POINTS OF ORDER

QUORUM

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, according to Standing Order 29(4) whenever the Speaker adjourns the House for want of a quorum, the time of adjournment and the names of the members then present shall be inserted in the Journals.

I was present yet my name was not recorded. I signed the sheet.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member signed the sheet and there is a mistake. It will be checked out and if somehow it has been lost, his name will be added in the journals branch, so he need not worry about that.

I thank you for bringing it to the attention of the House.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TREATY COMMISSION ACT

The House resumed from October 19 consideration of the motion that Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour had the floor. The hon. member for Surrey North has the floor for 40 minutes on behalf of her party.

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on September 21, 1992 the federal government, the British Columbia provincial government and the summit, which is a group representing aboriginal groups involved in this matter, reached an agreement to establish a commission called the British Columbia Treaty Commission. It would aid in the treaty negotiation process by assisting the groups involved to become fully prepared for their role in this process.

In other words, the commission would not be directly involved in the actual negotiations but would ensure those persons who would be at the negotiation table would have arrived there fully prepared with all the i's dotted and the t's crossed. I am assuming the objective of this approach, i.e. the creation of a commission to facilitate, is to speed up the negotiating process and to ensure all parties are fully informed as to the nature and intent of the negotiating dialogue.

The September 21, 1992 agreement committed the three principals involved to establish this treaty commission via statutes in the case of the governments and a resolution in the case of the summit. This agreement also addressed the B.C. Treaty Commission's organization such as the membership, the terms of office, the location of the office, the quorum, the funding arrangements at least for the first five years, and so on. The agreement also identified the commission's mandates and its parameters.

It was all there on September 21, 1992. Very early in May 1993, less than one year later, the summit passed its resolution. Later that same month the B.C. legislature also passed its enabling legislation. However, here in October 1995, almost two and one–half to three years later, we are debating Bill C–107 which is the bill respecting the establishment of the B.C. Treaty Commission.

There has been an awareness of this need for legislation for some time, actually one year and three months since September. One can ask why this government is taking so long, since January 1994 for example when Parliament opened here, to carry out its obligations on this process.

The commission does exist but because of the delay in the passing of legislation here to establish it, it has been functioning informally. The fact that the commission has been functioning in our immediate past provides us here today with an insight as to the possible effectiveness of its role in the whole negotiating process to date.

For example, we have had some difficulties. In British Columbia six blockades were erected by the natives in the past year. One was a blockade on a road for private residences on Adams Lake near Kamloops that ran through an Indian reserve. Not far away was a two–week blockade disrupting business this spring at the Douglas Lake ranch after the ranch had asked natives to stop net fishing on a lake that was privately stocked by the ranch. Only the delicate negotiations of the RCMP kept the peace and brought that blockade down.

A third blockade was outside Penticton. Three native bands disrupted last winter's season for the Apex ski resort with their so–called checkpoints on the access road that ran through the reserve.

Early this summer the province shelled out millions to a developer to buy waterfront property on Vancouver Island which was later discovered to be another burial ground. This triggered another obstruction.

• (1010)

Then in northern B.C. the Gitksan Indians, who are well into negotiating land claims, erected blockades to frustrate forestry operations on the land they wish to claim. Number six was Gustafsen Lake. The owners of the cattle ranch company at Gustafsen Lake were victimized by renegades who had no direct association with the North Shuswap band.

These behaviour patterns are not condoned and they are certainly not conducive toward achieving a constructive negotiating process. They are occurring regardless of the negotiations today and regardless of the commission's activity to date. Be it legal or illegal, behaviour patterns are occurring suggesting, first, that there is a frustration with the whole process, possibly partially due to delays such as the one we are experiencing today; and, second, that the present approach of the negotiations is not effective or at least not as effective as it should be.

In addressing the slowdowns or the delays, it is quite obvious in British Columbia how long the land negotiations have been dragging on. We can see that right across the country. Negotiations on the Nisga'a claim have carried on for some 23 years.

As negotiations proceeded into the 29th Parliament, which was 1972–74, the current Prime Minister was then the minister of Indian affairs. Negotiations continued on through the 30th Parliament of 1974–79 and again our Prime Minister was present. Negotiations marched on through the 31st Parliament of 1979–84 and our Prime Minister was there as well. As negotiations sped along during the 32nd and 33rd Parliaments of 1984–88 and 1988–93 respectively, our Prime Minister was in the opposition, except for a very brief period of time.

Now the Prime Minister has held a large majority in the 35th Parliament since October 1993 and here we are over two years later creating a commission to facilitate discussions between aboriginals, the B.C. government and the federal government. I wonder whether the right thing be done now on the treaty negotiations.

Another suggestion I mentioned earlier arises from the various behavioural signals we are getting, that is the possibility that the present approach for constructive negotiating is not effective or is not as effective as it should be. As I stated earlier, the commission is functioning in its facilitating role. Therefore, it should be preparing the parties involved for effective participation in the negotiating process.

Possibly it is this preparation aspect which may be the weakness in achieving the effective results for all those involved or for all those affected by the decisions which are being reached. Possibly the present method which we are using to prepare for these negotiations should be reviewed. We strongly recommend that the commission review this situation and insist that the parties involved listen to the concerns of both aboriginal and non–aboriginal peoples at the grassroots level and formulate their negotiating position with input from that source.

In our discussions with people at the grassroots level we found a common concern for jobs, public safety, health, racism, education, et cetera. We also found a common lack of understanding of the land claims and the self–government demands. We further found that there was a common mistrust of the federal department of Indian affairs and of politicians.

We recommend that the commission also promote the need for creating or establishing a fundamental change in the relationships between the aboriginals and governments, with less dependency on the federal government and more democratic control by the aboriginals over aboriginal governments. Our aim is to give aboriginals more responsibility for their own well–being, the tools to discharge that responsibility and more accountability for the results.

We strongly recommend that the commission prepare the parties involved to achieve that objective by incorporating the following principles into the agreements while they are at the negotiating table.

First, the development of democratic, accountable and responsible local governments on the reserves should be supported and subject to the laws of Canada and the provinces. Members will recall during the constitutional wranglings of the Mulroney government that aboriginal women were very concerned about protection of their individual fundamental rights and freedoms.

Second, aboriginal people on reserves should have access to the services of Elections Canada to guarantee democratic process is respected in band council elections and access to the services of the auditor general to maintain the fiscal accountability of local governments. We have been approached by band members who are very unhappy with what they view as this huge process in band elections and what they allege to be the misuse of band funds.

Third, land settlement processes should be not only fair, affordable and final but publicly negotiated and open to all the affected interests. The negotiations that led to Bills C–33 and C–34 being rushed through the House were not publicly conducted.

Fourth, individual aboriginals should be able to opt for private ownership of a share of any land entitlement and the property rights and reserves should be expanded and respected. Presently aboriginal farmers have difficulty getting operating loans for each crop year because they do not hold title. A newly formed aboriginal association, the First Nations Agriculture Association of Alberta, wants to address this and other related issues.

Fifth, aboriginals living on reserves should be able to receive federal financial transfers directly as other Canadians do rather than from a band council.

Sixth, direct federal funding of aboriginal political associations should end, allowing the aboriginals to decide which organizations they will support financially or otherwise. Why should anyone have to support something whose aims do not agree with his or hers?

Seventh, special tax exemptions for aboriginals provided for under the Indian Act should be rescinded and aboriginal individuals and companies should be subject to the same taxation laws as all Canadians. This would do much to counteract resentment and would give the aboriginals a stake in what happens in the federal government.

Eighth, existing treaties should be honoured in accordance with court interpretation and laws enacted by aboriginal governments should conform to the laws of Canada. Another point the commission could prepare the parties for discussing is Canadian law, including the Criminal Code. Laws should be enforced uniformly across the country regardless of race, language or culture of the victims or perpetrators of the crime.

In the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development policy guide on self–government listed among the subject matter where there are no compelling reasons for aboriginal governments or institutions to exercise law making authority are: maintenance of the national law and order and substantive criminal law including offences and penalties under the Criminal Code and other criminal laws, emergencies and the peace, order and good government power. That was page 7. We hope the minister will follow through on this commitment to universal application and enforcement of the Criminal Code.

A ninth principle for consideration at the table would be regional conventions of aboriginal representatives elected by aboriginals to discuss particular application of the principles of self–government. The commission can achieve the objective of giving aboriginals more responsibility for their own well–being and the tools to discharge that responsibility plus more accountability for the results by preparing the parties involved to negotiate the previously mentioned principles at the table.

Regarding the whole concept of treaty negotiations not specifically in the negotiating component, in British Columbia another concern comes to mind at this time. Article 13 of the British Columbia Terms of Union is: "The charge of the Indians and the trusteeship and management of lands reserved for their use and benefit shall be assumed by the dominion government".

The document goes on to say: "To carry out such policy, tracts of land of such extent as it has hitherto been the practice of the British Columbia government to appropriate for that purpose, shall from time to time be conveyed by the local government to the dominion government in trust for the use and benefit of Indians on application of the dominion government".

By order in council PC 1265, dated July 19, 1924, the federal government formally acknowledged that B.C. had satisfied all the obligations of article 13 respecting the furnishing of lands for Indian reserves and had described the process as "full and final settlement of all differences between the government of the dominion and the provinces".

One tends to think that would imply the negotiating aspect, as far as British Columbia is concerned, has been completed. However, here we are negotiating treaty settlements in British Columbia with British Columbia aboriginal groups which according to a release from British Columbia's aboriginal affairs minister will cost taxpayers some $10 billion.

In studying Bill C–107 I became concerned about some of the clauses. The first concern is there are several money spending clauses. For example, clause 6(3) assumes the commission has been functioning informally already, that any transactions which occurred previous to this will be assumed by the commission once this bill passes.

Clause 9 is remuneration and other terms and conditions of appointment of the commissioners. Here we are possibly talking about salaries or expenses, et cetera.

Clause 16 is a money clause which illustrates that the federal government will assume the financial responsibility of any claims or damages that the commission may incur. But it is directly related to the proportion of their original funding.

Clause 17 allows the commission to hire persons to assist it. In clause 5 allowances are made for the commission to have moneys to enable aboriginal groups to participate in the negotiations. Further to that, in clause 5(3)(c), should a dispute arise, money will be provided for the parties to prepare themselves to resolve the dispute.

Those money clauses are included in the bill. The agreement of September 1992 identifies a cost sharing program between the federal and provincial governments. It only addresses this issue for the first five years of the activities of the commission. No apparent indication is made of what occurs in the sixth year or thereafter and no date is available in the whole process to say how long these negotiations in British Columbia will continue.

On the money concept a clause states that an annual budget will be presented to the principals. Considering all these points, auditing is essential. Clause 20 addresses the audit situation but it says:

> The accounts and financial transactions of the Commission shall be audited annually—

• (1025)

That is good.

> —by a qualified independent auditor designated by the Commission, and a report of the audit shall be made to the Commission.

It does not go any further than that. Considering that a portion of this is federal funding, it seems very logical to me that auditing of the federal funding portion at least should be done by the auditor general.

Clauses 18 and 22 are of concern as well. Clause 18 says:

> The Commission may make by-laws consistent with this Act and the Agreement—

The agreement in this case means the agreement of September 21, 1992.

> The Commission may make by-laws consistent with this Act and the Agreement respecting the carrying out of the work—

That in itself is all right. Clause 22 says:

> Nothing in this Act shall be interpreted as preventing the principals from amending the Agreement from time to time.

That is the September 21 agreement. I find that quite difficult from the point of view the whole bill is the agreement of September 21, 1992. Therefore, if the principals are to go back and change this agreement after the legislation has been passed, it is a logical follow through that the bill should be amended to incorporate the changes the principals have made to the initial agreement.

We offer qualified support to the establishment of the B.C. Treaty Commission and to Bill C–107. We are a little after the fact, but nevertheless we hope any discussions facilitated by the commission would include our recommendations which, as I said, come from the grassroots, both native and non–native.

The concerns of aboriginal people are Canadian concerns. They are concerned about jobs, personal safety, social service and control over their own government just like the rest of us are. We need to give aboriginals the same rights and responsibilities for meeting those concerns as other Canadians have.

We believe aboriginals will welcome the chance to free themselves from the paternalism of the department of Indian affairs, to assert a more genuine, democratic control over their own affairs and to realize brighter futures for themselves, for their children and their grandchildren.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in my place today to join the debate on second reading of Bill C–107. The Government of Canada has maintained that providing justice and equity for aboriginal peoples requires two ingredients, self–government and the process of making modern day treaties through comprehensive claims.

Canadians have been wrestling with these issues for years. The Reform Party, for its part, has used the self–government issue to fan the flames of fear and apprehension during the debates over the Charlottetown accord and now it continues to stir up controversy in British Columbia through its misrepresentation of the treaty process.

I have heard hon. members opposite make a great deal of the media reports of the total First Nations' claims adding up to 110 per cent of the province. That total should not surprise us. Why should not the claims overlap one another? The First Nations have shared the land and its resources for centuries. They have migrated and tapped the resources of different locales at different times.

They have been asked as part of the treaty making process to describe the geographic area of the First Nations' traditional territory in British Columbia. They provided a map of the traditional areas of their ancestors which depicts a territory that a nation occupied historically. These maps are used to provide negotiators with a general idea of what area of land is under question, which is part of stage one of the process, the statement of intent.

A statement of intent is not a settlement. A claim is not a treaty. A treaty is a result of negotiations and the negotiations are just beginning. The claims are but the start of the bargaining position. No first nation would expect to receive the entire region described in its statement of intent. The First Nations do not expect fee simple title to the entire province.

When two First Nations have overlapping traditional claims they will settle the matter as the negotiations proceed. The federal and provincial governments do not participate in negotiating an overlapping settlement. However, several of the members across the floor, members who ought to know better, have been using the claims to instil fear among British Columbians.

They infer that these opening positions will lead to lost property for third parties across the province. They ask: "What will become of your cottages? What will happen to the jobs in the mining and forestry sectors? What will happen to the fisheries?" They raise these fears without adding that the treaty process provides for all sectors of British Columbia from cottage owners to the broad spectrum of industries to have a voice in the process.

They neglect to tell the people at the town hall meetings and on the radio talk shows that the Government of Canada consults with a treaty negotiations advisory committee representing many of their interests. They do not tell people that no negotiation can proceed until a regional advisory committee has been created to provide the views of British Columbians from that particular part of the province who are not at the negotiating table. They do not say any of these things.

This pattern of misinformation and fear mongering is typical of the tactics some members on the other side of the House have used to score cheap political points. They have often criticized the government for its dedication to the inherent right of self–government as a cornerstone of the Government of Canada's aboriginal policy.

We have said since the beginning, since the red book that provided our election platform, that we believe the inherent right to self–government to be an existing right within Canada's Constitution.

Hon. members of the third party have often made the case that no one has defined what self–government means. The argument that self–government has not been defined has been erected as an obstacle to prevent justice from getting through to the aboriginal communities across Canada. That argument speaks to the kind of meanspirited and narrow minded approach that has thwarted efforts to bring justice to aboriginal issues for years. It speaks for the tyranny of the status quo. It speaks for the preservation of the paternalism of the Indian Act.

Is that what Reform members want to uphold? Do they really want to impede progress, to impede righting past wrongs, to impede certainty, to impede economic stability, to impede job creation?

We want to make progress. One way we are doing it is by acknowledging that the inherent right to self–government is an existing right. We are now negotiating with First Nations on how that right is to be implemented.

No one wants to return to the constitutional debates to implement self–government. Self–government arrangements can be negotiated with individual communities based upon local culture, traditions and needs. That is exactly what we have been doing. That is how we are going about the process in British Columbia.

I remind the House, especially members of the third party who seem to specialize in misinformation and misunderstanding, of the six stages that a claim must go through before a treaty comes into effect. Hon. members will observe that it is a very thorough process.

In the first step a first nation files a statement of intent with the B.C. Treaty Commission. The commission makes sure that the statement is complete and forwards it to the federal and provincial governments. It is at this stage that the First Nations describe the geographic area in British Columbia that they consider to be their traditional territory. Forty–seven statements of intent have been filed. They represent over 70 per cent of the aboriginal people of British Columbia.

The second stage is the commission convenes a meeting to prepare for negotiations. All three parties exchange information, consider the criteria, discuss the research they will do to prepare for negotiations and identify issues of concern. Each party appoints a negotiator with a clear mandate. Each party establishes a ratification procedure and the parties agree upon the substantive and procedural matters that will be negotiated.

This is the stage at which the Canadian and British Columbia governments establish their own mechanisms for consultation with non–aboriginal interests. One of the requirements the B.C. Treaty Commission imposes on the two governments is the establishment of a regional consultative mechanism to represent third party interests. It imposes that.

When a commission determines that all three parties have met the criteria for readiness it confirms that they can proceed to stage three. This is where all three parties negotiate a framework agreement, a negotiated agenda, and identify the issues to be negotiated, the goals of the negotiation process, special procedural arrangements and a timetable for negotiations. So far four framework agreements have been signed and another three initialled by negotiators.

It is in the fourth stage of the treaty process that the parties negotiate an agreement in principle. These are the substantive negotiations. The parties examine the framework in detail.

Then the fifth stage is that the principals negotiate to finalize the treaty and remaining technical and legal issues are then resolved at this stage.

The sixth and final stage is the implementation of the treaty. Long term implementation plans need to be tailored to specific agreements.

All commissioners have agreed that significant progress has been made in the treaty process. The BCTC process is working. The process is fair. It is equitable and it is open. No one denies the negotiations ahead will be tough. Negotiations are tough. All negotiations are tough. There are some very complex issues that must be brought to the table.

It is time we settled these land claims so that all British Columbians, aboriginals and non–aboriginals, can get on with the job of building a prosperous society in our province, a society where all groups can enjoy the wealth, the resources that the province has to offer. This will benefit all British Columbians and all Canadians.

I hope I have said it slowly enough so that the third party across the House can understand. It is time.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the government talking about dealing with the issue of land claims negotiations quickly and resolving the problems.

We heard of an Indian settlement area on the west coast that has been working for 23 years to resolve these issues. A whole generation has spent time negotiating with governments that obviously have not come to any sort of agreement. The negotiation is still not finished after 23 years.

My colleagues and I agree that it is very important to get on with the job to settle the land claim issue and to negotiate with the aboriginal people. However it is not right for the government to hold out unrealistic goals for aboriginal people. It is not fair to the aboriginal people to lead them to expect more than what they are likely to achieve through the process.

I spent 15 years living in an aboriginal community in northern Alberta. I spent three years working to prepare non–treaty settlement areas for self–government. I know the process. I have been through the process and it can be done successfully. However they have to be very realistic in their expectations of what government and the people will help them to achieve.

I do not think this government is any more able than the previous government unless it comes into these negotiations with a very realistic perspective.

I am concerned. I would like to ask a question of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. Why has it taken the government over two years to come up with legislation to support the process which I feel may work in British Columbia? Why has it taken the government two years to address that issue?

• (1040)

Ms. Fry: Mr. Speaker, obviously three parties participate in the process: the Government of British Columbia, the Government of Canada and the summit. These three parties have to agree on what the framework will be to set up the whole treaty organization process. That takes a long time.

If the hon. member knows anything about negotiations, and she just said she did, you would understand also because you talked about—

The Deputy Speaker: I ask the hon. member to direct her remarks to the Chair.

Ms. Fry: The hon. member claimed that she understands negotiations. I would think the member would know that setting up the intent in an opening position is not what one ends up deciding on. Realistic agreements do not come until the process has taken place, until people have come to the table and have talked. Then they come with a settlement.

I do not think the hon. member understands negotiations at all.

Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I repeat my colleague's question to the member for Vancouver Centre. Why did Bill C–107, which recognizes the fact that we have B.C. Treaty Commission, take the government two years?

I do not want to get into a debate on levels of understanding of the process. It did not take the past two years to come to an agreement. The agreement was reached on September 21, 1992. In May 1993 the summit brought in its resolution. In May 1993 the B.C. government passed its resolution. In October 1995 we are debating it. Why so long? This is a typical example of the 23 years or however long it has taken on these issues. Why did it take two years for the government to bring it to the table now?

Ms. Fry: Mr. Speaker, I really thought I had answered that question. However it is obvious I have to repeat it so it is understood.

Getting three groups together to come to an agreement to write a piece of legislation takes time and agreement on every single part of the legislation before it can be brought to the table. This is a very technical and difficult process. We need to ensure when the legislation is done and on the table that everyone can agree to sign and can believe and trust it. It takes time to work that ground to ensure there is trust and there is agreement on the process.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

It is both a pleasure and an honour to speak to Bill C–107 today. The time has come to move forward on the issue. I am reminded of a comment made by the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville who, unlike his fellow members in the third party, does not realize this issue of land claims is what we have been talking about for many years. I refer to a quote of the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville in the Melville Advance: "Nobody even talked about it for 20 years and suddenly we're asking how did this ever come to be". That is quite unlike the position put forward by his party colleagues who just spoke.

This is a very important bill and it is long overdue. However, the understanding should be that we are now at this stage and we should move forward on it. Today marks the culmination of a long and at times very difficult struggle. It is born of British Columbia's unique history. It is the product of many years of hard work and goodwill.

Fairness, clarity and justice are not issues of party politics; they are elements of principles we all share as Canadians. Over the decades many people have played a part: people from various parties and political ideologies; people who share little in common except a desire to see justice done and to get on with building a brighter future for British Columbia.

To understand why in 1995 we are still talking about negotiating treaties, we need to look at our history. Unlike most other provinces, where treaties were signed to clarify jurisdiction over land and resources and to forge new relationships between First Nations and the newcomers to this great land, few treaties were ever concluded in British Columbia. As a result, some 124 years after becoming a province the key questions of unextinguished aboriginal claims and rights remain unresolved and the majority of the province remains subject to outstanding aboriginal land claims.

Few treaties were signed because of the position historically taken by the Government of British Columbia. From the late 1800s the position was that aboriginal rights had been extinguished prior to B.C.'s entry into Confederation in 1871, or if these rights did exist they were the exclusive responsibility of the federal government. In 1990, under the leadership of Premier Vander Zalm, of the Social Credit Party, B.C. reversed its longstanding position and the way was open to resolving these issues.

It is only fair to point out that one of the key players in convincing the provincial government to reverse its historical opposition to negotiating treaties was the B.C. minister of native affairs at the time, Mr. Jack Weisgerber. I know that many of my Reform Party friends will recognize Mr. Weisgerber's name. One of the early and enthusiastic architects of this process, Mr. Weisgerber now leads the provincial Reform Party in British Columbia.

Following on the heels of the B.C. government's decision, the Government of Canada and the B.C. government acted quickly to advance this process. Later that same year the federal minister of Indian and northern affairs, the Hon. Tom Siddon, along with Mr. Weisgerber and Bill Wilson, chairman of the First Nations Congress, agreed to establish a task force to make recommendations on the mandate and process for treaty negotiations.

By June of 1991 the B.C. claims task force had released its report. One of its key recommendations was the creation of the arm's length B.C. Treaty Commission. In the ten months that followed, representatives of Canada, B.C., and the First Nations Summit negotiated the British Columbia Treaty Commission agreement, which was the blueprint for the commission.

On September 21, 1992, the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, Indian affairs minister Tom Siddon, and B.C. Premier Mike Harcourt and native affairs minister Andrew Petter joined with the First Nations Summit leadership in signing the B.C. Treaty Commission agreement. In the three years since, the commission has made great progress. To date, 47 First Nations groups, representing over 70 per cent of British Columbia's aboriginal peoples, have submitted statements of intent to negotiate. In the agreement creating the treaty commission was the commitment to establish it in legislation. In May 1993 both the aboriginal summit and the province fulfilled their part of that commitment. Now the time has come for the federal government to honour its part of the bargain.

These are the events that have led us to this legislation and this debate. Across the years and across party lines people have joined in a common cause. It is their vision and determination that we celebrate and formalize today. Their cause was simple: the desire to bring justice to the aboriginal people and certainty to their province.

A Price Waterhouse study prepared in 1990 estimated that $1 billion in investment had not occurred because of unresolved claims. Since the time of that study the price has continued to be paid, year in and year out. Some 300 badly needed jobs have not been created and $125 million in capital investments have not been made. That has been the price of denying the problem or pretending that it would go away. That is the price of the status quo for the people of British Columbia. It is a price we can no longer afford. With the passage of this legislation, we will no longer have to pay it.

If the price of inaction has been high for the general population of British Columbia, for aboriginal people it has been far higher. For aboriginal people it has meant great hardships and poverty. It has meant the denial of historic rights and future hopes. It has meant generations of dreams deferred and promises unkept. It has meant a quality of life few in the House can imagine and none of us should have to tolerate.

Aboriginal socioeconomic conditions are appalling. Almost one third of aboriginal homes on reserves lack running water. Diseases such as hepatitis and tuberculosis, virtually eradicated in the non–native population, persist in aboriginal communities. Deaths from fires are three and a half times the non–aboriginal level because of unsafe housing and lack of proper sanitation. The suicide rate among aboriginal people is 50 per cent higher than for non–aboriginal people. That difference is even more pronounced in the age group between 15 and 25.

The country simply cannot afford to lose another generation of aboriginal people who are able and willing to make a contribution to this country. The people of British Columbia have told their government to get on with it and negotiate fair and just agreements that protect the rights of both aboriginal and non–aboriginal people alike. They want to establish a stable economic climate, which in turn will help to bring investment dollars and opportunities to all British Columbians.

In 1993, speaking in favour of the legislation creating the B.C. Treaty Commission, Mr. Jack Weisgerber recounted his experience in 1989 as a member of the premier's advisory council on native affairs: "It became clear to us, as we travelled and met with groups around the province, that if we were going to address the root of the social and economic problems we had to deal with the land claims question". Those words were from a man who now leads the Reform Party in British Columbia, words echoed by members of all parties in the B.C. legislature when that body passed its own enabling legislation. I commend to my friends across the floor today those words, which we now have the opportunity to honour through our actions.

The history of this legislation is the story of partnership between cultures, between political parties, between generations. Let us continue in that same spirit of partnership now as we open the way for a brighter future for all British Columbians and a prouder day for Canadians.

I would also like to comment on some things the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville said. Again from the same paper: "We are giving tax exemptions to anybody who carries an Indian treaty card. They do not have to pass a DNA test". That is an insult to all aboriginal people across the country or anybody of colour.

Does that mean that if I say I am an Inuk this person expects me to pass a DNA test? Does that mean that my colleague from Vancouver Centre, if she says she is a certain colour, has to pass a DNA test in order to prove to the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville that she is the colour she is?

This is part of the Reform Party. By the way, DNA does not tell what colour the person is. The ignorance of some of the members of the third party is appalling, to say the least.

Again, this is what the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville said: "The general public does not know the sellout that is taking place". Who is selling out? The aboriginal people from British Columbia have been in British Columbia for in the neighbourhood of 36,000 years.

When British Columbia joined Confederation in 1871, the aboriginal people of British Columbia were in the majority in British Columbia. What did the government, when B.C. joined Confederation, do? It passed a law forbidding the aboriginal people of British Columbia to vote.

The Speaker: We will pick up the debate a little later. It being 11 a.m., we will now proceed to Statements by Members.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ELECTION

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq, Lib.):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, on Monday the last general election of the undivided Northwest Territories was held. Twenty–four men and women, many of them newcomers, will form the 13th NWT legislative assembly.

I congratulate all those who were elected and extend to them best wishes for a productive, creative and successful term in office. I salute as well all the candidates who ran in this election for their courage and commitment to their people and their communities.

This new assembly faces challenges unlike any assembly before it. The task is great, but I have every confidence in the ability of these people of the north to pull together and work together. Through co–operation and mutual respect we will build a stronger north and a stronger Canada.

PATRIATION OF THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Marc Lalonde, a former Liberal minister and an old fellow traveller of the Prime Minister's, stated that the federalists did not have to apologize for unilaterally patriating the constitution in 1982.

Is it Quebecers' fault that the federalists patriated the Canadian constitution without Quebec's agreement and despite the opposition of all parties in the National Assembly? Is it Quebecers' fault that all efforts to bring Quebec back into the Canadian family fold failed, that the rest of Canada rejected the Meech Lake accord, that they felt too much was given to Quebec in the Charlottetown accord?

Now that they have shown they could shove the country's fundamental law down our throats with impunity, the only alternative left for Quebecers is to leave with honour and dignity, their heads held high, and to take their destiny into their own hands.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, many Saanich—Gulf Islands constituents complain about Canada Post's service. Despite rate increases mail delivery is notoriously unreliable. Personal mail boxes have been replaced with centralized superboxes. Service, rather than improving, is deteriorating.

By legislating that anyone who delivers letter mail must charge three times what Canada Post charges, government has created a monopoly operation and, typical of such enterprises, an inefficient one. Furthermore, using its financial advantage on letter mail to cross subsidize, Canada Post can sell junk mail delivery at a loss, thus prohibiting effective competition from other agencies.

Because there is no alternative mail delivery system, Canada Post has no fear of dissatisfied customers. The advent of facsimiles and E–mail gives some Canadians an option but many Canadians have no access to these alternatives. What is missing and vitally needed is fair competition. Government should remove the Canada Post competitive price advantage and let the free market set prices and standards.

"MY CANADIAN BOUQUET"

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Saskatchewan artist Anne Prefontaine.

In 1985 Anne was commissioned by the French Cultural Association to make a painting for the town of Gravelbourg, Saskatchewan. This painting was ultimately presented to the Right Hon. Jeanne Sauvé, former Governor General of Canada, on September 17, 1986. Madam Sauvé was a francophone who spent part of her childhood in Prud'homme, Saskatchewan, a small village in my riding of Saskatoon—Humboldt.

Mrs. Prefontaine's painting is called "My Canadian Bouquet", en français "Mon pays en fleurs". The painting depicts a beautiful bouquet of flowers. On closer inspection we see it is made up of the floral emblems of each of the provinces and territories, including the prairie lily, the floral emblem of Saskatchewan. Each flower is beautiful on its own, but as part of this floral arrangement the beauty of each is further enhanced. Like Canada, the final result is truly more than a mere sum of its parts.

I thank Anne for stepping forward again with her message of love and hope for a united Canada.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I received a letter the other day from the Prince Edward county council. Part of it reads:

> Council was in unanimous agreement that I should forward a letter to you as our representative of the Government of Canada advising that Prince Edward county urges the residents of Quebec to remain a part of a strong and independent country.
> Although ours is but a small voice in what has become a national debate, the people of Prince Edward have always had a strong sentiment for home and country, a country which includes Quebec.

This letter was signed by Laverne Bailey, warden of the county of Prince Edward.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mrs. Carolyn Parrish (Mississauga West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, an open letter was sent by the Mississauga West Federal Liberal Riding Association to the residents of Quebec. It expresses their thoughts and feelings about Quebec within Canada:

> As members of two of the four original provinces, Quebec and Ontario share a 128–year history of being close neighbours within Canada. Over the years we have established many links through families, trade, commerce and tourism. The vibrant and ongoing ties continue to define the spirit of solidarity that only close friends can share.
> Through education, travel and a wide range of pursuits and experiences a new generation has acquired even greater cultural sensitivity. We believe that given the opportunity, young people will enhance and strengthen the ties that exist between us.
> As friends, neighbours, and Canadians we have helped to build a great nation. Together we can continue to enjoy the richness Canada has to offer.
> Le Canada n'est pas le Canada sans le Quebec!

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal government's WGTA buyout has turned into a total fiasco. It is clear that whoever designed this program had limited knowledge of prairie agriculture. It is confused, disorganized and poorly planned.

The system for distributing applications for this program relied on obsolete information. As a result many farmers were left out of the initial mailing.

My office has received hundreds of complaints from both grain and livestock producers who are fed up with this boondoggle. An example is a recent letter I received signed by over 100 beef and grain producers incensed that compensation will not go to forage acres but will include other livestock feed crops.

If this is a forerunner of the way the government will handle changes for western agriculture, then farmers will be faced with many more hit and run farm programs.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec workers' solidarity fund has come out in support of the side for change. To all those waging a scaremongering campaign against the sovereignist option, Mr. Blanchet, the president of the fund, said, and I quote: "The solidarity fund feels that Quebec sovereignty is not only economically viable but that it will be profitable".

Since its inception in 1983, the solidarity fund has become the largest venture capital fund in Canada with over $1 billion in assets. This represents almost 30 per cent of the total value of all venture capital funds in Canada and it is at home, in Quebec, that this money is invested.

Since its inception, the fund has helped create and preserve over 30,000 jobs in Quebec. The solidarity fund is a shining example of what Quebecers can accomplish when they take control of their own destiny. In the same way, Quebecers understand that Quebec's future involves sovereignty and they will vote yes to change on October 30.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois is resuming his duties as negotiator for the PQ government, the same job he had during the 1979 negotiations with the Quebec public sector. This time again, the chief negotiator for the PQ has his bosses' complete trust and has been given a free hand.

The PQ negotiator's mandate in these negotiations as in the negotiations with the Quebec public service is to do his utmost to meet his bosses' expectations. Sixteen years later, history is repeating itself. The negotiator rehired by the PQ can exert himself all he wants, it is not up to him to make the final decision that will seal the outcome of these negotiations. Jacques Parizeau will make this decision as he did before, a decision that all union workers in Quebec are still paying for.

TEMBEC FOREST PRODUCTS

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in Mattawa, in my riding of Nipissing, Tembec Forest Products president Frank Dottori addressed a public meeting of the Mattawa & Area Forestry Committee. He announced the future plans for a $10 million expansion of Tembec's forestry products operation in the town of Mattawa.

Also at that meeting Mr. Dottori was recognized by the Canadian Institute of Forestry. He received an award recognizing his achievements in being one of the founders of Tembec which was created in 1973 by former employees of Canadian International Paper.

The resurgence of the Temiscaming, Quebec, mill and the growth of Tembec is one of Canada's best known business success stories. Under Mr. Dottori's leadership Tembec has risen to become one of the leading forest product manufacturers in Canada.

My congratulations are extended to Mr. Dottori and to the Canadian Institute of Forestry for presenting him with this achievement award.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette-Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in Montreal, the PQ leader told a group of young people something that sheds light on the kind of relationship Quebec separatists have maintained with Canada over the past 30 years. This is what the separatist said: "Stop bothering me with this idea of a distinct society. I am not interested. I want a country".

The sacrosanct concept of distinct society that one separatist dream weaver after another cloaked themselves in was really nothing more than a gimmick, a trap, a ruse to create constitutional deadlock. Quebecers are staggered to learn that, for the PQ leader, the distinct society concept was only a separatist gimmick. The people of Quebec are aware of their distinctiveness and, on October 30, they will say no to this man who has been fooling them for all these years.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister of agriculture is having trouble with mastering at least one of the three r's, namely writing.

This past August I had the opportunity to join several farmers touring an area around Lloydminster damaged by the drought. The farmers had asked me to forward their concerns to the minister regarding their grave situation. My letter dated August 18, 1995 read in part: "They have difficult and immediate decisions to make so it is imperative that your department promptly address the concerns raised by these farmers". It has been two months and the minister has failed even to acknowledge receiving my letter, let alone to respond to it and to the farmers affected.

I have also forwarded concerns to the minister about the Crow benefit from alfalfa producers in the dehydrated alfalfa industry. Guess what? There has been no response.

I have heard from a number of my constituents that the minister's office has not responded to their letters as well. Even farm organizations complain to me that they have not heard from the minister when they write.

Can the minister not write, or is the minister's office too busy trying to put out fires with the Crow buyout and the safety net programs that there is no time to respond to the farmers' concerns?

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, many times in the House by legislative and constitutional means members have presented laws by example to get people to recognize that we should have sexual equality in the country. Yet, right outside these doors during the months of August and September, a female engineer was harassed off the job by her subcontractor. We did not see any reaction in the House, or very little. Two hundred and ninety-five of us let this happen.

• (1110)

We did see to their credit her fellow workers put everything on the line. They walked off the job in protest leaving $165,000 worth of back pay, $15,000 or $18,000 worth of equipment here on the site, which public works will not let them take off.

We should be involved directly. This is our jurisdiction. This is happening under our eyes with our feet—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Manicouagan.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Bernard St-Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, not only is the no side unable to agree on the country that it would offer to Quebecers, but federal ministers, including the Prime Minister, make contradictory statements regarding the right of veto and the notion of distinct society.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs recognizes the right of veto, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs only sees it as a general principle, while the Prime Minister says that the decision does not rest with him, but with the other provinces.

The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs even admits that he has trouble interpreting the text written by the no side in the brochure. This is quite something.

The fact is that Daniel Johnson and the Prime Minister only agree on one thing: make all those who seek changes in Quebec pay dearly. This is their common goal. As for the rest, they only propose to wait until 1997, when the constitutional tango will start all over again.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the closer we get to October 30, the more difficult it becomes for the separatists to hide their true intentions.

First, the Bloc Quebecois leader was forced to define the meaning of a yes vote when he met with the editorial team of La Presse. He said: "To vote yes is to ensure that Quebec becomes inexorably sovereign, regardless of whether or not there is a partnership".

Yesterday, in Rivière-du-Loup, the Bloc leader was very clear when he said: "Let us not forget that the mandate sought by Mr. Parizeau's government and by sovereignists is a mandate to achieve Quebec's sovereignty, following which they will try to negotiate a partnership agreement".

The project of the PQ and its associates seeks only one purpose: to separate Quebec from Canada and make it a foreign country.

Quebecers have always been opposed to separation and, on October 30, they will once again say no to that project.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa-Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc leader seems to be having increasing difficulty in keeping secrets.

In the last two days the leader of the separatists has imprudently let out several secrets which were supposed to have been kept well hidden until after the referendum.

The negotiator on the PQ payroll has no intention of trying to preserve citizenship and the Canadian passport after a yes victory. What he wants is clear: a Quebec passport.

The day after a yes vote, he will be able to guarantee only one thing: Quebec will be a separate country. He wants nothing to do with any proposition aimed at renewing federalism.

Ten days away from the referendum, Quebecers are suddenly discovering what is behind the separatist plan: they want nothing less than to provoke the disintegration of our country. On October 30, the answer they will receive will be no.

GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the biggest disappointment Reformers have experienced in Parliament is the anti–democratic behaviour of the government.

The Prime Minister exercises dictatorial control over his MPs. MPs who have voted their constituents' wishes on Bill C–41, Bill C–68 and other legislation have been punished for voting for the people they represent.

The anti–democratic behaviour has been demonstrated in legislation. Bill C–64 replaces hiring based on merit with hiring based on quota. Bill C–68 throws out such basic rights as protection against unreasonable search and seizure. Now the Liberal government is sabotaging section 2 of the charter by acting as thought police.

Canadians are entitled to fundamental freedoms of thought, belief, opinion and expression. Yet these Liberals have set up a committee to monitor and set out punishments for expressing ideas in the House with which the Liberals do not agree.

• (1115)

The government is smothering debate and stifling meaningful dialogue. George Orwell would be proud.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the true face of the separatists has emerged in a document released by the office of the hon. member for Chateauguay. The document is a parody of the Lord's Prayer.

It might well be considered sacrilegious in both the religious and the secular meaning of the word. The prayer in question, if we can glorify it by that name, petitions as follows:

Forgive us for having been Canadians
As we shall forgive those Who so remain.

We will never ask anyone to forgive us for being Canadian. Quebecers will never prostrate themselves before the Leader of the Opposition, or the other separatists, either October 30 or at any other time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in a very revealing speech which included references to duplication and overlap, the Minister of Foreign Affairs explained that Quebec was too small to negotiate on equal terms with the rest of Canada. This unfortunate statement is one more example of what we have been hearing from Laurent Beaudoin, Claude Garcia and the Prime Minister himself, each of whom either think Quebec is too small, want to crush it or want to give it a drubbing.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Could he tell us whether he agrees with the Minister of Foreign Affairs who considers that Quebec is too small to negotiate on equal terms with the rest of Canada?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to know what kind of negotiations they have in mind, because when the Leader of the Opposition is on the hustings, at one point like yesterday, for instance, in the morning he was all for sovereignty without association or without a partnership, while that afternoon and evening it was not the same message.

It is clear, and this bears repeating, that when in Quebec they say that, after Quebec separates, there will be a new structure in which Quebec will have exactly the same number of representatives as the rest of Canada, which represents three times as many people, the rest of Canada will never go along with that. This is like suggesting that in the parliament of an independent Quebec, just because Quebec City is the capital, it should have the same number of members as Montreal.

In a democracy every person counts. If there is to be a Canadian structure, it must respect the democratic principle according to which members are elected in their respective ridings, while the Canadian constitution provides for a minimum level of representation for the smaller provinces like Prince Edward Island, which is protected in the constitution.

However, when someone claims, in referring to the issue of a future partnership, that the rest of Canada will have a parliament with the same number of members as Quebec, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in referring to this, says that is out of the question, this is exactly what the provincial premiers have said. Anyone who is the least bit realistic, is not a magician and really wants to face the facts will have no problem understanding this.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to clarify my question for the Prime Minister. I do not think this is a matter of bad faith, not at all, but it is not at all what I meant.

His Minister of Foreign Affairs said that Quebec, with a population of seven million, was too small to expect to negotiate with the rest of Canada with its population of 22 million. This was not about partnership or whatever, this was about negotiating from country to country.

My question is this: Does the Prime Minister agree with his Minister of Foreign Affairs that Quebec is too small to negotiate with the rest of Canada and if he does not agree, is he prepared to set the record straight? That is my question.

• (1120)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, all countries conduct negotiations. We negotiate with the Americans. We negotiate with Trinidad and Tobago. We negotiate with countries large and small. That is normal. The political clout, however, is not the same. That is where I notice another change in perception.

For the first time, the hon. member for Roberval said they are going to have a country. He was not talking about partnership. He referred to his country.

When will they have the courage to come out and tell Quebecers: "I am a separatist"? It is nothing to be ashamed of, so why not admit it instead of playing with words and saying at one point that "we will have a partnership", and then "we will not" and then "we will have half, or three quarters". Be honest.

Just say: "We want to separate", and Quebecers—30 per cent of the people who are now saying they intend to vote yes think they will stay in Canada— Does the hon. member want to remain a Canadian, yes or no? I would like to know.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister shows very little tolerance for others, although his own positions are entirely opposed to those of the no committee to which he belongs, an issue that was raised with him yesterday. Why is he so anxious to look for discrepancies in our points of view, when he knows perfectly well that representatives for the no side in Quebec most certainly do not share his position on the Canadian federation. He should be more careful.

Does the Prime Minister agree, since we are talking about his Minister of Foreign Affairs—I realize it annoys him to discuss this but, after all, he should answer the question—does the Prime Minister agree with his Minister of Foreign Affairs, who feels that to deal with duplication and overlap, Quebec should become a province like the others, in other words, close its Travail Québec centres and let the federal government collect its taxes?

That is what his minister said yesterday. Does he agree?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to clarify one of the hon. member's statements. The program being circulated was prepared and accepted by all partners on the no side.

It says in this program that it would be desirable for Quebec to have a veto, and the answer I gave yesterday in the House was clear. We were in favour of a veto for Quebec, but René Lévesque and the separatists dropped the veto. You cannot blame me.

We voted for a distinct society and you voted against it. So today you rise in the House. I want to ask you a very short question: Do you want to remain a Canadian? It is not a difficult question, but you are afraid to tell the truth. He does not want to answer any questions because he is afraid of the truth. We are not. We are Canadians, we want to remain Canadians, and Quebecers want to remain Canadians.

The Speaker: My dear colleagues, I would ask you once more to address your comments to the Chair.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, let us recall once again that René Lévesque trusted the other premiers, and that they plotted with the present Prime Minister to betray him. This is what happened, and history is a witness.

Lisa Frulla, the deputy chair of the no committee said, this morning, that the principle of the distinct society had to be enshrined in the constitution. She is the deputy chair of the no committee.

Does the Prime Minister, who has been a member of the no committee up to now, as far as we know, agree with the proposal made by its deputy chair?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we voted for a distinct society, and he voted against. He has the gall to rise and talk about it.

Secondly, he does not show a lot of respect for Mr. Lévesque in saying that he did not know what he was doing when he signed it. I think Mr. Lévesque was intelligent enough to know very well what he was doing when he signed it. I have never underestimated Mr. Lévesque's intelligence as the hon. member is doing. He did it consciously. What were his reasons? I am not a member of the PQ, I do not know. We, however, were in favour of a veto, and it was Mr. Lévesque who did not want the veto.

Imagine rising and talking this way. As far as the distinct society is concerned, in Charlottetown, we voted for it.

• (1125)

We campaigned for a distinct society, like Ms. Frulla–Hébert. Yes. It was the PQ, Mr. Parizeau and Mr. Bouchard and all of you, who once again scuttled that, because you want separation and anything goes in the name of separation, except telling Quebecers the truth.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the distinct society the Prime Minister is talking about is not the one in the original Meech Lake accord, it is the one in the Charest report "à la" Clyde Wells. Thank you Clyde, we remember the emotional outpourings on television. As for the original Meech Lake accord, the Prime Minister fought his whole leadership campaign against it, and he won. The Minister of Finance, on the other hand, campaigned for the Meech Lake accord and lost because of it. This is what history teaches us.

We must get back to Ms. Frulla, who made another statement this morning. She said that, in the case of culture, what was upsetting was the federal government's power to spend according to its own priorities. She went on to say that the federal government had to get out of the field and give the money to Quebecers to administer themselves. Her remarks were clear.

Does the Prime Minister agree with his deputy chairman, Ms. Frulla, and does he intend to withdraw completely from the field of culture, with full financial compensation, as his deputy chair wants him to?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what a distortion of history, again. We were talking about the Meech Lake accord; the PQ was opposed. You were against it. Why are you criticizing us for siding with you at the time?

An hon. member: You were against it.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Yes, but so were you.

I said at the time that it was not satisfactory, and you did not find it satisfactory either. Then, after we made the necessary changes and it became Charlottetown, I was in favour, and you were still opposed. So you have always been in favour of Quebec developing within Canada? This is where your problem lies. We, on the other hand, want Quebec to develop inside Canada. And when you talk about culture, there was a proposal in Charlottetown, and you voted against it. So shame on you, you are always opposed. Quebecers will be in favour of staying in Canada on October 30, in two weeks' time.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday afternoon the Minister of Foreign Affairs stated in Washington that "Canada will contribute to any U.S. led NATO force in the former Yugoslavia".

Later the Minister of National Defence confirmed this commitment saying: "It will not be a peacekeeping role. It will be more of a protective force and therefore have a combat capability".

Yesterday, however, the Prime Minister and the government tried to backtrack saying Canada's participation is yet to be determined. But this does not alter the fact that American officials took these statements as a definite support for their plans.

What was promised to the American government? Will we be sending troops? More important, why was Parliament not consulted?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the ongoing initiative at this time to have a permanent peace situation in Bosnia should be welcomed by everybody. At long last the Americans seem to be willing. I am not sure if they will be able to send some troops but the president says that he will send 25,000 soldiers there.

I was talking a few days ago with the Prime Minister of Great Britain who told me that he would send some soldiers there. I talked with the President of France who said that he would send soldiers there. I said that we would consider being there.

I said in the House that before we made the final decision there would be a debate in the House of Commons. We have to talk with them first to know what they want, what kind of role, and nothing has been determined yet. We will come to the House of Commons. It is the first time in the history of Parliament that we have had a debate before a final decision of this kind.

We have the right to talk with the people who are asking us to be there. We cannot do it in a vacuum. Probably there will be another flip flop. For months they all supported the presence of troops in Bosnia. However, yesterday they said they did not vote for it. They supported it all along at a time when they were trying to score political points. They are now gauging the wind, and it would not surprise me if they flip flopped again.

• (1130)

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we are talking about consultation before commitment.

The Liberals have long forgotten their red book promises. They promised to reject the camp follower approach to the U.S.

They promised a more open process for making foreign policy. They promised to expand the rights of Parliament to debate major Canadian foreign policy initiatives such as the deployment of peacekeeping forces.

The government is not only violating its own principles, it is acting like the Mulroney Tories during the gulf war. Why has the government broken its red book promises? Will it commit, here and now, to have a full parliamentary debate on Bosnia before we send more troops?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, for the first time we have had debate in the House about our presence in Bosnia before the decisions were made. Today I am standing here saying that the Americans, the British, the French and others have asked us if we would participate. We told them we would consider it.

Mr. Hermanson: And we said yes.

Some hon. members: We said yes.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): The decision has not yet been made because I have not taken the problem to the cabinet and to the House of Commons. The only thing we know for certain is that the Reform Party does not know anything about the facts and it is already against it.

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let us go from France and other countries to Hungary for a moment.

Last May at a meeting of the NATO Parliamentarians Association in Budapest I spoke with representatives of that fledgling democracy in Hungary. Hungary will not permit military movement without consulting Parliament. It will not even allow military planning for deployment without consulting Parliament. When it comes to troop deployment, Hungary is more democratic than Canada.

Will the government do more than pay lip service to this fundamental principle of democracy, which is consultation, which it preaches so eloquently but violates so consistently?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, for a person who has spent his career as a high ranking officer in national defence—who as a member of Parliament is double dipping by having his pension from the army—he should know there are always discussions at the military level on how to deploy troops. It has never been done by parliamentarians. It has always been done by the military under instructions by the government.

At this time peace is coming to Bosnia, which we hope will be a permanent peace situation. Canada is always there when there is a need for peace. If we are needed we will look on it favourably. However, I have not made up my mind. If Parliament were to tell us not to go there, we would not. However, it would surprise me if the people of Canada did not want to be in a place where we can save lives, have peace and make progress for the poor people who have suffered so badly over the last four years.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

We knew that there was some confusion between Daniel Johnson and the members of the federal government regarding the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society and the right of veto.

• (1135)

Yesterday, some confusion emerged within the federal Cabinet when, unlike the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, the Minister of Foreign Affairs expressed his support for a right of veto. As for the Prime Minister, sometimes he is in favour, sometimes he is opposed, depending on what day it is and to whom he is addressing.

Given the confusion prevailing in Cabinet with regard to the right of veto and the Prime Minister's occasional hints that he supports the notion of distinct society and giving Quebec a right of veto, why did the Prime Minister vigorously oppose the Meech Lake accord, which he played a large part in killing? On the night this agreement was rejected, he said to Premier Wells: "Thank you, Clyde, for a job well done".

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the number of unfounded statements in that question is unbelievable. First of all, yesterday, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs did not discuss the right of veto issue with anyone. So much for that. There was no mention of a right of veto in the Meech Lake proposal. It was not an issue because the amending formula had been accepted by René Lévesque several years earlier. Another faulty interpretation by the hon. member.

Third, he said that on the night I became leader—I explained this but they do not want to tell the truth. I simply said—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): No, you may be reluctant to admit it but, on the night of the convention, the vast majority of Newfoundland delegates supported my candidacy. So I thanked the people of Newfoundland for voting for me at the convention. However, that is not what they want to say. It was during the celebration following my election as leader of the Liberal Party, and I was saying thanks to Mr. Wells and all my other supporters. I also expressed my thanks to those who had run against me. I said that, for the sake of the party; to have a good convention, one needs opponents, and after it is all over, one should thank everyone and help the Liberal Party move forward. That is why I am Prime Minister today.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister can say all he wants about the right of veto issue, but if he wants to be serious, does he admit that he is unable to deliver the goods precisely because of the opposition of Clyde Wells and Roy Romanow, which is preventing him from getting the required unanimous approval of the other provinces?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): The hon. member should blame René Lévesque, who, with the leaders of the other eight provinces, imposed this formula on the federal government. It is true that unanimity is required. We were against this. Still, it was the Quebec government led by René Lévesque which imposed this amending formula, and now he is saying that it will be difficult. I agree that it will be difficult, because of the mistakes you have made in the past. Quebecers, however, will not let you make other mistakes when the referendum is held on October 30.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have learned that Canadian taxpayers contributed over $300,000 for advertising in a special edition of Homemakers magazine.

Ruth Cardinal, public affairs director for the Department of National Defence, defended DND's participation because it will encourage recruiting in the Canadian forces, this even though the average age of readers of Homemakers is 42 and the forces are downsizing.

How can the minister possibly justify such Cadillac advertising when the defence department budget has been slashed and thousands of military and civilian jobs are disappearing?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

If his question is do we have a recruiting policy in the Canadian forces, the answer is yes. If his question is do we have procedures in place for recruiting, the answer is yes. If his question is do we have a policy where we actually advertise in reputable magazines, the answer is yes. If his question is do we have a policy to recruit women for the Canadian forces, the answer is yes. The answers are yes, yes, yes and yes.

I want to reinforce to the House that the government, unlike the third party, has a policy of equal opportunity for men and women.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): The average cost of an advertisement in Homemakers is $26,000, not $300,000.

The documents also show that Ms. Cardinal received the idea from Alex Morrison, president of the Pearson Peacekeeping College, who also sits on the board of directors for the Canadian Institute of Strategic Studies. I remind the minister that the institute receives almost $100,000 a year in grants from the Department of National Defence. As well, Sally Armstrong, editor of Homemakers magazine, and Duncan de Chastelain, son of the Chief of Defence Staff, also sit on the board.

Can the Minister of National Defence spell conflict of interest? Can he explain why his department is engaging in such obvious objectionable cronyism?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had answered the question. Perhaps I can answer it in another way, with a different emphasis.

Do we have a credible policy?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Mifflin: The answer is yes.

Do we have credible procedure?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Mifflin: The answer is yes.

Do we have a credible magazine?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Mifflin: This magazine enjoys the widest circulation among women in Canada. Three million women read that magazine.

Do we have a credible policy with respect to recruiting women?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Mifflin: Yes. Again: yes, credibility; yes, credibility; yes, credibility; yes, credibility.

The problem with the third party is it has trouble with the word credibility; it just does not comprehend it.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In a brochure sent to all Quebecers by the director general of elections in Quebec, the no committee states, and I quote: "—the government of Quebec must control its areas of responsibility". What this really means is that Ottawa must stop using its spending power to interfere in Quebec's areas of jurisdiction.

Could the Prime Minister tell us if his government agrees with this position? And if so, does it intend to withdraw from areas of jurisdiction in which it is interfering through its spending power, notably education, culture, health and manpower training?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this document has been issued collectively by all members of the coalition. That is clear as day. However, before attacking us on this kind of thing, because this is a written document, Bloc Quebecois members should start by— When you see their leader crisscross Quebec with his magic wand in hand and come out with a statement like: "I am for sovereignty pure and simple; we will not even need Canadian citizenship or Canadian passports".

That same afternoon, he said: "Well, no, we will negotiate a partnership", but later qualified his statement. He was not so categorical any more. He was apologetic. That is in essence how the week started off, with all this talk about being among ourselves, francophones, people of colour, with women bearing more children and so on. Later in the week, they changed their tune once again. That is what really happened.

They do not want to tell people the truth. We, on the other hand, put our position in writing.

A moment ago, I asked the hon. member for Roberval if he wanted to remain a Canadian. Let me put the same question to the hon. member: Does she want to remain a Canadian or would she rather abandon Canada completely? She should answer this question, so that her constituents know where to stand come October 30.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister tell us clearly whether or not his government intends to withdraw from Quebec's areas of responsibility such as education, health, manpower training and regional development and to fully compensate Quebec through tax point transfers?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, education comes under the full responsibility of Quebec's Minister of Education.

I am happy that the matter was raised because he should do a good job. Quebec has the highest dropout rate in the country. This has nothing to do with the policy governing transfer payments. The policy is exactly the same for all provinces, including Quebec. Why are there more dropouts in Quebec? They should start by dealing with that problem.

Provinces have complete control over the hospital sector. We do not do a thing in that area, except send money. If they want us to stop collecting taxes and sending money, we can, but that is not what they want, of course.

They do not want to do the dirty job of collecting taxes. They want us to do it and to send them a blank cheque.

• (1145)

However, we have national responsibilities. The federal government is the one providing a national health care system to which all Canadians have equal access, instead of what some provinces would like to put in place at this time, that is to say, one system for the rich and one system for the poor. It is thanks to the Canadian government that we have a national health care system ensuring that all Quebecers as well as all other Canadians have equal access to health care. Under this system, when you are sick, you can be admitted to a hospital not because you have money but because you are a Canadian. It is a simple as that.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the National Film Board funded movie "Léolo" features a scene in which a child engages in an act of bestiality. As reprehensible as that is, it is made even more so by the fact that Canadian taxpayers have helped to fund this movie and that it was shown on Canada's public broadcaster across the country, the CBC.

Could the Minister of Canadian Heritage explain why he thinks this reflects Canadian culture and Canadian values and why in the world Canadian taxpayers are paying for that kind of garbage?

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question and for providing notice.

The issue of government funding for independent agencies is a thorny one. Certain artistic expression, while it may appeal to some, is clearly offensive to others. The film in question which aired on the CBC at 11.30 p.m. was produced under the former government. I understand it contained some controversial images.

However, I think even the member can appreciate that the CBC, with the airing of NFB and Telefilm movies, will allow the public to judge the works on their merit.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised the government is trying to justify this. I knew it would try to wrap this in the cloak of an artistic film. However, the great majority of Canadians would never let that kind of trash in their houses under any circumstances. It has been permitted in under the CBC.

At a time when the government regulator, the CRTC, is looking at the issue of violence in television, how can the minister explain his own broadcaster airing a film that has many scenes that most Canadians could only describe as disgusting and tasteless?

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, surely on the basis of one scene in one film the member would not want us to unleash a new age of censorship or abandon the Canadian film industry. The CBC is protected under the Broadcasting Act which allows it to have journalistic freedom.

The hon. member might consider separating the two issues: on the one, censorship; on the other, our investment in the film sector and the cultural sector which is a thriving industry that results in about 600,000 jobs in this country.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The no committee says that Quebec must have full control over those sectors which fall under its jurisdiction. The federal government goes against that position by continuing to interfere, with its spending power, in the manpower, education and health sectors.

Does the Prime Minister recognize that Ottawa is using its spending authority not only to interfere in fields of provincial jurisdiction, but also to impose national standards that do not reflect Quebec's priorities?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first, the claims made by the member opposite are absolutely false. Second, the real issue is that, today, the member for Roberval talked about a country. Yesterday, the Leader of the Opposition talked about a Quebec citizenship and said that the Canadian passport would no longer be used by Quebecers. Today, he changed his tune. The burden of proof rests with those who want to split the country.

I ask them: Do they want to remain Canadians or not? If not, they should tell the truth to Quebecers before October 30.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the Deputy Prime Minister expect to be taken seriously, considering that the establishment of the human resources investment fund, through which Ottawa will interfere even more in the manpower training sector, amounts to a blatant rejection of the position held by the no committee?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government which is refusing to negotiate on manpower issues is the Quebec pequiste government, not the federal government. The real issue on October 30 is the one raised this morning by the member for Roberval, and also by the Leader of the Opposition, who said that Quebecers would no longer use the Canadian passport. This will be the real issue on October 30. We are prepared to negotiate with the provincial governments. We are not in favour of status quo. There is only one government in Canada using the status quo as an excuse: it is the separatist and pequiste government in Quebec.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the francophones of Ontario and other Canadian provinces feel insulted and revolted by the disdainful remarks made at their expense earlier this week by the separatist member for Rimouski—Témiscouata.

Would the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs be so kind as to inform the House of the status of the francophone communities within Canada and to indicate the key measures taken by our government to support their development?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, not only has the hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata shown her ignorance of, and probably also her disdain for, francophones outside Quebec, but this very morning the regional delegate of the Parti Quebecois in my area had the nerve to make the statement that francophones outside Quebec are a colonized people.

This is an area in which the federal government has always assumed its responsibilities far better than the Parti Quebecois. Allow me to offer this quote: "The government of Quebec has not done enough, even the PQ has not done enough. The federal government has certainly done far more than Quebec has. I am prepared to admit that. But I think that all of us, in Ottawa and in Quebec, ought to promote francophones outside Quebec". The author of that quote is Lucien Bouchard himself.

JUSTICE

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General of Canada. Oresto Panacui and Jean-Guy Dipietro were convicted and sentenced to jail for armed robbery, kidnapping and attempted murder. They were released and the minister is well aware that Panacui has already reoffended.

The parole board released Panacui even though they acknowledged: "You are serving a very long sentence for a very violent crime and drug addiction was a factor in your criminal lifestyle".

Why is the minister allowing the parole board to release violent criminals and jeopardize the safety of Canadians?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the law passed by Parliament creating the parole board set it up as an independent organization, an administrative tribunal operating at arm's length from the government. The law I referred to does not give the Solicitor General of Canada any authority to intervene in the decisions of the parole board.

However, I will be happy to make sure the hon. member's concerns are brought to the attention of the board.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, another case in point. Dwayne Archie Johnson, who in 1970 abducted, beat and eventually stabbed Helen Betty Osborne 56 times before he left her body in a ditch, was convicted of second degree murder and in 1986 sentenced to imprisonment for life with no chance of parole for 10 years.

In March of this year he was granted day parole after serving seven years of his sentence. According to section 135 of the corrections act, the minister can direct the commissioner of the parole board to review and revoke parole.

When will the minister intervene against violent killers or will he continue to jeopardize the safety of Canadians by not acting at all?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to carry out the duties given to me by Parliament.

It is my understanding that the parole board operates at arm's length from government and from parliamentarians. Having said that, I will be happy to review the act and see what should and could be done under the terms of the law passed by Parliament.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

On three fundamental elements, namely the right of veto, a distinct society and respect of Quebec's areas of jurisdiction, there is an increasingly marked contradiction between the positions of the no committee and of the federal government.

Quebecers have a right to know whether the federal government fully endorses the position given in the brochure of the director general of elections distributed throughout Quebec with respect to the right of veto, a distinct society and respect of Quebec's areas of jurisdiction.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no contradiction whatsoever between the policy adopted by the committee for the no and that of the government of Canada. This is a written document in which there is a full partnership. Where the contradictions lie, however, is in the policy of the Leader of the Opposition, who claims one day that he will negotiate Canadian citizenship and the next day Quebec citizenship.

One of them says he wants to negotiate with Canada, the other says what he wants is a country. Where the glaring contradictions lie is with the policies of the separatists, who do not want to tell Quebecers the truth. I know that Quebecers are not fools and they will certainly understand that the question on October 30 is yes or no for the separation of Quebec, and the answer will be no.

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is a simple one. We are 11 days from referendum day. Does the Prime Minister endorse all of the recommendations of the committee for the no in this brochure, or does he not?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister himself has stated that he had a hand in these documents and endorses them fully. The issue about contradictions lies not with the document of the no side, but with the separatists themselves, who are going all around Quebec claiming that they want to negotiate something with Canada while at the same time, as they finally admitted yesterday, really wanting a separate country. They want nothing to do with Canada, they want Quebec passports, Quebec citizenship, and that is the choice that will be made clearly on October 30 by Quebecers, when they say no to the separation of Quebec from Canada.

FISHERIES

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

When the Atlantic groundfishery was announced last year, $300 million was allocated for capacity reduction. To date one–third of this allocation has been spent. How many licences have been retired? Two hundred and fifty–two out of 14,000. That represents less than 2 per cent of the groundfish licences on the east coast, nowhere near the 50 per cent reduction that was targeted.

Given that the minister has already spent one third of his budget for a capacity reduction of only 2 per cent, can he explain how he intends to reach his 50 per cent target?

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the TAG program has a $1.9 billion budget. Because more people applied and were approved, there is a shortfall in some parts of the program.

The total budget of $1.9 billion will be respected. We will ensure that we live within our means. Within those programs is a retirement program and a training program. We will work closely with my colleague, the Minister of Human Resources Development, to ensure that we, stay within that budgetary program.

Some adjustments will have to be made. Those retirement programs will be part of the overall program to deal with TAGS and to deal with the issues on the east coast.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary acknowledges that cuts have been made to training, to green projects and to capacity reduction. The list goes on and on.

When the program was introduced it was clearly stated by the government that the program would only meet its financial targets if training, green projects and capacity reduction were successful at getting people off the program. Now that the government has slashed these programs and capacity reduction targets cannot be met, will the minister tell Atlantic fishermen what they are proposing to do when the $1.9 billion run out?

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, these are the members of the Reform Party who after spending a weekend on the east coast were telling everybody the problems of the east coast. They do not have a clue about the problems of the east coast.

These are the same members who did not support TAGS. They wanted to cancel the whole TAGS program. I am very glad to see they have developed some understanding of the east coast problems by spending one weekend there.

I can assure the members that the training programs will continue. We will work closely with the Minister of Human Resources Development. There have to be some adjustments in the program. The green projects are continuing.

I hope the member will make another trip to the east coast so that he can see the training programs, so that he can see the green programs that continue to help with the disaster on the east coast.

BREAST CANCER

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is breast cancer awareness month. Although progress has been made, much more needs to be done to eliminate breast cancer. Can the Minister of Health tell the House if the government has met its goals and what is further being done to eliminate breast cancer in Canada?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have done considerable work to ensure that more and more dollars are channelled toward research in breast cancer.

Within our department we have reallocated an additional $2 million a year. Better still, along with those additional dollars we are working very closely in partnership with other groups so that huge sums of money are now being expended on breast cancer research.

We are not only doing more in research for breast cancer; we are also funding such things as the breast cancer information exchange projects. We are participating in setting standards of care and professional education so that the women of Canada have uniform, first class care when they are diagnosed with breast cancer. We are participating in the Canadian breast cancer screening initiative, one method of early intervention so that more people can be cured when breast cancer is detected at an earlier stage.

We will continue to do everything we can with the resources of Health Canada. We will also work in partnership with many other groups which have a very big interest in seeing this disease minimized, if not completely abolished.

QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during question period I was asked a question by the critic for the solicitor general from the Reform Party, the member for Calgary Northeast. He alleged that in section 135 of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act the solicitor general is empowered to direct the parole board to cancel or suspend parole.

I have before me section 135 of the act. I see no reference whatsoever to any power of that sort given to the solicitor general. It says rather that this power can be exercised by a member of the parole board or a person designated by the chairperson of the board. The chairperson of the board is not the minister. I therefore ask that the member for Calgary Northeast have an opportunity to correct the record.

The Speaker: Would the member for Calgary Northeast like to add something to this point of order?

• (1205)

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I directed my question to the solicitor general indicating that under section 135 it was within his power to address the commissioner of the board to review and revoke the decision made at the parole hearing. I understand that is what section 135(1) indicates.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, with the utmost respect to the hon. member, he should read the section of the act before asking his question. It makes no reference to any power of the minister to give any direction to the chair of the board or any member of the board.

The Speaker: I thank both hon. members for their interventions. The point has been made.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, earlier today, in answer to a question from the official opposition, the Deputy Prime Minister said that Quebecers were not fools and that they would vote no on October 30.

That statement implies that 50 per cent of Quebecers, including all the Bloc members who intend to vote yes are fools. I ask—

The Speaker: This is a point of debate, certainly not a point of order. I thank the hon. member.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, since the member claims in his point of order that I made a derogatory comment regarding Quebecers, I want to point out that my remarks concerned the blatant contradictions contained in the separatists' policy.

In that context, I believe those comments are not only acceptable, but also understandable.

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, this is not a point of order. Both sides have had an opportunity to say a few words. This is not a debate. I thank you.

The hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie has the floor on another point of order.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask you to clarify a point. What you just said is that both sides of the House can use the word "fool" in reference to people who do not agree with us. Is that so?

The Speaker: As I said before, there is no word which is unparliamentary in itself, and that applies to this word. The important thing is how a word is used. Today, the word "fool" was used. It has been before. I would appreciate it if we never used it again. Sometimes, words are used during a debate and then we try to justify them.

I gave an opportunity to both sides to express their views. I want to leave it at that. Again, this is not a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Hanger: Mr. Speaker, relating to the solicitor general's earlier point of order regarding his intervention or involvement with parole board decisions, there is nothing in the act which prevents the solicitor general from approaching the parole board or the commissioner. It is on this basis under section 135 that I am appealing to him to intervene in those parole board decisions.

The Speaker: I thank all hon. members and I hope that clears the air a little.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 93rd report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, which lists the members of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and the associate members of the standing committees.

With leave of the House, I intend to move concurrence in this report.

[English]

Therefore I move that the 93rd report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs be concurred in.

Routine Proceedings

LICENSING

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three sets of petitions to present.

The first petition has 56 signatures. The petitioners request that Parliament legislate a maximum level of profit taking from the private brokerage of all licences and permits.

COLLVER ECONOMIC SYSTEM

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition has 47 names. These petitioners request that Parliament commission the publication and study of a privately developed economic system by Mr. Roger Collver.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition has 43 signatures. The petitioners request that Parliament honour the treaties made between the settlers of this country and its original inhabitants.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have several petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The petitioners in the first petition pray and request that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation. The petition bears 169 signatures.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the second petition the petitioners pray that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings. This petition bears 175 signatures.

PEDOPHILES

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the third petition the petitioners call upon Parliament to eliminate the right of a convicted pedophile to be let out of jail on bail pending an appeal. This would thereby ensure the protection and safety of victims and the community from such a convicted offender. This petition bears 250 signatures.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in this petition 262 petitioners pray that Parliament not repeal or amend section 241 of the Criminal Code in any way and to uphold the Supreme Court of Canada decision of September 30, 1993 to disallow assisted suicide or euthanasia.

RIGHTS OF GRANDPARENTS

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am presenting yet again more petitions on behalf of grandparents throughout British Columbia. They ask this government to keep its commitment already declared to this House on May 4, 1995 and amend the Divorce Act to give grandparents access to their grandchildren.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present a petition from residents of my riding of Nipissing.

My constituents' concerns deal with the interdepartmental committee on household goods removal services which is chaired by the Department of National Defence. The allocation of all moves to one bidder will cause more problems and cost more money than does the present system of allocation. They feel the proposal would force many small family owned businesses to cease operation, causing job losses in regions already hard pressed to maintain employment opportunities.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to direct the interdepartmental committee to drop this proposal and to work directly with the Canadian moving industry to develop other alternatives to reducing federal expenditures.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege of presenting a petition from several people in my riding requesting the Minister of Human Resources Development to continue funding for agricultural employment services.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TREATY COMMISSION ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, before question period I was pointing out some of the contradictions of the party opposite in terms of its aboriginal affairs policy. I was referring to the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville, who has made some contradictory and naive observations regarding the hardships aboriginal people in British Columbia and all across Canada have faced over the last 300 or 400 years. I mentioned the attitude of wanting something like a DNA test for Indian people, which is very insulting to aboriginal people across the country.

The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville stated: "We cannot continue to assemble a system that creates entitlements because of the colour of your skin. We are building a South Africa. That may sound extreme, but that is exactly what we are doing. We are going to have the same strife that South Africa is going to have".

If the hon. member were up to date on the issue he would know that South Africa is enjoying good times as a result of doing away with the apartheid policies of the previous government. Now Nelson Mandela is president and he is doing great things for the people of South Africa. That is probably the way we should go with respect to aboriginal people in Canada.

The South African people who have resided in and maintained their lands in that area are finally getting an opportunity to address their concerns, which we are also doing in the area of Nunavut. I am happy to state that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a couple of weeks ago announced to the general public of Nunavut that it would have a role in deciding where the capital of Nunavut would be. There will be a plebiscite in the communities to determine that. Such a decision making role is precisely what the aboriginal people of British Columbia have always wanted.

British Columbia entered Confederation in 1871. At the time British Columbia entered Confederation, the aboriginal people of British Columbia were the majority. To overcome that fact, the government of the day quickly passed a law that basically stated that the aboriginal people would not have a vote.

In 1884 people all of a sudden found that because the aboriginal people were the majority they would able to do a lot of commercial fishing. The government of the day passed another law, which banned the aboriginal people of British Columbia from commercial fishing. They have debated that ever since.

I do not particularly like to revisit the history. We have to improve the state the aboriginal people are in and move forward. However, a lot of Canadian people do not know the history. Sometimes it has to be revisited or the people of British Columbia will not have the opportunity to correct a lot of the wrongs that were committed against aboriginal people at that time.

I have a letter written on October 13, 1995, from someone who says: "We the people of British Columbia will not give up our property, our home and our land, to which we have registered rights". This person reiterates what Squamish Chief Joe Mathias claims, that the aboriginal people own British Columbia 100 per cent. This person says: "Members of my family are Friesians. We were in Holland well before the Dutch. Are we now going to go back and say to the Dutch government that we own Friesland 100 per cent and we want compensation?" I do not think we would give that advice to this person, to go back to Holland to claim it back from the Dutch government. However, this person should understand that when he came from Holland the aboriginal people were already in British Columbia. They are still there.

I do not think aboriginal people are suddenly going to say you cannot stay on this land because it belongs to the aboriginal people. However, I think they have a very strong case. As aboriginal people, we believe we were here long before anybody else came along. People who took our lands do have some redressing to do. We have to face the fact that a lot of aboriginal people in British Columbia will say it is our land. If people can accept the premise that they were here first, then maybe the negotiations would go a lot more smoothly and hopefully will result in making sure that justice is served to the aboriginal people of British Columbia.

I would be prepared to answer any questions that may arise.

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the hon. member.

• (1225)

In his role as parliamentary secretary, is he quite satisfied with the length of time it has actually taken this government to bring this legislation to the House? As was said earlier, the legislation was already established through the agreement. It was just a matter of recopying it into a format for this House. I would like to know whether he is satisfied with a delay of two years for something as straightforward as this.

The second question I have was referred to by the previous government speaker from Vancouver Centre, in which she implied that this commission has the authority to actually state whether or not the parties involved are ready to negotiate. That is not necessarily my interpretation of what the act actually states. It states that the commission can assess the readiness of the parties. I think that is possibly a little loose from the point of view of what the criteria are to base that assessment on. It could turn to a dictatorial type of thing from the commission's point of view that one must meet these specified criteria.

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, in responding to the question I may not necessarily satisfy the member. I look at it from the point of view that it has taken two years for this government, but it has taken since 1871, which is 124 years, to arrive at this stage. I think what we should be rejoicing in is the fact that we have finally come to this stage today, so let us move forward from here. While I would be very hopeful that the negotiations will be expeditious, it has taken 124 years. I would hope that when the negotiated settlement arrives it will be the best for all concerned, but especially for the people who have been trying to get to this stage for the last 124 years.

On the other question, we have to do our bit as members of Parliament to ensure that the best possible procedure is taken to ensure a more expeditious conclusion of land claim negotiations in British Columbia.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was a little bemused at the parliamentary secretary's remarks with respect to the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville's question on treaty cards and DNA. I would expect a parliamentary secretary could recognize a bit of sarcasm when he sees it.

He must be aware that there is a stampede of people who have just a few drops of aboriginal blood trying to get their hands on treaty cards. If he thinks this is not a problem, he should consult with the band councils that have to deal with this and the problems created by Bill C–31. The secretary has to be aware that treaty cards have become articles of commerce. If he is not aware of this, he should not be secretary of state. If he is, he should not pretend to misunderstand the member for Yorkton—Melville.

