freedom embodied in the Bill as originally introduced, and that I wanted to remain free to test the Senate as to the full right of the authors to come under the Berne Convention, untrammeled by those four clauses which are now under discussion.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce informed me that he viewed the matter as I did; that, perhaps he could have pressed this matter to a vote in the House of Commons and tested the opinion of that House on the Bill as originally introduced, but that when it came to this Chamber, the Senate should be free to express its opinion on the matter; and that, if we felt strongly that this half-measure was not acceptable to the authors, we should say so, and he would make an effort when it returned to the House of Commons to have our views prevail. This is the position of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and my own position.

Now, I want to say that I accompanied a very imposing delegation of the authors of this country last spring to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and urged him to bring down last year the Bill, which he introduced this Session. He told us then that the Session was somewhat advanced, but he promised us to bring at the following Session this measure, as introduced some time ago in the Commons. He did so.

Nothing had happened to bring me to alter my view, and, with all due apology to this Chamber, I will read the very concise remarks I made in 1921; and to the conclusions I then reached I now adhere. I was addressing myself to my honourable friend opposite:

> Honourable gentlemen, the Government leader has stated that not only had the authors rights in connection with the publication of their books, but that the public was to be considered. I do not understand exactly what my honourable friend meant by that word, the public. Did he mean the readers at large throughout the land? Or did that expression cover simply the publisher or printer? If he meant the public at large, I do not see that the public needs any protection in this connection. Suppose a Canadian author has written a book: he goes to a Canadian publisher, who refuses to publish it:—he crosses the line, goes to New York or Boston, and obtains a contract, favourable to himself and quite satisfactory, for the printing of the book, and he gives the right to the publisher to sell that book throughout the United States and Canada. This is a right which, up to this moment, seems to violate no principle, if this law does not interevene; but, if this law should interevene, then that contract which the author had made or would make, he may not be able to make. The Boston or New York publisher may say: "I have a considerable clientele among the reading public in Canada, and I will make for you certain favourable conditions if you give me the right to extend my sales to your country." But the author will be hampered in disposing of his rights and entering into a contract for the publication of his book in the United States, which is the large constituency, representing a market of 110,000,000 people as against 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 Canadian people;—because under this legislation any publisher may immediately give notice to the Minister of Justice that he intends to claim a license and publish that book in Canada. If the American publisher has consented to enter into that contract, and is hampered in regard to entering the Canadian market through that demand for a license the contract may be set at nought; difficulties may appear; and the author may be involved in lawsuits and in loss—all because a Canadian publisher, who may have refused the risk of publishing that book when it was first offered to him, feeling assured now that it is a success, will pounce upon it and say, "Now I will print it in Canada"—in violation of a contract that may have been entered into with the American house by the author. This is the step we are about to take in putting into this Act these sections 13, 14, and 15. For my part I am not disposed thus to hamper the Canadian author. He has produced his book, he is a free man, he can offer it to a Canadian publishing house; that house may accept or refuse it; or he may, without offering it, decide that it can be launched on the American market, and he may cross over to the other side and publish it.
> Now, why should this Parliament interfere by saying: "You shall be limited in the right of disposing of your own property; you will be limited because if you go across the border to print your book you may to-morrow have a demand from a publisher to print a Canadian edition." There is no use blinking the fact that these clauses are incorporated in this Act to allow the Canadian printer or publisher a right to publish a book of a Canadian author which has achieved some success on the other side. If it were a failure, I suppose there would be no difficulty. But by what right should this Parliament hamper and restrict the liberty of the author in favour of the publisher and printer? I am in favour of giving Canadian printer and publisher all the possible advantages that may accrue to him regularly under our laws; but not at the expense of his neighbour. I do not see that the Canadian publisher or printer has any right to a mortgage of any kind upon the property of his neighbour; yet this is what we are giving him by these sections 13, 14, and 15. I want the Canadian author to go absolutely unhampered, and I want this Parliament, if it can do it by my vote, to accept the principle of the Berne Convention, which declares that when a state enters that convention, any one of its nationals—to use an expression we discussed lately, and to which we gave the legal sense—is to be allowed to publish his book, and to have the help of that constituency represented by the countries that accept the Berne Convention. For that reason I think clauses 13, 14, and 15 contain a vicious principle. The Minister of Justice has expressed the hope that he may successfully negotiate Canada into the Berne Convention, and have the United States accept these as reciprocal clauses. I am convinced that if we adopt that principle the Minister of Justice will come next Session and dclare his utter failure. But, as I cannot admit the prnciple on which he wants to rest, I am not ready to vote for these clauses.

Honourable gentlemen, I know that the Commons have put in a half-way clause, but that half-way clause does not change the principle. It still allows the Canadian author to be subject to the will of a stranger to his work—printer or publisher. It puts him under his absolute rule. I believe that the brains of Canadian authors should not be thus shackled. I deem them to be free men, and I want them to hold to their full property. It is for this reason that I refused to accept the present Bill in this Chamber, thinking that the Senate of Canada would recognize the freedom of Canadian authors and restore to them their full rights.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Would the honourable gentleman answer my question? The argument seems to be fairly convincing, but I would like him to differentiate the treatment that it was proposed to give to the authors by these clauses which have been ejected from the Bill, from the treatment which we give a man who owns a patent. As I understand the patent law, if I patent an article I must manufacture it in this country within a certain time, or I lose my control over it. Now, what is the difference? Each is the product of a man's brain, and the product, perhaps, of a genius who has laboured for years and years on it; but for the life of me I cannot see the distinction between the two.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The patentee obtains, under a universal convention throughout the world, the very same advantages that the author gets under the Berne Convention. He is protected against infringement throughout the countries in which he obtains the privilege to operate or sell his patent.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: On condition that he manufactures it in the country?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Oh, yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, the licensing clauses are the same.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, there is that to be said; but I surmise that we shall not commercialize the brain-work of the author.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Oh, but we do: he commercializes it himself, when he offers it for sale.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is why he has objection to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He does, but he stands, it seems to me, in a different position from the one who manufactures an article for sale in a commercial market.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The author brings forth the product of his brain. He must, in communicating it to the world, print it in a certain form; and it is when it comes to that form that you decree that he is no more the master of his own brain work. For this reason it seems that the author who publishes purely an intellectual work with the object of propagating his ideas, should be in a totally different situation from that of the ordinary inventor who turns his ideas into a commercial article, or other form, primarily for his commerce.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But the honourable gentleman forgets that inventions are sometimes not commercial at all; that they are sometimes most wondrous creations of imagination, as in literary work.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If the honourable member from Hamilton and others in this honourable House will allow me, I will suggest that there is another answer to his question. He has asked why the author should not be put on the same footing as the inventor.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: That is the question.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The answer is because the same question does not arise. It is not a matter of disadvantage for a patentee to be obliged to manufacture in Canada. He has the right to have his patent in the United States and in Canada, and he is obliged to manufature in both countries where he has the privilege. He does not complain. But here, on account of our neighbourhood with the United States, and the larger population in that country, the authors claim that they are put to a great disadvantage if they are forced to adopt that restriction. That is the difference between the two.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I do not often hear the honourable gentleman make such an inconclusive answer, because if a man has an invention and patents it in Canada and the United States, if he manufactures it in the United States, and does not within a given time manufacture it in Canada, though he may certainly bring it into Canada, yet any person else may make it in Canada. Now, as I follow it, the author is in the same position. Under this law the author may publish his book in the United States, and if he does not publish his book in Canada some person else may publish it here, but he may bring it into Canada if he chooses, if he does not make a bargain with the other man. As I follow the law, if a publisher in Canada refuses to make a contract with the author, satisfactory to the author, and the author declines accept the publisher's offer, there is nothing to prevent the author from bringing the book into Canada as manufactured in another country.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Subject to appeal to the Minister.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Where there is not a bargain made between the publisher in Canada and the author, is there anything that prohibits the author from bringing his work in and selling it in competition with a work printed in Canada? That is exactly the position of a patent.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: In that case he has to get a publisher who is willing to accept his price, and if they cannot agree they have to go to the Minister. That is the burden. Of course, after going to the Minister, it is quite proper for both to refuse to go on, but the difficulty is that the author is under an obligation of either agreeing to pay the price of the publisher or accepting the price of the Minister.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON Would not an author be in a much worse position if we enacted the same clauses in the Copyright Act as are in the Patent Act?

Hon. Mr BEAUBIEN: Will my honourable friend allow me?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I want an answer to that question: will not the author be in a much worse position if we interjected into this Act the exact clauses which are in the Patent Act?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will my honourable friend allow me to attempt an answer to his very skillful question, and it is this—

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I do not know that it is skillful.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yes, it is skillful. I think I have the right to pay you that compliment, anyway.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I do not mind the compliment.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Well, there it is. If you hold that copyright is the same as patent right, in my humble judgment you are right.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I do say so.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: But will you allow me to make this distinction: whereas copyright, which is not meant to deal with commerce, may touch commerce—as, for instance, you may pass from a book of philosophy to a directory—on the other hand, the patent law, is intended for commerce; although, mind you, there is also a border zone of that law that touches on the work of the brain.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: You may pass from a wireless machine to a pitchfork.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have not made the definition: the whole world has made it, because the patent law is different from copyright law over the whole world. There must be a reason for this, and I suggest that the reason I have given may be the right one.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It may be.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Question.

The Senate divided on the proposed amendment of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, which was agreed to on the following division:

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at 8 o'clock.

The Senate again went into Committee on Bill 24, an Act to amend the Copyright Act, 1921.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 2—application of provision regarding licenses and importations:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I ask what now is the position of section 2, Mr. Chairman:

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: Part of the section has been struck out. It now reads:

2. Sections thirteen, fourteen, fifteen and twenty-seven of the Copyright Act, 1921, are hereby repealed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I move that clause 2 be struck out and the following substituted therefor, namely, the section which was previously stricken out; that is to say:

2. Sections thirteen, fourteen, fifteen and twenty-seven of the Copyright Act, 1921, shall not apply to any work the author of which is a British subject, other than a Canadian citizen, or the subject or citizen of a country which has adhered to the Convention and the additional Protocol thereto set out in the second schedule to the said Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I wonder if the better form would not be to reconsider section 2 of the Bill, since we have passed upon it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The only point in my mind would be whether there could be a reconsideration at this stage. The Committee rose and reported to the House, and the Bill has under a motion been recommitted to the Committee.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: For reconsideration?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: For any change that may be suggested.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not insisting.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Section 2 as reported by the Committee to the House is now part and parcel of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We went into Committee and did some work on the Bill, making some amendments.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We considered and reported upon the whole Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I thought that in going back to the Committee we simply wiped out what we had done after the Bill left the Committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would point out to my honourable friend that the report of the Committee was adopted by the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not insist. I simply had my doubts about the matter.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Mr. Chairman, I beg to move an amendment to the amendment suggested by the honourable gentleman from Calgary (Hon Sir James Lougheed):

That section 2 of the Bill be struck out and the following substituted:

Sections thirteen, fourteen, fifteen and twenty-seven of the Copyright Act, 1921, shall apply only to a subject or citizen of a country which has not adhered to the Convention and the additional Protocols thereto set out in the second schedule to the said Act.

The effect is simply to strike out of the section the words "other than a Canadian citizen."

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: I second that motion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Why does not my honourable friend move an amendment to the amendment? To strike out the words "other than a Canadian citizen?"

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I am perfectly agreeable to that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Because the proposed amendment of the honourable gentleman would alter the whole clause.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: No—begging the honourable gentleman's pardon; I have adopted the language of the section, but stricken out the words "other than a Canadian citizen."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is the only alteration the honourable gentleman proposes?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: That is the only change.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I ask my honourable friend, would it be possible for such a person to get copyright in Canada if we passed this Bill and Canada adheres to the Convention?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: My best advice is that it would be.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I doubt that, because, it seems to me that if Canada grants copyright to anyone, it is granted under the Berne Convention, as we become members of the Berne Convention. If that be the case, the proposed amendment would be senseless.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: No, I think not. I think we can bring ourselves within the terms of the Berne Convention by dealing only with people who are in the Convention. It does not matter how we deal with outsiders.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then those within the Berne Convention will have the right, and they have the right under the Act as it came from the House of Commons, to secure copyright without the printing clauses being imposed upon them.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: My proposed amendment imposes the printing clauses on anybody inside the Berne Convention.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then can such a person get copyright in Canada?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: He can.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Absolutely, under the terms of the Convention. The nationals of any country in the Convention, as I take it, can get copyright.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He is a member of the Berne Convention, and by virtue of that he makes application for copyright in Canada.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: That is all right.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: What would be the effect of the amendment to the amendment?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: As I understand it, the effect of it would be to free the Canadian of any disability.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Canadians would be included in the Berne Convention and would not be subject to the licensing clause. At the same time our position in relation to the United States would be changed, because the licensing clause would apply to them. That is the way I understand the amendment to the amendment, and if I am not right I wish to be corrected. In other words the disability—if we call the licensing clause a disability—is removed from Canadians, but still applies against United States citizens.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: In other words, we maintain reciprocity—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of illwill.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: If you like, or bad treatment if you like.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Reciprocal treatment.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Reciprocal ill-treatment is maintained at the border, but our own countrymen are liberated.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I venture to say that this will meet with the most vigorous opposition on the part of Canadian authors, because it will result in reprisals being adopted by the United States, and that is what they have sought to avoid ever since copyright was discussed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I desired to know to what extent this proposal would be workable from the departmental point of view, and I am just informed that it is workable, and the representative of the authors, who is here, says they will be satisfied if the sub-amendment is adopted by the Senate.

The proposed amendment of Hon. Mr. Willoughby was negatived: yeas, 15; nays, 26.

The proposed amendment of Hon. Sir James Lougheed was agreed to on the same division reversed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Now I move my amendment to clause 5.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: Hon. Mr. Dandurand moves that clause 5 of Bill 24 be amended by adding thereto the following words:

Unless before that date an Order in Council is passed fixing a later date.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department is afraid that the time perhaps is a little too short, and asks power to extend it by Order in Council, because they will have to open negotiations with the United States.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: May I suggest to the leader of the House that it might be done in another way which I think has precedent in the Old Country, although I do not speak with certainty as to that—that we should fix a more remote date, say the 1st of January next, with the proviso that it may be proclaimed at an earlier date.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend simply reverses the order. We say the 1st day of July, and, if it is deemed impossible to close negotiations with the United States, extend the time by Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It might be for ten years, unless there is a limit.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: You did not proclaim it at all in 1921.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If you adopt the suggestion of the honourable gentleman from Moose Jaw (Hon. Mr. Willoughby), you overcome the difficulty by fixing a maximum time and taking the right to proclaim it earlier if the negotiations are concluded.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, we may say the 1st of January unless sooner proclaimed by Order in Council.

The proposed amendment of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, amended as suggested, was agreed to.

Section 5 was agreed to.

The Bill was reported as amended.

The amendments were concurred in, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

PATENT BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

The Senate again went into Committee on Bill 20, an Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to patents of invention.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. Bradbury in the Chair.

On section 7—who may obtain patents:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We had left sections 7 and 8 to be reconsidered; that is, to be examined, in fact, because we were not all satisfied with the policy of extending to two years the time within which an inventor has the right to make application for a patent. There is a division of opinion on this question outside of this Chamber, among people who follow the work of the Patent Office. As it is debatable, I am ready to acept the view of the House if it seems to be somewhat clear on this point. My honourable friend wanted some delay to express finally his opinion. I am ready to receive it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that I had the opportunity to-day of discussing with the Commissioner of Patents the sections that have been held over, and after that discussion I came to the conclusion that I would not offer any further criticism of the Patent Act. I have lost all confidence in my knowledge of patents, and therefore I am prepared, personally, to accept the sections. My honourable friend from Middleton was likewise impressed. I think he raised the same objection that I did.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I am disposed to accept the Bill as it is now.

Sections 7, 8 and 19 were agreed to.

On section 50—patent not to affect a previous purchaser:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is a motion for a small change to make this section agree with sections 7 and 8. It is to strike out, in line 14, the words "with the consent or allowance of the inventor thereof."

Section 50 as amended, was agreed to.

On sections 57 and 58—register of attorneys: patent agent or attorney:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is the explanation which I have from the Department on these clauses:

> These clauses are simply for the protection of the public. Frequently complaints are received in the Patent Office that so-called patent attorneys have taken money without rendering any service, and redress is asked for, which the Office is powerless to give. The Office has referred such complaints to the postal authorities, as this business is generally carried on through the mails, but without much result. If these clauses were passed, they would enable the Commissioner, on such complaints being established, to discipline the unscrupulous practitioners by depriving them of the right to practice before the Patent Office. Similar provision is found in the Patent Laws of the more important countries.
> Frequently members of the Canadian Bar wish to prosecute applications for patents before the United States Patent Office. They cannot do so without being registered as patent attorneys in that Office. Difficulty is experienced in obtaining this registration, and it is granted only on the personal request of the Canadian Commissioner to the U. S. Commissioner. If the system of registration were established such as these Clauses would provide, this difficulty would be removed, as registration in the U. S. Office would be granted on the production of a certificate of registration in Canada. The registration in the Canadian Office would be made in accordance with regulations to be made by the Governor in Council. Members of the Bar would be registered on request, and probably signing as attorney any document filed in the Patent Office would be deemed a request.

Sections 57 and 58, 61 and 62, were agreed to.

On section 69—notice of appeal:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This section seemed to be somewhat obscure or involved, and it was suggested that it should be recast. I move that the present clause be struck out, and replaced by the following:

69. Whenever an appeal to the Exchequer Court from the decision of the Commissioner is permitted under this Act, notice of his decision shall be mailed by the Commissioner by registered letter addressed to the interested parties or their respective agents, and the appeal shall be taken within three months from the date of mailing of such notice unless herein otherwise expressly provided.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I venture to suggest that this time should be extended to provide for any oversight in the receipt of the notice. It will be observed that the three months run from the posting of the letter in question. Now, possibly a very important letter might be lost, and the three months period is arbitrarily fixed. I think it would be improved by adding some such words as "except the time is otherwise extended by the Commissioner," and let him exercise his discretion. If there be evidence that the letter was not duly received, application might be made to the Commissioner to extend the time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would suggest the words "except otherwise extended, in the discretion of the Minister." It would then read as follows:

And the appeal shall be taken within three months from the date of mailing of such notice except otherwise extended, in the discretion of the Minister, and unless herein otherwise expressly provided.

Section 69, as amended, was agreed to.

Hon. G. V. WHITE: In regard to section 22, I beg leave to move:

That section 22 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

22. (1) In case of conflicting applications the Commissioner shall determine the right of the applicants to receive a patent or patents for the invention involved.

(2) Any decision of the Commissioner under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

I may say that this is the same amendment as was moved when the Bill was under discussion in another place. The present clause relating to conflicting applications is the clause which was contained in the old Bill, and when the present Bill first came down it had a clause in it as follows—it was 21 in the Bill as first presented in another place:

21. In case of conflicting applications for any patent the applicant shall be notified by the Commissioner that the question is one for the decision of the Exchequer Court, and no further proceedings shall be had or taken by the Commissioner concerning the application until the judgment is produced deciding which applicant is entitled to the patent.

It would seem to me that the present clause is somewhat cumbersome, and it is felt by the public generally, I think, or those interested in patents, that the Commissioner, who ic qualified to decide on these matters, should be the first party to decide as to who is entitled to the patent. Of course, an appeal to the Exchequer Court is provided for in the event of the applicant not abiding by the decision of the Commissioner. As the law stands at present, it means that each applicant shall appoint an arbitrator, and the Commissioner shall also appoint an arbitrator. That seems to be a more or less cumbersome method of dealing with conflicting applications, and I think that the amendment which I have submitted would simplify the matter very considerably.

I may say I have had a letter from the Engineering Institute of Canada, which is a very important body, and they feel that the Commissioner is fully qualified to deal with these matters. I understand that there are very few conflicting cases in comparison with the number of applications and patents granted; they do not amount to more than about one-half of one per cent. It seems to me, therefore, that the amendment I propose would be a much simpler method of dealing with conflicting cases.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If you struck out section 22 you would not need those other words at all. If section 22 were struck out, would not the matter be determined by the Commissioner under the other sections?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under his general powers.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The officers of the Department, who have the greatest experience in administration, oppose most strenuously the suggested amendment of my honourable friend from Pembroke (Hon. G. V. White). The Commissioner has prepared a memorandum explaining the reasons for the opposition which they offer to this amendment. It is as follows:

This amendment while apparently simple in its effect would in reality give the Commissioner a power and duty much greater and heavier than any of those given or imposed on him by the Bill.

Conflicting applications mean those in which different applicants are at the same time applying for a patent for the same invention.

The Bill makes no change in the present law in this regard. Under its terms, in such a case the matter is referred by the Commissioner to a Board of Arbitrators composed of three members, each applicant appointing one and the Commissioner appointing the third. The arbitrators determine which of the applicants is the first inventor and consequently entitled to the patent which is granted according to their award.

Under the Exchequer Court Act that tribunal has jurisdiction in the premises, so that the parties have the option of proceeding either by arbitration or before the Court. The latter course is generally adopted now having been found more expeditious and less expensive.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Without the intention of the arbitrators?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. But I think it will be found that the arbitrators are at times very necessary, and that the clause should remain, because contending claimants may be in British Columbia or in Nova Scotia and have their witnesses at hand, and may therefore agree upon two arbitrators in their own locality, who would immediately appoint the third arbitrator, and the difference could be settled then and there.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How does the applicant get his case before the Exchequer Court unless it first comes before the Commissioner and is refused by him or referred by him to the Exchequer Court?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If any one of the claimants lodges his petition in the Exchequer Court, the Exchequer Court has the preference.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGGHEED: Is that provided for in this Bill or in the Exchequer Court Act?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It has been the practice of the Exchequer Court to receive those petitions. (Reading):

The issues raised in these proceedings are most complicated and difficult to determine both in law and in fact.

Take for instance such an invention as that involved in the Automatic Telephone System recently installed in the Government buildings. Such inventions are as a rule acquired by wealthy corporations before the patents for the same are granted. Where two of these powerful corporations find that they are in conflict, that is, both applying for a patent for the same invention, a most keenly contested action to obtain the patent results.

The inventions involved are generally made by scientists after years of labour and to determine which of the rival inventors first brought the invention to the stage in which it is presented to the Patent Office necessitates an almost interminable examination of scientific witnesses and lengthy arguments of eminent counsel.

If the amendment were adopted the Patent Office would have to be made a duplicate of the Exchequer Court. The Commissioner would require the qualifications of a judge of that Court, would have to be given the same standing, his duties not being less in importance and he would have to be provided with an equal salary, to which he would probably not object. Every officer that is necessary for the one tribunal would have to be provided for the other. The expense of this unnecessary duplication must be at once apparent.

The amendment would also add to the expense of the litigants as the evidence taken before the Commissioner would have to be taken over again in the Exchequer Court.

Another objection is that it would enable patent attorneys with no legal qualifications to appear to the detriment of their clients before a tribunal of very high jurisdiction.

It may be said that as the Bill gives the Commissioner many judicial powers and duties, why not add this one?

The answer is, the judicial powers and duties given and imposed on him by the Bill are comparatively simple and may be exercised and discharged without the legal machinery that is necessary to provide for a formally conducted court of justice.

Until sometime in the early '90's the Commissioner of Patents had judicial powers in proceedings for the impeachment of patents for non-manufacture or through importation of the imported inventions. Several cases in which very important inventions were involved were tried before him and the results were so unsatisfactory to all concerned that the jurisdiction was transferred to the Exchequer Court. On one occasion to carry out the law, the Minister of Justice had to leave his Office and sit with the Commissioner of Patents. Experience has shown that it is advisable where possible to separate administrative from judicial functions.

It is the intention to carry out in the Regulations some of the ideas contained in the proposed amendment particularly in the way of clearly defining and narrowing the issue, that is, settling upon the actual parts of the inventions involved that are common to both and consequently in conflict. It is hoped that by so doing the proceedings can be simplified and in many cases a settlement effected without the necessity of the parties resorting to the Exchequer Court or a Board of Arbitration.

The amendment if accepted would introduce the practice of the United States Office. A persistent effort in this direction has been made ever since this Bill was first introduced. A similar amendment was made in the Commons and after discussion was rejected.

Many Canadians who have had experience in the U. S. Office in this connection have related the same to the Canadian Patent Office. They have found the U. S. Practice more lengthy, expensive and objectionable in every respect and not to be compared for expedition and economy with our Exchequer Court.

In the opinion of the Patent Office these matters can best be dealt with by that tribunal but there is no objection to giving the parties, as the Bill does the option of proceeding by arbitration if they so desire.

Hon. G. V. WHITE: Honourable gentlemen, I understand that this is the practice in force also in Great Britain. In the event of conflicting applications no outside arbitrators are brought in.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department is under the impression that whenever the issue is of any magnitude or importance it is referred by the law officers of the Department to the Court.

Hon. Mr. WHITE: There is a law officer in the Patents Department of the British Government and there is recourse to the Court, as in the United States.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But what real objection has my honourable friend to the Exchequer Court being utilized? It is in the same city as the Commissioner. There can be no economy in the change proposed.

Hon. Mr. WHITE: I have no objection to the Exchequer Court, but the danger seems to be in the more or less cumbersome method of appointing arbitrators. The applicant has the right to name his arbitrator. They are outside men. Are not the officers of the Department better able to adjust the matter, being more conversant with the invention or the application. I would like to know also how many cases of conflicting applications have been referred to the Exchequer Court. What is the percentage?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Generally speaking, the majority of cases are being dealt with now by the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Mr. WHITE: Would it not be much simpler to place the matter first in the hands of the Commissioner, doing away with the arbitrators? Then, if the applicants did not agree on the Commissioner's decision, they would have recourse to the Court.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But you would have then a double trial—one before the Commissioner and another before the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Mr. WHITE: But do you not have the same now, with your arbitrations?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; because there is an option given to the claimant. If they decide it is to their advantage to appoint an arbitrator, with the Commissioner appointing the third, they may do so. I have cited a case arising in which all the witnesses are at a great distance from the capital, and which it would certainly be more economical to settle in the locality. It is the inquiry and the evidence taken that are most costly.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Perhaps the Commissioner could explain how this works out. Suppose A and B are both applicants for the same patent, and A wants arbitration while B wants to go to the Court. What happens then?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: While the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) is on his feet let me ask him: can the Commissioner make a reference under such a condition as is mentioned by my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. Mr. W. B. Ross), to the Exchequer Court? There should be that power.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that cases have arisen in which one claimant wanted to go before arbitrators and the other wanted to have the matter referred to the Exchequer Court. It was the Exchequer Court that took unto itself the authority to deal with it.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Where is that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would that be under the Exchequer Court Act?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: No, it would not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It should be.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: It is just the appeals that this Bill provides shall go there.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not the Exchequer Court Act before me, but power is given to the Court to deal with patent matters in which a conflict arises.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: No, it does not cover that.

Hon. Mr. WHITE: If my honourable friend will permit me, I think there is an amendment to the Exchequer Court Act, Chapter 17, 3-4 George V, Statutes of Canada, 1913.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: What does it provide for?

Hon. Mr. WHITE: It is just a short Act, with one or two amending sections.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, Chapter 17 simply transfers the jurisdiction of the Governor in Council to the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My impression is that the Exchequer Court lacks the general power to hear appeals of the Patent Office unless provision is made in the Patent Act. A perusal of this Bill will show that leave is given to appeal to the Exchequer Court by several sections—for instance, section 48:

This section shall be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

And take section 41:

Any decision of the Commissioner under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

And under section 39 any decision shall be subject to appeal. So the appeal seems to be sufficiently confined to those particular sections.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Section 83 of the Exchequer Court Act is extraordinary, because it tends to state a thing negatively that ought to be stated positively. No man has an appeal unless there is a statute expressly giving it to him. How do you oust the arbitrators and give the jurisdiction exclusively to the Exchequer Court? The Court cannot take it upon itself. The Court must get the power by statute.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: As a matter of fact, the Exchequer Court has asserted its right to deal with those conflicts when any such case comes before them.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: But it is a statutory Court, and I do not see that it is in any better position than the arbitrators are. You could provide that, in the event of either or any of the parties to the arbitration deciding to go to the Exchequer Court, the Exchequer Court should be seized of jurisdiction to hear the application.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would suggest that we proceed as far as the third reading, and that the proposed amendment of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. White) be allowed to stand until we have the opinion of the Commissioner after consultation with the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: There may be something that covers the point I have raised, but I have not yet been able to find it.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: While you are dealing with that clause, do you not think it would be wise to provide that the Exchequer Court shall have the normal jurisdiction, but that if both parties agree they may have arbitration? That to my mind would make it quite clear.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Section 23 of the Exchequer Court Act provides:

23. The Exchequer Court shall have jurisdiction as well between subject and subject as otherwise,—

(a) in all cases of conflicting applications for any patent of invention, or for the registration of any copyright, trade mark or industrial design;

(b) in all cases in which it is sought to impeach or annul any patent of invention, or to have any entry in any register of copyrights, trade marks or industrial designs made, expunged, varied or rectified; and,

(c) in all other cases in which a remedy is sought respecting the infringement of any patent of invention, copyright, trade mark or industrial design.

Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: There is a difference between the drafting of that clause and clause 21. In clause 21 it is quite clear that the privileged jurisdiction is that of the court, but it is not so in section 23.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: At all events, the Exchequer Court has exercised that jurisdiction.

However, I will have the matter examined again by the Department, and, if necessary, also by the Department of Justice, and at the third reading we may bring in another clause. I would ask my honourable friend if he insists upon his amendment.

Hon. Mr. WHITE: No.

The amendment was withdrawn.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported as amended.

COLD STORAGE BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—PROGRESS REPORTED

The Senate again went into Committee on Bill 9, an Act to amend the Cold Storage Act.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Hon. Mr DANDURAND: I would ask Mr. Ruddick to come to the floor of the House.

The other evening objection was taken to this Bill because it authorizes the Minister of Agriculture to bonus co-operative societies or municipalities.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does this extend the present Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It restricts the operation of the Act, which says:

The Governor in Council may enter into contracts with any persons for the construction, equipment and maintenance in good and efficient working order of public cold storage warehouses.

On the 26th of May, 1919, an Order in Council was passed restricting the bonuses to municipalities.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Had they authority by statute to cut down the former classes?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am under the impression that it was under the War Measures Act, which was still in operation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: However, the statute is now limited to the specific class mentioned in paragraph 2 of section 1.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Considerable criticism was directed to the bonusing of co-operative societies to the exclusion of incorporated or privately-owned cold storage plants, by the honourable gentleman from Regina (Hon. Mr. Laird), who moved in amendment to add the words: "or incorporated companies." I may say that I postponed the further consideration of the Bill because I had no authority from the Minister of Agriculture to accept the proposed amendment. After consulting with him, I may state that he cannot accept the proposed amendment, because his idea is to help institutions that are mainly organized without the primary object of gain, and because privately-owned cold storage plants have been considerably helped under the old law. He wants to direct his attention to co-operative societies which may help districts where there are no cold storage plants. As my honourable friend from Regina is not here, I will not press the Bill, but will ask that the Committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I was not here the other evening when this Bill was under discussion, and I may say frankly that I am very much surprised at the attitude taken by the Government in the matter. Just a year ago we passed a Bill in this House after weeks of Committee work, and one of the very objectionable features of the old legislation was the bonusing of cold storage systems. I do not know that you improve the situation by refusing to continue or further extend assistance to private companies. I do not know of any cold storage business in Canada that is not operated for gain. If a co-operative cold storage company is established in any one of our districts it is established by a group of gentlemen who get together because they believe they see a way of making money out of it; otherwise they would not go into it. Consequently this is class legislation of the very worst kind, and I must take serious objection to it. It took the Department years to realize that the people of Canada had absolutely no control or interest in the cold storage systems which had received assistance in excess of $700,000 of the public money. The Minister seems to want to get carte blanche, almost, to deal with co-operative societies.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend must not forget that this is restrictive legislation. Under the Act as it is, he can give assistance to anybody.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: No, that was withdrawn by Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The Order in Council is of no avail now.

Hno. Mr. DANDURAND: If it was issued under the War Measures Act; it is no longer in existence.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I think I could in a few moments lay my hand upon a letter from the Deputy Minister of Agriculture pointing out to the Minister that under the old Act they had no control of these cold storage systems, and recommending the discontinuance of any further subsidies.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does not my honourable friend find some virtue in the second clause of this Bill?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I think it is as well, perhaps, not to go on with the Bill now, because I think the honourable Minister will find considerable opposition to it. As far as I am concerned, I confess frankly that I am going to oppose it as strongly as I can. The principle is vicious and absolutely wrong.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Would the honourable gentleman say in what particular it is vicious?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: This granting of subsidies to co-operative or any other companies for creating cold storage systems is vicious; it is class legislation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then my honourable friend is opposed to any more grants being given to cold storage institutions?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Absolutely.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: When this Bill comes up again, perhaps the leader of the House will be able to give an answer to the inquiry of which I gave notice to-day, as to whether the Government intends bringing in an Act in reference to cold storage warehouses. That subject was dealt with in a Bill last Session, and the Minister said that it could not be taken up in the House of Commons Session, but that he intended to bring in Bill this Session which would probably cover most of the points mentioned. The Bill passed had to do with the inspection of food in cold storage warehouses; and it was found that very little inspection was made. The Department had power to provide regulations, but regulations had not been passed. If the Minister could let us know whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in such an Act, we would be in a better position to discuss this Bill.

The motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand was agreed to, and progress was reported.

TRADE MARK AND DESIGN BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 21, an Act to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act.

Hon. Mr. Watson in Chair.

Sections 1, 2 and 3 were agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, May 18, 1923.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE

MOTION

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved:

That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY RATES FOR THE MARITIME PROVINCES

MOTION—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from May 8 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald:

That in the opinion of this House the railway freight rates now effective on consignments from the Maritime Provinces are proportionately higher than those effective in regard to consignments from the western provinces and seriously handicap the industries of the Maritime Provinces and should be substantially reduced, and that the Government should take steps forthwith to cause such reduction.

Hon. P. C. MURPHY: Honourable gentlemen, Senator Fowler is not here. He notified me that he was not going to speak on this motion, and I desire the permission of the House to say a few words.

This question is worthy of much more attention than was given to it at the time of its introduction by the honourable member from Shediac (Hon. Mr. McDonald). It is a question that vitally affects the Maritime Provinces; in fact, it is impossible for them to go on in an economic way unless some relief is given in regard to freight rates. I was surprised the other day to hear the leader of the Government say that he was glad the honourable gentleman who introduced the motion had not moved it, as he did not see how it could be otherwise than consistent for gentlemen from the West to move for reduced freight rates, or for gentlemen from the central sections to move that we pay them for sending merchandise through the canals, and so on. From the standpoint of this House, honourable gentlemen, I think no more important subject could come before it, and with regard to the jurisdiction of the House and the Government to deal with subjects of this kind, I would say that in dealing with them they are not only fully within their rights, but within their duty.

We, as Senators, are the guardians of the rights of the minorities; we represent subdivisions where our interests are identical. There are 24 members from the Maritime Provinces, whose interests are supposed to be identical; there are 24 from Quebec, 24 from Ontario and 24 from the West; showing that the Fathers of Confederation had some motive for dividing the country in this way, so that the different interests might be represented, and that justice might be done to the various sections.

Now, the resolution of my honourable friend from Shediac was buttressed by a voice from Ontario, and it was gladsome tidings, because it is very seldom we get sympathy from the central provinces. The voice of the Ex-Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Reid) was like one crying in the wilderness, but at least it showed us that he had a streak of common sympathy. I wish the Ex-Minister had seen the light earlier than he did, because before he was buffetted and handicapped by the Intercolonial being put under the Railway Commission he could have done something, when the road was in the hands of the Government.

Another reason why this matter can properly be referred to the Government is that last year, in the Suspension Act the Crow's Nest Pass rates were lowered, by about 50 per cent when the Government took the matter out of the hands of the Railway Commission, suspended the parliamentary order, and put the old C.P.R. agreement into effect.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The honourable gentleman ought to remember that the Railway Commission had nothing to do with that. The Act of Parliament fixed the rates of the Crow's Nest Pass.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I quite agree with that. Those rates were fixed by Act of Parliament as a war measure, but they were put in the hands of the Railway Commission which was to determine what the rates should be.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: No, they were only suspended for three years.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I quite understand that, and I think the Act of Parliament took the suspension off, and in consequence millions of dollars were lost while the Intercolonial Railway rates were maintained at a high level, which has virtually strangled the agricultural, fishing and industrial interests of the Maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Don't interfere with our rates: go on with your own.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I do not want to interfere with your rates. The action of the Government may have been justice to you, for the West has been penalized with regard to rates, but it must be remembered that the West had no special guarantee, even impliedly, given to them on entering Confederation, while I contend that we had. With the permission of the House, I want to read a few extracts from the discussions which led up to Confederation. I may say for the information of the House, though it is probably known to many of you who have gone into this question, that the reports of the discussions leading up to Confederation are very sparse; every meeting was practically held behind closed doors. The only records we have are contained in this little book, which is probably the best extant, by Edward Whelan, who was one of the delegates from my own province. Sir Joseph Pope also has some records from the Secretary of the Conference, that were found among Sir John Macdonald's papers. There is another book by Cauchon, of Quebec, who was also a delegate, but which does not amount to very much.

The matter of the Intercolonial Railway had been discussed for years, as a measure to enable the older provinces to bring in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island. I may say that Prince Edward Island would not accept the terms offered in 1867, but was forced by financial circumstances to enter Confederation in 1873. In passing, I may say that sentimentally and patriotically it might be all right, but we far as the Maritime provinces were concerned, it was a big mistake.

Here is what Sir John Macdonald said:

> I don't hesitate to say that, with respect to the Intercolonial Railway, it is understood by the people of Canada that it can only be built as a means of political union for the Colonies. It cannot be denied that the Railway, as a commercial enterprise, would be of comparatively little commercial advantage to the people of Canada. Whilst we have the St. Lawrence in summer, and the American ports in time of peace, we have all that is requisite for our purposes. We recognize, however, the fact that peace may not always exist.

I may say, in passing, that the Intercolonial was built as a military road, and is therefore not up to the standard as to curves and grades; hence it is very difficult to haul goods over it. Sir John A. Macdonald continued:

> We wish to feel greater security—to know that we can have assistance readily in the hour of danger. In the case of a union, this Railway must be a national work.

We hear talk on the other side about the capital charges, and the question is asked, "Was the interest ever paid on the capital charges?" I say it was never intended that interest should be paid on those capital charges. The road was built as a national work, as one of the terms of Confederation, and no interest charges were expected, any more than we were supposed to be strangled with freight rates that would stop us from dealing with the Upper Provinces altogether. Sir John went on:

> What will be the consequence to this city, prosperous as it is, from that communication? Montreal is at this moment competing with New York for the trade of the great West. Build the road and Halifax will soon become one of the great emporiums of the world. All the great resources of the West will come over the immense railways of Canada to the bosom of your harbour.

Hon. Mr. Galt said:

> If we are united we must have an Intercolonial Railway. I am an advocate of this great work, and it becomes an absolute necessity if a union of these Provinces is to take place at all.

Hon. Samuel L. Tilley, from New Brunswick, one of the fathers of Confederation, was a strong advocate of the Intercolonial Railway:

> Next alluding to the Intercolonial Railway project, he said that their feeling on this subject was: "We won't have this union unless you give us the railway." (Cheers.) It was utterly impossible we could have either a political or commercial union without it.

Now, here is what Hon. Wm. A. Henry, Attorney General of Nova Scotia, said on the subject:

The time has now arrived when we ought to have direct communication between Halifax and Quebec by railway, on a line not subject to foreign control, so that the inhabitants of our country may be able to visit the inhabitants of yours, without the necessity of going off British territory on their way.

Now, honourable gentlemen, you can see from these references to authenticated tradition, if I may so call it—and that is how we got the gospels of the New Testament—that in the discussions on Confederation it was laid down that in order to enable us to reach the markets of the central provinces we should have freight rates commensurate with our ability to send our goods in competition with those of the Upper Provinces. As honourable gentlemen know, the distances are very great. From Halifax to Montreal I think the distance is some 1,100 miles.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: 834.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Well, 834, and St. John is of course very much nearer; but, unless those provinces had freight rates that would enable them to compete with the industrial concerns of other provinces, they would probably never have entered Confederation at all, because our natural channels were with the Eastern States. As Maritime provinces, or even as separate provinces with our colonial status, we could no doubt have, as we had then, lower duties to the American market, and thus have been enabled to deal with that market, which is much nearer to us by rail and much cheaper by water.

Those railway rates have been maintained for 40 years, which shows the good faith of the Fathers of Confederation and their successors. They were intended to enable our manufacturers to compete in the upper provinces and send their goods to the West; but to-day that is an absolute impossibility. Such manufacturing industries as the Robb Engineering Company, which sprang up under those conditions, are now shut down; others are staggering on their feet to-day; and we have a half-dozen or a dozen others that are in such a position that if the rates are maintained they cannot go on. I submit that we have the same right to amelioration of those conditions, where strangulation is about to take place, as the West had to their Crow's Nest rate, which gave them the advantage, though perhaps the reduction gave them no more than justice.

To show how we are suffering on our freight hauls as compared with some others, take the rate on grain from Montreal to Fort William, 1,057 miles, 37½ cents per hundred pounds; Charlottetown to Montreal, 767 miles, 36½ cents, or a distance of about 50 per cent more at practically the same rate; Charlottetown to Halifax, only 238 miles, 20 cents for a little over a fifth of the distance of haul from Montreal to Fort William; yet the price is about two-thirds. Charlottetown to St. John, 231 miles, 20 cents; and this is where our export business goes in, to be handed over to the C.P.R., and the result of the transfer is that at the West St. John harbour, where it is shipped, the rate is 23 cents. That is for hauling freight 231 miles, the rate is a little over half of that paid from Montreal to Fort William, 1,037 miles. On coal, from Sydney to Charlottetown, 394 miles, the rate is 15 cents a hundred pounds, or $3 a ton, though we have been informed that it can be hauled nearly 2,000 miles on the Canadian National Railway for $9. You will see honourable gentlemen, that the equity in this matter is very lopsided. You can go through all the rates on agriculture, fisheries, and other goods, and find there are practically similar conditions. We cannot send our fish to the upper provinces, except a very small part of them, and then we have the Fordney tariff to contend with. We have to send our fish from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick chiefly to the New England States. The amount that goes to the Upper Provinces is only a moiety of the fish caught around our coast. Our potatoes are in the same position as our grain. Our grain does not go to the upper provinces, because we cannot compete with the western grain, but we are handicapped in our shipments to Montreal or Newfoundland, because often our freight has to be sent by rail to Sydney in winter time, when we are frozen up.

I want to read a letter from the Secretary of the Charlottetown Board of Trade to show how we are penalized and discriminated against, so far as the rates to Newfoundland and the Sydneys are concerned. This is addressed to a member of the Senate:

Charlottetown, May 9th, 1923.

Dear Senator:

With further reference to our conversation of a few days ago regarding freight rates.

In the spring of 1922, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine had a tariff in effect between Charlottetown and St. Johns, Nfld., in which the rates quoted were: oats, 18 cents per bushel; hay, $13 per ton; cattle, $12 per head; and last fall these rates were reduced to 15 cents, $10 and $10 respectively; but I have just been notified that for this season they have reverted to the rates in effect in the spring of 1922.

And it was not sufficient to penalize us in the railway rates, but they had to start up with the Merchant Marine, that great enterprize that was going to lift everybody out of the slough of despond. The letter continues:

These rates are exorbitant, as the rates from Halifax to Great Britain ports are only 25 cents per 100 pounds, or 8½ cents per bushel on oats, and $8 per ton on hay, and their own steamers have been carrying hay from Halifax to St. Johns all winter for $10 per ton.

Another point I wish you would look into is the rate on grain for export, as the rate from Charlottetown to West St. John, a distance of only about 220 miles, is 28 cents per 100 pounds, while the rate from Winnipeg to Port Arthur, a distance of 420 miles, is but 14 cents per hundred pounds.

Can you wonder that we are strangled, gentlemen, in the fact of these figures? As I say, it may be necessary to have reduced freight rates owing to conditions in the West, to enable the people there to do business, for I presume the West had a grievance; at least the wail of the West has been very pronounced this year, even in the fact of those rates, that are 50 per cent less than ours. I do not think that wail has added very much to the status of the country, with everybody getting into a condition of despair, and preventing immigration, and making those who had a good heart sit up and look very seriously at the situation, and this at a time when we were endeavouring to get immigrants, and paying out hundreds of thousands of dollars for that purpose.

However, we in the East have no jealousy of the West. Some of our best men have helped to build up that western country. The good of the West is our good: their benefit is our benefit. But we do plead, and I hope it will not be in vain, that the Government, by whatever means they choose, will give us some amelioration of our present condition. We need this if we are to live as part of a united Canada, and be contented, and try to build up a great Dominion, which was the intention of those who framed the Act of Confederation.

I think it was George Brown who said that the building of canals and railways was necessary to the furtherance of prosperity in this country. Let us consider that for a moment. The canals were built at a cost of $194,000,000 up to date. The net revenue from them has been about $25,000,000, leaving a net capital expenditure on the canals of about $170,000,000. Well, the Intercolonial Railway was intended to be in the same position as the canals; but what a difference, as regards usage by the upper provinces, between the canals and the Intercolonial. After all this vast expenditure on the canals, they are free of toll, and all your goods can be carried through them to the central provinces free of charge. The wheat of the West comes down through the canals free. But what benefit are the canals to the Maritime Provinces? Consider for a moment that we have paid our share of all this vast expenditure, our share of the cost of building those branch railway lines in the West, and our share of the expense of railway construction that was not contemplated at Confederation; and what benefit have we derived from that expenditure? The canals, with a capital expenditure equal to that of the Intercolonial Railway, are free to the western provinces, while the rates on the Intercolonial are such as to strangle the provinces by the sea. If matters are not arranged in some way so that rates will be lowered and we shall be enabled to deal with our brethern in the central provinces and the West in our agricultural, fishery and industrial concerns, the consequences will be serious.

I want to be fair, and I know every gentleman in this House wants to be fair, to every province in this Dominion. We are above the wail of the common electorate; we can say just what we think, and consider matters in a judicial way; and my honourable friend, the leader of the Government, can make proper representations to his friends in the Cabinet, so that they will see that we get such an improved condition of affairs as will help us to throw off the thraldom in which we are held at present.

So much for the Maritime provinces in general. Now I want to say a word for the province from which I have the honour to come. The railway in that province, unlike the Intercolonial, was built and paid for by ourselves. It was constructed in the beginning at a capital expenditure of $4,000,000—and it was cheaply built, too. To give the honourable gentleman an idea of how business-like men were in railway construction in those days, may I tell him that the contract was made with Schreiber & Burpee to build the line and to employ their own engineer, for which they were to receive a certain rate per mile. The result was that they went around hills where cuttings should have been made. On the line between Summerside and Charlottetown, it is said that a man on the back platform of the rear coach could shake hands with the engineer in going around some of the curves.

However, this road was handed over to the Dominion at Confederation free of charge: not a cent was credited to the province of Prince Edward Island under the terms of Confederation. There was one condition, however—that the road was to be properly maintained and operated by the Federal Government. That term was honoured more in the breach than in the observance, although when one considers the conditions existing at the time, it might have been worse. It has been worse in recent years; so much so that the engines have been allowed to run down to such an extent that during last winter, which was probably the most severe we have had in fifty years, there was not an engine on the road fit to tackle a snowdrift: every one that did broke down

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is it still a narrow-gauge road?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No. In pursuance of the terms of Confederation, it has been broad-gauged, the previous Government having started to fulfil the terms of Confederation, which for forty years had been entirely neglected. We were guaranteed continuous steam communication with the mainland, summer and winter; and for forty years we were denied that right, for which the Government have paid tribute, the last sum being $100,000. You can understand the situation of a people cut off for six or seven months in the year except for two little steamers, the Earl Grey, which went to Russia, and the Minto. These were their only means of communcation until the building of the Carberry, which is giving good satisfaction. The railway was narrow-gauge until two years ago, when a third rail was put in, which meant broad gauging from Borden to Charlottetown and to Summerside; and the road is to be broad-gauged this year to my own town of Tignish. We in Prince Edward Island are under the same handicaps as the people of the other Maritime provinces. After giving this railway free of charge—

Hon. Mr. WATSON: What is the mileage of railway on Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: About 300 miles. I can give it to you, with the exception of the mileage from Murray Harbour to Summerside. From Tignish to Charlottetown is 104 miles; from Charlottetown to Souris, 60 miles; then there is a branch from Mount Stewart to Georgetown, a distance of 28 miles, another from Cardigan to Montague, 6 miles, and the branch from Murray Harbour is, I think, about 50 miles. So the mileage is pretty close to 275 miles. I have not got the exact figures. The Murray Harbour branch was built by the Federal Government, and the rest of the road was built by the local Government before Confederation.

Now, last fall, for instance, because of the exorbitant freight rates to Montreal, a lot of our potatoes had to go to Cuba because there was no other outlet for them, and the steamers that came to take them from Prince Edward Island had to call at Charlottetown. From Tignish to Charlottetown is 104 miles, and the rate on potatoes for that distance was about 10 cents a bushel. You can understand what a handicap that would be at a time when 25 or 30 cents was being paid for potatoes. And this was in spite of the fact that there had been commodity rates for forty years, as it was understood there should be, although it was not so written in the bond.

There is another disadvantage which we suffer on the Prince Edward Island railway, and I hope Sir Henry Thornton will see his way clear to remedying the condition. Other parts suffer from the same disadvantage. In the summer we have what are usually known as picnics. In the old days a picnic was organized in my own town, and possibly a special train would be put on for it. The rate used to be $1 a mile, so the rate for a picnic to Charlottetown would be $105, and it was very seldom that those excursions did not turn in to the railway $1,500 to $2,000 for the day, and that without interfering with the ordinary traffic at all.

Two years ago, when the railway was transferred to this beautiful Railway Commission, that practice was discontinued; but, worse than that, the special rates to our agricultural exhibition in the city of Charlottetown, for which special trains had to be run in order to give accommodation, were discontinued; and whereas in the old days the road would clear up to $3,000, to-day on the train running down to Summerside, a distance of 67 miles, there will not be more than a dozen passengers. This is not only damaging to the rialway itself, but to the exhibition as an educational institution. I hope Sir Henry Thornton in his wisdom will see the importance of restoring those rates—the importance not only to the railway, but to the province and to the social and educational benefits to be derived from the exhibition.

Another thing that I want to bring to the attention of the House is the very great hardship which has resulted from the emasculation, as I might call it, of the Intercolonial Railway, which first ran from Halifax to Levis, and was later extended further because of the acumen of the Minister of Railways under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Blair, when the Drummond Counties Railway was bought. Imagine a trunk line of railroad ending in a field at Levis, within 150 miles of the metropolis of Canada. Results have shown the wisdom of the action taken, even if it had cost an extra million of dollars. But now what do we find? We find the road cut off at Rivière du Loup. That was never the intention, and that, to a certain extent is a violation of the Confederation compact. But the worst feature is that the railway is deporting, if I may use the word, our people from the Maritime Provinces—from Moncton, N.B., to Montreal, because by reason of cutting off the road at Rivière du Loup the auditor's office and other offices have less work to do. I am informed that at one week's notice 100 men employed by the Canadian National Railways at Moncton were ordered to report at Montreal. With all due deference to Sir Henry Thornton, I think that was not a very fair way of treating men who had built their homes and established themselves in Moncton. It was almost parallel to some of the evictions that took place in Ireland in the old days. Although an Englishman now, Sir Henry Thornton is of American extraction, and it seemed very strange to me when I read the article in the paper that a thing like that had occurred in Canada.

I think I have detained you long enough, honourable gentlemen, and I will close these few wandering remarks by appealing to my honourable friend to bring this matter to the attention of his colleagues, hoping that through them they may come to the attention of the Manager of the Government Railways, so that there may be some amelioration of the present condition. Otherwise, I shall be compelled to speak in the same manner as my honourable friend from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff) did the other day, and tell the leader of the Government that there is propaganda being carried on in the Maritime Provinces for secession from the Union. We of the Maritime Provinces are Britishers all through; but in the House at Halifax the other day one of the leaders got up and moved that a referendum be taken to find out whether the people of the province of Nova Scotia were in favour of secession from the Union. That is not new in Nova Scotia, however, because my good friend the Finance Minister some 20 odd years ago ran an election on that platform.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: 30 years ago.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: And unfortunately carried it. But the matter never went any further; I guess he was only playing to the gallery, and wanted not secession but accession to office. But this propaganda is going on at the present time, and you cannot blame the people for it, because conditions are such that they are driven almost to the margin of existence. When they get to that margin there is naturally going to be a revolution. When that time comes I hope my honourable friends will see the gravity of the situation, and will realize that three sovereign provinces are being strangled and cannot live under the conditions imposed upon them by the existing freight rates. The whole matter may be summed up in a few words: fix freight rates so that we can trade with you, and maintain the authenticated tradition of Confederation, by giving us what we expected we were going to get when we entered into it.

Hon. J. G. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, I have a good deal of sympathy for the resolution introduced by the honourable gentleman from Shediac (Hon. Mr. McDonald), but I think he made a mistake in saying in the resolution that freight rates in the East are higher than those in the West. I will not deny that the rates on certain particular articles that may be selected are higher in the East than they are in the West; but, taking them all round, the rates in the West are considerably higher than those in effect in the East. At the same time, as I say, I sympathize with my honourable friend who introduced the resolution and with the honourable member who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Murphy).

There is no doubt that both the East and the West—I mean the Far East and the Far West—suffer to a certain extent from excessive freight rates. This is due to our geographical position. We are a long way from the centre of Canada where the great portion of the population and the business of the country is situated. To my mind there is only one way by which we will get away from the disabilities imposed upon us by our geographical situation: that is to be allowed to trade with the natural markets that are near our door. To my mind there is nothing that will help the lower provinces as much as reciprocity with the United States. The United States, right at their door, have a large population who have the money to pay for everything they buy, and who want the products of the lower provinces. But, if I remember rightly, the last time the people had an opportunity of expressing their opinion on that subject, they did not look favourably upon reciprocity of trade with the United States: they even defeated the man who was largely responsible for reciprocity.

Hon. Mr. TURGEON: For all that we had a majority of the representatives of the lower provinces.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: My honourable friend states that there was a majority supporting reciprocity. I was under the impression that the majority was just a little the other way. I have not looked up the matter, and I take the word of my honourable friend, because I feel sure now that he is perfectly right. But it was largely the vote in the lower provinces that defeated reciprocity; at all events, it helped largely.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What about Ontario?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, in Ontario the Liberal farmers were caught by a— —

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: That is a good argument.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Then, what is my honourable friend kicking about now? Why is he complaining about conditions brought about in the lower provinces by the defeat of reciprocity in 1911. If it was a good argument in 1911, my honourable friend should not complain in the slightest degree at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The Fordney tariff would have been there to-day just the same.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: If my honourable friend could make prophecies ten years ahead he is a better man than anybody else in this country.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Judging the future by the past, we could.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Until my honourable friends from the lower provinces, and we in the West—for we are all in the same boat—can get the American market for our natural products, the Maritime provinces will have trouble about freight rates, and so will the prairie provinces, and we will never get them fixed to our entire satisfaction.

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: If we had reciprocity to-day would you not have reciprocity in railway rates in the West the same as in other matters? You are to-day getting freight rates in the West at 25 per cent less than they are in the United States.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: My honourable friend seems to forget that if we had reciprocity we would not be shipping over the long rail-haul: we would have a much shorter rail-haul, and my honourable friend could be shipping with practically no rail-haul at all, for he would only have to pay rates by rail from where he does business to a Prince Edward Island port; then he has water communication the year round for practically everything he wants to sell.

Hon Mr. MURPHY: No, it is not over half the year.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Well, if it is not for the year round it is very near it. At all events, the natural outlet for products of the lower provinces is the Eastern States. I have been down there two or three times, and I found the people so accustomed to trading with the United States in the past that they called the mail from Western Canada the foreign mail, and they looked on the mail from Boston as their natural mail, and they were pretty nearly right.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I don't know where you saw that.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I heard it in talking to men of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They must have been relics of a bygone generation.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: They were men not as old as my honourable friend who has just interrupted, and that was only two years ago. I do not say that was general, but the men who said that were perfectly right, for Boston is the natural market for everything they could produce. But now they are shut out by the tariff; and if we in the West and manufacturers in the lower provinces want to bring an end to the trouble of rail freights we must change our tariff policy, broaden our trade, take the shackles off it, let us sell where we can sell to the best advantage, let us buy where we can buy to the best advantage, and then we will not hear much about the trouble of freight rates.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: How are you going to do that when the other people will not deal? The honourable gentleman knows as well as I do that the American farmer's bluff is something like our own Progressive bluff. The Congress and Senate of the United States are blocking everything in favour of the farmers, who are as unreasonable as some of our Progressives in this Parliament. How are we going to get reciprocity when the other fellows won't deal with us?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Could we not have got it in 1911?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Yes, but they could have put it out, also.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: It was one-sided in this way, that it gave us a market of over a hundred millions, and gave them a market of only eight millions. There was nothing in that reciprocity proposition affecting the manufacturers of Canada, who made such a howl against reciprocity, and they deserve anything they get for that action, because the only two things in the whole Bill that affected manufacturers—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It was not the manufacturers—it was the farmers who made the howl. I know, because I represented an agricultural constituency.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: The only two items that affected the manufacturers were salt, which was put on the free list after having had a duty of $1.50 a ton, and agricultural implements, on which the duty was taken off to the extent of 2½ per cent on some, and 5 per cent on others. Those were the only two items within the four corners of the reciprocity agreement that affected the manufacturers, and they started to work, and put up the money.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It did not need any money.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: They put up the money to carry on the campaign that brought about the defeat of reciprocity. My honourable friend says we cannot get it. I am quite in agreement that we cannot get it on the same good terms we could have obtained in 1911, but I think my honourable friend will find that before long—it may be a matter of a few years—we will get a reciprocity agreement with the United States covering agricultural products, though we may have to give way to a certain extent. It may be necessary to put in that reciprocity agreement a lot of manufactured articles, and this would not please the manufacturers, but I would not be a bit sorry if that came about. I am anxious to see a good market for our natural products and lower costs for our manufactured goods, and I think a reciprocity agreement like that would be all right for both the lower provinces and the West, even though our manufacturers might not like it. But if they have to accept that, I say it will serve them right: they would be only getting a little dose of their own medicine.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I admit that, when the recipricoty agreement came out, when Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson returned from the United States, I was one who had visions of good things for Canada, and I told my friends that I was going to vote for country before party, because I believed that reciprocity was just what we wanted in the Maritime Provinces, especially for Prince Edward Island. But the more I studied that reciprocity treaty the more I believed it was wrong, and I had to convince myself it was wrong before I could stand on platform after platform and endeavour to convince other people, because I am a fairly honest man.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: That is where you spoiled your dream.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The trouble with that reciprocity treaty was that there was no defined time. The previous treaty, that was negotiated in 1854, was snapped off in 1866, after our trade had been running in channels to the south of us, and the abrogation of that treaty resulted in chaos to our trade. There was nothing to guarantee that the treaty of 1911 would not be abrogated in 6 months, as we now know it would have been since the farmer bloc has got sway in the Congress and Senate of the United States. I did not wish to bring politics into this discussion and refer to bygone days, and have a post mortem on the election in 1911; I would rather have a post mortem on my honourable friend politically than that.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: If the honourable members from the lower provinces are satisfied with their present condition, which to a large extent they brought on themselves, I do not know that I need worry. In regard to the Crow's Nest agreement, that was only suspended for three years, and the Government did not have to do anything: they just let it go. Let me tell my honourable friend that when that agreement was made, while it was to give a reduction of freight rates at that time, before the war, it afforded no particular reduction afterwards, because freight rates have come down in many cases lower than the Crow's Nest rates. I would like to add that it is in the West that the railways make the great bulk of their profits, as railway operation there is much cheaper in proportion to rates than in the East. Dividing the West from the East at Fort William, the net profits are much higher west of Fort William than in the East.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is it fair to divide at Fort William? Would it not be fairer to divide midway between North Bay and Fort William, because, from the freight standpoint, there is an unproductive distance of hundreds of miles?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Eight hundred, anyway.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would it not be fairer to divide there, and put the burden of 400 miles at one end and the burden of 400 at the other?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: But my honourable friend forgets that in the West there is a longer haul through barren lands: from Winnipeg to Fort William is 435 miles, and from Calgary—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does my honourable friend say that it is barren land from Fort William to Winnipeg?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Largely; I have been over it dozens of times.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: There is the member for Selkirk.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Selkirk is not east of Winnipeg, but north. There is unsettled territory for 400 miles, and from Calgary to Vancouver there is a distance of 500 or 600 miles, where there is a very little settlement on the main line of either road from the foot of the Rocky Mountain to the coast; so I think the division is fairly even. The reason that railroads make more profit west than east is because they have the long haul on the grain, and also they have higher freights generally; so that I do not think my honourable friend was right in saying that freight rates were lower in the West than in the East.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: Sir Henry Thornton says it costs $22,500 to haul one train from the West to the East.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is what he charges for coal.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I do not know. My own impression is that coal will never come down in any great quantities from Alberta to Ontario.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What do you say to that price?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I cannot see why it should cost that much, but I am not a railway man.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I don't believe him either.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I saw it stated the other day that on the Government railways of Canada one engine had hauled a train with 500,000 bushels of wheat. If one engine and one crew can haul that much they can haul coal of a weight equal to that of 500,000 bushels, and therefore they can haul the coal from Alberta.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They could not do that; that is an absurdity.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: That is the statement that was made in the dispatch in the paper. It may be wrong, but I know they can haul 60 cars with 100,000 pounds each, for they are making cars that carry from 80,000 to 100,000 pounds. They can haul coal cheaply because they propose to do it only in the summer months. My solution of the coal question is that if we use soft coal we can get it from Nova Scotia much cheaper than from Alberta, as it can come up in the summer by water to Montreal and Toronto, and if it has to come in the winter it is a shorter haul. I trust that something may be done to lower the freight rates in the East as well as in the West; at the same time I feel certain that the difficulty would be remedied if we could get satisfactory trade relations between this country and the country adjoining.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It is stated that coal can be loaded on cars at Lethbridge or Calgary at $2.50. At Sydney it costs us $6.50. I would like to ask if that western coal is lignite, or ordinary bituminous coal?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: In Saskatchewan we have nothing but lignite. In Alberta they have many qualities of coal. In the Crow's Nest Pass they have a bituminous coal that is a first-class steam coal and a first-class coking coal, but it is not hard coal. It is not a good domestic coal, for when you put it in a cooking stove it cokes, and checks the fire unless it is stirred up every fifteen minutes. At Bankhead the C. P. R. have a mine that is semi-anthracite, but it is not as good as real anthracite.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They are not producing there now.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Not much, I understand, but I am not sure. I understand there is good coal towards Brazeau and as far north as Edmonton, and in the Peace River Pass where the Hoppe leases are. The coal in the territory covered by the Hoppe leases, I understand, is the best coal we have yet found in Alberta, and is equal to Pennsylvania anthracite. It seems to me that distance will always prevent Alberta coal from coming down east, and if we have to use soft coal it will be cheaper for Ontario and Quebec to get it from the lower provinces.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: On behalf of the Senator from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan), I wish to move the adjournment of this debate. He has some very important information to give the House, particularly in view of what has just been said by the last speaker.

Hon. W. H. BENNETT: Before the motion is put, I would like to make a few remarks on the subject. There will never be decent railway rates in this country until this Government grapples properly with the subject, and that is by co-operating with their vessels on the Great Lakes and on the ocean as well as with the railway. Where is this Government to-day with respect to the rates on wheat for the farmer of the West? Let me read this dispatch from Port Arthur; I take it from the Montreal Gazette of to-day:

Price War on Lakes—Grain Shippers and Carriers at Odds Over Freights

Port Arthur, May 17.—In marine circles here it is stated to-day that a price war exists between the grain shipping companies and the companies owning steamships, the latter demanding seven-and-a-half cents per bushel to carry the grain eastward. As a result, shipments of grain from local elevators have slackened off during the last few days, and there is danger of their becoming plugged unless the situation improves. Yesterday three cargoes only left the harbour and to-day but one. It is reported that big American steamers refuse to carry the grain for less, and that they are now being diverted to Duluth and Superior to carry ore eastward. The price demanded is extraordinarily high in face of the fact that at the beginning of the season shippers were paid five cents per bushel which was in itself higher than usual.

Now, the vessel combines on the lakes to-day are holding by the throat the farmer of the West for 7½ cents a bushel on his grain at the head of the lakes. I assume it is for Georgian Bay ports or Buffalo. Talk about the Government-owned railway. It was something for a railway to be owned by the railway interests of the country, because they were big enough to hold the people up; but to fancy that a few steamboat lines are holding up this Government simply passes all comprehension.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: You mean this country when you say this Government?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: No, it is the Government they are holding up, not the country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: How are they doing it?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: This Government owns to-day and has on the Great Lakes the following freighters: The Adventurer, 3408 tons; the Trader, 3,341 tons; the Sower, 3,406 tons; the Sailor, 3,357 tons; the Pathfinder, 3,640 tons; the Engineer, 3,679 tons; the McKee, 3,575 tons; the Drummond, 3,500 tons; the Arthur Orr, which is a larger vessel, and which would have, I think, a tonnage over 4,000, and the Kearsarge. At the commencement of last season, as I proved the other day, the rate at the head of the lakes was only 3 cents a bushel. I gave as my authority the American report, and I quote from that the statement to show that on the first contracts of last year the rate was 3 cents. When the boats started out this year they were quite anxious to get 5 cents, which, as the report states, is considerably higher than the rate in former years.

These highwaymen,—because that is what they are,—holding up the farmer of the West—

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Buccaneers.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The honourable gentleman suggests "buccaneers." Perhaps that is a better term than highwaymen. Whether or not the Government are accomplices in the deal I do not know; but one would imagine that, with a fleet like that, capable of carrying a million bushels—

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What are they doing?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: They are charging 7½ cents a bushel, along with the buccaneers, because the Government have handed them over to their friends to run. Is not that correct?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not believe so.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I say they are advertised as being under one of these companies.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Subsidiaries of the Canada Steamships?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: A company called the Great Lakes Company has some of them. They are all on the lakes to-day. What is the result? Take the case of the Canada Steamship Company. They have one vessel called the Morden.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is not the Government's.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: No. The Canada Steamship Company have the Morden, which carries half a million bushels of grain. At 7½ cents, her freight will be worth $37,500 under this hold-up; and the Government are standing hand in hand with this Company in keeping up the rates and in having their vessels lying alongside the others, holding up the farmer for the same price.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would suggest to my honourable friend that he move the adjournment of the debate. I will lay on the Table of the House on Monday the official report of the Royal Commission that has been inquiring into this matter; then the honourable gentleman may speak by the book. I suppose my honourable friend is alleging facts, but he does not seem to be sure. When the information is officially presented to us, he will be able to give us data which will be uncontrovertible.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing in that report about this deal, because it refers to the machinations of the buccaneers last year.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend's remarks do not bear on the operations of last year?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: No, on what is going on to-day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But to-day navigation is just opening.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no, it is not. Let me say to the honourable gentleman that this report, which it is anticipated will expose the machinations of those buccaneers, has been in the possession of this Government for a week—since last Monday.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may inform my honourable friend that it was simply laid before us to-day at noon.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I can tell the honourable gentleman that one of the Commissioners left for his home last Monday; and he must have signed the Report before he left.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I suppose it would have to be printed.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I should say that in these days of typewriting, it was probably typewritten, and had been before the Government for some days.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may inform my honourable friend officially that it was distributed to the members of the Cabinet to-day.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: And some member of the Cabinet has had it in cold storage, probably, for several days.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That would do on the hustings.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Well, I agree that to appeal to honourable gentlemen on the other side would be about as useless, almost, as to talk on the hustings.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend thinks himself in the House of Commons. He should rise to a higher sphere in discussing matters here and try to acquire the senatorial spirit.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Get on to the Twentieth Plane.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: That remark, coming from my honourable friend, starts me reminscing. Honourable gentlemen can remember what happened a year or two ago when, with his uplifted right hand, my honourable friend was almost in danger of touching the Hon. Mr. Blondin, a member of the Government. Talk about impassioned appeals and pre-election ones. I am demanding rights for the farmers of the West. This spineless Government is not going to the country right away, and that is not why I am making speeches. I want the Government to rise to the occasion.

The Minister says he is going to get the facts. What are the facts that he is going to get? Are they that these vessels are not leased? If that is the case, the Government's position is worse than ever, because they own ten vessels on the Upper Lakes—and could add many others to the fleet—and they are actually standing idle to-day refusing to break up the combine.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman knows that this fleet is managed by the National Railway Board.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I will accept the statement of the honourable gentleman, then, that Sir Henry Thornton stands up and folds his arms and tells the Government: "You may ask me to do this or that; I am going to run these railways and these vessels as I like." If it is he who is putting this imposition on the public by entering into a great combine on the Upper Lakes for the benefit of the vessel owners, we had better know it. Let the honourable gentleman take the ground that Sir Henry Thornton is making the deal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman speaks of a "deal." I think he should first obtain the facts by putting a question on the Order Paper. It seems to me that this is not the place to speak in such a flippant way of the administration of the country, but that the allegations should be based on facts.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I am basing them on the facts. I defy the honourable gentleman to deny that these vessels are owned by the Government of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend has read a list of names which seem somewhat familiar to me as belonging to the fleet which Mr. Ballantyne palmed off on the country.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: My honourable friend is taking to the subterfuge of throwing the responsibility back on Mr. Ballantyne. These vessels were built in time of war.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: After the war, most of them.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Now the honourable gentleman is talking politics.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I know that all those steamers bore a name prefixed by the word Canadian—Canadian Discover, Canadian Exporter, etc. I suppose that is the fleet my honourable friend speaks of.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Part of the fleet—and they are owned by the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What is left of them.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There are a great many of them left.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I suppose, if we were to take the opinion of this House, three-quarters of its members would be in favour of disposing of the balance.

Some Hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I would be opposed to disposing of this fleet. If these vessels were properly handled they would be all right; but I think you might as well let them go, if they are going to be operated by this Government.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Do I understand the honourable gentleman to say that they are leased to private individuals, who are running them on the Lakes?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I say I have every reason to believe so.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Why not wait for the report, if the honourable gentleman only has "reason to believe?" The fact will appear in the evidence.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There are millions of bushels of grain which ought to be moved lying at the head of the Lakes, and I assume there are vessels waiting at Montreal to handle it; but the Government, instead of hanrling the grain in their own vessels and cutting the rates, are participating in them. If they have not leased the vessels, then they are charging 7½ cents per bushel; and if they have leased them, they have prevented competition by so doing.

The town in which I live is the headquarters of the Great Lakes Company fleet, and in the last paper from there which I have seen is a list of the vessels and the captains and the engineers for the season—the usual list that one finds in the press of such towns. The nemes of two of these vessels appear in that list; and, I know, from the statement of a man who knows all about it, that every one of those vessels is on the Lakes to-day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend's argument would be much stronger if it was based upon an official answer procured by the Government from the National Railways.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: If the Government received an official reply from the National Railways that those vessels are not carrying grain to-day, then I say that some official is not telling the truth, because I have a letter saying that they are. The letter simply states that these vessels are all running on the Lakes, and that they have bookings ahead. Here it is:

> I have to say that the steamers Canadian Adventurer, Canadian Sower, Canadian Trader, Canadian Sailor, Pathfinder, and Canadian Engineer, are carrying grain between Fort William and Port Colbourne and Bay ports.

That statement is made by one of the leading officials of the Railway.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What rate are they getting.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The letter does not say.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Nor under what conditions. Are they running under the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The writer of the letter does not say whether or not they are leased, but he bears out my so-called flippant statement that they were on the lakes. My honourable friend said that was a flippant statement.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, no. My honourable friend is in error. My honourable friend speaks of the policy that the Government has entered into as a "deal." I would like to know what he means by a "deal."

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Then, what part of my remarks are flippant?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman leads the Senate to believe that there has been some dark scheme carried on against the interests of Canada. He has no basis for his statement, except that he has been led to believe. He should first obtain the information.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I have the statement of a leading official that these vessels are on the Upper Lakes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Who is the official?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The honourable gentleman asks for the name of the official. Probably he would be decapitated for giving out information. That is an old game; I have heard of that before.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman can get the official information by asking for it.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The Government are in this position to-day: they are either running these boats as part of the combine, or they are leasing them to those who are holding up the general public by these rates.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: When the honourable gentleman says "the Government," what does he mean? Does he mean the Government represented by the Railway Department, or the National Railway Board?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The National Railway Board. But I say that when anything goes amiss in the country it is surely within the province of the Government to appeal to Sir Henry Thornton and to ask him to rectify it. Is he to be placed on a pedestal so high that, do what he will, the Government stand terrified of their importation, and say, "Go on, do your worst."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We hope they will do their best.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: If it is not true that the Government have leased these vessels, then they are doing the other thing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is, the Canadian National Railway Board.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: All right: once again, the Canadian National Railway Board.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And we have promised them—with the honourable gentleman's consent—a free hand.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Not to do whatever they please, whether it is right or wrong?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Undoubtedly we can make representations.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There is another matter—this latest trick of the National Railways, of going in for this new British preference. I am not in favour of that—going over to England to get officials when there are thousands of able officials here.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Is that absolutely true?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Whether it is true or not, honourable gentlemen were appealed to in the other House, and the statement was made in all the papers that the National Railways were doing it. This country was convulsed one day by an American preference by the bringing in of officials from the United States.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: By private corporations.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, by private corporations. What are honourable gentlemen going to say now, when under this so-called British preference they are bringing in from the Old Country men who were officials on the railway by which Sir Henry Thornton was employed? How conversant they must be with the transportation situation in Canada —say, of grain from the West, having worked on a short line railway in England.

Now, what do those rates produce? I am going to show you how it works out. This steamer would have a freight return of $37,500 on one trip. I presume the ship did not cost more than $500,000, so that on the single trip she is making 7½ per cent on her value, less the cost of the men's wages.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: How long would that trip take?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Around seven days. I hope the honourable gentleman will have his report down on Monday. I understand it is to be made public. I hope it will satisfy the West. Will the honourable gentleman not acquiesce in that, or is it to be a stuffed club, to go very easy on the marine men? As to the report, I think it will be a good report, but I fear the action of the Government will be a slap on the wrist to those vesselmen, nothing more and nothing less. The marine interests are soaking the public to the extent of 7½ cents a bushel on grain, and they are assisted by this Government one way or the other, by renting those vessels to co-operate in the pool, or by the Government holding up the prices themselves at that extortionate rate.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: My honourable friend said the report of the Commission would be tabled on Monday. Is that the complete report? I heard there was to be an abridged report, or a précis of it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I had no time to go through it. It seemed to be voluminous, and I was told a copy would be sent to me, and I thought I could lay it on the Table this afternoon, but I will surely do so on Monday. My honourable friend has moved the adjournment of the debate. I am glad to hear that my honourable friend is satisfied with one action of the Government, that is the appointment of the Royal Commission.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I hope the report will be of such a nature that the Government will be driven into action by the Progressives.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Why does my honourable friend say driven into action? It is the Government that has sought the information for its own advantage.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I would call the attention of the honourable leader to the fact that the honourable gentleman from Midland who has just spoken (Hon. Mr. Bennett) has made some serious charges—that the Government is leasing those vessels on the Great Lakes to friends of their own to enable them to exploit the public and put into the wheat pool of the high price of hauling this wheat around the lakes from the West. Can he bring the information down as to whether that is or is not correct?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course it is needless to say that I have not accepted at par the impressions of the honourable gentleman from Midland. He has heard, and he has been led to believe; but I will try to get the information for which my honourable friend has asked.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The honourable leader will understand that he can easily get the information as to whether those vessels which belong to the Government are under control of the National Railways—which, after all, are the people, or the people's representatives—or whether they are in the hands of a separate syndicate formed for the exploiting of those same people in the hauling of their wheat, and if they are getting 7½ cents, as he claims.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: And I would ask the honourable gentleman to find out, when he is making the inquiry, if a contract has not been made for the carriage to Midland of the coal for the National railways, instead of getting it carried by government vessels going into that port themselves, and if, in order to carry that railway coal to Midland, they have not been employing American boats —because I can tell him they have been doing that. The Company, or some person who is carrying the coal for the National Railway, is carrying part of it in an American boat—one load at all events, because I saw the boat reported.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will draw the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals to the discussion of this afternoon, so that we may get some light and some official statement on those matters.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is what we want.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Fowler, the debate was adjourned until Tuesday next.

The Senate adjourned until Monday next at 8 p.m.

PATENT BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of Bill 20, an Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to Patents of Invention.

He said: There is an amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross), which will settle the question of jurisdiction when there is more than one applicant for a patent. The Act as it stands provides for the appointment of arbitrators—one by each of the applicants and the third by the Department. At the same time, the Exchequer Court now has authority. The clause which it is proposed to add is:

(7) If, prior to such time as may be fixed by the Commissioner for the appointment of arbitrators or allowed by him to enable the conflicting applicants to unite in appointing arbitrators anyone of the conflicting applicants takes proceedings in the Exchequer Court for the determination of the conflict, no further proceedings shall be taken thereon under this section and said Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction in the premises; but no such proceedings shall be taken in the Exchequer Court after the expiration of such time.

Clause 22 provides that in the case of conflicting applications for a patent, the right to the patent shall be determined by arbitration.

Section 23 of the Exchequer Court Act, Chapter 140, R.S.C., gives that tribunal jurisdiction in the premises also.

To provide for such a case as was mentioned by the honourable Senator from Middleton

(Hon. W. B. Ross), namely, where one party wishes to proceed by arbitration and the other party wishes to go to the Exchequer Court, it has been deemed advisable to add subclause 1, which has been approved by the Department of Justice.

Under the provision to be added, if before the expiry of the time fixed by the Commissioner for the appointment of arbitrators, any one of the parties takes proceedings in the Exchequer Court, the proceedings under the Patent Act shall be discontinued and the matter will have to be dealt with by the Court.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: When does my honourable friend propose moving that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would suggest that my honourable friend from Middleton move that in amendment to my motion for the third reading.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What occurred to me was this. Assuming for the moment that proceedings have been instituted in the Exchequer Court before the arbitrators have been appointed, apparently the Exchequer Court can proceed to hear the case; but has the Exchequer Court authority under the Exchequer Court Act to refer the matter to arbitration, assuming that it is set in motion before proceedings in arbitration are commenced? The Exchequer Court might be influenced by the belief that the matter could be better determined by reference to arbitration than by a hearing before the Court. In that case the Court should not be precluded from compelling the parties to arbitrate. So long as jurisdiction is vested in the Court to make that reference, it would be satisfactory, to my mind.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: As I understand, there is provision now for arbitration, but one of the parties may want an arbitration while the other may want to go to the Exchequer Court; and, as the Act now stands, it does not say which proceeding is to take place. This amendment is made to cover a difficulty of that kind. If A asks for an arbitration and B asks for the Exchequer Court, the matter goes to the Exchequer Court, as I understand it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And then the Exchequer Court can appoint arbitrators to deal with the matter if they want to.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: They can deal with it themselves. I move the amendment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The honourable member for Grenville (Hon. Mr. Reid) has a notice of motion on the Order Paper to strike out clause 47. Has that been disposed of?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Committee decided in favour of the Bill as it was drafted, after the matter of the amendment was thoroughly discussed.

The amendment of Hon. W. B. Ross was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was read the third time and passed.

DIVORCE BILLS

THIRD READINGS

Bill D5, an Act for the relief of James Dunnett.—Hon. Mr. Blain.

Bill E5, an Act for the relief of Laura MacBrien.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

Bill F5, an Act for the relief of Chester Abbott Redmond.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

IMMIGRATION BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 136, an Act to amend The Immigration Act.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—enemy aliens:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This section repeals paragraph (p) of section 3 of the Immigration Act. That section reads as follows:

> 3. No immigrant, passenger, or other person unless he is a Canadian citizen, or has Canadian domicile shall be permitted to enter or land in Canada, or in case of having landed in or entered Canada, shall be permitted to remain therein, who belongs to any of the following classes hereinafter called "prohibited classes."

Then comes paragraph (p), which contains the clause:

> Enemy aliens or persons who have been alien enemies and who were or may be interned on or after the eleventh day of November, 1918, in any part of His Majesty's dominions, or by any of His Majesty's allies.

This is repealed, because I am informed by the Department there are no such enemy aliens who were interned after Armistice Day.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does that apply only to such as were interned after Armistice Day?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And the Immigration Act is in force against all other alien enemies?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. We are deleting this part of the section; it has no more application.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—deported conspirators.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This amends paragraph (s) of section 3, which reads:

Persons who at any time within a period of ten years from the first day of August, 1914, were or may be deported from any part of His Majesty's dominions, or from any allied country on account of treason or of conspiring against His Majesty, or of any similar offence in connection with the war against any of the allies of His Majesty.

That much remains. It is sought to have deleted these words, which conclude paragraph (s):

or because such persons were or may be regarded as hostile or dangerous to the allied cause during the war.

It was felt that this was too large a test, and somewhat obscure and dangerous in application.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That has a year and a half to run yet.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3—certain persons to be deemed to belong to the prohibited or undesirable classes:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We are not ready to repeal section 41 yet.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would like to explain that the effect of this amendment would be to except from the meshes of this section a British subject who has not been 5 years in the country.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Why a British subject any more than any other?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: A British subject who was not born in Canada, nor naturalized in Canada, would fall under the Act.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: A British subject cannot be naturalized.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The reason for the repeal of section 41 of the Act of 1919, and for the substitution of section 41 of the Act of 1910, which was repealed in 1919, is a matter of policy, and the changes can be readily understood by reference to the two sections. The old section 41 has been enacted with the following exception: the words "person other than a Canadian citizen" have been struck out, and in lieu, thereof the word "alien" has been inserted; so that it will read as follows:

Whenever an alien advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Great Britain or Canada, etc.

That will mean that a person coming from the British Isles or from outside of Canada, but who is a British subject, will not be reached by this clause, as proposed to be amended.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He ought to be.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: He ought to get worse.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: What is the reason for that exception? This is all very unsatisfactory, as we have agreed over and over again. My honourable friend reads from a paper or a book that he has, and nobody else has, and it is impossible to keep the context of that in our mind and follow it with the proposed amendment. Anyway, my honourable friend might give us the reasons why the Government proposes to except anybody who advocates by violent methods the overthrow of the government or the established order.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: As a matter of fact, these agitators from the British Isles, are the most dangerous we have.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Suppose we get at the reason why.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We have had the same old reasons for two years, and they are not a bit better now than they have been before. We have resented them before, and I hope we will again.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I take leave to move that section 3 of this Bill be struck out. That will leave the law as it was. I am of Scottish descent, and I have been told, and it is my experience, that a good Scotchman is the best man in the world and a bad Scotchman is the worst man in the world. Further than that, I am satisfied that some of the worst men in this country, men that we need least, are men from Scotland. I do not know any reason why they should not be subjected to the same law as aliens when they undertake to cause trouble in this country and to upset the Government and wreck property, and violate every law of God and man.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have been asked why this amendment was made. I have received no memorandum on the subject from the Department, because it was not the Department that sought the amendment:

it was made in the House. I may remind my honourable friends that in 1921 the Government of the day sought to have this clause so amended as to absolve all Britishers from its operation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, we know the reasons. They need not be mentioned.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Senate differed.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: The Senate is going to differ again.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not allowed to quote from Hansard, but my honourable friends will very much oblige if they will look at Hansard to see who suggested that Britishers should be exempted from that disability. When that Bill came up in 1921 it had behind it the Government's endorsation. The Minister of Immigration, having been sworn in only in December of that year, or in January of 1922, felt that perhaps the time had not arrived to make a change. I leave it to the Senate to say whether the time has arrived now.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: It does not matter to me who it was that moved in another place to make that exception. Anyone who had experience of the very serious strike we had in Winnipeg a few years ago knows very well that the foreigners were not the leaders. My experience of the foreigner in Western Canada is that he is inclined to be quiet and to obey the laws of the country, unless he is aroused by agitators. My honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) said that a bad Scotchman was the worst man in the world, and I agree with him. The leaders of the strike in Winnipeg were Scotchmen, or at least were from the British Isles. I do not think for one moment the Senate will permit the amendment to carry.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: May I say just a word, inasmuch as I have not spoken on this subject in the House before? I probably share responsibility for the introduction of the amendment to section 41 the year following the difficulty in Winnipeg, expressing the opinion then that it would be wise to get back to the law as it was before that difficulty occurred, believing it would have a salutary effect. I beg to state to-day that I have changed my mind in some respects, having in view the experience of this country within the last year and the Communist propaganda which has been carried on throughout the length and breadth of the world, apparently propagated and disseminated from Russia, and I think Canada would be well advised to maintain section 41 as it is.

Section 3 was negatived.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: The Government does not press its measure?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not insist in the face of such an expression of sentiment.

On section 4—Deputy Minister may order investigation:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This amendment has been made the ground of a decision to intercede by the courts in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is that the order for deportation?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The order for examination. I will read section 36.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It has not relation to section 41?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; it is an order to be issued on the complaint under section 41; it is to allow a deputy minister to sign the order instead of the Minister.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Does that refer to the investigation made under section 41?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is the order for examination in pursuance of the complaint under section 41.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Are you repealing that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. It is simply departmental.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Is there any provision in the Department for the enforcement of this Act? This deportation clause has been on the Statute Book for some time, and men who have been guilty of the most glaring offences under it have not been deported. That is an open secret. I would like to know what is the use of legislating if the Act is not enforced.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The latter part of section 41 reads as follows:

> And it shall be the duty of any officer becoming cognizant thereof, and the duty of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein such person may be, to forthwith send a written complaint to the Minister giving full particulars.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: That is very clear; but the inference to be drawn from my remarks is that the officials do not see these things or do not wish to see them.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Have there been many cases under this?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I do not think there has been one.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that attempts were made in some fifteen cases in Winnipeg and Vancouver, but habeas corpus proceedings stopped the action of the Government, and deportation was impossible in most cases, because there could be no deportation to Russia on account of conditions in that country.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I would direct the attention of the Government to what has taken place in Sydney within the last few weeks. Why has not that man Bruce been deported?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that no complaint has been received.

Hon. Mr. McCORMICK: The trouble is that he has not been apprehended. There is a warrant out for him.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Probably the warrant has been issued, but has it been issued under the instructions of the Department? My honourable friend informs me that no complaint has been laid. The matter, as I understand it, is left in the hands of the officers of the Department; and they have to wait until somebody complains. They must read the papers, as other people do. Why do they not act?

Hon. Mr. McCORMICK: The action down there was taken by the Provincial Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that there must be a complaint made.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It strikes me that the procedure should be quick and silent. As soon as a man lays himself open to the law, he should be grabbed and thrown incontinently out of the country, without any trial or anything else. I would not give any trial to such men, or any chance to defend or anything else.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: You might make a mistake.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: A man who would come into a country and accept its hospitality and then be a rebel towards it—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend must recognize the fact that the offence is committed some five hundred or a thousand miles from the centre where the officials of the Department of Immigration are. The Department must have knowledge of the action of the man.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They would see it in the papers.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And they can only be informed by a complaint of some official of the municipality in which the offence is committed. It seems to me quite a wise precaution.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: Do I understand that no action can be taken except here in Ottawa? Is there no one appointed to take action?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I read from section 41:

> And it shall be the duty of any officer becoming cognizant thereof, and the duty of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein such person may be, to forthwith send a written complaint thereof to the Minister of Immigration giving full particulars.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We read the other day in all the newspapers that down in Sydney a man—I think his name was Bruce—had made a public speech in which he said he wanted to see the British flag, the flag of his country, dragged in the mud, and the red flag of Communism flying in its place. Surely a department that had the first elements of life in it would be able to take hold of the matter, having read of it in the newspapers, and would not have to wait for someone at Sydney to lay an information. Are not these gentlemen in the Immigration Department able to read and write? Do they not read the newspapers? If we are credibly informed, most of the men in such offices spend a very considerable portion of their time in the perusal of the papers. Surely they could not miss those headlines, because they are very large and very glaring; and surely the Immigration Department at Ottawa has some knowledge of what took place when this man Bruce made this speech down in Sydney. I do not see how the officials of the Immigration Department can clear themselves with regard to this. What is the use of having this law on the Statute Book? I would have supposed that the man would be apprehended the next day on instructions from Ottawa and locked up, to teach these brutes that they cannot come into the country and insult its flag. The only treatment they can understand is force—that is the thing they are advocating—and their own remedy should be applied to them to shut their blatant mouths.

Hon. Mr BELCOURT: I do not know anything about the particulars of this case; but it seems to me, according to the procedure which prevails all over the country, that when this man Bruce was apprehended—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, a warrant was issued.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: On the complaint of someone in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It would be quite within his province to do that. If a warrant is out for the man's arrest there is no occasion for the Department of Justice to take further action: the law has been set in motion, and nothing more can be done. There would be no object in having any further complaint made, because our courts of justice in Nova Scotia are after the man. I do not think the Minister of Justice in this case is at all in fault.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Does not my honourable friend see some difference between this law and the law of the province which the Attorney General puts in force? If the man were arrested by the Attorney General, they would likely give him a trial by jury.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The administration of justice is in the hands of the Attorney General of the province, though we make the law.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is not under this Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is under this Act as well as any other Act. This is a criminal offence like any other criminal offence, to be tried under the provincial procedure. We do not institute the procedure. This crime is committed in the province of Nova Scotia, and the Attorney General of that province issues the warrant for the arrest of this man

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It could not be under this Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That has nothing to do with the Immigration Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Why could he not do it? He has already done it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is only the immgration authorities who can set the machinery in motion for his deportation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not think that is good doctrine. The administration of justice is in the hands of the Attorney General of the Province.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is, the criminal law; but there is special machinery provided in the Immigration Act for the deportation of such an individual as we have referred to, and that machinery must be set in motion by the Department of Immigration.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does that exclude provincial jurisdiction?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: This has nothing to do with the administration of the criminal law.. This is an Act for the deportation of undesirable characters.

Hon. Mr. McCORMICK: Has the Attorney General notified the Department that there was such a man at large?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He does not need to. The Department cannot find anything to excuse itself, in my opinion. The whole thing was made public and notorious, and apparently no attention was paid to it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that the Department cannot take notice of a newspaper item.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But their attention was drawn to it officially by a member of this House.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Under sections 41 and 42 it is not possible for the Department to take notice of that unless a complaint in writing has come in: the words here are perfectly plain. Of course, you could amend them to say they might act on a telegraphic message, but as the law stands now the Department cannot be put in motion except on a written complaint. The action of the Attorney General must have been under some other authority altogether foreign to this Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Where does he get the authority outside of this Act?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Then I am right in what I said a moment ago.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: He has no authority under this Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The man could not be sent out of the country.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, you cannot send him out of the country until you get hold of him, and when he is got hold of, he would be sent out of the country by the Immigration Department.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No, he would not, unless the Attorney General or some other person sends in a written complaint.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I think this Act ought to be amended, if it is going to be effective, and the Department ought to be empowered to take action, and not wait until someone lodges a complaint. When the Government was informed of what took place in Nova Scotia the Department ought to be in a position to cause an investigation to be made, and to take action. There are many of those men running wild in this country who ought to be apprehended and deported, and they never will be unless the Department takes action.

Section 4 was agreed to.

On section 5—arrest or prosecution of rejected or deported persons:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Act as it is now on the Statute Book, subsection 4 of section 42, reads as follows:

> Any person rejected or deported only by reason of inability to comply with the money qualification prescribed by any Order in Council passed under the authority of section 37 of this Act may be subsequently permitted to enter or land in Canada by a Board of inquiry.

That is, assuming he has not been rejected for any other reason but that one. The section is amended by substituting therefor the following:

> by reason of inability to comply with the provisions of any Order in Council which has been rescinded.

He may be subsequently permitted to enter or land in Canada by a Board of Inquiry or officer in charge. The case in point is this: many U.S. citizens were rejected under this clause of B.C. 183:

> A United States citizen entering Canada from the United States, provided it is shown to the satisfaction of the Immigration Officer in charge that his labour or service is required in Canada.

Unless subsection 4 of section 42 is amended as proposed, the persons above rejected would not likely be permitted to land in Canada without the consent of the Minister.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is there not a provision under the Alien Act which covers this same ground?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I would like to ask if the rescinding of the Order in Council imposing additional requirements as to cash in hand upon Chinese immigrants would permit under this amendment, the entering into Canada of Chinese who were excluded because of it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This Act is not applicable to Chinese.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The general Immigration Act does not apply to Chinamen at all?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is a Chinese Immigration Act absolutely distinct from this.

Section 5 was agreed to.

On section 6—lists of seamen, etc., must be delivered:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The effect of the amendment to subsection 1, of section 52, may be summarized as follows: Under the section as it stands, transportation companies must furnish a manifest of seamen who arrive on any vessel coming from any port or place outside of Canada and must also furnish a supplementary list of seamen who have signed at a Canadian port. The amendment leaves it to the discretion of the Minister as to whether or not either manifest shall be furnished.

Section 6 was agreed to.

On section 7—discharging crew without examination:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This applies to crews of vessels and would apply in the case of a crew deserting, or any member of a crew running away from the vessel. This amendment simply means that the penalty is an administrative fine instead of the former penalty, which provided for prosecution in court. It will be noted that administrative fines are also provided by section 48, and subsection 1 of section 52, or for certain other violations of the law.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Would that apply in the case of a crew deserting or a member of the crew runnng away from the vessel?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is the master who pays for the member of the crew who goes out. The change is made because prosecutions cannot be had, it being too difficult to follow up those people who land, or who disappear; but under this administrative fine the master would be obliged himself to pay the fine.

Section 7 was agreed to.

On section 8—deposit as security for return of deserters:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is a new clause. Its object is to give the Immigration Inspector in charge at a port of entry authority to obtain a cash deposit to cover whatever expenses may be involved of seamen who may desert, especially from foreign vessels which have no agent or representative in Canada. It is impossible to use the words "foreign vessels" of "foreign bottoms" in the section, because of favoured-nation clauses in the Japanese and other treaties.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Why should the master of the ship have to pay these expenses? It does not seem fair to me that because a man has deserted the master of the ship is visited with all the consequences, for he may be entirely innocent; in fact, he suffers from the desertion of the seaman, and yet he has to pay the expenses the Government has been put to in trying to deport the man.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If a seaman has deserted, the master has retained the money owing to the seaman.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is not made a condition. The master has to pay in any case what the Government has had to pay, in a matter over which he has no responsibility.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Suppose a refractory seaman has threatened the officers, or has mutinied before the vessel came to port, would the master have to deposit money in addition?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If he deserts, he leaves his money behind.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: But he may have no money coming to him.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But the master should be responsible for the members of the crew, otherwise there could be a conspiracy by which the master could connive at distributing a crew through the whole country.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But you cannot assume there is collusion between the master and the seamen.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are not assuming it; we are guarding against it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The master may be wholly and entirely innocent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I know, and yet at the same time he may contrive a very elaborate plan by which he may bring in a very large crew, and thus evade all the immigration regulations.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But we never legislate in anticipation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In a preventive way. Oh, yes, we do.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not think we ought to legislate on the anticipation of an offence being committed. We always assume that the offence will not be committed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The great body of law is preventive.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not think that answers my question.

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: Suppose they hired a crew before they came to Canada and the crew deserted when they got here, it would be very unfair if the master were to be held responsible.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If a tramp steamer comes to Halifax or St. John, and members of the crew desert, the Government will be put to considerable expense, the tramp steamer will disappear, and may not return for years to a Canadian port.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: This will only cover a certain class of cases. Suppose a captain brings men here in his ship for a single run from Liverpool to Montreal, their contract is at an end, and if they leave the ship they are not deserters, though the whole crew would go.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That would not apply to the seamen if they were paid off and discharged. This clause would not apply to the master naturally.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No, it would only apply in the case of a seaman breaking his contract.