With regard to the question of apartheid and who has it and who does not, it strikes me as curious that while South Africa is doing away with apartheid, the parliamentary secretary advocates and applauds the establishment of homelands within the Dominion of Canada. I think we should be moving beyond all that and be talking about one Canada, not a whole bunch of little enclaves divided on the basis of race and history. I know all that was irrelevant to Bill C–107, but it was a response to the irrelevant remarks of the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to get a question from the hon. member.

I am a member of Parliament and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but I am also an Inuk.

Whether the government of the day or governments past or the member believes it or not, as far as I am concerned all of Canada belonged to the aboriginal people long before, in some cases 30,000 years, anybody else came along. That is my belief. However I have to be realistic. Some 30 million people now live in Canada, the majority of whom are other than aboriginal. We have to deal with that reality.

However, the wrongs that have been done to the aboriginal people are very wrong. This is how I feel. I am not naive about aboriginal concerns. If the hon. member wants me to elaborate on aboriginal issues and aboriginal concerns I can do that quite well without any lessons from the member across.

I live in the small community in the north in which I grew up. In 1962 the Inuit got the vote. I know about aboriginal concerns. I know some people came north and started putting up "no trespassing" signs on gravel deposits. No trespassing signs on my land? I have no lessons to learn from the hon. member across. Aboriginal people have been on the receiving end of a lot of wrongs for a long time. This attempts to correct the injustices that have been done.

When the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville makes a statement like that I am unlike the member across. I do not think the person is joking. I realize there may be some problems with the status cards. That probably is the case. Is it the Indians, the aboriginal people doing that? I do not know. I must say I am naive in that regard. I can honestly tell the member that I do not know. I apologize for not knowing because it is part of my responsibility.

One my responsibilities is to ensure that there is expeditious approval of bills that deal with the concerns of aboriginal people. I hope the hon. member, when we are dealing with this bill, will give his support to it so that we can correct the injustices that have been dealt to the aboriginal people in British Columbia.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, before I get into the text of my remarks I will make a few comments on the parliamentary secretary's remarks.

The parliamentary secretary was discussing the issue of land ownership. He said that in his opinion the land that we know as Canada is owned by aboriginal people. I remind the parliamentary secretary this issue has been dealt with in the courts. It has been dealt with in the Delgamuukw decision which was originally heard in the B.C. supreme court and was appealed to the B.C. court of appeal and is going before the Supreme Court of Canada at some point in the very near future. The decisions of the courts to date have been that land ownership and ownership of resources resides with the crown.

I will talk for a minute about who benefits from that ownership. Thirty million people live in Canada and to a great extent the wealth of the nation and the standard of living that those people enjoy depend on the land base and resources.

We are talking about the B.C. Treaty Commission. In British Columbia approximately 96 per cent of the land is owned by the crown. The balance is owned by individuals on a fee simple basis. What the Government of British Columbia is talking about doing under the auspices of the B.C. Treaty Commission is negotiating agreements which will convey, in its own words, approximately 5 per cent of the land base to approximately 3 per cent of the population. A good deal of that population does not live on reserves.

In addressing the concerns of people in British Columbia who depend on forestry, fishing and mining for their livelihood and all of the secondary and tertiary jobs that spin from that, it is clear the issue of land ownership and resource ownership is a very serious one.

I will talk a little about British Columbia's participation in this process and the concerns expressed by ordinary citizens in that province. As I have said, the land base is very important to the economy of the province.

The Government of British Columbia and the Government of Canada are entering into a negotiating process to settle, depending on who one is, treaties or land claims with aboriginal peoples. There has been virtually no public consultation. The beginning of that consultation process is starting to happen, but in my view it is happening in a way that will make it very difficult for the real views of ordinary British Columbians to be heard.

On a straightforward philosophical basis, most British Columbians are opposed to the general principle behind the treaty process. With the negotiation of the agreements described by government to date we will have, as my Reform colleague said a few minutes ago, enclaves within Canada which will have a land base and which will have their own governing bodies.

There is a great deal of concern over the divisiveness this will create. The parliamentary secretary referred to South Africa as have other people in the Chamber. In South Africa the people are working to break down barriers between different parts of society, between black and white. They have been working at removing the different status that people received in that country based on their racial origins.

In Canada we are going in the opposite direction. We are erecting further barriers. I suggest there are barriers right now. I think they are inherently wrong. That is one of the reasons native people find themselves in the very difficult circumstances they find themselves in. As a country we have treated them differently.

Most of us on this side of the House believe very strongly that Canada is a very big welfare state. The welfare state that government policy has created around native people is many times larger and it has been very harmful to native Indian people. It has been very destructive. We need to do away with that, to break down those barriers, to do away with the Indian Act and start to treat everybody in our country as equals.

That leads me to the next point. In a democracy one of the fundamental principles of democracy is equality before the law, individual freedom, individual liberty and the notion that we all participate in a democracy on the same basis.

Sovereignty inherently rests with the Government of Canada. The provinces are way stations but in the end, citizens have to a certain degree an ability to exercise personal sovereignty in that they are able to vote, to participate in the democratic process and to influence to some degree at least the direction the government takes.

When we start looking at people, whether native Indian or other racial minorities or groups that have distinctive characteristics and start treating those people differently and we suggest they should have different status, whether that status is supposed to assist those people or not however well meaning that might be, the end result is that we create divisions in our society.

We create an us versus them mentality and we violate the fundamental principles of democracy. We violate the fundamental principle of equality before the law. We do that as a nation at our peril.

We can see what has happened in British Columbia with the implementation of the aboriginal fishing strategy. No doubt it was a well intentioned strategy. The result is that we have native fishermen and non–native fishermen on the rivers in conflict with each other. We have the very real possibility of violent conflict right on our doorstep as a result of that policy. I would suggest to the House that the aboriginal fishing strategy is one component of what the government's agenda is all about.

We are not talking in negotiating these treaties about moving away from the apartheid that we already have and treating people as equals; we are talking about building further walls. We are talking about finding new and better ways to segregate people by race and treat them differently. By doing that, as I said earlier, we are endangering future civility and peace in our country.

We need to not stand with our backs to the future gazing serenely over the past, over the wreckage of failed policies and massive outlays in expenditures by governments which have not worked and which have created a system of dependency and paternalism. We need to strive toward policies that include all people.

The Government of Canada has a serious obligation to deal with this problem and to deal with it in a manner that will, at the end of the day, bring all Canadians together as equals.

At the time British Columbia joined Confederation in 1871 the terms of union clearly spelled out that the federal government shall take all responsibility for existing and future obligations to native people.

There was one proviso in that agreement. The provincial government had an obligation to designate areas for reserve lands. The provincial government from 1871 through into the 1920s continued to set aside and designate lands as reserve lands, to the point where in 1924 the federal government acknowledged in writing that B.C. had met its obligations under the terms of union and therefore was discharged from any further obligations in that regard.

This is a very important and fundamental point because Canadians residing in British Columbia have been contributing through the tax system to the settlements of land treaties in other parts of Canada. They have been required to assist in the underwriting of the costs of the Nunavut settlement, of the Yukon land claims agreement, of the Saulteaux–Dene–Métis agreement and so on.

Now British Columbians will be asked to pay twice: once as taxpayers through the federal system and once as taxpayers and citizens of British Columbia through the alienation of land and resources. That is fundamentally wrong. That is asking the people of British Columbia to accept a situation of double jeopardy.

I believe very strongly the province of British Columbia should not be at the negotiating table other than as an observer. If the federal government intends to convey land and resources, it ought go to the province to find out for what the province is willing to sell those assets, the land and resources, in pursuit of the land treaty negotiations.

When we talk about these land claim issues and when we talk about treaty settlements and so on, as I said in my remarks a few minutes ago, the government tends to treat native Indian people as if they are all the same, whether it is the Gitksan and Wet'suwet'en people in my riding, the Niska people or the Casca–Dene people. They are not. They are individuals like all Canadians. They have many different aspirations, goals and desires. They do not all think the same way. They do not all want the same things; they want many different things.

In many cases the leadership in these native communities is acting in a fashion that is not supported by the majority of people they supposedly represent. I am deeply concerned when native Indian people come into my constituency office and say that they are very concerned about the ramifications for self–government because they do not know what it means. Quite frankly I do not think any of us know what it means. The Government of Canada and provincial governments have been talking for the last couple of years about recognizing an inherent right of self–government but they have never defined it. They have never said what that means.

The implications for that kind of statement are very serious indeed. It is instructive to note the native Indian people of British Columbia voted against the Charlottetown accord at almost the same rate as non–native people did although the provision for native self–government was one of the five key components of the agreement.

The ordinary grassroots people in native Indian communities certainly are not overly enamoured with the idea of native self–government. Their leaders are because their leaders understand the position of power and the position of authority they will end up in as a result. However the ordinary grassroots people in native communities are not in favour of it and certainly have grave reservations.

I remember very clearly that the Native Women's Association of Canada actively campaigned against the Charlottetown accord for the very reason the inherent right to self–government was one of the five key components of the agreement.

It is fine for the parliamentary secretary to stand and say that this is what all native people want, but it clearly is not what all native people want. They voted against it. I suspect that if I were to go into his riding I would find many native Indian people, aboriginal people, who would be very much opposed to the concept of self–government even though the member supports it.

Having given this matter a great deal of thought and having expressed my concerns, particularly in British Columbia, for two years now, I am convinced there has to be a better way. There has to be a way that the Government of Canada in concert with the provinces can negotiate agreements which will be inclusive rather than exclusive, which will bring Canadians together rather than separate them forever on the basis of race.

We have to recognize we are settling agreements that will be set in constitutional concrete. We have to think in terms of 50, 100 and 150 years down the road. We cannot settle the agreements on the basis of a five, ten or fifteen year window.

It is for these reasons that I have grave concerns with respect to the work of the B.C. Treaty Commission. I am convinced that the province of British Columbia should not be at the table other than as an observer. If we continue down the road we are going, I am certain it will only create further problems in our society. The net result will be that those people who we would most like to help will be the people who will be most hurt.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the comments about my riding demonstrated the need for some lessons on the history of aboriginal people in Canada.

My riding, Nunatsiaq, spans over three time zones from Tuktoyaktuk in the west to Pangnirtung in the east, from Arviat in the south to the home of Santa Claus in the north. However the fact remains that the native Indian population of Nunatsiaq is probably less than .05 per cent. The area I represent is Inuit. It is 85 per cent Inuit.

The ignorance of people like the hon. member opposite is why aboriginal people in Canada must be recognized. At the beginning of his comments the hon. member quite clearly said that this could not be native land because the courts said so. He may very well believe what the courts have said, but whose courts? Whose justice system determined that this was crown land? We did not set up the present justice system. By the way, we were not asked whether it was the kind of justice system we wanted or whether it was the kind of government we wanted. We were not asked any of those questions by the Government of Canada when the provincial and territorial governments were set up.

There has to be an understanding. We have a bit of a problem with all the things that have happened. I do not want to revisit all of it. However I want to point out to the member and to all other Canadians that a great injustice has been done in the past and we are trying to correct the situation. If we take a little more time as the government than members opposite would like to see, I say we can afford to do it because it has taken 124 years to arrive at this stage.

We have to ensure that expeditious approval of negotiated claims is achieved. I am sure members opposite will ensure that we have their support when the bill comes to committee. I hope the member ensures that he understands the issues, whether it is the justice system or righting the wrongs that have been done over the years, before thinking that every aboriginal person who comes to him is representative of aboriginal peoples at large.

I take back my comment about all aboriginal people, but the majority of aboriginal people know that wrongs have been done to them and are trying to right those situations. I apologize for making the hon. member think that I was representing all aboriginal people. I am a Canadian, I am an Inuk, and I do not represent all aboriginal people. However I have a problem telling the House that in a lot of cases I do not always agree with the president of Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, but I have no problem saying that she is my leader for the benefit of the Inuit people at large. We as aboriginal people have leaders who may not necessarily be representative of all aboriginal peoples, but by and large they represent the majority.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the parliamentary secretary's remarks. I was offended that he would refer to me as ignorant. He may disagree with me on a philosophical basis and that is fine; that is what Parliament is all about. However I can assure the House that I am not ignorant. I am not ignorant on this issue. I have spent a great deal of time on it.

I should like to respond to some of the remarks the member made in talking about representatives of native people. I have never had the opportunity to spend much time in the member's riding, but I have spent a great deal of time in British Columbia and I have met with many aboriginal people. I can assure the member that great numbers of aboriginal people have real concerns about their own leadership.

In my riding massive amounts of federal tax dollars are turned over to aboriginal leaders with no accountability whatsoever. Members of that community cannot even go to into the band office to get a breakdown of how the money is being spent. We see aboriginal leaders driving around in fancy new pickup trucks and fancy new cars while the people in their communities are getting by on virtually nothing. That is the kind of situation we are faced with in British Columbia.

I find it very difficult to listen to the member talk about representatives of aboriginal people. There are any deeply concerned people in my constituency who write to the ministers involved: the Minister of Health, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

In the case of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans they write to tell him they have a problem supporting the AFS. There is no accountability for how that money is being distributed. They just see a bunch of rangers going around their communities with fancy new pickups and new jet boats. There is no accounting of how the money is being spent.

The Minister of Health is signing health agreements with aboriginal hereditary groups, not elected representatives, in my riding. The people who live in those communities come to me with serious concerns about the future of health care for them under that kind of system. The native leadership in those instances is always talking about how it is working for the good of its people and how it is trying to further the interests of its people.

In many instances they are not concerned about their people. They are concerned about their personal well–being. They are making sure they are well off while the rest of the people in those communities are left to suffer and are hung out to dry.

• (1300)

That is why the aboriginal people in British Columbia voted against the Charlottetown accord. That is why they do not want self–government. In spite of all the grandiose statements by people like Ovide Mercredi, the federal minister of Indian affairs and the minister of aboriginal affairs in British Columbia, these people do not want it and it should not be shoved down their throats. Their individual rights and equality should be respected by the Government of Canada, not abrogated and trampled on.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the last speaker was concerned about the word ignorance. I would not use that word but would use the term misunderstanding and misinformation.

I have heard members of the third party mention a few things which I perceive to be a complete misunderstanding of what this commission is being set up to do. A question was asked about whether the commission had any role to play in making sure that the parties were ready to negotiate. There was no understanding that was a role.

I will read very quickly the role of the commission: "The duties of the commission are assessing the readiness of the parties, Canada, B.C. and First Nations, to negotiate". A clearly stated duty is to encourage timely negotiations. Therefore, with respect to the concern over stalling, that is something the commission is set up to ensure does not happen.

Another comment from members of the third party was that everything was being done in secret, nothing was being done in the open. The role of the commission is to prepare and maintain a public record of the status of negotiations.

I have another comment with regard to constant references to being Canadian together rather than apart because of race. This is a clear denial of the cultural heritage of people who do not belong to a majority group.

One of the things I clearly saw as a physician when we discussed aboriginal health issues was that the aboriginal people had a great deal of health problems. This was because their culture had been denied for so long. The lack of spirituality which is an inherent part of their culture has led to loss of self–esteem and to hopelessness. This has led to the large number of suicides and abuse we now see in the aboriginal community which have clearly been traced back to loss of cultural identity. These things are important to a people. It does not mean that people are different because they are given their cultural heritage. Cultural heritage is inherently what people are; it is what makes them the way they are.

I am really concerned about those statements. They show a lack of understanding of basic human dignity and human rights.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the member is quite right in saying the role of the B.C. Treaty Commission is to assess whether the parties are prepared for negotiating.

In the case of one aboriginal group within my riding, the government is entering into agreements for negotiating with hereditary governments, not with elected representatives. People from that community continually come to my office and ask: "Who do these people represent and why is the government dealing with them? Why is the government signing agreements with them? Why is the government going to negotiate with them?" Their rights have been completely ignored in this whole process.

Yes, there are very serious problems in Canada's aboriginal communities. It is not because of a loss of culture nearly so much as it is a complete reflection of the state of the welfare industry which has been built up around native Indian people. This symptom will be found in any community, be it aboriginal or non–native, wherever we go. If people are treated as wards of the state and are forever on a short leash from the Government of Canada, those are exactly the kinds of problems we can expect to find in communities like that.

Perhaps the hon. member could take time out of her busy schedule to come to my riding. I would be more than happy to take her to some of the aboriginal communities and introduce her to some of the people who have serious concerns about the direction in which both the federal and provincial governments are going. They have very serious concerns because they know it is not good for them. They know the government finds it very easy to deal with collectives but has a very difficult time dealing with individual rights and individual responsibilities.

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my great pleasure to speak on Bill C–107.

In the House we are usually pressured to deal with immediate problems. We get representations from constituents about existing problems and they want immediate solutions. This is one of the rare opportunities we have in this House to pass this bill and build for the long term health of Canadians, particularly young aboriginal Canadians.

It is also fitting to be here with the member for Vancouver Quadra. Both of us were in Beijing. At that meeting a platform of action was adopted. It particularly acknowledged the importance of including the aboriginal communities in decision making specifically recognizing their knowledge of environmental management, addressing their right to education, to ensure equal access to health care and to acknowledge traditional health care. It is an important step. Around the world people are talking about giving aboriginal peoples the tools to do what they need to do.

One of the key commitments made by our party in the last election was to act on implementing the inherent right to aboriginal self–government. We did so because we saw the place of aboriginal peoples in Canada as a litmus test for our belief in fairness, in justice and in equality. Sadly, it is a test which we as a nation have too often failed.

In the red book we promised to implement the inherent right of aboriginal peoples to govern themselves by negotiating self–government agreements. On August 10 we delivered on that commitment. We released our policy on aboriginal self–government and presented the principles which will guide the negotiations. This is a pragmatic and practical policy, one which we believe will work.

One of the key reasons we think it will work is that it is the product of some 18 months of consultation with aboriginal groups, provincial and territorial governments, as well as others on what they thought our policy should be in this area. In co–operation with provincial and territorial counterparts, our policy aims for direct negotiations with aboriginal people in their communities on issues directly affecting their lives.

As a government we believe the time has come to stop the endless, fruitless debates about how many angels can dance on the head of the constitutional pin and get down to negotiating practical, pragmatic and realistic arrangements that implement the inherent right of self–government. Our approach is new but it is animated by principles as old as our country, principles of respect, of tolerance, of fairness and of compassion.

In the case of British Columbia the policy provides that negotiations on self–government will take place at the same table as discussions on land and resources. The process and structures already in place for treaty negotiations and confirmed by Bill C–107, the British Columbia Treaty Commission act, will also be used to negotiate self–government issues.

These two sets of discussions, self–government on the one hand and land and resource uses on the other, complement each other perfectly. It means that for the first time the parties will be able to have all the issues dealt with at one table under one set of negotiations. This will be more cost effective, something I am sure members of the third party will herald as a great achievement. It eliminates overlap and duplication and permits a much more comprehensive approach to achieve progress, something I also hope they will herald. We are committed to ensuring that the same principles and practices of openness which have characterized the B.C. treaty making process will also be applied to the self–government decisions and discussions.

There seems to be some confusion on the part of members opposite, particularly in the third party, as to just what our inherent rights policy is all about. Let me lay down the main elements so they can see for themselves how the BCTC process can be utilized to negotiate fair and meaningful self–government agreements.

As a government we propose to negotiate self–government agreements with aboriginal groups and the province or territory concerned. These negotiations and the agreements they produce will be based on a number of principles.

We begin with the premise that the inherent right of self–government is an existing aboriginal right under the Constitution. What does that mean? It means we will recognize that aboriginal peoples were self–governing before the arrival of Europeans and that they never gave up that right to govern themselves, even though that right has been ignored or suppressed for many years.

Because this right is in the Constitution, it is enforceable in the courts. Litigation, as we know, is lengthy and costly and often serves only to create conflict rather than engender understanding. It can discourage a willingness to work together as Canadians to build a better, stronger future for our country. Is that not what we are here to do?

In the end, it is unlikely that the courts would go much beyond providing broad principles, leaving the details of self–government to be negotiated by the parties who would have to live with those agreements anyway. It is far better, this government believes, to negotiate practical ways of implementing this right at the outset, tailoring each agreement to the unique circumstances of each community or region.

Bill C–107 is not a one size fits all exercise. That approach has been tried and it only led to gridlock and frustration on both sides. What we need is an agreement and a process that is flexible enough to accommodate the diverse needs of diverse communities. This policy will do that.

The second guiding principle in our negotiations is that aboriginal self–government will be exercised within the existing Constitution. As a consequence, the right of inherent self–government does not include a right of sovereignty in the international law sense and it will not result in independent aboriginal nation states.

Our goal is to enhance the participation of aboriginal people in Canadian society, not place them outside it. The policy will not create little enclaves dotted across the country. It will provide aboriginal people with the tools they need to manage their own affairs and realize their own potential. It will mean an end to conflict and it will open the door to progress for all Canadians.

Third, the charter of rights and freedoms will apply to aboriginal governments as it does to all other governments in Canada. This of course makes sense only if we are talking about protecting rights within Canada.

The fourth principle is that federal, provincial, territorial and aboriginal laws must work in harmony.

While we are prepared to negotiate a wide range of powers, there are some areas that must remain with the federal government. As a general principle, matters which are integral to the aboriginal culture or internal to the aboriginal group are open for discussion. These might include areas such as education, health care, policing, natural resource management, agriculture, the establishment of governing structures, internal constitutions, elections and a leadership selection process.

However there are a number of areas where there is no compelling reason for aboriginal governments to exercise law making authority. Those areas include matters relating to Canadian sovereignty such as international diplomatic relations, foreign policy, national security and defence, international treaty making, immigration and international trade.

It includes as well matters affecting the fundamental national interest such as the management and regulation of the economy, the banking system, currency or broadcasting, postal service, emergency and peace, order and good government powers, and matters relating to the maintaining of law and order such as the Criminal Code.

While this is a federal policy we know we cannot go it alone because many of the jurisdictions contemplated by this policy are provincial. It is essential to have the territory or province concerned involved in the self–government negotiations. Its involvement will be crucial to the ultimate success of the process.

Not only do the provinces have jurisdiction over many of these areas, they also bring with them invaluable expertise in their administration. Having the three parties at the same table will allow new aboriginal systems, such as education, to be harmonized with existing provincial structures and minimize conflict down the road so as to create the best possible aboriginal governments. I am sure that is something we all agree with.

Fifth, where all parties agree we are prepared to protect rights and self–government agreements in new treaties. Finally, the government has made it clear that all funding for the negotiation and implementation of self–government agreements must come from existing resources. There will be no new money.

I have outlined the principles that will guide our discussions. As a government, we believe that they are both fair and realistic. We believe they provide a solid foundation on which to build. We believe they advance the rights of aboriginal people in a way which also protects the rights of all Canadians.

I have spent some time discussing inherent right because I am pleased to report that those involved in the B.C. treaty process have endorsed our self–government policy. Chief Joe Mathias of the First Nations Summit said that the new policy "means finally we have an important initiative that will bring First Nations into the 21st century".

Surely that must be our goal. With this bill we can begin to create the certainty that will encourage economic growth. We can provide the aboriginal people of B.C. with the tools they need to create the future they deserve.

We can move beyond the adversarial postures of the past to a new relationship based on mutual respect, trust and understanding, a new relationship that reflects the true Canadian values.

Some 50 per cent of all the aboriginal peoples in our country are under 25 years of age. It is an important point if we are to address their needs and make sure they have the systems in place to be the best they can be so that Canada can ensure them a long and successful future. It is an important point because all too often we talk about how we believe our young people are one of our greatest resources. Yet we do not always put our money where our mouth is in terms of implementing policies that will allow them to be just that, our greatest resource. We must do that more and more.

I am pleased to support Bill C–107 and encourage all parties in the House to pass it quickly and to agree with us in our position.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is always encouraging to listen to members that understand what processes we go through, the hardships we go through. One of the most often asked questions by members opposite, and other people I am sure, concerns the definition of self–government or inherent right. The two seem to always be an issue with some members of the public or politicians.

I will try to define what I think inherent right and self–government are. The hon. member elaborated on it. One time I was asked about the inherent right of self–government. I replied that as far as I am concerned it is the acceptance or the acknowledgement that we have been here for a few more years than anybody else. In the Indians' case it is something in the neighbourhood of 35,000 years; in our case it is a little shorter, only 3,500 years. However, we do not feel left out by the fact that the Indians have been here 30,000 years longer than we have.

The words inherent right and self–government to us have always been accepted as they are without trying to put them in a little box the way people quite often like to do. It is asked, is this the way it is going to be? Some people would say there is no other way when in fact there could be 10 different ways to do the same thing.

Would the member care to elaborate on her understanding of what is meant by self–government or inherent right? As far as we are concerned, it is the fact that we were here, we had a system in place. The Government of Canada and through it the Canadian people at large must acknowledge that we have the right to determine our future. We have that right to set up a self–government within our geographic areas without necessarily having to ask permission from a government that has been around for 125 years or so.

I wonder if the member would care to elaborate.

Ms. Torsney: Mr. Speaker, as the parliamentary secretary has outlined a number of principles related to self–government, I will identify some of the key principles that I think my constituents would be interested in and those that perhaps are a little greyer to some people than they should be.

Aboriginal self–government will operate within the existing Constitution. It is an important tool which will allow our aboriginal peoples the ability to make a lot of the key decisions which they need to make for themselves. Sometimes it is not appropriate for the federal government or the provincial governments to make all the decisions for this diverse group of communities which have very specific needs and problems that have either been neglected or that government policies at the provincial and federal levels in the past have tried to ameliorate but have only served to exacerbate because we tried this one size fits all philosophy.

The aboriginal peoples in the communities across Canada, particularly in B.C., need to be able to use their inherent rights to make the decisions within the context of the Canadian Constitution that will benefit their communities and see them empowered.

It is ironic that around the world people are recognizing the rights of empowerment of women, empowerment of individuals to make decisions, to have the tools to ensure they will be productive members of our communities so that we are more economically viable, we are more environmentally friendly and we take care of our population issues. All too often people within our own country do not recognize the importance of those values when it comes to a very specific group of people, the first people of Canada, the aboriginal peoples. Whether it was 30,000 years ago or more, they still were definitely our first peoples and we must give them the tools.

Another aspect, which seems to me to be common sense, but of course common sense is all too often not very common, is that the current system under which we have been operating has not worked. We have seen aspects of the aboriginal communities doing very well. I do not mean to draw from their success, whether it be in the arts, in business or in other areas of our communities. The aboriginal peoples have done very well in many aspects.

However, there are too many problems. There are too many young aboriginal people in jail. There are too many aboriginals who are dropping out of school, who do not seem to feel a part of Canadian society. It is incumbent on us to do everything we can to give them the tools so that they can be the best people that they can be.

This bill, this new approach to things, given that it was proceeded with after 18 months of consultations with the communities and with our provincial and territorial partners, has given us the answers and the policy decisions that they would like to see in here. It will be successful and it will make a huge difference in the lives of many Canadians, particularly our young aboriginal Canadians, to whom we must leave a good legacy.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am one of the first to support self–government at a local level within the context of Canada being the nation. Not only do I talk about it; I have worked hard to implement it.

I have a concern which I would like the hon. member opposite to address. How do we deal with the aboriginal communities who see inherent self–government as being separate and apart from Canada? They see the right of inherent self–government as a separate and distinct nation from that of Canada. How will we deal with those aboriginal communities which see inherent government as being separate from the Government of Canada?

Ms. Torsney: Mr. Speaker, certainly this is a process which is evolving. I am pleased to have her support for the concept and for this bill in terms of self–government.

There will be a series of negotiations, but I have outlined already the basic principles on which we are proceeding. It must be within the context of the Constitution. We must ensure the structures are appropriate on the issues they have decision making power on and it is all outlined in the bill and in the process we are going forward with.

The Deputy Speaker: It being 1.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

SENATE

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, representation in the Senate should be equal from each province, elected by the people, and have sufficient power to make it effective in order to better represent the people of the less populous provinces.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is a great honour for me today to rise as the mover of Motion No. 459 and therefore to speak in favour of it.

Advocating a triple E Senate has been part of the platform of the Reform Party of Canada virtually from its inception. As Senate critic over the past year I have had the opportunity to research the Senate. Senate reform for the Reform Party and for all of us from the less populous provinces addresses a feeling of alienation from central Canada and the central government, which has grown through the last two decades.

This feeling of alienation stems from the reality that governments will respond positively to pressure exerted by the provinces or the regions that contain the largest portion of our population. Sometimes these policy responses are at the expense of the smaller provinces and their desires. Equality of representation of provinces in the second chamber of Canada's central Parliament we believe would give the people of the less populous provinces real clout over the policy agenda of the federal government.

However, I am getting ahead of myself. I would like to spend some time today talking about the original purpose of the Senate; in other words, why it was created. I would like to speak about how it has performed this role, then deal with the criticisms of the Senate and attempt to respond to them. I will then conclude with the reasons why I believe the triple E concept for the Senate makes a lot of sense.

The Senate was designed to perform two main functions, the review of legislation emanating from the lower House, and provide a forum wherein the regions would have a voice in the central Parliament's law making process. It was to provide an institutional voice to small governments and perhaps to minority groups against the popular majority of the lower house. One could say that it was designed to act as a political bridge between the component parts of the federation and the central government.

The work of the Senate as presently constituted in the scrutiny of legislation has been praised by most political commentators. Also, Senate committees have carried out useful investigative studies over the years, which have added new information to policy development. Yet criticism has been levelled against senators who have stayed in the post regardless of the fact that they may show up only once a year, some less often than that. This criticism stems from the fact that senators used to be in for life. Also, because of undeserving patronage appointments Canadians have lost respect for the Senate, so much so that it has resulted in uncomplimentary names and references such as the old boys' club.

However, the main criticism of the role played by the Senate in our country concentrates on the inability of the institution to represent all regions. This has led to great frustration in western Canada predominately because there is a definite perception that central Canada, because of sheer numbers, sets and controls the public policy agenda.

Following on this argument is the feeling that senators, because they are not elected, have no legitimacy to act. Therefore, even if senators decided to start voting in regional or provincial blocs, they would not have the ultimate legitimacy to do so, in that they are not elected by the people of Canada. This is a strong reason for an elected Senate.

Bear in mind as well that our present Senate's powers are virtually equal to those of the House of Commons, except that while it can initiate legislation except money bills, it cannot hold up constitutional amendments for longer than 180 days. With these two exceptions, it is important to note that it can defeat, amend or indeed stall all legislation coming from the House of Commons. However, because of its lack of legitimacy its exercise of these powers is constantly subject to criticism. Therefore this lack of equality of representation and legitimacy to act to either defend or promote the interests of the smaller provinces has given great impetus to the movement of Senate reform.

While the impetus to a triple E Senate seems to have grown out of actions by the previous Liberal government to implement the national energy program, there have been other proposals for reform. Let us take a look at some.

The most popular subject for these proposals has been the method of selection of senators. Popular election, provincial government appointment and a mixed formula whereby half would be appointed and half elected have been proposed through the years. As early as 1908 Senator David suggested one third of the Senate chamber be named by the federal government, another third by the provincial government and the final third by universities and other public bodies.

A popular suggestion for reform in the 1970s was the creation of the house of the provinces. This second chamber would be made up of delegates appointed by the various provincial governments or perhaps provincial cabinet ministers. This was a second chamber modelled on what was then the West German upper house. While this reform had many supporters, especially among the provinces, it was obvious that this Senate could quickly evolve into a house of obstruction or a constitutionalized permanent federal–provincial conference. Neither scenario would have a long term positive effect on how the country is governed. Provincial interests only would be advanced in the upper house, with the national interest taking, at best, second place.

The idea of an elected Senate attained prominence in 1981 with the publication by the Canada West Foundation of "Regional Representation—the Canadian Partnership". It was based on the work of Dr. David Elton of the foundation and Mr. Burt Brown of Alberta. In 1982 Senator Duff Roblin, former premier of Manitoba, proposed that senators be elected on a basis similar to the elected system in Australia.

The first federal parliamentary report to espouse an elected Senate was written by the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform and released in 1983. It is noteworthy that the Senate co–chair of the committee is now the Speaker of the Senate, Senator Gil Molgat of Manitoba.

More recently, the Meech Lake accord proposed a hybrid type of appointment procedure for Senate vacancies, and the 1992 proposed Charlottetown accord proposed an elected Senate. I remember in British Columbia just how this was interpreted by our present NDP government. As a matter of fact, it was the B.C. provincial government's interpretation of the proposals for Senate change in the recent Charlottetown accord that helped to precipitate my entry into politics. At the time there was some suggestion that the provincial government would control the format of how the elections by the people would proceed.

In B.C. statements were being made by elected government MLAs and the premier that there would be equal men and women and the government would look after candidate selection for Senate seats. The first statement flies in the face of Canadian tradition. Canadians have long been committed to a system of merit for job applications. That is, those who can do the job best should do it. And any potential candidates for a Senate position must come from all spectrums of the province, not from government patronage lists.

As a point of interest, we must recognize in our country that to hire employees according to an ethnic and gender preference program is not working. In California, where the selection of employees has been based on preferential treatment based upon race and gender over the last while, Americans are going to see a ballot question in the 1996 election year that will potentially forbid the use of ethnicity or gender as criteria for either discriminating against or granting preferential treatment to any individual or group by the government.

Those who take the time to think realize that discrimination, if it exists, cannot be cured by counter discrimination. It is very divisive and fundamentally unfair.

During the 1980s a unique event in the history of the Senate occurred in Alberta. Alberta enacted legislation to enable persons to stand for election on a province–wide basis to contest a vacant Senate seat. An election was held and Reform Party member Stan Waters topped the polls. He was subsequently summoned to the Senate by the Governor General on the advice of the Prime Minister. Unfortunately we lost Stan Waters before he had the opportunity to show Canadians just how valuable an accountable senator could be. The election of Senator Stan Waters is a valuable precedent. Unfortunately, it was not followed with later Senate appointments from Alberta.

That very briefly is the history of how we got to where we are now, the history of why the contents of this motion are so dear to the hearts of all of us who represent the Reform Party.

The triple E Senate should be elected and therefore accountable. It is our belief that a Senate must be popularly elected. In a democratic age in a country that prizes democracy so highly, an appointed upper house lacks legitimacy.

More specifically, elected representation is essential in addressing issues of equity, since an elected Senate would place greater emphasis on increasing the likelihood that people will be elected based on merit rather than appointed simply to fulfil equity quotas. This would also address the longstanding problem of patronage appointments.

Let us take a look at the issue of patronage and the practice of the government to promote adding party members and friends to the Senate, whether as a result of section 26 of the Constitution Act or just to fill vacancies.

Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867, provides that in exceptional circumstances an additional four or eight senators may be appointed. This provision was invoked in December 1990, when the Senate systematically opposed passage of the legislation introducing the goods and services tax, legislation that had been passed after much contentious debate in the Commons. Here it could be argued that the Canadian people did not want the GST, but in order to raise more money in taxes—sounds like England in the days of wicked King John and others—the government of the day forced through legislation that people did not want by invoking section 26 and adding more senators.

If senators were elected by the people of Canada, the Prime Minister and present government could not run roughshod over the wishes of the people or set the odds in his government's own favour, but would have to abide by the will of the people.

At this time I must remind the House that we have a similar situation in the House of Commons today. We have the hated legislation on the contentious Bill C–68. The people of Canada do not want the national gun registration. Most of them know that forcing law–abiding Canadians to register guns that have been collected over the years, some as collector's items, some to be used in hunting, and some left to them as heirlooms from their fathers from a previous period in history, will not make Canadians one bit safer in their homes.

Most Canadians have done their research and know of the thousands of weapons smuggled in each year over our borders. Most Canadians know that these illegal weapons will not be registered. Most educated Canadians know that criminals or those with minds of criminal intent can get guns in all of our major cities from the underground network. Worst of all is the computer list that honest, law–abiding citizens will be placed on when they register their guns. They say those lists will be secure. American and Canadian authorities already admit that security cannot be guaranteed any more. The criminal element in the new computer world and information age breaks our security time and time again. American spokespersons readily admit the computer criminal gets access from supposedly secure documents.

Now our law–abiding citizens will have their names placed on these lists. Criminals will be able to access these lists. How safe now will Canadians be in their homes? If they are law–abiding citizens already, their guns will be locked up with the bullets in different places. The criminal will have the advantage both of surprise and of being prepared for a fight. Is this what this government wants, to put good, law–abiding citizens in jeopardy? No, it says. Then why have the national gun registration? Will it make Canadians safer in their homes? No. Will their names being placed on a list for all and sundry to steal from make them safe? No. Is this then another way for this government to raise money, taxes, as it is already deep in debt and going deeper all the time? Possibly.

This is the damage that occurs in our country when senators are placed in positions as vacancies occur, rather than being elected by Canadians, for the Senate can vote against government legislation. It can vote against poor government legislation.

In the case of the GST, which costs us heavily in the administration of it, the Prime Minister of the day invoked section 26 and appointed more senators at his own will and forced the GST on the Canadian people. In this way the governing party became a majority in the Senate and the hated GST legislation finally passed.

How has the GST helped Canadians? It has forced some businesses into bankruptcy. It has added extra tax burdens on already heavily taxed citizens. At present, when Canadians get their paycheques, after taxes they are taxed again. The promise of the government of the day that part of the GST would go toward reducing the deficit and debt did not happen. What about the growing underground economy, growing because of the enormous tax load placed on Canadians?

Today, because of attrition, the Liberals can stack the Senate and once again we will have the wishes of Canadians put second to the wishes of the Prime Minister and the cabinet. By appointing the latest four senators, good strong Liberals, to the Senate we are seeing once again the upper house not being accountable to the people. Canadians can do nothing about making senators accountable. Only with an elected Senate is this possible. If the hated gun legislation is forced on Canadians, down the road we will see happen exactly what Canadians warned today's government would happen.

Today's law–abiding citizens will be forced to break the law to protect themselves and their families. Canadians will be more vulnerable in their homes if the criminal element will know where the guns are.

Another costly government bureaucracy will have been created as the present federal government attempts to administer this latest tax burden on Canadians. The present gun registration will have proved no more effective than the existing gun registration, which has been in force for many years. It is past time that we as responsible MPs looked to an elected Senate so unpopular laws are not forced on the Canadian people.

As far as the method of election is concerned I think we have a lot to learn from our Australian friends. In a recent edition of the Canadian Parliamentary Review, Professor Howard Caddy, in an article about the Australian Senate, states that proportional representation ensures that the upper house in Australia does not reflect exactly the representation of the lower house.

He also goes on to say that "as a result of the fact that the political party composition of the Senate is usually different from the House, compromises can be obtained when there is a difference of opinion between the two houses on particular legislation". It can be worked out.

When we look at an equal Senate under the triple E Senate, each province will have the same number of seats. This is the present situation in both Australia and the United States. In such a Senate the less populous provinces would have a majority of the seats just as the more heavily populated provinces do now in the House of Commons.

Regarding equality, at present the Constitution stipulates that there shall be 104 senators, a number that can be changed only by constitutional amendment. Distribution of Senate seats is by region now in Canada. If we look at Ontario and Quebec, they have 24 each. If we look around the rest of Canada, the west has only 24 between four provinces and the maritimes only 24 between three. The present representation favours central Canada and is unfair.

Do we need 104 senators? No, we do not. Can we lower the numbers? Yes, we can if the will of the Canadian people decides so. Now that senators are no longer elected for life and leave the Senate at 75 years of age, it is opportune to look at the less cost involved in fewer senators and the fact that absenteeism should be a less serious problem than it was in the past. An equal number of seats from each province suggests a fairer representation.

Should the two most populated provinces with the most MPs in the House of Commons also have the most senators in the Senate? No. This policy is unfair for the less populated areas of our vast country.

To be effective the Senate must have adequate power to balance the House of Commons. We do not believe that defeat of a government bill in the Senate should lead to the resignation of the government. However when we are fine tuning the powers of this Chamber we must ensure that the Senate can amend or veto regionally offensive legislation.

In conclusion, the adoption of an elected, equal and effective second chamber in Canada's central Parliament would be of great benefit to our political system. Through equality the interests of small provinces would be protected. With the combination of elected and effective, senators would have the legitimacy to act, to amend or to defeat legislation which did not respect regional differences in the country.

It would also combine the best aspects of the present Senate, its scrutiny of legislation, with the legitimacy to act to defend regional interests.

I realize as with all proposals there is some fine tuning to do. Ways must be found to ensure elected senators do not act to slavishly serve the interests of the political party they represent. They must have the freedom to represent their regions even if the interests of the region do not coincide with the interests of the national political party they represent.

However these are details and we can work them out if we get the fundamentals right, an elected, effective and equal Senate.

[Translation]

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois on the motion by my colleague, the hon. member for Mission–Coquitlam, which reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, representation in the Senate should be equal from each province, elected by the people, and have sufficient power to make it effective in order to better represent the people of the less populous provinces.

This will be recognized as the proposal for the triple E Senate, that is elected, equal and effective.

Let me state right at the onset that I am going to oppose this motion and I shall close my remarks with what it leads me to conclude about the present Senate.

• (1350)

First, I want to deal with the concept of an elected Senate. To start with, obviously, we know that the Senate is one of the two Houses in this country. A number of countries have two houses, the USA and France, for instance.

What sets the second chamber apart in Canada, as in England, is that it is not elected, in other words the members are appointed. The Senate we have is an elitist Senate, an aristocratic Senate, one that is not accountable. Often its appointees are men or women who have had a long career in politics, or business leaders who backed a given political party, or party organizers who find in the Senate the income and means to allow them to continue to serve their party.

The Senate in its present form is an extremely negative aspect of our democracy. When reference is made to an elected Senate, I think that most people who want to have a Senate, to retain the Senate, would agree that in the current political situation and in response to current views on democracy, the Senate ought to be elected.

Now, for the concept of an equal Senate. From what I have been able to understand, each province would have the same number of senators, like the U.S. Senate. I think some people here either watch too much American television or are at least very much aware of the American philosophy and would like to see in Canada people with the same power as American senators. When we look at American history and the process by which every State large and small, was given the same number of senators, we see that at the time the political philosophy was such that people wanted to create a certain equality between the States by having the same number of senators from each State.

However, that was in the 18th century, and we are in the 20th century. I think that in the 20th century, people do not look kindly on the fact that states or provinces with a population that is relatively low compared with the more densely populated provinces, and I personally and the people of the Bloc as well do not look kindly on the fact that some provinces are given so much power, considering their low population numbers.

If we look at the current system in Canada, each province is represented in the House of Commons, according to a certain ratio that is used to determine proportional representation. I think that considering the present state of democratic thinking, people are well represented.

There could be some special considerations on the basis of which one part of the country would be better represented than another part, there is the historical aspect, there is the cultural aspect and there are all kinds of considerations, but I do not see why, considering the present state of Canadian culture or Canadian politics, Prince Edward Island would have the same number of senators as Ontario. It would be interesting to see some evidence that this would be better than what we have now.

The concept of an equal Senate takes us back to the Constitution of 1982, in other words, Canada as checker board, a vast country divided into ten parts, with each part being equal to the other. That is what we saw and that is what we see now, to a certain extent under the current amending formula for the Canadian constitution, and I think that if we consider the effectiveness of this mechanism, we may have some reservations about giving certain parts of the country so much power that they could easily obstruct the operations of our institutions.

I am referring to the potential power of entities that may represent as few as 300,000 people out of Canada's total population of 28 or 29 million, so I do not think that today's proposal for an equal Senate is in the interests of Canada and Quebec.

And now, let me deal with the concept of an effective Senate. When the hon. member for the Reform Party introduced her bill, she made a connection between effectiveness and the Senate's power to obstruct, to hold up legislation passed by the House of Commons. I think there is something a little dangerous in all this. It would mean having a Senate that would obstruct the will of the representatives of the people. Two, three or four hundred years ago, the people in the Commons were not always considered to be sufficiently intelligent, knowledgeable or enlightened to debate the real problems, so people were appointed to block their decisions.

Today, however, if we look at countries with only one house, we can see that democracy functions effectively and well there. In Quebec and Ontario there is no longer a second appointed house, and democratic institutions are functioning well. So I do not think we need a second house to block the democratic will of the representatives of the people, as is currently the case.

Reference was made to the gun control bill. It is totally unacceptable, in my opinion, for appointed senators to be able to block legislation passed by a large majority of the representatives of the people. I see it as dangerous for democracy in Canada when people who have not been elected are given the power to prevent the will of the people's representatives from being effectively expressed in the administration of the country.

Therefore, we in the Bloc oppose the motion. The motion is not a votable item, but if it were, we would vote against it, particularly because we have repeatedly called in the House for the abolition of the Senate. We consider the present Senate ineffective. We consider it too costly. According to the budget, the Senate will cost Canada $42 million this year. The services the Senate currently provides have a certain value. However, in comparing their cost with the Senate's potential influence, its effect, if it were operating at maximum capability, I think that, right now, the $42 million spent on the Senate is too much, given the needs and the cuts being made in various areas, where there are desperate needs.

We are calling for its abolition, particularly because we have no hope or expectation of its being reformed. It is impossible. With the Canadian constitution as it currently stands, if we look at sections 38 and 42 of the constitution, we see that Senate approval is required to amend the powers, role, election and appointment of senators in Canada.

So, from what I understand of the way the institution works, I do not think the senators would go so far as to commit hara–kiri. So, I think the only way to abolish the Senate is along the lines of the motion I made in connection with the bill to implement certain elements of the latest budget. It would simply be a matter of cutting off the Senate, of arranging for senators not to be paid anymore, of abolishing the funds needed to operate the Senate so that the Senate dies on its own. With the state of Canada's constitution and the way institutions work, it is beyond reform, it is ineffective, it is not elected, and the powers currently in its hands serve more to hamper the flow of democracy in Canada than to help Canadians live better in this country.

[English]

Mr. Gouk: Mr. Speaker, there were some very interesting comments made by the hon. member from the Bloc.

The Deputy Speaker: The Chair received no indication that anybody on the government side wished to speak. The Chair has not seen anybody on the government side stand. However there is a rotation and we have heard from one member of the Reform Party. Therefore the hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader has the floor.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I know I would enjoy hearing his remarks, but I think in terms of the normal rotation of speakers among the parties that a government member should participate in this debate at some point.

The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam has proposed a motion to the House and I am pleased to speak on it. I was surprised that she did not quote from her leader in the course of her remarks. I thought a decree had been issued from the leader's office that all members of the Reform Party were to quote the leader in every speech at least once. Perhaps she forgot the decree this afternoon.

I would like to help her out because I have a quote from the little green book. It is the little book of Reform, the gospel according to the hon. member for Calgary Southwest and the Reform Party.

The hon. member for Calgary Southwest in one of his more lucid moments said: "The three priorities of the present Senate are in order: protocol, alcohol and Geritol". These remarks might be considered by some to be insulting of the Senate. I guess for that reason the hon. member for Mission–Coquitlam did not feel it was appropriate to quote those remarks. However, I have quoted them.

The hon. member for Calgary Southwest evidently thinks these remarks are appropriate. I know that his views are shared by the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster because the last time I quoted this he was citing along with me. He remembered all the words. He had memorized the words of his leader and quoted them along with me.

I point them out because there is a lot of agreement on that point among members of her party apparently. Yet, at the same time, they have not proposed the abolition of the Senate, as members of the other group which was largely western based, the New Democratic Party, used to do and still does. They now are back to abolition but for a while they supported the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, you will remember in the last Parliament when we were debating the GST that the NDP changed its principles. The principle was that there could not be an unelected body in Parliament; however, it changed its principles in the course of the GST debate.

I see that I have hit a nerve.

Mr. Morrison: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am wondering what the relevance of all this is to the matter which is under debate.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary will make his point relevant very soon.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia that this motion deals with the Senate; it is not on gun control. He may have heard the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam spend half of her time speaking on gun control. The only reason she did so was that her arguments on this motion were so thin she ran out of them in about 10 minutes and had to fill in the rest of her time on gun control.

This motion is about Senate reform. If the hon. member had read the motion instead of making these interruptions, he would realize what I am talking about. We are talking about the Senate and I was talking about the approach of the New Democratic Party to the Senate. It wanted to abolish it. The motion before us is not for abolition; it is for a triple E Senate and it is that to which I wish to speak.

The hon. member's motion proposes changes to the powers, the method of selecting senators and the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate. Thus the motion would require a constitutional amendment under the seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population general amending procedure. That is what would have to be done in order to achieve the amendment as proposed by the hon. member.

This seven and fifty amendment, as we call it, seven provinces and 50 per cent of the population represented by those seven provinces, must have the consent of the House of Commons and the legislative assemblies of two–thirds of the provinces representing at least 50 per cent of the population according to the most current general census. The Senate could in respect of such a constitutional amendment exercise a six–month suspensive veto.

Once again, I would say to the hon. member that the Charlottetown accord contained a Senate amendment proposal along the lines proposed in the hon. member's motion, but it was defeated by a majority of Canadians in a majority of the provinces. There is little evidence to indicate that Canadians wish to reopen this constitutional debate. Other issues, such as the economy and job creation, are the priorities of Canadians. That is why the government is dealing with those issues and not the one the hon. member has raised today or any others like it.

I think the hon. member would agree that despite her best intentions, this is not a good time to be opening a constitutional debate in this country, as her motion would suggest. In Quebec the current government of that province is unlikely to approve any constitutional changes, save for an amendment making the province an independent country.

It is important to note that because Quebec's approval will be necessary to achieve the kind of Senate reform she wants, we should not bother pursuing it. We need that agreement. It is not just because it has to be part of the seven and fifty portion of the agreement; Quebec has a special arrangement.

Quebec of all the provinces is divided into 24 electoral divisions for the purposes of representation in the Senate pursuant to section 22 of the 1867 Constitution Act, the British North America Act. Because Quebec senators must meet their property or residence qualifications in the division they represent, it could be argued that a scheme for Senate reform which sought to provide equal representation for the provinces, as this motion does, might require not only seven of the provinces representing half the population but also a bilateral amendment with Quebec if the current provisions respecting these 24 seats were to be altered.

Bilateral and multilateral amendments are covered by section 43 of the Constitution Act. It provides that an amendment to the Constitution in relation to a provision applying to one or more but not all provinces requires the consent of the Senate, the House of Commons and the legislative assemblies of each province to which the amendment applies. Imagine getting that kind of agreement in the Senate, let alone in the provincial legislatures involved.

Bilateral or multilateral amendments are not subject to minimum and maximum time limits and do not require votes by a majority of the members of the legislative bodies involved. Otherwise they are subject to the same rules as the seven and fifty amendments and the Senate is limited to a suspensive veto.

Thus even if Parliament were to pursue the motion and seek to amend the Constitution in accordance with it, it is doubtful we could secure the requisite consent of the National Assembly in Quebec. Furthermore there is also no guarantee other provinces would approve of these changes.

The Ontario government of Premier Mike Harris could hardly be expected to weaken the province's influence in the upper chamber without getting something in return, being mindful of the defeat of former Premier David Peterson in 1990 after he agreed to give up some of Ontario's seats in order to keep the Meech Lake accord alive. We all remember that. I thought it was a generous gesture on the part of the premier but it was not popular in Ontario. Mr. Speaker, you would remember that; you have a seat in Ontario.

Smaller provinces like Nova Scotia and New Brunswick which together represent 6 per cent of the population and hold 19 per cent of the Senate seats are hardly likely to be enthusiastic supporters of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam. Therefore I think there is very little reason to believe that these provinces would consent to any changes unless they got something in exchange, like a stronger constitutional obligation for the federal government to make equalization payments. I only throw that out as one suggestion out of many possibilities.

Furthermore we could not contemplate radical Senate reform without public participation. Various groups would argue that other constitutional issues are far more pressing than changes in the Senate and should take precedence over the Senate, things like entrenching specific rights of aboriginal peoples in the Constitution.

Again, I draw attention to the failure of the 1992 Charlottetown accord. This accord contained provisions for an elected, equal and more effective Senate, all the things that are in this motion. It was rejected in a federal referendum in nine provinces and two territories and in a provincial referendum in Quebec. A majority of Canadians in a majority of provinces voted no.

Outside Quebec, Canadians rejected the accord by 54 per cent to 45 per cent with 1 per cent casting spoiled ballots. Quebecers voted 55 per cent no, 42 per cent yes. In the member for Mission—Coquitlam's province of British Columbia the Charlottetown accord suffered its most resounding defeat where 67.2 per cent voted no. Yet she trots into the House today and puts forward exactly the same provision that was in the Charlottetown accord.

I thought her party trumpets how democratic it is all the time. The will of the people in her own province was 67 per cent against this proposal and what does she do? She trots in here and proposes the same thing. I have hit another nerve and this one is from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Morrison: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is proper for a member to use deliberately inaccurate data when he makes—

The Speaker: Order. I think we are getting into debate. I am sure the hon. member will have his turn in a little while to refute whatever one hon. member or another says. We always have the interpretation of figures which can go either way.

• (1410)

However, I caution all hon. members in using the term. I believe I stand to be corrected, but deliberately mislead is an unparliamentary term and I would hope all hon. members would shy away from it.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I do hope these needless interruptions will not be taken off my time. I am pressed to finish what I think is an accurate speech and I am looking forward to the hon. member making his own instead of interrupting by arguing.

Again, I express my shock that the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam would come forward with proposals very similar to what was in the Charlottetown accord after that accord was rejected out of hand by the electors of her riding, and even more shockingly was rejected by her party and opposed vigorously by her party while some of us had the good sense to support it.

Despite the fact that the accord contained provisions for major Senate reform, including measures to provide for representation of aboriginal peoples and new powers to veto any House of Commons legislation that changed taxation policy in key areas of natural resources, this accord failed. I stress that.

The Charlottetown negotiations demonstrated that agreement among first ministers, territorial and aboriginal leaders was possible, but it was not arrived at easily. Although the Reform Party leader referred to the accord negotiated by 17 parties as the Mulroney deal, it was in fact the result of a very complex process that required extensive accommodation and compromises.

Writing in the Edmonton Journal, former Alberta Premier Don Getty said: "The package was so difficult to get, I would say it was almost a miracle that we were able to put it together". Yet here the Reform Party, having worked against it and having striven for its defeat, now is pulling chunks out of it and saying it supports this and that, let us do this and let us do that. It shows what a lack of sound policy thinking it has. It keeps going back to things that are really dead. The Reform Party should rethink this resolution.

I urge the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam to consult with her leader again, refer him to the quote I have read from the little green book, and ask him what he really thinks of this motion to see if he does not think that perhaps it is pie in the sky, unnecessary, and not a reasonable thing to put forward in Canada as we know it today, having gone through these two recent constitutional discussions at great length and at great pain to our country.

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a few notes to keep me on track, but after some of the unbelievable rhetoric I heard coming from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands I feel like throwing them out and straightening the record on all the things I would probably make unparliamentary reference to if I were not under complete control.

The one comment I will make is about how the hon. member said that former Premier Peterson of Ontario was thrown out of office because he agreed to reduce some of the seats for Ontario in the Charlottetown accord. I suggest he was thrown out of office because he was a Liberal. We will soon see that happening on the other side here as well.

I will deal with other parts that he erroneously brought forward in the content of my comments today.

The Senate is something about which I hear a lot of complaints. It is an ongoing complaint within my riding. I have a tremendous number of people who communicate with me in one form or another asking why the Senate is even there and calling for its abolition.

One of the things I have suggested to them is that the Senate in its current form does not provide much of a benefit to Canadians. It is in essence a rubber stamp most assuredly for the balance of this term of government, now that the Liberals have functional control of it, and carrying on for as long as it takes the balance to shift again once we have managed to send the Liberals to the other side of the House, chasing after Mr. Peterson. There is no need for it to be a rubber stamp, but that is the way the system currently works. We are saying rather than abolish it, change it into something that is far more democratic.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the Prime Minister and many others who occasionally sound out on the other side of the House keep talking about the Charlottetown accord and how we rejected not the Charlottetown accord but the triple E Senate. The Charlottetown accord was not about a triple E Senate. That was a little carrot put in there, which was kind of like putting a bad tasting pill in something sweet to try to attract us.

The Reform Party gave full credit to any part of the Charlottetown accord that was worth while. We said there were some good parts. At any place I went to address the Charlottetown accord, the first thing I commented on were the good parts, not all the garbage that was in there. Believe me, there was plenty. Some of the parts were actually good.

It is absolutely ludicrous that the Liberals, every time we try to bring up something that has some linkage to the old Charlottetown accord, say it was offered to us on a platter and we turned it down.

There are three parts to a triple E Senate. First is the elected Senate. We could have that part now without any constitutional amendment. It takes absolutely no change. It takes the co–operation of the Prime Minister and his Liberal cronies to agree to do what the majority of Canadians would like to see.

We have already seen it. We have seen the democratic election of Senator Stan Waters in Alberta. As other vacancies have occurred, we have called on the Prime Minister to allow that province to designate who it would like him to appoint by allowing it to hold a democratic election, as Alberta did, instead of appointing some Liberal hack he had some obligation to look after for one reason or another. The majority of Albertans said they wanted Stan Waters.

Why not start this now? The reason is that the Liberals would not have any place to pay off all the people they have obligations to and to put future obligations on people whom they place in the Senate.

Many senators not only could get elected but would be willing to stand for election. It would give them the credibility they may be due but have lost because most people look on the Senate simply as being loaded up with friends and people who have special ties to the party in power, whatever that party might be.

What does electing senators provide? It provides regional representation from people who do not owe their allegiance to their patron but instead can represent the people of the region they come from.

The second part of a triple E Senate is equality, the equalness of the Senate. It calls for an equal number of senators from each province. We live in a country that goes by the concept in government of representation by population, the ultimate definition of democracy which should not be changed.

There are problems with almost every system and rep by pop has its problems, particularly in a country where 90 per cent of the population lives within 50 miles of the American border in a huge geographic area. Further, a large portion of them live in the central part of the country because that is where the original development started before moving westward. There is an imbalance in the distribution and the needs of the people in the different regions.

We need in the Senate some kind of regional balance to provide control over the problems created by rep by pop. This might be a difficult concept for centralists but there is a growing number of regional concerns that the government and others do not address.

The Quebec referendum is a direct result of what happens when regional concerns are not addressed by Parliament. The number of senators has to be large. Two people represent states in the United States that have population bases as large or larger than this entire country. They do it quite happily with two people. I do not hear complaints from California, from Texas or from New York that they have the same number of senators as Rhode Island. I refute what the previous member from the Bloc Quebecois had to say.

Finally, we get to the third part, the effective part of triple E. The Senate must have sufficient powers to be able to provide a regional perspective and address regional problems created by legislation without being beholden to their patron.

A majority of the House, as was referred to by the member for Kingston and the Islands, is not necessarily a majority. A majority from the Liberal Party is the word of the Prime Minister. We have seen that with several bills already where some members in the Liberal Party had the audacity to vote according to the direction of their constituents and were thrown out of their committees for it. That is not a majority. It is not democracy. That is autocratic rule. That is what a Senate has to be able to overcome. A triple E Senate gives them the tools and the power to do that.

This creates a dilemma for members of the Liberal Party. I can understand that because they would lose this tremendous source of patronage appointments, a place to shove their friends and other people to whom they have obligations.

There was a vacancy for the chair on the board of referees in my riding. I heard through very good sources that the former assistant campaign manager of the Liberal candidate was being appointed to that position. In fact, he came to us and told us not to bother putting any names forward because he was getting it.

I raised the matter in the House and eventually it became a big issue. I certainly was talking about patronage. The individual was interviewed by the Vancouver Sun and was asked whether it was a patronage appointment. When asked how he would respond to that, he said: "What is wrong with patronage? How else are we going to get anyone to join our party?" How else indeed.

I am not suggesting that all senators are not good. There are some good people in the Senate, but that is more from good luck than good management. I am simply pointing out that the Senate does not do the job most Canadians need and want it to do. There is an opportunity for us to start now with the triple E part by having elected people going to the Senate.

Let us start with an idea that does not need any constitutional change and then branch out from there. Before we know it, the place may even become fully democratic.

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the private member's motion before us proposes changes to the powers of the Senate, the method of selecting senators and the number of senators by which the provinces are entitled to be represented in the Senate.

Clearly what needs to be understood here is that the third party is asking that there be constitutional change. If there is one thing which is absolutely clear, it is that Canadians have said they do not want constitutional change now. They want to focus on priorities. They do not want us to focus on constitutional change. They clearly expect, and rightfully so, for us to focus on their priorities which are jobs and economic growth.

The hon. member talks about regional problems, regional priorities and regional concerns. One thing we can be positive about is that all Canadians no matter where they live in Canada are concerned with jobs and economic growth. It is time to focus on exactly those.

The thing I find so difficult about this type of motion is that members of the third party had an opportunity to support exactly what this motion is asking for in the Charlottetown accord but they chose not to. They had their opportunity but instead chose political opportunism ahead of principle.

The Reform Party stated in Montreal on October 15 that it wanted to change federalism only through administrative agreements, not constitutional talks. Each of the 20 changes proposed by the Reform Party could be accomplished without comprehensive federal–provincial negotiations of the sort that led to the failed Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords.

What we are seeing here is an absolute flip–flop. The introduction of this motion shows once again the inconsistency of the Reform Party. It adopts policies based on which direction the wind is blowing at the time. Certainly the member must realize that her motion would require constitutional amendments. I ask: What will it be, constitutional amendments or Reform Party administrative agreements? The Reform Party must make up its mind. This is an incredibly inconsistent statement.

In conclusion, unlike the Reform Party, our government believes in working with Canadians to improve the effectiveness and responsiveness of our federal institutions. We have done many of those things already. We have taken a number of steps, for example introduced parliamentary reforms to allow MPs to better represent their constituents, overhauled the committee process to allow for greater input, and so on.

I close by saying that Burt Brown of Alberta is the strongest proponent of a triple E Senate. Everyone in Alberta recognizes that clearly. He is being really responsible. Today he is not talking about a triple E Senate. If members know Burt Brown they will know that he ploughed a giant message in his fields with the words: "It is better together".

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there is conventional wisdom among the people who sit at my right and certainly those who sit at my extreme left, no pun intended, that the best thing to do with the Senate would be to do away with it and save the people $40 million annually.

That could be done but it would be a very shortsighted move. We need a real Senate, not the old people's home that we have over there now, to protect the common people from the House of Commons or, to put it perhaps more succinctly, to protect the public from the PMO.

Every meaningful federal union on earth, save ours, has an elected upper house to protect the rights of the regions. If we look at what has happened in Canada in the last five years, we see there have been two instances where the existence of a real Senate would have permanently blocked some very unsavoury parliamentary legislation. The first instance was the infamous GST which passed because there was a Senate that could be easily manipulated by the Prime Minister.

The second one has already been alluded to by my colleague and that is Bill C–68, the people control bill. They call it the crime control bill but it is a masquerade. If we had a real Senate representing the regions that bill would be consigned to the darkest corner of hell where it belongs.

In the last 50 years there has been no greater public outcry than there has been over that specific piece of legislation. We have the spectacle of the governments of four provinces and two territories lining up together with the protesting citizenry, demanding that the particular bill be stopped. Yet, because the Prime Minister has the ability to manipulate the Senate, to stack it, nothing can be done. There will never be a real democratic system in the country that reflects the views of the regions or of individual citizens unless we have the opportunity to elect two Houses, and both Houses should have power.

This legislation will almost certainly be proclaimed into law. The only hope we have now would be to get a Reform government to repeal it.

I must confess that before I came to this place I was a bit of a Senate basher. I felt that the other place had no place. However I have attended some of the committee hearings that it holds and I must say that they compare very favourably with the ones we hold. The problem is that those committees represent an illegitimate body and therefore cannot make recommendations that have weight.

Even if we cannot get triple E, surely we should be electing our senators. I do not know how many people are aware that in the United States of America, which has triple E, there was a period of more than a century when all its senators were appointed. They were appointed by the state governors. The elected Senate in the United States devolved from an act by the Oregon legislature when it demanded that its senators in that one state be elected. It grew from there and eventually they changed the constitution of the country to accommodate the new realities.

Changes can be made. In the long term I agree with my colleague that we must have triple E. In the short term I would plead with the government to get off its high horse and start allowing the provinces to elect senators to be appointed subject to their election.

BILL C-106

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Journals of Thursday, October 19 show the vote on Bill C-106 was deferred by the chief government whip to today at 5.30 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 45. However, according to Standing Order 45(6)(a):

> A division deferred on Thursday is not held on Friday, but is instead deferred to the next sitting day, at the ordinary hour of daily adjournment.

The next sitting day is today and the ordinary hour of daily adjournment is 6.30 p.m., not 5.30 p.m.

The chief government whip cannot unilaterally defer a vote from Thursday to Friday to Monday to any other time but the ordinary hour of daily adjournment, to wit 6.30 p.m. He could do it pursuant to Standing Order 45(7) but as as you know, Mr. Speaker, he would need consent from the three whips for that.

He did not ask me so that leaves him with only one option which is unanimous consent. If it was done by unanimous consent the records would indicate that. The records show the vote was deferred pursuant to Standing Order 45.

Mr. Speaker, if you would also check Hansard and the video for that day you would find that unanimous consent was not sought. In fact the government whip was not in his seat to be in a position to ask for unanimous consent; he was in front of the Speaker's chair. As you know, Mr. Speaker, it is from there that he asks that votes be deferred according to the authority granted him under the standing order. The standing orders in this case do not give him the authority to defer a vote from Thursday to 5.30 p.m. today.

It may not even be necessary for you to rule, Mr. Speaker. The problem can be solved if the House gives its consent to have the vote at 5.30 p.m., which consent I and the Reform Party are prepared to give.

My concern is not really with the time of the vote. The point is we should be careful about following the rules. Our distinguished table officer, Stanley Knowles, once said that the opposition has only the rules for its protection, hence the authorities on parliamentary procedure emphasize the great importance to the opposition of the only protection it has, the protection of the rules.

I note that he is not objecting to the fact that the vote is scheduled for 5.30 p.m. this afternoon. I submit that the decision which the Speaker made at the time of the request last week was correct.

I refer the hon. member to Standing Order 45(5)(a)(ii):

> During the sounding of the bells, either the Chief Government Whip or the Chief Opposition Whip may ask the Speaker to defer the division. The Speaker then defers it to a specific time, which must be no later than the ordinary hour of daily adjournment on the next sitting day that is not a Friday. At that time, the bells sound for not more than fifteen minutes.

When the request was made on Thursday it was deferred in accordance with this standing order to the next sitting day that was not a Friday, which was Monday, at a time not later than the ordinary hour of daily adjournment. In other words, the chief government whip, who I believe made the request last Thursday, made it in accordance with Standing Order 45(5)(a)(ii) in requesting that it be deferred until Monday at 5.30 p.m. I believe he had that right under that standing order.

I know that Standing Order 45(6)(a) deals with Friday divisions. It was intended as a rule to deal with divisions which might otherwise take place on Fridays, in saying that it went to the ordinary hour of daily adjournment on Monday. In respect of Thursday votes, that was intended as an explanation. However, the rule which allows the time to be fixed was set in Standing Order 45(5), not in Standing Order 45(6).

No doubt the hon. member makes a very neat point. However he has missed the other part of the rule, which in my submission applies in this case. That is the rule to allow the chief government whip or the chief opposition whip to set a time earlier than the ordinary hour of daily adjournment on any day when a vote is deferred.

It would be incongruous if the rule relating to Thursday divisions was different from that relating to divisions deferred on any other day. If, for example, a division is demanded today, the chief government whip or the chief opposition whip may defer the division to any time tomorrow not later than the ordinary hour of daily adjournment. It would be incongruous if the rule were interpreted, as the hon. member has suggested, that where a division is demanded on a Thursday it must go to 6.30 p.m. on Monday and not to any intermediate time. It cannot go to Friday. That much the rule is clear on.

I submit that Standing Order 45(5) allows for discretion in asking for a vote any time during the day on Monday, assuming that Monday is the next sitting day, no later than the ordinary hour of daily adjournment. That is the purpose of the rule, in accordance with the interpretation which has been placed on it over many years. The decision which was made last Thursday to defer the vote until 5.30 p.m. today by the Chair on request was absolutely correct.

Mr. Ringma: Mr. Speaker, for today, as I have said, we are quite happy to accept 5.30 p.m. as the time for the vote. I submit it is your prerogative to examine the case put forward today versus that of the government benches to see what the technicality is.

The Speaker: I thank both members for their intervention on this matter. I have re-read the rules. What I would like to do at this point with your consent is have a brief look at the tapes and to revisit Hansard. I will rule formally later this day.

REGIONAL RATES OF PAY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider abolishing the Regional Rates of Pay, now in force for certain federal government employees, in accordance with its stated policy of pay equity.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a good way to start off on a Monday morning, dealing with an issue that is not just temporal or philosophical. This is an issue that fundamentally affects far too many public servants right across our country.

I do not know if it is luck or what it is, but this is the third time in two Parliaments I have been lucky enough to have my motion drawn for debate. The first time was in the second session of the last Parliament, in June 1990 and again in the third session in September 1991 a similar motion was also drawn for debate.

It is an issue that is near and dear to my heart. It is an issue that has affected, over the years, tens of thousands of federal employees. And it is an issue, once again, that I believe should be brought to the attention of the people who are elected to represent these public servants. As members of Parliament we are supposed to be affirming in the House the equality of employees, the equality of individuals, the equality of opportunity and the equity of people's labour.

I will talk a little about the regional rates of pay so that people understand exactly what they are. In years gone by, the federal government through the collective bargaining process, came to an agreement with its federal public employee unions that there should be regional rates of pay.

This was done at a point in time when the economies were much different than they are today. It was done at a time when one could argue that there were vast differences in economic conditions in various parts of the country, say in Winnipeg, in Halifax, in Sydney and St. John's, Newfoundland.

As total or global packages were negotiated it was agreed that there should be regional rates of pay. It meant that employees of the federal government who did a similar or identical job would get paid at a different rate based on where they lived.

As time went on, initially the rates grew in numbers. With the development of our economy, with the genesis of the economy and the consolidation of transportation infrastructure across the country, it became increasingly apparent that to continue a discriminatory wage practice based solely on a single factor of the employee living in a certain area was clearly discriminatory.

Over the last 15 years through successive collective agreements each and every time there has been the global negotiation, the number of regional rates has collapsed.

They have gone from a high of 35 or 40 down to today where only 8 or 9 regional rates of pay are left. That is solid recognition that individuals' pay should be based on their qualifications and the job they do and not on where they live. Their fundamental wage package should not be based on where they live any more than it should be based on their language, colour, gender or culture. It is discriminatory. Today it still stands as a discriminatory practice. What does this mean? It means quite a bit to the people who are affected by these discriminatory wage rates.

During the 1988 federal campaign one of the big issues in the Halifax—Dartmouth area was dealing with the general trades and labour group at the ship repair unit in Halifax. Its members were in a legal strike position. Treasury Board and the Tory government of the day in their haste to go to the electorate forgot to designate them as essential employees. Therefore for the first time ever the potential was that those employees might be in a strike position.

One major stumbling block for those unionized workers in the negotiations going into the campaign was the regional rate of pay. They were doing the same job at the ship repair unit in Halifax as was being done in British Columbia. They had the same job classifications, the same jobs and were working on the same classes of ships, but in some cases the wage differential was as high as 28 per cent.

The regional rate of pay was made an issue in the campaign, that it was a discriminatory practice. They were not seeking a commitment from the government of the day to collapse it all at once. They wanted a commitment that it would be recognized over the next one or two collective agreements that the rate should be collapsed.

In 1989 a ships crews strike tied up the St. Lawrence Seaway. The government was not concerned until there was a freeze–up and the possibility that commerce going up the St. Lawrence Seaway would stop. At that time the ships crews strike caused legislation to come before this place to break the strike and put them back to work.

What was the issue that caused that ships crews strike? It was the wage differential between the two regional rates. There was a west coast rate and an east coast rate and the dividing line went right down the middle from the Arctic Ocean. Conceivably, if a ship was in trouble in the Arctic it could be responded to by ships crews from either the east coast or the west coast. If they both got to the troubled ship at the same time, there was as much as a 20 per cent or 25 per cent wage differential. They were doing the same jobs on the same ships on the same high seas, sometimes in 15–metre swells. They were going out to save lives and there were two different wage rates which were based on where they lived.

How much money did they get? This whole strike was caused because the ships crews from the east coast region were making between $19,000 and $21,000 a year. They wanted their pay package to go up to what it was on the west coast, about $22,000 to $23,000 a year. That was what caused the strike.

When it went to binding arbitration after the legislation passed the House, the first thing that happened with the tripartite panel was that it collapsed the regional rate of pay. It saw it as discriminatory. The panel then went on to other non–monetary issues. The history with the last three or four cases that went to binding arbitration where the regional rate was an issue is that it was immediately seen as discriminatory and was collapsed.

The east coast ships crews after they saw what happened at the tribunals told me: "The next time we are not going to bargain in good faith. We will just tie it up and hope it goes to binding arbitration because the binding arbitration process will find the rates discriminatory and will collapse them".

There is a principle here which we should listen to carefully. It is the principle of equal pay for work of equal value. That is it, straight, clean and simple. Some will argue that if you live in Halifax you should get paid less than if you live in Winnipeg. If that is the case, why are 91 per cent of federal employees in Canada paid under national rates of pay? That means that while the ships crews or the ship repair unit charge hand in Halifax get paid up to 28 per cent less than their west coast counterparts, other employees of the federal government are working in the same area and are getting identical rates of pay as their counterparts who are doing identical jobs in Toronto, Sudbury, North Bay, Victoria, Vancouver and St. John's.

It does not make sense. It cannot be argued that a regional rate of pay has to be maintained so that it does not disrupt the local private labour market when at the same time 91 per cent of the employees are on national rates of pay. It simply does not make sense and is discriminatory.

The government of the day of which I am a member will say that we are in a period of restraint. I understand that. Collective bargaining was suspended in the 1994 budget. That was not something I supported then and it is not something I support today. It is wrong. I support the collective bargaining process. I said it when that legislation came forward in the House and I will say it again today.

The government indicated that once it got beyond its $900 million or $1 billion in savings which it was trying to accommodate by the wage freeze and the suspension of collective bargaining, any further savings would be reallocated back into the pay packet. It would perhaps talk about the increments but certainly it would look at some of the pay equity issues.

I implore the government today to see this not as one of those issues that affects just a few people. This is an issue of pay equity. Just as the government has committed itself at the earliest opportunity to address those inequities in pay equity as it is traditionally defined, I ask the government today to also extend that definition to regional rates of pay.

What does it mean? The best numbers I have are from September 1994 and they have changed. In September 1994 there were 211,823 employees on the federal public service payroll. There were nine groups that were still under regional rates of pay which amounted to 23,233 people. That means 9 per cent of the Public Service of Canada is being discriminated against based on no other factor than where they live.

Should we tell the charge hand down in Halifax who is being paid 13.7 per cent less than the west coast charge hand that he should work only 86.3 per cent as hard as the individual on the west coast? Should the general trades and labour individual who is paid 13.2 per cent less work 13.2 per cent less hard? No. The performance evaluations they face are exactly the same no matter where they live. I submit that their pay rate should also reflect that similarity.