Section 8 was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Before the Committee rises, I would like to call the attention of the Government to a matter perhaps not directly concerning this Bill, but very closely associated with the administering of justice to aliens coming into Canada. In the part of the country from which I come we have had some very sad experiences. Not long since an alien murdered a citizen of Canada in cold blood, and was sentenced to a long term in the penitentiary. Much against the wish and against the protest of many people, that man is now at liberty.

Several other cases might be mentioned. Only yesterday I happened to be on business in the city of North Bay, and witnessed a funeral procession of between two and three thousand people. A man had been murdered in cold blood—a murder deliberately planned by a convict, a Pole, who had fifteen years to serve in the penitentiary, and who had been pardoned and let out. The man whose funeral I saw pass leaves a widow and five small children. I do think the Government should exercise more care and discretion in the pardoning of criminals.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported as amended.

CANADA TEMPERANCE BILL

SECOND READING POSTPONED

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 23, an Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill, which has already received the attention of the Senate, deals with the prohibition of the importation of intoxicating liquors under certain conditions. It does not come to us in the same form that it had last Session. If the Chamber will allow me I will explain, in the very terms of the Attorney-General of the Province of British Columbia, the reasons for bringing the legislation before the Federal Parliament in its present form.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Would my honourable friend allow an interruption just here? I notice that an Order for a return of all the correspondence that passed between the Attorney General or the Government of British Columbia and the Department here with reference to the proposed Bill was passed in another place. The return, however, does not contain the first letter of the Attorney General to the Solicitor General, in which, it is to be inferred, he unfolded his proposition and asked for legislation such as was probably put in the first Bill. I would like to ask my honourable friend whether it is not possible to get that letter, which is really the main letter in the whole correspondence. Another letter, under date of the 24th of February, refers to this first letter of the 16th of February. Why is the letter of the 16th not on file? And could it not be brought down.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Perhaps that is a private letter and gives his real reasons.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: No, it is a public letter.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It just happens that I received a copy of a letter addressed to the late Solicitor General in January last, and which, as it bore on a matter that would not come before Parliament, I filed away. Yesterday, after reading some correspondence which was addressed to me, I found a reference to a copy of a letter that had been sent to me in January, and just a few moments before I entered this Chamber this evening I looked for that letter and found it. As I read the letter it struck me that perhaps it was a personal letter to the late Solicitor General—perhaps not—and I deleted from it all that could reflect upon the attitude of any member of either of the branches of Parliament—not in such a way as to hurt the feelings of anyone—and brought down the argument put up by the Attorney General of British Columbia in favour of this legislation. I decided to present the argument in terms which I could appropriate for myself, and which would be deemed satisfactory to this Chamber.

There is another part of the letter which I might perhaps read later, but which did not bear on the reasons for moving in this direction.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I do not want to discuss the letter here; this is not the place to discuss it. I simply asked for information of my honourable friend. It does appear to me, however, that this is the fundamental letter of this whole correspondence, and I do not see why it should be censored.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If there is an official letter which has reached the Department, I do not know of any reason why it should not have been produced, and filed in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Had you not better wait with the Bill?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What I have before me is simply the argument in the actual terms of the Attorney-General.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: Would the honourable gentleman give the date of this letter?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not the exact date of the month, but I am sure it was in January.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Are you now quoting from a letter which you do not intend to produce or lay on the Table?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am extracting from a letter of the Attorney General the argument in favour of this legislation.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Written by the Attorney General to the Solicitor General?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: From a copy sent to me. I do not know whether it is an official letter or a personal letter. I am under the impression that it is an official letter, although it discusses the situation generally. I could hand the letter over to any member of this Chamber, but I did not want to ruffle the feelings of honourable gentlemen with the remarks as to the stand that was taken by some members of it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Let us have it by all means.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That makes us more curious than ever.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will hand it to the honourable gentleman from British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And we will make an effort to ruffle that gentleman's feelings too.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: If the honourable gentleman will permit me, I would like to point out that an Order for a return of all this correspondence was passed, and that letter is referred to in the return, but it is not produced. Is it usual for the Government to disregard an Order of Parliament for a return because they think there is something in a letter that may hurt someone's feelings?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, I will have to refer to the Department. As I say, I found in my file a copy of a letter from which I thought I could lay fully and clearly before the House the view of the British Columbia Government.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I do not think my honourable friend has any option in the matter. Here is the return which was asked for, and which was brought down:

A copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Attorney General, Hon. Alexander Manson, of British Columbia, and the Solicitor General, in reference to the proposed amendment to the Canada Temperance Act, together with copies of legislation of the British Columbia legislature, with the accompanying brief of the Attorney General of British Columbia containing his references regarding the vote of the British Columbia legislature.

That Order was passed in another place, and in response to the Order the Secretary of State laid the correspondence on the Table of the House. It transpires that the first letter from the Attorney General of the Province of British Columbia commences in this way: "Dear Mr. McKenzie: Re Canada Temperance Act." It was no private matter: it was "Re Canada Temperance Act"—a public official of a Province writing to the Solicitor General of the Dominion on a public matter which had to be discussed in both Houses of Parliament, and upon which a decision had to be made, resting upon the reasonableness of the circumstances as to whether that legislation should be given or not. It goes on to say:

With further reference to the above matter, and my letter to you of the 16th, I should perhaps add, in case the question is raised, that in the event of the legislation being passed it is desired to say that the Government of this Province will not deal harshly with existing export liquor concerns. We shall give them time to dispose of their stocks, and shall endeavour to be as reasonable with them in all respects as the circumstances of the situation will permit.

Now, I take it that the letter of the 16th is the vital letter: the other is an afterthought, the purpose of which is to make the Dominion Government more favourable to the granting of the request by telling that Government, so soft-hearted as it is, that they can pass this legislation with a due sense of the fact that the Attorney General of the Province of British Columbia will not deal harshly with the export houses. It seems to me that that gives my honourable friend no ground for refusing to produce that letter. I do not think he can retain it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend will realize the situation which confronts me. The Department which is responsible for the bringing down of this correspondence to the House of Commons has not judged it opportune or right to bring down this first letter of the 16th of January. I learn for the first time that there has been correspondence laid on the Table of the House of Commons. The reason for this is obvious. I have to deal considerably with the Hansard report of the Commons, but I confess that even though I gave my full twenty-four hours to reading it, I could not be familiar with all that takes place in that House; so I am not au fait. Now I am informed that the letter of the 16th is referred to in the letters published. My sincerity is obvious. I prefaced my remarks by saying that I was reading part of the statement of the Attorney General of British Columbia. Part of that statement appears to be taken from that letter of the 16th of January, and I have just taken the parts to explain fully the situation as I see it. If this right is challenged because I am not laying on the Table of the House the full letter, I will have to find out under what conditions it was received before I proceed to read the whole letter.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why do you not wait until that time before you deal with this matter?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: My honourable friend can go on and give what deduction he chooses. That may satisfy the Senate, or it may not. Afterwards we can take up the question of whether we want more. But we should have very full information.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Let us have it now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I will proceed as I intended to do. If I find that I can produce the letter, I will do so.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It will be too late.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: When I have finished, my honourable friend will have one-half or two-thirds of the letter.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The other third might nullify the two-thirds.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I did not think there was occasion. I simply proceeded to declare that I would state the case of British Columbia in the terms of the British Columbia Attorney General himself.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But, you see, it makes us suspicious when a garbled report of part of a letter that has been called for, and not produced in the other House, as I understand, is attempted to be made use of. Let us have the whole letter so that we can judge. Do not be so tender of our feelings. This Senate has had so much abuse from one end of the country to the other that a little more from the Attorney General of British Columbia would not hurt us a bit, and perhaps we can reply in such a way as will even things up. We have that capacity in this House, and I think we would exercise it under provocative circumstances.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I believe in reality there will be nothing in the letter. I will do my utmost—and it is good politics, it is good tactics—to bring the letter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But may I point out to my honourable friend that the opening statement of this return which has been brought down to the House, signed by the Secretary of State, reads as follows:

> Return to an Order of the House of Commons, dated March 12th, 1923, showing a copy of all correspondence between the Attorney General, the Hon. Alexander Manson, of British Columbia, and the Solicitor General in reference to the proposed amendment to the Canada Temperance Act.

Now, if my honourable friend suppresses the letter written by the Attorney General—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Not I; I am bringing it here.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But if my honourable friend retains the forcible possession of it, and refuses to disclose it to the Senate, he certainly does not bring it here. We know nothing about it, and I direct his attention to the statement of the Secretary of State, which statement, in face of the fact that the letter has not been brought down, is a misrepresentation—not a deliberate one, possibly—but a misrepresentation made to the House of Commons that all the correspondence was placed on the Table between those two gentlemen, the Attorney General of British Columbia and the Solicitor General of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But that would be a grievance of the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is likewise a grievance of this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is the question.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Because this return has been practically brought down to this Chamber, and the same statement is repeated, that all the correspondence has been placed upon the Table. Then, if we are to discuss this matter in the absence of a letter which is fundamental to the discussion of the entire subject, my honourable friend starts out by handicapping us at once. The Attorney General of British Columbia has not been slow to express himself in very forcible language in reference to the action of this Chamber last Session—misrepresenting, I say without hesitation, what the action of this Chamber was; and it is very desirable that the fullest disclosure should take place, and that there should be a very full discussion of the attitude taken by the Attorney General of British Columbia against this Chamber in dealing with this subject. This Chamber owes it to itself that nothing should be concealed, that disclosure should take place, and that the Attorney General of British Columbia should be made to understand that this Chamber is prepared to maintain its conduct in this matter.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may tell my honourable friend that personally I have nothing to hide; but I am somewhat perturbed by the fact that, correspondence having been asked for that letter of which I received a copy is not found in the return. There may be some reason.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It shows, then, that the return is incomplete.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the letter may have been deemed by the late Solicitor

General to have been a personal letter, and he may not have filed it in the record, but may have left for the Bench with that letter among his private correspondence.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He would have known enough to mark it private.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not discussing that. It is all very well to say that that letter was written there, but that letter may not be there. I have a copy.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why don't you produce it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I was about to read perhaps two-thirds of it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is the other third we want.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Read it all. Give it to us.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The reason why I cannot read it all is very simple: it is because I took some excerpts from the first page in order to have a good plea for the legislation. I took what I considered appertained to the second stage of the Bill before Parliament.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is it not a rule of the House that if a letter is read in part the whole letter must be laid on the Table?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then, what are you quibbling about? Let us have the letter.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friends should not forget this, that outside of the question it is physically impossible: I have not the first part here: I think I have it in my room, but it is not in my hand.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We will wait until you send for it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am told that that letter may not have been the official letter, since it was not laid on the Table of the Commons. I had forgotten all about that letter; but I found, just as my honourable friend opposite had found, in the following letter a reference to that one. I found this evening a reference to a letter which gave me the whole situation, so that I rushed to get it in order to have a full statement. I thought I had found the other statement, and I did find it: I have the full statement.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think the honourable gentleman is a past master in the art of camouflage.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; my honourable friend will not say that when he reads from Hansard the very first words that I used. I said: "I think I am doing better justice to the Attorney General by taking from a letter of his a statement of his case." But I will simply move the second reading, and perhaps I will be able to bring the whole letter, which will cover more ground than I intended to cover at the second reading.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Has my honourable friend red-pencilled the other third?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; I have got page 2, page 3—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It looks all right; it does not look very offensive.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: One moment: I was about to read all that to my honourable friend. I have got page 4. Simply the first page—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Have you got page 1?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I made an abstract of page 1.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, that won't do. That is a revised version. We desire to see the original.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friends ought to be thankful to me, because I found the letter that apparently the members for British Columbia and elsewhere were anxious to see, more especially from the fact that it had not been laid on the Table of the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me it is a very suspicious document, otherwise my honourable friend would not have to defend it in this way.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not defended anything. On the contrary, I was relying on it to convince the Chamber, and the last part I intended to read when the Bill came to Committee, because there is a very interesting part.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then let us have it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The only difficulty is that apparently it is not an official letter. I will move that this Order be discharged and placed on the Order Paper for to-morrow.

The motion for the discharge of the order was agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION BILL

SECOND READING POSTPONED

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 54, an Act to provide for the investigation of Combines, Monopolies and Mergers.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, we have before us an Act whose title gives clearly its purport. The definition clause indicates the object in view, which is restrictive.

In this Act, unless the text otherwise requires, the expression "combine" shall be deemed to have reference to such combines immediately hereinafter defined as have operated or are likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers, or others.

This legislation is not new; it is but a substitute for enactments which have been more than once sanctioned by our Parliament. The history of our legislation may be summarized as follows. The statute of 1889, which covers Conspiracies and Combinations in restraint of Trade, made those acts public offences. It was this statute of 1889 which was re-enacted in our Criminal Code of 1892 as section 520. It now stands as section 498. We subsequently had the Combines Investigation Act of 1910, providing for the investigating of combines, trusts and mergers, This Act was repealed by The Combines and Fair Prices Act of 1919, which was passed together with the Board of Commerce Act. The Board to be constituted was to enforce these two Acts. Since the courts have declared ultra vires the powers of that Board, the Combines and Fair Prices Act has ceased to operate. As section 11 of that Act provided that no prosecution could be commenced under section 498 of the Criminal Code, except under the written authority of the Board of Commerce, the recalling of the two Acts of 1919—the Combines and Fair Prices Act and the Board of Commerce Act—will revive fully that section 498 of the Criminal Code, and render it operative. So that to-day practically all the legislation that we passed on this matter has either been wiped out or has been paralyzed by section 11 of the Combines and Fair Prices Act, which suspended the operation of the Criminal Code except when put in motion by the Board of Commerce.

Why did we pass this legislation during the last thirty years? And why the present Bill? I surmise that they are the result brought about by the present condition of our society: because there are times when the mass of the people believe that they are being imposed upon and oppressed by capital and by various devices, the object of which is to squeeze them and grind them down. Human nature is naturally inclined that way. Our social fabric is undermined by suspicion, caused primarily by ignorance. This suspicion increases as prices for necessaries of life go soaring. It is all the easier to entertain suspicion when the process of evolution has brought us to an era of large associations and of big business; when the world, commercially speaking, has contracted, and its needs are supplied by large producers. Those people see those powerful associations dominating the world, they feel that they are enslaved by these modern Molochs, and they brood over their situation. All of a sudden we realize that we are facing a discontented people.

What can we do to remove that sense of impotency, and those causes of injustice which are real or imaginary? The people do not reason from effect to cause. The laws of economics are unknown to them. Very often these same laws are not discerned even by the savant or the scientist. How can the man in the street find his way in this labyrinth? He does not realize that he himself may furnish the cause, at all events one of the causes, of the grievances under which he smarts. Who will deny that the high wages rate to our railway men and to our coal miners has been the direct cause of the high cost of transportation, and has thereby affected the cost of living of all the people?

But, with the manifest inequalities of society, it is natural that the masses will mainly see the organizations which control the capital, the industries and the distributing agencies. They believe that at times these associations abuse their power to extort unconscionable profits.

Is it not our duty to put at their disposal a mode of action which they may use or not, but which will be within their reach? There have been coalitions and monopolies, which were detrimental to the public good: must no society be armed against them?

It is alleged that this instrument may become one of persecution, and that, moreover, all the necessary powers are to be found in the Criminal law and in the Customs and Patents Acts. If those powers are already in our statutes, is not the principle which underlies this present legislation already accepted and sanctioned by Parliament? If, as I have shown, this legislation merely embodies the principal enactments of preceding legislation, have we not to this day sanctioned those principles? Are we not now facing but a question of form and procedure? Why is it opportune to offer another mode of procedure in order to accomplish the same end?

I repeat, that all our legislation has gone by the board: since 1889 all the legislation directed against illegal or unjust combinations has been set at naught; the paralyzing of the Board of Commerce Act and the Combines and Fair Prices Act has laid dormant all the vitality that was to be found in the Criminal Code. Surely, if Parliament since 1889 has thought it necessary to provide against large combinations that would work to the detriment of the public, and if it has been good legislation for the last thirty years, then Parliament, when shown that another order of things prevail, will realize the necessity of similar legislation to protect the public.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Unfortunately, the legislation never was enforced.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Efforts were made to enforce it before the high tribunals of the realm, but with the disastrous results that we know of.

Why is it opportune to offer another mode of procedure in order to reach the same end? We have to-day on our Statute Book no Act which operates to the satisfaction of the public and of Parliament; and the matters which it is sought to examine into are too complicated and sometimes too technical for anybody to assume the risk and the cost of laying a complaint before the criminal courts. First, we must remember that aggrieved parties to-day have not even the Criminal Code to rely upon, because it has been paralyzed by an Act which is no more operative; and, secondly, if we were to leave the people that sole recourse, it would be very little to offer them in the way of a remedy. Members of this Chamber will realize that it is not easy for an individual to make an affidavit and assume the responsibility of summoning these institutions to court at the risk, in case of failure, of being sued for damages. Methods of operation which should be investigated are not easy to uncover. Generally there is secrecy in regard to these combines, and only minute investigation will disclose the injustice and illegality of their operations.

It is a matter for public authority to take in hand. The safeguards of the courts are not taken away; on the contrary, in virtue of this procedure, they are revived. Any inquiry under this Bill will not be found to be hurtful, because there is a measure of discretion surrounding the first stage of procedure. It will be said, and it has been said by the honourable gentleman from Manitoba (Hon. Mr. Bradbury), that the legislation to this date has not seemed to be very effective; yet, I think he will admit that the enactment of legislation which will bring before the public and before the courts those who would do an injury to the public will, in itself, be a sufficient deterrent in many cases.

In very many instances an investigation will be an advantage even for the institution which is suspected of violating the law. I will mention two instances which to-day are under investigation by this Parliament, which will go to show that an investigation is very often to the advantage of the institutions suspected of making unconscionable profits.

From quite a large section of this country we have heard considerable recrimination against the banks and the workings of the Bank Act. The banks have been examined from all angles, and for the last two months they have stood the test. Who will deny that this investigation has strengthened the whole financial fabric which is maintained by the Bank Act? Prejudices, suspicions, accusations of all kinds have fallen to the ground because the Bank Act has been examined and those who are responsible for the management of our institutions have been heard. I am quite sure that the banks to-day are in a better position in the public estimation than they were three months ago, even in those districts where they were most strongly assailed. Who will say any injury was caused to the banks by a flood of light being shed on their operations?

I will take another instance. There was a hue and cry raised against the sugar refiners. They were struck by the Budget delivered a few days ago, and claimed that the tariff proposed would operate to their detriment. During the last week most of our principal sugar refiners have come before a Committee of the other House to be investigated. Will anyone claim that it was not to their advantage to do so, and that they did not benefit by the investigation?

I am somewhat surprised to hear that the bringing forward of this legislation has caused some feeling in certain quarters. Why should there be any feeling? We have had just such legislation in this country for a number of years. I have read this Bill from the first line to the last, and have found it very clear and easy to understand; and if it goes to Committee, as I feel sure it will, I doubt very much that we will be able to improve on it. When honourable gentlemen look into the question, they will find that the Bill embodies the best that was to be found in the preceding legislation, so that the legislature of to-day is benefiting by the experience of the past. I know the Bill has been discussed adversely in many quarters in this country.

I have under my hand an article which has been distributed to the members of this Chamber taken from a monthly paper published in Toronto, and which contains a statement which I think will be found to be incorrect:

> Although proponents of this artifice to abash "good times" boasted on the floor of the House that their objective was to "cut the throats" of all combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers, the real intent of the act undoubtedly is to declare a combine illegal when its control limits the dealing in or enhances the value of any article. Unfortunately, however, the bill states without qualifications that any arrangement to fix a common price or to lessen manufacture or production shall be illegal—a very different matter from curbing a vicious trust striving further to increase the cost of living.

I believe that statement will be found to be absolutely erroneous. The simple fixing of a common price is not on its face a proof of unfair dealing; and I think the definition of the word "combine" will bear me out in the construction I put upon this Bill. I will not go further. I believe this Bill will help to allay the feelings of unrest which are noticeable in the country to-day, and will help to restore confidence in our institutions and in the power of the law to cope with all unjust dealings.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: How are they going to prove unjust dealings?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would prefer not to discuss the clauses of the Bill just now; I think my honourable friend will find the whole machinery quite sufficient to attain the desired end.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Can the honourable gentleman tell me whether it is proposed in the Bill to appoint a public prosecutor or to take charge of and prosecute any illegal combination brought to his attention?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is a Registrar to be appointed to receive complaints and to start an investigation; and he may, I believe, of his own initiative inquire into cases which he believes should be investigated.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: In my opinion all the legislation we have had along this line in years past has come to nothing as pointed out by the leader of the House, simply because there was nobody whose duty it was to take on himself the prosecution of any information that was laid; and unless a public prosecutor is appointed to take action under this Bill you might as well let the matter alone, because it will be nothing but camouflage.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am sure we have all been desirous of hearing the introductory remarks of my honourable friend in moving the second reading of this Bill. As the hour is somewhat advanced, I would suggest that we adjourn the further discussion of the Bill until to-morrow, so as to permit us to better digest the idealistic views of my honourable friend upon the efficacy of this legislation. Therefore I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend in his statement mentioned the fact that at some time or other the powers of the Board of Commerce had been declared ultra vires. I do not know whether my honourable friend has a memorandum before him indicating that; but I would like to know when that was done, and what were the powers the Board of Commerce was seeking to exercise which were declared ultra vires.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not the information before me. It was a special reference by the Government to the Supreme Court to test the constitutionality of the Board of Commerce.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I suggest that my honourable friend should have that information before him when we consider the Bill again.

The motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed was agreed to, and the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE HUDSON BAY ROUTE

DISCUSSION AND INQUIRY

Hon. RUFUS H. POPE rose in accordance with the following notice:

> That he will direct the attention of the Government to the importance of the Hudson Bay District, and will inquire of the Government what is being done to make the route available for traffic.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to place before this honourable body certain information that has come to me with reference to our northern possessions. Before doing so, however, I would crave the indulgence of the House while I review shortly the limited development that we have made in the way of transportation and other matters affecting Canada's vast areas. We have confined our activities to a strip of a few miles along the boundary line of the United States of America, with the fatal result that our people are always looking southward instead of northward for their future. The consequence is that we have to-day more Canadians of a certain kind in the United States than we have in Canada, and our people are going there more rapidly to-day than during any other period of Canadian history. If we are to become a nation, it cannot be by devoting our entire attention to a narrow strip of land crossing this continent. We are a northern people, and if we are to have a future it is important that we should begin to consider the value of the wonderful asset that nature has given to us in northern Canada. We have railroads crossing this continent for a distance of nearly 4,000 miles. In the centre we have a great agricultural community which to-day, to say the least, is dissatisfied: the members of a third party who sit in another place are the living evidence of that dissatisfaction. If half of what they say is true, the situation is serious, and we have to take into consideration their cry for assistance. I am not prepared to endorse everything they say, but at the same time I fully realize that if wheat and coal and other natural products have to be transported long distances under high freight rates, the development of that section of our country, which is very important to all of us, will be very slow and of a very doubtful character. Discontent of the people is a serious matter, and spreads a sentiment that we do not want in this country. Whether it be by the Maritime Provinces, calling for aid along certain lines, whether it be by means of motions in favour of secession, or whether it be the cry of men from the prairies for aid and assistance, there is nothing in these movements that spells success and prosperity for Canada.

If wheat and live stock are to find their best market in Europe, and apparently that is their final market, then I say we have to consider some outlet other than the eastern ports of Canada, involving a long haul by rail from the Great West down to the East. We have to shorten that haul and cut the freight rate at least in two, and we have to avoid a great deal of the cost of rehandling these products of the West. Some people say that we should do as we did in the old days, making our own cloth at home and educating our people in the little log school-houses. But that is not advancement. While that period did produce wise men and great women. we cannot afford to have our children go back to such conditions. We have to face the issue as it is; and if we are intelligently to work out the destinies of Canada we must give the boys on the farm a fair opportunity for enjoyment of the pleasures of life, or what we call advanced civilization; otherwise we cannot keep them there. If the farming community is not the cradle of loyal Canadian citizens, it becomes the home of undesirable people. It is either one thing or the other.

Viewing the question from this standpoint, I have been tempted to seek much information. No doubt some honourable gentlemen possess more information with reference to the northern country and the Hudson Bay route, and the value of the natural assets of iron and coal, or oil and precious minerals, and the wonderful fisheries, in that northern country than I do. If these wonderful assets are properly utilized, the cost to the rest of Canada to develop that northern country will not amount to anything in dollars and cents. Of course, if we follow the old line, and allow these natural assets to drift away from us for no consideration, the time will come when the people of Canada will have to pay dearly for their neglect.

Let us consider first the navigation. We are all well aware that previous to the war the German people were looking around the world with their scientists, no mean men, thoroughly and well they investigated our north country, about which they learned more than the people of Canada; they were investigating the country which they proposed to own some day, but which, thank God, they did not succeed in securing. In doing that they searched for the wonderful natural resources of Canada, and they found them. In planning for navigation they equipped unsinkable ships, big whalers that were able to navigate those straits every day for four months in the year. Of course, it was hard on the sailors on account of extraordinary weather, but they could navigate that northern route as early as the St. Lawrence route, and in 1913 they went in there on the 1st of May and came out and went in again as they pleased. The steamers remained in there all winter, and went into an open port called Eskimo, about 100 miles north of Churchill, without difficulty. Of course, the water does not freeze, as everybody must know; its temperature does not get low enough to freeze. They had floating ice at certain times of the year, but they claimed that there was no difficulty in always finding the channel which they could pass through to Port Churchill. This report to my mind opened a new book. While we have been familiar with the Hudson Bay for 300 years, more or less, we know that sailing vessels have gone in there every year, and the report states that during those three centuries only one boat was lost; therefore there is evidently some safety in navigating those waters. Those unsinkable ships of the Germans were built of reinforced concrete, and had several compartments, so that if anything happened to one compartment the cargo was not affected except in that one place. To repair those ships they had only to beach them; they did not need a dockyard or shipyard; and the engineers and the men who belonged to the crew could make the repairs; so that the ships could navigate those waters during that entire year of 1912-13. What is the result?

Those German people tell us in their report that we have up there the most wonderful deposits of hematite iron. Everybody knows that from our geological reports. There are also wonderful water-powers to be developed. Pig-iron is selling to-day in Montreal around $39. That iron could be delivered to our manufacturers for nearly one-half that price, and this would place our industrial people, so far as iron is concerned, in the very forefront of all the world. That iron deposit would develop foreign trade, which would find the world's markets in Europe and in any countries you choose to name. It would have a shorter distance and easier transportation than any other foreign iron.

The same remark applies to the wonderful fisheries of that northern country, which are of magnificent quality and unlimited in quantity, that should find their market in New York or anywhere across the seas. Those resources alone, if properly handled through an organization in the profit of which the Government shared, would go a long way towards the development of the country. But of course, if we do as we have done, parcel them out under license and receive no consideration for them, they become empty assets that we have given away as though the people never owned them. There are also extensive oil fields, and the cheapening of oil, of gasoline, and of similar products that are required in this eastern country, would be of enormous advantage. But you cannot do that with long railroad routes: you must shorten the distance, and you can best shorten it from Hudson Bay.

With regard to Port Nelson, I do not know any honourable gentleman who has studied that question who has felt confident about going there. You have 12 or 15 miles of shallow water before you get into deep water; you will have to build a concrete wall for that whole distance to protect the port from the ice coming down from the north; you will have to dredge that 12 miles, and continue to dredge it if you are going to navigate to and from that port. This will cost millions. Churchill is very much better.

I understand that, when we determined on Nelson, it was said that the area in front of Churchill was impossible; but I understand that since that time Mr. Tyrrell, one of our explorers from the Geological Survey, has found a natural way like a hog's back, almost a natural dump, for a railroad to Fort Churchill.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He found it before Nelson was selected.

Hon. Mr. POPE: So much worse for the people who selected Nelson. Eskimo is farthere north than either of those places, yet the Germans, from their experience in winter, found that the best place was Eskimo.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: How would you get to Eskimo?

Hon. Mr. POPE: By rail. This report has been handed to me therefore I thought it my duty to mention these facts since it was stated by the Government a little while ago that they proposed to continue the Hudson Bay railroad; but I do not know whether or not they are going to do anything with that railway. We have a Government to-day of peculiar promise. I have learned since that statement was made that they have taken up 100 miles of the steel and removed it. It may have been a wise thing to do; it may have been their fashion of redeeming promises. That is for them, not for me. I do not miss the hundred miles, because I think it was going in the wrong direction, but it is up to the Government to tell us what they are going to substitute for that 100 miles of steel if they have taken it up.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I do not think it is right to say that the Government has taken up 100 miles of rail.

Hon. Mr. POPE: I have been so informed.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I do not think that is correct. I believe they were about to take it up, but Sir Henry Thornton stopped it, and I do not think any rails have been taken up.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If they were going in the wrong direction, you ought to be pleased.

Hon. Mr. POPE: I am not going in the wrong direction at all, and I will tell you why—because if I made 90 guesses that the Liberal party would violate their promises, 89 of them would be sure to be right, so the chances are all entirely in my favour.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Are you satisfied now?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Perfectly.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Nothing more to say.

Hon. Mr. POPE: You would save in the transporting of grain from the prairies from 20 to 25 cents a bushel, and on 200,000,000 bushels that would amount to $50,000,000, which would be left with the farmers of the West instead of being taken away. You would shorten the distance to British Columbia by a thousand miles or more of rail. You cheapen the products and goods coming and going in and out of that country. You would give the people of Canada a better idea and more intelligent appreciation of the breadth of Canada, as well of its length, and I think it is very important that Canadians should begin to know and appreciate their own heritage. We cannot expect a few millionaires, sitting down in the valley of the St. Lawrence, who have got to be 60 or 70 years old, to take very much interest in this project. Their day has gone by. The best they can do is to hire some agent to speak for them. They will not be here, because nobody will elect them or appoint them to any place. It is only their agents who can be heard, and as a rule those agencies are the cheapest we have. I have digressed that far because I think I am right. The old men who have become rich in those valleys are of no use to the future development of Canada. They have got out of life what they are after; they are self-satisfied; they are jealous even of their own surroundings. Take a little village like Montreal: they are so jealous lest some ship might pass by that port; if it did, Montreal would collapse. Think of a ship going by Montreal; how fatal it would be; and to have traffic going through the north at half the price, for the benefit of the people Canada instead of paying tribute to Montreal on its way to Europe—the loss it would mean to Montreal. And when I speak of Montreal, I speak of one of the wealthy financial centers of Canada.

Now, there was a time when the West was just as open as the north is to-day. There was a set of young men who formed what is known as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and in spite of the Grits they built the road from ocean to ocean; they bought the land for Canada; they developed it; they put their money in; they had a hard trial, but they made money out of it in the end, and Canada prospered and developed, and remained Canada. But the West that was built was considered as cold and as chilly and as barren of possibilities as anything that is told to us to-day of the north of Canada.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: You might tell us on what dates the C.P.R. purchased the land you speak of.

Hon. Mr. POPE: I did not say they did; I said Canada purchased the land.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: And gave it to the C.P.R.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Yes, they gave them 30,000,000 acres, and $30,000,000, and so on. Whether they gave them too much or too little, they gave them so much that they made the greatest transporting organization in the world, and to-day it is the finest advertisement that Canada has. They did it in spite of you Grits—every one of you, whether you live East of West, black or white.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The Grits got the Crow's Nest Pass deal.

Hon. Mr. POPE: I say these things because they are historical. I do not say them because I am a Tory. I say them because I belong to and sympathize with the party that had the pluck and the courage and the men to do it. And now I am appealing to the Government, through their representatives in this House, to discover another set of men—to discover them, if you will, in your own party; I don't care. Let them have some courage for the north; let them put some effort forward to develop that country, and make a name, politically, for the organization to which they belong. I am sure they will have my support in a proper scheme of development, and we can carry it out cheaply to-day, because we have learned that it is unnecessary to give away so much of our assets as it was in those days.

We can develop this route we can put lines of steamers on there; we can build the railroad down to the coal fields and oil fields and grain fields, connecting with our own road of course. All of that can be done without one dollar in cash being put up by the Dominion of Canada. It can be done on a basis of fifty-fifty profit division, with the assets that lie in that country. This is not alone Berlin's statement that I have just been making, but it was made to me by men of sound business and financial ability, and I believe in it—that those assets are of sufficient value that, if properly disposed of, if handed over to proper organizations on the basis that when developed the profits will go fifty-fifty to Canada and the organizations that construct and build, we will not in the end pay one dollar of money, and the prosperity of Canada will be secured for the entire future. We will open up that country; we will put people in it; and Canada will prosper. Why, as long as forty years ago I saw as fine a sample of wheat as was ever grown anywhere, which was raised in the Arctic circle, and was on exhibition in the office of the Minister of Agriculture in Ottawa; yet we are to-day as far from developing that country and appreciating its value as we were forty years ago, with the exception of establishing a few plucky fellows who have gone up there to settle.

I remember asking a question of a man who had great confidence in the C.P.R. in its early days, and had a great deal to do with its construction. I asked him what he thought about the Hudson Bay route. He said it was absolutely practicable, but he added, "You must remember we have to keep still about that now, or the bondholders in England will get frightened, and we will not be able to dispose of the bonds and stock of the C.P.R. in order to complete its construction; but the future of the Hudson Bay is as assured as that of the road we are going to build now is bound to be a great railroad in the future." I would like to ask the honourable leader of this House for the fullest information with regard to the construction of the Hudson Bay road.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the honourable gentleman be good enough to tell us what is that wonderful report that makes the north look like fairy-land? Where can we get it? The honourable gentleman has found certain information, something marvellous, about a regular Eldorado up there, according to that report, and we would like to see it. The honourable gentleman was fortunate enough to get it, and it would be a gracious thing on his part if he would let the other members read that report. He might convince us after a while that there is no ice at all up there, and that navigation is possible all the year around. While the honourable gentleman is giving us that information, he might give us the name of the concrete ship he puts on the bank for repairs, and the tide does not come up. I suppose that just as Joshua stopped the sun, the German stopped the tide from coming up, and simply said, "Hold on, I am repairing my ship." Let us have the names of the concrete ships that were there, and also where we can get the report.

Another thing the honourable gentleman spoke about was the wonderful fisheries. When the Senate Committee inquired into the Hudson Bay route, it was proven that there were no fish in the bay itself. I myself went to the Fisheries Department and inquired. However, would the honourable gentleman give us the name of that report, or tell us where it is to be found. Is it in the Library?

Hon. Mr. POPE: No. You can get it in Berlin. I told you that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may inform my honourable friend that the Government has not up to this time examined into the feasibility of the Hudson Bay route; but I will draw the attention of my colleagues to his remarks. My honourable friend has spoken of the railway route. In view of the present state of our finances this is a very considerable undertaking. I think it is the intention to try to maintain that part of the railway which is already constructed, and to operate part of it in order that the millions that have been invested in it will not be lost. Further than that I cannot go. I shall be glad to bring to my honourable friend any further information which I may be able to gather.

Hon. G. W. FOWLER: I should like, with the leave of the House, to say to the Minister that as Chairman of the Committee on the Hudson Bay route, I am quite familiar with the conditions existing up there so far as we got them from the evidence put before the Committee. We held a very exhaustive inquiry into this matter, and there is no question in my mind, and the report made to the House so states, that the port of Nelson should not have been selected, but rather Churchill, or Eskimo, which is still further north. A diversion of the line for about 60 miles would have been necessary in order to reach Churchill. The engineers claimed that there was no practicable route across a certain extent of muskeg which lay between the Pas line and Churchill; but both the Tyrrells, who gave evidence, said that there was a natural deposit, evidently from glacial times, which made a first-class railway route all the way to Churchill, and that this difficulty with regard to the muskeg could have been overcome if that route had been followed. You would then have a deep water terminus, which, at a very small expense could be very greatly enlarged, and which would give a perfectly safe harbour, no mater what the direction of the wind might be. Nelson is 20 miles from deep water, on a tortuous channel down which in the spring comes ice from the river, which is brought back again with the tide. For this reason it is impossible to maintain buoys to mark the channel; and without buoys to mark the channel it is impossible to navigate. This condition reduces the time during which vessels can enter Nelson by a month or six weeks at least.

I regretted very much to see that the Minister of Railways had announced that he thought Nelson was the right place for the port, and that it was the place the Government were going to adopt. I think he is making a mistake which will injure the Hudson Bay route for a long time to come. The expense of building the necessary terminals at Nelson would be very great. A considerable amount of money has already been spent there, of which two-thirds, I have no doubt, will be lost because of the lapse of time and lack of maintenance during that time. I am as strongly in favour of the Hudson Bay route as my honourable friend from Compton (Hon. Mr. Pope). I believe that it will some day be an important route. I cannot understand the feeling that exists on the part of some people that live at ports now in use—a feeling of jealousy towards another port or route being established.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is there such a feeling? I have never noticed it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: My honourable friend would not notice it; he lives in the clouds.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I live in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You live in the clouds mentally. You do not have these feelings. You are so high-minded that you cannot think that there would be such a feeling in the breasts of others. But this feeling does exist, and we have seen instances of it. When there was some talk about the deepening of the St. Lawrence, a certain honourable gentleman who is a very popular member of this House spent some three hours of his own time and of the public's in trying to show that the proposal was an absolute absurdity; and why? He thought it would injure Montreal.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: You should not impute motives.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I am not naming anybody, so I am perfectly safe on that point.

This is a very great country, and there is room in it for expansion in every direction; and that is what we want. We want to get people in, and when they are here to satisfy them, so that we can keep them here. What is the good of bringing immigrants into his country and spending ten years or so in educating them, and having them leave to go to another country because they are dissatisfied? The western people think they have a grievance, and they think the Hudson Bay route would help them out; and in many respects it would. Now that the embargo has been removed from Canadian cattle, that route should be of assistance because of the short rail haul and the longer water haul.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: It is a shorter water haul too.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But the water haul would be longer than the rail haul, and the cattle improve during the time they are on the water, while they shrink when they are being carried by rail. So that would be the route for the cattle trade.

There can be no doubt in the mind of any man who has read upon the subject, or who has given it any attention whatever, unless he is blinded by the old myths that it is nothing but a frozen region and fit for nothing but the polar bear, that there is great potential mineral wealth in that country. That country has been found to be tremendously wealthy, and it cannot be exploited unless there is some means of communication with it. For all these reasons, I have been, ever since the matter was first broached, a strong believer in the Hudson Bay route. When I was in the House of Commons although I was in opposition, I voted for it when it was introduced by the Laurier Government because I believed in the future of that whole northern country. I think it has great potentialities. It is easy to sneer and say: "Oh, it is all frozen." It does not require very much brain power to speak in that way; but to a thinking man, a man who has a desire to study this question, the facts show that there is a great future ahead of that country. As the honourable member from Compton (Hon. Mr. Pope) said, if this country is going to be only a narrow strip across the continent north of the United States boundary, it can have no great future. We boast that we have the largest portion of the North American continent, and therefore we feel that we shall eventually become the greatest country on that continent. Of course, the country to the south of us has a great start of us; we admit that; and it will take a long time to overcome it. I shall not see the change; you will not see the change; but we do not live for ourselves alone. We must live for the future. If the men who were responsible for the building of the Canadian Pacific railway and the acquisition of the Northwest Territories had thought only of themselves and their own times, that railway would never have been built, and that great territory would never have been acquired for Canada. But those men had vision: they saw the possibilities of this country in the future. They built perhaps better than they knew, but not better than they dreamed. The men who have done great things in the world have been men of vision—men who dreamed greatly. That is what has made the British Empire what it is: men have gone out to the uttermost parts of the earth and have conquered them and made them part of the British Empire.

I hope the Government will prosecute the Hudson Bay scheme, and, before they spend millions of dollars upon the port of Nelson, they will be well advised to look into the ports of Churchill and Eskimo.

THE FRENCH CONVENTION BILL

SECOND READING POSTPONED

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 23, an Act respecting a certain Convention of Commerce between His Majesty and the President of the French Republic.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, we have before us a new commercial convention with France. France is the only country which, up to the signing of the recent treaty with Italy, had an association with us in treaty making. As every member of this Chamber knows, the first treaty with France was signed in 1893 by Sir Charles Tupper representing Canada. It was superseded by the treaty of 1907-8, which remained in force up to 1921; in 1921 another provisional treaty was signed by my right honourable friend the late Minister of Trade and Commerce (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster); and we have now this treaty which replaces the one of 1921.

The treaty of 1893 was somewhat restricted in its scope; the one of 1907 being much wider. The trade expansion under the treaty of 1907 was gradual and fairly pronounced. On the 10th of September, 1918, the French Government gave a general notice denouncing and terminating nearly all their treaties with the world. Apparently, under the new conditions which had arisen from the war, they wanted greater freedom of action to meet those new conditions. Nevertheless the French Government agreed to continue the treaty of 1907-8, with a shorter time for denunciation, namely, three months, and this agreement was confirmed by our Parliament in 1919. In 1920 Canada took the initiative in denouncing the treaty at short notice. I do not know all the reasons that militated in favour of the denunciation of that treaty by the Canadian Government, but I surmise that Canada also, in the rearrangement of its tariff, wanted to be free from the obligations imposed upon her by the treaty of 1907. This denunciation caused considerable alarm and confusion among those people who were purchasing from and selling in France; for a certain period our traders were all up in the air. Orders had been received and given, and they did not know whether or not they would be detrimentally affected by this denunciation.

In order to meet that situation, the Canadian Government decided to move towards a new provisional agreement to conserve the trade advantages that accrued to Canada under the convention of 1907. The result of the action of the Canadian Government was the signing by my right honourable friend of the provisional agreement of which I have spoken. Under this provisional arrangement the French introduced a new system of barter, which they thought was more flexible than the rigid lines of the minimum and general tariffs. They granted percentages between the minimum and general tariffs. This treaty, as I have said, was essentially provisional, and was made to preserve the existing commercial relations. It will be seen by the preamble of the Act that this was to be superseded by an agreement which should be negotiated without delay.

The first phrase of the agreement of 1921 was:

> Pending the conclusion of a new commercial convention, with a view to which negotiations will begin immediately, the French and Canadian Governments have agreed to the following provisions.

They continued, practically, with some changes, the Treaty of 1907. They reduced the rates on some of the articles we enjoyed under the minimum tariff, they added some to the minimum tariff, and they placed a certain number of articles on a percentage basis between the general tariff and the minimum.

These provisions of the Treaty had hardly been signed, and had not yet been sanctioned by our Parliament, when France made a move which surprised Canada to some extent, and created anxiety in the minds of the people who were interested in French trade, by raising its general tariff under power that Parliament had given the Government. They issued a decree called the Decree of March, 1921, by which they increased the general tariff to a considerable degree—from 200 to 300 per cent, and over.

The French Consul at that time, or just after our provisional treaty had been approved by this Parliament, asked that negotiations should be opened for a new convention, basing his suggestion upon the preamble of the Act, or that statement under which both parties were to begin negotiations immediately. The answer of my right honourable friend (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster), who was at the head of the Trade and Commerce Department, was, I would take it, a dilatory answer; he did not consent to open negotiations at the time, because circumstances did not lend themselves to that action being taken, and he did not answer in an affirmative way.

Such was the situation when the present Government took office. It found itself confronted with three questions to settle. There were two French complaints, so to speak, which we had to answer, and there was one Canadian complaint. The Department of Trade and Commerce had interpleaded that provisional arrangement as covering simply the importations from France, and not those from the French colonies. That was one of the complaints of the French Government. They also complained that we were not complying with our obligation, which I have already mentioned, in opening without delay the negotiations for a permanent treaty. The Canadian Government, on its side, was protesting against the Decree of March, 1921, which raised the French general tariff to an extreme degree, not only, I will say, against Canadian goods and against those of many other countries, but which was freeing the United States from this exorbitant increase of rates on the general tariff. This decree put Canada into a very inferior position in competition with American goods, and our manufacturers were vehemently protesting.

When the French Consul objected that we were excluding the French colonies from the benefit of our tariff, we set up, against that, the grievance of the decree raising the general tariff against Canadian goods. The answer was somewhat surprising: it was the following: The French are not protesting because of material losses, inasmuch as the Canadians are exporting to the French colonies ten times more than they are receiving from them. That is, it is simply a principle, a sentiment; we do not want to appear to treat our French colonies with indifference, and we were negotiating for them as well as for France. As to the grievance which we were setting up against theirs, the answer was: "You complain that the general tariff has been raised against Canadian goods; we can settle that very easily if you will simply agree to open negotiations and get into conference with us, as you have bound yourself by treaty to do." We had simply to honour our signature, and to proceed to the making of a new arrangement.

I go into these details because some who view with more favour the old convention continued by the provisional one have asked the question: "Why did you reopen negotiations since present conditions prevailing under the Treaty of 1921 were quite satisfactory?" I do not admit that the convention which I am now presenting to this Chamber is less favourable, nor that the present conditions are not satisfactory. We were obligated to enter into new negotiations by the treaty of 1921, as I said, and I draw the attention of this Chamber to the fact that we were not exactly in the same position as the Government that presided over the destinies of this country in 1920, because that Government was not obliged to denounce the Treaty of 1907. It did so; it was the action of Canada; but it did so freely, and it took the initiative. That is because in 1921 and 1922 we could not do otherwise than abide by the signature of my right honourable friend who had obligated himself and this country to enter immediately into new negotiations.

It may be urged by those who dislike some features of this treaty that if we were obliged to negotiate we were not obliged to agree to the treaty. My answer is that while we were not obliged to agree to any treaty that we would deem injurious to the interests of Canada, yet if we did not sign a treaty we had to face the situation squarely. We fell under the general tariff of France, which, as I think no one will gainsay, was and is practically prohibitive. Instead of falling under the general tariff—which I affirm would have been our fate if we had refused to enter into negotiations, because the French were not disposed to continue this provisional agreement, but were bound to replace it by a permanent one—we got first, the minimum French tariff on an important list, which my honourable friend will find in Schedule A; second, we got notable reductions from the general tariff in Schedule B; and third, we got—what is no mean advantage—equality of treatment with the United States.

Now, I have to affirm that the general tariff of France would have practically meant the loss of that market. The question then arises: is the French market worth cultivating? What do statistics show? Our exports to France in 1908, at the beginning of the application of the treaty of 1907-8, were $1,806,732; in 1914 they were $3,810,562; from 1914—I leave aside the exceptional abnormal exportations of Canada to France, and come to 1922—we exported in 1922 $8,248,438 of goods. Last year, 1923, we exported $14,175,- 091; that is the last report we have, October, 1922, but it is made in 1923.

France is to-day our third biggest customer. Great Britain is our largest market; the United States comes second. The United States would probably be our natural market if we were not hindered by the high tariff wall which prevents us from selling to that country; I assume that and do not suppose I incur contradiction. But last year, in spite of that high wall, while we were selling Great Britain $372,067,445 worth of goods we were increasing our sales to the United States to $369,080,218. What would the statistics say if we had free access for our natural products to the United States? Since we decided in 1911 that we did not want ingress to the advantages of the American market, we must look for markets far away across the Atlantic.

Our manufacturers have been anxious to enter the French market. As I have said, the general tariff would have been quite prohibitive. We obtained a large list under the minimum tariff, covering most of our important products, and we obtained the guarantee that as respects this list no country would get better treatment. As regards Schedule B, we are assured that we shall receive the best treatment that will ever be enjoyed by the United States, which is our most active rival in the French market for the goods that we are sending there. As to Schedules A and B, our position under this new arrangement will never be inferior to that of the United States. And not only does our present inferiority disappear, but in Schedules A and B our situation in very many particulars is superior to that of the United States.

When the decree of March, 1921, was applied against Canadian goods by the French Government, although that decree affected solely the articles that we were selling under the general tariff, very many protests were made by our Canadian manufacturers, and the late Minister of Trade and Commerce, being in receipt of those protests, started an inquiry tending to remove the inequality of treatment under which our traders were smarting. The Canadian Manufacturers Association filed this official statement with the Government on the 12th of February, 1922:

> The French Government, although not obliged by treaty to do so has exempted United States goods from increases applicable under the French general Tariff, while it continues to apply those increases against Canadian goods.
> The result is that on Canadian goods (other than the few lines which, by treaty, are subject to the French minimum tariff rates) France levies double to three times as much duty as she levies on similar goods imported from the United States.
> We placed these facts before the previous government, but so far France has made no change in these arrangements of her tariff.
>
> The following Canadian products, among others, now suffer under this tariff discrimination if shipped to France: wrought iron, iron bars, steel bars, tubes welded or not, furniture, pianos and organs, phonographs, varnishes, machine tools, locks, many forms of hardware, metallurgical alloys and substances, spirits, valves, brass goods, implement parts, shafts, screws, bolts, link belting, spark plugs, etc. . .
> We respectfully urge upon your Government the necessity of pressing for the immediate removal of said tariff discrimination.

Every item mentioned in this list is now placed upon even terms with the same article coming from the United States. Here is a comparative statement showing the difference between the duty levied on parts of agricultural machinery imported from Canada and the same duty on the machinery partly imported from the United States. This is a statement of the tariff now in force, which will be replaced by the new arrangement if it is adopted in this Canadian Parliament. I read that statement to indicate what the increase in the general tariff of France had produced as an inequality between the Canadian trader and the American:

This is the present condition as affecting one particular industry in this country, namely, that engaged in the making of agricultural implements. This discrimination now disappears. And let us not lose sight of the fact that this is only a matter which affects the general tariff. This incident, to my mind, is a clear indication of the value of the French market and of the advantage of fair treatment by treaty. How much more important still is it for us to obtain material reductions? In schedule A there are over 100 articles mentioned in which the rates are much below the American rates; and many are below the old treaty rates. In schedule B there are increases and decreases when compared with the old treaty, but in many instances the new rates are below the United States rates. It is quite true that we do not as yet sell a number of these articles, but in very many instances the manufacturers have asked for the inclusion of such articles because of their intention to develop a trade in the French market. Naturally, we must provide for extension.

Now, what does Canada give in return for the advantages that accrue to her under this arrangement? The advantages which we give the French in the Canadian market are to be found in schedules D, E, and F. Schedule D gives a list of French products which will be received here under fixed rates of duty. We had such a list of fixed rates in the treaty of 1907, although I admit that the present arrangement contains an enlarged list. If honourable gentlemen will make a calculation they will find the rates to be a little below those of our intermediate tariff. On some items, when our preferential and intermediate tariff rates are the same, the reduction applies to both; but in nearly all the British are not competing to any extent with the French. The principal item on the fixed rates list is wines of lower strength, on which we have the same rates which prevailed under the treaty of 1907. On stronger wines, our rates having been increased, no reductions from our intermediate tariff rates are given—the rates are the same as those to be found in the agreement of 1921.

It is argued that not only are we reducing our tariff upon French luxuries ,but that we are at the same time reducing our duties on similar articles coming from Japan, Switzerland, and other countries enjoying the most favoured treatment. I answer that argument by saying that the Canadian buyers will not be hurt by these reductions, and that in some instances these luxuries are the raw materials of Canadian manufacturers.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What have you done in the matter of French motor cars?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend will allow me, I will answer him when we go into Committee on the details of the tariff.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Have you reduced the rates on the general tariff?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would have to go into the tariff itself to find out how they are dealt with.

It has been alleged that the people who are likely to be most benefited by the rates which we grant to France and the other countries that will come under the arrangement, will be the more prosperous people—the privileged classes. In answer to that representation, I may say that it is very difficult to make an arrangement to enter the French market without being obliged to allow reductions on the goods that France produces, and that most of the goods produced by France which will reach this country are in that category. But it is not only the rich people in Canada who will benefit by these reductions. I am satisfied that a great number of what might be called the middle classes in Canada will also enjoy to a considerable degree the benefits of the reduced customs duties on those articles; and if the most prosperous people happen to have an advantage in the purchase of those goods, I think that our various systems of taxation, including our income tax, are arranged in such a way as to reach them.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think they have.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It has been said that we shall lose revenue. That would be fatal. The French also will be losing revenue through the reductions which they have made on our goods. But we are in hopes of increasing our trade. Lower duties do not necessarily mean loss of income; very often the contrary is the case. I think my right honourable friend will bear me out in that statement.

It has been said, and we may hear it again, that this convention will help the trade of the nations having the benefit of the most favoured nation treatment. I answer that by pointing out that when dealing with these nations on even terms both countries benefit by the arrangement. It will tend to increase our trade both ways. We cannot deny the fact that he who wishes to sell must be disposed to buy. The balance of trade with the countries which have the advantage of the most favoured nation clause in those treaties which my honourable friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) mentioned a few days ago, is largely in favour of Canada.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: With all of them?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Here is the statement which I have in my hand of the value of imports into Canada during the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1923:

Argentine Republic: value of imports into Canada, $3,075,934; value of exports of Canadian goods to Argentine Republic, $4,445,041.

Colombia: value of imports into Canada, $360,509; value of exports of Canadian goods to Colombia, $127,820.

We can hardly help ourselves so far as Colombia is concerned, inasmuch as coffee is our principal import from that country.

Denmark: value of imports into Canada, $119,315; value of exports of Canadian goods to Denmark, $2,243,861.

Italy: value of imports into Canada, $1,598,477; value of exports of Canadian goods to Italy, $12,073,332.

All these countries will benefit by the advantages we give France.

Japan: value of imports into Canada, $7,211,015; value of exports of Canadian goods to Japan, $14,510,133.

Norway: value of imports into Canada, $560,042; value of exports of Canadian goods to Norway, $2,216,756.

Sweden: value of imports into Canada, $485,522; value of exports from Canada, $2,574,262.

Venezuela: value of imports into Canada, $294,305; value of exports from Canada, $512,499.

The only country that appears to have a balance of trade in its favour, with the exception of Colombia, is Switzerland, which sold to us $7,735,538, and to which we sold in return only $519,196. When this state of affairs was mentioned to a Swiss representative he said that it was their misfortune to be a land-locked state, that they had to receive their goods from afar through other countries, and that they were quite sure they were receiving Canadian goods to a larger extent than was indicated by their customs returns. They claimed that quite a large amount of our goods go to them through Great Britain and other countries bordering on the Atlantic.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the $7,000,000 made up of?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not a statement of what Switzerland sells us.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It must be of German goods in transit.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Switzerland is active in quite a number of lines, and is pressing France in articles of luxury. When I was in France at one time, I had occasion to discuss tariff conditions, and I was in contact with Senator Viger, who had just been negotiating a treaty between France and her neighbour, Switzerland.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: For what year are the figures which my honourable friend has just given?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The year ending the 31st of March last.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I did not hear the honourable gentleman read the report of Spain's trade with us.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may say, in reference to Spain, that an effort is being made to come to some new arrangement. I do not know to what extent the negotiations have proceeded, but I know that Great Britain has lately negotiated a treaty with Spain, and the question of Canada coming under it has been mooted.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask a further question? I understand that two discussions are now merged into one, or are about to be—the resolutions for an inquiry which I had the honour to move before this House concerning the most favoured nation clause, and the consideration of the French treaty. Do I understand that the remarks of my honourable friend are addressed to the most favoured nation clause? And do they imply the answer of the Government?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may say that I am not giving the official answer of the Government; I am giving what I believe to be the attitude of the Department most interested in the study of these problems—that Canada should not lose any sleep over the present situation, inasmuch as the advantages that accrue to Canada under these conditions seem to be manifest, and we cannot expect anything better than the best that these countries will give to any country in the world, and that under these arrangements we are extending our trade to an appreciable degree. I am simply giving an impression without being in a position to state that the matter has been deliberated upon and settled ne varietur.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Did the honourable gentleman give the total amount of our exports to France?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Our exports to France for the last year were $14,118,577, and our imports $12,250,376.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I cannot find anything on that motor car business.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will try to obtain the information for my honourable friend. I readily admit that it is quite a difficult problem to be able to prophecy as to the possibilities of trade in years to come under this instrument. There are so many economic conditions that vary and intervene and alter the trend of trade that it is really only by experience that we can test the value of a treaty arrangement. Let us hope that under this agreement Canada will benefit greatly; and let us not forget that, although we enter into treaties with sentiments and desires of certain permanence, we can by experience shape our course differently at a certain moment. We can always go out of a treaty, as we did in the case of the Treaty of 1907, by its denunciation in 1920. I hope that there will be no occasion for Canada retracing its steps, but that both France and Canada will find mutual advantage in developing their trade under this agreement.

I beg to move the second reading of this Bill.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Honourable gentlemen, I am rather perplexed and sorry that I am not able to go on at the present moment in taking up a line, brief in the main, on what I think is a fair criticism of the measure which has been brought down. I had an idea that this afternoon was to be devoted to the two other Bills which we started in on yesterday, and I left all my notes at my house. Now, I do not want to delay the work of the Senate for a single moment; but I shall be prepared to go on to-morrow afternoon, and I think there is other business that we may go into for to-day. I am as anxious as possible to get through with this measure, and I thank my honourable friend and the Senate for the adjournments which have been made owing to my absence last week. If any other gentleman wishes to pursue the discussion now, that would be quite in order, and I could adjourn the debate, or, if my honourable friend feels that the pressure of business is so great in respect of this measure that he would rather go on with it, I will not raise an objection, although I would much rather have a little time to discuss the matter with him.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I was in hope that as we returned this week we could advance to at least one degree each of these important Bills that are before us; and I wonder if there are not some members of the Senate who would be disposed to express their views on the Treaty, and allow my right honourable friend till either this evening or to-morrow to get his notes and proceed. Or, perhaps, if the second reading is not to be challenged, we could perhaps take the second reading, and put down this Bill for the Committee stage to-morrow, and my honourable friend could then make his general remarks on the Bill when we go into Committee; so that I would feel that we had somewhat advanced our work. But I do not insist.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Then, if my honourable friend consents, I move the adjournment of the debate, and will take it up to-morrow.

The motion agreed to, and the debate was adjourned.

THE ITALIAN CONVENTION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 153, an Act respecting a certain Trade Convention between His Majesty and the King of Italy.

He said: Representatives of the Canadian Government who were in France negotiating the treaty which I have just laid before you for a second reading, met representatives of His Majesty the King of Italy in London and had a brief conference over the opportunity of agreeing to conditions of trade between Canada and Italy which would be mutually satisfactory. After an exchange of views the Canadian representatives felt that they could do nothing better than offer the Italian Government the most favoured nation treatment in the Canadian market in exchange for similar treatment for our own goods in the Italian market.

I have just indicated the formidable advantage which we have already in exchange of commodities with the Italian people. The most favoured nation treatment gives this advantage, that, whatever we may do, whatever Italy may do, whatever advantages it may offer in treaties negotiated and signed to-morrow, or at some time in the distant future, Canada will have, ipso facto, similar advantages in Italy. This view being that of the present Government, the representatives of Canada were authorized to sign this arrangement which is before us. I have yet to hear any criticism, and I will with considerable interest await the criticism of my honourable friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) on this arrangement, which grants both countries the most favoured nation treatment, and sanctions the principle as far as this country is concerned.

I move the second reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. Barnard in the Chair.

On section 1—short title:

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have very few remarks to make, but I would like my honourable friend to inform me why we need to have a special treaty with Italy when we are under the regime of the most favoured nation clause. What is the meaning of the most favoured nation clause? It means that any advantage granted to any other nation is extended automatically to Italy. After three months of hard work the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries finally put their signature to a new treaty with France whereby duties were reduced for French goods, and automatically they were reduced for Italy; there can be no doubt as to that. Now, whenever Italy enters into a compact with any other nation, the result of which would be a reduction of rates on foreign goods entering Italian territory, the same reduction will be automatically extended to Canada. I would like to know what is the value of the treaty now before us, which repeats exactly the condition which existed prior to that treaty?

I will go further, since my honourable friend has been good enough to ask for the expression of my sentiments, and ask: what is the sense—if I may put it in that crude way—of having the most able men of Canada —and I class Mr Fielding in that category—go to France and discuss item by item the advantages that Canada will get, and what advantages Canada will in exchange concede to France, taking into account in that discussion the special conditions and productions of both countries, the natural outlet for the foreign trade of each, knowing that it is to our advantage to export our wheat and flour, and equally advantageous for France to export her silk tissues, her ribbons, her embroidery, her wines, her olive oil or olive soap, etc? What is the use of having this pact prepared with care, fitted to measure, so to speak, for each country? Picture to yourself Mr. Fielding building up with France a foreign trade that suits Canada as closely as a glove fits a hand; appealing for concessions because they are necessary; giving in exchange concessions because they are of value to France and will give us in exchange advantages worth while. What is the use of doing that, with great care—in one word, having obtained the arrangement best suited for one country, and then, without a second thought, applying to Italy this carefully-made arrangement suited exclusively for France? In other words, we make a suit of clothes for our relations with France, constructing it with care for three months, and then we take that suit of clothes and put it on our trade with Italy, which in many respects is completely different from our trade with France. But is not that the consequence of the most favoured nation clause? I repeat, what has the Government done? What is the use of this treaty that is already completed for us? It was done over 30 years ago for us by Great Britain and it exists today: my honourable friend cannot deny that. Why, then, should we have this treaty to repeat exactly what exists?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What does my honourable friend mean by using the words, repeating exactly what exists to-day? Does he want to convey the idea that up to the moment we signed the treaty we had the enjoyment of the same treatment with Italy?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I mean to say that by this new treaty you profess to extend to Italy the advantages that you have given to France. I say that that had already been done, because at the very hour that you signed your treaty with France there existed a treaty that did it automatically. I say that, because Italy is one of the nations enjoying the most favoured nation clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But we were not enjoying it with the Italians.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I beg my honourable friend's infinite pardon: the most favoured nation clause is a reciprocal clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: And therefore what Italy granted to any country in the world as a reduction had to come to us automatically.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In virtue of what instrument?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: In virtue of the treaty made by Great Britain for us before we were a Confederation.

Hon. Mr DANDURAND: But I do not see, in the list of countries enjoying the most favoured nation treatment in Canada, the mention of Italy.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Oh yes, Italy belongs.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The name of Italy is not mentioned in the memorandum of the 4th of May, 1921, which is attached to the agreement made with France in 1921, and headed, "The following is a revised list of countries accorded the most favoured nation treatment by Canada." That is signed by the Commissioner and the Deputy Commissioner of Customs.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I must admit that is a very sound authority. I would ask for leave to consult the authoriites that I have on the subject; but I am absolutely convinced that Italy has the advantage of the most favoured nation clause.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I think my honourable friend is labouring under a misapprehension in that respect. There was an arrangement made between Italy and Canada in 1910 by Order in Council, which was permitted under the powers that we had, embracing a certain number of articles, but not calling on either side for most favoured nation treatment. I do not think my honourable friend will find that Italy to-day is in the list of most favoured nations. She enjoys, as Canada enjoys in Italy on a certain list of articles, certain benefits in this market, but not the most favoured nation treatment.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Subject to correction and verification, I would nevertheless submit that a treaty made with a great deal of care with a nation, and taking into account all the conditions peculiar to that nation, cannot be applied holus bolus to another nation; that is, if we wish to obtain from the treaty the greatest possible advantages. You cannot deal with a country like Italy as you would deal with France. There are certain articles, the export of which you could stimulate towards the Italian market, the export of which you could not reasonably expect to stimulate towards the French market. If it is worth while taking three months of arduous labour to obtain the best possible reciprocal treatment between two countries, why extend the same terms to another nation—to Italy—and expect the same advantages as if the treaty were made specially with Italy?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Would the honourable gentleman tell us whether the articles included in the French treaty would be imported into Italy under the Italian treaty, and whether the articles imported into Canada from France would be the same as the articles imported from Italy into Canada?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is the basis of my whole argument. I contend not. I contend there is a difference in the productions of both countries. I will give an example which I think cannot be challenged. You can get from Italy very good strong wines, but very few good light wines. In France the reverse is the case: you can get excellent light wines, including burgundy and champagne, but very few, if any, heavy wines like port and sherry. The same is true of many other things. Then, why not use such advantages as the Italian market can give us? Why not go to the Italian as we go to the Frenchman, and say to him: "My friend, you need an outlet for certain of your goods. Very good: I am free from the shackles of the most favoured nation clause, and am going to give you advantages that nobody else will share. I am completely free, and what I give you is a real advantage in toto, and not a fraction of an advantage. I will give your heavy wines the privilege of my market. What are you going to give me in exchange?"

Look at the position in which we are to-day. Look at Mr. Fielding when he dealt with France, shackled as he was by the most favoured nation clause. He went over to France and said to the Frenchmen: "I am going to make a real sacrifice for you: I am going to cut the tariff very low on certain items." He enumerated the items which France exports in great quantities. The French people must have smiled, and said: "My friend, the advantage is only mine to the extent of five per cent. You give that advantage to Japan, with whom I cannot compete because of the ridiculously small amount that Japan pays for skilled labour.' They would say to Mr. Fielding: "But your advantage is only a very small fraction of the advantage which you pretend to give to us, because you give to Switzerland, which now manufactures ribbons, for instance, with German labour, very often living across the frontier, and with German money and German machinery, the advantage of the same reduction. You do not give it to me." It is quite evident from our statistics that when Mr. Fielding went to France and professed to make reductions for the French manufacturers, he did very little for the industry of France. What he did was to work for these other nations which were making similar goods with very much cheaper labour. I do not know that this is wise. If Mr. Fielding had been free from Switzerland and Japan, he would have gone with a clientèle worth $30,000,000 or $40,000,000, instead of one worth $10,000,000 or $12,000,000. Would not Mr. Fielding then have been able to obtain real and substantial concessions for certain of our goods which are essentially Canadian? And how could he be expected to obtain them if he could not really dispose of the Canadian market? Now he does not dispose of it at all. The most favoured nation clause disposes of it. I do not want to labour the point any longer; but, notwithstanding what my honourable friend said a moment ago in reference to the most favoured nation clause, I for one am sorry to say that I am not convinced as to the wisdom of this treaty.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think the argument of my honourable friend would be fairly debatable, and would have some merit if he presented simply this small part of the picture: Canada facing France and Italy. I admit that it would seem strange if, after having wrestled with the French experts for conditions which would especially fit Canada and France, we were to go over the Alps and offer Italy the same treatment. But this is but a very small portion of the whole situation, and I draw the attention of my honourable friend to this wider feature. When our representatives went to Italy, they knew, first, that that market was a very important one for Canadian goods. We had been selling to Italy $12,000,000 worth to $1,500,000 worth that we were importing from her. It was important to preserve those conditions and to extend them.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Were they threatened?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They are always threatened; that is the point I want to make. Without securing such an advantage, Italy could turn to-morrow towards one of our competitors, the United States, if no such advantage had been secured, and could give to that competitor advantages which would simply wipe us out in that market. We can compete to a certain degree, but beyond that we cannot go; and our representatives were negotiating with a nation of from 38,000,000 to 40,000,000 people, a nation which has a very important market, and which was ready to give us, so long as we would be linked together by this treaty, the greatest advantages that would be given to any other nation. Have we not secured in that market a position which will allow us to go ahead in peace to develop our commerce there? That country cannot do anything which will not benefit us. It is true that we are giving Italy similar advantages; but what do we aim at in commercial treaties? The increase, the enlargement, the extension of our own trade.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Can my honourable friend say at this point to what countries other than Italy this favoured nation clause will extend?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Argentine Republic, Colombia, Denmark, France, Japan, Norway, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, and Venezuela.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: You can hardly count in Russia now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, but Russia is on the list.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How many of those countries have we treaties with, entirely apart from the Italian treaty?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We have only one treaty, and it is with France. The other arrangements were made by Great Britain.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But we have treaties with some of those countries, have we not?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, we have not. Great Britain made those arrangements.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: We adhere to them.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask whether the concession granted to Canada by Italy has also been granted to the United States by Italy?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know the conditions prevailing between the United States and Italy. When the general French tariff was raised, there was immediately commotion among our own people, who claimed that they were being discriminated against, and were being chased out of the French market because under those conditions they could not compete with the United States. So, with regard to Italy, an important country of 38,000,000 people, we can sleep in peace, feeling that no arrangement can be made with them which would be detrimental to our trade. It seems to me that we have secured a concession without any considerable efforts. It is true that Italy can bring her goods here under the same conditions. If reductions are to be made, they are to be in favour of the consumer; and I, who favour a moderate tariff, am not chagrined at that feature. I feel that we have secured an advantage in the expansion of our trade which is not to be despised.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Speaking of the concessions granted by the treaty under consideration by Italy to Canada, I would like to know whether similar concessions have not been granted to the United States.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That I cannot answer. I will get the information and answer my honourable friend later on. I suppose the United States had in Italy the advantage of the most favoured nation clause. If that was so, this instrument would put us on a plane with the United States. If the United States has not yet secured that treatment, whenever it does, it will not occupy a similar position to Canada; and yet the United States has a market of 110,000,000 people to offer the Italians; and we, with a population of 8,000,000 people, have the advantage of knowing that we shall not be discriminated against by Italy. Surely my honourable friend will admit that the United States can offer very many tempting conditions to Italy which we could not offer; yet we have them in virtue of this arrangement.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Does the United States offer any concessions to Italy?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: No; it makes no most favoured nation clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not think the United States has any such arrangement with Italy, but I will obtain the information.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Of course it may get whatever it can from other countries.

Sections 1 and 2 were agreed to.

On section 3—extension of advantages to Italy and Italian possessions:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I would like to ask a question. I am not making any criticism of the arrangement made with Italy; it is certainly a most expeditious way of making treaties, without taking time or trouble, or making examination—just simply saying to a country, "Give us all, and we will give you all." Arrangements between man and man are never made that way. You can hardly apply the same rule, however, to relations between nations and families of nations. There is a great deal to be said on both sides, as to whether it is the wiser policy in the end to have no most favoured nation treaty arrangement at all—as the United States has as a policy, and which it has consistently carried out—or to provide against possible discriminations in the wider processes of trade being made against you by countries which may work with your rivals in that trade, and give them a favoured position, and consequently militate against your own trade. I have thought a great deal about that subject, and read a great deal about it, and up to the present time my mind is about on a balance with reference to it. It does seem that it is not the best thing to go to one country of 38,000,000 population and industrially swap considerations, make your close examinations as to what will benefit us and what will benefit them, saying, "What can we give you to get certain things from you in return?" and then go to another nation and say probably referring to a former treaty: "Now such is our condition with you, but we will make a bargain with you to give you everything that we give friends, and you give whatever you give to the most favoured nation anywhere else"—whether our commodities for exchange are absolutely diverse or whether they are exactly the same. But, at the same time, so long as that is the policy I am not at all critical of the arrangement that was made with Italy.

But I want to ask my honourable friend this question. It has been said in another place that, under the Italian treaty, Italy, in order to get the advantage of the most favoured nation clause, must get her goods into Canada by exactly similar water passage to that which France is obliged to use in getting her goods into Canada. Now, I am quite certain that that is absolutely wrong. There is nothing within the pages of this treaty to justify a conclusion of that kind; yet that intimation has been made in another place in answer to a question on that point, and the affirmative statement was made—that if Italy gets the advantage of the most favoured nation treatment she has to submit to all the methods of getting her goods into our country that France submits to. Evidently that is not so, because it is not in the treaty. Evidently it is not so, because Japan, which has most favoured nation treatment, is subjected to direct shipment only by virtue of a distinct clause in the treaty, and Switzerland can get her goods in by any route she likes. I think it is quite unfortunate that such a wonderfully loose statement was given to this country, and that we were led to suppose that Italy, getting the most favoured nation treatment, is bound to send her goods into Canada by the direct water passage.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Can the right honourable gentleman give me the page from Hansard containing that statement?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I haven't it here. I will send the statement to my honourable friend. But there is the treaty, and it is before the members of the Senate. If that is the case, point out in the treaty where it is so stated. I am quite sure that it is altogether wrong.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I would say that the most bulky article imported into Canada is salt, and of course that has to come by water, and it is a direct importation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, I cannot answer my honourable friend, except by looking at the treaty, but I may say that I can hardly imagine that Italy would send her goods otherwise than by direct route to a Canadian port. I know that in the spring, when the winter loses its grip on the St. Lawrence, it has been my experience to find that in nine cases out of ten a boat from the Mediterranean headed the procession to our port. So that, since they are making that effort to come inland to that extent just at the opening of navigation, I know that they do frequent our port, and, as it is the cheapest route, I cannot conceive that the Italians would go and unload in an American port to save their goods in transit when in their own bottoms they can send them to ours. I do not see anything in the treaty referring to that. Is it because it was obvious to our representatives that Italy could not or would not, commercially speaking, think of utilizing anything but a water route direct to our ports, that it is not included? But I will look up the statement to which my honourable friend refers, and see what is the justification, outside of the document which is before us for review.

Sections 3 and 4 were agreed to.

On section 5—suspension of inconsistent laws:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: What is the time that this convention stays in existence.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Article V sets out the period of 4 years, with one year's notice for its termination to be given by either of the contracting parties.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Why was the term made longer than for France? Four years is an unusual term. What reason led to that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know who proposed it, but I would think it would be a fair delay to test the value of such an arrangement.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: The French Treaty runs for six months only.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I see the difference. I have not been given any special reason for the difference.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is there not a great advantage for Italy as compared with France? This treaty confers on Italy all the advantages that we concede to any foreign country. We get in exchange only similar treatment. That is not the case with France.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend will undertake to negotiate with France a similar treaty, I think I would not hesitate long before I would tell him that Canada, as far as I am concerned, would gladly agree to make it on the same basis.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Can my honourable friend state how this treaty arose? Was it anticipated when the representatives of Canada went over to France to negotiate the French treaty?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, my memory is not good enough. I have a fairly good recollection that our representatives were to try to make an arrangement with more than one country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Was it negotiated between trains?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am sure Belgium was mentioned, and I am sure that if Italy and Spain were not mentioned, our representatives were to take advantage of their presence to see if they could not enlarge our trade.

Section 5 was agreed to.

Article I to V, inclusive, of the schedule were agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand for the second reading of Bill 54, an Act to provide for the investigation of Combines, Monopolies, Trusts and Mergers.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen. it was not my purpose to make any remarks upon this subject except to say that it has come before us like a very old friend whom we have met many a time and oft. For some 35 years, I think, we have been not only placing legislation upon the Statute Book in reference to combines in restraint of trade, but have been forgetting that we had such legislation. I cannot overlook the fact that the broad principle contained in the Bill respecting restraint of combines and trusts can scarcely be attacked. It is very desirable that there should be a suppression of any combination which would unreasonably enhance or increase the price of those products which enter into the general living of the community. I cannot overlook the other fact that this is a Bill which was introduced by the Government after very considerable dramatic pretence. It was foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne at a time when the public mind was considerably agitated by the so-called increased cost of living. It was referred to in the Address in rather pretentious language which, if it is implemented by action, of course would be very acceptable to the public:

> A Bill will be submitted to you to safeguard the interests of consumers and producers from undue enhancement of prices or unfair restriction of trade by combines, monopolies, trusts, or mergers.

It is nicely balanced, honourable gentlemen will observe. It is to protect both the consumer and the producer. I doubt if language could be more happy than this in which the Government of the day indulged, in placing the phrase in the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of Parliament; and how Parliament, or how this Chamber, can oppose a measure so extremely well balanced, in which the scales are held so that neither the consumer nor the producer will suffer, is certainly beyond my knowledge.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Except the evil doer.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I therefore hesitate to attack a measure that is so scientifically drawn as to mete out justice with such precision as this which is indicated in the Address.

I cannot overlook the fact that this measure, when introduced into the Commons, and when disposed of by that body, was almost unanimously accepted and endorsed by that branch of Parliament. We cannot overlook the fact that Government, as it is to-day, is largely made up of appealing to the credulity of the public, and the more successfully you can appeal to the credulity of the public with measures which you place upon the Statute Book the more popular the Government may be. A Government need not exercise very great apprehension as to the administration of the law so long as that law is attractive on its face; and the Government, in submitting to Parliament this measure with those qualities, apparently received the almost unanimous support of the other branch of Parliament. Modern government is very largely made up of the art or science of humbugging the public, to use very plain language, and I know of no measure that can be handled so successfully in humbugging the public as a measure of this character. I cannot forget the fact that it is a well-known principle in matters of this kind, as Barnum said in his day, that the public really wish to be humbugged. The Government of the day is certainly catering to that public weakness, if it can be called a weakness.

I think this Chamber will approach with very great hesitation the rejection of a measure which is calculated by representation, whether true or not, to appeal to the public mind as this does. Immediately the Government of to-day appeal to the public mind by intimating that they propose placing machinery on the Statute Book which will reduce the cost of living, argument can scarcely be brought to bear to convince the public to the contrary; therefore we have to accept to a large extent the statement of the Government that this can be done.

Going back for a great number of years, I think to 1889, when the first legislation was introduced, my honourable friend reviewed the different measures placed upon the Statute Book which were calculated to bring about this very desirable end. Different methods were adopted in the different statutes placed upon the Statute Book for that purpose. First of all, the legislation was enacted entirely irrespective of the criminal law; then it was introduced into the criminal law; then, while not taken out of the criminal law, it was placed alongside the criminal law, as auxiliary machinery, so to speak, and was thus in addition to the criminal law. But up to the present time I have not heard of any successful administration of this particular class of legislation.

Of course, the principle is as old as human nature itself. Combines and trusts are by no means a modern invention. Humanity, as far back as history records it, discovered the advantage of unity. Unity is strength. Individuals invariably have resorted to an aggregation of other individuals for the purpose of giving them strength, or for effecting a common purpose. Nations have formed alliances for the purpose of carrying out particular designs which they had in view, and of rendering themselves more powerful. Aggregations of industry or commerce have set in motion the same principle. The consequence is that to-day we have running all through commerce the same principle which humanity discovered in the very early stages of the human race. This being the case, I look for combinations to the end of all time, both in respect of trade and in respect of everything else towards which common purpose may be effective. I doubt very much the sincerity of the Government in giving effect to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Why does not the honourable gentleman say "Governments", since he has given the history of the last three or four.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are only dealing with one at the present time. The previous Governments have all suffered by reason of any infirmities which they possessed. We are dealing with this particular Government, the Government responsible for the introduction of this Bill. It is not much more than a consolidation of the measures which we have upon the Statute Book to-day; and I do not anticipate that the Government will be any more successful in the administration of this law than has been the case in the past.

I listened with a good deal of pleasure to the remarks of my honourable friend in moving the second reading of the Bill. I have to congratulate him upon the optimism which he expressed with respect of the good purposes which will be served by the Bill, and the high idealism which he expressed as to the views and intentions entertained by the Government in giving it effect. As I say, I am very skeptical as to the outcome of it. Under the circumstances I can simply express a want of belief, not only in the sincerity of the Government in giving effect to it, but likewise a disbelief in their ability, notwithstanding any effort they may make to enforce it, to make it a success. Notwithstanding the opinions which many of my honourable friends, around me may entertain on this subject, I therefore, while doubting the intention of the Government to give effect to it, hesitate to suggest any amendment to the Bill.

Hon. F. L. SCHAFFNER: Honourable gentlemen, before this Bill is read a second time, I wish to make a few remarks upon it. I am in favour of the principle of the Bill, notwithstanding the remarks of the honourable gentleman who has just spoken as to Governments during the last 35 years trying to place an the Statute Books an anti-combines Bill that would be of some benefit. This Bill is: "An Act to provide for the investigation of Combines, Monopolies, Trusts and Mergers." I agree with the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat, and with a good deal that the honourable gentleman who leads the Government in this House said yesterday. My honourable friend says there always have been combines and mergers and always will be. Very likely he is correct; but I maintain, honourable gentlemen, that there are combines which are legal and there are combines which are illegal. I do not know that the same could be said of monopolies or trusts. I would say that when business men who are operating any particular industry or along any particular line think they can save overhead expenses and produce more cheaply by merging or combining, it would be a legal combine; but that is not the kind of combine to which I wish to refer for a few moments.

I have been connected with Parliament for nearly twenty years, and I have found a condition which is common to the members of both Houses. We represent here a country the interests of which are very diversified. We come here from the Atlantic, from the Pacific, and from the centre of Canada, and the interests of those parts are so diversified that it is very difficult to produce any measure that will meet with the approval of the whole Dominion. I have found that when any particular question has come up we are all inclined to be provincial. Perhaps we cannot help it. Reference has been made to-day to the jealousy of Montreal. It is all right for those living in Montreal to be jealous of the port of Montreal. Right here may I say that if this country ever amounts to anything, we will have enough trade for Montreal and Quebec and all the other ports, and there need not be any particular selfish jealousies in regard to them.

But coming back to what I have said about provincialism, and trying to advance the best interests of the section where we live, I may say there has been a combine carried on, particularly during 1922, which has very much affected the part of the country from which I come. I felt that I could not let this opportunity pass without voicing my opinions about it. I have already said that I believe it is quite possible to have a useful combine or merger; on the other hand, it is not very much to our credit that we have had legislation on the Statute Book for thirty-five years and nevertheless could not prevent what I call illegal combines. Last year the farmers of the three western provinces had a good crop, about 400,000,000 bushels of wheat. That being so, one would wonder why conditions in the West are as they are to-day. I do not believe that I am extraordinarily pessimistic; I prefer to be optimistic, and I dislike saying anything that may be detrimental to my own country. Yet we must look the facts in the face. What are the facts in regard to the western provinces during last year? We had 400,000,000 bushels of wheat, and what was the result? About 80 per cent of that product is to be exported. After the farmers had paid their expenses of production and the freight rates, they had very little left for buying anything beyond the bare necessities of life. The reason for that, I believe, was very largely combination—the lake freight combination, the Atlantic ocean combination, the grain dealers' combination in the West, and one or two others.

At 6 o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at 8 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Honourable gentlemen, at 6 o'clock I had mentioned a few combines which I believe exist in the three Western Provinces, that affect to a very great extent the profits that farmers might otherwise have made. I do not say that those are the only combines that might be found out there, but they appealed to me as those that most closely touched our people there. I mentioned the Great Lakes combine, the North Atlantic combine, and the grain dealers' combine.

The grain dealers' combine is perhaps not as pronounced or as easily explained as some others; yet I believe that in the western provinces it has a material effect in reducing the prices of grain. I say combine, because I believe that a combine extends as far as Chicago, and that between the Chicago and Winnipeg grain exchanges there is a very clear understanding, though it may be to a certain extent secret. I have no objection to a grain exchange as such; I believe a grain exchange can do legitimate work; but the opportunities of making a very great deal of easy money tempt those in the grain trade beyond what some have been able to bear. I am not so sure that something might not be said for the manner of marketing grain through their methods, but the dealers have become so rich, and have such tremendous control, that I think they have overdone the market entirely. A grain exchange might be allowed a cent a bushel, and I would not care if it were one and a half or two cents, for their part of the business in marketing grain; but they are not content with that; and I am confident there is a combination among the grain dealers in changing the price of wheat from time to time. It seems very improbable that wheat prices should vary almost every day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does the honourable gentleman speak of the price to the producer?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: The price to the producer.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Which is absolutely different from the world price fixed at Liverpool?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes: my honourable friend can take it that way if he wishes to; but the point I wish to make is that it seems very unreasonable, yet it is going on all through the grain season. Wheat to-day will be say a dollar a bushel, and it might stay at that for a day or two, and then go up to $1.01, $1.02 or $1.03 not very much variation, and the next thing we know is that wheat goes down. So it goes up and goes down, and my opinion is that there is a combination who just put the price up or down: they buy the wheat from the producer, and when they have bought it they sell.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman a question. Mr. Wood of Alberta last year before the Special Committee made the statement that there are about 45 companies dealing on the Wheat Exchange in Winnipeg, these companies being associated for the purpose of buying grain from farmers for elevator companies and flour mills; that they have their headquarters in Winnipeg, and that they fix the rates from day to day. Does my honourable friend believe that statement is true?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes, the companies are in Winnipeg, and there are also a great many Chicago companies in Winnipeg. Some dealers are Winnipeg men, but I am told that quite a large majority of those who deal on the Grain Exchange in Winnipeg are Americans.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Is not the price fixed by the Chicago Grain Exchange?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: It may be, but they claim it is fixed by the markets of the world or Liverpool. I am inclined to think that the Liverpool market does not vary so much from day to day as the Stock Exchange, whether in Chicago or Winnipeg, would try to make people believe.

We had considerable talk last year in regard to the establishment of a Grain Board. The farmers through the western provinces have been wanting a different method of marketing their grain. It was thought in this House, and I think it was stated, that one great object of having a Grain Board was to raise the price of wheat or bread to the consumer. As far as I know, and I was interested to quite an extent, I do not think that was the object at all; I think it was simply to enable the producers to get for their wheat the world's market price, whatever it was—of course less all necessary expenses. It may be said that the legislatures of Saskatchewan and Alberta established wheat boards. When the matter came up in Manitoba, while the legislature was in session, it was defeated by about three votes. I know practically every man who voted against it, and they were not real farmers who defeated it, but grain buyers in Winnipeg: it was the lawyers and other men in the city, and grain dealers, who were members of the legislature; and I know for a fact that some of those grain dealers were farmers living 200 miles from Winnipeg. From my own knowledge I could name a man who made a good deal more money out of dealing in wheat, according to the system which I am trying to point out, than he did out of farming. So I do not think it is very hard to understand why these men voted against the Wheat Board.

Another combine which I think worked very detrimentally to the farmers of the western provinces last year was the Lake Freights Association.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Before you pass away from the question of the grain, can you tell me how much the farmers got for—say No. 1 Northern wheat—farmers who lived 10 miles or so from an elevator or a railway station?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I am very glad the honourable gentleman has put that question, because I was forgetting something. I will answer the question to the best of my ability. The excuse that some of these grain dealers, who are also farmers, gave for defeating the motion was that it was all right for Alberta and Saskatchewan, but that the Manitoba wheat was 10 days earlier, and therefore got to the market earlier, say on the 1st of September. They said: "We will get a better price." Now comes the question of my honourable friend. Of course, the object of the Wheat Board is not to put all the wheat on the market during the fall, but to sell it during the year whenever there is a market. No. 1 wheat sold last year in Boissevain, 182 miles west of Winnipeg, at distances running from two miles to eight or nine miles from an elevator, at 80 cents a bushel.

Hon. Mr. GILLIS: What month was that?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: During, say, September. Wheat was sold from farms adjoining my own for 80 cents. Wheat to-day is worth $1.15 to $1.18.

Hon. Mr. GILLIS: That would be the street price, would it, by the load?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: By the carload.

Hon. Mr. GILLIS: I think the honourable gentleman is wrong in that respect. I think the price was nearer 90 cents than 80 cents at that time.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: The price got by men loading eight or ten loads of wheat was 80 cents a bushel. I have no reason to doubt the word of those men, because I have been dealing with them for years. But granting that the price was 90 cents, to-day they could get $1.15 or $1.18.

Hon. Mr. McCALL: At Port Arthur, or at the station?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: All grain is sold at the Port Arthur price. They sell at Boissevain. It would have been better for those men last year if there had been a board under which they could sell a certain quantity of their wheat and get an advance on it, the rest to be sold later at an equalized price.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Could they not do that without a board?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: They could do it by means of a voluntary board; but a voluntary board is a very hard thing to conduct, for several reasons. A farmer is not always a very safe man to get along with in that respect. For instance, a few years ago the Government of Manitoba bought a lot of elevators throughout the country; they bought too many, and paid too much for them. A farmer would haul his grain to a town where there would be one of these elevators belonging to the Government, and where the Ogilvie Company or the Lake of the Woods Company—I just mention those two because they come to my mind—would have an elevator; and those people would give half a cent a bushel more than the Government elevators, and the result was that the farmers would go to them. The same thing would happen with a voluntary board. As far as I am concerned, I do not care whether it is a voluntary board or a compulsory board; my idea is that we should have some better way of selling our wheat, in order that we may distribute the sale of it over the year, so that the man who is unfortunate enough to be four or five miles from an elevator will have an equal opportunity with the man near an elevator. I think it is the fault of the farmers that a voluntary board will not work. If you are going to market wheat in that way you must have at least half of the wheat produced, and I am very much afraid that if there were a voluntary board someone might offer the farmer half a cent more for his wheat simply in order to kill the board, and then these people would go on manipulating the wheat, as, in my opinion, they have been doing all along.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Where would it stop? If the Federal Government went into this thing, as they did under the War Measures Act, would it not be as reasonable for them to come down to my province and take the potatoes?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: In the first place, the Government does not advance money. The money is got from the bank.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The Government is behind it.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I do not say that there is any objection. I opened my remarks by saying that we are provincial. I am advancing the claim of the farmers of the three western provinces, and claiming that there should be some other way of selling the wheat than through those who do not grow it, and who get too large a share of what the farmer or producer should have.

Last year in another place freight rates were reduced. In one way they were reduced, and in another they were not. There were two regulations governing freight rates in the West; one was the Crowsnest Pass agreement, which is familiar to every member of this House, and the other was an Act passed by the Roblin Government. The Crowsnest Pass agreement went along all right until the war came; then it was suspended for three years. The three-year period terminated on the 1st of July last year. What would have occurred had there been no legislation? The freight rates would have gone back to the level existing under the Crowsnest Pass agreement. That did not seem to be what the Government wanted, and in that connection may I say that while I am not in favour of group government, I am inclined to think that had it not been for the third party in another place last year, the rates on wheat and flour would never have returned to the rates existing under the Crowsnest Pass agreement, because I believe neither of the old parties would have granted what has proved to be a great boon to the farmers of Western Canada. I quote the words of Mr. Bracken, the Prime Minister of the Manitoba Government. He says that the farmers of the three provinces saved $20,000,000 by that reduction last year.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And increased the deficit by that much.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I am speaking for the farmers of the three western provinces; and here is where my honourable friend comes in. The $20,000,000 saved for the farmers of the three western provinces by the return to the Crowsnest rates was practically all taken from them by the combine on the Great Lakes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Somebody got it.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: How do we know there was a combine? We know there was a combine because it has been proven under oath before a commission appointed by the present Government that there was a combine among Canadian vessel owners on the Great Lakes, for the purpose, we believe, of increasing the rates on grain. This has been substantiated in the report of the commission.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Will the honourable gentleman mention the total amount paid for freight?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: No, I cannot do so just now.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Would it be $10,000,000?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: We claim that was taken from us by the combine on the Great Lakes; and the commission appointed by this Government has stated that a virtual monopoly among Canadian operators was maintained during the entire season of 1922.

There are three men who seem to be largely responsible for these rates, and who seem to have done very well by them. In four years they seem to have been able to get $564,329.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What about the $20,000,000 in one year?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I am speaking of what these men, the two Wolvins and Norcross, personally got out of it. The honourable gentleman is so sensitive when we talk about lake freight rates that he cannot keep still. These men received the following salaries in those years: Roy Wolvin, $77,000; John Norcross, $38,000; and the other Wolvin, $64,000.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: In salaries?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes, in salaries.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What were they—directors?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I think they were more than that: I think they managed the concern.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: How about the other directors?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I am just giving the three. The dividends of those three men during that time amounted to $90,000. The Standard Shipping Company is one in which I think the Wolvins are interested. It is a company that does no shipping itself; it acts as a shipping broker, and rents space to farmers who have wheat to ship, and controls 56 per cent of the shipping space available on the lakes.

The combine does not end there, but continues to the Atlantic. On account of the Fordney Bill one of our principal lines of trade in the three western provinces has been very much affected; I refer to the cattle trade. We were just beginning to raise a class of cattle that sold readily in Chicago when the Fordney tariff was introduced. This question was brought up the other day in connection with reciprocity. It has been stated, and I think it was argued in 1911, that no matter what bargain we made with the United States, they could do away with the contract at any time it was in their interest to do so, and could set up a tariff to suit themselves. A very strange thing seems to have happened in the United States. What is called the Farmer Bloc seems to have influence enough to control Congress.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: The Congress and the Senate, because it was the Farmer Bloc which caused the Fordney tariff to be enacted. Then we were unable to sell the class of cattle which we were sending. We were sending hogs and cattle to the United States, but I understand the greatest profit was in stockers. I know for a fact that good steers that I saw during the summer were selling for 2 cents a pound, and good cows for about $10 apiece.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Two cents a pound on the hoof?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes. That is a very low price. I am prepared to substantiate the figure. Then it became necessary for us to look for some other market for our cattle.

For a long time it was believed that the old National Policy tariff was necessary, and for many years I believed that myself; but I am convinced by long experience that while we need the tariff for a revenue, especially since the war, it is not as important to us as a market. I believe a market is what we need. Saskatchewan can raise cattle better than Manitoba, and I believe statistics show that no country in the world can produce a greater number of cattle, and better cattle, than can the province of Alberta; hence the importance of a market for this product. The tariff to-day on a binder is only 12½ per cent.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They took off 2½ per cent last year.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: No, it has never been less than 12½ per cent. It was 35 per cent. The Tories reduced it to 20 per cent; the Liberals reduced it to 17½ per cent; the Tories reduced it to 12½ per cent, and it has stayed there since—not to introduce politics.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: And the Liberals promised to take it off altogether.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: And so did the Tories.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: And they took 2½ per cent off.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I am dealing with conditions. The Tories reduced it down to 12½ per cent, and there it has stayed.

Hon. Mr. GILLIES: And the Liberals reduced it to 10 per cent.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: No, I must maintain that it has remained at 12½. I never like to be too dogmatic, but I think it remained at 12½; and I say that 12½ is not out of the way on a binder, which will last under ordinary conditions for ten or twelve years.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Yes, for 15 years if you keep it under cover.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes, I believe the honourable gentleman is right that it will last 15 years; but lumber and other building material are scarce in the West; so very many binders are left out in the field with the canvas off. They will last only 8 or 9 years, and if so I do not think 12½ per cent is any more of a duty than the farmer should pay. I have always felt that way.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It is only his share.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes; so I say with the tariff on many things. On a threshing machine, unless the duty is reduced, it is a different matter. As to the combines, last fall the Atlantic steamship service reduced the ocean rate on cattle to $15 per head, which should be a paying proposition. Then the embargo was taken off. We have heard a great deal about who should have credit for removing that embargo, but I would name two individuals who I believe deserve most of the credit: Hon. Robert Rogers and Harry Mullins. Colonel Mullins went to the Old Country at his own expense and spent several months going up and down through England and Scotland lecturing to the people, and advocating the removal of the embargo. However, when we went to sell our cattle the shipping men jumped their rate from $15 to $22.50, an advance of $7.50. At that rate the farmers will not have much left after paying the freight, though I am very much pleased at the price they are getting for cattle at present. At Montreal there was some ill-luck, the ice in the river having delayed shipment about 3 weeks, and the delay, I am told, cost them almost $100 per head. That does not seem reasonable, but I am told that. They had to keep the cattle there for three weeks. I do not know any worse condition that we would strike up in the Hudson Bay, and once we get those concrete compartments that my good friend told us about to-day there will be no trouble, and we will be able to go there at all times of the year.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I would mention to the honourable gentleman that the reapers are rated at 10 per cent duty.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Then I stand corrected. Not only was the freight rate increased $7.50 by the shipment, but when buyers came from Great Britain with money in their pockets to buy cattle, after the embargo was removed, and asked steamship companies for rates during spring months for shipping cattle in bulk, they were told there was no space, as a man in New York had contracted for practically all early boats. Now, a man in New York does not raise cattle; he does not even buy cattle; yet, he was able to control the space, so that it could not be bought for those farmers.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is a combine.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Sure it is a combine. Before I go on about the cattle there is something I should have mentioned about the wheat. Those brokers insisted that if I were going to ship my wheat I must insure it with them, and at double the price that I could insure it at any other place. These are facts.

A good deal has been said about the Canadian ships that we built. I believe we spent about $75,000,000 on them. The question has been asked why those Canadian ships could not be used to break or to help to break these combines, but we were told that the ships were not suitable to carry wheat, and, as far as the Atlantic was concerned, they were not suitable to carry cattle. What were they fit for, if they could not carry wheat or cattle? In my opinion, they should have been built to carry such products. I have a right to express my opinion, and it is wonderful how independent one gets in the Senate, and I think those vessels should not have been built. They were built when it was too late, and conditions did not make it necessary that they should be built.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: They carried bacon during the war.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: All right.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And they were built when the price was very high.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes, they were, but I may tell my honourable friends this, that we are not the only country that made that mistake.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It was not a mistake.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: The American Government went into shipbuilding on a much larger scale, and it has a direct continuing loss of about $50,000,000 a year, but that estimate takes no account of the depreciation of the ships while the deficit of the Canadian ships that was given to this House took account of the depreciation. The United States invested more than three billion dollars in ships, which at 5 per cent would represent an additional $400,000 a day, or nearly $150,000,000 a year. Many of us blame the Government to quite an extent. Foresight is not always as good as hindsight, even though the government were practical and sincere in connection with the matter; but other countries did the same. My honourable friend from Montreal said that the Canadian boats were going to be used on the Great Lakes, but I do not like the way their managers attend meetings: they seem to attend the same meetings as the men who fix the rates. Perhaps there is some excuse for that; perhaps those few ships could not break the combine; but I would like to see them able to carry on the traffic.

Now, I think I have said enough to show that there were a combine on the lakes, in the ships and in the insurance, and that there is a combine on the Atlantic Ocean to prevent us from shipping our cattle at present.

How are we going to meet those conditions? How are we going to work in the interest of all Canada in this respect? The only way we can do it is by the western people being united and claiming their rights, and I think that when they do they will find the benefit. Montreal is a great metropolitan city that we are proud of, but I am afraid Montreal will be up in arms when it learns in a day or two that 800 head of cattle are being shipped over the Canadian National Railway to Quebec without touching Montreal at all on the way to the Old Country. In my opinion, the way for Montreal to continue to be a good port, and to receive more and more produce from the West in order to build up the harbour for the farmers, with their wheat and cattle, is to see to it that those combines cease their operations. I saw an item the other day—I do not vouch for it, but I imagine it is about correct—stating that the estimated value of the agricultural investment in this country is $6,800,000,000, or an amount equal to all the other investments in Canada, exclusive of the railways. That being so, surely the farmers have a right to be represented and listened to.

My honourable friend from Calgary (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) said that there had been anti-combine laws on the Statute Book for 35 years, and that they had accomplished very little. I assume the reason for that is that the law has not been properly administered. But I know of one or two instances in which the anti-combine law did do good in the West. As many of you probably know, northern Alberta and northern Saskatchewan have plenty of timber, whereas southern Alberta, southern Saskatchewan and Manitoba, have practically none at all. An eastern man or a man from British Columbia can hardly understand what that means. Some years back—I cannot give you the year—after the anti-combine law was brought into effect, it had the result of reducing the price of lumber, the duty being taken entirely off rough lumber, and reduced on other kinds. That is one instance in which the anti-combine law did much good.

It is not my intention to make any further remarks. I am going to support this Bill, not because I think it is all that it should be, but because I believe in the old saying that half a loaf is better than no loaf at all. This Bill passed the other House by a very large majority, perhaps the largest that has been recorded since this Government came into power, and I am going to support it because I believe something should be done, and not only in the interest of the West but of the East as well, because the progress of the West has a great influence on eastern Canada, as I think will be admitted when I draw attention to the fact that during the years when immigration was going into the West. and when they had money to spend, there was prosperity in eastern Canada. The West has practically no manufacturing, nearly everything they buy coming from eastern Canada, particularly Ontario and Quebec; and you and I know that Montreal and Toronto and Hamilton made very rapid strides when the West was going well. Let me give you a homely incident that bears on this. Some years ago in Brockville I went into a big carriage factory. I believe it was the largest carriage factory in Canada. The manager was a Mr. Storey. This factory was filled with carriages—that was before the days when automobiles were used to any extent. I said to this gentleman: "I suppose your business is in the lower provinces and in the province of Ontario?" He said: "If we depended on Ontario and the lower provinces for our business, we would not be able to run it very long. Our trade is in the prairie provinces." I believe the same thing is true of practically all manufacturing, whether it be of binders or mowers, or boots and shoes. So, while we perhaps cannot help being provincial, each of us looking out for his own province, let us work together for the common good.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not intend to make a speech. I know the honourable gentleman from Boissevain wants to be absolutely fair, but he has repeated a statement about the farmers saving $20,000,000 under the Crowsnest agreement which, I think, is not quite correct; and he has also said that these $20,000,000 were lost to the farmers in the lake freight rates. The honourable gentleman would be very much surprised to learn that the total expenditure for freight on the lakes was not $20,000,000. I have seen the statement in print myself, and I know that those in the business said they only wished they could have got a part of that. The same is true in regard to the railways, because the total amount paid for freight was not that much.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I said distinctly that I was quoting the Prime Minister of Manitoba, who, I know, is a careful man, and who, I presume, knew what he was saving. It is an easy matter to make the calculation. You know what you save on a bushel of grain.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I think my honourable friend here (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) is wrong, as sometimes happens when he is talking about lake freight rates. My honourable friend says the amount saved would be nearer one-quarter of $20,000,000. I would like to point out that the crop last year amounted to about 400,-

000,000 bushels of wheat, and the crop of oats was greater than that. About 80,000,000 bushels were required for seed and feed in the West, leaving about 320,000,000 bushels—say 300,000,000 bushels. The lake freight rates ran from about four cents up to as high as twelve cents.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Very little of it as high as that. It averaged about four cents.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Very little of it four cents. If it averaged seven cents all round, there would be $21,000,000 on 300,000,000 bushels, not taking into account the oats or barley. So when my honourable friend says the freight paid on the lakes is nearer one-quarter of $20,000,000, he is altogether wrong, because, in addition to the wheat, there would be from 100,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels of oats coming down the lakes.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: There would not be 300,000,000 bushels of wheat altogether brought down; there has been to the present time about 150,000,000 bushels of wheat exported. I rather think that the estimate of $20,000,000 saving to the farmers was based on the total amount of exportable wheat and oats that would be shipped down in the season.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: But it is still coming.

Hon. C. P. BEAUBIEN: Honourable gentlemen, the leader of the House has supported this Bill with such earnestness and zeal that I am tempted to point out to him one or two defects in it with the hope of making the measure truly effective. I must say that the reply made by the leader on this side of the House (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has placed this proposed legislation in a rather different light. It is perhaps necessary that a political party at times should offer to the public a measure of this kind, to satisfy the passing sentiment; but for my part I feel convinced that it will never be put into force. Everybody knows that it was brought down in another place without very much forethought or preparation. As a matter of fact, the Bill as first presented allowed the registrar or the commissioner power, upon a report, to cite a man before the tribunal for sentence, without allowing him even the ordinary British fair play of a defence. I mention that simply to establish the fact that this measure was conceived, and brought into the world and up to its present stage, amidst the busy deliberations of the other House. It is not surprising, therefore, if the measure is far from perfect.

No doubt the wise men who sit on the other side of the House and guide the destinies of their party, are aware that should the attempt ever be made to put this measure into execution, the courts would function as in the past, and declare this law unconstitutional, for the same reasons invoked and upheld before, and no harm would be done. However, in case my honourable friends on the other side of the House should really and earnestly attempt to put this law into operation, I draw their attention to just one clause, which to my mind is double-barrelled in its effect, and which at the same time deprives the measure of its efficacy and robs it of any possible fairness. Section 34 of the Bill reads as follows:

> Nothing in this Act shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

Nothing is said of the employer. The employees, the labourers, are however placed in a privileged position. Whether or not they are guilty of combinations, the effect of which is to raise the price of commodities, nobody dare put a hand on them. If they have overstepped the bounds of reason and legality, nobody can interfere.

Of what is the price of commodities composed? Is it not the fact that the greater part of the price of any commodity is composed of the cost of labour? In a great many cases the cost of labour is 80 or 85 per cent of the total cost; in the majority of cases I should say it is certainly over half the total cost. Taking it all in all, I do not think I would be exaggerating if I affirmed that at least 70 per cent of the cost of everything we consume or use is made up of the price of labour.

Now, honourable gentlemen, what is the effect of this Bill? This Bill has been prepared—my honourable friends across the House say with a great deal of care—for the purpose of controlling the prices of commodities within a reasonable measure. The Bill touches "la portion congrue" as we say in French—the meagre portion—of the price of commodities, and leaves the larger portion, the 70 per cent or 80 per cent made up of the price of labour, untouched. It is operative only as to the balance of 20 per cent or 30 per cent. That portion only remains compressible under the operation of the law and it alone must be reduced so that the total price of the commodity will be reduced. Allow me to illustrate by one example. Take the compensation paid for labour on railways. In 1916 there were 140,000 employees on the railways, and they were paid to the tune of roughly $100,000,000 a year. In 1922 there were 153,000 employes, and their compensation totalled $217,000,000. The last figure shows an increase of 115 per cent over the compensation of 1916. Of course the railways had to follow suit and increase their rates, and therefore we Canadians had to pay for freight in 1916 $184,000,000, which jumped in 1922 to $313,000,000. Those figures seem exceptionally large, but honourable gentlemen must not forget that they represent only 70 per cent increase over the figures of 1916, whereas the labour wages on the railways in 1922 showed an increase of 115 per cent. Whereas in 1916 we paid $53,000,000 for transportation of passengers, in 1922 we paid $78,000,000, which is an increase of only 49 per cent, not 115.

Well, honourable gentlemen, is that increase justified? I am giving this example in order to show whether or not this law should deal with labour unions. Everybody knows that the labour unions, through their tremendous power, are keeping enormous wages in force in this country on the railways, and that freight rates would fall just as soon as wages could be reduced. If that increase in wages is not justified, I am right in saying to the Government, "You have evidence of a combination, the most powerful in the land, forcing up freight rates which are reflected on everything that we consume." For instance, take iron, take lumber; sometimes freight rates are reflected three times in the price of the finished commodity.

The only justification for the labour unions —I think they call them the Big Four Railway Brotherhood—insisting on maintaining the rate of wages that is paid to them today, is that the price of living has gone up so high that whatever is paid to them is not higher than the much lower wages they received in 1916 when compared to the price of living at that time. Well, the last number of the Labour Gazette shows that the weekly budget of a family of five, for food, fuel, lighting and rent, was $14.21 in 1916 and $20.96 in 1922, or an increase of 46 per cent. Am I not justified, then, in saying to the Government: "You have there the evidence that the railway employees, because of the increase between those two dates of 46 per cent in the cost of living, exact an increase in their remuneration of 115 per cent, which has sent up and maintains the price of practically every commodity which we consume." Am I not right to say to the Government: "Why do you exclude the labour unions from this research, which you say you want to make conscientiously? And why do you exclude more particularly those who evidently maintain the increased price not merely of one commodity, but of all commodities in the land?"

I do not want to add to these brief remarks. It seems to me that if my honourable friends are really in earnest, if they really desire to get at the root of the trouble, they will address themselves not only to the meagre portion, but to the entire difficulty, not omitting, for political or other reasons, the labour unions of this country.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, in view of the expressions of the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat, and inasmuch as the honourable leader of the Government may not to-night reply in full to the question that has been submitted to the House in the speech just closed, I feel constrained to say a few words, touching the point raised as to the propriety or otherwise of section 34 remaining in the Bill.

Before doing that, however, I would like to say a word with reference to the principle underlying this Bill, and to endorse it, and to say that I purpose to support it. It is in keeping with legislation that has been passed by two previous Governments. So far as the principle itself is concerned, I do not see that any fair-minded citizen of Canada would hold that it was not proper that an illegal combine, or at least a combine that was organized for the purpose of enhancing the cost to the common people, should go unfettered and unrestrained.

There has been a great deal of difficulty experienced in the administration of this Act by other Governments, and no doubt the same remark will apply to the administration of this Act; but in my opinion the results will be satisfactory if those who are charged with its administration undertake to do their work honestly and fairly, instead of in the manner in which the last Act was administered, or attempted to be. If it is improperly and unfairly administered, and used as a weapon to persecute business instead of directing and properly controlling it, then it will fail, as did the other.

or collectively. But this Act proposes to deal with a combine, which is an aggregation of gentlemen who may have a substantial amount of capital with which they purchase the product of labour and withhold it from public use until such time as the scarcity or demand permits them to enhance the price, and requires the public to pay through the nose, to use a homely phrase, for what they have in hand—something that they did not themselves create, that is not the product of their own labour, but is simply the result of their having gathered together in times of plenty a supply of any given article, for which this attempt to hold up the public for the highest possible price.

There is, in my opinion, no analogy between those two situations, and therefore I agree, that section 34 should properly remain in this Bill, as in former Acts of this sort. My honourable friend has tried to point out what he believes to be facts with reference to the effect of wages upon railway rates and upon the cost of living, and he has selected the wages of railway employees for this purpose. I beg to submit to the House for its consideration a little different view of that same picture. Honourable gentlemen will remember that from 1914 to 1918 there was no appreciable increase in the rates of wages received by railway employees in Canada, notwithstanding the fact that the cost of living did steadily and substantially increase during that period. They will recall that in the year 1918 the Government of the United States, which was then administering the railroads of that country, caused an exhaustive and expensive investigation to be made into the question of wages for railway employees, and determined that a certain standard should be set, which was regarded as constituting a living wage at that time. The railway companies of Canada were not forced or coerced by any combine or monopoly to adopt that wage, but they voluntarily adopted it in July, 1918.

From 1918 to 1920 the cost of living continued to rise, and rose fairly rapidly, and in 1920 the President of the United States created a tribunal empowered with full authority to deal with that question. In that year that tribunal authorized a further substantial increase in the wages of railway employees in the United States—why? As they said, in order to keep pace with the advance in the cost of living since 1918. Again the Canadian railways adopted the same increase, because of the fact that the cost of living was substantially the same in both countries, although as a matter of fact it was somewhat higher in Canada than in the United States.

The railway companies came along on July 16, 1921, and put into effect an arbitrary all-round decrease for the 153,000 men, aggregating $14 per month for each employee. Did the railway rates drop to the same extent at that time? Did that decrease in wages, which the employees accepted on the ground that there was a decrease in the cost of living, effect the railway rates? In some slight instances, but not very seriously.

Again, in 1922, the railway came along and repeated the dose, not in the same way, because this time they attacked the working conditions instead of the wages; but I want to say of the class of men with whom I am most familiar, and whom I represent in Canada, numbering some 8,000, that on the top of the reduction that those men accepted of $14 per month in 1921, a very substantial number of them also accepted, unwillingly it is true, a very substantial reduction, extending from $25 to $45 per month. That was in 1922, and it is a fact that to-day many railway employees are receiving $50 a month less than they did in 1920, though the cost of living has not diminished to any extent. It is thus unfair to represent to this House the point of view that my honourable friend has presented, though I am sure he has done so honestly.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What are they actually receiving?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The minimum wage to-day is $112 a month.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Do I understand that my honourable friend challenges the figures I have read to the House as to the cost of living, and as to the difference in the cost of living between 1916 and 1922, and as to the difference in the wages paid to the men in 1916 and 1922?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am challenging the statement made by my honourable friend that the increase in the cost of living was due to high wages, and that the high railway rates were due to high wages. I say that the increase in rates followed the increase in the cost of living, and that the decrease in wages has not been followed by a proportionate decrease in railway rates; and I think that fact is obvious to all who investigate it.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I did not say that the increase in the cost of living came from the wages exclusively, by any means.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Surely that was the impression.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: No; what I said was this. You have a law to control the prices of commodities. You control everything except wages, yet wages is the greatest portion of the price of those commodities; why do you not include them? I cited evidence from the figures which I submitted. I want to know whether you, for the railway employees, challenge the statement that in the wages paid to the employees in 1916 and 1922, the difference is greater than the difference in the cost of living between those two dates.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: There are just two inaccuracies in my honourable friend's presentation of those figures to the House. One is that in 1916 there were 140,000 railway employees—which figure I accept—and that the wages were so many million dollars. In 1922, he says, the wages were so much more, and there were 153,000 employees at that time.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is right.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: But when he makes his comparison, he makes it on the millions of dollars of 1916 and the millions of dollars of 1922 in wages, but he makes no allowance for the increase of 13,000 in the number of employees.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: But if you compare $100,000,000 and $217,000,000, it is apparent that the figures show an increase of 117 per cent, while I mentioned 115 per cent; so I hope my honourable friend will not misquote me again.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I did not misquote you; I just pointed out the joker in your argument.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What is a joker?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My honourable friend only plays bridge, and jokers are not used in bridge. The other point, that is perhaps misleading to the House—and I am sure it was unintentional on my honourable friend's part, and perhaps he did not even think of it himself—is that one reason for the pay-roll of our railways being substantially increased is the fact that the civilized nations of the world are fast recognizing the principle of the standard 8-hour day; so that the increase is not due entirely to higher wages? The Government of Canada has a 7-hour day in its public service, and I do not think honourable gentlemen can object if railway men who are shovelling gravel on the track, or working in the shop, giving the railway company 8 hours of service as a day, should have those 8 hours recognized as constituting a working day. That is something that has long been due the men. It came here, not as the result of a demand of the employees in Canada—though no doubt the demand would ultimately have been made—but because of the precedent established in the United States at that time, and because the Canadian railways felt that they could not ask their employees to accept less remuneration or work longer hours than men in the same service in the United States.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is it not the same union?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I would point out again to the House that the unions had nothing to do with those rates and conditions. They were put into force voluntarily by the railroads, and not because of any demand made by the railway organizations in Canada, either in 1918 or 1920. The railroads came to the organizations and asked if an adjustment on that basis would not be acceptable. The railway organizations said: "We would prefer to make the adjustments on a little different basis;" and the railways said that so long as the amount of money involved and to be distributed was not exceeded they were willing that it should be distributed in a manner satisfactory to the employees. For that reason our rates and rules are not the same as those in the United States; but basically they are the same, and were brought about, not because of any combine or hold-up on the part of the railway organizations at all. I submit that as a statement of fact, because it is borne out by the facts bearing on the case. I feel that the discussion of railway rates and railway conditions is perhaps quite out of order under this Bill; but inasmuch as the point has been raised, I could not refrain from attempting to place before you some of the facts not brought out by the honourable gentleman who raised the question.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I hope that my honourable friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) is not opposed to the principle of the Bill. I think the principle of the Bill is recognized in all the countries of the world where democratic principles are applied, and I would be surprised if any member of this House were to take the position that it would not be proper for Parliament to guard against combines that are calculated to affect the welfare of the community. That I take to be the principle of the Bill.

In regard to section 34, there may be two opinions as to whether or not labour unions should be brought under operation of the Bill; but I call the attention of the honourable gentleman to the fact that it would be contrary to the rule adopted in the Treaty of Versailles, to put the labour unions under the operation of the Bill, except, maybe, with certain safeguards. I have not sufficiently examined the Bill to have formed a final opinion on section 34. The Bill may be defective in certain respects. If that is so, it is our duty to try to perfect it.

The honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) attacked the Bill, and referred to the action of the labour unions in regard to railway wages. The honourable member from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson) is perfectly correct in the statement that the increase of wages referred to was brought about in the United States by the McAdoo award, which the railways in Canada had to follow because otherwise their employees would have gone to the United States. It is perfectly true that the labour unions in Canada had nothing at all to do with the fixing of those wages: they were brought about by the award in the United States, and the Canadian railway companies were driven into accepting practically the same scale of wages. I do not agree with the honourable gentleman, however, that those wages were fair wages. They were exorbitant wages; exorbitant to such an extent that labouring men, yardmen, were receiving higher wages than those paid to station agents or other important employees of the railway companies. They were exorbitant wages, and had the effect of crippling the railways in Canada to a very large extent; and I think the railway companies were perfectly justified in trying to bring down those wages as soon as they could. Railway wages as they are now are generally a good deal higher than those paid in other occupations in this country.

As far as I am concerned, I am in favour of labour unions, provided they are controlled to a certain extent, and provided they do not abuse their powers; but I think that the laws of the country should be such that any employee entering the service of a public utility should forego or renounce the right of joining a union. I think experience in the past has shown that labour has been oppressed, and that it was necessary for labouring men, for their reasonable protection, to join together and assert their rights. Therefore, I think we should be careful in dealing with matters of this kind.

The interest of labour unions or of labour is now a common interest with that of the employer, and the progress of society and of the country will take place only if those two interests work harmoniously together. Our endeavour as parliamentarians should be to devise the best means to foster both interests on parallel lines, and to try to put an end to the prejudices which exist. I have examined into the question pretty carefully, in order to be able to form a judgment, and I repeat that, so far as I am concerned, I am of opinion that the labourers in the past were not treated fairly; but I believe that day has now gone by, and they are very liberally treated by their employers. But there still remains a sentiment of irritation, and what is necessary now is that the leaders of society and large employers should try to educate the labouring classes, and get them to understand that it is the desire to treat them fairly, and that their interest is common with that of their employers. If they come to understand that, they will appreciate the necessity, in their own interest, of giving good and fair service; and the employer will be sure to remunerate them liberally.

This, of course, is a good deal outside of the question, and was drawn into the discussion because of the attack made upon labour unions. I thought it was my duty to express my opinion on that point. As far as the Bill is concerned, I submit that it is our duty to try to improve it, but that we should all support the principle of the Bill.

Hon. A. B. GILLIS: Honourable gentlemen, I want to say just a word regarding this Bill. At the outset I wish to state that I am going to support the Bill because we have been led to believe that great things are going to be accomplished by this legislation. This was one of the planks of the Liberal platform during the last general election, and it was preached from one end of the country to the other that they were going to bring in legislation of this kind, and generally revolutionize conditions in the country. I therefore trust that the Act will not remain a dead letter on the Statute Book, but will be fully enforced. There is no question that many combines exist in the country, and it will be the duty of the Government to act promptly, in carrying out the duty of inquiring into combines that may exist.

The honourable member for Boissevain (Hon. Mr. Schaffner) spoke with regard to the grain trade in the West. I want to give one or two figures to show that in my opinion there exists in the western provinces a very strong combine in relation to our grain trade. I will cite figures showing the prices of grain to the individual farmer—that is, the man who is not fortunate enough to have a carload of grain, and who has to draw his single load to market and sell in what is supposed to be open competition. As a matter of fact, there is no competition. All the elevator companies are a combine, even the wonderful Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company, forms as strong a part of that combine as any of the ordinary line elevators. For that reason I think there is ample scope for the Government to inquire carefully into the operations of those elevator companies. The individual farmer who brought his load into market during the month of October would receive 81 cents per bushel; if he were fortunate enough to have a carload, he would receive 99.18 cents per bushel, or a difference of 18 cents. During the month of November the average price the farmer would receive for his single load, selling on the open market—that is, the street price—would be 87.3 cents; if he had a carload he would receive $1.06, or a difference of 19 cents a bushel. Practically the same thing applies to the month of December. To my mind there certainly exists a combine, so far as the grain trade in the prairie provinces is concerned.

The honourable gentleman from Boissevain (Mr. Schaffner) has elaborated and dealt very fully with this question; therefore I do not think it is necessary for me to go over the same ground. I am going to support the Bill in the hope that it may have some effect along these lines: it is very desirable and very needful. A great deal of the complaints that we hear of conditions in the prairie provinces is due to the fact that the farmers are not receiving a fair price for their wheat. When a grain dealer makes a profit of 18 or 20 cents a bushel on the farmer's grain, it is certainly unfair to the farmer, and there is something radically wrong when conditions of that kind exist. I hope that the Bill may result in the Government inquiring carefully into conditions in the prairie provinces, particularly in reference to the grain trade.

Hon. G. W. FOWLER: Honourable gentlemen, I am in favour of the principle of an anti-combine Bill, but I am not in favour of the provisions of the document before us. It certainly places in the hands of the registrar a tremendous power, and subjects the manufacturers of this country to very serious difficulties, provided the registrar proceeds against them. Section 5 provides that—

> Any six persons, British subjects, resident in Canada, of the full age of 21 years, who are of the opinion that a combine exists, or is being formed, may apply in writing to the registrar for an investigation of such alleged combine.

There is no obligation on these gentlemen who have come to this decision, in case their opinion is founded on wrong reasons, and it is therefore not tenable that they shall be mulcted in damages or costs as an ordinary suitor would be if he brought such an action against an individual. It seems to me that is a defect in the Bill. It seems to me that when you come to consider the amount of trouble and expense, the interruption of business and the various difficulties that may occur from an investigation into any business or aggregation which is charged with being a combine, there should be some penalty fixed upon those who set the machinery in motion provided they have done so for insufficient or flimsy reasons. That is one of the defects in the Bill.

Then, to my mind, you place too much power in the hands of the registrar. You do not specify what the qualifications of the registrar shall be. He could be anyone picked up on the street, and it is rumoured that a certain man of rather unsavoury reputation, politically, a man who has been a mischief-maker throughout this country, is in training for the job. This should put us on our guard, and we should surround the appointment of a registrar with such safeguards and qualifications as to prevent a mischief-maker like the individual I have in mind being appointed to the post.

These are some things that have struck me as being very serious defects in the measure, though I have not examined the Bill very closely. I think the measure has been very ill-digested, notwithstanding the very enthusiastic reception it met in the other Chamber, having 117 votes for and 21 against. That does not carry as much weight with me as the figures would indicate.

I listened very attentively to the remarks of the honourable gentlemen from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson) in regard to the wages paid to employees on the railways. My honourable friend always comes to the rescue of labour when there is the slightest criticism of it. I find no fault with him for that; but he is such an enthusiast in the cause of labour that he is very apt to be what we might call lopsided in that way. The McAdoo award was a very fortunate thing for Canada, and for the United States as well. It was the result of ambition on the part of a certain politician in the United States who wanted to be the Democratic nominee for President at the approaching election. He made that award in order to get the labour votes in that country, and I am very glad to know that he did not get the nomination. However, the mischief that he did still remains. Under this new scheme of wages brakesmen were able to draw much higher pay than presidents of universities. Men without any particular qualification except brawn and muscle, without any expensive training such as men in other vocations require before they earn anything like that, were able to draw down $300, $400 or $500 a month, which is a very good stipend in this country, even when the cost of living has gone up.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: More than county judges.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes. Well, I would compare them to men who work even harder than county judges do, because in my province county judges have as near to a sinecure as you can find, though I dare say in Ontario and Quebec such judges work fairly hard. But those workmen, without more intelligence than enough to enable a man to open a window in a car, were receiving $400 or $500 a month; and the men on the little branch lines were getting the best pay on account of overtime, bless you. Now, look at the illogicality of this overtime business. They say you should work a man only eight hours a day because he can only give his best service for those eight hours; yet if you keep him two hours overtime you pay time and a half for overtime, when, according to the rules as to loss of health and loss of labour he is giving his poorest service. In other words, you are paying him 50 per cent more for that poorest service than you pay for his good service.

That is one of the greatest difficulties, and causes a considerable amount of cost. Now, let us see how the 8-hour day works out. When I was a young man working at my profession I often worked 16 and 17 hours a day, and was very grateful that I had the work to do. The difficulty with the world to-day is that so few people want to work, and everybody seems to desire to spend money before they make it. Those are the two greatest difficulties we have in Canada to-day.

In my small town of 2,500 people the Canadian National, which used to be the Intercolonial, had two station agents, one taking the day train and the other the night, and they divided the day between them. The man who worked at night was able to get three or four hours sleep between one and five o'clock, and so he took a little sleep after breakfast, and had the greater portion of the day to himself for his own avocations.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: But if caught sleeping he would be dismissed.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But he was not caught sleeping.

Hon Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: There was no one to catch him.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: A man in military service caught sleeping would be shot, dismissed into the other world; but that is no argument, for you know a man can so train himself that the very rumble of the car wheel on the track will wake him, and he could sleep right up to the moment of the train approaching the station. At any rate, he got along very well; I know him, and he is in the same position yet; only to-day he just works 8 hours and takes as much time off for meals as ever; the station is closed during the meal hour; but there are three men doing the work of two, and getting higher wages than when there were two. Here we have 22,800 miles of railway belonging to the National system, and that same thing exists over the whole distance, not only with regard to station masters but other officials. These are some of the reasons why we have these tremendous deficits over the road. You cannot give those men this large pay for the short hours without doing the same thing for other labour, or else creating immense dissatisfaction. That is the position we are up against.

My honourable friend says this was all done voluntarily. I tell you that the railway unions have the railway management by the throat. Let me illustrate. A self-propelled car, a motor, was put on to run passengers from Campbellton to Bathurst on the old Intercolonial, now the Canadian National. Two persons were all that were necessary to run that car; but the unions, whom my honourable friend has been exalting, stepped in and said: "No, this won't do; you can't run that car with two men; you must put on five;" and they compelled the management to put on five men, and so the railway took off the car.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I must correct my honourable friend in that connection. That car that had been operating between Campbellton and Bathurst was brought up to Toronto and operated between Toronto Union Station and Washago over a portion of the Canadian National lines where a passenger service had been abandoned, and I can say that the same organization of railway men operated in Toronto as at Campbellton, and there are no five men on that car.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I can say there were five men on that car; the union compelled them to put on five men.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No, you are mistaken.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: My honourable friend can shake his head until it shakes off, but it will not alter my knowledge, and those are the facts.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I speak with knowledge of it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I say those are the facts, and those are the causes that have led to a large portion of the excessive cost of the railway. Of course, there are other causes, of which I will have occasion to speak when I move the motion that is now standing on the order paper.

I want particularly to call the attention of this House to the extraordinary powers that are given under this Bill to the Registrar, and also to the unfairness of permitting any six people who happen to be British subjects and living in Canada, to put any business in this country to the expense of a defence, and the expense of bringing all their books and showing them, without those people incurring any penalty if the investigation proves to be on a false alarm.

One reason I find fault with the labour unions is that they refuse to get down upon the same plane and the same level as the rest of the people. I believe in labour unions in a proper way, and the moment they are willing to be incorporated so that they can be sued for breach of contract just like an ordinary individual or corporation, then they will have removed, so fas as I am concerned, the great stumbling-block in the way of my appreciating them to the full. That is what they should do. I understand that that is the case in England, and I hope it is so, but whether it is the case in England or anywhere else, it should be the case everywhere.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It has been advocated, only.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It was the rule in England once, but following the Taff Vale case—

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It is not now.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I trust that some day it will be the case here, and then a contract with a labour union will be enforceable against them if they choose to break it, whereas it is not so now.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It is, under the Industrial Disputes Act.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Under the Act that is going through?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not see how it will work if the labour union has nothing to be taken.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Oh, a penalty.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But that is only camouflage; that is a joke. You put $1,000 on the employer and you can collect it, but you could not put $100 or $50 on an employee and collect it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: You put $10 a day on 150,000 employees, and the employer has it all in his own hands to collect it if the court says so.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But suppose the men do not work any longer, how are you going to get it? You can only get it by keeping it out of the men's wages. No, that is not a fair and square basis at all. I trust that amendments will be made to this Bill so that these objectionable features will be removed; so that the Registrar shall not have the absolute power of a czar. Why, if he were so minded, supposing an election were coming on, he and the gentlemen who are so fond of hugging the machine, might not be above going to a lot of employers of labour and saying, "Reports have come into my office about you people—that you have a combine; come across, or we will have to investigate." Therefore I say, when you are putting such power into the hands of a man, for Heaven's sake appoint a man that the country would have confidence in; and he should be a barrister, because he should have a knowledge of law, and because barristers are usually of high character.

Hon. GEORGE LYNCH-STAUNTON: Honourable gentlemen, I am opposed to this Bill in toto, but I do not propose voting against it on the second reading. I am opposed to it because of my reading of the history of legislation of this kind. We are told that similar legislation is in operation in nearly every country in the world, but I have yet to learn of one enactment anywhere that has ever been effective to any extent whatever. We have had these laws ever since the time of Queen Elizabeth. Again and again they have been enacted and repealed. For many years they were utterly abandoned, and then, within the last 50 or 60 years, there has been a revival of them. They were recognized as futile.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: You had proceedings under the Act.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: They are good election matter, and I presume that the House of Commons will go on enacting them for all time to come until they get something else that appeals more to the people. But I want to draw attention to two or three clauses in the Act, so that when I move an amendment, as I propose to do, honourable gentlemen will appreciate what I am after. In the 2nd section it is stated:

> In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires,—The expression "combine" in this Act shall be deemed to have reference to such combines immediately hereinafter defined as have operated or are likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public.

Now, my first quarrel with this section is with the words, "are likely to operate." I looked at the French version, which has an entirely different meaning, the translation being, "are of a nature to operate;" that is to say, possibly may operate. Surely it is enough to punish a man if he does something which injures somebody; but surely he should not be punished for a merger about which some Registrar may say: "Well, it looks all right, but by some possibility it may operate to the injury of the public." Surely a man should not complain before he is hurt. Any person may honestly and innocently merge two businesses, and some person may come along and say, "Now, I can see where in the future the public may be injured." I think that such legislation is utterly and absolutely improper and unreasonable. Then, it goes on to enact: "whether consumers, producers or others." I think if the Act read in this way it would be sufficient.

> The expression "combine" in the Act shall be deemed to have reference to such combines immediately hereinafter defined as have operated to the detriment of or against the interest of the public.

But it goes on to add, "whether consumers, producers, or others." Let me show how that may be very serious. A memorandum was sent to me the other day pointing out that the Ford Car Company fixes its prices, and it has published them in the newspapers. There is a clause in here which says it may not fix its prices if anybody thinks that to do so may operate to the injury of others. It may put the price $100 lower, and then some man will come along, and will say: "I have a lot of cars of another make, which were yesterday selling at $500 in competition with the Ford, which was selling for $600, at which price I could very well enter into competition with them. Now, they are reducing their price to $500. I would not have bought all these cars had I known that Ford was going to reduce his price." Why provide in a statute not only that a man may be indicted if the combine is likely to hurt a producer or consumer, but also "if it is likely to hurt a producer, a consumer, or others"? The Bill does not provide that it shall be a wrongful act; it may be a perfectly innocent act, but still he would be liable to prosecution.

My honourable friend here (Hon. Mr. Fowler) has spoken of the powers of the Registrar. If I went before the Registrar and said, "I am one of the others, and they are lowering the price of that car to injure my business, and I want an inquiry," the Registrar would have the facts which would not justify, but which would obligate him to make an inquiry. They would go to the Ford Company, or to any other company, as the case might be, and would inquire into their business and upset their affairs, and put them to no end of trouble.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The charge would be that they had unduly reduced the price.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Not "unduly;" simply that they had reduced their price to my detriment, because they could compete with me better than they could before. That would be the injury to me. If I had $10,000 worth of cars in my garage, and were selling them in the market at $500 while you were selling yours at $600, and you reduced your price, it would certainly injure me. The Bill does not say "unduly," "unreasonably" or "improperly." It simply says that if the action results in an injury to anybody—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: "Anybody" is the public.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Excuse me: it says "the public, whether consumers, producers or others." You eliminate the buyers and the producers, and you come down to the middleman—the seller. The reason that I object to these words is because the action should be to the detriment or injury of the public.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Does not the honourable gentleman think it is all controlled in the word "public"?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No. The public does not mean all mankind: it means different classes of mankind, because the Bill goes on to separate them into different classes. It says that one class of the public is the consumer. The Registrar would say: "Does that injure the producer?" "No." "Does it injure the consumer?" "No." "Whom does it injure?" "The distributor." The statute subsidizes the public, which I say should not be done.

Take the condition of the sugar refiners. Suppose they have a fixed price, and one refiner to-morrow cuts the price 10 or 20 cents per cwt. Surely the others are all injured, and could ask for an inquiry, saying that the price should not be reduced, that it will ruin their business, and that they want to find whether the reduction had been maliciously made. I think the provision should be limited to combines that have injured the public generally—not extended to those "likely to injure;" and the public should not be subdivided as they have been.

Then, I submit, the Registar should be one of the present Government officials. We have got enough departments now, and there ought to be men in those departments who could make these inquiries. If you set up a new department under a Registrar, it means a whole new outfit of parasites on this country. If you create a department for this purpose, the officials of that department will have to justify their existence, and will go about the country nosing into everybody's business, so that they may make a return at the end of the year showing that they have earned their salaries.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw my honourable friend's attention to clause 4, subsection 2, which says:

> The office of registrar may be held either separately or in conjunction with any other office in the public service.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I am quite aware of that, and want to strike out the words "either separately or." I want it to be indicated that it should be held in conjunction with some other office. That is the point I am trying to make.

I think also that the Government should be manly enough, when they fail in a prosecution of this kind, to pay the costs, not of the prosecutor, but of the persecuted. We have had two trials in Toronto under this precious legislation, one of which lasted six or seven weeks, and put the grocers of Toronto to an enormous expense. That trial was held before the late Chief Justice Falconbridge, who, after thoroughly examining into the matter, declared that there was no foundation for the charge at all. Those gentlemen were brought up and tried in a criminal court, and were put to all the expense of a defence when there was no reason whatever for the prosecution. There was another case in Toronto which was decided by the Court of Appeal. Because that was a civil action the Court of Appeal gave the costs to the defendants, who were successful. Under this legislation, the old principle that the Crown neither takes costs nor gives them is recognized, although in a great deal of our modern legislation the Crown does take costs. There should be a provision here that the Dominion Government should pay to the unfortunate people who are persecuted under this law their costs at least.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will answer in a very few words. My honourable friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) was surprised to find that the labour organizations were excepted from the measure. I would draw his attention to the fact that this principle was introduced into this kind of legislation from the very inception. He will find it at the bottom of section 498 of Chapter 146 of the Revised Statutes; he will find it also in the Combines and Fair Prices Act, in clause 2, where it says:

> The expression "combine" does not include combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

I realize that the situation has changed somewhat since this kind of legislation was first introduced and this principle recognized. I am not sure at the moment whether it is to be found in the Act of 1889; but, even if it is not, it could be said that 10 years ago wages were low, and at that time it was admitted by people who were studying social questions and the relations of capital and labour, that labourers should have the right to unite for their own protection. Labour has succeeded magnificently in asserting its will and its right to bargain collectively. Wages have been gradually forced up. Should we at this time decide that labour unions shall dissolve and the men return to their previous powerlessness? That is what it would mean, because the whole of their strength to-day is based on union. I recognize the fact that they may be unreasonable and oppressive in the exercise of their newly-acquired power; but there was a time when the conditions were reversed; and I wonder to what extent the abuses that we have observed will continue and develop. At this moment I am inclined to accept the view of my honourable friend from DeSalaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique), and to suggest that labour employed in public utilities should be made to accept some kind of public control. Not long ago the nation had to protect itself, and could not allow the military, for instance, to form a union against the nation. We have reached the point where policemen in our towns and cities are trying to organize into unions and to hold up the cities by withdrawing their protection. We have seen strikes in some cities; we have had an experience of it in Montreal; and it seems to me that Parliament will some day have to determine the extent of the control to be imposed on the wage earner who is giving his labour to a public utility. I recognize the principle, and I mentioned it last week as embodied in the League of Nations, of the freedom of man. A man would be free to give or not to give his labour to a public utility, but when he has consented to do so, I feel that in the interests of society there should be some kind of control.

My honourable friend from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) attacked clause 5 of the Bill. Of course, these matters could probably have been better discussed in Committee. He feels that there is no responsibility attaching to the denunciation by six citizens; and that if it is found that they have made a baseless complaint they should be made to pay the costs. That is not the principle which has been followed prior to the drafting of this Bill. There is something more commendable in the suggestion of the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton).

The honourable gentleman from Sussex also said that the registrar seemed to have considerable power. He seemed to think that he would have a power for mischief by calling unduly on corporations that were doing no harm, for evidence of all kinds. I think when we go into Committee we shall find, by the simple reading of the clauses, that the public and the so-called victims are very fairly protected. There is a right vested in the registrar to first cross-examine the applicants and find out whether there is any basis for their opinion. The registrar may not have to call upon the parties complained of to rebut any kind of evidence. He will be a man of standing, who will himself judge of the value of prima facie evidence produced by the complainants.

The Government is asked what will be the standing of that individual. I would surmise that a Government composed of ordinary beings who are careful of their own reputation and have a sense of their responsibility would select for such a position a man who would have the full confidence of the public, and who would not impose such a handicap as has been suggested upon the operation of this Bill. The Bill simply provides machinery for investigation.

My honourable friend who has just spoken has suggested that the clause defining combines is very loose. When I introduced this Bill I took occasion to say that it had been largely taken from past legislation, with all the experience that past legislation had furnished. If my honourable friend will look at the Act for which he himself voted—because he was in this Chamber at the time—he will find the very same expressions in clause 2, which says:

> The expression "combine" is used in this Act with intended relation to articles of commerce, and it shall be deemed to have reference only to such combines, immediately hereinafter defined as, with relation to aforesaid, have in the opinion of the Board of Commerce of Canada (or of a single member thereof acting under authority of and for the purposes of section 8 of this Act) operated, or are likely to operate, to the detriment of or against the interests of the public, consumers, producers, or others.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Because they went wrong once they should not be asked to do it again. I do not know that I would vote for it, though.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: This is going much further.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, it is limited:

> This expression shall be deemed to include—

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: In the new Act it will have to be in the opinion of the judge.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The other objection that my honourable friend had to the phraseology of this interpretation clause was directed against fixing a common or resulting price or a common rental or a common cost of storage or transportation. I have drawn his attention to the fact that all this is subject to the definition of the word "combine" which declares that it must be > Operated or likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others.

The expression, "the public" is a broad expression, and I doubt very much whether anyone having to administer this Act would not laugh out of court complainants who would come before him saying that the public were being victimized because they were being offered an article cheaper than heretofore the complainants had heard asked for it.

On the whole, I think that this Bill will stand the minute examination of my honourable friends when it comes to Committee, and I am glad to find that, the principle being recognized, we all agree upon the second reading which I have had the honour to move.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

RAILWAY RATES FOR THE MARITIME PROVINCES

DISCUSSION CONCLUDED; MOTION WITHDRAWN

The Senate resumed from May 8 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. McDonald:

That in the opinion of this House the railway freight rates now effective on consignments from the Maritime Provinces are proportionately higher than those effective in regard to consignments from the western provinces and seriously handicap the industries of the Maritime Provinces and should be substantially reduced and that the Government should take steps forthwith to cause such reduction.

Hon. J. S. McLENNAN: Honourable gentlemen, this motion has been on the Order Paper for a long time, and it seems that we should submit it to the arbitrament of the House for its opinion. I would not have spoken on this if it had not been for some remarks that fell from the honourable member from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff), who has visited Nova Scotia and the other Maritime provinces. I am sure that visitors as genial and observant as he will always be welcome there, although apparently he has seen and heard things which none of us who have been there our lifetimes, or the greater part of them, have ever heard.

He expressed the opinion that the prosperity of that country could be enhanced if there were free trade between those provinces and the States of the American Union. In saying that he indulged in what all of us have many times indulged in—the game of "hypothetical history"—what would come about if something happened which has not happened. I had occasion to make some studies which had some bearing on this question, and which I would like to submit. They were based on figures given me by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I asked for figures which would show certain things in relation to two of the larger Maritime provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I did not include Prince Edward Island, because its situation was somewhat different and somewhat special, any more than I included mining in the figures in which I made comparisons. While mining is a very great and important industry in Nova Scotia, it is not one of very great importance in any of the States with which I made the comparison.

If there are any benefits to be derived from American trade, it seems to me they would be evident in a comparison made between our Maritime Provinces and those States of the American Union which are most like those provinces to which I refer. I took Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine—States not altogether dissimilar—in fact, as similar as possible to our own provinces.

As to population and growth, which are important. I have had some interest in public questions for the best part of half a century, and certainly there have been no 5 years or 10 years in that time in which one has not heard about how the population of Canada was going away to the United States and elsewhere; how we were losing people to an alarming and appalling extent. Only during certain years at the very beginning of this century was that cry not raised over and over again, from the sixties onward.

I made the comparison, first of all, covering the 60 years from 1860 to 1920. During those years the State of Maine increased from 628,279 to 768,014, or 22 per cent. New Hampshire increased from 326,073 to 443,083, or 35 per cent. Vermont increased from 315,098, to 352,428, or only 12 per cent. Take our own provinces, with which I have been making the comparison. Nova Scotia increased by 192,980 in that period, or 59 per cent. New Brunswick increased by 135,829, or 53 per cent. So that it is perfectly evident that during that whole period the rate of growth of population in the provinces compared very much more than favourably with the growth of those corresponding States which are contiguous, and most like the provinces with which I compared them.

Then, 60 years being a long period, I took a shorter period, namely, from the beginning of the century to 1920, and found that in those 20 years our two provinces had increased by 121,019, or 15 per cent. I took the three States again for the corresponding periods, and found that they had increased by 113,830, or 7½ per cent, the United States increase being just half of our Canadian provinces. We had increased 121,000 in a total population of 911,000, which was a vastly greater increase than that of the three American States—113,000 in a population of 1,500,000.

I find that our provinces doubled the value of their agricultural lands and buildings—that in farm implements and machinery they increased from $6,871,000 to $13,357,000, or more than double; that in field crops, though we have always felt that agriculture was not our strong point, our actual increase in value was from $18,158,000 to $73,500,000, which is four times. I find that in these States their field crops increased from $63,000,000 to $171,000,000, which is less than three times.

When we come to manufactures, which do not include mining, I find that their value in our provinces in 1901 was $44,564,000, and in 1921 $276,964,000, an increase of over six times. Taking the corresponding figures in those three States which abut on our provinces—Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont—their increase was from $303,000,000 to $1,032,000,000—only three times.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: But they are the three deadest States in the Union.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: They are the three most like our own. We cannot pick out tobacco from Virginia and food from Florida and gold from Wyoming, and then make a comparison. I made the comparison with States which most closely resemble our own. In giving these comparisons I am fully aware that a great statesman said there were three forms of untruth—lies, d— lies, and statistics. I have tried to do this as honestly and decently and fairly as I could.

I find, again, that they have the same troubles of which we complain. Those three States have lost living inhabitants, mostly to other parts of the Union, 294,699; and had there not been nearly 243,799 new people come in to those States, their condition would have been very different.

Now, I am not certain whether the views of the honourable gentleman from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff) or mine are the more likely to be correct, but I am inclined to think that reciprocity would not have made very much difference. Looking at the matter in a practical way, one must remember that from the beginning until 1887 reciprocity never became a party question in Canada. After 1865, when there was a joint protest of all the Boards of Trade of Canada and the United States convened in Detroit against the repeal of the old treaty, effort after effort was made. In 1865 there was a mission to Washington; there was a mission again in 1869, again in 1871, again in 1874, again in 1878, again in 1887, again in 1892, and again in 1896; and then Sir Wilfrid Laurier said—and I believe no Prime Minister of Canada ever said anything that had a more unanimous response from the people of Canada—"We will make no more pilgrimages to Washington."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, but Washington made a pilgrimage to Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: Yes, later enormous changes had come: we had found our feet; we had met with extraordinary prosperity; we had developed great self-reliance. That prosperity has unfortunately since met with difficulties, but it will come back. Every one of those missions failed, but every time the tariff of the United States has been hostile to Canada some new avenue has opened up to us. Canada was like Antaeus in the fable, who wrestled with Hercules. Antaeus was the son of the earth, and every time Hercules threw him he got new strength. So it was with Canada at the time of the McKinley tariff and other similar tariffs, and I am hopeful it will prove to be that the Fordney tariff will develop new strength and more self-reliance in us. It was that self-reliance, coupled with various blazing indiscretions, that caused that mission from Washington to Canada in 1911 not to meet with success. So much for that.

Speaking on the motion of the honourable gentleman, who has waited so long for the solution of the question he has proposed to the House, I would not be fair if I did not say that I scarcely think the revision of railway rates in the way he suggests would be a panacea for our trouble. Whatever lowering of rates there may be between the central provinces and the Maritime provinces, we must remember that a large part of our products there are similar in condition to those here, such as lumber. Fish is the only important one that is different, and I am not going into the somewhat complicated question of the distribution of fish; but I do think there are other openings by which the prosperity of Nova Scotia can be enhanced. One is the creation of new avenues of trade, and the railways of the country, according as they are handled in one way or another, can enormously change the result. for example, the trade from British Columbia could do a great deal for Nova Scotia if boats were put on that would carry cargo through the Panama canal, as pointed out by the honourable member from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Barnard). If this line were established, Nova Scotia-produced iron and steel might be substituted for foreign iron and steel in the markets of British Columbia, and products from the western province could be brought to the Maritime provinces, as well as to Ontario and Quebec, at a very cheaper rate than at present. That is not altogether impossible.

Again, there is the lifting of the embargo. If the honourable gentleman from Sackville (Hon. Mr. Black) were here, I am sure he would confirm, from the closest possible knowledge, the possibilities of these great dyke lands of Nova Scotia feeding cattle, which could be shipped during the summer months from Sydney, and during the winter from Halifax with a minimum disturbance and loss of weight. I think I am justified in saying that there is no land where cattle could be fed more cheaply than on these marshes.

Then there are various other things. There would be calling of the mail steamers, thus putting the Maritime Provinces practically where they should be, having regard to their geographical position in relation to Europe, instead of being as they are now, about on a parity with the north of lake Superior.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Where would you have the steamers stop?

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: That big traffic of the Montreal steamers must always go up the St. Lawrence, but a detour of 80 or 100 miles would give the lower provinces the advantage of their close proximity to Europe which they now enjoy only during the winter.

I think, too, that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick will get their greatest impetus towards prosperity and increasing population by the development of various industries which will make for an export trade. The prosperity of those provinces began on the water, and they are the nearest points in Canada, I think, to foreign trade, in the widest possible sense, not only to England and Europe, but to the rest of the world. When it comes to building a fishing vessel and sailing it, Nova Scotia can do as well as her competitors from the United States, and I do not believe that the skill and energy and enterprise is all dead, but that it will yet come to the front.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: My excuse for adding a word or two on this subject is the great importance of it. We in this country have been fortunate enough to have a Railway Board which has given entire satisfaction from the time it was created; and if it has given satisfaction, it is because it has not been a political agency, and because the Government has not interfered by influence or otherwise with its decisions. Our neighbours to the south of us have had another experience. Their Interstate Commerce Commission, which corresponds to our Railway Board, has ruined the railways all over the United States. You may consult any business man in that country, and he will tell you that they have had the worst commission that they could have, and that its decisions do not command any respect or exercise any influence because it has been under the sway of the United States Government.

The motion which the honourable gentleman from Shediac (Hon. Mr. McDonald) has put before the House seeks the interference of the Government in order to induce the Railway Board to reduce rates. Surely this House, much more than the other branch of Parliament, should be the one to guard against any interference of that kind, and I hope the honourable gentleman will not insist upon his motion, as it would be a step in the wrong direction and would no doubt have a very bad effect on the Commission. The Commission should be left alone. It deserves the confidence of the public; it is doing a good work. If Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, or any other province or part of the community is dissatisfied with the rates, they are at liberty to go to the Railway Commission and make a complaint, and they will be heard and will receive justice. But do not ask Parliament to intervene and exercise a power which they have the right to exercise, but which should not be exercised except under very exceptional circumstances.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON: May I just observe that the motion of the honourable member from Shadiac does not propose that Parliament shall interfere with any jurisdiction which the Railway Board may have. May I also observe that the Railway Commission has not heretofore exercised any jurisdiction over rates on this portion of the Canadian Government Railways.

Hon Mr. MURPHY: That is the important point that he overlooks.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But the Government railways are now under the Commission.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The honourable gentlemen will note from reading the motion that it is proposed that this House shall express the opinion:

> That in the opinion of this House the railway freight rates now effective on consignments from the Maritime Provinces are proportionately higher—

If that is a statement of fact, then there should be no hesitation on the part of the House in agreeing that it is a fact, and by so doing bringing it to the notice of the Board of Railway Commissioners, who now have jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The point I tried to make is this. It is open to them to go to the Commission, which is the proper party to pass upon that question, and give a ruling. But this Parliament is not in sufficient possession of the facts, and it would be taking the question out of the jurisdiction of the Board, so to speak.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: If they have gone to the Commission and the Commission has not done justice, and the factories in the Maritime Provinces are closing down, is not this the proper place to come to demand justice?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No. When you are not satisfied with the decision of the Railway Board, you apply to the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Cannot Parliament express an opinion?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The honourable member in pressing this motion, did so, I am sure, because of a desire on his part and on the part of the people of the Maritime Provinces to bring to the attention of Parliament the fact that the Maritime Provinces are labouring under a very serious disability. I think it may be summarized somewhat in this manner: that the original freight rates in Canada were based on Montreal, Montreal taking Boston and New York rates as between it and the West. And there was added to the Montreal rate an arbitrary so-called, which is a common term in rate making, that applied between Montreal and the points in the Maritime Provinces. The arbitrary increased as distance increased. That same thing applied to points in the state of Maine. The complaint of the Maritime Province people, as I understand it, is that as freight rates increased from time to time that arbitrary should have remained the same, so that getting their goods into the markets of the central and western provinces, and being able to purchase from those markets, they should not have been placed in a more disadvantageous position than were other parts of the Dominion; that, if they were required to pay increased freight rates west of Montreal, just as people in the province of Quebec or the the province of Ontario were, they should have continued to enjoy the same fixed arbitrary over and above the rates west of Montreal.

From my own observation, I think this is perhaps a matter of more importance to the Maritime Provinces than many honourable gentlemen realize. I have in mind what occurred in the town of Amherst. Only a few years ago Amherst was a very prosperous town, surrounded by a rather good country, and had some large industries, one particularly, which employed a large number of men—the Rhodes-Curry Car Company, and the Robb Engineering Company. For reasons which I am not qualified to state, those industries have drifted to other centres to some extent, particularly the car industry, which has almost entirely ceased to exist in Amherst, and which is now carried on in Montreal. The change may have been due to freight charges on material that had to be transported and to the rate charged on cars that had to be delivered to railroads west of Montreal. There is no doubt that the change was justifiable in the minds of those who caused it; but, so far as Amherst and the surrounding agricultural country is concerned, honourable gentlemen will appreciate that it was a severe blow to the community. That experience has caused a decrease in the town population within the last 24 months of more than 2,000 people, and it is the problem of that particular town to-day to find the means to obtain the taxes necessary to carry on their necessary municipal undertakings.

Amherst's experience has been multiplied in a number of other places in the Maritime Provinces, and there are very few places which show any substantial growth during the last two or three years. I attribute that unfortunate situation to some extent to the condition of freight rates. I am sure it is true that the Maritime Province people probably attribute to it more importance than it deserves; nevertheless they do feel that some relief in this regard would be a great boon to them. Many things have occurred indicating this, and I think the honourable gentleman, in bringing this matter to the attention of the House, has rendered the Maritime Provinces a real public service, and that the House should not pass over it lightly. When in the opinion of the House the representations he has made are true, what is the objection to the House agreeing to the motion? The matter will then be placed before the Board of Railway Commissioners, to deal with it as in their judgment seems wise.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Does not the honourable gentleman think that the Maritime Provinces are suffering very much because they have been cursed with Government ownership for years and years, ever since the Intercolonial was built, because no one had any interest in developing that road and establishing new industries? If honourable gentlemen would read the life of James J. Hill, they would see that every time he opened a piece of road there were factories and mills established to keep that road going. If the Maritime Provinces had had private ownership, they would have marched ahead with the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think it is proper to say that the Maritime Provinces also feel that they are entitled to some attention because of the fact that the present Government did bring relief to a substantial number of citizens in Western Canada. There are many articles of commerce to-day that are carrying a higher rate of freight, the cost of which is distributed all over Canada than would have been the case had the Government not taken that action last year and left the Railway Commission undisturbed and unhampered.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: I wish to ask the permission of the House to amend my motion, as I do not wish to make any reflection or criticism of the rates in the western provinces. I would eliminate the words "are proportionately higher than those effective in regard to consignments from the western provinces and." The motion will then read:

That in the opinion of this House, the railway freight rates now effective on consignments from the Maritime Provinces seriously handicap the industries of the Maritime Provinces and should be substantially reduced, and that the Government should take steps forthwith to cause such reduction.

If honourable members from the province of Quebec knew the situation in the Maritime Provinces, I do not think they would oppose the plea which I am making for at least an examination into our condition.

The motion as submitted was amended accordingly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may say to my honourable friend that I have some idea of the situation in the Maritime Provinces, and I add my sympathy to that already expressed by members of other provinces who sit in this Chamber. I recognize that the situation is not very bright, and that the Maritime Provinces are badly handicapped by the present high rates.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And Government ownership.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But perhaps they are not so very much more handicapped than many of the other provinces in the Dominion, the rates all round being admittedly too high. The special case which my honourable friend has raised arises out of a change in the proportionate rate which used to prevail in the Maritime Provinces, and which has been disturbed somewhat. This is a special case which should receive the attention of the proper authorities; and when I say "proper authorities," I am in somewhat of a quandary. My honourable friend suggests that the Government should take steps forthwith to cause such reduction. Can the Government take steps to do so?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I hear my honourable friend say certainly. Would he indicate in virtue of what authority the Government could take such steps?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Is not Parliament supreme in this country?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then my honourable friend means that we should ride rough-shod over the powers given to the Railway Board, and should appropriate to ourselves the right to fix rates. Of course, I take it for granted that this power would first be initiated in the popular branch, and not in this Chamber. It would directly affect the revenue of the country. Now, I do not believe that either this Parliament or the country is disposed to throw into the political arena, into Parliament, the fixing of rates on our railways. We have a Railway Board, an independent institution, to which we have delegated those powers.

I am not sure that political action cannot be exercised to a certain extent and perhaps I am not very orthodox in even suggesting that there may be a political discretion exercised; but it would only be after the Railway Board had passed judgment upon an application from one of the Maritime provinces, and an appeal to the Privy Council had been lodged from that Board if its decision were adverse. Then the matter would be in the hands of the Executive, that is, of a Committee of Parliament. The situation, as I see it, is absolutely before our eyes in an appeal to the Privy Council from British Columbia against a judgment of the Railway Board. That has already been heard in part, and will be continued after the prorogation of this Session. So there may be, in the last resort, an appeal to a power very near to Parliament, which is the Executive.

The answer which I have in my hand, and I have had for some weeks, may indicate to my honourable friend how he could proceed about it. It is one of the ways, and I do not for the moment see any other way. It is an answer to his motion that comes from the Department of Railways. I asked for it because I was under the impression that my honourable friend was putting this motion on the Order Paper so as to secure an expression of opinion from the Senate through some members speaking on this motion, but that he would not press it to a vote.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: I want to find out how to-night the Senators stand on this question. I have heard two or three expressions, but the people, in the Maritime provinces want to find what the opposition is, and who they are.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Who they are? The Maritime provinces are more interested in relief. The Senate can express here a wish by the adoption of this resolution or by an expression of opinion. We understand what are our limitations. The answer is as follows:

Since January 20th, the date the general Railway Act became applicable to the Canadian Government Railways, as provided by Section 14, Chap. 13, 1919 (an Act to incorporate the Canadian National Railway Company and respecting Canadian National Railways), the Intercolonial Railway has been under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners for rate-making purposes, and already an application affecting rates on Prince Edward Island has been made to the Board by J. J. Hughes, M.P., for King's, P.E.I.

This was an application for the establishment on Prince Edward Island of equal rates for equal distances on the mainland, and was heard by the Railway Board on Wednesday, the 25th of April. Representatives of the Canadian National Railways present intimated that new tariffs were in course of preparation, which would remove some of the objections complained of, and the matter stands until these tariffs have been filed and an opportunity afforded Island shippers to study them.

If Senator McDonald feels that there is unfair discrimination as to rates on the Intercolonial, the proper procedure would be to have the parties concerned make application to the Board of Railway Commissioners, when the matter would be heard promptly, and if the charge of alleged unfair discrimination is found to be sustained, the Board would apply the remedy.

This, of course, is an answer from the officials of the Railway Department, and a procedure is here indicated that would bring the matter before the Railway Board, which is specially constituted for the purpose of fixing railway rates—I say specially, not exclusively—and have a pronouncement from that Board. If the pronouncement is unsatisfactory to the Maritime provinces, there lies, as I said, an appeal to the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Having regard to the observations of the honourable member from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), as well as those of the leader of the Government as to possible or at least apparent conflict of Parliament with the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners, in case Parliament were to pass this motion, I am sure that no honourable gentleman desires to have Parliament even appear to interfere with the proper performance of the duties of the Board referred to. There is a little distinction between this case and that of the Crow's Nest Pass, for in the latter case the rates were originally fixed as a result of a statute passed.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: A bargain with the C.P.R.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The rates were simply brought back into force by reason of a certain statute coming to an end, and not being renewed, and therefore it was a passive action of the Government, rather than a positive one that might be termed, and sometimes has been termed, governmental interference. But it does seem to me that this matter is of sufficient importance for the Board of Railway Commissioners to know the sentiment of this House, at least; and, while I would not care to move, because I am not a Maritime province man and not specially interested in the matter, I would suggest that if the honourable member from Shediac (Hon. Mr. McDonald) would amend his motion I think it would be perfectly proper for the House to concur, and let the matter be brought to the attention of the Board of Railway Commissioners so that they would, in all probability, review the expressions of opinion that have been given here, and thus be more fully seized of the importance of the matter than they might otherwise be. I would suggest that the honourable gentleman amend his motion to read as follows:

That in the opinion of this House the railway freight rates now effective on consignments from the Maritime provinces seriously handicap the industries of those provinces and should be substantially reduced, and that the Government should call this opinion to the attention of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: I am perfectly willing to follow the suggestion of the honourable member from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson). The reason I brought this matter before the House is that there is a very critical situation in the Maritime provinces. I am receiving letters and telegrams stating that factories are closing down, and there is not the slightest question that the freight rates are paralyzing the industries of the East. I find there is a great deal of discussion going on about redistribution—how many members there will be from Ontario and from Nova Scotia; but the important question in the Maritime provinces is not now many men we are to have. We might as well have 4 as 24 if we have no jurisdiction,—if we cannot come to the Commons or the Senate and get relief on rates. Representatives from the manufacturers in the East have come to the Railway Commission, and have got nothing. I went to a so-called expert, a pretty important man in this matter, and spoke about the differential or an arbitrary rate, such as the honourable gentleman from Welland emphasized—a through rate that was given us in 1876—and he said, "My dear man, freight rates are so evasive that what I know in the morning I forget at night." And this is one of the experts that we are supposed to take our final answer from. Now, if our factories are going to close down because that is the kind of intelligence we have to submit to, I say that unless this Senate considers my plea and takes action, I have no business here.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, I have recognized from the outset that any grievance can be ventilated in both branches of Parliament; but we have our limitations when it comes to invading the jurisdiction of the tribunal which we have invested with some authority, and which we have created as an independent institution. Can we ask that the Government take action when, as a matter of fact, the Government will stand as a Court of Appeal if there is a case submitted to the Railway Board and rejected. It semes to me that my honourable friend could perhaps, like the member for one of the divisions of Prince Edward Island in the Commons, lay his case before the Railway Board and force them to take cognizance of it.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: In the last amendment that was made to my motion, we state that, in the opinion of the Senate, the Government should lay the case before the Railway Commission.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The Senate can lay the case, not the Government.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: An opinion expressed by this House obviously does not implicate either the Government or the House of Commons. Therefore I would suggest a modification of the motion.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Do I understand that the honourable gentleman asks leave to further amend his motion?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: Yes.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The motion will read as follows:

That in the opinion of this House the railway freight rates now effective on consignments from the Maritime provinces seriously handicap the industries of the Maritime provinces, and should be substantially reduced, and that the Senate's opinion be brought to the attention of the Board of Railway Commission.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have considerable diffidence in going that length. This is undoubtedly a departure, and a precedent that we are creating by affirming our adhesion to a certain policy, and asking the Railway Board to act in consequence. I think that the honourable gentleman should be satisfied with the discussion which has taken place in this House, and the exposition and development of the situation in the Maritime provinces. We should be somewhat slow in going on record as advising the Railway Board. That is what bothers me.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Do we understand that my honourable friend objects to the consent of the House being given to the amendment of the motion?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, I would like very much to show sympathy to the Maritime provinces, but at the same time I dislike to create such a precedent. We have said that the Railway Board which we created would act independently of political influences. We may recall any of those powers by an Act of Parliament; but we are not doing that; we are simply giving advice to the Railway Board.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: Is that political influence—advice from the Senate?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: The Railway Board is a tribunal. A case will be brought before that tribunal; the facts will be laid before it; argument will take place; and in the fullness of their independence that tribunal will render judgment. Now, we are dictating in advance to that Board the judgment it should render. In what position shall we be tomorrow if the Railway Board, after a full investigation, comes to the conclusion that it has no right or that it should not alter the situation? It will be a judgment which will set at naught our wish. What will be the recourse? An appeal to the Privy Council, or a Bill presented in this House to reach the end which will not have been met by a judgment of the Railway Commission. This is the situation. Have we a right, in advance of a case being submitted and pleaded, to give our opinion to the Railway Board? That is what hampers me considerably in acquiescing in the resolution.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I quite appreciate my honourable friend's difficulty, but is it not true that ever member of this Chamber has the undoubted right to bring before this Chamber any matter of public importance, especially to such a large proportion of the community as these three Maritime provinces form? The honourable member from Shediac has done that. With a good deal of force he has, by the recital of facts, presented a case that I think, has enlisted the sympathy of a great many honourable gentlemen in this Chamber, who I think agree that it is a matter well worth the closest investigation and inquiry on the part of the Board of Railway Commissioners. Now it is suggested that this House should formally express its opinion that such an inquiry would be proper for the Commission to make, without directing the Commission in any way, because we have no right, perhaps to do that. I would hesitate trying to urge upon my honourable friend that this House should take any action that might be considered as a dangerous precedent; but surely the Senate of Canada has a right to express an opinion on a matter of such grave public importance as this seems to be.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: What are we asked to express an opinion on? On the statement made here that the manufacturers of Amherst and the lower provinces are put out of business on account of the freight rates? Now, we do not know what those freight rates are. My honourable friend who made this motion undertook to compare them with those in the West; yet we have the statement made in another place in this building that the rates in the West are preventing the farmers from farming. I am sure that the freight rates had nothing to do with the car works moving from Amherst.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think they had.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: You might say that about any business like it in any part of Canada.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: For instance, if a car is built in Amherst for the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway, before it became a part of the National, that car in all probability would have to be hauled empty from Amherst to Montreal to be delivered to the owner, at a cost of perhaps $50 to $75. If that car is manufactured now by the consolidated and enlarged car company in Montreal, and is turned out on the tracks of the purchaser, a very substantial saving is made in that as well as in the transportation of material; but, so far as the people of Amherst are concerned, it is fatal.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: But you would not suggest that those cars should be made in Amherst that can be made cheaper in Montreal?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I do not think it is good policy for any Government to attempt to concentrate the industrial activities of the country in any one centre.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Motions similar to this are constantly being made in the Senate for the purpose of enabling questions to be discussed; but as a rule the mover courteously withdraws his motion after it has been discussed. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. McDonald) has had a very ample discussion of this matter, and I think the present leader of the House will agree with me that it has always been the custom, after having heard the discussion, to withdraw the motion; and I would ask the honourable gentleman to do so, because it is really embarrassing, and is the first time in 23 years that we have encountered such a case.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think the honourable member from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson), who has occupied the position of a Minister of the Crown, will admit that when a tribunal is created for the purpose of making an investigation and obtaining all the details required and the views of experts, as the Railway Board has been, it is but proper to accept the suggestion of the leader of the Government and refer the question to the Railway Board. We have no knowledge that any application has yet been made to the Railway Board. The honourable gentleman from Shediac Hon. Mr. McDonald) has made his representations in favour of his province. He should be satisfied with that, and should follow the course laid down by the law governing the situation. A present court is created by Parliament to hear the complaint. Let him go to that court and exhaust its jurisdiction; then if he feels that the Railway Board has not rendered justice, he has recourse to the Governor in Council. If he is then of opinion that he has not obtained justice from the Governor in Council, he may ask Parliament to make a pronouncement. It seems to me that it would be indiscreet on the part of the Senate not only to create a precedent, but to form an opinion. If we are ready to form an opinion, we should be ready to dictate to the Railway Board the extent to which they should go. They would have the evidence and all the facts. We offer our sympathy to the honourable gentleman, but I for one feel that I am not at all qualified to go as far as he asks me, and therefore I hope that he will understand that the leader of the Government has indicated the course which should be followed, commencing by making an application to the Railway Board.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I quite appreciate the fact that the leader of the Government feels a somewhat serious responsibility in establishing a precedent which he thinks might commit this House to a line of action, or to expressing an opinion on something not properly before us. He is, I feel, confronted with the problem of either consenting to permit the honourable gentleman from Shediac to amend his motion in the manner suggested or to withhold that consent, which I know, from his usual courtesy, would be a matter of regret to him. Under these circumstances, and inasmuch as the matter has been very fully ventilated and very calmly and deliberately debated on two different occasions in this House, it may be that the honourable gentleman from Shediac will now feel that the matter will be brought to the attention of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and that the purpose which he has tried to serve, and which I think he has very well served, has been fulfilled.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may add, honourable gentlemen, that I will make it my duty to lay officially before the Chairman of the Railway Board the debate which has taken place in this Chamber, and to ask him to kindly give his serious attention to the situation which has been disclosed to this House.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD: I appreciate the very kind and sympathetic way in which my plea has been received by the Senate. I was only pressing my motion as I know the needs of the Maritimes and that they want action right now. After the very graceful way in which the leader of the Government has promised to use his undoubted influence at once in this matter, I ask leave to withdraw my motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

GOVERNMENT STEAMSHIPS

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Before we adjourn, I would like to ask the leader of the Government whether he has brought down the information promised yesterday in regard to whether certain boats were in the hands of private individuals or in the hands of the Railway Department.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I had hardly left this Chamber before I penned a letter to the Railway Department asking for the information which my honourable friend from Midland (Hon. Mr. Bennett) had requested. As soon as I get the answer, I will communicate it to the House.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 23, 1923.

The Senate met at 3 p. m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DIVORCE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill G5, an Act for the relief of Lillian Beryl Brayman.—Hon. Mr. Willoughby.

Bill H5, an Act for the relief of Roland Bergeron.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

Bill 15, an Act for the relief of Florence Cohn.—Hon. Mr. Blain.

DISPOSAL OF CANADIAN SHIPS

ANSWER TO INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I was asked at the sitting on Friday last if the Government or the Railway Board had disposed, by lease or otherwise, of the Canadian ships on the Great Lakes. This was an informal question which arose in the course of a debate. The answer which I got was that no such lease had been made, or other disposal of the ships. The Canadian National Board could lease any of those steamers, or all of them, without any reference to the Government, but would not be apt to do this. The Railway Board, with the consent of the Government, has decided, to offer for sale 27 of the smaller ships of the fleet, which will include those on the Great Lakes.

FRENCH CONVENTION BILL

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand for the second reading of Bill 23, an Act respecting a certain Convention of Commerce between His Majesty and the President of the French Republic.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Honourable gentlemen, I do not propose to take up very much of the time of the Senate this afternoon on details, but I desire to lay before you, as plainly and briefly as possible, some impressions of the Bill which have not been brought out by my honourable friend who introduced the Bill yesterday. In fact, if I had not read the Bill myself, and had not listened to or read the debates upon it in another place, I am afraid that I would have had a very inadequate idea of the nature of the measure. I cannot, therefore, felicitate my honourable friend too greatly on the clarity and fulness of his exposé of the Bill before us.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I took it for granted that most of the honourable gentlemen here knew about the treaty.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Still, it is wonderful what a lot of things we do not know, and how it sharpens us up to get a full and clear explanation from the leader of the Government in this House, such as he is so often able to give when he sets himself to it.

It is my purpose to call the attention of honourable members to two or three considerations prior to my remarks upon the Bill itself in particular. The first consideration is the course followed by our trade relations with France from the time that these exchanges of commodities began to take place. I think everybody in this Parliament, whether in the Senate or the House of Commons, has a sympathetic leaning towards the development of trade with France. That is natural to us, coming from the history of our country and the composition of its population, and the relations which have existed between the people of this country and those of France. From the inception of Confederation until 1896, properly speaking, that trade went on without any special or definite arrangements being made between Canada and France for tariff or trade privileges. In 1896 there came into force the first modest treaty which was made between Canada and France. That, if I remember rightly, was not a very large affair: the commodities treated of were few in number and limited in range. There were only 19 articles in all of Canada's products that were admitted under the special schedule at minimum tariff rates; then there was a clause which admitted wines, sparkling and non-sparkling, at a reduction of the ad valorem duty; and in addition to that soap and prunes and almonds and plums, and may be one or two other dried fruits, were admitted at a lowered duty. So, although it was an extension of the basis of trade, and indicated a desire to develop this exchange between the two countries, it was on a very modest plane indeed, and not too much could be expected from it.

That remained in force until 1910, when the 1907-8 convention came into effect. This was on a much extended basis. The number of articles which were admitted into France from Canada on the minimum tariff basis were some 152, and articles of French produce and of the colonies of France were given most favoured nation treatment in Canada. That condition remained until the story was taken up by my honourable friend yesterday, and until that treaty was denounced both by France and by ourselves, and was succeeded by the modus vivendi agreement which came into practical operation in February, 1921, and which has remained in force until this day.

Now I propose to give some figures with reference to the trade under these different conditions, commencing in 1868 with an import from France into Canada of $1,365,291, and exports to France of the modest figure of $96,672. We find that in 1895, the last full year of trading on that basis, our imports from France had grown to $2,585,174, and our exports to France had grown to the modest sum of $330,805. During that time, from 1868 to 1895, we imported from France in round numbers $44,000,000 worth of goods, and we exported to France in round figures $9,000,000 worth. That is, the total imports were an average of $1,600,000 and the total exports an average of one-third of a million dollars per year. In those 27 years the balance of trade was against Canada to the amount of $35,000,000.

Coming to the next period, which extended from 1896 to 1910, the figures which I will give in round numbers are as follow: In 1896 our imports amounted to $2,810,862, and in 1910 they amounted to $10,109,544. Our exports to France in 1896 were $573,835, and in 1910 they had crept up to $2,601,097. That is, in that period of 15 years we bought from France to the extent of $92,000,000, and we sold to France to the amount of $22,500,000, on sugar. There was a favourable balance in those years of $53,500,000.

Coming to the next period, commencing in 1911, our imports from France in that year were $11,563,677, and our exports $2,535,204. In 1912 our imports were $11,744,664, and our exports $2,048,768. In 1913 our imports were $15,375,874, and our exports $2,357,154. In 1914, our imports were $14,276,535, and our exports $3,632,444. In that period we bought from France $52,800,000 worth, and we sold to France $10,600,000, and the adverse balance for those four years was $42,200,000.

Looking at the matter in another light: from 1868 up to 1914, which takes in 27, 15, and 4 years, our imports from France had crept up from $1,365,291 to $14,276,535, and our exports from $96,672 to $3,632,444. On the whole, then, during that period of 46 years we imported from France $188,800,000 worth of goods, and we sold to France $42,000,000 worth of goods. The adverse balance against us was $146,800,000.

As showing the comparative purchases on the per capita basis, let me point out that in 1913 we bought from France at the rate of $1.58 par capita of our people, and France bought from us at the rate of 9 cents per capita for her population. The point I wish to make clear is that during that long period of 46 years in the pursuit of developing trade between Canada and France, that was the result and the development to which we had come.

The one inference that we can draw from that is that Canada proved a very good market for France, and that France proved a comparatively small and disappointing market for Canada. The object of treaty making, if I understand it at all, is this: to get markets for our surplus products. Some say it has another aim: it may be to get goods from other countries at a cheaper rate, and to bring them into consumption in our own country. It only requires a thought to show that Canada can get that without going abroad to negotiate treaties; all she has to do is to drop her tariff. If she wants goods from abroad at a cheaper rate, she can take off tariff duties and allow them in without. It is not a primary part, and consequently is not the basic defence of a treaty, that by getting the treaty you get goods into your market at a less price, and consequently benefit your own people. That is one thing we may bear in mind. The other thing we may bear in mind is that our negotiators in one sense never had a stronger argument in France than was at their hands when they went to Paris to arrange this treaty. The argument is largely from the figures which I have read—that to France this had proved a most eligible and most profitable market, because of the large amount of sales she made in the various exchanges that took place.

I have stopped at 1914. I have done that because we can say, and can only say, that up to that time trade was normal, more or less. After the war opened trade became abnormal; treaties amounted to very little here or there; and consequently I have dropped the figures from 1914, and have based the argument upon existing treaties and existing developments during those normal times.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: So did I, but there is an interesting element which my right honourable friend could emphasize—that the war has brought about this extraordinary situation, abnormal it is true, but we have re-established the balance by the extraordinary quantity of products that we sent over to France.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I wish to avail myself of that element; I was about to do it; but at the same time I caution my honourable friend, and caution myself and my friends in the Senate, that they are not to take an argument based upon deductions made from a war market, and that we are on safer ground when we keep ourselves to the normal time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I recognize that.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: But, as my honourable friend said, there is an interesting development in the matter of trade, and whilst I am not going fully into the figures from 1914 to 1920, I am going to quote some figures from 1920. While we have not got down to normal, perhaps the worst abnormality has passed, and these figures show results that have been brought about by the war, and they are interesting.

Taking, then, the figures for 1920, 1921 and 1922, which are contained in the published reports, we imported from France in 1920 $10,630,865 worth of goods, and exported to France, $61,108,693 worth. In 1921 we imported $19,138,062, and exported $27,428,308. In 1922 we imported $13,482,705, and we exported $8,208,228. The abnormality is shown by the fact that in three years our exports to France fell from $61,000,000 down to $8,000,000. We are getting back nearer to normality. The figures of 1922-23 show a larger export to France than $8,000,000, but that was an abnormal year of a series of abnormal years, so far as France was concerned, owing, to a certain extent, to the failure of her crop, and the consequent exportation of a large amount of grain to France, and a large amount of sugar, upon neither of which is there any market advantage to any country as far as tariff is concerned, the minimum and general tariffs being exactly the same on grains and on sugar. That there was a favourable balance in those years of $53,500,000.

But there are other countries than France. The figures for Belgium are surprising. In 1920 we imported from her less than $1,000,000 worth, but we sold to her $28,500,000 worth. In 1921 we imported $4,700,000 and sold to her $40,250,000 worth. In 1922 we bought $3,800,000 worth and sold $12,300,000 worth. In those three years we imported $9,500,000, from Belgium and we exported to her a little over $81,000,000 worth of Canadian products. There was a favourable balance there in those three years of $71,625,144. The favourable balance for France in those three years was $53,500,000, or $18,000,000 less.

Coming to Italy, the figures are also a little astonishing. We imported from Italy in 1920 $999,000 worth and exported to her nearly $17,000,000 worth. In 1921 we imported from Italy $1,750,000 and exported to her $57,750,000. In 1922 we imported $1,387,000, and we exported $15,300,000. That is, in those three years we imported from Italy $4,000,000 worth and exported to Italy $90,000,000 worth. The favourable balance of trade in respect to Italy was therefore around $86,000,000.

Coming to Denmark, Norway and Sweden, I will give the total of the three years. We imported in 1920-21-23, $3,000,000 from those three countries, and we exported $30,750,000 to those countries. The favourable balance to Canada in those three years was $27,721,000.

Take Greece, which has latterly fallen into hard luck. In those three years we imported from Greece $2,500,000 worth of goods, and exported $55,600,000 worth, showing a favourable balance for Canada in those three years trade of $53,000,000.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Have we been paid for that?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Yes, that is all on a commercial basis. In connection with that it may be fair to say that our war loans that were made to Greece, Rumania, Belgium and France during those times, which have been sometimes very strongly criticized, have probably, and to my mind very certainly, been the seeds of this large growth of exports to those countries. Those people became acquainted with the products of Canada about which many of them had known nothing before, and they got acquainted with the resources of Canada for food purposes, and they have followed the trade ever since, to the great advantage of our country.

Take New Zealand—for we must not forget our own little sisters here and there. In those three years we imported from New Zealand $9,500,000 worth, and we exported to New Zealand $23,000,000, a favourable balance of trade of $13,500,000.

Coming to Switzerland there is a different picture. We imported from Switzerland in those three years $30,500,000 worth of goods, and we exported to Switzerland $3,250,000, showing an adverse balance of trade to Canada on that account of $27,250,000; but it is only fair to say, what was hinted at by my honourable friend yesterday, that Switzerland, being an encircled inland country, there is little doubt that she gets from Canada a good deal more than is shown by those figures. But there is no doubt, on the other hand, that the balance of trade with Switzerland is very largely against Canada.

Take Japan. In those three years we bought from Japan $49,800,000 worth of goods, and we sold to Japan $37,000,000 worth, an unfavourable balance of $12,800,000 as far as that country is concerned.

Now, to one who had not read over and studied those statistics, it is rather wonderful how the commerce of Canada, particularly in exports, has grown with reference to those countries with which we had scarcely any trade at all 20, 15 or 10 years ago. The moral that I draw from that is simply this, that, in discussing a treaty with France, we are apt to fix our minds upon our trade with that country and with that country alone, and perhaps we give undue prominence to what some seem to say is the absolute necessity of making a treaty with France, whether the terms are favourable or not. There is no such necessity.

In 1914 the total of our exports to France was about three-quarters of one per cent of out total exports of goods from Canada. Had we lost the whole of it, the loss would scarcely have been appreciable. In this year of grace 1922-23 our total exports will probably be about $950,000,000; so that our exports to France on the $12,000,000 basis will only give a little more than one or one and a quarter per cent of the total. It is therefore not an absolute necessity that we should go beyond what is reasonable and fair to make a treaty with France on the ground that it is of superlative importance for us to do so.

I am one who believes that the more strings we have to our bow the better. The more entrees we get into the trade of foreign countries for our exports and for the supplying of our own needs the better, because countries differ, and it is well to have your name and your work and your trade-making acquaintanceship with new countries from time to time, rather than to devote yourself entirely to the old countries with whom you have been trading. So that I hope honourable members will understand what I mean in giving these figures, and basing my remarks upon them—that though we want to secure as much of the trade of France as possible, and are trying to do so, it is not an essential to Canada; that it is a very small and trivial amount of our total trade; and that if France or any other power with that amount of trade is not reasonably fair to us, we are not called upon to make sacrifices and pay out our money and forego our duties in order that we may be saved from dire consequences. That modifies to a certain extent our view with reference to what some have expressed, I think a little too strongly—that we must have a treaty with France; that it is pretty nearly absolutely essential that we shall.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Have you taken into account, in the increase of the trade of Canada with those Mediterranean countries, that the breadstuffs and other articles usually received from Russia and the Danubian provinces have been supplied by Canada because they could not be obtained from those countries, and that when those countries are open Canada will not have that increase of trade?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Yes, I remember two things with reference to that: first, that our agricultural capabilities are those that we chiefly wish to develop; and, following from that, that anywhere we can push our grains and flour and meat products, it is to our very great advantage to do so. I do not think we should be kept from trying to do that merely because some day or other a source of supply may spring up either in some of those countries to a larger degree than now, or they may come from some other country. The future with reference to the marketing of breadstuffs is one which may provoke a great deal of argument and speculation. Some go so far as to say that the world will some time starve to death if the population continues to increase in the present ratio, and that the time will come when there will not be bread enough for the mouths to eat. Others take the opposite view, and say that production will so increase that our agricultural and food-producing countries will by-and-bye find that their stocks are left on their hands. I do not think we need to borrow trouble from that source; these things adjust themselves pretty well; and I think we and several generations after us may live without being troubled with the fear that the world's population will not be sufficient to eat all that the world will produce, from year to year, and from generation to generation, for a long time to come.

Now I come to the matter of the negotiation of this treaty. I have said that our negotiators going to Paris had very strong arguments in their favour, and I was a little surprised to read a statement made in another place to the effect that when our negotiators arrived at Paris they found that changes had taken place, and that it was impossible to get as generous treatment for Canada as that of preceding times. I do not see why that should be so. It seems to me that the argument for a generous treaty on the part of France was a very strong one. Here we find that France has traded with Canada for 46 years and has sold Canada $188,000,000 worth of her products, and has bought from Canada only about $42,000,000 worth of Canadian products. That is a market which is not to be despised, and it passes my understanding if intelligent and wideawake French negotiators did not have an abiding sense of the utility and the profit of such a market as that. I doubt if there is any great country in the world which affords France a greater comparative output for her products, while at the same time calling upon her to buy so small a proportion of its products. So it might very well have been urged by our negotiators, under the treaties which existed: "Widen our trade, one to the other; your market has increased with us more than our market with you, by all this heavy percentage; you de not wish to lose that market". Nor do I believe that the Paris negotiators thought they would lose it, nor do I believe that they would not have been prepared to have given more for the retention of that market if it had been properly pressed before them. I know of no argument that is stronger than that. Would it not appeal to you, honourable members of the Senate—would it not appeal to every business man in Canada—that if there was a country where we could send $188,000,000 of our products and only have them pay in return for $42,000,000 or so, that is a market that we would want to keep, and that we would not wish to lose? That, therefore, was one of the strong arguments which our negotiators had at their hands. Whether they used it skilfully or not I am not saying but evidently it did not produce results.

But there was another argument which could be used.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: What of the exchange against France? Was not that argument urged by France as rendering very difficult importing from Canada?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: We all have to meet exchange difficulties, but that should not prevent a fair exchange of products.

The second argument which was under the hands of our negotiators was that France gives to the United States, and has given to the United States, very great advantages, in many respects over ourselves, and I know of no special return that the United States has given for that treatment of her products on the part of France. I know that the United States, with her vast population and mighty production, and all that prestige which belongs to a great industrial and naturally productive power, has an opportunity of making her influence felt in treaty and trade arrangements without having recourse to most favoured nation treatment and bargains along that line. At the same time, as between Canada and the United States, it is an argument which would appeal to the French negotiators, that they should treat us as well and as generously as they did before, when they established a large market in our country for the small amounts they bought from us. But that has not been done. Other arguments might be used by our negotiators, and very strong ones. Whether they were used or not I am not saying; but evidently, from the treaty, they have not been very effective.

Now, with these remarks I want to say one word with reference to the agreement of 1921, to which very scant and somewhat slighting reference has been made in another House, and to which a little less scanty reference has been made by my honourable friend who sits opposite to me. One speaker in the other House, one of the negotiators of the treaty, said with reference to the treaty of 1921 that everybody knows that it was worse than that of 1908; and the impression given was that we got very little under that agreement and that the sooner we got rid of it the better. I think it is due to myself to ask the attention of this honourable House for a moment to that. The treaty of 1907-8, Schedule A, had 152 articles on the minimum basis. I brought back, in the agreement of 1921, 138 of those 152, and they are embodied in that agreement. But in that agreement we got 23 other products not in Schedule A of the 1907 treaty on the minimum list and in addition to the 138; and we got 8 others on a percentage basis. Fourteen of the 152 articles under the 1907 Schedule A left Schedule A, as far as the minimum basis was concerned, and were embodied in Article I, where they had a percentage of reduction rate. Not a single one of those articles was an agricultural product: all of them were products of our manufacturers. So that the simple fact is that that agreement embodied 161 articles on the minimum basis, as compared with 152 in the 1907 Schedule, and in addition all those others that I have mentioned. But the treaty of 1921 did something else. Under that arrangement France went back to the intermediate tariff, and we got rid of allowing to Switzerland and Japan and the other most favoured nations any reduction of duties on the goods which were embodied in the 1907-8 Schedule.

The Finance Minister says to-day that the treaty which he brings before Parliament will probably cause a loss of $850,000 to the revenues of this country. It is safe to say that that is a minimum estimate, and that anywhere from $850,000 to $1,000,000 will be the loss of revenue owing to this treaty when it shall have gone into operation. You may make an estimate from that of what was saved to the revenues of the country by France being taken from under the special duties in the 1907-8 treaty, and put back under the Intermediate tariff. That is simply by the way.

I wish now to draw the attention of honourable gentlemen to the treaty itself. First, what has been gained for Canada? What has Canada got? Take Article I, which reads:

> The natural and manufactured products originating in and coming from Canada enumerated in Schedule A to this Convention shall enjoy when imported into France, the French Colonies, Possessions and Protectorates having the same customs tariff as France the benefit of the minimum tariff and of the lowest rates of duties as regards present import duties and taxes and as regards any such duties or taxes which France may hereafter establish and also as regards surtaxes, coefficients or other temporary increases that France may establish.

That is to say, not all the products of Canada enjoy that privilege, but only those that are mentioned in Schedule A, which are 141 in number. 141 of the products of Canada get the privilege of Article I, namely, the benefits of the minimum tariff; and we get most favoured nation treatment in regard to those articles if any better treatment is given to any other country.

When you go to the Article by which France gets an entry into Canada, you find that it covers not a schedule of 141 articles, but all the products of France and of all her colonies. It is not a fraction of her products, but all of them that get most favoured nation treatment on their entry into Canada. Now, bear that in mind, and then bear another thing in mind: you have to read Article II in connection with Article I. With regard to those 141 articles in Article I admitted to France on most favoured nation treatment there is a most important paragraph which sheers off almost all the benefits that otherwise we would get. What is that Article? Article II makes certain exceptions. It says:

> The grant of the minimum tariff for the products enumerated in Schedule A means the treatment of the Most Favoured Nation as respects such products, but does not entitle Canada to claim the benefit of any preferential advantage which France may grant to her Protectorates—

No one finds any fault with that. We give special privileges and preferential privileges to the sisterhood of the different components of Great Britain.

> —or the benefit of any tariff resulting from economic agreements which France may enter into with border states, or the benefits of any tariff which France may grant for products the importation of which is designed to facilitate financial settlements with those countries that were at war with France during the years 1914-1918.

That is an article that never appeared in previous treaties; and the strange thing about it is that when it was brought before the other Chamber the Minister of Finance, who had the Bill in charge, said: "That is a clause that is common to all treaties; it was in the former treaty. It only means that there is a little border of territory between the two countries where they ease up on certain arrangements." That is what he stated in the House, and that is what he thought this clause meant. That is where he showed no adequate knowledge of the breadth and the efficacy of that clause, because that was not it at all. In the other treaties there was always an arrangement for a little border strip of 15 kilometers which did not affect the duty at all; it was simply for transhipment and warehousing privileges, but made no difference in the duties in any respect whatever. Our two negotiators thought that that was all they had given in this Article II; but when it was put to them, the Finance Minister in the end had to say: "Yes, I was wrong about that. It goes farther than I had thought. But it is no matter: I am quite certain France will never take advantage of it." Did you ever hear any negotiator of a treaty use an argument like that?

What is a treaty for? To bind a people by the terms and conditions of the treaty, and by nothing else. What does that provision mean? It means that with regard to the border states—Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and Spain—France may give any further advantages and preferences that she chooses, and that Canada will not participate in or enjoy those advantages. And yet the Finance Minister says: "It is a matter of no consequence; I am sure France hasn't it in her heart to do it; and, if she does, it won't hurt us, because they don't compete with us." Where is your competitor more keen and efficient than Belgium, in a large class of articles which have been placed in these schedules, from which Canada is supposed to benefit in the market of France? Take everyone of the countries I have mentioned, and in one particular or another they are and will be keen competitors with us in the French market. No: France under this treaty, if it passes, will be able to give whatever preference she pleases to these five border states, on goods which compete with our own; and we ourselves get nothing of that advantage. Does that look fair or right?

But that is not all of it. There is the other part of the clause:

—may grant for products the importation of which is designed to facilitate financial settlements with those countries that were at war with France during the years 1914-1918.

Germany, Austria, Hungary, Turkey, Russia, Bulgaria, were all at war with France during those years. France has claims against all of them; in making adjustments and financial arrangements France is at perfect liberty to give to those six countries any preference she chooses, and we get none of the advantages. Is this a most favoured nation treaty arrangement that we have? I just put it to the common sense and the business view of the members of the Senate and the people of this country.

Now let us go to Article III. Having culled out 141 articles that Canada would like to send to France, they make up another schedule which is called Schedule B. 82 of the articles which under the old treaty enjoyed the benefits of the minimum tariff are deprived of that benefit, and are now put in Schedule B, where they get what? A percentage on the difference between the maximum and the minimum tariff. It has been said by someone that the French administrators have of late years followed a different method of putting on their duties. So they have. Now, what does this percentage mean? It means in the case of all the articles mentioned in Schedule B that the Canadian producer will look at the tariff and will say: "On a certain article I will have fifty per cent on the difference between the maximum and minimum tariffs of France. I will look up the maximum and subtract from it the minimum, and if I take 50 per cent of the difference, that will show the duty that I will have to pay." And that percentage is constant, and does not vary. But there is something else that does vary. That duty is so much per cent of the difference between the maximum and the minimum, and France any day in the year may change her maximum and her minimum, one or both, on all those articles. If she lessens the difference between the maximum and the minimum, the percentage that you get dwindles; and when the minimum becomes the maximum you get nothing at all. And our negotiators never thought it worth while to guard themselves and Canada by saying: "You give us a percentage upon the difference; give us also an undertaking that the same difference between maximum and minimum will remain whilst this treaty lasts, or that if you change one you will change the other so as to keep the difference the same." France has an absolutely free hand, and can make a change in everyone of those articles with regard to the minimum or the maximum, or both. Consequently the Canadian merchant never knows where he would be. France has a different system from ours. It was alluded to by my honourable friend yesterday. She is given, as an administration, wonderful power by the chambers, and she has a complex system of co-efficients. I never could quite fathom how they act; but she can attach co-efficients to a duty, and change it in a night by an Order in Council, or by a decree of the Department. So she can change her maximum and her minimum, and we are not protected in that way at all.

Go to the reverse. When our negotiators under another section of the treaty said that French products in such and such a schedule shall come into Canada at a cetrain rate plus a discount of a per centum for the sum of the duty paid, France imposed the condition, and it is in the treaty, that if any changes were made between the intermediate and the general rates in the Canadian tariff, the proportionate difference between the two should be maintained, so that she should always have a specific and fixed duty. Why was it that our negotiators tied themselves and the Dominion Government, on a matter of tariff legislation, hand and foot, and never sought to tie the French negotiators with reference to the articles I have just spoken of? That does not seem to be a fair way of dealing.

Now, not to make the matter too long, in Schedule D France gets entry for 31 very important articles at specific or ad valorem duties plus the most favoured nation treatment, while in Schedule B Canada gets no most favoured nation treatment. There is a proviso that if the United States, with reference to any one of those articles in Schedule B, gets better treatment than is offered under the present tariff, Canada shall get the same. But there is a wide difference between the most favoured nation clause, which takes in all nations, and the bilateral agreement which takes in only one nation.

Then there is another peculiar thing that is vaunted in the other House as being a claim for this treaty—that the United States gets certain treatment under the decree of March, 1921, and that, so long as the duties are in that way towards the United States on that list of goods over and above those in Schedules A and B, Canada shall get equal treatment; but that when for any reason the United States' claim to these duties lapses, Canada then will get 25 per cent on the difference between the existing maximum and minimum duties. There is no guard that the same difference shall be kept between the maximum and the minimum so that that fades and vanishes away, changes and alternates, according as these maximum or minimum rates are changed—and they may be changed now and then, and on and off. In those respects it does seem to me that our negotiators were scarcely as wise and sagacious and careful of the interests of Canada as they should have been. It seems to me that the price they paid is a good one, as seen by Schedule E, Schedule D, Schedule F, and Schedule C. Take them, and you will find the most important products from France admitted under fixed duties, plus a discount of 10 per cent and 15 per cent; and you find those absolutely fixed: we cannot vary them. We can demand that the treaty shall be cancelled, but that is not a nice thing to use as a remedy.

Another thing: why was it that a treaty which cost so much effort and which is going to cost Canada so much in actual revenue, which has to be made up by the people in other ways—how is it that it was only given a duration of six months? Is it possible for any manufacturer or any producer to employ capital, make his equipments, set his cap for the trade with France, and only have six-months' certainty of the prevailing treaty, and not a single month's security or certainty as to the percentage of duty that he will get? It seems to me that the time is quite too short, and that if the negotiators had any faith in the treaty, and had any abiding conviction that it would be an advantageous thing, they should have given our producers some opportunity of setting themselves to capture and develop and open out the trade along these lines.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is the treaty only for 6 months?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Only for 6 months. France can denounce it, or Canada can denounce it, on a 6 months' notice. It simply goes for that time.

Now, I have not attempted to make a thorough analysis of the treaty. That can be done when we come to the items, if it is thought wise to do it. The treaty has been framed, it has been signed, and on this last I think I might congratulate the negotiators. I looked in perfect astonishment at the signatures to that treaty, and, lo and behold, I found that a representative of the British Government had actually been allowed to attach his signature to that treaty and to the Italian treaty. Now, I can imagine a brief conversation between the little gray man and the large man from Quebec; the large man saying: "Isn't this a Canadian business? I don't want to play with the British Ambassador in this yard; I don't want to put my name alongside of his; I don't think it is becoming in Canada to do it." And the little gray man saying to the other: "Tut, tut, man, that is silly; you ought to be mighty proud to sit alongside and to sign alongside of a representative of the greatest Empire in the world." Thanks for the little gray man; we have not committed the foolishness at Paris that I am afraid has been committed at Washington.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, the debate was adjourned.