How much would it cost? To completely eliminate regional rates of pay in one round of negotiations would cost the government less than 1 per cent of its total pay envelope. It would cost less than 1 per cent to stop discriminating against 9 per cent of its federal employees.

As the government moves toward a time when it can reinstate collective bargaining, when it can start treating public servants with the type of respect they deserve, one of the number one priorities is pay equity. One of the number one priorities within pay equity is addressing the discriminatory practices of regional rates of pay.

Looking around the Chamber there are members from all over the country. There are members from the west coast, from the great province of Quebec, from New Brunswick, from Saskatchewan, from Ontario. There are members from every province and territory in this place. All of us are paid the same based on the job we do for the people of Canada, not based on the place we represent.

I close by urging members of the House to agree with the motion before us. Tell the government it is imperative that the horrendous discriminatory practice of regional rates of pay must go and must go quickly.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the member for Dartmouth's comments. While I understand his motives I certainly disagree with some of the arguments he raised.

In looking at the different regions in Canada, very quickly it is found that there are substantial differences in the cost of living for people in various regions. For example, in Vancouver the cost to acquire and maintain a house is much higher than in rural British Columbia or rural Saskatchewan. Looking at the cost of living from region to region, some people may do very well on $35,000 or $40,000 a year. However, other people are just skimping by on that kind of wage simply because so much of their earnings are going into their cost of living, particularly their housing.

One size fits all does not and cannot work for a country the size of Canada. This is a huge nation geographically with hundreds of thousands of square miles of land. There are different realities in all parts of Canada. We cannot impose a one size fits all standard on a nation this size. That is why the collective bargaining process has recognized this disparity in the cost of living and why we have the differences in pay rates. I would argue it is not a discriminatory practice, but rather a recognition of the reality of the cost of living in Canada by region.

If we are to impose this kind of a one size fits all standard and do away with regional differences in pay, the people who are currently paid less to reflect the reality of their lower cost of living are going to benefit greatly. However, the people who are to be the losers are the ones at the top end of the scale right now who require their income to maintain their households and their cost of living.

The member and the government have said that they want to run the government like a business. We agree with that. We think governments should be run like a business. I come from a business background and I know what it is like. In the construction company I formerly owned, people were working in different parts of British Columbia. The pay scales differed to reflect the reality of where they worked. For example, people were working in camps far away from home in areas that were remote and expensive to live in. Their pay scale was altogether different from that of people who could get up in the morning in the community they resided in and go to work.

If we are to run government like a business we have to understand that the method of dealing with employees has to be reflective of that. We cannot adopt a one size fits all standard if we are to run government like a business. We have to look at it from the point of view of what makes sense.

The other major concern I have with this motion is that it could be perceived by some as the thin edge of the wedge. Is this the beginning of an imposed minimum wage right across the nation? Will we have a minimum wage level established based on the most prosperous regions where the cost of living is highest and then have that imposed on the entire nation? There is real concern that may be the direction we will be going in if we adopt this kind of philosophy and attitude.

With the greatest of respect to the member, I think I understand his motivation, but I certainly disagree with his arguments. For that reason we on this side of the House, certainly myself, will not be supporting this motion.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, because of the strong interest from government members in supporting this motion and in supporting our colleague from Dartmouth who has been working on this motion for many years, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour and I will be splitting our time. We will each have five minutes.

I congratulate my colleague for once again bringing this motion to the floor of the House of Commons. Whenever there is a motion in the House which deals with national standards, I always try to stand and speak in favour of the motion.

• (1130)

I am a passionate believer that Canada needs more, not less, regulation, programs and activities wherein the national standards of the country will be promoted and upheld. I happen to believe national standards represent the galvanizing feature or the glue that holds the country together.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): More regulation, more government.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): With respect to the member for Skeena, I did not say more regulation. I said regulations that have national standards.

I come from industry as well and I have always favoured less red tape, much more efficiency in government and less duplication. However I believe the national government has a role to play in the country. I for one am totally frustrated. I do not feel comfortable with the offloading and dismantling program we are going through.

The member has put forward a very good bill. Its impact on the treasury of Canada will be minimal versus the positive output from it.

I say to the member for Skeena that I do not ever remember any member of Parliament on the government side saying that government should be run like a business. Government cannot be run like a business. If we are talking about efficiencies, absolutely, but I come from business and the difference between government and business is that business is only interested in earnings per share per quarter. It is only interested in profit. That is not the government's bottom line. Our bottom line, rather than the business bottom line, is people. We are interested in people. Business is only interested in profit as a bottom line. That is a big difference.

It is nothing personal with the member for Skeena. It is an ideological view I have. Governments, and I cite my own province right now, are becoming so lean in their attitude that the people factor is really being hurt. We are here as members of Parliament not to look out for the advantaged. We are here to look out for the disadvantaged. I get a sense that governments are becoming so businesslike that we are almost becoming mean as governments.

Mr. Harper (Simcoe Centre): No.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): The member whom I have immense respect for from Orillia says no. I am concerned about this matter. We should be skating with our heads up.

I am happy to stand in the House to support the bill. I campaigned in my first election in Broadview—Greenwood for a strong national government. I believe the best way to help disadvantaged regions and people who are disadvantaged is to make sure the national government is strong enough to ensure that those regions receive the same treatment as downtown Toronto, whether it be in education, hospital care, service to the public or whatever.

I am happy to continue that thought process here. I salute my colleague from Dartmouth for making sure the government holds true to its red book commitment to be the government that rebuilds national standards in the country. What better area than to start with the Public Service of Canada which used to be recognized as the best public service in the world. The way we have been battering it around lately, it needs confidence and support to once again become the greatest public service in the world.

I salute my colleague from Dartmouth for putting us back on the right path.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette, on a point of order.

Mr. Laurin: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much time is left. Normally speeches are 10 minutes long. When they are 20 minutes long, there are 10 minutes for questions and comments. And I think the 10 minutes must be nearly up. It would be difficult to allow an extra 5 minutes, as the member across the way announced earlier.

I think that when 10 minutes are used up, by one party or the other, it is a total of 10 minutes.

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: On the question about dividing the 10–minute time period in private members' hour into two 5–minute blocks, Standing Order 43 refers to government business and giving notice to the Chair through the whip and so on.

Given that we have only six people who wish to speak it would be better if the hon. parliamentary secretary would finish his 10 minutes. Then we will move across the floor and back to his colleague.

[Translation]

Mr. Laurin: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette, again on a point of order.

Mr. Laurin: Mr. Speaker, I beg your pardon, but you have just told the parliamentary secretary that he might finish his 10 minutes. He is not entitled to 10 minutes, because the Reform Party has already used up a certain number of minutes. All that he can use is what remains after the remarks by the Reform Party member.

Otherwise, provided a member announced his intentions in advance, he could book in advance all of the time reserved for a party by indicating that the 10 minute period would be shared with a colleague, if he were the first speaker.

I believe that you should acknowledge everyone in turn, without going beyond 10 minutes.

The Deputy Speaker: The parliamentary secretary has 3 or 4 minutes more, if he wishes to use them.

[English]

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, today being Monday we are heading into the final week of the referendum. It is nice to hear a positive spirit coming from the Bloc. Hopefully it is a sign as we go through the final moments that Bloc Quebecois members and some of their constituents are starting to realize that being a part of this great Chamber, being a part of Canada, is a much more exciting challenge and a much more worthwhile one than separating and going on their own.

Once again, my commitment is to national standards, which is essentially what the bill is all about. We are reinventing ourselves as a government and a country. We have to look at every opportunity presented to us to keep the country working. Often it is public service motivated because the Public Service of Canada touches every aspect of the economic life of the country. A vibrant, forward looking, well motivated public service plays an essential role in ensuring the economy and the policies related to the economy of the country are the right ones.

The bill respects the contribution the Public Service of Canada makes, so let us all get behind it.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by thanking the hon. member opposite for acknowledging my positive spirit. He is extremely perspicacious, and I would remind him that yes is the response associated with positivism.

I have listened with a great deal of attention and interest to what my colleague from Dartmouth has had to say. Let me congratulate him as well on his sincere concern with this problem. I feel that efforts must be made to ensure wage equity in all areas. It is a desirable thing for there to be wage equity, no discrimination according to gender, skin colour, race, religion, or geographical location.

Because, regardless of where a job is done, I am thinking for instance of a plumber who fixes a sink, whether in Trois-Rivières or James Bay, obviously it is the same job. Where this causes certain problems, and I think that certain differentiations need to be made, the issue cannot be decided as simply as that. Serious problems crop up in trying to attain this principle of equality.

Of course, one could say: equal pay for equal work. But there are often differing incidental expenses in performing that work which need to be taken into consideration.

The hon. member himself just now said that all members of this House are paid the same because that is normal, we all do the same work. I am sure that a member from British Columbia is just as good at his job as a member from Quebec, and vice versa. Except that the member from British Columbia who comes to do his job here in the House is given points for travel time, just as I, as a Quebec member, am given points when I come to do my job in the House, but the value of these points is not the same.

We have the same salary, but when the member leaves Vancouver to do his job here in the House, his plane ticket costs a lot more than the mileage I would be allowed to come and do my job in the House. If the member had to pay this out of his own salary, he would be at a disadvantage. Today, he has the same salary, because someone else pays for incidentals and costs directly related to his job in Ottawa.

The same applies to a plumber. Suppose a company is doing work at James Bay. If the company wants to attract qualified employees to James Bay to do certain jobs, such as electricians or plumbers, the individual who agrees to go to work in a remote area where his expenses will be higher will insist that by the end of the week he should have about the same net salary as his counterpart in Montreal. The hon. member did not mention this in his speech.

I refer to remote areas, but we could also talk about isolated areas. When someone is asked to go to work in a location that is not easily reached except by plane, for instance, this individual will spend more to get to his job, in addition to suffering the inconvenience of isolation.

Working in an isolated area is worse than working in a remote area, and there should be some compensation. If the hon. member means equal pay for equal work, fine, but members will have to suggest ways to compensate for additional expenses. Perhaps we could call it a remote area or isolated area allowance, or even an occupational hazard allowance, depending on the area.

Take a firefighter, for instance. Someone who works as a firefighter in a small community of 15,000, 17,000 or 20,000 does not run the same risks on the job as a firefighter who works in a big city like Montreal or Toronto. The risks are not the same. The buildings are higher, and exposure to chemical products may be more frequent. The working conditions are quite different.

If these differences are not reflected in the salary, it will be necessary to find a way to acknowledge them by providing an allowance. If an allowance is used, we still have the same problem, which is how to determine the amount of the allowance.

The union has argued that it is not easy to judge to what extent one job location warrants a higher salary than another location, because the work is the same. If there is a problem with salaries, determining the allowance will also be a problem.

The hon. member for Dartmouth has remained silent about these issues. I am aware of union demands that everyone should be equal, but when they talk about making everyone equal, they mean raising the lowest salaries to the highest level in a given occupation. So that the hourly rate proposed for a plumber living in a small village of three or four thousand inhabitants where the cost of living is not particularly high is the same as a plumber working on a construction site in Montreal.

Obviously, no plumber is going to turn his nose up at a salary increase in such a region, without its being either remote or isolated. But these have to be taken into account.

Getting back to the remote regions, a person has to pay more to get to work and, then, on top of that he has to pay more for everything he buys in order to live in this remote place, all of which comes out of his salary. A pound of butter in James Bay does not cost the same as in Montreal, because it has to be transported by air.

So, if I pay employees the same salary for their work, the one living in James Bay will not have enough salary to live on there. It does not cost the same to build a house in James Bay or to live there or in Manicouagan as it does in Montreal or Toronto. I am in favour of equalizing by taking the best salary being paid in each place in society, but we do not want to end up with other inequities that would be just as unfair.

We have to be careful in this matter before we legislate, because we also have to allow the business, the employer, to find labour, which at times can be hard to find. I myself was in education. I was an administrator in education. Most teachers from Montreal or from my riding of Joliette, a beautiful riding in the province, asked to go to teach in Port Cartier, a very remote region, would not voluntarily go and work there for equal salary. As the region of Port Cartier would not have been sufficiently self sufficient to develop its own teachers, it would have had to go without competent people to teach there.

The same thing would have happened in James Bay, Manicouagan and in other areas in other provinces. I am thinking of remote areas, in the woods, for example, areas hard to reach. Sometimes competent workers would not be hired, in order to be able to provide everyone with the public services to which they are entitled. This has been discussed with respect to certain trades but health care could have been chosen just as easily as my example of education.

When people are entitled to equal services, their wages must enable them to pay for these equal services to which they are entitled, in all fairness and independent again of their gender, age, skin colour, religion and so on. These are the sorts of things I would like to see addressed by the hon. member for Dartmouth, who seems to have a well intentioned bill here, but one that does not seem to be detailed enough to ensure it would improve the situation instead of creating other areas of inconsistency or other labour relations problems.

I would also like to see these matters discussed between employers and employees, and I think that good personnel administration means that, when disputes of this type crop up, they are discussed together, negotiated, in preference—by far—to letting the courts decide, as has been said.

I am totally in agreement with the unions on this approach when there is a problem, instead of letting grievances develop and going before the courts to have the issue decided, which takes time and runs into thousands of dollars in costs as well. What is preferable is to allow employers and employees to discuss the true nature of the problem and to look together at where solutions lie.

This motion will not be voted upon at this time, but it does show good intentions, and I hope the government will show an interest in it. I hope also, however, that the motion will be able to be translated into a bill which will do more justice to workers, to employers as well, and to the regions. Care must be taken to ensure that the regions do not end up in a situation where they will be unable to have the services necessary for a quality of life and an environment to which they are as entitled as everyone else.

I hope therefore that the hon. member for Dartmouth will seek the assistance of his colleagues in addition to his own opinions on this, and I am anxious to hear their input.

• (1150)

[English]

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to support the motion put forward by my colleague from Dartmouth this morning. As we approach the second anniversary of the election that brought us here, I have come to appreciate the many opportunities available to members in terms of how items are put on the agenda and I realize just how talented the member for Dartmouth is in bringing these items to the attention of the nation. I bring to the attention of the House the credit he deserves on not only this one but on other issues.

Before speaking to what I believe to be the merits of the motion I will address some of the concerns that were raised by colleagues who spoke previously.

In response to the Reform member for Skeena, I think the first argument he made against the motion was on the grounds that we really had to recognize the differences in the cost of living in various places in Canada in terms of remuneration public servants receive. I challenge that on a couple of grounds. The country, the courts, and public sympathy are headed in the other direction. So even in the context of being responsive to the will of the nation, we are heading in another direction.

More appropriate to the political affiliation of the member who made the suggestion, I wonder about the cost of bureaucracy in trying to determine pay packages on the basis of regional costs of living. I believe there would have to be a new department of the cost of living. I cannot see that being consistent with decreasing the cost of governance in Canada. Quite the contrary. That would be a pretty expensive proposition and one I think the member should reconsider in the face of his own party's positions on those issues.

The second issue raised by the member for Skeena and repeated by the member for Joliette had to do with isolation pay and the need to recognize cost of living. I had the good fortune of visiting Iqaluit last fall with the social security review group, and I was shocked at the price of a banana in that community. I reassure both the member for Joliette and the member for Skeena that isolation pay and bonuses related to isolation would not be affected by the intentions of this motion. This would all be a part of job classifications and pay related to job classification and not related to isolation. Hopefully some of their concerns would be reassured by that.

The member for Skeena mentioned that he was fearful that this was the thin edge of the wedge. I agree with the member, but I think we are heading in the other direction. I would turn that metaphor on its head and say quite appropriately that we are heading to the narrow point of the triangle, not to the wide edge of the triangle, and it is just a matter of time.

It should not be surprising that I have fewer exceptions to take with the member for Broadview—Greenwood in terms of his comments, other than whether or not the nation requires national standards, the nation requires national values. Questions of fairness in remuneration speak to the need for a national value in Canada. That value is fairness, which the government has to acknowledge and respect. I say that because this discussion follows the recent debate on Bill C–64 on pay equity. It strikes me that the values behind this motion and that bill are the same. How can the government that supports the notion of pay equity based on questions of gender or minorities continue to support the notion of regional disparities in terms of how much public servants are paid depending on geography?

The other important consideration is the inevitability of this happening anyway. I suppose this would appeal to members represented by the member for Skeena and the Reform Party in terms of the savings involved in doing this as an act of will rather than being forced to do it through the courts with all the costs associated to have these decisions forced upon us through the legal system. It is very important for us to recognize the need to do what ultimately will happen anyway without having to be told to do it.

By way of history, the previous government reacted to the strike in 1989 in Halifax and Dartmouth by enacting back to work legislation contained in Bill C–49. At that time as part of that back to work legislation a conciliation board was established that concluded that regional rate policies would not be maintained much longer. That conciliation board labelled the policy discriminatory and ordered a new collective agreement to bring east coast and west coast workers into parity.

We have already been told by a process the previous government put in place to deal with this inequity. It is long overdue that we do that. It is an important opportunity for this government to meet the commitments that were made to act in a fashion that is consistent with what we said in opposition. At that time many members said these were discriminatory practices.

As I said before, this government is promoting equity in terms of pay regardless of gender and ethnic background. It would only be fair to eliminate discrimination based on geography as well.

I will speak for a moment on the question of where this regional pay package idea came from. I do not know for certain but I assume there are a couple of historical factors that come into play here. My sense is that at the time these pay regimes were affected jobs were probably less well defined. Consequently what one did in terms of a job classification in one part of Canada was probably quite different from what one did as a part of a job classification in another part of Canada.

In the course of collective bargaining over the years job descriptions and categories have become much tighter. The level of degree that was contained in the practice and exercise of some of these jobs has probably diminished significantly. The argument that might have been in place at one time no longer exists. I also think that at the time these regional pay packages were put in place there was a lot less mobility of labour. We are obviously moving across the country today with a good deal more frequency and efficiency than we did some time ago.

The most important reason to support the motion by the member for Dartmouth is it reflects Canadian values. Many Canadians have lost their faith in this fine institution and in governance in general because they see things that they think should be fixed and which do not get fixed as quickly or as efficiently as they perhaps should. This is one of those things.

People look at this and say if you are doing the same job it seems only fair that you should be paid the same, wherever you do it in Canada. We have to respond to those common sense arguments to win back the trust and confidence of those Canadians who watch every day as we make decisions.

There was a point made that perhaps in the low wage areas a higher pay scale that would reflect the national number would have the effect of making it difficult for the local communities to compete with the public service in terms of pay packages. If 100 per cent of the employees of the public service were affected then an argument might be made for that, although I would not accept it. However, given the fact that it is only 9 per cent of the public service left, it does not strike me that they should be the people who bear the brunt of that argument.

I encourage my colleagues to support the motion put forward by the hon. member for Dartmouth. It is important to recognize that federal government employees are competent, efficient, hard working and deserving of the same compensation regardless of where they live.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Dartmouth that in the opinion of the House the government should consider abolishing regional rates of pay. It is an important issue for the hon. member and I am glad to see it being debated in the Chamber.

As hon. members may or may not be aware, regional rates of pay have been in place in the public service since the 1950s. Under this system federal public servants performing the same jobs, with the same qualifications and the same experience, are paid different wages depending on where they live. This is clearly discriminatory.

The federal government is committed to pay equity which quite simply means equal pay for work of equal value. We rightly condemn wage discrimination based on gender, race or religion. I believe discrimination based on geography is also wrong.

In the public service we have people who are working for the same employer. Yet as of September 1994 over 23,000 federal employees were being paid lower wages than others doing the same work. In some cases the discrepancy is 25 per cent. There are two people doing the same job, with the same qualifications and seniority, but one earns 25 per cent less simply because of where he or she lives.

I will give the House an example of how different that is in the public sector from what it would be in the private sector. I come from a railway background. In the railway industry there are unions. Some are conductors, some are engineers and some are in maintenance. We negotiate a collective agreement on a year to year basis. No matter where a conductor, an engineer or a maintenance person working for CP Rail lives, they get the same pay based on a collective agreement. Quite frankly that is the way collective agreements have always been negotiated.

I do not think it takes a leap of logic or great faith to understand that we cannot go on doing this in the public sector. Over the years the number of classifications affected by regional rates of pay have been dropping steadily. We have been moving however slowly in the right direction. Now the question is when we will take the final steps to rectify a situation that should have been rectified many years ago.

Some members will be concerned about the cost of ending regional rates of pay. I agree that this is an important consideration. Treasury Board estimates the cost of removing regional rates at around $87 million per year. This would represent a 1 per cent increase in our total outlay for public service wages. While it may be difficult to argue for such an increase while we are cutting back in everything, at some point it will not be a discretionary expenditure.

Members of the Chamber often wonder why there are regional rates of pay. The reason for them is that the argument can be made that people should be paid less based on where they live instead of being paid the same amount. Everyone seems to think we are asking for people to be paid less when we are asking for people to be paid a reasonable rate of pay at the same level as someone else living in Montreal, Toronto, Sioux Lookout or Dartmouth.

I was in the House with the hon. member for Dartmouth when east coast ships crews went on strike in 1989 over discriminatory rates of pay. I recall the hon. member seizing the issue and holding the government of the day accountable. I remember Bill C–49, the back to work legislation, that was brought forward in this case. It established a conciliation board under the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

If members look at the report issued by the board they will see that it is quite enlightening. It clearly states that regional rates of pay are discriminatory. It orders the government to eliminate regional rates of pay in that classification.

We face another such situation. Logic and precedence state that the government will be forced to act. We will be forced to do the right thing. What would it say about this institution if we waited for another conciliation board report to tell us to act when we already know we have to act.

The member has put the issue before the House in very succinct terms. Either we do it as a collective in the House of Commons because it is the right thing to do, or we will have an outside body do it for us because it is discriminatory.

As I mentioned before, in the private sector everybody in large unions gets the same rate of pay. In the House of Commons it could be argued that there is a bit of difference depending on where people live and their costs of living. The argument in northern Ontario is that the cost of food is higher and the cost of gas is higher. The cost of housing is much lower in Kenora—Rainy River than it is in Halifax, than it is in Toronto, than it is in Vancouver. It balances itself out in most cases.

The motion put by the member is a very good one and should be supported by the government and all members opposite to give people work and pay based on their abilities, their seniority and their classifications, not on where they live.

The Deputy Speaker: The time set for this debate expires at 12.10 p.m. Shall we call it 12.10 at this time?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: The time allocated for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TREATY COMMISSION ACT

The House resumed from October 20 consideration of the motion that Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the debate on Bill C–107 to raise a couple of objections with regard to the way the bill has been presented to the House.

What we have here is enabling legislation that sets up the British Columbia Treaty Commission. At this point as we are debating this position in the House we have a British Columbia Treaty Commission. On the commission are certain representatives of the federal government who are making statements on behalf of the federal government. Yet there is no legal authority for them to do so.

My purpose this morning is not to debate the particular details of the bill but to draw to the attention of the people of Canada—and those listening to us this morning will recognize it—that the bill is based on a recommendation of the Governor General of Canada who recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue under the circumstances and the manner and for the purposes set out in a measure entitled an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission. Then the summary of the bill reads:

> This enactment, together with an act of the Legislature of British Columbia and a resolution of the First Nations Summit, establishes the British Columbia Treaty Commission. That commission will facilitate in British Columbia the negotiation of treaties among first nations, Canada and British Columbia.

That is a major undertaking, a very serious and a very necessary issue that needs to be dealt with. I make it abundantly clear to everyone in the House this morning that my purpose in rising to speak against the bill is not the business of negotiating land claims and treaty settlements in British Columbia. That is not my purpose.

My purpose in rising concerns the issue of people going around the country without the legitimate authority of an act passed by Parliament. We should have settled the treaty business a long time ago.

Now the British Columbia legislature has passed legislation. The summit comprised of bands and various tribes among the aboriginal peoples has established a resolution that appoints certain people legitimately. However the House has gone beyond letting people go out there and do something without the legislative authority to do so.

This process disenfranchises the representatives of the House, of the people of Canada. It is wrong in principle and I object to it. I am not alone in that objection. Sitting on either side of me this morning are representatives of the constituency to the south, Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, and the constituency to the north, Okanagan—Shuswap. They too find it objectionable that the House should engage in the process of doing business in this manner.

The purpose of the act so clearly stated is to establish the British Columbia Treaty Commission as undertaken in the agreement. The agreement refers to the agreement reached by the summit, the province of British Columbia and Canada.

What does it do in terms of establishing the commission? Established by the joint operation of this act, an act of the legislature of British Columbia and a resolution of the summit, is the British Columbia Treaty Commission consisting of a chief commissioner and not more than four other commissioners.

There was nothing until now. Yet they are travelling around the province of British Columbia setting up meetings. There was a meeting in my constituency last week. They are acting as if they were representing and negotiating on behalf of the Government of Canada. According to this act they could not commit the government to anything.

An hon. member: Were there discussions?

Mr. Schmidt: Indeed there were discussions. Of course there are discussions and negotiations. What else would we expect? We need discussions to negotiate. What kind of comment was that? Is that the way the government runs things, with arrogance and presumption? That is not right.

An hon. member: Yes.

Mr. Schmidt: Yes, arrogance and presumption is exactly what it is up to.

I want to look at the purposes and powers of the commission in rather significant detail. The purpose of the commission is to facilitate in British Columbia the negotiation of treaties among one or more First Nations, Her Majesty in right of Canada and Her Majesty in right of British Columbia. The Westbank Indian band is already in step three of the process, yet the legislation has not yet been passed in the House.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): We are trying to be efficient.

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests this is efficiency. Is it efficient to do things with two people who have elected representatives to represent them and make the legislative proposals that ought to exist there? If that is the argument, what is the point of electing people? What is the point of having a Parliament? What is the point of having laws if one person can decide what happens and the person happens to be the person who runs the privy council?

Apparently the commissioners are running around the province representing Canada as a result of an order in council passed by the federal cabinet. That is how they run the country. It is not a democratic process and I object very strenuously to it.

It goes beyond that. I want to go into the details and responsibilities of the commission. What is it supposed to do? It is supposed to do at least four things that I will draw to the attention of the House. It is to assess readiness in accordance with the agreement of Her Majesty in right of Canada and in right of British Columbia and one or more First Nations to begin negotiations. The commission is to assess whether or not a particular band or tribe is ready to start negotiations. That is its responsibility and it is a major responsibility. We should all have had input into that debate before the commission members went around talking to various people.

It is to allocate funds. This is the authority that gives to the treasury the right to allocate funds. However, what has happened? It says to allocate funds that have been provided. By whom? By the finance minister to enable First Nations to participate in negotiations in accordance with the criteria agreed to by the principals. Is this not an interesting provision?

We now have these people spending money, travelling around the country, being paid and incurring expenses on behalf of the Government of Canada. They are to divide moneys among the persons who are to participate in the negotiations. In accordance with what? In accordance with criteria agreed to by the principals, which are the summit, the legislature of British Columbia and Canada.

Finally, they are to encourage timely negotiations. Are we to suggest then that this commission is not to do the negotiations? We are getting into the details of the bill, which I said I would not do and I will not.

I will simply say that I object strenuously to this method of retroactivity, this business of presenting to the House legislation after the fact. We have asked this of the people who have briefed us on this. We have asked them if this is really retroactive legislation and if they have already begun the process. The answer was yes. I object strenuously. I hope every member will make every effort to make sure this never happens again in the House.

Hon. Raymond Chan (Secretary of State (Asia–Pacific), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure today to rise to speak on behalf of legislation that will have such great economic benefits for the people of British Columbia. With this legislation we can remove an obstacle that has hampered economic growth in B.C. for too long, uncertainty over ownership of land and resources. That uncertainty has carried a very high price.

In 1990 a Price Waterhouse study asked forestry and mining interests in B.C. about the effects of the uncertainty created by unresolved land claims. The results are sobering: $1 billion in investments were not made in those two sectors alone; 300 new jobs were not created; 1,500 permanent jobs were adversely affected; $125 million annually in capital investment is lost because of the lack of legal certainty with regard to land and resources. Since the time of that study the price has continued to be paid, year in and year out.

That is the toll we pay for leaving things unclear, uncertain, undefined. That is the price for refusing to sit down with our aboriginal partners and discuss rational solutions to real problems. That is the price opponents to this process will have us continue to pay. Here we have a chance to do something concrete, to create jobs and real economic growth for Canadians.

In September Ms. Marlie Beets of the B.C. Council of Forest Industries was quoted as saying her members know they cannot afford to ignore treaty issues. There is solid support in the forestry industry to resolve this, even though the industry has concerns about what treaties might contain.

People in the forestry industry of B.C. understand what is involved. They know they cannot function efficiently without clear policies. They know aboriginal rights must be defined clearly so that everyone knows the rules of the game. They know their time has come to realize the potential of their province and to expand opportunities for the people. They want to get on with it. The proposition is simple: treaties will provide certainty and create a better climate for investment and economic growth. This is a reality that cannot be denied.

Treaties will provide a land base for aboriginal people and with it a foundation upon which to build self–sufficient communities. This will allow aboriginal people to become involved in a range of economic activities that in the absence of a land base have been foreclosed to them. Commercial activities like mining, forestry, and tourism become far more possible to be pursued by First Nations. And the growth of strong, self–reliant, economically vibrant aboriginal communities strengthens us all, because it will bring positive economic spillover into non–aboriginal communities.

For too long the aboriginal people of B.C. have been denied both their legal rights from the past and their hopes for the future. For too long they have suffered high rates of unemployment, low rates of literacy, and high rates of infant mortality and suicide. For too long we have denied ourselves the contribution they can make.

This situation cannot be defended and it must not continue. With rights and obligations clearly defined by treaties, all British Columbians, aboriginals and non–aboriginals, will be able to get on with realizing the potential of the province and expanding their opportunities for advancement.

This will be good news for the forest workers and the miners. It will mean an expanded tax base as the infusion of settlement funds stimulates economic activity and creates jobs. It will also mean lower social costs associated with the poverty and unemployment in aboriginal communities. It will mean the end of conflict and costly litigation and the beginning of co–operation and negotiation.

These historic issues will not go away. They cannot be wished away. As long as the issues remain unresolved, investment will stay away and the jobs that must be created will go elsewhere. The spiral will continue: uncertainty creating fewer opportunities and fewer opportunities creating more social problems. The cycle of poverty and dependence will continue.

These issues must be dealt with. We have a choice as to how we are going to do that. We can litigate at great expense to the Canadian taxpayer, knowing that at the end of this long, drawn out and often bitter process a court is likely to tell us to work out the details ourselves—something very similar to the negotiation process we have now—or we can negotiate directly from the outset.

Surely it makes good economic sense to avoid costly court battles, which cast each party in the role of antagonist. It makes good sense to instead approach these issues as partners, prepared to give and take in the spirit of trust and mutual respect.

Yes, there are real economic benefits in proceeding with treaties in B.C., but at the end of the day the most important benefit will not be felt in terms of dollars and cents; it will be felt in the lives of the individuals as they are given the opportunity to contribute further to the greatness of Canada.

The benefits of holding a job cannot always be measured by points on a graph. Having a job is really about hope. It means having the ability to plan for the future in order to realize your own potential and advance your family. It means having the pride of contributing to the overall health of one's community. Is it better to leave things in a state of confusion or to sit down with our aboriginal colleagues and establish certainty?

Perhaps it is expecting too much to hope that the Reform Party's vision of Canada is broad enough to include the first peoples, generous enough to expand the circle of opportunity, or far sighted enough to see the wisdom in finally completing this great unfinished business of our history. Surely it is not expecting too much to ask the Reform Party to take a hard headed look at the economics of treaty negotiations and admit that it makes real sense. Surely we can see the awful price we are paying for uncertainty. Surely even they can see the benefits of negotiating instead of litigating.

I ask that the Reform Party and all other parties in the House join us in helping to close the chapter of frustration and fear and help us to write a new one of understanding and opportunity. Let us finally complete the work our forebears began.

Mr. Elijah Harper (Churchill, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am humbled to be here in the House to speak in Parliament where the laws are made. This is the supreme lawmaking body of the country, based on the principles of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which says "based on the principles of the supremacy of God and the rule of law". We as aboriginal people, the first inhabitants of this country, have always known that.

We are now debating once again what has been debated for years and years: land. The first order of business has not been concluded with the First Nations, the first inhabitants.

The creator created all nations all over the world, created land, the trees, the environment we live in today. It so happens that he placed the aboriginal people in this country. Canada is an aboriginal word meaning community.

Our ancestors welcomed many nations that came to this land. Today many nations benefit from the rich resources of this country. As aboriginal people, we seem to be living in a third world country in our own homeland. We have always declared that the creator put us here and the creator will always honour that, no matter what governments do, how they cut it and slice this country. The country will always be aboriginal land, Canada.

Today we are talking about the B.C. Treaty Commission. Today we are also facing another crisis dealing with Quebec, another incident that would divide Canada. If it is the will of God to honour the people he placed here, the aboriginal people, the original inhabitants of this land, then Quebec cannot separate. We have put our faith in the creator to sustain us. This institution is based on that. The Canadian Constitution is based on that. As a matter of fact it is written on a piece of paper I have that in the principles of Christianity is found the liberty that has made Canada great. It is so great that in the United Nations' annual listing of the world's countries for 1994 Canada was ranked first out of 173.

Canada has benefited from the relationship with the aboriginal people. When we make treaties it has to be understood by every Canadian that we are here to co–exist, to welcome the Europeans, to live side by side with each other, to respect and honour each other and not to dominate. These treaties must also have the view and philosophy of the First Nations in this country because the creator put us here. We could not have given the land to anyone because we do not own it. We could only share the land and resources that would benefit everybody else in this country.

We did not accept the European concept of land tenure which is to have property, to see it as a commodity and to exploit and develop it for the purposes of a company or one or a few individuals. Maybe that is why opposition members are afraid of the land claims we are making. Maybe they think we may become like them. We may acquire all these things and not share them. In assessing these things we tend to assess the successes of our land claims and businesses in our communities based on European values and not in relation to some of the traditional ancient values we used to have. However, they are coming back again today.

We have to get back to the ancient roots because we are very close to the creator. The land has caused so much hurt. Look at the Oka crisis. Corporal Lemay died in that situation because the Mohawks did not want their ancestral burial grounds decimated. This summer in Ipperwash, Anthony "Dudley" George was killed as a result of land, another aboriginal burial ground.

These issues have to be resolved. They have to be dealt with. Our way of thinking and our philosophy are ones that have always been shared with other First Nations in this country, to share what we have, to share the land and resources. If we were to add up what it means in dollars and cents over the last 500 years I do not think it would even represent 1 per cent of the compensation to the aboriginal peoples. We probably would have been the wealthiest people in the world if we had been greedy and kept everything for ourselves. However, that was not our way of thinking.

That is why I am so honoured and humbled to be here, to be in this House which was created on the principles I espoused and which this place has sanctified to say all these things. All of us have to be reminded daily because we make mistakes as human beings. Personally, it has been a difficult journey for me to be involved in mainstream politics, provincially, nationally and internationally, in promoting this kind of philosophy.

The world's needs have come together because there is a global economy, a global movement which is happening, which is tearing our communities apart. It is influencing the communities in Canada. It is not just the aboriginal people, but Canadians as well. They feel helpless. They distrust governments. We have to restore trust.

I support Bill C–107. It will begin the treaty making process in British Columbia where treaties have not been made in the past, except for northeastern B.C., in the Peace River area, where Treaty No. 8 was signed years ago, as well as the treaty concerning Vancouver Island. However, most of British Columbia has never been in the treaty making process where land has been settled.

Our rights have never been extinguished. The Canadian Constitution has recognized that. There is not a requirement under the Constitution for any citizen or any nation to give up rights; rather, those rights which are recognized and affirmed in the Canadian Constitution should be expanded and defined. People are concerned about extinguishing land claims. They feel there should no longer be a requirement to extinguish land claims.

Several reports have been made to government over the past years. One was the 1985 Coolican report entitled: "Living Treaties, Lasting Agreements" which determined that extinguishing land claims were no longer an option. Today there is another report entitled: "Canada and Aboriginal Peoples: A New Partnership" authored by A.C. Hamilton. That report will be discussed in the near future. There was also the interim report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples entitled: "Treaty Making in the Spirit of Co–existence: An Alternative to Extinguishment". That report is also an alternative to extinguishing land claims.

All of those reports suggest a new approach. All of them ask that we come together, that we respect each other and that we negotiate in good faith. The rights of all individuals must be recognized. Whether they be aboriginal, government, business, or third party interests, their rights must be protected in order for us to co–exist without fear.

I have heard some hon. members say that one law should be applied. Whose law should be applied? When our cemeteries are being desecrated, will the government remove the people who are occupying them? How would they feel if our aboriginal people were to go to their cemeteries? Whose law would be applied?

We must bring this to the attention of the Canadian public. Our concept of land tenure is one of sharing the land and resources. If the Canadian people understood that, they would not be threatened by land claims. Their interests would be protected. Aboriginal rights would ensure that. Our forefathers have taught us for many years that our history is very rich.

I have called for a sacred assembly to which all members will be invited. I have invited the Prime Minister and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. A letter will also be sent to opposition members inviting them to participate in the sacred assembly which will be held hopefully sometime in December.

The sacred assembly is designed to bring together aboriginal and non–aboriginal leaders, spiritual leaders and religious leaders from all walks of life in Ottawa for the purpose of providing counsel and promoting reconciliation because of the events of this past summer.

What I believe has been missing is the spiritual element of this whole process. The political process has failed us. We need to get back to our traditional spiritual roots. The prime objective is to restore that so that the spiritual leaders, advisers and elders can provide direction not only to our aboriginal leaders but to government leaders across this country as well. This is sorely needed and the time is right for us to address these things.

With those few words, I thank you for listening. I recommend this bill to the members opposite.

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I rise to address the House on Bill C–107, the British Columbia Treaty Commission Act. I am extremely pleased to be joining my hon. colleagues in speaking in support of this legislation. It is imperative that we give the treaty commission the legal foundation and powers it needs to get on with the job of settling the dozens of land claims that are casting a cloud of uncertainty over British Columbia.

Settlement agreements acknowledge that claimant groups have some historic interest in the land which was occupied and used by their ancestors long before Europeans moved into the claim area. Equally as important, land claims settlements pave the way for a better economic future for the beneficiaries. They do so by providing a financial package to the claimant group and by ensuring a secure land base and certainty over resource ownership, all of which are critical to establishing a viable economic base.

The settlement of a land claim is not an end in itself, but a beginning. It is the beginning of a new era in which aboriginal people can regain control over their destiny, a destiny which has been taken from them. They can gain control of their economic future and reduce their dependence on government.

Hon. members have heard aboriginal leaders say time and again that self–government will be meaningless without sustainable economic development that is controlled by the aboriginal people themselves. On the other hand, the expansion of the aboriginal economy can help counteract the human and economic costs that for so many years and for so many generations have paralyzed First Nations communities across this great nation.

Economic development is critical to achieving the red book goal of strengthening aboriginal communities. Self–government, improved social services, better health care, more sensitive justice initiatives: the success of all of these efforts depends in part on strengthened local economies that provide aboriginal people with meaningful employment and reasonable levels of income.

There are many examples of the positive impact land claims settlements have had on aboriginal economies and standards of living. The Inuit of the Nunavik region are a case in point. Under the terms of the James Bay and Northern Quebec agreement, the Inuit established the Makivik Corporation which among other things serves as a holding company for a wide range of businesses that are bringing tangible economic benefits to northern Quebec every day.

I quote from the Makivik Corporation's 1994–95 annual report in which third vice–president Mark Gordon, who is responsible for the economic development program, made the following statement: "There is a common theme that unites all of our initiatives. That theme can be summarized by one word: control". Control by the Inuit people of their own future, control to do good, to enhance the lives of Inuit people.

The Inuit of Nunavik have certainly taken control of their economic future. The Makivik Corporation has used compensation funds to invest in a wide range of successful businesses that are providing employment and income to Inuit beneficiaries.

Air Inuit and First Air, for example, provide critical transportation and delivery services both within Nunavik and between the north and other parts of Canada and Greenland. Both airlines are major employers in the Nunavik region and both reported profitable years in 1994.

Makivik Corporation also owns the Kigaq Travel Agency which promotes travel in northern Quebec. Another Makivik subsidiary, Seaku Fisheries, is involved in commercial fisheries development. Among other things, Seaku manages Makivik's shrimp licence. In 1994, 43 Inuit fishermen from Nunavik were employed on shrimp fishing vessels with collective earnings of close to $700,000. The company also invested about $500,000 in 1994 in community based fishing projects.

Seaku owns 50 per cent of Unaaq Fisheries which trains fishermen and pursues fisheries business opportunities at the international level. In 1994, Unaaq International completed consulting contracts for the National Capital Commission, the United Nations Development Program, the Canadian International Development Agency and Industry Canada.

A newly created subsidiary of Makivik, Nunavik Arctic Foods, is commercializing Nunavik country foods, particularly caribou and ring seal meat. The food is harvested through traditional Inuit hunts, processed and packaged in four community processing centres and distributed throughout retail outlets throughout Nunavik. Studies have shown that during full scale operations of processing centres, 72 cents out of every dollar will remain in Nunavik.

Makivik has also entered into a joint venture with other Inuit development corporations to form a Panarctic Inuit logistics corporation. This new enterprise recently joined with Frontec Logistics Corporation to successfully bid on a $288 million contract to operate and maintain the north warning system for a five–year period ending in the year 2000. Among other things, the agreement between the two corporations provides for the recruitment, training and hiring of Inuit workers.

The Cree of James Bay region have also used their compensation dollars and other economic development funding to acquire and establish a very impressive portfolio of collectively owned businesses among other interests. The Cree holding company known as Creeco owns an airline and a construction company.

Using funds from their 1984 land claim settlement, the Inuvialuit of the western Arctic region have pursued a wide range of economic development initiatives under the umbrella of the Inuvialuit Development Corporation.

The most successful has been the Inuvialuit Petroleum Corporation which in 1994 realized an amazing 200 per cent return on the timely sale of most of its holdings in western Canada. The corporation closed the year with a $50 million investment portfolio and total assets of $117 million. The company has initiated a number of programs to provide direct benefits to Inuvialuit people, including employment training and development. It has an exciting future in the Canadian petroleum industry.

The Inuvialuit also co–own the Northern Transportation Company with another aboriginal business, the Nunasai Corporation of Nunavik. In 1994 the Northern Transportation Company was named business of the year by the Northwest Territories Chamber of Commerce. Over the 10 years that the business has been owned by aboriginal people, it has contributed more than $100 million in taxes, purchases and payrolls to the territorial economy.

Another successful Inuvialuit venture is the Umayst Corporation which markets musk–ox meat and wool. The Inuvialuit Regional Corporation has also formed an international investment house that caters specifically to native groups around the world. Based on its track record, in 1993 the Inuvialuit Regional Corporation was able to secure an $87 million loan from the Bank of Montreal, part of which was used to repay a loan from the federal government. Clearly Canada's investment and land claim settlements is a sound one.

Settlement agreements often include specific provisions for economic development that go beyond land and resource ownership and financial compensation. For example, as a result of the Nunavut final agreement, the Inuit of Canada's eastern Arctic have been guaranteed preferred access to economic opportunities in the area of guiding, sports lodges and the commercial marketing of wildlife products. The final agreement also provides for increased Inuit participation in government employment and contracting within the settlement area and includes the right to negotiate employment, training and other benefits for the developers of major projects.

Similarly, the land claim settlements of the Gwich'in and Sahtu Dene and Metis recognize the need to expand the economic horizons for aboriginal people. The Sahtu agreement provides for economic development opportunities related to guiding, lodges, naturalist activities and commercial fishing. The Sahtu Dene and Metis will also be well positioned to take advantage of employment and business opportunities that will arise in the oil and gas sector as a result of the settlement agreement.

The Council for Yukon Indians' final agreement also enhances opportunities for Indian people to participate in the territorial economy. Both the federal and territorial governments have made commitments to contract with aboriginal companies to provide Yukon Indians with access to government employment.

The combination of land claim settlement agreements and other economic development initiatives have resulted in significant expansion and strengthening of the aboriginal economy in recent years. Twenty years ago a survey of aboriginal economic development in most regions of Canada would have revealed pockets of commercial activity heavily concentrated in natural resource based industries. Today there are literally thousands of aboriginal businesses across Canada operating in all sectors of the economy.

In my province of Saskatchewan, for instance, there are over 700 aboriginal owned and operated businesses enjoying tremendous economic success, doing well in the economy of Saskatchewan and indeed all of Canada. They provide employment to aboriginal and non–aboriginal people, paying the government tax revenue and all of the good things that go with sustained economic growth.

These aboriginal enterprises include industry firms, transportation and construction companies, retail and service outlets, manufacturing operations, management consultants, computer companies, arts and crafts enterprises, tourist outfitters and recreation oriented businesses.

Aboriginal businesses are also taking advantage of opportunities in new markets, such as authentic aboriginal tourism products which involve a combination of facilities and experiences that are uniquely aboriginal, experiences which are sought by many people from many nations.

Market research by the government indicates that authentic aboriginal tourism products have the potential to generate revenues of $1.6 billion annually in the Canadian economy. Not only will this benefit the aboriginal business but all businesses and enterprises across this nation.

Aboriginal business development is gathering momentum as First Nations, Inuit and Metis peoples seek to gain control of their economic destinies. In a 1991 survey of aboriginal people, more than 18,000 respondents indicated that they own or operate a business and 34,000 others indicated their intention to start a business within two years.

Aboriginal people are proving to be astute business people. An independent study of 292 aboriginal firms that received financial assistance from Industry Canada revealed that 90 per cent of those firms were operating after two years. These businesses have proven to be good sources of employment for aboriginal and non–aboriginal Canadians alike. Of the 2,122 jobs created or maintained with support from Industry Canada, 1,486 were held by aboriginal people and 636 by non–aboriginal people.

In addition to the business ventures I mentioned earlier, which are a direct result of land claims, there are many other examples of successful aboriginal entrepreneurship.

In Saskatchewan the Meadow Lake Tribal Council, which represents nine First Nations, was the winner of the 1995 prestigious Aboriginal Economic Developer of the Year Award. The tribal council has developed an impressive economic development strategy that sets out a tremendous range of activities. Already a forestry company owned by the tribal council has generated 240 direct jobs.

In La Ronge, Saskatchewan, Kitsaki Development Corporation has business enterprises which gross over $30 million a year and provide well in excess of 250 full time jobs for aboriginal and non–aboriginal people alike.

In The Pas, Manitoba the Opaskwayak Cree Nation owns seven profitable businesses and is developing more. The latest venture is an $8 million, 70,000 square foot hotel complex that will open in 1996. Another organization of Manitoba First Nations, the Southeast Resource Development Council recently opened a plant that will manufacture windows and doors for the nine First Nations in southeastern Alberta.

Next year the first aboriginal owned hydroelectric plant in Canada will open in the Northwest Territories. The $26 million Cascades station will be owned by the Dogrib Power Corporation and most of the 100 jobs created by the plant will go to local Dogrib people.

In Quebec the Mohawk Trading Company in Kanesatake markets office supplies, equipment, computers, software and furniture to a wide range of clients including federal departments, corporations like Pepsi–Cola and Colgate–Palmolive.

On the east coast the Labrador Inuit Development Corporation has signed a multi–million dollar contract to mine and export rare anorthosite crystal to Italy.

We are witnessing an increase in the entrepreneurial partnerships between aboriginal people and mainstream business communities. Such partnerships, joint ventures and strategic business alliances are essential if the aboriginal community is to capitalize on opportunities throughout the economy.

In northern Ontario, for example, the Mussel White Mine Development project involves an agreement between Placer Dome Mining and four First Nations. Under this agreement 60 jobs will be created at the mine site. The Long Lake First Nation in northern Ontario has also negotiated an agreement that provides for employment, job training and opportunities with Long Lac Forest Products:Buchanan Brothers. This agreement has resulted in 65 jobs for First Nations people.

Despite the impediment of unresolved land claims, British Columbia First Nations are also pursuing business opportunities. Since June 1995, for example, the Skeetchestn First Nation and the Chai–Na–Ta Corporation have been working together to grow ginsing on 544 acres of reserve land in the Kamloops area for export to China and Hong Kong. In return for providing financing and land for the project, the First Nation anticipates approximately 300 jobs and more than $14 million in profits over the 10–year agreement.

On Vancouver Island the Nuu–cha–nulth Tribal Council has turned a former residential school into a resort. The 56–room lodge is being operated as a franchise of the Best Western chain. About 70 per cent of its workforce is First Nations people.

Most of my comments today have illustrated how land claims can contribute to the development of aboriginal economies. But resolution of land claims is also vital to non–aboriginal peoples since it creates a climate of certainty and often leads to economic spin–offs in neighbouring non–aboriginal communities, as well as many jobs for non–aboriginal people.

Strengthening aboriginal communities provides new opportunities and wealth creation possibilities for all Canadians. It has been estimated that if aboriginal people were to achieve the employment and wage parity with other Canadians by the year 2000 it would boost our gross domestic product by a whopping 2.3 per cent. A stronger First Nations community means stronger regional economies and a stronger country.

Hon. members can rest assured the government will continue to support business and economic development initiatives among aboriginal people. We will do so not simply for the economic benefits but as a litmus test of our beliefs in fairness, justice, and equality of opportunity, as we stated in the red book.

Over the years we have not paid the attention we ought to allowing aboriginal people to fully participate in the Canadian economy. We have not paid attention to the great opportunities we can experience by everybody working together. When we treat all people in this land with dignity and with respect, when we work together, when we do not see the colour of a person's skin, when we do not see the race of a person, when we do not make distinctions based on religion, when we reach cross that gulf that has been created to share and to work together, it is then that our nation can prosper.

These are times when we hear many intolerant statements, many hurtful statements. However, these are times when we must be all the more vigilant in our fight for equality and dignity for all people.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for this opportunity to point out the economic gains that could be made for all people by settling some long–unfinished business.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to hear people from all walks of life supporting land claims. I consider this a misnomer, but it is called land claims today. As far as we are concerned, we are not claiming the land; the land is already ours. For lack of a better word, we call it land claims.

There was some question about what the legal basis is for the B.C. Treaty Commission. The B.C. Treaty Commission is presently acting as an agent within the authority of the three parties, which are of course the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the provincial government, and the aboriginal people. In order to obtain funding for negotiations, the government had to seek the necessary appropriations from Parliament, which it has done. To allay the fears that there is no legal basis for the commission, we can rest assured the commission does have a legal basis.

I will return to the land claims issue in British Columbia and some of the issues the hon. member was talking about. One thing we have managed to achieve in a very short space of time as aboriginal people is to establish that we are a force to be reckoned with. People with little tolerance for aboriginal issues have a problem with the existence of land claims.

It was not so long ago that a previous prime minister of our party questioned that very thing but quickly turned around and realized that we do have a basis for land claims. The Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau questioned that in the early 1960s but realized that we did have a basis for recognition of aboriginal rights. Since then it has been acknowledged that there is indeed a basis for the negotiation of land claims.

In the past, aboriginal people have always been at a disadvantage in that it seemed we did not have anything to negotiate with, whereas the government had everything at its disposal to negotiate with. Too late for a lot of us, we realized we had a lot more to negotiate with than we thought. There was no clear definition of who owned the land and held the title. As a result, a recognition of the fact that we were here precipitated the land claims negotiations in the 1970s. Today we have settled quite a number of those negotiations and are continuing to settle them.

Now we are just starting on British Columbia, which is only right. It is long overdue for justice. I must question whether justice will ever really be served at this late date to the aboriginal peoples of British Columbia because of other interests and the agreement beforehand of not dealing with privately owned lands. I have to wonder about all this.

I was wondering if the hon. member could elaborate a little more on what his role was as the former chair of the aboriginal affairs committee. How did he see the positive benefits of land claims to the aboriginal peoples across the land, more so maybe in the province of Saskatchewan?

I was in a conference this morning in which aboriginal forestry was discussed. My knowledge of forestry is somewhat limited. I have very little knowledge of trees. Ask me about snow and how to define snow in 25 different ways and I can do that, but forestry is not my area of expertise. It looked like a very good program that was going on where they wanted to have joint ventures and co–management.

I was just wondering if the member might elaborate a little more on what co–management or joint venture in Saskatchewan is and whether it is in his area of expertise as a result of his chairmanship of the aboriginal affairs committee.

Mr. Kirkby: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for his question.

In my experience, we are just seeing for the first time the effects of land entitlement settlements upon the people of Saskatchewan. This is a result of longstanding grievances between First Nations and the government. Approximately 26 First Nations signed land entitlement projects, which compensated them for land that was not allocated to them at the time of the signing of the treaty but which should have been.

I believe it is a very positive development in Saskatchewan. I believe there will be a lot of economic development projects. These economic development projects will benefit both the aboriginal and non–aboriginal communities.

Within Saskatchewan we have to learn to better live together and work together. As in other places, we see that there can be intolerant attitudes expressed from time to time. However, in Saskatchewan nobody is going away. The aboriginal people will be there in the future and the non–aboriginal people will be there in the future. We must learn to get along and work together.

When people begin to see the benefits of the land claims settlements to the economy in general there will be an acceptance of the process. We will learn that what benefits one group in Saskatchewan will benefit all. When one group succeeds we all succeed.

In the area of resource management, we need to see that all people will begin to respect one another and will be able to sit down at the table to learn to work together and respect each other. We must not say things that can inflame the situation. We must work together so that all people will live together with mutual respect and dignity, now and in the years to come.

We must learn to live together and work together. The land claims settlements, as well as a number of other initiatives, will give us the opportunity to do so. We need to ensure that all people will strive for peace and will work together in mutual respect.

Mr. John Loney (Edmonton North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased and honoured to be able to stand in the House today to speak on the British Columbia Treaty Commission and its second annual report.

The report, released June 27, 1995, and tabled in the House on October 19 by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, cites the participation of the majority of First Nations in British Columbia and the progress being made at several negotiating tables as evidence that this voluntary treaty making process is working. In the four months since the report was released, significant progress has been made in the negotiation of treaties in British Columbia.

When the report was released, 43 First Nations, representing approximately 65 per cent of the First Nations population in British Columbia, had entered the six–stage treaty process. By October 20, 1995, the number of First Nations participating in the process had increased to 47, representing over 70 per cent of the First Nations population.

In June seven First Nations had progressed to stage three framework agreement negotiations. Framework agreements have now been signed by the first four nations: the Champagne Aishihik, the Gitksan, the Wet'suwet'en, and the Sechelt. These First Nations are involved in stage four of the process, the negotiation of an agreement in principle.

Framework agreements have been initialled with three other First Nations: the Teslin and Tlingit Council, Gitanyow Hereditary Chiefs, and the Ditidaht First Nation.

Stage three framework negotiations are in progress with four First Nations: the Kaska Dene Council, the Lheit Lit'en First Nation, the Squamish First Nation, and the Nuu–chah–nulth Tribal Council.

• (1315)

The British Columbia treaty commissioners have made several recommendations relative to the challenges being faced in the process. They recommended that the principals and the parties to the negotiations continue to commit extraordinary effort to public information and that principals take a greater role in public education on a province–wide, regional and local basis.

The commission notes that in its first annual report it was critical of the principals for not fulfilling their obligation to inform the public. It adds that since then substantial progress has been made in the area of public information. The principals have made considerable effort to inform the public about the process and the issues, all in a spirit of openness.

Another of the commission's recommendations centres on the necessity of both levels of government to make full use of their consultation processes so that the community at large will be confident that its voices are heard and its concerns are considered.

The province–wide treaty negotiations advisory committee meets on a regular basis to provide advice to both the federal and provincial governments on sectorial issues such as fisheries, energy, petroleum and mineral resources; lands and forests; wildlife and governance. Regional advisory committees are being organized at the local or regional level in areas where First Nations are entering the treaty process. The government is committed to a consultation process that works effectively. Such a process is critical to the success of the treaty making process.

In this year's report the commissioners also recommend that an interim measures agreement be negotiated in a meaningful and timely manner so that the treaty negotiation process is not undermined. Interim measures are of critical importance to First Nations and should be included as a necessary element in a co–ordinated treaty making process. Interim measures should provide First Nations with adequate protection of their affected interests until a treaty is in place, thus avoiding the necessity of litigation.

The federal government is prepared to consider requests for interim measures where the issues are critical to concluding the treaties. The commissioners recommended that the principals review the current funding program to ensure that First Nations have adequate funds to prepare for and carry out negotiations and to enable the commission to carry out its responsibilities in allocating funds in a fair, independent and effective manner. The issue of funding is under review by the principals.

The commissioners also recommended that the principals address ways to effectively manage a treaty making process where more than 43 First Nations will be involved in negotiations. This issue has become even more critical to the principals as there are now 47 First Nations involved in the process. The principals are involved in discussions with each other and with the commission to find creative ways to manage these complex negotiations while respecting the right of all 196 First Nations in British Columbia to participate in this historic treaty making process.

I am pleased to report that the implementation of the commissioners' sixth and final recommendation is nearing completion with the introduction of Bill C–107, the British Columbia Treaty Commission Act, in the House on Wednesday, October 18, 1995. The enactment of the bill, together with the resolution of the First Nations Summit and the provincial Treaty Commission Act, will formally establish the British Columbia Treaty Commission as a legal entity.

Chief Commissioner Alec Robertson, Q.C., and Commissioners Barbara Owl Fisher, Will Battam and Peter Elugzik continue the work begun by their predecessors in fulfilling the commission's role as the keeper of the process. Miles Richardson was recently nominated by the First Nations Summit to replace Carol T. Corcoran, one of the original commissioners. These individuals are to be thanked for their dedication and perseverance during these trying times. This is a new process and they have worked long and hard to ensure that the process will work.

During the first year of operation the commission's emphasis was on accepting First Nations into the process. As the parties move into framework and agreement in principle negotiations, the commission's role will be focused on monitoring and facilitating progress.

The commission and the government are committed to the treaty making process and to doing everything possible to ensure that it carries the people of the province of British Columbia into the next century with healthier communities and more productive relationships.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

As I said earlier, it is always a pleasure to listen to people who have some understanding but also support the aboriginal people.

In the long run land claims is a misnomer. I guess the whole issue evolved because of the fact that all of a sudden more people were here than had been previously, since 1492. Prior to that we had been a stable population.

Christopher Columbus came over in 1492, which reminds me of a joke that should not be taken seriously. Dick Gregory, a comedian born in 1932, said: "You have to say this for the white race. Its self–confidence knows no bounds. Who else could go to a small island in the south Pacific where there is no poverty, no crime, no unemployment, no war and no worry and call it a primitive society?" Basically the same thing happened here when Christopher Columbus arrived.

However the reality is that this is 1995. We have gone through a lot of changes over the years. Now I think we are finally getting the recognition that should have been there right from the beginning.

I have a question for the hon. member on the British Columbia Treaty Commission. What will the B.C. treaty commission do to ensure that all British Columbians are informed of the treaty negotiation process?

Mr. Loney: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question, as part of its duties the British Columbia Treaty Commission is responsible for the provision of a public record on negotiations. The commission is required to report annually to the legislature, Parliament and the First Nations Summit on the progress of the negotiations.

Recently the commission released its second annual report to the principals detailing the progress of the negotiations. I have encouraged the new commissioners to play a larger role in informing the public on treaty negotiation issues.

In addition, a number of other steps have been taken to ensure that the treaty negotiation process is accessible and open to all British Columbians. These steps would include establishment of regionally based advisory committees, public forums, regional information meetings, a toll free phone number and brochures.

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the last few years the public information programs developed around the treaty negotiation process have expanded from public forums and open houses to include a wide range of different activities covering the province. It is a fantastic positive model, one that reaches into every home, every community, every institution within each and every one of the communities in question.

I commend the government for introducing a model of that nature. All parties to treaty negotiations in British Columbia place a high priority on effective public information. That is the key to success.

Without information we operate in darkness, in ignorance. Decisions are made without the proper facts, without the proper support systems, without the proper introduction of the major parties concerned in helping to bring about the most effective decision that will cater to the needs of all parties concerned.

There are many opportunities for the public to learn about treaty negotiations and the treaty making process. These opportunities are being provided through activities undertaken provincially, regionally and locally. To date this government and the other governments involved are doing a fantastic job in notifying all parties concerned of the process and where, when and why activities must take place.

At the provincial level the tripartite public education committee or TPEC takes the lead. The committee consists of members representing the three principals who are representatives of the Canadian government, representatives of the province of British Columbia and the First Nations Summit.

For clarification purposes I would like to read from the act what we mean by the summit:

> Summit means the body that is established to represent the First Nations in British Columbia that agree to participate in the process provided for in the agreement to facilitate the negotiations of treaties among First Nations, Her Majesty in right of Canada and Her Majesty in right of British Columbia.

At the provincial level TPEC's primary objective is to plan, organize and implement province–wide public education programs on treaty negotiations.

I digress. Later in my presentation I will discuss the value of the process introduced in the province of British Columbia.

At the outset of the treaty negotiation process in 1994 the strategy developed by TPEC focused on holding public forums in communities around the province. Between June 1994 and today a total of fourteen forums have been held in British Columbia; five on Vancouver Island in Port Hardy, Nanaimo, Campbell River, Port Alberni and Victoria; three in the north in Prince Rupert, Smithers and Prince George; one in Cariboo—Chilcotin in Williams Lake; one in the Kootenays in Cranbrook; one in the interior in Kelowna; one on the sunshine coast in Powell River; and two in the lower mainland in Chilliwack and Vancouver. Two more forums will be held within the next few weeks in the lower mainland, one in Richmond and one in Delta.

The fact that so many have already taken place shows that the model is a dynamic one. We are reaching the people we should be reaching.

These community events begin with an informal open house in which the public is able to view displays and videos, pick up information and speak one on one with negotiators. The open house is followed by a forum, a formal panel discussion involving not only the principles of negotiation but also the B.C. Treaty Commission and the local first nation. After the presentations the floor is open to questions from the audience. The forums are moderated by a high profile member of the community. This is a dynamic community interacting model.

The critical and most crucial facets are where the individual who has a concern can come to the public meeting, identify with one of the leaders or one of the representatives of TPEC and discuss on a personal basis problems, issues or concerns relating to problem that will be discussed in the general meeting.

Then follows information. The information giving process is critical. It is absolutely essential that information at this stage be given in a very objective manner; clean, precise, not nebulous, not sweeping generalizations. The facts must be given as we know them in the real world.

Because three parties are involved in this process and because community representatives and community leaders are there from all facets of the community, the chances of success of giving a very accurate, true picture of whatever the scenario might be is far greater than having a bureaucrat come in from Ottawa or from Victoria to make a presentation on behalf of the governments in question or even a First Nations representative making a presentation on behalf of all First Nations people in British Columbia.

We know from research that if all parties do not get involved in the decision making and searching for information processes, the picture will be tainted, tainted because a person at the top, if he has the responsibility for giving the information, has a very slim chance of presenting a real picture of what is happening at the grassroots.

Let me give an idea of what I am talking about here using a board of education as an example. It could be any institution we have created in the country. The chief executive officer will have a chain of command. The information will be coming from the grassroots up this chain to the office of the chief executive officer. The chief executive officer is paid a very grand salary and is responsible for all operations within his institution which might encompass thousands of people. He is responsible for their behaviour and actions and the outcome. Do you think for one moment that chief executive officer will be presented a true, accurate picture of what is happening at the grassroots? Of course not.

All research reveals that as information flows upward to the pinnacle, to the top of the pyramid, it slowly but surely takes on a new meaning, a new perspective, a new perception. Whatever the motivation might be, whatever the reasons might be, the information reaching the top is not the truth. This is one of the major reasons why this model introduced by the government of British Columbia has all the partners and all of the participants partaking in a variety of ways with a multitude of strategies. They are contributing at the grassroots and affecting the people who are making the decisions at the top end as well as middle management. This model is dynamic. It is one of the most fruitful models we have at the present time in our democratic society.

These community events begin with an informal open house. This is crucial. People must come into an atmosphere and environment where they feel at ease. It has to feel as if they are coming into a family reunion where they can openly and honestly discuss their concerns and perceptions with each other. It must not have the atmosphere of a formal meeting dictated and controlled by one chairperson.

After the presentation, the floor is open to questions from the audience. That is another crucial stage of this process. The people that are asking the questions may not have the same perception as a chairperson or any other of the major players has in this session. The person asking the question may have a completely different background which in turn affects how he or she perceives what is being presented in this meeting. If this person's perception is off balance or it is not in harmony with the perceptions and actual concepts that are being presented by the leaders of these groups then I think we have a problem.

However, in this model the people who are responding to the concerns and to the questions must have the background to understand the people who are asking the questions. It is absolutely essential that in this model we have representatives of the First Nations people who have a very in depth, comprehensive understanding of what this treaty and this model are all about and what the process is all about.

I would rather see someone from the First Nations who is capable of handling that role presenting an information package or responses to questions raised by First Nations people than someone coming from the department of Indian affairs in Ottawa telling the people in British Columbia that this is the way it is and these are the answers to the questions.

My perception will never be the same, no matter how long I work with First Nations people. I could work with them for years and I would never have the same type of perception of any situation as they have simply because I have not been raised in that culture. I have not been raised in their environment. Therefore, their experiences would be far different from mine.

The forums are moderated by a high profile member of the community. As more First Nations groups move into stages three and four of the treaty process, TPEC is expanding its activities to include issue oriented forums, with more focus on what is happening at the negotiating table and workshops for the media. The first media workshop was held in Nanaimo last week and was extremely well received.

A second level of public information activity takes place at the regional and local level. As part of the readiness preparations, the three negotiating parties establish a tripartite public information working group to support the negotiations. This is critical. We may have some of the most dynamic, shattering, exciting, zestful kind of experiences within that public forum but if the information that is being shared and generated is not shared with other people in the community who could not be in that public hall, all is in vain. All we are doing it helping to develop a gap between those who know and those who do not know.

Therefore, it becomes much more difficult to convince the public who do not have the first hand knowledge to really and truly comprehend what is going on. If they are making judgments based on ignorance then we have trouble. We then have negative reactions to anything that is being proposed in the media.

It is critical how the information is handled, the media that is involved, their perceptions and the kind of interpretations they give.

This working group develops a strategy, an action plan for the negotiation and takes responsibility for implementing the plan in the communities which fall within the traditional territories. It is extremely important to realize that these people must have an awareness of the communities in question. The model they might introduce to a community like Nanaimo may not not be exactly the same as the one they might introduce in a community like Powell River. They must have a knowledge and understanding of the people involved in each of the communities. What are the concerns in that community? What are the things people are saying in coffee shops? What are they saying on the reserves?

What kind of reaction are we getting to things we have already done? What kind of feedback are we getting from the major players from what we have done in the past? All of this has to be taken into consideration in making a global perception of the community where we are going to present this information package, or become involved in a process with the three partners and other members of the community.

A variety of initiatives have been implemented throughout the province. Some examples of programs include resource centres being established for the community at large on the sunshine coast, in Kelowna and in the Cariboo—Chilcotin area. These will be located in the local libraries.

The libraries will be provided with a set of three binders. One contains all information pertaining to the treaty negotiation process. I have not seen the binder, but I am hoping that the instructions regarding process are clean, clear, concise and understandable. The second contains all information specific to the negotiations being carried out in that community. The third contains all documentation pertaining to the local consultation process.

Newspaper supplements are being produced in Kelowna, Prince George and Williams Lake. These will be inserted into local newspapers to provide the widest distribution of information about the negotiations to the community. Extra copies will be produced for use as handout material at public events.

Open houses are held from time to time in each negotiation area to allow the public to informally meet with negotiators to discuss matters relating to the negotiations. This is dynamic because there is no set formula or schedule, but when the need arises within a community for an open house it materializes.

This is extremely important because when the emotions rise, you must strike when the iron is hot. If the people are really agitated and very concerned about some issue, they should have an open house as quickly as possible if that is a strategy that they feel is going to be the most effective in giving the information to all parties concerned.

A local organized public forum has been held in Prince Rupert. These forums involve not only negotiators, but also members of the community to discuss issues in depth. The forums are normally taped by the local community cable television stations and rebroadcast. We are very fortunate that often the local community television stations will rebroadcast some of these events two, three or four times at different times of the day to make sure they hit the various listening audiences that are available at that time.

Information about negotiations is often made available through other public events. For example, in the north, information booths have been set up at annual trade shows, giving negotiators wide exposure to those attending the show. Another example was the information booth set up for the Burrard negotiations at weekend canoe races and at a shopping mall as part of a week long native heritage days event.

Those are some examples, but I could go on and on because the human mind is a very creative thing. If you take the tethers off the human mind and allow it to be free to create, you will find that the individuals concerned will come up with a multitude of strategies on how to share information with each and every concerned person.

The working groups are also actively seeking opportunities for negotiators to speak to community groups, such as chambers of commerce, municipal councils, unions, churches and business groups. All of these activities involve a media component. The working groups have developed networks with the local media and keep them informed, as well as seeking specific opportunities for negotiators to be interviewed by reporters and appear on radio talk shows.

An important aspect of public information work at the local level is developing partnerships and alliances with community groups. Efforts are under way on a continuing basis to develop linkages with educational institutions, business associations and community organizations in an attempt to encourage ongoing dialogue with the communities.

• (1345)

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to tell the hon. member that his time has expired. Perhaps there will be more in questions and comments.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to agree with the member who as I understood it stated that we cannot have a true settlement unless the grassroots are consulted.

The inference I took was that he was saying the grassroots at the aboriginal level should be consulted. This is not a criticism; I am just stating that I was not at all clear as to whether he also believed as I do that there must be a full consultation process at the grassroots level with the non–aboriginal community as well and that they must be involved in the process.

He did refer to partners participating. Again, I agree with that. I believe he also mentioned about people making decisions at the top end. I suggest to him that the problem with the process as it is presently envisioned by the federal Liberal government and by the NDP government in British Columbia is that people are going to be making decisions at the top end for the non–aboriginal community and there is going to be insufficient input from the grassroots, as he put it, in the non–aboriginal community.

Since coming to Ottawa I have experienced that consultation is a word which is frequently used very liberally, if I may use a play on words, particularly by the civil service. Consultation really means that they are going to go through the process of appearing to consult, but after all is said and done, the die is cast and the decision has been made.

I would assume that the member believes in the equality of all Canadians as I do. Everyone of voting age meeting certain qualifications should have the right as a Canadian citizen to vote in any election. That also obviously extends to the broader issue of the equality of all Canadians. I wonder if the member would also agree with me that in the same way throughout this process there most probably are going to be ratification procedures for the aboriginal community which will be one person, one vote.

I wonder if the member would agree with my party's position that there also must be a ratification procedure which would be outside of the ratification by this Chamber or by the legislature in Victoria. The ratification procedure should be on the basis of one person, one vote for all people in the affected area, be they aboriginal or non–aboriginal. This would give us the qualification that all people are equal regardless of race, language, creed, colour, religion or gender. Would the member agree that in order for this process to work we must have one person, one vote by aboriginal and non–aboriginal alike in order to have a final and concluding settlement of this issue?

Mr. Dromisky: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the questions and his perceptions. I have to agree with him that the democratic process is a viable one. All interested and concerned parties who in some way will be affected must be involved in the process.

Because the negotiating process affects all people, it is possible that those who are interested and keenly want to become involved may do so. They may contribute to the process. That is why I say it is extremely important that people at the grassroots level do not shy away from the process but contribute to it.

When it comes to the actual decision making, whether a vote should be here or there, I am not too aware of the exact process or the technicalities involved. I am sure that all parties concerned will come to some decision as to how it should operate. I am sure they have, but I am not aware of the strategy they are using at the present time.

From what I can gather it is a consultative process, one in which consultation takes place with all parties concerned. Information flows and decisions are being made in light of the information they have generated. Alternatives are carefully examined and some consensus must be reached within a legal framework naturally by all parties concerned.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief supplementary to my friend.

I wonder if he would give us his personal opinion. In order for us to arrive at a proper conclusion to this process as the aboriginal community will have one person, one vote, would he agree that the non–aboriginal community that is affected by the same process should also have one person, one vote? What is his opinion?

Mr. Dromisky: Mr. Speaker, my opinion is very simple. If the issue pertains to a treaty settlement in a particular reserve or area, the people involved are the ones who should be making the decision. There is no doubt about it.

For instance in my own riding in the reserve of Fort William, if there is going to be a decision made regarding the reserve's boundaries and so forth, the people who are involved in that decision making are the ones who are on the reserve and other partners. For people who might be affected by the decision who live 10, 15, 20 miles away in my opinion I would not expect them to be actively taking part and casting a vote.

Putting it simply, the people on the reserve are the ones who are being affected by the decision. Therefore they must through this process and come to some conclusion as to how it is going to be decided.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might give a lesson to the hon. member of the Reform Party on government and land claims.

In the aboriginal world, land claims have been going on for some time in which a particular group is formed to negotiate. For example the Inuit people of the Northwest Territories in the eastern Arctic formed an organization called the Tungavik Federation of Nunavut which in turn now is called Nunavut Tungavik Inc., to negotiate land claims agreements on the Inuit's behalf with the Government of Canada. The way the people of Canada, other than the Inuit people of the Northwest Territories, took part was through their elected representatives, the Government of Canada and their member of Parliament.

That is the process that has been used. I guess it is called the British parliamentary system where you elect your member of Parliament and he or she acts on your behalf.

In the aboriginal people's case an organization was appointed. I am sure all aboriginal groups across the country have an organization, which is negotiating on their behalf and they in turn have to ratify whatever is negotiated.

The people of Canada or people of a certain region, such as the people of British Columbia, will be represented by their elected representatives, whether it is the member of the provincial legislature or the member of Parliament for that particular region.

I wonder if the hon. member might care to expand a little more on how the information should be disseminated to the public at large about the British Columbia Treaty Commission so that the people of British Columbia because they feel involved in it will feel they have a role to play in the whole process.

• (1355)

Mr. Dromisky: Mr. Speaker, I have already given some information regarding process. As many strategies as possible must be created to inform the public. It may be costly. It may be time consuming. It may be consuming in terms of human resources and so forth, but it is absolutely essential for developing the proper mental state, perceptions and so forth that as much information be given to all members of the adjacent community as well as the First Nations people.

I am sure that in the hon. member's communities as well as in a great number of communities with all the modern technology we have, with the creative individuals who exist in each community, we could come up with a multitude of very effective information giving and information sharing strategies.

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I support Bill C–107, the British Columbia Treaty Commission.

As many members are aware, the process of treaty making in British Columbia includes important third party consultations. In July 1993 the federal and provincial governments announced the establishment of the Treaty Negotiation Advisory Committee, TNAC. This is a 31 member organization that is divided into four sectoral advisory groups dealing with lands and forests, wildlife, fisheries and governance.

Each sectoral committee has completed interest papers which give an overview of the impact of treaties on their economic resource used and regulatory requirements. There have been several common interests identified. These include the need for certainty in treaty settlement, assured access to land base, fair and affordable agreements and avoiding impact on the existing employment base in smaller communities.

TNAC members ensure that the interests and expertise of major industries, business, labour, environment and outdoor recreation groups and local governments are understood and are taken into consideration in treaty negotiations.

TNAC advises governments on broad province–wide concerns and provides a forum for the provision of detailed information for discussion.