THE MOST FAVOURED NATION CLAUSE

ORDER DISCHARGED

On the Order:

Resuming the adjourned Debate on the Motion of the Honourable Mr. Beaubien—

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Nations enjoying the benefit of the most favoured Nation clause, without any adequate compensation for Canada, and will ask the Government whether it intends to obtain the denunciation of the treaties granting such unilateral advantages.—(The Rt. Hon. Sir George Foster.)

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I have made some little allusion to this in the remarks I made yesterday, and I have no desire further to carry on the debate. It might disappear from the Order Paper, unless somebody wants to follow it up.

The order was discharged.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—PROGRESS REPORTED

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 54, an Act to provide for the investigation of Combines, Monopolies, Trusts and Mergers.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—definitions; "combine":

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: How far would that extend—the definition of a combine? How far down does it go? What is a combine? How would it be construed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Read section 2, paragraph a.

Sections 2 and 3 were agreed to.

On section 4—registrar; duties of registrar:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is it not the intention to change this section in regard to the registrar—as to the personnel, how he is to be appointed, and what qualifications he shall have? Is it going to be possible that the Committee will leave it to the Government to name any person, no matter what his qualifications may be? When you are appointing a judge there are certain qualifications laid down: he should be a barrister of so many years standing; but here you are appointing a man with ten times the authority of a judge, and yet no qualifications whatever have been named for him. It does seem to me that this House would be very lax in not attaching some necessary qualification. In speaking on this matter yesterday, I pointed out that it was rumoured that a certain politician of unsavoury reputation was hanging around the corridors and the purlieus of this House with the expectation of being appointed to that office; and I say this, that if that man is appointed, it will have a very bad odor throughout the country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course my honourable friend said that yesterday; but he left the Chamber before having the answer. My honourable friend had retired at that moment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I will say this much, that very few members of this House are more regular in their attendance.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not disputing that; I said my honourable friend had made that remark last evening, and I had the privilege of answering him, but he was not in his seat.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would it be too much trouble for my honourable friend the leader to give a brief résumé of what he said in answer, for I am anxious to have that, in the interests of the country. We have not got the Hansard, so I could not see it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, I think I have the Hansard.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Just the first part of it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know that I will repeat textually what I said last evening, but I may state now that it is my opinion, and it will be quite readily understood in this Chamber, that a barrister of some standing should be given the preference for that position. I am not sure, however, that some other view may not be entertained upon the value of some person having some other calling. I have noticed that in the other Chamber there is a representative from British Columbia who is not a barrister—I think he styles himself an accountant—who seems to have the qualities that would fit him perfectly for that position judging from my reading of his speeches. I do not name him, but he is one of the bright members of the House of Commons, and I think I would trust him to deal with these matters if they came before him as registrar. But I am not ready to say.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is he likely to be appointed?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may state my view, that my preference for a barrister may disappear if some name is pressed forward of a person having the qualifications, but who might not have the advantage of belonging to the Bar; so that I am not speaking for the Government. Knowing how easily a member of the Bar could adapt himself to very many conditions, with the advantage of a knowledge of the law, my own preference would be, as I say, for a barrister; but last evening I stated that this is one of the very important positions that the Government may have within its gift, and that the Government would like to be judged by the reputation and standing of the person who will be favoured. I do not know what my honourable friend has in view when he speaks of some aspirant for the office. My honourable friend asks, will we leave to the Government the appointment of such a responsible official? The Government appoints Lieutenant Governors, representatives of His Majesty the King.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I said, leave it to the Government with that restriction.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They appoint judges; and I think we must trust the body of men who for the time being have the support of public opinion, and of the majority in the other House, to do the right thing. Interest is the measure of men's actions. Is it not in the interest of the Government to select the best men for positions in order that it may meet with the general approbation of the public?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: When you quote that, you leave out the human equation. Governments, otherwise, would not make mistakes at all; they would always select the best men and do the right thing; but they occasionally select a poor man—not poor in this world's wealth, but poor in attainments. They occasionally follow the wrong course, because they are not perfect. As I say, you must remember the human equation.

Take, for instance, the appointment of judges. A man must be a certain time at the Bar before he is eligible. You surround the thing with safeguards. Here you are giving the man a very important position, a position in which he can do a great deal of harm if he is the wrong man. He can disrupt business throughout the country, which is a very important thing to consider, in these parlous times at any rate, that business shall not be improperly disturbed or interrupted.

I made the remark the other day that my honourable friend the leader of the Government, for whom I entertain the most kindly feelings and the greatest respect, was a master of camouflage; and his answer to-day with regard to my objection proves it, because he made quite a lengthy speech and said absolutely nothing to the point.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: He answered you.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, he did not answer the question at all. I asked what safeguards were to be placed around the appointment of this man, and he said if I had only been here last night for the whole evening, I would be informed of that. I have heard what he said to-day, and it leaves the matter absolutely as it was before. He said it as if he were imparting a tremendous amount of information to us; his words carried conviction, but they did not back up the conviction.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What is the suggestion of my honourable friend?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Is the honourable gentleman prepared to make a suggestion as to the qualifications the nominee should possess?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, I am—that he should have the same qualifications as a judge of the Supreme Court or High Court.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I was not present last evening when my honourable friend apparently informed the House, in answer to the inquiry made by the honourable gentleman from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler), and I had not the opportunity of being assured in regard to the qualifications of this registrar. When my honourable friend rose to his feet this afternoon and pointed out that during the absence of the honourable gentleman from Sussex, as well as during my own absence, he had answered that question, I was prepared, when he was to repeat himself, to be assured that we were to have an ex-judge or some gentleman with qualifications that would be equivalent to those of a judicial officer. But my honourable friend has answered nothing to-day, and if his explanation last night was on an equality with the answers he has made to-day the House is as ignorant of the required qualifications as it was last night.

In casting my eye over this Bill, I cannot see any reason why the Government should hesitate to say that the man should be possessed of the first judicial qualifications—that for this office he should be a barrister of ten years' standing. If reference is made to sections 16 and 17 it will be observed that the judicial functions to be exercised by the registrar are quite as important, more important, probably, than those exercised by any judge. I cannot conceive of a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada exercising more important functions than those enumerated in sections 16 and 17.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw the attention of my honourable friend to subsection 2 of section 4, which is an indication of what may be done. It will give an idea of the trend of thought of the Minister who presented this Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend is surely not serious in asking us to accept the state of mind of a Minister of the Crown, particularly when political influence is brought to bear upon him.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I make that remark at this moment, because my honourable friend speaks of a judge on the Bench being given the preference. I see in this Bill an indication of some other intention.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not apprehend that it will be a judge, inasmuch as judges already occupy positions or offices which will not permit of their exercising the functions detailed in this Bill. But it is a court made up of commissioners.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think my honourable friend is in error. Will he look at clause 4: "duties of registrar."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That may be; but as we advance through the Bill it will be found that "the registrar and every commissioner may order—" and so on.

Any person summoned before the registrar or a commissioner shall be competent and may be compelled to give evidence as a witness.

Every person who is summoned and duly attends as a witness shall be entitled to an allowance for attendance.

Then, section 17:

The registrar and every commissioner may accept or require evidence upon affidavit or written affirmation, in every case in which it seems to him proper to do so.

The registrar and every commissioner and all persons authorized to administer oaths to be used in any of the Superior Courts of any province may administer oaths—

And so on.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The registrar is the whole thing.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In fact, all the machinery of this Bill is the machinery that would be imported into any Bill for the establishment of a court, and I see no distinction between this tribunal and any judicial tribunal. The one is vested with just the same powers as the other; and when we consider the extraordinary powers thus given to the registrar and the commissioners, by which they subpœna witnesses and hear evidence and adjudicate upon matters that may involve millions of dollars, and when we take into consideration the fact that the Bill is aimed at the suppression of combines, which means that enormous masses of capital will be involved, to think, say, that the presiding officer of this important tribunal, associated with commissioners on either side, shall not be qualified by having an ordinary knowledge of law as administered by a judicial functionary, is trifling with public business.

As I intimated yesterday, I do not see my way clear to move an amendment to this Bill, because of the state of mind of the Government touching its administration, or, in the first place, in placing it on the Statute Book. I have very grave doubts as to the sincerity of the Government in desiring this to become part and parcel of the statute law of the Dominion; but the responsibility is the Government's. I think we discharge our duty when we point out where the Bill is wanting; and it certainly is wanting in this particular respect.

As we proceed, I should like my honourable friend to direct attention to the particular principle wherein this Bill departs from the statute of 1919, which became the subject of a judicial decision of the Privy Council in the case of the Attorney General of Canada against the Attorney General of Alberta. I have been looking through the Bill, and I am more or less acquainted with the Act of 1919; but I fail to see any distinction between the two. At the same time, we have a judgment of the Privy Council which held that that Act was ultra vires of the Federal Parliament, and I trust my honourable friend will give us some explanation as to wherein the one differs from the other, and in what way he expects the administration of this measure to be any more successful than the administration of the one placed in the statutes of 1919, which was administered by the Board of Commerce.

Hon. Mr. REID: I agree with what has been said with regard to the appointment of the registrar being really the most important part of the Bill. I rise to make a suggestion which perhaps would save a great deal of expense in the administration of the Bill.

There may be very few cases coming before the registrar, and if you appoint a registrar for this particular purpose, he will require a staff and so on, which will cost the country a great deal of money. Parliament has appointed a man at a salary of $12,000 per annum, giving him the standing of a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, who, in my opinion, has very little to do between one election and another; I refer to Mr. Biggar. Mr. Biggar is a barrister of high standing. Why could not the administration of this legislation be put in his hands at no expense whatever? He is a man in whom this country would have confidence, and I merely make this suggestion because such an appointment would meet with my own views, and would effect an economy in the administration of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not had occasion to discuss this matter with the Prime Minister, who fathered the Bill in the other House. I find, however, in subsection 2 of clause 4 an indication of the possibility of such a thing being done as my honourable friend has suggested. This subsection says:

> The office of registrar may be held either separately or in conjunction with any other office in the public service, and in the latter case the registrar may, if the Governor in Council thinks fit, be appointed not by name, but by reference to such other office, whereupon the person who, for the time being, holds such office or performs its duties, shall by virtue thereof be the registrar.

I have heard some criticism of this Bill this afternoon, and have listened to suggestions as to the qualifications required by the registrar. I take it for granted that similar thoughts would occur to the Minister having to make the choice of the registrar. Already, as I have stated, there is an indication that the office may be filled by one who is an official in the public service.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But could my honourable friend say why there is so much mystery about it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is the most extraordinary thing I have heard yet. Here we are passing an enabling Act—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, it is not an enabling Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: —and I am asked if the Government has already deliberated upon the official who will be appointed under the Act. My honourable friend has been in power long enough to know that the first thing is to see whether Parliament is agreeable to the legislation; then it will be for the Executive to organize the machinery for undertaking the administration of the measure. I do not yet know in what form this Bill will leave this Chamber. It would be far more in order, if my honourable friend is dissatisfied with the safeguards that surround the appointment of the registrar, if he would propose an amendment which we could discuss, and which would be there not for tomorrow but for all time.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think I would say that no matter whether he were in the service or not he should be a barrister of at least 10 years' standing.

Subsection 2 of section 4, to which my honourable friend has referred as showing the intention of the Government to appoint one already in the service, does not show any such intention. It says the office may be held separately or in conjunction with any other office in the public service. The intention of the Government may be either the one thing or the other; so they may not have any particular intention at all. I was only speaking from rumour, which sometimes contains a very strong element of truth, when I said that there was danger of a certain obnoxious politician being appointed to this office, and that I thought he would be a dangerous man there because of his well-known characteristics.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The obnoxious part has disappeared.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Age has improved him, as wine is improved with age. Like cheese, I think, he has grown worse, and smells to Heaven.

However, I am not going to insist. I am pointing out that these are things which ought to be done in the interests of good government and economy. We have a tremendous number of officials in this country to do the work that is laid before them. What does this mean? We will appoint a man who is holding a very prominent position. He must have a very big salary, because in these days in order to keep up—what shall I say?

Some Hon. SENATORS: Keep up with the Joneses.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, in order to keep up with the Joneses, he must have a salary of not less than $10,000 a year. Then he has got to have a private secretary, because it is utterly impossible for a man to hold a position of any kind without having a private secretary. It would be infra dig; it would be lowering to the dignity of his position if he had not a private secretary at least. Then he must have an assistant chief, and so on down the line, until you find him surrounding himself with 25 or 30 officials, all with big salaries, because he could not justify his own salary, unless his assistant was in receipt of half that amount.

Then take other things. There must be a first-class motor car at his disposal, at $4000 or $5000 a year, with a chauffeur in uniform—that is the livery of the country—in order that his wife and family may have the advantage of the salubrious air round about Ottawa, and of driving up the Gatineau and all these other beautiful places. That example is set him by those in the seats of the mighty, as well as by those who recently vacated those seats, and who were no less offenders in that respect—I do not wish to make fish of one and fowl of the other. You will find that this office, instead of costing $10,000 a year, will, when it gets fairly under way and meddling with everybody's business, will be costing $100,000 a year. Well, can we afford it?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Will the honourable gentleman allow me to suggest that he might submit the amendment which he has in mind, and the Government may possibly accept it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does the honourable gentleman make that suggestion in order that I may shorten my remarks? Is that his desire? If I am offending him, and stepping on his corns, I would not do so for the world, because he is a venerable old gentleman, and one for whom I entertain great respect.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: He has no intention of doing that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is the only reason I can understand for his wanting me to shorten it. I say these things because they should be said. We are in danger of extravagance, and the Government is setting an example of extravagance. The Governments of the past have set such an example, and this one is following them. I want to say that to-day, when we have to pay direct taxation to the Federal Government, it is a matter of some importance, because we are going to add to our already too large Civil Service by creating another high-salaried office. Now, I do not propose to move any amendment: I am just throwing out the suggestion, and if it is considered a good one, and in the interests of good government, it can be accepted and an amendment can be adopted. I have made my protest, and so far as I am concerned I have fulfilled my duty.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I would draw attention to another paragraph which further illuminates this subject. True, we have not reached the section yet, but it has a bearing on the matter which the honourable gentleman from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) has been discussing. If you look at section 31 you will find a provision—

> That notwithstanding anything in the said Acts or amendments thereto, the Governor in Council may appoint any British subject to be Registrar under this Act.

And further:

> May appoint any British subject to be a Commissioner thereunder.

And a few paragraphs further down it refers to "a commissioner or commissioners." So that the one expensive motor car to which the honourable gentleman from Sussex refers will be entirely inadequate, as there are to be at least three officers of the rank entitled to call for motor cars here.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And the chief, in addition, will have a private car on the railroad.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: It certainly seems to me to be significant that a special provision should be made here to appoint any British subject—making that the only qualification for an office of this kind.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: The honourable gentleman from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) has intimated that if a barrister were appointed he would require assistance, and have all the paraphernalia of officers and an establishment. As a layman I would respectfully ask why a lawyer or a judge should be appointed to decide in matters of trade about which he knows nothing, because his profession has not qualified him to enter into the minute matters or the combinations of trade, and he has no experience in the ramifications of trade. A man of that kind appointed to be a judge in cases involving the minutiae of trade would be entirely astray. If a person should be selected for that purpose, he should have a knowledge of all the combinations and minutiae of trade, and not be a barrister, and not a judge, and not a lawyer.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: I am going to take issue with my honourable friend from Sussex on the very same point. I cannot fall in with the idea that every time some sort of investigation is to be made, along the lines of trade, a barrister or a judge should be the one to be appointed. I am rather inclined to think the man to be appointed should be one who has been brought up in trade and dealing and who would have a far larger grasp than the ordinary lawyer or judge would have of matters arising under this Bill. As far as judges are concerned, my opinion is that the more they keep away from this sort of thing the better it is for the Bench. I do not think it is well for a judge to do anything outside of what he is appointed for. I have very strong objection to judges serving on Commissions, and I do not think a barrister of 10 years standing is any better, or as good, to look after a business proposition as a layman who has been trained along those lines.

I wanted to ask the leader of the Government one or two things regarding this Bill. I sincerely hope that the costly establishment that my honourable friend from Sussex has built up will not materialize. I can hardly imagine that it would, under the thrifty Liberal Government that we have. I cannot bring myself to believe that such a thing could happen.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You are joking now.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: No. But, subsection 3 of section 4 refers to the duties of the registrar, and then says:

(e) To make reports from time to time to the Minister;

(f) to conduct such correspondence with Commissioners as may be necessary, and to receive and file all reports and recommendations of Commissioners.

Then section 10, read in conjunction with that, says:

10. The Governor in Council may from time to time appoint one or more persons to be Commissioners under this Act. Every Commissioner shall have authority to investigate the business, or any part thereof, of any person who is or is believed to be a member of any combine.

Of course, there is this provision, under section 5:

Any six persons, British subjects, resident in Canada, of the full age of twenty-one years, who are of the opinion that a combine exists, or is being formed, may apply in writing to the Registrar for an investigation, etc.

Those people, I take it, make complaint to the Registrar. The registrar then, it says, shall communicate with the Commissioners, and the Commissioners, under section 10, shall have authority to enter and examine, etc.

Is it the idea of the Government to appoint a Registrar, and is it their idea also to appoint permanent Commissioners who shall be there at all times to receive from the Registrar any such reports as may come in on complaint of those six persons? In other words, is it the idea under this Act to set up a Registrar with an office? It says, "one or more Commissioners." How many should there be? Is it the idea to create under this Act a Registrar with a court of Commissioners who at all times shall be ready, on the complaint of any six persons, to investigate the business, and to enter and examine the premises, books, papers and records, etc.?

It would appear to me that it is not particularly necessary that there should be any great number of Commissioners. It would strike me that a Registrar and one Commissioner, if he is to be a permanent official, would be all that would be necessary under this Act, if that is the mind of the Government creating it. To appoint two or three Commissioners would in my opinion lead practically to an established court. Such a court, with a Registrar and Commissioners, would simply mean that it is there to do business, and although I know there were no prosecutions under the old Act, yet with a court always ready to sit, would it not lead to some six persons banding themselves together and making these complaints? In that case, no doubt there would be a very serious upsetting of business. I would like to hear from the leader of the Government whether or not the idea is to establish what I might term a permanent court in order to go on with this investigation, or are the appointments to be made when the complaint is laid, and are the Commissioners to be on duty each time?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My understanding of this Act is the following. The Registrar will be appointed to a permament position; he will receive complaints; he will make a preliminary investigation; he will get from the complainants sufficient information to enable him to form a judgment as to the good faith of the complainants, and as to the value of the complaint. When he has satisfied himself one way or the other, he will report to the Minister. If he reports to the Minister that the complaint is valueless, baseless, that ends the matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is this the Commissioner, or the Registrar?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Registrar. If he has gained the conviction that there is some basis for the complaint, and so reports to the Minister, it will then be the duty of the Minister to assume his own responsibility and appoint a Commissioner, or more than one, to enter on an investigation. The Commissioner will be appointed in connection with the complaint before the Minister. The Minister will know what is the institution that is to be investigated.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Read section 7 and you will see you have not quite studied the matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend in that connection read subsection 2 of section 31, where it will be observed that appropriations are to be made from Session to Session of Parliament for the payment of the Commissioners. It would therefore appear to me that the Commissioner or Commissioners, as this subsection mentions, are to be permanent officers:

(2) The remuneration and expenses of the Registrar and Commissioner or Commissioners so appointed, and of the temporary technical and special assistance so employed,

The Commissioners are not temporary—and the fees and expenses allowed to any counsel instructed by the Minister of Justice under this Act, shall be paid out of such appropriations as are made by Parliament to provide the cost of administering this Act.

There is all the machinery of a court; there is no doubt about that. The Commissioners are puisne judges, and the Registrar is Chief Justice of the court; that is about what it is.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You said that if he reported that the thing was trivial, there would be the end; but it is not the end; the Minister shall thereon decide whether a further investigation shall be made.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is what I did say. The Minister, of course, remains master of his action. When we come to the section we will see that it is the Minister, after consultation with his colleagues. The Minister will decide as to what will be the next step.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Whether he will do anything or not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But if he decides that there shall be an investigation, according to my reading of this Act, perhaps influenced by the statements which I read as made in another place, I have come to the conclusion—and if I err on that part I will retrace my steps that there will be no permanent court, no permanent Commissioner; that one or more Commissioners will be appointed in each case, and chosen for their experience in the business which is to be investigated.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But would it be unreasonable to state that in the Bill? Will my honourable friend tell me, on the other hand, where the Bill prevents a permanent staff from being appointed, made up of the Registrar, Commissioners, and all the permanent officers of the court?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have just stated, under section 10:

10. The Governor in Council may from time to time appoint one or more persons to be Commissioners under this Act. Every Commissioner shall have authority to investigate the business, or any part thereof, of any person who is or is believed to be a member of any combine or a party or privy thereto, and who is named in the order in council appointing the Commissioner; every Commissioner shall have authority to enter and examine the premises, books, papers and records of such person. The exercise of any of the powers herein conferred on Commissioners shall not be held to limit or qualify the powers by this Act conferred upon the Registrar.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then you might have 20 Commisisoners, all acting at the same time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We might, if there are 20 investigations going on throughout the land.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You may have more than one Commissioner for each investigation?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, but it would be quite proper that under this Act a Commissioner specially fitted to examine into the lumber industry would not be the proper Commissioner to examine into the grocery business.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The difficulty I see in that connection is that the Act provides that the Registrar shall sit with the Commissioner. If you are going to have a number of investigations proceeding at the same time I find it difficult to appreciate the Registrar sitting with the Commissioners.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Where does my honourable friend find that the Registrar shall sit with the Commisisoner? I do not think he will find it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would infer that under sections 16 and 17.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Once the Registrar is appointed a Commissioner, then his functions as investigator are at an end. It is the Commissioner then who is seized with the carrying on of the investigation, and he may from time to time report to the Registrar, who will report to the Minister.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but he sits as a Commissioner.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes; read sections 16 and 17. Then there is a provision for punishing contempt in the face of the court, and so on—in fact, all the machinery of a court. I do not contend that that is unnecessary; it may be necessary for the carrying out of the purposes of the Bill; but it is not unreasonable to ask my honourable friend to so mould the Bill as to express fully what is to be done, what are the powers, what are the limitations, etc. All statutes invariably do that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, I believe that all these questions will be answered by the Bill itself; but of course we are now going on at random from one section to another, and putting to ourselves questions to which we shall have to find answers in the text itself. Let my honourable friend read section 10.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That would seem to indicate that the Commissioners are appointed only when required.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. I read that Act from the first section to the last, and it seems to me quite a complete document.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend pardon me for again interfering? Under section 10 the Order in Council simply designates the particular Commissioner who has been appointed to make a certain investigation. He is not appointed for that purpose, but he is designated as the person who shall make a particular investigation.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does it not say "appointed"?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED (reading):

> The Governor in Council may from time to time appoint one or more persons to be Commissioners under this Act. Every Commissioner shall have authority to investigate the business, or any part thereof, of any person who is or is believed to be a member of any combine or a party or privy thereto, and who is named in the Order in Council appointing the commissioner.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think that means that the Board of Commissioners are appointed as occasion arises.

I want to reply to my honourable friend from Lambton (Hon. Mr. Pardee), and also to the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Roche). I was a little surprised at my honourable friend from Lambton casting aspersions upon members of his own profession—

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: I did not.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: —particularly when he had before his eyes the example of a lawyer from his own town who was such an excellent business man that he died a millionaire. I could understand the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Roche), being a business man, taking that stand. We have in this House a man who has been not only a great lawyer in his province, but a great business man as well; and we have sitting on this side of the House a lawyer from the great city of Montreal, who not only excels as a lawyer, but who in the short span of life that has passed, has amassed a huge fortune. So, the fact that a man is a lawyer does not necessarily prove that he has not business ability. As a matter of fact, young business men are to-day taking courses in business law in order to better fit themselves for the conduct of business.

Now, what are the duties of the registrar? They are first to examine into evidence. Who is so well trained, who so well could understand the force and weight of evidence, as a man trained as a lawyer? That is what the registrar has to do in the first place—to examine the evidence that comes before him as to whether or not there is a combine; and yet you would ask an untrained man to do that. He might be able to tell you what sugar is worth in the raw state, and how much refined, and what the spread ought to be; but he would not be a judge of the weight of evidence at all. Therefore I say it is important that the registrar—even more important that the registrar than the commissioner—should be a man trained in the law. We find it provided that the registrar shall have the right to call expert witnesses to give evidence with regard to these things; therefore he is not without assistance and guidance in the peculiar matters that belong to big business. All he has to do in matters of this kind is to call to his aid some business man. So, from the nature of the Bill itself, it is evidently intended that the registrar shall have a knowledge of the law; but I would like to see it expressly stated that he shall have such knowledge.

That is all I have to say with regard to this matter. I think the amendment should be made, and that the leader of the Government would be well advised if he would amend the Bill to that effect. Do not be deceived about this, because you may create a bureau which will spread and increase until first thing you know $100,000 to $200,000 will not cover the expense of it.

I am opposed to so much interference with business. There are already hamperings enough in connection with the businesses of this country—"big business," as it is opprobriously called. God help the country that has not got big businesses; God help the labouring men in a country where there is no big business to give them employment. I am impartial in what I say, and I can afford to speak in this way because I am not a member of any big business or big corporation. Our legislation all round is too much of the interfering sort—prohibition: it interferes with what a man may drink and what a man may do. This is only an example of it, gone a little madder than usual. Six irresponsible people, without incurring any penalty, can band themselves together and obtain an examination into a man's business. I say it is absolutely outrageous, and I do not blame the business people of this country for being uneasy with regard to the future when they see the legislators interfering with them in every shape and form.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Let me suggest that this clause be suspended so that we may look further into the matter.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I wanted to ask the leader of the Government if it is not the intention that this legislation should operate in somewhat the same way as the Industrial Disputes Act does at the present time? The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act passed in 1907 provides for a registrar, who is the Deputy Minister of Labour. When a complaint is received from either an employer or an employee, in compliance with the provision prescribed in the Act, the registrar decides whether or not a board ought to be established, and makes his recommendation to the Minister. The Minister then finally determines whether or not a board shall be established. If it is decided and agreed by both of them that a board shall be established to investigate the dispute, then a board of conciliation—or in this case, a board of commissioners—would be established to deal with each specific complaint. If it is the intention of the Government that the Act should operate in that way, then I would like to be advised as to just how it is intended to proceed, and at the same time comply with the terms of section 25, which bring in the Attorneys General of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend asks how it is that the Attorney General of each province may be called.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If my assumption is correct, that you intend the registrar to function as the registrar does under the Industrial Disputes Act, and that the commissioners shall virtually perform the same duties as would be performed by a board of conciliators under that Act, then it seems to me quite clear. But I cannot quite understand how the Attorneys General of the provinces seem to have certain duties.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They are not parallel cases. Under the Industrial Disputes Act a registrar applies the Federal Act and sees to the carrying out of the conditions under it; whilst under this Bill the Federal Government recognizes the power and authority of the province, and directs the attention of the Attorney General to infractions of the criminal law, and invites him to bring to justice the parties who, after an inquiry, have been found to have violated the provisions of our criminal law.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But if he does not do so you get onto dangerous ground again.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Power is appropriated under this clause for setting in motion the machinery which will bring the offender before the criminal courts.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not the criminal courts?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Under the Act of 1910, entitled, "An Act to provide for the Investigation of Combines, Monopolies, Trusts and Mergers," I find this provision:

4. The Governor in Council shall appoint a Registrar of Boards of Investigation, who shall have the powers and perform the duties prescribed.

The office of Registrar may be held either separately or in conjunction with any other office in the public service, and in the latter case the Registrar may, if the Governor in Council thinks fit, be appointed by reference to such other office, whereupon the person who for the time being holds such office or performs its duties shall, by virtue thereof and without thereby being entitled to any additional remuneration be Registrar.

That is somewhat the same as the clause in the present Bill. Then, on referring to paragraph e of section 2 of the same Act, I find:

"Judge" means, in the province of Ontario, any judge of the High Court of Justice; in the province of Quebec, any judge of the Superior Court; in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan and Alberta, any judge of the Supreme Court; in the province of Manitoba, any judge of the Court of the King's Bench, and in the Yukon Territory, any judge of the Territorial Court.

Under that Act the commissioner was a judge; and whenever there was an investigation to be passed upon, it had to be passed upon by a judge. As presently advised, I think it would not be unreasonable to follow those old provisions of the law. Of course, the objection has been taken that the judges should not be appointed to perform these functions. Well, the question of whether they are judges or barristers of ten years' standing might be considered, and I suggest that the clause be suspended so that we may look further into the matter.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Board of Commerce Act created a permanent tribunal. The principle which underlies the present legislation is totally different; it is simply an investigation Act. When we go from clause to clause, the honourable members of this House will notice that the whole machinery is for the purpose of probing into the organizations of the day that may be denounced by six citizens who will declare that these associations are working to the detriment of the public.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I ask my honourable friend this question? The Privy Council held that an order made under the Board of Commerce Act was ultra vires of the Federal Parliament, inasmuch as it affected property and civil rights. I think I am right in that general proposition. Now, if the judgment of the Privy Council be good —and it is good, because it is final—then it seems to me that an investigation made by this Parliament into a subject with which we have no power to deal would also be held ultra vires, and that an injunction would lie to restrain the commissioner from making that investigation. If the Board of Commerce had no authority to make a final order, certainly the preliminary steps by way of investigation would be equally ultra vires of this Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have not had occasion to look very much into this, but I am under the impression that the difference is this: under the present Bill it is a criminal offence--

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, not until the Attorney General of the province refuses to take action. I am dealing now with the preliminary steps, namely, of an investigation with a view of setting the Attorney General in motion.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Section 26 of the Bill provides that:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding $10,000 or to two years' imprisonment, or if a corporation to a penalty not exceeding $25,000 who is a party or privy to or knowingly assists in the formation or operation of a combine as defined in this Act.

So this Act is brought practically under the operation of the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: At that point I would direct my honourable friend's attention to the judgment of the Privy Council that this Parliament cannot appropriate to itself, by the passing of a criminal law, powers which are vested in the provinces under section 92 of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I do not see that that question is raised in the present case. The preliminaries to which the honourable gentleman has referred are for the purpose of ascertaining whether an offence has been committed. There it is part of the same Act. If any member of this honourable House has any doubt as to the legality of this Act, it would be quite proper to ask the opinion of the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Do you not think we should do that, in view of the disaster we met in connection with the Board of Commerce?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, but I would think it is perfectly within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, because it is dealing with the matter as a criminal offence. A number of Acts have been passed on the same lines, and they have not been attacked.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may answer my honourable friend on the same line as the answer that has just been given. The Criminal Act, which is now Article 498 of the Criminal Code, is being added to by this Bill which is before us, and the question has been put: has not that criminal offence been somewhat shaken by the judgment rendered in the case of the Attorney General vs. Wholesale Grocers?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is not the case I have reference to; it is the case of the Attorney General of Canada vs. the Attorney General of Alberta, in 60 Dominion Law Reports.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: As we are discussing practically the value of that criminal enactment which is being supplemented by this Bill, I have the opinion of the Department of Justice on this point. It is from Mr. Newcombe, the Deputy Minister and is as follows:

> I have considered the judgments of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario in the case of Attorney General vs Canadian Wholesale Grocers, herewith, with relation to its effect as to section 498 of the Criminal Code, and I find that it does not conclude any question as to the authority of parliament to enact that section.
> The court was composed of the Chief Justice, Hodgins, Ferguson and Magee, J. J. The Chief Justice reluctantly considered that he was bound by the observations of Lord Haldane in the Board of Commerce case to hold that section 498 was ultra vires, as not relating to criminal law within the meaning of that section of the British North America Act, 1867. Hodgins and Ferguson, J. J. however, expressly refrained from expressing any opinion against the validity of section 498, although they agreed with the Chief Justice for other reasons that the appeal should be dismissed. Magee, J. concurred in the result without any observations or reasons, and so it stands that the invalidity of section 498 rests only upon the opinion of the Chief Justice.

I do not think that it is at present necessary or advisable that our course of action should be in any wise modified by reason of the view which the Chief Justice expressed. I do not think that the question is governed by Lord Haldane's observations, and when it arises for decision we will have an opportunity to make good our claim for legislative authority. Meantime I would proceed upon the assumption that the enactment is intra vires.

Progress was reported.

Bill 105, an Act respecting the Canadian Order of the Woodmen of the World.—Hon. Mr. Pardee.

C.G.M.M. CANADIAN FARMER

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR inquired of the Government:

1. In respect of what voyage or voyages of the C.G.M.M. Canadian Farmer was the amount of $13,642.52 paid by underwriters during 1922?

2. (a) How much of this payment, if any, was for equipment lost or damaged and replaced by purchase? (b) How much was for damages made good by repairs? (c) At what yard or yards were such repairs effected? (d) Who on behalf of the C.G.M.M. made the specifications and gave the order for these repairs? (e) Who on behalf of the C.G.M.M. inspected the repairs when completed and gave certificate for same?

3. (a) In respect of what voyage or voyages of the Canadian Farmer was the amount of $151.59 due by underwriters as adjusted loss at 31st December, 1922? (b) What was the nature of the loss?

4. (a) In respect of what voyage or voyages of the Canadian Farmer was the amount of $5,236.63 recoverable from underwriters at 31st December, 1922? (b) What was the nature of the loss upon which this claim or these claims were based?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

RAILWAY MAIL-CARRYING CHARGES

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF inquired of the Government:

How much was pand for carrying through mails from the East to the West and from the West to the East during the fiscal year 1922-1923—
(a) to the C. P. Railway?
(b) to the Government Railways?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The answer is as follows:

Expenditure on account of Railway Mail Service for the Nine Months to 31st December, 1922:

Canadian Government (I.C.R. and P.E.I.)	$687,136.47
Canadian National (C.N.R. and G.T.P.)	816,471.38
Grand Trunk Railway	898,654.31
	$2,402,262.16
Canadian Pacific Railway	$2,803,261.51
For Fiscal Year, 1921-1922:
Canadian Government (I.C.R. and P.E.I.)	$985,065.77
Canadian National (C.N.R. and G.T.P.)	1,170,825.02
Grand Trunk Railway	1,235,984.17
	$3,391,874.96
Canadian Pacific Railway	$ 3,747,248.05

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, the object I had in view in making this inquiry was to find out how much money was paid to the different railways. I would like to point out to the honourable leader of the Government that we are paying several hundred thousand dollars more to the Canadian Pacific Railway than we are to our own Government roads, although the latter have about a third more milage than the C.P.R. and the trunk lines from the East to the West and in the lower provinces have practically a monopoly of the mail carrying. I would like to see if something could not be done to equalize matters a little better than is done at the present time, in the interest of our Government roads.

THE RUSH-BAGOT TREATY

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. MACDONELL inquired of the Government:

1. Have new Draft Treaties regarding the Rush-Bagot Treaty been passed between this Government and the United States Government?
2. If so, at whose suggestion have these new treaties been drafted?
3. What changes in the present Treaty are recommended?
4. Was the Canadian Draft Treaty submitted to the Chief Executives of our National Defence Department for their information before being despatched to Washington?
5. Has the new Treaty been negotiated through the British Embassy at Washington or direct between this Government and the United States Government?
6. Is Parliament to know anything about this important matter before such treaties are completed?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The answer is as follows:

1. Negotiations looking to the conclusion of a treaty to take the place of the Rush-Bagot Agreement of the 29th April, 1817, are still in progress.
2. The Canadian Government has taken the initiative in this matter.
3. In the present state of the negotiations, it is not considered desirable to give a detailed reply to this question.
4. Yes.
5. The British Embassy has been in touch with the proceedings throughout.
6. Any treaty if concluded will be made subject to the approval of Parliament.

GOVERNMENT MERCANTILE MARINE

DAMAGES TO FREIGHTERS McKEE AND DRUMMOND

Hon. Mr. BENNETT inquired of the Government:

1. What was the nature of the damage done to the freighter J. A. McKee and to the Thos. J. Drummond, Government owned vessels, on account of which insurance to the extent of $8,780.11 and $23,150.03 on each of said vessels, respectively, was paid for insurance to Canada in the year 1922.

2. Where was the work performed on said vessels for which the above insurance was paid and by whom was the said work performed and by whom inspected for the Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The answer is as follows:

1. Steamer J. A. McKee, stranded Prince's Shoal, August 26, 1920; insurance paid, $8,002.69.

Damage sustained:

To hull: Plating repaired and renewed. Tanks recemented. Tank margins made good. Stern post renewed from original scarph down. Rudder straightened, aligned, and new counter balance. Port hawse pipe renewed.

To machinery: Propeller removed from tail end shaft. Thrust shaft examined. Steering chains aft removed, put through fire, examined, annealed, replaced and coupled up in order.

Fire in accommodation of same vessel, September 23, 1921, Levis to Sydney:

Damage sustained: Flooring, woodwork and fittings renewed and painted, $296.27; miscellaneous personal injury claims, $481.15; total damages paid (J. A. McKee), $8,780.11.

Steamer T. J. Drummond, struck bottom, Welland Canal, November 3, 1921, and struck shoal or rock, Brockville to Maitland, November 22, 1921; insurance paid, $22,428.25.

Damage sustained: Keel plate cut off, faired and refitted. Considerable portion bottom plating faired and renewed. All internals in way of above including frames, floors, keelson, brackets, etc., repaired or renewed. Broken and damaged cement cut out and renewed and all new and disturbed work painted as before.

Also same vessel struck abutment, Lock No. 4, Soulanges Canal, August 12, 1922, $54.63.

Also collision of T. J. Drummond with S.S. Covalt, canal bank, Thorold, September 1, 1922, $37.86.

(Repairs account these two accidents not yet made. Items given represent survey fees.)

Miscellaneous cargo claims, $629.29.

Total damages paid (T. J. Drummond), $23,150.03.

2. As to the J. A. McKee, August 26, 1920—at Lorne Dry Dock, Levis, by Davie Shipbuilding Company, and inspected by I. J. Tait, Superintending Engineer, Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Same vessel, September 23, 1921—at Montreal, by Shore Staff, C.G.M.M., inspected by William Young, Assistant Superintending Engineer, C.G.M.M.

As to T. J. Drummond, November, 1921—at Collingwood, Ont., by Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, Limited, inspected by I. J. Tait, Superintending Engineer, C.G.M.M.

Repairs on account mishaps of August 12th and September 1, 1922, not yet made.

GREAT LAKES SHIPPING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have a further answer to an inquiry made some days ago as to what the Railway Department was doing with the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine now on the Great Lakes pending their sale. The memorandum I have received reads as follows:

There are ten ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine on the Great Lakes at the present time.

Of that number, six 3,400-ton boats are assigned to carrying grain between Fort William and Port Arthur to Port Colborne and Bay ports.

The T. J. Drummond and the J. A. McKee, the two 3,500-ton boats, are under charter to the Great Lakes Transportation Company for the summer season.

Two 3,750-ton boats are at present tied up for repairs.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

The Senate again went into Committee on Bill 54, an Act to provide for the investigation of Combines, Monopolies, Trusts and Mergers.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 4—registrar:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Has the Minister had any amendment prepared with regard to the qualifications of the person to be appointed as registrar? It seemed to be the consensus of opinion on both sides of the House on the last occasion when we discussed this Bill that there should be some provision made with regard to the qualifications of the registrar, so that the country would know that the man appointed was a proper man for the position.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think the suggestion for the suspension of this clause came from the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique). I do not see him in his seat. I do not know whether anyone has drafted an amendment to the clause.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Do you want it to remain in suspense?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no objection to the form of this clause; but it may be suspended till we go through the rest of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think it was I who first brought up the matter of the qualifications of the registrar, and I am interested in seeing the matter adjusted.

Hon. Mr DANDURAND: Well, we will suspend the clause. Perhaps while we are going through the other sections my honourable friend can draft an amendment which will suit him. Of course, that implies a point that may not be agreeable to all—that a barrister must fill the position.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I decline to prepare an amendment on the ground that I have done my duty in bringing it to the attention of the Government. It is a Government Bill, and I as a humble member of this House would not have the temerity to introduce an amendment and expect the Government to accept it. Recognizing as I do the importance of the position, and the necessity for the appointee to be properly qualified, I leave it to the Government's good sense to accept the suggestion and make the amendment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We will allow the clause to stand for the time being.

Section 4 stands.

On section 5—application for investigation of alleged combine:

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Does not the leader of the House think that it would be well to provide that the statement accompanying the application made by six persons should be a sworn statement, or should at least be in the form of a solemn declaration made before a justice of the peace? That would guarantee the bona fides of the applicants, who would be more careful knowing that they were responsible for their declaration.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: In addition to what the honourable gentleman has suggested, I think there should be responsibility for costs attached to these applicants if the action against the company fails. Otherwise there would be a great deal of trouble made for companies by persons desiring to embarrass them. That is only fair if a man who starts an action against another or against a corporation fails. It is a small enough penalty to make him pay, but it would be a deterrent to irresponsible persons who might otherwise bring actions. If these men are so high-minded as to want to do some good for the country, they should take the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: If the honourable gentleman is prepared to have the clause suspended, I will prepare an amendment for the next sitting.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no objection to the clause being suspended, but I do see objections to the suggestions made by my honourable friends. We must first realize what is the end in view. If there is a public tort, its cure is for the advantage of the community at large; and all that is required under this Bill as framed is that six citizens should draw the attention of the registrar to a certain condition of things. As I had occasion to state the other day when the Bill came up for second reading, these concerns present a very difficult problem, and are surrounded with secrecy and considerable legal protection. So when you ask six persons to take an oath or to declare that they solemnly believe, you defeat the object of the Bill, which is to draw the attention of the public to a certain condition of things which should be investigated. This being a measure in the public interest, it seems that we should not at the very threshold make it difficult to start an investigation. If you tell a person that he must take an oath as to facts upon which he is not absolutely clear, seeing results clearly but not seeing the causes which may be enshrouded in considerable mystery, you deter him from taking action. If you add to that a provision that he must pay the costs, then he may feel that it is too costly to try to cure the evil that may be of considerable consequence to the community. Therefore I say that I do not think the honourable gentlemen who have made the suggestions realize that there are combines, mergers, and trusts that are detrimental to the state. It being recognized that there have been such trusts, why should we not afford an opportunity for shedding light on such a situation and not preclude the starting of an investigation?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: My honourable friend neglects the human equation in this matter. There are in every community, be it large or small, certain busybodies and people of such a character that they want to pry into other peoples business and make mischief for them. We see it everywhere. These are the type of persons I wish to guard against. Gossip and scandal are so magnified as to be entirely out of proportion to the real evil. These men who listen to gossip will go off and make this application before the registrar. Then, see what the registrar has to do under the Act. He has to go to the company, examine its books and hold an investigation, which is only preliminary to further investigation. All this entails a tremendous amount of expense and annoyance to the persons attacked, and the complaint turns out after all to be nothing but moonshine—no reasonable foundation for it whatever. But the mischief has been done. Surely there ought to be someone responsible for that. Either the Government of the day ought to be responsible and pay the costs of the people investigated, or else the men who started the law in motion and made this declaration should be called upon to pay. If that were done they would be more careful to investigate before they signed a declaration of that kind. If a man lays a criminal information against another man on false grounds, he is liable to an action for malicious prosecution. Why should these six individuals, I do not care how high-minded they are, object to paying costs if they had gone wrong? I do not see any reason whatever in the argument advanced by the honourable gentleman. I think it would be only a safeguard against malicious persecution on the part of a lot of busybodies, not only to make them take a solemn declaration, but also to make them liable for costs if their action falls.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like to ask the Minister whether, if an application has been made by six persons and they have stated the grounds, the registrar must necessarily hold an investigation? Has he got discretion or not? Supposing he does not consider the ground that these six persons allege sufficient for such an investigation to be held, has he discretion to refuse or not? It appears to me that the regstrar would be obliged to hold an investigation if any six persons made an application. Is that so? If it is, I think it is going too far.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend will find his answer in clause 7, which says:

> If after such inquiry as he deems the circumstances warrant, the Registrar is of the opinion that the application is frivolous or vexatious, or does not justify further inquiry, he shall make a report in writing to the Minister setting out the application, the statement or statements, the inquiry made and the information obtained, and his conclusion. The Minister shall thereupon decide whether further inquiry shall or shall not be made, and shall give instructions accordingly.

My honourable friend will see that the registrar will first get all the information that the complainants can furnish. He may from their statements come to the conclusion that there is no need to trouble the person complained of, and make a report to the Minister; but if there is something that strikes him as being serious, he goes a step further and starts a preliminary inquiry, and when he has made that inquiry he reports to the Minister. He may report against any further investigation, or he may find in favour of holding a regular inquiry before a commissioner.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: He is bound to hold an inquiry if an application is made. The complainants state the grounds, and he may consider them insufficient, but according to this section he must hold an inquiry of some kind first.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I would be satisfied by simply adding after the words, "the application shall be accompanied by a statement," the following words: "made in the form of a solemn declaration." I think that would be sufficient to meet my objection. It would be no harm to oblige the applicants to make that solemn declaration, which would give some guarantee that they would be prudent in their statements.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is it your intention to accept that amendment from Montreal?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; I will ask the suspension of the clause, and will take note of the suggested amendment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Will you take note of my proposition at the same time?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Certainly. The suggestion of my honourable friend is, that these six complainants, if they fail, be made to pay the costs.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes; secured by a bond when they make an application.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I did not say what the effect of a solemn declaration would be. Every honourable member knows that if it is false the maker of it is subject to be sued.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Would it not rather appear that the adoption of the suggestion of the honourable member from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) would have a very deterring effect on any persons laying an information or making a complaint, because after they had made the complaint the matter would be entirely out of their hands. After the complaint is filed and the Registrar makes an investigation if the Minister approves of the matter being further dealt with, in case the complaint is not sustained it would seem to me that the responsibility for the payment of costs should rather rest upon the Crown than on the original complainants, because the Minister makes the decision whether or not the prosecution shall occur.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: There is just this point about that, that the Registrar and the Minister may be taken in by the statements made by those people, and the whole difficulty may be the result of false and erroneous statements made by the original six who started the ball in motion. Why should they not be held responsible? My honourable friend speaks of a deterrent as though there was some sort of desire on the part of everybody to get something on some corporation or some big business house. Is that the feeling in this country? Is it the feeling that, because there is a big business or a big corporation, therefore it should be shadowed at all times by detectives, and guns should be trained on it? It seems to me that is a very bad sort of idea to go abroad throughout this country,—a country that requires big business and big capital and big corporations in order that the smaller men who have not money may have work. My honourable friend speaks for labour in this House, but he cannot speak properly for labour by attacking the very people that make labour. There is too much of this sort of thing in this country, to the detriment of the country, and to the driving of people out; they are going to-day out of Canada, by thousands, because there is not work for them here, at a price that they claim is necessary in order that they may live, and they can get that price in the neighbouring republic. Yet we are passing legislation that is going to hamper the very people who are providing whatever labour is provided. It seems to me this is a very wrong procedure for us to take. If there is a combine suspected, those six intelligent persons who are citizens, but who may not be voters, who may not have one cent of property in the country, who can pack their little valise and leave at any time, can join and make a complaint without swearing an affidavit to it, or becoming responsible in any way in case their statement is false and erroneous. Thus they may put a corporation to great expense and annoyance without having any responsibility whatever. I would say that it is awful legislation, it is absurd legislation, and it will be greatly to the detriment of this country if it passes this House.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am quite in accord with the honourable gentleman from Sussex in what he is trying to do, but I do not agree that he is taking the right course in the suggestion he has made. He has pointed out that people who have no financial responsibility may lay an information, yet the making of a law requiring them to pay costs if they do not succeed is not going to collect the costs. I think responsibility should be placed at some point where the costs could be refunded in case the suit did not succeed—that the expenses should be collected from some party named in the law who would be responsible. and not from irresponsible complainants.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Let the complainants be called upon to put up a bond. It is an easy matter to arrange that, and thus there will be a deterrent. Of course, if the object of this House is to pass legislattion that would interfere with the progress of employment, with the supply of work, with the formation of corporations that would bring capital into this country, then it is all right to pass this Act as it is, and I will guarantee that it will act as a stopper, and keep people out of the country. If that is what you are after, go ahead.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend must not forget that the many ills that he suspects may flow from this Act have not shown themselves in the operation of preceding Acts which contain such a legal enactment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Because they did not operate. Nobody operated them. If you are going to do the same with this, just say so, and allay all our suspicions and fears.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It simply shows that busybodies and suspicious people are not so numerous in Canada, after all, since so very few have taken advantage of the Acts that have been on the Statute Book since 1889.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They have not been so fatal as this one.

Hon. Mr. REID: I rise to ask a question, but before doing so I want to say I agree absolutely with the honourable member for Sussex. I think there has been sufficient legislation put on the Statute Book this Session to deter almost any person from putting capital into manufacturing industries in this country. We have such great natural resources that instead of trying to prevent capital from developing them we should be doing something to encourage capital to take hold of them.

I wish to ask the honourable leader of the Government if the two propositions are that this section shall be amended as suggested by the honourable member for Montreal (Hon. Mr. David), so that those six people must make an affidavit that they believe there is a combine, which would perhaps be a small safeguard; and also, as proposed by the honourable member from Sussex, that those who make the declaration shall pay all costs in connection with the matter if they fail. I would like to see both those suggestions adopted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There are three suggestions made: one, that the statements of the six complainants be under the form of a statutory declaration; and two others, one from the honourable gentleman from Sussex, that the complainant should give security for costs, and one from the ex-Minister of Labour, that the Crown should pay the costs. This is on the same line as a suggestion made by the Honourable member for Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) on the second reading. I will ask that this clause be suspended.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Before the suspension of that clause—there seems to be in section 7 an omission of one of three possible cases. In the first place, you have the six persons who incur no responsibility at all, and need not be very substantial people, who are simply required to be British subjects and residents of Canada 21 years of age; they give no security at all as to the bona fides of their allegations; they simply place them on paper, which is an easy thing to do; but the moment those six men, who might be called irresponsible men, have undertaken to do that in a city or town or rural community, immediately you have a prima facie case against the owners and against their method of business. That is not a healthy thing for a man to meet in his business. An old well-established firm might very well subsist against an allegation of half-a-dozen men on that ground, but an individual or a young firm starting in business will be at a disavantage the very moment the law is put into operation and becomes the news of the town, because everyone in business has to face persons who are more or less hostile, for business or other reasons. Such a firm or individual remains under suspicion of trying to overcharge his neighbours, trying to get more than he should, or trying to work a monopoly of some kind in order to gain unreasonable profits.

Does that aid business, or does it not? My honourable friend is good enough to think that there will not be many people who will make charges of that kind. I am inclined to think they will be numerous, and that, taking Canada as a whole, under the operation of this Bill you will have hundreds and perhaps thousands of investigations started in this way, and every one of them can be started by six persons who make the allegations though not in any way responsible, financially or otherwise. I am not lawyer enough to know just how far that kind of irresponsible allegation would be prevented by the motion of my honourable friend from Montreal. I would like to know exactly from men who are legal, or from my honourable friend the leader himself, how that would serve as a deterrent.

The Registrar must make an inquiry; there is no doubt about that. It seems that his primary inquiry would relate to the allegations made by the six men: they have stated so and so, and he has to look into that and see whether or not those allegations are well founded. That is not the inquiry that will go into books and transactions. There may be another inquiry after that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: How will he investigate that?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I think he will just have to use the best judgment he can on such information as he can gather. If he undertakes a thorough investigation into all the circumstances of the business of the people against whom these allegations are made, it will be as thorough as the final inquiry.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And that is the only kind of inquiry he can make.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: My idea is that he is supposed to make an estimate or valuation of those charges, and as it appears to him he is to report on only two cases—on those that are frivolous or vexatious, or on those that do not justify further inquiry. But what becomes of the other possibility, namely, that the allegations are in his mind trustworthy and valid, and that therefore he should make an inquiry? He does not appear to report to the Minister on that phase of the matter at all. When the Minister gets the reports provided for in sections 6 and 7, he has only reports upon cases that are frivolous or vexatious, or cases that do not justify any further prosecution, and it is upon those that the Minister acts: and, if the registrar says, "A, B, C, D of those that I am reporting are frivolous, and E, F, G do not justify further inquiry," then the Minister is to say whether or not he approves of that, and that nothing more shall be done. But what becomes of the case in which the registrar feels that there is really a matter which ought to be looked into and investigated, and which does justify such action? I cannot see where that is provided for at all.

Hon. Mr. McCORMICK: In a matter such as this, where so much annoyance can be given to people engaged in any kind of business, and employing labour, on the complaint of six men to the registrar, I think it would be more proper if previous to any action there should be an inquiry between the Minister and the registrar as to things that are of concern to the general public. They ought to be able to ascertain whether an inquiry should be held or not, and, if the Minister finally decides that action should be taken on the allegations of those six men, there should be some responsibility, as to the expenses of the inquiry, even if the Crown has to assume it. When the complaint first comes to the registrar he ought to make some inquiry, and before the Minister takes action he ought to be in a position to get some information. According to section 8 a corporation has to furnish a lot of information, but before any corporation is required to do that, there should be substantial reasons given, for such action.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would like to know from the honourable Minister how far this Act would have power to operate as against a province. As I understand it, the provinces of Ontario and New Brunswick have certain Hydro Acts which make it impossible for any private people to start electric power companies and compete with them. Is it intended that this measure should operate against those provinces? There is a combine, it is clear—a combine to shut out everybody else. Is it the intention that this Bill should operate against them, so that a power company can be started to compete? I understanded that where they operate they do not allow any competition. What does the Minster say with regard to that? This is not exactly on the point, but it bears on the whole measure. I have not lost sight of the point I made that there should be some penalty attached to the solemn declaration. I take it for granted the section is going to be amended to that extent, and I think the other amendment should accompany it.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: In answer to the honourable member from Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster), I would quote the law which says that a solemn declaration has the same force and effect as if made under oath, and that a man who makes a false solemn declaration may be sued for perjury.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Could he be prosecuted for laying a false information if the information were simply untrue, whether he had malice prepense or not, or must he wilfully lay a charge on false information? I should suppose the latter.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know exactly what would be the value of a solemn declaration covering the statement that he is called upon to make:

The application shall be accompanied by a statement showing:

(a) the names and addresses of the applicants, and at their election the name and address of any one of their number or of any attorney, solicitor of counsel whom they may, for the purpose of receiving any communication to be made pursuant to this Act, have authorized to represent them; (b) the nature of the alleged combine and the names of the persons believed to be concerned therein and privy thereto; (c) the manner in which, and where possible the extent to which, the alleged combine is believed to operate or to be about to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Your solemn declaration would not be worth a fig, inasmuch as the statement is one of belief only.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is an expression of opinion, so I do not see that the solemn declaration would add very much to the value of the document.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think it would add a good deal; that and the penalty I suggest would act as a deterrent unless there was some real reason.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not answered my honourable friend's inquiry as to the opinion of the registrar being against the parties complained of. If he is of the opinion that the investigation should proceed, then he is authorized to go forward. Clause 21 states:

At the conclusion of every investigation the registrar and every commissioner shall make a report in writing, which report shall be signed by the registrar or commissioner, as the case may be. If the report is made by a commissioner, it shall be transmitted to the registrar, together with the evidence taken at such investigation, certified by the commissioner and any documents and papers remaining in the custody of the commissioner. The registrar shall without delay transmit to the Minister his report and the report of every commissioner. The Minister may call for an interim report at any time; and when so called for it shall be the duty of the registrar and every commissioner to render an interim report setting out fully the action taken, evidence obtained and conclusions reached at the date of the interim report.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That does not answer the question of the honourable gentleman from Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then, section 23 says:

Whenever, from or as a result, of an investigation under the provisions of this Act, or from or as a result of the judgment of the Supreme Court or Exchequer Court—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, his authority is under clause 6. He proceeds to make an investigation under that clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, and clause 7 allows him to make a report that he has found nothing.

Section 5 stands.

On section 6—registrar shall cause inquiry to be made:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Can my honourable friend say under this section what is the distinction between the legal authority of this Parliament to pass legislation authorizing an investigation of this kind to be made and the powers contained within the statute of 1919, I think it is—the old Combines Act—in regard to which it was held by the Privy Council, in the case of the Attorney-General of Canada and the Attorney-General of Alberta, that the Federal Parliament had no authority to legislate in any way so as to interfere with the exercise of property and civil rights in the provinces, and that under section 92 of the British North America Act the rights of the provinces were so protected and guaranteed as entirely to prevent the exercise of a like authority by the Federal Parliament? The question came up as to the validity of an order made by the Board of Commerce, and it was held to be an invasion of property and civil rights. It seems to me that precisely the same thing is being done in this Bill. If the making of an order were invalid under the statute of 1919, the preliminary steps which are to be taken here for the purpose of investigating an alleged combine would be clearly ultra vires of this Parliament.

I have read this authority as critically and as closely as I can, and I cannot see wherein there is any distinction between the legislation we are now considering and that of 1919, so far as the authority of this Parliament is concerned. If one step is invalid certainly the other is. The invalidity did not lie merely in making the order, but in every step which led up to the order; and it is quite clearly as illegal to take the preliminary steps in investigating a business, which can only be investigated by the province, as to make a final order.

It will be observed that it is proposed in the latter part of this Bill that, after the investigation is made and the report is prepared, the Federal officers shall hand the report over to the Attorney-General of the province, and notify him to put the provincial machinery in motion for the purpose of prosecuting the accused; but all the preliminary work up to that point is clearly invalid. The Bill on its very face admits the inability of this Parliament to give effect to the object in view, but it is said: "At the final stage we will hand it over to the province and trust to the powers of the province to give effect to the object we have in view." Then it is provided that if the Attorney-General of the province remains passive the Federal officers shall then set in motion the criminal law as to combines. But the Privy Council has said that the Federal Parliament cannot appropriate to itself the right to pass criminal law touching subjects which are exclusively within the right of the provinces. It seems to me that at every turn you bring this legislation which we are considering to-day within the case of the Attorney-General of Canada and the Attorney-General of Alberta, and that we are simply spending our time for naught; and. unless my honourable friend can show us some authority either from the law officers of the Crown or otherwise, that we are dealing with a subject that is distinguishable from the legislation of 1919, it seems to me that we are simply placing legislation upon the Statute Book to be held ultra vires of this Parliament by the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It was from that very point of view that I asked the question with regard to the provincial combines. Say a provincial officer is going to bring an action—say Attorney-General Raney is going to bring an action against Premier Drury in regard to the Hydro. The thing is absurd on the face of it. In my opinion it is clearly ultra vires.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not presume to give an off-hand opinion on what would be the situation if a complaint were made against a Hydro Commission created by a provincial Government. It would be a fine case for attorneys to argue before the tribunals of this country. I realize that all this legislation hinges upon our right to legislate in criminal matters. The Federal powers claim the right to make criminal law. There has been an opinion by one judge out of three of the Appellate Court of Ontario that section 498 of the Criminal Code was probably ultra vires; but the Department of Justice takes for granted that that opinion should not bind the Dominion of Canada, and that we should proceed as though we had the power, awaiting the real test case whenever occasion arises. This measure simply supplements the enactment already in the Criminal Code. On the second reading of the Bill I read the opinion of the Department of Justice on this very point I do not know whether my honourable friend was in the Chamber when I did so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think I was.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It bore on the value of the present legislation, which is based on the Criminal Code.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend permit me to read an extract from the judgment of the Privy Council which was delivered by Viscount Haldane, and which deals with the exercise of the right given us under the British North America Act to legislate in criminal law. This is the case of the Attorney-General of Canada and the Attorney-General of Alberta, in which it was decided that the legislation of 1919 was ultra vires of this Parliament:

It is one thing to construe the words "the Criminal Law, except the Constitution of Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, but including the Procedure in criminal matters."

These are the words to be found in the British North America Act.

—as enabling the Dominion Parliament to exercise exclusive legislative power where the subject matter is one by which its very nature belongs to the domain of criminal jurisprudence. A general law, to take an example, making incest a crime, belongs to this class. It is quite another thing, first to attempt to interfere with a class of subject committed exclusively to the Provincial Legislature, and then to justify this by enacting ancillary provisions, designated as new phases of Dominion Criminal law which require a title to so interfere as basis of their application. For analogous reasons their Lordships think that sec. 101 of the B.N.A. Act., which enables the Parliament of Canada, notwithstanding anything in the Act, to provide for the establishment of any additional Courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada, cannot be read as enabling that Parliament to trench on provincial rights, such as the powers over property and civil rights in the Province exclusively conferred on their Legislatures.

I cannot recall exactly the line of argument adopted by the Department of Justice, and I defer with very great respect to the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, particularly that of the Deputy Minister of Justice; but nevertheless, in view of this decision of the Privy Council, I cannot reconcile the exercise of the power we are now seeking in this legislation with that particular judgment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend will realize that we have a right to legislate on trade and commerce.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But this authority deals expressly with that, and they hold that this legislation does not come within trade and commerce. The suppression of combines, the investigation into trusts, has nothing to do with the exercise of the powers of the Federal Parliament in trade and commerce. It is purely a matter of dealing with property and civil rights. If my honourable friend has any doubts upon that question, or if he feels absolutely sure that it comes under the head of trade and commerce, the perusal of this judgment will at once disabuse his mind of the idea that we can invoke that power for legislation of this character.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend will look through the Criminal Code, he will find dozens and dozens of enactments, I was going to say hundreds, which are of a similar nature—which are prohibitions carrying a penal sanction. Now, we have a right to legislate on good order in the Dominion, and, besides, we have the exclusive right to legislate on trade and commerce. I recognize that it is a debatable matter. It is one upon which the Department of Justice does not express a very clear-cut opinion; but in view of the fact that the proposed legislation is in the general interest of Canada, it is not for this Parliament to set arbitrary bounds to its own powers when the matter may at least be debatable. That will be for the courts to decide. Where we trespass upon provincial rights of course it would be unseemly that we should do so with our eyes open, going clearly against the letter of the Act; but when we have power—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Have we not a decision there? Does not that open our eyes?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is the language of the judgment:

Nor do the words in section 91, "the regulation of trade and commerce," if taken by themselves assist the present Dominion contention.

There is an express authority that the Federal Parliament cannot invoke this particular power to pass legislation of this character.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It seems to me that where we have a judgment like that so clearly defining the matter, it is presumption on our part, and an improper presumption, to pass legislation that clearly infringes upon provincial rights. There is only one explanation for it, and that is that this legislation is sought as a sort of sop to be thrown to certain persons who are anxious for this kind of thing, with the expectation on the part of the promoters of the legislation that it will never be brought into active operation.

I do not want to be unkind, but really I am forced to that conclusion, with nothing but the most kindly feelings towards the Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not intend to bore the House with a repetition of my speech on the second reading. I gave them a few of the reasons why there had been in the past a desire, and apparently a necessity, for such legislation, and why the reasons which operate in favour of such legislation in the last thirty years justified the present Bill being brought before us. In this matter I can only rely upon our advisers, and our Department of Justice has been asked to give its opinion, and I will read it. It bears on the very question we are now discussing—the value of Article 498 of the Criminal Code, which we are adding to by this present Bill. It is from Mr. Newcombe, the Deputy Minister, and is as follows:

> I have considered the judgments of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario in the case of Attorney General vs Canadian Wholesale Grocers, herewith, with relation to its effect as to section 498 of the Criminal Code, and I find that it does not conclude any question as to the authority of parliament to enact that section.
>
> The court was composed of the Chief Justice, Hodgins, Ferguson and Magee, J. J. The Chief Justice reluctantly considered that he was bound by the observations of Lord Haldane in the Board of Commerce case to hold that section 498 was ultra vires, as not relating to criminal law within the meaning of that section of the British North America Act, 1867. Hodgins and Ferguson, J. J. however, expressly refrained from expressing any opinion against the validity of section 498, although they agreed with the Chief Justice for other reasons that the appeal should be dismissed. Magee, J. concurred in the result without any observations or reasons, and so it stands that the invalidity of section 498 rests only upon the opinion of the Chief Justice.
> I do not think that it is at present necessary or advisable that our course of action should be in any wise modified by reason of the view which the Chief Justice expressed. I do not think that the question is governed by Lord Haldane's observations, and when it arises for decision we will have an opportunity to make good our claim for legislative authority. Meantime I would proceed upon the assumption that the enactment is intra vires.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is a good deal of doubt there.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Whatever may be the shortcomings of the Chief Justice, as a lawyer and as a judge he has no superior and very few peers.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I can only say, as I have often said in this Chamber, that where there is a doubt we should—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Encourage the lawyers.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We should not accept the doubt as a limitation to our own jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is a truly modest idea.

Sections 6 to 9 inclusive were agreed to.

On section 10—Governor in Council may appoint Commissioners to hold investigations:

Hon. Mr. REID: These sections are going through pretty fast. I would like to bring up one question. I have not had time to read this Bill perhaps as thoroughly as I should. According to section 8 the registrar may at any time require written returns and full disclosure of agreements. I would like to ask if that information is to be made public; in other words, if the investigation is to be a public investigation, and if the documents submitted are to be given to the public. An industry might be destroyed by making public any of the reports that are submitted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would draw the attention of my honourable friend to section 19.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then it is purely in the hands of the Minister to decide whether the investigation is public or private.

Hon. Mr. REID: Section 19 does not cure the point I raise at all, because the very minute a charge is laid the registrar demands that a report be made of the whole of the business complained of and the business practically stops while the investigation is going on, and the party investigated does not know whether he is to be exposed to the public or not, the whole matter being in the hands of the Minister. Well, there may be ministers either in the Dominion or in the local government who might think it to their interests, political or otherwise, to disclose the business. I think any investigation of this kind should not expose to the public any private business; it should be kept absolutely private, just as are other matters that come before the Government on which reports are made after an investigation. In the case of banks their whole business is not exposed; and I think industries should be treated in the same way. We all know the injurious results of information being made public, perhaps without good grounds: the matter may be taken up by the press, and the business concerned may be ruined.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend will look at the Combines and Fair Prices Act, which his own Government brought into being, he will find that practically all of this section 8 is taken from section 19 of that Act. Perhaps, in the mind of my honourable friend, that would be evidence that it is good legislation, since it was his own, but he may revise his own judgment upon it, and alter it. The reason for the inquiry being conducted privately at the beginning is obvious. There may be no justification for the complaint, and if it is held to be frivolous no harm has been done. It is the right of the commissioner or of the Minister, under section 19, to order an investigation to be conducted in public at a certain moment. That power will only be utilized when it is deemed in the public interest that it should be. In a case establishing a notorious merger or combine, until that point is reached it will be seen that the investigation is carried on in private; but a time may be reached when the public will be interested in obtaining an insight into the operations of the combine.

Hon. Mr. REID: I have no objection to the information being taken, as required in section 8, but after the information is obtained I object that the Minister should have power to make it all public, and thus destroy the industry. It may have been so under the Combines Act; but we must remember that under war conditions advantage was taken of the situation, and there were combines with inflation of prices that were an injury to the public; but now we are getting back to normal conditions, and I think we should go a little more cautiously in these matters. I would like the honourable leader to tell me what section of this Bill is the same as section 19 in the old Act, where power was placed entirely in the hands of the Minister.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Section 9 gives power to the registrar or the Minister to investigate a business, to enter premises and examine books, etc. Section 25 of the Combines Investigation Act of 1910 required the proceedings to be public. In the Act of 1923 it has been thought better to make the proceedings private, for, if an offence has been committed, investigation will result in a prosecution; if no offence has been committed, publicity might work injury to the public. The honourable gentleman will see that the Act of 1910 ordered the proceedings to be conducted in public.

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes, but that is the very point. The honourable gentleman said it was the Government of which I was a member that passed that Act, but our Government did not come into power until 1911.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think that under the Board of Commerce Act the prosecution was public, since it was before a regular tribunal.

Hon. Mr. REID: I have here the statute passed in 1919, the Combines and Fair Prices Act, but I see in section 19 the court may investigate businesses and appoint examiners, but the information is not made public. Then it is provided that "no prosecution shall be commenced, otherwise than at the instance of the Attorney-General of the province, without the written leave of the Board expressing whether such prosecution shall be by way of indictment or under Part 15 of the Criminal Code, and that such prosecution shall be commenced only after a judicial finding in which the alleged offence was committed." In other words, all that the court did was to collect the evidence and get it ready, but it did not make it public, and had no power to make it public. All we would do would be to hand it over to the Attorney General of the province, who assumed the responsibility for it.

Section 10 was agreed to.

On section 11—access to premises and records:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Supposing he does not hand over the papers, what is going to happen to him?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then there is a penalty clause.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: How much?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is clause 16: "Powers of registrar and commissioner as to witnesses, evidence on oath and production of papers."

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Section 11 applies to papers.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Section 29 covers that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Those are pretty heavy penalties. The Act establishing the Inquisition had nothing on this. This is awful legislation; I am shocked; it is worse even than I expected from honourable gentlemen opposite. I am really pained and shocked at this legislation, which requires men to hand over their private papers and books, and subjects, them to a penalty of $5,000 and two years in the penitentiary if they do not do so. If I were running a business and they came and demanded the books under these circumstances, I think I would have a sawed-off shot-gun and would be tried for murder and not for contravening this particular Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend wants to be shocked a little more, he only needs to look at the Customs Act and see what the customs agents can do.

Hon. Mr. REID: I would ask the leader of the Government if he would not let section 11 stand. It says:

> Every person who is in possession or control of any such business, premises, books, papers, or records, as are referred to in the two immediately preceding sections shall give and afford to the registrar and to every commissioner admission and access thereto whenever and as often as demanded.

Could not something be done to compel the commissioners or the registrar, or whoever has the information, to keep it private? At all events, if it is to be disclosed, should not the Minister be the one to disclose it? Then, if the information is made public and a business is destroyed, we would know who was to blame.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is not section 19 a complete answer to my honourable friend? That places the full responsibility upon the shoulders of the Minister.

Hon. Mr. REID: It says the Minister may order the proceedings to be conducted in public. The point I raise is that the commissioners who take the evidence have all the documents and all the information—quite properly perhaps—and make them public. I feel that something should be done to protect the industry by compelling all those that have anything to do with the investigation to keep all information private until it is disclosed by the Government through the Minister who may be responsible. Then if there is any leak, the commissioners, or whoever it might be, could be prosecuted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We might proceed with the Bill, and if we find there is further enactment on these lines we might consider it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Supposing when a man's papers and books were demanded he should say: "No, I will go out of business; I won't give up my books and papers and show the secrets of my trade; I will go out of business in Canada and go to some country that gives liberty to a man to carry on business and will set up there." Would he in that way evade this punishment that is held over his head, or is he bound to be dragged before this tribunal and punished?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not believe so, I believe that if he closed his doors it would end the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think he should be given that alternative. If he says: "I am used to a free country, where there is liberty and where a man can conduct his occupation in peace and comfort and security; I find I have come to the wrong country, a country that is ridden by busybodies and faddists—and I cite prohibition and some other laws that we have passed; I want to go to a country where there is real liberty and where people are not obliged to conform to the opinions of short-haired women and long-haired men"—he should have that alternative. We are very little in advance of Russia. We laugh at the Russians, and say they are an ignorant lot of people; and why? Because only about 10 per cent of Russia is Bolshevik; and yet the Bolsheviki have been in control of the other 90 per cent for several years. We have very little to laugh at Russia for. We are run by about 10 per cent of our population—faddists, short-haired women and long-haired men, who have passed prohibition legislation of all sorts, and educated intelligent Canadians put up with it. Now we come to the ordinary trade and vocations of life. What justification is there for it? What outcry is there from the public that there are combines plundering and ruining the country? We do not see anything of it in the papers, except here and there in a red-flag sheet; and yet we are being stampeded and this legislation is going through—legislation which permits of conduct towards the people equivalent to that of the time when the Star Chamber was in full force in Great Britain. I have made my protest; I am only one individual; pass it if you will.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend may have taken that stand ever since he has been in public life. If he has, this is not the first time he has had occasion to address this Chamber or the other Chamber, because we have had similar legislation in a variety of forms. Under the Customs Act an agent enters a wholesale house, and as he enters he closes the doors behind him and says, "I take possession;" and he holds the stock, the books, everything, under his hand for whatever length of time it pleases him. We have an Act which enables the Government to reduce the tariff in case parties are taking advantage of it for the purpose of a combine. We have an Act which allows of the suspension or annulment of a patent where that privilege has been abused. We are surrounded by such laws, and yet we have managed to live and find ourselves more or less the happiest people in the world.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That seems to me to be a very poor excuse for such legislation—if you run over a man with an automobile, put the next one through a threshing machine. One bad act is justification for another. There may be some justification for the enactment of the customs law, because nearly everybody would smuggle. I would not include the honourable gentleman in that, but nearly everybody will smuggle.

Some Hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Hear them howl. Every man who protests is a smuggler.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If not he, his wife.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: His wife anyway, because a woman, being unmoral, is always a smuggler and sees no harm in it. She thinks it is all right. But that is no justification for this kind of legislation. The first thing we know this country will not be fit to live in. Having lived in it all my life, and my family for some generations before me, I shall be very sorry to have to leave it.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Where will you go?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: To some South Sea island where they have no law.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I should like to ask whether or not there are any restrictive penalties in regard to indiscreet or intolerable information that might be given by a registrar or a commissioner. They have tremendous power for getting information. They take up contracts or agreements of a business man or a corporation. This throws a very strong light on the kind and quality of man who should be a registrar or a commissioner. The possession of such information with regard to agreements, contracts, business methods and arrangements in the hands of some persons might be used by way of personal gain, or for the benefit of friends close to him, in a very improper and very damaging way. I have had a fairly good view of the wisdom of Governments in making appointments; but my life has given me instances of some mighty poor men who have been placed in responsible positions, and I can conceive of persons being nominated as commissioners or as registrar, who have strong political or partizan leanings; men who have various attitudes with reference to this business man and that; and I think there is in almost any man's being a little chord of temptation that can be pulled and made to operate in an unfair way. Suppose a man makes disclosures or uses information for his own advantage or for the advantage of his friends financially or politically, is there anything to restrain him or punish him for such incontinence?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I read the Bill very minutely, but it was two weeks ago, and I have not in mind and cannot recall any special enactment on that point.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I could not find it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But if, when we are in Committee, we realize there is no such restriction, we can very well add a clause in order to protect the public.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Will the Civil Service Commission appoint the registrar?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Surely it is not the intention of the Government to go outside the Civil Service Commission?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend knows the deputy ministers are excepted from the Civil Service Commission, so probably this commissioner would be equal—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Equal to a deputy minister?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In qualifications to a deputy minister, I think the appointment is left to the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is covered by section 4.

Hon. Mr. REID: It was with knowledge of the way in which the Customs Act had been administered for many years that I made the suggestion with reference to this Bill. The honourable gentleman has referred to customs officers having power to go into places of business and take charge. That is true, if they have information that any violation of the law has taken place or is suspected by any individual. But that is never heard of, and the information does not come to the public, unless prosecution takes place, and then a judge decides what proportion of it shall be made public. In this case the commissioner walks in, and there is nothing to prevent him, after the investigation has been held, giving the information to the public. Clause 19 simply provides that the Minister may order that the evidence be taken in private.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The investigation is private unless the Minister says it shall be public.

Hon. Mr. REID: The investigation is held in private, but there is no provision that the commissioner must keep the proceedings secret. That is the point. For instance, a customs officer can hold an investigation in private, and the law will not allow him to make anything public. In this case the commissioner shall hold the investigation in private if he so orders; but, after he has held the investigation, he may let the information out. For that reason I would ask the honourable leader to consider whether anything could be added to cover the point I make.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We may consider the possibility of amending or supplementing, but if my honourable friend will read section 19 he will find: "The proceedings of the registrar and every commissioner shall be conducted in private," etc. Until the Minister intervenes the investigation is private, and the commissioner, as well as the registrar, must keep it private to the point where he makes his report to the Minister; so that it is private with him or with them all the time unless the Minister intervenes to declare that it shall be carried on in public.

Hon. Mr. REID: I do not think that is plain.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: That is simply as to the investigation itself—as to whether you shall open the doors and let the public in, or keep the doors closed and keep only the registrar in. But the point my honourable friend has made, and that I tried to make, is that the information which the commissioner or the registrar gets, whether he conducts the investigation privately or not, is information which is of the most private kind, and if used or made public it might be very disadvantageous to the firm, and might work a great injustice to it, and might be used for the advantage of another. It is to dam up that possible leak in the dyke that I think we ought to have something.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I see no objection to that. I will take a note of it.

Sections 11, 12 and 13 were agreed to.

On section 14—Registrar or Commissioner may inspect and copy books, etc:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: There is a kind of an omnibus clause here: you not only have the registrar and the commissioner and the experts provided for, but they may be investigated by the Registrar and the Commissioner, "and also by such parties as the Minister or Commissioner allows." What is exactly the extent and meaning of that? That opens a very wide door. A commissioner might think that he should take a business man in to help him in this investigation, and this man might be a rival of the accused.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is a clause which allows of the appointment of experts, who, in cases of books, would be accountants or auditors.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Experts would not be confined to bookkeepers: they would be in any line. Suppose it was a dye factory, an expert on dyes would be employed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Section 15 provides that information obtained by competent persons employed to examine books, papers, or records shall not, except so far as the Minister deems expedient, be made public, and also that such parts of books, papers or records as are not material to the investigation may be sealed up. This section provides the necessary secrecy.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But the experts are not necessarily expert bookkeepers: they would be experts along any line.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They may: that is why the expression is a broad one.

Sections 14 to 17, inclusive, were agreed to.

On section 18—no person excused from attending or giving evidence on ground that evidence may incriminate him:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He is not to be excluded on such ground?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is an ordinary saving clause that no evidence thus given shall be used against such person in any criminal proceedings.

Section 18 was agreed to.

On section 19—proceedings in private:

Hon. Mr. REID: That is the clause I object to. I think that should stand to see if something cannot be provided.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We may find that in some other clauses there are sufficient guards.

Section 19 was allowed to stand.

Sections 20, 21 and 22 were agreed to.

On section 23—Governor in Council may admit article free of duty or reduce duty if satisfied as a result of investigation under this Act that combine exists at expense of public:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Can that action be taken before the action referred to in section 25, and its result known? Section 25 refers the whole thing to the Attorney General. Can any decision of a registrar or a commissioner as affecting the combine itself be taken and made public before you hand it over to the Attorney General of a province? Is not this all preliminary—to put information into the hands of the Attorney General of the province for prosecution if he deems it worth while to take action?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Section 20 opens a pretty wide door.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw the attention of the honourable gentleman from Grenville (Hon. Mr. Reid) to section 22 as to secrecy:

Within fifteen days after its receipt by the Minister the report (other than an interim report) of any Commissioner shall be made public, unless the Commissioner is of the opinion that the public interest would be best served by withholding publication and so states in the report itself, in which case the Minister may exercise his discretion as to the publicity to be given to the report in whole or in part. The Minister may publish and supply copies of any report in such manner and on such terms as to him seems most desirable.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then it all depends on the commissioner; the Minister has nothing to do with it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That refers only to the report—not to the evidence.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Minister may exercise his discretion as to publicity.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Perhaps I was not clear in my question as to section 23. The reduction of duty or otherwise is a penalty for an adjudged case. Therefore, whether the Attorney General takes it up or not, the decision has been made and the penalty applied, which affects not only the man or the corporation itself, but the whole trade.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, I am not ready to say it is a penalty. It is a relief to the whole public, but of course it would operate as a penalty.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think that is quite a reasonable provision. If there had been a combine, and it was clearly ascertained, then the combinesters should be punished.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Is it ascertained before the Attorney General has taken up the matter and prosecuted?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, because the report of the commisioners is made to the Attorney General. They simply hand it over to the Attorney General as the provincial authority.

Hon. Mr. REID: According to section 22, it is left in the hands of the Minister whether to make it public or not. Unless the commissioner writes it in his report that it would not be in the public interest to expose it, the whole information must be made public.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; the report.

Hon. Mr. REID: Well, the report would be supposed to contain all the evidence.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. REID: They generally submit the evidence with it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is another matter.

Hon. Mr. REID: That may form part of the report. The evidence may be submitted with the report to justify the finding. At all events, I interpret that as leaving the thing in the hands of the commissioner, and as meaning that it shall be made public.

Section 23 was agreed to.

On section 24—if owner or holder of patent makes use of exclusive rights to unduly limit production or restrict or injure trade, patent shall be liable to revocation:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We should have put that in the Patent Act.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like to ask the Minister: who pays the expenses of this Act? I see that witnesses are entitled to receive travelling expenses, and witness fees, and all that sort of thing. Where does the money come from?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Federal exchequer.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: That is all right. I thought they had nothing in the treasury.

Sections 24 and 25 were agreed to.

On section 26—penalty for violation of Act:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: If you make the penalty too great, you will defeat the object of the Bill. Before you can convict on an indictable offence you have to try it before a court, and I can assure you, as one having had long experience with criminal law, that the worst thing you can do is to make the penalty for an offence too great, that is, out of proportion to the offence. As sure as you do, you either get a disagreement of the jury or an acquittal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend will see that there is no minimum.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: It may be one dollar.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But an indictable offence is tried before a jury, and how do the jury know what attitude the judge will take? And if they suspect that the judge will be severe, they will acquit or disagree. That is the result of my experience, and I think you will find that it is the result of any man's experience.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You will have to hoodwink the jury in some way.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You have the penalty here too great.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Not for big business.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But you are going to bring in a lot of little fellows in addition to the big ones. You can prosecute a small man for this offence as much as you can a big man.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: There is no private prosecution allowed: you have to get the consent of the Attorney General or the Solicitor General.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is not the point. That only goes to the prosecution, but this is after you have the thing started; after you have had the investigation, then you turn it over to the provincial authorities for prosecution. I see that these remarks of mine are not received with very much seriousness by my honourable friend. He is sure in his own heart that this Bill will never be operative—that it is really just a little sop to the boys.

Section 26 was agreed to.

Sections 27 to 30, both inclusive, were agreed to.

On section 31—appointment of registrar and commissioner and employment of requisite technical and special temporary assistance:

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: May I ask if all the expenses will be paid by the Government?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am happy to be able to inform my honourable friend that the Federal exchequer will be mulcted only for its own costs.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Who pays the costs in case the inquiry falls to the ground? Does the alleged combinester have to suffer the injury?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not presume there will be any costs.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does he not have to defend himself?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If he has a clear record and clean hands why should he employ counsel?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Just to show that he has a clear record and clean hands.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: Who pays the witnesses if the case is not proven?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The Crown pays them all.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It is the same as with any criminal charge: a man who defends himself has to pay his own expenses.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw attention to subsection 2 and 3 of section 31. Of course, the question arises as to the claim on the part of the accused if he is freed from the accusation.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: That is my point.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not see that power is taken to compensate him by paying his expenses.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You think acquittal will be sufficient compensation.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: Do you not think something might be added to cover the expenses of the party accused?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We have left that question in abeyance. The question is, should the complainant or the Crown or the innocent party pay? My honourable friend from Manitoba (Hon. Mr. McMeans) has just remarked that in all criminal cases the accused pay their own expenses.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You are not putting this in the same category?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But if a man is maliciously prosecuted, he has an action in return; in this case he has not.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: A man so accused may not be a criminal.

Section 31 was agreed to.

Section 32 was agreed to.

On section 33—Governor in Council may make necessary regulations:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Will the regulations be effective before any meeting of Parliament?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: It is just the usual clause.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Are the regulations effective from the time they are made?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Section 33 was agreed to.

On section 34—trade unions not affected:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: What is the meaning of this section?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It says:

> Nothing in this Act shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

Why not add the words "or employers?"

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Does that mean that the Act shall not apply when the combination is for reasonable protection?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Who is to say whether it is reasonable protection or not? And why, if it applies to workmen and employees, should it not apply to employers? Why should not everyone be reasonably protected? Is it only the workmen who are to be protected or exempted from restrictive laws? That is class legislation.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: That is the fly in the ointment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, that is the fly in the ointment. Let us all be judged alike. I shall view labour legislation from a different standpoint when the labour unions consent to be incorporated so that actions can be brought against them for breach of contract. So far as labour legislation is concerned, my experience is that the labour unions are always trying to get some advantage over other people. Let them stand on an even basis with others. Every man in this country should have an equal right before the law. They make exceptions of themselves and are not to be held liable; but the corporation of employers is held liable. Corporations of employees can amass a large amount of money and snap their fingers and laugh when a corporation tries to enforce any contract against them. That is not fair, that is not square, that is not British justice and fair play; and I say they have no right to be excepted from this any more than employers have.

I would make a suggestion, which I am sure is in line with my honourable friend's view, because I know him to be a very sensible, level-headed, just man. I appeal to him on that ground to amend this by adding the words "or employers" so that it will read "workmen or employers or employees."

Hon. Mr. REID: I would also like to make the appeal to have farmers exempted.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: U.F.O.

Hon. Mr. REID: Not U.F.O.—farmers as a whole, including U.F.O.'s.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Real farmers.

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes. Is it not a fact that farmers have to unite to sell their products? Why should this legislation apply to workmen and not to farmers? I think everything should be done to assist farmers and give them an opportunity to reap better profits.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Could my honourable friend mention a case in which any provision of this Act applies to trade unions?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not see any.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Or in what way it could reach the trade unions, if you were to omit the clause?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I confess that up to this moment I have not emphasized the expression "reasonable protection," which opens quite an interesting debate. What this section would cover in the general activities of the trade unions I am not prepared to say. It has been suggested that employers should be added.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would you allow me to make a suggestion? Suppose that the trade union was composed of bricklayers who bind themselves not to lay more than 300 bricks in a day. Would that bring them within this measure if the exception was not made?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Off-hand, I would say yes.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It is not a combination in respect of trade.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then, if you pass this exception, you are permitting the workmen to do what you will not permit the employer to do.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I say that I believe that the trade union which would act in that way would not be covered by clause 34. That is my opinion as I read the clause.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would not be excepted?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: A union that decided to limit its production unduly to the extent that my honourable friend mentions.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would be unreasonable protection.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It would fall under this legislation, and would not be protected by clause 34.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Where would you draw the line as between reasonable and unreasonable? Would it be at 300 bricks or 400 bricks a day?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I return to section 2:

> The expression "combine" in this Act shall be deemed to have reference to such combines immediately hereinafter defined as have operated or are likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is not a trade union that restricts the labour of its members to the laying of 300 bricks a day when an ordinary man could lay 800 to 1,000 a day a combination in restraint of trade, and does not that work to the injury of the public? The restriction placed on the output of labour has done more to raise prices in this country than anything else.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This Bill would reach a case of that kind. That would be unreasonable.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Where does reason begin?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is for the courts to decide that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: To-day they have regulations against the laying of more than 400 bricks a day.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: No, I think it is 1,000.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, it is not so much as that.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: They could easily lay 1,500.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I have built a good many brick buildings, and I know that a man could easily lay 1,500 bricks; but to-day they do not lay 800, and that is their regulation.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Why have section 34 at all?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: On the second reading of the Bill I had occasion to state that this clause, from the inception of this kind of legislation, from 1888 up to to-day, has been included, and I stated why I thought it was. I may have been in error, but I am convinced that in 1888, and for very many years afterwards, the labour organizations were striving to better their condition, were pleading that their wage was a starvation wage in many instances, and were forming themselves into associations in order to gather strength and obtain a living wage. It seemed natural, when the scale of wages was so low, that they should be allowed freedom of action to band together and strive for a better wage. To-day the situation is somewhat different.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then, why not change the law?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: You still allow them to join together. You do not declare that the simple fact of claiming collective bargaining is ipso facto an illegal act, but you limit that action by declaring that it must be for their reasonable protection. It leaves the whole question open. I can understand why this provision has been carried from one statute to another.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But now the time has come when the boot is on the other foot, and the wage is really higher than industry can pay. Look at what men are getting in the United States—$18 a day, working a 9-hour day. It is a good deal worse there than it is here. The cost of construction is so great that it is impossible for people economically to build, and there begins the endless round. Since labour has got the upper hand, why should you put employees on a different plane? Why should they not get on the same platform as the poor employer, who to-day has to plead for mercy, suffering as he does because of labour? I do not ask for the employers any special legislation whatever; but why should you give the workmen special legislation when they do not ask for it, when they do not need it, when as a matter of justice, it should not be given? Give fair play to each.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not see that this alters very much the situation of the labour union; it declares that they can form themselves into unions or associations.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Of course they can.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then, till they go one step further and do something that is unconscionable or unreasonable they are free to live their own lives in society. The same thing applies to the employer.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why don't you say the same thing about the manufacturers?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No one would think of assailing the manufacturers because they have formed the Canadian Manufacturers Association. So long as they are working for their general interests without operating at a certain moment to the detriment of the public by raising the price or reducing production they are free to act. They are free in their movements, just as labour organizations are in their unions.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then why do you except the latter?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Because their association was a manifest one: they were organizing, and it was said, if I might use the expression, that they were manifestly the under-dog thirty years ago, and twenty years ago.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Now they are the top-dog.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That protection is there, so long as they use it in a reasonable way. I do not believe there is any harm in continuing that semblance of protection.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: When they were the under-dog it was justifiable; but now that they are the top-dog it is not justified. Why not include the employers in that?

Hon. Mr. REID: I want to make an appeal on behalf of the producers. The interpretation clause of this Act refers to combines that are likely to operate against the interest of the public, whether producers, consumers, or others. That would take in the farmer. Then, section 34 is put in to except one particular class. If that section were not in, the Bill would apply to the class mentioned by the honourable member for Sussex.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think the word "reasonable" gives society sufficient protection.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I see that the leader of the Progressives is not in his seat, or probably he would ask the question I am going to ask. I understand that the Parliament of Canada passed an Act authorizing the western provinces to make a pool in grain, but it did not go through. In the event of the farmers of the West combining not to sell their grain until a certain time, would that be forming a pool to raise the price to the people?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think the intention of the Grain Growers of the West was very well put before us by another honourable representative of Manitoba in this Chamber on the second reading of this Bill last week. The pool is not for the purpose of enhancing the price, but for the purpose of allowing the grain to reach the market as the market needs it, and not glutting market and depreciating an article that has some value.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: Does this Bill cover the legal and medical fraternities?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I had that in mind while I was listening to my honourable friend from Sussex.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Better let this section stand.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I think my honourable friend said it would not affect a combination of farmers forming a pool to hold the grain, and not to sell it until a certain time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not like to substitute myself for the courts that may have to pass judgment on all those questions.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

The Committee resumed at 8 o'clock.

On section 34—trade unions not affected:

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I think this clause should be eliminated. My honourable friend the leader of the Government said something this afternoon which was very true; he said that the principle contained in this Bill had been recognized since the '80s.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Since 1888.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I think that recognition was justifiable at that time, and perhaps for many years afterwards, but I believe the time has come when conditions are such that the clause should be eliminated. I have always held that labour should be considered, and that they had an absolute right to their unions. I think so yet; I have no doubt that the union of labour has done a great deal for the progress of labour in this and other countries; but I think now that anyone who has had to employ labour during the past ten years, especially during the war and since, will feel with me that there is no particular reason why a clause like this should be retained in the Bill. This is the feeling not only in this country, but in the United States. The price of labour has reached such a stage that it is reacting upon labour. It may be said that it is all right—that it will make labour more considerate; but we know that a great many people have gone from this country to the United States during the last year because of high wages.

I would like to call the attention of the House to an article from New York city, because it expresses much better than I can my opinion on this subject. It says:

> The demand for higher and ever higher wages is the monkey-wrench that has got into the machinery. The Board of Education of the city of New York had planned a building program involving upward of $36,000,000. This has now to a large extent been deferred. Masons were getting $10, and in many cases $12 per day, but decided that it was not enough, Thereupon the contractors threw up their hands, and, backed by the Board of Education, they resolved to close down, and do no more building until prices receded. Aside from the schools New York had a building programme in hand, in large work only, amounting to upward of $42,000,000 and this has been dropped until such time as there is a reasonable deflation in prices of both labor and materials. The New York Telephone Company was to have expended some $11,000,000, but have decided to postpone the work, while Columbia University has decided to defer a $10,000,000 building project.

All that work has been suspended because of what is believed to be an unfair rise in the price of wages and material. I give that as a proof that we should not make any special legislation to asist labour. I believe and always have believed that the labourer should be well paid. If I had my way I would even classify labour, as the man who should perhaps get the highest wages does not. I would give the man who goes into a sewer to work better pay than either the carpenter or the mason. That idea may not be general, but it is in my opinion the proper one. The article from which I have read closes with these words:

> If our labour leaders would let up on the wage business and preach production to their members we might get somewhere. High wages are by no means objectionable; in fact, they are very desirable; but with high wages should go economical and high production, both of which are now sadly lacking.

These are my sentiments. I honestly and sincerely believe that labour is not playing the game fairly. I have said that several times; but when they get good wages it is up to them to produce and give satisfactory results.

My own experience last summer was something like this. I was employing quite a number of men. All those men smoked cigarettes. I have no objection to that; they smoked from the time they started in the morning until they stopped at night. But they not only smoked cigarettes; they rolled their own, and all day they were either rolling cigarettes or smoking them. That is not fair.

We hear a great deal about capital and labour, but this is no time to enter on a discussion of that question. They should get good wages, but on the other hand they should produce something in return for those wages. Hence I think that this clause should be eliminated.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: My honourable friend has, I think, reserved two or three clauses which he is to take into consideration. Might it not be just as well to reserve this clause with the others? We can all think it over, and maybe some suggestion can be made to modify it to some extent without deleting it entirely? I simply make the suggestion that it be allowed to stand with that end in view.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no objection to accepting the suggegstion of my right honourable friend. As he rose I was about to say that I did not think it was good policy for us to drop a clause that seemed to be very harmless. If the word "reasonable" were not in it, I would think an argument might be made for modifying if not dropping it; but in the form in which it has been on our Statute Book for the last 30 years, it seems to me that it can do no harm, because whenever the labour associations go beyond what is reasonable they except themselves from it. We are all striving to round the angles and bring about an understanding between capital and labour. If I were not convinced that the clause is practically harmless, I would not say that the Senate of Canada, with all it represents should abstain from touching it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Before this clause is disposed of I would draw attention to the statement in some newspapers that there is talk of a gigantic combine of all the farmers in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta in order to enhance the price of food. It is a voluntary pool—as I understand these combines, people go into them voluntarily—and the question arises whether we should not also exempt farmers when they want to make a combine. A combine in wheat is the most serious possible, for bread is the staff of life. Such a combine would raise the price of food to the poorest people in the community, for, as everyone knows, they use a much larger proportion of bread than any other article. The poorer people are the more bread they eat, while wealthy people have a variety of food, and eat comparatively little bread. A combine of the farmers to raise the price of wheat would certainly raise the price of bread, and, according to some legal lights whom I consulted in Montreal to-day, such a combine would certainly come under the provisions of this Bill. There should therefore be a clause stating that the farmers, when they do combine to raise the price of food, and thus increase the cost of living, shall not be subject to prosecution. Honourable gentlemen who represent the farmers should certainly have a clause of that kind inserted in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I have never yet seen a combination of farmers to raise the price of wheat or bread or flour to the consumer. That has never been advocated by anybody in the western provinces. They desire only to get rid of the speculator—not to raise the price of bread.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think there is a misapprehension as to this section. I do not read it as an exemption, that is, an unqualified exemption of a combination of workingmen. The same principle is imported into this section that runs all through the Bill. The combination must be one for reasonable protection of workmen or employees. This exemption would apply to the manufacturer, and to every combination in Canada that is formed simply for reasonable protection. What is aimed at in the Bill is a combination for unreasonable purposes. Honourable gentlemen will observe that this section at the end of the Bill deals with reasonable protection:

> Nothing in this Act shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

Instead of using the words, "workmen or employees," we might insert there, "manufacturers, merchants, any body of men, may form a combination for their reasonable protection." But when the combination becomes unreasonable so unreasonable as to be a machine for extorting unreasonable prices from the public—then it comes within the Act. In my judgment combinations of employees or workmen would be just as well protected under the Act if they were not mentioned here. I fancy that mention is made of workmen or employees for the purpose of removing any misapprehension in the minds of the working classes; but, as I say, without that specific mention they will be just as well protected.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: On two or three occasions during this debate reference has been made to a proposed combination of farmers. I want to say that there is no idea or intention among farmers or wheat-growers to form any pool for the purpose of raising the price of wheat.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If that were the case, this Bill would extend to them: it would cover any such combination as that.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: The farmers of the West, at all events, do not want any exemption in any shape or form. All they want to do is to prevent other combinations from reaping the whole or most of the benefit that they should derive from the wheat they grow. They want to prevent all the wheat, or a great deal of it, from being forced onto the market early in the fall by creditors of the farmers, who urge them to sell their wheat. Their idea is that if they have a wheat board, they can draw their wheat in, and get a certain amount of money on it, but that the wheat board will have full control, and not rush wheat on the market, and thus put the price away down as was done the year before last. As soon as the wheat got into the hands of the middlemen or speculators on that occasion, it went up 30, 35, 40 and even 45 cents more than it sold for in the months of October and November, when it was being delivered to the market. That is all that the farmers want, if they succeed in getting a wheat board that is workable. If they do not succeed in getting a wheat board they can form a pool among themselves, not for the purpose of raising the price of wheat, but for the one and only purpose of preventing it from being put on the market and the price pushed down below its value in the hands of speculators, causing consumers to pay a third or a quarter more than they would have to pay had the wheat been marketed in a quiet and orderly way, feeding the market as fast as it could take the grain. That plan worked well during the war under the War Measures Act, and I am sure that, if the farmers succeed in getting something of the same kind, it will be of benefit not only to themselves, but to the consumers all over the country.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Just a word with reference to the phase of the discussion which has come upon us at the moment. It strikes me, from my reading and consideration of the subject, that the farmers to-day in the United States and Canada are feeling their way along to the very best and most solid form of marketing their products. The farmer has suffered from the middleman. Every consumer suffers from an overplus of distributors and middlemen, and we are paying a good proportion of the amount that we pay for our keep because they are too many men who are not producers, but who are taxing the people and burdening business for keeping them up in the process of distribution—an unnecessary distribution.