The process aspect of treaty negotiations has also received considerable attention from TNAC members and their demands for a more—

The Speaker: Colleague, of course you have just started your remarks. You will have the floor immediately when we come back to the debate.

It being 2 p.m., we will now go to Statements by Members.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the residents of Hamilton Mountain are very concerned about the referendum campaign in Quebec.

In countless conversations with my constituents many have expressed a strong desire to see Canada remain united. They want Quebecers to remain within Canada so that they do not lose the benefits of belonging to one of the world's most prosperous and successful countries. We want them as members of the Canadian family to enjoy all the privileges that entails.

As a united country, we have managed to build a prosperous and progressive society. Both Canada and Quebec are better off united.

On behalf of the residents of Hamilton Mountain, I would like to appeal to Quebecers to choose Canada and vote no on October 30.

MANITOBA

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in the House to pay tribute to Manitoba's 125th anniversary.

Over the past year, all Manitobans have celebrated the history of this great province and its place within Canada. All over the province, communities large and small have been holding events and gatherings focusing on Manitoba's 125th birthday.

The strength and prosperity of Manitoba has been built by people of many different cultures and customs. Bound together by a dedication to hard work, they have built a proud legacy that will endure long into the future.

The past year has also seen celebrations of special accomplishments in the history of Manitoba. These achievements have been a source of pride for not only Manitobans but all Canadians as well.

In this anniversary year, Manitoba serves as a shining example of what can be achieved through the fundamental values of hard work, dedication and commitment to building a strong community.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute to Roger Bernard who, with the help of his organizer, Mr. Robert Feeney, was able to accumulate over 60,000 signatures in support of Canadian unity.

Mr. Bernard began a 23-day journey on July 1 of this year entitled "Canada Can Campaign '95—Standing Up for Canadian Unity" in order to deliver a message of optimism, hope and inspiration to all Canadians.

Mr. Bernard collected these signatures on a long trip spent running and cycling the 2,219 kilometres between Barrie, Ontario, and his hometown, Eel River Crossing, in New Brunswick. He covered an average of 100 kilometres per day and visited 23 municipalities.

Speaking on behalf of all Canadians, I want to commend Mr. Bernard for his courage and his dedication to our country.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to speak to our neighbours in Quebec who are going through a period that is critical for their future. My riding, Timiskaming—French River, is on the Quebec border, and 30 per cent of the residents are francophones.

Since time immemorial, people in Northern Ontario and Northern Quebec have done business with each other. Strong ties of friendship have developed between these two regions. There is no doubt that if Quebec separates from the rest of Canada, we would see a considerable decline in the level of interprovincial trade. Quebec's separation would also have a devastating impact on what now constitutes Canada's strength: our trade, our economy, our national and international relations and especially our two cultures.

Dear friends and neighbours in Quebec, there are no problems we cannot solve in order to build this beautiful country together. So on October 30, decide to grow with Canada and say no to separation.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois gives us a false impression of its interest in the situation of francophones outside Quebec. Compare the insincerity of its comments on the decline of francophones outside Quebec with the following statement sent by the mayor of Whitby to the mayor of Longueuil, as part of an exchange of letters between the two twin cities. It indicates that francophones outside Quebec have not been assimilated and have contributed to the education of dynamic communities.

As Mayor Edwards said: "I can assure you of the fond admiration and deep attachment felt by all citizens who have taken part in twinning activities since 1969, for our friends and colleagues in the city of Longueuil; I am convinced that the feeling is mutual.

In Whitby, there are tangible and permanent signs of these exchanges which gladden my heart. From my window, for instance, I see Longueuil Park. A little to the north, Charles Garnier school is under construction, a school for French immersion which reminds us of the presence and growth of francophone communities in our country".

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last week, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs went so far as to call the sovereignists racists. This insulting epithet is not worthy of a parliamentarian and certainly not of a minister. I have spent my whole life fighting against racism, discrimination and injustice and for the rights of minorities, immigrants and refugees. I am not at all a racist.

Furthermore, I can assure you that sovereignists are tolerant and open to cultural diversity, as are the thousands of voters in the riding of Bourassa, in Montreal North, who voted for me, a candidate of Latin American origin.

The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs should publicly apologize for these gross and unwarranted attacks which were directed to more than 50 per cent of the people of Quebec.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the NDP has always painted itself as the defender of the little guy, the downtrodden and the poor. It is time for a reality check.

Recent news stories in British Columbia reveal that British Columbia's New Democratic Party and a related fundraising group used a web of deceitful accounting and shady payoffs to rip off charities for years. NDP headquarters has been raided on the execution of search warrants alleging theft and fraud of more than one million dollars.

This scandal has serious implications for this House. Several former members are implicated in the diversion of charity funds. The question is how much money flowed from NCHS to finance federal NDP campaigns?

In a 1987 letter former NDP MP Dave Stupich claims that the Nanaimo Commonwealth Holding Society contributed substantially to the New Democratic Party at the local, provincial and federal levels.

On behalf of the charities involved and all members of the House, I demand that the investigators broaden their scope past the B.C. border to include contributions made to federal—

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Mr. Speaker, Helen Betty Osborne, a 19–year–old Métis girl, was brutally murdered in 1971 in The Pas, Manitoba. Sixteen years later Dwayne Archie Johnston was the only person convicted for the crime and sentenced to a life sentence with no eligibility of parole for ten years. An aboriginal justice inquiry also determined that the murder was clearly motivated by racism.

Today, only seven years after his conviction, Mr. Johnston is out on day parole and can enjoy his weekends outside the prison. Newspaper reports state that there are a number of serious factual errors in the parole board's file on Mr. Johnston and that he "narrated his version of events in an emotionally flat, bland manner, as if rehearsed".

I strongly urge the parole board to seriously re–examine its decision to allow Mr. Johnston day parole.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Foreign Affairs belittled Quebecers on the weekend by intimating that Quebec would be too small to penetrate world markets. Quebecers will simply not stand for such belittlement and will continue to maintain a steady course for sovereignty, despite the waves created and the flotsam strewn in their way by the advocates of the status quo.

In response to the minister, who claimed that voting yes was like trading an ocean liner for a rowboat, we offer the remarks of the Mayor of Granby, who said: "And I say this to you: the Titanic is listing dangerously. The time has come for us to get off the luxury liner in a calm and orderly fashion and board the Quebec flagship".

And this is exactly what Quebecers will do on October 30.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are others besides the Bloc member for Rimouski—Témiscouata lacking respect for francophones outside Quebec. Her separatist colleague, the PQ regional delegate for the Outaouais region, stated on October 20, with regard to francophones outside Quebec, that they are much more colonized than francophones in Quebec, so they are twice as afraid, that francophones outside Quebec are twice as frightened and doubly moved by the fear sown by the camp of the desperate.

Quebec separatists have become so arrogant toward those different from them that they think they can do anything they like. Quebecers are aware of Canada's virtues of tolerance and generosity. On October 30, they will vote no to the arrogance of the separatists.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in a week it will be October 30, and Quebecers will have to vote in the referendum on Quebec's separation.

Before they vote, they should ask the following questions. Do you want Quebec to separate? Do you want Quebec to stop being part of Canada? Should Quebec become a foreign country? Do you no longer want to be represented in Canada's Parliament, that is, no longer elect members in a federal election? Do you want to give up all that you, your parents and your grandparents have built in this country?

Quebecers know Canada. It is their country. They have always had their place here. They know that Canada can be improved to better meet their aspirations and they will prove it by voting no on October 30.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the key arguments used by the separatist spokespersons in justifying their plan to separate Quebec is the issue of protection and survival of the French language.

It is claimed that French is in danger in Quebec and the only way to ensure its future is to break Canada apart this coming October 30.

How can the separatists make such an exaggeration concerning the French language, when they are preparing in their project of separation to condemn more than a million francophones outside Quebec to isolation?

In Canada, the French language knows no borders, no colour, no race. This coming October 30, Quebecers will say no to the abandonment of their millions of francophone neighbours, and a strong Quebec will remain within a Canada which, too, will be strong and united.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the following is a comment that was made in May 1990 on the Prime Minister of Canada's position with respect to Quebec. It was said that "For a year he has made political hay at the expense of Quebecers by telling English Canada that there would be no problem in Quebec if the Meech Lake Accord failed".

And who was the author of this commentary? A sovereignist? Not in the least. It was the present Minister of Finance who was denouncing the intransigence of the Prime Minister of Canada with regard to the demands of Quebec.

It is all very well for the Prime Minister of Canada to try to rewrite history, casting himself in the role of Captain Quebec, but Quebecers remember that the person who was pulling the strings to make Meech fail in its attempt to meet the minimal demands of Quebec to reintegrate the Canadian Constitution was none other than the "little guy from Shawinigan".

If we vote no, we are again placing the fate of Quebec in the hands of the man who, to again quote his Minister of Finance, "went off to Ottawa to put Quebec in its place".

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, is Quebec a distinct society, or is it not?

We reformers believe it is, but we also believe that the other provinces have some distinguishing elements as well.

In our opinion, all provinces should have the same status within Confederation, just as all Canadians should be equal in the eyes of the law.

We have therefore reached the conclusion that it is possible to ensure equality and the recognition of languages and cultures. All that this would require would be to give the provinces primary responsibility for language and culture.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette-Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the contempt with which the Bloc member from Rimouski—Témiscouata referred to francophones outside Quebec is absolutely unacceptable. It illustrates the kind of threat the separatist platform represents for francophones in other provinces.

Canada's francophones now know perfectly well that a separate Quebec would have no interest in introducing measures to promote the French fact in Canada.

Quebecers, however, are very sensitive to the issue of protecting the French language. They will not let the separation of Quebec threaten the future of more than one million francophone compatriots.

On October 30, they will vote no, because they do not want the French language to disappear in Canada. We will not let the separatist magician make us disappear with a wave of his magic wand.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, francophones outside Quebec continued throughout the weekend to react to the intolerable comments made by the Bloc member from Rimouski—Témiscouata.

We all remember that last week, the Bloc member said in the House, and I quote: "According to Statistics Canada, there are one million francophones outside Quebec, but just 640,000 speak French. They have been assimilated—the francophones—poof!" she said, making fun of us francophones outside Quebec.

Director General Georges Arès of the Association canadienne française de l'Alberta said, and I quote: "The future of francophones in Alberta is more promising than ever before". Mr. Arès was referring, for instance, to a commitment by Premier Ralph Klein regarding school governance by Franco-Albertans.

Francophones across Canada, including those in Quebec, feel insulted. As Murray Maltais said in Le Droit, referring to the hon. member in question: "She says what she thinks, but she does not always think about what she says".

GASTON TREMBLAY

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on October 16 I attended the funeral of a great Canadian, my friend Gaston Tremblay, whom I always knew as Gus, a native of Quebec.

Gus retired to my riding in 1984 after a distinguished career in the RCMP. Gus had a talent for numbers, which he used as an RCMP auditor but also as a volunteer treasurer for many community organizations, including the Royal Canadian Legion and the Reform Party as my official agent during the election campaign. He attained a high rank in the Knights of Columbus and was past president of both the RCMP Veterans Association and Gateby intermediate care facilities.

• (1415)

His talent with numbers gave him special insight regarding our national debt and as treasurer of any group he guarded their every dollar. Gus was a man of passionate convictions. He dearly loved his country and rejected the idea of hyphenated Canadians.

I extend my sympathies to his family members and join them in their grief. Gus Tremblay, my friend, will be sorely missed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after an urgent appeal from the chair of the No committee, Mr. Daniel Johnson, who asked him to announce his position on the issues of distinct society, veto rights and elimination of overlap, the Prime Minister of Canada, after humiliating his ally, Daniel Johnson, in New York by refusing to do so, finally agreed to issue a joint statement with Mr. Johnson dealing only with distinct society, and I will quote part of the statement:

> We remind you that we have both supported the inclusion of this principle in the Canadian Constitution every time Quebec has demanded it.

My question is directed to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. What explanation does the minister have for the fact that the Prime Minister claims he has always supported the principle of a distinct society every time Quebec has demanded it, although he fought with such tenacity against the Meech Lake Accord which contained a significant definition of distinct society?

The Speaker: My dear colleagues, I would appreciate it if you would make both your questions and your answers a little shorter.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think if anyone reads the last paragraph of the statement, he will know exactly what the situation is, without the embellishments added by the hon. member for Roberval. I will read the last paragraph of the statement issued jointly by the chair of the No committee and the Prime Minister of Canada:

> We state unequivocally that Quebec is a distinct society. We remind you that we have both supported the inclusion of this principle in the Canadian Constitution every time Quebec has demanded it. We have not changed our opinion on this subject and we always maintain our support for this fundamental Canadian reality. We have supported it in the past; we support it today and we will support it in the future, in all circumstances.

This is a clear-cut position; it indicates exactly what the No committee and the Prime Minister of Canada believe.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs acknowledge that when the Prime Minister of Canada says that he has supported in the past, supports today and will support in the future, in all circumstances, the distinct identity of Quebec society, he is referring to the concept of distinct society in the Charlottetown Accord, a concept that was meaningless, being subordinate to the equality of the provinces, a concept that was rejected by Quebecers, and that the Prime Minister has always been opposed to the concept of distinct society as defined in the Meech Lake Accord?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no, and once again we must emphasize that the question on October 30 will be about the separation of Quebec from Canada.

The Bloc Quebecois wants to separate Quebec from Canada. As for Mr. Parizeau, when the distinct society concept was raised with him, his comment was: "I do not give a damn about distinct society, I do not want it". That is what he said. And he is the leader of the Yes committee, while we have always insisted it was possible to be both a Quebecer and a Canadian and that it is in the best interests of Quebecers to remain in Canada in order to make the changes that are needed.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs knows perfectly well it is unconscionable for the Prime Minister of Canada to tell his ally, the head of the No committee, that the distinct identity of Quebec society will certainly not be enshrined in the Canadian Constitution.

Will the minister at least admit that the reason the Prime Minister will not include this distinct identity in the Canadian Constitution is that he ran his campaign for the leadership of the Liberal Party on an anti–Meech Lake platform, so much so that the then Minister of Finance said in Le Devoir on March 9, 1990: "Jean Chrétien is about to destroy forever the credibility of the Liberals in Quebec"? Would he agree the Minister of Finance was right?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for the Bloc Quebecois does a poor job, as he often does, unfortunately, of presenting the position of the Prime Minister of Canada.

In his speech in Quebec City last Thursday, the Prime Minister said: "Quebec is a distinct society because of its language, culture and institutions". Those who were opposed to change in recent years were the members of the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois.

We should remember that the Parti Quebecois not only rejected the changes proposed in the Charlottetown Accord but also campaigned to ensure that Quebec would not have the powers and jurisdictions included in Charlottetown.

We must set the record straight. Those who are in favour of continuing change and development in Canada and Quebec and who support the best interests of Quebec are not those who want to break up the country and separate Quebec, with all the negative consequences that would ensue.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in the joint statement issued by the Prime Minister of Canada and the leader of the No side on the weekend in an effort to cover up the deep division between them, they say that they have not changed their minds about the distinct society and that they still believe this basic Canadian reality should be acknowledged.

Will the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs admit honestly that the real position on the notion of a distinct society is the one expressed by the Prime Minister on September 11, 1995, when he said that there was absolutely no need to enshrine in the constitution the fact that Quebec francophones are distinct from other Canadians. Dixit Jean Chrétien.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to repeat the last paragraph of the statement again, because the answer is the same.

However, what is important to see is that the official opposition is trying to shift attention away from the real issue of the referendum debate. In the referendum debate, the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois want to separate Quebec from Canada. Their aim is not a partnership, as Mr. Bouchard has finally agreed. Their aim is not a distinct society either. These are empty questions, because Mr. Parizeau has clearly indicated that he could not care less about a distinct society.

Their aim is to separate Quebec from Canada, and they will be responsible for breaking up Canada and causing the ensuing negative effects for Quebec.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister how Quebecers can trust the Prime Minister of Canada when he claims to be in favour of the concept of a distinct society when we know those who made him head of the party, like Clyde Wells, are completely and unconditionally opposed to a distinct society—thank you Clyde, we remember—and will never permit the Prime Minister to go back on a commitment he made in the leadership race, which he won specifically because he was opposed to the Meech Lake Accord, unlike the present Minister of Finance, who was in favour.

• (1425)

The Speaker: My dear colleagues, I would ask you to not use the name of any member who has sat here in this House and to always use their title as minister, if that is the case, or of leader of the opposition, rather than using their name.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what counts at the moment is finding out which option will enable Quebec to best cope with the problems of the world to come. The Prime Minister of Canada agreed with Charlottetown, which contained a whole series of measures that would have enabled Quebec to acquire certain jurisdictions it wanted. The Parti Quebecois was the one opposed.

The option that will enable Quebec to continue to develop and cope with its problems in the future is the option that implies that Quebec will remain in Canada, where it has developed harmoniously for 128 years and that it will continue its quiet revolution within the constitution. I would point out that the first quiet revolution took place while Quebec came under the constitution.

Oral Questions

CANADIAN ECONOMY

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to change the subject from constitutional ills to the overriding economic interests of all Canadians, including Quebecers.

[English]

My question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister will know that the Canadian dollar is continuing to fall today in international markets.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): I know the Bloc does not take this matter seriously but I would like to ask the question anyway.

International investors know that the prospects of a yes vote do not mean a new and better economic union between Quebec and the other provinces but the end of the economic union we have today.

What measures has the minister taken to assure the international financial community that Canada will fulfil all the financial obligations it has contracted on behalf of all Canadians including Quebecers and that it will fulfil these obligations regardless of the outcome of the Quebec referendum?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked two questions.

In terms of the first one on the value of the dollar, as the hon. member knows Canada has a floating exchange rate. Under those circumstances the value of the dollar is established by the markets. When the occasion requires, the Bank of Canada will intervene to ensure there are orderly markets.

On the second question relating to Canada's obligations, I am very confident international and domestic markets are completely assured that Canada will under all circumstances fulfil its obligations.

However I should like to take advantage of the question asked by the hon. member to reaffirm, without any hesitation and without any equivocation, that Canada stands 100 per cent, four square behind all its obligations.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, according to a recent article in the Vancouver Sun the Minister of Finance made reference to the fact that the premier of Quebec, Mr. Parizeau, acknowledged Quebec's liability for one-quarter of Canada's debt in a 1990 speech. This would be consistent with the stated desire of the separatist government to use the Canadian dollar.

Has the minister sought any public reassurance at this time from the Government of Quebec to the international financial community that it would maintain its full share of Canada's financial obligations regardless of the outcome of the Quebec referendum?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again the hon. member accurately reflects a citation by the current premier of Quebec that in the event of separation he felt Quebec's share of the national debt should be proportionate to its share of the population, i.e. 25 per cent. That is a position that has also been reflected by a number of the leading separatist leaders.

I think we all understand the tremendous negative consequences that would flow from any kind of break up of the country, in turn leading as well to negotiations over the debt. That is why I reaffirm that it is very clear that what we are dealing with here is not an offer of partnership. It is not some kind of an amiable separation. We are dealing with the rupture of the country.

The fact is this debate is about the future of Canada.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, speaking of the rupture the minister refers to, he will know that during this campaign Mr. Lucien Bouchard, the Leader of the Opposition, has indicated that—

The Speaker: I ask you, colleagues, to please refer to either the riding or the title of a person rather than their name.

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): Thank you for that reminder, Mr. Speaker.

The Leader of the Opposition has indicated during this campaign that Quebec might renege on its share of Canada's debt obligations. Of course a statement like that is not at all consistent with the stated desire of the Government of Quebec to use the Canadian dollar.

Has the Minister of Finance sought to reassure international financial markets that the Leader of the Opposition is not a member of either the Government of Canada or the Government of Quebec and may not speak for either in this regard?

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first, I think the point is a valid one. The Leader of the Opposition will not be speaking for anyone in the event of separation; the Premier of Quebec is Mr. Parizeau. So, clearly, Mr. Bouchard will be out of things.

An hon. member: Name the riding.

Mr. Martin: Ah, yes. No, I did not mention his name.

Mr. Speaker, as regards the use of the Canadian dollar, I think the Leader of the Opposition and the Premier of Quebec have deliberately created an ambiguity. They talk about using the Canadian dollar, and yet, on two occasions—in Ahuntsic, last week, and in Portneuf, six or eight months ago—the Leader of the Opposition said very clearly that the separatists intended giving up the certainty of the Canadian dollar for the uncertainty of the Quebec dollar.

When we ask ourselves where this double talk is coming from, we know very well. Mr. Parizeau wrote in L'Actualité that it was simply a ruse, that he intended to favour the Canadian dollar, but that, ultimately, he wanted a Quebec dollar.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

The desperate appeal by the leader of the no side, Daniel Johnson, to the Prime Minister of Canada addressed not only the distinct society but also Quebec's right of veto and the elimination of duplication and overlap between the federal government and the Government of Quebec. These elements are covered in the document currently being distributed by the no side, via the director general of elections.

Since the joint document has absolutely nothing to say on the question of the right of veto and the elimination of duplication and overlap, can the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs tell us whether the Prime Minister will give in to Mr. Johnson's plea and make his point of view known to the people of Quebec on these two issues before the 30th?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition is clearly attempting to cloud the issue; it is spreading ideas that are totally contrary to reality. On the question of a distinct society, the leader of the no committee and the Prime Minister have stated their position very clearly.

In the case of the right to veto, the no manifesto is clear, and the Prime Minister has also indicated that the entire membership of the no side approves. But the problem we are facing now in the referendum is that the official opposition is attempting to make people believe that the referendum is about something other than separation. That is why we must repeat again and again that what the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois are attempting to do, what their leaders clearly state as their intention, is to separate Quebec from Canada. There is no other truth, and the opposition's questions are aimed at having Quebecers believe something that does not correspond to reality. The issue is separation.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the chair of the no committee has been very clear in making this urgent appeal for the Prime Minister to make his point of view known on the distinct society, the right of veto and the elimination of duplication and overlap before October 30, Daniel Johnson has said so himself.

Why does the government persist in concealing its true intentions from Quebecers? What more is there that you want to conceal from Quebecers?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, when it comes to concealing things from Quebecers, I believe that we have said, and have proof of having said, what was going to happen; it is the members of the opposition who have tried to make Quebecers believe that partnership is possible.

It is the members of the opposition who have tried to make people believe that a large number of Quebecers could retain their Canadian passports. And it is the members of the opposition too who are trying to convince people that it will be possible for Quebecers to keep the Canadian dollar.

I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is the members of the opposition who are trying to invent stories, tell stories, fairy tales, to the people of Quebec. I repeat, October 30 is about separation. That is what the leaders of the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois are saying and it is the truth.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Armed forces personnel can collect a non–taxable separation expense for a period of up to one year when posted. Documents obtained show that for a three–year period then Major–General Armand Roy collected over $50,000 in non–taxable separation expenses. This is scandalous.

Almost every day I rise in the House and question the minister about the mismanagement of his department. What does the minister have to say about this one today?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of National Defence, as parliamentary secretary, in response to the question from the hon. member, who spent a lot of time with me as a member of the special joint committee on defence—

Mr. Hermanson: Answer the question.

Mr. Mifflin: I will answer the question if you would listen.

An hon. member: And learn.

Mr. Mifflin: He was very strong and very adamant in saying that mobility in the Canadian forces is a very strong thing. He wants to help morale with these kinds of questions? Give me a break.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians would hope that this is an isolated incident. Unfortunately, it is not.

Access to information documents show that Rear Admiral Keller, who is currently the chief of financial services at NDHQ, was in receipt of separation expenses for over four years, totalling $86,000. At the same time, able seamen in Esquimalt are in welfare line–ups trying to feed their families.

This is an example of the minister's mismanagement. How can the minister allow this to go on under his nose?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do have to tell members in all honesty that it is very difficult for me to find an answer to this kind of question.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): There is no answer.

Mr. Mifflin: In order to have an answer, there has to be a question. There has been no question. The hon. member is talking about money paid to senior officers to ensure mobility in the Canadian forces. He signed on as part of his participation—

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Out of control.

Mr. Mifflin: He signed on as part of supporting mobility. He cannot take his signature away from that report. It is there and it is immutable. It cannot be changed. I used to think he was credible.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Last spring, the Prime Minister mentioned that one of the ways to eliminate duplication by Quebec and Ottawa would be to let Ottawa collect all taxes from Quebecers. Last week, the Minister of Foreign Affairs again suggested this as a way to eliminate duplication.

Could the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs tell us whether the Prime Minister or the minister himself or his colleagues discussed with Daniel Johnson the approach suggested by the Minister of Foreign Affairs for reducing duplication, in other words, to have all taxes payable by Quebecers collected by the federal government and to close the Travail Québec centres?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as far as duplication is concerned, I think what we must consider here is whether both parties are acting in good faith when they want to negotiate agreements to eliminate overlap.

I may point out that before the Parti Quebecois was elected, we had signed twelve agreements with the province of Quebec to eliminate duplication. We have signed a total of 64 such agreements with the other provinces. However, since the Parti Quebecois was elected on September 12, no agreements concerning duplication have been negotiated.

My point is that the Parti Quebecois has shown it did not have the slightest interest in reducing overlap of any kind because, as Mr. Parizeau pointed out, it is not interested in making federalism work. It wants to get out. That is their goal, that is what they want to do, and that is what they are working for.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs acknowledge that the last federal proposal on eliminating duplication and overlap was an agreement on manpower which was turned down by Daniel Johnson, the Premier at the time, and by the present Minister of Labour, who both called this agreement unsatisfactory?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what the Quebec Minister of Labour called the agreement does not alter the facts.

The facts are that the federal government offered to transfer to the provinces, including the province of Quebec, all spending on educational institutions in the provinces, including both programs and money. The province of Quebec turned down this offer and in my opinion proved once again they did not want to negotiate any accommodation with the federal government.

We are prepared to make certain accommodations, but they are only interested in separation.

CANDU REACTORS

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this government has a long history of using tax dollars to fund megaprojects that end up costing us billions. Petro–Canada is just one example.

Now the Chinese premier has visited Canada and walked away with another megaproject deal. The government is planning to use the Canada account to finance Atomic Energy's sale of two CANDU reactors to China.

Does the government not realize it is broke? Does it not realize Canada cannot afford to finance a dime, never mind several billion dollars worth of taxpayers' money on this sale?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member ought to take pride in export sales of Canadian technologies. These sales are done on a basis that will provide the maximum amount of returns to the Canadian public. I can assure the hon. member this will be the case here.

The Chinese market, I do not need to remind anybody, is a very important market and is one that is growing at considerable length. It is important that this country establish itself.

On the first point regarding Petro–Canada, thanks to the minister of energy and mines we have completed the most successful privatization of almost any western country in the past decade.

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I think they gave it away.

My supplemental is to the Minister of Natural Resources, since that is who was quoted here. I quote that minister even further: "The Canadian government will no longer be in the business of negotiating massive support packages for energy megaprojects". If we are not subsidizing megaprojects at home any more, why are we considering doing it overseas where the risk to the taxpayer is even greater?

• (1445)

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me point out to the hon. member that export financing is a normal part of doing business in this country and in most other countries.

As the Minister of Finance has pointed out in relation to Candu technology, we have technology which is second to none in the world. We want that technology to help solve the energy problems of nations such as China. If we are going to compete with other nations in relation to that technology, it is important to provide export financing.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Last week, the deputy chair of the no committee, Ms. Liza Frulla, demanded that Ottawa withdraw completely from the area of culture, declaring that Ottawa had no business interfering in this area of exclusive Quebec jurisdiction.

Can the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs tell us whether it is his feeling that, in the field of culture as in the other questions raised by Daniel Johnson, Quebecers will be given no response before October 30?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, all of the questions by the Official Opposition are along the same lines and our response is that the federation, that Canada, has been very flexible in the past.

It has allowed the province of Quebec, like the other provinces, to acquire a considerable amount of power, even spending power. In the sixties, the federal government had around 60 per cent of the spending power, and now it is the provinces and municipalities which have more than that 60 per cent.

The immigration agreement is one that was signed without any constitutional amendment. It is totally possible to settle the problems that exist without constitutional amendments. And if I may remind the Opposition of one final point, it is they who refused to allow Quebec the decentralization contained in the Charlottetown Accord, while the Prime Minister approved it.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

How can the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs expect the people of Quebec to think that there would be a place for Quebec in his Canada after a no in the referendum, when we are familiar with the points of view of his Prime Minister's best buddies, Clyde Wells and Roy Romanow, and when we know that his Prime Minister systematically refuses to give any hope whatsoever and any response whatsoever to the pleadings of his allies on the no side?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there has always been a place in my heart, in my soul, in my intellect, for Quebec as a part of Canada, because it is within Canada that Quebec succeeded in developing the world's best standard of living.

It is within Canada that Quebec and the people of Quebec have succeeded in attaining a level of democracy unequalled anywhere in the world. In what country in the world could there be a leader of the opposition with the right to speak out in the House on what he sees as the future of Canada as an entity?

I am proud to belong to a country with such democratic values. I am proud to belong to a country which values sharing as Canada does. I am proud to belong to a country which redistributes the wealth of advantaged provinces to the least advantaged. And for these reasons, the men and women of Quebec will vote no in the referendum on October 30.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the health care system is a source of great pride for Canadians all across the country. It is an important component of our nation's identity. The constituents of Bramalea—Gore—Malton and indeed all Canadians are worried that their health care benefits may be reduced or eliminated.

• (1450)

Will the health minister assure Canadians that the basic principles of the health care system will never be abandoned by this government?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during the last election, this party committed to preserve the universal medicare system which all Canadians enjoy. We said we would also preserve the five principles of the Canada Health Act, but that we would work as active partners in order to make our health care system more efficient and more effective to address changing realities.

We also said that we would not support a system which offered better quality or faster access for rich Canadians versus the rest of Canadians. We have acted on this. That is what the October 15 deadline was all about. Canadians from coast to coast, wherever they live can rest assured that this government will continue to protect and enhance our health care system.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

The minister has stated before in the House that he supports uniformity of gasoline standards between Canada and the United States. As the minister is aware, this past Friday the U.S. Court of Appeals ruled in favour of Ethyl Corporation to sell the gasoline additive MMT in the U.S. This is the same substance this government wants to ban.

Will the minister admit that in view of the U.S. decision this government has no reason to ban MMT in Canadian gasoline, a substance that makes cars run cleaner?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member has a relatively recent model of motor vehicle. Mine is rather old. He should know that all the motor vehicle manufacturers, North American as well as Japanese have told us that the diagnostic systems in the new vehicles are put at risk by MMT. Consequently, warranties will not be respected by the manufacturers where MMT is used in the fuel.

This is the purpose of the gasoline. That is why it is made. That is what it is used for. Surely to goodness the hon. member would like to ensure that the industry has the opportunity to respond if indeed the determination in the U.S. continues to hold. In fact, at this time MMT is not available in fuel in the United States.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Reform has long pushed this government to conduct independent scientific tests on MMT, yet our view is scoffed at. Legislation to ban is now known not to have been based on good science at all. Obviously, the decision was politically partisan rather than to help the environment.

Will the Minister of Industry admit that Reform was right all along? Will he admit that there should have been independent tests before trying to ban it, a ban that now appears to be completely useless in view of the minister's harmonization goals?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member stands except awfully close to the petroleum companies on this particular issue.

I can tell him where we stand. We stand with the consumers. We stand with the people who are purchasing the vehicles that are using the fuel. We stand with the people who are looking to have their warranties respected. We need to have standards that are consistent north and south of the border. They are not right; they are wrong. Let them talk to the makers of the vehicles.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. Last week he said that federal buildings in the Outaouais area and elsewhere in Quebec would remain federal property until negotiations on them were concluded.

• (1455)

Will the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs acknowledge as well that common sense and reason along with the rules and practices of international law in the matter of state succession provide very clearly that, when sovereignty is proclaimed, all of the assets of the federal government located on Quebec territory automatically become the property of Quebec?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I see the opposition is opinionated, not to mention hard of hearing. This is the sort of question that makes it hard to concentrate on the goal of the referendum. The goal of the referendum is as follows: "Do you want to separate from Canada?" This is the question. All the rest are hypothetical questions, which have no bearing.

In the present matter, once again, we must not get carried away with marginal issues. What those of us on the no side want is for Quebecers to remain in the federation, because it is in their interest and in Canadians' interest for them to do so and this is why we are going to vote no.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the minister that we are talking about what he said himself. So if there is a diversion, he is the cause of it.

As Quebec has paid for over 20 per cent of all federal assets in the rest of Canada and abroad, will the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs acknowledge that Quebec will be entitled as well to its share in the ownership of these other federal assets and this is why Canada will hasten to negotiate a quick and equitable division the day after the referendum?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the statement I made is true, it speaks for itself and it stands. What is important is that, in the last week of the referendum, we can no longer divert Quebecers' attention onto such matters, we must concentrate on the basic issue, because a third of the voters in Quebec still believe they will continue to remain in Canada, even if they say yes. This is wrong. Quebecers must know the truth, and the truth is that separation will mean they can no longer live in Canada.

GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Robert Heinrich, the committee chair of federal affairs for the Liberal Association of Saskatchewan, was my opponent in the last federal election. Guess what? He has been appointed to the National Parole Board. On a daily basis, that is more lucrative work than being an MP. It pays to be a loser if you are a Liberal.

Can the solicitor general describe to the House the rigorous selection and screening process used to assess the qualifications of appointees to these plum positions?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the position was the subject of a public advertisement. Candidates submitted applications. The applications were reviewed by the chair of the parole board who carried out an interview process and made recommendations. It was on the basis of competence and merit that the decision was made.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, at least there is consistency here. A few months ago, Mr. Heinrich's campaign manager received her reward. She was appointed to the board of the Farm Credit Corporation.

My question is for anybody over there who feels competent to answer it. After all the defeated Liberal candidates and all of their campaign managers have received their lollies, what is going to be done for all of those hardworking Liberals who handed out—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton East.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

All Canadians value our well earned reputation throughout the world for being a nation with a deep respect for human rights. Canadians continue to be concerned about the human rights situation in Mexico, our NAFTA partner.

• (1500)

Can the minister tell us how the government is responding to those concerns?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me advance notice of her question.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Speaker's Ruling

Mr. Ouellet: There is some courtesy in Parliament sometimes. I certainly appreciate this. If other members want to do the same thing I will gladly accept their advance questions.

The human rights president of Mexico, Jorge Madrazo, was in Ottawa some time ago. He met with the Canadian human rights commissioner. They have agreed to exchange information, to work together and to co–operate on a very wide variety of programs which will certainly go a long way in helping Mexico to cope with its situation.

In his discussions with me Mr. Madrazo has indicated that he is quite pleased with the co–operation he is receiving from his government and hopes to see progress in this regard in the near future.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance.

At the recent Beijing conference the government committed itself to implementing gender based analysis throughout federal departments and agencies. The need for this analysis is to determine the different social and economic impacts that government policies will have on women and men.

Will his department ensure that full gender based studies in matters relating to his next budget will be undertaken and tabled in the House when the next budget is delivered?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as indicated by the hon. member, the Secretary of State for the Status of Women unveiled a new policy on gender analysis which was very highly applauded by all of the countries that were there.

In the past, individual budget decisions have been studied for their impact on women. It is therefore a major step forward that now each and every government department must look within its own decision making process to make sure no decisions are taken that are hostile to women. It is the view of the government that all decisions taken should be to their benefit.

The Speaker: This brings question period to a close.

BILL C–106—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: This morning the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan rose on a point of order relating to Standing Order 45 and the timing of the deferred vote scheduled for 5.30 p.m. this day.

His argument is that this vote should have been scheduled for 6.30 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45(6)(a), when a vote is deferred on a Thursday.

The hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader counter–argued that Standing Order 45(5)(a)(ii) allows the chief government whip to designate another time than the ordinary hour of adjournment so long as he does not set the vote down for a Friday.

I have reviewed the matter and find that the wording of Standing Order 45(6)(a) is very specific. It reads as follows:

> A division deferred on Thursday is not held on Friday, but is instead deferred to the next sitting day, at the ordinary hour of daily adjournment.

Because of this very specific wording I can only conclude that the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan has a point. Standing Order 45(6)(a) clearly states what is to happen when a deferral of a division is requested on a Thursday and a Friday.

The hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader did allude to a possible incongruity between the two standing orders. He may wish to pursue that aspect with the committee that he so ably chairs.

• (1505)

For now, and until the House changes the wording of the standing orders, requests by a single whip, acting alone, for the deferral of a division on a Thursday will be automatically set down at the ordinary hour of adjournment on the next sitting day that is not a Friday.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to the question put by my hon. colleague from Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia. I raise it under citation 485 of Beauchesne. I ask whether you ruled his question out of order on the basis of—

The Speaker: I ruled the question out of order and that is why I never permitted an answer for it. I found that the question was just not in keeping with the administrative responsibilities of anyone identifiable. I found that it was a matter of what was going on in the party and that does not include what we do here in the House for answers from ministers.

I would like to let that matter sit right there.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, is it appropriate to ask for clarification of a ruling by the Chair? Can a member ask a question for clarification purposes only with regard to a ruling and not on the basis of challenging the Speaker? I certainly understand that rule in Beauchesne, but for clarification cannot a point of order be raised?

The Speaker: Hon. members collectively have empowered me as the Speaker to make decisions on what will be in order or out of order in question period. I take this responsibility very seriously.

The hon. member has asked if he can rise on a point of clarification. If an hon. member wants clarification I will be very happy to speak with him or her in my chambers. I find that I am being asked more and more for clarification of decisions that I have taken in the course of question period. I hope that most members feel that the decisions I take are taken in the best interests of the House.

With regard to the points that come up I beg that you give me latitude so I can carry out question period in a judicious manner. Of course a point of clarification can be raised but many times when a point is raised I am led into hypothetical cases which could be misinterpreted.

Therefore, if members will agree, I would prefer that if you have points to be clarified about a particular decision I will be happy to speak to you in my chambers about it. When we keep having these discussions come up time and time again I feel that what is being questioned, not necessarily in this case but in some instances, is the decision itself. I hope you would give me enough room to make those decisions.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is in reference to the decision made by the Speaker with regard to the vote tonight.

For the benefit of all members, some who may not have been physically in the Chamber at the time of Mr. Speaker's ruling, I take it that the vote for today only, without creating a precedent, will remain at 5.30 p.m. Perhaps Mr. Speaker can indicate that.

• (1510)

Second, there has been informal consultation between the Reform Party whip and myself to bring the matter as per the Speaker's suggestion to the procedure and House affairs committee in order to attempt to make more uniform the rules as they apply to every single day of the week rather than the ambiguity which some could perceive as being in the rules at the present time.

The Speaker: My colleague, it is my understanding that if the whips of the major parties agree that the vote will be at 5.30, which I presume is the agreement reached, I do not have to ask for unanimous consent of the House.

I see the three whips in front of me now and there is no question but that the vote is going to be at 5.30 and that is so ordered.

MOTION NO. 383

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, through you I seek the unanimous consent of the House for me to withdraw my private members' Motion No. 383, now in the order of precedence, on the subject of cigarette lighters and the Hazardous Products Act. The government has already taken the action intended by my private motion since it was tabled last February 6.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion withdrawn.)

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing order 36, I am pleased to present on behalf of over 100 signators from the the riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury a petition which deals specifically with the proposal from the interdepartmental committee on household goods to remove services and change the way the federal government purchases moving services by offering all federal government moves to one carrier.

The petitioners pray and call on Parliament to direct the interdepartmental committee to drop the proposal and to work directly with the Canadian moving industry to develop other alternatives to reduce federal expenditures.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I present to the House a petition on behalf of our young children. It is a petition signed by 65,000 people. The petitioners ask the House to amend the Criminal Code to prohibit pardons for those convicted of sex offences against children.

They also ask that the Criminal Code be amended to prohibit for life all those convicted of sexual offences against children from holding responsible positions of trust and or great responsibility regarding children.

I ask the House to take seriously a petition from 65,000 citizens from British Columbia.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition that has been circulating all across Canada. The petition has been signed by a number of Canadians in Calgary, Alberta.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, considering the very unfortunate events that have taken place on the lower mainland relative to the murder of a young lady and other events relating to that, it is very timely that I received in my office today a petition to return the rights to the citizens from criminals.

• (1515)

Some of the points refer to keeping dangerous sex offenders and pedophiles locked up for life, eliminating statutory release and imposing stiffer sentences for violent offenders.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have a petition to present on behalf of my constituents.

It has been traditional that the Government of Canada divide the national defence related furniture moving business among local independent movers on an equitable basis, which policy has provided excellent service at reasonable rates.

The petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to resolve to veto any proposed change to the present tendering process of the Department of National Defence and to support the present system of tendering.

MERCHANT NAVY

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition on behalf of Surrey North constituents and other Canadians. There are about 400 signatures.

The constituents draw attention to the record of the merchant navy in World War II as the fourth arm of the armed forces and call upon the government for benefits similar to those enjoyed by veterans.

It is also my hope that the government will follow through on its commitment to recognize veteran merchant seamen who were put in harm's way due to the war.

FORESTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have two sets of petitions to present. The first group of petitioners, some 63 of them, is saying that the cutting of old growth forests diminishes the national diversity of our environment, our country, our culture and our people.

The petitioners request that Parliament order an immediate moratorium on the cutting of old growth forest reserves to promote the policy internationally.

JOB EXPERIENCE

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from 94 petitioners who say that job experience is a vital part of an individual's education and that we need to positively influence all aspects of business potential.

Therefore the petitioners request that Parliament increase the co–operative aspect between productive business enterprises and education systems.

HIGH RISK OFFENDERS

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have before me a petition that has been signed by 424 people.

These people are very concerned that high risk offenders upon their release from prison are more and more frequently committing crimes that result in serious personal injury.

The petitioners believe that there would be fewer such incidents if Parliament would enact legislation permitting the use of post–sentence detention orders. Specifically the petitioners request that Parliament pass Bill C–240 dealing with high risk offenders.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present, two of which concern the Young Offenders Act.

The first one was motivated by the sad death of Vivi Leimonis or Georgina Leimonis. The petitioners request that Parliament recognize and address the concerns stated in the petition and amend the Criminal Code of Canada and the Young Offenders Act accordingly, providing heavier penalties for those convicted of violent crime. Police departments must also be provided with adequate funds to ensure the safety and security of the public.

The second petition was occasioned by the violent death in my riding of Mr. Louis Ambas and the petitioners are primarily from my riding.

They pray and request that Parliament amend the Young Offenders Act to provide that young offenders charged with murder be automatically tried in adult court; that, if convicted, they be sentenced as adults; and that their identity not be hidden from the public.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my final petition is signed by people from all across Canada but primarily from British Columbia.

It calls upon Parliament to ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BRITISH COLUMBIA TREATY COMMISSION ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Speaker: The member for Edmonton East has the floor and has 17 minutes left.

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rose today in support of Bill C–107 respecting the British Columbia Treaty Commission and the process that has been developed in treaty making in British Columbia which included, specifically, third party consultations.

• (1520)

The process aspect of treaty negotiations has received considerable attention from TNAC members. Their demands for a more open negotiation process and less stringent confidentiality requirements have really stimulated media interest and some public criticism. The government has responded by removing TNAC confidentiality requirements. This has improved the members' capacity to consult with and to represent their organizations more effectively.

The provincial minister of aboriginal affairs, the hon. John Cashore, attends most of TNAC meetings and the federal minister has met with TNAC on four occasions including most meetings held so far in 1995. The member of Parliament for Vancouver East has agreed to be the personal representative of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to TNAC. However I will take this opportunity to introduce members of the House to some of the people participating in the treaty negotiation advisory committee and to the TNAC group.

The key treaty negotiation advisory committee member is Michael Hunter. He is a representative of the Fisheries Council of B.C. He has significant government experience as part of the federal team that negotiated the 1985 Canada–U.S. Pacific Salmon Treaty. He is a former employee of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and has been on the fisheries council for about nine years. He has served on numerous fisheries advisory committees as well as on international trade consultations. His organization, made up of the major fish processing companies, is most concerned with ensuring that claims settlements do not create more problems for the B.C. commercial fishing industry.

Paddy Greene is a lifelong commercial salmon fisherman from Prince Rupert. Mr. Greene has also been actively involved in the advisory processes of the DFO on fish allocation and fisheries management. He has served as commissioner on the Canada–U.S. Pacific Salmon Commission and was recently manager of the Prince Rupert Fishermen's Co–op. He sits as the northern representative on TNAC and chairs the fisheries committee. He has been most concerned about the implementation of the DFO's aboriginal fisheries strategy and legal sale of aboriginal fish food.

Dennis Brown is a representative of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union. Mr. Brown has risen through the ranks of the union, serving in various capacities including Fraser River organizer before becoming an executive member. He has worked effectively on easing tensions between commercial fishermen and recent Vietnamese entrants. The UFAWU includes both harvesters and plant workers, many of whom are native people. The union is most concerned about job losses in an already downsized industry. He will point to the many aboriginal plant workers and commercial harvesters as examples of how to create and maintain job opportunities for natives.

Guy Rose is a representative of the British Columbia Cattlemen's Association. Mr. Rose's family has been in the business for three generations. Usually soft spoken, he is concerned by the apparent lack of understanding some politicians have displayed concerning the impact of claims policies on third parties. He perceives that the general population is concerned by the generous benefits that may be provided. His group's main concern, however, will be continued access to provincial crown land at reasonable cost for grazing needs.

Susan Anderson, although designated as the alternate for the B.C. Federation of Labour, has attended almost all committee meetings on behalf of the president, Mr. Ken Georgetti of the B.C. Federation of Labour, and is a historic supporter of native rights. Ms. Anderson has referred frequently to the need for better compensation and adjustment programs for those industries and workers affected by claims agreements.

Bill Wimpney is a representative of the B.C. Wildlife Federation and is outspoken and direct. He is usually constructive and well prepared. He is continually mindful of the BCWF members' interests. He also chairs the wildlife sectoral advisory committee. The BCWF represents about 40,000 anglers, hunters and outdoor admirers throughout B.C. Mr. Wimpney has worked on preparing a statement on his organization's position on native issues and some bottom lines his members expect in negotiations. These relate specifically to access, endangered species protection and jurisdiction.

Marlie Beets is the vice–president of aboriginal affairs with the Council of Forest Industries and the former alternate for the Cariboo Lumber Manufacturers' Association. She is from Williams Lake and has been associated with the forestry industry for many years. COFI is most concerned about the further loss of harvestable timber resources and has indicated that minimum land transfers balanced with a larger cash component would be preferable.

Lloyd Whyte represents the interior forest industry coalition, an umbrella group for the three interior forestry organizations. He has been concerned about the cost sharing formula between Canada and B.C. and believes it will provide more land to native people in the interior than on the coast. He also chairs the lands and forest committee on which he sits as representative for the Cariboo Lumber Manufacturers' Association.

Ken Sumanik is the representative of the Mining Association of B.C. He was the chair of the energy, mines and petroleum resources committee. His organization represents large mining and exploration operators in B.C. They have indicated they are facing serious economic difficulties due to commodity prices and environmental standards. The industry is most concerned that claim settlements not impede its ability to explore efficiently developed mineral deposits. It is not so much concerned about to whom royalties are paid as long as the opportunity remains to explore and develop B.C.'s mineral and petroleum resources.

Jerry Lampert is president of the B.C. Business Council. He recently stepped down as the organization's designated representative but usually attends agenda items involving the ministers. He was appointed by the B.C. Business Council when the respected James Matkin stepped down. Representing a large, diverse group of major private sector corporations, the business council acts mainly as a group to lobby governments. It will be most concerned with ensuring ministerial participation in TNAC meetings as the best means of ensuring its views are heard by the decision makers. The council also seeks to minimize the impact of settlements on B.C. employers by ensuring that the cost of treaty settlements does not add to the tax burden of businesses.

Dick McMaster is the representative of the Fishing Resort Operators Association and the Council of Tourist Associations. Mr. McMaster speaks for a growing sector in the B.C. economy. Many of the areas seen as ideal for tourism and recreation are also priority areas for many claimant groups. Tourism and sport fishing operators will seek to ensure their continued access to and use of those areas. This includes freshwater fishing and wilderness enjoyment. Mr. McMaster has been an active member of the committee and frequently participates in committee discussions.

At a March 1994 meeting he stated:

> The more economic effort natives are involved in now, the less there will be the pressure for more land and cash when treaties are settled.

Although Richard Taylor is an alderman for the Union of British Columbia Municipalities he chairs the governance sectoral advisory committee. He chaired the early negotiations with the government to establish and define a joint third party consultation process. He has promoted the UBCM position on the need for local governments to be represented or present at the treaty negotiation table.

These are very respected British Columbians. The Government of Canada appreciates the time they have taken from their very busy schedules to participate in this very meaningful and important consultation process.

The job before these people is a great one. They carry the responsibility of representing vast interests of B.C.'s economy. They are building economic well–being not only for the immediate generation but for generations to come. They carry the responsibility of representing the vast interests of B.C.'s industry. TNAC is an integral part of the process. TNAC will develop positive, realistic and fair recommendations to enhance the negotiations.

The long term success of the process lies with the partners of the process. We need to encourage and congratulate all those who will participate.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to my colleague from Edmonton East I could not help but get a sense of one reason the bill was going through the House so quickly and with so much co–operation. Obviously it is because of the tremendous team that has been put in place and the co–operation the team is bringing to the table not only in the sectors of tourism, mining, forestry, et cetera, but in all levels of government.

My community, which is downtown Toronto, is going through a very difficult time. The brotherhood of carpenters and joiners, the drywall lathing and installation workers, a very large union of about 2,800 members, has been on strike on and off since June and has voted recently to go on strike. Less than 1,000 members decided this. At a time when our economy needs to be working at full throttle we have in Toronto a situation in which the leadership and the various principals cannot seem to co–operate. The people who are affected by this, the thousands, are suffering.

Yet here in western Canada we see a beautiful example of all levels of government coming together. All the principal stakeholders and all the various sectors of the economy have come together. We see that a piece of legislation goes through the House in no time flat. The community in western Canada and ultimately all Canadians will be the beneficiaries.

I appeal to the leadership of that very strong union in my city to use this example in British Columbia as a possible model on how to get all of those people back to work in Toronto.

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in the debate on second reading of Bill C–107 regarding the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission.

The negotiation of treaties offers Canadians a chance to look at the issue not only from a historical perspective but also from a modern reality. The tabling of this legislation on the British Columbia Treaty Commission gives us an opportunity to discuss the implications and the importance of treaty negotiations in B.C.

Members from British Columbia, including my hon. colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, understand only too well the importance of these negotiations. The history of British Columbia and the various interests speak for a process, in a sense beg for a process such as this.

This legislation reflects not only how current treaty negotiations are done but how critical they are. The situation we have today regarding negotiations is much different than when the numbered treaties on the prairies were settled. It bears discussion on the kind of relationship aboriginal people across the country have with their treaties.

I stand in the House of Commons as a representative of the Government of Canada and as an elected member for my constituents. I stand here also as someone whose whole life has essentially evolved around the whole issue of treaties in terms of the kinds of inalienable rights that aboriginal people have discussed, debated and put on their priority list throughout the years of discussing the Constitution and land settlements. The treaties have always arisen as a major priority.

If people have a sense of passion, a sense of direction and vision about their interpretation of the treaties, it comes from the fact that it is a much analysed subject but also very personal. My grandfather who is a chief, Zaul Blondin, was a signatory to Treaty 11. In that signatory I see many things not just for me but for the future of my people. In relation to British Columbia I can see the same kind of intent, the same kind of compassion, passion, dedication and determination about the process when it relates to not just one group but all of the groups. My frame of reference is from my experience. My experience is from the perspective of the First Nations.

I know the numbered treaties for the First Nations I referred to in my area, 8 and 11 in the Northwest Territories, set a very interesting perspective for the future of a people; the Dene people guided by these two treaties, the language itself, the immense vision by the people who signed those treaties, the people who had the vision. It was not colloquial. It was not parochial. It was not odd and simple. It was very visionary.

This language, as long as the grass grows, as long as the sun shines, as long as the rivers flow and as long as this land shall last, are not just words. They have given the opportunity for aboriginal young people to have post–secondary education. They have given the opportunity for people of aboriginal descent, no matter where they live and who are treaty, to have accorded to them the appropriate health programs and services to deal with taxation issues, health issues, hunting and fishing rights and related issues and issues still debated like housing. Those issues are being constantly debated.

The numbered treaties in the prairies were signed in advance of settlement. The government of the day sought to ensure that certainty and title were confirmed before Europeans settled in what are now Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Although certainty was the intention, the issue is yet much debated, the treaty is much debated, and most of the results are as of yet lacking definition or implementation and are not at all conclusive. That also begs for a process and hence we have the British Columbia one.

There needs to be certainty. There needs to be very clearly spelled out the future for aboriginal people. I have a document called "Sovereign Injustice—the Forcible Inclusion of the James Bay Crees and Cree Territory into a Sovereign Quebec". On page 5 it talks about the unilateral alteration of aboriginal treaties:

Existing land claims treaties provide for a permanent federalist arrangement and include federal and Quebec governments (as well as aboriginal peoples) as parties. How can the PQ government claim it would be legal or legitimate for a secessionist Quebec to unilaterally alter existing treaties with aboriginal peoples in Quebec? On what basis could Quebec claim it can simply take over existing federal treaty obligations and unilaterally determine that the Canadian government would no longer be a party to the treaties concerned?

That question has a lot to do with certainty. Aboriginal people feel this is their homeland. They have an inalienable right, as my colleague from Churchill indicated earlier on in debate, that aboriginal people feel they have an inalienable right to this country. They cannot be separated from this country because it was the creator who put them here. They did not come from somewhere else.

Treaties have a number of interpretations, some very spiritual. It is not only legal analysis, it is also a spiritual commitment, a spiritual determination that the aboriginal people have that relationship with treaties.

In British Columbia the situation was much different. Certainty over the land question was never resolved prior to settlement. As a result we are now dealing with a situation that presents challenges that did not exist at the time the early treaties were concluded. Much development has occurred in British Columbia. There has not always been that attempt for partnership.

In Canada and in the world there are no entities unto themselves that feel they can exist without partnership.

• (1540)

Aboriginal communities understand with good measure what there is to be gained from those partnerships and of working together with other groups which is happening across the country, including in British Columbia, in the Queen Charlotte Islands. In the Haida Gwaii we have the first ever bicultural model, a Haida Gwaii trust. This is a trust fund between non–aboriginal and aboriginal people that resulted from an arrangement that came about with the federal government, the provinces, industry, as well as the aboriginal peoples themselves.

These things can happen but they are not easy. No one will tell anyone familiar with the negotiation process that it is simple or easy. It is not. However it is necessary. It is necessary to go through rough waters. It is necessary to have a dialogue that is challenging.

One of these challenges is the need for the government to represent third party and public interest at the treaty table. Let me put it this way. Those third party interests in terms of the treaty negotiation advisory committee are well represented. The list was read previously by the member for Edmonton East. It explained there is representation and fairness there. There is nothing secretive or conspiratorial. It is an open process and very transparent.

Canada recognizes the need to consult with third parties and to provide information to the public if treaties are to be lasting and beneficial for all Canadians. Some of my colleagues and I have spoken on a number of occasions about the importance of an open treaty negotiation process. How can we best as a government address the challenges in the areas of taxation, health, education, justice, policing, hunting and fishing rights, to name a few, in a global sense without a proper process?

This year this negotiation process will lend to and aid this whole situation. Nevertheless, many people continue to falsely believe the treaty process in British Columbia is secretive, conspiratorial, that the whole truth is not being told and that a special deal is being made. This is not the case. This belief has been fostered by a lack of awareness, understanding, compassion and sensitivity. If those people were as informed as they should be this would not be the case.

Information is a great enlightener. It pays to read and it pays to go to the source to negotiate to be with those people. Go to the source and meet with those people. That is what this country is all about.

The negotiation of treaty under the auspices of the British Columbia Treaty Commission process is not one based on backroom deals or secrets. The treaty process has never been as open and as transparent as it is in British Columbia today.

In B.C. we have set in place a province–wide treaty negotiation advisory committee made up of 31 organizations representing major economic sectors in that province. There was a time when this group operated under confidentiality rules. This is not uncommon. It happens when people are dealing with issues they feel deserve that kind of arrangement.

Today, however, when providing advice to the government on treaties being negotiated under the B.C. Treaty Commission an openness protocol is at work. Many of the recent TNAC sessions have had and will likely continue to have media present. How much more open can it be?

On local and regional levels negotiators meet regularly with regional and local advisory committees to discuss the topics being addressed at the treaty table. Of course this is part of the consultation process and allows public and third party interests direct access to the negotiators. That accessibility is one way of demonstrating to people that there is not any kind of conspiracy or a cover–up. It is a partnership.

As far as actual treaty table talks, one of the items to be initially discussed during the readiness stage is the procedural document referred to as the openness protocol.

These openness protocols have been agreed upon by the three parties at the table, the federal and provincial governments and the First Nations. Many of the treaty table members of the public and third party advisory committees can, if they so desire, attend and observe main table negotiation sessions. So it is open and people are welcome to attend.

I know of one instance, the Sechelt treaty negotiations, where negotiation sessions are videotaped and replayed on the local cable station. I cannot imagine a more open process than that. I was in Sechelt in my previous incarnation, if I might, as the critic for the aboriginal portfolio for the Liberal Party. Their process on self–government, which is renowned throughout Canada and the world, has also been very open. The Sechelt people do not have anything to hide. They have a lot to be proud of and a lot to share, and they do.

I assure members the public has not been shut out of the process; rather, it has been invited in and encouraged to attend. We are well aware the treaty process cannot happen in a vacuum. The public and third parties need to know about and be involved in the process. We encourage their input and involvement.

This is a fairer process, much more acceptable than the kind of imposing process previously engaged in. Now it tends to be more of a partnership, one of equality. Maybe that is what is so objectionable to some.

There are many threads the negotiation teams need to weave together for the modern treaty process to work, including representing the Canadian public and federal government at the treaty table, balancing effective negotiations with openness, ensuring the consultation process is an accountable one, and providing the public and media with timely information. Under the B.C. Treaty Commission process all of these threads are coming together. We are only at the beginning of the process, but we are moving toward strengthening the social, economic, and legal fabric of British Columbia with regard to land claims.

In Canada the treaty process has a past that forms an integral part of our history. It has a present. Many of us here in the House of Commons have seen the passage of modern treaties, as in the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement and the Inuvialuit Final Agreement. It has a future through the passage of legislation establishing the B.C. Treaty Commission and the negotiation and settlement of treaties under its auspices. That is why I am here today, to help usher in Bill C–107 and to ensure the job of treaty negotiations can continue in the province of B.C. so these negotiations can ultimately reach a successful conclusion.

Treaty making is a world known process. Treaty making is done between nations. Treaty making is done between various groups. It is an honourable process. It is not a process that begs criticism or any kind of misunderstanding. It is an honourable process. It is a process that will allow partnerships to develop. It is generally a process of honour that when you have made a treaty it will help to deal with some of the tougher questions governments have to deal with. It solidifies for governments, for communities, for peoples the programs and services. The arrangements that are made become clearer. They should, anyway.

In the myriad of claims and the whole conglomeration of land questions regarding title in British Columbia, with the whole issue of hunting and fishing, fishing rights and the Sparrow case, let us hope this process will lend some clarity, some definition, some partnership that will allow these groups to come to some conclusion and reach some of the results that have long been sought after and long wanted.

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I believe I have two questions for the hon. member. One is in relation to the time element here.

We know this process has been going on for a considerable amount of time. The only reference I noted concerning time, which I believe was in the agreement of September 22, which this bill is based on, was in relation to funding, where it said "the first five years". Does the hon. member foresee this as a long, ongoing process again, or do we have a five–year or ten–year objective here?

My second question relates to the bill. I think clause 3 says the commission will assess the readiness of the principals to participate in the negotiations. What kind of authority does the word assessment mean? Does it mean it will assess and advise the principals that they are ready or not ready, or that it will assess and tell the principals that they can or cannot negotiate?

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, on the whole issue of time, the only answer I can give is what has been prescribed in the working documents of the bill. I believe the member mentioned five years. For instance, Treaty 11 goes back to 1921.

Each treaty has a life of its own. We should say that the B.C. Treaty Commission has been set up to facilitate the negotiation of modern treaties in B.C. Once the process is completed the B.C. Treaty Commission will no longer be required. The B.C. Treaty Commission agreement states that the principals, Canada, B.C., and First Nations Summit, "shall terminate the BCT upon completion of their duties under their agreement or where BCT is no longer performing its duties". It is based on whether it is able to complete its work or not. Once its mission is completed, then as a mechanism the commission will essentially be disbanded.

The member talked about the authority. I do not have the answer to that. I can take it under advisement. I am sure the appropriate departmental officials are watching and will be able to get back to the member with an answer.

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak in this debate on Bill C–107, following the member for Western Arctic. She has referred to her grandfather, a signer of Treaty 11 in the early 1920s, and talked of the passion, vision, and wisdom of the men who signed that treaty. I can tell the House and those watching the debate today that those qualities are very much in evidence in the granddaughter, in our hon. friend the member for Western Arctic. I would like to pay tribute to her as my colleague in the House, in caucus, and in cabinet for the qualities she brings to issues such as this. She contributes so much to assist us in our deliberations. It is indeed a pleasure to speak following her in the debate.

The events this summer in British Columbia and in Ontario have made all members of the House painfully aware of the tension in native communities across Canada. This is the result of years of injustice and poverty. This government is resolved to overcome these problems through the new partnership it envisages with Canada's First Nations. One of the first and most important unresolved problems in this relationship and in creating a better relationship between aboriginal peoples and other Canadians is the question of treaties in my home province of British Columbia.

I remind the House that British Columbia is unique in Canada, in that the process of signing treaties has never been completed. Only a handful of treaties were signed in the pre–Confederation period. These include the Douglas treaties of southern Vancouver Island, the area that includes my riding of Victoria, which indeed were signed by Governor Douglas with the First Nations of the area in a very farsighted move. In 1899 Treaty No. 8 was signed with the First Nations of the Peace River area in northeastern B.C. Generally speaking, British Columbia is without a treaty system. In the rest of British Columbia the issue of aboriginal rights remains largely unresolved due to hundreds of years of neglect by successive colonial, federal, and in particular provincial governments.

The First Nations have wanted to resolve these problems. Repeatedly they have pressed for treaties, but only in this decade did the provincial government have the willingness to negotiate with them and with Ottawa. Previously it maintained that there was no need to negotiate and it said that whatever rights to land and resources the aboriginal people may once have had were extinguished long ago. The result was decades of legal acrimony as the First Nations sought settlement through the courts of what they were unable to achieve through the negotiations process.

I would like to mention in particular one case of great importance. In 1973, more than 20 years ago, the Supreme Court of Canada was asked in the famous Calder case whether aboriginal title to the Nisga'a traditional territory had been extinguished. Chief Frank Calder, with whom I had the privilege of sitting in the British Columbia legislature and who is now a constituent, a friend and adviser of mine, led the way in achieving recognition of aboriginal land title. In that case all six justices accepted that aboriginal title had existed in the past. Three ruled that it had been extinguished, but three ruled that it was unextinguished and that the government was obliged to negotiate treaties.

Since then the federal government has accepted the need to negotiate treaties in British Columbia. We have been negotiating with the Nisga'a people for these last 20 years, but resolution of the negotiations was next to impossible without provincial participation because of their responsibility under our Constitution for crown lands. That changed in 1990 when Jack Weisgerber, who was then the minister for aboriginal affairs in the province of British Columbia, announced that the province of British Columbia was willing to drop its traditional opposition to tripartite negotiations. It was this announcement of Mr. Weisgerber, who is now the leader of the B.C. Reform Party, that paved the way for the B.C. Treaty Commission.

I would like also to pay tribute to Mr. Weisgerber's premier at the time, Mr. Vander Zalm, who was responsible for this major breakthrough in the attitude of the British Columbia government toward the question of negotiation with First Nations people.

Today Mr. Weisgerber is leader of the provincial Reform Party and apparently is an opponent of this negotiating process, like his federal Reform brethren. I find it sad and ironic that Mr. Weisgerber, who should be proud of his role in the historic process of resolving this longstanding injustice, is now renouncing what is in my mind the finest moment of his political career.

I would ask the federal Reform Party to support the old Jack Weisgerber, the old Social Credit Jack Weisgerber, who was willing to help break a 120–year of pattern of injustice, and not the new Reform Jack Weisgerber, who wants to continue with the 19th century attitudes into the 21st century.

Many critics of this process, including many in this House, have emphasized the high costs of settling land claims. Indeed, there will be costs. I look at the Sun newspaper of Thursday, October 19, where the title on the city and region section says "$10 billion figure baffles Ottawa". There is cost to settling land claims. When we are trying to settle issues that should have been resolved over a century ago, there will be a cost, a cost for long delay as well as the cost of the settlement itself. But there are also steep costs if we keep putting negotiations off and if we keep putting them off any further than now.

For example, in 1991 a Price Waterhouse study indicated that every year land claims go unsettled in British Columbia the province suffers the following consequences. $1 billion in potential investment in forestry, mining and other resource sectors is lost. Second, 300 jobs which would otherwise be created are not created. Third, 1,500 jobs are adversely affected. Fourth, $125 million in capital investment is lost or deferred.

That is the price of inaction as outlined by the Price Waterhouse study. It is the price the critics of the process would have us continue to pay year after year until eventually it would be the courts which would force governments to pay billions more than they would have to pay if we settled these negotiations and these matters through fair, open negotiations with the First Nations people.

To help achieve this goal the B.C. Treaty Commission was established. It consists of five commissioners, five outstanding British Columbians, who represent the interests of all the parties to the negotiations. Two of the commissioners are nominated by the First Nations Summit, one by the provincial government and one by the federal government. The chief commissioner is duly selected and appointed by all three of the principals, namely the First Nations leadership, the federal and provincial governments.

The First Nations Summit includes all the First Nations in B.C. which have agreed to participate in the B.C. Treaty Commission's six–stage treaty negotiating process. The summit provides a forum for First Nations involved in the treaty process to meet and discuss negotiations. As one of the principals of the process it continues to provide direction along with the governments of B.C. and Canada.

Carole Corcoran was elected by the First Nations Summit as one of its first treaty commissioners. She also sat on the royal commission on Canada's future from 1990 to 1991. She serves on the board of governors of the University of Northern British Columbia. Unfortunately she had to resign recently.

On October 4 the First Nations selected Miles Richardson of Haida Gwaii as the second First Nations treaty commissioner. Mr. Richardson was a member of the B.C. claims task force which reported to the governments of B.C. and Canada and the First Nations on how the parties could begin negotiations to build a new relationship. Mr. Richardson's appointment is pending order in council approval at this time.

The First Nations Summit has also elected as one of its commissioners Wilf Adam of the Lake Babine Indian Band. Mr. Adam, a former chief councillor of the band, is chairman of the Burns Lake Native Development Corporation and is co–founder of the Burns Lake law centre.

The British Columbia appointee is Barbara Fisher, formerly general counsel and Vancouver director of the Office of the Ombudsman. She currently practises part time as counsel to the B.C. Information and Privacy Commission.

Since last April the Government of Canada's representative on the commission has been Peter Lusztig, a professor of finance at the University of British Columbia. He also brings considerable breadth of experience from the community, having sat on B.C.'s royal commission on automobile insurance and the B.C. commission of inquiry into the tree fruit industry. In 1991 he also chaired the Asia–Pacific initiative advisory committee which was struck by the federal and provincial governments.

Since last May the chief commissioner, the fifth commissioner, has been Alec Robertson, Q.C. The legal community is familiar with his past work as president of the B.C. branch of the Canadian Bar Association, as chairman of the Law Foundation of British Columbia and as a member of the gender equality task force of the Canadian Bar Association.

I have given some details of these individuals to show all members of the House that the B.C. Treaty Commission consists of five distinguished Canadians who are doing their utmost to ensure that the comprehensive claims process moves along in a timely and orderly manner.

It was mentioned earlier that one area where much progress has been made is with respect to consultation with the citizens of British Columbia and the rest of the country. That is of course consultation outside of the responsibilities of the First Nations and the two governments.

One of the recommendations contained in the commission's annual report which was tabled in the House last week is: "Canada and British Columbia make full use of their consultative processes so that the community at large will be confident that their voices are heard and their concerns are considered". This government strongly supports that recommendation. An effective dialogue, an effective exchange of accurate information is absolutely essential to concluding sound and sustainable treaties in British Columbia.

Governments are using a number of consultative mechanisms to ensure that third parties affected by the treaty process voice their perspectives, their concerns, their interests, their ideas. We heard from one of the previous speakers on the government side, the hon. member for Edmonton West, how the treaty negotiations advisory committee provides advice to both governments on sectoral issues on a province–wide basis. To ensure that the interests of regional parties are being addressed, the negotiating teams work with local sectoral groups to form regional advisory committees, RACs as they are called.

There is an overall umbrella of 31 organizations to which the member made reference which cover the general interests of people in the province. In addition, there are the local bodies or the regional advisory committees. They are formed in areas where negotiations are beginning. They include representatives from the local non–aboriginal governments as well as from a variety of sectors such as industry, business, social services, resources and environment.

The establishment of a regional advisory committee is one of the conditions for the British Columbia Treaty Commission declaring a negotiating table ready for negotiations to commence. Eight regional advisory committees have been established in communities across British Columbia so far.

The lower mainland regional advisory committee, which meets in Vancouver, provides advice to the provincial and federal teams that are or will be negotiating with the Burrard, the Katzie, the Musqueam, the Squamish and the Tsawwassen. Issues which are of concern to this regional advisory committee include the use of federal crown lands, treaty settlements, Stanley Park, taxation and provision of services to the aboriginal community.

The Bulkley–Skeena regional advisory committee located in Smithers provides advice on negotiations with the Gitksan, Wet'suwet'en and the Gitanyow. Their concerns centre on the use of lands and resources, particularly forest and fish. Governance is also an important component.

On my own Vancouver Island there are two regional advisory committees. The west island RAC in Port Alberni is working with the negotiators for the Ditidaht First Nation and the Nuu–Chah–Nulth tribal council to ensure that the interests of local communities are addressed. Issues such as interim measures, fishing, forestry and environmental concerns are being addressed.

The south island RAC covers Victoria and extends north to Nanaimo. There are currently two First Nations in the first phases of the negotiation process, the Temexw and the Nanaimo. As other First Nations enter the treaty process, this regional advisory committee will be expanded to include representatives from additional interest groups.

There are others. There are a total of eight in other parts of the province. I will not go into each one in turn but to say that the overall system of regional advisory committees is well in place. It is working well and all local interests in those areas are involved in the negotiation process.

The regional advisory committee sets its own terms of reference including the meeting times, locations, subjects for discussion, openness of meetings and membership. The regional advisory committees are becoming more active in areas where the parties are moving into framework negotiations.

Despite the regional advisory committees and despite the umbrella organization discussed by my colleague, there have been public criticisms of the consultative process. Concerns have been raised that the interests of non–aboriginal people were not being properly represented at the negotiating table. As has been indicated by my colleague from the Western Arctic, this is incorrect. In order to dispel many of these concerns, federal and provincial representatives have made significant efforts to convey information about the treaty process. Local community officials are contacted for input on appropriate representative organizations for inclusion on any RAC being formed in their area.

The treaty commission process ensures that both the federal and provincial governments are responsible for representing the non–aboriginal interests at the table. It is the role of both governments to listen to all these other interests, to consider their positions and their views and to develop a balanced negotiating strategy that fairly represents the interests of the communities involved, as well as of course the interests of the province as a whole and the country as a whole.

This government recognizes that the treaty process is important to everyone and will affect not only aboriginal people. A consultation process that works effectively is critical to the success of the treaty making process. The federal government is committed to consulting non–aboriginal people and third parties throughout the negotiating process.

Third party interests have been active in British Columbia throughout the treaty negotiations to date. They will continue to play an important role as these negotiations progress. The challenge before us is to ensure that we continue to develop a new relationship that encourages open dialogue and permits us to carefully consider all available options.

It was a pleasure to rise today to speak in favour of Bill C–107.

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have one question of the hon. member which relates to the five commissioners.

I realize the act states in the beginning that it is the chief commissioner plus four and there is quite a good dissertation on how the four are selected, including the chief. I do not quite understand how this fifth one came to be. In that relationship also in the term of office, I understand the chief commissioner is a three–year term of appointment and the others are for two–year terms. Does the hon. member know if there is any number of reappointments or consecutive terms, that type of thing?

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, yes the fifth commissioner who is of course the chair of the representatives, is chosen through consultation among the two governments and the First Nations who are part of the treaty process. It is done essentially by a consultative process and agreement in principle on an individual.

That was the case with Chuck Connaghan who served as the first chief commissioner and who set up the process. It was also the case for Alec Robertson who is currently the chief commissioner.

With reference to the period of time, I understand the member is correct. There is a set period of two years but reappointment is quite in order. If any of the organizations, be it either of the governments or the First Nations people, wish to reappoint one of their appointees, that is perfectly in order and would happen. It is also true that the chief commissioner can be reappointed, although I have to say that is my understanding rather than my firm knowledge. I will get absolutely accurate information for the hon. member.

It is important to make sure that in such an organization with five people in it we do not come to the end of the period of appointment and then start afresh with new commissioners. As the hon. member quite correctly pointed out in her question to the hon. member for Western Arctic, this is a difficult issue with respect to time. A continuity of personnel will be most important in making sure that we do not slide backward at any point in the process. I will get the actual terms dealing with the period of appointment for the hon. member.

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak in support of Bill C–107 today.

In 1990 Price Waterhouse estimated, as the hon. member who just spoke indicated, that about $1 billion of expenditures involving up to 1,500 jobs in the mining and forestry sector were likely to be affected if claims were not resolved. When we hear these numbers we must keep in mind that these are only two industry sectors and this study was over five years ago. In that report Price Waterhouse indicated that comprehensive land claims generate uncertainty for companies operating in British Columbia. I will get back to the factor of uncertainty.

Factors creating uncertainty include right of access to land and resources, possibility of production or shipment disruptions affecting reliability as suppliers, and possibility of unsatisfactory compensation if a company is affected by a land claim settlement.

Forestry and mining companies reported that they required a premium to invest in British Columbia rather than elsewhere because of the uncertainties related to comprehensive claims. Currently the premium is generally less than 1 per cent but it is expected to rise in the future. As indicated, the economic impact on the province of British Columbia is substantial.

The report goes on to indicate that uncertainty surrounding settlement of the land claims issue will ultimately have an impact on the provincial economy. It is estimated that almost $1 billion of currently proposed mining and forestry industry investments could be affected by the non–settlement of comprehensive land claims, although land claims are generally not the only issue to be resolved before development can proceed.

The economic impacts of such delays or cancellations could be summarized as follows: $50 million of capital expenditures could be lost each year; $75 million of capital expenditures could be delayed resulting in both lost opportunities and continued operation of less than efficient plants; and some 100 jobs stand not to be created each year because of the economic uncertainty. Such loss of growth of primary industry jobs means that the service sector will also be impacted and grow more slowly. Using generally accepted employment multipliers this is equivalent to a further 200 jobs not created throughout the province each year which might otherwise materialize.

The report indicates based on the projects identified in the survey that ultimately some 1,500 permanent jobs could be impacted, together with related indirect and induced employment.

It is important to refer to particular parts of the report because of the details contained therein. It is important to look at different aspects. There is reference made to the mining industry. The situation is a bit different at the mining development stage. A number of the participants indicated that they expected difficulties from unsettled land claims. Together the projects the participants indicated they had problems with represent about $680 million in capital expenditures.

Extrapolating the results and analysing expected impacts, Price Waterhouse estimated that the mining investment of about $100 million a year was likely to be affected by uncertainties related to comprehensive land claims in British Columbia. This represents about 12 per cent of annual private and public capital investment in the British Columbia mining industry. Based on the survey results about half the projects affected were expected to experience delays of about three years. The other half were expected to be cancelled.

Along with these losses one has to look at another ancillary loss, legal costs. Comprehensive land claims in British Columbia result in legal costs to governments, companies and native organizations estimated by Price Waterhouse at about $5 million a year.

In 1987, it is important to note, forestry, logging and wood products, manufacturing and pulp and paper manufacturing accounted for about 30 per cent of the GDP of the goods producing industries of the province of British Columbia and about 10 per cent of the province's GDP. In 1988 the industry was responsible for 87,000 direct permanent jobs representing about 6 per cent of total employment in British Columbia. The multiplier effect creates at least two more jobs for each direct job. Thus 261,000 jobs in British Columbia can be attributed to the forestry industry, 17 per cent of the total provincial workforce.

Mining, oil, gas and related manufacturing account for about 15 per cent of goods producing GDP and about 5 per cent of the provincial GDP. This is half the size of the forest industry in terms of GDP contribution.

We must note the Price Waterhouse study was completed over five years ago in March 1990. A lot has happened in the resource industry and on the land claims front since that time. However the one thing that has remained consistent is the need to establish certainty in the province of British Columbia through the negotiation and settlement of land claims.

The study conducted by Price Waterhouse involved leaders in the mining and forestry industries including senior executives, presidents and vice–presidents of companies, as well as general managers, chief foresters and managers of exploration and woodland operations. This is a critical point to understand the real impact of the lack of certainty on the land claims front to resource development and the impact the study has had in the industry. It signals the very broad recognition by industry from the boardrooms out to the field. The issue cannot be more emphatic. The settlement of land claims is long overdue.

Price Waterhouse reported that unresolved, comprehensive land claims generate uncertainty to companies operating in British Columbia, as I have already mentioned. I will mention it again to emphasize it for third party members and get through to them that it is an important factor.

Factors creating this uncertainty include the right of access to land and resources. For these companies the most important factors affecting the premium include future uncertainties regarding the outcome of injunctions related to land ownership or access, the possibility of production disruption, and future considerations regarding royalties and taxes.

The respondents to the Price Waterhouse survey generally agree that companies, employees and governments all pay the cost of uncertainty related to comprehensive land claims. The survey respondents also agreed that generally the higher cost could not be passed on to consumers because the resource sectors in British Columbia sell on world markets and are price takers. None of the respondents reported having considered compensation for comprehensive claims when applying for federal–provincial government funding. Very few respondents actually reported having applied for government incentive programs in the past.

These are very real concerns in resource based sectors in the province of British Columbia that consequently the economic stability not only of that province but the rest of the country as well.

There has been considerable action on the claims front since the study was done. The province of British Columbia has entered into the negotiation process and over 47 nation groups in the province of British Columbia have submitted statements of intent to negotiate.

The federal government is committed to resolving the uncertainty issues caused by the lack of treaties in B.C. The tabling of legislation for the creation of the B.C. Treaty Commission is one step toward the resolution of uncertainty.

There is no doubt in anyone's mind that the Price Waterhouse numbers demonstrate a clear and resounding indication of the impacts and the costs associated with not resolving land claims in the province of British Columbia.

We know we are losing over $1 billion in investment and over 1,500 jobs in mining and forestry. The door is open to resolve the land claims issue, to achieve certainty and to move forward. We must act. The opportunity is here today with the B.C. Treaty Commission legislation.

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's comments with regard to the issue.

A number of bands in B.C. have not agreed and have refused to sign on. They are actually arguing with other bands over who has what lands. Yet the member is saying to go ahead and spend the money with no commitment from the other bands. I do not understand this at all. It will be an ongoing argument between the bands and there will be no settlement.

He blames this for impeding industry. It will impede industry. I will not disagree with that. It will not impede industry as much as the government has since it was elected. The government's regulations have tied up mining far tighter than any land claim agreement. Even the mining and logging industries would agree with that.

I fully understand that land tenure is a big problem in Canada. However that is into the area of provincial jurisdiction. They are trying to put the horse before the cart. It has already taken place without the legislation passing through Parliament and I do not understand that either. Maybe you can answer some of my questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before I give the floor to the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn, I remind members to direct questions and comments through the Chair.

Mr. Bodnar: Mr. Speaker it is nice to know that members of the third party recognize that this uncertainty is having an impact on industry in Canada. Hopefully, rather than being critical of what is being proposed, the third party will propose whatever it believes may be better. If its proposals are better we can discuss them.

It is interesting to note the land claims, overlapping claims and the problems with them. Of course it is voluntary and entrance is voluntary. However it is hoped that as we proceed the parties and other groups in British Columbia will see the process is working. Since it is voluntary, hopefully other groups that are somewhat reluctant will join the program.

A step has to be taken. We cannot throw our arms in the air and say that we have this problem but will do nothing about it. We cannot say that. We have to try to bring the matter to a resolution and help industry and people in the province of British Columbia and elsewhere in Canada bring the matter to a head. I just wish the hon. member had some constructive suggestions on how this matter could be dealt with if he is not happy with the process we have introduced.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I too am very pleased to speak to Bill C–107. This is a very important bill and is long overdue. However the understanding should be that we are now at this stage and let us get on with it.

Today marks the culmination of a long and at times very difficult struggle. It is born of British Columbia's history and is the product of many years of hard work and a lot of acrimonious debate.

The issue of aboriginal rights in B.C. has remained unresolved for years. The negotiation process has gone on for decades. Many people have played a part. Many times the negotiators did not understand the cultural differences they were dealing with.

My comments this afternoon will be very short. I will address only what one company in British Columbia has done to improve cross–cultural awareness which not only improves relations but improves business for all concerned.

Aboriginal and non–aboriginal people often work in the same circles in both the private and public sectors, yet the level of awareness across cultures is often lower than it should be. Misinformation about the culture and beliefs of First Nations can create tension within an office and across the boardroom table. This tension negatively impacts on interpersonal and business relations.

One of the best ways to increase knowledge about First Nations is through cross–cultural awareness training. An example of this is what I am going to speak about today.

B.C. Hydro is a leader in this field. Once B.C. Hydro realized the benefits of working with aboriginal peoples it developed the aboriginal cross–cultural awareness training program to increase employee knowledge of First Nations culture. "Taking an interest in learning about First Nations issues was the first step in improving relationships between two cultures," says Patrick Kelly, training co–ordinator of B.C. Hydro.

The program has been so successful it is now offered to organizations outside B.C. The hydro program was developed in collaboration with aboriginal people and is delivered by First Nations people familiar with community, corporate and government operations.

The program has three levels. Participants start with an information session about First Nations history, culture and languages. An overview on relationship building and conducting business with aboriginal people is also presented. Participants then progress to the next level which provides in depth information about a specific aboriginal group relevant to the client. The client also has the opportunity to acquaint the aboriginal group with its structure and interest. The third level of the program includes a facilitated face to face meeting between the client and the aboriginal group.

To date B.C. Hydro has provided training for several organizations and businesses such as CN Rail, the Union of B.C. Municipalities, the Insurance Corporation of B.C., and the B.C. Lottery Corporation. Reaction to the program has been very positive. Two CN Rail employees who recently attended the session noted that the training will strengthen partnerships with First Nations and stimulate new ideas and strategies.

Cross–culture awareness training can assist any organization that deals with First Nations. Ian Tait, B.C. Hydro's manager of business development and communications says: "In light of the current treaty making process in B.C., it has become even more important for companies to build stronger relationships with First Nations". I am sure anyone who is wishing to have information on this could contact someone at B.C. Hydro with regard to its aboriginal cross–culture awareness training program.

I have recently been assigned to the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage. If ever we are to have an interest in the heritage of this country and who probably has the most to gain or to lose, we certainly have a lot to gain by knowing our aboriginal and our First Nations people and knowing more about their history and their culture. It is important that we understand what their culture is and try to work with it. If First Nations would understand our culture too, I believe that all in the community would be better served and business would be better served.

My comments are very short. It is only to create awareness, which in turn will give better understanding, which will lead to a resolution and hopefully, passage of Bill C–107.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I remind the House that we are presently at the last stage of debate on Bill C–107, in which members are entitled to a 10–minute maximum intervention without questions or comments.

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–107. As a member of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development, I know the importance of the bill. I will spend a few moments talking about the federal government's perspective on the B.C. treaty negotiations.

The federal government has a dual objective in entering into treaty negotiations: to achieve certainty as to the rights and obligations of all lands and resource users; and to establish a new relationship between First Nations and other citizens. It is important as Canada evolves to achieve a better relationship between our native people and the rest of Canadians.

The interests which Canada brings to the treaty negotiating table are outlined in the preliminary document dated June 27, 1995. This was prepared by the federal treaty negotiations office.

The Government of Canada has primary jurisdiction over issues such as financial benefits, governance and fisheries, while in other areas such as lands and wildlife it may exercise varying degrees of authority. Although the federal government does not have primary jurisdiction over all the topics which will be subject to negotiation, it has nevertheless declared its interest in every area. Overall, in concluding treaties in B.C., Canada's interest is ensuring that fairness, affordability, clarity and durability are present.

The federal government has also identified its specific interests in negotiating the key components of the treaty. Those key components are lands and resources, financial benefits and governance. Let me outline some of the key elements of each of these components.

In the area of lands and resources, we want to ensure the conservation of resources for the future use and benefit of all Canadians. We want to ensure that we promote and integrate a co–ordinated approach to land and resource management. We also want to identify and consult with all interested and affected third parties and deal with them equitably. We obviously have to respect the legal rights of all of our citizens. The promotion of self–reliance of the First Nations is important and is one of the reasons I sit on the parliamentary committee. Last, with respect to lands and resources, we must safeguard Canada's over–arching obligations.

In the area of financial benefits, we want to ensure in concluding agreements that they are affordable for all Canadians. That is very important. I believe we can work together with all parties to make sure that happens. We also have to ensure that there is no burden to Canada's economy and taxpayers.

Most important, we must ensure there is fairness and equity among all the treaties concluded in B.C. and elsewhere in Canada. That is important for our government. We talked about that in our red book, that there be fairness and equity in all of our conclusions when we do these treaties. The last and most important one is promoting self–reliance in the First Nations communities.

The main elements in the area of governance are establishing new relationships with First Nations. That is an important element for us. We are always striving to do that. I am watching this happen more and more in my committee. We are looking at it in a subcommittee on education of which I am also a member. We are looking at how those new relationships can be built so that First Nations can take their proper roles in the country.

We want to establish clear and harmonious jurisdictional arrangements among all levels of government. We also want to maintain Canada's over–arching sovereignty and the application of the charter of rights and freedoms.

We must make sure that First Nations institutions of government are democratic and accountable. This is coming more and more into play. Our native people want to be more democratic and accountable for their ongoing performance in Canada.

We want to recognize the unique needs of various First Nations. That is very important as well. There are so many unique needs of our First Nations people. Through this treaty and this commission those needs, unique as they are, can be highlighted and accentuated.

The means whereby Canada will achieve its interests will be determined through extensive consultations with third parties and ultimately through a process of negotiations with the First Nations and British Columbia.

What is the vision for post–treaty British Columbia? The federal government has a vision for British Columbia after treaty negotiations have concluded with the province's First Nations. Canada seeks a society in which new relationships are forged with First Nations, a relationship obviously based on respect and trust, one that reconciles modern Canadian realities with the traditional native aspirations.

Although Canada has a vision of what it would like to see at the end of the day, there is no prescription to define this new relationship. It will be built on a process, that trust I talked about, the respect I talked about. That will be negotiated by the three parties: the First Nations, Canada and British Columbia.

The fundamental elements of Canada's vision for post–treaty B.C. include certainty, equity and finality, practical arrangements, and opportunities for economic development. That is very important because our First Nations are striving to build their communities. They are striving to be more independent, but that independence can only come if there is economic opportunity and development, if native people can forge their design and abilities around economic development and make their communities more productive. That would give the independence and self–reliance which is so important for our First Nations people.

We have to make sure that the vision is workable, efficient and cost effective with these governance arrangements. What we will see in this vision at the end of the day are healthier First Nations. Nobody wants that more than the First Nations people themselves.

Last, we want more harmonious relations and better neighbours. That goes without saying. I am very pleased to have had the opportunity to speak on Bill C–107 and, obviously, very pleased to support it.

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as a new member of the aboriginal affairs and northern development committee, I am pleased to rise and speak on Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission.

The B.C. treaty commission will be charged with the task of facilitating treaty negotiations, including the implementation of the inherent right to self–government. The bill will help all of us to understand something of the complexity involved in this process and something of the patience that is required. It will also help us to understand what that elusive phrase "inherent right to self–government" means.

Self–government will be dealt with at the same treaty table as other items such as land and resources. The same principles and practices of openness which currently characterize the B.C. treaty making process will also apply to self–government negotiations.

The federal government will not establish additional processes. These negotiations will be with the aboriginal groups that are involved in the existing treaty process in B.C. As the act outlines, the current chief federal negotiators who work out of the federal treaty negotiation office will represent Canada in self–government negotiations.

The budgets allocated for the B.C. treaty making process and managed by the treaty commission will support self–government negotiations.

It is federal government policy to implement the inherent right of aboriginal people to self–government and it will focus on reaching practical and workable agreements on how self–government will be exercised. Rather than trying to define it in abstract terms or through lengthy and costly litigation, while there are different views about the nature, scope and content of the inherent right, negotiations among governments and aboriginal peoples are preferred over litigation. Consultation and co–operation, not confrontation.

It seems to be without cause for any contradiction that in our modern society, and perhaps because we tend to follow practices from south of the border, that we are becoming less and less able, sometimes in government and civic affairs and interpersonal relationships too, to sit down and solve some of these problems without the help of high priced lawyers and legal experts. We could give many examples of the increasing cost of this sort of thing. Many of us have had first hand experience of that. I applaud the thrust of this bill.

Given the different circumstances of aboriginal peoples, implementation of the inherent right cannot be uniform, nor will it result in a one size fits all form of self–government. There are 625 First Nations in Canada and I am sure we would find at least 450 different interpretations of what the inherent right means, depending on whether these are the Crees of northern Quebec or the members of Walpole Island or the Sechelt in B.C. Therefore there are 625 negotiations to be completed.

It would do us well to remember that for 200 years we have treated our aboriginal people in a paternalistic way. They see themselves as occupiers of this land before our ancestors arrived. They see themselves as people who agreed in a peaceful way to share that land with us. All too often our answer, when they were outnumbered, was to ignore them completely and push them on to the poorest land we could find and call it a reserve.

Self–government arrangements will be tailored to meet the unique needs of aboriginal groups and will be responsive to their particular political, economic, legal, historical, cultural and social circumstances.

The inherent right of self–government immediately does not include a right of sovereignty in the international law sense and will not result in sovereign, independent aboriginal nation states. On the contrary, implementation of self–government should enhance the participation of aboriginal people in Canadian federation and ensure that aboriginal peoples and their governments do not exist in isolation, separate and apart from the rest of society.

It is envisioned that these agreements about self–government will provide for the aboriginal First Nations a form of government somewhere between municipal government or provincial government where they will have self–government authority over the immediate day to day lives of their people and they will have a continuing relationship with the federal government.

Lest we feel that these things are all going to be done very quickly and expeditiously and that Bill C–107 suddenly outlines the path before us with sign posts that will be met one after the other, it might be wise to summarize some of the subject matter that will be open to negotiation in the first instance, in other words the scope of these negotiations.

They will involve the establishment of governing structures, internal constitutions, elections and leadership selection processes; membership; marriage; adoption and child welfare; aboriginal language, culture and religion; education; health; social services; administration and enforcement of aboriginal laws; policing; property rights; land management; natural resources management; agriculture; hunting, fishing and trapping on aboriginal lands; taxation in respect of direct taxes and property taxes of members; transfer and management of moneys and group assets; management of public works and infrastructure; housing; local transportation; licensing, regulation and operation of businesses located on aboriginal lands. Subject matters beyond those integral to aboriginal culture or strictly internal to an aboriginal group are open to negotiation.

In these instances, primary law making authority would remain with the federal or provincial governments as the case may be and would prevail in the event of a conflict with aboriginal laws.

These matters need to be understood and negotiated. They would include such things as divorce; labour and training; administration of justice issues, including matters related to the administration and enforcement of laws of other jurisdictions which might include certain criminal laws; penitentiaries and parole; environmental protection, assessment and pollution prevention; fisheries co–management; migratory birds co–management; gaming; and emergency preparedness.

The third heading is subject matters where it is essential for the federal government to retain its law making authority. These are grouped under two headings in the act: the powers related to Canadian sovereignty, defence and external relations, international diplomatic relations in foreign policy, national defence and security, security of national borders and international treaty making; immigration, naturalization and aliens; international trade, including tariffs and import–export controls.

Other national interest powers involve the management and regulation of the national economy, the maintenance of national law and order, the protection of health and safety of all Canadians, federal undertakings and other powers including broadcasting and telecommunications, aeronautics, navigation and shipping, maintenance of national transportation systems, postal service, the census and statistics. While law making power in these areas will not be the subject of negotiations, the federal government is prepared to consider administrative arrangements where feasible and appropriate.

The policy principles on which self–government negotiations will be based are the following: the inherent right is an existing aboriginal right under the Canadian Constitution. Self–government will be exercised within the existing Canadian Constitution. It should enhance the participation of aboriginal peoples in Canadian society. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms will apply fully to aboriginal governments as it does to other governments in Canada.

Due to federal fiscal constraints, all federal funding for self–government will be achieved through the reallocation of existing resources as outlined in the 1995 budget. Where all parties agree, rights in self–government agreements may be protected in new treaties under section 35 of the Constitution as additions to existing treaties or as part of comprehensive land claims agreements. Federal, provincial, territorial and aboriginal laws must work in harmony. Laws of overriding federal and provincial importance such as the Criminal Code will prevail and the interests of all Canadians will be taken into account as agreements are negotiated.

Members have spoken previously about respect and trust which are absolutely essential. Another essential element if Bill C–107 is going to fulfil its promise and if we are going to get land claims on the road to settlement will be patience.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak in support of Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission.

It is important that we go back to the last Parliament when the Liberal members from eastern and western Arctic came to the House and made sure that parties on both sides of the House were fully acquainted with some of the difficulties, frustrations and road blocks that our First Nations have had over the years in trying to get some of these outstanding treaties resolved.

I can reflect back to our very first year as rookie members of Parliament. Mr. Speaker, I remember being with you and our caucus colleagues when we spent a long weekend in Iqaluit. We were all immersed in the community and the culture. Many of us realized that old expression "out of sight, out of mind" reflected what has been going for many years with many of our First Nations communities.

As I mentioned, the members from the eastern and western Arctic urged us on and we as a caucus and now as a government are fully participating in ensuring the realization of some of those priorities which interest the First Nations are becoming legislation.

It is also a tribute to the government, specifically to the minister responsible for Indian and northern affairs. As one of our members mentioned earlier, some of these issues have been on the books for over 100 years. We just keep putting these treaties aside. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development probably had to twist some arms, because this has always been a tough issue to get on the front burner and get to the point where it becomes legislation on the floor of the House.

Today we can celebrate. Maybe there are some members in the opposition who do not like the process that is evolving as we get the issue resolved, but I am happy to hear that in spirit they are essentially supportive of the legislation. I think that is fair ball. There is always room for improving the process in this place.

At times it strikes me as funny that the Reform Party tends to come from a background where they want less government, less red tape, and the activity around this particular bill has been that. A lot of entrepreneurial people from all levels of government and all sectors of the economy have worked together in a very constructive way. They have worked expeditiously, and now when they seem to be getting some real results the Reform Party is saying hold on a minute, we are getting a little head of ourselves; let us not be too efficient here, because we have to make sure that the MPs ratify this and place the seal of Parliament on it before we confirm or negotiate transactions.

The Reform Party should know that all of those discussions and activities and exploration that have taken place are really conditional upon the work in the House. The Reform Party should not get too upset about the process, as long as in the end we get this resolved. I think that is where we are all coming from.

I have worked over the last six years with my colleague from the Western Arctic, who has made me as a city member of Parliament much more aware of some of the difficulties some of our first peoples are having trying to get their dreams, policies, and objectives resolved. I believe all members would agree that our member for the Western Arctic has been very passionate about making sure that her communities and her people have been represented in this Parliament over the last six years.

On behalf of my constituents in downtown Toronto, we support the government on this bill. We hope that our first peoples, with the help of this bill, will realize a good part of the dream they have been working on for so many years.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in today's debate on a bill respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission.

I should start by congratulating the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs, for succeeding in bringing this matter before the House, a very difficult task because of the full parliamentary calendar, and in convincing us all of the importance of this bill because it is indeed a very significant bill.

I see that some of the members across the way do not share my opinion but this is nonetheless what I think about the whole issue.

• (1705)

In May 1991, the Government of British Columbia made a commitment to ensure that the province would pay its fair share in the settlement of the land claims in question.

In June 1991, the provincial minister of aboriginal affairs announced the approval in principle of the establishment of a treaty commission in charge of co–ordinating the start of land claim negotiations, as recommended by the task force that had been set up for this purpose and whose members included representatives of the various levels of government.

In November 1991, the federal minister of the day, the hon. Tom Siddon as you may recall, approved 19 of the recommendations in the task force's report.

In December 1991, the Premier of British Columbia, Mike Harcourt, and the provincial minister of aboriginal affairs, Andrew Petter, approved the task force's recommendations regarding the land claims in B.C.

In the next 10 months, representatives of Canada, British Columbia and the summit negotiated the agreement on establishing the British Columbia Treaty Commission. The agreement on the BCTC specifies the commission's role, membership, financing, location, duties, powers, decisions, immunity, mandate and reviews.

On September 21, 1992, the Government of Canada, then represented by Prime Minister Mulroney and Minister of Indian Affairs Tom Siddon, the Government of British Columbia, represented by Premier Mike Harcourt and Minister of Aboriginal Affairs Andrew Petter, and the leaders of the First Nations summit formally approved the commission's constitution by signing the agreement on the British Columbia Treaty Commission.

The agreement on the BCTC requires the principals to establish the BCTC through legislative means. The federal and provincial governments agreed to adopt legislation to achieve this goal, while the summit agreed to pass a resolution to that effect.

To enable the BCTC to start operating as soon as possible, commissioners were appointed on an acting basis by provincial and federal orders in council dated April 13, 1995 and April 14, 1993 respectively and by a summit resolution dated April 5. These orders in council gave the commissioners the authority to carry out the agreed mandate pending the adoption of legislation to establish the BCTC as a separate corporate entity. This is of course the beginning of the process we are involved in.

On April 15, 1993, chief commissioner C.J. Connaghan and commissioners Lorne Greenaway, Barbara Risher, Carole Corcoran and Doug Kelly were appointed to the BCTC.

On May 11, 1993, the Summit passed a resolution to fulfil its role and support the establishment of this entity. On May 26 of the same year, the provincial bill was assented to pending the implementation of a federal statute. Political parties support the BCTC legislation.

The hon. Tom Siddon, acting on behalf of the federal government, and the province of British Columbia managed to complete their negotiations on cost sharing by June 1993.

In December, the BCTC started accepting statements of intention to negotiate from First Nations in British Columbia.

You can see the series of events that finally led to us debating this bill in the House today.

In April 1995, Alec Robertson was appointed chief commissioner and Peter Lusztig and Wilf Adam commissioners, while Carole Corcoran and Barbara Risher were re–appointed. Adjustments were made to expiring mandates. Some commissioners were re–appointed and, in other cases, new ones were appointed. On October 5, 1995, the Summit accepted Ms. Corcoran's resignation and designated Miles Richardson to replace her as the First Nations' representative.

I would now like to take a moment to look at the duties of this commission we are in the process of officially establishing. The duties of the commission are as follows: to assess the readiness of the parties to begin negotiations, the parties being of course Canada, British Columbia and the first nations; to finance the participation of first nations in the negotiations, in accordance with pre–established criteria; to encourage timely negotiations; to maintain a public record of the status of negotiations; to assist, at their request, the parties to the negotiations in obtaining dispute resolution services; and to report on the status of negotiations to the Parliament of Canada and to the British Columbia legislature.

In the few minutes that I have left, I want to discuss the status of negotiations. Forty–seven groups are engaged in the BCTC process. These groups represent 77 per cent of the 196 first nations in British Columbia. For those who are not from that province, it always comes as a surprise to hear that there are 196 first nations in British Columbia. In my riding, which you know well, I have the honour of representing the Akwesasne first nation, which is a Mohawk nation.

This is not the time to talk about some of the problems which exist in that region of the country. However, I hope that, at some point, during a parliamentary debate, I can express my wish that the problems which we have been experiencing in the Akwesasne region can end, so that all can live in peace and harmony, and enjoy a degree of prosperity, while complying with the laws passed by this Parliament.

I now go back to the progress made regarding the legislation before this House. The parties have indicated their readiness to negotiate. The negotiators signed framework agreements concerning, for example, the Teslin, Ditidaht and Gitanyow nations. The federal Minister of Indian Affairs, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, signed framework agreements concerning the Sechelt and Gitksan first nations. He also signed other agreements concerning the transborder land claim made by the Champagne, Aishihik and Wet'suwet'en first nations. I apologize to aboriginal members for not pronouncing these names properly, but it is not out of disrespect.

I hope that the House will quickly pass this bill, which is so important for these negotiations. I also hope that all members of this House will support this bill. Mr. Speaker, as you may remember, there was a rather sad episode in this House about a year ago when we discussed the issue of land negotiations in the Yukon. A parliamentary committee even had to sit throughout the night in an attempt to have a bill approved in committee.

Indeed, the committee sat all night, until six or seven in the morning.

Needless to say that I hope we do not have to suffer such delays, and that we will proceed as quickly as possible to pass the bill currently before the House.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

CULTURAL PROPERTY EXPORT AND IMPORT ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act, and the Tax Court of Canada Act, as reported (without amendment) from the committee.

Hon. John Manley (for the Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Manley (for the Minister of Canadian Heritage) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

[Translation]

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House for third reading a bill on the creation of a mechanism to allow appeals of decisions made by the Cultural Property Export Review Board.

[English]

Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act, and the Tax Court of Canada Act, passed second reading on October 3. I thank my colleagues for their comments in the House and the progress of the bill. I thank those who gave input at the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage.

The purpose of this bill is to establish an appeal mechanism against decisions by the Cultural Property Export Review Board concerning fair market value of cultural property offered as a gift to museums, galleries, archives and libraries in the public sector.

The mechanism is twofold: first the donor or the recipient institution may ask the Review Board to reconsider its first evaluation of fair market value. Donors who have obtained a second evaluation from the Board and are still dissatisfied may then go on to the next stage, appeal of the Board's decision to the Tax Court of Canada.

As announced in the February 1990 federal budget, the responsibility for determining fair market value of cultural goods donated to designated Canadian museums, art galleries and libraries is transferred from Revenue Canada—Taxation to the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board.

• (1720)

The legislative amendments implementing this change became law in December 1991. In January 1992 the review board assumed this new responsibility.

Inadvertently, no provision for appeal from decisions by the board was included in the amendments, despite the fact that a right to appeal had existed previously.

When Revenue Canada still had this responsibility, the lack of an appeal mechanism had raised considerable concern among donors and custodial institutions. The Minister of Canadian Heritage, in co–operation with the Review Board, undertook a series of consultations with the community concerned on the need for an appeal process.

Subsequently we decided to propose legislative changes that would provide for the right to appeal to the Tax Court of Canada. Why should we adopt this bill?

[English]

What we want to do through this legislation is restore a natural right that existed up to 1991. With these amendments we have actually proposed two avenues of appeal over disputes concerning the fair market value of donations of cultural property to museums, art galleries, archives, and libraries.

The two tier process is effective in that it gives donors a chance to obtain satisfaction more quickly without having to go to court. The latter process is always very long and costly for all parties concerned.

This mechanism is not only a boon to present and potential donors of cultural property. It is not only essential for museums, art galleries, archives and libraries, as present and potential beneficiaries of donations of cultural property. It is important for Canada as a whole and for all Canadians, now and in the future. It encourages donations of items that are outstanding examples of our heritage, so that these can be preserved, exhibited and appreciated, for the greater benefit of future generations.

The Minister of Canadian Heritage is responsible for a department where the concept of heritage is given its broadest possible meaning. Heritage means the set of values we share and the signs by which we recognize ourselves as being members of a group and, indeed, a country.

Today, we can no longer restrict the meaning of heritage to what we have inherited from the past. Heritage is far more than just a collection of historical remains. Canada's heritage is first of all an expression of the ties that bind its citizens and of the unique identity of this country within the international community.

One could say that the concept of heritage cannot be separated from our identity. In the present economic situation, the concerns of heritage and identity are sometimes seen as redundant or of lesser importance.

[English]

Heritage and natural identity lie at the heart of economic and fiscal matters, for they animate and inspire the people and activities that drive the economy.

[Translation]

As a result of the various ways in which it interacts with other commercial enterprises, the arts and culture sector generates considerable expenditures which stimulate a direct demand for goods and services produced by other industries.

In 1992–93, the direct and indirect financial impact on GDP totalled more than $24 billion.

• (1725)

More than 600,000 corresponding jobs were created directly and indirectly the same year. The amendments we are proposing to the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act will consolidate the sectors of the arts, culture and heritage by making it easier for those who give valuable cultural property to museums, art galleries or libraries.

Investing in our arts, culture and heritage is investing in our collective future. These amendments are therefore of the highest importance to all Canadians, and particularly to the 60 million visitors to our art galleries and museums annually.

I would like to point out here that Canada's museums were the first of its cultural institutions to be established. For example, what is now the Canadian Museum of Civilization was founded in 1881. It can be difficult for museums, galleries and libraries to acquire new collection items. They have not escaped the financial challenge of these difficult times.

They have had significant cuts to their funding. Our museums, our art galleries and our libraries must therefore depend on the generosity of Canadians from all walks of life, on people who could have made money selling their artifacts, on people who, instead, have generously given them to us forever.

To offset the drop in funding faced by our museums, art galleries and libraries at the moment, it is our job to come up with ways these cultural and heritage institutions can acquire cultural property that will enrich their collections. Collections are not simply the irreplaceable assets of museums, art galleries and libraries, they are their raison d'être.

Policies and activities involving collections are among the basic mechanisms museums, art galleries, archives and libraries use to define and carry out their mandate. Museums, art galleries, archives and libraries may find it very difficult to complete their collections, for reasons such as rapidly increasing costs.

That is especially true for some art galleries, following the rapid increase in prices on the art market. The speed with which new products appear on the market make it very difficult for museums of science or history to show up to date collections. Donations of cultural assets to the collections are of definite financial value.

For instance, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act concerns a very large range of cultural items, including works of art, historical artifacts, natural science specimens, archives or scientific and technological material of historic significance. Our government has committed to supporting the cultural sector in Canada. Data produced by Statistics Canada show that the Government of Canada remains by far the one that supports the most the cultural sector in Canada. The government wants to go on doing so by continually seeking new ways of promoting the development of the cultural sector.

Innovative structural changes such as Bill C–93 will support the cultural sector without increasing the burden of Canadian taxpayers, so that they can donate their cultural properties instead of selling them to other countries. Canadians must be able to benefit from tax incentives such as those resulting from this legislation. These incentives encourage people to increase their support for our museums, art galleries and libraries.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary will certainly have the opportunity to conclude her remarks after the deferred division.

LAW COMMISSION OF CANADA

The House resumed from October 19 consideration of the motion that Bill C–106, an act respecting the Law Commission of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.30 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45 the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the second reading of Bill C–106, an act respecting the Law Commission of Canada.

Call in the members.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 11 petitions.

UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to commemorate, in the name of the government, one of the most important events of the century: the creation of the United Nations Organization on October 24, 1945.

Fifty years ago, the first signatories of the UN Charter, including one of Canada's greatest prime ministers, Mackenzie King, gathered together in San Francisco to work out their vision of hope for humanity.

Amid the ruins of a devastated world, our predecessors firmly believed that, for the sake of humanity, they had to build a better future. They also knew that peace and development were not a matter for a few countries but one for the whole planet and all its peoples.

Today, as we contemplate the achievements and turmoil of the past 50 years, one thing is clear: the UN is a universal organization, not only because almost all the countries of the world are members, but because it is involved in all fields of human activity.

From peacekeeping and peacemaking to education and the fight against poverty; from human rights and development to the environment, human health, refugee assistance and programs to promote economic stability and growth; from democratization efforts to initiatives to share technologies and improve food and agriculture, Canada can be proud of the progress made by the UN in improving the fate of millions around the world.

But we can also be proud of our contribution to these efforts. We Canadians were among the first to sign the charter. It was also a Canadian, the late lamented John Humphrey, who wrote the first draft of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948.

[English]

It was my predecessor, Lester B. Pearson, who helped usher the UN into adulthood. Among his valuable contributions to the UN, none was more visionary than his proposal to help set up the first peacekeeping operation in 1956 during the Suez crisis. Since then, more than 100,000 Canadians have served in over 30 peacekeeping missions around the world, without mentioning our contribution to the Korean war. Today I want to pay tribute to those who have served and those who have died in the service of peace and in the service of the United Nations.

Canada has worked through the UN to fight for the rights of the poor and the underprivileged, to promote respect for the environment and to push for disarmament. We have consistently been one of the largest suppliers of food aid. We have assisted in missions to monitor elections in many parts of the world.

The International Civil Organization is based in Montreal. The Food and Agriculture Organization was founded in Quebec City and just last week celebrated its anniversary by holding a major conference there.

Canada has played a leading role in the International Atomic Energy Agency as well as in many other UN specialized agencies. We have served on the Security Council in every decade since the UN was created and we have recently declared our intention to run for a security council seat for the 1999–2000 term.

[Translation]

And last year, Canada announced that it would nominate the City of Montreal as the future home of the Secretariat for Biodiversity.

[English]

As we stand here today at the beginning of the next chapter in UN history and on the threshold of the 21st century, I am pleased to state that Canada remains firmly committed to the United Nations system. I pledge our continued support for the UN's goals.

I had the honour of addressing the United Nations General Assembly in New York last month. I outlined what Canada believes should be the UN's main priorities for the years ahead. This government believes the UN should pay particular attention to three main objectives: preventive diplomacy, rapid reaction and peace building.

All of the components of the UN system must help identify and resolve tensions before they generate into conflict. When preventive diplomacy efforts fail, the UN must be able to intervene quickly and effectively on the ground.

In New York I tabled Canada's report on how to increase the UN's rapid reaction capability. I was encouraged by the positive attention given to our recommendation.

Alongside these efforts, the UN must continue its ongoing work of peace building and articulate the visions of development centred on the individual and one that balances the economic and social agendas for the purpose of improving the well–being of society.

Just as the world has undergone many changes since 1945 and has had to adapt to new requirements, modern technology and fiscal restraints, so must the United Nations greet its future with a strategy for revitalization to meet the challenge of the next century. Those challenges often arise quickly and harshly. Canada will continue to hold out its hand to the UN to help ensure that the general assembly, the security council and indeed the whole UN family are best able to meet the needs of the future in a co–ordinated, efficient and fiscally responsible manner.

The UN has accomplished great things in its first 50 years. There have of course been setbacks. We can make the UN better, however we cannot hope to make it better when some countries do not pay their dues. Countries can pay their dues and they should now. That is not to say that we cannot reform the scale of assessments to reflect current economic realities. We should and without delay.

The UN at 50 should take stock of what it has done, how it has done it and how it can do things better in the future. We must look back and reflect on the spirit that carried the architects of the UN forward. Their vision was bold. Their challenges were great.

Today we are faced with universal problems that threaten the achievements of the last 50 years. Unlike 50 years ago, we have a proven universal mechanism that can help us meet those challenges. Let us make it stronger and better. That is the challenge for the years to come.

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have this opportunity today to speak on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois on this fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the United Nations Organization.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs gave a relatively appropriate picture of the past achievements of the UN, the challenges facing it today and the role played by Canada.

In my comments on this anniversary, I would like to focus on two main issues which I feel are fundamental and which may have been purposely avoided by the minister.

First, the matter of promoting human rights and democracy. Second, since this is the era of globalization, I would like to discuss that very typical characteristic of the UN, its universality. The UN's membership includes nearly 200 countries, 28 of which joined since 1990.

First, human rights and democracy. As I listened to the Minister of Foreign Affairs say how proud he was, and rightly so, of Canada's contribution, adding that it was a Canadian, the late John Humphrey, who wrote the first draft of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, I could not help thinking of this government's lax approach to promoting human rights and democracy.

Considering that this government has refused to commit itself to recognizing the results of the referendum to be held next week in Quebec, it is somewhat surprising to see the minister holding forth at the United Nations and recalling the UN's achievements in promoting human rights and democracy.

That takes some nerve, I must say. And coming from a government that has decided from now on to focus exclusively on business interests and literally to turn its back on promoting human rights and democracy, it is downright embarrassing.

The late John Humphrey must be turning over in his grave today. The Bloc Quebecois has strongly criticized and condemned Canada's abdication of its historic responsibility for human rights and democracy.

Before I finish my comments on this first point, I will read one of the most interesting recommendations made by the Bloc Quebecois in the dissenting report of the Special Joint Committee reviewing Canadian foreign policy. The Bloc Quebecois recommended that the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade and CIDA, working in co–operation with NGOs and business corporations, draw up guidelines to give concrete expression to the key components of Canada's foreign policy respecting democracy and human rights.

Among other things, these guidelines could include a mandatory framework for analysing situations involving gross and reliably attested human rights violations. They were to be formulated as soon as possible and made public no later than the UN's 50th anniversary celebrations scheduled for October 24, 1995. But October 24, 1995 is today, and what is the government tabling? Nothing, nothing tangible on promoting human rights and democracy. What an opportunity lost by Canada.

These guidelines were to serve as inspiration for new legislation and regulations to govern the transactions of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, CIDA, NGOs and business corporations with states belonging to the international community.

We felt that Canada's foreign policy, as it concerns democracy and human rights, should be more consistent and absolutely honest and open, so as to maintain the respect and prestige Canada had acquired, which a sovereign Quebec would certainly have been able to perpetuate.

Today there is every indication that this will be the case if Quebecers vote in favour of sovereignty on October 30. More than ever before, and this is again borne out today, it is high time that Quebec was finally able to participate fully in international politics, realize its aspirations and defend its own interests. Faithful to its democratic values of openness and tolerance, Quebec fully intends to stress greater concern for humanitarian aid and equality among nations.

This brings me to my second point, the universal aspect of the UN and the lessons to be learnt. I would like to refer now to several quotes from the secretary general of the United Nations' speech on nationalization and globalization at the first conference of young leaders, May 24, 1992.

The timely words of the UN secretary general are even more timely today. He said: "In order to enter into a relationship with another, we must first be ourselves. For that reason, the first prerequisite for the proper globalization of our modern life is a solid sense of identity. Excessive or misunderstood globalization might result in the creation of a kind of cultural soup, one uniform culture, which would do nothing positive for the world".

A sound sense of identity. Such was the message of the secretary general of the United Nations. This in fact is really the code for access to the world, a body of cultural references. According to the secretary general, the United Nations is that body of cultural references.

Now, what is the situation concerning cultural identity and cultural reference for Canada and Quebec? English Canada, we agree, needs solid anchor points in order to cope with the invasive American culture. Quebecers, on the other hand, base their identity on Quebec first and foremost. Therein lies Canada's whole problem; it is based on the assumption of a single nation, with one and the same culture, the so–called Canadian culture.

This denial of the existence of Quebec as a historically constituted nation disavows the existence of two founding peoples. Canada is, therefore, having serious problems defining itself. It is, in fact, a country still in search of an identity. Its existential problem is that it is torn in two directions by a dual identity. Recalling the words of John A. McDonald at the time Canada was created: "We have created Canada; now we must create Canadians", we in Quebec are saying "We have created Quebecers; now we must create Quebec".

To return to my main theme, the concept of the nation–state: a nation is, first and foremost, a shared desire for a shared life. It is the first step toward universalism. Universalism itself, therefore, is nourished by nation states. The secretary general's speech illustrated the value of another underlying principle of universality, and that is sovereignty. He expressed it as follows: It is the art of making unequal powers equal. Without state sovereignty there is a danger of chaos, a danger of destroying the very instruments of international co–operation".

He continued as follows: "A world in order is made up of independent nations, each open to the other, respecting their differences and their similarities".

This is one of the most essential messages, perhaps the most essential one, we can glean from the United Nations Organization, that great international institution which embodies these essential values more than any other body. This is why we believe that a sovereign Quebec will be able to participate fully in international life in its own right, bolstered by a solid identity, a solid anchor point, a single and unique cultural reference. Then it will be able to communicate with other nations, with the universal, to use the terms of the UN secretary general. It will do so by assuming its fair share of the obligations imposed upon it by its allegiance to the values of democracy, peace and justice.

There is no doubt whatsoever that this is the spirit within which a sovereign Quebec will assume its responsibilities on the international scene. Since Quebec is faithful to these values, there is no doubt in our minds that the United Nations will open its doors wide to us the day after our accession to the status of a sovereign state.

[English]

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, 50 years ago the charter of the United Nations mapped out many high principles. These were noble aspirations but the reality of the UN has not lived up to that dream.

For decades the UN has remained incapable of acting forcefully to achieve those principles. The primary problem is that it cannot adequately finance its operations. If the UN is to respond to the many global problems which exist it must have sufficient resources to do the job. Since it has not been doing its job effectively, it is difficult for the UN to take the moral high ground and pressure its member states to pay up.

What is required is major reform and the sooner the better. Without this I cannot blame some of those in default for not paying their bills. Why invest in an operation that is so bureaucratically top heavy, inefficient, and many times ineffective?

A further problem with the UN is the inefficient way the specialty agencies operate. Studies have found significant overlapping and duplication of work, limited responsiveness as well as a lack of transparency. In these agencies the UN has a tough time getting its job done. Certainly this is something that has created a number of institutional obstacles.

There are many areas where the UN should be improved and overhauled for the 21st century. To begin and most important, Canada must insist the UN eliminate the duplication and waste which contributes to its ineffectiveness. If the UN is ever to recover from its current crisis, this is an absolute prerequisite.

Furthermore, Canada must take a proactive and constructive role in reforming the UN so that it can better live up to its original goals of collective security, freedom, justice and human development. Canada is a respected player in the UN and we can provide effective leadership in the reform process. This will be extremely important going into the 21st century.

We must also strengthen the UN to attack the root causes of conflict, lack of democracy, poverty, abuse of human rights, intolerance and the uncontrolled spread of military technologies. In addition, many of the environmental problems which have emerged over the past several decades cannot be remedied without effective international co–operation. A revitalization of an effective UN would greatly help in all these areas.

The minister mentioned peacekeeping. This is a very important duty of the UN in which Canada has played no small part. Canadians attach a great deal of importance to our country's peacekeeping tradition but times have changed and peacekeeping is becoming more perilous and unpredictable. Therefore, this Parliament must establish clear criteria to make sure that our scarce peacekeeping resources are used where they can be most helpful and not used where conditions are unacceptable. We must realize that Canadians cannot participate everywhere. Our men and women in uniform have served the cause of peace very honourably for years and we are very proud of them.

Never again should our troops be left to twist in the wind, as happened in Bosnia, while the government in Ottawa failed to remove them for months and months from a dead end mission where the mandate could not be carried out properly.

In conclusion, the UN faces many challenges over the coming years. If this 50th anniversary celebration is to mean anything, then we must address these challenges head on. The UN will not survive unless it becomes effective, accountable and transparent in all of its activities. These are the changes that we need. These are the changes that the Reform Party will support.

INDUSTRY

Mr. John Godfrey (Don Valley West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Industry entitled "Performance Benchmarks for Small Business Financing by Banks: A Progress Report".

I am particularly pleased to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this report is supported by members of all three political parties on the committee.

The report follows up on the committee's second report to the House "Taking Care of Small Business". It sets out a framework for banks to report their small business loan statistics to the industry committee on a quarterly basis. This data will allow the committee to track the performance of the banks in their relationship with small and medium size businesses and to select specific benchmarking issues for future investigations.

The committee will hold meetings with the banks to discuss this report and related matters during the week of November 6.

AGRICULTURE AND AGRI–FOOD

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 10th report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food which deals with Bill C–61, the agriculture and agri–food administrative monetary penalties bill.

After very fruitful discussions with departmental officials and all others concerned, I am proud to report the bill with several amendments.

I also would like to thank all committee members for their co–operation, and the staff and departmental officials who expedited the discussions very well.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Ms. Susan Whelan (Essex—Windsor, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present four petitions that have been signed by the constituents of Essex—Windsor.

The first petition has over 2,400 signatures and is from members of the CAW local in Windsor. They urge the government to implement an emergency surtax on the profits of banks and other financial institutions to pay off the deficit.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Ms. Susan Whelan (Essex—Windsor, Lib.): The second petition calls on Parliament to act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child through amendments to the Criminal Code.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Susan Whelan (Essex—Windsor, Lib.): The third petition deals with the social issue regarding same sex relationships.

GUN CONTROL

Ms. Susan Whelan (Essex—Windsor, Lib.): Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition on behalf of my constituents concerning gun control.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. The particular petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

CFB CHILLIWACK

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will present several petitions today. They have come in over the summer and this fall and are from people in British Columbia.

• (1030)

The petitioners say that over the last 10 years Canadian taxpayers have invested millions of dollars in infrastructure at Canadian Forces Base Chilliwack. The Canadian taxpayer will have to absorb any loss incurred by shutting down CFB Chilliwack and replacing that infrastructure elsewhere. This is the last army base unit in B.C. and the only military base in the lower mainland and in the entire British Columbia region. Due to its favourable climate CFB Chilliwack is able to provide optimum year round training.

Therefore the petitioners are calling upon Parliament to re-examine the closure of CFB Chilliwack to see if perhaps it should not stay open.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CULTURAL PROPERTY EXPORT AND IMPORT ACT

The House resumed from October 23 consideration of the motion that Bill C-93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be read the third time and passed.

The Speaker: When Bill C-93 was last before the House the hon. member for Mississauga East had 28 minutes remaining for debate. Therefore I now recognize the hon. member for Mississauga East on debate.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the tax incentives provided in the Cultural Property Export and Import Act are for all Canadians and not only for the wealthy.

The act has been in effect for almost 20 years, that is since 1967. It has evolved and it must continue to do so in order to encourage Canadians to keep within the country those objects that are part of our heritage. The more Canadians are aware of the existence and purpose of this legislation, the more they donate interesting property related to our heritage.

Indeed, we notice an increase in the number of gifts made to public institutions and authorities responsible for keeping such property and making it accessible to ordinary citizens, the rich as well as the poor, now and in the future.

Economic considerations are not the only reasons underlying this bill. It is also important to make sure that our cultural heritage remains here in Canada. When the original legislation was passed, it did not include any deterrent to prevent the sale of Canadian cultural property on the free market. Consequently, Canadians have forever lost many important elements of their culture and heritage.

These objects were sold abroad and have become the property of public and private collections throughout the world. This is a major and permanent loss of heritage for Canadians.

Cultural and heritage institutions in Canada have a long and proud history.

[English]

Our first museums had an educational purpose: to organize and transmit knowledge in the natural sciences. For example, the first known museum in Canada dates back to 1831, when the Halifax Mechanics Institute opened a public museum and reading room. Later came the establishment of the arts museums. By 1903 Canada had 21 museums. Today our museums are respected and renowned worldwide.

[Translation]

The Canadian Museum of Civilization is one of those renowned institutions which attract visitors from all over the world. People come here to admire its distinctive architecture. But what would that magnificent building be without its collections? Without their artifacts, works of art and books, our museums, galleries and libraries would only be empty buildings, rooms and walls.

Bill C–93 will ensure that the collections of Canadian museums, art galleries and libraries are up to date, diversified and exciting.

• (1035)

Canadians are increasingly interested in their heritage. They expect the government to play a role in developing heritage collections. Bill C–93 is an attempt to meet these expectations.

An article in The Ottawa Citizen in October 1994 described the importance of gifts of cultural property for Canadian museums. Here is the story of one such gift.

Ainslie Loomis was a university student in 1939 and regularly visited Britnell's bookstore in Toronto. One day, while browsing through a box of old books, she came across an album of photographs entitled The Antiquities of Cambodia, which had been published in 1867. The price was marked as $2.25, but Britnell's dropped it to 75 cents. In 1993, and now living in Brantford, she gave the album to the National Art Gallery of Canada; it was worth $10,000.

The article went on to explain that the National Gallery of Canada came into being through gifts of works of art. At its creation in 1880, the National Gallery's collection comprised only donated works.

Leanora McCarney of Hull, Quebec, has been giving works of art to the National Gallery for 15 years. She says that when they travel abroad they see galleries with entire wings full of donated works. She does not believe Canadians are in the habit of donating works the National Gallery. She hopes to start a trend, because she feels people should understand that what is involved is their heritage.

In making it easier for people to donate cultural property to museums, galleries and libraries, the government will perhaps make Leonora McCarney's wish come true.

The implementation of measures, like Bill C–93, to consolidate our museum, gallery and library collections has an effect on other sectors of the economy besides the arts and culture. Cultural tourism is a flourishing part of the tourism industry.

On the whole, the tourism industry brings in nearly $30 billion a year and employs over 600,000 Canadians in 60,000 tourism related industries.

In Canada, recent trends indicate most tourists visiting Canada want a cultural experience different from their own. The Department of Canadian Heritage is trying to improve heritage tourism in Canada.

Many examples may be found in Canada of the contribution cultural tourism makes to the local economy, while promoting people's awareness of cultural values and encouraging their participation.

Thus the activities proposed at the Musée de la civilisation in Quebec City are an excellent way to approach culture, community development and cultural tourism.

Opened in 1988, the museum promotes experience on a human scale with a collection of over 80,000 pieces illustrating life in Quebec.

• (1040)

The leadership role of this museum in the city's cultural and educational development is widely recognized. This museum is now regarded as an essential tool for promoting public participation in cultural heritage activities.

[English]

Clearly museums, galleries and libraries are not elitist shrines or ivory tower domains for the happy few. They are democratic, diverse institutions open to all citizens. They make a vital contribution to the cultural and scientific life of the community. In Canada, museums, galleries, archives and libraries are resources and inspiration to people of all communities, backgrounds, ages and abilities.

To all Canadians our museums, galleries and libraries represent our authentic and irreplaceable link with our history, culture and heritage. Successful passage of Bill C–93 will help to ensure that these institutions remain vibrant temples of the human spirit, a strong presence for all Canadians to inspire us and reflect who we are.

I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of this bill, this legislative jewel, for the future development of Canada as a nation. The Cultural Property Export and Import Act is currently the only legal mechanism available in Canada that promotes conservation, thus helping to define our heritage. Again, this incentive to establish and protect Canadian culture is only an incentive and not a tax deduction or loophole. This incentive in the form of an individual tax credit is available to all Canadians.

Its scope was broadened in 1992 to include artists by encouraging them to donate their creations to designated institutions interested in collecting their work. I do not need to explain to you that artists are among our poorest fellow citizens, at least financially. This tax incentive provides us with a way, however small it may be, to allow major works by living artists to enter the public domain, where they will help inspire and educate citizens much better than if they remained hidden in the artists' workshops.

The Cultural Property Export and Import Act plays another very important role: encouraging Canadians to espouse philanthropic principles, to think about future generations, to seek today what may become a national treasure tomorrow, and to collect works of art.

Those who argue that cultural property donations can only come from the rich are completely mistaken, to say the least. In fact, some of the greatest collectors in the world had very little money at their disposal and sometimes even went without food in order to buy works of art.

We need more of these people in our country, people who can recognize what is of aesthetic value, people who can have a passion for history or, even better, people who can understand the scientific and technical symbols which define us as a nation.

This bill is designed for those who feel it is their civic duty to keep alive our heritage as a young country, and it seeks to welcome objects which are symbolic and representative of our country. To promote the making of collections and to stimulate a philanthropic spirit is the least that the federal government can do to ensure that our heritage remains accessible to all Canadians.

Our country is still very young. It is less than 150 years old. We have a duty to develop existing private and public collections, so that our culture can thrive and be the envy of other countries. More importantly, this will allow Canadians to be fully aware of their place and identity as a nation.

Given the current economic context, it is particlarly appropriate for us to take all possible measures to keep our cultural treasures in Canada, and to encourage the public to think twice before selling abroad family objects brought here by their ancestors over a century ago, not to mention a masterpiece by Riopelle bought 25 years ago for next to nothing.

We are talking about Canada's heritage but, more importantly, about the preservation and development of that heritage.

I am convinced that everyone in this House should support this wise piece of legislation.

[English]

Because the arguments are sound I encourage all members of the House to support the bill, which is based on sound logic and makes good sense for the country.

The Speaker: I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2), because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 23 minutes today.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to speak to Bill C–93 and I will argue today that not only is this piece of legislation flawed, this whole act is completely unnecessary. I am quite amazed at the lengths to which the government has gone to introduce this type of legislation for what appears to be not a problem at all or at least a very minor problem. I will argue the legislation has caused far more problems than it could ever hope to solve.

I quote from a Revenue Canada pamphlet called "Gifts and Income Tax":

> The Income Tax Act and the CPEIA provide tax incentives to people who want to sell or donate significant cultural property to Canadian institutions.
> The Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board—is responsible under the CPEIA for certifying that an object is of "outstanding significance and national importance".
> When an object of this nature is donated to a designated Canadian institution or public authority, and is certified by the CCPERB, the donor does not realize a capital gain. For purposes of the tax credit, the donor can claim the FMV of the gift up to the total amount of tax still payable after claiming any credits for charitable donations and gifts to Canada or a province.

• (1050)

When that legislation was originally brought in, I believe in 1977, right from that time we have had all kinds of problems with people trying to take advantage of that legislation.

I quote from a newspaper article, March 24, 1995, in the Montreal Gazette:

> Tax avoidance schemes under which unscrupulous art donors obtain bloated write offs for works given to public galleries and museums are on the rise across the country, the Canadian Museums Association warned yesterday.
> These dubious donations have become so rampant in recent months that Ottawa might shut down the program under which tens of millions of dollars of art is donated to Canadian public institutions each year, said John McAvity, executive director of the 2,000–member association.
> Warning members to be more vigilant against such schemes, McAvity said: "The donations in question appear to be motivated purely by tax avoidance considerations rather than philanthropic reasons—These donors appear to be neither serious nor knowledgeable collectors or even known to the museums".

Under the scheme, which dates back at least 20 years, a donor buys a work of art for well below the artist's usual fee. The donor would then have the work evaluated for four or five times the amount he had paid for the work, donate the piece to a gallery, museum or registered charity and write off 100 per cent of the evaluated amount, art experts explained.

At the heart of the donation issue is the concept of fair market value.

Michel Rolland, president of a firm that facilitates art donations to public institutions, said that if a client was able to obtain a work of art for well below the usual going rate then the client has made a shrewd investment.

But a Revenue Canada brochure states that "the generally accepted meaning is the highest price, expressed in terms of money, that the property would bring in an open and unrestricted market between a willing buyer and a willing seller who are both knowledgeable, informed and prudent, and who are acting independently of each other".

In other words, if you were willing to only pay $2,000 for a work of art then you should in all likelihood only get a tax receipt for $2,000, said Robert Kerr, a Montreal chartered accountant who writes for the Gazette.

After five or so lean years many artists are desperate to sell their work at almost any price, said Thérèse Dion, a local art consultant.

Rolland's Art–Transit Int. Co. has paid Montreal artist Catherine Widgery 20 per cent of the usual price for her work. "If it is a $10,000 work, I get $2,000", she said.

Similarly, a copy of an Art–Transit artist's contract obtained by the Gazette shows that some artists are paid only 18 per cent of their usual rate.

"It seems like a win–win situation", said one Montreal artist who did not wish to be identified. "Museums are happy to get things free. Artists are happy because they have a bit of money in their pockets. So everybody is happy. What is not kosher is that a client is buying it (a work) at below its value, but getting the write off for a different amount".

Still the artist added "I find the whole thing a bit fishy, but everybody's doing it".

According to the documents obtained by the Gazette, Art–Transit's warehouse contained, as of January 26, a total of 7,241 works of art.

These include works by several artists.

The documents also show that some of the artists have enormous quantities of works with Art–Transit: Guiangoldo Fucito is listed as having 494; Francine Larivée has 440; and Claude Paul Gauthier has 485.

• (1055)

The point is that while some people say it is a win–win situation, it is good for the artists and it is good for the people getting the write offs. It is profoundly unfair to taxpayers who are granting these people a write off for the full appraised value of the art work. In this case it is art work that was bought for $2,000 but that according to the appraisal is worth $10,000 and therefore the write off is $10,000.

This thing is nothing but a huge rip off. We are talking about over 7,000 works of art in one company alone where this is being done. I have no idea what the value is but it has to be astronomical. This is not fair. This is a rip off.

Previous to 1977 when this legislation came into place people donated works of art, artefacts, sculptures, whatever, because they wanted to give them to museums. They did it for altruistic reasons. They are philanthropic. They did not care about the write off.

There were museums previous to 1977. There were art galleries. There was lots of art in them. According to this article, since before 1977 we have had this problem with these scams. It would be bad enough if that were all there was to it. This tax credit is far richer than one can get if one donates to a regular registered charity.

If one donates to the food bank all one can do is donate up to 20 per cent of total income which is the most one can get a deduction for. However, if an art dealer or someone savvy who knows the tax law can work this deal they can actually write off their entire tax for a year by donating these so–called works of art. To me that is unbelievable.

A gentleman from an art gallery came in front of the Canadian heritage committee in Hamilton. In his judgment most people would give out of the goodness of their heart but there are some people who are on to this. He said it was probably the wealthiest people who would make the biggest contributions to the art galleries and take advantage of this situation.

What we have is a tax avoidance scheme, in my judgment, that permits the wealthiest Canadians to get away with paying little or no tax. That is profoundly unfair.

In the last budget the government was talking at length about how we had to have tax fairness. My hon. friend across the way is nodding. This is not tax fairness. This is not in alignment with any kind of taxation system that treats people the same way. Absolutely not.

Why are we fooling around with legislation like this? We should be rolling this legislation back. We should be bringing in a flat tax or a single tax or a proportional tax, a tax system that treats people equally. We certainly do not want one that treats people who donate art better than people who give to the food bank or to the Salvation Army or to the cancer society. That is ridiculous. How can we justify that? That is absolutely out of the realm of anything that makes sense.

I am sure people are wondering how much this costs Canadians every year. Last year there was something like $60 million in tax deductions handed out. Depending on people's tax situation, it could amount to as much as the full $60 million in actual loss to the Canadian treasury if people did not donate to anything else and it consumed absolutely all their income so they did not pay any income tax at all. That is not realistic, and I recognize that. However, suffice it to say that people did avoid paying millions and millions of dollars in taxation because of this scheme. That is not fair and that is not right. We should have a transparent system.

• (1100)

Just before the last election there was a bit of a furore in the newspapers about former Prime Minister Mulroney donating his personal papers to the National Archives. Someone said they saw a figure of how much of a tax break he was to get. The gentleman subsequently said he had made an error and he did not know why he quoted that figure. That is not the point. The point is that we have no idea how much people get in terms of a tax break for the donations they make. These things are protected through the Income Tax Act. We have a situation where people are making donations and we have no idea how much they are being appraised for because that would violate their privacy. Is that the best system?

It was not very long ago that someone at the National Gallery of Canada decided it was a good idea to buy "The Voice of Fire". It was an American art piece. It was three stripes. It cost approximately $1.8 million. People went absolutely berserk, and rightfully so. In my judgment it was a complete waste of money.

If we visit the gallery and look at the comment book, people have said over and over again: "The emperor has no clothes". I think Canadians feel that way too. The point is that we know how much money we paid for that piece of art, but for these other things we do not know how much revenue we are forgoing when we purchase them. That is wrong. It should be out in the open. We should know how much we are paying, either through a tax credit or directly for items that are purchased on our behalf by our government. That is how an open democracy should work.

The legislation is completely contrary to that. That is why we should not be fooling around with the amendment to the legislation but should instead be repealing the whole bill. It is absolutely ridiculous.

I want to talk about some of the specifics of the legislation. The legislation offers an appeal process over and above the cultural export review board. If people do not feel they are getting a fair price from the review board for their donation they can ultimately appeal it to Revenue Canada. If memory serves, that was the situation prior to 1993 or 1991, I have forgotten which. At any rate we would be returning to that situation.

I question whether we should have the review board at all. It is another layer of bureaucracy. How are the people appointed to the review board? They are appointed the same way everyone else is appointed to government boards. They are appointed on the basis of who they know. They are appointed because of their connections. It is quite conceivable that a former prime minister, such as Brian Mulroney, could donate papers and have the decision made on the value of those papers by people he appointed to the board. It is ridiculous.

A few times the National Archives of Canada has gone to the board and the board has said this is the value of the former prime minister's papers. We never find out what it is, but those people who may indeed have been appointed by the prime minister are making those judgments.

This appeal process will allow us to go to Revenue Canada and ultimately I suppose to the tax courts. However, our sources tell us that we have approximately 6,000 cases before the tax court today, 6,000 backlogged cases. Why are we bringing more stuff to these people? Why are we bringing more decisions for them to make? I would think there are more important things for those people to be doing than arguing about the price of somebody's dinosaur fossil or their three stripes on a piece of paper, their so–called art.

I make another point about the legislation. I believe the legislation, which goes back to 1977, and the art bank, which falls under the purview of the Canada Council, have worked against artists. They have hurt artists by flooding the market with all kinds of art and alleged art that has no business being out there in the marketplace today. We have something like 18,000 pieces of art stored in warehouses today, stuff that is supposed to be in the art bank.

We have this legislation that encourages art galleries to go ahead and purchase these things because the money is not coming out of their budgets. All they are doing is going to the people at the export review board and saying: "We think this is pretty good. Put an evaluation on it. The guy is going to give it to us. Whether or not we hang it on the wall now or at any time in the future is really irrelevant, because it does not cost us a thing". They are not working with a budget. They can bring in as much of this stuff as they want. The only ones who pay are the taxpayers.

The people in this article say it is a great scheme and everybody wins. It is win for the art gallery and win for the artist, but it is big time lose for taxpayers who are out millions and millions and millions of dollars in revenue. There are no safeguards built in to ensure the galleries and the museums are using their power to do this responsibly. There is no check in place to make sure that happens.

This is horrible legislation. I would argue that before 1977 we had very good art galleries. We were able to hold on to our works of art. We were able to maintain different pieces of important cultural property because people ultimately gave these things to our institutions over a period of many years. We know they did that.

Surely this new legislation encourages some people to use the system by taking advantage of the tax credits. Also, the legislation encourages us to keep not only Canadian art but American art and artefacts and foreign artefacts of all kinds as well. People are using this to say this is to keep Canadian culture in Canada. We should be accurate here and say that it is also used to buy all kinds of foreign art.

The fact is that people gave art before 1977 to these institutions. In trying to encourage people to give even more we have opened up a Pandora's box. We have allowed all kinds of people to milk the income tax system, to take advantage of it to the point where we now have the Montreal Gazette writing articles about it. We really have what amounts to a tax avoidance scheme going on, which obviously costs taxpayers millions and millions of dollars. That is ridiculous.

We have that problem. We have the problem that it is not transparent. We have people donating but we never know how much money they get in the form of tax deductions for their art. We have an export review board that could be appointed by people like the Prime Minister, who will end up passing judgment on things they want to give. We have a problem with the art market being flooded because of this type of incentive, this kind of screwy incentive we have here. We have all kinds of problems with this extra bureaucracy and extra cost to solve what was a very minor problem.

Instead of proposing an amendment that will send this to the tax courts where there is a backlog of 6,000 cases, why do we not just do away with the whole thing? Let us just do away with it. Then we can get rid of all these problems. We will not have the Montreal Gazette writing nasty stories about all the scams that are being worked to take advantage of the situation.

We will not have, on the one hand, people in our party and in the Liberal Party campaigning to simplify the tax system and, on the other hand, the government working against that concept by providing tax incentives for the wealthiest of Canadians to take advantage of this system and avoid paying tax. That is crazy. It is so unfair it is unbelievable. I cannot believe the government, the minister, the parliamentary secretary and members across the way are arguing for this type of legislation.

I hope people take the time to write some letters about this. I hope they take the time to contact their MPs and ask how this can be fair.

Let me conclude by saying that although this is a fairly innocuous piece of legislation, when people find out about it they will not be pleased. They will say that when the government spoke in the last budget about achieving tax fairness they believed the government. Now the government is turning around and proposing legislation that is exactly contrary to that. I hope the government will realize that and stop the bill before it goes any further.

Ms. Guarnieri: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if I could have unanimous consent to seek clarification on some of the member's comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The Chair can only ask for unanimous consent. The first three speakers have 40 minutes without questions or comments, but with unanimous consent the House can do whatever it so chooses. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Agreed.

Mr. Solberg: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would be happy to do that and I will ask my colleagues to consent to do that. However I have to disappear for a radio interview at 11.30 a.m. I have to get back to my office. If we could do this in five or six minutes it would be great.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We will have to. I have to stay within the 40–minute restriction as much as possible. I would hope that certainly would happen.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when the member referred to the gifts and income tax book he was rather selective in his reading. I wonder why the member did not bother to inform Canadians on how cultural property is actually certified. I wonder if he would be willing to read into the record exactly how they are certified, just so that he does not mislead Canadians into thinking that it is a free for all for everybody and anybody can give anything to any cultural institution.

Would he be willing to read the paragraph on page 18, so as not to mislead Canadians, and the first two paragraphs on page 19, so that Canadians are fully informed? As usual, I find that the Reform Party is rather selective in what it chooses to read out of transcripts.

I reassure the Reform Party that it will secure its place in museums beside the extinct species, with the dodo bird and the dinosaurs.

The member's discourse is somewhat limited in nature. When he was quoting from Mr. McAvity, who is executive director of the Canadian Museums Association, he was very limited in the quotes he chose. Mr. McAvity went on to say that they are the voice of 2,000 museums.

Mr. Gilmour: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The member opposite was asking a question. The whole purpose of interrupting the proceedings was to ask a question of my colleague. This is not a question. This is a statement.

• (1115)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank the hon. member for Comox—Alberni for his intervention. It is certainly in the spirit of unanimous consent knowing that we do have some restriction given the statement by the member for Medicine Hat that he had other obligations when they accepted the unanimous consent.

Without further ado I would simply ask—

Ms. Guarnieri: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All we are doing at this point is using up valuable time. I simply ask the parliamentary secretary if she could possibly put the question so I might allow a reasonable amount of time for the member to respond.

Ms. Guarnieri: Mr. Speaker, Mr. McAvity, who represents 2,000 not for profit museums in Canada, said: "We are very pleased to be here today in support of these amendments. The museum community has been patiently waiting for these amendments for several years". He went on to say: "This legislation was universally applauded by Canadian museums as it brought our community in line with those of many other western nations whose governments have been supporting the enrichment of public collections through similar legislation for years". Mr McAvity went on to say even more resoundingly that the Canadian Museums Association came before the committee to voice its wholehearted endorsement of these amendments.

Given all of the above, does the hon. member think he has more expertise than those individuals to judge what is good for Canadian museums? I thank the hon. member for his patience in allowing me to put the question.

Mr. Solberg: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member was taking advantage of my good nature a little bit, but that is okay.

I will acknowledge that there are a couple of paragraphs on pages 18 and 19 that do explain fairly specifically that the export review board has to judge an object to be of outstanding significance and national importance because of its close association with Canadian history or national life, aesthetic qualities and value in the study of the arts or sciences in order to be eligible to be designated for a tax deduction. The fact is that $60 million worth of those are designated every year. That is a tremendous amount of money, as the hon. parliamentary secretary would know.

The parliamentary secretary was asking me about Mr. McAvity and the museum association and was pointing out that the museums like the legislation. Of course they do. They have unfettered access to all kinds of things with no budget. They do not have a budget. The museums can basically say: "We would like that work of art or that artefact. We will take it to the review board and get it to tell us what it is worth and whether it is significant. When the board does that, then we get it". It is that easy.

The only one who pays is the taxpayer. It is certainly good for the artist or the person who is donating it because he or she gets that big tax credit. It is certainly good for the museums. Why would they have any problem with this? They probably love this stuff. It is profoundly not good for taxpayers who have to take it in the pocket every time one of these donations is made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank all members who participated in this extension of the debate for their co–operation.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, before I get into the main body of my speech, I would like to proffer a couple of comments relative to what was said by the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

I did not listen to all of his speech but I did hear a chunk of it. On two different occasions he described the legislation as being horrible and innocuous. I would think the hon. member would find some disparity between those two adjectives, innocuous and horrible.

After listening to him I suspect he probably thinks the legislation is more horrible than it is innocuous despite the fact that this is anything but sweeping legislation. It really is what we might call a technical bill to put back into legislation a review and appeal mechanism, something that was inadvertently left out in 1991.

Again, in commenting on observations made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, it is quite clear he believes that the free market system can do the job. At one point in his speech he said that we just do not need this kind of legislation at all. He was not only referring to providing an appeal mechanism or a review mechanism; he was talking about the entire system of public support for donations of Canadian heritage to museums.

We would have to be dreaming. We would have to be in full flight of fantasy to believe the museums would do as well without this legislation. Without this incentive, without this kind of legislation, many of the donations to the museums across the country, and we are talking about more than 2,000 institutions, would dry up. This was forcefully put to the committee of which I have the honour to chair by witnesses a few days back.

Let us not fool anybody. This legislation is absolutely necessary. The comments by the hon. member for Medicine Hat truly reveal what the so–called Reform Party feels about supporting cultural institutions and specifically museums. Reform members simply do not support public support at all which is wrong headed. It is a mistake and is not something that is shared by the Canadian public.

I listened to the hon. member and he seemed to plead on behalf of taxpayers, as if he spoke for all taxpayers. While many taxpayers believe they are overburdened, and in some cases they are, most taxpayers are quite enlightened and support this kind of legislation. They appreciate museums. They appreciate cultural institutions. They support artists of all kinds. They want to reach out and help Canadians in the cultural field. They accept that this is what this legislation is doing.

This is certainly recognized by the museums. If it was not helpful the museums would be saying that, but that is not what their witnesses were saying. They came to the committee and said this legislation is needed and is supported.

This wanders perhaps a little off the bill, but this bill has something to do with preserving Canadian heritage. Everyone knows as well as I do the crisis this country is going through right now. We all know the crisis this country faces and we have a heritage. We have a tremendous history. On Monday we want all Canadians, not just Quebecers, to appreciate this heritage, this history, this land, this great nation. That is what this country is all about.

This cultural property bill is just an infinitesimal part of the efforts of preserving Canadian heritage. I feel very, very strongly that come Monday Quebecers will show that they are going to preserve Canadian heritage in a much greater way through the ballot box rather than through the mechanism of the cultural property bill.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat said he has no idea as to the tax expenditure involved in this kind of legislation. The tax expenditure is in the neighbourhood of about $60 million. Again, it is fully supported by Canadians.

• (1125)

Getting to the main body of my presentation today, we have debated the merits of the Cultural Property Export and Import Act long and hard.

Some time ago the hon. member from the official opposition clearly understood that the lack of an appeal process in relation to determinations of fair market value by the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board was the result of an unfortunate oversight. That is really what it is, an unfortunate oversight.

Bill C–93 is a technical bill. As such we must remember that its purpose is to restore a right that was lost when the determination of fair market value was transferred from Revenue Canada to the review board. We are correcting an error. We are removing a mistake that was made four years ago.

The act is even more important and necessary today than when it came into force in 1977. That is because it is fast becoming the only source, and I emphasize the only source, through which institutions can hope to continue acquiring cultural property for their collections. That has to be borne in mind throughout this entire debate.

With little or no acquisition funds, museums are now having to focus on donors to build their collections. Canada is therefore greatly in need of a means to encourage people to collect important examples of our national heritage with the ultimate aim of voluntarily donating to custodial institutions.

The Cultural Property Export and Import Act must be cherished and developed to ensure that the level of collecting of important examples of our heritage continues to increase, not to decrease. That is important.

In the 19th century the function of private collectors gained a new level of importance in the face of the spread of public galleries and museums throughout the world. While the impressionists and post–impressionists were to some extent barred from official public exhibitions, their work was nonetheless being bought by private collectors with or without the mediation of dealers. These works ultimately found their way into public collections only after their position had been established by the art market created by private collecting.

This collecting spirit was not relegated just to contemporary art, but also to the diversity of products created throughout the world. It is thanks to the collectors of the last century and continuing through to today that the public has ultimately been led to an appreciation and understanding of those objects that have come to embody the trends and symbols which define the psychology and history of our development as a civilization.

Collectors are the seers, the wise men of our times. They are the individuals who have foresight enough to recognize what is and what will continue to be of outstanding significance and national importance for generations to come. Custodial institutions for decades now have developed a strong rapport with collectors working alongside them as they collect, often with the ultimate intent to give to the public.

We are seeing in Canada today collectors who have built up strong collections who, rather than automatically giving to the public through public collecting institutions, are faced with the choice of selling those collections for a handsome capital gain or donating them to designated institutions in return for a cultural property tax certificate. However, knowing the limitations of the cultural property determination process and the fact that there is no recourse to appeal the Cultural Property Export Review Board determination, we have witnessed several cases already where collectors are opting to sell their collections rather than holding themselves hostage to the bureaucratic process. It is very important to keep that in mind. If we are to respect and encourage the intent of our collectors to give to the public domain, we must find ways to ease that process. Establishing a system of appeal to the Tax Court of Canada would be a very important step toward encouraging the concept of making donations in our country, a step that the donors as much as the institutions are anxiously awaiting. That also has to be borne in mind. This is not only important to the institutions and the art community, it is important to the donors. In fact it is important to all Canadians.

Over the past few years, the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board has been the object of press articles focusing on the board's reduction of proposed fair market values in applications for certification of cultural property for income tax purposes. These stories, by the way, refer to a small proportion of all certification applications. The review board has responded by expressing the challenge of determining fair market value in these economic times where the markets in which cultural property circulates are extremely weak.