No man can walk through the streets of Ottawa and count the grocery stores or the drug shops, or can go to the city of Toronto, where these are probably even more in evidence, without coming to the conclusion that there is an overplus of distributors in those lines. Every distributor has a family and runs an establishment, and every bit of the expense is paid, not out of a certain thing that he produces, but out of his charges for intervening between the man who produces and the man who consumes. It would be an interesting thing to note the number of grocery stores, drug stores, fruit stores, and the like of that in this town, and then note the population of Ottawa, and reckon the cost per head of all those establishments for their upkeep, the upkeep of their families, their living expenses, their luxuries, and everything that pertains to life. What amount would that be when taxed upon the consumers of those products, according to the population which is in the city of Ottawa to-day?

I do not know that there is any way out of it, by legislation or otherwise, except through the growth of economic sense. I do not know any way by which you can say that there shall not be more than a certain number of grocery stores. But it is evident to anyone that if you had in this city 10 grocery shops—establishments properly distributed and well conducted on good business and economic principles, they could supply all the grocery needs for the whole of this population, and you would have only 10 shops to keep up, where perhaps you have now over a hundred, two hundred or three hundred establishments to keep up. This is one of the things that it is most difficult for us to meet in an economic way.

A man who produces something useful is a great boon to the country, while every man and every member of a family who does not do something in the way of absolute production, but lays himself or herself over on the producer and the consumer to keep them, and provide them with a business, and a remuneration for that business, is so much of a tax upon the ultimate consumer, and therefore adds to the cost of living.

It is most entertaining and instructive to watch the growth of co-operative business among primary producers in the United States of America. The farmer is reaching out in that direction. In the fruit industry, in all departments of the vegetable industry, and now in the grain industry as well, co-operative marketing is taking the place of the old plan of throwing everything into the hands of middlemen from the time that it leaves the granary of the farmer until it gets onto the consumer's table. By a wise system and business method of co-operation the producers are keeping those profits to themselves. I do not think that the result has been to increase the price of the product, yet it has brought to the farmer and the primary producer what is his right—the largest proportion possible as a profit to him who produces.

If the consumer could be right at hand with the primary producer, and directly take what he wants, without the intervention of a long line of middlemen, there would be less cost to the consumer. So I think that the farmers, having abandoned the plans they had at one time, of making the Government the medium of their transactions between themselves and the consumer, are going on a principle which, if they work it out with the same business ability in their organization from the first to the last, as farmers in the United States are doing in those productive industries, the effect will not be to add to the cost to consumers, but to increase to the farmer the profits which are naturally and rightfully his.

Now, with reference to the matter before the House, what the leader of the Opposition said is true, that the spirit of this Act being that a reasonable actor, whether employer or employee, shall be protected, it is of the essence of the Act, that as long as both are reasonable neither of them shall be attacked by it. But if reasonableness is of the basis and an essential part of the Act, why is it necessary to take out any one class and say that they shall not be proceeded against under this Act so long as their action is for their own reasonable benefit? Why should not the milkman be exempted in the same way in his arrangements for the production of milk and the distribution of it through the city; giving him no more than a reasonable return for his pail?

A Bill of this kind is going to be very difficult to work out with a whole class of businesses. Take the men who manufacture on a stated selling price: you get a store selling at a single price, and they fix the price. I have known of some investigations into that matter, and I have seen where a distribution of sugar by a system that prevailed five or six years ago, and also this fixed-price method with reference to certain articles, in the end, worked out absolutely to the benefit of the consumer himself. Somebody must fix the price. It is quite reasonable to think that the manufacturer who is working up his special line, and who wants to advertise it and make a custom for himself in it, will be just as wise and reasonable in fixing his selling price as will 20, 30, 100 or 1,000 retailers who are selling the article, one here and one there, and getting all they can for it, with different prices in different localities. Taking many articles sold in drug shops, and in many other ways, the fixed-price method for resale is one of the most economical ways of distributing the product, and in the interest of both producer and consumer.

I think that it is not necessary for us any longer to keep up these distinctions between classes. There is as much right to attack by this Act the trade unions, and working people who combine to force up prices beyond what is reasonable, as any other combine. The producer who reasonably puts a proper price on his goods and tries to work up his custom through that reasonable method, should not be attacked by this Act. But, if either of these classes is unreasonable, then they should be at the mercy of the Act. If both of them are reasonable, and if reasonableness is of the essential nature of the Act, the Act itself will be their best provision and safety.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, I fear that some of us may perhaps be overlooking the fact that there is other legislation on the Statute Book of Canada that governs in a case where either an employer or a number of them, or employees in concert, seek to impose unfair conditions on the other; and, in view of the fact that another Act does govern these things, it may be the intent of previous legislation of this sort—because in at least two previous Acts this same clause has occurred—to make it clear that the other legislation should govern matters of wage disputes rather than that the Combines Act should. May I point out again, as I did on the second reading of this Bill, that there is nothing which workmen, by combination, can control except their own labour. They offer and sell the only thing they have to offer and sell, and from which they are able to support themselves and their dependents—that is, their own efforts, the labour that they offer to give in return for a day's pay. That is not in contemplation in this legislation. This legislation, as I understand it, proposes to prevent men or combinations of men from unfairly gathering together, through the investment of capital, the product of labour, whether it be of the farmer or the workman in the factory, and by obtaining control of the surplus product at a time when the supply exceeds the demand and putting it in storage until the demand exceeds the supply, and then wresting from the public an exorbitant price for it. It is to prevent an abuse of that kind in any line of endeavour that I understand this legislation is necessary. In my opinion, it is not applicable to relations between employers and workmen at all. But, as the right honourable member from Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) and also the leader of this side of the House (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) have pointed out, if there is unreasonable combination on the part of workmen in such a way as has been pointed out in one or two instances this afternoon, it is within the scope of this measure to recognize it and take action. That being so, there can be no harm in leaving the clause just as it is. It will have this beneficial effect; it will not upset the minds of a million workers of this country, and will not afford an opportunity to those who wish to agitate their minds. It can do no harm to leave it, and I respectfully suggest, honourable gentlemen, that it is neither desirable nor proper for this House to take any step which will upset the equilibrium of the workmen when no good purpose can be served by so doing. There is a similar clause in the Act of 1919 and in the previous Act, and I respectfully suggest that it should be left in this Bill. It worked no harm in the previous Acts, and we all agree that to eliminate it from this Bill will not in any way alter the situation except to disturb the minds of workmen throughout the country and to afford an opportunity to those who desire to disturb them and bring about a feeling of dissatisfaction.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: My honourable friend has presented an argument which appeals to my mind. I have been impressed by what he has said as to this being made a handle for more trouble and more hard feeling than we have at the present time, when it is in the interest of all labourers and employers as well to get together on a common basis of reasonable co-operation, each being so absolutely necessary to the other for the best of production and the cheapest of consumption.

FRENCH CONVENTION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from May 23 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand for the second reading of Bill 23, an Act respecting a certain Convention of Commerce between His Majesty and the President of the French Republic.

Hon. C. P. BEAUBIEN: Honourable gentlemen, I am free to confess that when I heard the speech delivered by the honourable the junior member for Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) on this very important matter, a good many of my hopes received a severe blow, and I wondered whether some of my endeavours in the past had not been spent to no avail. With the ability which has exercised its power over Parliament for more than 30 years, my right honourable friend in a vivid manner confronted our possible trade with France with the general trade of Canada, and I must confess that our trade with France looked so small that I wondered whether it was worth anybody's while to endeavour to increase it in the future. At the same time, however, I recollected what one of my honourable friend's colleagues told me in 1920. At that time I happened to be in Paris and the honourable gentleman was in Geneva acting as Minister of Finance for the League of Nations. No less, I believe, than some 50 nations had chosen him to direct the financial affairs of that League. Well, this colleague of his told me that the representatives of all nations after hearing Mr. Viviani, the great French parliamentarian and orator, had determined that no resolution henceforth would be taken up by the League of Nations immediately after discussion, because they who had heard Mr. Viviani felt they were not free agents, they were carried away by the power of his oratory, and would not perhaps give the decision which calm consideration would recommend. I think I can in a measure at least apply that to my right honourable friend. I felt that I should mistrust myself and that perhaps it would be wise to investigate these facts from another angle. I do not contest any of the figures submitted here by the right honourable gentleman, but I think I may say that there is plenty of room to differ with him in the angle from which the question can be approached.

If you contrast our trade with any foreign nation whatsoever with the total trade of Canada, you have a very sad picture. The reason is self-evident. Our total foreign trade is divided in the ratio of 46.7 per cent for the British Empire, 39.7 per cent for the United States, and 13.6 per cent for the rest of the world. It matters greatly, therefore, if you contrast our French trade with our trade with any other foreign nation instead of opposing it to the total foreign trade of Canada. But I presume it is self-evident that we gain by extending our trade to different nations, and that it is undesirable for us to have our foreign trade anchored too strongly across the line, and, perhaps, in a measure concentrated too much in the hands of two nations. I think everybody will admit, therefore, that it is of great advantage to Canada to extend her foreign trade amongst other nations.

What is the comparison to be made between our trade with France and our trade with France's greatest competitors on our markets? Here it is. I will take two years before the war, and three years afterwards. In 1913 our export trade with France was .62 per cent of our total exports; with Italy .09 per cent; with Sweden, Norway and Denmark, all put together, .41 per cent; with Spain .01 per cent; with New Zealand, which my honourable friend has mentioned, .44 per cent. Therefore, France then held the leading place amongst these nations in reference to our export trade.

In 1914 our trade with France was .78 per cent; with Italy, .11 per cent; with Sweden, Norway and Denmark, .36 per cent; with Spain, .014 per cent; with New Zealand, .42 per cent.

In 1920, with France, 4.75 per cent; with Italy, 1.32 per cent; with Sweden, Norway and Denmark, .94 per cent; with Spain, .08 per cent; with New Zealand, .54 per cent.

In 1921, France, 2.25 per cent; Italy, 4.77 per cent; Sweden, Norway and Denmark, .87 per cent; Spain, .42 per cent; New Zealand, .97 per cent.

In 1922, France, 1.07 per cent; Italy, 2.07 per cent; Sweden, Norway and Denmark, .97 per cent; Spain, .11 per cent; New Zealand, .52 per cent.

It is therefore evident that if you exclude Italy for the last two years, France will easily be at the head of the nations with whom we trade, with the exception of the United States. Everybody knows what has happened in Italy—that socialism and anarchism have practically held full sway. Everybody knows that up to the time Mr. Mussolini took power that in a great many centres the workmen had taken possession of the different industries and were conducting them themselves to the exclusion of the proprietors; at all events, it is common knowledge that there was a great upheaval in Italy, and therefore an enormous diminution in the production of that country of both raw and manufactured products. That to my mind, is the explanation of why the exports of Canada to Italy were so large in 1921 and 1922. The figures for Italy for the 11 months ending February, 1923, are $11,812,000, having been considerably reduced, and are lower than our exports to France.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Did we not sell coal to Italy?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have not analyzed our exports to Italy; but I know we did export coal to Italy to a large amount.

May I at the same time draw the attention of this honorable House to two evident obstacles in the way of our trade with France, which, if removed, should lead us to hope for very much better results. The first results from the depreciation of the franc which now is one-third of its value. What are we discussing? We are considering whether or not we should grant to France certain reductions of duty, say from 1¼ per cent, to hardly more than 1¾ per cent on the value of the goods imported from France.

What is our position towards France? Why, the franc, which at par is worth practically five to the dollar, is now worth 15 francs to the dollar. When a Canadian producer sends his goods to France he is confronted with a duty—artificial if you like, but no less real—which is equivalent to a protection of 300 per cent. It really, matters very little, under what regime of protection, under what tariff, your goods are received in France now; what matters is the value of the franc.

What would you say, honourable gentlemen, if we surrounded this country with a protection wall of 300 per cent? Do you think many foreign goods would be sold on our market? That is the position, as far as France is concerned. That possition will not last long. I dare say that the signs now are clear that there must be a readjustment before long. The incident of the Ruhr has not been so importunate, after all, since Mr. Poincaré was able to announce to the House of Commons in Paris very recently that France was spending no more money in the Ruhr, than she was getting out of it. She is on the way to make it a paying enterprise. The German people know it. The French can foresee that the German people will settle; that they will make a reasonable, practical offer; and just as soon as this can be foreseen generally you will witness the price of the franc appreciating, and it will rise rapidly, and then it will be very much easier indeed for us to do business with France. Our exportations to France during the last year exceeded $14,000,000, which, after all, is practically 400 per cent, increase on our expert trade of 1914.

But there is another obstacle. The French people know nothing of our production. I think I can say that I am pretty familiar with the conditions out there. I have made a very sincere effort, and I have given what little ability I have to develop our trade relations with France. I have been appalled to find even people of learning there totally, absolutely ignorant of our products. May I give you an exemple? I was once at Grenoble, a large city which produces no less than 400,000 tons of paper a year, at a large banquet presided over by the President of the Chamber of Commerce; and that gentleman read a speech which was next day reproduced in the papers, and in which he said:

> For the first time, gentlemen, we hear that you produce wood pulp to make paper in Canada. Can you not arrange that some of it is sent to France?

Honourable gentlemen, you know what happened in regard to nickel. Prior to the war, when France wanted nickel where did she get it? She got a little from New Caledonia, but very little, and the rest of that nickel was bought in Germany but of course came from Canada, since we are responsible for over 90 per cent of the total production of the world. The same method applied to asbestos, and in the good old province of Quebec we produced 95 per cent of the best asbestos of the world; yet every time the French people wanted asbestos prior to the war they went to Berlin for it. Is it possible to expect that we can sell our goods in France if they are not known?

Now, may I give you an example of what can be produced when our goods are known? We are now selling a great deal of salmon in France. We did not sell so very much prior to the war, but what happened? It happened that there was a great deal of canned salmon amongst the stocks which were liquidated after the American army returned home. The French people got into the habit of using canned salmon; it got into their diet, practically in everyday use, and when those stocks ran out they looked for more. Here is a letter which I have already quoted to the Senate, but I will ask permission to read one paragraph or two which I think will explain very clearly the views which I hold on this subject. This is from the president of the British Columbia Canning Company. He writes:

During the war the American Government had shipped over in the stores for their Army enormous supplies of canned salmon in these grades, and at the close of the war these were thrown on the French market, at whatever price could be realized for them. The result was that everybody in France commenced to use canned salmon, and it became almost a standard article of food. These enormous army supplies that had been left in France and dumped on the market had all gone into consumption by the Spring of 1921, and the demand for it had become so strong that the French buyers immediately commenced to look around for the filling of this demand. They naturally applied to the three sources of production: the United States, Japan and British Columbia.

To a certain extent France had taken, prior to the war, some British Columbia Salmon, and most of the producers in Canada had acquired the habit of stamping the word Canada on the top of their cans so that on any purchase that went to France they could comply with the French law in that respect, rather than put a sticker on each can.

When the French buyers commenced to feel out the market, they of course found that the United States market and the Japanese market were lower than Canadian prices because of the cheap means of fishing that are allowed in the United States and are not allowed in Canada, and because of the larger production per unit. However, this was overcome entirely by the Preferential Treaty that we had with France, which gave us 25 francs per 100 kilos preference. The result was that not only this large surplus pack that we had on hand went into consumption very rapidly in France, but also we were able to pack considerable more of this grade of fish in 1921 and dispose of that also. As a result we are almost entirely cleaned up of this grade of fish at the present time, the industry starts out next year on a legitimate basis, and we are assured of a steady demand in France for the Canadian product.

He goes on to state that practically now they have chased the American and the Japanese salmon from the French market. Trerefore I say, honourable gentlemen, that what we have accomplished for salmon we could accomplish also for a great many other of our products. Why not for cereals? Are any people better placed than we are to make cereals out of wheat and oats? What about lumber products? What about asbestos, which I mentioned a moment ago? What about paper, and a great many other products for which we are in a specially privileged position to compete with other countries on the French market?

Therefore, notwithstanding the pessimistic impression cast upon me by the speech so eloquently delivered by the right honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster), I think I can still cherish my hopes, and believe there is for Canada a bright future in the French market, provided, of course, we take the trouble of making our goods known in that market, and provided the conditions of exchange allow us a fair and reasonable chance to compete in that market.

I desire now to refer to the Treaty of 1921. It has been said in another place that that Treaty had a great many defects, and that it was responsible for Canada being placed on a footing of inferiority to the United States in the French market. I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that Article III of that Treaty clearly states that the entire treaty of 1907-8 was continued in force—the entire treaty, save and except the items that I will mention in a moment. The Franch Government agrees, for the benefit of the Canadian products imported into France, to continue until the conclusion of the new commercial convention the application of the regime laid down in the Convention of 1907-8, with the modifications and additions provided for by the following Articles.

These Articles refer to two schedules. In one there is in fact a retrenchment of 14 articles. Under those 14 articles all together, prior to this Treaty and prior to the war, Canada did not export as much as $150,000 worth a year. Therefore I think I can say that the 14 items which were rejected, so to speak, from the list of the minimum tariff by the Treaty of 1921, were not of a great deal of importance; and, besides, most of them, as you can see, have still percentages of preference.

But there is Schedule 2. Well, if you take Schedule 2 you will find that all articles, with privileged treatment heretofore exclusively reserved to the United States, had reverted to Canada; so that after 1921 Canada enjoyed nearly every article of import in the American tariff which Canada should have possessed prior to 1921. It seems to me that there has been misapprehension as to the cause of our trouble after 1921. While this Treaty practically selected a certain number of items both of French and Canadian origin for preferential treatment, nothing therein is said as to the general tariff; nothing is said or done as to the items which are not so privileged. And what happened? It happened that France respected this treaty, but raised her general tariff, and therefore, without violating this treaty or the treaty of 1907-8, which was thereby continued, France really created a new class of privileged items for the United States, for the United States was in no way affected by the increase in the general tariff. In France it was stated that the Americans had not cancelled their treaty of 1910; that they had still the right to enjoy the maximum tariff that was laid down at that time; and so it came to pass that practically everything that was exported by the United States into France under the general tariff had an immense advantage over our own goods. This, I am glad to say, has not only disappeared by the arrangement we are now considering, but provision has been made that no such trouble will ever come to Canada under the present treaty.

May I now look rapidly at the Treaty itself. What is the value of the Treaty for Canada? What did we get, and what did we give? I will endeavour to put it as shortly and concisely as I can. We have conceded fixed rates, and I have heard a great deal of criticism as to that, but for my part I fail to understand how it could be otherwise. The spread in the Canadian tariffs between the minimum and the intermediate is only 12½ per cent on the average. What would percentages in such a spread mean to France? Practically nothing. And to make this more plain, I will revert to what concessions Canada has made to France.

Under the Treaties of 1907 and 1921 there were 12 items which enjoyed fixed or specific rates. In 1922 these items were increased to the number of 31. We have conceded to France a certain number of concessions which no doubt will be very useful to France; but to what extent? The fixed rates which we have so conceded and which I have before me, are not very much lower than those France had before. For instance, of all items of export which exceed $100,000 in any one year I find only six. The reduction in the tariff rate has been small. Take, for instance, medicinal preparations: The tariff was 25 per cent; it is now 22½ per cent. Take perfumery, non-alcoholic: it was 32 per cent; it is now 25 per cent. Furs: it was 15 per cent; it is now 12½ per cent. Tableware, china: it was 27½ per cent; it is now 20 per cent. On feathers, it was 27½ per cent; it is now 22½ per cent. Granting these concessions, honourable gentlemen, what do they amount to so far as the trade of Canada is concerned?

I am taking now the major items of export of France to Canada. What do they represent? Take, for instance, our importations of cotton in which France shares. Her share is 1.71 per cent, and it is on that 1.71 per cent that a reduction will be made. Take silk: France's share in our importations of that product is 8.55 per cent; on paper and products of lumber, 2.15 per cent; chemical products, 4½ per cent; velvets, 9.76 per cent; furs, 8.69 per cent. So, if these reductions are material, honourable gentlemen can see that they can only bear to a very small extent, on our total importation of these products.

The concessions that we have given to France besides that bear on our intermediate tariff, on which we have granted 10 per cent discount on 91 items, and 15 per cent on 3 items. Will you reflect for one moment, honourable gentlemen, that 10 per cent practically means 10 per cent of 12½ per cent, which means that on 91 items we have really made a reduction to France of 1½ per cent of the value of the goods imported. What is that worth? As to the 3 items that remain, we have granted a reduction of 15 per cent on the intermediate rates, which also means 15 per cent of 12½ per cent, or practically 1¾ per cent. There are in this Chamber manufacturers, and I know that if you told them, as an inducement to send their goods to another country that the tariff of that country would be brought down to the extent of from 1½ to 1¾ per cent of the value of the goods to be shipped, they would not be very much interested; they would certainly expect a much larger reduction.

Now, what have we obtained? We have obtained certain advantages, and I am bound to say we have made certain losses. In 1907 we had 152 items which enjoyed the minimum tariff; in 1921 that number was raised to 161 items; in 1922 there was a serious drop, and we had only 144 items. We have made a serious loss. These are matters of importance to the Canadian producer. It is true that France's present minimum is worth more to Canada than the minimum which she had in 1921, and the reason is easy to explain. The spread between the minimum and the maximum in 1921 was about 150 per cent; now it goes up to 400 per cent, and the average is close to that figure. So it is quite apparent that so far as the other nations who compete with us but who do not enjoy the most favoured nation treatment, are concerned, Canada is in an infinitely better position than she was under similar treatment in 1921.

We have lost 17 items of the minimum tariff; but we must bear in mind that of the 144 items now enjoying the minimum tariff, 44 will receive lower rates than they received in 1921. This, in my opinion, is a very valuable concession. Amongst those items are some of very great importance to us. For instance, we have building material, we have furniture, we have machine tools, electrical incandescent lamps, glassware, buckles, aluminium, common wood, apricots and prunes. All these commodities the Americans are now exporting in large quantities to France. We have therefore a minimum tariff for the commodities which I have mentioned, 144 in number, and we have besides percentages on 418 items. Some of these items are to my mind problematical—200 are for chemicals. What Canada can accomplish in the export of chemicals in the future I am absolutely unable to say. There is, however, a new field opened to us, and it is quite possible, for the Canadian has as much initiative as his neighbour to the south, that we may find some means of gaining an important advantage from these concessions.

The important factor, however, is that our main current of trade has not been disturbed; the duty as to the main bulk of our exports in the past has not been disturbed, but as a matter of fact has been improved by the increase which France has made in her maximum tariff. On the other hand, there are a few items on which the import taxation will bear very much more heavily than it did in 1921. I cannot help regretting that tires, for instance, which constituted a very promising item of our trade with France, have been stopped, I am afraid, by an increase of duty of some 50 per cent. Not more than a month ago, in the city of Toronto, I met the manager of a very large tire factory, who told me they had shipped to Bordeaux in fulfilment of one order, no less than 10,000 tires. I am very much afraid that this trade will suffer.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is the same rate as that given to the United States.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: It is. But we badly needed preferential treatment to support our export trade in that commodity, as the Americans produce in much larger quantities.

On the other hand, we have some substantial reductions on goods which the United States exported in large quantities to France. The items are numerous and I think are important. There is a long list of them, some of which I have mentioned. It is quite possible that we shall reap profits from these concessions in the future.

One of the main advantages of the Treaty is the fact that the general tariff of 1910 has been stabilized; it cannot be changed; and therefore in the future we shall be on absolutely the same footing as the United States with regard to our export trade to France. Further, there are minor advantages. We enjoy the most favoured nation clause in regard to exports to the French colonies. In Saint-Pierre and Miquelon we enjoy the minimum tariff, whether it is conceded to other nations or not, on the items appearing in schedule C, which are practically all foodstuffs. The same is true of the West Indies and Guiana.

In conclusion, I think our concessions to France have been substantial. They are not very great individually, but I think they will help her export trade to Canada more especially because the French franc is now only at one-third of its par value, which allows the French people to lay down their goods in Canada at a much better price than they otherwise could. Our main trade routes have not been seriously affected. We have suffered in our secondary trade, but we have had new opportunities opened up to us, and we shall not be at a disadvantage with the United States. In many cases we have a preference over them, and should be able to use it to some profit.

I would like to refer briefly to what has been said in reference to the right which France has exacted to make special treaties with the countries that surround her and countries with which she has been at war. I have always been surprised that France should be expected to deal with Canada, as she has done, when she has been forced to share every advantage conceded to her with a number of nations which were her greatest competitors. When any advantage is offered to France, she immediately sees Switzerland and Japan and Spain coming in, without having shared in the negotiations or made any sacrifices whatever, and benefitting as a result of the negotiations. It is surprising, therefore, that France, knowing that concessions, when given to her, are also passed over to her competitors, should exact for herself some measure of freedom. Let me give a rather striking example of what has happened in the past, and what must necessarily happen in the future. France exports here $889,000 worth of cotton; Switzerland comes in and exports over $1,589,000; Japan comes in to the extent of $220,000. Then, take silk. When we think of France, we think of the country that dominates such industry. France exports to our market $1,883,000 worth of silk; immediately Japan comes in with $4,424,000 worth, and Switzerland with $5,174,000. Take watches and clocks and the like: France exports to us $233,000 worth; Switzerland $865,000 worth. Take velvets and silk fabrics of all kinds: France exports to us $1,366,000 worth; Japan $4,039,000 worth, and Switzerland $4,435,000 worth. France exports braids to us to the extent of $46,000; Switzerland $112,000. Brushes—France exports to us $42,000 worth; Switzerland $114,000 worth. Buttons—France, $11,000; Japan, $107,000. Electrical appliances—France, $1,200; Japan, $18,000. Embroideries—France, $17,000; Switzerland, $100,000. Handkerchiefs—France, $5,000; Switzerland, $225,000; Japan, $77,000 worth.

Is it surprising, honourable gentlemen, in view of past experience, when Canada goes to France and offers concessions which must be divided in such a way that the major part of the benefits go to the natural competitors of France, that she should want a little leeway, a little liberty for the purpose of making some sort of arrangement with neighbouring countries. There is no doubt that we have lost certain advantages that we had before; on the other hand, we have made material gains; our major trade routes have not been interfered with, and we have a good chance of maintaining our present status, when in the past we had no such certainty at all.

Therefore, after much hesitation, and for the reasons I have given, I will vote for the Treaty.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 23, an Act respecting a certain Convention of Commerce between His Majesty and the President of the French Republic.

Hon. Mr. Taylor in the Chair.

Sections 1 to 8 inclusive were agreed to.

The Schedules, the title, and the preamble were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 30, 1923

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DIVORCE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill M5, an Act for the relief of Thomas Benjamin Brown.—Hon. Mr. Bennett.

Bill N5, an Act for the relief of Elva Burnside.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

Bill O5, an Act for the relief of Alfred Thomas Candy.—Hon. Mr. Ratz.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

GROSS RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES—INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired of the Government:

1. What were approximately the gross receipts per mile on the Canadian National Railway lines in each province during the last fiscal year of the Railway.
2. What were approximately the gross expenditures per mile on the Canadian National Railway lines in each province including everything during the last fiscal year of the railways.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Management report that railway accounting methods of the Canadian National System do not make it possible to give the gross receipts and gross expenditure per mile of line within the boundaries of each Province.

CANADA TEMPERANCE BILL

SECOND READING POSTPONED

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 43, an Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act.

He said: The object of this Bill is, and its effect would be, to prohibit the importation of liquor by private individuals and by export houses in provinces having Government control. When I was about to move the second reading of this Bill last week, I was asked if I could not produce a letter of the Attorney-General of the province of British Columbia, Mr. Manson, which was referred to in a return which had been made in the House of Commons. It just happened that I was about to quote from that letter, in order to give reasons, legal, constitutional and administrative, in explanation and support of this measure.

I felt, and still feel, that my sole aim is to establish before this Chamber the necessity for this measure. I confess that I had hardly time, as I explained at that moment, to decide whether the document from which I had taken excerpts was a private or a public one. I was not aware of the return which had been made in the Commons. I did notice that the letter covered more ground than I needed. Outside of the legal argument, and the basis of the reasons operating in favour of this measure, it contained a personal and pressing appeal to the Solicitor General of Canada to give expression to the will of the Legislature of British Columbia in bringing again before Parliament a measure that had been defeated last Session.

I intended leaving aside everything which at first sight smacked of party politics, because if there is a forum where legislation must be approached in a dispassionate manner, it is the Senate of Canada, which was specially created for that purpose. This letter was deemed private by the Department of the Solicitor General, because the writer states that if some Conservatives are disposed to object to this measure for party reasons, the Liberal party should have a single eye to the welfare of the province and to the reputation of the Liberal Government of British Columbia. It is a plea to a friend not to allow his party friends to suffer in reputation through the notorious work of the bootlegger in that province. Mr. Manson seems obsessed with the idea that sinister influences are at work to block this legislation. He wants the Solicitor General to assist against a powerful lobby which will be directed by prominent Federal Liberals, just as it was carried on last year. Surely this would stamp such a letter as a private one. But at the same time it bespeaks, on the face of it, absolute sincerity on the part of its writer.

When Mr. Manson suggests that there was lobbying against this measure last year by prominent Federal Liberals, my conviction is that he could possibly only refer to attorneys, Liberals or Conservatives, having been retained by private interests to defend those interests from their point of view. I saw no sign last year of a lobby of any kind carried on around this Chamber. I do not even remember that I was approached in this Chamber by a Liberal attorney, or an attorney of any view, although it may be that such was the case—that attorneys did come and make representations on behalf of some parties. I remember more especially that in connection with the Saskatchewan part of the Bill attorneys were somewhat active in asking for delay in the bringing into force of that legislation.

Having examined the document itself after I left this Chamber, I found that it was a personal document, a private one, and I suggested that a telegram should be sent to the Attorney-General, Mr. Manson, asking him to allow me to bring this matter before the Senate, and I was handed this telegram from him:

I have no objection to production of all correspondence, including personal correspondence.

This being my authorization to bring this letter before the Senate, I will do so, and a large part of it which I was to have read last week if I had not been stopped, will contain formidable arguments, I believe, in favour of the legislation which I am now promoting before you. It is dated January 16, 1923, and is as follows:

January 16th, 1923.

Dear Mr. Mackenzie:

Re "Canada Temperance Act"

Last Session the Federal Government, through yourself, was good enough to introduce into the House an amendment to the "Canada Temperance Act" largely at the solicitation of the Government of this Province. The amendment, as you will remember, was known as Bill Number 132. The Bill passed the House of Commons unanimously. It passed the first and second readdings in the Senate. In Committee of the Senate an attempt was made to strike out Section 3 of the Bill which contained that part which is vital to this Province and to Quebec. The motion to strike out was defeated by a substantial majority and the Bill was ordered for third reading in the Senate. Unfortunately the third reading did not come up until a day or two before the House prorogued. Then, with twenty-eight Senators absent, the Conservative Senators from this Province instigated a motion to amend on third reading by striking out Section 3. The motion to strike out carried by six votes. I wired the Prime Minister and several others begging that the utmost possible be done to prevent the deletion of Section 3. A conference of a Committee of both Houses was arranged. Senator Barnard and Mr. A. W. Neill from this Province were members of the Committee. As a last resort I suggested a compromise to the Prime Minister. Barnard refused to compromise and the Committee disagreed. Thereupon the Senate, with thirty-three Senators absent, by a majority of five, deleted on third reading Section 3 of the Bill. I recite the foregoing so that your memory may be refreshed as to exactly what took place.

At this Session of the Legislature I moved, seconded by the Honourable the Premier, a resolution praying that the Federal Parliament at its next Session enact legislation providing for the prohibition of the importation of intoxicating liquor into Britsh Columbia except by the Provincial Government in effect for the enactment as an amendment of the "Canada Temperance Act" of Section 3 of Bill 132 of last Session. The motion carried by a vote of thirty to fourteen. Major Burde was the only member absent and he assured me that had he been present he would have voted for the resolution. Every Independent in the House and all the Government Members supported the resolution. Bowser, after considerable trouble and a good deal of insistency I am told, was able to line up his thirteen followers in opposition to the resolution.

I cannot find language strong enough to emphasize the necessity for the legislation asked for. It will be conceded by any sane person that the liquor trafic is like a high explosive, extremely dangerous and difficult to handle, and where it is handled by a Government the very life of the Government, regardless of its political complexion, is jeopardized. In the interests of the public and in the interests of the Government it is desirable, therefore, that the liquor business be handled with the utmost caution and surrounded with every possible safeguard. The reasons for seeking this legislation may be briefly summed up as follows:

(1) The people by plebiscite decided in favour of Government Control as against Prohibition.

(2) The decision in favour of Government Control meant that the people were unwilling that the business should be left longer in private hands where the element of private gain would intervene.

(3) Private importation under the existing Federal law precludes a complete system of Government Control.

(4) Private stocks within the Province inevitably result, despite every endeavour to prevent it, in the re-vending of liquor by other than the Government and the consequent undoing of the Act.

(5) Sale by illicit dealers (private importers) results in:

(a) No guarantee of quality;
(b) Excessive purchases;
(c) Public drunkenness, demoralization of home conditions, and financial ruin to many.

(6) Private importation increases greatly the cost of liquor law enforcement.

(7) The export house manifestly exists for illegal purposes, namely:

(a) Shipping into Prohibition Provinces;
(b) Shipping into the Prohibition United States;
(c) And in actuality sells largely to a string of smaller illicit dealers.

By way of illustration of (c), in July or August last our officers seized the whole stock of two export concerns at Fernie and kept the stocks under seizure for a couple of weeks with the result that the sales in our Government Liquor Store at Fernie increased by 136% and in our Store at Michel, a neighbouring village, by 114%.

(8) The Dominion has already approved Provincial autonomy in the matter of liquor legislation by supplementing Provincial legislation so that liquor cannot be imported into Prohibition Provinces when the Prohibition Provinces so request. The Privy Council has held that prohibitory and restrictive laws with regard to liquor are for the Provinces and carrying out the spirit of these decisions the Dominion has said that they will pass supplementary legislation in order to make the control in Prohibition Provinces full and complete. Logical reasoning dictates that the Dominion's attitude with regard to Prohibition Provinces should be extended to Government Control Provinces because Government Control is simply a modified form of Prohibition and just as much a sumptuary law.

Objections raised against our request:

(1) That the people of the Province had not been consulted—that this was not contemplated by the plebiscite.

Ans: Two questions were submitted to the people:

(a) The question of Prohibition;
(b) The question of Government Control.

The conclusion from the plebiscites is that people have an honest desire to have the business carried on in the safest way possible without depriving the people entirely of the privilege of obtaining liquor. Giving effect to this wish they voted for Government Control. Government Control and private importation are contemporaneously impossible. The people emphatically voted against private importation.

(2) That the tax provisions of our Provincial Act with regard to private importations sanction the legality of it.

Ans: They do nothing of the sort. They were inserted in our legislation under the realization that we could not prohibit private importation and with a view to doing the next best thing, namely, putting all the stumbling blocks possible in the way to discourage private importation.

(3) That if the Government would supply good liquor at a fair price illicit dealing would cease.

Ans: This Government supplies the very best liquor produced. No-one seriously contends otherwise in this Province. The price in this Province compares very favourably with the price in Quebec and it is generally conceded that the prices charged are fair and reasonable. They were reduced very materially on September 1st last, decreased to the extent that the revenue from liquor this year will be $400,000.00 less at least than it was a year ago.

(4) That the proposed legislation will take away one more privilege from the people of British Columbia.

Ans: The people of British Columbia themselves by an overwhelming majority said: "We want the Government to interfere with one of our ancient privileges in the matter of obtaining liquor. We disapprove of the private handling of the business. We believe in Government Control. We surrender our old privileges for the greater good of the people of the Province."

(5) That British Columbia alone asked for the legislation.

I might say that I am perhaps responsible for that statement, which was made because I had not under my hand any correspondence or information furnished me showing that the province of Quebec was in alliance with British Columbia in supporting this demand.

Ans: This is not so. The Prime Minister of Quebec, after very mature consideration with his Colleagues, under date of April 4th, 1922, wrote me as follows:

"Such a provision in the Federal laws would complete our Temperance legislation as it would leave the entire control of the distribution of intoxicating liquors to the Government or Commission through which the Government acts, thus preventing to a great extent the gravest danger to which Government Control is exposed, the illicit sale of liquor. Viewing your suggestion from this standpoint, it meets with our entire approval.

"In what manner the Federal authorities will meet this proposal we are yet unable to state; but it seems to us that if our two provinces were to insist upon the adoption of this suggestion it should be favourably received as, with the proviso that the enactment would operate only upon the request of an interested province, the measure would simply contribute to ensure the adoption of a province's desires in connection with the sale of intoxicating liquors."

Generally, the Conservative party of this province, apart from the vote in the House in December last, when Mr. Bowser gave as his reason for voting against my resolution that he did not trust this Government to handle the liquor business, which is a purely absurd and political reason, is committed to the legislation this Government seeks. I quote from a Conservative pamphlet entitled "Misrule of the Oliver-Farris Government" where in paragraph 14 the following language is used:

It seems as though it were a document issued before the last provincial elections in British Columbia.

"This new Government (Conservative) will also use every effort with the Dominion Government, under whose jurisdiction the matter lies, to see that legislation is passed at Ottawa which will stop the importation of liquor into this Province by private parties so that all liquor purchased and sold in British Columbia will be absolutely under Government control."

This paragraph was inserted in the pamphlet prior to the last Federal election. Possibly the change at Ottawa explains Mr. Bowser's change.

That the export houses are in the habit of clearing liquor for export, taking it beyond the three mile limit and reshipping it into British Columbia without paying the duty to the Federal Government is incontrovertibly true. It is a fact that we have known from the beginning of Government Control, but unfortunately one that we have not been able to successfully deal with. We pick up occasional cargoes of liquor within the three mile limit, but what we get is a mere fraction of what is actually handled in that way. I attach herewith a clipping from the "Vancouver Sun" of January 14th, which is in point.

Bootleggers Find Plan to Beat Duty on Export Liquor

How can bootleggers retail whisky at $5 a bottle? This is a question that has been puzzling many people during the past few months. The government price is only a few cents less and the government runs no risk.

Here is the answer, according to a rumor that has been floating about town recently.

It is said that large quantities of whisky, hundreds of thousands of dollars worth every month, leaves this port for foreign parts, and it is likewise no secret that by some means or other the most of it finds its way into the United States. Liquor passing through Canada in that way pays no duty. It enters in bond and is released from bond without payment only when leaving for a foregn port under customs supervision.

Presumably the Canadian bootlegger is paying the usual duty of $21 a case, but actually, report has it he is not. According to the story that is told there is a cache not far from Vancouver, where many a rum runner puts in during the middle of the night and unloads a sufficient portion of her spirituous cargo to supply B.C. customers in the bootleg trade.

Later this whisky in small quantities is brought back to town and disposed of to the bootleg trade at prices much lower than would be possible if the duty were paid.

Whisky costing $16 or $19 a case, f.o.b. Vancouver, can be sold very profitably at $5 a bottle. Whisky costing $18 a case and paying a duty of $21 a case could not be sold at $5 a bottle.

It is understood the authorities have got wind of this method of smuggling Canadian whisky into Canada but never actually taking it out, and that efforts are being made to discover the hiding place, which is believed to be on an island somewhere this side of the American border.

The letter continues:

A tremendous lobby will be carried on against this legislation. That lobby will be this year, as it was last, in the hands of Liberals, probably in the hands of conspicuous Federal Liberals. Very liberal sums of money will be made available for the debauching of members of both sides of the House. Very substantial contributions will be offered to the campaign funds of all parties.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does my honourable friend adopt this language as an argument—that the members of both Houses are to be debauched? Does my honourable friend adopt that language?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does not my honourable friend remember that he insisted on having this letter?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend is making use of this as an argument.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend said this was an argument why this legislation should pass. I ask him now does he make use of this language.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. This is the part of the letter that I did not intend to read. If my honourable friend will read my remarks of last week he will find that I took—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then my honourable friend should have resented the language before using it in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I did so, and I intend to resent it when I am through. I said the honourable gentleman seemed obsessed with the idea that there were deep plans to carry on a formidable lobbying, namely, through Liberal agencies, and I explained that that did not seem to work last Session, since there was no effect, apparently, and because when the vote came all the members of this Chamber voted in favour of the amendment, so there again the statement is in direct contradiction to that affirmation. I am reading this letter not of my own volition. Last week I was stopped by my right honourable friend, and I was told that this letter had to be made public because it was mentioned in the return. I said that I had only taken from it the legal and constitutional arguments which would support my contention that this legislation should be passed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend is mistaken. A statement was made to the Commons under the signature of the Secretary of State that all the correspondence had been placed upon the Table of that House, and we asked that the correspondence in this case should be placed upon the Table of the Senate. My honourable friend refused to do so, and we insisted that it be done. My honourable friend, before reading a statement of that kind, should certainly have vindicated the Senate against any such statement. I further say that the letter is a falsification of facts almost from beginning to end; it is on a par with the statement just made by the writer.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have given the arguments which I intended to give, taking them from the lips of the Attorney General himself who has asked for this measure. I was limiting my argument to what I thought was necessary to convince the Senate of the necessity of this measure when I was told that, because there was a reference in the report to the Commons to another letter, I should produce this letter.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: And the date of the letter was mentioned.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The date of the letter was mentioned. This is the letter of the 16th of January referred to in the letter and in the report. If my honourable friend thinks I should stop—

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Go ahead.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And retrace my steps when I come to this paragraph, I will do so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is rather late to do it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am at the disposal of my honourable friends.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Go on.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Go on.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: What he says will not kill anybody.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Finish the letter, and we will talk about it afterwards.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: All right. I would draw the attention of this Chamber to the fact that this letter was treated as a private letter by the Department, and that it was simply on the insistent demand of some members of this Chamber that I obtained from Mr. Manson the authorization to read it to this Chamber, because he had nothing to hide.

Hon. Mr. GREEN: May I ask whether the communication is marked confidential or private?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The copy I have, because it is only a copy which was sent to me, as I stated last week, does not bear any such term.

Hon. Mr. POPE: All right, go ahead.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friends should have still in their ears the remark that I did not want to ruffle the feelings of anybody in this Chamber, and should remember that the honourable gentleman from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) said: "Well, we can stand it."

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We can stand it. We will pay our respects to Mr. Manson later.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And I may say that this paragraph is directed against Liberals mainly.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That does not make any difference.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That does not make any difference. I expressed my opinion—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It is an insult to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is not addressed to the Senate, but to Parliament:

> A tremendous lobby will be carried on against this legislation. That lobby will be this year, as it was last, in the hands of Liberals, probably in the hands of conspicuous Federal Liberals. Very liberal sums of money will be made available for the debauching of members of both sides of the House.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is addressed to a member of the House of Commons, and does not seem to be addressed to us.

> Very substantial contributions will be offered to the campaign funds of all parties.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: All parties.

Hon Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Do you promise that?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: How about the Progressives?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: How is it divided?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Shall I continue?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Before my honourable friend continues, I would ask him whether upon reading this communication from Attorney General Manson he repudiated it on behalf of his fellow Senators.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Perhaps my honourable friend will wait until I am through. I have a few notes on this point.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: $10 notes?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will not qualify the value of my own arguments. I think it was a friend talking to a friend:

> You in the Federal field are faced with this question —you depend for your continuance in office to a very considerable extent upon the success of the Party in the Provincial field and the continuance in office of Provincial Liberal Governments. You need a Liberal British Columbia, and you need it very badly. If the Liberal Government in British Columbia is to be maintained in office it must maintain its good name. Its good name is vulnerable at no point as it is in connection with the liquor traffic. It is quite immaterial that the unsatisfactory conditions that prevail as the result of private importation are beyond Provincial control. The people do not look at that. If liquor conditions are unsatisfactory as a result of private importation then the good name of this Government inevitably will suffer and the life of the Govenment will to that extent be jeopardized. From a purely political standpoint then it behooves our Federal friends to put through this legislation. It is extremely important to them I shauld say that this legislation should be passed. This Session will probably see the Conservatives in the House of Commons split upon the question. It has been intimated to me that they will not be unanimous as a result of Mr. Bowser's solicitations. Nothing would suit him better than to see our Provincial Liberal Government wrecked upon the reef of liquor administration. Nevertheless, there are Conservatives in this Province, notably Mr. L. J. Ladner, who will support this legislation and speak in behalf of it.
> I am satisfied that if the Government puts its weight behind this legislation it can carry it in the Commons and in the Senate and make it law. In doing so it will be doing a splendid service for the Provinces of B.C. and Quebec and such other Provinces as adopt Government Control, and politically it will be taking an extremely wise course. The Prime Minister in receiving a Prohibition deputation last Spring committed himself definitely to the policy of supplementing Provincial legislation with regard to liquor by Dominion legslation. Our Legislature has spoken emphatically as to what its wishes are. It remains for the Dominion Parliament to give effect to those wishes, following the pronounced policy of the Prime Minister of Canada in that respect. The legislation should be introduced, if I may say so, very early in the Session. It would be extremely unfortunate if we were again caught as we were last year with a successful filibuster at the close of Parliament. I beg you personally as I beg all our political friends at Ottawa to assist our Province, to assist our Government, to assist me, and to assist themselves in this respect.

Yours faithfully,

A. M. Manson.

P.S.—I attach a copy of my remarks in the House in speaking to the resolution in favour of Federal prohibition of private importation of liquor into the Province.

I have perused the remarks of that gentleman in the legislature of British Columbia. He made an extended statement, more argumentative and more complete than the arguments which are contained in this letter. I am not speaking of the political reasons, but of the legal, constitutional, and social necessity for the bettering of conditions of morality in British Columbia. I quite realize that the reading of some passages from this letter will hurt the feelings of members of this House. I absolve the Attorney General of responsibility for making this document public. As it was treated as a private document on the face of it, I supposed it would be admitted by every member of this Chamber that it is a private and personal letter; but when asked to produce it, coupled with the statement of my honourable friend that there seemed to be something very mysterious about the letter, the Attorney General did what any other man in his place would have done, and said: "I have nothing to hide."

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Was this letter brought down in the other House?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It was not. It was a letter of the 26th, I think, or following date, which was in the return I now have.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: And referred to there?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It referred to a letter sent on the 16th which was not published, and this was what brought members of this Chamber to ask: "What about the letter of the 16th?" It just happened that I had part of it in hand, because I had taken excerpts from the first page, but the day was not on the excerpts.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Might I ask the honourable leader of the Government to whom this letter is addressed?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is addressed to Mr. D. D. McKenzie, late Solicitor General in the Federal Government.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: and the date again?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: 16th January.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I ask my honourable friend in what way he claims this letter should not have been placed upon the Table in the Commons, in view of the fact that the Attorney General of British Columbia adopted it as a public letter in which he says:

With further reference to the above matter and my letter to you of the 16th, I should perhaps add, in case the question is raised, that in the event of the legislation being passed which is desired, the Government of this Province will not deal harshly with existing export liquor concerns. We shall give them time to dispose of their stocks and shall endeavour to be reasonable with them in all respects as the circumstances of the situation will permit.

My honourable friend will notice in this sessional paper—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What was the date of the sessional paper?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The date is not given, but it is No. 136, and the first statement by the Secretary of State is that it is a Return to an Order of the House of Commons, dated March 12, 1923, showing:

A copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Attorney General Honourable Alex. Manson of British Columbia and the Solicitor General in reference to the proposed amendment to the Canada Temperance Act, together with copies of resolution, etc.

Then below that the Attorney General himself refers to this letter of the 16th to Mr. McKenzie, the Solicitor General, and deals with it as if it were a public document of which the Parliament of Canada had been fully apprised. So that my honourable friend must not assume that we were asking for anything unreasonable, in view of the fact that it is treated in this sessional paper as a public document.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not ready to accept the conclusion of my honourable friend. There is a reference in the letter of the Attorney General of British Columbia to his letter of the 16th, but when the documents were asked for I am not ready to say who took the responsibility of stamping it as a private or semi-private communication, or in part a private communication, because I do not know whether it was the late Solicitor General himself or the acting Solicitor General—since none has been appointed—who stamped it so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But who would have the right to mark it?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Is there any stamp on the document itself which marks it as private?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not seen the original: all I have is the copy that was sent to me, and there is nothing stamped on it. That copy came direct from the Attorney General.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Surely the Attorney General is sufficiently wise in his day and generation to mark it "personal and private" if he wanted it to be so treated.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I suppose we have not to pass on the action of the Government in the House of Commons—as to whether it was the duty of the Government to lay this letter before the House of Commons; we have to deal with the honourable leader of the Government in this House.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Precisely; but what I do object to is that my honourable friend, the leader of the Government in this House, should castigate this side of the House because they have asked for a public document referred to in a sessional paper brought down by the Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am castigating nobody; I am resisting an assault. It is my honourable friend who jumped up and asked if I took the responsibility for what was in that letter. Certainly not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You brought the assault down on your own head.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: If my honourable friend would pardon me for a moment, I think I could throw some light on the question whether this was intended to be a confidential document or a public document. I will do it now, or do it later.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would ask my honourable friend to do it later, otherwise it would break the line of my argument. I may say I was shocked at the statement made by the Attorney General that large sums of money would be employed. Of course, that does not mean that it would have any influence; but the simple fact was stated that a lobby would be carried on around Parliament. He did not say the Senate: he said the House, and he was addressing himself to a member of the House; so that it would perhaps concern the House of Commons; but I think I carry the general consensus of opinion in this Chamber when I stand up to defend the honour of both branches of this Parliament.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have not seen any money: we would like to know who got it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The Progressives, I guess.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may add that I have now been a quarter of a century a member of this House; I have not the honour of ever having sat in the House of Commons; I have seen attorneys representing private interests explaining in the lobby their point of view, but suspicion has never been cast upon any member of this Chamber, nor has it ever passed through my mind that any member could be influenced by anything but arguments that appeal to reason. When Mr. Manson comes to the Federal Parliament, if he is ever sent by a constituency in British Columbia, he will not be long in finding that in Ottawa, among the members of both Houses, there is a high standard of honour which would dispel any idea of any such nefarious influence being carried on through the lobbies of this Parliament.

I have seen legislation initiated in the other Chamber, or in this one, passing through the various stages of Parliament but never have I felt that there was the least deviation or modification in that legislation through any shady means. I sometimes thought that legislators were perhaps sometimes influenced by party bias, but that would be the only occasion when I would feel that our reason —and I include myself—would be blurred by anything but the best interest of the country.

This letter is, in some of its passages, apparently intended to be read by a friend. That appeal to a brother Liberal not to allow legislation in British Columbia to fall into disrepute, and the Government with it, is a personal appeal to a personal friend which surely Mr. Manson had not the idea of making public. He was giving all the arguments that he felt were necessary to convince his friend, the Solicitor General, and adding those personal ones in order to make his case as strong as possible, so as to bring the Solicitor General to accept his views and to present again this legislation. That is what I see in the document, and in the extravagant language that we find in some of these paragraphs. We all know that private letters indicate the thought behind the words—the innermost feelings of the writer—and I believe that if it indicates indiscretion in terms, it bespeaks also sincerity and earnestness.

I desire to stress a few points which are at the threshold of this discussion. Is this Bill necessary to abolish export houses and bootlegging in British Columbia, and in other provinces where the same system prevails? My answer is in the affirmative.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: Is this a further statement of the Attorney General?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I am now proceeding to discuss the Bill. Export houses exist by virtue of the general laws of the country, the Federal laws more especially. They come under the right of people to trade, which is Federal jurisdiction. I cite the Customs Act, so that we may have a clear understanding of the status of these export houses. In the Interpretation Act, clause 2, subsection k:

"Warehouse" means any place, whether house, shed, yard, dock, pond or other place in which goods imported may be lodged, kept and secured without payment of duty.

Then, section 27:

Unless the goods are to be warehoused in the manner by this Act provided, the importer shall, at the time of entry pay down, or cause to be so paid, all duties upon all goods entered inwards; and the collector or other proper officer shall, immediately thereupon, grant his warrant for the unlading of such goods, and grant a permit for the conveyance of such goods further into Canada, if so required by the importer.

Then, section 81:

The importer of any goods imported into Canada may, subject to such rules and regulations as are from time to time prescribed by the Governor in Council in that behalf enter the goods for exportation or for warehouse.

Then, section 286, subsection g, says, in reference to authorizing the appointment:

The Governor in Council may from time to time and in the manner hereinafter provided, in addition to the other purposes and matters in this Act mentioned, make regulations for or relating to the following purposes and matters:—(g) Authorizing the appointment of warehouses, and regulating the security which shall be taken from warehouse keepers, the forms and conditions subject to which goods are to be warehoused, and mode of keeping goods in warehouse, and of removing goods therefrom, and the amount of warehouse rent or license fees.

So that it will appear clearly that one has a right to import any goods, liquor included, at a port, pay the duty at that port, and ship inward; or receive the goods in bond, transfer them from one bond warehouse to another, or from one place to another, in bond, pay the duty when he withdraws them from bond, or from the warehouse, or withdraw them for export in bond and pay no duty.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Is that actually done in British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, that is what actually is done in British Columbia. Now, I affirm that no province has the right to prevent the opening and existence of an exporting house. The only thing a province can do is to regulate to such an extent as not to make the business prohibitive. In British Columbia regulations have been so stiffened that while a year ago there were 33 export concerns there are to-day but 9. My authority is the Attorney General of that Province.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the number of export houses has been reduced in the way indicated, notwithstanding the importation clause being on the Statute Book, then why is the number not further reduced? Why are the export houses not reduced to the lowest minimum?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Have we reached the lowest minimum. There comes a moment when a further turn of the screw may be tantamount to prohibition, and there the provincial authorities enact beyond their jurisdiction.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is a matter of legal right on the part of the province.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In support of this affirmation of law I read the statement of the Department of Justice in answer to my query. This is signed by W. Stuart Edwards, Assistant Deputy Minister, and approved by Mr. E. W. Newcombe, his initials as approving being on the letter:

Re Canada Temperance Act. Referring to your letter of the 23rd inst to the Minister of Justice, I am of opinion that in view of the provisions of sections 81, 2 (k), 27 and 286 (g)—

Which are the provisions I read a moment ago of the Customs Act—

—neither the Government of British Columbia nor this Government has power to prohibit the establishment or maintenance of export liquor warehouses. Importers have the right under section 81 to enter the imported goods "for warehouse", subject only to such rules and regulations as are from time to time prescribed by the Governor in Council in that behalf. It is clear that under this statute the Government has power to regulate and control such warehouses, but not to prohibit them. The suggestion that the Government could bring about the abolishment of these warehouses by refusing to license them does not appear to be in point, as I am unable to find any provision of the law providing for the licensing of such warehouses. They have their existence by virtue of the statute and not by license of the Government.

This Bill excepts, in effect, intoxicating liquor from section 81, which I have read, as the result of amending section 81 so far as export houses are concerned. It is the Federal authority which has passed this Customs Act, and section 81 is the law, and this law will stand so long as it is not amended. We could propose an amendment to section 81 of the Customs Act, modifying it or withdrawing it. We are doing it under another form with respect to provinces that have government control.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is it the intention that this legislation shall apply only to provinces in which there is government control?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: That is the full intention of the Act?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is the full intention of the Act.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I suppose my honourable friend would object to it being amended so as to make it clear that it so applies?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would not object. I know such question has arisen in the minds of some persons in Ontario, for instance, and I would have no objection to modifying that in order to make it clear.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Then any province adopting government control would have the same privilege?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Exactly the same privilege. We mention British Columbia, because that province has been moving specially in the matter but it would cover the province of Quebec, which just now is on the same plane.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: And Manitoba, if it carries it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Manitoba, if it carries Government control, and Alberta, if it carries Government control at the next plebiscite. It has been alleged—and I think my honourable friend has just given an echo of that contention—that the province could withhold a license, because the provinces have, by their own statutes, granted a license. I want first to say that that license is to me somewhat of a misnomer, because it is simply a receipt for a tax imposed. In the Liquor Control Act of the province of British Columbia, 1921—which I would advise my honourable friends on both sides of this House to read, because it is a most interesting document, and seems very complete—under the taxation provisions, it is said in section 54:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

Every person engaged in or carrying on the business of importing liquor into the province, or of exporting liquor out of the province, or of keeping liquor for export from the province shall in each year apply to the Board for a separate licence in respect of each warehouse or place of business within the province occupied or used by him for the purposes of his business, for which license he shall pay to the Board, for the use of His Majesty in right of the province, a licence fee of three thousand dollars.

I believe that since 1921 that figure has been increased. I do not know whether anyone could give the present figure.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: $10,000, I think.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That would perhaps explain why a certain number have gone out of business.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does my honourable friend consider the right of import to carry with it the right to export?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, absolutely. If my honourable friend will again read clause 81 of the Customs Act—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am speaking of the Canada Temperance Act—of the right of an individual to import liquor for his own use.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He can do so, I think, outside of clause 81; but clause 81 is a statutory provision.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It has nothing to do with the Canada Temperance Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, but the Canada Temperance Act can vary any of the powers contained in the Customs Act or any other Act if it is so specifically stated.

It has been said that if the province could grant a license, it could refuse a license. I have stated the opinion of the Department of Justice, which is that the province can regulate the trade of an export warehouse, but not to the extent of prohibiting. The argument has been made that, if the province simply assumed an autocratic attitude and said, "We will not grant a license," under the Act as passed they would not collect any taxation. If they want to reach these houses they require some legal enactment. In this instance they reach them by imposing a tax of $3,000, which they have increased to $10,000. If they refused a license to the owner of the export warehouse, it has been said that he could not take out a mandamus against the Attorney General—it is contended that he would need a fiat; he would offer his taxation and carry on his trade until he was attacked; then he would defend himself.

The Attorney General, as appears from his letter of the 16th of January, wanted the Bill to be so framed as to wipe out export houses, but he feared that he would not be given that power completely; and we see in a subsequent letter contained in the return to the House of Commons that he says: "If you will give me power to extinguish the export warehouses I will see that they are allowed a certain time to dispose of their goods and go away." That is absolutely in accord with the present legislation.

Strong objection was taken in another place to power being given the Attorney General in British Columbia or elsewhere to control the export warehouses and to say when and how they should go out of business. The Minister of Justice said, "Suppose we eliminate them ourselves," and once he had made the resolution to wipe out that eyesore in British Columbia, all opposition ceased, and I think I am within the truth when I say that the Bill then passed the other House without any objection—at all events, without a division and apparently unanimously.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: May I ask my honourable friend a question? Does the Bill as presented to the House of Commons represent the wish of the Government of British Columbia as to the legislation which they desired to have passed?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I can only speak of the desire of the legislature as evidenced by the resolution which we have before us in that famous report to the House of Commons.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I know what the resolutions are; but I had the idea, and still have it, if it is not disposed of by a negative, that the form of legislation was practically foreshadowed and placed in manuscript form by the Attorney General of British Columbia himself.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I cannot answer my right honourable friend; but I believe that the Bill as presented in the House of Commons gives full authority to the Attorney General of the province to ask for prohibition of the export warehouses as well as of private importation by Order in Council. So the Bill as introduced last Session seemed to give them authority to reach the end they had in view. I have a statement from the Attorney General on this matter in which he controverts the statement of the Minister of Justice, who said that the Province of British Columbia desired the legislation in the form in which it was introduced. He gives an explanation based I think, upon correspondence with the Attorney General of the Province of Quebec, explaining that he gave way as to the form of the Bill as presented in the House of Commons, but that his original suggestion was the Bill as we now have it before the Senate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend say again how many export warehouses there are in British Columbia? Did I understand him to say nine?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Nine, yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In view of the provisions of the Bill, particularly paragraph c and subsection 3 of section 163, making provision for the carrying on of business by dealers in intoxicating liquors in British Columbia, how many warehouses would be required for the brewers and distillers of Canada who carry on business in that province.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may say that when the Minister of Justice amended clause c, doing away with the export houses, he did not notice that there was another paragraph which mentioned export houses; and I received from Mr. Manson a request to have this clause amended to bring it into harmony with the new section; he even suggested that the word "brewer" should be struck out, because he did not see from his own experience that the brewer needed to have, either for blending of flavouring—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The warehouses will continue. My honourable friend does not contend, I presume, that this Bill will absolutely wipe out all warehouses. Export warehouses have to be maintained, as all the distillers of Canada may be authorized to do business in British Columbia. The Bill does not contemplate in any way interfering with their right to maintain export warehouses.

Hon. Mr DANDURAND: I draw my honourable friend's attention to subsection 2. Who are the parties who will be able to import liquor into Briitsh Columbia, and in virtue of what authority? I will read the clause:

Subject to the provisions of subsection 2 of this sectoin, and notwithstanding the provisions of this or any other Act to the contrary, no person shall import, send, take or transport into any province in which the prohibitions of these subsection are in force any intoxcating liquor.

2. The provisions of subsection 1 of this section shall not apply to:

(a) Intoxicating liquor which has been purchased by or on behalf of, and which is consigned to His Majesty of the Executive Government of the province into which it is being imported, sent, taken or transported; or any board, commission, officer, or other Governmental agency which, by the laws of the province, is vested with the right of selling intoxicating liquors.

That means that the Government and its creation, the Liquor Board, are excepted.

(b) The carriage or transportation of intoxicating liquor into and through a province by means only of a common carrier by water or by railway if, during the time the intoxicating liquor is being so carried or transported, the package or vessel containing the intoxicating liquor is not opened or broken or any of the intoxicating liquor drunk or used therefrom.

This is for the carrier. The carrier under certain conditions may pass through the province and do so legally, but he cannot stop therein or discharge his cargo.

c. The importation of intoxicating liquor into a province by any person duly licensed by the Government of Canada to carry on the business or trade of a distiller or brewer where the intoxicating liquor so imported is imported solely for the purpose of being used for blending with or flavouring the products of the business or trade of a distiller or brewer carried on by him in the province, and while kept by him in the province is kept in a place or warehouse which conforms in all respects to the requirements of the law governing such places or warehouses, and is used solely for blending with or flavouring the products of his said business or trade as a distiller or brewer.

Consequently I say this Act will henceforth leave, in British Columbia and Quebec, which have the same regime, the sole right to import to the Government agency, to the carrier who will be passing through the province, and to brewers and distillers for the purpose of blending and flavouring only. There will be no other warehouses, and the eyesores of which we have heard so much will disappear completely from those provinces.

Hon. Mr. REID: Before the honourable gentleman leaves that point, I would like to ask a question about these export warehouses. As I understand the honourable gentleman's argument, he quoted the Customs Act, and said that, according to that Act and the decision of Mr. Newcombe of the Department of Justice, and also of the Department of Justice itself, when any private individual asks for a license for a customs warehouse they are compelled to grant it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. REID: I have understood the law in reference to bonded warehouses in this way: that where it is necessary to carry on trade, whether it is the liquor trade or any other, in any part of the Dominion of Canada, under the Customs Act, bonded warehouses shall be provided. That has been done for many years; but the key was always in the hands of the Customs Department through its officials.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: A double key.

Hon. Mr. REID: Yes, and the goods were under the control of the Government. In the past, when a warehouse was granted to a private individual, it was still under the lock and key of the Customs Department; but under what was known as the Doherty Act it was agreed and understood that whenever any province wished to pass a law to promote prohibition, the Dominion Government would assist it. With reference to the bonded warehouses, while no law was passed, when anyone applied to the Customs Department for a license for a bonded warehouse in connection with his business, the reply from the Dominion Government was that it would not be granted unless it had the endorsation of the Provincial Government or of the liquor commission that was acting under the authority of that Government. The result was that in every province that I know of every license for a bonded warehouse was cancelled, and licenses were only renewed when the applicants produced the authority of the local Government. I understood that to-day there is not a private bonded warehouse in any province of the Dominion of Canada except in British Columbia. I remeber, when I was administering the Customs Department, we had only a few bonded warehouses in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I thought my honuorable friend wanted to put to me a question.

Hon. Mr. REID: What I want to know is whether any of the bonded warehouses in British Columbia had the authorization of the provincial Government, and whether the provinces cannot now, under the instructions that have been sent out, cancel the license of every bonded warehouse and leave it in the hands of the Dominion Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may tell my honourable friend that I have not the data as to the number of bonded warehouses in existence just now in British Columbia, and how many have been owned with the consent of the province, and how many without. My honourable friend says that in virtue of an Order in Council no license would be granted for a bonded warehouse from Ottawa except with the consent of the province; but I draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that an export house need not be a warehouse under the Customs Act. It will have a bond if it needs one, and its goods will be there without the warehouse, ready for export. An export house is only needed when one wants to delay paying duty; then he asks for a bond. If he pays the duty as the goods come into port he is free to ship those goods wherever he pleases, under section 81; so that if he enters them for export until he decides to do so he has the right to retain them and he pays no duty.

Hon. Mr. REID: But they are under the lock and key of the Dominion Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, they would be.

Hon. Mr. REID: The goods are shipped to the warehouse in British Columbia, and they are still under the control of the Dominion Government, and cannot go out until the duties are paid.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I would like to understand how warehouses were abolished in Saskatchewan. I understand there is some legislation by which the Saskatchewan Government found it possible to do away entirely with warehouses, which are the things I object to.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Last Session we passed special legislation to enable the province of Saskatchewan to rid itself of liquor that was in that province, mostly not in bond. It had been there before the Prohibition Act came into force, it was there legally and could be exported legally, but the owners were waiting their chance: they could not export except by violating the law of Manitoba or of Alberta or of the United States, and the province asked for legislation to prevent exportation, so that once they were prevented from exporting their raison d'être was at an end.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Why cannot we pass legislation to prevent exportation from British Columbia? Many members object to legislation preventing importation for private use, but why cannot we legislate to produce the same result there as in Saskatchewan?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend can do that if he will under this Act, by an amendment. The exception to the prohibition to import in British Columbia is in favour of the Government, the public carrier, the distiller, and the brewer; these are the four parties referred to in the Act. My honourable friend can add the words "private individuals" if he wants to. They will have the right to import if we except them from the prohibition. Then the export houses alone will disappear—that is, they will not be there.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We will all agree on that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not claim I have enough power to influence my honourable friend; but perhaps, when the argument is over, he will agree to go one step further and do what the provinces are asking for, namely, give complete control to the Government in the distribution of liquor.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Not distribution; importation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, importation and distribution.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is this Bill?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is this Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend say whether there are any export houses in Quebec outside of those controlled by the Provincial Government?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No; the Commission has every thing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I cannot answer that, but I will get the information.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think there are. Would my honourable friend at the same time point out the distinction between the law of Quebec and that of British Columbia whereby the latter cannot wipe out export warehouses while Quebec, where the right of importation obtains, has wiped them out.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. I may inform my honourable friend that the province of Quebec has passed an Act which prohibits the transportation of liquor in the province.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is there anything to prevent the province of British Columbia from doing similarly?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, there is—the aggressiveness of the members of the Bar from British Columbia, so I am told.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Which bar?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Apparently Attorney-General Manson has control of the Provincial Legislature.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He has control of the Provincial Legislature by the will of the people.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: Does the honourable gentleman suggest that the Quebec Liquor Transportation Act is intra vires of the province?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would not like to express an opinion on that Act; I would rather leave the courts to pass upon its value.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: But if my honourable friend is of opinion that it is ultra vires, that is no reason for closing the Customs warehouses in the province of Quebec. A moment ago he gave it as a reason, but if the Act is bad it is a very poor foundation on which to close those excise warehouses.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But very likely the province of Quebec would feel far more secure if this Act passed and the export houses were prevented from operating in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They have not shown very much interest in it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And if it were made clear by this Act that private individuals have no right to import. Of course, the province of Quebec has an Act. The Attorney-General of British Columbia has his own views on the division of powers between Ottawa and the provinces, and he does not feel that he has the right to entangle the province in costly law suits, and he puts this question to us: "You want me to utilize doubtful powers that I may not have; why not utilize your own that are sure?" Here we are; it is up to us; we have the power, the undoubted power, and now we are asking ourselves if British Columbia could not do as the province of Quebec has done, and utilize the powers that are very questionable, constitutionally speaking.

Now, we have, in many provinces, absolute prohibition. There is no question that a respectable minority in number and in quality is smarting under the law of the majority, yet must accept that law; and the federal power has come in and sanctioned the rule of the majority. Why should not private importers be happy with the advantage of living in a province like British Columbia or Quebec, where users of alcoholic liquors are able to have them at hand, and relinquish the right to buy directly outside or in Europe? It has been alleged that there is a state of things in British Columbia which makes it difficult for the private individual to buy. He is taxed to an amount equal to the profits that the Commission would make, and perhaps more.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Ten per cent more.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In order to discourage him from purchasing liquor outside.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would it not be possible if he had the corresponding advantage, which is to his mind greater than the extra tax he has to pay, of getting a much better quality of liquor, when he imported it himself from the old country than by buying it from the Provincial Government? I am not a user of liquor myself, but I understand it is notorious in the provinces of Quebec and British Columbia that the quality of liquor handled is not extra.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: In Quebec you can import any brand, any kind, anything you like, but you must have it consigned to the Liquor Commission, and they take a big rake-off before you get it.

Hon. Mr. REID: That is what you want to do now with this.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Any private individual in the province of Quebec can apply to the Liquor Commission for the goods he desires, and they will be procured for him. But now, on the written authority of the Attorney General of British Columbia—

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: That is no good.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: For the time being it is—I am informed that some regulation permits connoisseurs of good wines and liquors to get the quality they desire. It is under the same conditions which apply to the general public as to payment. I will lay on the Table of the House a statement to that effect from the Attorney General.

In the course of my remarks I stated that the Attorney General of British Columbia was suggesting that if this Bill reached the Committee it would possibly be advantageous for the good administration of the liquor business in British Columbia that the word "brewer" should be deleted from the clause. I was asked also to strike out subsection 3, after the word "accused" in the fifth line, and substitute the following. I mention this because my right honourable friend has given notice of an amendment, and he may judge whether this suggested amendment would be preferable to his own:

And where the person accused is a person duly licensed by the Government of Canada to carry on the business or trade of a distiller the burden shall also be on him of proving that all intoxicating liquor imported by him is imported solely for the purpose of being used for blending with or flavouring the products of the business or trade of a distiller carried on by him in the Province and that all intoxicating liquor imported and kept by him in the Province is kept in a place or warehouse which conforms in all respects to the requirements of the law governing such places or warehouses and that all intoxicating liquor imported by him is used solely for blending with or flavouring the products of his said business or trade.

This eliminates the reference to export houses. The reason is obvious, because if the Bill passes the importation will be confined to the Crown, the liquor in transit to the distiller and brewer—if we leave the word "brewer"—for blending and flavouring purposes.

Now I desire to cite one opinion clipped from the American press, as to the effect of these export houses in British Columbia. This appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday, I think:

The Portland Oregonian, one of the most reputable American papers on the Pacific coast, in a leading editorial headed "Canada Fosters Lawlessness," has this to say: "Canada maintains at Vancouver a thriving and extensive business in smuggling alcoholic liquors into the United States in flat violation of the law of this country, and the Dominion government profits by it and is knowingly a party to it. The principal part of the business of the large export houses in Vancouver is done with men who smuggle liquor into the United States. It is done contrary to Canadian law and for the purpose of breaking American law. That government is the first link in the chain of which the last link is the bootleggers who retail liquor among the rich tipplers of Portland. This is the conduct of a bad neighbour. Canada prides herself on the strict enforcement of her laws, on severe punishment of criminals, on the reign of British justice. Its people at times make unfavourable comparisons with conditions in that respect on this side of the line. When it maintains a headquarters for violation of American law by Canadians and Americans who conspire together its boasts and taunts react against it. Evil example is infectious. A government which fosters infraction of its nieghbour's law breaks down respect for its own."

I think we in this Chamber are all agreed that it is important that those export houses that thrive upon illegal business in British Columbia should be wiped out. This Bill does that, and I am sure that to that extent it will meet with the unanimous approval of this Chamber. This Bill goes one step further. It prevents the private individual from purchasing his liquor from any other party or source than the provincial Liquor Commission; and I think that all those who are interested in seeing good order maintained in the Province, should favour the request which is made in this legislation for placing the control and monopoly in the hands of the provincial Board, which is entrusted with the operation of the provincial Act. If you allow any private individual to import apparently for his own use you allow him to buy in far larger quantity than he would buy at home. He may be absolutely honest in his desire to provide his family and his friends who visit him with the liquor that he prefers, but if you give that right to the citizens at large, you will necessarily have quite a large number of citizens buying with other designs, such as money making, and you open the door to a great deal of illegal selling through bootleggers.

The province of British Columbia, the province of Quebec, and nearly all the Attorneys General whose telegrams I have under my hand, favour this legislation. British Columbia and the province of Quebec have not gone the full extent of prohibiting liquor; they have said, "We will control it." That is their right, and I am under the impression that a large majority in this Chamber favour that system, and prefer it to complete prohibition. If a majority of this Chamber favours that system, why not give it a fair chance of being administered in an honest way? I am told: "But you limit the liberty of the subject." We limit it very little indeed when this legislation is compared to complete prohibition. A majority of one may force a population of 2,000,000 of people to accept a prohibitory law and go without their wine or beer or Scotch, if it is their habit occasionally to have a glass of liquor. This is considered to be a hardship in British Columbia and in the province of Quebec. Those provinces felt that there should be Government control and when the province of British Columbia voted by a majority of about 35,000 in favour of Government control—

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: With the right of purchase by the private individual.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Was that question put to the people?

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: It was absolutely understood.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I defy my honourable friend—I know nothing about it, but I will take that risk—to cite a newspaper that said so during the campaign. I have seen the argument—and it was most explicitly made in form and matter—that when the elector of British Columbia was asked, "Do you favour government control, or prohibition?" instead of voting for prohibition, he said "Government control," but knew that he was retaining the right to buy for himself outside of the province. I say that this is an afterthought, a special pleading by a very good lawyer, for only a constitutional lawyer or a lawyer having some knowledge of the general law of this country could ever have that in his mind.

Hon. Mr. REID: Why was not the vote taken for straight prohibition?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will surely concede the fact that Government control meant Government control as defined by the Statute; and that gave the right of private importation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I see by the return which we all have in our hands that the question put was: "Which do you prefer? (1) the present Prohibition Act, or (2) an Act to provide for Government control and sale in sealed packages of spirituous and malt liquors?" By a majority of 30,000 odd they preferred the second alternative. They gave their preference not to the Prohibition Act, which deprived them of the right to buy.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: No, no; the right to import was specially preserved in the Prohibition Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: At all events, the electors were facing these two alternatives, whatever they mean; and I recognize that if there was a Prohibition Act, it was the Act which was before them. It was a question of whether they favoured "the present Prohibition Act," or "an Act to provide for Government control and sale in sealed packages of spirituous and malt liquors." They declared their option by a very large majority in favour of Government control. Why did they do that? They did that because they wanted to eliminate private sale, because they wanted the Government to have in its hands the control and sale of liquor.

The Act was passed, and I draw attention to the framing of it. It struck me as a clear, well-prepared piece of legislation. If the people, when they went to the poll and voted for Government control, saying, "it will be Government control in part," I can imagine the farmer on his farm and the man on the street saying: "Oh well, I can continue to write to Bordeaux and get my red wine, or to write to Dewar & Sons or some other house in Glasgow or Edinburgh and get my Scotch direct."

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: That is what they did, though.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why not?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Because they had never done it before.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Oh, yes. I can give my honourable friend the reason for this: because the Government of British Columbia wants to make money out of it. That is the reason why.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friend should come back to the point when the electors were being called to the poll. They were free men, and as between prohibition, which they had and apparently disliked, and Government control, they favoured Government control. When they voted for Government control I say they wanted it as Government control.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend say they voted against their own right to import liquor as they had it under the statute?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, I say that they voted against their right to purchase liquor from any other source than the Government or under Government control.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: If the honourable gentleman will permit me, as an elector of British Columbia, I should like to say that he is absolutely wrong—that the British Columbia electors voted as between sale by doctors' prescriptions, a system which was so abused that there were queues half a block long in front of the dispensaries, and it had become a public scandal; and we in British Columbia said: "Let us substitute sale by Government vendor stores in place of this humbug of prescriptions." I would like to point out to my honourable friend that so clearly was this recognized by the legislature that when they passed along the request to Parliament pursuant to the vote on this question, they put this in:

> That the Federal Parliament be requested at its next sittings to enact legislation providing for the importation of intoxicating liquor into British Columbia for use therein—

—without saying anything about distributing the trade of British Columbia with the countries overseas with which we have trade at present.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman does not make his point. "For use therein" they were leaving aside the export houses because they thought they could not attack the export houses. They asked that importation "for use therein" should be prohibited; and if importation "for use therein" was prohibited, except through the Government, then the private importer was being wiped out. I think if my honourable friend reads that document again he will find that it covers private importation.

Now, we have the Legislature voting recently by a large majority in favour of the total prohibition of the importation or sale of liquor except by the Government. So it seems to me logical that the provinces that have obtained provincial control through the mandate should ask that that Government control should be effective. Surely this Chamber, in view of the danger of those private importers enjoying the right of importing as much as they please, with the possible advantage of distributing it overnight to bootleggers, will hesitate to refuse the request of that Legislature, when by a two-thirds vote it asks that power be given to it. Where is the argument against it? We have voted complete prohibition and have imposed it upon large minorities in other provinces. Did we stop and say: "Those people have rights; we are restricting the liberty of the subject?" No; we said: "This is the will of the province."

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: My honourable friend is mistaken. What we said was: "We will let you vote on this question."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: British Columbia voted on this question and gave a majority of 35,000 in favour of Government control. That Government said: "We will establish and maintain Government control, and we will see that it is effectively maintained if we have Government control; but we have not Government control if anyone can go and buy elsewhere."

I may say that private importation is looked upon with considerable disfavour by the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. They know that these private warehouses are feeders of bootleggers and that liquor comes across the line.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not agree with you.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Why should not that power be given?

Hon. Mr. POPE: Where do the bootleggers in the Province of Quebec get their stuff to export to the United States? They buy it from your Commission.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend told us the other day that moonshining was being carried on in quite a number of farms in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. POPE: That is true. That is for consumption in Quebec—not for export. They export real liquor from your Commission.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman from Ottawa has an amendment to propose. I have not examined it thoroughly, but there may be enough virtue in it to protect the United States.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I should like to ask my honourable friend a question. He said he had telegrams from the Governments of other provinces giving reasons why they favoured the legislation that he is proposing. I think it would be interesting to spread those on the record.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will give those telegrams to my honourable friend. My friend to my right (Hon. Mr. Watson) hands me a telegram addressed to him from R. W. Craig, Attorney-General of Manitoba:

Manitoba Government favours passage of Bill 43 amending Canada Temperance Act as precautionary measure and would respectfully and earnestly request your support.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: How does it affect Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: They are going to vote on it in a few days.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: All they have to do is to put the question in the referendum that they are going to take in the coming month.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have a telegram from the Deputy Attorney-General of Quebec:

Your letter addressed to Prime Minister concerning Canada Temperance Act received. Attorney-General adheres to this Bill. He has already expressed his opinion to the Minister of Justice, whom you can see in connection with it.

Here is a telegram from the Attorney-General of Manitoba addressed to the solicitor for the Province of British Columbia:

You are authorized to say Manitoba Government favours passage of Bill forty-three. R. W. Craig, Attorney-General.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: May I ask who is the solicitor for British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Messrs. Smith and Johnson, Barristers, Ottawa.

Mr. Cross, Attorney-General of Saskatchewan, says:

Have received wire from Attorney-General of British Columbia relating amendment Canada Temperance Act prohibiting export warehouses stop. You may state to Committee that Saskatchewan Government supports British Columbia point of view. J. A. Cross, Attorney-General.

I have a telegram from Mr. Raney, the Attorney-General of Ontario:

Understand you are acting as agent for British Columbia in matter of Bill now before Senate for prohibition of private importation of liquor into Government controlled provinces. This Bill will assist law enforcement not only in Government controlled provinces but in provinces having prohibitory legislation. For these reasons it has approval of Government of Ontario. W. E. Raney, Attorney-General.

I have also a telegram from the Attorney-General of Nova Scotia:

Have following from Byrne, Attorney-General New Brunswick. "Authorized by Premier Veniot to say that Government New Brunswick endorse principle non-importation liquor as advocated by British Columbia and Quebec." A. M. Manson. Export house question not an acute problem in this province. Therefore would not require any Federal Legislation to deal with a local situation. If proposed amendment will have tendency to assist better enforcement of our provincial temperance legislation emphatically endorse same. W. J. Ohearn, Attorney-General for Nova Scotia.

I may say also that the Attorney-General of Alberta has expressed his opinion in favour of the Bill. I had the statement under my hand, but I cannot find it at the moment. I think honourable gentlemen will take my word for it.

With these few remarks, I will express my thanks to my honourable friends for their patience and courtesy in listening to the statement which I have made. I confess that when it is read in Hansard it will be seen that I had quite a number of—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Interruptions.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. collaborateurs.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Helpers.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Therefore I move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Watson, that the Bill be now read the second time.

Hon. H. C. BARNARD: Honourable gentlemen, I must congratulate the leader of the Government for the good-natured way in which he has dealt with this matter this afternoon, and also upon the impassioned eloquence with which he advocated a cause with which I know he is not in sympathy.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Order. You cannot impute motives.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may tell my honourable friend that he is absolutely mistaken. I feel that this is very good legislation.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: I of course accept the statement of the honourable gentleman. I am sorry that he did not see fit, on the occasion when this Bill was first presented for second reading, to complete the reading of the letter of the Attorney-General of British Columbia, because I would have liked to have taken up the arguments and statements in detail. However, I hope to be able to deal with them in any event, although I may not be able to do so in the order in which they appear in the letter. In regard to that letter I just want to say a word. The honourable gentleman was good enough, in the kindness of his heart, and I suppose possibly out of consideration for the feelings of a political ally, to give him absolution for making public a statement in the letter which was undoubtedly a serious reflection upon the honour of this body.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But he said he had no contrition: how can you give him absolution?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The contrition will come afterwards.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: Of course, my honourable friend is better informed on questions of absolution than I am; I have to get along in the world without it. But the honourable gentleman need not have worried about having to make public the contents of this letter, because the gentleman who wrote the letter had already taken a somewhat contemptible method of making public the same statement. I am informed—and I hesitated to believe it until I heard the letter to-day —that there was a copy of this letter in the office of the Citizen in Ottawa. Since I have heard the letter read, I am absolutely convinced of it, and I think when I have read a few words of an article that appeared in that paper on the 20th of April last, honourable gentlemen of this House will agree with me that the Attorney General of British Columbia sent this letter down here with the idea that the charges and insinuations, miserable and contemptible as they are, should be made public in the press of the city of Ottawa. This article reads as follows, in part:

It is well known that the exporting liquor concerns are doing a huge business and making, it has been estimated a profit of over a million dollars a year—probably two million. They are bringing every possible influence to bear to prevent the passing of House of Commons Bill No. 43. The opinion has been expressed, in a memorandum to the Dominion solicitor general, by the man who is best qualified to advise on the situation in British Columbia, that the liquor interests will use money in an extremely liberal fashion to prevent the passing of the bill which is intended to close the private importing and exporting warehouses.

There is a repetition of the statement made in the letter of the Attorney General to the Solicitor General of Canada. It goes on:

The purveyors to bootlegging and rum-running succeeded in getting an exemption last session. A last-minute party move of Conservative senators served the purposes of the law-breaking element in British Columbia, after the House of Commons had legislated to put them out of business. The people of Canada will want to know whether Conservative and Liberal party workers—

He joins the two, the same as the Attorney General did——in the liquor business, with money to spend in influencing legislation, can go on undermining the credit of Canada through the instrumentality of party opportunism in the Senate. Public opinion is behind the request of the government of British Columbia, endorsed as it is by all parties in the province, to be allowed to suppress the private liquor warehouses.

So I do not think my honourable friend need worry about making public that letter, because it has already been done for him. I am very glad the letter has been read today, because it will give honourable gentlemen of this House an idea of the kind of man the Attorney General of British Columbia is.

Now, dealing with the Bill, this Act as passed by the House of Commons is very different from what it was when introduced. As it stands now, the export warehouses are cut out. I am extremely doubtful as to how far that amendment is going to be acceptable to the Attorney General of British Columbia, because I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that his object in introducing this legislation, was not so much prohibition of the importation by private bodies as it was to get absolute control of the export warehouses.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask my honourable friend his opinion of the constitutional provisions as regards exporting? Has he considered that?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: No, I have not given that any great amount of consideration. The Bill as introduced had aparently a two-fold object—to prohibit importation for private use, and to continue the present system of export warehouses subject to the control of the local government.

Dealing first with the question of private importation, so far as I am concerned the objections I have to the Bill are precisely the same as I had last year. I affirm unhesitatingly—and I was in British Columbia at the time—that the leader of the Government is absolutely in error when he states that the people of that province were under the impression that they were interfering with the right of importation when that plebescite was taken. I have had no occasion to change my mind since the action of the Senate last year; and when he says that those people, in voting for Government control, intended thereby to give up the right of private importation, he is mistaken. I do not believe that he would find any number of people in British Columbia who would agree with the Attorney General of that province.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: May I ask my honourable friend a question just there? On page 3 of that return, where the two questions are set forth: "Which do you prefer, the present prohibition Act, or"—is that the Prohibition Act which affirmed the right of importation by private parties?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think that appears in the question. My honourable friend did not read the whole of it. The whole question reads—

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I had no necessity for reading the whole question, because I wished to ascertain the fact as to the first question. I wanted to know whether the first question referred to a prohibition law which affirmed the right of private importation. My honourable friend says it did.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: That is absolutely correct.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: That is all I was after. My honourable friend may be after something else.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There can be no bother about it, because it was part of the question. It is stronger than my honourable friend puts it.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I was trying to understand one half of the question; that is as much as I can do at once.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: In the new Act, which was passed as a result of the plebiscite, the right of importation was still recognized, and the province put a duty upon the liquor imported by private individuals; but the right was still there, and it was never in the contemplation of the voters, when they voted on that question, that that right—which was a right by law existing at that time—was to be interfered with.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: As a question of fact, has it or has it not been interfered with?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: This legislation will interfere with it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Has the right of importation for private use since been interfered with, or has it been recognized by the province?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: It is recognized by the province, because the province says "if you do not import you shall pay duty." That is the provision in the new Act—the one passed subsequent to the plebescite.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But the right would exist anyway, under Dominion legislation?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: No, the provincial courts say not. I disagree with them, but the matter has never gone beyond the provincial courts. They put a special tax on it, and the Court of Appeal, in a test case that was made, concerning a case of Canadian-made rye whiskey, held that that was a valid tax.

Now, if a province decided in favour of prohibition, this Parliament would not take the right of private importation away without a plebiscite. In the event of the people of a province voting that they want the use of liquor for beverage purposes, surely it has no right to say: "We will take away the right of private importation without giving you a chance to say whether you want it or not." Therefore I say that if this Act is to become law at all, there should be a provision in it that it shall only become operative in any province which adopts it by a plebiscite.

Another reason why this Act is objectionable is that any monopoly in the hands of a Government or anyone else is an undesirable proposition. What happened after the Senate's action of last year? The first thing that happened was that, although we were met with a fusilade from the Provincial Government of—well, severe criticism, I will put it that way—for our action, one of our defences being that their prices were too high, one of the first things they did was to reduce prices. Of course, they said they were going to do it anyway, but we did not take much stock in that. Let me give you an idea of the results of monopoly. We were paying for Walker's Club whiskey $6 for the imperial quart, which was obtainable in Ontario for $4.60. We paid for an Imperial quart of Old Tom Gin $6.37½ as against $4.25 in Ontario. Dewar's Special Liqueur Whiskey cost us $7.50 as against $5.60 in Ontario.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Does that include the provincial tax?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: There is no provincial tax. Some more of the prices we were paying were: Sandy Macdonald, Imperial quart, $7.50 in British Columbia as against $5.40 in Ontario. Hennessey's Three Star brandy, $8.25 in British Columbia as against $5.75 in Ontario. Martell's Three Star, Imperial quart, $8.25 in British Columbia as against $5.75 in Ontario. Those are some of the prices we were met with under Government monopoly in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is prohibition by indirection.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I suppose you were drinking less.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: And feeling better.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: The next thing that happened was this. The Attorney General had made no attempt so far to regulate any of his export warehouses. What did he do? On the 27th of July, after we got home, following the Senate action of last year, he established for the first time a series of regulations regarding those export warehouses, making them take stock once a month and make returns to him showing exactly where their goods had gone, so that he could keep check of them. The point of that is this, that his first duty was, not to come to this Parliament and further prohibit the people of British Columbia from doing something that they had a legal right, and, as the majority thought, a conscientious right, to do. Instead of coming down here and asking for prohibition, his first duty was to see what he could do by regulations at home, and by his own prices. He did not do it; he came down here and told a hard-luck story about the way he had been treated by the Senate, and then went home to make these regulations, and he told the legislature of British Columbia that the result of those very regulations—which he did not pass till long after the Senate action of last year—had resulted in reducing the illegal business of the export warehouses by 75 per cent.

With regard to those export warehouses, I am very much surprised to find the opinion which has been given to the honourable gentleman by the Department of Justice, for the simple reason that I have a directly contrary answer from some department of the Government in regard to the same question.

In order to understand this export warehouse business, I want to explain that there are a certain number of export warehouses in what the Attorney General calls Eastern British Columbia, that is to say, Fernie, Cranbrook, Grand Forks and Greenwood, the first two being in the Crow's Nest Pass, and the others in the Boundary Creek country, just north of the American boundary. By no possibility can any of those warehouses do a legitimate trade. The only market they have for their goods is the United States or the province of Alberta or Saskatchewan. Every one of those warehouses has been kept up with the consent of the Attorney General of British Columbia. The reason I say they cannot do any export business is that the local freight rate from any one of those points to the coast is higher than the total freight rate from Montreal to Vancouver; so that it is an absurdity for them to suggest or say that it would be possible for those warehouses to do an export business, which can only be done through the seaports Victoria and Vancouver, to any country other than the United States. Therefore those warehouses were in Eastern British Columbia for bootlegging purposes and nothing else, and they were there established by the consent of the Attorney General of British Columbia, either past or present, and they have been maintained with the consent of the present Attorney General ever since he occupied that office.

When you hear the voice of the Attorney General of British Columbia when he addresses the provincial legislature on this question, you would think his heart was bleeding for the United States and for the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan on account of the bootlegging business in those provinces and in that country. He says:

I take exception to the export house too. What is the export warehouse? It is a concern supposedly carrying on the business of exporting liquor to places without the province of British Columbia. What are those places? For the most part they are our sister prohibition provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and our sister prohibition country, the United States.

The export warehouse carries on trade and commerce and as such its business cannot be interfered with by this province. We licence such concerns, and we attempt to regulate them, and recently we have been quite successful in the latter endeavour, but we have absolutely no power to refuse them a licence. Any refusal on our part, I am satisfied, will be met with an instant application to the court for a mandamus to compel us to licence.

There has been a wide misapprehension in this regard. This Government has no control in the matter of licencing export liquor warehouses. I have pointed out that a very great portion of their business, for that matter I suppose 90 per cent of their nominal business is with prohibition provinces and prohibition States.

But I have also pointed out that their actual business is an illicit business right within our own province, as is well illustrated by what happened at Fernie. Because of the illicit business they carry on, which brings our Act into serious jeopardy, and because we do not care to have this province made the seat of illicit shipment of liquor into friendly provinces and States about us, I am of the opinion, and I think every honourable member in this house will agree with me, that the export liquor warehouse must go.

He practically makes his whole effort on the question of the export liquor warehouse, and very lightly touches on the question of prohibition of private importation.

With regard to the statement that those warehouses have been established with his consent, in an answer to a question found in the Hansard of the House of Commons, in column 1311, find this—that there was a licensed warehouse, Customs bonded warehouse, granted for Fernie, to Consolidated Exporters Corporation on the 22nd January, 1923. Mr. Manson's appointment was the 28th January, 1922; so that was one of his. The provincial authority giving consent was the Attorney General. Another was granted for Fernie for the 26th June, 1922, with the consent of the Attorney General. Another was granted for Cranbrook on the 11th May, 1922, by the Attorney General. Another was granted for the city of Grand Forks on the 7th of February, 1923, by the Attorney General. In addition to these, after he had asked this Government for this legislation, he gave his consent in the month of March this year, to the granting of another for the city of Greenwood, in the Kettle Valley country. The city of Greenwood and the city of Grand Forks, two places where he has granted licensed warehouses, are strategic points for the bootleggers. They are situated on the Kettle Valley Railway, which runs along the International boundary and crosses it half a dozen times within a very few miles. You can imagine what opportunities for export warehouses so situated would have.

An Hon. SENATOR: What is the population of Greenwood?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: The population of Greenwood is about 350 people, and that of Grand Forks is about 1,500; and they are situated within 10 miles of each other. There is not the slightest possibility of either of these warehouses doing anything but a bootlegging business. I made the statement a moment ago that these warehouses were there with his consent.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Could they be placed there without the Attorney General's consent?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: No. At page 317 of the Senate Hansard I find the following questions and answers:

1. Is there any regulation requiring or does the policy of the Government require the consent of Provincial authorities before granting licenses for bonded warehouses or excise warehouses for the storing of intoxicating liquors in Provinces where the sale of liquor by private individulas is prohibited?

2. What is the date of such regulation or inception of such policy?

3. Is there any Order in Council dealing with the question, if so, what is the date thereof?

4. Is the Government compellable by mandamus or other process of law to issue such licenses in such Provinces without the consent of Provincial authorities?

5. Is the Provincial authority having jurisdiction in the premises compellable by mandamus or other process of law to give such consent or is the giving of such consent wholly discretionary with the Provincial authorities?

1. The policy of the Government requires unconditional consent of Provincial authorities before granting a Customs warehouse for storage of intoxicating liquors in bond or before granting a license for an Excise bonded warehouse for storage of intoxicating liquors, in all Provinces where the sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited under Provincial law.

2. As to Customs—31st December, 1916. As to Excise—March, 1918.

3. No.

4. No.

5. No information. Matter is one to be dealt with by Provincial authorities.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Are exporting warehouses the same as the warehouses referred to in those sections as excise and storage warehouses?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: There are two kinds of warehouses. The export warehouse is a customs warehouse dealing only with imported goods held in bond; the excise warehouse is for the storage of Canadian made goods, but the business is done by the Customs. The excise warehouses are only about four in number, and are held by the Canadian Pacific Ocean Steamship Service and the provincial Government. They do not amount to anything in connection with this discussion.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Are they the same? Do they cover what you refer to as exporting warehouses?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: An excise warehouse is for the storage of Canadian made goods which have to pay an excise tax.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Are they the same?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: It is a bonded Customs warehouse which is there for this purpose.

Right Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER: It does for both purposes.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: Then the goods arrive in the country they are put into a bonded warehouse, and if they are exported legitimately out of the country there is no duty paid at all; on the other hand, if they are sold within the country, as soon as they are released from the warehouse duty is payable.

Another very important question was put in the House of Commons on the 18th of April:

1. How many licenses for bonded warehouses for storage of intoxicating liquors in bond are in force in the province of British Columbia?

The answer was:

There are at the present in the province of British Columbia 25 Customs warehouses for storage of intoxicating liquor in bond, nine of which, however, are inactive.

There are three licenses for excise bonded liquor warehouses in force at present.

That information does not tally with that given to my honourable friend by the Attorney General.

The question goes on:

What is the duration of such licenses, and has the Government power to cancel or revoke same, and if so, for what reason?

I would call the attention of the honourable gentlemen to this answer:

A Customs bonded warehouse for the storage of intoxicating liquor is only granted upon unconditional consent of provincial authorities and remains in force until cancelled by the Minister for cause or withdrawal of provincial consent.

There is the policy laid down by the Government; there is the construction of it by the Customs Department; and notwithstanding the opinion given by the Department of Justice to my honourable friend, I challenge him or the Department of Justice, or the Attorney General of British Columbia to show that they have ever attempted to refuse a single one of these licenses. Surely, if the Attorney General were in earnest in his desire to shut out these export warehouses, he would make one refusal and have a test case. We do not usually find that the provincial Government in British Columbia have any hesitation in taking their citizens into the law courts; on the contrary, they are very much the other way, and there is not a shadow of doubt that if the Attorney General were sincere in the statement he has made, he would at least have attempted to test the question, which he has never done.

The Attorney General made a statement the other day with which I want to deal. It was just about as accurate and reliable as the statement about debauching the members of the House. As it will take me some little time to deal with it, if honourable gentlemen will permit me, I would like to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at 8 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: Honourable gentlemen, when the House rose at 6 o'clock I was about to discuss the statement issued by Hon. Mr. Manson, the Attorney General of the province of British Columbia, just subsequent to the debate on this Bill in the House of Commons. I trust the House will pardon me if I refer to this statement at some length, because as a sample of unparalleled and impudent mendacity it is hard to find its equal, unless it be in the letter which we heard read this afternoon by the honourable gentleman who leads the Government. I may say, in passing, that this statement appeard in the Ottawa Citizen, which is apparently kept in close touch with all the thoughts and ruminations of the Attorney General upon this particular question. The statement reads as follows:

Victoria, B.C., May 3.—Declaring that the Senate of Canada alone is responsible for the border liquor running out of British Columbia because of its failure to give the provincial government power to prohibit as well as regulate the traffic. Attorney General A. M. Manson issued a statement last night, replying to the charges made against him in the House of Commons yesterday by H. H. Stevens, Conservative, Vancouver.

Mr. Manson said: "The bitterness of Mr. Stevens' political animus toward me seems to unbalance his judgment and eliminate sense of honesty. He throws his avowed prohibition views to the wind in his desire to malign a political opponent. I have confidence that others in his party may rise above mere party malice. The occasion surely warrants non-partisan thought.

"Three export liquor houses were established in Fernie long before I came into office. This province could not prevent their establishment—

The same old story.

It was a matter of trade and commerce—purely a federal matter. I sought at Ottawa legislation to prohibit private importation of liquor into the province, which would have, if passed, put an end to the export houses. Conservative senators defeated the legislation. They should have realized that sooner or later various crimes would ensue from rum-running from British Columbia to Alberta. They probably did not think of murder, but it has happened and it would not have happened had the amendment sought in Ottawa been passed.

You can see, honourable gentlemen, that this statesman adds to his suggestion that the Senate of Canada are capable of being debauched—I think that is the expression—the suggestion that they were responsible for the murder and hanging which recently took place in connection with some rum-running transaction in Alberta with goods out of a warehouse which he had the power to close at any time that he chose to withdraw his consent. The article goes on:

The responsibility must rest with the Senate. There has been no new establishment of export houses in eastern British Columbia since I have been in office. The houses have been cut from a half dozen last year to one this year; from thirty odd in the province last year to ten this year. This is as a result of stiffer regulations—regulations as stiff as we dared make. We can regulate; we cannot prohibit.

That statement is full of inaccuracies, to put it mildly. For example, he says: "Three export warehouses were established in Fernie long before I came into office. This province could not prevent their establishment: it was a matter of trade and commerce—purely a federal matter." Now, the answer to a question in the House of Commons shows that a license was granted for Fernie on the 22nd of January, 1923, one year after Mr. Manson came into office. Another was granted for Fernie on the 26th of June, 1922, six months after he came into office. Another was granted for Cranbrook on May 11th, 1922, three months after he came into office. Another was granted for Grand Forks on February 7th, 1923, a year after he came into office.

He went on to say: "There has been no new-established export house in eastern British Columbia since I have been in office." As a matter of fact, in the month or March this year, at the very time these questions were on the Order Paper in the House, he had given his consent to the granting of a license for an additional warehouse in the town of Greenwood, which is situated on the Kettle Valley Railway and is one of the finest stratgetic points for bootlegging in British Columbia, being at least 250 to 300 miles from the coast, where the only market for export could be the state of Washington.

In substantiation of this statement I read a letter from Mr. Farrow, Commissioner of Customs, dated April 20, 1923:

I acknowledge receipt of your communication of the 19th instant, requesting to be advised whether a license has been granted for a bonded warehouse for the storage of intoxicating liquor at Greenwood, B.C., and if so, whether the consent of the provincial government was previously obtained.

In reply you are informed that a Customs bonding warehouse license was granted last month at Greenwood, B.C., with the written consent of the provincial authorities.

Then he states that it was purely a matter of trade and commerce. He says:

I sought at Ottawa legislation to prohibit the private importation of liquor into the province, which would have, if passed, put an end to the export houses.

He did not. He sought last year, and again this year, a Bill from which he expressly excepted such warehouses. Clause c of the Bill as introduced last year expressly provided:

Where the intoxicating liquor so imported is imported solely for the purpose of his export business and while kept by him in that province, is kept in a liquor warehouse which conforms in all respects to the requirements of the law governing such warehouses, and when sold or disposed of by him is actually exported from that province.

That exception was in the Bill of last year, which was the Bill asked for by the resolution of the Legislature of British Columbia, and was in the Bill which was introduced this Session.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, that is not the Bill which is before us.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: I am dealing with the statement of the Attorney General, who is trying to cozen the people of British Columbia that he is in earnest in trying to do away with export warehouses. The other statements as to the number of houses that are in existence in the province, and how, they have been cut down, I do not propose to go into in detail. All I propose to say is that his statement and that of the Department at Ottawa are wholly at variance, and I take it that he is about as accurate in that regard as he has been in other statements made by him in connection with this matter.

Now, I am wondering who in the province of British Columbia besides this gentleman himself, and possibly his associates in the provincial Government, wants this Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is two-thirds of the Legislature.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: I am not particularly concerned with that. I will say to my honourable friend that the Moderationists, the people who were largely responsible for the carriage of the present liquor Bill, do not want it. They have been agitating for the past two years for an increase in the liberty of sale rather than for further restrictions. The prohibitionists do not want it; and I will prove that statement to my honourable friend. They are on record as being opposed to it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have evidence to the contrary from the Rev. Mr. Cook and the Rev. Mr. Peck.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: I will try to give my honourable friend a little better evidence than that. The Rev. Mr. Cook, against whom I do not wish to say anything, is pretty well known as a political parson who has a great deal to say on matters with which he is not very conversant. I am going to read a resolution passed by the provincial Prohibition Association, which I think is possibly more authoritative on that point than the statement of the Rev. Mr. Cook or any other private individual. This resolution is contained in an open letter written to the Premier of British Columbia by William Savage, Chairman of the Law Committee of the British Columbia Prohibition Association. It reads as follows:

> This association declares that it cannot take any part in assisting the fact or principle of Government sale nor can this association take any steps which would add to the Government monopoly in the liquor business. This association, however, instructs its committee to ascertain if possible whether such legislation is contemplated or promised by the Dominion Government, and if such legislation is contemplated to urge upon the Dominion Government that the legislation be extended to apply to a condition of provincial prohibition in the event that a Prohibition Act shall succeed the Government Liquor Act.

That is a straight declaration of the Prohibition Association that they are opposed to this legislation.

I will also quote from a letter appearing in the Prohibition Bulletin, of Vancouver, written by an even higher authority in prohibition circles than the Rev. Mr. Cook—I refer to the Rev. Ben. H. Spence, Secretary of the Dominion Alliance, whom I have no doubt all prohibitionists will recognize as one who speaks with a certain amount of authority as to the wishes of prohibitionists in Canada. This is a letter to Mr. G. O. Buchanan, 328 Fogers Building, Vancouver, B.C. It says:

> Dear Mr. Buchanan:
> The Dominion Government's proposition to give the British Columbia Government a monopoly could not by any stretch of imagination be called a temperance measure. It was a financial one. I don't think that it is up to us in the slightest to help the Governments of British Columbia and Quebec make their liquor sales more profitable by tightening their monopolies.

So I think I am right when I say that, so far as the people of that province are concerned, the only persons who want this legislation are the honourable the Attorney General and, possibly, his associates in the Legislature. Certainly the great bulk of the people of the province are opposed to it.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: What are the dates of those letters?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: The last one is undated; the first one is dated September 21.

I do not propose, honourable gentlemen, to discuss this matter further to-night. In view of the fact that I have shown that the people of the province—the prohibitionists and moderationists, and, if my honourable friend wants me to put it that way, the Conservatives—are all opposed to this legislation, I am content to leave it to the judgment of this House as to whether it feels disposed to act upon the representations of a man who would make the statements that have been made in support of this legislation by the Attorney General of British Columbia.

Hon. R. F. GREEN: Honourable gentlemen, before this Bill is voted upon I propose to say a few words in connection with it. I will not keep the House very long. I think that the House should be seized of the situation so far as the people of British Columbia are concerned. While it is true that the province of Quebec is said to be interested in this Bill, at the same time the House in Quebec has taken no action in connection with it; and the legislation is aimed, first, last, and, may I say, all the time, at the province of British Columbia. British Columbia is a province many miles away from here on the far confines of this Dominion. In local matters we have faith enough in our own judgment to think that we can deal with these matters in the best interests of our province and of Canada as a whole. It has been demonstrated in the speech of the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Barnard) that this young gentleman— I say young gentleman advisedly— the Attorney General of the province of British Columbia, has all the time had the power that he is now asking this House to give him to stop these warehouses. True, he has not had the power to stop personal importation, but he has had the power to regulate it; because the moment any individual attempts to import more than he would generally be supposed to use for his own purposes, he could step in and have that importation stopped—at least, he could take care that whoever made the importation did not turn around and sell it to the people of British Columbia or elsewhere.

We had prohibition in the province of British Columbia, and while we had it we also had the right of personal importation. The people were asked to vote on the question whether they wanted that or Government control. They voted, and, as the leader of the Government stated to-day, gave a majority of 35,000 odd in favour of Government control. It is true that the question of private importation was not raised. It is also true that we had the right of private importation at that time, and that many of the citizens of the province were of the opinion that if they put the control of liquor in the hands of the provincial Government they would be retaining to themselves that right.

I have no brief for the warehouses; I care nothing for them; but I do care for the good name of the province of British Columbia and for the way in which things are managed in that province; and I say without any hesitation that they have not been managed by the present outfit in power in a way that is good for the province.

This gentleman who writes so eloquently asking us to pass legislation that is not necessary has had the power over and over again to prevent export warehouses from getting licenses. He did not come before us last year with the same Bill that is presented this year. He then wanted what? He wanted the right to determine who should have export houses. It would have been a nice proposition. This gentleman may try to say that he is not responsible, but that his immediate predecessor was responsible; and for what? For seeing to it that nobody but his particular friends or the friends of his Government secured these licenses. Why, a member of the local Legislature supporting this honourable gentleman in that House—he and his firm—were employed by some gentlemen to secure for them a license of this description. These gentlemen had tried to get a license in other ways, but were not able to secure it. They secured the services of this firm, one member of which is to-day a member of that Legislature, and they got a license; but before they got that license they had paid into that firm $3,000. The money apparently was there, and nobody was saying anything about it until it was discovered by somebody that it cost $3,000 in addition to the license fee to secure a permit of this kind. This gentleman did not deny having done that, but he came back with the explanation—I am not going to mention his name, or say anything about the matter except to read two letters which are published in the Victoria Daily Times of Tuesday, November 1st. This is the first letter:

Dear Sir:

Upon returning to the office today—

That is, his own office—

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: You propose to give the name if you read the letter.

Hon. Mr. GREEN: If you want it I will give it.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: You must give the name if you read the letter.

Hon. Mr. GREEN: The gentleman who writes is Ian Mackenzie, a member of the local House, and the letter is addressed to R. T. Colquhon, one of the partners in Lloyd and Son, Limited. It is as follows:

Dear Sir:

Upon returning to the office to-day, after an absence of ten weeks at Victoria attending the session, I find that my firm did some legal work for you by way of making application to the proper Department of the provincial and Federal Governments for a bonded warehouse in your name. Although I understand the firm gave the best part of a week entirely to this work, I consider the fee charged in excess of the ordinary legal fee. I find that half this fee was deposited to my credit in the Bank of Montreal.

In order that there may be no question at all about the propriety of this matter, and no suggestion of the exercise of influence on my part in any capacity as a member of the Provincial House, I enclose herewith my cheque for $1,500, being the amount placed to my credit. I have further caused to be executed an agreement between myself and my firm to the effect that I shall not be entitled in whole or in part to any fees accruing to the firm, either directly or indirectly, from Government sources.

Trusting you will understand my motives in writing this letter, I remain, Yours very truly.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Had the matter become public before he wrote the letter?

Hon. Mr. GREEN: Oh, yes, it had become public, because there had been an investigation in the House.

On May 21st last, Captain Mackenzie wrote Mr. Colquhon again:

Adverting to my letter addressed to you under date of April 16, 1921, enclosing my personal cheque for $1,500, I find from my bank that this cheque has not yet been cashed. I would therefore ask you to cash this cheque by noon to-day or return same to me, in which latter case I shall hand it over to the G.W.V.A. Relief Fund.

Captain Mackenzie added that on the same day he wrote the Provincial President of the G.W.V.A. a letter saying that he would turn this cheque over to them.

What I say is that this gentleman, who is so innocent, and so anxious that we at this end of the country should do something that he has the power to do himself, is in the same boat with his predecessor, they having been quite ready to allow their friends, certain firms of solicitors, to secure from the public certain moneys for the purpose of getting licenses that he said he would be compelled to give if asked for it, as shown in the statement read here to-day in this House. This is the gentleman who is asking us to do these things, and I say that he does not represent the people of British Columbia, who are quite competent to look after their own interests. All I ask of this Chamber to-night is that they see to it that we are left in that position. My honourable friend the leader of the Government quoted from an article from the Oregonian. That article is quoted somewhere else under a signed statement by this same gentleman, Mr. Manson. In the particular article quoted to-day he tells us about the unfavourable conditions, and the impression we are making on the Americans. Incidentally he says:

The Portland Oregonian, one of the most reputable American papers on the Pacific coast—

That is his certificate of character to the Oregonian. I have another clipping from the Oregonian that I intend to read. This was published on April 11th of this year. In this particular interview, which must be correct because it is contained in his special pride, the Portland Oregonian, Mr. Manson says:

Legalized bootlegging and piratical high-jacking alike both heard the death knell of their activities in Canadian United States waters by the announcement of A. M. Manson, British Columbia's Attorney General, who said yesterday that the co-operation of the Dominion Government had been obtained at last and that clearances hereafter would be refused by the Dominion customs officials to vessels leaving port for "deep sea" with cargoes of liquor. This completely destroys the business of the scores of small craft that have been supplying Washington and Oregon with their liquor.

In the past Dominion and Provincial Governments have been at odds and the bootleggers have flourished. The liquor laws are provincial, while it is the Dominion which governs imports and exports of liquor and all else. The province was able to forbid the private sale of liquor but it could not prevent import and export houses, sanctioned by the Dominion, from doing business.

The Dominion, unmindful of the province's troubles, was interested only in seeing that duty was paid on all the liquor brought in. Liquor consequently has been pouring into British Columbia in great quantities from England. The duty has been paid, and the export houses then have been able to dispose of it as they wished with no interference from the Dominion. Small vessels have loaded every day, entered their cargoes with the customs officials, consigned to fictitious people in Seattle, Portland and other foreign points, and have cleared for deep sea like fishing vessels.

As the duty was paid, the customs officials cared nothing for the nature or the disposal of the cargoes, and when the vessels returned empty no questions were asked. It was no offence against Dominion law to take duty-paid liquor to any point on earth. From the Dominion standpoint, the activities of these boats were perfectly legal. Where the liquor went, of course, was an open secret. American boats were met a few miles from port, the cargoes transferred and the Canadian craft returned for new loads. Some Victoria vessels have made as many as three of these deep sea voyages in a single day.

With Mr. Manson's announcement yesterday, this comes to an end. A new government, of the same complexion as British Columbia's was elected in the Dominion a year ago. The province has now succeeded in getting sympathetic treatment from the Federal authorities, who have instructed the customs authorities of British Columbia ports to refuse clearance to deep sea of vessels carrying liquor cargoes except in the case of real fishing vessels, which will be allowed to carry a sufficient amount of liquor for medicinal use.

Bootlegging under the new conditions will be impossible. The only source of liquor, save from the government stores, is the export houses. The latter can export only. If they cannot account at all times for the disposal of their stocks, as they have been able to do heretofore through these deep sea trips, their licenses would be cancelled by the provincial government.

That is Mr. Manson's statement to the Portland Oregonian, his particular pet.

Last year in this House the statement was made that it was impossible to get decent liquors at reasonable prices in the province of British Columbia from Government sources. We had an investigation into that situation late last fall before a special Committee of the local Legislature. I will give you one sample of what was found. They have a Commissioner who buys liquors, and it was proven that he bought liquors of a very low grade from particular friends at a greater price than he would have had to pay the manufacturers or their agents. It was also proven that he bought Scotch whiskey that was too poor to sell to the people of British Columbia, that was not fit for consumption, and that they had a gentleman in their warehouse who cured this kind of thing; and he admitted under oath that this liquor was taken out of the bottles and put into a cask or casks, that some prune juice and other stuff was added to it, and that it was then re-bottled and sold as Government draft whisky. This Mr. Attorney General Manson is the gentleman who is in charge of all this liquor business, and he is the gentleman who is asking us to-day to give him further power to deal with all the liquor affairs in the province of British Columbia.

I am going to say a few words in closing about that gentleman. Unfortunately, so far as the public and the press of the country are concerned, he happens to be Attorney General and represents our province. This gentleman says in one breath that he has not the right to exclude those warehouses, and in the next breath he says that he has the right, but does not do it, thus trying, as we say in the West, to pass the buck to this House instead of doing this thing himself. This gentleman has for weeks and months past tried to dragoon this House through his friend, the editor of the Citizen, and through the public press of this country. He has been saying things about people who are perhaps better than himself; saying things about members of this House and members of the other Chamber that he has no right to say; saying things that this House should resent; and I ask honourable gentlemen if we are going to sit here to-night and allow propaganda of that kind. Are we going to sit here to-night and allow that gentleman to dragoon us into passing this Bill, as he has done up to its present stage?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, after the House rose at 6 o'clock I felt a sense of humilitation that charges should be made against members of the Parliament of Canada, particularly against members of this Chamber, by the present Attorney General of British Columbia, as these have been set out in his letter of the 16th January to the Solicitor General of Canada, which letter was read before this Chamber this afternoon by the leader of the Government in this House.

I am satisfied that no honourable gentleman in this Chamber would resent the imputations which have been cast upon this Chamber more than my honourable friend the leader of the Government. I felt, when those charges were read, that the duty fell upon this Chamber of vindicating its honour by protesting against the charges contained in that letter of the 16th January.

I have been in public life for many years; I have followed fairly closely the doings and the practice of Parliament; but never during my time have I heard read, in Parliament or elsewhere such a letter, or heard charges made by the Attorney General or any other Minister of any province of this Dominion such as have been read in this Chamber to-day.

We cannot sit still and accept imputations upon our public honour such as have been made by the Attorney General of British Columbia. I am satisfied that if this letter had been placed upon the Table of the House of Commons at the time this Bill was under discussion, the Bill would never have reached this Chamber. If I understand aright the spirit of the House of Commons, no public assembly would so quickly have resented the charges that were made against that House as well as against this Chamber, than the House of Commons itself.

This letter not having been laid upon the Table of the House of Commons, the duty falls upon this Chamber of protecting the honour of Parliament. I therefore propose moving an amendment which I hope every honourable gentleman in this Chamber will support, as I think that every honourable gentleman owes it to himself to do. The amendment which I beg to propose is as follows:

That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be left out and the following words added instead thereof:

"the second reading of the said Bill be postponed until an opportunity be given the present Attorney General of British Columbia to establish his serious imputations against Members of the Senate and House of Commons, as set out in the letter of the 16th January last addressed to the Solicitor General of Canada, and read in the Senate this day by the Leader of the Government in this Chamber, or until he has an opportunity to withdraw the said charges and apologizes therefor.

The contents of this resolution can be at once communicated to the Attorney General of British Columbia, and if he has a sense of honour he will comply with the demand which has been made in this resolution—either to establish the charges which he has made against members of Parliament in both Houses, or withdraw and apologize for the very serious imputations which he has cast upon the Parliament of Canada.

I therefore beg to move this amendment to my honourable friend's motion, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Blain.

The Hon. The SPEAKER: Are you ready for the question?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have just sent for the letter in question in order that I may be able to answer the remarks of my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We have heard enough of that letter, I should think. Did you not read it all before?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think it will improve with further reading.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is there not a postscript?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There was a postscript; there was the whole speech the honourable gentleman made in the legislature. I could have read it, because he called it part of the letter. I was surprised that the curiosity of my honourable friends opposite was so absolutely satisfied that they did not ask for the postscript to be read. It contained 5 or 6 pages.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It is such a mouthful already that we do not want any more.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Honourable gentlemen, while we are waiting for this unfortunate letter to come, may I be allowed to say in defence of my revered leader that while he did read the letter, he was solicited to do so. For instance, my right honourable friend (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) said:

I do not want to discuss the letter here; this is not the place to discuss it. I simply asked for information of my honourable friend. It does appear to me, however, that this is the fundamental letter of the whole correspondence, and I do not see why it should be censored.

Later on the leader of the Opposition said, after there had been considerable discussion:

That makes us more curious than ever.

Still later the honourable member for Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) said:

We will make an effort to ruffle that gentleman's feelings too.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We are going to do it, too.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Now is the time to do it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend is under a misapprehension, for he thinks we are attacking the leader of the Government. Not at all; this in no way reflects upon him, because the letter was produced on the expressed wish of the House It is fortunate that it was, and we feel a sense of indebtedness to the leader of the Government for producing it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I only wanted to stand by my leader.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We all stand by him in that regard.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Evidently this letter was not intended for public notoriety.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It was published in the Citizen newspaper.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Attorney General telegraphed his authorization to make it public.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Perhaps he had not read it.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am sure, if there is anything disagreeable to Parliament in the letter, it was only with great reluctance that my leader stood in this House and said that he would only read certain parts, and would leave out the disagreeable things.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: You are doing first rate; you are making it worse.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The right honourable member for Ottawa said:

Read it all. Give it to us.

And then the honourable gentleman from Sussex said:

Is it not a rule of the House that if a letter is read in part the whole letter must be laid on the Table?

Well, we have had the whole letter. Then the honourable member from Sussex goes on:

Then, what are you quibbling about? Let us have the letter.

I think, honourable gentlemen, it is a tempest in a teapot. After all, here is the Attorney General of British Columbia simply writing to a political friend and telling him of the good that might be done if such a course were followed. That is all there was to it. When he said there was going to be money spent, it was the bootleggers who were going to spend the money; and I am sure we have no sympathy with them. This afternoon it was stated there were some of these warehouses right on the line, established there for the sole purpose of exporting intoxicating liquors to the adjoining republic.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: By consent of the same Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I ask the honourable gentleman, does he approve of those warehouses being built there?

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: I do not.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Then, why not vote for the Bill?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: May I ask the honourable gentleman if he is now apologizing on behalf of the Attorney General of British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Not at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That apology won't do.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The Attorney General wrote a letter to the then Solicitor General explaining that if certain parties had their way there would simply be a debauchery of the law.

There are two sides to this question. I am one of those who would like to be allowed to import from the Old Country any brand of champagne or claret or Scotch or anything else; but I realize that, if I were allowed to do so, although I might not abuse the privilege and might keep the liquor for my own use—that if everybody were allowed to import, Government control of the liquor traffic would be absolutely impossible. I do not think there is a man in this House who can deny that. In our province you can import anything you like and bring it as far as the Customs House, but when it gets to the Customs House the Liquor Commission steps in and says: "We will take charge of this."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let them do that in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And they take charge of it and pay the duties, and then, although the liquor is yours, they will charge you just as much profit on it as they would make if they imported it themselves. But you will get one bottle at a time. They will not let you have the whole of it. It will be put in a certain store, and you can go there and get one bottle at a time.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Question.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I rise to a point of order. I submit that the motion in amendment is not in order. We are dealing with a public Bill, and the progress of this Bill does not depend upon the act of any individual. I submit that there is no connection at all between the amendment to the motion and the Bill itself. If this gentleman has offended Parliament, there is a way to deal with him.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We are going to deal with him now.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I hope the honourable gentleman will have some patience, so that I may be allowed to raise the point of order. He will be allowed to answer it if he desires to do so. I hope he will not interrupt me.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Go to it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I say that the progress of a public Bill should not be delayed because of the action of any individual in the community. There must be some reason based on the Bill itself why progress should not be made with it, and it is not because A or B may have offended the feelings of this honourable House, or of the other branch of Parliament, that the progress of a public Bill should be delayed. I therefore submit to the honourable the Speaker that the amendment is out of order.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The honourable gentleman who has just spoken has shown a very small knowledge of the rules of order. He has talked for some minutes, during which he took time to administer a reprimand to me, but he has failed to state any point of order at all. A point of order only affects the wording or the character of the amendment. The motives that actuate the moving of the amendment have nothing whatever to do with a point of order, if the motion itself is within the rules of the House. Surely the six months' hoist, as it is called, is in order. Then, where does the point of order arise? Only in the disordered imagination of the honourable gentleman who has raised it. That is exactly how the matter stands at the present time. There is no point of order; the honourable gentleman has shown no point of order, so the amendment stands as made.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say to my honourable friend that there is excellent authority for this, and it will be found in May. My honourable friend is under a misapprehension in saying that a private individual has anything to do with this. A private individual has nothing to do with it. A good reason suggests itself to Parliament why the second reading of this Bill should be postponed. For instance, I could move that this Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Instead of that, I move that the Bill be not now read a second time, but be postponed until a certain condition occurs, an imputation having been cast upon members of Parliament by a law officer of the Crown who seeks particularly the passage of this Bill. In fact, the only person of whom we have heard as requiring the passage of this Bill is the Attorney General of British Columbia. Will the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) say that if a Bill comes before us for consideration, based upon certain facts which may turn upon the representations made by an individual, we have not a right to postpone the further consideration of that Bill to inquire whether those facts are true or not? The postponement is based entirely upon the ascertainment of a certain condition of facts. I am sure, if there is no precedent for it, the House is prepared to make a precedent.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If no other honourable gentleman wishes to say anything, may I remark that I did not refer to the motives of the honourable gentleman who moved the amendment: I referred to the reason assigned in the motion to amend. The reason assigned in the motion to amend is the offence given by this gentleman to this honourable House. I say that is no reason for stopping the progress of the Bill. Of course, I do not deny that it is open to any honourable gentleman to move the six months hoist. That is absolutely denying the progress of the Bill; but the motion to amend does not deny the progress of the Bill, but merely stops it until a certain gentleman has done such and such an act.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The six months' hoist does the same thing.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is perfectly well known that the six months' hoist is in order; but it is in order because it is acknowledge to be a motion relevant to the Bill; it is a way of expressing the opinion of the House that the Bill should not be passed. Here we are asked to wait before proceeding with a public Bill, to see what action Mr. Manson will take—whether he will offer an apology to this honourable House or will do another thing. I submit in full confidence that such a motion is not in order.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Honourable gentlemen, I must say that I am sincerely in favour of the principle of this Bill; but when the Attorney General of the province of British Columbia makes such a serious charge not only against the members of this House, but against the members of the House of Commons, I think it is time that a halt was called. Therefore the motion of the leader of this side of the House is very timely. If I were sitting on the other side of the House I would not rest until the Attorney General of British Columbia was brought before the Bar of this House and proved his charges. If the charges which he has made were directed against the members on this side of the House—but I understand from the letter that they were not—they might more easily be passed by, because we would assume with some certainty that he was talking about something with which he was not familiar. But his charge is directed against men with whom, no doubt, he has been associated for some time, men whom he should know; and I say that this House should not rest until the Attorney General of British Columbia is brought before the Bar of the House to prove the charges he has made.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: Do you feel guilty?

Hon. Mr. GORDON: No, I do not. I think it is a very serious matter, and I therefore say again that I think the motion which our leader has brought in is most timely.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened to the discussion that has gone on here all afternoon, and I have listened also to the letter read by the honourable leader of the Government, which has come from Mr. Manson, the Attorney General of British Columbia. I think it is too bad that from those in high places should come such accusations as have been made in that letter.

There is one thing that has always appealed to me, and it appeals to me now—and I would ask your indulgence, as a very young member of the Senate, for saying this—that there is always a tendency on the part of the public to belittle what men in public positions do and to question their motives for doing it. Therefore it does appear to me doubly too bad that a man in the position of the Attorney General of British Columbia, the Government of which has the confidence of the people, a man who himself, to hold that position, must be looked up to with considerable confidence, should have written such a letter as that which has been read to us to-day. It only goes to show that, men in high places, and possessing the confidence of the public, should be most particular and most careful in what they say regarding men who are supposed to be carrying on the affairs of this country, and are men in whom, to all appearance, the country has confidence.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the honourable gentleman, but I think he ought to adress himself to the point of order before the House.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: I was just going on. With regard to that letter, let me say, in response to your demand, Sir, that it does not appear to me, that Mr. Manson should be dignified to such an extent as to think that the Senate of the Dominion of Canada would put off the discussion of this Bill, and the rights or the wrongs of it, by reason of the fact that he has written a most irresponsible letter.

There are two questions insolved in this Bill: whether you shall have prohibition or whether you shall not have prohibition; whether you shall have the right to import liquor one by one, or whether it shall be under Government supervision. It appears to me that it would be entirely infra dig on the part of this body to pay such attention to the letter that the Hon. Mr. Manson has written, and to so dignify Mr. Manson, that he would have a chance to think that by reason of this letter he had influenced the Senate of the Dominion of Canada to put off the discussion of this Bill on its merits.

I have only this to say about the Bill, and I hold myself subject to correction, that I cannot understand how the people of the province of British Columbia, after having passed on the question by a majority of 30,000 or 35,000 could be content to allow every man and every woman in that province to import liquor of all kinds, at their own pleasure, and still think they had prohibition. To my mind that is an absolute impossibility.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: What about the point of order?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: I think I have discussed that; and may I crave the indulgence of this House to speak my mind upon the Bill while I am here? I want to reiterate that, although there may be great merit in the motion of the honourable leader of the Opposition, to whose judgment I pay very great respect, I do not think this House should so degrade itself, if I may say so, as to take up a letter of a man who has in that letter made imputations which are absolutely irresponsible, and should put off the discussion of the merits or demerits of the Bill now before us.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I heard with a great deal of interest and sympathy the opening remarks of the honourable gentleman who has just sat down, but I was extremely disappointed with his conclusion. Like myself, he is a member of the Bar, and knows that we regard an Attorney General as the head of the profession in his province, and the people regard him as the mouthpiece of the law of the province in which he lives and in which he has his election. To my mind it is of great importance that the people should have confidence in the integrity of Parliament as well as in the integrity of the judiciary; and we know, as the honourable gentleman just said, that men are prone to believe every idle charge which is made against the honour and integrity of their fellow men, particularly when they are made by the highest legal authority in the country.

I quite disagree with the honourable gentleman when he says that we should allow this statement of the Attorney General to pass by as an idle falsehood and libel on this House. That gentleman not only sent the letter to the Solicitor General, but so far as we know he did not mark it private. He had meant that that letter should be on the public files of this country as a charge against the integrity of the representatives of the people of this country. He not only did that, but apparently he sent a copy of it to a newspaper in the capital of Canada, to be there disseminated throughout this Dominion against the integrity and honesty of this legislature. If we pass by these things, the newspapers which have disseminated it throughout Canada will be read by all the people, those in sympathy with prohibition and those against prohibition; and if we do not resent it as the honourable leader of the Opposition says we should, if we do not publicly and clearly resent it, they will all agree, that ye have been purchased to oppose this legislation. I therefore trust that this vote will not be partizan, but will be unanimous against those charges. It will not prevent the discussion of this Bill, but will only postpone it until this man either disavows his intention or apologizes for his cowardly conduct in attacking the honesty of this House.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to ask those lawyers across the floor of the House what becomes of the Attorney General of Manitoba. He asked for this Legislation. Simply because a gentleman in British Columbia has written a letter at which honourable gentlemen take offence, should the Dominion of Canada be thwarted because they want an apology? I have a telegram from Mr. Craig, Attorney General of Manitoba, and he wants this Bill passed.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: He did not know about his brother Attorney General then.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I am not a lawyer, but this seems to my mind childish. I am reminded of the old story we used to hear about Sir John Macdonald, which seems appropriate on this occasion. He told about a thunderstorm that came up after a Jew had had a little bit of pork, and he said it was a hell of a row about a little bit of pork. It seems to me very like this letter of the Attorney General's. I would like to carry out the wishes of the province of Manitoba, who unanimously support and wish for this legislation.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Will you tell us how it affects Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. GREEN: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman if this letter or telegram that he has is not exactly on a par with those of the other Attorneys General of the various provinces that were sought for, and that came in answer to a request of the Attorney General of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I do not know; I have no explanation of that kind at all. I simply got a telegram from Mr. R. W. Craig, Attorney General of Manitoba, requesting that this legislation be passed, and asking my support.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The telegram that the honourable gentleman has just received, if he will read it, says "as a precautionary measure."

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: That is, the Attorney General of Manitoba would like this Bill passed so that, in the event of something happening in the future in Manitoba, he could come and ask for similar legislation, that is all. He is not particularly interested in the present Bill, but if the plebiscite to be taken in Manitoba next month should carry, and the Government should have control of liquor in that province, he might come down here at the next Session or the Session following and ask for legislation similar to what British Columbia had.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I asked that question of the leader of the Government to-day, and he said that if Manitoba should carry the vote in favour of Government control, it would get the benefit of this legislation.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It would have to be a special Act.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: No, a general Act affecting the whole Dominion of Canada.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Honourable gentlemen, the point of order has been raised by the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), that the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) is not relevant to the motion before the House. I have not had much time to examine into this question, but I find in May, at page 357:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a Bill, to move, as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the Bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction or prosecution.

It would seem to me, without having had time to examine the matter further, that the point of order is not well taken.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: When my honourable friend who sits opposite moved the amendment which is now under discussion I sent for the letter of the Attorney General of British Columbia which I had read to this Chamber. Unfortunately it has gone to the printing office, and has not been returned to me. The matter that I wanted to be sure of was the exact ground upon which the amendment was based. I surmise that the ground is that passage of the letter which says that a formidable lobby will be instituted to resist this legislation, and that large sums of money will be available, apparently from the export houses and other parties interested in resisting it.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is that all it said, that the money would only be available?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It stated how it would be spent among members of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It would be spent in an effort to debauch, but to debauch whom?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Us.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I beg pardon.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: You.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. One must not forget that this letter is addressed to the Solicitor General, who sits in the House of Commons, for he says, "the House." He was speaking to a gentleman who was sitting in the House of Commons, and it was not the Senate of Canada.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We resent it for the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I said, when I was reading the document, that it struck me that it was not addressed to us—that it was addressed to the House of Commons if it was addressed to anyone.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We resent it for the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend says, "We resent it for the House of Commons." Now, everything may hinge on the phraseology which was used by this gentleman in expressing his view that considerable interests would be agitated about resisting this measure, and would make an effort to organize opposition to it. I doubt very much if the writer had in his mind that that lobby, with the forces of money behind it, would affect a member of this House. It was the House of Commons of which he was speaking, since he was addressing a member of that House. I draw the attention of honourable gentlemen of this Chamber to the fact that the letter was, in part, a public document addressed to the Solicitor General, and in another part a private letter addressed to a political friend. I think that any member of this Chamber who will read it will come to the conclusion that the Department that brought down to the House of Commons the return of the correspondence between the Attorney General and the Solicitor General truly interpreted the views of any ordinary man when they took for granted that this was not a public letter.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would ask the honourable gentleman what he has to say of the publication of the gist of that letter, that is, the scurrilous part, in the Citizen newspaper.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, suppose that that letter which has appeared in a newspaper of Ottawa, had been found under another form, in a form similar to this letter, would my honourable friend move the amendment which has been moved—to stop this legislation until the party who had inspired that correspondence or that writing in the Citizen had been brought to the Bar, or had apologized for inspiring the newspaper?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, but it proves that the man who wrote that letter sent a copy to the newspaper, because they are exactly alike.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is a surmise. Now, I desire to come to this point: I am not disposed to accept this amendment of my honourable friend, because we are dealing with a public Bill which has for its object the cure of an evil that every member of this House realizes to be an evil. I have not yet heard a member of this Chamber, since this debate has opened, argue that those export houses in British Columbia should continue to operate. The only divergence of opinion is as to the authority that has the power to suppress them. My honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Barnard) claims that full power is vested in the provincial authorities. I take issue with my honourable friend. The Department of Justice takes issue with him. I take issue with him because he does not make a distinction between an export house and a bonded warehouse. That difference is essential. A warehouse, according to the statement of the Minister of Customs, needs the acquiescense of the Department of the Attorney General of the province of British Columbia; but an export house which is not a bonded warehouse need not have a license, nor need not have the authorization of the Attorney General of British Columbia. So that an export house may continue to exist in any part of British Columbia without any license from the provincial authorities of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: Can the honourable gentleman tell us of any export warehouse which is not a bonded warehouse?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, I am informed that there have been two concerns carrying on as export houses at Cranbrook last year without a Customs bond. I say that an export liquor house need not be a warehouse.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: How long did they carry on?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They will carry on as long as they have money to pay for the liquor which they have imported, and the duty on that liquor. Such houses have existed in British Columbia; such houses, I dare say, exist to-day, and will continue to exist; and the argument that we present to this Chamber is this. We are all agreed that the export houses in British Columbia are an eyesore; that they furnish bootleggers; that they furnish liquor for export to the prohibition province of Alberta; that they furnish liquor for export to the United States.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: I take issue to a certain extent with my honourable friend on that point. There are certain firms that have been in the liquor business at the coast in the province of British Columbia for years past, who have just as high a standing as any business concerns in the province or anywhere else in the Dominion of Canada. Now, the export of liquor or the sale of liquor is not against the consciences of the people of British Columbia, and, as long as those export houses carry on their business in a proper way, and facilities are not given to export houses in the interior who cannot export according to law, that is all the protection that is required for the purpose of the business.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will put a question to my honourable friend. Does he admit that if we pass this legislation, we would do away with the export houses, and the warehouses in British Columbia for export?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: If the Bill goes through as it is now, I think you would. But my point is that you could do it anyway. What the Attorney General is doing is making all this fuss in order to tie up the question of private importation in such a way as to give him an absolute monopoly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If that is the true position, and if my honourable friend admits that there is virtue in 50 per cent of this Bill, I say it is his duty to allow it to go to Committee. Of course, he says: "I maintain that the province has the power to do away with this vice, which would be accomplished in fact by this Bill." But the province says it has not that authority, and the Department of Justice says it has not that authority. One thing is sure: we are facing the question, whether we shall, in virtue of our power, refuse to cure the evil which every member of this Chamber admits to exist, or whether we shall say that a certain gentleman has seemed to be obsessed with the idea that powerful influences would try to block this legislation. Will that be accepted as a sufficient reason for postponing the day when an evil, which we all recognize exists, will disappear from our body politic? I say no. Enlarging upon the idea thrown out a moment ago by my honourable friend from Sarnia (Hon. Mr. Pardee), I say it is our duty to proceed to legislate for the good of this country, treating with contempt certain expressions which would seem to throw a slur or a possible doubt upon the virtue of the parliamentarians at Ottawa. I will not await a certificate of character, whether it comes from the Atlantic of from the Pacific. Let us do our duty here; and when we have done that fully, we may walk out of this building with head erect, satisfied that we have earned the respect of the people whom we serve. For this reason I will vote against the amendment.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Honourable gentleman, the situation that has arisen is unique in my experience in parliamentary procedure. The particular kind of procedure that is recommended now has come upon the Senate in a moment without having given the members any opportunity for reflection as to what would be the result of such action. I am discussing now more particularly the motion which is directly before us; but in discussing that one can hardly avoid having something to say with regard to the general situation.

I have been more than 40 years in public life, the most of that time in the House of Commons, and the rest of it in this Chamber. During those 40 years I have not only consorted with members of Parliament of both Houses, but I think I have had a very fair acquaintance, in a great many other associations of enterprise and activity in our Dominion—in church circles, in benevolent societies, in different associations—with men of every profession and every kind; and I have no hesitation in saying, as I have said before, that, taking them on the whole, and on an average, the members of the Dominion Parliament are as honourable and straightforward and honest and conscientious a class of men as can be found amongst all the professions and enterprises of whatever kind they may be that are going on in our country. When a man outside makes these unfounded assertions, whilst I think it is a bad thing to do, and the more reprehensible in a man occupying a position in public affairs because of the larger influence it has, at the same time it does not operate so far with me as to cause me to say that I will fling up my duties or will deviate one single iota from the business in hand which it is my duty to pursue. It does not seem to me—I speak just from the impression of the moment—that this is the best action that could be taken by this body, and I will give some reasons for saying so.

Here is a public Bill which comes to us for our consideration from the House of Commons, where it was unanimously agreed to. It is an important Bill in more respects than one. It is a Bill which affects provincial interests and Dominion interests as well. It is a Bill which carries in its train moral as well as trade and financial consequences. Suppose we adopt this resolution and postpone this Bill on the plea that we shall make no further effort in consideration of the Bill until the charges that have been made are substantiated or an apology has been received. What does it mean? At this day of the Session it means that the Bill gets no further consideration in this House and at the hands of this Parliament. If anyone thinks that is an extreme assertion, I leave it for him to judge. It means that the prospect of the Bill being considered further is very much diminished, and that the possibilities of its being taken up again are very small. If we do not pass upon this legislation no relief of the condition as it presents itself to us is possible for another year and more. Therefore, presuming that important issues are involved in this measure—and I believe that very important issues are involved in it—we take the responsibility, for the reason which has been alleged, of allowing a continuation of those errors and difficulties, the confusion of interests, the flouting of law and order, the offences against good neighbourhood with other nations and other provinces, and the inevitable consequences which to-day are more serious maybe than we think. The result may be a breaking down of respect for law and order in portions of our community, which will be impelled by greed and the expectation of great gain which is inherent in these operations of rum-running, to smuggle and get these alcoholic liquors into markets where great profits can be got. I think that as a legislature, or a part of the legislature, we are bound to take that into consideration. Is it not a better plan for us to go directly along with our duty in the consideration of a public Bill of this moment, and to take every means that is open to us to repel the insult and bring to book the man who would insult us? That, to my mind, is the more dignified course to take; that, to my mind, is the politic course to take; and I believe it is the constitutional course to take.

Suppose that on every Bill that comes up some irresponsible person outside of this Chamber and outside of the House of Commons were to prefer a charge as lightly as did Attorney General Manson, are we to say that our dignity is ruffled, our honour is impeached, our honesty is insulted, and therefore we must stop public business, and must not undertake to carry on this branch of it until the charges are proven or there comes an apology? Pass this motion, and what is the position of the Senate? Suppose the Attorney General takes no notice of it; suppose he neither apologizes nor attempts to prove the insinuation that he has made. Then, if we are consistent with the spirit of this motion, we sit here all this Session and we sit here next Session, and under the obligation of that motion we are pledged to do nothing along the line of considering a public matter. Where would our operative power land in the end if we did that whenever there were such allusions? They are numerous: they come to us from the newspapers, from men in society, from different quarters; and there is not a week or a month in which there is not some such implication as that upon the honour of legislators. I think we would be over-sensitive and absolutely ridiculous if we stopped the wheels of legislation on every such occasion. That is why I am not disposed to vote for this motion; that is why I ask honourable members of this House carefully to consider the matter before they put the Senate in such a position.

Hon. Mr. POPE: It will be carried.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: That may be true.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Yes, that may be true.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Generally speaking, I like to listen to people when they are speaking, and pay them the courtesy of listening carefully; and I like to be treated in the same manner.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: And I think it becomes the dignity and the efficacy of this House that we should conduct our business along those lines. I am willing to take repartee and to give it; I am willing to make statements and to answer questions; but at the same time I think that we can carry these things on without in any way interrupting the current of thought.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Are you looking at me? You are talking too long.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Well, that is a frank statement.

Hon. Mr. POPE: One frank statement deserves another.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: That is a fair and frank statement to be made. At the same time, each individual member of this House must be his own judge as to when he talks and how long he talks.

Hon. Mr. POPE: And the other fellow too.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: And the rest of us will try to listen to him with as much equanimity as we possibly can.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Good.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I do not know that on this point I have anything more to say than I have said. I would ask the members of the Senate very carefully to consider their vote on this question. For my own part I make my decision in a little time, but I make it. I do not think this is a wise move of procedure, and I shall vote against it.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Two weeks ago this House sat behind closed doors to consider whether or not, on account of inuendoes contained in a newspaper published in this city, the House would summon before the Bar the editor of that paper. It was then considered that the honour of the House was at stake. However, the better counsel prevailed, that too much importance should not be attached to it.

To-night we are face to face with a different matter. We have been told from both sides of the House that the Senate of Canada is being slandered and vilified in the most arrant manner by the Attorney General of British Columbia, and we are asked to turn the other cheek, when we know that if we proceed with this Bill the Attorney General will say: "The coon came down; I frightened them out."

Hon. Mr. WATSON: No, no.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: That will be the story, and it will go to the press of this country that the Senate has been impaled by a man in authority who was in possession of the facts, and that they did not dare to call him into court and question what he said.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Proceed with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Proceed with the Bill? Had the remarks made by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) been made by the leader of the House, this thing would have been at an end. Had he appealed to the House, he would have stood on his feet and would have said: "Let us be practical about the matter: this House is not going to adjourn for two weeks." The House knows there is telegraphic communication between here and British Columbia, and the leader of the House knows that before this time to-morrow he will have from the Attorney General of British Columbia a most abject apology for what he said in that letter. Let us have a little respect for ourselves, because these attacks that are made on public men in this country are making the people believe that the public men have very little respect for themselves; and I do not think they should have if they are not prepared to bring a man like this to book. I am going to appeal to the common sense of the leader of the House; I am going to ask him now, in defence of the members of the House of Commons, and the members of this House, why not wire at once to the Attorney General of British Columbia? The honourable gentleman himself says that in his opinion the statements are slanderous. Then, why should he not appeal to the Attorney General of British Columbia and ask him either to retract the statements or to say that he is prepared to come here and substantiate them? What will be the position if this Bill does not pass? From one end of the country to the other the report will go forth that the Senate has been bought out—that the statement is true that there was a large hush fund available for the purpose of defeating the Bill. Now, let us be a little bit practical, and, with the best of good nature—because all who have spoken have been good-natured—I ask the leader of the Government to wire to the Attorney General at once asking him to withdraw all the insinuations, inuendoes and charges he has made in his telegram, and then let us go on with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: In view of the suggestion of the right honourable member for Ottawa, that the passing of this amendment as it stands might prevent our ever considering the Bill on its merits, might I suggest that it be amended so as to give the Attorney General the opportunity of doing so-and-so, instead of using the word "until." We may then consider it in a few days if we hear nothing from him.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: Put a time limit on it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I see no reason why I should not accept that suggestion; then it will be for the Attorney General of British Columbia to avail himself of the opportunity.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to point out to the House that, as I read the amendment moved by the honourable member from Calgary, the effect of adopting it would be that the discussion on the Bill would be now postponed, but it would be competent for the leader of the House to move to consider the Bill two days from now. The effect of the amendment would be simply to postpone the discussion on the Bill at the present time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The object of the amendment is to mark the disapproval by this House of the letter which has been read by the leader of the House, coming from the Attorney General of British Columbia.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: No man desires more than myself to mark that disapproval of a letter the like of which I have never seen or heard in my parliamentary experience; but my objection was to throwing up all our business until he had either apologized or proved his statement. I have no objection to taking the matter into consideration for a short postponement in order to communicate with the Attorney General, when, if he is a man at all, he will either make his apology or prove his assertion.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I find myself in rather a peculiar position, hardly knowing what to do. I am strongly in favour of the legislation that is before the House, and I also strongly resent the insinuations made by the Attorney General of British Columbia. However, I do not think the two ought to be joined together. I think we ought to deal with the legislation that is before the House, and deal with the Attorney General's letter in a separate manner. Therefore, as we will seem more or less up in the air over this matter, I think we would discuss it a great deal better after we had slept on it for a night, and I will take the liberty of moving the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. L'ESPERANCE: I would like to second that motion, for I feel in the same position as the honourable gentleman who moved it. I am strongly in favour of the principle of this Bill. I voted for a similar Bill last year, and I intend to vote for the Bill this year again. On the other hand, I strongly resent, as I am sure every other gentleman in the House does, the remarks of the Attorney General of British Columbia. If the amendment presented by the honourable leader of this side of the House goes through, I will have to vote for the amendment, which is simply to postpone discussion until the Attorney General has disavowed or apologized for his remarks. I believe that would meet with the views of the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am surprised to have heard some opposition to the suggestion made by the honourable gentleman from Assiniboia, who is moving the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow afternoon, with the idea that sufficient time would be given for more light to come from the West.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will shorten the time for the Attorney General to make his apology.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Might I suggest that it be adjourned until next Wednesday?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I thought we were all bent upon disposing of the legislation which is before us; so let us adjourn this Bill until to-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; my honourable friend will at once appreciate the false position in which we would be placed by postponing it until to-morrow. The intention is to resent at once the imputations cast upon this Chamber by the Attorney General of British Columbia; not to trifle with him.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friend is absolutely in error when he speaks of imputations made against this Chamber. I am repeating for the third time that there is no imputation against this Chamber. Of course, I have not the text of the letter before me, but my recollection is clear, because I said: "This letter is not addressed to us; it is addressed to a Commoner".

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: But my honourable friend surely remembers that the imputations referred to the Senate of Canada, and it was in the press three weeks ago.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And to the Conservatives in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I thought the Liberal section of the country was receiving its share of laudation.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: What is the objection to the debate being continued? It is not doing away with the motion in amendment. It is merely an ordinary motion, made at 10 o'clock, that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow. The House may to-morrow act upon this motion in amendment, or there may be a further adjournment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The House is better prepared to deal with the matter now than it will be to-morrow or at any later date.

The motion of Hon. Mr. Turriff to adjourn the debate was negatived.

The Senate divided on the proposed amendment of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, and the same was agreed to on the following division:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I understand that the Bill remains on the Orders of the Day, I move, therefore, that this Order be discharged and be placed on the Orders of the Day for Friday next.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Subject to the resolution, of course.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I think the honourable gentleman is not quite right about that. As I understand the position now, the Bill will disappear from the Order Paper.

Some Hon. SENATORS: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the case: it should. My honourable friend the leader of the Government will have the right to move at any time to place it upon the Order Paper, but he cannot move its postponement at the present time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend is moving the postponement of the second reading of this Bill sine die. It will be for the House to decide when it shall be taken up again. The House may be ready to take it up on Friday next, and in consequence, I moved that it be put on the Order Paper for consideration on Friday next. I took it as a consequential motion. The Bill may be dealt with this Session. I understood that quite a number of votes were secured for the amendment of my honourable friend on the statement—

Hon. Mr. POPE: No, no.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend has not a right to interrupt.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Yes, I have. We are independent people on this side of the House, and have a right to vote as we feel.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Why should my honourable friend raise a controversy of this kind when he has the right at any time to move the House to place the Bill on the Order Paper? Why should he to-night fix a date?

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: It is just possible that we may get an apology before to-morrow at three o'clock.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then the motion can be made without any question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no precedent at hand for the dropping of an Order which it is intended to deal with under certain conditions.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will quite appreciate the fact that he has the right to move to place the Bill upon the Order Paper at any time. Its disappearance from the Order Paper to-night does not prevent him moving that it be placed on the Order Paper for say Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: He can do it even without a seconder.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not so sure of that. My honourable friend states that I can take a Bill that has been dropped from the Order Paper. We can always bring it back; but a Bill goes on from stage to stage; it is always somewhere under the direction of the House.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It lies on the Table.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But there is no such Order. I fear that the Bill disappearing, I may not be able to revive it. I have not examined the point.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I suggest that my honourable friend take the matter up with the Speaker and the Clerk of the House between now and to-morrow. The question can be taken up to-morrow, but there should be no motion now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not insist.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I understand that you are at liberty to move for the consideration of the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: For the reinstatement of the Bill.

Hon Mr. BEIQUE: If your motion were adopted now, the Bill would stand for second reading on Friday.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would be a current Order, and could be proceeded with unless somebody raised objection to it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not press the motion.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: What is the procedure now in order to operate along the line of this motion?

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I presume my honourable friend will acquaint the Attorney General with the contents of the resolution.

CONCURRENCE IN COMMONS AMENDMENT

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved concurrence in the Commons amendment to Bill W4, an Act to amend the Petition of Right Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen will remember that we passed this Bill, which allowed the Governor General by Order in Council to recall a fiat obtained by fraud. Clause 2 of the Bill reads as follows:

Nothing in this Act shall be construed or interpreted as a legislative interpretation, declaration or limitation of the prerogatives of the Crown in dealing with the issue or revocation of any fiat granted upon Petition of Right.

This has been eliminated from the Bill by the House of Commons. The question now before us is whether we will accept the amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I ask my honourable friend the reason given for striking it out? It seems to me that it was unnecessary in any event, because the Bill does not even impliedly, much less expressly, purport to limit the prerogative of the Crown.

The amendment of the House of Commons was concurred in.

COLD STORAGE LEGISLATION

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF inquired:

Is it the intention of the Government to implement the Cold Storage Bill passed by this House during last Session?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department has under consideration the questions contained in the Bill passed by the Senate last year. It will not be possible to bring in any further measure this Session concerning cold storage warehouses.

PRIVATE BILL

MOTION

Hon. Mr. TANNER moved:

That the Parliamentary fees paid upon Bill K3, an Act respecting the Frontier College, be refunded to the promoters, less the cost of printing and translation.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Did the Bill not pass?

Hon. Mr. TANNER: The Bill was withdrawn.

The motion was agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

The Senate went again into Committee on Bill 84, an Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—relation of parties pending proceedings:

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I have a motion to make regarding section 2, and also with regard to section 3. The motion is that sections 2 and 3 be struck out. I will confine my motion to section 2. When the Bill came up first, particularly after hearing the statement made by the late Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson), I thought there was some need of a change in this Act on the lines of sections 2 and 3. I gathered the impression, rightly or wrongly, from his statement, that the Board, in dealing with these disputes, had not power to make a retroactive award. On looking at the statutes later I found that I was mistaken with regard to that, for honourable gentlemen will find in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, chapter 20, 1907, section 26, that the Board have power to date their award as they see fit. Section 26 reads as follows:

The Board's recommendation shall deal with each item of the dispute and shall state in plain terms, and avoiding as far as possible all technicalities, what in the Board's opinion ought or ought not to be done by the respective parties concerned. Wherever it appears to the Board expedient so to do, its recommendation shall also state the period during which the proposed settlement should continue in force, and the date from which it should commence.

That, in plain terms, gives the Board power to fix the commencement of the terms of their award. If a company to-day should reduce wages, say by 10 per cent, and the men ask for a Board, which hears the complaint, the Board will make their award and say that it should date as of the day when the dispute arose. We have this state of affairs before us. For instance, if a company cuts wages by 10 per cent, and a Board is appointed, under this amendment, if adopted, the company would have to go on paying the prevailing rate of wages until the dispute was ended. This might be 60 days. There would be 30 days notice, and in addition whatever time would be taken up in making the award. Then, if the award was in favour of the company, I think it would be impossible to recover the wages that were paid away under what the Board would hold to be a justifiable reduction. On the other hand, if the Board decide that the rate of wages was cut without justification, and they make an award that is to take effect as of to-day, the men have recourse to the company to get the wages that were retained from them.

Taking the law at it stands, therefore, you have a fairer state of things than you would have if the proposed amendment, as set out in section 2, were adopted. I have received statements from two parties, one a mining company and the other a mining association, pointing out just how this new section would work. First is a copy of a resolution passed at a meeting of the Asbestos Mine Operators Association of the province of Quebec, held in Montreal on Tuesday, May 2nd, 1923. It recites:

Whereas, Bill No. 84, Section No. 57, generally speaking says that an Operator desiring to make any change affecting wages or hours, must give thirty days' notice of intention, and that if a Board of Conciliation is asked for during that period of thirty days, conditions must not be changed until the Board has been appointed, heard the evidence and delivered their report.

And whereas, this means that should conditions necessitate a change of any kind, nothing can be done in less than about 60 days, and whether the employer can afford it or not, operations must be continued or he becomes liable to a penalty of from $100.00 to $1,000.00 per day, etc., and the application of this penalty would, should labor troubles arise, cause the owners to sustain very heavy losses, and in the case of small operators, probable loss of title to their property, and while it may be said that the penalty applies to either party using these conditions for the purpose of delaying change, there is no way in which the penalty can be made applicable to employees.

And, being convinced that such conditions could not fairly be applied to the Mining Industry, it was, therefore, resolved that this Association protest against this bill and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to members of the Senate.

There is also a statement here from the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, Montreal, dated May 15th, 1923. The Secretary-Treasurer writes:

I am directed by our Executive to submit for your attention the enclosed extract from the minutes of the Institute with regard to Bill No. 84. "An Act to Amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907." ive study of it can be obtained.

The minute contains the views of the Ontario Mining Association and the Western Canada Coal Operators Association and concludes with a recommendation by the Institute Executive that Bill No. 84 be tabled until such time as closer and more effective study of it can be obtained.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) Geo. C. Mackenzie.
Secretary-Treasurer.

Federal Bill No. 84, an Act to Amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907

The Secretary-Treasurer submitted letters from Mr. R. M. Young, Secretary of the Western Canada Coal Operators Association, and from Mr. Belmer Neilly, Secretary of the Ontario Mining Association, both protesting against this Bill and enclosing copies of letters which they had sent to members of the House of Commons and Senate at Ottawa setting forth objections, from the viewpoint of mine operators.

The objections raised by the Ontario Mining Association are:

"Bill No. 84, section 57, generally speaking, says that an operator desiring to make any change affecting wages or hours, must give 30 days' notice of intention and that if a Board of Conciliation is asked for during that period of 30 days, conditions must not be changed until the Board has been appointed, heard the evidence and delivered their report."

This means that if conditions necessitate a change of any kind, nothing can be done in less than about 60 days, and whether the employer can afford it or not operations must be continued or he becomes liable to a penalty of from $100 to $1,000 per day, etc.

Such conditions can not fairly be applied to the mining industry. In the early development stage of every mine, there is no income. Often operations are financed from month to month, and if labor trouble starts and those financially interested decide to withdraw their support, the owners, under the proposed conditions, would lose title in the property through the application of the penalty, because in many cases they could not continue to operate.

It is all very well to say that if either party uses these conditions for the purpose of delaying change, etc., they shall be guilty of an offence but there is no way in which a penalty can be made applicable to the employees.

The Labour Department will remember where such procedure was attempted in Porcupine in the early days. The employees convinced the court that they were not on strike but taking a holiday because their physical condition required it.

Take for example, the position of a silver mine operating on a narrow margin with silver at a price of 65c. per ounce. If the market were to break to 55c. per ounce and at a time concurrent with impending labour trouble, the mine might have to close down, yet under the terms of this proposed amendment, a shut-down would be looked upon as a lockout and the owners subject to a penalty of from $100 to $1,000 a day.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Is it not correct to say that the wages of miners in silver mines depends on the selling price of silver, and that the wages fluctuate from month to month with the selling price of silver? That is the agreement as I understand it.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: All I can say now is that I am reading the case of those miners. It goes on:

Consider a prospect in the development stage. Men are putting up money to meet the pay-roll from month to month and so long as they are satisfied they are getting a run for their money, they are quite willing to continue, but if employees suddenly demanded an appreciable increase in their wages and a labour dispute was impending those financing the property would suspend operations because they could not continue the venture under these conditions, and again such owners would be subject to the penalty above stated.

Following the same line of argument, if it became necessary for good cause, to reduce wages or change hours any time before the expiration of 30 days, the employees could ask for a Board of Conciliation and they might thus enforce an intolerable condition for sixty days, or possibly considerably longer. Of course in this case the employees themselves would be subject to the penalty, but how are employees, without any financial responsibility to be penalized?

We are so thoroughly convinced, so far as mining is concerned, that Bill No. 84 is unfair and unreasonable, that we do not hesitate in recording our objections.

The objections raised by The Western Coal Operators Association, are:

"This Bill proposed to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act so as to make it unlawful for an employer to make effective a proposed change in wages or hours or for an employee to go on strike until the question at issue has been dealt with by a Board appointed under the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and makes compulsory the application for the appointment of a Board by the employer or employee proposing the change in wages or hours.

This Association, which represents some thirty companies in Alberta and South-Eastern British Columbia, with an annual output of approximately 4,000,000 tons, opposes the changes to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act for a number of reasons, among which are:

1. The Act is enforceable against the employer, who is incorporated, but not against the employee, who, either as an individual or as a member of a trade union, is not. It is true that penalties for violation of the provisions of the Act, by either employer or employee, are specified in it, but it is equally a fact that they are not and never have been enforced against the employee. It is also well known to employers of labor that the employee does not lay himself open to the charge of infraction of the Act by going on strike, but simply, in his own words, quits work. That might seem to negative his right to engage in any dispute or to carry on negotiations for new conditions or wages, but the fact remains that he has done so and continues to do so through the representative officers of his Union, and whether the action he has taken puts him outside the operation of the Act or leaves him within it, it is a fact that this course has been taken on numerous occasions in the West, and no action has been taken by the Government to test the application of the Act in such cases.

2. The proposed amendments place a serious barrier in the way of a return to normal mining conditions in the coal industry in Western Canada. The agreements with the United Mine Workers of America, which organization represents the miners in this district, usually expire on the 31st of March. So far it has been found impossible to bring about a reduction in the high wage rates paid during and immediately following the years of the War. How high these rates are is shown by the following representative figures, which, for men underground, represent eight hours from the time the workman enters the mouth of the mine until he returns again to it, or an approximate average of actual work of from 6½ to 7 hours, and for those above ground, an eight hour day:

Underground:
Contract Miners, average per shift in 1921..	$9 61
Day Wage Miners, Timbermen, Bratticemen..	7 50
Machinemen..	9 42
Common Labor, Inside..	6 89
Surface:
Common Labor, Outside..	6 58

For example, on March 31st, 1922, our agreement with the United Mine Workers expired. Thirty days prior to that date we entered into negotiations for a new agreement. We were paying peak rates to which wages had climbed during and after the war. Other industries had secured reductions, and we proposed reductions in line with the decreased cost of living. The men demanded further increases in wages and reductions in the hours of labor underground already down to eight hours from bank to bank.

Nothing transpired until two days before the end of March, when the men applied for a Board. The Board was appointed and an award made in due course. The Chairman and the Miners' representative concurred in the majority finding which proposed a reduction of approximately 27½%. The men refused it and remained on strike. Finally on August 28th, owing to the settlement made in the United States by the same organization, the U.M.W. of A., and to the public pressure due to the approach of winter, they secured a settlement on the old basis.

The Government now proposes to amend the Act so that while a Board is sitting even at the expiry of the agreement between the parties, the high wages shall continue. Naturally, the object of labour will be to delay the functioning of the Board, prolong its sittings interminably, and when finally an award is made reject it, and rely on the approach of cold weather and the public interest aroused by fear of a coal shortage to enforce their demands and secure a renewal of the high scales. It has been said that public opinion would practically enforce acceptance of a Board's award. It did not do so in 1922, although the employees' representative concurred in the majority finding of the Board, and labour has always set its face resolutely against any suggestion that the findings of a Board should be regarded as more than an expression of opinion.

With the high wages, costs are correspondingly high, and they cannot be brought down unless and until wages are adjusted. The general consumer in the west suffers as a result. Recently the question of an Ontario market has become a live one, and provincial authorities in the east and in the west have shown a gratifying interest. An adjustment of wages must inevitably come if we are to secure and maintain a market in the east, and labour will benefit by steadier operation.

Under the circumstances, the proposed amendments are a backward step; they will not provide a solution in any individual case, but they will defer the ultimate readjustment. In the meantime the people both east and west will continue to pay more for their coal than they should and very much more than they would be paying in the deflation which had taken place in other industries.

The Secretary-Treasurer reported that the Bill had already received its third reading and had been passed by the House of Commons and that it was now before the Senate.

After careful consideration and discussion it was moved by J. G. Ross, seconded by George C. Riley, and carried that the Secretary-Treasurer should communicate with several members of the Senate conveying a recommendation from the Institute that: Whereas the mine operators had recorded some well founded objections, Bill No. 84 should be tabled until such time as closer study could be given and opportunity afforded of hearing the arguments of the mine operators in person; and that in the meantime the existing Act, without amendment, be continued in force.

I only wish to say further with regard to this legislation, that if you strike out this section and leave the matter as it is, you will be doing no injustice to labour. It will be in their interest to get as quick a decision as they can. The board can make this award as of the date when the reduction took place, and they will get their money. On the other hand, if you adopt this new procedure and require the company to go on at the existing rate of wages pending the decision of the board, and to do so under a penalty of $1,000 a day, you may do a great injustice to the company, because if it should take three or four months they would pay out a large amount of wages in that time, and it is a commonplace to say that they would have no way of getting it back. As we are doing no injustice to the labourer and conferring no new right on the employer, I think it would be wise to strike out this section and leave the law as it is. I move to strike out section 2.

Hon. W. B. ROSS.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, we have already had a couple of prolonged discussions on the merits of this Bill. It is regrettable, after we have fully threshed out a measure, and a long adjournment takes place, that we must travel the course over again in order to refresh our memory and to impart information to such members of the Senate as were absent during the discussion. We are facing that situation to-day. I do not intend to cover as much ground as I did when this Bill was explained upon the second reading, or when it came up in Committee.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: We always read your speeches.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: You are very kind, but I doubt that all the members of the Senate do.

I would draw the attention of my honourable friends to two facts: first, that clause 57, as it is in the Statutes Book, contains the principle which is reaffirmed in this amendment; and that this amendment is to clarify and reaffirm what is already contained in the clause.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the clause?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Clause 57, as it is to-day.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, I have it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I dislike repeating the clause without the amendment, but I shall have to do so in confirmation of my statement that the principle is there in toto:

Employers and employees shall give at least 30 days notice of an intended change affecting conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours; and in the event of such intended change resulting in a dispute, until the dispute has been finally dealt with by a board, and a copy of its report has been delivered through the registrar to both the parties affected, neither of those parties shall alter the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours, or on account of the dispute do, or be concerned in doing, directly or indirectly, anything in the nature of a lockout or strike.

That is the law to-day.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Although it is the law, is it not merely a pious exhortation? If anything further was intended, there would have been a penalty applied.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I was coming to that point. I will try to make my explanation as clear and simple as possible.

When the amendments that are sought in this clause are added, it will be seen that it is simply a reaffirmation emphasizing the prohibition of any alteration in the conditions either by the employee or the employer. Now I will read the section with the added words:

Employers and employees shall give at least 30 days notice of an intended change affecting conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours; and in the event of such intended change resulting in a dispute—

The words added are these:

It shall be unlawful for the employer to make effective a proposed change in wages or hours or for the employees to go on strike—

Then this is old:

—until the dispute has been finally dealt with by a board, and a copy of its report has been delivered through the registrar to both the parties affected,—

Then the new words come in:

the application for the appointment of a board shall be made by the employers or employees proposing the change in wages or in hours.

This declares upon whose shoulders will fall the obligation of asking for the board, namely, those who ask for the change. Then the old Act continues:

Neither of those parties shall alter the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours, etc.

I contend that that first phrase does not alter the principle of the Act nor add to it: it simply emphasizes the fact that the violation of this prohibition is unlawful. I believe there is no special necessity for those words, and it is not those words that are being attacked to-day. It is section 58, not section 57. If these amendments did not touch section 58 there would be no clamour in the public or in this Chamber.

Now I answer the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton). He asks: "Is it not simply a pious expression of opinion or desire on the part of the Parliament of Canada that the position of the parties should remain the same without any sanction?" I would say "Yes" if section 58 were to remain as it is; but we are moving to amend section 58. In section 58, in the penalty clause, there was no sanction for a violation of that prescription in clause 57 that the conditions should remain the same. I have already stated why, and I will repeat it, and I think it will be clear. My honourable friend the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson) explained it to my complete satisfaction, and, I am sure, to the satisfaction of the members who heard him.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Does the honourable gentleman then admit that in the original Act it was only a pious exhortation, and intended to be one?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I do not admit that; and I think I shall satisfy my honourable friend on that point. One must not forget that this is "The Industrial Disputes Act, 1907," and that in the year 1907 there was heard no complaint by the employer that he was paying too high a wage. The universal complaint was by the employee, that he was receiving too low a wage. Labour organizations were moving toward strengthening themselves, in order to ask for better wages.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Then, why did they provide in the Act for a lockout?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Because a lockout is very often the answer to the demand for a higher wage and is the penalty imposed upon the parties who are insisting upon a higher wage or threatening a strike. I am speaking of the days prior to 1907. The answer of the employer was: "You may go out or you may remain out: I close my doors; I stop my furnaces; I go home, I have some bread; and when you are ready to work at the price I fix, you will come back." I think I am depicting the situation which had to be met in 1907 by clause 59. Wages were universally low—I do not intend to discuss the merits of the complaint made at the time—and there were surely no complaint among the employers that the wages were too high and should be pressed down. The general opinion was that the employee was entitled to defend himself and to try to get an increased wage. Now what do we see? We see clause 57, which says that the situation shall not be altered pending the investigation until a report has been made. Against whom was that prohibition directed? It was against the party who had asked for a change. Who was the party asking for a change or likely to ask for a change? In nine cases out of ten, in 1907 it was the employee, so the prohibition of 1907 applied more especially to the employee and prevented him altering the condition until a report was made. And who was the one to wait if not the one clamouring for a change? That was the employee.

As the ex-Minister of Labour has stated, from 1907 till to-day, or till 1914 or 1918, it was the employee who was asking and striving for higher wages who had to stand the prescription of section 57; and, if he did not, we had clause 59, which said:

Any employee who goes on strike contrary to the provisions of this Act, shall be liable to a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $50, for each day or part of a day that such employee is on strike.

This penalty exercised considerable restraint on labour. The whole machinery of sections 57 and 59 was directed against a strike until there had been an investigation, because the employee was the one who needed the change. I believe I am facing quite a number of employers in this Chamber, and they will not contradict the statement that in 1907, and in the years that followed, the complaints, the threats and the movements were among the employees for increased wages. That situation has been altered.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, we will see. Now the condition has been altered: the employee has succeeded in obtaining an increased wage in certain cases, I believe, an undue wage for instance, in the coal mining business, which I know more about, and I think I am justified in saying on the railways as well. But the employees generally throughout the land have succeeded in increasing their wages and the question is now for the employer. When conditions are changing, and we are returning to prewar conditions, it is for the employer to examine into the situation to see if there is not reason for a reduction in wages. I say the situation has been altered, because now in the majority of cases it will be the employer who will ask for the change. When the employee was asking for the change during all those years there was a penalty against him if he altered the conditions.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: It was never enforced. Can you state one case in which it was enforced?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have the affirmation from the representative of the Department of Labour and from the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson) that generally the employees have respected the prescriptions of section 57.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But was it ever enforced? Did the Government ever collect the fine?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In nine cases out of ten, where Boards were asked for, the employees accepted the prescriptions of the law; and I say that it behooves Parliament to serve to the other party an equal measure of justice, and to put both on an equal plane.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: Might I ask the leader of the Government whether there is anything in this Act that provides machinery for collecting fines, or for punishing labour, or the union, or whatever is meant, in case they do not live up to this Act? Have you machinery whereby they can be penalized?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend must not lose sight of the fact that this Act tends simply to bring together labour and capital for discussion before they decide to part.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: No; you make it unlawful for an employer to do something; but have you made it unlawful for the men, and have you made any machinery by which they can be got at?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Section 57.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But do they ever do it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I reaffirm that in nine cases out of ten the employees have accepted the law that we laid down, which carried the penalty. They have never struck unless face to face with section 59, which concerned them. Now the position is reversed: the employer has to take the initiative; the wages are high; and in nine cases out of ten he will be incited to move towards a reduction in wages. Should there not be a penalty if he violates the law? Should not the law be the same for the strong as for the weak? Suppose the weak has become strong to a considerable extent, though he was weak in 1907; he was told that he could not strike till there had been a conciliation board which had investigated the trouble and tried to bring the parties together, and had reported. He had to accept that. But look at the position of the employer to-day. In 1907 the legislators in both Chambers of this Parliament did not foresee that the conditions would be altered, and that there would come a day when the employer would have to move in order to reduce wages. As the legislators did not foresee that, but only saw that the employer could use the lockout to curb the demands of the employees, whether legitimate or not, clause 58 was drafted, and here is how it reads in the statute:

Any employer declaring or causing a lockout contrary to the provisions of this Act shall be liable to a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars for each day or part of a day what such lockout exists.

Thus section 58, the penalty clause which applies to the employer, was drafted with the idea that all that he could do to alter conditions was to proclaim a lockout. The legislature of 1917 did not foresee the situation that faces us to-day; and, as a new situation has arisen, and, as section 57 contains a prescription that affects both labour and capital, and says that they shall respect the situation as it is, pending investigation, we come to Parliament and we say, "Make that enactment as binding upon the employer as we made it binding upon the employee in section 59." I ask, is that just? Is that fair? I leave it to the judgment of every member of this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I am in agreement with the honourable gentleman who has just spoken, thus far, that I rejoice with him in the fact that the labour unions have become strong and able to treat at arms' length with their employers. He has shown that in the past, in acquiring and using that strength, they have been able to command not only fair wages, but wages which he admits are too high in certain industries. Therefore there is no ground for complaint, as far as the past is concerned. Let us therefore deal with the future, and try to frame a law which will be fair to both employee and employer. To do that I think we must give effect to the law as it was intended to operate at the outset. What was the object of the law in 1907, and up to this date? It was to employ means for bringing before public opinion the real state of things, not so much to impose penalties on employer or employee, but to prevent either employees or employers from quarrelling among themselves before submitting their differences to an arbitration board.

Now, let us continue that policy, and see in what respect the law should be supplemented in order to render equal justice to both parties. As it is, section 57 sets out what the employer can do and what the employee can do. It is true that the principle is affirmed that no change shall be made by the employer before the conciliation board has pronounced upon the change; but that was merely advice, so to speak, that was put into the law—a direction to the employer as well as to the employee. There was an absence of sanction.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: As regards the employer.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, as regards the employer. But you have admitted that the employees were sufficiently protected by the law to enable them to obtain a rise in wages to such an extent that you say they are too high to-day in certain industries.

Now, what is the object of the amendment? It is declared unlawful for any employer to reduce the wages to what he believes they should be, to what he believes he can pay. Is it fair that the employer should be bound for 5 or 6 months, and it may be a longer period, to pay wages that he cannot afford to pay? Let him be subject, if you will, to the judgment of the board of arbitration, as the employees would be subject; let the sanction be as severe as you desire it to be; but apply it to both parties. But you do not desire that the sanctions should be too severe so far as the employers are concerned, and they should not be more severe so far as the employees are concerned.

Let us deal with the case that has been placed before us by the honourable member for Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross). I think the case before the House cannot be answered. The honourable gentleman has shown that in the mining industry there are a number of companies that are liable to changes in the value of their goods to such an extent that they would be unable to continue their operations if they were not allowed to reduce the wages; yet you want to penalize them and oblige them to keep their employees at work for four or five or six months although unable to pay their wages. Is it not the fair thing to say, "The employer will be entitled to reduce the wages provided that before doing so he has applied for the appointment of a board of arbitration"? Even then it might take four or five months, and if the board decided that wages should not have been reduced, the employer will no doubt abide by the decision. If you want to make the arbitration compulsory I would have no objection; but it would have to be compulsory on both parties. I understand that is not what the Government desires or suggests, and I agree with that: I think it would be going too far. What is required is to set in motion public opinion, and to have the means of bringing the facts before the public, with the expectation that both employer and employee will abide by public opinion. So far that has been the best safeguard, and the best means of settling labour disputes. Therefore I say that to my mind it is best to leave section 57 of the Act as it is, but to supplement it with the amendment of which I have given notice, which I will now read:

57a. It shall be unlawful for any employer without the consent of a majority of the employees evidenced in writing, signed by them or their authorized representatives, or for any employee to make any change in the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours, unless the party making the change has before doing so applied for the appointment of a Board to which the dispute shall be submitted and,

as regards wages, the Board may declare its decision retroactive to any date not anterior to that on which the change was made. On the failure of either party to abide by the decision of the Board, the other party may have recourse to a strike or lockout as the case may be.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman would drop the last phrase?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

On the failure of either party to abide by the decision of the Board, the other party may have recourse to a strike or lockout as the case may be.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: But you have no other party; you have only one party to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No, there are two parties—employer and employee.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: The employer and the union, whichever you like, and they are not incorporated.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Those words were intended merely to show what would be the effect; but I have no intention of insisting on their addition. It is not necessary to insert them in the section. The honourable gentleman (Hon. W. B. Ross) has stated that the law already gave the power to the arbitration board to make its decision as of what date it wished. I have no doubt he is right, from the reading of the statute, but there should be no objection to repeating it. It is better to make it more clear, as there may be a doubt as to whether, in the absence of the word "retroactive," the statute was intended to give the board the power to date the award from the time of their appointment, or from the time of their decision. There should be no objection to making it clear.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I only wanted to give a word of explanation. The original form of my motion was to strike out sections 2 and 3. That was because the two were buckled together, and one without the other is no good; but as there was a technical objection under the rules of the House to moving to strike ont two sections together, I confined my motion to striking out section 2. All I have said is unintelligible, however, unless sections 2 and 3 are read together. If section 2 goes, section 3 would follow for the same reason. Section 2 is really introductory to section 3, which has the sting in it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In order that we may understand the situation clearly, my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) intends, if he succeeds in striking out clause 2, to strike out clause 3?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman from De Salaberry moves in amendment that clause 2 be replaced by the amendment of which he gave notice some time ago and which he has read?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No; leave section 57 as it stands in the statute, and add to it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What I mean is that the honourable member from De Salaberry moves to replace section 2 of the present Bill by his own amendment?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If the amendment of the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry is accepted, does he accept section 3 of the Bill?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, with my amendment.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: Honourable gentlemen, in my opinion all legislation now on our Statute Books dealing with disputes between employer and employee are one sided and unfair. The employer is bound; the employee is not bound; and until we can get legislation that will compel organized labour to become incorporated with a substantial capital so that if they are proven in the wrong they will be penalized and will be able to pay, the same as the employer has to pay to-day, we will never have satisfaction. Under those conditions we would not have one strike where we now have a dozen, and in the long run I believe that the employee would be quite as well off as he is to-day. Organized labour have things too much their own way to-day, and an increase in wages does not increase the output. I think that was shown pretty plainly about 30 years ago, before labour was organized as it is to-day. At the Springhill mines in Nova Scotia the miners decided to get more pay. After three or four strikes, the result was that they were getting 50 per cent more pay than they had got before; but, instead of producing more coal they produced less, to such an extent that within a few months after the increase in pay it took 1,200 to produce as much coal as 800 men had produced prior to the strikes. Then, again, due to the high pay that was given and the inclination to strike and to repudiate their contracts, it was almost impossible for operators to get a new dollar for an old one. I am a director of a large coal company in Alberta. Early in 1921 our men there went on strike. The strike was settled, and they worked for about a week, when they went on strike again. This continued for six months, and during the six months we made seven distinct contracts, each of which was to run for three years. The honourable leader of the Government said, I think, that in nine case out of ten the employees respect the contracts they have made. My experience is that unless it absolutely suits their purpose they do not respect their signature in one case in a hundred. These conditions make it almost impossible for operators to make firm contracts for their output. They have to put in saving clauses.

The same thing applies to the chartering of ships. Last year in Nova Scotia we had big contracts in New England and chartered ships. When the first ship was less than half loaded, a strike came on, and the result was that we lost more than half those contracts, and lost very considerably in our freights. A ship is supposed to earn so much, but unless you guarantee to keep her going, someone has to pay the loss; and if you put in a strike clause, you have to pay very much more than if you could take a ship firm and could be sure of loading it.

I say again that my experience has been that increasing the wage does not increase the output, but, on the contrary, decreases it. I believe in paying good wages. I would be quite willing to pay a man $6 a day as $3 a day if he would attempt to earn it; but to double his pay and then to have him turn around and do half the work for double pay is very unsatisfactory. We all know that with the enormous war debt hanging over us, it is necessary for everybody in this country to produce more and spend less; and I believe, with the exception of organized labour, that is being attended to. The farmer, the fisherman, the lumberman, the merchant, the financial man, is I think exerting himself to produce more and to economize in expenditures; and if organized labour would help, the change in the conditions in this country would in a very few years be very great indeed. Of course, I suppose it is practically impossible at the present time to get an Act passed, particularly through the House of Commons, to compel labour to become incorporated so that they would be responsible for their acts. But I hope, at least, that we will be able to improve on the legislation we have got.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, at the risk, perhaps, of repeating a few things that were said a few days ago, when this subject was under discussion, I crave the opportunity to lay before the members of this House again a few facts respecting the operation of the Industrial Disputes Act, and reasons why, in my humble opinion, the amendments now sought are fit and proper to receive the support of honourable gentlemen in this House.

Before doing that, however, may I endeavour to correct an erroneous impression that seems to be in the mind of the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross), who was good enough to say at the opening of his remarks that he was somewhat impressed with the arguments that I advanced on the evening of the 15th, but that since that time he had discovered that the statement which I made was in error. I beg to call the honourable gentleman's attention to the fact that I did not make the statement that he attributed to me, namely, that awards should not be retroactive, Hon. W. B. ROSS: I did not say you did. I said I got that impression.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The honourable gentleman, as will be found on page 590 of the Senate Hansard, asked: "How many of the awards made in railway matters, if any, have been retroactive?" My answer was:

> In the terms of the McAdoo award, and in those of the decision of the Chicago Railway Board of 1920, which again was followed by our Canadian railways, there was a retroactive feature.

But these retroactive awards were American awards adopted here by Canadian railways at that time, and were not the result of the work of any board of conciliation in Canada. As I said:

> But in no individual dispute in Canada that had not reference to the United States situation, so far as I can recall, has there been a retroactive award.

In passing, I would like to submit the reason why that is the case It is quite true that the law permits and gives to a board of concilliation full latitude to make an award retroactive; but in most cases, no matter how deeply the board might be impressed with the justice of the employees' contention for making the award retroactive, they would hesitate to do so, fearing that the employer would not accept it. Therefore, with a desire to prevent friction or open strife occurring, the awards are usually made effective from the date of the decision, or the pay period nearest to the date when the board reaches its conclusion.

Reverting to the Bill before us, may I call the attention of the honourable gentlemen to the fact that this is to my knowledge the fourth occasion of which I have knowledge since the inception of the Industrial Disputes Act, that the Government in power has sought to amend it. These amendments are necessary from time to time as occasion for them arises. I recall that in 1912, I think it was, the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour was challenged by the city of Edmonton. At the next Session of Parliament the Act was amended to provide for that contingency, and never again has there been any dispute on that point. I recall another instance when I was Minister, when some 18 employing companies, all engaged in the coal-mining industry, refused to agree to a board of conciliation being established to deal with the whole matter, contending that the Department was under obligation to appoint 18 boards to settle 18 different disputes, although they were all in the same locality, and the dispute in each case was the same. That difficulty was got around by appointing a commission under the Inquiries Act, which brought about a settlement. At the next Session of Parliament the Act was amended in a common-sense way to provide that, where a number of employees engaged in the same industry had exactly the same dispute with their employers, it was proper that they should be referred to one board of conciliation. It was obvious that if 18 different boards were appointed there would be 18 different awards. In 1921 a situation arose which had never been contemplated by Parliament when it passed this Act, and it arose out of the situation which the leader of the Government has pointed out.

In 1907, when the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was first submitted to and adopted by Parliament, the labour organizations in Canada were strongly opposed to it—why? The answer is that they felt that the operation of the law would retard and delay them in obtaining justice in the adjustment of their disputes. They thought the law would operate to their disadvantage by reason of the fact that they would first have to give 30 days' notice, they they then would have to apply for a board, and would have to wait till it was constituted, when it would sit and hold an investigation before making up its mind as to what its decisions and recommendations would be. They felt that they would be under a disadvantage by reason of the delay. However, notwithstanding their objections, and they were many—and the present Minister of Labour and myself and several others were associated with that objection—the law as passed by Parliament was respected, and its requirements were complied with.

Let me show you, briefly, honourable gentlemen, how it operated. In July, 1907, I happened to be chairman of the first committee that had to make an application for a board under this law. We had a dispute with our friends the Canadian Pacific Railway—and I may say that our relations with that Company have always been most pleasant, and, notwithstanding the fact that we have sometimes differed, we have always settled our differences. The organization I happened to be associated with has not had a strike in the Dominion of Canada for over 27 years, and has never in its whole history violated an agreement made. An application was made for a board by the employees in July, 1907. The board got into operation late in September, and in October brought in its decision; and the recommendation, as I recall it, was to be effective on November 1st. Those employees felt then, and feel still, that had it not been for the existence of that law, they would, by mutual consent and agreement, through direct negotiations, have reached an agreement with the employing company in the month of July.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: How did the Act prevent that?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Because section 59 specifically said: "Unless you can make an agreement with your employer you cannot force his hand by going on strike."

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: You mean you would have forced him? You would not have agreed with him?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Unless he agreed with us. The operation of that law brought about an adjustment in the end which was accepted reluctantly by both parties, but nevertheless it was accepted because we believed the decision reflected what would be public opinion on the subject; and in 1909, two years after that, I became an ardent advocate of the Industrial Disputes Act and have been ever since, because it has in hundreds of cases caused the decisions or recommendations of boards to be adopted by both parties, whereas otherwise lockouts and strikes would have occurred, from which great public inconvenience would have resulted. I have shown, I hope, clearly, how the very first case that came under the operation of this law worked out towards the employees who were the applicants. Since that time up to the end of last year, if I am correctly informed, 503 boards have sat. My honourable friend will correct me in that if I am wrong.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There were 620 applications for boards, and 430 were organized.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: 430 boards of conciliation had been established, everyone, I believe, upon the application of the employees, because the employers have declined to make application, even when they sought a change.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Except once or twice with an employer.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes. This means that the situation I pointed out in that individual case has been repeated in more than 400 instances, which means that thousands of men on probably 400 occasions have experienced delay and postponement in the adjustment of their wages because of the requirements of that law.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Did they always get an increase?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No; and during all that time they have never complained since they raised their original protest when the law was first under consideration. I submit, honourable gentlemen, that that is a record that ought not to be lost sight of.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Have they always accepted the award?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In almost every case.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: It has been favourable to them?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No, in many cases not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will you allow me to give a figure? Out of the 620 applications for boards, there have been only 36 strikes, in spite of the efforts of different boards to conciliate.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The law of 1907 provided penalties in sections 58 and 59. Section 58 provided a penalty to be imposed on the employer if he violated the law by indulging in a lockout. Section 59 imposed penalties on the employees if they, contrary to the law, indulged in a strike, it being assumed by Parliament when it passed that legislation that those offences must necessarily be the only ones that could be committed if either party made a change without complying with the requirements of the law. As the honourable leader of the Government has pointed out, that worked all right up to 1921, but the cost of living steadily advanced, and wages slowly advanced during that period, so that it was always the employees who sought the change, and they had to go through this performance and suffer the delay consequent upon the requirements of the law. In 1921, however, the tide had turned, because the peak of living costs in this country was reached in July, 1920. Accordingly, in June, 1921, the railway companies of Canada, who brought about the grievance that now causes this amendment, gave 30 days' notice, as required by law, on July 16, 1921, of an intention to reduce wages. They were unable to reach an agreement with their employees as to the amount, and, instead of applying for a Board of Conciliation, as section 57 distinctly says shall be done, the railway companies in Canada, all of them acting together, arbitrarily put into force a reduction in wages that averages about $13.26 to about 150,000 employees.

The employees objected to that procedure, saying that it was a violation of the law. The employing companies said: "Oh, no, it is not; we are quite within the law." The matter was referred by the Department of Labour to the Department of Justice for its opinion, and the latter said: "Yes, it is a violation of the spirit of the law; but we have pointed out to you that there is no penalty imposed in section 58 for changing conditions; the only penalty is for indulging in a lockout, and in this case they are not dismissing anybody or not locking anybody out: they are simply reducing wages. Therefore, as the Department of Justice officially ruled upon request of the Labour Department in 1922, as shown in the Labour Gazette of that month, it was an infringement of the intent of the law. I will not trouble you with the whole decision of the Department of Justice, but its closing words were:

> Upon consideration of its provisions I find it difficult to escape the conclusion that the intention of Parliament in enacting this legislation was to prevent the doing of that which the railways are proposing to do.

That is to say, the making of a reduction in the actual amount of money paid out to employees was making an alteration in the conditions of employment with respect to wages, within the meaning of the statute, notwithstanding the fact that the intention of the railways was to account to the employees for the difference if and when the report in favour of the employees was made by the Board.

Now, just a word as to retroactive decisions. I am of opinion that in 1918 and again in 1920 retroactive decisions on our railways were made effective. I remember the case of at least nine employees of the Intercolonial Railway, with local headquarters at Rivière du Loup, appealing to the Department of Labour to obtain for them the back pay to which they were entitled, or claimed to be, under a retroactive award of 1918—the McAdoo award applied here. But, in taking up the matter with the railway company, the officials said,

I think quite properly, that while it was true that the nine employees were in their employ at May 1st, the date to which the award was retroactive, they were not in their employ in July when the award was made, and therefore, as they left the service before the decision was reached, there was no obligation on the railway. I think that was a fair view to take—that even though the award was retroactive it was not known to be in effect or even contemplated when those men left the employ, and therefore they received every dollar they had reason to anticipate as a result of the contract under which they were working. Now, if a retroactive agreement can work in that way in favour of the employer, it will work exactly in the same way when retroactive to the employee, if this amendment is adopted. In the event of a Board of Conciliation making an award retroactive and in favour of an employer, the latter can recover from every man in his employ, by deduction on the pay-roll, and, if there are a few who have left his employ, he makes the same loss as he would make a gain in the case I have referred to, so that it does not work an injustice to either party to have the law apply equally and alike to both.

In 1921 the railway companies put into force and effect an arbitrary reduction in wages amounting to about $300,000 a month. The railway employees took exception to that, and applied for a Board of Conciliation. Under the amendment offered by my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), whom I want to congratulate upon the fair stand that he has taken in this matter, the employing company would be under the necessity of making the application, if it is an employer that seeks to change any of the conditions; and surely that is but fair. In this case the employing companies, several railway companies in co-operation, not only refrained from naming, but declined to name, a representative on the Board which the Department of Labour established. A gentleman was named to represent the railway companies who I think was entirely satisfactory to them, and that Board brought about an agreement as between the representatives of the employees and the railway companies, by which the reduction was finally accepted. No harm would have been done had the law been complied with. Here is what would have happened. If the railway company had made application for a Board promptly, that Board could have been got together and operated quickly,—because I think the honourable leader of the Government told us, when we were discussing this matter on May 15th, that the average length of time which those 400 odd Boards had taken to operate was 43 days after the application was made, when they made their awards.

In 1922 the railway companies of Canada again repeated that offence—and I use that word advisedly, because it was an offence against the law—but on certain other classes of employees. The employees on whom they sought to impose this were the men employed in the station service throughout, the maintenance-of-way service throughout, and the shop trades—probably from 60,000 to 70,000 men all told. The 35,000 men in the shop trades took violent exception to the railway companies repeating the offence of the year before, and forced, as they were, to make an application for a Board in May, 1922, they advised the railway companies that if they put into effect the arbitrary wage reduction before the evidence had been submitted to the Board, they would decline to go on with the proceedings before the Board, and would cease to work. The Board met. A gentleman in this city had his first experience as chairman of that Board, and I think he must have found it interesting. He found that certain reductions had been put into effect already. The result was that the Board immediately functioned, and appeal was made, I assume, to the Department of Labour. At any rate, the Prime Minister of Canada took a hand in the matter, and in a few days succeeded in inducing the railway companies to retreat from the position they had taken, and agree to maintain intact existing rates until the Board had made its report. Had that not been done, honourable gentlemen, there would have been a nation-wide strike, because it was all set to occur. It would have occurred, because those men were determined, after respecting the law themselves for a period of 17 years. that the law should not be allowed to operate in one way against them, and in another way to the employer. It was a test case. The Prime Minister succeeded in averting that public inconvenience. I am not proposing to give him any particular credit for it, because I think he acted partly because he realized that the Government should have come down in the session of 1922 with this legislation instead of waiting till a year later. It was because the Government had at least neglected to do its full duty in that regard, after the experience of 1921, that he felt it was imperative that he should take personal interest in endeavouring to avoid what would have been a calamity to the public service.

Now, this amendment to section 57 simply proposes to do what previous amendments to the Act have done, namely, make it clear what the original intention and application of the Act was to be; and, if adopted, the Act will then operate in exactly the same manner to both employers and employees.