It is therefore crucial that the mandate for determining fair market value rests in the hands of experts who are knowledgeable about the twists and turns, the ups and downs of the marketplace and who know how to relate often conflicting trends in the marketplace to the cultural property applications it has before them. This is a very intricate business and it cannot be left to rank amateurs. If the job is going to be done properly it has to be left to knowledgeable people, people who are experts and people in whom we have confidence. This has been thought out and taken into account.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Integrity.

Mr. Harvard: Yes, as my good friend from Broadview—Greenwood pointed out, people of integrity are also important.

Speaking of people and integrity, the current review board consists of 10 members, the maximum number allowable under current legislation. These members represent the myriad of players who are actively involved in the process of preserving cultural property in institutions or public authorities who are designated to do so.

Let us go through this. Two of the members are contemporary art dealers. Four members are or were employees of designated institutions who have expertise in archival material, Canadiana, contemporary and Inuit art. One member is an accountant, another is a lawyer and the remaining two members are members of the public at large. Several of the members who sit on the board are also collectors who are fully aware of the dynamics that come into play between institutions that collect and collectors who become donors.

This not something that has been slapped together. This has been thought through very well. When we take into account the composition of the 10–member board we can appreciate the kind of thought that has gone into making up the board.

In my opening remarks I referred to comments made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. That same member at second reading of the bill expressed concern that a board appointed by the government and consisting of members who represent the community it serves could be—to use his words—too cosy, leading to a scratch my back and I will scratch your back situation. That kind of assumption places subjectivity over expertise and suggests that human beings are by nature incapable of assessing their peers objectively. I think he has underestimated the capabilities of people and perhaps even their integrity.

We are not talking about amateurs, we are talking about professionals, professionals that value and wish to maintain their professional integrity. Further, as is the case with all professional organizations, the Cultural Property Export Review Board has a strict code of ethics to avoid any conflict of interest.

I might add that the transfer of determining fair market value to the board in 1991 was not an arbitrary move, but rather the result of the realization that such determinations can best be made only by individuals who are actively involved in the environment in which cultural property circulates.

The appeal process which the bill proposes will ensure the full use of the expertise available on the board. It is intended that given the thoroughness with which the first stage of the appeal process would be handled through a request for redetermination by a subcommittee, most issues with determinations of fair market value would be resolved and that requests for a further appeal to the Tax Court of Canada would be minimal. In other words, we do not see the two–stage review process being used on every occasion. We believe in most cases that all questions will be settled after the first go–around. Very few of these cases go to the Tax Court of Canada. It is important to keep that in mind. We are not interested in a prolonged process where both stages are used up on almost every occasion. We do not think that will happen.

The second stage of the appeal process necessitates that the donor make an irrevocable gift to the institution. Only the donor would be able to request an appeal to the tax court up to 90 days after the redetermination process is completed. Again we are not talking about people who are in the game for frivolous reasons. They are serious donors.

As with anything new, the first and second stages of the appeal process will be subject to trial and error before an efficient and workable system is developed. In other words, we can see this system, to some extent, maturing. One would hope that after the system has been used for a number of years, it will be more efficient and more mature. I believe that is a safe assumption. As with most processes, over a period of time after they have been used again and again, do get better.

The museum community, as have donors and potential donors, has been anxiously awaiting the appeal process since the original announcement was made by the Minister of Canadian Heritage in November 1994. It was looking for the announcement up until then. It was cheered by that announcement. It has been looking forward to the legislation. It has been looking forward to the passage of the legislation and it has been looking forward to this kind of debate. With a little luck it will be given royal assent in the very near future.

Over the past year and a half the review board has established positive working relationships with Revenue Canada and Justice Canada to ensure that donations of cultural property are made in the spirit of the act, that is, with a philanthropic end in mind. The board is to be highly commended for the effective action it has taken to discourage the use of the tax incentives under this act as a tax avoidance measure.

Let me point out the kind of regime that has been set up to prevent misuse of donations. Not any Tom, Dick and Harry can come along with any kind of alleged piece of art and give it to an institution and get a tax break. It is not as simple as that.

I want to draw attention to a couple of paragraphs from a pamphlet entitled "Gifts and Income Tax". The Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board may rule that an object is of outstanding significance and national importance because of at least three criteria: close association with Canadian history or national life; aesthetic qualities and value in the study of the arts or sciences.

This is important. To be eligible to have cultural property certified, an institution or public authority has to be designated by the Minister of Canadian Heritage. The institution or public authority has to have this designation before formally accepting one's gift if one is to receive the maximum tax benefit.

The designation procedure ensures that the institutions and public authorities receiving cultural property are competent, classified, and maintain and preserve cultural property. Designated institutions are also required to make one's gift available to the general public for education, research or display purposes.

I point that out because when I was listening to the hon. member for Medicine Hat, he left the impression, at least with me, that this was a kind of loose set–up that could be exploited by people who really do not want to give pieces of Canadian heritage for philanthropic purposes but just to get a tax break.

I assure the hon. member for Medicine Hat and all Canadians that it is not as simple as that. There is a regime. There is a framework. It will have to be followed correctly and properly if pieces of art are to be accepted and where tax certificates are provided.

I am told that the board has implemented measures to target suspect donations and to make determinations so that supposed donations made with an anticipated profit are unable to receive substantial financial gains. The board has been working closely as well with the Professional Art Dealers Association of Canada to ensure that all appraisals coming before it are fully substantiated with demonstrable sales of comparable works.

As there are fewer tax incentives available to taxpayers today, the board is taking every measure possible to ensure that the tax incentive to donate under the Cultural Property Export and Import Act cannot be used as a loophole. The great importance of this act is the continuing development of our national heritage, and it merits extreme vigilance. The Canadian Cultural Property Review Board, I reiterate, is to be commended for its efforts thus far.

This brings me back to those people for whom the Cultural Property Export and Import Act is intended, the donors, the institutions and the public; three major groups in this equation and we should not forget that.

The purpose of the act is to encourage and ensure the preservation in Canada of important examples of our heritage in movable cultural property. Without acquisition funds to fulfil their mandates to collect cultural property, designated institutions must rely on donors.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, as much as we respect the marketplace, it is a dynamic place and we would not want to be without it for one minute, sometimes it comes up a little short. When it comes up short we as politicians have to recognize that. In this case we have recognized it because the museums, the institutions, cannot rely on the marketplace through some magical process providing the donations that are so required by these institutions.

It would be nice to believe that the marketplace could wave a magic wand but it cannot, any more than the Leader of the Opposition can. We cannot rely on a magic wand in this case. We have to rely on well thought out legislation which will do the job for the institutions, for the donors and for the public at large. We think this legislation does it.

I remind Canadians that without an appeal process that ensures recourse for determinations of fair market value of cultural property for income tax purposes, donations to the country's public institutions will become paralysed and so will our heritage. Canadians do not want that, not for one minute. That is why we have this legislation. Canadians, the public, would suffer if this were to happen, this paralysis I was referring to.

At a time when museum attendance has been steadily increasing and contributing to the economy of Canada through cultural tourism, we cannot afford to abandon our duty to continue to inspire our people to partake in the cultural harvest of our nation.

Museums are more popular today than ever before. Perhaps this has something to do with the fact that our country is getting older. It is 128 years old. We have a lot of heritage; heritage that has been captured by our artists, heritage that expresses Canada in all of its manifestations. We have a duty to encourage artists, to support donors, to support designated institutions so that this heritage in art form is preserved and protected because we will be a stronger country for it.

Imagine for a moment what future generations of Canadians would think of us if we were oblivious to these facts, if we ignored these facts, if we let these precious pieces of heritage slip through our fingers, allowing these precious pieces of heritage to be squandered. They would condemn us. They would assess us very harshly. However, we would not have to wait for the evaluation or the assessment of history. I think our contemporaries would treat us very harshly.

Canadians know what this country is all about. Canadians know what our heritage is all about. They also know what it takes to preserve that heritage because they know a country is not here for just today, tomorrow, next week, the week after, the month after or the year after. Like so many countries, Canada is here for a long, long time. In recognition of that we have legislation to support our artists, our donors, our institutions and the public at large.

I think all Canadians, all taxpayers, support this. They will not share some of the criticisms we have heard of the bill. Of course no legislation is perfect. As long as human beings are what we are, imperfect, we will often create imperfect legislation. However, I think we have done a good job on this. Certainly the institutions have told us that. The museums have told us that. They came before the committee and praised this legislation. They praised the minister. They praised all of us in the House and they want the job done. They do not want this frivolous talk, this carping from the other side of the House.

Criticism for criticism's sake does not make any sense. If you have something worthwhile to say, say it. To stand up on your hind legs, to carp and to criticize just to fill the air does not make sense. I think the opposition does us a disservice when it grandstands, when it indulges in that kind of talk. We want responsible debate. In some cases we have fallen short of the goal of responsible debate.

Canadians support the legislation and they want it passed. That is all I have to say and I hope we can have this legislation passed as quickly as possible. Canadians want it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We will now move to the next stage of debate in which members will be entitled to 20–minute speeches subject to 10 minutes of questions or comments.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise this morning on Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

The Cultural Property Export and Import Act came into force on September 6, 1977 together with certain complementary amendments to the Income Tax Act. The purpose was to preserve in Canada significant examples of Canadian heritage through the use of a system of export controls, tax incentives for private individuals who donate or sell cultural objects to public institutions, and assistance to institutions in purchasing cultural objects under certain circumstances. Bill C–93 would affect only the use of tax incentives. It is an amendment to the original act.

• (1155)

The legislation will establish an appeal of decisions of the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board to the Tax Court of Canada. This bill is being sponsored by the Minister of Canadian Heritage and it is his responsibility through the Department of Canadian Heritage to develop, implement and promote cultural policies that will enable Canadian creators to flourish and Canadian consumers to enjoy and benefit from a wide variety of cultural products.

The federal government clearly has a role in the development of policies and programs designed to encourage the production and preservation of Canadian cultural materials.

In the area of heritage policies and programs the Department of Canadian Heritage provides support and assistance to museums across the country while at the same time ensuring that our national institutions, including the National Archives, the National Gallery, the Canadian Museum of Civilization, the Museum of Nature, the Museum of Science and Technology and the National Library, function in an environment conducive to giving Canadians maximum access to our cultural heritage.

Culture is fluid, always changing and must not be looked on as something rigid or something around which barriers or parameters can be built. Culture is diverse. Customs that may seem strange to one culture will often be part of the daily life of another.

It is for these reasons that it is important these cultures are reflected in the collections of our museums so that others will be exposed to them, will learn from them and will in turn understand them.

The Cultural Property Export and Import Act already serves as a vital instrument to protect Canada's diverse cultural heritage by building strong public collections. Bill C–93 will serve to strengthen this legislation and will help to ensure the history of all Canadians is preserved for future generations.

The amendments contained in Bill C–93 should not be reviewed in isolation but rather as part of a comprehensive policy for preserving our heritage. Historic sites, parks, museums, monuments and historic buildings are all symbols of what makes us unique as Canadians. Their preservation is essential as both reminders of the past and sign posts for where we are going in the future.

Part of the greatness of our history and our heritage rests with not only the deeds of past generations but with national treasures, the artefacts, works of art and personal objects they created. By preserving and displaying these objects in museums the past can continue to live in the present.

The influence of American television, movies and printed materials can blur the distinction between Canadians and Americans and cause us to forget the great achievements of previous generations of Canadians. The preservation of our cultural property and museums, archives and libraries ensures the continuation of a distinct Canadian identity.

According to the Canadian Museums Association there are over 2,000 museums in Canada. These museums range from small, seasonal, one person operations to medium size facilities, as we have in several communities in my riding of Erie, to great urban museums such as the Canadian Museum of Civilization, the Art Gallery of Ontario, the Glenbow Museum and the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts.

All of these museums enjoy national and international reputations because of one reason, their collections. Great collections do not occur by accident but instead develop from careful nurturing and the generosity of donors and benefactors who believe in the importance of preserving Canada's patrimony for future generations.

Critics of Bill C–93 like to say tax incentives for donations of cultural property are tax loopholes for the rich. In saying that they are ignoring the rigorous standards museums, archives and libraries apply to get at these acquisitions. Our cultural institutions do not frivolously accept people's junk and offer them tax incentives. If that were the case the contents of my garage would make me a rich man. On the contrary, they make conscientious professional judgment about what objects or collections are worthy of certification because they are, in the words of the act, of outstanding significance and national importance.

I mentioned earlier that there are over 2,000 museums in Canada. To be eligible to apply to have objects certified as cultural property and therefore made eligible for a tax credit, a gift must be made to an institution that has been designated under the act. But not just any organization that operates a museum or calls itself a museum is eligible to be designated. I am informed that there are only approximately 300 designated institutions in all of Canada. Only a fraction of those 2,000 museums in Canada are even eligible to apply to receive the tax benefits offered by the legislation. That small number of designated institutions is an indication of one of the safeguards that was built into the original legislation and is further enhanced in the bill now before the House.

To be designated a museum, archive or library, it must be a non–profit corporation and have as its principal activity the acquisition and preservation of cultural property. It must also have a collection that interprets and displays to the public. It must have a professional staff and it must be open to the public on a regular basis. This means that before an institution is even able to apply to obtain a tax credit for an object that it wishes to bring into its collection, the institution must demonstrate that it has the ability to preserve that object in perpetuity. The institution must then apply to have the object certified as a cultural property by the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board.

Again, the tax credit is not automatic just because a museum or other institution is designated and wishes to add an object to its collection. It must be demonstrated that the object is of outstanding significance and national importance and that it fits within the acquisition mandate of the institution. After that, arm's length appraisals for the fair market value of the object must be obtained. These are provided by evaluation experts who have no association with either the recipient institution or the person donating the object. Again there is a safeguard in the system.

The appraisals are reviewed by the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board and it determines the fair market value for income tax purposes. The review board is composed of experts in all aspects of cultural property: museum personnel who are knowledgeable about its significance and the means to preserve it and dealers and collectors who are active in the marketplace and know the prices at which objects regularly sell.

Establishing the fair market value of cultural property or any other commodity is more of an art than a science, and it is inevitable that disagreements will occur. In 1987 in the Ontario high court a judge wrote in his ruling that fair market value was a notional or hypothetical concept, an opinion arrived at by evidence, assumptions, calculations and judgment in the absence of an actual transaction. In such a situation it is obvious why there may be disagreement about the fair market value of a particular object.

Responsibility of the review board to determine fair market value can at times be very onerous, particularly when dealing with unique objects and donations to a wide range of institutions. The experts on the review board recognize this. That is why they fully support the two appeal processes established by the bill. They understand that it is important for donors of cultural property and recipient institutions to be able to request a thorough review of their decisions through the redetermination process and, if necessary, through an appeal to the tax courts of Canada.

The present law enables the review board to redetermine the fair market value of an object if additional information becomes available. To date this system has worked well, but there have also been cases when donors have felt that further consideration of the information that had been provided was required or that additional emphasis on salient facts was needed. This was not possible if a redetermination could only take place when additional information had been provided.

Bill C–93 removes the requirement that additional information be provided before a redetermination takes place. This means that the review board will be able to revisit its decision at the request of a donor or recipient institution with or without the provision of additional information.

We believe it will be difficult to design a first level of appeal that is fairer or more equitable than this one.

If after a redetermination the differences between a donor and the review board still have not been solved, the donor must complete the gift, if he has not already done so, and may then appeal the determination of fair market value to the Tax Court of Canada. This is an important point, because at the time the appeal is made to the Tax Court of Canada the donor will have made an irrevocable gift to the museum, archive or library. He will no longer be the owner of the object. The cultural heritage of Canada will therefore have been enriched regardless of the tax court decision about the object's value.

What will be at issue in an appeal to the tax court will be the fair market value of the object for income tax purposes. The question of outstanding significance and national importance will have been resolved, and the donor will have made the gift in the knowledge that the fair market value of the donation remains an issue.

Again, those concerned about fairness in the tax system and whether rich people are benefiting from a tax loophole will appreciate that the process, by its very nature, guarantees that the tax system is fair and that it will not be abused.

If donors are prepared to make a gift with the full knowledge that they may receive a tax credit for less than they believe an object is actually worth, they are clearly not being motivated by money or profit when they make a donation. If that is their only concern they can withdraw the gift, sell it on the open market, and no tax credit will be given. This system is a win for all involved.

The amendments in Bill C–93 not only reinstate a previous right of appeal but improve on it by establishing two processes that will permit an open dialogue about the fair market value of an object. We believe the ability to discuss fair market value, a concept that involves evidence, assumptions, knowledge and the exercise of judgment, will lead to better appraisals provided to the review board when it makes its initial determinations. This in turn will lead to a limited number of requests for redeterminations and in all likelihood to only a few appeals to the tax court.

Bill C–93 is being strongly supported by museums, archives and libraries, by collectors and donors of cultural property, by dealers and appraisers, and by the review board. I urge all members of the House to support the bill. The amendments are technical in nature and respond to strong concerns expressed by the heritage community. Their passage into law should be seen as part of the ongoing commitment of the Government of Canada to ensure the preservation of Canada's cultural heritage. This will benefit the culture and heritage of my riding of Erie. This will benefit the culture and heritage of the finest country in the world, Canada.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a comment on this important piece of legislation, Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

I congratulate the member for Erie for laying out the provisions of Bill C–93. I want to explain to Canadians in very straightforward language what those provisions mean. It is extremely important for Canadians to note, as was expressed by the member for Erie and by the previous speaker, the member for Winnipeg St. James, that this is not a bill that is directed, as Reform would paint it, to somehow provide benefit to the rich. To demonstrate that, I did a little calculation of what the implications might be.

If taxpayers were interested in making a contribution of a book, an artefact, et cetera, to a museum, library, et cetera, and the contribution were deemed to have a fair market value of $1,000, assuming their original cost of acquiring it many years ago may have been $100, under the current tax act if they were to sell that artefact to a museum they would realize a capital gain of $900. Half that capital gain is taxable. Reform is saying this is a rich man's scheme, so let us assume the highest marginal rate, in which case they would pay tax of $225 on the taxable capital gain. That means that the net cash to the owner of the artefact would be $725 on the sale to the museum of the $1,000 artefact.

The legislation provides a tax credit to the donor of the artefact. If that artefact is shown to have a fair market value of $1,000, the tax credit would be 17 per cent on the first $200 and 29 per cent on the balance. In total, the tax credit or the reduction of taxes otherwise payable would be some $266.

It really comes down to a matter of cash. A straight sale would generate $775 to the taxpayer who sold the artefact to a museum. If a tax credit system is used, the donor only gets $266. In that regard it is clear that those who are prepared to donate to our cultural and heritage institutions assets of value that have been determined by a rigorous process of review and assessment would be receiving in real cash terms substantially less than if they had sold them directly.

If we are talking about true value, as the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James spoke of so well, since our cultural institutions have very little or no real cash to acquire assets this is really the only way to allow them to acquire those assets. It allows those institutions, the libraries, the archives, the galleries, et cetera, to remain current in terms of the cultural and heritage artefacts and documents that are available. It allows them to be competitive. It allows them, as the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James indicated, to continue to attract Canadians and visitors from around the world to visit our cultural and heritage institutions.

It should be clear to Canadians that in Bill C–93 the mechanism of a tax credit allows our Canadian institutions to acquire these items at substantially less cost than if they had to buy them at their fair market value. Considering also the tourism value that is generated through our cultural and heritage institutions, there is no question that the bill provides a very advantageous arrangement for all Canadians.

The hon. member for Erie might want to amplify or comment on the benefit to Canada that will be generated as a result of the provisions of Bill C–93.

Mr. Maloney: Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Mississauga South put forward in a very clear and concise manner the benefits of the tax credit to the cultural industry, as opposed to the loss of taxes. The difference is minuscule.

When I bring my family to Ottawa there is nothing better than visiting the various museums. It is an interesting way to spend a day. Many people come to Ottawa to do that. They should be encouraged to do it, but not only in Ottawa. In my community of Erie there are small museums which are expanding. It certainly provides enjoyment for all people, not only in the riding of Erie but for the tourists who visit us.

The bill can only amplify and increase the benefits we must ensure our cultural community has, not only for ourselves but for future generations.

I had a conversation with the German ambassador to Canada last week. I was asking him about the reunification of east and west Germany. He said that one of the concerns they have is bringing their art objects back from countries such as Russia, where they were carted away during the war.

• (1215)

Preservation of heritage and culture is important to all countries throughout the world. We must not let it happen in our country where we just cut it off as the Reform Party has suggested. It will flounder and die.

Mr. John Loney (Edmonton North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity again to speak in support of Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

As members will recall, the purpose of the bill is to establish an appeal of decisions of the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board to the Tax Court of Canada. Members will also recall that this is the reinstatement of a right that had previously existed. I repeat that it is the reinstatement of a right that had previously existed but was lost when the responsibility for determining the fair market value of certified cultural property was transferred from Revenue Canada to the review board.

Some people have incorrectly called tax incentives for donations to museums, art galleries, archives and libraries a tax loophole for the rich. While some wealthy people do benefit from these credits, there are also many people who donate important objects of Canadiana that have been in their families for generations.

According to the Canadian Museums Association, over 60 million people visited museums in Canada last year. As part of their experience of visiting a museum, these 60 million people were able to view objects that are now in public collections because of the tax credits available for donations. Without these incentives, many of these donations would not have been made and the objects would have instead been exported and sold to museums in other countries.

If Canadians and visitors to Canada are not able to learn about our past by visiting museums, the damage to our history and to our identity as Canadians will be immeasurable. Museums, art galleries, archives and libraries are not just warehouses full of objects that never see the light of day. On the contrary, they are lively centres of education and learning where one learns about the past through objects that have been preserved for the present and future generations.

The idea was perhaps most eloquently stated by Sir Arthur Doughty, Dominion Archivist of Canada from 1904 to 1935, when he wrote about archival documents: "Of all the nation's assets, archives are the most precious. They are the gift of one generation to another. The extent of our care of them marks the extent of our civilization". These words apply equally to the holdings of museums, art galleries and libraries.

Tax incentives that offer partial financial compensation to a donor of cultural property are a small price to pay for the preservation of our national heritage. Through these tax credits, the Government of Canada is able to assist institutions to continue to acquire and preserve significant cultural objects when acquisition budgets are shrinking or non-existent.

It is also important to consider these amendments in the tradition of tax incentives as a means to encourage charitable donations. Income tax exemptions for donations to educational institutions, hospitals and churches have been included in the Income Tax Act since its passage in 1916.

In 1930 these exemptions were extended to registered charities. Tax exemptions for donations to educational and charitable institutions including museums, archives and libraries have therefore been a fundamental principle of the tax policy since income tax was first introduced.

In recent years, the Income Tax Act has been amended so that tax credits now extend to gifts to non-profit organizations that provide housing for senior citizens, Canadian amateur athletic associations, Canadian municipalities, the United Nations and its agencies, and registered national art service organizations. As this list indicates, tax credits are part of an overall fiscal strategy to encourage donations to a wide range of organizations.

Institutions designated pursuant to the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, that is institutions that have demonstrated they meet legal and professional requirements for the preservation of our cultural property, are both educational institutions and registered charities. Tax credits for donations to these institutions are therefore not new but instead are consistent with the history of giving in Canada.

It has also been suggested that tax credits for donations of cultural property are a waste of taxpayers' money because donors are able to get rid of works of questionable importance. This suggestion demonstrates a lack of understanding of the collecting practices of Canada's custodial institutions and of the professionalism of Canadian curators. It also implies that every object acquired by a museum, art gallery, archive or library is automatically certified as a cultural property for income tax purposes.

I would like to address each of these points in order, as an understanding of these issues is key to understanding the importance of the tax credits available for gifts of cultural property.

First, with respect to the acquisition mandates and practices of Canadian custodial institutions, it must be understood that these institutions are established with a specific mandate to acquire and preserve defined types of objects. Museum curators must therefore carefully select which objects they are going to acquire and must be able to demonstrate how they fit into this acquisition mandate. They do not accept just anything or everything. In fact, I have been told by senior museum curators that they turn down as many offers of gifts as they accept.

Second, museums, archives and libraries are staffed by professional personnel who are acknowledged experts in their subject areas. They know what is culturally significant and what is not. They know what should be preserved and what sometimes unfortunately, must be allowed to perish or be exported. They are also keenly aware that their institutions cannot preserve every example of even important cultural objects. In short, professional judgment is applied when decisions are being made about what objects are worthy of being added to the permanent collection.

Third, there seems to be an assumption that when an object is chosen for inclusion in a public collection it is somehow automatically certified as cultural property and therefore is eligible for a tax credit. Again, this is a fallacy. Just as professional judgment is applied to what will be required, it is also applied when deciding if an application for certification as cultural property for income tax purposes should be submitted. In short, only a fraction of the objects that are acquired in any given year receive a tax credit.

To be eligible for certification, an object or a collection must satisfy the criteria of outstanding significance and national importance found in section 11(1) of the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, which states:

> (a) whether that object is of outstanding significance by reason of its close association with Canadian history or national life, its aesthetic qualities, or its value in the study of the arts or sciences; and
> (b) whether the object is of such a degree of national importance that its loss to Canada would significantly diminish the national heritage.

It is clear from these criteria that only truly significant objects are eligible for certification for income tax purposes. The decision is not made arbitrarily but rather according to specific legislative requirements that are applied uniformly to all objects that are considered for certification by the review board. It is also worth noting that the decision as to whether an object is of outstanding significance and national importance is made by a board composed of people who are active in the cultural community.

• (1225)

The Cultural Property Export and Import Act requires that review boards be comprised of people who work in custodial institutions, people who buy and sell cultural property, or people who actively collect objects that are important to Canada's cultural heritage. The review board is therefore a board of experts who are knowledgeable about both the significant and fair market value of cultural property.

When the previous government decided to transfer the responsibility for determining the fair market value of cultural property from Revenue Canada to the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board it did so without consultation. Members of the review board were not consulted. Dealers and collectors of art and antiques were not consulted. Custodial institutions were not consulted.

In the course of implementing its new mandate, the review board sometimes lowered the proposed fair market value of cultural property. While this was inevitable and had also been the practice at Revenue Canada, the result was that some donors felt that their donations had been undervalued. When they attempted to appeal the board's determination, it was discovered that the right of appeal that had existed under the Income Tax Act had been lost.

In response to the concerns raised, consultations then took place with members of the review board, dealers, donors and representatives of the institutions that collect cultural property. Their response was unanimous: The right to appeal review board decisions was necessary to ensure that the system continued to work fairly.

Bill C–93 is a manifestation of the will of the people. It is not something that was dreamed up by this government, nor is it an expansion of existing tax incentives for the donation of cultural property. It is instead the reinstatement of a right that was lost in 1991. It is also a tangible demonstration that this government listens to the people of Canada and is prepared to move quickly to correct imbalances and inequities in the tax system.

There has been much talk from members of the third party about fairness in the tax system yet they oppose a bill that is just about that, fairness. The current system with the lack of an appeal of determination of fair market value has been characterized by many people as being unfair. The establishment of not one but two appeal processes will restore fairness to the system. It will ensure that if donors believe they have a legitimate dispute with the review board they will be able to pursue it first with the review board and, if necessary, in the tax courts.

Donations to museums, archives and libraries involve a triangular relationship between the donor, the recipient institution and when certification as cultural property is required, between the donor and the institution on one hand and the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board on the other. This relationship is one of mutual respect and co–operation in the preservation of Canada's heritage in movable cultural property. This relationship must also include a mechanism for dispute resolution if and when the participants cannot agree about the value of the gift.

The appeal process of determinations by the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board proposed in Bill C–93 will permit any donor of cultural property who disagrees with a review board determination the opportunity to pursue this first with the board and if necessary ultimately with the Tax Court of Canada.

The amendments proposed in the bill should be viewed as a guarantee of the donor's right to natural justice through an appeal to the judicial system if that is warranted. These amendments should also be viewed as a reinstatement of a right of appeal that was lost in 1991 when the responsibility for determining fair market value was transferred to the review board.

We believe it is important that the decisions of government boards and agencies be subject to appeal because even in the honest exercise of judgment, differences of opinion can occur. An open and transparent process with respect to determinations by the review board is essential and the right to pursue the matter in the courts, if no other resolution can be found, is consistent with both the Canadian legal system and the concept of natural justice.

As Canadians we have the privilege to live in a country with many cultures. The material history, the cultural property of many diverse groups that make up Canadian society must continue to be preserved for the benefit of all Canadians. I believe the amendments contained in Bill C–93 will help to ensure this happens and will only improve the already unique Canadian approach to protecting cultural property.

In conclusion, I would urge the support of the House for Bill C–93.

[Translation]

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the comments by my dear colleague, the member for Edmonton North.

[English]

This is a very innovative bill. I have had a chance to review both the comments and some of the supporting documentation provided by the minister of heritage.

I am interested in the comments that my colleague from Edmonton made just a moment ago. In Ontario riding we have many museums and a number of people have donated artefacts over the years. It may come as a surprise to the House that Ontario riding was the riding and the county after which the rest of the province was named in 1867. Previous to that it was Upper Canada and Canada East.

I have a very simple question for the member. Perhaps he could explain to the House some of the significant impacts the bill might have in the area like Edmonton where I know there are many people of various backgrounds who moved there over the years, particularly the francophone community in that part of the country.

[English]

Mr. Loney: Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question, Edmonton and northern Alberta in particular are areas where the descendants of many cultural and ethnic groups coming from many different countries settled, particularly as he pointed out the francophone community.

The amendments in the bill will give the descendants of the people who settled the west, particularly after 1905 when it became a province, the opportunity to pass on to the province, which is now their home province, some of things that their parents, grandparents and possibly great grandparents brought not only from eastern Canada and other parts of Canada when they settled that part of the country but also from their countries of origin.

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

Throughout Canada publicly funded organizations and institutions are being forced to re–evaluate their mandates, their operating procedures and their very reasons for being with increasing costs and reduced levels of financial support from both the public and the private sectors. The existence of many of these institutions is being debated. In my riding of Victoria—Haliburton it is a great worry for many cultural organizations.

The cultural sector in Canada has developed through a combination of public funding, private funding and volunteerism. In order to meet the targets to reduce the deficit the government believes all institutions that receive public funds must become more self–sufficient.

However, government is not going to just cut them adrift. Instead it will develop structural measures to assist them through this transition period. Tax credits, whether to assist in the development of a distinctively Canadian film industry or for the donation of cultural property to designated institutions such as those available through the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, are the one way the government is able to help through that transition time. It must be remembered that heritage institutions and related activities also contribute to the economy of Canada. The impact of heritage institutions and their activities are increasingly having beneficial, economic impacts on communities across Canada. A recent Nova Scotia study, for example, noted that the economic impact of the six major museums in that province significantly exceeded the direct expenditures associated with the operating of the facilities.

Similarly, data available from a series of studies conducted in Alberta show that spending by visitors to historic sites averaged $50 million annually. These same studies have demonstrated that museums such as the Tyrrell Museum in Drumheller are often the top tourist attractions in a region.

Much of the activities of museums, archives and libraries also support research, knowledge and public education. The research conducted by the staff of these institutions often leads to seminal discoveries and the effect of this can have impact in other areas such as the production and dissemination of CD–ROMs and publications.

Exhibitions also educate the public, create employment and contribute to cultural tourism. Visitors who travel to other cities to view exhibits, stay in hotels, eat in restaurants, shop, attend events, take tours and spend money in a variety of sectors of the economy because they travel to a city or town to visit a museum.

The recent exhibit at the Art Gallery of Ontario of impressionist paintings from the Barnes collection is an excellent example of this and has provided concrete proof of the contribution cultural institutions can make to the economy.

During the three and one–half months this exhibit was on display in Toronto, almost 600,000 people visited the Art Gallery of Ontario specifically to see this exhibit. According to an economic impact study that was conducted afterward, almost $75 million was spent in the province of Ontario on trips or excursions that brought these visitors to the exhibit. This $75 million expenditure created ripple effects throughout Ontario's economy that resulted in the production of $137 million in goods and services.

In addition to these impressive statistics, the Barnes exhibit produced employment and the amount of taxes associated with this event totalled almost $22 million for the municipal, provincial and federal governments.

While these almost 600,000 visitors went to this cultural institution to see an exhibition they also had the opportunity to view works from the permanent collection of the Art Gallery of Ontario. The same is true for visitors to any other museum, art gallery, archives or library. Some of the works on display from the permanent collection would undoubtedly have been acquired as a result of the tax incentives offered by the Cultural Property Export and Import Act contained in Bill C–93.

This represents another side of the economic impact of cultural institutions. The idea that the foregone tax revenue that results from a donation of certified cultural property is somehow lost money is simply not true. In the first place, the work of art or the artefact that is being donated to an art gallery or a museum will either have been with the donor's family for generations or it will have been purchased by the donor at some point in the past and is now being donated to a public collection.

If, in the case of a work of art, it was bought through a commercial gallery or an auction house, an open market transaction occurred. Money changed hands during that transaction and taxes were paid to governments both in the form of sales tax and income tax paid by the art dealer or the auction house.

Similarly, these objects, often of great cultural significance, were purchased with after tax dollars, that is, with the disposable income of the donor. It is important to remember that a donor of cultural property is not reimbursed dollar for dollar for the fair market value of the donation. Instead a donor receives a tax credit equal to 17 per cent of the first $200 and 29 per cent of the fair market value beyond that. Simple mathematics indicate that the tax refund, the forgone revenue the donor receives is only a fraction of the fair market value of the object.

If a person buys an object with after tax dollars, donates it to a distinguished institution and then receives a tax credit for 29 per cent of the fair market value of the object, it is difficult to see how anyone can fault that individual. They will also have donated it to a public institution where it becomes part of Canada's cultural patrimony that is accessible to everyone.

Members of the third party have objected to tax credits for donations but they have not yet addressed the purpose and intent of this bill. Tax credits are not the issue. In any event, I believe I have adequately demonstrated that tax credits for donations provide an incentive and a modest acknowledgement of a donor's generosity. They do not, as stated earlier, even come close to reimbursing an individual and in fact can contribute to significant revenue gains in a variety of areas of the economy.

It is perhaps worthwhile reminding hon. members that the purpose of this bill is to establish an appeal of decisions of the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board to the Tax Court of Canada. It establishes two types of appeal: the right of review of a determination by the review board itself and then, if necessary, the right to appeal to the Tax Court of Canada.

This need for the right of appeal is not new however but a re–establishment of the right of appeal that was inadvertently lost in 1991 when the responsibility for determining fair market value was transferred from Revenue Canada to the review board. There has been concern that the right of appeal would simply add to the backlog of cases to the tax court. We do not know if this will happen but every effort has been made to ensure that it does not. The redetermination process will allow the majority of disagreements to be settled directly with the revenue board.

Is the possibility of adding a few more cases to the workload of the tax court a reason to deny someone that right of appeal when they disagree with a decision that directly affects them? Is this a reason to open the reinstatement of right that was lost and now denies some individuals natural justice through their inability to appeal to the courts? I believe not.

It is also questionable if the reinstatement, and this must be emphasized, of a right of appeal will lead to an increase in appeals to the Tax Court of Canada. This right to appeal existed before when the responsibility for fair market value resided with Revenue Canada. Therefore, it seems reasonable to assume that the tax court is in a position to resume this responsibility.

People from every province and territory have made donations to institutions designated under the Cultural Property Export and Import Act and people from around the world are now able to share in the enjoyments of the works of art, archival collections, books and artefacts that are preserved in public collections as a result.

These cultural institutions both preserve Canada's heritage in movable cultural property and make a significant contribution to the economy. Culture is not a frill enjoyed by only a few people but a valuable economic activity as well. To ensure that it continues to play this vital dual role, our museums, archives and libraries must have vibrant collections that will both contribute to knowledge and attract attention and visitors.

The tax incentives offered by the Cultural Property Export and Import Act are an important means to ensure that the donations of significant cultural property will continue. Without a right of appeal, as contained in Bill C–93, some donors will feel that they have no recourse if they disagree with a decision of the Canadian Cultural Properties Export Review Board and they may not be prepared to make a donation.

The appeal process will contribute to the preservation of Canada's cultural heritage collections of international stature. Both activities are important to Canada as a nation. I encourage all members of the House to support Bill C–93.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member. I congratulate him on a very able speech.

The member must know that at second reading of the bill the members of the Reform Party voted against it. Some of us were kind of surprised at that because the bill does something to promote Canada's culture. It does quite a lot to promote Canada's culture I would suggest, particularly the culture that is contained in Canada's museums and art galleries.

Does the hon. member agree with me that the Reform Party policy on this matter is inappropriate and that Reform Party members should be supporting the bill since they must recognize, as we do, that culture is an extremely important part of Canada's political, economic and social life?

• (1245)

The culture represented by Canada's art galleries and museums is a very significant part of our heritage.

Mr. O'Reilly: Madam Speaker, I thank the member for Kingston and the Islands for his question. It is a very interesting one. I could not imagine not being in support of the bill.

Museums, art galleries, archives and libraries in every province and territory benefit through the receipt of donations of cultural property as a result of these tax credits.

I recently sent a collection of postcards, with no value or tax incentive for me, that I received dealing with western history, particularly in the province of Manitoba. It was sent in the 1800s to my riding of Victoria—Haliburton.

I came across it in a collection and managed to pick it up for very little and I donated it to the Canadian Heritage Museum in Manitoba. It sent me a thank you. I should have asked for a receipt but I did not feel the collection had a lot of value.

The collection significantly added to the heritage, the culture and preservation of culture in western Canada. It is very important for an eastern Ontario member to be concerned with western Canada and with the culture of western Canada, with the preservation of the culture in western Canada.

I have a lot of trouble understanding why the Reform Party would not support such a bill. I know quite specifically that the areas those members represent have gained from Liberal members such as me, the member for Kingston and the Islands and the member for London—Middlesex.

Somewhere along the line we have donated without any tax receipt. The collection I donated was postcards, but it was invaluable. I should have had it appraised. I felt it should be in a museum and was something people should be able to enjoy. It is preserved forever instead of being thrown in the garbage or kept in some personal collection where it is not seen.

I also collect guns, much to the dismay of a number of people here. The gun bill is still in the other place. I have a gun that was carried by an army doctor in the first world war. I guess we would call it an oxymoron that doctors were issued handguns in the first world war. I have had recent discussions with the museum in Lindsay to donate that gun. If I am lucky enough to get a tax receipt for it, that would be fair. It is the only one of its kind registered in Canada and therefore should be preserved so that the public can see it.

Even going into the law and order issues Reform Party members seem to stand for, I cannot imagine why they would disagree with the bill. It is necessary. It will help preserve our culture and our heritage, a very important part of the fibre of our country.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to speak in support of Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

The bill, as previous members mentioned, establishes two processes. The first gives the donor or the recipient institution the right to request that the review board reconsider its initial determination of fair market value.

If after receiving a redetermination from the board the donor is still not satisfied, he or she may take the second step of appealing the board's decision to the Tax Court of Canada. The fair market value of cultural property certified by the review board is eligible as a tax credit of 17 per cent on the first $200 and 29 per cent on the balance over $200. The donor can claim the fair market value of the gift up to the total amount of his or her net income and there is no tax payable on any capital gain resulting from this gift.

This is a technical bill, as was mentioned by colleagues earlier. The objective is the preservation of Canada's cultural heritage.

I understand from a tax policy point of view where Reform members are coming from. They have a system of tax reform not unlike my own approach, a single tax system in which they want to flush out from the entire tax act of Canada all the preferences given in the various sectors.

However, until we as a government get involved in total tax reform we cannot deprive sectors of our economy vital to the economic soundness of the country the opportunity of growth and participation in the economy. This is where the Reform Party is short sighted.

If we say to the artists, the cultural community, that we do not want to give them the opportunity to participate in the tax act through tax credits, we cannot say no to them without having the same approach for the energy sector, the forestry sector, the tourism sector and so on. I am philosophically supportive of where Reform members are coming from but they cannot oppose only one sector.

Until we get a commitment from the House for total tax reform we have to continue to do these tax credits on a sector by sector basis. Otherwise we will be punishing one community while other communities get a free ride. That is wrong.

Do we want to punish the cultural community and let the very wealthy people have the ability to send their kids to ivy league universities where they get tax credits or estate tax redemptions of up to $600,000 on property in the United States? It does not work.

I want to come at the bill from another point of view, what cultural properties contribute to the tourism sector. I will give a specific example of a museum in Toronto which I know the Speaker is very familiar with, Canada's Hockey Hall of Fame. This is an example of a museum that celebrates the cultural soul of the country, hockey.

About three weeks ago I had the opportunity of going through the Hockey Hall of Fame. I was absolutely blown away by the historical relics on display, with the feeling one gets as one goes through the hall of fame and looks at the history of hockey, its contribution in terms of job creation in hockey, the celebration of those magical moments in great Stanley Cup goals and so on. One walks out of that building with a sense of pride which I cannot describe on the floor of the House.

There is another feature to this museum on which we are not dwelling. It is relevant to all museums, all cultural property establishments across Canada. These are tourism assets. The spinoff we bring to our community when we celebrate and package our cultural properties is phenomenal. What industries are affected by these tourism assets? We are talking about hotels and restaurants. We are talking about replicas of these assets manufactured in small craft shops. These cultural property assets and historic museums exist right across the country.

I have been glancing through "On the Road to Quebec", a guide to the sightseeing attractions in Quebec. We are on the eve of a very important decision in our country. As I was going through this guide I could not help but feel emotional about some of the great cultural and historic sights and assets in Quebec. There is a litany of sights, tourist attractions and properties that celebrate the great history and the great contributions Quebec has made to Canada. Just going through those assets in Quebec right now alone make the bill worthy of merit.

I believe many Canadians right now are listening to these debates in the House because we are going through a very fragile time in our country's history. Many members are receiving calls in their offices by people concerned about the referendum on Monday. This is no secret. There have been many newscasts on television and radio and many newspaper articles stating that things are very fragile right now.

To Canadians not living in Quebec, if ever there was a time when they could celebrate the great cultural assets in Quebec, try to travel this weekend to Quebec to visit and celebrate some of these great Canadian cultural assets all over Quebec, especially in the outlying regions. We have great centres where our history and cultural assets are celebrated. This would be the weekend for Canadians, if they could find the time, to go and visit these centres, these communities and these small hamlets. While they are there they can go to the local manor, the local inn, stay for the weekend, talk to the community and express to them our hope and our wish that on Monday they vote for Canada.

If a lot of Canadians did something like that, they would be making a great contribution in making themselves feel comfortable in another region of their country, and probably the Quebecers would welcome it. It has been my experience that the hospitality that Quebecers show, especially to people from outside their province, is first class—the restaurants, the inns, all the activities that go on in Quebec.

I want to reflect for a second on the experience you and I have both had, Mr. Speaker, as fathers whose sons played in the Quebec pee–wee tournament, another great celebration we have in our country. Young boys from all across Canada go to Quebec City every February, a majority of them unilingual English, and play in the Quebec pee–wee tournament. One of the unique features of that Quebec pee–wee tournament is the fact that each and every member of the teams from across Canada lives with a family in a home in Quebec City.

We both know, Mr. Speaker, that there is a very special feeling, a very special emotional attachment that stays with those young men when they finish that tournament and come home to their communities right across Canada. This tournament, which has been going on for almost 80 years now, has been one of the unique experiences young boys celebrate. It is a substantial and concrete example of hockey as a cultural instrument pulling people together in the country.

I have absolutely no difficulty in supporting the bill before the House today. If our culture is strong, if our culture is celebrated in every aspect, our ability to galvanize and stay as a nation increases. In my mind, over the last few years we have had too little celebration, too little promotion of our history, of our culture and all those things that bind us as a nation.

As I mentioned the other day in the House, we have become so preoccupied and so focused on deficit and debt reduction that we are actually melting away some of the glue that has been holding us together as a community and as a country. When we see cultural instruments as just another expense and in the name of deficit and debt we have to cut, we have missed the whole point.

The celebration and support of culture is an investment in the community. It is an investment not only in an economic sense but also in a spiritual sense. If we were to spend more time celebrating that aspect of our cultural heritage, we probably would not have some of those parochial thought processes that seem to be so apparent today taking over the agenda.

I repeat that I celebrate the bill. I support the bill. I appeal to all Canadians who are looking for something to do this weekend to travel to Quebec and look at the great Canadian cultural properties that celebrate not just the heritage of Quebec but the heritage of Canada. It is those kinds of discussions, one region to another, one community to another, that ultimately will lead, I hope, to a great victory for Canada on Monday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): That is a bit out of the norm, but while I would not this day or any other day compromise the integrity or impartiality of the Chair, I want to associate myself with the member for Broadview—Greenwood, particularly his memories of our young boys going to Quebec City for the Quebec pee–wee hockey tournament. I thank him for including me in that statement.

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support and address Bill C–93, the legislation that establishes an appeal for a decision of the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board to the Tax Court of Canada.

The purpose of the bill is to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act with consequential amendments to the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act to establish an appeal of the determinations by the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board of the fair market value of certified cultural property.

In December 1991 the responsibility for determining the fair market value of cultural property donated to designated Canadian museums, art galleries, and libraries was transferred from Revenue Canada Taxation to the review board. The review board assumed this new responsibility at its meeting held in January 1992. No provision for appeal of review board decisions was included in the legislative amendments, despite the fact that the right of appeal had existed when this responsibility was with Revenue Canada.

Donors and custodial institutions expressed serious concerns about the lack of an appeal process. The Department of Canadian Heritage, in co–operation with the review board, then undertook a series of consultations within the community about the need for an appeal process. As a result of these consultations it was agreed that legislative amendments should be prepared to establish the right of appeal to the Tax Court of Canada.

The bill establishes two processes. The first gives the donor or recipient institution the right to request that the review board reconsider its initial determination of fair market value. If after receiving a redetermination from the board the donor is still not satisfied, he or she may take the second step of appealing the board's decision to the Tax Court of Canada.

It is appropriate that the bill is receiving third reading today, October 24, because today marks the 50th anniversary of the United Nations. It was 50 years ago today, within a few months of the end of World War II, that the United Nations formally came into being when its charter took effect. The United Nations has the difficult mandate of maintaining international peace and easing global suffering.

We are also approaching the end of the United Nations world decade for cultural development. Launched in 1988, this decade will conclude at the end of 1997. The purpose of the world decade for cultural development is to promote activities that enhance the cultural components of development and undertake research and pilot projects that focus on the relationship between culture and development.

Through agencies such as UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the UN also has responsibility for literacy, education and contributions to scientific and cultural development around the world.

Canada has played an active role in the work of both the United Nations and UNESCO and is recognized internationally for the work it has done to protect the cultural property of developing nations. During the 1960s Mexico and Peru in particular, but many other southern and central American countries as well, experienced heavy losses of cultural property through illicit trafficking. Their appeal to UNESCO for a method to stop this led in 1970 to the UNESCO convention on the means of prohibiting and preventing the illicit import, export and transfer of ownership of cultural property. This convention, while it deals with measures to prevent the import, export and illicit transfer of cultural objects, places the onus on each country to develop its own measures to protect and preserve its cultural heritage.

To join the international movement to protect cultural property Canada passed the Cultural Property Export and Import Act in September 1977. The purpose of the act is twofold: first, to ensure the preservation in Canada of significant examples of the nation's cultural, historic and scientific heritage; and, second, to protect in Canada the legitimate interests of foreign states concerned with the preservation of their cultural property.

These objectives are accomplished by the following features of the act: first, the establishment of an export control list of defined categories of cultural property, which restricts their export without a permit; second, the establishment of the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board to review applications for export permits and applications for the certification of cultural property for income tax purposes; third, the establishment of income tax incentives for gifts or sales of cultural property to designated Canadian institutions; and, fourth, procedures for the recovery and return of foreign cultural property that has been illegally exported from its country of origin.

In 1978 Canada became a signatory to the 1970 UNESCO convention on the means of prohibiting and preventing the illicit export and transfer of ownership of cultural property. The convention, which contains measures to prevent the illicit import, export and transfer or ownership of cultural objects, places the onus on each signatory country to develop its own legislation to protect and preserve its cultural heritage and to establish measures to facilitate the return of illegally exported cultural property to its country of origin.

The Cultural Property Export and Import Act contains provisions whereby it is a criminal offence to import into Canada cultural property that has been illegally exported from a country that is a signatory to an international cultural property agreement.

Protection of another country's heritage is not sufficient if we do not protect our own. Canada therefore put into place export controls to regulate the export of cultural property from Canada. It is imperative that we discuss here today the control system. It should be noted that any object that is more than 50 years old and made by a person who is no longer living is subject to export control. For such objects, a cultural property export permit must be obtained before they can leave the country.

The Canadian cultural property export control list provides a detailed description of the classes of objects that are subject to control. It divides cultural property into seven categories or groups of objects. The first is objects recovered from the soil or waters of Canada. The second class is ethnographic arts. The third is military objects. The fourth is decorative art. The fifth is fine art. Sixth is scientific and technological objects. The seventh is books, documents, photographs and sound recordings.

To apply for a cultural property export permit, the exporter submits an application to a permit issuing officer who determines if the object is included in the controlled list. If it is not, the permit is issued forthwith. If it is included in the list, the permit issuing officer refers the permit application to the appropriate expert examiner.

The expert examiner must then determine if the object meets the criteria of outstanding significance and national importance found in section 11 of the act which reads as follows: "The object is of outstanding significance by reason of its close association with Canadian history or national life, its aesthetic qualities or its value in the study of the arts and sciences; and whether that object is of such a degree of national importance that its loss to Canada would significantly diminish the national heritage".

It should be noted that if the expert examiner advises that the permit not be issued, the permit officer advises the applicant accordingly. The applicant either retains the object in Canada or appeals the expert examiner's decision to the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board.

The review board then hears the appeal and either overrules the expert examiner or affirms his recommendation. If the review board overrules the expert examiner, the permit is granted immediately. If the board agrees with him, a delay period of between two and six months is established.

There is an incentive system. The act establishes the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board which consists of nine members plus a chairman. It is composed of two representatives of the public at large, including the chairman, and four members each from the curatorial and dealer collector communities. As such, the board is an independent body of individuals with a recognized knowledge and interest in Canadian heritage.

The work that occupies most of the board's time is not export control. The certification for income tax purposes of cultural property donated to Canadian institutions is of primary concern.

At the time of passage of the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act was amended to provide an exemption from the payment of capital gains tax for gifts or sales of certified cultural property. In addition, the value of objects or collections that have been determined to be of outstanding significance and national importance is eligible as a tax credit up to 100 per cent of net income instead of up to 20 per cent of net income that may be claimed as an exemption for charitable donations.

Prior to these amendments, capital gains tax was payable for gifts in kind. Only federal and provincial government institutions could offer tax credits up to 100 per cent of net income.

From 1977 to 1990 the review board had only an informal advisory role in the determination of the fair market value of gifts of cultural property. In 1990 the responsibility for determining the fair market value of certified cultural property was transferred from Revenue Canada Taxation to the review board. This was confirmed by legislative amendments to both the Cultural Property Export and Import Act and the Income Tax Act in 1991.

No provision was made for appealing determinations of the review board. The right of appeal contained in the Income Tax Act was then lost. The need for an appeal process was identified and acknowledged in 1993. By establishing the right of appeal, potential donors will be assured that if they are dissatisfied with the review board determination, they will have recourse to the Tax Court of Canada.

With the agreement of the Tax Court of Canada, the appeal to the tax court has been made retroactive to January 1992. That provides all donors who have made a gift since the right to appeal was lost and who wish to pursue an appeal with both the opportunity and the legal right to do so.

Determinations of fair market value are now being made by the members of the review board, people with professional expertise in the various domains of cultural property who are also active participants in the various marketplaces where it is sold. These same people already experience an expertise in a quasi–judicial capacity, that of hearing appeals when export permits have been denied. It is only appropriate and sensible therefore that they assume the additional responsibility as they are experts in the subject matter with experience as an appeal board.

An open and transparent process both at the time the review board determines and if necessary redetermines the fair market value of cultural property is essential. The right to pursue the matter in the courts if no other resolution can be found is consistent with both the Canadian legal system and the concept of natural justice.

As we celebrate the 50th anniversary of the United Nations, let us remember that Bill C–93 is very much in the spirit of everything the United Nations stands for. The Cultural Property Export and Import Act has its philosophical roots in the activities of the United Nations because it both protects Canada's heritage and allows Canada to become a signatory to the 1970 convention.

Bill C–93 is about fairness and natural justice, two principles that are fundamental to the United Nations. On this the 50th anniversary of the United Nations, it is only appropriate that all members of this House support this bill.

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, over the past few years a number of donors and custodial institutions have felt uneasy about the arbitrary decision making upon which the value of the goods donated to a museum or an art gallery were executed.

In the mind of the member for Central Nova, are the protocol and processes that will allow for due process and the laws of natural justice to take place incorporated in the bill?

Ms. Skoke: Yes, Mr. Speaker. An open and transparent process at the time the review board determines and if necessary redetermines the fair market value of cultural property is essential and the bill provides for that. The right to pursue the matter in the courts if no other resolution can be found is consistent with both our Canadian legal system and our concept of natural justice.

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to expand very briefly on cultural property and the valuation and benefits to society in her area in particular. Could she expand on the benefits they receive?

I agree with her wholeheartedly that reinstating the right of appeal is necessary. I want to commend her for her comments today.

Ms. Skoke: Mr. Speaker, cultural property valued at approximately $60 million is donated to Canadian institutions each year. In my riding we have the Nova Scotia Museum of Industry which is a very new facility. It is one which is relying on cultural property donations. We look forward to hearing from anyone in Canada who wishes to make a contribution to our industry, science and technology museum.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in support of Bill C–93, an act to amend the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

I also thank my French teacher, Madame Paré, for allowing me to interrupt my class to come to the House to speak on this important bill. To Madame Paré I say:

[English]

On Friday, October 20, the Ottawa Citizen carried a story with the headline: "Museums, historic sites become hot ticket". The story notes that museums and historic sites across Canada have been attracting more visitors and even a little more money.

A Statistics Canada study also discovered that 12,000 full time and almost 20,000 part time employees worked in heritage institutions in 1992 and 1993. In addition to these paid employees, over 54,000 people volunteered their time to work in these same heritage institutions. These people are all working for one purpose and that is to ensure that Canada's heritage is preserved and that it is preserved in public institutions where it will be available for the enjoyment of all Canadians.

Few collecting institutions today have any funds to purchase objects for their collections. As a result, they must rely on donations. The tax incentives available for donations to custodial institutions that have demonstrated they meet professional standards is one way in which the Government of Canada is able to provide assistance to ensure that their collections continue to reflect Canada's heritage.

Donations to registered charities are eligible for tax credits, although the total value of gifts to charity in any one year cannot exceed 20 per cent of net income. Donations of cultural property that have been found to be, in the words of the act, of outstanding significance and national importance are eligible for a tax credit up to 100 per cent of net income and are exempt from the payment of capital gains tax.

That does not mean they receive a tax refund equivalent to the fair market value of their donation. Non–refundable federal tax credits are based on 17 per cent of the first $200 of value of the donation and 29 per cent of any amount above that. When the exemption from capital gains tax is added to this, the best possible tax treatment a donor may receive is a refund equivalent to 50 per cent of the fair market value of the object or collection they are donating.

A donation to a museum means that a donor is donating both significant cultural property and 50 per cent of the fair market value to the institution. It would be more profitable to sell an object in the open market than to donate it to a cultural institution. Tax credits are a fiscal measure that provide an enticement and an acknowledgement of the importance of the donation, but they are not meant to represent financial compensation.

I will give a very brief example. I know that many Canadians who are watching the debate really want to know whether or not this is some sort of a scheme for rich Canadians, as the Reform Party would like to characterize it.

If a taxpayer had an object of art with a fair market value appraised at $1,000 and that object of art cost only $100 when it was acquired many years ago and the taxpayer sold that object of art to a museum for the $1,000 fair market value, it would generate a $900 capital gain, half of which is taxable. On that capital gain, even at the highest marginal rate, $225 in income tax would be paid. That means the net proceeds to the donor would only be $775.

If we compare that to the tax treatment that is being afforded to the donor under Bill C–93, the donation of the $1,000 artefact would generate a tax credit of 17 per cent on the first $200, or $34, and 29 per cent on the remaining $800, or $232. In total, the cash value of the refund to the taxpayer would only be $266. That should be compared to the $775 they would have received had they sold the object outright.

In brief, what it really means is that the libraries, archives, museums and other cultural and heritage institutions of Canada are able to acquire for substantially less very important artefacts and cultural and heritage items for Canada. It is much more than they would be able to afford by paying the fair market value in cash.

Approximately 1,100 applications for certification for tax credits are received annually with a total fair market value of approximately $60 million Canadian. Because this is a tax credit it results in forgone revenue of approximately $25 million to $30 million annually. However, when compared to other tax incentive programs this is a very small amount of forgone revenue and has an impact far beyond the dollar value of the cultural property that is being preserved.

Much of the cultural property being donated because of these tax incentives would otherwise be lost to Canada, as it would be exported and sold on the international market. By keeping these objects in Canada and in public collections they become part of Canada's heritage.

Approximately 300 institutions in every province and territory of Canada have their collections enriched each year because of the existence of these tax credits. The Cultural Property Export and Import Act therefore plays an important role in the development of heritage collections in Canada. It encourages donations of significant pieces of our patrimony to the people of Canada through public collections and these donations are forever for our enjoyment and for the enjoyment of our future generations.

The legislation was meant to promote private donations as a means of indirect government support when acquisition funds could not be sustained. Many Canadians are unaware of the important role played by private collectors in the preservation of our national heritage. Objects formerly from private collections now enrich our public museums, just as the great museums of the world have been supported by private individuals for centuries.

In Canada we have our own unique examples: the donation of Sir William Van Horne to the Musée des beaux–arts de Montréal; the Zacks bequest to the Art Gallery of Ontario in Toronto; the collection of Lord Beaverbrook, now proudly displayed in the Beaverbrook Art Gallery in Fredericton; Dr. Norman MacKenzie's collection, which forms the basis of the collection of the MacKenzie Art Gallery in Regina; the magnificent and diverse collection of the Harvey family, which is now in the Glenbow Museum in Calgary; and the generosity of the Koerner family to the Museum of Anthropology in the University of British Columbia.

These museums now house the collections of their benefactors and founders. Some even owe their existence to these private individuals who had a passion for collecting a strong sense of Canada's history. Because of their generosity and their decision to enrich our heritage these works are now preserved and will be appreciated by future generations of Canadians as they appear in exhibitions and are made available for research purposes.

Government has a legitimate role to play in these transactions and must facilitate the movement of cultural objects from the private to the public sector by taking reasonable steps that will encourage philanthropy.

Without the tax incentives offered by the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, collectors would cease to make donations to museums, archives and libraries and would instead sell their collections to the international market.

There is a perception that it is only wealthy Canadians who have objects or collections to donate to our museums, archives and libraries and that only the wealthy benefit from the tax credits for donations of cultural property. This is simply not true. It is not true because of the reasons outlined by the hon. member for Erie, the hon. member for Central Nova, the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James and the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, all who so eloquently spoke on behalf of this bill and on behalf of Canada's cultural heritage.

As a result, museums in Canada, from the smallest local historical association museum in rural Canada to the major collecting institutions in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal are the product of a collective belief. The Cultural Property Export and Import Act and the tax incentives it offers for donations nurtures that belief and contributes to a shared vision of Canada.

In 1991 the Income Tax Act and the Cultural Property Export and Import Act were amended so that the responsibility for determining the fair market value of certified cultural property was transferred from Revenue Canada Taxation to the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board. Through an oversight the right of appeal that had existed in the Income Tax Act was not transferred at that time. As a result this right was inadvertently lost. Bill C–93 will reinstate the right of appeal that existed until 1991. That is what the bill does. It reinstates the right of appeal that existed before 1991.

It does not extend the existing tax benefits for donations of cultural property nor does it make any fundamental changes in tax policy. The appeal of determinations by the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board proposed in Bill C–93 will permit any donor of cultural property who disagrees with a review board determination the opportunity to pursue this first with the board and, if necessary, with the Tax Court of Canada.

The amendments proposed in the bill should also be viewed as a guarantee of the donor's right through natural justice to an appeal to the judicial system that it is warranted. The decision to transfer the responsibility for determining fair market value to the review board was made in haste and without consultation with the people it affected the most, the recipient institutions and donors.

The government learned from the mistake of the previous government and has consulted widely with the donors, museums professionals, dealers and members of the review board. During this consultative process we learned that many collectors were discouraged from making donations because they did not wish to become involved in a process they had perceived to be unfair.

The museum community is very pleased with the approach that has been taken with this bill and is convinced an appeal is necessary to ensure that donors will continue to support their institutions by making donations of cultural property.

The bill establishes two appeal processes, one that involves a reconsideration of all the relevant information by the review board and another that involves a formal, legal appeal to the tax court. The bill goes even further to ensure fairness with the agreement of the Tax Court of Canada. The appeal to the tax court is made retroactive to January 1992. Every donor who has made a gift since the right of appeal was lost and who wishes to pursue an appeal will have both the opportunity and legal right to do so.

The amendments proposed in Bill C–93 are extremely important because they offer a remedy to a situation that need not exist and should not exist. The right of appeal is a fundamental right and the bill proposes to re–establish a right that was lost through an oversight. These are technical amendments but are critical to the continued preservation of Canada's heritage.

That concludes my formal remarks on the bill. I am very happy to stand in support of Bill C–93. I reiterate the rationale for the bill which is the reason I am here speaking to the House. The debate that has been going on, particularly by the opposition, the third party, has tended to paint those who donate cultural and heritage artefacts to our institutions as people who are doing something wrong, people who are rich, people who are taking advantage of a situation.

In the example I outlined to the House it is very clear that in terms of cash in their pockets, those who have made that wonderful gesture to contribute part of Canada's heritage to libraries, to archives and to museums are doing it for much more than cash in their pockets and for substantially less than they would otherwise receive should they have sold those artefacts for fair market value.

I compliment the parliamentary secretary and the member for Mississauga East for her excellent work on getting the bill through the House. I know of nobody that is more fiercely loyal and supportive of the Canadian cultural and heritage institutions. She has demonstrated that with her work in the House and by her extensive travel across the country promoting Canada.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have one brief question for my friend from Mississauga South who was an accountant in his former life.

The bill before us responds to the concerns of the artistic donor and custodial community with respect to review board procedures as well as to concerns that donations of cultural objects are sometimes made for the purpose of tax avoidance. In his experience as an accountant has he seen widespread use of the legislation for the purpose of tax avoidance?

Mr. Szabo: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Erie for his important question. As a chartered accountant, having operated a practice for over 25 years, I must admit that I have not seen any reports or cases come before the courts with regard to problems of donations of cultural property.

The process outlined in the bill is a rigorous, independent one by people who are in the business of cultural and heritage artefacts and items. The process is meant to ensure fairness and equity in our tax system for Canadians who wish to make donations of cultural and heritage property. Because of that rigorous process there is no question in my mind that the determination of the values for tax purposes is fair and reasonable and represent fair values for all Canadians.

Some members have described this process as a win, win situation. It is win, win for all parties. Museums and other cultural institutions will be able to acquire for the enhancement of their collections important artefacts and objects of art for the enjoyment of all Canadians at substantially lower values than they would have to put out should they have to purchase those at fair market value.

That alone creates a situation of leverage. That leverage situation means that we get much more for the dollar. Donors of cultural property are not getting cash out of the deal. They are not getting, whether it be directly or indirectly through taxes on the transaction, more by the tax credit method. In fact, they are getting less. They are getting less than they would otherwise.

It is fair to say that people who come forward and donate, and the figure is some $60 million a year, are not doing it because they are out to get something out of the system. They are, in fact, putting back into the system much more. It is a tremendous expression on behalf of Canadians who have been fortunate enough to acquire assets and objects of art that they are prepared to contribute to Canada, so that all Canadians can enjoy our wonderful heritage.

It is timely that we are talking about cultural and heritage artefacts. No province could be more proud of its cultural heritage and its contributions to Canada than the province of Quebec. At this point, as a member and as a Canadian, I would congratulate it for the wonderful contribution it has made to the Canadian culture and heritage. It is an outstanding example of what we can do as Canadians together. For that we should all be thankful.

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the hon. member, but he has disappeared.

The nature of Canadians is to give and support institutions within their communities, both at the lower level and to the senior levels of the museum chain. A country is known by its culture, not by its material aspects, and what it leaves behind for the world. Little by little the artefacts have been gathered together by small museums at the local level, the provincial level and the national level.

• (1345)

Does the hon. member feel strongly that the bill will ensure that those who give those valuable artefacts whether to museums or to art galleries would be given fair compensation under the rules of the Income Tax Act as the bill is presently written?

Mr. Szabo: I thank the member for the question and the comment.

Fair compensation is a relative term. For some Canadians fair compensation has to do with money. Bill C–93 provides for a tax credit mechanism with regard to the treatment or the non–treatment of capital gains. The donors are really getting only about 50 per cent of the equivalent of the fair market value. The donors are not getting in monetary terms fair compensation.

When $60 million worth of artefacts are donated to Canada it must mean there are a lot of Canadians prepared to make those contributions so that all Canadians can enjoy the cultural and heritage artefacts we have.

Their compensation is knowing we live in the best country in the world and that we want to share it with all Canadians and with all who visit our great country.

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today we are continuing to debate the merits of the Cultural Property Export and Import Act.

When the act came into place in 1977 the time was ripe for lengthy debate on the measures necessary so that the symbols of our cultural heritage were not only recognized but preserved. In 1977, 10 years had already passed since Canada celebrated its centennial and it was time to take a hard look at who we are as Canadians, what we are as a country and consider what Canada could possibly become in the next 100 years.

The Cultural Property Export and Import Act was brought into force very much in keeping with the spirit of encouraging the development of our nation not simply for nation's sake but as a nation that can hold its own beside its neighbour to the south and among its neighbours that make up the world; to encourage the development of a nation we call Canada, which peaks the interests of other nations.

If we consider today is the future, 30 years into the next 100 years of our existence as a nation, where do we stand today? We stand as a nation that can and does attract people from all over the world either to visit this country or to invest in it. Canada as a nation is respected around the world. Foreigners are impressed that despite our geographical vastness we are holding strongly together. Despite the diversity of our cultures we are keeping together. Despite the disputes we have had and will continue to have we are growing stronger together.

As we celebrate the 50th anniversary of the United Nations we in Canada are celebrating our commitment to developing all of those aspects integral to civilized nations.

Standing here today debating the merits of the Cultural Property Export and Import Act makes us sound like cultural barbarians; to think that we have to justify measures that have been in place for almost 20 years, measures that confirm our commitment to work with the United Nations to stimulate cultural growth, academic excellence, scientific achievements, beauty and peace and harmony.

How can we begin to presume that accomplishments and achievements can take place in a vacuum where the means to create awareness of progress are non–existent. Imagine our nation without our museums, art galleries, archival institutions. Imagine our 2,000 museums without collections that live and breath and grow to reflect who we are and how we are placed in the context of the rest of the world.

Imagine our nation without any symbols, without the pride our people can take in these symbols and share with our neighbours. Human nature is about interaction, linking history, the arts, science and our personal impressions, and sharing these linkages with our friends and colleagues so that we continue to learn, continue to seek, continue to live and continue to exist.

Let me point out some examples of symbols of our national heritage which thanks to the provisions of the Cultural Property Export and Import Act are now being preserved in Canada and, more important, are being exhibited to the public for the world to see and from which to learn.

In 1992 the Art Gallery of Ontario was successful in repatriating to Canada a magnificent painting by Franklin Carmichael, one of the founders of the Group of Seven, with the assistance of a grant provided under the terms of the very act we are here discussing today.

To give a sense of the importance of this painting, the Group of Seven in their day were regarded by the public as radicals, off the wall, artists who produce works of questionable artistic merit. As recently as the 1920s Canadians found the bold and confident landscapes painted by the Group of Seven what we might call too difficult. Imagine that, a Group of Seven painting being too difficult at a time when the rest of the world has already gone beyond landscapes, when impressionists had already been putting challenging images on the canvas for the past 50 years. Nonetheless, Franklin Carmichael was a central figure in the development of the decorative symbolist wilderness landscape that actually led to the formation of the Group of Seven.

The painting the Art Gallery of Ontario succeeded in bringing back from England is a brilliant example of the kind of radical painting in Canada in the 1920s that Carmichael was so instrumental in bringing to public attention. Here was one painting that was so instrumental in giving the Group of Seven public recognition. This painting has therefore become a symbol of how one object, one artefact, can have such an impact on the further development on how the public perceives art.

To see this painting hanging in the Art Gallery of Ontario today is only one example of how important it is for us to open our minds and our hearts to those who have the courage to introduce us to new ways of doing what we as citizens have been doing since we were born. To have access to the formative symbols of the past is integral to the definition of the present and to the assurance of the future.

In the bill the establishment of an appeal should be viewed as a reinstatement of the right of appeal that was lost when the responsibility for determining fair market value was transferred to the review board in 1991.

These amendments will ensure that donors who disagree with the determinations of the review board will have the right of appeal to the courts and will not be denied natural justice.

The announcement of the establishment of an appeal process was received positively by donors, museums, art dealers and the media. These legislative amendments therefore enjoy a high level of public support.

The amendments are technical in nature and respond to strong concerns expressed by the heritage community. Their passage into law should be seen as part of the ongoing commitment of the Government of Canada to ensure the preservation of Canada's cultural heritage.

Further, I think of the Art Gallery of Windsor, of the many functions in my riding and in the neighbouring ridings in Windsor and Essex county, Art by the River in Amherstburg, Art in the Park in Windsor and many other charitable events. I know of the many dedicated volunteers who assist in these events and other displays of our culture. I also know the thousands of people who visit them benefit from the culture and the experience.

The Art Gallery of Windsor has now moved into a shopping centre. At first it was met with large opposition but now it is in the shopping centre and thousands of people are visiting it.

More and more young Canadians are having the opportunity to see these displays of culture. More and more people are benefiting from what is being recreated in this act, continuing to be allowed their contributions worth up to $60 million a year open to all Canadians in public institutions, institutions that promote our culture and our heritage.

During the summer when I was in Jonquière I had the opportunity to visit a display in Chicoutimi by a local artist. We have to remember how important it is to all of Canada to encourage Canadians to understand and benefit from the cultural aspects and to continue on. We are only in the 30th year of the next 100 years. There are 70 more years to go. I know that in Windsor and Essex county we continue to do that on a regular basis.

Art in the Park, for example, started small and has grown to such a large capacity it is now offered it in the winter as well. Thousands of people come through on Saturdays and Sundays and take the opportunity to purchase art. Many people in the local community have now taken and used art as a fundraising activity. Donations of art are used for auctions and other activities. It is important that we re-establish the appeal rights that were lost. The right of appeal should never have been lost. Unfortunately the last government decided that as a Canadian citizen one did not have that right of appeal.

We in this government believe that the right of appeal in all subjects is very important. No one should be denied the right of natural justice. When they do donate something they should be given their true value in the amount of effort and donations. I believe the value is many times more than the fair market value actually is of the object because thousands of people will come to see these objects in years to come and will all benefit from them and will go on from there.

Hopefully Windsor and Essex county can be a model for what is happening now and into the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until 5 p.m. tomorrow, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the people of Guelph—Wellington are proud to be Canadians. They look forward to a no vote on October 30.

Last year over 1,000 Guelph—Wellington residents signed a petition urging the Leader of the Opposition not to promote separatism when travelling abroad. Many other constituents have contacted my office expressing their hope in a united Canada and reminding Quebecers they are an important part of our country.

• (1400)

Members of the Bloc and the separatists in Quebec like to remind us of what is wrong with Canada. In Guelph—Wellington we like to remember and celebrate what is good about living in the best country in the world.

Guelph—Wellington residents know that Canada is great. We urge Quebecers to remember that the United Nations considers us to be the best and to vote no on October 30.

PRIVACY OF INFORMATION

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Privacy Commissioner of Canada estimates that Canadians have their names crunched through various computers, back and forth across the continent, about five to ten times a day. He further estimates that the buying and selling of personal information is a $300 million a year industry. This is a serious threat to the privacy of Canadians.

The Information Highway Advisory Council released a report last month pointing to the need for legislation ensuring personal privacy in the growing area of information technology. The Government of Quebec has led the fight to protect personal information by regulating the selling of name lists. Quebec's bold Bill 68 is designed after similar legislation in western European countries.

This Thursday Bill C–315 will be introduced in the House for second reading debate. Bill C–315 accurately reflects the growing need to protect Canadians' control of their personal information. Members of the House will have the opportunity to debate the issue then. I look forward to participating in the debate on Thursday.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Julian Reed (Halton—Peel, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the referendum date draws near I would like to acknowledge a package received from a grade 13 politics class at Mayfield Secondary School in the riding I serve. Not only have over 450 students signed a petition stating the importance of Canada's unity, they have also put together a video cassette in which they have voiced their concerns over the referendum as well as their love of the province of Quebec. This is being sent to a secondary school in Quebec.

All Canadians are concerned about the Quebec referendum and its long term effects on Canada. Canada is not whole without Quebec, and it would be in everyone's best interest that Canada remain united.

We should realize that all Canadians, from the youngest to the oldest, have an enormous stake in the country. Our youth are concerned. They have every right to be. The rest of their lives hangs in the balance of the referendum. Canada's youth should not be overlooked or disregarded.

UNITED NATIONS

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today, October 24, is an anniversary that celebrates peace over war and unity over division. Fifty years ago 31 nations from around the globe ratified the UN charter. It was on that day that Canada and other like–minded countries sought to ensure the peace and security that had proven so elusive to their generation.

Today every Canadian from Quebec to Newfoundland to British Columbia can take pride in the accomplishments of Canada within the UN as exemplified by prominent Canadians like Lester Pearson, Major General Roméo Dallaire and Mr. Jules Deschênes at the World Court in The Hague. All have helped to build a strong and flourishing reputation for Canada.

The UN espouses the principles of unity and co–operation. As we approach an uncertain time in our own history, let us remember how we as Canadians have promoted such principles. October 24 marks an opportunity for all of us, from coast to coast, to reflect on what a united country can achieve and what a divided country will certainly lose.

CHÉTICAMP COMMUNITY RADIO

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, I took part in the official opening of CKJM, the new community radio station that has just gone on the air in Chéticamp and the Cape Breton Highlands.

This is the conclusion of five years' work by Normand Poirier, Angus Lefort and Daniel Aucoin and many other volunteers, who wanted to give Acadians in the area their own community radio as a means of local development. Their efforts were backed by the Government of Canada and strongly supported by the 5,000 or so listeners in the station's coverage area.

The opening ceremony was followed by a show featuring a variety of local musical talent. The show proved the point, if proof is required, that French language and culture are very much alive in Chéticamp, Grand–Étang, Saint–Joseph–du–Moine and many other places in Nova Scotia.

The Acadian people here have roots, language and culture in common with the francophones of Quebec. They fervently hope they will continue to have a country in common after October 30.

FREE TRADE

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Claude Cheysson, former French minister of foreign affairs and former commissioner of the European Community confirmed yesterday that the European Union could sign a free trade agreement with a sovereign Quebec. Mr. Cheysson thus recognized Quebec's special position between North America and Europe.