I want to add a word in reference to the mining industry that has been represented in the document read by the honourable member from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross). In most cases there is no agreement whatever between the employers and the employees in the metalliferous mining industry; but where agreements do exist the rates are on a sliding scale, in the silver mines at least, on the basis of the price of silver, and they rise or fall as the price of silver does, and they are not fixed. Therefore, their agreement being of a fluctuating type, and elastic, this amendment can in no way interfere with them. It does not interfere with agreements of that sort.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That would apply to a silver mine in operation?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: But suppose one is being developed and there is no output—no profit?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am quite sure it is true to say that there is not a single undeveloped mine of any sort in Canada that has any agreement with its employees, and therefore it is not bound by that law. With reference to coal mines, the coal industry is a very important one from the standpoint of public convenience or inconvenience, and interruption of business in coal is a matter of serious import to the people of Canada, because we have to depend upon a substantial and adequate supply during a large portion of the year.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman says that there is no agreement, but if I understand the Act properly it does not require any agreement. It relates to the de facto conditions of employment. If the employees have been paid at such a rate for a month or three months it cannot be changed except after a Board has been appointed.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am glad my honourable friend has raised that point. You will note that in the interpretation clause of this Act the word "employee" refers to ten or more employees organized for the purpose of collective dealing with their employers. In the opening up of a new development that never has occurred; there are no agreements; and I think I can voice correctly the view of the Department of Labour in stating that the Department does not interfere and is not called upon to interfere or to establish Boards, in industries that are only in the early stage of development, or where there is no agreement with their employees.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The Department has no discretion.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am speaking of what the experience of the Department has been.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But you speak as if they have a discretion.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: They have; the Minister has a discretion in every instance, as to whether or not a Board shall be established. The honourable leader of the Government has pointed out that 600 applications have been made, but only 400 Boards granted.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Under the clause for which my honourable friend is now pleading surely he does not contend that there would be any discretion at all?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Oh, no. The honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) asked if there was any discretion in the hands of the Department as to whether or not a Board should be established when an application was received.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What I meant was: supposing that a railway company want to make a reduction, and they say to the Minister, "You should not establish a Board," can they make the reduction without the Board?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No. If the Minister agrees that the representations made by the railway company are good and sufficient, then he may refuse to establish a Board. I can say with assurance to my honourable friend that during the time I happened to administer the Department of Labour there were occasions when Boards asked for by railway employees were declined.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I do not see the authority.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: There is one section that gives the Minister power to determine whether such a request should be granted.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: I think my honourable friend will agree that any workingman, whether he is working in a mine that is paying or one that is not paying, comes under the control of the union.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I can answer that quite clearly. For instance, a mine worker is not eligible for membership in the Mine Workers Union unless he is working in an operating mine.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: I say that a man belongs to the union in the opening up of a mine: he comes under the union's control.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Where in the Act does the honourable gentleman get authority for the statement that it does not apply to a mine that is not producing?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It is not in the Act. I simply stated what the experience of the Department was, and what the custom was.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Where does he get authority for saying that there is discretion in the Minister?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I might refer my honourable friend to sections 5 and 6 of chapter 20.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Under that I think the honourable gentleman will find that it is the duty of the Minister to grant a Board, and he could be compelled by mandamus to do so. There is no discretion there.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: While my honourable friend is dealing with that, will he be kind enough to look at section 57, which clearly indicates a Board, since it is stated there that no change shall be made in wages until the dispute has been finally dealt with by a Board, and a copy of its report has been delivered to the Registrar. Therefore the Minister must appoint a Board.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I think my honourable friend is thinking more of the practice than the law.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I want to make it clear that if the Department of Labour refrained from the establishment of a Board, if they thought it was not the proper thing to do under the circumstances, then both parties, employer and employee, are no longer bound by this Act.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Where do you find that? I cannot find it in the Act.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My honourable friend should refer to section 6:

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON.

Whenever under this Act an application is made in due form for the appointment of a Board of Conciliation and Investigation, the Minister shall, within fifteen days from the date on which the application was received, establish such Board under his hand and seal if satisfied that the provisions of the Act apply.

In answer to the honourable gentleman who asked a few minutes ago how the Act would apply to a mine that was in the early stage of development but not producing, I say that the Minister would decline to establish a Board in such case, because he would be satisfied that the provisions of this Act did not apply. Section 1 of the Act declares what industries come under the jurisdiction of the Act, and it is not a mining industry operating until it is developed. I am sure it is true to say that since 1907 there has never been a Board established in connection with any mining dispute unless the mine was producing.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It is not a mine until gold is coming out of it? Is that the idea?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does not the honourable gentleman read in that an obligation upon the Minister of Labour to appoint a board whenever the dispute comes within the jurisdiction of the Act?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Quite.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: There is no discretion: he must appoint a Board.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is true, if it is within the scope of the Act.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Section 2 of the Act defines an employer. It says:

"Employer" means any person, company or corporation employing 10 or more persons, and owning or operating any mining property, etc.

If he is employing 10 men and owns a mine, he is clearly within the Act.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The point is that it is not a mine until it is producing.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Is it a mining property? If it is not a mine it is a mining property, the Act says.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The ex-Minister knows that it sometimes takes 16 months before a mine produces a ton of coal.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: An analogous case would be to say that a manufacturing industry was not an industry until it had its factory built.

I hope this digression and interruption has not drawn the minds of honourable gentlemen from the facts I tried to present in sequence, namely, that for 15 years, from 1907 to 1922, a million labour men or less may have come under this Act and suffered the disabilities I have referred to; and, when the shoe was on the other foot, the employers took advantage of the technicality in the Act that failed to provide a penalty for this particular offence, and saved to themselves a substantial amount of money, and applied the law to themselves in exactly the opposite way to that in which they wished it to apply to their employees. This amendment is sought to cure that defect, and to make the legislation apply to the workmen and the employer alike. Surely it is just to say that the Parliament of Canada should not, and I hope it will not, go on record as saying that the law shall apply in one way to the employer and in another way to the employee.

It was said this afternoon that the penalty imposed on the employer is severe, while the penalty imposed on the employee is light. I just want to mention this fact in passing. Take a railway company for example. We are prone to talk of the Canadian Pacific Railway as being our greatest railway—perhaps we will get over that in time to come. The C.P.R., with 60,000 employees, put into effect a reduction in wages, and the maximum penalty imposed on the employer is $1,000 a day, with the minimum of $100. But if those 60,000 employees go on strike, it is $600,000 a day.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: How much would you give for it on the dollar?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am not gambling to-day. So it does not give a correct impression to say that the heavier penalty always rest on the employer. In proportion to their ability and responsibility, I think the fact is that the discrepancy is rather the other way.

Let me say this in closing, and let me thank the House in having been so patient in listening to me this afternoon. In the mining industry contracts are made for definite periods, and expire on definite dates, whereas contracts made between the employees of railways and the employing companis in, I think, every instance, run indefinitely, subject to cancellation on 30 days notice. In the case of the railways we have no trouble except that which I have outlined, and the railway employees are prepared to take care of their own situation. In the mining industries, the agreements expire on definitely fixed dates, sometimes two years in advance. If an employer in the coal mines, for example, desires to make a change in conditions, all he needs to do is to advise his employees of the fact not less than 30 days before the agreement expires, and then sit down and try to negotiate a new agreement with them—or he can do that three months before the agreement expires. If he cannot reach an agreement with them, he can apply for a Board, and a decision will be rendered before the existing agreement expires. But that has never occurred in any case of which I know. It happened on December 31st, 1921, that an agreement which had been running for a year and three months, to my knowledge, between the coal miners of Nova Scotia and the company, expired; no steps were taken by either party, as far as I know, to have the employees a few days before the end of December approach the company for a new agreement, and the company said: "It is our intention to reduce wages," which they did on the first of January. The result was that a strike insued, with all the results that inevitably follow. I submit that had the employing company in that case—and the same is true in many other cases— made up their minds that they wanted to change conditions 30 days or 90 days before the expiration of the agreement, they could have given notice and entered into negotiations with the employees; and, if they failed to reach an agreement, they could have applied for a Board and had a judgment rendered before the agreement expired. Those are things which I think perhaps have not been brought to the attention of honourable gentlemen before; and I respectfully submit that the amendments now proposed are exactly in keeping with the intent and purpose of this law since 1907; and, if they are not concurred in at this time, the action will be interpreted by thousands—indeed, by approximately a million workmen—as saying that the will of the Canadian Parliament is that a law affecting relations between employees and employers shall apply in one way to the employees and in another way to the employers. I submit that that is the important and crucial point before us, and that in making our decision it is not a matter of whether a reduction in wages shall occur a week or a month hence. That is a minor consideration. But the principle involved is a vital one, and if the confidence of a million workingmen of this country is to continue to be placed in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and the Parliament that passed it, that Act must inevitably and invariably continue to apply in spirit and letter equally to all parties that come within its jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I want to ask the honourable gentleman a question in reference to these agreements. There has been an impression that labour does not always respect its agreements; that it may break them, while the employer must maintain them.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My answer to the honourable gentleman is this. In most of the cases in which it is claimed that agreements have been broken, it is because the agreements have been made otherwise than through the recognized organizations.

The honourable member for Amherst (Hon. Mr. Curry) this afternoon referred to what he believed to be a fact, and it possibly was, namely, that a company of which he is a director in Alberta had made some seven agreements with its employees in the coal-mining industry. I want to say this to honourable gentlemen—because the Department of Labour had a very accurate knowledge of what transpired in the Alberta coal fields from 1915 to 1920, and even up to the present time—

Hon. Mr. CURRY: That was in 1921.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: —and was in constant touch with what occurred. No agreement that was made in the western coal fields between the Mine Operators' Association and the United Mine Workers' organization was ever violated; but in 1919 there was a revolutionary movement in the Alberta coal fields that worked in harmony with the revolutionary movement in the city of Winnipeg, both of which had the same purpose in view. Wholesale secession occurred among the miners, and it is true that a number of the coal operators—I do not know about the ones my honourable friend referred to—tried to make side agreements with those outlaws, if I may use so strong a term, who are proposing to destroy or confiscate the employers' property, if they could. They thought they could break up the Mine Workers' Union. In some cases they did make an agreement with John Jones, Dick Smith, or Bill Brown.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: The agreements I speak of were made with constituted authorities in Alberta at that time.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I would be interested in knowing who those supposedly constituted authorities were.

Hon. Mr. CURRY: I can get them.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I do know that the railway organizations which represent nearly 200,000 men in Canada, have a well-known reputation for keeping their agreements. In the mining industry there may have been a few occasions, but they are rare, when men have gone out on strike with the sanction of their organization in violation of agreements.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: The coal miners in Nova Scotia made an agreement in August, 1922. Can the honourable gentleman tell me how many strikes and walkouts have occurred since that time?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: None, authorized by the Mine Workers.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: What control have they over the men?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Let me point out to the honourable gentlemen that it was the control of the United Mine Workers that put the pumps and fans in operation when the owners of the mines were in great fear that their property was going to be destroyed. It was the influence of the United Mine Workers that prevented a substantial number of the miners in Nova Scotia from being misled, and affiliating themselves with a Soviet organization of Russia. I feel convinced that it is surely true that the influence exercised by the United Mine Workers' organization, for example, has been of great benefit to the owners of coal mines in Alberta, as well as to the miners employed therein. Had it not been for that strong influence the situation would have been very much worse.

Let me point out this in fairness to our miners' organizations. We often hear that our railway employees in Canada are men of higher intelligence, men who will keep contracts, and so on. That is all very well and nice to listen to. Most of those men are English-speaking men, men who understand the English language, and who are reasonably intelligent and in constant touch with the travelling public. In the mining industry the reverse is the fact. Approximately 50 per cent of the men engaged in the mines in Canada are not Anglo-Saxons by birth, and thousands of them do not understand a word of the English language; and both in Canada and the United States it is a tremendously difficult task that the Executive of the Mine Workers have to endeavour first to make intelligible to men engaged in the mining industry, who do not speak their language, the requirements and laws and regulations of the organizations. I think the constitution of the United Mine Workers is printed in 12 different languages. That is a matter which honourable gentlemen ought to keep in mind when they feel like criticising unduly the policies and intentions of those responsible for trying to protect a body of men that number between three and four million.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Question.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Mr. Chairman, I claim the privilege of addressing the House, and especially you, Mr. Chairman, as you are a working man. I want to differ from everybody. I say so with all modesty, because I have been a working man and am familiar with working men, having been amongst them. I regard all these other gentlemen as professional men, because they are either capitalists—a much-derided class just now—or they are legal gentlemen. Even my honourable friend the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon Mr. Robertson) has had largely to do with railway men—a class distinct from the ordinary working man, in that they are very highly paid and have certain organized rules and employments, and are not subject to the same drawbacks or the same influences as other men, because their employment is required from day to day and they have their allotted positions and responsibilities. So the question affecting merely railway men does not apply to the working man in general. I say this boldly, and perhaps some persons will not agree with me—that a workman has a perfect right to strike; he is not a slave; he gives his labour in return for a certain amount of money, and therefore can make that contract and end it himself. An employer, on the other hand, is not bound altogether to keep his workmen when it is not to his advantage to do so; and I dare say he could terminate that agreement. It is not made in perpetuity; it is not made for eternity, but for a settled and definite time, and that is according to pleasure. I say that the employees in a coal mine have the right to strike when they wish to; but I say that men employed in certain mechanical branches in the operation of a mine—those who work at the ventilating shaft, those who work at the pumping shaft, and others who are necessary to the conducting of the whole operation—should not be allowed to strike on the same terms that a working man in the mine or a truck man underground or any other employee of that kind would be allowed to strike. So you have two distinct classes of labour even in an employment of that kind.

Now I want to speak of the causes that operate upon men to make them strike. There are in mines, and I suppose in other employments, good, faithful, honest, hard-working men with families depending upon them, who wish to maintain the same arrangements as those under which they started. They abhor strikes, because they know that they and their families suffer when there is a strike or cessation of labour and payments. But there are agitators in our land who do not care so much about working as they do for stirring up strife, and those are the men who operate on the body of employees to cause strikes or disarrange relations between them and their employers. Furthermore, beyond the question of hours and the rates of pay, there is a question which those agitators have in their minds—the control of the mines, the control of the owners of the mines, the control of the output to the public, which will result perhaps in an increase of their wages.

Now, is that contemplated? Yet that is the result of this Bill. For 30 days the agitators are in control of the property-owners; they can hold them up for 30 days and longer, and practically own and control the whole operation. During that time the whole concern may be ruined. Therefore, if you wish those who have embarked their capital, those who are the owners of the mines and other operations, to really enjoy the possession of their property, you cannot hand it over to agitators for 30 days or 60 days, or any other time. They must use whatever moral or physical force they have to retain and possess and enjoy the benefits of their property.

That is the question that is really at the bottom of this. It is all very well to speak about the observance of rules and regulations by the railway employees. That does not affect mines and other operations of that kind. At the beginning of this debate I asked the question of you, Mr. Chairman, how far down does this extend? It extends down to an employer of 10 men, I understand, in other branches of employment than mines or railways or any other great undertakings. It affects the whole business of employers throughout the country, as far as I can learn, and I would like to have enlightenment from my learned brethren of the long robe on this subject, as to whether, in addition to affecting mines and great operations of that kind, it does not go down to every grocer or carpenter or dealer, or any person of that kind throughout the entire country; not being confined to railway men, to miners, or to any of those great public undertakings which are assumed to come within the object of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I would like to point out to my honourable friend that this Act applies only to employees in public utilities, as mentioned in the interpretation clause, and that it has no bearing whatever on industry in general. I would like to ask, what is the order now before us? The honourable member for De Salaberry gave a notice of amendment some time ago.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: After the vote has been taken I will move my amendment.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Much as I would prefer to see the Bill as it came down from the House of Commons, I feel that the honourable member for De Salaberry in his amendment has tried to find some middle ground on which perhaps we might all agree, and if the motion to strike out the section as moved by the honourable member from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) is not adopted, I am prepared to endorse the amendment of the honourable member from De Salaberry.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I understand that we are now about to vote on the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Middleton that clause 2 be struck out; so that all those who believe in the status quo will vote for that amendment; while those who believe that some modification should be made, either as proposed by the Department of Labour or by the honourable member from De Salaberry, will vote against the amendment of my honourable friend from Middleton.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No, that is not the situation at all. My motion is to strike out section 2; then the honourable member comes on with his amendment.

The amendment of Hon. W. B. Ross was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I now move my amendment as section 57A. I understand that the Labour Department is opposed to my amendment, and of course, as I am a supporter of the Government, it is disagreeable to me to offer the amendment, but I cannot abdicate my own judgment. I understand the reason given by the Department of Labour against my amendment is this, that it will necessitate—

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Are you speaking against the amendment now?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No, I am not speaking against the amendment, but I may be allowed to say just one word. I think it is but proper that I give the reason against the amendment and state why I cannot accept it.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: The ex-Minister of Labour says he is for your amendment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I understand the objection is because it will necessitate too many Boards of Arbitration, and thus increase the expense. I have weighed that reason, and I cannot accept it, because I do not see why we should have a law of this kind which works unfairly; and if we do not take this occasion to amend it as it should be, the agitation will continue, and we shall have the same Bill every Session, and the discussion repeated.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Béique was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I move now that section 3 of the Bill be adopted—penalty for causing lockouts.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I wish to propose an amendment to the Act. By the provision of subsection 3 of section 8 of the Act of 1907, where the employer and the employee do not agree upon a third arbitrator, the appointment is in the hands of the Minister of Labour. Now, it has been represented to me by very important employers that this is not a very satisfactory condition, and that a great many employers have refused to agree to a Board because they have felt that the Minister of Labour, in the nature of things, cannot be an impartial umpire between the contending parties. They say that the selection should be made by a man who is not affiliated with either side. I point out that it has been stated here that nearly all the applications for Boards have been made by employees. One of the reasons, as given to me—personally I know nothing about it—is that the labour representative consistently declines to agree to a third man, because he thinks that the Minister of Labour will cast a benevolent eye on his side. I therefore wish to substitute for the Minister of Labour the Chief Justice of the province in which the dispute arises, or, if the dispute interests more than one province, then the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. I therefore beg leave to move:

4. (1) Subsection 2 of section eight of the said Act is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) If either of the parties fails or neglects to duly make any recommendation within the said period, or such extension thereof as the Minister on cause shown grants, the Chief Justice of the province in which the dispute arose, or, if there be no such Chief Justice in that province, the Chief Justice of the highest court of last resort in civil matters in that province, or, in any case where the dispute did not arise in one province only, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, shall as soon thereafter as possible appoint a fit person to be a member of the Board; and such member shall be deemed to be appointed on the recommendation of the said party."

The whole object of my amendment is to substitute the Chief Justice for the Minister—

Section 4 of the said section eight is hereby repealed and the following subsituted therefor:

"(4) If the members chosen on the recommendation of the parties fail or neglect to duly make any recommendation within the said period, or such extension thereof as the Minister on cause shown grants, the Chief Justice of the province in which the dispute arose, or, if there be no such Chief Justice in that province, the Chief Justice of the highest court of last resort in civil matters in that province, or, in any case where the dispute did not arise in one province only, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, shall as soon thereafter as possible appoint a fit person to be a third member of the Board, and such member shall be deemed to be appointed on the recommendation of the other two members of the Board."

Then I will read it altogether:

(3) The following is hereby added to the said section 8 as subsection 6 thereof:

In subsections 2 and 4 of this section the expression "Chief Justice" includes any judge duly authorized as and for the Chief Justice.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think we should at least exercise some care and take time to think over so important a change as that. Just off-hand, may I point out to the House a couple of reasons that occur to me immediately why that might not be an advisable amendment to adopt. The honourable member from Hamilton states that he has been informed that the appointments of chairmen by the Minister of Labour have not been satisfactory, and that because of the fact—

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No, excuse me; that might be implied from it, but my statement was that I had been informed by heads of important industries that they had declined to appoint an arbitrator because they felt that the Minister was not an impartial person to appoint a third man.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: And I think my honourable friend added that the history of the operation of the law had been that the arbitrator appointed by the employees had refrained from agreeing as to a chairman with the arbitrator representing the employer's interests, in order that it might be left to the Minister to appoint the chairman.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Yes, I understood that.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The leader of the Government will check me if I make a statement that is not correct, but my belief is that in the case of more than half of the 400 odd Boards that have been appointed, the arbitrators nominated by the two respective parties to the dispute have agreed upon the chairman or third member of the Board.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is substantially correct.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That being so, it at once disproves any thought or suggestion that there has been a practice on the part of arbitrators appointed to represent employees to refuse to agree on a Chairman, and to desire to leave it to the Minister, because in more than half the cases they have agreed. Now, it so happened that I had a little experience in the administration of this Act; and I am sure it is correct to say that not one single appointment of a Chairman was made during the time I was Minister that was not acceptable to both parties. I want further to point out that the firm from whom the honourable gentleman got his information probably does not come within the scope of the Act at all. You will observe that this Act may be applied by agreement with a firm that does not come within the scope of the Act. It is not compulsory. It is quite true that in such cases the employers have refused to agree to the adjustment of their disputes by the machinery provided in this Act. In the second place, I wonder if the dissatisfaction of the comparatively few employers in Canada who were put in the position of approving or disapproving of appointments made by the Minister of Labour can be weighed against the undoubted dissatisfaction there would be if there was no change made in the law. In the first place, I think the information available to the Department of Labour through its trained officials and its fair-wage officers, who are located in most of the provinces, and upon whose recommendations the Department very largely acts in many cases, and the knowledge of the Departmental officers as to who have been accepted and have rendered satisfactory service as members of boards in times past, are valuable. It is the practice of the Department, wherever they find a successful chairman, a man who time after time has succeeded in bringing the parties together and in obtaining a unanimous report, to use the services of that man whenever possible. And there is nobody in as good a position to know these things as the Minister and the Deputy Minister of the Department, the latter of whom is the Registrar of Boards under this Act. I think it would be a very grave departure from past practice, which has generally proven satisfactory. This Act has been in force for 17 years, and this is the first time I have ever heard it said that a single employer took exception to the chairman appointed in any instance. I believe, honourable gentlemen, with all due respect to the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), who, I think, has talked with a gentleman engaged in an industry that does not come under the Act at all, that it would be a very serious matter for this House to adopt the amendment, and I hope it will not prevail.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: One would think the Minister of Labour would be very pleased, because he is in a very difficult position every time he has to make an appointment. There are some cases in which the Minister of Labour actually appoints two out of three, and sometimes on top of that he appoints the third. I think it would give much more liberty and authority to the Minister of Labour to use his influence; it would not be his own appointees who were acting.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I want to say a word in support of the amendment. The fact just mentioned by my honourable friend from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson) shows the existence of a state of mind in this country not altogether without justification. He says that out of 400 cases 200 have been settled amicably by consent; that is to say, that the third arbitrator has been named by the consent of both parties. What does that show? Let me open wide the door of a board of directors, and let my honourable friend listen for a second to what is going on. "Well", they say, "the men are offering as a third arbitrator So-and-so." "Absolutely impossible; you cannot expect that man to do justice to a company." "If we cannot have him, what is going to happen?" "Well, we must agree because if we don't know that nine times out of ten the third arbitrator will have rather strong leanings towards the men, and, to avoid the nomination of a third arbitrator by the Minister of Labour, we had better agree." The agreement is made, and I will tell my honourable friend that if it were not for that feeling, he would find that in probably 350 out of 400 cases the nomination would not have been made by common consent, but by the Minister. Of course, I do not blame the Minister so very much for that.

What is the situation of a Minister of Labour—not only the present one, but of those who have preceded him? The Minister of Labour is supposed to have the confidence of the usefulness if it were said by some of the large labour unions that they had no confidence in him. The political gain that any Ministry can obtain from the nomination of the gentleman representing the labour unions would disappear completely if that representation did not lean a little, for political reasons alone, towards the labour classes. At all events, it is the opinion widely held throughout the country that the Minister of Labour is not entirely free, but that he has to feel the pulse of the labour people of the country when he acts in the capacity of Minister of Labour. I think that the amendment is a timely one, and that there would be absolutely no objection either by labour or by capital if a man with the authority of a chief justice in any province should pick out the third arbitrator, who is really the only arbitrator in all those cases.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think the members of the Senate, or some of them at all events, are under a misapprehension as to the working of this Act since 1907. The impression seems to exist that there is a leaning on the part of the Labour Department, a prejudice in favour of the masses as against the classes who meet before these boards. The proof that such a prejudice is absolutely unfounded is clear. Up to two years ago, during the working of this Act—that is to say, for 14 out of 16 years—the Department has almost invariably appointed a judge as the third arbitrator, and it was this House that precluded the continuation of that policy by adopting a prohibition removing that right.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: That is not removed in the case of labour disputes.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes, it is.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And it is the action of this Chamber which has prevented the continuation of that policy. So the premises of the whole speech and the motion of my honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) fall to the ground. There cannot be a prejudice by reason of the fact that a man leaning in favour of labour was selected. He was selected from among the class of men who had practised at the Bar and who had reached the Bench. I am informed by the Department that in a number of instances, since this Act has been in operation, complaints have reached the office against the choice made by the Department. Complaints from whom? From the employees. And the Department has yet to hear of a complaint made on the part of the employers.

I draw the attention of the honourable gentleman from Hamilton to one objection that I could add to those that have been made by the ex-Minister of Labour. It is that the chief justice would labour under the difficulty of not knowing the conditions prevailing in the matter which would come before him, and he would have to be informed by representatives of the Labour Department or by the two parties to the dispute of the real situation. The Department of Labour has all these questions before it from year to year, and is in a better position to select a man of responsibility to act as third arbitrator. I am under the impression that we should leave well enough alone. The Act has been working for the last sixteen years. We have given somewhat of a jolt to the tradition of the Department by practically refusing it the right to select its arbitrator from among the judges; but I think that until we find a real grievance, based upon something more serious than we have heard of yet, we should leave the law as it is.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not agree with the leader of the Government at all on this matter. I think that this giving to the Minister of Labour the power of appointing the arbitrator is probably the worst feature in the Act. Take an example. In Nova Scotia we have a general Arbitration Act. One of the clauses of that Act is that in case the arbitrators of the respective parties cannot agree, the umpire shall be appointed by the Chief Justice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that that Act is not used.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I beg pardon: it is used daily, and with great satisfaction. I am told that there is legislation of a similar kind in some of the other provinces. If the Chief Justice of the Province can select a man to deal with all kinds and classes of cases to the satisfaction of the people, I should think he could do it with regard to a labour dispute. The Minister of Labour is not an independent man like a judge; he is subject to political influences. A member of this House who is now dead, Senator Nicholls, told me that so far as he was concerned this arbitration was a farce, because the dice were loaded against him every time before he went into an arbitration. The Government was making the selection of a particular county court judge who was a little biased against capital, and he was the only man who was ever acceptable to labour, and was continually appointed; and, to use Senator Nicholls' own words, he said, "I surrender right at once."

The proposed amendment of Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton was agreed to: yeas, 26; nays, 16.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported as amended.

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at 8 o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill 105, an Act respecting the Canadian Order of the Woodmen of the World.—Hon. Mr. Pardee.

CANADA SHIPPING BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 166, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

He said: By section 487 of the Canada Shipping Act, apart from the pilotage districts of Montreal, Quebec, St. John, and Halifax, the master or mate of any vessel can apply to the pilotage authorities to pass an examination as pilot, and the pilotage authorities, after the ordinary examinations and upon the payment of the dues, are compelled to deliver a certificate to that master or mate. The object of the Bill is to make this discretionary instead of compulsory on the pilotage authorities; so that they "may deliver the certificate" instead of "shall deliver the certificate," after having approved the request.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But why?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The necessity for this has been shown to the Department in a special case this season in the pilotage district of Miramichi. At that place the channel is narrow, and any accident that might take place there would block the traffic altogether. It is not a very important district, and the pilot could not make a living if the most valuable ships that go there were relieved from the obligation of taking those pilots on those ships; yet it is very important to the port that pilots should be retained there to bring foreign ships in. The only purpose of this Bill is to empower the pilotage authorities in special cases to refuse the examination of a master or mate, and to place the small pilotage districts on the same level as Quebec, Montreal, St. John, and Halifax in this regard. So that, as I understand the end in view, it is to allow the head of the pilotage authorities discretion in granting a license to a master or mate in these districts where there is only an unimportant movement of ships, and where nevertheless it is important to have a pilot. You will not have a pilot if you starve him, and the authority is taken to leave to the Minister the right to say when he shall allow a certificate to a master or mate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Who are the pilotage authorities?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The head of the pilotage authorities is the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The procedure in those four ports that are mentioned is different, apparently, from that which is contemplated?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: And I take it that in those four ports masters and mates of ships coming in may not be licensed as pilots.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, that is the situation.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: What will be done in places where there are no licensed pilots, but where ships coming into a small port would have to depend on local information from fishermen and people of that kind. There would be no Pilotage Board established, and no regular pilots; and giving the masters and mates of ships permission to enter ports of that kind without pilots would prevent these people from securing a living, because it would be only now and then that they would have a chance of piloting a ship in. I think it is perhaps dangerous to allow vessels to come in from sea under the direction of masters and mates, who have no local knowledge of the dangers of a small port, without the assistance of a pilot,—either a licensed pilot or somebody who has local knowledge.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: As the law stands, the head of the pilotage authorities, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, has no discretion. Under this change he will act according to the needs of each district.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Does that apply only to certain specified ports?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The law applies to all districts and ports except the ports of Quebec, Montreal, Halifax, and St. John.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They are not interfered with?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION AND RETIREMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 180, an Act to amend the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the object of this Bill is to return to Parliament a power that had been delegated to the Governor in Council. There is a clause in the old Superannuation Act which authorized the Treasury Board to grant additional years in fixing a retiring allowance. It is thought that some embarrassment may arise from that power, which for quite a number of years has not been exercised. It is proposed to repeal that clause, so that if in any case it is deemed necessary to make an addition to the amount granted, it can be done by special appropriation of the House, instead of act by the Treasury Board.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is good law. This wipes out that power entirely.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The discretion of the Treasury Board goes by the Board.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will move no amendment to that.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. Willoughby in the Chair.

On section 1—provision for adding ten years to service repealed:

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What is the occasion for this change?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would surmise that there are occasional demands from members of the Civil Service to be allowed to retire with the addition of a certain number of years under the authority of this clause. The Minister believes that there will be no effort made to utilize that clause if it disappears from the Act.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And you get rid of that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Section 1 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Bill was read the third time and passed.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION BILL

FURTHER CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

The Senate again went into Committee on Bill 54, an Act to Provide for the Investigation of Combines, Monopolies, Trusts and Mergers.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 4—registrar (further considered):

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The consideration of clause 4 was suspended because it had been suggested that I should examine into the question of including in the clause a statement of the qualifications of the registrar. The point made was that the registrar, because of his functions, would need to be a member of the Bar. I am informed that this matter was discussed in another place, and that it was deemed injudicious to tie the hands of the Government to making their selection from among a certain class. People do not see eye to eye as to the necessity of a member of the Bar filling that position, and the Government is of the opinion that the Governor in Council should not be thus bound. I can only reiterate what I have already said in this Chamber, that the responsibility will lie upon the Government to make a choice that will appeal to the common sense of the people, and by which the Government will be judged. I would ask my honourable friend from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) not to insist, because he will meet with considerable opposition—I do not say in this Chamber, but perhaps elsewhere—if he wants to emphasize the right of a barrister to be selected for the position.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The fact that my proposition would meet with opposition would not of necessity make me change my view, because I have been accustomed to opposition most of my life, and it never affects me in that way. I will make the best fight possible, and, if I am defeated, why, I accept the situation gracefully. But I suggested that it was already in the mind of the Government to appoint a certain politician of unsavoury reputation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If the honourable gentleman had not thus qualified the person that he has in mind, and if he had simply asked if it was the intention to appoint Mr. So-and-so, I could have answered him. My honourable friend surely will not think that I will accept his premises to draw a conclusion. All I have said is that the Government will be judged by its appointment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But it will be too late to remedy the matter if they make the appointment that I have in mind. I think I have described the party I have in mind sufficiently to enable the honourable gentleman to say whether the person he has in mind is the same one.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I suggest to my honourable friend the safety of saying that the Government has no intention of appointing such an individual. Inasmuch as he has not been designated, I think my honourable friend should assure the House to that effect.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER I quite agree that it is a matter by which the Government will be judged; and I am quite sure that, if the Government is guided by the good sense of the leader of this House, the gentleman whom I have in mind will not be appointed, because, if he were, the Government would be judged very adversely. That being so, I am content to leave the matter with the Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If the name the honourable gentleman has in his mind could be given to me, I could perhaps advance a first-class defence for that gentleman without having any idea that he would be offered the position. The qualification which my honourable friend gives to a certain gentleman leaves me disarmed when it comes to discussing the question of that person; but I may assure my honourable friend that the appointment which the Government will make will, I think, meet with general satisfaction, although no name has been given to me. I do not know just now that there is a person in the flesh of whom any member of the Government has thought. Personally I have not thought of anybody.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He will grow up.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: If my honourable friend could make a defence of this gentleman, he would qualify for the position of an advocate who is commonly known as "the Devil's advocate."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think that all of us who have been at the Bar have at times been called upon to try to take the part.

Section 4 was agreed to.

On section 5—application for investigation of alleged combine:

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I move that section 5 be amended by adding in the seventh line, after the word "statement," the following words: "In the form of a solemn or statutory declaration." That means that the applicant will be obliged to accompany the application with a declaration made in accordance with the Evidence Act, section 36, chapter 145 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, so it will be in this form: "We do solemnly declare," etc.; and: "We make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act." The effect of that amendment will be that those applicants will be more cautious when they know that they may be prosecuted for perjury. It will be a protection also to the Registrar and the Commissioners, who will have before them the solemn declaration signed by those applicants, and naturally they will have more reason and justification to believe that the facts alleged by the applicants are well founded. I do not think it is necessary to say more; I think the amendment will be adopted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. David was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Now I would ask the Minister to make the amendment that I suggest—that a bond of security for costs be given by the parties.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am just drafting an amendment to meet the wishes of my honourable friend, but on another clause than that one. We had suspended clause 19. I am suggesting, instead of touching clause 19, to amend clause 22 which was under review; we will come to it in a moment.

My honourable friend has suggested that the complainants should be made to give security for costs. Well, this principle would defeat the object of the Bill to a very considerable degree. I do not know why I called the parties complainants; I do not remember whether in the Interpretation Act they bear that name: I do not think they do, because it is a wrong appelation. There is no complainant under this Act, and there is no accused. This Act is for the purpose of authorizing an investigation by Registrar of Commissioners of the modes of operation of large concerns in order to see if their system is operating to the detriment of the public. They formed those associations under the protection of our laws, and, with the advantages granted to them by the Parliament of Canada, they are protected in very many ways. They are organized for private gain, but they form an important part of the body politic, and it is deemed right, under the present conditions prevailing in our society, that, as they absorb considerable power and command a large amount of capital, the Government of the country should be armed with the power to examine into their operations, with as little disturbance to those associations as possible. This being the idea, it is deemed proper that when an inquiry is made under section 5 they shall not stand as accused. The statement will be made that there is a commercial combination or industrial combination that does or tends by its system of operation to do injury to the public at large.

The Registrar will have in hand the elements furnished to him by the statement submitted. He will ask for supplementary information. He will, if he deems proper, turn towards the association or company or corporation named in the statement, and will ask them for an answer bearing on certain specific points. They will simply have to explain how their operations are being conducted, and I would surmise that in nine cases out of ten the Registrar, if he is a man of experience, imbued with the idea of creating as little disturbance as possible and of simply doing his duty in obtaining the information, would be met with the good will of the institution, without himself being acoompanied by legal help, and without the idea that when he presents himself he will be met by legal representatives of the association. He will meet the general manager, and with him will discuss points that are in his mind, and he will proceed according to the information in his possession, trying to find out whether there is really a clear indication of an injury to the public. Having in hand this Act, and proceeding in the spirit of the discussions which took place in the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada, he will recognize that the fixing of prices and combining to carry on a larger business throughout the world, is not prima facie a confession that there is anything blameful. Under these circumstances those associations will not be put to any considerable expense. On the contrary, they will hasten to explain their system, and a report will be made in consequence. That is the reason why the parties who make the statement are not asked to give security for costs. They will not bear any civil responsibility; it will be the Registrar who will take the initiative and decide whether or not to go forward. If in his judgment there is cause for examining further and more thoroughly, he will so report to the Minister, who will then, by Order in Council, appoint a Commissioner to make the investigation. All that procedure is carried on privately.

Now I examine section 19, which says:

> The proceedings of the Registrar and every Commissioner shall be conducted in private, but the Minister may order that any portion of the proceedings before the Registrar or any Commissioner shall be conducted in public.

The responsibility is upon the Minister. Section 22 says:

> Within fifteen days after its receipt by the Minister the report (other than an interim report) of any Commissioner shall be made public, unless the Commissioner is of the opinion that the public interest would be best served by withholding publication and so states in the report itself, in which case the Minister may exercise his discretion as to the publicity to be given to the report in whole or in part. The Minister may publish and supply copies of any report in such maner and on such terms as to him seems most desirable.

We suspended section 19; I thought that we were suspending section 22.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Had we better deal with the statutory declaration first?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then we might discuss the amendment I thought might be made to one of those clauses.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would that be an amendment to cover security for costs?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: My object in asking you to make the amendment holding the parties responsible, or requiring them to give security for costs, was to prevent what we call fishing expeditions. Those six people might have listened to gossip without fully examining into it and finding out the truth. As a result, the Registrar is set to work, and enters upon his investigation, which would of necessity subject those people to considerable trouble and expense, and they certainly would get considerable publicity; for, however you might think you were guarding against publicity by saying that none of those things would be made public, you cannot have so many people in the secret without it leaking out, and the public would soon know that such and such an organization or corporation was being inquired into with the idea that it formed an improper combine.

To say that there is no party of the other part in the first instance is to say what is not quite within the facts, because the party or organization or corporation must be named in the complaint that those six people make. Otherwise, whom are you going to investigate? The parties are the six who are making the complaint and the corporation that is complained against. It surely is not asking too much that those men should be made responsizle for what they set in motion, if it is set in motion on frivolous or purely vexatious grounds. I can very readily see how this might be a great interference with business, and I still think that it is not asking too much that those men, by whatever motives actuated, should become responsible for the truth of the statements they make.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think if he turns to section seven my honourable friend will probably see ample guarantee against anything of that sort. I agree entirely with the leader on this side, that if you compel the applicants for an investigation to give security for costs you will have very few applications of that kind made. The danger of having to pay costs is very much in evidence. You may have thoroughly good information on which to base an application, but the evidence may be difficult to furnish, and I think no one would willingly assume the risk of the evidence breaking down and the complaint not being established.

If the amendment proposed by my honourable friend from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) is carried, you will have the complainant bound to give an affidavit as to the facts complained of, as stated in the application. To me that would be a very important and substantial guarantee that no one is going to bring any vexatious or frivolous complaint. The Registrar, before going on with the investigation, would have to decide whether the application was frivolous or vexatious. In many cases, if not all, that could easily be ascertained; and if so found, he would report to the Minister who would probably agree with him, and that would be the end of the whole matter. That, with the guarantee afforded by section 7 of the Act, would leave very little chance of the Registrar deciding to prosecute any complaint that would be frivolous or vexatious.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not agree with my honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), nor yet with the honourable gentleman who leads the House and represents the Government, in the view which they have taken of this particular subject.

I was much interested in following the very pleasant picture drawn by my honourable friend the leader of the House as to the manner in which the Registrar and the Commissioners would discharge the very onerous duties placed upon them. They would make a courteous call upon the combinester, or the combine generally. They would of course make the most friendly remarks as to the pleasure they had in meeting each other, and the purpose which brought them together, and the object which they had in view, and the great service which they were all conferring upon the public in discharging the functions of their office; and the most friendly spirit would prevail among all of them. A more pleasant picture could really not have been drawn. Scripture says that without a vision the people perish. There is no probability of the people perishing when pictures of this kind can be drawn. My honourable friend has been seeing visions and dreaming dreams.

I cannot conceive of an investigation, or of the preliminary steps to the investigation, of a combine taking place under this Act except by the setting in motion of the most elaborate machinery, involving very substantial costs.

If my honourable friend will look back upon the records which we have of the various other combines which have been investigated in times past, and upon which the Supreme Court of Canada has been called upon to pass—those trifling investigations which find their way down to Ottawa, and then over to the Privy Council—he will rather qualify the vision or the picture which he has painted as to the harmlessness and the simplicity of the methods which will be adopted in probing to the root the complaint of those six citizens of Canada who will march up in battle aray and make application to have a combine investigated.

Can you conceive of anything more elaborate, so to speak, or anything more martial, than six citizens marching up to the office of the Registrar, with all the information which they may have been accumulating, probably for weeks or months? They will all be sleuths; they will all be detectives, or that class of individual, I have no doubt; they will come with their portfolios laden with documentary evidence as to the tyrannical treatment of the public by this combine which they are going to investigate and finally break up.

But my honourable friend from Ottawa, although a lawyer of many years standing, and of very distinguished ability, thinks that this statutory declaration will be a sufficient guarantee that no injury will be done.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That, along with section 7.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Section 7 does not do anything at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, in the first place, as to the statutory declaration, I have never viewed a statutory declaration with formidable fear.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Others may, though.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I very much doubt it. However, we will have the statutory declaration. That, I hope, will prove some comfort to my honourable friend from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler). I hope he will to some extent be comforted by that; he apparently intends to demand that some provision be made for the costs.

I say without any hesitation that the machinery provided in this Bill for the investigation of combines will necessarily be, when set in motion, of as expensive a character as the machinery of any judicial tribunal in the realm. My honourable friend must keep in view the fact that this investigation is not going to deal with an individual. It is going to deal with a group of individuals, and the registrar, in making a courteous call at 9.30 in the morning upon one of our merchant princes—

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is too early.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: —will scarcely be discharging the whole of the duties expected of him. How my honourable friend has come to paint that picture of the harmlessness of this proceeding I certainly cannot understand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think I can satisfy my honourable friend by the text of the Bill itself.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If that be the case, I would view the Bill with very much greater suspicion than I have done in the past; if its text possesses all the simplicity which seems to have impressed itself on the mind of my honourable friend, I think we shall be warranted in exercising a very much deeper scrutiny.

The principle of the Bill is to break up combines and trusts and monopolies. Can my honourable friend point to anything in the community more formidable than combines, monopolies, and trusts? They are the largest aggregations of capital and of industrial resourcefulness that we have. Does my honourable friend think the Registrar, or one of these Commissioners who may have the good fortune to be appointed by simply dropping down to the office of one of the members of the combine and looking at his books, and then going out to lunch with the combinester, is going to solve the difficulty? Why, no. I say to my honourable friend now, that if this legislation is going to be a success, the most scrutinizing efforts will have to be made for the purpose of carrying it out—efforts that will probably occupy weeks and months, and possibly a year, for the purpose of ascertaining the grounds necessary for the breaking up of the monopolies which will be attacked.

I differ from my honourable friend from Sussex as to the six applicants paying the costs.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend allow a question? I think the speech we have just listened to is more against the principle of the Bill than anything else. Is my honourable friend opposed to the Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: While my honourable friend was attending to other very important duties, I stated to the House my views as to the principle of the Bill. If my honourable friend would do me the honcur of looking through Hansard, and take that much time from more pressing duties—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I thought I might get a short answer.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, one is not bound to criminate himself.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes or no.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: One cannot asnwer that question by yes or no.

I said I differed from the honourable gentleman from Sussex, in that those six retainers—I will not call them informers—who will be employed by the Government to set the wheels in motion, should not pay the costs. But I say with every confidence that if an investigation should prove abortive, then the Government should pay the costs. Why should the Government not pay the costs if the investigation proves abortive? If the investigation should disclose a combine or an offence under the Act, then let the guilty ones pay the costs; but my honourable friend should certainly introduce into this measure a provision that if an investigation is started and proves abortive, the Government should pay any costs that would be properly incurred in the defence of those involved. I think such a provision would meet the views of my honourable friend from Sussex, and it must appeal to everyone's sense of fair play. The principle applies in every other walk of life. Why should the Crown disturb the business of an individual or of an aggregation of individuals and drive them to retaining expensive counsel? Because my honourable friend, as a lawyer, knows very well that one of these investigations cannot be conducted unless the victims or the accused employ counsel, and counsel of the first standing, because millions of dollars will be involved. Any combine that will be investigated will represent millions of dollars, and the investigation must necessarily extend over a very considerable length of time and counsel must be employed and very large costs must be incurred. There is no reason why the principle that is recognized in all our juridical proceedings should not be readily reconized by the Government, that if the investigation proves abortive, they should assume the costs.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Would my honourable friend have the Government pay in all cases, even where the Registrar finds that a combine exists?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I said that if the investigation were abortive, if it were not well founded, if the investigators had to dismiss the proceedings against the combine, then I am sure my honourable friend as a lawyer of many years' standing will recognize the principle that the losing party should pay the costs.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have not said anything against that view yet.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Because my honourable friend in all probability will be retained in many of the proceedings.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I quite agree with you.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That does not quite cover my position, because there are two stages at least to these proceedings, maybe more.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There may be three.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The preliminary stage is set in motion by the six men who have combined together to act as spies or informers—or retainers, as my honourable friend has said. I do not care whether or not they are actuated by the highest motives in the world; I do not care whether their motives may be mere interference with someone, trying to injure someone, or whether they may be the very highest motives. If they, on false premises, have started this matter in motion, so that it comes to the Registrar, and he then makes the investigation, he must make not a mere cursory or casual investigation. If he does his duty, he must make a thorough investigation into the business of the corporation, which means that the members of the corporation and the officers of the corporation will be obliged to devote a very considertable time to the overhauling of their whole business. The Registrar examines their books, and can bring experts to assist in that examination; and these people must submit to it and must assist in the examination. Now, suppose the Registrar says after all this that the information is vexatious and frivolous, and so reports to the Minister, who is to pay these men for the expense and the trouble and the vexation and the publicity that will consequently follow? Should not there be some check on these people starting a frivolous and vexatious investigation? Should not they be held responsible for all costs up to that point?

If, however, the Registrar and the Minister decide that the matter should go further, then the responsibility shifts from the six men and becomes the responsibility of the Government; and if in the end the corporation complained against is successful, it would be indecent if the Government did not pay the costs and were not compelled to pay the costs. You must remember, honourable gentlemen, that it is a serious matter to interfere improperly and vexatiously with the business of any corporation. My honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) would be the first man to set up a squeal or a howl if certain corporations in which he is interested were investigated. We read the other day in the newspaper of an investigation into a certain corporation of which he is the head; we read his evidence there, in which he gave a very remarkable exhibition of illtemper with regard to some questions which were asked him. I sympathized with the honourable gentleman, and I thought he was quite right, because I thought the questions were vexatious. But that is the type of question that the officers of any corporation being investigated will have to submit to. So I say they should not be subjected to the like of that on vexatious or frivolous grounds, and that the men who started it should be made to pay for the stage for which they were responsible. But when the matter goes beyond that, and when the representations of these men have been adopted by the Government, and then the court decides that there are no grounds for the complaint, that there has been no combine against the public interest, the Government that ordered the secondary or tertiary proceedings should be held responsible in costs and should pay the costs. Upon them must be the responsibility; and if my honourable friend does not propose to amend the Bill, but to let it go, on his own head be it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not believe that the situation is as bad as that painted by my honourable friends opposite. I draw their attention to the fact that, before Parliament ever thought of taking unto itself this right to investigate, it had in 1888 put in the Criminal Code a provision which prohibited combinations and so forth to the injury of the public.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And very properly so.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I ask my honourable friend, could not any man having not one cent behind him, no financial substance, walk into the court house and lay a complaint under clause 498 of the Criminal Code against a corporation or an association or a merger?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He would have to do it under oath, and would be responsible for costs.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I say a man having no financial substance. Then you have the accuser and the accused brought before the criminal courts, and the accused must start their defence, employ counsel, stand the humiliation of sitting not very far from the dock, and defending their honour and liberty. That is the law which has been on our Statute Book since 1888, and that is the danger that has been hanging over all associations that might be supposed to be carrying on trade under certain conditions which would be injurious to the public. Instead of that, what have we in this measure? We have a statement by six British subjects, of the best kind, I hope, which brings to the attention of the public officer, the Registrar, the fact that these six men believe that there is a case for investigation. They give their reasons and their data, and the Registrar proceeds to investigate. He does not bring these people before the criminal courts.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He has a court of his own.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. He has powers of investigation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He sits with the Commissioners.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What are his powers?

To receive and register, and, subject to the provisions of this Act, to deal with applications of alleged combines; to bring at once to the Minister's attention every such application; to conduct such correspondence with the applicant and all other persons as may be necessary; to call for such returns and to make such inquiries as the Registrar may consider to be necessary, in order that he may thoroughly examine into the matter brought to his attention by any application for an investigation; to make reports from time to time to the Minister.

So, having received a statement directed against the workings of a large corporation, he will ask from that corporation statements, contracts, information, and so forth, in order to judge of the seriousness of the complaint.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He will have to go into the establishment and examine the books. He would not take the statement they would make, but would go there and see for himself, if he was doing his full duty; he would have to look through the whole concern; and all this evidence would have to be submitted to him at first hand. Copies would not do. There would be an interruption of the business and publicity. Take the case my honourable friend has cited of the man under the Act of 1888. Suppose the man laying the complaint were responsible, should he not be held for costs?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And were he an irresponsible person, would any tribunal listen to his complaint? Unless he was a responsible person, no man holding a legal position would listen to him for a moment; but, being a responsible person, he would be responsible for costs. The Government, surely, is a responsible person, and should be responsible for costs; and these six British subjects, actuated by a high and holy zeal for the welfare of their countrymen, should be responsible for costs. That seems to me so plain and apparent and common sense, and in the character of fair play and justice for everybody, that I cannot understand why my honourable friend, with his well-known character for fairness, would not, without any hesitation whatever, accede to my request and place in this statute an amendment that would cover the ground. There is nobody hurt that should not be hurt, because if the complaint is not vexatious or frivolous the combinesters are made to suffer as they should suffer; but if they are innocent, why, in Heaven's name, should not the men who started the frivolous complaint against them, and advertised them as being villains and traitors to their country, be punished?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend goes beyond the mark when he speaks of advertising those people as being this and that. There is no such thing. It is not a public denunciation: it is a statement made to the Registrar.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would you say it was private when there are at least six people who know it, outside of the Registrar—six people who hold no official position? What would prevent them from publishing it broadcast? We know how anxious newspapers are for news, and how you would see great headlines about the prosecution being set on foot by six British subjects. It is a noble thing to be a British subject, but there are some pretty reprehensible characters who are British subjects, all the same. All that is published far and wide. Do you mean to say that that is not at all an injury to a corporation? I say that if a combine exists it should be crushed out; but I say, further, that every corporation should not be subject of attack by irresponsible persons, even though they be British subjects.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, I do not believe there will be very many complaints against those large corporations.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Do not be so guileless.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There have not been in the past, and I do not believe there will be in the future; but machinery is organized and set in motion to protect the public in general against the operation of big institutions called trusts, mergers, and combines.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Properly so.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, if they are big institutions with a large amount of capital, they are working under the laws of this country, protected by those laws, and by the whole machinery of the entire fabric of society, which has given its taxes, its money, for the organization of transport and other advantages without which those large associations could not develop and thrive.

Now Parliament says: "These large, powerful corporations need to be investigated at times; we will set up machinery for investigating their doings; they may become so considerable as to desire to dominate the state. We have set up the Railroad Board to settle freight rates on our big railway corporations, to supervise their operations from A to Z. They are absolutely under the control of an institution created by Parliament; all this because they were getting large profits, they were public utility corporations, and they needed to be controlled by the state, if the state did not want to find itself controlled some morning by those big organizations." By the side of those big organizations appear large commercial institutions which are absorbing the activities heretofore carried on by hundreds of citizens separately. They represent a power. They employ the best legal talent. They look to the interests of their shareholders. Has not the state a right—and when I say the state, I mean the whole public—to defend themselves by creating machinery which would allow of an investigation of all their affairs when there is suspicion evidenced by a statement made by six citizens?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I agree with that entirely.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend is with me to that point.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, utterly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then should not those big corporations accept this right of the state to investigate?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And to do so in the way provided by this Bill?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is simply and purely an investigation. They are not accused; they are simply denounced as perhaps falling under the clauses of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The moment those six people sign that document they are accused.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They are singled out by those six citizens of the state—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They are accused.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The state then appoints a Registrar, who simply looks at the statement produced.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Which is an accusation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, it may turn out to be an accusation.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, that is an accusation. The moment those people sign that document it is an accusation against the people designated in it. You cannot get away from that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The state does not treat them as accused at that moment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, and I do not hold the state responsible then; but the moment the Minister passes upon it the state accuses, and it then comes out of the hands of private parties, and the complaints should be answered. But while the accusation is in the hands of those private parties, the persons making the accusation should be responsible if it is frivolous; and you agree with me.

Hon. Mr DANDURAND: I believe that to ask for security for costs from those parties would destroy three-fourths of the value of this Act.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Because the operations of those organizations are sometimes so involved that it will take experts in accounting, and others, to make a special examination on the operations of the association and report to the Registrar. The Registrar, being seized of the complaint, if he has not sufficient information to turn towards the parties who are indicated to him as people working to the detriment of the public, he will probe, he will examine and cross-examine those complainants, in order to obtain the information. He may not go further if he finds the complaint or statement a frivolous one. If he thinks, from the investigation he has made with the parties signing the statement that there is matter in it, then he turns to that supposed merger or combine and asks them for some statement or some information bearing on their operations. Up to that time no costs are incurred by that party.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Oh, yes. Will you answer me one question: Why should not these people pay if it is a frivolous complaint? Do you say that the reason why they should not pay is because it might deter others from bringing such a complaint? Is that your answer?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then would you give me your answer?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This Bill has for its object the placing at the disposal of the public in general of a method by which the Registrar will be seized of any information that can be furnished him as to the operations of those big institutions.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No matter how frivolous?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If the complaints are frivolous, he will decide so himself without even turning to the parties that are mentioned or accused.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: How can he tell that they are frivolous?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He will, because he is a man of experience, or is supposed to be.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He must examine the books.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He must go to a certain extent, and to that extent he will from his own judgment. If he supposes for a moment that there is no serious complaint, no offence, he so reports to the Minister, and that ends the matter. But if he finds that there is substance in the accusation he goes further. When he has his record complete, and is in a position to say that he really believes that this system of operation should be investigated further, he reports thus to the Minister, who appoints a Commissioner.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You have not yet told me why.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course the parties may, before the Commissioner, obtain a favourable report; but they have been put to certain expense, certain trouble, and certain worry; yet they would be put to all that worry if it suited a citizen, one citizen in six, to walk to the court house and make an affidavit.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I say no, because no responsible judge would under those conditions grant an order for an investigation against a supposedly reputable firm or organization. The complaint or accusation must be made by a responsible citizen, and that responsible citizen would be mulcted in damages and costs if he did not succeed in his contention. I take the same position with regard to the six citizens. It does not matter whether there are six or sixteen, they ought to stand on the same ground; that is all I ask. I am with the honourable leader of the Government, and with this legislation this far —that Parliament should take the right to investigate combines; and combines should be destroyed, because they are against the public interest. But I say that an organization that is attacked has also some rights in this country, or should have.

As I have said before, it is very important for the welfare of this country, very important for everybody living in Canada—for labour, for all the people, whether they work with their hands or their brains—that those organizations should exist, and that business should be carried on. Do not let us give an opportunity to persons who, from spiteful motives, and without any danger of incurring costs to themselves, may bring accusations against corporations that are carrying on their business properly. If the question of costs comes in, and if those people know that in case their action is shown to be frivolous—as in their hearts they know it is—they will have to pay for it, they will be deterred from so acting. I say that the business of this country is its very life-blood. If business were not carried on we would all starve—the lawyer, the doctor, the merchant, the labouring man; nobody could exist unless we had business in the country; and are we going to destroy the business interests by allowing irresponsible people to start accusations without any responsibility for them? It seems to me such legislation is perfectly damnable.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: May I say a word in connection with this, to call the attention of the leader of the Government to a suggestion which I think I made a couple of days ago when this same question was under consideration? It is substantially the same suggestion as the leader on this side of the House has made to-night. I think it is true that the Registrar in his official capacity would be equivalent to the judge referred to by the honourable member from Sussex (Hon. Mr. Fowler) and by the leader of the Government in the analagous case referred to. That is to say, there would be no substantial costs placed upon the combine, or the parties against whom the complaint might be laid, until the Registrar had reached the conclusion that it was a matter fit for investigation. But if the Minister, upon the recommendation of the Registrar, determined that an investigation should be held, and it was held, then if the investigation proved that the complaint was not well founded the parties complained against should be relieved of costs. I respectfully suggest to the leader of the Government that the practice that obtains in Exchequer Court cases might well be applied to the administration of this Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Exchequer Court security is very small.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It should at least go to that extent.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: You can appeal from a judgment of the Exchequer Court or the Supreme Court for $50.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I was referring to costs.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I mean as to costs. Section 5 was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You are opening the door for blackmail of the worst kind.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The preamble should be changed, and it should be called, "an Act for the Blackmailing of Business in Canada."

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Did I understand the honourable leader to say that he had an objection to section 22?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: A considerable objection is taken to section 22 because it says:

> Within fifteen days after its receipt by the Minister the report (other than an interim report) of any Commissioner shall be made public, unless the Commissioner is of the opinion that the public interest would be best served by withholding publication and so states in the report itself, in which case the Minister may exercise his discretion as to the publicity to be given to the report in whole or in part.

It has been represented by some honourable gentlemen that there was no clear expression of restriction as to secrecy of officers, to prevent them from communicating any document or information to the public. I take it for granted that the business of the Registrar being conducted in private, it is implied that secrecy will bind the Registrar and the Commissioners. Although I was disposed to accept an amendment to section 22, if it is thought that the terms of section 19 sufficiently direct the Registrar and the Commissioners to maintain secrecy as towards the public so long as the investigation is private, that amendment would be unnecessary.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why do you not start with the six men who set the ball in motion? They are not bound to secrecy; they can yap the whole thing over the country.

The Bill was reported as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

CANADA TEMPERANCE BILL

TELEGRAM FROM ATTORNEY GENERAL OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

The Hon. the SPEAKER informed the Senate that he had received the following telegram:

Please assure the honourable body over which you preside that my letter of sixteenth January to the late Solicitor General, which was intended as a personal communication, was not intended to cast any imputation or reflection upon the Senate or upon Parliament of Canada. If the language used can by any possible construction carry such a reflection I regret it. It was not so intended, and so far as language used can by any construction reflect on probity of Parliament the same is unequivocally withdrawn.

(Signed) A. M. Manson,
Attorney General.

JUDGES BILL

FIRST READING

Bill 201, an Act to amend the Judges Act.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 2

FIRST READING

Bill 202, an Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service of the financial year ending 31st of March, 1924.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of the Bill.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, to-day is the 12th of June, and as the cheques for the Civil Service will be needed for the 15th, if there is no objection, perhaps we can take the three readings of the Bill this evening, so that if the Deputy Governor is ready to come down to-morrow it will be at his disposal.

I move that the rules governing the reading of Bills be suspended so that we may take the second reading now.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I suppose my honourable friend is moving the second reading on the distinct understanding that obtained when other interim supply bills were passed, that it will be subject to any discussion or exception which may hereafter be taken when the Supply Bill in its entirety is brought down.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. I may inform my honourable friend that the Bill does not cover even the sum of $500,000 that has been mentioned for a new public building in Ottawa.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is provision made to carry out the purchase of the Paris hotel?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not followed very closely what has taken place in the other House; but, from my reading of the newspapers, I understand that there has been no money disbursed.

The motion was agreed, and the Bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF LAKE FREIGHT COMMISSION

DISCUSSION AND INQUIRY

Hon. W. B. WILLOUGHBY rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate and of the Government to the report of the Commission which investigated the combine of shipping on the Great Lakes, and will inquire what steps are to be taken by the Government.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the inquiry of which I have given notice relates to the report of the Commission appointed by the Government to investigate the alleged combine on the Upper Lakes. This report has been filed, but unfortunately it has not been printed, and I suppose many members of the House have not had an opportunity of perusing it. The report is a very exhaustive and illuminating one, covering 90 pages, exclusive of the evidence. I trust the Government at some later date will order the printing of the evidence as well as of the report. The Chairman of the Commission was Mr. McLean, Assistant Chief Commissioner of the Railway Board, a gentleman whom I, and those who had the opportunity of seeing his work, regard as one of the most competent investigators of transportation rates in Canada. His work has been peculiarly valuable for very many years. The other members of the Commission were Mr. Thompson, a legal gentleman from Saskatchewan and a former member of the House of Commons, and Mr. Tremblay of Quebec, both men of high character.

The Commission originated, as you know, because of the accusation made publicly all over Canada, particularly in Western Canada, that there was a shipping combine on the Great Lakes. That statement was very strongly denied, but it has now been authenticated. The Commission had to proceed under the powers of the Criminal Code to find out whether there had been undue restraint of trade, and they have reported that there was a combine and discrimination as between shippers, and they have also made other findings with which I will deal very briefly.

We had a commission appointed by the former Government for the purpose of investigating the grain trade in the West, to which I merely wish to make passing reference. You will remember that its operations were stopped for a time by injunction, but that it was later held that certain of its powers were perfectly valid and intra vires. Unfortunately the present Government did not see fit to continue that commission; but that there must have been some real grievances to investigate is demonstrated by the fact that the Government has appointed a new commission for the purpose, which will commence work somewhere about the end of this month. This commission will deal with the grievances of the grain-growers before their grain reaches the head of the Lakes.

The Lake Rates Commission which has made its report was to deal with the handling of grain after it had passed on shipboard. The question of the farmers of the prairies getting the uttermost farthing out of their grain is a very important one. They have to deal in a world market, and cannot pass on to the purchaser across the Atlantic any extra burden of cost. If there is an undue discrimination, they themselves have to pay it, whether it be in higher freight rates or extra tolls, and they are to that extent the losers. The province of Saskatchewan, from which I come, more than any other province in Canada, is interested in seeing that the farmer gets the last farthing out of his grain. Saskatchewan produces as much wheat as all the rest of Canada, and is situated farther inland than any other province. Between it and the head of the Lakes we have Manitoba; and west of us is Alberta, which is developing a grain-shipping route by way of the Pacific ocean. If the mountain rates were abolished and the cost of shipment to the Pacific coast were as low as it is to the head of the Lakes, in good years, such as last year, assuming that there were the necessary facilities at the coast, practically all the grain in Alberta would go in that way, as well as much of that of Saskatchewan, under normal conditions. The Government has, very wisely and properly, I think, placed in the Estimates a considerable appropriation for enlargement of the terminal elevators at Vancouver. Provision is made for betterments and for an additional capacity of $2\frac{1}{2}$ million bushels. In certain seasons the grain might suffer to some extent because of the long journey around by the Panama Canal to the European markets; but I have no doubt that in the future, when there are adequate facilities for receiving the grain and handling it properly, the Pacific route will develope to a very large extent, and its development will proportionately lessen the strain now experienced every year at the head of the lakes in handling our grain.

I know there are certain honourable gentlemen opposite, one in particular, who think we have no great advantage in the Hudson Bay route. I see the honourable gentleman smiles, in pleasant assent, I assume, to that proposition. The Hudson Bay route in any event will come sooner or later. All political parties in Canada and their leaders are absolutely committed to the continuation and development of the Hudson Bay route. But we are interested now, not in the ultimate development of that route, but in the conditions at present existing for the shipment of our grain via the head of the lakes and by the Pacific.

I am not going to dwell on this matter at very great lenght, because those who are interested in it, if they will read the findings of that Commission, will find in the Report a very full and illuminating discussion of the handling of our grain. I know that many people do not appreciate the fact of the distance that we are from the seaboard. Our competitors in the grain business, with a few exceptions, are more favourably situated geographically than we are. One of our great competitors is the Argentine. In the old days Russia was a great competitor. In the Argentine the grain is grown and shipped at an average distance of 400 kilometers—250 miles, or less—from the seaboard. In Russia the grain shipped to European and other foreign markets has come to a large extent from Odessa—from the grain district north of the Black Sea. In India the grain came from Karachi and other points, and only a comparatively short rail haul was required.

Winnipeg is 400 miles from the head of the Lakes—Fort William and Port Arthur. Moose Jaw, which is a fairly central point in Saskatchewan, is 400 miles farther. Calgary is 440 farther again. I am quite safe in saying that the average grain haul from Saskatchewan, the big grain province, is between 800 and 900 miles. Both in the north of the province and in the south that distance is exceeded. From the central parts of Alberta, also, the average haul is 400 or 500 miles farther. So you begin to realize the distances that the people of the prairies have to send their grain before it reaches, not the seaboard, but the head of the Lakes. That being the case, they are very keenly interested in the question of rates.

I am not going to discuss the tariff in this connection, but I do think that the question of railway rates and two or three other things are infinitely more important to the farmers of the prairies than anything else.

Now let us look for one moment at the competing conditions. I will give you only one illustration, and that is from the Argentine, a very keen and large competitor in the English market. Through the courtesy of the Trade and Commerce Department here, I have procured some information regarding the Argentine. This is dated June 16, 1922, and is the latest report I could get. The present rate on cargoes of wheat from Buenos Aires to the United Kingdom is 25 shillings per ton. I have figured out that the average ocean rate to Great Britain or to the continental ports of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, etc., would at that time be only 16¼ cents per bushel, and the average railway rate would be 13¼ cents. That would make 29½ cents. I do not know what is the present rate from the port of Montreal to the European markets but very recently it was 12 cents a bushel. Taking both the northern and the southern route, the distance would not average more than 3,000 miles, whereas the distance from the Argentine is over 6,000 miles, or more than double. A ship could make two trips from Montreal for every one it could make from the Argentine; yet the rate from Montreal was 12 cents while that from the Argentine was 16¼ cents.

As to railway rates I do not think anyone who is familiar with the question will say that at the present time they are higher in Canada than are profitable to the railways. In any event I am ready to concede that the rates, which have been investigated—and I have followed the investigations—are lower on the Canadian Pacific and on the Canadian Government system of railways in Northwestern Canada than the rates from corresponding points in Minnesota, the Dakotas, and Montana; but the quantity of grain shipped from corresponding points in Montana and the western part of North Dakota is a mere bagatelle compared with the quantity shipped from Saskatchewan or Alberta. In other words, the great grain trade in the United States lies very much nearer their ports, like Duluth, for Minnesota is a great grain state, as you all know, and there is not the long haul that there is in the Canadian Northwest from Winnipeg to the head of the Lakes, through an area which is practically barren of production of any kind. Therefore the great bulk of the United States grain does not cost so much money to ship as the settlers in the Canadian Northwest have to pay, although the present rate per mile on the Canadian Pacific is lower in Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Manitoba than the corresponding rate in the United States.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: How much lower is it?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I have not the rates before me at present, but it is appreciably lower.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: About 30 per cent.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: But it has to be lower yet. The putting into force of the Crow's Nest Pass Agreement has been discussed in this House, in another place, and throughout the country. There is no doubt that the renewal of the Agreement was of very great assistance to the farmers of the Northwest last year, but the rates given under the Crow's Nest Pass Agreement are not as low as the rates that were enjoyed by Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan prior to 1918. In other words, the railways themselves gave a better rate than is provided under the Crow's Nest Pass Agreement. It is a fact that we have gone only as far back as the Crow's Nest Pass Agreement, and that the rate is still one that the farmer is not able to bear. I am not a prophet of evil. I have little sympathy with those who slander Western Canada. I have absolute faith in its future. It is passing through an ordeal, and undoubtedly trying times, but I have no doubt that it will right itself yet. Crop conditions in Western Canada are favourable for this year. Granted certain things that this Parliament can do, I look for the return of old-time prosperity and old-time optimism. There is out in the West a great deal that is wrong and that no Parliament can legislate on. It is only socialists who expect this Parliament to redress certain of our disadvantages.

Coming now specifically to the Report of the Commission, we find that the rates were discriminatory. We all know that in railway transportation there is no discrimination in rates. The Railway Commission fixes the maximum and the minimum rate. The Commissioners in this case have reported that in their judgment it was not possible to apply the same principle to steamboat transportation. For many reasons the rate must be left largely within the range of competition in shipping. I think that is a reasonable conclusion. But the Commissioners have suggested that there should be a maximum rate, and if you look at the Report you will find that there has been a great deal of discrimination as between shippers. I am going to give a few illustrations taken from the Report. These figures all relate to the fall of 1922. On October 31 there were rates of 4 cents and 6 cents; on November 2, a rate of 9 cents per bushel; on November 10, a rate of 5 cents and a rate of 8 cents; on the 12th, rates of 8 cents and 9½ cents; on the 13th, 4½ cents, 7 cents and 8 cents; on the 18th, a rate of 10 cents; on the 21st, a rate of 8 cents; on the 22nd, rates of 5 cents and 8 cents. These are for absolutely the same distances. On the 26th there were rates of 8 cents and 10 cents.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Were those different shippers?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: No, not always different shippers. In some cases the same shipper has been given different rates. That was brought out in the evidence before the Commission.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There would be no evidence of discrimination to the same shipper.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Oh, yes. There might be a discrimination in two rates. There would not likely be discrimination to the same shipper; but two shippers who offered their wheat on the same day might be quoted two different rates for the same boat.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Can the honourable gentleman tell this House at what dates the contracts were made for the space? I do not want to interrupt, but I would ask the honourable gentleman to make that clear. It often happens that on the same ship different lots of grain are carried at different rates, because some people have contracted for space at a certain figure, and at another time other people have contracted at another price. That is how the difference is accounted for.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: There is no doubt that some of the shippers contracted long in advance. For instance, Mr. Stewart, who gave evidence before the Commission, contracted for a considerable amount of space a very long time ahead. But in the evidence before the Commission it was brought out that on the same day, not for contracts made long in advance, but for fresh contracts, different rates were quoted to different people. That is the point as to which, I think, the honourable gentleman asked specifically. I can quite understand the propriety of the rates being not absolutely uniform, because a certain shipper may have made his contract for a considerable amount of space a long time in advance, and from various causes the rates may have gone up or down in the meantime. The Commission do not say that the shipping rates should be uniform, although, a uniform rate is applicable to railways. They say that a uniform rate may not properly be applicable to shipments by boat, but that there ought to be a maximum rate.

The Commission deal also with the question of insurance. The average person who does no shipping at all would assume that when he put his goods on shipboard he would have a perfect right to insure them in his own way, for little or for much, at whatever rate would obtain. But not so on the Great Lakes. The Commission has found specifically, in several instances, which are given, that the shipper had to pay for insurance exactly twice the rate for which the insurance could be obtained elsewhere. Illustrations of this are given in the Report. The ship-brokers in Winnipeg are all in a combination. They control about 90 per cent of the shipments, and if you are not willing to place your insurance on the cargo with those brokers, who procure you space in the boats, you cannot ship at all. That is a rather an amazing fact. Anything shipped across the Atlantic or the Pacific, other than grain, you can ship at your own risk if you wish, or you may insure at the best rate you can get.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does my honourable friend contend that the rates on boats should be the same the year round, as the rates are on railways, for instance.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: No, I do not. What I have said is that I agree with the finding of the Commission in that respect—that there should be a maximum rate.

I now return to the question of insurance. It is not my assertion, but is the finding of the Commission, that a shipper cannot place his own insurance. I have heard that charged for very many years—that you could not place your own insurance on grain on the Great Lakes; and when, a couple of years ago, we had a special committee of this House inquiring into the shipment of grain by the port of Quebec, I asked a very distinguished gentleman who appeared before that Committee, and who was a very important official of one of these companies shipping at the head of the Lakes, if it was not the case that the shipper was not at liberty to put his own insurance on his own grain.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is right. Nobody denies it.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Well, he did deny it. I do not want to bring his name into this discussion, because it does not necessarily arise, but he did deny the assertion that had been made. The Commision recommends that the shipper should have the right that he has with everything else, of placing his own insurance wherever he likes, and at whatever rate he likes.

There is another phase of the matter. The Commission finds not only discrimination in rates and very arbitrary dealing in connection with insurance, but also that our Canadian shipping on the Great Lakes favours American ports as against Canadian ports that it discriminates against Canadian ports. It gave rates to Buffalo and to Port Colborne cheaper than to Georgian Bay ports at times, and a boat would, I take it, make two trips by the Georgian Bay route while it would make one trip to Port Colborne or to Buffalo.

The rate last year was a high one. In a recent discussion in the House some honourable gentlemen quoted Mr. Bracken, the head of the Manitoba Government, as saying that the farmers had suffered the loss of $20,000,000 this year by the high rate.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: But the total trade was only $12,000,000.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I think that was a rather excessive estimate. However, the Commission made the finding that in 1921 the average rate per bushel from Port Arthur to Port Colborne was 2.85 cents, whereas last year it was 4.05 cents, or an increase of 42 per cent. That is a very substantial amount. They also find that there were shipped at the head of the Lakes about 275,000,000 bushels of grain, 55 per cent of which went to American ports and the balance to Canadian ports. But the shipowners say: "We have not made any money." I do not know whether they have or not; but I do know that the farmers lost money by reason of the increased rates, and I know that the Commission reports that the Canadian boats made more money out of their purely Canadian traffic than they did out of their international traffic. As you all know, our Canadian boats carry grain from American ports to Buffalo and Port Colborne and the Georgian Bay ports; and it has been contended for many years that the Canadian ships on the Upper Lakes cannot be profitably operated because they have not got return cargoes of coal. I am not here to try to make out a case for anybody, but I am here to endeavour to put the facts fairly as I understand them, and I dare say that may be true; but I do think it is an advantage to the American shipping to have a return cargo. But, after all, the Commission has investigated the quantity of coal taken back, and I was somewhat astonished to learn that the ships went back loaded only to the extent of 20 or 30 per cent.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That pays the expenses going back.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: No doubt it helps, and I do not contend that it is not an advantage. It would be an advantage to Canada if we had return cargoes. But the Commission finds that the average earning per hour of boats engaged in purely Canadian grain trade, that is, from one Canadian port to another, is $42.02, and the average earning in international trade is $24.07.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Does this apply both ways?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Yes, because among other things the Canadian boats are more cheaply manned than are the American boats. The American boats have an eight hour shift, with three crews a day; we have two shifts.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: They have higher wages.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Yes. The companies may or may not pay large dividends.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They do not pay any just now.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: 42 per cent.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Some people get very great advantages out of them. The Commission investigated the cost to the companies of some of the boats, and what was the fixed value of their assets. Let me give you a quotation from the report. One of the companies was putting a flotation on the market and the law, I suppose in every province in Canada, provides specifically that the representations made in prospectuses must be true. That prospectus contained a letter of the president of the company, which said:

> The net earnings, after deducting depreciation, for the year ending December 31st, 1921, exceeded five times the amount required for interest on this issue.

Five times the amount required for interest on the issue would be $350,000; but in Exhibit No. 329, which was put in as part of the evidence of the company, it is stated that the net earnings of 1921 were only $133,974.39. No satisfactory explanation of this astonishing difference is tendered.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They were shy.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: There is another illustration of the same kind. On examination of the assets of the companies we may find that some of them were very greatly overestimated. In fact, material has appeared publicly more than once showing gross overvaluation of many of the ships on the Upper Lakes. But I pass on.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Let us have it.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: There was a similar representation in the prospectus of another company as to the amount they could pay as a dividend on their earnings. The discrepancy is equally great.

The Commission has found that there is a combine.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Like the Wheat Board.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Like the Wheat Board, perhaps. They make a specific finding, and they make certain recommendations. They suggest that the dates of sailing of all boats, the space open to charter, and the destinations, should be posted up daily in the ship-brokers' offices. I do not know why the vessel-owners should not employ their own brokers, as railway companies employ their own freight solicitors who go to people and solicit business. The vessel-owners could employ their own brokers and pay them themselves, and shippers could place their insurance where they saw fit. The vessel-owners could fix any rate they saw fit for the transportation of grain, subject to the maximum recommended by the Commission. It appears from the evidence that at the present time the farmer sells to a grain-buyer in Winnipeg or at the head of the Lakes or somewhere else, and it is the shipper or grain-dealer who deals with the ship-owners.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The speculators.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Speculators, many of them. The shippers, as set out in the evidence given before the Commission, are unable to go to the ship-brokers and find what space is available, the dates of sailing, and the destinations. If they get all that information they are obligated to place their insurance with the shipping agent at twice what it would cost to place it elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not want to interrupt the honourable gentleman, but I would like to know where in the report he finds that statement.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: It is in the sworn evidence.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not want to disturb the honourable gentleman—

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: It does not disturb me at all. If you look at table 19, page 65, which I have taken the trouble to extend somewhat, I think you will find it. These are the rates per $100:

Period	Trough Vessel Broker	Written Direct
April to November 30th..	30 cents	15 cents
December 1st to December 5th	$1.00	50 cents
December 6 to December 8. ..	1.25	50 cents
December 9 to December 10 ..	1.50	75 cents
December 11 to December 12..	2.00	$1.00
After December 12..	2.50	1.25

Mr. Bawlf, one of the leading grain merchants of Winnipeg, stated in evidence that he wanted to place his own insurance, and could do it at half the rates charged by the shipping brokers.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes. Brokers offered that when they had no insurance to do it.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Oh, but they did. If I am not mistaken, Mr. Bawlf got insurance elsewhere. However, I have given you my authority for making the statement.

We had the Government Merchant Marine. I understand now that it is the intention of the Government to let some 27 of the vessels of less than 5,000 tons go. I say this subject to correction. I wrote to the authorities of the company, and they were kind enough to supply information as to the tonnage they used on the Upper Lakes and on the ocean during the year 1922, and the number of bushels they transported. On the Upper Lakes in 1922 they had the following boats:

Adventurer, Engineer, Pathfinder, Sailor, Signaller, Sower, Trader, Warrior. These were placed on the Great Lakes on October 11, 1922, and operated until December 7, 1922, and carried 3,193,159 bushels of grain.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Did they charge any less than the other boats?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I do not believe they did.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: No, the Government put them in the combine.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I will have a word to say on that too. In 1923 they again had several boats on the Upper Lakes. In 1922 they had general cargo ocean boats taking grain to Great Britain and the continent. These were the following: Aviator, Carrier, Challenger, Commander, Conquer, Constructor, Cruiser, Explorer, Leader, Mariner, Miller, Navigator, Otter, Pioneer, Raider, Rancher, Ranger, Runner, Seigneur, Squatter, Spinner, Trapper, Trooper, Victor, Volunteer, Voyageur. They carried to Great Britain 12,247,347 bushels, and to the continent 623,952 bushels.

They had also a number of boats on the ocean transport in 1923. I will not trouble you with the names of those vessels. They carried to Great Britain 4,136,856 bushels, and to the continent 759,417 bushels.

The honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) has asked me whether the Government Merchant Marine gave more favourable rates than the other boats. From all I have been able to find, they were directly represented in the combine meetings. The boats were never put on the ocean or on the Great Lakes by the people of Canada for that purpose; and why those of less than a certain capacity are being sold I do not know. I do not want the Government Merchant Marine to institute or cut rates that will leave nothing for anybody else. I believe in the shipowner being given reasonable compensation for his services, and a reasonable return under normal conditions on his real capital investment, after squeezing out the water.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Did the Government Merchant Marine make a profit even at those rates?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I do not know.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: The officers did.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I cannot substantiate my statement, but I am inclined to believe that they made a profit on the grain, both on the lakes and on the ocean. It is true that they did not make a profit on the whole of their operations.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: They paid too much for their vessels.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: It is possible. They were constructed when the cost of shipping was excessive. They are trying to pay interest on a capitalization based on war time construction costs, and will always be up against very great difficulty.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They lost on the mere operation, let alone overhead.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: But the fact that the Canadian Merchant Marine lost money in 1922 in no way proves the proposition that they lost money in the shipment of grain either on the lakes or on the ocean.

It is perfectly clear from the evidence given before the Commission that when the weekly meetings of the representatives of the different shipping lines took place in Montreal or New York, the representatives of the Government Merchant Marine sat in at those meetings, and there was a gentleman's agreement made. I know that is not confined to shipping alone; but I know of no reason why the Government's should sit in and hear the discussion of rates of line companies. I think it would be very interesting to know, and I think the Government would be warranted in finding out, whether money was lost by the Canadian Merchant Marine in the transportation of grain alone. I know that the transportation of grain in Northwestern Canada is the most profitable thing they have. It furnishes very much the greater volume of their traffic, and it is the more lucrative end of it. As to shipment across the ocean, we know that grain is one of the very best kinds of ballast. The liners like it, as we know, and when the rates are reasonably attractive tramp vessels come in. They are always found on the North American coast. Grain is one of the cheapest and safest and most easily handled kinds of ballast that a vessel can have, and I do not think there is any justification for the grain rates from Montreal being higher all the time than the rates from New York. The rates from that American triangle are better than the rates from Montreal. Incidentally in that connection, there is one thing that I think the Government ought to do. We know that the rates of marine insurance in the Gulf and on the St. Lawrence are higher than they are from United States ports.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Always.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I know that Governments have already investigated that. There was talk at one time of forming a Canadian Lloyds. I think it would be quite legitimate for the Government to expend a sum of money in compensating the Canadian ship-owners and equalizing the rates from Montreal and Quebec with the rates from the American ports, making it a charge on the general revenues of Canada.

To proceed further with the report. The Commissioners have found that there is a combine. I have already said all I wish to say in that connection. They have shown a very wide spread of rates in the fall of 1922. Again I apologize for reading some of the figures, honourable gentlemen. I read them because the report is not at present accessible to everybody. The Commission, in table 9, on page 31 of their report, give some of the rates charged by the boats on grain from September 1st up to the close of navigation in 1922, and they give the number of bushels that are carried at these respective rates, and the percentage of the whole. Here are some of the figures:

Rate	Bushels	Per cent of total bushels
3..	5,282,000	22.1
3⅛..	488,000	2.0
3½..	799,000	3.3
3¾..	217,000	....
4	6,546,000	27.4
4½..	641,000	2.7
4¾..	505,000	2.1
5	1,443,000	6.0
5½..	1,450,000	6.1
6	1,074,000	4.0
6½..	74,000	....
6⅞..	131,000	....
7	442,000	1.7
7½..	272,000	....
8	3,305,000	13.8
9	500,000	2.1
9¾..	111,000	....
10	380,000	1.4
11	151,000	....
Total..	23,821,000

They say, in conclusion, in that part of the report, that 22.8 million bushels, or 85 per cent of the total, are covered by the rates whose bushel percentages have been extended. So we find the rate spreading from 3 cents up to, in one instance, 22 cents, if I remember rightly.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: For 36,000 bushels.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: It would not be a typical shipment at all. But these rates, from September 1st, do run from 3 cents to 11 cents.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman has already said that the average throughout the summer was 4.05 cents.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Yes, that is right; because a very large amount of the shipments in the early part of the year were at from 3 to 4 cents; but towards the end of the season, even before the close of navigation, you find the rates gradually mounting up until they get to 9, 10 and 11 cents.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They do not mount in proportion to the increase in insurance at the end of the season.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I do not know when navigation closed last year. I know that after the formal close of navigation boats still run at the owners' risk. I do not know on what terms it is possible to get insurance. But allow me to say to the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) that these rates that I have quoted are the rates, not to the close of shipping, but to the close of navigation. So we find a very large quantity of grain shipped at rates of 6 to 11 cents while navigation is still open. The people who got their grain down late last year certainly had to pay a very exorbitant rate, whereas those who were fortunate enough to get it down earlier in the year had a rate of 4.05 cents on the average, or up to 5 cents, which was not so exorbitant.

I have already stated to you that the spread in rates between the preceding year and last year was, I think, 42 per cent. The Commission finds that there was no such increased cost in the operation of the boats in 1922 over 1921 as would warrant that increase.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: There was no demand for space the year before, because there was a very light crop.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Oh, no, that is not right.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I fancy the demand for space was not so good. That is the very thing that the farmers blame on those people, that once there is a congestion they immediately jump up the rates.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Because there is an increased demand. It is the law of supply and demand.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I grant you there was undoubtedly an increased demand last year over 1921, but if the report of this Commission is acted upon and the Government fixes a maximum rate, which should not be an excessive rate, then it will have to fluctuate between that fixed rate and the lowest rate that the vessel owner is willing to take. I hope that no Government, or no Commission appointed by this or any other Government, would ever dream of fixing a rate of 8, 9, 10 or 11 cents a bushel, during navigation, for the hauling of grain between those ports.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Might not the fixing of a maximum rate cause very serious congestion? Might not people wait to take advantage of the low rate to ship their grain?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I do not apprehend that that condition would arise. If you follow the rates year in and year out you know that they are lower in the springtime than later on. It is in the fall that the rates begin to mount rapidly, from the month of September, usually, or from the month of August. The rates later in the year would undoubtedly be higher than in the springtime.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: May I ask the honourable member how he would compel the steamship companies to carry grain at a fixed rate?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I do not know that you could compel them at all, and that is one reason why I would not sell our Canadian shipping, the Government Merchant Marine. I think the Government should retain it, so that we might have ships owned and operated by Canada for the purpose of preventing any such catastrophe as that of the ship-owner saying, "We will not ship your grain."

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: We might change the coasting laws.

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: If the rate is too low, will not the boats go elsewhere rather than carry Canadian grain?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I do not think so. If we are to believe the report of the Commission, the Canadian vessel-owners made more money this year in the purely Canadian trade than they did in international trade. As every vessel-owner knows, much better than I do—for he knows in practice and I know it only as a student of this matter—the competition is much keener in the American ports than in the Canadian.

As to our coasting laws, I frankly say, as I said in the House incidentally in another connection the other day, I would not abrogate them altogether if the Americans did not reciprocate. I would not give them the unrestrained right to use our harbours and all our facilities and our coast waters if they would not give us something in return.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And paid no taxes and no wages in Canada.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: No, I would not do that. The Commission have not made such a drastic recommendation as that. They have recommended that the Government have the right by Order in Council to set aside, whenever they see fit, the coasting laws—in short, to suspend their operation. I can see no objection to that. The only question is, who is to exercise that right? I do not know whether it could best be exercised by the Government, or whether it should be left to some independent body such as the Railway Commission, or some body constituted for the purpose of carrying out the recommendations of this Commission. But I do think that every fall, once rates were found to be mounting to these figures, some body should have the absolute right to suspend the operation of our coasting laws. According to my understanding, in any event, it is only in the fall that there is keen competition from the American boats, and that competition is not felt to any extent in the spring or the early part of the summer. That is the recommendation of the Commission, at any rate, and it is obvious from their findings that the rate for the transport of grain is cheaper on the American side than it is on our side from corresponding points. The Commission find that the competition over there is keener, with the larger number of vessels, and the rates are lower, and if the Government or any other body had the right to suspend the operation of the coasting laws we would have keener competition here.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I would draw the honourable gentleman's attention to the fact that on the American side there is demurrage; only a certain number of hours are allowed for unloading. There is no demurrage that I know of on the Canadian side.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, there is.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Where? Not last summer.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Demurrage was claimed at Port Colborne, according to the evidence of the Commission. What occurs at Georgian Bay ports I do not know, but I remember the evidence in connection with Port Colborne.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: While there may be demurrage on both sides, is it not fair to state that on the American side there is a charge for elevating, which is not always included in the rate, but which makes the rate very much the same as to the Canadian ports.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Do you mean at Buffalo and Toledo?

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: Yes; an elevating charge that balances the rate. The honourable gentleman spoke of one rate being lower than the other.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I do not think it balances. I think that at some places they have an elevation charge. However, this fact has been brought out, not only in the evidence given before the Commission, but also by the committee of this House that investigated the transport of grain via Quebec, and heard evidence largely from grain people, that the grain will seek its easiest and cheapest outlet, and the easiest and cheapest outlet was found to be the ports of New York and Portland. Last year, 1922, we sent 55 per cent of our grain out through American channels. The aggregate cost of sending grain through our own channels must be greater than by the other route, or the grain would take the Canadian route.

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: Why is the port of Montreal the largest grain exporting port in America?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I am very glad that it is, and I believe that with the extended facilities that are being provided at the port of Montreal this year, both for the loading and the storage of grain, the port of Montreal is bound to grow very largely.

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: And also to give a cheap rate.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: And give cheaper rates too, I think. The complaint against the port of Montreal has been, not that they were not doing all they could, but that the pressure on their handling facilities was so great that the port was congested at times. The vessel-owners make that complaint.

It has been suggested, however, as I notice by the papers, that to crystallize into law some of the recommendations of the Commission would be ultra vires of the Federal Parliament. It is said, for instance, that the fixing of the insurance rate is a matter of civil contract. I am not speaking as a lawyer, or as one who has given any legal consideration to the question, but I do not see any legal difficulty whatever to prevent the Dominion Government, which has under its exclusive jurisdiction navigation and shipping, and the regulation and control of harbours, quays, lighthouses and everything pertaining to shipping, from licensing certain vessels to transport grain, and requiring as a condition for the granting of such licenses that the vessels shall avoid any unfair discrimination and give equality of treatment to everybody as to rates, and permit everybody to insure his own grain in any way he sees fit. The threat of invoking legal action to invalidate any law of the Dominion Government is, in my opinion, a mere brutum fulmen. I think the Dominion Government should go very much further than to suspend the operation of the coasting laws under certain circumstances; they should put the regulation of the shipping rates under the Railway Board or some other Commission appointed for the purpose. This matter is vital to the people of the West. They plead for you as well as for themselves. The people of the West are generous purchasers when they have the money, and they do not enjoy to the full the commercial prosperity of the Eastern provinces. The West gains the least benefit from any system of protection, but in many cases, even where it has lost, it has been willing to make concessions for the stability of Canadian industry as a whole; and I think the East has to make corresponding concessions to help the staple industry of the West and put it again in a flourishing condition. I know that Parliament will deal generously with the great industry of the West, the raising of grain, and to help make it profitable.

I have shown the heavy rates to the English and the continental markets. The United States are more favourably situated than we are, because grain in that country is frequently above export price because of the large local demand of the milling interests. On very few occasions has the price of grain in Canada been in excess of the export price. In other words, in the United States the home consumption, relative to the production, is very much greater than it is in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: How do prices of Canadian and Argentine grain compare in the Old Country?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: The price of our grain is higher because it is a harder grain; but the Argentine grain is a very keen competitor. We know that London has become one of the greatest milling centres in the world. The millers of Canada say they are discriminated against in the transport of flour to the Old Country market. The Old Country miller can draw on all the grain-growing countries of the world for his grain, which puts him in a very favourable position, and the spread between the price of the Argentine wheat and the Northwest wheat does not represent the difference in grade.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: Is not the price of wheat regulated by the London or the Liverpool market rather than by the price which may be charged for freight on wheat from Fort William to the seaboard?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: If I apprehend the honourable gentleman's question, he says the price of wheat is not fixed in Liverpool in any way.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It is.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: And that the rates do not affect it.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I would not accede to the proposition at all that the return value of grain in Liverpool or Rotterdam or Hamburg is not affected by the cost of shipping.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It does not affect your argument.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: Was it the farmers who were affected by the high freight rate that existed on the Upper Lakes last season, or was it the brokers who sold the wheat?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The speculators.

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: Or the speculators, who were forced to deliver later on?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: The same question came before the Commission, and Mr. Stewart said the rate was reflected back to the grower.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: He would say that.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: And it is true. I would say to the question of the honourable gentleman that the broker at times might be the suffered; but I know also that the farmers of the West constantly carry their grain and borrow money from the banks and do not sell up to the last minute. The best answer I can give is that of Mr. Stewart, who is a large dealer himself.

I thank you, honourable gentlemen, for having listened to me so patiently this evening.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman is to be congratulated for having taken the trouble to study the work and report of the Commission. I think that when money is spent in making investigations of this kind, it is very proper that some members of this House should take the trouble, as the honourable gentleman has done, to enlighten us we regard to what has been done.

Hon. J. G. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, now that this matter has been so well brought to the attention of the Government, I trust the leader of the Government in this House will see that the necessary and proper action is taken to remedy what has been proven under oath before the Commission, and to see in the future that the Government Merchant Marine and also the other boats on the Great Lakes are not allowed to discriminate between one shipper and another, or against Canadian ports in favour of American ports, and in favour of American producers as against the interests of Canadian producers. It was proven under oath, and acknowledged by the manager, that the Canadian Government Marine sat in with the other lake and ocean shippers in the North American combine, and allowed American flour, to take one particular item, to be carried from American ports to Europe at 15 cents a sack, or 15 cents a hundred, while flour, made from Canadian wheat and ground in Canada, had to pay from 18 to 19 cents. That is a difference of about 20 per cent.

I have seen it stated in the press that in all probability the Government will not do much more than provide that the coasting laws may be abrogated by Order in Council to allow American vessels to come in and operate between Canadian ports when prices on our Canadian vessels go very high. I think they should have the right to put an end to such exorbitant charges as were made last fall. Last fall the owners of the lake vessels complained that they had to charge more for carrying wheat to Canadian ports because of the time that was lost in unloading; but it was proven that the same vessels made more trips during the season of 1922 than they had made during the season of 1921.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Because they had no grain to carry. They could not make the trips.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: My honourable friend is wrong if he makes the statement that there was no grain to carry from the crop of 1921. There were several hundred millions of bushels to carry, and it was carried chiefly, if not altogether, by our Canadian ships—and in neither 1921 or 1922 was there much delay in unloading those vessels. There is no excuse on those grounds for the tremendous rise in the cost of bringing wheat down from the upper end to the lower end of the lakes. The cost of running a ship was considerably less in 1922 than it was in 1921, so everything pointed to a reduction of freight rates for the crop of 1922.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: You forget the coal strike.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: But the cost was higher. As has been pointed out by my honourable friend from Moose Jaw (Hon. Mr. Willoughby), unless something is done to enable the western Canadian farmer to grow his wheat at a profit, there will not be so much wheat grown for the Canadian vessels to carry. My honourable friend from Montreal (Hon. Mr. Webster) suggested that if the price was fixed too low, the ships would not carry the freight. I remember that a few years ago ships carried millions of bushels of wheat from the upper end of the lakes to the lower end of the lakes at two, two and a quarter, two and a half, and sometimes even less than two cents, and were making money; and if the Railway Board were to deal with the matter, I do not think there would be any danger of them making the rates too low. My honourable friend need be a bit afraid of the boats standing idle, as I do not think anybody appointed to fix the minimum rates would make them so low that the boats would not be able to carry the wheat at a good profit. The Government boats stood idle last year while there were complaints from New Brunswick that there were millions of feet of lumber awaiting shipment to the Old Country; but the North American combine had made the rates, so high and they would not reduce them, that ships were tied up down in the lower provinces. We cannot expect much from the shipping combines when we find our own Government standing in with them; we cannot expect the combine to be any better than the Government; but I hope this investigation, which has shown up the facts of the case pretty well, as evidenced by the report, which I think is a very fair one, will open the eyes of the Government to the necessity of dealing with this matter in a strong way, so that the farmers of the West will not lose all the benefits they gained by the Crowsnest rates being put into effect again.

If we spend practically $100,000,000 in establishing a merchant marine, surely it ought to be used to keep freight rates at a moderate level; otherwise, the whole country is going to suffer. However, I do not think there should be any difficulty in coming to some arrangement to prevent a recurrence of what happened last year.

My honourable friend pointed out what has been done in regard to insurance. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been simply taken out of the hands of the farmers on the insurance of grain coming down the lakes. They have had to pay double what they could insure their grain for themselves. My honourable friend from Montreal (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) says that the insurance companies have a combine, and that the rates are all the same. It is true enough that we have to pay the combine rates of the insurance companies, but this time we were forced to pay double those rates.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: You could not be. Insurance is all the same price, like postage stamps.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: But it was done. A man shipping one hundred thousand bushels of wheat could insure that wheat at from 15 to 18 cents on the hundred dollars if he could go out and place his own insurance; but as the honourable gentleman from Moose Jaw (Hon. Mr. Willoughby) has pointed out, he could not get space unless he agreed to insure through the man who gave him the space, and paid 30 cents for his insurance.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: 35 cents.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: And there were hundreds of thousands of dollars lost in that way.

If there ever was a time when it was up to the Government to put an end to what has been going on, and to stop three Americans in Montreal from drawing hundreds of thousands of dollars each year out of the price the farmer gets for his wheat, it is now. I congratulate the honourable gentleman from Moose Jaw for bringing this matter forward in the way in which he has. It is up to my honourable friend on my left (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) to see that the Government takes the necessary action—which I am sure the Government will do. I do not see that the Government has any object in standing in with a few men to rob the whole country, and I feel they will act, and act promptly and strongly; and I trust that the rumours we have heard about them doing practically nothing except abrogating the coasting laws are not correct.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Where did the honourable gentleman get such confidence in the Government?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: It is not so much that I have confidence in the Government, as that the case is so plain and the results such that I do not think they will have the nerve to do anything else. The matter has been placed before the Government by the honourable member for Moose Jaw (Hon. Mr. Willoughby), and I still have enough faith in them to think that they will come pretty near doing what is right.

Hon. W. H. BENNETT: Honourable gentlemen, I did not assume for a moment that such a debate concerning the Northwest would go by with only one or two voices being raised. I hope, therefore, it will stand for another day. I would like to ask the leader of the House whether, as stated in the press the other day, it is the policy of the Government simply to introduce legislation giving the Government power to abrogate the coasting laws, or whether it is their intention to go further in the matter of freight rates. Perhaps when the House meets again we will have an answer.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The answer was given lately in another place by the Prime Minister, who said that a Bill was being prepared and early this week would be introduced, to give effect to the conclusions of the Commission. We shall not have very long to wait to see what is in the Bill. It must not be forgotten, when the Government is assailed because those ships have asked and obtained the same price as other ships, that the Government is represented by the National Railway Board, which has had the sole administration of that part of the system; for the shipping has been managed in conjunction with the railways, under the supervision of the Railways Board. The Government should be given credit at least for having initiated the inquiry to ascertain the reasons for those rates increasing in the autumn; and since the Government has gone to that trouble, I would credit it with being logical enough to conform, so far as the law will permit, to the conclusions of that report.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The complaint is not that the Government have been running those boats with a view to getting fair rates, but that they have leased the Government boats to the conspirators in the combine.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is another question, which my honourable friend may raise later. I understand that he moves the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I move the adjournment of the debate. I would prefer to have it adjourned until the day after to-morrow, because I want to peruse the evidence.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bennett, the debate was adjourned.

CARGOES OF UNREGISTERED TRAWLERS

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Will the honourable leader of the House kindly take a note of an order of the Senate which I obtained on the 8th of March last that is three months ago with regard to fish trawlers landing their catches in the Maritime Provinces? It would appear to be nearly time for the return to be brought down to the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will inquire about it.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION BILL

MOTION FOR THIRD READING POSTPONED

On the Order:

Third reading Bill 84, an Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907 as amended —Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I understood that an amendment moved by the honourable Senator from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) would be withdrawn at this stage. We might recommit the Bill to Comittee of the Whole.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON: May I suggest to the honourable leader of the Government that this Order be discharged and placed on the Order Paper for to-morrow? I think that the honourable member from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), on further consideration of the amendment of section 8, agrees that there are one or two features deserving and indeed requiring further examination, and on the third reading a motion may be made for the reconsideration of that amendment. But in the absence of the honourable member from Hamilton I would prefer that the order be discharged and placed on the Order Paper for to-morrow.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: Before the Order is discharged, may I ask if we are to understand that upon the application for a Board the employer might make a change, without waiting for its report?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It is not proposed to change at all the clause dealing with that question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The part of the Bill dealing with that question will not be affected by the suggested amendment, if it is moved when the Bill comes up again.

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: No, but can we not have an interpretation?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The effect of the amendment is that the employer will be at liberty to make a change immediately after he has applied for the appointment of a Board.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Order was discharged and placed on the Order Paper for to-morrow.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Hon. the SPEAKER announced that he had received a communication from the Governor General's Secretary informing him that the Right Honourable Sir Louis Davies, K.C.M.G., acting as Deputy of the Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber at 4 p.m., this day, for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain Bills.

VIMY RIDGE MEMORIAL

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF RESOLUTION

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Honourable gentlemen, I have the honour to inform you that I have received a letter from the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs which reads as follows:

I have it in command from His Excellency the Governor General to transmit to you copy of a despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, enclosing copy of a note from the French Ministry for Foreign Affairs conveying the thanks of the President of the Republic for the joint resolution of the Canadian Houses of Parliament regarding the gift of land on Vimy Ridge by the French Government.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Joseph Pope,
Under Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The letter enclosed is addressed to His Excellency the Governor General, the Right Honourable Lord Byng of Vimy:

Downing Street, 29 May, 1923.

My Lord,—With reference to my despatch No. 193 of the 28th of April, I have the honour to transmit to Your Excellency to be laid before your Ministers, the accompanying copy of a note from the French Ministry for Foreign Affairs, conveying the thanks of the President of the Republic for the joint resolution of the Canadian Houses of Parliament regarding the gift of land on Vimy Ridge by the French Government.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,
(Signed) Devonshire.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE INSURANCE CLAIMS

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call attention to insurance claims and reports in connection with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and will inquire:

1. What was the amount of the claim, if any, made upon the marine insurance underwriters in respect of a casualty recorded as occurring to the Canadian Farmer on or about the 18th of June, 1922?

2. Has this claim been paid or adjusted, and if so, for what amount?

3. If not paid or adjusted, what is the position of this claim?

4. If no claim has been made, has there been any protest, and any extension of protest delivered to the underwriters or their representatives. Is it the intention to base a claim on this extension of protest, if any?

5. (a) At what date first subsequent to the casualty recorded as of on or about the 18th of June was the Canadian Farmer docked for repairs? (b) Where was she docked? (c) What company made the repairs? (d) Who on behalf of the C.G.M.M. made the specifications for these repairs, and who inspected and certified to them on behalf of the C.G.M.M.?

6. (a) What was the amount of the account received from the dock company for these repairs? (b) What portion of this amount, if any, was made a charge against the underwrriters?

7. Has the account for these repairs been included in the Operating Account for the year ended 31st December, 1922? If not, why?

8. Is the amount of any claim for the casualty recorded as of on or about the 18th of June included in the estimated amount recoverable for insurance shown in the assets as at 31st December, 1922? If not, why?

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I had it in mind to call attention to certain insurance transactions in connection with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, but before doing so I would like the answers to the questions now on the Order Paper. So I will simply ask the questions at present, and defer until some other time the remarks which I had intended to make.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am quite agreeable to complying with the wishes of my honourable friend. I do not know in what form he will have an opportunity of bringing up the matter again, but he will always be able to do so by making another inquiry on this subject:

1. Claim, $8,715.95.
2. In course of adjustment.
3. Answered by No. 2.
4. Answered by Nos. 1 and 2.
5 (a) August 20, 1922; (b) Prince Rupert; (c) Prince Rupert Dry Dock Company; (d) Inspected and certified by Mr. T. Louden, Assistant Superintendent Engineer, Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, in conjunction with C. McCoskrie, representing Underwriters, and W. A. Wallace, representing British Corporation Classification Society.
6. (a) $8,500.00; (b) The whole amount, subject to adjustment.
7. No, as account not paid until April, 1923.
8. Yes; $215.95 survey fees, etc., paid August and September, 1922.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS PROPERTY PURCHASE

INQUIRY

On the notice:

By Hon. Mr. Fowler:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to and inquire from the Government whether it is the intention of the Canadian National Railways to purchase a property at a cost of $2,000,000 or at what price.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Fowler) does not specify the place. Assuming that the honourable gentleman refers to the negotiations respecting a certain property in Paris, France—which matter has been discussed at length in the House of Commons since Senator Fowler gave notice of his inquiry—it may be stated that the Canadian National Railway Company does not contemplate the purchase of the property in question, but that negotiations are in progress, details of which cannot as yet be made public, by means of which Canadian National Railways expect to lease a suitable location as the Paris offices of the National System.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

MOTION WITHDRAWN

On the notice:

By Hon. Mr. Blondin:

That he will call the attention of the Senate and of the Government to the desirability of amending The Bankruptcy Act of 1920, so that its provisions, as far as the Province of Quebec is concerned, should apply only to "Traders," in accordance with the common law of that province and also in accordance with all previous Bankruptcy or Insolvency Acts which have existed in the past.

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN: Honourable gentlemen, as substantial amendments to the Bankruptcy Act are now before this House, I think it would be proper that I should let the matter drop, and wait until the Bill itself comes up.

The motion was withdrawn.

CANADA TEMPERANCE BILL

RESTORED TO ORDER PAPER

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved:

That Bill 43, an Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act, be restored to the Orders of the Day for second reading to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is that the British Columbia Bill?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, partly.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LATE HON. SENATOR FORGET

TRIBUTES TO HIS MEMORY

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, it is our duty to record the loss of one of our colleagues, Senator Amédée Emmanuel Forget, who had been a member of this Chamber since 1911.

His state of health at the time of his appointment was far from being satisfactory, and he just managed to hold his own, although constantly suffering accute pain. It is largely due to his good and admirable wife, who watched over all his movements, as his guardian angel, that he resisted for such a period the violent attacks of a fatal disease. This sufficiently explains why we did not hear his voice in the debates of this Chamber.

Senator Forget was admitted to the Bar in 1871 and was deemed by all his colleagues to be splendidly endowed, and destined to have a brilliant career before the courts of Justice. To the surprise of all his friends, he answered the call of the West and accepted, in 1875, the secretaryship of the Half-breed Commission in Manitoba. Later in 1875 he was appointed one of the Commissioners for the settlement of the half-breed claims in the Northwest Territories. When a separate Government was set for the Northwest Territories, in 1876, he was appointed Clerk of the Council and Secretary to the Lieutenant-Governor. Later on, he was made Clerk of the Assembly at Regina, and in 1888 was made Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs for Manitoba and the Northwest Territories. He was promoted to the position of Indian Commissioner in 1895, and was made Lieutenant-Governor in 1898, in which post he remained till 1905, when he was made the first Lieutenant-Governor of Saskatchewan. At the end of his term, he was called to the Senate.

This gradual ascension from post to post, till he reached the highest office in the gift of the Crown, that of Lieutenant-Governor, would suffice as a complete eulogy of our late colleague, whose qualities were recognized by all the governments which held sway in Ottawa since 1875.

As I had not the privilege of any lengthy contact with the late Senator Forget, I will leave to my honourable friend Sir James Lougheed the privilege of completing this all-insufficient biography.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I am sure that we on this side of the House appropriate to ourselves the very fitting tribute which has been paid by my honourable friend to our late colleague Senator Forget. To those of us who have lived for a great number of years in the West his departure is like the severance of a link in the chain that for many years has bound together the old-timers in that western country. As long ago as 1875 the late Senator went to the Northwest. It was then in a very primitive condition as compared with eastern civilization. He saw the opening up and the development of that great country. He arrived on the scene about the time that the Government of Canada was attempting to adjust satisfactorily the differences which had led to the first rebellion in Manitoba. From that time down to the date of his death he was most closely associated and identified with the development of the West. It is seldom, as my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has very well observed, that one comes in contact with a public servant who, entering the service in what might be termed a minor office, reaches the highest place at the disposal of the Crown. The late Senator went to the Northwest as secretary of the first Half-Breed Commission. He became a commissioner for the adjustment of the half-breed differences in that country. Next he was Assistant Indian Commissioner, then Commissioner of Indian Affairs, then Lieutenant-Governor of the Northwest Territories, and afterwards Lieutenant-Governor of the great province of Saskatchewan, with which he was long identified. He was then, about twelve years ago, appointed to the Senate of Canada.

Those of us who knew the late Senator most intimately had the deepest sympathy with him in the almost constant sufferings which he heroically endured, he having been a semi-invalid for the last thirty odd years. Notwithstanding his painful condition from day to day, he performed his public duties, onerous as they were, not only to the credit of himself, but to the satisfaction of the people of the Northwest Territories and afterwards the province of Saskatchewan.

The death of Senator Forget will be felt deeply by the pioneers of that country and by the older settlers, with whom he came constantly in contact, as also by his colleagues in this Chamber. It is therefore my melancholy duty to give utterance to these few sentiments as a humble tribute to one who was so prominently identified with the interests of Western Canada.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, as a college mate and life-long intimate of the deceased I may be allowed to add a few words to what has been so simply stated. The deceased Senator was possessed of unequalled qualities of character which gained him the affection of every person with whom he came in contact. I may mention two striking examples of this.

In his youth he was sent by his parents to St. Albans, in the state of Vermont, to learn English. He remained there with a family for three or four months. In that time he gained the affection of that family to such a degree that until the death of the father and mother he was always considered and treated by them like one of their own children.

Again, when he came to Montreal from Marieville to study law, he entered the office of the late Sir Adolphe Chapleau. When he had been in that office but a few months he became most intimate with Sir Adolphe Chapleau, and was treated by Sir Adolphe as a brother. Sir Adolphe, although several years older than himself, had the most striking affection for him. As is well known, Sir Adolphe Chapleau was a strong Conservative. The late Senator Forget was at that time, as he always remained, a Liberal. His intimacy with Sir Adolphe Chapleau did not change his political convictions.

These facts show, what I have stated, that he was possessed of such personal charm, such frankness and other good qualities of character, that he gained the affection of all with whom he came in contact.

The late Senator remained firm in his convictions and performed the high duties to which the honourable member on the other side of the House (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has called attention. He was, as has been stated, Lieutenant-Governor for two consecutive terms, I think: the first for the Northwest Territories, and the second for the Province of Saskatchewan. Although in very poor health most of that time, he always performed his duties to the satisfaction of his country.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION BILL

THIRD READING POSTPONED

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of Bill 136, an Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907

He said: Honourable gentlemen, there was an amendment moved to this Bill by the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), which had the effect of removing from the authority of the Minister of Labour the appointment of a third arbitrator when the two parties could not agree in making a selection, and placing that appointment in the hands of the chief justice of a Superior court of a province. I was informed last week that the honourable member for Hamilton although the amendment was carried, did not intend to persist in it, and was disposed to retrace his steps. I do not know the reasons that actuated him. Perhaps, after mature consideration, he found that the Minister of Labour was in a better position to decide as to the person to be selected, and that information would have to be conveyed to a judge, while both parties would be striving to have their view favoured in the choice of the third arbitrator. At all events, I am informed that our colleague from Hamilton will not be here for the next two weeks, and that the honourable the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson) intends to move in the direction I have indicated. So I move the third reading of the Bill in order to give him the opportunity of moving that the Bill be not now read a third time, but be referred back to Committee.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Would you permit me just one moment. I do not know where my honourable friend the leader of the Government got his information with regard to the changed attitude of the member for Hamilton. The member for Hamilton was not alone in his idea, and whether he may have changed or not I do not know. There are other members of this honourable body, however, who took the same position as the honourable member from Hamilton, and who have not changed their viewpoint.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The matter is still in the hands of the majority of the Senate. It takes a majority to carry an amendment. The information I received was from the honourable gentleman who was about to rise (Hon. Mr. Robertson), who conveyed it to me while the honourable member from Hamilton was in the Chamber. As we were somewhat desirous of shortening our sitting that Friday afternoon, I was told that the matter could well go over, and I moved that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that is why it comes before us to-day. I took it for granted that the postponment was with the concurrence of the honourable gentleman from Hamilton. I am only sorry that he is not here to-day.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In addition to the remarks made by my honourable friend in moving the third reading of this Bill, I may, in explanation, state that the amendment to section 8 which was moved by the honourable gentleman from Hamilton was, as honourable gentlemen will recall, sprung upon the House and acted upon quickly and without much consideration; and that the honourable member who moved the amendment discussed the matter with me the following day and agreed that perhaps the question should receive further consideration. He even went to the extent of agreeing with me as to what further amendment might be desirable, and stated that he was prepared to second the motion which I am now about to make to refer this Bill back to the Committee of the whole for further consideration of the amendment to section 8. Personally I would have no objection whatever to further consideration of the Bill standing over until the honourable member from Hamilton is here, except that it might be putting the Bill off until too near the end of the Session, if the honourable gentleman is to be absent for two weeks. But as this is not the place to give the details of the further amendments suggested, nor the reasons therefor, I desire to move:

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole to-morrow for the purpose of considering the amendment to section 8.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I am somewhat at a loss to express myself upon this subject. The amendment which was moved by the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), and which was so overwhelmingly carried, seemed to me to appeal so strongly to the judgment and good sense of this House that, in the absence of the mover of the amendment, I think it would be very much better to know precisely what my honourable friend from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson) proposes to move. The condition of affairs which was pointed out to the Senate at the time the amendment was moved by the honourable gentleman from Hamilton did violence to one's sense of fair play—namely, that the umpire in a board of conciliation is appointed, according to recent practice, by Order in Council, or his appointment is determined by Council.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: On recommendation of the Minister of Labour.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: On the recommendation of the Minister of Labour. It does violence to one's sense of fair play to think that in an arbitration between two contending forces, the employee and the employer, the arbitrator should be determined by Order in Council. That is what it amounts to. That, according to the best practice in arbitration, which so largely takes the place of a judicial tribunal in determining important matters, the umpire should be judicially and not politically appointed, has been so well recognized, that I personally hesitate to say whether we should depart from the amendment which was so fully discussed and was so overwhelmingly carried in this Chamber when the Bill was before us for consideration.

However, I have always admired the excellent judgment of my honourable friend from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson), who, while acting as Minister of Labour in the late Government, held the scales of justice very impartially between the contending forces; I therefore hesitate to oppose any recommendation which he may make. At the same time, I should like to have the recommendation set out fully in the amendment which he purposes to move so that before we again consider it we may be in a position to consider fully whether the one should supersede the other.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: As the Deputy Governor General has arrived, I would suggest that we suspend our sitting during pleasure, and continue the debate after his departure.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

After some time the sitting was resumed.

The Right Honourable the Deputy of the Governor-General was pleased to retire.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, taking up the thread of the discussion before the House adjourned during pleasure, and replying in part to the remarks of the leader of this side of the House, I beg to say that I have no objection to giving an outline of the proposed amendments which would be offered if the House passes the motion now before it to refer this Bill back to the Committee of the Whole.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Go on.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The honourable member who moved the amendment to section 8 on May 31st, I think, overlooked two things which he now recognizes that he did overlook. In discussion with me he indicated the belief that it would be wise to refer this matter back to the Committee and to discuss it further. One fact which he overlooked was that the industries which he had in mind in moving the amendment, did not come within the scope of the Act. The second fact was that this House—and he was one of those who took a prominent part in the discussion—had eliminated the possibility of judges being used as chairmen of boards. I would call attention to the fact that prior to 1920, in almost every case in which the Minister had to appoint a chairman of a board of conciliation, a judge was selected; but in 1920 the Judges Act was amended, and again in 1921 it was further amended, so that judges could be used but could not be paid. Experience taught the Labour Department that judges, like other men, are not very anxious to render special services unless they are compensated. So the Department of Labour has been deprived of the services of judges as chairmen of boards. I would refer the House to the Hansard of 1921, in which it will be found that when this question was under discussion I expressed my belief that the workingmen of Canada had a very great respect for the opinions and decisions of our judges, and that the use of judges as chairmen of boards of conciliation was desirable in the interest of industrial peace, because a decision handed down by a judge as chairman of a board was more apt to be respected and accepted by both parties than the decision of a layman. Notwithstanding that, the Department has not been able to avail itself of the services of judges in that capacity.

The amendments which I had in mind as proposing to move were that our action of May 31st, taking the appointment of chairmen of boards entirely out of the hands of the Minister, should be reconsidered and rescinded, and that section 8 should be amended to provide that, notwithstanding anything in any other Act, judges might be compensated in keeping with section 51 of the Industrial Disputes Act.

I would point out one or two other disabilities which merit consideration. The amendment of the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) provided that the chief justice of a province in which a dispute might occur, should be called upon to name the third arbitrator in the event of the other two not agreeing. I respectfully submit to the House that the history of the Industrial Disputes Act will show that the very large majority of disputes —I should think at least two-thirds—are interprovincial in their character, and that therefore the duty of making a selection would devolve in most instances upon the Chief Justice of the Dominion of Canada rather than upon the chief justice of a province. If a dispute arises in the western coal fields, for example, the Coal Operators Association covers the southeastern part of British Columbia and the province of Alberta. One then asks whether the Chief Justice of Canada, or the Minister of Labour, would be in a better position to know the facts surrounding the case and to make an intelligent selection of a third arbitrator. Our railroads, likewise, are all practically interprovincial in their character, and the selection in all those cases, therefore, would devolve upon the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Now, what would occur? I submit that in all probability the Chief Justice of Canada, in the exercise of that duty, if he agreed to perform it—which I do not think he would be obliged to do—would take the advice of the Minister of Labour or the Government, and that the situation would not be at all altered from the one already in existence.

I hope honourable gentlemen will accept the statement that I am honestly desirous of making the Industrial Disputes Act effective and successful in its operation, so that it may achieve the end for which it was created, namely, to help in the settlement of industrial disputes and avoid the public inconvenience which necessarily follows from these. If we rescind the action taken the other day and leave not only the power but the responsibility of naming the third arbitrator in the hands of the Minister of Labour, and, by amending section 8 further, permit him to appoint judges as chairmen of boards, as was done in most cases prior to 1920, then I think we shall be making a constructive improvement in the Act. Indeed, while I do not think it would be wise, yet I would not be seriously opposed to going to the extent of providing that where the two members of the board did not agree, the Minister should be required to appoint a judge.

That should eliminate all objections to the line of action proposed. I do not think it would be wise to go that far because personal experience impels me to make this observation. Instances have arisen, in some local disputes, in which some local man was peculiarly qualified to act successfully in the capacity of arbitrator. I remember one case in Sault Ste. Marie, where I had the honour of appointing Father Brennan, an outstanding gentlemen in that locality, as chairman of the board. He brought about an agreement which all parties accepted. I might have appointed a judge in that case; but I doubt very much whether the results of the efforts of the board could have been any more successful. Therefore I would not recommend tying the appointment down to judges; but I would much prefer to leave the appointment of the chairman in the hands of the Minister. I therefore respectfully suggest to the House that the Bill should be referred to the Committee of the Whole and that we should go into it carefully and not hastily, and act maturely rather than hurriedly, as we have done.

The proposed amendment of Hon. Mr. Robertson was agreed to: yeas, 28; nays, 10.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would like to call the attention of His Honour the Speaker to the somewhat irregular manner, in my opinion, in which this vote has been taken. I think when the Speaker is in the Chair the bell is supposed to be rung.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I may be wrong.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He simply called for the yeas and nays.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: If the honourable gentleman refers to page 137 of the Forms of Proceedings, he will find the following:

> Should the words "not content" be heard, the Speaker says: "The contents will please rise," and, judging to the best of his knowlerge, says "The contents" or "Non-contents have it," adding, "the motion is lost," or "carried."

I declare the amendment carried.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I bow to the ruling of the Chair.

IMMIGRATION BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 136, an Act to amend the Immigration Act.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department of the Interior has suggested that a slight amendment be made to section 8 of this Bill, which reads as follows:

> In case any officer, seaman or other member of the crew, or other person employed on any vessel, deserts the vessel while in any Canadian port, such vessel shall not be granted clearance until the master has deposited with the officer in charge such sum as may be prescribed.

I move that after the word "master" the following words be added: "or the responsible agent or owner in Canada of the vessel."

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: What is the object of the amendment?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The master may be in a hurry to clear his ship while the responsible agent will remain and give the necessary security.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Dandurand was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That change having been made, it becomes necessary to adapt the last part of the clause to the new condition. The money was to be returned to the master, because the master was the only one mentioned. I move that the words "to the master," in the twenty-sixth line, be struck out. The clause would then read:

> The amount of such deposit shall be returned less any expenses for detention.

We do not say to whom. It will be returned to the party who has made the deposit. The clause will read in this way:

> In case such deserter returns to the vessel, or is deported under the provisions of this Act, the amount of such deposit shall be returned less any expenses for detention, maintenance, transportation, subsistence, medical or hospital treatment or otherwise which the Government shall have incurred on account of such deserter.

That is, returned whence it came.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Dandurand was agreed to.

The Bill was reported as amended.

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of the Bill as amended.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

BANKRUPTCY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved the second reading of Bill 139, and Act to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I have been asked by the honourable leader of the Government in this House to take charge of this Bill.

The Bankruptcy Act of 1919 was preceded by three Acts of a similar nature—the Act of 1864, the Act of 1869, and the Act of 1875. I speak with some knowledge of those various Acts, because I commenced my practice under the Act of 1864. Under those different statutes the estate of an insolvent was handled from the beginning by an official assignee appointed by the Government. The consequence was that the official assignees became very much interested in obtaining a clientele and solicited appointments as assignees to as large a number of estates as possible. They were invariably the nominated choice of the insolvent. That gave rise to a great deal of abuse. Very often their appointment was the result of a bargain, and they were interested in administering the estate or in preparing for a composition with the creditors in the interest of the insolvent more than that of the creditors. Those Acts of 1864, 1869, and 1875 did not give satisfaction to the community at large.

The Act of 1919 followed the same procedure. In section 14 of that Act it was provided:

(1) The Governor in Council may, upon application to the Secretary of State of Canada, appoint sufficient fit and qualified persons to be trustees in bankruptcy and under authorized assignments and in proceedings by insolvent debtors to secure compositions, extensions and arrangements under this Act.

Under the present Act, 1919, a large number of trustees have been appointed by Order in Council, especially in the province of Quebec, where they number some 240 odd. That has been disastrous, and the commercial community, not only in the province of Quebec, but elsewhere, have been applying to the Department of Justice for a change. Now, we find in the English Act that a different mode has been adopted and has been in practice and has given satisfaction for a great number of years. It will suffice for me to refer to section 19 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1914, which says:

(1) Where a debtor is adjudged bankrupt, or the creditors have resolved that he be adjudged bankrupt, the creditors may by ordinary resolution appoint some fit person, whether a creditor or not, to fill the office of trustee of the property of the bankrupt; or they may resolve to leave his appointment to the committee of inspection hereinafter mentioned.

The main object of the present Bill is to adopt the English system, that of giving the appointment of the trustee to the creditors at the outset. Honourable gentlemen will understand that if the trustee is chosen by the debtor, he may go around to the creditors, of whom he has a list, and solicit proxies, and he cannot be displaced. This has been the practice ever since 1864—and I speak advisedly, because I have had a pretty large practice under the different Insolvency Acts. I think it much better to adopt the English system, which better protects the interests of the creditors. They are the parties who should be protected, and they are interested in choosing a proper person, one in whom they have confidence, and who will feel that he is entrusted, not with the interests of the insolvent, but with the interests of the creditors. That is one of the main objects of the Bill.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How is it proposed that the assignment shall be first made?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The assignment will be first made to the prothonotary or the clerk of the court in the different provinces. The provinces will be divided into districts, and there will be one officer designated for each district. The Minister of Justice in introducing the Bill stated:

I shall give to the House a list of the local officers that we intend to choose as receivers. The following officials, or the persons for the time being exercising the functions of such officials, shall be official trustees:

(a) In the province of Quebec, the prothonotaries of the Superior Court;

(b) In the province of Nova Scotia, the prothonotaries of the Supreme Court;

(c) In the province of New Brunswick, the Circuit Court clerks;

(d) In the province of Prince Edward Island, the deputy prothonatories of the Supreme Court;

(e) In the province of Ontario, the local registrars of the Supreme Court;

(f) In the province of Manitoba, the deputy registrars of the Court of King's Bench;

(g) In the province of Saskatchewan, the local registrars of the Court of King's Bench;

(h) In the province of Alberta, the clerks of the Supreme Court;

(i) In the province of British Columbia, the district registrars of the Supreme Court.

These officials are men of legal training. They are competent to receive the assignment and also to exact from the insolvent the proper declaration which under the amendment he will be compelled to make. In the Bill it is provided that the debtor making an assignment, whether voluntary or compulsory, shall be obliged within seven days of the assignment not only to give a statement of his affairs, with the names and addresses of his creditors and the amount owing to each, but also to answer questions which may be put by the official receiver, in order that at the outset creditors may have a fair knowledge of the affairs of their debtor.

I think that is, again, a very important provision, and one that will be in the interest of the mass of creditors.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How is it proposed to protect the estate in the meantime—until the first meeting of creditors?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: A guardian or custodian is appointed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: By whom?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The guardian is appointed by the official receiver. There was in the House of Commons a rather long discussion on that question. It was provided in the Bill as first drafted that the appointment should be from among the larger creditors, but that was changed to provide that the person appointed should be a qualified person, due regard being had to the desire of the creditors.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does the guardian put up security?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, he puts up security. It is provided for in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: What proportion of the creditors will have the power to appoint the trustee?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The majority of the creditors—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Majority in value.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: And there is in the Bill a provision stating how.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Before we reach that point would my honourable friend give his views as to the guarantees the creditors would have for the protection of the estate pending the first meeting of the creditors, at which they will appoint their trustee? It seems to me that the critical stage in the handling of the estate is the time between the assignment and the incoming of the creditors.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: On page 3 of the Bill, in section 8A, it is provided:

> 8a. The custodian, whether appointed by the court pursuant to a receiving order, or by the Official Receiver pursuant to an authorized assignment, shall take immediate possession of the books and all the property of the debtor liable to seizure, and he may under the direction of the Official Receiver take conservatory measures and dispose of any perishable goods; he shall remain in possession until a trustee is appointed by the creditors.

The honourable member has asked about the provision as to security. I will refer to that. On page 6, section 7, new section 14, provides that every trustee—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the trustee, not the guardian.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE (reading):

> Every trustee appointed by the creditors as hereinafter provided shall within seven days give security in cash or by bond of an approved guarantee company, satisfactory to the Official Receiver, conditioned for the due accounting and for the payment over and transfer of all moneys and property received by him as such trustee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think there is any provision for the guardian putting up anything.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think there is.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Because he may be appointed by the court or by the official receiver, as set out in section 8A.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think there is a provision, but anyway that is a matter of detail and when we are dealing with the Bill in Committee, if we do not find such a provision, or if the provision is not put in, this honourable House may provide for it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is my honourable friend's view of that particular step in the proceeding? That is the most critical stage in the handling of the entire estate. For instance, there is no provision, so far as I can see, for the guardian taking an inventory of the estate.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But even if there is none in the Bill as drafted we may provide for it. These are matters of detail. From my reading of the Bill I found that the machinery was quite satisfactory, but I may have overlooked details of that kind.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I desired simply to hear the honourable gentleman's views on the subject.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I may say that I intend myself to suggest some amendments to the Bill, but generally, after having read the Bill as carefully as I could, I found it was on good lines. There are certain amendments which should be made, but I think it will be a great improvement, and one which will protect the interests of the mass of the creditors, if we adopt the English system of having the appointment of the trustee made by the creditors instead of permitting the trustee to be chosen at the outset by the insolvent himself.

The Minister of Justice, in presenting the Bill, gave in very appropriate and concise language the main purpose of the Bill, and I cannot do better than quote his language. He said:

This Bill provides for amendments to the Bankruptcy Act as follows: (a) To abolish the system of authorized trustees and to accept the English system of administration of estates by trustees selected by the creditors, assignments to be made to the creditors at large and deposited with an official received who will be chosen from among local legal officers, such receiver to appoint a custodian with authority to conserve the assets of the estate under the direction of the receiver. The custodian shall call the creditors together, who at their first meeting will choose a trustee, and from that day the custodian's duty will be completed. In cases of petitions—that is to say, compulsory assignments—the appointment of custodian is to be made by the court rather than by the receiver, the latter directing, as in the case of assignments, the conservation of the assets—

I have dealt with that part.

(b) To provide for sales in the province of Quebec of property subject to hypothec in the same mode as to notices, etc. as in the case of sales made by the sheriff.

We would be adopting the same procedure which was in force under the Insolvent Acts of 1875 and 1869. In the province of Quebec it is important that the sale of real estate be made by the sheriff in order that he may discharge the property from all liens and hypothecs. In this Act it is provided that the sale may be made by the trustee with the same effect as if it were made by the sheriff, provided the same notices are given; I believe in certain cases the sale may be made subject to hypothec, but with the authority of the judge. I am not quite sure whether the Bill as it reaches us is to that effect; but it is important that there should be a provision giving authority to the judge in certain cases to order the sale subject to mortgages, because it may be very much more advantageous to the creditors and a better price may be obtained. For instance, there are cases in which the property is mortgaged for large amounts, payable only in two or three or four or five years; if the property is sold and the purchaser has the benefit of that term, he will be able to pay a larger amount than if he were obliged to pay at once in cash.

Then I proceed:

(c) To restore to the landlords the privileges which they were entitled to under the laws of the different provinces on the first of July, 1920.

This provision has given rise to a great deal of discussion and to the expression of many different views. The position taken by the Department of Justice, with which I entirely agree, is that there is a very strong doubt as to whether it is competent for this Parliament to interfere with the laws of the different provinces which determine what shall be the privileges of the landlord. I had a letter from the Board of Trade of Montreal —and there are letters from other institutions—opposing this change. These institutions are in favour of maintaining the law as it is now, making the law uniform in the several provinces, and limiting the privilege of the landlord to three months' rent. But, as I say, the Department of Justice has taken the view that it is very doubtful whether it is within the jurisdiction of Parliament to interfere with the laws of the several provinces. These institutions, if not satisfied with the laws in the provinces, should apply to the provinces to have those laws changed. It seems to me that, although Parliament has the power to enact a Bankruptcy Act providing for the taking possession of the property and assets of the debtor in the interest of the creditors, and providing for the distribution of such property and assets amongst the creditors, that is quite different to going a step further and interfering with the civil law of each province and declaring that the rights of the creditors shall be changed by Federal law.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Rights flowing from civil contracts.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Do you allow the law to remain in that way? You are going to give a preference still.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Under the Bill the laws of the several provinces will be respected.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: As to rent only?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: As to rentals.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Have you made any change as to whom the assignment is made to?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have covered that. It is the English method of procedure, making the assignment to the creditors, and doing away with the present official assignees.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The creditors appoint them?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask my honourable friend to make that clear. My honourable friend opposite (Hon. Mr. Willoughby) asked whether the change was with regard to rent only. As I understand it, the proposal is to leave all the relations of landlord and tenant as they are to-day, not merely those as to rent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. See section 31, page 10.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Then I proceed:

(d) To provide for the examination of the debtor by the official receiver on the causes of his insolvency and the distribution of his assets. This is a very important feature of the English Act. It is hoped that the debtor will be deterred from assigning by the prospect of this compulsory examination.

I have already said a word or two of that feature of the Bill, which I think is very important. The creditors are discouraged from the outset when they are in the hands of official trustees; they are afraid of the costs, which pile up very quickly, and prefer to submit to all kinds of things and to accept a very small amount as composition when they should get a larger amount. It is very important that, before the appointment of what I call an official receiver is made—the party to whom will be entrusted the liquidation of the estate—the creditors should be properly informed as to what brought about the insolvency, and what are the assets and liabilities. This provision is for the purpose of giving power to the official receiver to examine the debtor. He will be competent to do that because he will be a prothonotary, a legal gentleman, or the Master of the Rolls. He will report to the creditors at their first meeting. Of course, the creditors will be at liberty to submit the debtor to further examination if they choose.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: In making these changes, have you kept in mind the small estate? In the case of a large estate, I can understand that these things would be all right; but have you kept in mind the small estate?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think it will be as beneficial in the case of the small estate as in the case of a large one. In the English Act there is no difference made between small estates and large ones; and the Act has worked well in England, and I do not see why it should not work well here. The examination will not cost anything at all.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: By whom will it be done?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: At the present time the examination is very expensive, because it is invariably made by a lawyer, who charges pretty heavily; but under this Bill the examination would be made by the prothonotary, an official who would not be entitled to receive any pay. He is a public officer.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He is not always a salaried officer. In our province, for instance, he is paid by fees, and he would take care that he got his pay, and pretty good pay too. You cannot get something done for nothing in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: At all events, it will not be as expensive as the present system.

Then I proceed:

(e) To enable a composition between the debtor and creditors only after the assignment. This is to protect the creditors and prevent debtors from defrauding their creditors by disposing of their property. Many requests for such a change have come to the Department of Justice.

Under the present Act the debtor may at the outset ask for a composition from his creditors; and, as I have said, the creditors are very often somewhat discouraged.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And in the dark.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: And in the dark; and they prefer to accept the composition, fearing that the whole estate may be squandered.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Is this to stop that? Do you make it so that they cannot accept the composition?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The composition cannot be offered until after the examination has taken place and after the creditors know what is the financial condition of the debtor.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Then that examination takes place before the actual assignment is made?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Before the trustee is appointed.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes. It is the English practice again.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The result of the examination is submitted to the creditors when they meet to appoint a receiver.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is all right.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE (reading):

(f) To compel trustees in every case to apply to the court for a discharge within fifteen days after the payment of the final dividend and to prohibit appointment of such trustees in any other matter until he has obtained such discharge.

This, again, is a very important provision. To my knowledge, in a large number of instances, no final account could be obtained from the trustee. He realizes on the assets of the estate, and very often he never makes any account, or he drags the matter along for a considerable length of time. Here, after the final dividend has been declared, it shall be incumbent upon the trustee to apply within 30 days for his discharge from the judge. If he fails to do that, he cannot act further as a trustee in any other matter.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Does that prevent him from acting as trustee in two cases at the same time?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No. If he is already appointed as trustee in another matter, I think he can continue in the other estate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But he cannot get another appointment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But he cannot get another appointment.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: That pretty well prevents a man from going into this thing as a business?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes. He is not an official trustee.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: But there are unofficial trustees who can make a business of administering estates of this kind—for instance, trust companies.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No. He has only to comply with the law and demand his discharge. He applies for a discharge within the thirty days, and then he can be appointed in any number of other estates.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The only obligation is that he should not be in default.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That he should not be in default.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He may wind up half-a-dozen estates at the same time, I should think.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is further proposed to amend the law which refuses the claim of a wife as the creditor of an insolvent, to enable her to rank equally with the ordinary creditors. Under the Act the wife, if she lends money to her husband, has no right to claim on the estate until after the creditors have all been paid in full.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is under the old Act?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Under the Act now in force. It is suggested that that is very unfair. The husband has a great influence on his wife, and, if she has any means, it is in the interest of his creditors that he obtain an advance or loan from his wife. The creditors have the benefit of it, and it is unfair to prevent the wife from ranking as an ordinary creditor; and it is against the interest of the creditors, because it deters married women from making advances to their husbands. The Bill further provides to extend the section which authorizes the examination of persons connected with the affairs of the debtor, so as to admit of the examination of relatives or other persons who may have received either gifts or preferences. I have referred to the provisions for the examination of the debtor. The present Bill provides also for the examination of relatives of the debtor, in case of any of them having obtained preferences before the assignment.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is all right.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I proceed:

To provide for the distribution to the creditors of any property acquired by the debtor betwen the time of his assignment and his composition with his creditors.

Under the law as it is now creditors are vested only with such assets as the debtor has at the time of the assignment. It is proposed by the present Bill to give the creditors also the benefit of any property which may come to their debtor until the time of the composition, or his discharge. That I think is but fair.

There are several other amendments, which are matters of detail, respecting the working out of these provisions and correcting certain other features of the law. I would suggest that the Bill be allowed to be read the second time, and when we go into Committee and take up each section I shall be in a position to give further explanations as to its scope.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would like to call the honourable gentleman's attention to an amendment that I have been asked to propose, so that he may have an opportunity of considering it. As the law is now, I understand, an employee has a preferred claim, but if he is working on commission the preference is wiped out. It is thought that the man earning his living by commissions ought to be in exactly the same position as a man earning his living by a salary.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I intend myself introducing an amendment bearing on matters of that kind; but that will come only when we deal with the Bill in Committee.

Hon. N. A. BELCOURT: I desire to say a few words on a matter which I think I should mention now, because it affects the scheme of the whole Bill. What I am about to say will be but a paraphrase of what was said a little while ago by my honourable friend opposite with regard to the security which should be furnished by the custodian. I thoroughly agree with my honourable friend that that is a matter of very grave importance. May I read section 8A:

> The custodian whether appointed by the court pursuant to a receiving order, or by the Official Receiver pursuant to an authorized assignment, shall take immediate possession of the books and all the property of the debtor liable to seizure, and he may under the direction of the Official Receiver take conservatory measures and dispose of any perishable goods; he shall remain in possession until a trustee is appointed by the creditors.

The appointment of a trustee may take a week, two weeks, or a month. There may be a large number of creditors in England or elsewhere in Europe, or in some remote part of Canada, and during the weeks that elapse before the trustee can be appointed this custodian is in charge of everything. He may even dispose of some of the property—perishable property, etc. I think the Bill would be much stronger if it contained some provision obliging the custodian to give some sort of security.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He certainly should.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have looked in vain through the Act of 1919 and the amendments made, and in this proposed Bill, to find some provision whereby the custodian is bound to give any kind of security. He may be—and, in the province of Quebec, for instance, the chances are that he will be—an ordinary bailiff about the court. We know that bailiffs about court have little or no means, and if such a custodian wished to do away with the property there would be no remedy for the creditors. I am pointing out this effect, not because I want to find fault with the Bill, but because I would have it amended. It seems to me that this matter is of such importance that it ought to be considered by the Government immediately before we go into Committee. It may be proper to discuss in Committee the best method of carrying out that idea, but I think that in the meantime the Government should seriously consider whether, in order to make this Bill what it is intended to be, there should not be some distinct provision requiring the custodian to give some security.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I quite agree with what my honourable friend has said, and, in perusing the Bill as it has come before us, it struck me that the infirmity of it lies in the absence of any safeguard under section 8A. We all know that the crucial stage in the advantageous handling of any estate is at the beginning, immediately after the assignment is made. If the estate is not then properly conserved, if it is not in the hands of responsible parties, the estate becomes dissipated, and by the time the creditors arrive on the scene a very substantial proportion of their assets has disappeared. It seems to me that this strikes at the very policy of the Bill. It is the most fundamental principle to be looked for in a Bill of this character. The custodian may be an absolutely unsubstantial person. He may be appointed by the Official Receiver, that is, by the prothonotary. He may not occupy any official position, and he does not occupy any official position.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Or if he does it is only an irresponsible one.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, it seems to me that, inasmuch as the Government proposes to amend the Act so as to make use of judicial officers such as prothonotaries, it should make the Court responsible in some way or another for the initial stages of handling the estate. My honourable friend may say that the Federal Government has no consitutional authority to impose this duty upon the provincial officer, but it has already apparently given recognition to that right by proposing to appoint a provincial officer as the Official Receiver of the estate, in his capacity as prothonotary of the court. Why not go further? Why not make the court responsible for the handling of the estate until the first meeting of creditors? Why not in some way or another make it a court proceeding? Then it would be safe-guarded probably in a more satisfactory way than any other that could be adopted.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It would only be by obliging the custodian to give security, and the court would fix the amount of this security.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The court would then regard it as a proceeding of the court and would see that the process would be properly issued.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: If by the court you mean the judge, he may be as impecunious as the bailiff.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The opinion expressed in Committee of the Whole in the House of Commons was to this effect, that it was compulsory upon the Official Receiver to appoint as custodian the largest creditor of the estate, and the Department of Justice anticipates that that would very likely continue to be the case. It was thought that possibly that would offer a sufficient guarantee.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am personally of opinion that we should go a step further and should make it the duty of the Official Receiver, the prothonotary, or the clerk of the court, to see that at the outset the person who is chosen as guardian gives a bond. Of course, the amount payable on the bond can be charged to the estate. That would be a proper guarantee for the mass of the creditors. The guardian should be obliged to furnish a security of that kind at the outset.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But, may I ask my honourable friend, is there any reason why, under this Bill, a procedure should not be adopted analogous to that taken—say—under the Winding-up Act, or under any Act whereby a receiver is appointed? When I speak of the court assuming the responsibility of taking charge of the estate in its initial stages, until the first meeting of creditors, I mean that if the application is made before the court for the appointment of a receiver, the court of course safeguards the property which is handed over to that receiver, in the first place by appointing a substantial, reliable person, and in the second place by imposing upon him such obligation, by way of bond or otherwise, as will protect the estate. There is no reason why a procedure of that kind should not be adopted in this case. Under section 8A, it will be seen that the custodian can be appointed by the Official Receiver. In the first place, the Official Receiver is not a very important individual himself. He is simply the clerk of the court, or an officer of the court, and in almost every case of no substance. He is not under security to any large amount. It is proposed to give him the authority to appoint as custodian of the estate somebody, who may be his bailiff, or a constable, or some attendant upon the court. There is imposed upon that custodian no obligation to provide the security or even to make an inventory of the estate. He receives his authority in the first place from the Official Receiver, and he goes into an estate that may perhaps represent a million of money.

My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Béique) may say—and he has said it—that the intention is that the prothonotary should see that his appointee puts up the necessary bond, etc. But we must have it in the Act. I need not point out to my honourable friend that an Act of Parliament should provide every safeguard for the protection of property of this character.

Apart from this particular point, it seems to me that the Bill is one that might appeal to our reason and can be advantageously discussed. But certainly it is fundamentally weak in this regard, and I say without any hesitation that there is no protection whatever of the estate for the creditors until the trustee is appointed. Several weeks elapse before the creditors have notice. The creditors may live at a distance and the notices calling them together may not be sent out with due dispatch.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Will my honourable friend pardon me? I have just received from P. Burns and Company a wire dealing with that very phase. It says:

> Clause requiring two-thirds creditors to attend first meeting is unworkable and will affect very seriously delaying administration bankrupt estate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In the meantime, as my honourable friend will readily appreciate, the estate is in the hands of an irresponsible person. I would suggest that the Government take into consideration the advisability of providing some way by which the court may take possession of the estate, just the same as if possession were taken of it under an order appointing a receiver, because, after all, the estate under such an order is under the control of the court.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Has not the custodian to be one of the principal creditors?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It may be anybody.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: An officer of the court.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He may be a bailiff; he may be the caretaker.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Why should mercantile or commercial matters be handed over to the lawyers? Why should the prothonotary of a court be selected as the person who should have charge of an estate? He is not a person with any acquaintance with mercantile affairs. He is probably paid by fees for the issuing of writs and matters of that kind, and he would not undertake any such obligation or duty unless he were paid very handsomely for it. Probably the custodian he would appoint would be a friend of his, and might not have any knowledge of estates of the character and kind that would be brought up for adjudication and settlement. And that custodian would require to be handsomely paid. There you have two persons in the place of an official assignee. The official assignee is a person of experience and very probably has had the management of many estates, and would likely administer the estate very much better in the interest of the creditors than would the prothonotary of the court or anybody who would be appointed by him. I think it is very improper to mix up mercantile and commercial matters in the functions of judges and court officials, because they are two distinct branches of employment. The lawyers have their experiences in the courts and in the settlement of cases and in legal business, but commercial affairs are totally different. Therefore a person experienced in the law is not ipso facto conversant with mercantile affairs.

There is another circumstance that I should like to refer to, and to suggest to the legal mind: that is, that a great many ordinary small commercial transactions are conducted under limited liability. There are limited companies now where there were private merchants before; so it would require a person conversant with the routine of business, as well as with the administration of law—strictly law —to understand exactly how an estate of that kind could be managed, and he could do it better than a legal man with all his knowledge of law It requires practical knowledge, outside of legal knowledge, in order to carry on the business of the country; and I think the prothonotary is a very unfit person to take charge of an estate and to have his nominees in charge of it, and that an official appointed by the Government or some authority of great extent ought to be the one person selected to take the entire management and control of the estate, and to be responsible to the creditors for whatever is involved in it

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: That is the present law.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Will the leader of the Government tell me whether the Law Department was asked to say whether the application of the law to farmers and non-traders was constitutional.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. I have no knowledge; but I will obtain the information. I know that the right of the farmer to enjoy the benefit of the Bankruptcy Act and to make an abandonment of his property as a trader has been discussed elsewhere. It has been alleged that in some parts of the country farmers claim to be traders to a considerable degree.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: If they have not given their opinion, I would ask that they be asked to give it on that question, because I did not understand that the law applied to non-traders.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In answer to the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Roche), who believes that other qualities than those to be found in a legal man are required to liquidate an estate, and that very often a man following a commercial pursuit would be a better appointee as an assignee than a lawyer, I would draw my honourable friend's attention to the fact that the principal aim of this Bill is to secure the creditors against the doings of the debtors. Their debtors under the present Act can arrange with the assignee of their choice for the protection of their own interests. When a man assigns, and declares thereby that he cannot pay one hundred cents on the dollar, and that the liquidation will bring whatever it may bring to the creditors, I believe everybody will admit that the principal interest to conserve is that of the creditors.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: This is left to the creditors.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The object of this Bill is to see that the creditors have their choice of their own liquidator, and the temporary selection of the prothonotary or clerk of the court is simply for the purpose of allowing the court official to lay his hand on the estate, examine without delay the insolvent, obtain from him the details as to his assets and liabilities, appoint a custodian for the time being, and call the creditors together. The creditors will then have the selection of their own assignee. As the honourable gentleman from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) has stated, the two Acts that went by the board, and the one which is about to go by the board if no remedy is found, were weak in allowing the insolvent to select the liquidator. Many liquidators were being appointed throughout the country, and they became much interested in forcing people to the wall and in tempting people to go to the wall for the money that there would be in it for themselves and for the insolvents. That created considerable disruption in the commerce of the country, and I believe that if the present Act is not amended, it will have the same result. Those hundreds of officials prey upon the misfortunes of people who are in business and who have had some difficulty in meeting their liabilities but who, not tempted by these officials to go into solvency and to free themselves from 25 to 50 per cent of their liabilities at one shot, could recover. I believe this Bill works in the right direction in giving the selection of the assignees to the creditors. They will undoubtedly select a man who can best do the job and I am convinced that it will not be a member of the bar but the clerk of the court, who will initiate the proceedings by appointing a responsible custodian. If the Bill is not strong on that point, it can be strengthened by providing for a bond of some kind. The conservation of the estate should be the first duty of this Parliament, and the appointment of the custodian should be surrounded with proper guarantees.

I suggest that we should take the second reading of the Bill before six o'clock, and go into Committee on it this evening. It is an important Bill and will take some time to discuss.

I am glad to announce to the House that there will be an effort made to wind up the business of Parliament before the end of this month. If that effort succeeds in the other House, we in this Chamber have no time to lose, because some important legislation is forthcoming, and by the end of the week we should have the Order Paper cleared, if possible.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I make a suggestion to take the place of section 8A? As I understand the matter, it is proposed to zone the entire Dominion in reference to the assignments that may be made. When an assignment is made to the prothonotary, could not the obligation be placed upon him to make an application to his court to appoint a trust company as receiver of the property pending the first meeting of the creditors? The Government could appoint or designate trust companies for certain zones. I mean reliable trust companies.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Are they not doing that now?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is only for the purpose of conserving the estate until the first meeting of the creditors.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I think a distinction should be made between large estates and small ones, because if an estate is large it might be well to appoint a trust company; but a trust company's first fee would gobble up a small estate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We could regulate the fees.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: And they would not touch it. The Credit Men's Association was formed for the purpose of preying on estates, and they have done it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would point out to my honourable friend that trust companies nowadays are charged with administering the smallest wills and estates, and do it even more reasonably than individuals; and there is a reliability about well-recognized trust companies which is not associated with an individual.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I take it for granted that we are all agreed that the Bill should be strengthened in that respect; but I would invite honourable gentlemen to consider whether we should not content ourselves with expressing the very strong opinion of this House as to the necessity of proper guarantees and securities being obtained at the outset from the person in charge of the estate, but leaving it to the Governor in Council to provide for it by rules.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why leave it to the Governor in Council?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is leaving the working of the Act to the Department of Justice, which has been the policy in the past and which is the policy of the present Bankruptcy Act. The Governor in Council is interested in the making of the necessary rules for the working of the Act. This is merely a suggestion for the consideration of the House. My own mind is not settled on the point at present. Might we not adopt a clause providing that rules shall be made by the Governor in Council for the giving of proper security?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend draft a clause? We can consider it then in Committee.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: As suggestions seem to be the order of the day, may I make a suggestion too? My solution would be this—and I think it would meet the wish of my honourable friend who has just spoken (Hon. Mr. Béique) and also the approval of my honourable friend from New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. Fowler) to have the amount of security fixed, and the appointment of the custodian made by the court, and not by the prothonotary. The judge would know the size of the estate. and he would be able to determine the amount of security to be given and the proper person to administer it.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He would need to have some idea of the size of the estate.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He would have that because the debtor comes to the prothonotary and makes an assignment and gives a list of his assets. The prothonotary is merely a machine for the purpose of receiving the assignment, and finding out what property is perishable.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why could you not give it to the sheriff?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My suggestion is that the information should be laid before the judge immediately, and that the judge should appoint the custodian and determine the amount of security that is to be given.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: The same as he would for a receiver.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes. If the judge has not got sufficient information from the papers laid before the prothonotary, he can make inquiries to determine who would be the best party—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We had an Assignment Act in our province, under which the debtor made an assignment to the sheriff of the county, who called the creditors together and they appointed the custodian.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Who looks after the estate in the meantime?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: The sheriff. You could allow him to appoint the custodian, he giving bonds to the amount of the perishable property that would come into his hands. After all, in small estates that would not amount to very much.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Are the creditors to say who the trustee shall be?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, afterwards.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: After there is no estate.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: If you are providing that this custodian shall give a bond for the property, the estate is all there.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: So far as my experience in our province is concerned, I would have very much more confidence in the registrar of the court than in the sheriff.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: In the province of Saskatchewan, and perhaps in Alberta, the sheriff and the clerk of the court, who would be the prothonotary in Quebec, are consolidated in all the smaller places in the same official. I was about to suggest that the prothonotary, or whatever you may call him, should forthwith be obligated to make an application to the proper judicial authority to bond the custodian, and the judge would then fix the amount of the bond, based upon the value of the estate, which would be known to the first receiver.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I move that we go into Committee of the Whole on the Bill this evening.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Why is it necessary to sit to-night? We will have a lot of time on our hands, and will not know what to do with it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not so sure of that. If my honourable friend will look at the work before us, and the work to come from the other House, and if an effort is to be made to speed the work and to prorogue before the last day of this month, I think he will see that we should proceed a little more rapidly ourselves.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not know what work would come from the other House that would require a great deal of time. The Bank Act is the only thing that could possibly take up much time. Redistribution we are not particularly interested in: that would not affect us.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But there are a number of Bills.

The motion was agreed to.

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

BANKRUPTCY BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Béique, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 139, an Act to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Hon. Mr. Bennett in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I would suggest that it be understood that we pass such clauses as the Committee may be disposed to accept, but at the request of any honourable member we may to-morrow reconsider any of the clauses which have been passed. There are some clauses which for my part I would be in favour of passing, but which I have to consider further. We can reduce the work for to-morrow.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—definitions:

Subsections 1 and 2 of section 2 were agreed to.

On subsection 3 of section 2—locality of a debtor:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend say now what is repealed? What is the difference between the section to be repealed and the proposed section? This deals with the districts throughout the Dominion, etc. Wherein is it different from the other?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: In the present Act, after an authorized assignment had been made, the creditors could take the estate out of the hands of the first assignee into another province. It could be taken, for instance, from Saskatchewan or Manitoba to Montreal. Apparently there is that change in any event.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Section 3 of the statute of 1920 says:

Section two, paragraph (x), of the said Act is hereby repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:

"(x) 'locality' of a debtor (whether a bankrupt, assignor or person who has proposed a composition, extension or arrangement to or with his creditors) means either the place within a bankruptcy division or district whereat the debtor has carried on business at any time during the six months immediately preceding the date of the presentation against him of a bankruptcy petition or the making by him of an authorized assignment, or where the greater portion of the property of such debtor is situate, or where the debtor resides."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The six months is extended to a year, in the first place.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is replaced by this:

(3) Paragraph (x) of the said section, as enacted by chapter thirty-four of the statutes of 1920, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(x) 'Locality of a debtor' (whether a bankrupt or assignor) means (a) the principal place where the debtor has carried on business during the year immediately preceding the date of the presentation against him of a bankruptcy petition or the making by him of an authorized assignment; or—

This is new:

—(b) the place where the debtor has resided during the year immediately preceding the date of the presentation against him of a bankruptcy petition or the making by him of an authorized assignment; or (c), in cases not coming within (a) or (b), the place where the greater portion of the property of such debtor is situate;"

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: In that connection may I ask the honourable gentleman whether, in the case to which I have just referred, the creditors would have the right to transfer into another jurisdiction in the same province, or to another province, the liquidation of the estate? That right existed before, and it was exercised very frequently in the West.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I will answer that question to-morrow. I forget at present.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I know that very much objection is made to it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Section 5 provides for that:

Provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall invalidate any proceedings by reason of the same having been commenced, taken or carried on in the wrong court, but the court may at any time transfer to the proper court the petition, application or proceedings, as the case may be.

That is the Act of 1920.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: "May at any time transfer to the proper court." That would not meet the case.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: That would not be the one. I referred to the right of the creditors to transfer.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I will look that up.

Subsections 3 and 4 of section 2 were agreed to.

On subsection 5 of section 2—trustee or authorized trustee:

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: There is a great deal of complaint in the West that the management of bankrupt estates is practically all getting into the hands of one concern. The wholesalers, chiefly of Winnipeg, have organized a Credit Men's Trust Company with a small capital, whose only and sole business is the winding-up of bankrupt estates in which the wholesalers are concerned. The company, I understand, has only a nominal capital, and does not pretend to do any other class of work. There is a great deal of objection among other companies and assignees who have given a great deal of time to that sort of work in the past. I understand also that the legal fraternity of the outside parts of the country in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta is practically tributary to the city of Winnipeg in that matter. I am not familiar enough with the subject to know how the situation could be remedied, or whether it should be remedied; but it certainly seems to me that the wholesalers should not have all the say. I have been told of a number of individual cases in which an official assignee was appointed, and in which, under the Act we are now amending, this Credit Men's Trust Company would go around and get authority or proxies from the different creditors, chiefly the wholesalers, and take the estate out of the hands of some other company that may have been appointed to wind it up, and the estate is then handled absolutely and altogether in the interest of the wholesalers. Personally, I do not know whether any injustice has been done in the past or not; but I know the legisimate trust companies, of long standing and large capital, and absolutely responsible, and also the legal fraternity in that great country west of Winnipeg, have been complaining during the past two years that the present condition of affairs is most unsatisfactory.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Was that company organized after the Act came into force?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: It was organized, I think, some three or four years ago.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The Credit Men's Association is really responsible for this Bankruptcy Act.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The English method of procedure may cure the defects which the honourable gentleman has alluded to. Of course, in a Bankruptcy Act we must apply the will of the creditors. It would not be practicable to try to override the will of the majority of the creditors.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: The reason I bring up this matter is not that I can propose any amendment, because I have had no experience of that sort of thing, but to give expression to the complaints which have been made to me. I will have to leave it to others to do what is necessary.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does the honourable gentleman understand that the appointment of the official assignee is altogether in the hands of the creditors? It is their views that determine who is to be appointed; and whoever is appointed has to give security. If the Credit Men's Association has a small capital, that does not relieve them of the obligation of giving security.

Subsection 5 of section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3—ceasing to meet liabilities:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: By the Act of 1922, a new paragraph was added, as follows:

(i) If he ceases to meet his liabilities as they become due.

That opened the door to a man being treated as insolvent because he could not pay any individual creditor, so it is proposed to add the word "generally" after the word "liabilities". This is the wording of the Act of 1875.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Will that change it sufficiently? Without looking into it very carefully, I understand that if a man has a judgment against him for say $200, and it remains unsatisfied for a certain length of time, his creditors can have him declared bankrupt.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is not that the Winding-up Act?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I think the whole Act is wrong, for this reason. A man may buy a piece of real estate for $1,000, and pay $750 on it, and owe $250. His creditors can sue him and have him declared bankrupt. I do not think that is right. I do not think the Act should apply to anybody but traders —men who buy goods on credit.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman is treating another provision of the Act which is not touched. Subsection e of section 3 of the Act says:

If he permits any execution or other process issued against him under which any of his goods are seized, levied upon or taken in execution to remain unsatisfied until within four days from the time fixed by the sheriff for the sale thereof, or for fourteen days after such seizure, levy or taking in execution, or if the goods have been sold by the sheriff or the execution or other process has been held by him after written demand for payment without seizure, levy or taking in execution or satisfaction by payment for fourteen days, or if it is returned endorsed to the effect that the sheriff can find no goods whereon to levy or to seize or take; provided that where interpleader proceedings have been instituted in regard to the goods seized, the time elapsing between the date at which such proceedings were instituted and the date at which such proceedings are finally disposed of, settled or abandoned, shall not be taken into account in calculating any such period of fourteen days.

A like provision has been in all the insolvent Acts we have had in this country. The honourable gentleman does not suggest, I am sure, that the creditors be prevented from demanding an assignment from their debtor if he allows part of his property to be sold by the sheriff.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It says that if the execution is returned by the sheriff there are no goods to seize. Out in the western country you can have a very well and completely furnished house, in which the furniture is of great value, and the sheriff cannot seize it because he has to put up so much cash before he enters the house, and the creditors do not want to do that. But this section applies to every person, does it not?

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Is not that applicable to traders only?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It applies to everybody. We are not dealing with that section. It is not touched by the present Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I think it ought to be limited to traders.

Section 3 was agreed to.

On new section 4—if petitioning creditor is a secured creditor:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: This is changed. The object is to secure creditors. It is to compel a creditor to make a valuation of his security, and to allow him to rank and vote only for the value, which I think is a good provision. It was in the Act of 1875, and I think it is in the English Act also.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What has my honourable friend to say as to the fixing of the value of the creditors' security? Suppose there is a difference of opinion as to that? Who determines what is the value? The section is silent upon that point.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The creditor should be compelled to make a valuation, and the mass of creditors have the right to take the security at the valuation made by the creditor, and to allow him to rank for the full amount of his claim or to accept his valuation and allow him to rank for the balance only.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The difficulty I see is this. He states what his security is, and places a valuation on it, and he seeks to rank on that valuation. The valuation which he places upon it may be much less than the real value of the security. The consequence is that he would keep his security and would rank on a larger margin than he would otherwise be entitled to.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The answer to that is that if they are not satisfied they can take the security themselves.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There should be some way of ascertaining arbitrarily the value of that security by valuators or assessors. If it is a minor security, I can understand it; but a very large amount of money may be involved, and it seems to me desirable that an appropriate valuation should be placed upon it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: This has been considered very carefully, not only on this but on previous occasions, and the law was the same under the Act of 1875. There is another provision also which we will find later on. Although the estate may take the security at the valuation made by the creditor, if the estate does not take the security, the security may depreciate in a month or two for some reason or another; then the creditor is at liberty to revalue his security, but always subject to the right of the mass of the creditors.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Can my honourable friend conceive of a case in which the creditors would take over the security?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have seen it done.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let us assume for a moment that a creditor is secured upon a valuable piece of real estate, and has placed on it a fair value—the actual value. The creditors are not going to take over that real estate. They would have to pay for it on their own account, and might have to carry it for a considerable length of time.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It works out in this way. I have known a number of cases in which the creditors have taken securities. They have only to say that they take the security; the consequence is that the creditor is allowed to rank for the full amount of his claim, and he is paid out of the estate. The security is sold, and if it does not bring enough to pay the creditor, then he is paid out of the balance, the mass of the estate; but the creditors are not called upon to disburse the money at all. The creditor has to wait until the estate is liquidated.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He takes it pro rata.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot understand it working out in that way. However, let them adjust it between themselves. There should be an assessment made.

New section 4 was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 4—proof of debt, etc.:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What does "qualified person" mean?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: What qualifications must this person have? Personally I do not know anything about the Bankruptcy Act, but I have received several telegrams from prominent mercantile companies in the city where I reside, making certain suggestions or giving expression to their wishes with regard to this Bill. Among other things they strongly protest against the custodian being any person other than one of the most interested creditors or a reputable authorized trustee. As far as I am able to read this section, there is nothing in it showing what is necessary to qualify a person to become a custodian. I would suggest that the honourable Senator from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) state whether he is in favour of the views of those merchants or not.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If honourable gentlemen will refer to the debate in the House of Commons, they will find that there was a long discussion on that. The original Bill contained the words, "one of the most interested creditors." Exception was taken by several members, and the Minister of Justice agreed to substitute the words, "a qualified person, but due regard being had to the wish of the creditors," the desire being to give more leeway, but at the same time to indicate that the choice is to be made from amongst the largest creditors. He must be considered a good, qualified person.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Look at section 11, subsection 4. Perhaps that would throw some light on it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The word "interested" has been left there.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I was going to suggest that it will have to be changed. The two sections should harmonize.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How would you propose changing it?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think it is quite acceptable as it is in subsection 2 of section 4:

> And appoint as custodian a qualified person, having regard, as far as the court deems just, to the wishes of the creditors.

I think that is the best wording to adopt.

Section 4 was agreed to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would like to say in regard to this section which we have just disposed of, that it is germane to the question we were discussing this afternoon—in fact, is almost of the essence of that question. The custodian should be practically a receiver appointed by the court upon the necessary securities being forthcoming from his appointment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is understood that we will come back to question of security.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Perhaps the honourable gentlemen can enlighten me on this point, whether the section we are dealing with applies only to an involuntary assignment, on petition to the court. There is also the voluntary assignment under the Act: who then is the custodian?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Those cases should be on the same plane, because the interested creditors are alike.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under the Act it is the clerk of the court who appoints the custodian.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: You mean, under the amending Bill?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, under the amending Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think that the two should harmonize.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, because there is no distinction between the creditors of a voluntary bankrupt and those of an involuntary bankrupt. They both want to be paid.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Yes, and they both want the court protection.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They both want to have the estate protected.

Section 5 was agreed to.

On section 6—Regarding vestment of property in trustees:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is a consequential amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This contemplates the intervention of the court; that is, it contemplates a receiving order issuing from the court. At what stage, may I ask?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Section 6, subsection 3, repeals section 6, subsection 3, which vests the property in the authorized trustee and substitutes a provision for vesting the property in the creditors' trustee. In this connection it should be noted that there is a period between the adjudication and the meeting of the creditors, during which time the property remains vested in the debtor. We provide, however, by this new subsection that he shall cease to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with such property, which shall be deemed to be in the custody of the court.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: That again would apply only to compulsory assignments.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I should think so.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Are we not making a mistake? Subsection 1 of section 6 of the said Act is repealed—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: 1920?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, 1919. You repeal subsections 1 and 2, and you repeal subsection 3 and substitute something else for it. In that case I should think subsection 3 would become subsection 2.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, it should be renumbered. That can be done later.

Subsection 4 of section 6 amends subsection 4 of section 6 of the Act. This section provides for the transfer of proceedings from one bankruptcy district or division to another by the court upon the resolution of the creditors, and that proceedings be retained in the district or division in which they were commenced, although they should have been commenced elsewhere. The object of this latter provision was to protect the authorized trustee by enabling him to retain control of an estate in which he had inadvertently or otherwise been appointed as trustee. This latter provision is repealed as being no longer necessary.

Section 6 was agreed to.

On section 7—stay of proceedings:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: This section repeals section 7 of the Act, which is one of the sections to provide a stay of proceedings. Section 10 of the Bill takes the place of this and is worded differently.

Section 7 was agreed to.

On section 8—application of Part I:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That is merely a consequential amendment. Section 8 of the Act of 1919 reads:

(1) The provisions of this Part of this Act shall not apply to wage-earners or to persons engaged solely in farming or the tillage of the soil.

Instead of the words "this part," it would read:

The provisions of section 4 of this Act shall not apply to wage-earners or to persons engaged solely in farming or the tillage of the soil.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Would not this be the proper place to discuss the question whether this Act should not be confined to traders?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: We might make that the subject of a separate discussion. If we decided to confine the Act to traders, some of the sections of the Bill would have to be repealed. I would suggest that we take up to-morrow the broad question whether the Act should apply to traders alone or not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I suppose that the "section four" mentioned in section 8 refers to section 4 of the Bill we are now considering.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It means that in the case of an involuntary assignment section 4 shall not apply to farmers or wage-earners. It will apply to everybody else. It is section four of the Act of 1919 that is referred to in section 8 of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Subsection four of section 6 of the old Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But it is not "subsection 4;" it is "section four."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; it is subsection 4 of section 6 of the old Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then we had better correct that. This would refer to section four of the Act of 1919, as I take it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am reading from page 169 of Statutes of 1919, chapter 36.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The observations of the honourable gentleman (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) refer to section 8 of this Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. We are striking out of section 8 of the Act the words "this Part" and are substituting the words "section four." That does not refer to section four of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: No; it refers to the Act of 1919.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Section four of the Act of 1919 is a lengthy one, headed "Petition and Receiving Order," and comprises about ten paragraphs. Is that what is referred to?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think it is.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have this note from the Department:

Section 8 amends section 8 of the Act, which limits the provisions of the first part of the Act (which relates chiefly to petitions), to persons other than wage-earners and farmers. There are some provisions in this part which relate to assignments. It is sufficient to say that the provisions of section 4 (which provide for petitions and receiving orders) shall not apply to wage-earners and farmers.

I am reading from the notes of the Law Clerk. I think you will understand the matter quite easily. Section four of the Act of 1919 deals with petitions and receiving orders.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Well, this does not apply to wage-earners or farmers, because, while they have the privilege of placing themselves under the Insolvency Act, they cannot be compelled to come under it. That is the sole object of the amendment. So section four of the Act of 1919 is not to apply to them, and that is what is stated in this clause.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Why should that apply to doctors, clerks, lawyers, and senators?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is no reason why.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: As was suggested a few moments ago, we will take up that question to-morrow.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All right.

Section 8 was agreed to.

On section 9, new section 8A—when possession to be taken by custodian:

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It occurs to me that that is the section in which security ought to be provided for.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes; and I do not see why it follows section 8 of the Act of 1919.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE (reading): "The said Act is further amended by inserting immediately after section eight the following section." It is 8A.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but the marginal note of section 8 reads:

Certain acts of debtor not deemed an available act of bankruptcy.

Why section 8A, dealing with the initial stages, should be attached to 8, which deals with an entirely different subject, I cannot very well understand.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: There is something in what the honourable gentleman says. It does not seem to come in the proper place. We will consider that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We may adopt the section and have it placed elsewhere.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But we do not want to carry it in its present form. That is the question we discussed this afternoon.

Section 9 stands.

On section 10, new section 8B—stay of proceedings:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I suggest that this section be allowed to stand. It reads:

On the making of a receiving ofder or authorized assignment, no creditor to whom the debtor is indebted in respect of any debt provable in bankruptsy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the debtor or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings for the recovery of a debt provable in bankruptcy unless with the leave of the court and on such terms as the court may impose;

I take no exception to that, I think that is a proper provision. But it continues:

—provided that, subject, to the provisions of section forty-six, any secured creditor or person holding security on the property of the debtor may realize or otherwise deal with his security in the same manner as he would have been entitled to realize or deal with it if this section had not been passed, unless the court otherwise orders.

It is on account of the use made of those words, "unless the court otherwise orders," that I am asking that this clause be allowed to stand. I will state what is the difficulty, in my opinion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Was this Bill passed as introduced in the Commons?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, it is as introduced, but the trouble is this. Take an estate where there are millions of dollars of property, and bonds have been issued. It gives the judge power to tie up the realization of the security on those bonds. If these words "unless the court otherwise orders" were not in the Bill, the bondholders would be entitled to bring to sale the property on which they had the mortgage; but with these words the judge will have the power to defer as long as he may deem necessary the realization of the property.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is not that desirable to prevent a sacrifice being made?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am merely telling the House what is the trouble in my mind, so that it may be considered. I am not settled on the remedy. I am advised that holders of bonds are frightened by this clause, because they do not know whither it may lead. I think it should be very carefully considered. It may depreciate the sale of bonds in a general way, and we should guard against that. I am not sure whether we should fix a time beyond which the judge should not go, either six or twelve months, but without opening the door to tying up the securities indefinitely, or whether it would not be better to allow the judge to exercise the power, provided additional security is given to the holder of the security. Suppose that a property which is considered to be worth $1,000,000 is charged with first mortgage bonds of say $250,000. The mass of the creditors would be very much interested in delaying the realization of the property in the expectation of getting the best price possible and having a large amount to distribute amongst themselves. But is is only for that purpose that the realization of the security should be delayed. On the other hand, if it is delayed in the interest of the mass of the bondholders, the creditors should not suffer, and because of the delay be unable to realize the full amount of the claim, which they could have done if no delay had been granted. I suggest that this clause be allowed to stand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It occurs to me at the moment that the words are practically surplusage. Before a disposition of the property can be made under an issue of bonds or under any instrument that would operate as a security upon the property, an application will have to be made to the court, whether in bankruptcy or not, for the sale of the property; and the court will exercise its discretion as to the date that may be fixed for the sale or foreclosure, as the case may be. It seems to me that the court already has discretion. This simply gives the court a discretion.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: You are losing sight of the first part of the proviso:

> Provided that, subject to the provisions of section 46, any secured creditor or person holding security on the property of the debtor may realize or otherwise deal with his security in the same manner as he would have been entitled to realize or deal with it if this section had not been passed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would he not have that right anyway if he is a secured creditor?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes but we passed a moment ago a section staying the proceeding.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is, section 46 of the Act of 1919?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The first portion of this section says:

> On the making of a receiving order or authorized assignment, no creditor to whom the debtor is indebted in respect of any debts provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the debtor, or shall commence or continue any action, execution, or other proceedings for the recovery of a debt provable in bankruptcy unless with the leave of the court and on such terms as the court may impose.

You see, this is general. It stays the proceedings. You then have the exception which I have just read. So, that there is no stay of proceedings so far as secured creditors are concerned, "unless the court otherwise orders."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Was there a stay under section 46 of the former Act?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Does this postpone or nullify the claim of a creditor who has given his goods to the debtor and where the goods may be in sight? Would it prevent him taking any action on the ground of fraud or otherwise?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not at present agree with my honourable friend that the words "unless the court otherwise orders" should be stricken out. I think the discretion of the court should be maintained.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have not suggested that the words be struck out. I merely drew attention to the clause and ask that it be suspended.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think those words should remain. One reason occurs to me now. There may be others. Bonds and other securities are secured by mortgage in favour of someone who acts as trustee. In all these mortgages you will find a clause to the effect that if the debtor, the company which has issued the bonds, goes into liquidation or becomes bankrupt, the bonds immediately become exigible. I am supposing a case of that sort where the bonds have not matured. They are not exigible as to date, but they have become exigible because the giver of the bond has become insolvent, or has not met the interest, or something of that sort. The time for the maturing of those bonds has not expired. An action is brought by the trustees in the name of the bondholders for the payment of those bonds. We must bear in mind all the time that the unsecured creditors have a lien on all the property of the debtor, including the property that goes to guarantee the bonds.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: A second lien.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: A subsequent and unsecured lien, which would only cover and apply to the balance which would remain after the property had been disposed of in satisfaction of those securities. You must remember all the time that there is a concurrence, a co-existing interest, along with the secured creditors, in the property mortgaged. The trustee brings an action. He says: "These bonds are not matured under the terms of the bond, but this debtor has committed an act which makes them exigible right away: I am going to sell right away." The unsecured creditor may say: "If you wait five or six months you will make a better sale." I think that is where the court should be allowed to exercise its discretion to decide whether it would not be in the interest of the unsecured creditors without causing any injury to the secured creditors, that the sale should be postponed and that there should be a stay of proceedings.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: That section would not cover it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Oh, yes. This section stays all proceedings of any kind.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: As against the debtor only—not as against the property itself.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: You cannot distinguish between the property and the debtor.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: If I have a mortgage on the property, I can sell the property.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: You could exercise the power of sale, and I think the court might interfere.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Of course, if you proceed under the power of sale, there is nothing to restrain any creditor from applying to the court and asking that the proceedings be delayed.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: But this section says it shall not interfere with any rights at all.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Unless the court otherwise orders. That is what I am talking about.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: What I mean is this. The section says:

> Provided that, subject to the provisions of section 46, any secured creditor or person holding security on the property of the debtor may realize or otherwise deal with his security in the same manner as he would have been entiled to realize or deal with it if this section had not been passed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: "Unless the court otherwise orders."

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: First, it says:

> On the making of a receiving order or authorized assignment, no creditor to whom the debtor is indebted in respect of any debt provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the debtor, or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings.

That is only an action for a debt. But if you hold a mortgage or bond against his property, that does not prevent you selling the property under the mortgage or under the bond; so all that is referred to in the section about bringing the action is an unsecured debt.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. See the words in the thirty-second line "or otherwise deal with his security."

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I know, but it merely says that it will be the same as if this section had not been passed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: "Unless the court otherwise orders."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If you leave that out, you are quite right, and I am all wrong.

Section 10 stands.

On section 11, subsection 1—regarding assignment for general benefit of creditors:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the meaning of "locality of the debtor?"

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is defined in section 2.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But I want to know its relation to the trustee. It means that this trustee must have authority in this locality. That is what I do not quite understand. In introducing this Bill my honourable friend pointed out that one of the vicious features of the old Act was the appointment of trustees in bankruptcy as described in the first paragraph of section 14, and he stated that the policy of this Bill was to do away with what I might term "locality trustees." We are repeating the phrase here.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Section 11 amends section 9 of the Act in such a way as to provide for the assignment to the creditors generally instead of to an authorized trustee, as heretofore,

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: "Pursuant to section 14 with authority in the locality of the debtor." That is to say, as I understand it, the creditors could not appoint a trustee unless he was an authorized locality trustee. Now we are doing away with that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is merely a consequential amendment.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Because you are making an assignment to an officer of the court in that locality.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If that is the meaning, that is all right.

Subsection 1 of section 11 was agreed to.

On new subsection 2 of section 11—authorized assignment:

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What is the meaning of the words "or otherwise?"

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: They make it more general.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think they are wholly useless.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: A common creditor.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:: Whether secured or not.

New section 2 was agreed to.

On new subsection 3 of section 11—filing of such authorized assignment:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To what extent will the court authorize jurisdiction or authority over the property? Apparently the policy of the Bill is that the custodian should be in possession of the property.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Subject to the jurisdiction of the court. He may be removed.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It may not be a very proper expression.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me you would have two conflicting authorities, one the court, and the other the custodian.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: "Shall be under the authority of the court"—I think that would be better.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The custodian would be appointed by the court?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; he is appointed by the Official Receiver, under section 8A. He can be appointed by the court, but section 8A refers to "the custodian whether appointed by the court pursuant to a receiving order, or by the Official Receiver pursuant to an authorized assignment." Can my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Béique) say what is the distinction? There are apparently two classes of cases there; that is to say, the case where the receiving order is issued by the court, and the case where the Official Receiver acts pursuant to an authorized assignment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: There is the distinction between the voluntary assignment and the compulsory one. That is the only distinction. I would suggest that it should read: "Shall be deemed to be under the authority of the court."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. I think everything that is done up to the taking of possession by the trustee should be under the authority of the court.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: Instead of the words, "in the custody"' it should read, "under the authority."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Furthermore, the prothonotary should be an officer of the court in relation to the property.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: You mean the Official Receiver?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, the Official Receiver.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will not this situation arise?

If the Official Receiver accepts the assignment, he shall file the same whereupon the property of the debtor shall be deemed to be in the custody of the court—

He is himself an officer of the court; he is a clerk of the court, or prothonotary.

—and the debtor shall cease to have any capacity to dispose of or otherwise deal with such property.

It is deemed to be in the custody of the court so long as it remains there, but the following subsection reads:

(4) Immediately after the acceptance of the authorized assignment, the Official Receiver shall appoint a custodian whom he shall, as far as possible, select from the most interested creditors.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are going to amend that. He may not be an interested creditor: he will be a "qualified person," according to what my honourable friend from De Salaberry has suggested.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But he may be chosen from among the most interested creditors.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND (reading):

The Official Receiver or his nominee shall preside at the first meeting of creditors and shall decide any questions arising in connection with the appointment of the trustee by the creditors.

My first reading of it would give me the impression that once the Official Receiver accepts the appointment the property of the debtor is deemed to be in the custody of the court. It passes from the court to the custodian only when the custodian is appointed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But go back to section 8A and you will see that the custodian is in possession.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Not at that moment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, not as an officer of the court. That will have to be cleared up.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes. Subject to reconsideration to-morrow if the Department takes any objection. I should think it would be a better wording to substitute "under the authority for the words, "in the custody."

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Beique was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Would it not be better to have the custodian appointed by the court?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would think so.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: An assignment is made to the court official—the prothonotary or the registrar. Then he goes to the judge, not on the suggestion of the creditor, but on his own initiative, and suggests So-and-so as custodian, asking the court to ratify his suggestion or appoint somebody else. The judge does so and names someone and mentions the security to be given by the custodian. You have there an official who will be responsible to the court and liable to imprisonment for failure to perform his official duties. You have all the machinery of a duly-constituted court to inquire into his conduct—to hear evidence and to make such provision as will best suit the case. We are trying to make this Bill as good as we can, and I think it would unquestionably be much better if the appointment of the custodian were left to the discretion of the court.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If it were ratified by the court?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Ratified by the court or left to the discretion of the court.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There should be a duly qualified receiver appointed by the court.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Then the court would be able to make the custodian perform his duties.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I appreciate the suggestion which was made a moment ago, that it be declared that the Official Receiver, who is the prothonotary, should be an official of the court. I am inclined to think that it would be well to provide for that. However, I would point out that even if it is so provided the judge will leave such matters to the prothonotary and an unnecessary petition would add to the cost of the liquidation of the estate.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Perhaps the honourable gentleman can enlighten me. It does seem to me that this is a most cumbersome way of having an assignment or bankruptcy petition. First you have the Official Receiver. Then, when he gets the property, he must pass it over to the custodian. The custodian then calls a meeting of the creditors and they appoint somebody else and it is passed over to the creditors' nominee. You have the property passing into the hands of three different persons.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No, no.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Two persons. First you have the Official Receiver.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: And the custodian.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Yes. There is the Official Receiver. He gets it first. Then he nominates another man called the custodian.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He has to take possession of the property and hold it.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Why cannot the Official Receiver do that? The meeting of the creditors is to be held within a very few days.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But it is the Official Receiver and not the custodian who calls the creditors together.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I know. When the Official Receiver gets hold of the property why cannot he call a meeting of the creditors and let them deal with it at once?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But it takes some time to call such a meeting, and during that time the property must be in the hands of somebody.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: But it is in the hands of the Official Receiver, who is a court official.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But he cannot exercise any authority in the matter.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Why should he not?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There must be a special arrangement for that purpose. The prothonotary has his own duties to attend to, and he must appoint a custodian who can take care of the property during the whole time. That is why the custodian is necessary. But what I think should be done is to make that custodian an officer of the court; or at all events make him amenable to the court if he does not do his duty.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: An interim receiver, that is what he should be.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: May I ask the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) where in the Bill there is any definition as to who the Official Receiver may be. I have not come across that definition so far.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Official Receiver is the prothonotary or the clerk of the court.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Does it say that?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes; in section 2, at the end of the first page.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Of the amending Bill?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

"(yy) 'Official Receiver' means the person having authority in the locality of the debtor to exercise the functions of the official receiver for the time being."

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: But that does not say he is the prothonotary or an officer of the court.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: As was mentioned a few moments ago, it might be better to add a provision stating that he shall be an officer of the court.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: That is all right, but it is not in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No. We will consider that.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: In Quebec there is a prothonotary. I do not know what the officer in Ontario would be called. In some other provinces there is the registrar.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: Subsection 3 is passed, but in line 16 the words "in the custody" are struck out and the words "under the authority" are substituted.

New subsection 3, as amended, was agreed to.

On new subsection 4, subsection 2 of section 11—appointment of custodian:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That stands.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I suggest that we adopt the words "a qualified person."

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Is there any definition of the words "most interested?"

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I suggest that this be worded to read:

Shall appoint as custodian a qualified person, having regard, as far as the court deems just, to the wishes of the creditors.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would imply that the matter is considered by the court before he is appointed. It seems to me that some section has been omitted which made provision for application being made to court.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Let subsection 4 stand.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: In order that we may consider something other than this, let me make a suggestion. I propose that the subsection should read:

Immediately after the acceptance of the authorized assignment, the court, upon the application of the Official Receiver, shall appoint a qualified person as custodian of all the property and assets so assigned or transferred to the Official Receiver.

You cannot call the creditors at that moment. A man comes into the office of the Official Receiver and says, "Here is my property." You cannot get the creditors together to give advice to the judge. There must be somebody who, immediately the assignment is made, within a few minutes if possible, takes charge of the property which has been abandoned, controls it, and becomes responsible for it. I submit that the only way to bring that about is to provide that the Official Receiver may at once go to the judge and say: "I have received an assignment of property from So-and-so. Whom will Your Lordship appoint as custodian?"

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Upon proper security.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: And he would fix the security that is to be given.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: One of the suggestions that have been sent to me in some of these telegrams is that the custodian should not be a relative of the debtor. So far, I think, no honourable gentleman has made any reference to that point, and I would like to know what is the opinion of the Committee on it. Would it not be objectionable to have as custodian a relative by blood or by marriage of the debtor?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If the relative must give security, what difference does it make? Would not the requirement of security remove the objection?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He may be a relative without your knowing it. I do not see how you could provide against that.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: If the custodian has nothing to do but merely take care of the property until it is handed over to somebody else, then of course the security would be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He cannot dispose of any of the property.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: He is only the custodian.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Then the relationship would not make any difference.

New subsection 4 stands.

On new subsection 5—procedure at first meeting of creditors:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: "And shall decide any questions arising in connection with the appointment of the trustee by the creditors."

Hon. M. BELCOURT: That is very poor language.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is to say, he apparently supersedes the creditors.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Certainly, that is what it means.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It means he shall decide any question that may arise as to the majority of creditors.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It does not say that.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: "Shall decide any questions arising in connection with the appointment of the trustee." He is to decide as to the majority of the creditors, who have the right to appoint the trustee. There might be some dispute as to the amount of their claims.

New subsection 5 was agreed to.

On section 12, new section 10—Form of assignment:

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would point out that there might be several courts having jurisdiction in the same place. I do not suppose it makes much difference.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: "The court having jurisdiction in the locality of the debtor."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is defined.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are going to define that. That has to be done yet.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: You do not define what court.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; it will be necessary to have a clause defining that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think it is defined later on.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have not seen it yet.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: There is no definition of it there.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: With regard to section 12, would it not be wise also to have the appointment of the guardian announced, so that any interested creditor who might come to the courthouse could find out who the guardian is? I think the same provision ought to be made for the guardian as is made for the Official Receiver.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: You mean the custodian?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes, I mean the custodian.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me the Official Receiver should be compelled, when he notifies the creditors, to state what has been done as to the custodian.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is what I mean.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In the first notice to creditors all the information could be given and should be given to the creditors.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: When the Official Receiver notifies and calls in the creditors?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is not only that. The provision says:

> Every Official Receiver with whom an assignment is filed, shall, when the same is completed as hereinbefore provided, deposit the same in the court having jurisdiction in the locality of the debtor.

He should at the same time give notice to that court of the fact that So-and-so has been appointed custodian.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, there is no doubt about that.

Section 12 was agreed to.

Section 13 was agreed to.

On section 14—publication of notice:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is that public notice of his appointment in the Canada Gazette?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Notice of the assignment to be published.

Section 14 was agreed to.

New subsections 1 and 2 of section 15 were agreed to.

On subsection 3 of section 15—proceedings by trustee:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What does that relate to?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: A provision was inserted in the Act last year providing for schemes of arrangement, which were subject to the approval of two-thirds of all classes of interested parties—that is, of creditors and shareholders. This is to substitute three-quarters for two-thirds. I have been asked to amend this provision by persons representing companies, and I have invited them to prepare their amendment, and we may consider it to-morrow. They claim that this provision is all right so far as the creditors are concerned, but that, as far as the shareholders are concerned, it should be sufficient to require two-thirds.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To do what?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: To approve of the scheme of arrangement.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Two-thirds in value?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes. We will consider it when it comes up. I think we may pass it and reconsider it to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: With regard to that, my correspondents think that a plain majority would be quite sufficient at the first meeting of the creditors, and they object to two-thirds being necessary. The proposed amendment is even worse than that; it makes it three-quarters.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: We will let this stand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Has that to do with the presence of the three-quarters joining under the signatures?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is three-quarters of the creditors.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That does not involve their being present. They must be consenting parties.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Present, or by proxy.

New subsection 3 of section 15 stands.

On section 13—filing of assignment (reconsidered):

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: In order to try to make myself intelligible, may I read subsection 14 of section 13 of the Act of 1919. I propose to deal with something in the Act which is not dealt with in the Bill before us. This is the subsection to which I want to refer:

If default is made in payment of any instalment due in pursuance of the composition, extension or scheme, or if it appears to the court, on satisfactory evidence, that the composition, extension or scheme cannot, in consequence of legal difficulties, or for any sufficient cause, proceed without injustice or undue delay to the creditors or to the debtor, or that the approval of the court was obtained by fraud, the court may, if it thinks fit, on application by the trustee or by any creditor, adjudge the debtor bankrupt, make a receiving order against him, and annul the composition, extension or scheme.

The case I want to put before the Commission is this. Whilst the composition, extension or scheme is being carried out, especially in the case of composition, certain things will have been done, and certain payments will have been made to the creditors. If the judge subsequently annuls that composition, you have creditors who have received part of the money under the composition.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but without prejudice to the payment duly made.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What I am coming to is this. During the same time merchants throughout the community, having learned that so-and-so had made an assignment or an extension, or a composition, and on the faith of that, and knowing that some of the creditors under the composition scheme have already received some part of the money, advance goods to the debtor. The judge comes along afterwards and annuls the composition and puts an end to everything, and these gentlemen who advanced the goods in the meantime can only rank with those men who have already received part of the money forming the composition.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: Would that not be the consequence if the debtor failed to meet all the requiremnets of the composition? His creditors would rank the same as creditors of any debtor.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is quite true; but I am putting the case of creditors who under a composition scheme have already received half the money to be paid by way of composition. Whilst that scheme is being carried out, other people advance goods to the same debtor under the impression and in the hope that this composition is going to be carried out.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: They do it at their own risk.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is what I want to guard against. These men are placed in the awkward position of being faced by a man who is declared to be bankrupt, whilst their co-creditors have received part of their debt. I realize the difficulty of protecting these men who have advanced the goods.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You cannot protect men from the three-card-monte game.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Persons advancing goods under such circumstances know that they are treating with a debtor who has made a composition to pay his debts in three or six or nine months; therefore they are supposed to know that they are exposed to the risk of the composition being annulled.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Suppose the composition is completed; the result is the same. What do you suggest?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Why could not the court exercise its discretion in regard to these subsequent creditors who have advanced goods or money on the faith of the composition being carried out? I thought we might add the words: "and subject to such depreciation as the court may make with regard to the claim of creditors against the debtors incurred subsequently to such composition, extension or scheme."

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No, because a man who does that takes an additional risk and should have the same security as a man who did not take such a risk in making the original sale. The composition is for the original creditors of the debtor.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Who advanced to a solvent man.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes. The people you are trying to protect advanced to an insolvent man and took their chances on the composition being carried through. They took an extra hazard. You should not put them on the same plane.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It would create such a state of uncertainty that they would be at the mercy of the caprice of any judge.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: By that additional sale, this man has made the estate, that much the worse.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That much the better.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The best provision for a man who finds that there is still a little margin owing, is to pay it himself and save his own property.

Section 13 was agreed to.

New subsection 5 of section 15 was agreed to.

On new subsection 6 of section 15—court may make order annulling bankruptcy or assignment:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Under the Act at present in force the judge has the right to decide. This is taking the matter out of the jurisdiction of the judge.

New subsection 6 of section 15 was agreed to.

Section 16 was agreed to.

On section 17—Security to be furnished by trustee:

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I suppose we ought to make a similar provision there with regard to the custodian. He ought to be under the same obligation as the Official Receiver as to security.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. That will be an amendment consequent upon the other clause being changed.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

Section 17 was agreed to.

Sections 18 and 19 were agreed to.

On section 20—sales in the province of Quebec:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will accept all that if the honourable gentlemen from Quebec say that is what they want.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Anything is good enough for Quebec? Seriously, I do not see why the same provision should not apply to a mortgage in Ontario or any of the other provinces in which the English law prevails.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I may have to ask that part of this clause be reconsidered to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Let us adopt it in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Beique) consider the propriety of applying the same provisions to the other provinces?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That is not within my province.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am making the suggestion. I do not see why the same provision should not apply to all the provinces.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend can test the feeling of his colleagues from Ontario.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is because of the distinction between a hypothec and a mortgage. Is not that the reason?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But it is not a sufficient reason.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Under the Ontario system the mortgagee is the owner.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, he has the legal estate; whereas in Quebec he has not.

Section 20 was agreed to.

Sections 21 and 22 were agreed to.

On section 23—remuneration of trustee:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Under the law as it now stands the remuneration is limited to 5 per cent. It has been claimed that in small estates, if $1,000 is realized, that is altogether sufficient, and that power should be given to the court, with the approval of the inspectors, to increase the amount.

Section 23 was agreed to.

Sections 24 to 30, inclusive, were agreed to.

On section 31, new section 52—application of provincial law:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should like to have that section stand until to-morrow, because it has created a great deal of dissatisfaction in the country.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Stands.

Section 31 stands.

Sections 32, 33 and 34 were agreed to.

On section 35, new section 65A—Official Receivers:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How are those districts to be established? By Order in Council?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: By Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The wording of this section does not seem to be very apt:

"65a. There shall be one Official Receiver in each Bankruptcy District or Division who shall have and perform only such duties and responsibilities as are prescribed by this Act and Rules, and who shall be appointed by the Governor in Council".

Suppose it is the local registrar or the clerk of the court, would not that disqualify him for performing other duties? He would have to give up one or other of the jobs.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And if he gave up his position he would cease to qualify under this Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Let it stand.

Section 35 stands.

Sections 36, 37 and 38 were agreed to.

Progress was reported.

PRIVATE BILL

COUCURRENCE IN COMMONS AMENDMENT

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved concurrence in the amendment made by the House of Commons to Bill 12, an Act to Incorporate the Montreal Finance Trust.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned till to-morrow at 3 p.m.

Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

THE SENATE

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

FREIGHTERS DRUMMOND AND McKEE

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. BENNETT inquired of the Government:

Upon what terms were the freighters T. J. Drummond and J. A. McKee leased to the Great Lakes Transportation Company for the season of 1923 as to the price to be paid for the use thereof and conditions (if any) as to price to be charged for carrying grain.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

The freighters T. J. Drummond and J. A. McKee were chartered May 3, 1923 to the Great Lakes Towing Company, of Midland, Ontario. It is not considered in the interests of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to publish the terms of the charter. There were no conditions as to grain rates.

JUDGES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 201, an Act to amend the Judges Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the Legislature of Ontario has decreed that there shall be two Appellate Divisions and a High Court Division by its last legislative enactment. The first Appellate Division will be presided over by the Chief Justice of Ontario, and there will be a Second Chief Justice on the Second Division. When a vacancy occurs in the Court of Common Pleas, the two judges now occupying positions in that Court are not to be replaced. There will be a Chief Justice of the High Court, with the same number of judges as at present. The judges of the Appellate Division will be known as the Judges of Appeal. There is no increase in the number of judges and no increase in salaries. That covers the first part of the Bill.

The second part, which concerns the Circuit Court of Montreal, is for the purpose of raising the salaries of the four judges of that Court. The Senior Judge of that Court will henceforth receive $8,000 a year, and the other three judges will receive $7,000 each. I may say that this will cure a grievance which has been apparent to all the members of the Bar at Montreal as well as to the judges, more especially to the victims of the law which neglected to take them into consideration when the salaries of the judges were raised before.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: What are the present salaries?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Chief Justice gets $5,500, and the Puisne Judges $5,000 each.

Strange to say, the error occurred while the Minister of Justice was from the province of Quebec, the present Lieutenant-Governor of that province, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. But he was not from Montreal. Circuit work throughout the province had always been carried on by the judges of the Superior Court, but some 25 years ago it was felt that the work which devolved upon that Court in the city was so great that it justified the appointment of special judges to that Court. In general actions for recovery, their jurisdiction is limited apparently to $100; but in other matters it goes much further. The whole municipal machinery falls under their review, as well as the valuation rolls, and they deal with actions in which millions of dollars are involved, and in such cases their judgments have been carried as far as the Privy Council. They deal with thousands of cases, and work diligently from morning till night. They are as fully and seriously occupied as the judges of the Superior Court. These judges felt that they had been lost sight of. When the increases were made, the Minister of Justice of the time took for granted that they belonged to the Superior Court and were getting the benefit of the general increase. I believe it is due to these judges to raise their salaries as proposed in the Bill. They are not put on an exact parity with the Superior Court judges, who receive $9,000 a year; but if the dignity of the Bench is to be maintained, these judges in the city of Montreal are entitled to a stipend that will enable them to maintain their position in the community. The jurisdiction of this Court is considerable.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How many judges are there in Montreal?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Chief Justice and three Puisne Judges.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Were not the salaries of the judges of Appeal in Ontario previously fixed at $9,000?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They are not increased in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: If this is the proper time, I would like to point out to the leader of the Government that last February I asked if the Government was aware that two judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario had been paid $10,000 each by the Province in apparent contravention of an Act passed in 1920. The reply which I got was no. Now, ugly rumours are floating about to the effect that two prominent judges did receive $10,000 each from the Province of Ontario for services rendered after that Act was passed. I would like to ask the leader of the Government to bring this matter again before the Justice Department and get a ruling.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will submit the question of my honourable friend to the Department of Justice.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman was stating the jurisdiction of the judges.