• (1405)

Free trade agreements will soon be signed between the European Union and Mexico and Tunisia. The idea of strengthening Quebec's position as a special European partner in North America is particularly attractive.

So, as Quebec enjoys special ties with its North American and Latin American partners, could it be that Canada alone has yet to comprehend the virtues of partnership? The Government of Canada has been trying unsuccessfully for some time now to sell the idea of a free trade agreement between NAFTA and the European Union. Perhaps a sovereign Quebec will succeed where Canada has failed.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last weekend my wife and I visited Montreal, where her family lives and where she grew up as a francophone and raised her own children.

When we crossed the bridge back into Ontario her heart was heavy and the tears flowed. She is Canadian and Quebecois. She does not want to be anything else.

As a Canadian by choice myself, I do not want to lose my country. For goodness' sake, Quebecers, say no to the song of the separatist sirens. Your hopes for a strong and powerful Quebec may be met within Canada.

We Reformers in the west know what they want. We want the same. We want a smaller, less intrusive federal government. Together we can have it. Together we can get rid of the arrogant centralists with their failed visions. Together we will build a new Canada.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the honours and advantages Canadian citizenship confers upon Canadians are too numerous to list. Our country is a model for the international community and the envy of hundreds of millions of people.

Canada could not have become the great country it is without the will and determination of the women and men, in Quebec and in the other provinces, who have worked unceasingly to attain the common goal of constructing a country in our image.

The wonderful thing about Canada is that it allows all of us to be proud of our status as Canadians, while not preventing us from being proud at the same time to be francophones, anglophones, and Quebecers.

This coming October 30, the people of Quebec will renew with pride their confidence in, and attachment to, Canada by voting no.

QUEBEC

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Quebec is now one of the world's most modern and most industrialized societies. Quebec's expertise is widely recognized in a number of sectors and its products are increasingly sought after throughout the world. The people of Quebec enjoy a considerable standard of living, education is universal, and health care is one of the jewels in our crown.

The Quebec of today owes its success to the quality, ingenuity and determination of generation after generation of Quebecers. All of these accomplishments, all of this progress by Quebec, have taken place within the Canadian federation.

This coming October 30, Quebecers will refuse to compromise what it has taken them centuries to build. They will choose Canada; they will vote no.

FINANCIAL MARKETS

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is feeding the uncertainty on financial markets by claiming that sovereignists do not want a sovereign Quebec to continue using the Canadian dollar. However, there is absolutely no doubt that a sovereign Quebec will continue to use the Canadian dollar and that it is in the interests of both Canada and Quebec to maintain a currency union.

A sovereign Quebec will continue to use the Canadian dollar and, as the Minister of Finance himself pointed out, it cannot be prevented from doing so. A sovereign Quebec will also assume its fair share of the federal debt. If the Yes side wins, Quebec and Canada will be well–advised to start negotiations immediately on the sharing of the debt and federal assets.

The finance minister of Canada has a responsibility to contribute to the stability of the markets and to refrain from spreading doubt and uncertainty the way he is doing now.

UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada is proud to join all other nations in celebrating the 50th anniversary of the birth of the United Nations Organization.

We take particular pride in marking this anniversary, since Canada was directly involved in the founding of the UN. To Canada, the UN is an example of co–operation and openness.

It is no easy task to bring together daily some 200 countries with widely divergent interests and ask them to work on finding and developing ways to improve the lives of the people of this planet. Like the UN, Canada has always appreciated the advantages and potential of a relationship built on tolerance and the acceptance of diversity.

Today, Canadians are gathered together to wish a long life to the UN and to a united Canada.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during the referendum campaign, I had the opportunity to travel to Quebec, where sovereignist posters showing possibilities through symbols are everywhere.

I do not understand these ads.

One poster, for example, seems to convey the message that, if Quebecers vote Yes, peace becomes possible. But we already have peace. Vote No and it becomes a certainty.

The posters say that a Yes vote would make the Canadian dollar a possibility. Vote No and it becomes a certainty.

Vote Yes and the economic union becomes a possibility. Vote No and it becomes a certainty.

Vote Yes and NAFTA becomes a possibility. Vote No and it becomes a certainty.

Why trade certainties for possibilities? It will be up to Quebecers to decide, and to live with the consequences.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are only a few days away from the referendum. Quebecers will soon have to decide whether or not they want to leave Canada.

Before making a decision, they should know that Canadians from the other provinces do not want Quebec to separate. Quebec is more than just one province among others. It is the very source of our history, our culture, our identity.

Through its politicians, its thinkers, its reporters, its artists, its athletes, its entrepreneurs, its trade unionists, Quebec has always been closely linked to Canada's development.

On October 30, Quebec will say No to Canada's break–up and decide to carry on its exciting adventure with its Canadian partners and to continue to shape this society, which is the envy of all the people in the world.

QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, on the American television network CNN, French president Jacques Chirac reiterated his country's intention to recognize Quebec as a new state, if the Yes side wins next Monday's referendum.

This statement by the French president fully supports the comments he made on January 26, when he was a presidential candidate, namely that: "Should Quebecers decide to achieve sovereignty, France should certainly be among the first to tell Quebec that we are on its side".

There is no doubt that if Quebecers vote yes on October 30, the international community, headed by France, will take note and recognize Quebec. That recognition will take place as soon as the National Assembly proclaims Quebec's sovereignty, after formally proposing, in good faith, a new partnership to Canada.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with the referendum coming very soon, I want to quote a statement which, in my opinion, reflects what a majority of Quebecers think of Canada.

The quote is as follows: "I am among those who believe that Canada is not exclusively about failures. We did not live together for 125 years only to make mistakes. One of the great Canadian achievements is that we have cared about the poor and that we have tried to share our wealth. We set up social programs which are among the best in the world, and that must be preserved".

That very pro–federalist statement was made by none other than the Bloc Quebecois leader, on June 18, 1993.

• (1415)

Quebecers are well aware of the merits and benefits of Canada. On October 30, they will choose to remain a part of that country by voting no.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Premier Clyde Wells of Newfoundland has entered the referendum campaign to set the record straight for the No side. It is out of the question that Quebec's status as a distinct society should be recognized constitutionally. Meanwhile, the Minister of Finance declared this morning that the distinct society clause should be enshrined in the Constitution.

Of course my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Could he tell us the government's position on the issue of distinct society? Is it the position he, as the finance minister, took this morning or is it the one taken yesterday by Mr. Clyde Wells, whose position is known to be very close to the Prime Minister's?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House our position is quite clear. We have always said, in fact the Prime Minister himself has said that he supported the concept of distinct society in the past, he supports it today and is prepared to support it tomorrow. The Prime Minister of Canada himself made that statement in this House. Is that not clear enough?

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Labour was gracious enough to answer the question, I will ask her another one.

When the Minister of Labour says before this House and before all Quebecers who are listening that the Prime Minister is prepared to include in the Constitution the principle of a distinct society, is she referring—and this is my question—to the Charlottetown version preferred by the Prime Minister, in other words, a meaningless concept subordinate to the equality of the provinces and rejected by all Quebecers, or is she referring to the distinct society concept in the Meech Lake Accord, which the Prime Minister opposed? Which version is it, Madam Minister?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, which distinct society is the hon. member for Roberval talking about? Is he talking about the distinct society of Meech Lake, which Mr. Parizeau said at the time was an empty shell? Is he talking about the distinct society of Charlottetown, which the hon. member and the Bloc Quebecois refused to endorse?

Is he talking about that distinct society? Is he talking about the distinct society Mr. Parizeau referred to last week, when he said: "To hell with distinct society, I want the separation of Quebec"? What is he talking about? We on this side are willing to state quite clearly that Quebecers are a distinct society in Canada.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today, this is a very serious question, a question to which I would appreciate an answer, not this beating around the bush by the Minister of Labour in full view of the whole province of Quebec.

My question—I will give her a second chance, and I would appreciate an answer—is this: Would the Minister of Labour be so gracious and so kind as to tell Quebecers who are listening, when she says she supports a distinct society, does she support a distinct society as defined in Charlottetown, which was rejected by all Quebecers, or does she support the distinct society defined in the Meech Lake Accord? Which one is the Minister of Labour, as a minister of this government, referring to when she says she supports this concept? We would like to know.

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have a very serious decision to make. It is serious because on October 30, we decide whether or not we will break up Canada. That is what we are all going to do on October 30.

When I hear the hon. member for Roberval, it sounds like he is saying: "Madam Minister, put the distinct society in the Constitution and we will forget about our referendum". I do not think that is what he meant. But the fact is that between now and October 30, we want Quebecers to think carefully. We know we have a distinct society in Quebec, and we are proud of it. We are also proud to be Canadians, and that is why we will say no on October 30.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the premier of Newfoundland, Clyde Wells, said he considered that Quebec was indeed a distinct society but that there was no question of its having any particular status or real powers. These words killed the hopes of the no side, and especially of Daniel Johnson and Pierre Paradis, who are still begging the Prime Minister of Canada to commit himself to including this concept of a distinct society in the constitution.

Will the Minister of Labour admit that the government of Canada could not include the notion of a distinct society in the constitution, even if it wanted to, because there will always be the likes of Clyde Wells, Frank McKenna and Roy Romanow there to tell us to forget about any ideas of a distinct society?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have never heard a worse example of twisting someone else's words. Never.

Clyde Wells has acknowledged that Quebec is a distinct society. Mike Harris has acknowledged that Quebec is a distinct society. Why twist these facts on the eve of such a serious choice, a choice that concerns all of us, Quebecers and other Canadians both? What is going on? What is going on with the yes side? Are they running short of arguments for selling us on their option of Quebec's separation?

This week is a week of great significance and we must reflect upon the meaning of this vote, and not allow Quebecers to think that they will still wake up Canadian the next morning. This is where the importance of the October 30 vote lies. I would like to see the yes side at least have the courage to tell Quebecers openly what their option is on October 30.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, at least now we know that the Minister of Labour shares Clyde Wells' definition of a distinct society, as does the Prime Minister. Fine then. It goes over very well here in the House, but far less well in Quebec, as the minister is aware.

The people who are getting worried at this point are Daniel Johnson and Pierre Paradis, not those in the yes camp. Those in the same camp as her, her former colleagues if she can still remember.

Would the Minister of Labour have the courage to be frank with her friends in the no group, her former colleagues, telling them that should there be a no vote on the referendum the predictable outcome of the 1977 constitutional negotiations will again be a resounding failure, as the good buddy of the Prime Minister, and the new–found buddy of the Minister of Labour, the ineffable Clyde Wells, has clearly stated?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, should there be a no vote in the referendum, you will see this country continue the transformation it began 30 or more years ago. And judging by how the people of Quebec have fared within this country over the past 30 years, we have every right to be proud of who and what we Quebecers are. This has been accomplished within the Canadian federation. We have always played a lead role in that federation. And after the no, we shall still be there, continuing to transform this country.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the past two days the value of the Canadian dollar has dropped by a cent and a half, interest rates have jumped alarmingly—the bank rate went up by 1 per cent today—and Canadian stock markets have witnessed the worst times they have had in eight years. The separatists are getting a foretaste of the economic consequences of their position.

Would the finance minister tell Canadians in plain terms what a vote against federalism on October 30 would mean for their bank accounts, their mortgages, their jobs and their economic future?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is a direct correlation between lower interest rates and a higher quality of life. Lower interest rates mean higher retail sales, therefore a stronger domestic market. It means more construction. It means more job creation. It means heavily indebted governments will have more money to spend on the needed social programs.

Markets react very negatively to political uncertainty. I cannot think of greater political uncertainty than arises out of those who would threaten to break up a country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): To answer the member's question, it will lead directly to higher mortgage rates, lower job creation rates, lower retail sales and less money available to governments. In the case of the people of Quebec it also means tremendous uncertainty over the fate of the economic union and over the fate of their creating relationships with the United States.

[Translation]

The fact is that a country cannot be destroyed without grave consequences for its people and their lifestyle. Those who deny the consequences of separation deny the truth.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the separatists have been trying to downplay the economic consequences of the instability of the past few days. They have been trying to chalk it up to federalist fearmongering but money markets are not easily swayed by emotion or scare tactics. As the minister says, they react negatively to instability while they react positively to stability, certainty and positive initiatives.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister tell the House what positive steps can be taken to restore the faith of investors and lenders in the future of Canadian federalism?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, fearmongering is the result of those who espouse an option and who are afraid to tell their people the consequences of the option they are espousing.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): However, there is a very clear way. It is the only way to reduce this uncertainty. There is only one way to reassure the markets and that is to unequivocally vote no on October 30.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is one other thing that disillusioned Quebecers and sceptical money markets are both missing, which is the good news that Canadian federalism is going to change for the better. Canadians want it to change, the provinces want it to change, reformers in all political parties want Canadian federalism to change for the better.

Quebecers can develop their language, their culture, their resources, their destiny within that federation. They do not need a yes vote and they do not need constitutional lawyers to guarantee that federal security.

Will the finance minister make it clear the federal government is open to substantial positive changes within the federation, changes that do not require constitutional change, so that a no vote can mean both no to separation and no to the status quo?

• (1430)

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have been attending federal and provincial finance minister meetings over the course of two years. I can say that without any exception at every single one of those meetings, every finance minister representing his or her province or territory has expressed fundamentally the need for change in the way in which governments relate to each other, the way in which our economy works and the way in which we approach the next century.

Right across the country, in Quebec most certainly but also in western Canada, Ontario and Atlantic Canada, there is a deep desire for change, progress and improvement. We have seen that in the way the government has acted. Every single government department has begun to change the way in which it operates focusing only on the most essential.

We are seeing it in our new trading relationships and in fact the minister is rarely here. Canada is in the process of opening new trading relationships right across the country. I take that back; the minister is always here in spirit.

It is seen in the way the government is working with small business and the great degree of flexibility.

[Translation]

One thing is very clear: we have a choice on October 30 between progress and change for our country or a backward step, as represented by the Yes side.

CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Premier of Quebec and leader of the Yes side clearly expressed his intention to continue to use the Canadian dollar once Quebec achieves sovereignty. He also committed a sovereign Quebec to assuming its share of the enormous Canadian debt.

Does the Minister of Finance not believe that he too should be clear and, rather than allow uncertainty to pervade the financial community, he should indicate that he has in fact prepared a plan "B", should the yes side win on October 30, as it likely will, which he has stubbornly refused to confirm up to now?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the only thing that is clear in what the separatists say about the use of the Canadian dollar is their ambiguity.

A week ago, the Leader of the Opposition said, at the Ahuntsic CEGEP, that he wanted a separate Quebec to use its own money. A year ago, in Portneuf, he asked what point there was in separating if Quebecers were not going to have their own money. In L'Actualité, where it appears in black and white, the Premier of Quebec said that keeping the Canadian dollar was simply a ruse, that he wanted a Quebec dollar. So who is speaking the truth? The Leader of the Opposition today or the Leader of the Opposition last week?

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, that is totally false. The Leader of the Opposition did not say that.

Will the Minister of Finance admit he has a responsibility to make a commitment that, the day after a yes vote, he will argue in favour of negotiations beginning quickly with Quebec to reach a partnership agreement, as the interests of both parties dictate?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have said repeatedly that Canada's interest would be to protect its rights within NAFTA. And, in order to protect its rights within NAFTA, Canada could not sign a special agreement with an independent, that is, separated, country. It is not that Canada would not, it is that Canada could not.

Second, is the member saying that the Leader of the Opposition was incorrectly quoted on Canada AM, was incorrectly quoted in Portneuf and that the leader, the Premier, was incorrectly quoted in L'Actualité when, in each instance, they said clearly that they wanted to give up the certainty of the Canadian dollar for the uncertainty of the Quebec dollar?

JUSTICE

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, convicted murderer John Lee received an out of court settlement of $12,000 after suing Correctional Service Canada because he was beaten up in jail. Lee's victims, Mrs. Tutin and the rest of the family, received no compensation and are demanding an explanation from the justice minister why he received this out of court settlement.

Why is the justice minister giving money to murderers?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the individual in question sued Correctional Service Canada for negligence after being seized as a hostage by other prisoners and beaten with an iron bar.

He sued for $60,000. When the case came to court, there was a pretrial conference and the presiding judge strongly urged that the case be settled. The case was then settled for $12,000 of which about $8,000 went to the inmate's lawyer.

This was a step that was taken in light of the advice from the presiding judge. The court indicated that a settlement was in order and this is what happened.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, by this action the minister tells an outraged public that crime pays.

There is no justification for rewarding John Lee, a murderer. It is disgusting. A victim's rights must be paramount, yet again the victim's family is forgotten. Justice is when the criminal pays for his crime.

Why does the minister make crime such a profitable business for lawyers and criminals, yet ignores the pain and isolation of the victims?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Correctional Service Canada is mandated by the law to carry out the sentence imposed by the court. The courts have held on many occasions that if there is negligence in the way that it is done, then there is a cause of action for negligence.

That is what happened in this case. The inmate was taken as a hostage. He was beaten with an iron bar. He sued for $60,000. The settlement that was advised as a result of a pretrial conference by the presiding judge was not $60,000; it was $12,000.

There is no reward for murder or for acting illegally. It is simply a matter of following the precedents in previous cases.

CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Canadian dollar and the stock market are now on a roller-coaster ride as a result of various national and international factors.

Will the Minister of Finance admit that the financial markets' first source of uncertainty and concern about Canada is the enormous size of its deficit and its growing debt, which will exceed $600 billion next year?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the last budget was very well received by the international markets. Interest rates have fallen since then. The question we must ask is this: What will occur in four or five days? It is very clear that the referendum debate has had an enormous impact on savings, on our way of life, on job creation in this country.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has a short memory. Two weeks after he tabled his budget, the Bank of Canada rate reached a high of 8.6 per cent, which was higher than the current 7.65 per cent rate, because that budget was poorly received and because government finances were in bad shape. That is the main factor, as Moody's recognized in January.

How can the Minister of Finance give such answers when the Governor of the Bank of Canada himself declared on October 12, 1994: "It is only because of the high debt and deficit levels that political uncertainty has become another concern"?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if one listens to currency traders and the other parties involved, the cause of the problem becomes very clear. The hon. member and his separatist colleagues are only doing this in order to dodge the real issues, as their option will create political uncertainty, which will lead to economic uncertainty. The hon. member should say that he is in fact endangering Quebecers' and Canadians' savings, jobs and economic development.

If this has nothing to do with recent events, why has the gap between Quebec and Canada savings bonds increased so much in the past few weeks? It is because the Quebec government refuses to accept its responsibilities, which involve managing for its own people?

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the justice minister.

The justice minister recently accused the Ontario solicitor general of pandering to the gun lobby. I have evidence which strongly suggests that the minister is pandering to the Canadian Gun Coalition.

Did the minister provide the Canadian Gun Coalition with copies of letters addressed to him supporting Bill C-68 without the consent of the authors?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if anyone is pandering it is members of the third party who see, for some reason which escapes the rest of us, some purpose in pursuing this subject at a time when the majority of Canadians and the House of Commons have spoken. We have already enacted legislation to act on the public will.

As to the question which the hon. member puts, I will take the matter under advisement and investigate the facts. I do not have a factual answer at this moment. I will find one and I will furnish it to the hon. member.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have in my office a package containing a number of letters addressed to the minister from the city of Gloucester, the city of Nepean and so on. These letters were sent along with a covering letter signed by Wendy Cuckier of the gun coalition to all Ontario MPPs.

Would the minister explain as soon as possible how the Canadian Gun Coalition obtained these letters which were addressed to the minister?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, so desperate is the hon. member for anything to argue in his cause, so profoundly devoid of merit is his position on this issue, that he is now pretending to find in the commonplace events which he described some reason to become righteous and indignant.

The fact is that people, organizations, cities and governments across the country have written to me in support of the gun proposals. My office is flooded with faxes and letters in support of Bill C–68. Those people who write in support of the legislation either expressly or implicitly authorize and urge me to spread around their position so that everyone might know the extent to which these proposals are supported.

CANADA SOCIAL TRANSFER

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday, in reference to Canada's future, the minister said that the No side was the one promoting change, as evidenced by the new Canada social transfer.

With this surprising statement, is the Minister of Finance telling Quebecers that, following a No vote on October 30, Canada's proposed change would be the implementation of the social transfer through which Ottawa will, over a two year period, deprive the provinces of 7 billion dollars, including 2.5 billion in the case of Quebec?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first, the figures used by the member are not valid.

Second, the Canada social transfer will provide the provinces with a great deal of flexibility to innovate and find their own solutions to problems.

This initiative truly shows the flexibility of the federal government regarding the involvement of the provinces in social programs. Indeed, what we see here is a fundamental change of attitude for the federal government and for the country, and the member opposite should congratulate us.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, are we to understand that the Minister of Finance believes that tomorrow's Canada is simply a matter of Ottawa deciding and the provinces paying, as confirmed by the establishment of the new Canada social transfer?

• (1445)

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our attitude is reflected in the statements made by the premiers of the other provinces, who not only recognized Ottawa's flexibility but also recognized that the country as a whole wants changes and wants co–operation between the provincial and federal governments, and said so.

Whether the issue is harmonization with the minister responsible for public service renewal, harmonization in regional development or discussions on human resources, all the other provinces are co–operating to improve life for Canadians.

One government refuses to co–operate and will not look for solutions to help its population: it is the separatist PQ government in Quebec.

CANADIAN RESERVES

Mr. John Cannis (Scarborough Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

It seems that budget cuts are threatening the existence of the Queen's York Rangers, a Canadian reserve unit with a 250–year history. A special commission will report in the next few weeks on the future of Canada's reserves.

Could the minister confirm that no decisions with respect to the future of the reserves will be made before the commission reports?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Queen's York Rangers is but one of many distinguished regiments that have contributed much over the years to Canada's security with long and noble traditions going back, in the case of the Queen's York Rangers, to the time before Canada became a country in assisting the British in the American revolution.

This heritage is vital to Canada's military preparedness. Earlier this year when we were discussing the rationalizations taking place in national defence I asked Hon. Brian Dickson, former Chief Justice of Canada, to chair the commission on the reserves but in the meantime gave instructions to the department not to effect any changes that would have an impact on reserve regiments until such time as the commission has reported and the parliamentary committee of the House and the Senate reviews the commission's conclusions.

MINING

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

Two years ago the minister promised regulatory reform to help industry in Canada. Last December he tabled a report in the House in which he offered specific changes to the mining industry in order to help it some time in 1995.

Will the minister table those reforms now, soon or can the mining industry expect something in its stocking by Christmas?

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry and I are working very closely with the mining sector to ensure an efficient regulatory system.

Last Thursday my department organized in co–operation with the Mining Association of Canada a regulatory reform workshop which brought together representatives of the Minister of Industry's department, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, and the Department of Transport.

Very constructive recommendations came out of that day–long workshop which we will be working on to ensure that the regulatory regime supports and does not interfere with a viable, productive mining industry.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I think the day–long workshop is already a two–year workshop. We need action more than just words.

New regulations being considered by the environment department have scared officials within the Minister of Natural Resources' own department so badly that they have leaked a 75–page memo to the press saying, among other things, they are scared to death of what this will do. It may harm the Canadian economy, inflame federal–provincial relations and may even affect Canadian sovereignty.

Will the minister table that 75–page memo in the House and does she share the concern of her officials?

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me assure the hon. member that neither my officials nor I are scared in relation to what I think he is referring to, the recommendations of the standing committee on the environment.

My commitment as Minister of Natural Resources is to work collaboratively, co–operatively with my colleagues, the Ministers of the Environment, Industry, Fisheries and Oceans, and Transport. At this point I am willing to go on record to the minister that working together we will ensure a regulatory regime that supports the mining industry.

CANADA SOCIAL TRANSFER

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Despite the efforts made by the government to keep bad news under wraps until the day after the referendum, we know that unemployment insurance and old age pensions will be affected considerably by federal government cuts.

• (1450)

When the Minister of Finance states that a no will make it possible for Canada to continue to evolve since change is already underway, as he says, is he giving us confirmation that Canada will continue to evolve along the path of cuts to education, health, unemployment insurance, old age pensions on which it has already set out?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all the Minister of Human Resources Development has indicated very clearly with respect to the whole consultation process on unemployment insurance that it is far from finished, but that our objective is employment insurance, i.e. getting Canadians back to work. That is, moreover, the goal of his reform.

On the other hand, concerning old age security, the Prime Minister has already stated very clearly here in the House that the federal government will never, never do anything to compromise the economic security of our seniors.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the minister admit that the federal government's choice to transfer its enormous deficit to the provinces by cutting Canada social transfer payments promises nothing positive for the future if Quebec were to say no, for Ottawa will be the one to set the national standards and Quebec will have to manage as best as it can to apply them, with consequences one can well imagine for social programs?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): First of all, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the Canada social transfer, it is very clear that the national standards involved are the principles of health insurance, to which Quebecers strongly subscribe. Secondly, a great deal of flexibility has been built in to allow the provinces leeway for innovation and for tailoring their programs to their own population.

As for dollar figures, the difference between today and the first year will be $350 million, or less than 1 per cent of Quebec's revenue.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to the issue of gun control which the justice minister says enjoys such wide support.

Opposition to Bill C–68 continues to grow: 100 per cent of the chiefs in the province of Saskatchewan are opposed, 85 per cent of the RCMP in Alberta, justice ministers in four provinces and territories.

Does the justice minister not realize he is destroying the trust people have in the criminal justice system by forcing through a law that a large segment of society, including the police, does not support?

Hon. Allan (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday the Ontario Provincial Police Association at its annual meeting voted on a motion to not support Bill C–68, the gun control bill. That motion passed nearly unanimously.

We have been saying all along that the frontline police do not support the justice minister's bill and yet he repeatedly says he is bringing in the gun registration and that the police requested it.

Now that it is obvious the police oppose gun registration, will he act on the wishes of the police even though they conflict with his personal views?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is telling that on an occasion when the rest of us are engaged in debate on important matters of the future of Canada, when we speak of the economic future of Canada, indeed the future of the confederation, the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville rises to ask questions about the right to bear firearms. It is fitting.

If I must address the substance of his question, the group to which he referred forms part of the Police Association of Ontario which represents all the frontline officers in Ontario. The Police Association of Ontario forms part of the Canadian Police Association. I was present on March 30 of this year in Ottawa when the Canadian Police Association, the national group of frontline officers, debated and voted on Bill C–68 and I was there to see it support the bill.

I was in Markham, Ontario, on August 14 this year when the Police Association of Ontario voted in support of Bill C–68. I was in Regina in late August when the chiefs of police voted in favour. The police of this country are behind this bill.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Has the minister seen the text of remarks on the Quebec referendum attributed to French President Jacques Chirac in New York yesterday? Is the minister in a position to comment now on those remarks?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I looked at the transcript of President Chirac's remarks yesterday.

At the outset I want to say it was far from the endorsement the hon. member for Verchères was pretending at the beginning of question period.

President Chirac said: "If the referendum is positive the government will recognize the fact". In other words, the French authorities will arrive at the same conclusion as everybody else, that they obtained the majority. That is all.

[Translation]

President Chirac's policy on Canada and Quebec is one of non–indifference and of non–interference, as has always been the case with him and with the French authorities.

RESEARCH PERIODICALS

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. In July, the Social Sciences and Humanities Council implemented a new policy on funding for research periodicals, which would cut funding to French language periodicals in half.

Will the Minister of Industry confirm that, as the result of the Social Sciences and Humanities Council's new policy, research periodicals in French will bear the brunt of most of the cuts, whereas the ones in English will escape them for the most part?

[English]

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is important to recognize the important role the Social Sciences and Humanities Council has played in social science and human research. This role is well recognized from coast to coast.

In looking at how it deals with the fiscal situation the council has drawn on its experience and has made very careful, fair and peer reviewed decisions for the best interests of Canada.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, many people are employed making commercials and videos and that kind of thing for businesses and advertising agencies.

Unbelievably the CBC has recently announced it will be going into direct competition with these private sector audio and video production houses, specifically in Toronto. It is actively today trying to steal their clients. Clearly this is a violation of the CBC mandate.

Why is the minister allowing the CBC to kill jobs in downtown Toronto? Why are Toronto MPs not standing up in outrage about this? Why in the world are we allowing the CBC to kill these businesses which pay the taxes that actually fund the CBC?

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not have to convince the House the Reform Party does not support public broadcasting. The hon. member can lip–sync my answer by now that the CBC is in charge of its own management and makes its own decisions to the best of its ability.

The hon. member should well know that on the committee we have been looking for ways the CBC can look for new efficiencies. That is exactly what it is doing.

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION ACT

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

Since the release last June of the environment committee's proposal to overhaul and update the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, some industry officials have said the committee proposals are a threat to the country's investment climate, costly to implement and grounded on shaky science.

• (1500)

It is important these myths be dealt with.

Will the minister join with his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, who is expected to respond positively to the committee's impressive set of recommendations and take the opportunity to turn Canada into an international leader in green legislation or is he going to accept the arguments of some of the officials in his department and back away from the committee's critical recommendations on pollution prevention?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can really do no better than to associate myself with the remarks of my colleague, the Minister of Natural Resources. In responding to an earlier question she made it clear that we in government believe that both sustainable development and economic growth are important parts of our mandate as government.

As we prepare the government's response to the standing committee's report, we will ensure the concerns of the sustainability of development are front and centre.

I remind the hon. member that when the Department of Industry Act was introduced in the House it contained a mandate to pursue the objectives of sustainable development. That was a mandate I sought to add to the old industry, science and technology department act. I am proud to say that I was able to introduce it in the Department of Industry Act.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

The Speaker: Colleagues, as you are all aware, today is the 50th anniversary of the United Nations. We have in our galleries today some 17 Canadian recipients of the United Nations Association of Canada Medals of Honour recognizing their outstanding contributions to the UN.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

SMALL BUSINESS LOANS ACT

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Industry, Lib.) moved that Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, even before the red book came into being during the last election, the Liberal team in opposition made a commitment that if we were to be given the trust of the people after that election, the small and medium size business community would be the centrepiece of any policy development that would be part of our agenda.

• (1505)

We believed in opposition and we believe now that the greatest hope Canadians have for putting other Canadians back to work rests with the small business community. It is the small businessmen and women who, in many cases with very few resources, created, through their own ingenuity, creativity and sweat and toil, products and services that grew not only into businesses but became a very important and vital ingredient in the economy of this country.

When we were elected about two years ago we started immediately to deal with the number one difficulty that small businessmen and women had in trying to meet their objectives which was getting access to capital.

It is very important for me to recognize the critic for the Reform Party. One of the very unique experiences that we had in the industry committee was the fact that we worked as a team. We have many differences with the Reform Party. I for one do not feel as committed as they are to their attack on the deficit and debt. I find their approach too radical and too swift. However, one issue which we have consistently agreed on is the fact that small business is the hope of this country when it comes to putting Canadians back to work. It was because of our teamwork that we have been able to move an agenda forward on the access to capital front.

The amendments in Bill C-99 before us today, which is an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, are from feedback we have received from the men and women in the House who have been working on this issue. They are the result of feedback we have had from industry and the banking community. They are also the result of the feedback and the success we have had with the Small Business Loans Act.

Some members will recall when we were in opposition that the then Conservative government initiated, in its last budget, amendments to the Small Business Loans Act. At that time, we supported those amendments because we believed that they were instruments for trying to break up the hardened attitude that many people in the financial community had toward taking risks with small businessmen and women.

This bill is not meant to be a cure all for the difficulties that businessmen and women are having. It is a bill where we told the financial community that we would develop an act in Parliament where 90 per cent of the risk that it takes on a small business project, up to $250,000, the Government of Canada would guarantee if that business should fail.

Since the Small Business Loans Act started, over many years, it has been used to help just under 500,000 small businesses in this country. Many people have had, through this act, the opportunity to take a shot at their dreams, create jobs and ultimately help create the economic fabric of this country.

When the Government of Canada is guaranteeing such a large amount, the number one question obviously is what is the down side for the taxpayer.

Until two years ago, on a loan float of about $3.5 billion, the loss to the crown was approximately $26 million. A loss of $26 million on a $3.5 billion float is pretty respectable. In the last year and a half, the float has increased considerably. The float right now is closer to about $8 billion. On that float, the estimated losses are approximately $100 million.

Because of that increased loan loss, that $100 million, and because of our commitment to fiscal responsibility, the government has decided to listen to the Reform Party, to listen to the banks and others. It has decided that the act has to be redesigned in a way where those costs are recovered.

The essence of this bill deals with a new formula so that those loan losses can be covered. Essentially the three components in the bill to recover the loss on that rather large float would be the following: the major elements would be first, a reduction in the minister's liability to pay a loss on any business improvement loan from 90 per cent to 85 per cent. The second point is the establishment of an annual administration fee and a restriction on the passing on of the fee to borrowers except through interest rates, the establishment of a claim processing fee and the granting of authority to make regulations respecting the release of security taken for the repayment of any business improvement loan.

What we have done is this. Previously the guarantee was 90 per cent. It has been reduced to 85 per cent. If this is the way that the Small Business Loans Act can continue to be viable so that it is not going to be a drain for the taxpayer or a strain on the treasury or something that would generate too much nervousness with officials in the Department of Finance, then I naturally support all these amendments. These amendments are all good, solid amendments.

The most important thing that the Small Business Loans Act did was this. Because all of us worked together on the Small Business Loans Act, it led to another journey that we all went on in the last two years. That journey happened in the industry committee where the Bloc Quebecois, the Reform Party, and government members all worked together on this total review of the difficulties that small business men and women were having in accessing capital.

Members would probably recall that almost a year ago, the committee published virtually a unanimous report "Taking Care of Small Business". That report dealt with all of the various experiences men and women were having when dealing with financial institutions.

All of us in this House heard over the last few years story after story after story of the difficulties many of our constituents were having in dealing with the various banks or other financial institutions. It was through that feedback that we became united in dealing with this issue.

Some of the key recommendations in the report are now being implemented. As of the end of this month there will be a common quarterly reporting chart and statistics on the whole thrust of each individual financial institution's lending to small business by sector, by gender, by municipality and the size of the loan. That kind of accountability is going to change the whole bank culture and attitude toward small business.

That has been the biggest accomplishment of our committee. We have made a very strong impact in causing the men and women who are managing the banks to reflect and review the way they have been dealing with business. Not big business. We all know that whenever big business wants a $500,000 or a $3 billion loan the banks trip over themselves trying to lend those larger businesses the money. In the past few years some of those loans the banks were tripping over each other to give to the larger businesses ended up coming back in their faces, or part of them came back in their faces.

We were not really concerned with the larger corporations. We respect the larger corporations and the job creation contribution they make to the community, but we were concerned with the small business community and the fact that the small business community represents virtually all of the new job creation that is happening in this country. I believe and I know many members opposite believe that those quarterly accountability sessions are shifting the attitudes of the banks.

Ultimately, it does not matter what side of the House we sit on, we are here for one reason. We are here to get the economy of this country going again. The economy is only going to start going again when collectively we can work at creating an environment where business can flourish and give men and women the dignity of a job. That is the most important thing we can be working on today.

It is no secret that there are just under three million men and women who do not have work. I cannot imagine getting up in the morning and not having a job to go to. Many of us here have been blessed with the fact that not only do we have a terrific opportunity to serve our country right now, but we have also had the opportunity to work throughout our careers. Very few of us have felt the pain or the assault on our dignity of not having a job. That assault on dignity is the toughest thing a man or a woman can face. Our number one responsibility is to assist in creating an environment where business can take those risks and chances to get the economy going. That is why we on this side of the House, supported by members opposite as well, believe that whenever we can pass an act of Parliament that will improve on creating more jobs, even if they are minor improvements, then we are on it right away.

It is important that a bill like this does not take a long time to go through the House. That is why it is important to work together. If we can work together and get the proper amendments in this bill, then this kind of cohesion gives confidence to the marketplace and the people who execute this bill, the banks.

This bill is not executed by the government. After it is passed by this House this bill will be implemented by the financial institutions in Canada. The bank managers make the decision as to whether or not that taxpayer guarantee should be given to a small business man or woman. The implementation of the act is totally delegated to the financial institutions. Because of this guarantee those bank managers can take a bit more risk. Ultimately that is going to assist in getting the economy going.

The small business sector represents the greatest hope we have for putting Canadians back to work. It is going to accomplish that once the proper environment is put in place. Also, the small business man or woman does not tend to create a lot of bureaucracy and therefore can be more efficient when operating a small business. They tend to have much closer relationships with the men and women who work with them. The family–like environment which happens in a small business in many cases generates the kind of activity that allows creativity to flourish, that allows productivity, which allows business to create better products at better prices.

That is ultimately the reason our exports are going to be our hope as well. In the last few months our exports have been holding the economy together. Many of those exports, for example in the automotive sector, came from small and medium sized corporations. Some of them are organized in larger institutions but many of them are small, individual plants with a maximum of 30 to 50 workers.

We have to stop thinking of small business in the traditional way it has been thought of in this Chamber. For many years in Ottawa most of the attention was given to the larger businesses. The larger businesses had the resources to come to Ottawa and lobby their MPs or they had the resources through accountants and lawyers to do the work on the basic grants and support systems that were in place. Larger businesses had the resources to get their tax credit put into the tax act because they could afford to lobby the various departments including the Department of Finance.

In the last two or three years we have discovered that a lot of these larger businesses with all the great contributions they have made in terms of job creation and research, are not creating the same kind of economic thrust. Now it is the small business community. Many of us have had to reorient ourselves, go back to basics and reacquaint ourselves to try to understand what the small business community really needs.

Even though I frequently talk about access to capital, there are a couple of other things the government is going to have to address as well. We have to take up the challenge to reduce the paper burden and red tape. How many times do we hear that small business men and women are spending more time pushing paper and government forms than on their own businesses? We have become a nation of paper pushers. We have to realize that along with access to capital we must reduce the red tape and paper burden.

The Department of Industry, the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have been working very hard in the last few months trying to create a one–all form. They are trying to organize various forms for business. They are working on a system that will be on one form, a simplified system for business reporting on various aspects of government responsibility.

That is also another realization we have come to accept and support as a result of our continued campaign on the access to capital front. In other words, that journey on access to capital has led to the realization that reducing the paper burden is something we must also work on very diligently.

The last thing I will touch on in terms of policy is where small business is crying out for our attention, which is the whole area of tax reform. Small business is telling us that the tax system is complex and inefficient. Many of them argue it is not fair.

As a government we are committed. Our red book stated quite clearly that the whole GST regime we fought so vigorously against in opposition is something the government has to address in its mandate. There is absolutely no way any Liberal member of Parliament could ever expect to go back on the campaign trail to get re–elected unless the whole issue of the GST is dealt with.

My goodness, in opposition we fought against the GST to the point that it nearly caused a riot in the other place. We challenged the government because of the complexity, the paper burden and the inefficiency of the GST. We on this side of the House are working very hard on total tax reform. It is a very complex issue to dismantle an entire structure the previous government set up. As the Prime Minister would say, it is not a matter of saying "poof" and it is gone. It has to be done responsibly, in a way that will not create a bigger problem than already exists.

We believe that dealing with the issue of tax reform is central to the requirements of small businesses and their ability to work in an environment that allows them to maximize their potential. Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, is another example of where the government is fine tuning by working with small businesses and the financial institutions and dealing with the financial markets, the currency traders, who have control on our interest rates and our dollar.

There is an issue I wish we could one day debate in Parliament. With the various challenges we take on in the House, whether related to industry, social programs or fiscal responsibility, deficit and debt with all the cutbacks, I would say the one challenge that we as a House of Commons have yet to face is the challenge of how we work with these currency traders who are essentially running most of the central banks of the world. These unaccountable, unelected currency traders move literally a trillion dollars a day, pushing paper, playing the derivative games. I have referred to them before as the private casinos in the financial institutions of the world. These men and women who move that currency around in an unaccountable way are affecting our interest rates, which in turn affect the investment activity and the job creation activity.

I do not know how we can call ourselves a sovereign nation when we think of the fact that we have essentially lost control of our currency. We are sitting here as elected people, but every day we bow down to the currency traders, asking what the dollar is going to be, what the interest rates are going to be.

Do the men and women in this room have anything to do with what goes on with those currency traders? No. Those currency traders are controlling the agenda. No matter how fiscally responsible the government is in the House, they could say that it is not good enough. Then suddenly they give us another squeeze and drop our dollar or cause a jerk in interest rates.

I would love to have a debate in the House one day on how the currency traders of the world manage their affairs and what their accountability is. It would be not unlike the challenge we took up two years ago when we wanted to see what was going on with the financial institutions in the country and what they were doing with small business. These financial institutions were not initially receptive to our exchange, our views and our attempts to try to make their attitude and their culture more responsive to business. However, because we worked together I believe we now have a constructive relationship with the banks. I now believe those banks are actually starting to enjoy the growth and the improvement they are experiencing in their small business relationships.

I would put to the House that an even bigger challenge would be how we could take on the currency traders of the world so we can once again get control of our economic agenda.

In closing my remarks on the bill once again I thank members opposite, members of the Reform Party and members of the Bloc for working with us on these amendments so we can hopefully get them through the House before the end of the week.

This is probably the last time I will be on my feet before the referendum vote on Monday. I appeal to those small businessmen and women who hopefully are watching or are participating in this debate to think between now and next Monday about anything they can do to help make sure this campaign for Canada is won.

I personally believe that one of the things small entrepreneurs can do, because they have flexibility, is maybe find a bit of time to get into their vans, cars or trucks and take their families to visit our great province of Quebec this weekend.

When I was a small businessman I did a lot of business in Quebec, and I never had any difficulty doing work in that great province. I believe that one of the ways we can make sure Quebec votes for Canada on Monday is to make sure that a majority of those people, especially in the outlying regions of Quebec, feel comfortable with those of us who are outside Quebec.

I know it is a precarious moment right now. Things are very tenuous. However, I think the greatest asset we have in the country is people from one region of the country talking to another, one on one, not through television ads. I respect these rallies, but the best way to bring togetherness is when people sit down and have a constructive, warm and caring relationship.

I do not think it is too late to make a tremendous turn in those numbers we all read in the newspapers right now. I believe the best way to turn those numbers is by making sure this weekend, if one is from Ontario and maybe planning on driving north to a cottage or east down to Buffalo or Niagara Falls, to travel instead to the outlying regions of Quebec. Together, when we talk about all the assets we have as a whole nation, we will end up staying together.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to speak on the bill. I pray God that next week everything is all there for Canada.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on behalf of my party to Bill C–99, an Act to amend the Small Business Loans Act.

The parliamentary secretary made it very clear that small businesses play a very important role in the Canadian economy and, of course, the economy of Quebec. Both the government of Canada and the government of Quebec have set up programs to support small business, because one of the problems facing people who want to launch a small business is the financing.

Often these people are very keen and have interesting ideas, and if governments do not find ways to support them, their ideas often remain undeveloped and the business never materializes. Both the government of Quebec and the Canadian government have taken steps to provide assistance to entrepreneurs.

Of course there are private investment funds in various provinces including Quebec, such as the FTQ's Fonds de solidarité which has some impact in this sector. However, the parliamentary secretary said that today in Canada a total of nearly $8 billion is invested under this program, which is an indication of its importance.

Another indication is the fact that the program is popular among entrepreneurs. In our riding offices, we often see people with good ideas who decide to ask their member of Parliament for information on programs that could help them start a business.

Canada has legislation, the Small Business Loans Act, which was adopted several years ago. This legislation has made it possible to lend money and start businesses. The bill before the House today proposes a number of amendments to this legislation.

Originally, the purpose of this legislation was to provide guarantees for bank loans to entrepreneurs who wanted to start a business. This guarantee could vary from 85 to 90 per cent, and in fact varied from year to year.

The cost to the Canadian government is what it costs someone who wants to guarantee loans. If the individual's business is not as successful as he expected, if he goes bankrupt, then the government of Canada has to pick up the loss incurred by the banks. In 1992, these losses totalled $44 million. The maximum was changed in legislation adopted in 1993 and a number of provisions were changed as well, so that in 1995–96, the government of Canada could be faced with picking up a total of as much as $100 million in losses.

Considering the current state of federal finances, it is understandable that the minister should be concerned and that the debate on small business in the Standing Committee on Industry had to consider this aspect as well.

That is why we have a bill before the House today. The purpose of the bill is to reduce the maximum for guarantees provided by the federal government. The maximum would be reduced from 90 to 85 per cent of the loans approved. By reducing the maximum, the government of Canada is of course reducing its responsibility for amounts to be paid in case of bankruptcy.

There is of course a corollary to all this: if the guarantee is less extensive, people with higher risk projects that may be more innovative will have more trouble obtaining guarantees. This is not unusual, and if the banks are unwilling to take the risk, some projects may be rejected.

In fact, the 85 per cent rate goes back to before the amendments in 1993. It is of course an area where the government could save money. We hope there are no business people with clever and brilliant ideas, who are refused loan guarantees because of this provision.

Also, an important aspect of this provision concerns us in the Bloc Quebecois considerably. With the amendment, the ceiling could be lowered even further, should the government decide to regulate it lower. As one of my colleagues was saying earlier, for the moment it is at 85 per cent. It could drop to 60 per cent. It could drop to 50 per cent. We really do not know.

What is of concern in all this is that the government is giving itself the option in the bill before us to lower the ceiling by regulation. Government by regulation is reprehensible. I think the House of Commons has to take measures to ensure that the bills passed are good for the country. I think, when legislation gives the government the option to decide things of this importance by regulation, we are running the risk of hurting the country's business people.

• (1545)

There is also another provision in the bill that causes us some concern. Basically the aim of the amendment in the bill is to have moneys paid by the Minister of Finance in the event of a bankruptcy absorbed some other way. In other words, the Minister of Finance does not want to see the $100 million planned for this year back again next year. Another way for the government to ensure that losses are cut or even eliminated is for the program to be self–sufficient.

My colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, said it well: "How are we going to go about recovering costs?" Administrative measures will be taken. An annual administration fee will be charged. There will also be a claim processing fee.

The bill provides that these administrative fees are not to be paid directly by the business people. It does provide that they can be paid by the business people indirectly. In other words, the interest rates on loans could be raised to cover the administrative fees that the banks would have to pay.

This means doing rather deviously or hypocritically what cannot be done directly.

I would like to think that government finances are important, but the program's efficiency is going to be reduced by this measure. It will be reduced, because the banks are not going to go out of their way for business people. By definition, the banks want to be profitable and they charge the highest interest rates the market will bear.

As a result, entrepreneurs will have to bear higher costs in order to meet program requirements. This is one measure that causes serious concern among the members of the Bloc.

There are some items that we would certainly have liked to see included in the bill which are not there. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry has said that the measures proposed in the bill were discussed in the Standing Committee on Industry and are contained in its report tabled in October 1994: Taking Care of Small Business.

Although the Bloc was considerably involved in the drafting of this report and endorsed the bulk of its recommendations, it made a number of comments, in the form of recommendations, amendments or notes, which we felt improved upon the proposals for making the Small Business Loans Act more efficient and effective. One of these proposals was that "the Small Business Loans Act ought to provide guarantees for small business operating capital loans. To implement such a measure, the government should carry out a cost analysis of such a program and take a responsible fiscal approach".

We know that the loan guarantee given is intended to help businesses meet expenses related to very specific aspects such as buildings and equipment, but not working capital. The problem is that, in recession conditions and crisis situations, and as a result of certain changes in the Bankruptcy Act as well, there are many small businesses which need financing for their working capital for a time, but they cannot take advantage of the act as it stands to obtain either financing or a guarantee of financing.

To improve the way we help our small businesses, the Bloc Quebecois would have favoured an amendment saying that the operating capital of a business could also be financed with a government guaranteed loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act.

There are a number of things we find disturbing in this bill. I mentioned the reduction in the maximum rate, which means fewer businesses will have access to the program or those that do may have to meet more requirements. Second, there is the matter of administration fees which we think will be passed on to businesses through an increase in the interest rates they will have to pay. And third, there are aspects that are not covered by the legislation such as the financing of operating capital.

That is why the Bloc Quebecois will discuss the bill in committee, and propose amendments that will probably be along the lines of the comments I just made.

I would like to make a few more comments as I conclude my speech. This may annoy some government members who will probably think that I am not on topic or other members who will say: "Duplication and overlap, here we go again. It is the same old sovereignist or separatist refrain from the Bloc". In any case, as I mentioned in my introductory remarks, in Quebec we have a number of programs with substantially the same objectives. Take the Paillé plan, named after the present Minister of Industry, which also provides for loan guarantees. Take what is being done by the Société de développement industriel du Québec. Since I became a member of Parliament, I noticed that many constituents who want to start a business are told to go to the provincial office and the federal office. In fact the situation is not quite clear. Often there is out and out competition.

Who is responsible for this competition or overlap? I do not want to get involved in all that, but I simply want to point out that there is some overlap that is counterproductive. It does not do the entrepreneurs any good because they often do not know where they stand. And when governments at the provincial and federal levels do not belong to the same party, people often believe that if they go to one government, the other government will be annoyed and that will get them in trouble. I myself have never noticed that since becoming a member, but there are people who think they can play one government off against another or people who think there may be difficulty applying to one level of government when application or representation has also been made to the other government.

So I think that, when measures such as this are before the House, we should note—and I am not saying criticize, but we should at least note—that there are overlaps, which could hurt business people and the government's budget.

The same taxpayers, whether they are from Quebec or Canada, are helping to fund these programs through their taxes. And I really think a number of people use this sort of competition to try to get the best out of both programs. I think, in the long term that governments put themselves in situations where their expenditures under these programs will increase because of the competition, because of the overlap and because people try to take advantage of the opposition or even the competition between governments.

With bills like this one, it is important to point out problems of overlapping created by such programs.

In concluding, I would like to make one comment. More and more in the business community in Quebec and Canada, in the government and even in the Liberal Party, which did not follow such policies in the past, we are hearing talk of how the government should step aside, and the people who go into business should take on their responsibilities.

There is a movement to re–establish the laws of free competition, to promote globalization, to pare down the size of government. The Minister of Finance is often seen to support such ideas.

When the time comes to make cuts in social programs, in education, in unemployment insurance, we hear "the government is overspending, it is too costly, the government must interfere less and less in the economy". On the other hand, when we come to bills like this one, when we realize that when it comes down to it the government is guaranteeing eight billion dollars worth of loans this year, and I think that the legislation allows up to $12 billion. We realize that the neoliberal discourse of the governments was the same; it is the Liberals this time, but it was the same thing when it was the Conservatives. I cannot see much difference in practice between the policies of the former Conservative government and those of the present Liberal one. They both took a neoliberal stance, calling for government to withdraw from the economy, but yet when we get down to practicalities, to instances where according to the very theories they espouse the government's presence might be questioned, then we see that they are continuing the same kind of intervention as before.

Not that I condemn such intervention—the Bloc Quebecois is in favour of a healthy government involvement in economic affairs—but, on examining the bill and everything that goes with it and looking at what the Small Businesses Loans Act has done in the past, despite the fact that it has been extremely effective and much appreciated by entrepreneurs, I am forced to conclude that the government is saying that cuts must be made, the government must withdraw. In situations like these one realizes that not only is the government not withdrawing but it is even becoming increasingly involved.

A few years ago there were $2 to $3 million in loan guarantees annually, and this year the figure will be $8 billion. Perhaps, the way things are set out, the figure next year will be even higher. There is one big question mark: the government is acting in such a way that it will not cost anything on the budget. All the better, one might say. It is the banks and the entrepreneurs who will pay, but basically it is the government which gives the guarantees but wants to arrange things so that it will cost nothing. In the long run, the businesses themselves pay, because of the interest rates charged on the loans.

One wonders really what purpose these programs serve. This morning I was looking at the industry committee's report "Taking Care of Small Business". Experts appeared before the committee stating that there was no certainty that businesses started up under the projects in question would not have started up anyway.

I heard, in fact I listened carefully to the speech made earlier by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry. He talked about a lot of things, but I would have appreciated it if he had tried to be more specific about the rationale underlying this bill. Is it effective? Is it true that about three–quarters or at least half of the businesses that were started with the help of this legislation would have been started in any case? What use is a program that guarantees loans but which basically does not cost the government a penny? We could say this is wonderful, it does not cost the government a penny, but on the other hand, if that is true and if the impact is neutral, why is the government involved in this kind of program?

Do not get me wrong. As a member for the Bloc Quebecois, I will debate the bill in committee, we will ask questions and we will propose amendments, but I am very disappointed that a government that wants to make cuts everywhere and has not done so in this sector although, according to its ideology, it probably should, has introduced a bill like this one.

I am very disappointed when a government introduces a bill providing for measures that, as was pointed out in the standing committee, were ineffective, and in the presentation given by the parliamentary secretary is incapable of proving otherwise.

• (1600)

One wonders what the government is doing. Basically, it extends legislation, changes maximum guarantees and tinkers with details. Personally, I think this kind of legislation is effective and that the government has a role to play in the economy, but I would have liked to see the people who administer or claim to administer billions of dollars of taxpayers' money be more consistent and more credible when they introduce bills like this one.

We will probably vote against the bill, considering my comments on this legislation, but once again, in concluding, I am inclined to be rather wary of a government that again is asking us to extend and restructure a bill, although it is incapable of demonstrating the bill is effective and produces the desired results for entrepreneurs and the Canadian economy.

I will conclude my speech after comments that have indicated I am somewhat disillusioned with a government I thought would be more consistent in the way it manages the affairs of the state. After two years as a member of the House of Commons, one becomes increasingly convinced there will have to be some major changes made in Canada, starting with the Canadian federation—or with the government that now claims to head that federation.

[English]

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I stand to enter the debate on Bill C–99, a bill to amend certain sections of the Small Business Loans Act.

I want to pay particular tribute to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry for his very kind remarks and his description characterizing the industry committee that dealt with the report "Taking Care of Small Business", which was tabled about a year ago, and also some of the recommendations in the report, some of which are included and recognized in the bill.

I would like to follow up on some of the suggestions he made about the significance of small business in the economy of Canada. It is not a secret to us or anybody who follows the economy of Canada that approximately 80 per cent to 85 per cent of the new jobs created in Canada are created by small business. When it comes to the Small Business Loans Act it is precisely that sector of our economy that this act addresses. In my opinion, these amendments are not sufficient. They do not go far enough and some of them are counterproductive.

We must recognize that in the new economy that is developing, the important issue and the characteristic of a business is the ability to apply knowledge in a way that will provide for new services, new products, and particularly the application of new technology and the most recent discoveries of science. It is very clear that in the globalization of the economy and in the international competition that is developing it will become increasingly significant that the science and the technology of a nation will become a determining factor in that particular competitive environment.

One critical factor in developing the ability to transfer knowledge and apply it to new products or new ways of processing and doing things will require a skilled and very knowledgeable workforce. That does not come by accident. It comes as a result not only of good technical schools and good universities, but begins in primary school, kindergarten to grade 12. It is here that we need to change our educational system so that it will become far more geared to science and technology, and particularly the science area, and that we all become sensitive and recognize that it is really science that is going to make the difference in the next century.

We also know from past experience that it is the small business that is most able to apply this new knowledge, because it is not fettered with all this bureaucracy. It is not fettered with all these regulations and things that are internal and the internal politics that stand in the way of new ideas and adapting to change. We need to develop that kind of awareness and recognize that it is the small business group that is going to be the leader in this particular area.

The whole idea of small business rests on entrepreneurship. Unfortunately, today in this country we have what is known as bureaucratic entrepreneurship. We all know what that is. That means that a bureaucrat sees how many more bureaucrats he can get under his supervision. That will mean that his salary and power will increase. Therefore, the entrepreneurship is one of developing larger and larger departments. We have a very well developed entrepreneurship orientation, ability, and skill level in that area. However, we do not have that same level of expertise, that same skill, that same fully developed attitude in the developing of entrepreneurship in business and the application of knowledge to produce new products and adapt to new processes in developing those products.

Right down into the kindergarten level, all the way up through the universities, we need to develop this attitude, this orientation toward entrepreneurship. The Small Business Loans Act is directed precisely to that area. We must recognize that the Small Business Loans Act is not a new idea. It has been around since 1961. It has been amended many times. It was designed in the original instance to provide for innovation to our economy in Canada.

I want to hearken back to a moment ago when we talked about developing entrepreneurship, the skill and so on. We now need to recognize that it is this legislation that initially was designed to do just that. We should look at some of the provisions of this particular piece of legislation and ask ourselves whether the new amendments will facilitate or will stand in the way of that kind of development.

We all know that small business has as its major impediment to further growth and development, very often in its initial establishment, access to capital. There are two kinds of capital to which business requires access. One is equity capital, which establishes the machines, the facilities, and those kinds of things. The other is loan capital. There are two kinds of loan capital. Usually it is centred around operational capital, which allows the business to operate from one day to the next. We discovered in the last year that even though everybody says there is all kinds of capital available, we have story after story of business telling us that it is the access to capital that is its stumbling block. It is not getting the access it needs.

I want to draw to the attention of the House some of the elements that came to our attention when we studied this problem in the industry committee.

With the amendments that were implemented in 1992, the loans provided under the Small Business Loans Act increased dramatically. Between 1993 and 1994 the number of loans grew to 42,500 from 13,000 in 1992. The new lending reached almost $2.5 billion and averaged $58,500 per loan, from a previous average of $37,000 per loan.

There was a sad note in the evidence that was heard before the committee. A 1988 study concluded that two–thirds of the loans would have been made even without the government guarantee, which at that point was at 90 per cent. Since the revisions, however, Mr. Al Cotton of the Toronto–Dominion Bank told the committee that 75 per cent of the bank's small business loans would not have been made in the absence of the guarantee. Shortly after his presentation, Mr. Kluge of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce stated that most SBLA lending would have been granted in the absence of the program, but that in certain high risk sectors, such as new restaurants, the guarantee was important.

We were left with a dilemma. Here we had two bank officials from two of the major banks, one saying that the loans would not have been given without the guarantee of the loans act, another bank official saying that they would have been granted. It becomes a real dilemma. Did this loan act really produce the kind of result desired or did it not?

Mr. Mitchell: Sure it did.

Mr. Schmidt: My worthy opponent says of course it did. He comes from one of the banks that was not represented by those other two, so I suspect he would agree.

The cost of administering the program exceeds 2 per cent of administration, which is another problem. At the present time the Small Business Loans Act tacks on to the loan a 2 per cent administration fee, which becomes part of the principal and can be amortized over the length of loan, or I suppose the individual can pay it off up front if he wishes to do so. In any event, the 2 per cent is not sufficient to cover the loss or the administration of the loan.

The third point is institutional loans. Under this provision it suggests the loan level is rather high in this way of doing business between financial institutions and their various lenders. I want to draw the Haines–Riding study into this a little later in my remarks, when I will get into this in more detail.

I now want to go on to the specific provisions of this act as it is before the House today. The first of these is the reduction of the government's liability from 90 per cent to 85 per cent. In other words, the loan guarantees are now no higher than 85 per cent of that loan. That is one provision.

The second provision, to which we should all pay very special attention, says that future changes to the rate of the liability of government are transferred from Parliament to cabinet. This means that in the future the liability that will be incurred by this government and will rest on the shoulders of every Canadian who pays taxes will be decided not by the people's representatives but by the cabinet. That is an abrogation of democratic responsibility. I want to take very strong exception to this. In fact I want to introduce right here the notion and the statement that the Reform Party will not support this bill on the basis of that provision alone. Unless an amendment is made to withdraw that provision and that transfer of power from the Parliament to the cabinet, we will oppose this bill, even if we would agree with everything else in the bill. We do not agree with everything else, but that is sufficient in my opinion to oppose the bill in its entirety.

Why do I take such a strong view of this? This is a democratic country. This country is based on the principles of democracy, which means that the people in this House who are elected to represent the Canadian people have been elected to look after the best interests of those people who have elected us. That means we should represent them as honestly as we possibly can, and do so fairly, justly, and equitably. That is what I was elected to do.

This kind of amendment takes away the right of parliamentarians to represent their people on the floor of this House. That is wrong. It is wrong in principle. The time has come for us to take very strong exception to this kind of amendment.

We all know that within the platform, the philosophy, and the principles of the Reform Party of Canada we stand for precisely the ability to represent our people. We want more free votes in this House. We have had some examples of free votes in this House, and the government is to be commended for those few instances. However, the government is to be severely chastised for those moments when its members did exercise their free vote and were punished for doing so. That is a fault, a blemish on this government's record in terms of its democratic principles and the application of democratic decision making.

We talk about a referendum. There are certain instances when every person in Canada should exercise their right directly and immediately not only at the time of exercising a ballot in favour of a particular person but also in favour of major social, ethical or moral issues on which they feel very strongly and about which the majority should decide what the issue in Canada ought to be.

One which has been well publicized is capital punishment. We go on from there as well. There is the other place, the Senate of Canada, and we believe there is also responsibility that it be democratized; that the individuals who sit in that chamber to provide and exercise sober second thought be elected and that they fairly and accurately represent the various regions of Canada so there can be fair representation not only by individuals but by the various regions of Canada as well.

Therefore within that framework of deep philosophic orientation we oppose the provision in this bill which would amend the act in such a way that the power moves from the House of Commons, the Parliament of the country, to the cabinet.

Another provision is the application of an annual fee of 1.25 per cent to the administration of a loan, the outstanding balance, paid by the lender. It is very interesting how this fee is to be administered. It is to be paid by the lender and the lender may not recover the cost of that 1.25 per cent except through an increase in interest rates.

It is interesting what the act does. The earlier limit on the interest rate was 1.75 per cent above prime. The amendment proposed says the new limit is 3 per cent above prime. It does not take a mathematical genius to add 1.75 and 1.25 and come up with 3, which now means very clearly that the bank or any lending institution may increase its interest rates 3 per cent above prime and thereby recover its full 1.25 per cent. That is what this provision is.

Another provision provides for a claims processing fee. When we ask the various department officials how much that fee will be, when will it be applied, under what conditions will it apply, will it be a standard fee across any loan, will it make any difference, they say they do not really know because they have not yet decided whether they will apply such a fee.

Why does the act have this provision in it? They might want to recover certain costs associated with claims. That is very interesting but it begs the question of what kinds of conditions must a lending institution meet in order to avoid being assessed a claims processing fee.

There is absolutely no provision in the act that would suggest the parameters, the guidelines, the details under which a claims fee would be applied. It is dangerous when we have open ended legislation of that kind when nobody knows how much, nobody knows under what conditions, nobody knows under what guidelines it will be applied.

I was absolutely astounded when I read this. When we got the briefing, it sounded very different. When I went back to the actual act I discovered that really the slant was quite different. I want to read this exactly as it is written. Section 4(1)(e.1): "The minister may prescribe the terms and conditions on which a lender may release any security, including a personal guarantee, taken for the repayment of a business improvement loan".

We were told in no uncertain terms that this dealt with guarantees, the actual phrase being personal guarantees. I can see where a small businessman getting started who becomes a little bit desperate will actually provide a personal guarantee. He will say: "Here is my house and my personal effects. I will stand good on a personal basis for this part of the loan". When half the loan is paid the lender says he will now take the personal guarantee away.

That is only one small part. It includes the release of any securities, which includes anything else. It could be a facility, a building, equipment, land, a variety of things. If there is a loan outstanding of $250,000 and half of it is repaid, that is a $125,000 liability. If at that point the lender can now release security, where is the security left for the balance of that loan? I can see the understanding that it goes to the personal guarantee because the building is probably worth the $125,000, but if the lender cannot take that off too and the act allows him to do that then I ask myself what kind of protection there is for the Government of Canada on the hook for the guarantee of 85 per cent of that loan.

So much for a review of the particular provisions. There are some issues we should be aware of. I referred earlier to the Haines–Riding study from Carleton University in Ottawa. It makes some very interesting observations. I think we should go back into history a little. The Small Business Loans Act up until this point had a ceiling of sales of $2 million; in other words, a business that had sales of more than $2 million would not qualify for the SBLA loan. Under this act now that level is $5 million.

The Haines–Riding study shows very clearly that businesses with sales of $2 million or less have a much lower failure rate when it comes to the repayment of loans than those with sales between $2 million and $5 million. The differential between those loans is a failure rate increase of 14.7 per cent. That is pretty significant.

We need to combine that with the increase in the amount of loans outstanding as well. In the past the maximum SBLA loan one could have was $150,000. That has now increased to $250,000, which means, although we cannot say for sure, if the size of the business and maximum loan has increased we can conclude the loss rate will increase proportionately. Therefore if it costs $100 million now on an annual basis to run this program what will it be under the new provisions? I think the answer is very obvious. It will be higher than it is today.

That brings us into a very serious conundrum. On one hand we have an act that is supposed to build and encourage businesses. It will do that in a variety of cases. It should then generate more tax revenue and things of this nature which would then increase the economy of Canada and everything would roll along more smoothly than it did before.

The maximum of the SBLA loan ceiling has now moved from $4 billion to $12 billion, a threefold increase. If it now, under the $4 billion ceiling, runs at $100 billion, what will it do under the $12 billion? If the proportion remains constant it will also be a threefold increase. We cannot afford that.

The national debt is somewhere around $560 billion, growing at about $1,000 per second. About $45 billion to $60 billion is paid out in interest, much of which is foreign currency denominated. With the Canadian dollar being where it is today, can anyone imagine what this is doing to our social programs? That is why we are in trouble with the health care system. That is why we are in trouble with transfer payments. That is why we are in trouble with welfare payments. That is what makes this kind of bill questionable.

Yet people say they were told at the beginning that 80 per cent to 85 per cent of the new jobs are created by small business. Right. Should we not encourage small business? Right. Should not our government programs to the greatest degree possible be self–financing? Right. This bill is supposed to do all those things.

If it does that, then we can support that. However, we still want to go back to the earlier point I made about this democracy. That is absolutely at the heart of this issue and we cannot, we dare not allow that to get in the way of implementing this bill.

I want to address one final point, competition. I want to read a very extensive point made very effectively by our study on small business. We were told by Mr. Doug Robbins of Robbinex that financial institutions are increasingly using the Small Business Loans Act—get a load of this—to finance assets, for example cars and trucks, that are able to obtain financing without a government guarantee.

Data provided by the Scotiabank on its small business lending portfolio show that SBLA lending is more heavily concentrated in areas of transportation by as much as 25 per cent than the bank's total small business lending portfolio in which transportation and communication lending represents only 6 per cent. The representatives of Newport Credit and the Canadian Financing and Leasing Association, specializing in asset based financing, told the committee they are having difficulty competing with lenders who benefit from government guarantees.

Since when has the government become that great and wonderful arbiter to determine winners and losers in the marketplace? The government has no business getting into this area. If a business cannot succeed in the marketplace it should not be there. That is the part that bothers me more than anything else in a bill of this kind, this orientation. We need to recognize this is not a simple, easy answer to our economic problems.

The committee received conflicting views on the future of the Small Business Loans Act as well. It was suggested the act be expanded by extending it to working capital. Neither the Small Business Loans Act nor this bill does that. It was also suggested that it be restricted by focusing on rapidly growing business that enhances the country's knowledge base and generates skilled employment, which we already talked about.

With increase lending comes increased taxpayer exposure. We have already dealt with that. This amendment, although it goes part of the way, does not go all the way. It should go further.

The committee suggested we reduce the percentage of government guarantee, which has been done, reduce the percentage of assets that can be financed, and reduce the maximum loan amounts, which the bill does not do. In fact it goes in the opposite direction. It doubles the exposure that would have been happening under the act as it is now.

The bill has numerous shortcomings like releasing securities, any kind of securities as well as personal guarantees. We need to be very clear and an amendment is needed in this area.

This bill also increases the liability of government even though the minister stood up in the House and said the bill, because it is a self–financing or a cost liquidating kind of a program, does not increase the liability of government. I dare suggest the experience will show that it does increase the liability of government. If it does not increase the liability of government then I ask the minister whether there is any need for a program of this kind.

Let me emphasize once again that the most serious flaw in the bill is that it disenfranchises parliamentarians. It moves the authority to make decisions and obligations on behalf of the people of Canada from the House to the cabinet. That is wrong. Democracy must never be denied.

I reiterate that unless that provision is removed from the bill we will oppose it.

• (1630)

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act and to share with the House the concerns and hopes of small business owners and managers throughout Guelph—Wellington.

At this important time in Canadian history I remind all Canadians that it is the hope of small business people in Guelph—Wellington, their families and their employees that Canada remains united. They recognize the imperfections of our confederation, but they realize, as we have in the past, that we can continue to evolve to make our country always stronger. They are confident that a united Canada, one that includes Quebec as an active member of our nation, will continue to be regarded worldwide as the best country in the world in which to live.

Bill C–99 is part of our ongoing effort to reduce the deficit, fulfil the promises we made to Canadians two years ago and provide the support that is necessary to enable small business to grow and to create jobs. I congratulate the Minister of Industry and the Minister of Finance who have directed and focused our efforts to strengthen small business in Canada. The Minister of Industry visited my community last year. He was welcomed by small business people who encouraged him to continue his initiative of providing support and assistance to them, so that they can continue to build a strong community in Guelph—Wellington and elsewhere.

Small business people in Guelph—Wellington, when talking to me, remind me that they have hope in our future. They talk to me as women and men who have taken risks in order to build a life for themselves and their families. They are creating jobs in my community and in every riding across Canada. They look to us, the federal government, to assist them in that important responsibility.

The Small Business Loan Act is part of our efforts. Since 1961 more than 420,000 loans, totalling over $15.5 billion, have been made to small businesses. These loans have helped small business gain access to capital for start–up, expansion and growth. The program's success lies in its ability to serve as an economic development tool and as an example of public sector and private sector co–operation.

Guelph—Wellington recently hosted, through the efforts of small business leaders like Catherine Billings, Anne Redfearn–Grobbo, Richard Zinck and Valerie Poulton, Community Spirit '95, a small business expo, which brought together business people to exchange ideas, share expertise and celebrate the successes of small businesses in Wellington county. The message that I received at Community Spirit '95 and wherever I meet small business leaders is: We need government to get out of the way where it causes us unnecessary burden; to listen to us when we have ideas for our future and to provide the assistance necessary for us to weather uncertainty and to expand our resources when we want to create jobs and strengthen our achievements. The Small Business Loans Act program allows every small business in Guelph—Wellington whose revenues do not exceed $5 million annually to ask for that assistance.

Small business people in my community understand the seriousness of our financial crisis. They know that deficit spending is not the way to sustain our economic future. They are concerned about taxation and they want the government to manage its money as well and as carefully as they manage their own money. They recognize the need to reduce expenditures and to refocus spending.

The Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal visited Guelph this fall where he spoke to representatives of small business about the program review that will redesign government. They welcomed the change because they support our efforts to spend what we have and not to mortgage our future.

Recently, the Small Business Loans Act program has suffered tremendous losses for the government. Assuming continuation of the historic losses that have occurred over the past few years, the annual program cost would increase by over $100 million. Clearly this is a threat to the future of the program. The potential cost of the program given these circumstances, and the government's need for deficit control required that the program be brought to full cost recovery.

• (1635)

The federal government included an examination of the Small Business Loans Act in its program review process. During the months of October and November 1994 the review included extensive consultations with major stakeholders, representing lenders and those who borrow. As part of our efforts to encourage more participation by members of Parliament, the recommendations of the industry committee and the small business working committee were also taken into account. All stakeholders supported the move to full cost recovery.

Small business people in Guelph—Wellington know that in order to survive as a nation we will have to choose. They have told me that we can no longer afford the luxuries and excesses of the past. As they have had to do in their businesses, they have asked me to work for them to make decisions on what is important to us and for our future and to concentrate on what will make us strong again.

They do that in their businesses each and every day and they welcome a federal government that from the day of its election in October 1993 does the very same in order to secure a strong future for this country.

As part of our efforts we have introduced a new 1–1/4 per cent annual administration fee on each lender's average outstanding balance of the Small Business Loans Act made after March 31, 1995. We have also announced that the maximum interest rate that a lender can charge under the program has been increased by 1–1/4 per cent.

Bill C–99 also includes changes which will complete the move to full cost recovery and improve the administration of the program. These changes will mean that the Small Business Loans Act will be better targeted toward small business which really needs its help. These changes go hand in hand with our efforts to improve access to loans to small business by our financial institutions. While we aim at cost recovery, our commitment to strengthening the future of small business in Canada is unchanged.

Small business recognizes the need for co–operation. Each and every day in Guelph—Wellington small business leaders rely on distribution, transportation and communication in order to survive. They have called on me to bring a message to Ottawa. Let us work together: government, industry and labour to get the job done.

In Guelph—Wellington we know the importance of listening and working together to build a stronger community. This summer, Wendi Bacon of the Royal Bank Business Centre brought me together again with the leaders of financial institutions throughout my riding. We discussed the concerns of small business people, their frustrations in obtaining capital and their suggestions for strengthening their relationship with the banks.

Everyone recognized that there is more to be done. But it was also an opportunity to review what has happened in the past two years and to remind ourselves that we have met with some success.

Also this summer I had the opportunity to meet with small business people, leaders like Phil Greenway of Danby Products and Dwayne Mott of Orbex Computer Systems who reminded me that they want deficit reduction and they demand that the government plan carefully, consult extensively and act responsibly.

Community leaders like Michael Henry, general manager of the Guelph Chamber of Commerce, Ralph Macdonald of the Rockwood and Eramosa Township Business Association and Mike Lazarakos of the Guelph Small Business Association, bring together business and government in order to work out solutions and most important, to listen to one another in order that we improve and enhance small businesses in Guelph—Wellington.

Small business leaders throughout Canada have told the government that the primary lending issue for them is access, not the cost of financing. We believe that by making the Small Business Loans Act self–sustaining, these changes will ensure that access will continue.

• (1640)

In the past two years I have participated in the ground breaking of a new Purolator facility, welcomed the Minister of Industry as he visited Skyjack and Linamar, walked with the minister of agriculture as he toured Semex, visited countless businesses and congratulated our business leaders on their successes. Guelph—Wellington supports its businesses and it celebrates their successes.

As a former small business manager I share the frustrations of individuals, couples and partners who have a dream and who work hard to establish that dream in a business of their own. I also share the fulfilment and know how enriching owning, operating and working in a small business can be.

I am excited to tell small business owners, managers and employees that the federal government recognizes that it must create a better environment for jobs and growth in the small business sector.

We have eased restrictions on internal trade, proving to the world and to ourselves that federalism works. Removing these barriers is good news to many of the businesses that sell products and provide services to other parts of Canada. This is welcome news to Sleeman's Brewery, which knows that various provincial liquor boards practise selective listing policies. Mackinnon Transport should welcome this initiative. It is aware that transportation regulations differ from province to province. D&J Construction in my riding saw new opportunities because construction procedures are different from one province to another. Trodat Canada, Clear Choice Manufacturing and Autosparks are companies that have told me that our patchwork of regulation standards and various provincial laws are unacceptable to them and to their employees.

We have also opened doors through exports. Canada is a major exporting nation. By forging partnerships with the provinces and working as Team Canada we have built a new approach to selling Canada to the world.

Nipponia Export Limited of Puslinch is one example of this success. During a recent trip to Brazil it sold 200 cattle in a deal worth almost half a million dollars. The University of Guelph re–signed an agreement with a university in Chile. Valcom Limited recently negotiated joint ventures and recruited distributors at Telecom 95.

The message from the business community of Guelph—Wellington is loud and clear: we can compete, we can produce and we can succeed.

Bill C–99 is not the sole solution to the concerns raised to me by my constituents. It is a part of our strategy to further our commitment to our future. It is legislation which fulfils promises, makes government more accountable through cost recovery and strengthens the relationship that exists between government and business.

We have more to do. Together we must address the problems of the GST and we must eliminate the underground economy. I am proud to be working with union representatives in Wellington county to give suggestions to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue to address an underground economy which costs us revenue and costs us jobs. The underground economy does no Canadian any good. With it we prolong the deficit and we prohibit Canadian men and women from their responsibility of providing for themselves and their families. At the same time the people of Guelph—Wellington look forward to the government fulfilling its promise to replace the GST. We will do that.

We know that it will require all 10 provinces and the federal government to work out a solution to the GST which will make it fairer and simpler and ease the administrative burden on business. Again, my constituents have provided me with suggestions which I have been pleased to forward to the Minister of Finance.

The government remains strongly committed to small business as the main engine of economic growth in Canada. We have been told repeatedly and we are listening. The best that we can do for business, large and small, is to get the deficit under control. The changes that are included in this legislation are a step in the right direction. The user–pay system which is being adopted will mean that it is no longer a contributor to the government's deficit.

• (1645)

The changes ensure that the Small Business Loans Act will continue to be an important public policy tool to foster the growth of small businesses in Canada.

In Guelph—Wellington we like to celebrate our success. We believe we have a workforce that is second to none because we live in the best community in Canada. We know we can accomplish much when we all work together, stay positive, and keep focused. The enthusiasm evident throughout Guelph—Wellington is there because we want to succeed.

Two years ago the people of Guelph—Wellington helped to elect a Liberal government with a mandate for change. I say to my Quebec colleagues that the best anniversary present we can imagine is a united Canada committed to change, change that will result in jobs and growth for Guelph—Wellington and in all 295 ridings in this great country. As part of that mandate, Bill C–99 deserves our support.

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity today to talk about the Small Business Loans Act. Obviously as a government and as a party we believe the small business sector plays an important part in the economy.

The last time statistics were compiled, in 1993, showed that 911,700 businesses in this country had fewer than 100 employees, which is actually 99 per cent of the businesses that operate in Canada. So we can see the importance of the small business sector. In fact that number represents a 30 per cent increase in the number of small businesses over the previous 11 years. Not only is small business an important part of our economy, but it is an increasingly important part of our economy.

These small businesses with fewer than 100 employees—some are micro–businesses, with between one and three employees—account for 44 per cent of the jobs. More important, small business accounts for the vast majority of the new jobs being created in this country today. As a government, we recognize that.

We as a government understand that we need to assist the small business sector, that we need to create a climate, an environment within which the small business sector can operate successfully, so it is able to be profitable. By being profitable they are able to create employment, which is the bottom line. We want to ensure employment is created. The government has done that in a number of ways. It has done it in terms of the fiscal policy. It has done it because we have addressed Canada's fiscal deficit and we have worked as a government to bring some economic order to this House.

By the end of this fiscal year we will have come close to reducing the annual deficit by half. In the last budget the Minister of Finance had a plan that would see our expenditures reduced by 19 per cent. The public service is being reduced by 14 per cent. We are bringing economic revitalization to this country and we are bringing some sanity to our economic house, but we are doing it in a way that recognizes that behind every expenditure line on the government's expenses there are real people, real Canadians. We are determined to do this economic exercise in a fair and equitable way for every Canadian.

The second area we have worked in to create a favourable climate for the small business men and women is on the regulatory regime under which they have to operate. There is no question that if we overburden the small business men and women with regulation after regulation they spend more time doing that than they do taking care of their business, creating wealth and jobs.

Already this government has eliminated 250 regulations that have served their purpose and are no longer applicable, and we have amended another 300 plus. We are very cognizant of the need to refine our regulatory regime and we are working every day to make sure we are protecting the interests of Canadians where those interests need to be protected by regulation while at the same time making sure we do not do it in a manner that overburdens the small business sector.

We come to the third component of the strategy for small business, which is the issue of access to capital. The Small Business Loans Act and the bill we have in front of us, Bill C–99, deal very much with the whole issue of access to capital.

Along with colleagues in the House, I sit on the industry committee. That committee has worked for close to two years on the issue of access to capital. We have worked with the private sector, with the Canadian chartered banks and with others to try to ensure that they take measures to increase capital to the small business sector. To some extent, we have met with some small successes.

The banks listened to much of what we said and agreed that there needed to be a code of conduct that clearly outlined the relationship between the small business sector and the financial institutions. That code is now in place in all of the banks. It defines things like if a person is turned down for a loan he or she has to be told why. A reason has to be given. Alternatives have to be given. It talks about when a loan is called and the amount of time that has to be given in order to do that. It is helping to take some of the surprises away. I was glad to see that was the recommendation of the industry committee and that the chartered banks followed that.

A second thing the banks have done is put in place an alternative dispute resolution system, the ADR. Basically it is a mediation process. It gives small business men and women who have a relationship with a bank and who are not happy with what is happening with that relationship the ability to appeal what is going on to an independent panel. This is a positive step. It was long overdue. I was pleased to see that it was with the initiation again of this House through the industry committee that the banks are in fact doing that.

We still have many challenges. One of the things that we know as parliamentarians is that in order to evaluate whether or not there is sufficient lending to the small business sector, whether there is indeed proper access to capital, we need to know exactly what is being lent and how much that is either increasing or decreasing. One of the things we have worked on in the last four to six months with the chartered banks is that they will provide statistics on how much they are lending. And that is not just a gross amount of how much they are lending, but broken down by region, by industry, and by a number of other factors, so that we as parliamentarians and representatives of the Canadian public, and in this particular case the small business community, can tell whether or not small business is experiencing a credit crunch.

One of the greatest difficulties we had in examining this issue in the last two years is we did not really have access to good statistics. We had a lot of anecdotal evidence, and when we called the banks they often said that was the exception rather than the rule. By insisting that we get these statistics, by insisting that this information be provided to us, we will have an opportunity to see not the exception to the rule but what the rule is and whether there is more capital out there available to the small business sector.

Complementing the private sector and their lending to small business, the government also has a role to play. Bill C–99 is one of several components of the government's interaction with the small business community in terms of access to capital. We have the Business Development Bank, formerly the Federal Business Development Bank of Canada, which lends to small business, we have the business development corporation that used to be part of the human resources development department and now is part of the industry department, that lends to small business in rural areas, and we have something that is a very important project, the Small Business Loans Act.

I am probably one of the few if perhaps not the only member of this House who has actually used that program as a lender—not as a borrower but as a lender. I can say unequivocally that in the 20 years I operated in a private financial institution, this program helped provide capital to the small business men and women. Indeed, there were incremental loans that happened as a result of the existence of this program. It was not simply a duplication. It was not simply providing loans that would have otherwise been made. It actually allowed for loans to be made under this guarantee program that otherwise would not have been able to take place.

It is an important program. It can really help people in very meaningful ways. For instance, if you are a long distance trucker and you want to buy your rig—they sometimes cost well over $100,000—this program will help finance that. It will finance that type of equipment up to $250,000. It will allow somebody to get into business who might not otherwise have been able to.

If you are a retailer, one of the things you have to do when opening a retail shop is the leasehold improvements in the business. This program allows for financing of leasehold improvements. That is a tough thing to get financed in the private sector. Through the Small Business Loans Act, a lot of people who otherwise might not have been able to get the credit to do that, who otherwise might not have been able to open their shops, are able to. It is because of this program and the good this program is doing.

If you are a manufacturer, ofen you have to go out and buy the equipment. It might be a stamp machine, a conveyer belt, some sort of equipment. Again, this program can help that business do it.

This is not, as one of the members of the Bloc mentioned before, a duplication of an existing program in Quebec, the Paillé program. That program provides credit up to $50,000. This program provides it up to $250,000. That program is for start–ups. The small business loan is for start–ups as well, but it also allows us to finance existing business expansion. That is an important source of new wealth creation, an important source of new job creation. Not only are we helping start–ups, but we are also helping existing businesses find capital for their expansions.

In addition, the Small Business Loans Act has a longer amortization than the Quebec program. It has a relatively short amortization of three years, whereas under the Small Business Loans Act you can amortize up to 10 years. For the small business person who is starting off with a new business or with an expansion, it is important to have that longer amortization so that the payments, at least in the beginning, can be relatively low and the cashflow can be reserved for expansion and to keep the company going in what usually are the most difficult years, either at the start–up or after an expansion.

I want to talk a little about the cost of this program. I believe government has a role in creating an environment for small business. I believe government has a role in certain circumstances to assist directly, such as in the Small Business Loans Act. I also think it is important that we do this in a way that is revenue neutral, that recovers costs and is not going to place a large burden on the Canadian taxpayer.

We have seen this work. The Federal Business Development Bank, now the Business Development Bank of Canada, has for many years worked on a mandate of cost recovery. It has to structure its programs, its guarantees, its collateral, its fees, and its interest rates so that it recovers cost. It works, and it is proven that it works.

This SBLA program now is moving along the same basis. It is going to be a cost recovery program. There is always going to be a certain amount of loss that is going to be created with any loan program. If you lend money, you are going to have a certain amount of loss. The objective as a prudent lender is to make sure there is a provision for that loss and there is the revenue to carry that.

I know that one of the members opposite talked about the great liability that was going to be incurred by the government through this program. In a five–year time frame this program is going from $4 billion to $12 billion. That is $8 billion more capital for the small business men and women of this country. That is important to remember. It is happening over five years.

The potential liability is 10 per cent of $12 billion. To suggest that is the true liability of the government, that that is what is at risk, is like going to a chartered bank and saying that the risk is the total loan portfolio. Of course we do not say that. We do not suggest to any lender that the risk is the whole loan portfolio.

What lenders do, what we are doing as a government and what the Department of Industry and the Minister of Industry are doing is figuring out through prudent assumptions that the loan loss history is likely to be based on historical data and on economic performance. It is the same thing the banks do. They make a loan loss provision and as a government we ensure that the revenue stream is sufficiently large enough to cover potential losses.

In reality it is not a burden on taxpayers. It is a cost recovery program that ensures capital is provided to the small business sector.

I will comment on a couple of things that were said about how we will go about recovering the costs. The program has always had a 2 per cent fee that is paid up front. It can either be paid in cash or it can be amortized over the length of the loan.

In doing that examination and trying to ensure that it is a cost recovery program, it was determined that additional revenues would be required. Therefore a new fee was put on, an administration fee of 1.5 per cent.

One of the members of the Reform Party was complaining that the administration fee was being passed through not as a direct fee but rather through the interest rate. A small business person will prefer that it happens that way because the fee will be paid on a declining balance, as opposed to the full amount at the time it was borrowed. In reality the fee will be less, because it is on a declining balance calculated through the interest rate, than if the 1.5 per cent was paid up front.

The minister acted prudently and in a way where business people can have some control over their fee based on the speed at which they pay back the advance. That was a good way of doing it. The minister structured it so that the banks pay the administration fee. Then they have the option to collect it from their clients. I hope the chartered banks, as part of their commitment to helping the small business sector, would absorb a part or all of that fee.

When the plan was originally amended back in 1993 the maximum rate was 1.75 per cent, but the banks charged prime for the most part. They were anxious for the business. They went out there and they got it. Even though there was a maximum rate they did not charge it. They charged prime.

Now that we have added another 1.25 per cent or 1.5 per cent to allow for the fee and put the maximum rate up to 3 per cent, I do not understand why all of a sudden it was not good enough to charge prime or prime plus a half or prime plus one. They seem to be jacking up the rates to the maximum. I do not think that is what they should be doing. They have to take care of their profits. They have to take care of their shareholders. However I believe they have a responsibility to the small business community, and one way they can show that is by absorbing a portion of the fee.

The way they have structured the fee is appropriate. It allows for small business people to save some money through their declining balance.

In summary, it is a good piece of legislation. It is an act that has been in place for many years. It has helped a lot of small businessmen and women. There are many businesses today. All we have to do is walk down Main Street in my hometown of Gravenhurst or any other community in my riding, and I dare say in any community in any member's riding, to see businesses operating today that would not be operating if this loan program did not exist. It does its job. It creates and helps small businesses. It creates and helps employment.

Not only does it do that. With these amendments it will do it in a way that will not cost the taxpayers of Canada anything because it will be a cost recovery program. I applaud the Minister of Industry for the bill. I applaud the Minister of Industry for the changes. I know they will be good for Canada.

• (1705)

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we all know that small businesses exist throughout Canada, both in rural and urban centres.

In Atlantic Canada, small business is the backbone of the economy. It sustains the economy. The majority of small businesses, whether they are in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Quebec, are owned by local people employing young people and older people. The businesses have been there a long time, are part of the community and are sustainable.

My question is for the hon. member from Parry Sound—Muskoka. From his experience in the lending side of financial institutions and his experience with the Small Business Loans Act, could he elaborate on the value of small business to the Canadian economy to ensure the money stays in Canada for Canadians and provides a sustainable economy that supports our future?

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I will try to be as brief as I can.

The hon. member makes the excellent point that small businesses tend to create employment locally, tend to purchase locally and tend to form part of the local economy. The profits earned from those businesses are retained within the community as opposed to going elsewhere.

As someone who was involved in economic development initiatives in a rural area, organizations would look for the big hit. They would look for the big 500 to 600 person plant to come in and create employment. Those days are long gone. That is just not in the cards any more, or if it is it is a rare occasion.

We have to build the local economy one small business at a time, one job at a time, and this act provides an important tool to allow that to happen in rural communities.

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last summer I had the opportunity of driving around with the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka. We were on a little mission called the access to capital for small business task force.

Over the past two years I have been here, I have seen that the federal government only has the capability to create the atmosphere for the creation and the enhancement of small business. We do not have the money any more to throw at jobs because of deficit reduction, et cetera. One thing we have done is establish the small business centre in Toronto to cut through the red tape.

Bill C–99 is only one part of the overview. The Federal Business Development Bank and business development corporations play very important and crucial roles in the formation and enhancement of small business.

Could the member give us any information on what is being done with them to improve that part of the overview?

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I will address a couple of examples the member mentioned. One is northern Ontario where we have a regional development fund called FEDNOR that is able to provide funding for small businesses.

One way to be creative is to combine the money from FEDNOR with the money available from the Business Development Bank of Canada. If FEDNOR is able to provide funding to cover contingencies, for example losses of 5 per cent, the Business Development Bank of Canada can lend with a higher risk profile. We are looking at taking approximately $500,000 from FEDNOR and levering that through the Business Development Bank, or through a private financial institution, up to $20 million.

Government has the ability to use some creative tools in the way it finances and uses some of our programs. It is the same with the Small Business Loans Act that we are talking about in Bill C–99. It can work in conjunction with other credit facilities provided by private lenders. The term credit can be covered by the Small Business Loans Act and the bank or the private institution can come along and be happy to provide an operating credit. In a lot of cases we work in conjunction with various programs.

• (1710)

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka for his efforts on the bill. As part of the industry committee and as part of various task forces, he has travelled widely in Canada to receive information from small businesses.

Actual consultation with small businesses is an area that has been overlooked in the past. They do not have a large staff or a lot of money to spend carelessly. Every penny they spend in their budgets is very important to them.

My question for the member concerns communication and information to small businesses once the bill is passed. It is very important that the consulting process and improvements continue to go forward. Getting the information out to the many small businesses around the country is very important. The member might want to comment on that.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question because it makes an excellent point. Not only is it important to have the programming, it is also important that the small business sector knows the programming exists and how to use it.

One initiative of the government and the Minister of Industry is the single window approach to providing information so that instead of having to go to maybe five or six different offices to gather all the information, small business people can go to one location to talk to an individual and learn the various programming aspects they need to know to help their small businesses. There are many vehicles for doing that. It can be done through chambers of commerce. Most communities have a chamber of commerce. It can also be done through economic development offices.

The idea of a single window approach to provide information to the small businessmen and women is one that we recognize as a government to be important and are working on to ensure it takes place.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it has been a pleasure for me to participate in the work of the Standing Committee on Industry. With a businesslike attitude committee members have gone about their work for the benefit of all Canadian small businesses and of assisting them in competing in the world economy of today.

I was particularly appreciative of the comments of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry regarding his concern for the amount of red tape, the paperwork and the difficulties with taxes faced by small businesses. It is with this kind of attitude we approach many of the difficulties our business people are facing with a view to assisting them to make our Canadian economy as competitive, as viable and as profitable as any in the world.

Small business is the cornerstone of the Canadian economy today. Using a definition of small business being a concern with less than 100 employees, there are about a million small businesses registered in the country. This means that small business makes up nearly 99 per cent of all business enterprises in Canada. Small business accounts for about 60 per cent of the economy's private sector output. These are substantial figures.

As well, small business entrepreneurs presently create eight out of ten new jobs. In a day when we depend on new ideas being translated into new jobs, and new products and new services being translated into a larger market share of our highly competitive business world, we do not need to argue the value of small business to the Canadian economy. Rather we need to learn how to encourage entrepreneurs to develop new ideas and new products.

As a nation Canada has historically been highly creative. We have learned how necessary it is to adapt to both the economic and physical environments. However, we have been less successful in taking our ideas and inventions from the laboratories and basements of entrepreneurs and getting them into the national and international marketplace.

It was extremely educational for me before I was even on the committee to attend some of the hearings and listen to the difficulties small business people were having in securing loans, securing the capital they needed to get their ideas and concerns off the ground. In some instances there were business people with many orders in their order books, ready to sell but with no money to work to produce the product. One very significant reason for this lack of success has been the shortage of loan capital, of equity capital, available to someone to take a well developed idea or an advanced product prototype and make it a commercially viable asset of the Canadian economy.

So often we have heard stories of how someone had this great invention but after years of struggle to get it marketed they finally gave up and went to the United States where there was capital, resources and an invitation waiting, all that was necessary to make it a marketable product. These are sad stories, sad because they tell of a loss to our country not only of the product, but more important, the loss of the people who took what they had and left.

The Small Business Loans Act was an initiative by the federal government in 1961 to help remedy this situation. By and large this has been a successful intervention by the government. The Small Business Loans Act has provided a 90 per cent government guarantee to banks, credit unions and other lenders that make loans to small business people. Loans that are properly made and placed under the umbrella of this act will not be a write off to the lender if they are not repaid.

The Small Business Loans Act guarantees loans made to small business interests that qualify. There is an interest by government for which I want to offer some congratulations in supporting this sector of our economy. Today about $6 billion in loans to small businesses is guaranteed in this manner. Under these proposed amendments to the act, the amount of money available with this government guarantee would substantially increase.

However, in the real world where not everything works out or goes quite as planned there are some aspects of the Small Business Loans Act that do need updating from past experience. There need to be corrections; there need to be some changes.

The amendments brought forward in Bill C–99 are being proposed by the government. One of the problems the government faces is there is about a 5 per cent failure rate in these guaranteed loans. Estimates are that without some means of recovering these losses, this loan guarantee program could cost the government in the order of $100 million each year which would be an unacceptably high cost. To its credit, the government is proposing amendments to the act to rectify this problem.

One amendment would reduce the size of the loan guarantee from 90 per cent to 85 per cent. In this move the government quite properly is telling the money lenders that they have to bear some of the risk in lending to small business enterprises. This should not make a significant difference in the willingness of lenders to make loans under the Small Business Loans Act for in many instances, lenders have already said that they are including fully secured loans under this act when it is hard to explain why this need is there.

A second amendment which I support is the establishment of a 1.25 per cent annual administration fee that can be passed on to the borrower in the interest rates that are applied. It has already been said that this would increase the premium on the interest rate to about 3 per cent, which is significant. After listening to people looking for capital, it seemed to me that more often it was not the interest rate which was so important to them but the fundamental access to capital which they needed.

It is my opinion that it is completely in order for the borrower to bear some of the cost of this guaranteed loan program. The borrower is perhaps the one who will benefit most from it. When the lenders are competing with one another for loans, the interest rate is always a negotiable matter. Therefore, when competition is keen and the lender really wants to get the money out into the marketplace, the borrower may get the benefit of a loan interest rate which is significantly lower. I do not have the same difficulty with this amendment as do some other members of the House.

A third amendment which Bill C–99 would make to the Small Business Loans Act would allow a borrower who has repaid one–half or more of the loan to be released from the personal guarantee held by the lender. This would not leave the loan unsecured by any means. The collateral and physical assets held by the lender would remain in place until the loan was repaid.

Often a loan is made to a partnership and over time the partnership may dissolve. In an instance such as this, where a former partner is no longer part of the business, there may not be a strong desire to stay and there also may be a serious financial need to free the guarantor of the burden which he has taken on. These amendments would conditionally allow that to happen. They would also allow a borrower in some way to separate his or her corporate and personal interests.

My interest here is not to add more burden or more risk to the government. Far be it from that. However, with the withdrawal of the personal guarantee, the borrower is free, which allows more opportunity for the expansion of business and of commercial activity.

There is an amendment regarding a claims processing fee which is troublesome for me in that it is poorly defined. How would it be implemented? When would it come into place? These amendments need careful attention and further revision before they can be supported.

Bill C–99 has one essential flaw. The bill gives the Minister of Industry the power to make future regulation changes without the consent of Parliament. The Minister of Industry will argue that this transfer of power allows the department to act more expediently in response to the rapid rate changes of the financial markets.

Parliament could transfer every policy change away from the elected members to senior bureaucrats and ultimately to cabinet ministers. Then we would not be called a democracy, would we? This trend by the Liberal government is a very serious challenge to the authority of Parliament.

This portion of Bill C–99 must be amended to respect the rights of Canadians to have future regulatory changes soberly examined by their elected officials and not left in the hands of the executive or the bureaucrats. Without the amendment of this portion of the bill the Reform Party cannot give its support to this otherwise sound piece of legislation.

There are over 4.2 million Canadians employed by small and medium size businesses in Canada. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business recently surveyed its membership on job creation. Catherine Swift, vice–president of the organization, recently claimed that small firms and new businesses are the ones which have created all the new jobs over the past couple of years. This is an accurate claim. In the 1980s, 85 per cent of new jobs were created by small and medium sized businesses. This trend is continuing to grow as more and more Canadians explore the possibility of starting their own businesses.

The Liberals must make good on an election promise they made in their red book. They promised "to focus on small and medium sized businesses because they can and must be the determining factor in turning around what has so far been a jobless recovery". By creating a more efficient financing model for small businesses, the government is becoming more responsible for the development of small and medium sized businesses in Canada. The long term financing of these businesses becomes even more assured with these cost recovery amendments.

The minister needs to amend Bill C–99 to give Parliament the right to make future regulation changes. Parliament must not give this power away. This is necessary because losing the right to make future changes could in the long run harm not only the democratic process but even the small business loans program itself.

Members of Parliament are elected to examine programs such as this one in the interests of their constituents. To lose that ability would be inexcusable. I encourage the Minister of Industry to cease seeking such executive control. With this aspect of the bill eliminated, the small businesses of Canada can get to work and access a plan that is working well and could be improved on to make its viability assured even during these highly competitive times.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak on Bill C–99, the amendment to the Small Business Loans Act.

The summary of the bill concerns me. The bill states: "This enactment amends the Small Business Loans Act with the objective of moving the small business loans program to full cost recovery". I thought that the whole concept of the Small Business Loans Act was for the government to try to provide some underlying guarantee of picking winners and losers, because let us face it, it has been in that business for a long time, through grants, subsidies, contributions and giving away money by the millions and billions. As an aside, did you see my waste report where $11 billion in grants and contributions are given away by this government every year?

Getting back to the bill, the concept of the Small Business Loans Act was to provide a guarantee to higher risk businesses that had the potential to generate jobs and economic growth. The government was prepared to underwrite that program to try to foster development. It is not a bad idea, although we Reformers always felt that a dollar in the hands of an investor was far better than a dollar channelled through a bureaucrat and back into the economy. Nonetheless, the government is now going to channel this money through the bureaucrat back into the economy on a full cost recovery basis. The first question which comes to mind is: Why are we doing this?

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): That is not the bill.

Mr. Williams: Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, is the one I am talking about. That is the bill that is on the agenda at the moment. My hon. colleague from the Liberal Party says that is not the bill. I am quoting right from the bill. Does he not know what we are talking about right now and what the bill says? The bill states "small business loans program to full cost recovery". Let us talk about this full cost recovery.

The government has lots of power. It is going to establish an annual administration fee to collect money from the lenders, put it in a pocket and it is going to restrict the lenders from passing on the fee to the borrowers, except through interest rates. The government is going to say to lenders: "We are going to charge you an administration fee of maybe 1 per cent or 2 per cent of the amount of money that you are lending out. You are prohibited from charging your borrower an administrative fee but you may include it as a mark–up on your interest rate". Remember full cost recovery.

The lenders will have to pay to the government 1 per cent or 2 per cent of the total money they lend out. The government will take this pool of cash and reimburse the lenders who make bad choices because they are the ones who are going to collect the guarantee from the government.

I scratch my head trying to figure out the logic because I cannot find any in this particular bill. It says that the government, by skimming money off the prudent, intelligent lenders who made intelligent, prudent investment decisions are required to pay a premium to the government so that it can build up a pool of cash to reimburse the lenders who made poor and irrational decisions. It does not make sense. We are penalizing good and competent lenders and subsidizing incompetent lenders. The poor businessman does not get one nickel's worth of a break because this is on a pooled cost recovery basis to the government.

I cannot understand the logic. That is why the Reform Party says that a dollar in the hands of an investor, a businessman, an entrepreneur, a consumer, is far, far better than a dollar in the hands of a bureaucrat. The amendments to this act are living proof of the justification of Reform Party policy.

I cannot understand the government which talks about creating jobs, jobs, jobs. I recall that was its slogan during the election. The Liberals were going to spend $6 billion on the infrastructure program. Let us take the money, channel it through bureaucrats, lend it out or give it away to try and create jobs. It did not work.

The President of the Treasury Board appeared before the government operations committee trying to justify the infrastructure program. After spending $6 billion, by his own admission he has created 8,000 permanent jobs. That works out to $875,000 per job. He would have been far better off putting the money in the bank, taking the interest and giving it to the people, saying: "Do not bother going to work" because they would have had a lot more money. Ten per cent on $750,000 is $75,000 a year just by writing a cheque.

This type of policy is no good. It is not going to generate economic growth. It is not going to do anything for the lender. It is not going to make the lender more willing to give money to the small businessman. It is not going to make the small businessman accept any more risk because the successful small businessman is now going to end up paying an insurance premium through the lender into the government's pocket so it can bail out the guy who does not make it. That is just another tax on the competent and the successful small businessman who is trying to create jobs, pick the country up and generate some economic growth so we have a chance of digging ourselves out of the economic morass that the Liberal government and the Tory government have put us into.

The government talks about moving from this House and into cabinet the opportunity to make regulations. This is an affront to the powers of this House. We have seen a continuous and continual erosion of the powers we have in this House being passed over to the executive, to cabinet. Pretty soon the House will be an irrelevant debating society where we talk about these bills but have absolutely no control whatsoever over them.

If we approve this bill as it is being proposed, we are passing all the authority to cabinet. What good is that? When will the bill come back for public debate? When will we be able to find out that this bill is not working, that it is not creating jobs, except bureaucratic jobs? When? That is why this type of bill must be opposed at every opportunity.

As Reformers we believe in having accountability and responsibility. It is about time this Liberal government introduced some cost benefit analysis to tell us what in its opinion will be the outcome of the amendments it is proposing. How many jobs is it going to create in the civil service? How much is it going to cost the taxpayer? How many jobs will be created through this in the private sector? How much tax revenue will it produce? How many new jobs will it create in the small businesses that it intends to help?

Conversely, is this actually going to shut down jobs in the private sector? That is going to happen as we find it detracts from the motivation of small businessmen to borrow money through the Small Business Loans Act. The whole concept is recognizing that there are opportunities. A chance has to be taken. A risk has to be taken.

That risk is going to be avoided because the government says it does not have the money any more. It is going to skim the money off the successful entrepreneurs, channel it through the lenders back to use as write–offs on the bad loans and bad decisions. That is a dreadful decision.

In the last decade small business has accounted for the largest share of the net new job creation in the country. It employs almost half the labour force. Small businesses create eight out of every ten new jobs in Canada. They do it because of entrepreneurial spirit, not channelling money through the bureaucracy back out in some complex formula that Liberal members want to bring into cabinet so they can change and modify it if they so desire.

Give entrepreneurs freedom from rules and regulations. Give them freedom from red tape. Let them go out there and create jobs. By giving them the motivation and incentive to do so, unemployment will come down. New jobs will be created. Additional taxes will be paid without any tax increase. The deficit will come down. Our competitiveness will improve on the international stage. We will have all these things by getting the government out of the lives of small businessmen and women and not into it more at their expense.

The Department of Public Works and Government Services has found that small companies accounted for 79 per cent of the suppliers to the federal government in 1993–94 fiscal year. At least we are glad to see that the federal government recognizes that small business provides products that compete with the best in the world and are worth buying for the Government of Canada.

However, despite the excellent contribution small businesses make to the Canadian economy, the Liberals have not come through on their electoral promise to create a better environment for small business to work in.

I heard some comments from the other side of the House. I am sure they were not too complimentary on our position but I hope my remarks will cause them to think about the spirit of the bill. I would love to talk to them afterward and find out how they can see the logic and benefits in here.

• (1740)

These are the points I would like to make on this bill. I do not think that when it gets into committee and we hear witnesses—the banks that are going to be paying the fee to the government—that they will be complimentary. Some small businesses that use the program will be sceptical about why they should pay the premiums. Therefore, I hope the government will give some serious thought to redrafting the amendments to recognize that small business wants to provide the motivation.

I agree with the idea that the government should be involved in creating an environment for small business to create jobs. That is great. But the underlying philosophy here is that the government wants to be seen doing that but with the small businessman's money. On that point, I totally and absolutely disagree.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat astounded by the discussion of the member for St. Albert about the aspect of guarantees somehow being circulatory moneys that small business has to pay in order to support these loans.

Most of us understand the concept of bad debts. I understand the member is an accountant. We all understand that small businesses have accounts receivable and usually make provision for bad debt losses. Indeed, bad debt losses under the Small Business Loans Act have been very small. I think they average out at about 2 per cent.

The member does not seem to understand that in order for the government to protect itself from bad debt losses it needs to find a method to recover a certain amount of cash flow from successful loans. This is no different from any other normal business operation. These are the things I thought the Reform Party would applaud the government for because it is taking a business approach to lending.

The member does not seem to be able to understand the whole concept. It seems to elude him that somehow we are taking money from one pot and putting it into another at the behest of small business operators. Quite frankly, it is normal business practice and something for which the government should be applauded.

The member talked about creating jobs. This program has been around for a considerable length of time. We are now fine tuning it, allowing it to expand. The jobs the member talks about being created by the small business environment, in fact, were assisted by this program. Some of the great jobs he spoke about which have increased over the last number of years have been as a result of the small business loans program.

The member also talked about infrastructure spending and how it is a terrible waste of government money. If we look at the public assets and the whole concept of why there is public administration in the country, it is to build certain public assets that for whatever reason businesses did not want to build, such as airports, roads, sewer systems, et cetera. The member does not seem to understand that is still a commitment of government in most places in the country and it does create jobs.

I would like to ask the member whether he understands fully the concept of guarantees and of making provision for guarantees?

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to respond to the member who I understand is also an accountant.

The point I am trying to make is that the small business community is being provided this guarantee courtesy of themselves. It will have to pay for the guarantee. The successful entrepreneur will pay higher interest rates to the bank, which will in turn pay a fee back to the federal government, which will use the pot of money collected to reimburse the lenders for the bad decisions they make or for the loans that go sour and the small businessman who does not make it. The successful businessman will pay a premium to underwrite the bad debts incurred by the lenders.

This will no longer be an underwriting by the federal government. It states "loans program to full cost recovery". Therefore there will be no underwriting except a great paper war by the federal government. That is the point to which I am trying to object. There is no guarantee by the federal government. It is only a guarantee to be paid by the guy who wins to pay the guy who loses.

I know that up until now the federal government has picked up the tab for the losers who have not paid back their loans, and the winners have gone on to create jobs and build this economy. Now they will to be asked to do that with another chain around their legs as they try to climb up above high taxes, high interest rates which will be even higher now because they now have to pay the federal government, the high Canadian dollar and so on. How can we expect them to compete? That is the idiocy of this bill.

Getting to the member's other point on infrastructure, of course taxes pay for infrastructure. Of course we need infrastructure. However, the promise at the last election was jobs, jobs, jobs through the infrastructure program. The President of the Treasury Board said: "Six billion dollars netted us 8,000 permanent jobs". That, by simple math, is $750,000 per job, which is far more expensive than any job costs in the private sector.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was listening attentively to the member. I could not help but get frustrated when he kept referring to the small business men and women who failed as losers.

I would like to know how the member would propose that the banks, which administer this program, would choose who would get these small business loans in a way that there would be an absolutely perfect track record? What special insight or ability to judge entrepreneurship, what special formula does the member have that would allow him to never make a mistake on judging a small business person's ability to absolutely be—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. Albert.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, again the hon. member really has not applied his mind to the subject matter at hand.

Bankers incur losses and bad debts every year, billions worth. Their customers have to pay that through lower interest rates on deposits and higher interest rates on loans and they are required to make a profit in the meantime.

Let us take two lenders. One is a prudent lender who can make solid investment decisions and the other is careless and reckless and invests money not nearly as wisely. The one who is prudent and careful and analyses the lending applications his or her losses will be less. He or she may still have losses but they will be less.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): How do you know?

Mr. Williams: Because one is prudent and more careful and analyses the applications. The losses will be less. The customers will pay the premium, passed on through the interest rates. The borrower will pay a higher rate. The money will flow into the government coffers.

• (1750)

On the other side there is the reckless lender who is not too careful about the application he approves. His losses skyrocket. It will not cost the reckless lender any more money because he is reimbursed from the fund the government has. Now we are separating the risk and the reward because the prudent lender who analyses the applications will have lower losses, hence higher profits, and the reckless lender will not suffer any consequence of his recklessness with lending because he will be reimbursed by the successful entrepreneur who borrowed at a different bank.

That is the whole point I am trying to make. We are just moving this money from the successful borrower through the lender into the government's pocket to subsidize and reimburse the lender who makes the bad decisions, who lends the money to the business that may fail. That is the point I am trying to make. It is fairly clear, it is fairly simple and I hope the hon. member realizes that.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will try this one more time. The member talks about its being a simple concept. Indeed it is a very simple concept.

In his hometown I am sure there must be an insurance broker who in his daily operations will have a provision for doubtful accounts. It is a fact in the course of doing business. That insurance broker will say: "It is a normal operation that I will lose 2 per cent to 3 per cent of my accounts receivable every year. If I were so perfect as to have a 0 per cent, I would be a very unusual business; I would be a business that did not take any risk". Small business is about taking a certain degree of risk.

Those bad debt losses within that business are shared and borne by all the other customers by definition. Therefore there is nothing strange or unusual about the government's orientation to this and I am really quite surprised the member does not understand it.

Have I made it any clearer for the member?

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief and lucid. He used the example of an insurance broker. If the broker has 2 per cent or 3 per cent of his debts go bad which he has to account for, that is fine and he builds it into his margin. However, the point I am trying to make is why should he have to build into his margin an amount of money which is channelled through the government to reimburse his competitor across the street who may be reckless and have a 10 per cent bad debt situation? That makes no sense.

The Deputy Speaker: It being 5.53 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

NATIONAL HORSE OF CANADA ACT

Mr. Ian Murray (Lanark—Carleton, Lib.) moved that Bill C–329, an act to provide for the recognition of the Canadian Horse as the national horse of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have my private member's Bill C–329 reach the floor of the House of Commons today. Unfortunately the bill has not been chosen as a votable item, however it certainly represents a part of our history which deserves to be celebrated.

The purpose of the bill is to bring appropriate recognition to the Canadian horse, the official designation of the breed. I believe it is a symbol of Canadian heritage. I believe we should take every opportunity to celebrate those aspects of our history which make Canada unique.

There are several precedents for the kind of recognition I have proposed for the Canadian horse. Some years ago Parliament passed a bill which designated the beaver as Canada's national animal. Recently we recognized hockey and lacrosse as our national sports. That kind of celebration of our heritage is neither frivolous nor unimportant. We need more symbols to add to the rich tapestry which is Canada's history.

As we debate the bill today Canadians are watching with concern the debate taking place in Quebec which is so important to our future. When I introduced Bill C-329 I was well aware that the history of the Canadian horse began in New France, now the province of Quebec, and I believe if we embrace the goal of the bill it would make some small contribution to national unity.

Alex Hayward, a Canadian horse owner who lives near North Gower, Ontario, brought to my attention the idea of giving the Canadian horse national status through a private member's bill. Mr. Hayward grew up with the Canadian horse and insists "they can do everything but dance".

After researching this breed we did note in several documents that the Canadian horse was declared our national breed by Parliament on March 17, 1909. Unfortunately nowhere in the debates of Parliament could this be verified. Therefore I set out to bring some attention to a breed of horse which has worked our lands as far back as the 1600s.

The introduction of the Canadian horse to Canada dates back to King Louis XIV of France in 1665. The horses were delivered to the governor of New France at Stadacona, now known as Quebec City. King Louis felt a knight should not be without a horse, and the horses were presented as noble gifts in order to keep his colonists happy.

The exact breeding of this horse is unknown. It was not until 100 years later that accurate breeding records were kept by horse breeders. However, historians believe that the blood lines are from the Arabian, Barb and Andalusian stocks. In 1667 and 1670 further shipments of this horse were received and their numbers reached 12,000 strong by the year 1760.

It has been noted that the Canadian horse was the first to clear Canadian soil. This versatile breed cleared, ploughed and cultivated the soil. In addition they were used as carriage, riding and race horses. This small, swift, rugged and strong horse seldom reaches 1,100 pounds and is from 14.3 to 15.2 hands high. Therefore the average Canadian horse would be about five feet high.

As the years went on France was constantly at war and was unable to support its colony. For the next century and a half the horses in New France were bred and multiplied, with no outside blood lines changing the breed. However, when the British arrived in the late 1700s they brought with them other breeds of horse. Upon arrival of the British many French settlers moved on to Manitoba and the United States and took their Canadian horses with them.

The American civil war created great demand for cavalry mounts. The Canadian horse was the right size and was well known for its tough constitution. This made it well suited to the hardship and rigours of war. Exports from Canada increased greatly and prices were very high. Many horses were killed in the war and those that survived never returned to Canada. By the late 18th century these factors threatened the continuation of the Canadian horse and so action was taken then to preserve this fine breed.

In 1885 a stud book was started to keep accurate records of the breed and in 1895 the Canadian Horse Breeders Association was formed. The federal ministry of agriculture maintained a breeding centre from 1913 until the second world war forced its closure in 1940. The Canadian horse has supplied foundation stock to many breeds, in particular the Morgan and the standardbred. It has been estimated that by 1850 half of the horses in Canada carried some trace of Canadian blood.

In The Canadian Horse by Gladys Mackey Beattie the strength and endurance of the breed are well described. There are recorded instances of Canadian horses trotting from Quebec city to Montreal and from Montreal to Cornwall, stopping only when their drivers needed refreshment.

Another example was noted in the Breeders Gazette of Chicago written in 1914: "A wood merchant, owner of Canadian horse weighing approximately 1,050 pounds, harnessed it on the same pole beside another horse, 200 pounds heavier. The Canadian horse always kept its harness traces well stretched and never showed as much fatigue as its heavier mate. After two years of common work, the heavy horse died. Questioned on the cause of this death, the driver answered 'It is the Canadian horse that made him die of overwork'. Another heavy horse teamed with the same Canadian horse died after a year and the Canadian was still in perfect condition".

We should also pay tribute to that small band of Canadian horse breeders past and present, without whom this important part of our heritage would have been lost. In this respect I would like to thank Alex Hayward and his friend, the late Don Prosperine, from Dunrobin, Ontario, which is in my riding of Lanark—Carleton. Those two gentlemen decided in 1978 to become partners in a project to breed the Canadian horse. They spent a year and a half searching in Quebec for suitable specimens. From their beginning with one stallion and two mares their stock increased to 28 Canadians. Don Prosperine's son, Frank, continues the family tradition on his farm in Dunrobin where he has 18 Canadians.

In conclusion, I want to thank those of my colleagues who have shown an interest in this part of our heritage and who are taking part in the debate today. I also want to thank the people from across Canada who wrote their member of Parliament in support of Bill C–329. Finally, congratulations to the Canadian Horse Breeders Association as it celebrates its centennial this year.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his words on the Canadian horse. From what I have read about this horse it seems like an outstanding candidate for the title of national horse of Canada.

The hon. member has talked about the history of this animal: how it came from France; its ability to stand up in Canada's cold weather and the varied seasons; its strength and its intelligence. All of those things are wonderful. It is a lot like Canadians in that sense. For that reason I cannot say anything against the bill. I do not have a problem with the Canadian horse or even with the concept of having a national horse for Canada.

However, I am wondering, when we are six days away from a referendum on the break–up of the country, why we are talking about these types of issues. It is an issue which the hon. member could handle in a member's statement or in a letter writing campaign. There are ways of handling these types of issues.

Frankly, when we are bringing Private Members' Business to the House of Commons, it should be a little more relevant to the national agenda. For crying out loud, in six days we are going to have a referendum about the break–up of the country. That is the type of thing members should be bringing to Private Members' Business to discuss. There is no reason in the world we could not have had a bill today regarding the devolution of powers and how that might affect Canada and the possibility that Quebec would remain in the country. There is absolutely no reason we could not have had that debate.

All kinds of excellent legislation has come from private members. That is the type of thing we should see in this hour.

We have a debt of some $560 billion and it is going up $90 million a day. It will be going up more now that interest rates will be spiked as a result of all the uncertainty over the Quebec referendum. To me, that is the type of thing we should reserve this time for.

Last night on television I saw that a transit worker was stabbed to death in Toronto. He was the first ever transit worker to be murdered in Toronto. This Ontario member could have brought forward legislation to deal with that type of thing.

I truly do not want to denigrate what the hon. member has done. However, I believe that Private Members' Business should be set aside for things which are more germane to the public agenda in Canada. I know that Canadians are outraged at some of the things which are going on and that nothing is being done. We cannot prod the government to do it, so let us prod private members to do it. Let us get them to bring forward the legislation.

There are 97 or 98 government MPs from Ontario in the House. The hon. member brought forward a bill to make the Canadian horse the national horse of Canada. Fine. But a lot more essential legislation could have come forward to deal with the issues I have just talked about.

• (1805)

Would it not be great if a Toronto MP, along with 19 or 20 other Toronto MPs, brought forward legislation to deal with crime. We could point to the example of what happened in Toronto the other night, where we saw that man stabbed to death on TV. It was outrageous. We have to do something about those types of things. We cannot continue like that.

In small ways almost every day we are seeing the erosion of the rule of law, not the breakdown, but the erosion in a lot of ways. Some people are becoming so disrespectful for the rule of law. Let us have legislation to deal with that sort of thing.

Another thing we could be dealing with today and it would help the hon. member and his cause, would be to see Parliament and individual parliamentarians bring forward legislation through Private Members' Business to free up MPs to vote the wishes of their constituents on certain pieces of legislation. There is no reason in the world that we could not have legislation like there is in Britain today. They can defeat their own government's bill without bringing down the government. In other words, there would be a motion of non–confidence after defeating a specific piece of legislation.

Imagine how Canadians would feel about their House if that is what happened here. It would be astounding. It would be a revolution. People would have new confidence in this place. As politicians, I think members across the way would agree that we have a vested interest in doing what we can to improve the very poor reputation of politicians. That would go a long way to doing that.

One thing we could bring forward is balanced budget legislation. The situation today is that we are going in the hole approximately $19 million a day. Every day that goes by we go into the hole a little further. To me that is absolutely immoral when we consider the effect it will have on our children.

I have two boys back home; one is seven and one is eleven. Many members have young children. It is really immoral for us to be living today at their expense. We must move quickly if we are to be worthy of our title as parliamentarians to make sure that comes to an end. We have to quit spending them into poverty down the road.

I do not want to talk for a long time. I want to say again that Private Members' Business should be set aside for very important issues, for issues that are important to the country as a whole.

I appreciate the argument that this horse is part of our heritage. I also know and the member has noted that this horse was recognized by cabinet I believe in 1909. I would argue that because of the fact that the horse already has the title Canadian horse, because of its proud history, we have certainly already given it a lot of profile. I would argue that there are other ways, through statements under Standing Order 31, through a letter campaign to other MPs, through recognition by provincial legislatures and that kind of thing that we could make the point.

I will conclude by thanking the hon. member for his initiative. I also encourage members across the way, in my own party and in the Bloc, to bring forward the best possible and most important legislation they can think of when they deem it appropriate to bring a bill forward through Private Members' Business.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the bill to provide for the recognition of the Canadian horse as the national horse of Canada affects many Quebecers and particularly breeders. It is therefore a pleasure for us to represent them by taking part in this debate.

In perusing Bill C–329, we learn that the horse was sent by the King of France, was invaluable to settlers in their efforts to survive and prosper. We learn that the horse has a number of fine qualities, including strength, endurance, intelligence and good temper.

We also learn that it was nearly lost at one point through interbreeding and casualties in war. Allow me to add a few points, because I believe it is important to understand the history of this exceptional animal and see how it developed.

• (1810)

The very first horse to touch the soil in New France arrived in Quebec City on June 25, 1647. At that time it was called the Canadian horse, and there were no horses in this part of North America. The region's dense and broad forests effectively prevented crossbreeding with other types of horses. There was no possibility of interbreeding with the breeds of horse brought in by the English and by the Spaniards in the south.

It was only after 1759 that export to the United States and crossbreeding with other types of horse became a possibility, and the numbers of the purebred Canadian horse began to decrease.

Sometime around 1880, faced with the real threat of the breed's disappearance, people decided to act. Quebecers like François Pilote, Édouard Barnard and, particularly, Dr. J.A. Couture, a veterinarian, decided to ensure the species' survival by selecting and breeding the best of the remaining horses. Dr. Couture, among others, gathered in a breed book all of the subjects combining the breed's distinctive characteristics to ensure their protection.

Thus, through this brief history, we can see that the Canadian horse arrived and was bred in Quebec. Those who raised and trained them were the inhabitants of what would become Quebec. These same people took steps to ensure that this symbol of strength and pride would not disappear from our continent.

In the light of these facts, it would be a good idea perhaps for any future recognition of this horse as the national horse to contain greater reference to Quebecers' contribution to its survival and conservation.

Furthermore, since the government of Quebec is currently considering a similar request, it seems more in keeping with history that any recognition of this breed as a national emblem should come from the Quebec National Assembly rather than from the House of Commons.

[English]

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter the debate on Bill C–329 to recognize the Canadian horse.

I must admit I am not knowledgeable about horse breeding. One of my constituents brought the bill to my attention. As I read over the history of this horse in Canada, I realized it is part of our identity, part of our cultural history. The member from the Reform Party who went into great dissertation about the irrelevance of the legislation, I believe, misses the very important point that cultural identity is what makes a nation.

Looking at the history of this horse, in 1665 it originally came from the royal stables of King Louis XIV. It was situated in New France. During that time the breed strengthened and became larger until 1759 at the time of the collapse of New France.

It is interesting to study political economics. It is something I have always been fascinated with. There is always so much concern about what happened on the Plains of Abraham in revisiting our history of those days. If we were to study the history of New France prior to the Wolfe–Montcalm battles, we would discover an economy that was rampant with inflation, high debt and high unemployment. It is interesting that these are some of the very problems we have today.

After the collapse of that economy, many French speaking people of New France left the province. They went to Manitoba.

• (1815)

Do we see any similarities between some of these things and some of the debates that are happening in our House today? The Canadian horse typifies Canada itself, often struggling against tremendous forces of nature and social situations, sometimes becoming almost extinct, and from the brink of that extinction fighting back, becoming stronger, becoming more proficient.

I often like to view art. The members of the Reform Party do not seem to have much interest in art. If we go to the National Gallery we will see a number of paintings there by Cornelius Krieghoff. Cornelius Krieghoff of course was not a Quebecer, but he painted at the time of New France. In those pictures you will constantly see the Canadian horse. That is very much part of our cultural identity. That is also why it is very important that this nation continue to exist, because we have something very special to protect. A horse clearly cannot run on three legs. The Canadian horse is not just part of Quebec; it is part of all of Canada.

As a previous speaker has mentioned, there is quite a breeding operation not far from the Hill, in North Gower. When I read the background of this horse, that also rang a familiar bell with me, because the last time I went horseback riding was in North Gower.

In conclusion, in looking at the struggles this horse has been through, it is very appropriate that he is called the Canadian horse. More important, it is incumbent upon us in this House to look at those things that make us a nation rather than those things that divide us.

The struggle for Canada in this part of North America has not always been easy and has often been met by trials and tribulations and indeed death. Often our concern in this country was to protect ourselves from the Americans south of the border through wars and now even the consistency of cultural identity in Canada. We continue to resist the imposition of American culture in our society and we continue to strive for the dominance that is Canada's culture. This horse is a symbol of that.

I am very happy to support this bill. I want to remind some of my colleagues in the House that we must always fight for a united Canada.

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to have this opportunity to speak on the bill before the House by my colleague from Lanark—Carleton, Bill C–329, an act to recognize the Canadian horse as the national horse of Canada.

The history of this breed is impressive. The Canadian horse was introduced into Canada in 1665, when the King of France sent horses from his own stables to the people in his North American colony. The breed thrived and multiplied in its new home from 145 head in 1679 to over 5,000 in 1720, in that short period of time.

The history of the Canadian horse is also the history of Canada's agricultural pioneers. These animals became an invaluable ally to the settlers in their efforts to survive and prosper in their new homes.

I want to talk about this for a minute, because I found it very interesting. When the member from the third party was here he said we should be talking about more important things in the House right now. We have a motto on my farm back home. The motto is very simply this: mindful of the past, planning for the future. It goes to show members how important our history is to us in this country. If we have no past, we really do not have much to look forward to in the future.

In these days of tractors and modern machinery, when a farmer goes out to plough his field he hops into a 100–plus horsepower tractor that is pulling anywhere from six to ten furrows behind him in an air conditioned cab. He is listening to the radio and the markets as he is doing his job. However, back in the days of the Canadian horse, a farmer went out and had a single furrow in front of him, the horse in front of him, the reins around his neck, two hands on the handles, and he went out ploughing.

Today, with the equipment we have we can plough 15 to 20 acres a day. Back then, a farmer ploughing a field with a horse in front of him could do two acres a day. Members might be interested to know that for every acre he ploughed behind a horse he had to walk 10 miles. For the farmer to do two acres a day he would walk 20 miles. I should be getting more exercise like this.

The horse has always been there. I come from Grey county in Ontario. When the surveys of Grey county were first being done there were two surveys. One was called Rankin and the other was called Trainer. The distance from Owen Sound down to Hamilton is about 150 to 180 miles. When these gentlemen were setting out the surveys to lay out the townships and the roads and everything in the early 1800s, which does not seem all that long ago, the fields were not there. It was all covered with forests. These gentlemen came with backpacks and horses from Owen Sound. They worked their way down and set up food caches all the way through. They came from Hamilton and worked their way up so they could start to do these surveys. The surveys took quite a while.

When the surveys were done, of course, there was still a forest to clean away so we could get into agriculture with open fields. The horse was there again. The farmers were cutting down trees and were using horses to pull those trees and stumps away.

This summer I was up in Collingwood, which is part of my riding. They have a fair called the Great Northern Exhibition. They show horses. It is part of our heritage, our past. I watched and handed out trophies this year for the horse pulls. It is a very competitive atmosphere.

In my own village of Holstein, we have a Santa Claus parade every year. One of the prerequisites to be in that parade is to have a horse–drawn float. There are Mennonites and Old Order Mennonites in my area who use horse–drawn equipment, the horse and buggy, the democrat. Maybe the pages do not know what a democrat is. It is a long wagon affair with a number of seats in it, which a sizeable family can sit in. Some of these families have eight to ten kids, all behind the horse.

In the Depression years our family lived on a farm. We had a large stand of timber on the farm and we sold wood. How did we get it to town? We hauled it with a horse. This was all part of agriculture.

The Canadian horse is known for its strength and endurance. There have been a number of historical accounts of the horse's performance and ability to outperform animals of much greater size. I am talking about Belgians and Percherons, horses of that kind, which are sizeable horses when you get beside them. Never get stepped on by one. I did when I was a child.

One story tells of a butcher who hooked his Canadian horse to a buggy and travelled 250 kilometres from Quebec City to Montreal in less than 12 hours, outracing the overnight steamer that was racing against him to collect an unpaid bill.

There was another account from the Breeder's Gazette of Chicago in 1914. I think the hon. member touched on this, but I will say it again, because we have to show how good the Canadian horse is. It is not very often that we in this House beat our own drum on how good we are as Canadians. I think we should do it more often. The Canadian horse is a good example. A wood merchant was the owner of a Canadian horse weighing approximately 1,050 pounds. He harnessed it to the same pull against another horse about 200 pounds heavier. The Canadian horse was always kept in its harness traces, well stretched and never showed as much fatigue as his heavier mate. After two years of common work the heavier horse died. "The question on the cause of death", the driver answered, "is the Canadian horse made him die of overwork".

That goes to show how good this breed is that we are trying to recognize as something that is Canadian. Canada should be very proud too because as a united country we are number one in the world today. Again I have to stress the fact that my colleague from the third party seems to miss this point. I find it unfortunate that he and my Bloc colleagues they do not understand how good they have it right now.

Despite its qualities the Canadian horse almost faced extinction through inbreeding and neglect. In 1886 a few admirers banded together to establish a breed registry or a stud book listing all the purebreds.

In 1907 a second book was opened and the federal department of agriculture funded a panel of judges to survey approximately 2,500 horses, out of which only 969 were acceptable and registered as foundation stock. That is how close we were to losing the Canadian horse.

Between 1913 and 1981 the federal and Quebec governments launched programs to maintain the breed. However, in 1976 with only 383 Canadian horses left on record, once again the horse was destined to disappear. This is what the hon. member across was talking about, this resiliency of Canadians. We bounce back. We will bounce back. We always do bounce back. The Canadian horse is a good example of this.

During the past 10 years there has been a resurgence of interest in the breed. People are rediscovering the little iron horse. Is that not a great way of describing a symbol of Canada, the little iron horse. It is a gentle hardworking breed, an intelligent, multi–purpose horse. There are breeders in my riding of Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe that have written to me to proudly describe these animals, which is one of the reasons I am here today supporting the member's bill.

This bill provides us with an opportunity to celebrate this uniquely Canadian horse. We owe much to it for its hard work in developing this country and I encourage all the members to support this bill.

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today to speak in favour of Bill C–329, an act to provide for the recognition of the Canadian horse as the national horse of Canada.

Since their introduction into Canada in 1665, the "little iron horses" have served Canadians well. Not only were they used for driving and riding but they were also used for clearing land, cultivating and hauling. They may have begun their lives as pampered pets in the royal stables of King Louis XIV but once they were shipped to Canada they had to earn their keep.

The early history of the Canadian horse in some ways resembles that of the colonists themselves. In her pictorial history of the Canadian horse, Gladys Mackey Beattie notes that due to natural selection, only the strongest managed to survive. The conditions under which they had to exist gave them endurance found in no other breed.

Over time the horses became smaller in size than the original imports, but they were much more hardy, could thrive on meagre rations, trot tirelessly through mud or snow by day or night, matured at an early age and were long lived as well. Many stories are told of the strength and stamina of the little horses who could eat less but do more work than other horses almost twice their weight, and they could run. The record books of the 1800s are full of references to record times of the pacers and trotters descended from Canadian horses.

The historian, Faillon, described the horse as "small but robust, hocks of steel, thick mane floating in the wind, bright and lively eyes, pricking sensitive ears at the least noise, going along day or night with the same courage, wide awake beneath its harness, spirited, good, gentle, affectionate, following his road with finest instinct to come surely to his own stable". What fitting attributes for a national symbol.

Another reason to recognize this uniquely Canadian breed as our national horse is its need for protection and encouragement. Throughout history, despite its strength and stamina and sometimes because of it, this little horse has often been in real danger of extinction. After 1670, the last year that horses were shipped to Canada as gifts to nobility, the 40–odd horses in New France multiplied. Their numbers reached 5,200 by 1720 and 12,000 by 1760. However when the British captured Quebec in 1759 the fortunes of the Canadian horse began to decline. British immigrants brought their own horses and bred them to the durable little Canadians, depleting the purebred stock.

Many French Canadians packed up and moved away to Manitoba or the United States, taking their horses prized for their cross breeding qualities with them. From 1861 to 1865 thousands of Canadian horses were shipped to the U.S. to be used as cavalry mounts and pack horses during the American civil war. A great many died in the war and those that survived never returned to Canada.

By the end of the 19th century only a small number of pure blooded Canadian horses were left. Despite breeding programs only 383 registered Canadian horses were on record as of 1976, and the future of the breed seemed pretty dark. Since the late 1970s determined Canadian horse lovers and breeders who believe it is a perfect all–purpose family horse have increased the numbers to the point where the breed is no longer in danger of disappearing.

As gentle, relaxed and intelligent as they are, some breeders believe they will be in greater and greater demand for tourist activities from endurance trail rides to pulling visitors through the narrow streets of our oldest cities.

However until now the horse that can "do everything but dance" has certainly not received the recognition and honour it deserves. The little iron horse was an integral part of the lives of Canadians more than 300 years ago, working alongside our first colonists and doubling as carriage horses for the family and race horses on Sundays and holidays.

All in all it is what J. G. Rutherford, federal veterinary director and livestock commissioner, reportedly testified before a parliamentary committee in 1909 when he said that it was "the best general purpose horse raised in Canada".

It is high time we recognize it as Canada's official national horse and I thank my hon. colleague from Lanark—Carleton for bringing it to the attention of the House.

The Deputy Speaker: There being no further members rising to speak on the matter, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has expired and the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being 6.35 p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, October 25 marks the second anniversary of our government's election. Two years ago, Canadians across the country decided to elect a government that reflected them, one they trusted.

The popular support our government has enjoyed in these past 24 months demonstrates clearly our ability to identify the public's real needs. The challenges are considerable. We are working tirelessly to put the economy back on track and we are confident we will make good all of our campaign commitments by the end of our mandate.

Canadians want the changes we support, and we are sure that, if we continue to work together, Canada will long remain the best country in the world.

REFORM PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, two years ago today, on October 25, 1993, the people of Canada sent 52 Reform MPs to Ottawa. They did so because we as a party promised to put their interests as constituents first. Today my Reform colleagues and I thank our constituents for helping us to keep that promise.

A special thanks goes out to the people of Lethbridge constituency for participating in the first leg of my annual fall tour. In places like Diamond City, Picture Butte, Nobleford and Milk River they talked about issues that were important to them, things like jobs, pensions, agriculture and certainly the referendum.

They told me about their hopes and their fears. They reminded me what it meant to be their representative in Ottawa. The main streets and the coffee shops of southern Alberta are a long way from Parliament Hill.

Many of my constituents will never have the opportunity to visit the nation's capital, but the Reform Party believes that by effectively representing their interests in this House of Commons we will be able to bridge that distance.

The Speaker: I have not been able to say this for a long time but thank you, Mr. Speaker.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I would like to appeal to all my fellow Canadians in Quebec who may be thinking of voting yes on October 30 as a way of protesting against the policies of this federal Liberal government, against this Prime Minister, against the corporate agenda, against the current constitutional impasse, whatever, to think again.

Governments and prime ministers come and go. What is in the interests of all of us and the world is that Canada remain and that progressive Canadians stand shoulder to shoulder in defence of social justice in the Canada we built together in the last 50 years.

We have been an example to the world. Let us not commit the sin of sowing despair when we should be sowing hope, for what hope is there for others who are not so richly blessed if Canadians cannot find a way to live together.

I have always believed that Canada has a mission to be a light to the nations and that Quebec in Canada was integral to that mission. The rest of Canada has not always nurtured that light but that light for the next few days is in the care and keeping of Quebecers alone. I appeal to them not to snuff it out.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, MMT is the only available gasoline additive in Canada that can reduce nitrogen oxide emissions by as much as 20 per cent. These emissions cause urban smog.

A ban on MMT would have the effect of adding one million cars to Canadian roads by the year 2000. MMT lets Canadian refiners use less intensive refining which also cuts down on other types of emissions that hurt the environment. In Saint John which has the biggest oil refinery in Canada this is important.

The environment minister with Bill C–94 wants to remove MMT from Canadian gas because she says it will harmonize Canada's standards with the U.S. where MMT is not used. She has also stated that automakers claim that MMT harms their onboard diagnostic systems. Independent studies and American courts have said that there is no such link. Within weeks MMT will be used in U.S. refineries.

I ask the minister to stop Bill C–94 as Canada's gasoline standards would no longer be—

The Speaker: The hon. member for York—Simcoe.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the efforts of the no side during the referendum campaign.

The federalists have been responsible. We have presented a dream to Canadians. Our dream is of pluralism and tolerance. We want a Canada where our children learn to work together rather than build walls and become isolationists.

As of today we are witnessing a massive outpouring of love and support for the people of Quebec for a united Canada. People from all over Canada, including my riding of York—Simcoe, will be flocking by the thousands to Montreal on Friday to show their support for unity.

David Ducharm and Andrew Douris along with many other school children presented me with a petition calling for Quebec to remain part of Canada.

Better opportunity for our children and for the greater good of humanity is what federalism offers. For the sake of our children, for the love of our children, let us keep Canada together.

BILINGUALISM

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the number of Canadians learning French has increased enormously in the past fifteen years. Thanks to the policy on bilingualism, thousands of young people across Canada are learning French. At first, the debate was fierce, but, little by little, Canadians learned the importance of bilingualism and of the French language.

And so, immersion classes started throughout Canada, and, in British Columbia, 3,000 kilometres from Quebec, many anglophone parents decided their children would learn the second language of their country and join with francophones outside Quebec, who speak both English and French. We have come a long way. The policy on bilingualism has served our country well, and I would like to join the many Canadians who believe in a bilingual Canada and who continue to live together in harmony despite their race, colour and beliefs, and believe in a united Canada.

"Mon Canada inclut le Québec". My Canada includes Quebec.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on October 30, Quebecers will make a very important choice: saying yes to separation and to Canada's break–up or saying no to separation and to Canada's break–up. Canadians from all the other provinces hope that when the people of Quebec make their democratic decision, they will choose to remain in Canada.

The people in my riding of London—Middlesex feel that a majority of Quebecers will want to remain an integral part of this country we have built together. We think that they will vote no.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, at the No side rally in Verdun last night, the Prime Minister of Canada confirmed that he had nothing to offer Quebecers who are calling for change.

• (1405)

The Prime Minister of Canada is asking the people to trust him and says that he will never agree to any constitutional change without Quebec's consent. But how can we trust this man who, in 1982, agreed to the unilateral patriation of the constitution without Quebec's consent?

As Lysiane Gagnon wrote in today's La Presse: "It is too little, too late. Weeks and years too late".

In the past few days, the no side has begged Canada to help it out, but its appeals have been in vain. At the very last minute, a panicky Prime Minister of Canada has entered the referendum campaign with empty hands. It is too little, too late. Quebecers will not be fooled; they will vote yes next Monday.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. John Cummins (Delta, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadian historian Desmond Morton maintains that a nation is a people who have done things together in the past. It is not bound by language or by a common culture but by a shared experience.

We are a prosperous, peaceful and tolerant society. Most significantly in the words of Jacques Hébert: "Quebec and its differences have been accepted since 1867 within a federation that is the most decentralized in the world, precisely to accommodate Quebec's differences, its distinctive language and education systems, its civil code".

Nevertheless, the separatists would diminish what our forefathers have built, a nation which is the envy of the world, a nation which because it is what it is, continues to be a country of choice for many of the world's less fortunate.

Last June, the leader of the Reform Party cautioned that we cannot stand by passively and allow Quebec voters to make a decision without a vigorous defence of Canada, including a positive federalist alternative to the status quo.

It is time we trumpeted the virtues of this land in which we have been blessed to live.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on October 30 the people of Quebec will be called upon to make the most important decision in the history of their province and this country, that being should Quebec separate, yes or no?

[Translation]

Canadians from coast to coast want Quebec to remain an integral part of Canada.

[English]

The last thing francophones across this great country want is for their nation to disintegrate. Many francophones from my riding of Thunder Bay—Atikokan have communicated to me the sadness they would feel should Quebec separate.

The constituents of my riding plead to all Quebecers to reflect on the virtues of Canada and to preserve our national unity. I am confident that as Quebecers look back on their lives as Canadians, they will see mostly benefits and positive experiences.

[Translation]

Our country was born of two cultures who share a sense of family. We may all be different from one another but, at the end of the day, we are still one big family.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Ms. Maria Minna (Beaches—Woodbine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to acknowledge and commend the hard work of two young men from my riding of Beaches—Woodbine.

Sean Lee Popham and Jesse Moore, two students from Malvern Collegiate, have circulated a petition to over 100 schools across Canada. This petition supports a united Canada and rejects any attempt to separate Quebec from the rest of Canada. Sean and Jesse's petition now has over 3,000 signatures from student leaders in both territories and all of Canada's 10 provinces, including Quebec.

Student Councils for a United Canada was created at the 1995 Canadian Student Leadership Conference in Bathurst, New Brunswick. Now more than ever it is important that their message be heard.

The young people of Canada do not want to see this country broken up. They want a secure and prosperous future for themselves and for the young people of tomorrow. Their message to Quebec is this: Say no to the break up of our nation and say yes to a strong, united Canada.

PARTNERSHIP

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Quebec is at a crossroads. To ensure their future, the people of Quebec must take their destiny back into their own hands. In this context, the mandate for sovereignty that Quebecers will be giving their government next Monday must not be construed as a rejection of Canada, but rather as the will to assume responsibility for themselves. Over the years, the people of Quebec and Canada have developed strong bonds of friendship, and they have many interests in common.

A partnership would be in everyone's best interests, since more than 300,000 jobs on each side are at stake. Partnerships are clearly the way of the future.

On October 30, Quebecers will not only take their destiny into their own hands but also hold out a friendly hand to their Canadian partners.

FRANCO–ONTARIANS

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, after being insulted last week, when the Bloc member for Rimouski—Témiscouata said: "The francophones—poof!", we, Franco–Ontarians, have decided to speak up. After countless press conferences and all kinds of protests, the French speaking community of Ontario is now mobilizing and organizing a rally to be held tomorrow at La Cité collégiale, in Ottawa. This rally will be an opportunity to proudly show that the French language is alive and well in Ontario and that La Francophonie wants Quebec to remain in Canada.

Tomorrow, it will be our turn, as francophones living in Ontario, to say "Poof!" to everyone who wants us gone for the sake of justifying Quebec's separation.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in a speech to thousands of supporters of the no side, the Prime Minister told Quebecers that he is not opposed to future change in Canada if they vote no.

The Reform Party has long called for renewed federalism without constitutional change. To this end it has put forward a 20–point plan to modernize and decentralize Canada.

By adopting the Reform Party policy paper on a new confederation, all of the provinces of Canada would benefit from a decentralization of powers. Furthermore, the 20–point plan would allow for reform of our institutions and could be made, bringing greater representation to the people and the regions of Canada.

Most important, by adopting the plan, the changes could be made without comprehensive federal–provincial negotiations, such as the Meech Lake or the Charlottetown accords.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all Canadians, I want to point out that voting no does not mean voting for the status quo.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Prime Minister said: "Voting no means rejecting separation. It does not mean that we give up anything regarding the Canadian constitution. We will keep open all the other paths for change, including the administrative and constitutional ones".

On Monday, Quebecers will decide not only the future of Quebec, but also, indirectly, the future of Canada.

Quebec's claims are increasingly echoed by a number of other provinces.

The changes that many of our fellow citizens have been hoping for can only be achieved by voting no. We are confident that, on October 30, Quebecers will say no to the break–up of Canada and that they will choose to continue to work to improve our great country.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this week, the Prime Minister's cynicism has reached new heights. After claiming that he always supported the distinct society concept, when in fact he fought against its inclusion in the Meech Lake accord, the Prime Minister said yesterday, in a speech in Verdun, that any constitutional change affecting Quebec would only be made with the consent of Quebecers.

This absurd statement from the very person who imposed the Canadian Constitution on Quebecers, when the Quebec Liberal Party and the Parti Quebecois were jointly opposed to it, shows that the no side is panic stricken.

Quebecers will no longer be taken in by such equivocation. On October 30, they will vote yes to denounce the patriation of the constitution imposed to them in 1982 by the current Prime Minister of Canada. Quebecers will vote yes to be on an equal footing to negotiate from a unified platform. On October 30, they will vote yes to give themselves a country.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the no side held a very important rally in Verdun. A large number of people came to hear the leaders of the no side talk about Canada's future after the referendum.

These thousands of Quebecers were elated to hear their leaders reaffirm their profound attachment to Canada, as well as their confidence regarding our country's future.

Canada is in constant evolution. Voting no in the referendum will allow that evolution to continue in light of what Quebec and the other provinces are calling for. However, voting yes would mean the break–up and the end of Canada. But Quebecers do not want that and they will vote no.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in a speech to his supporters in the referendum campaign, the Prime Minister made an about–face and promised Quebecers change as an incentive to vote no in the upcoming referendum.

My question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Would she agree that these last minute promises, made in a panic by the Prime Minister a week from the referendum, sound very familiar to Quebecers who remember the referendum in 1980?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister of Canada explained his point of view to all those who believe in the no side, saying how serious the situation and the choice made on October 30 were for the future of our country, and that this was a choice Quebecers had never had to make before in their entire history, because just one vote would mean the break–up of Canada.

So the Prime Minister urged all Quebecers to think carefully before they voted, to think carefully about what Canada is today, what Quebecers are today, before they go and vote. That was basically the Prime Minister's message last night.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing the complete about–face made by the Prime Minister.

I therefore want to ask the Minister of Labour why Quebecers should trust someone who made promises to them last night, when only last Sunday in New York, he bluntly rejected the demands of Daniel Johnson, the chair of the no committee? Why should we trust the man who betrayed Quebec in 1982?

The Speaker: Once again, my dear colleagues, I would ask you to be very careful about your choice of words used in both questions and answers.

This is a question and answer period, so I hope we can keep reasonably calm.

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unlike the hon. member for Roberval, the Prime Minister of Canada is aware of the gravity of the situation and does not take the destruction of this country lightly.

This country is not just any country. It is the best country in the world. And the Prime Minister of Canada has always been a proud francophone, a proud Quebecer and a proud Canadian. In this, he is like the majority of Quebecers who are proud to be Quebecers but are also attached to their country, Canada. That is where the Bloc Quebecois is wrong.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the editorial writer for the Daily Gleaner in Fredericton wrote the following on Monday: "At the beginning of the referendum, the rest of Canada was asked to remain silent". In return for that silence, assurances were given that there would be no promise of constitutional change for Quebec.

• (1420)

Does the Minister of Labour agree that this revelation of an agreement between the Prime Minister of Canada and people in the other provinces outside Quebec is strangely similar to what happened that night in 1980, when Quebec was betrayed by the same man, the same—

The Speaker: I want to ask the hon. member for Roberval to please change the word he used. I would appreciate it if this word were not used in the House of Commons.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, to conform to your instructions, I will change the word I used. So is this not strangely similar to what happened at a time Quebecers remember with sadness in their hearts, when they had problems with the same man, in the same way, with the same players and for the same reasons?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, oddly enough, in this referendum campaign, the three leaders who want the break up of this country had to sign an agreement among themselves. It is the only written agreement in this referendum campaign. On the other side, we have Quebecers who do not want the break–up of this country, and to share the same goal, we do not need an agreement in writing.

If there is anyone today who could not care less about the distinct society concept that we as Quebecers support, it is the leader of the yes side who said in no uncertain terms: "To hell with a distinct society. We want a country". That is what the choice is about on October 30. It is about the break–up of Canada as we know it today, and that is why it is such a serious matter.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister made the following statement, and I quote: "Any changes in constitutional jurisdiction will only be made with the consent of Quebecers". This somewhat ambiguous statement is devoid of any meaning; moreover, the Prime Minister took great care not to pronounce the words "right of veto", but rather allowed the idea to circulate without ever stating it.

Will the Minister of Labour confirm that the Prime Minister's statement does not in any way constitute a right of veto as Quebec has always understood and demanded it, but is instead a vague promise that is more or less devoid of meaning?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think this is evidence of a lack of desire to properly understand what the Prime Minister of Canada said yesterday. The Prime Minister of Canada was very clear about the distinct society and said that he accepted it.

He was very clear in stating that the constitutional changes affecting Quebec will be made after consultation with Quebec-

ers. He was very clear in stating that this country is undergoing a very great transformation in preparation for the 21st century and that his heartfelt wish is that Quebecers will participate fully in these changes for the 21st century. That was the Prime Minister's message.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is not being very clear. What she was asked involved the right to veto, changes with the consent of Quebecers, these being the words of the Prime Minister, but as usual she is not answering the question. I shall attempt another.

Can the Minister of Labour tell us what reassurance there is for Quebecers in such a statement by the Prime Minister, when in 1992 he overrode the virtually unanimous opposition of the parties represented in the Quebec National Assembly, including the Liberal Party of Quebec, of which she was not so very long ago a member, and the leader of the present Liberal Party had voted against unilateral patriation of the Constitution? This Prime Minister was therefore identifying himself as a Quebecer at the time, and Quebecers were represented at that time by 74 Liberal members in the House of Commons. How can there be any confidence in a person who has reneged on his commitment to Quebec?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the present Prime Minister of Canada is very aware of the whole constitutional history of this country. He is also well aware of what has happened in Quebec. He understands very well, too, the disappointment some Quebecers may have felt at certain points in the history of this country. For the past two years, however, this Prime Minister has been leading this country; let us look at what he has done in those two years to respond to the needs of all Canadians, to respond to their concerns, their needs.

When the Prime Minister of Canada speaks, I feel that we can judge him very well by the actions he has undertaken in the past two years as the Prime Minister of this country. He did not govern by "referendum" for the past two years; he has acted, and he has governed this country.

FEDERAL SPENDING

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the separatists say that Canada cannot change and will not change but Reformers insist Canada is going to change, and without the help of constitutional lawyers and the federal-provincial wrangling they bring.

One of the real changes Quebec and every other province wants is a limit on federal spending. It is unchecked federal spending that has led to federal encroachment in areas of provincial jurisdiction, huge deficits and debt and a staggering tax burden for all Canadians. Legislation is required to limit federal spending power.

My question is for the finance minister. Is the federal government open to that kind of change, simply limiting federal spending power, a practical change that can be accomplished without constitutional wrangling?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have been very clear on this side of the House and have agreed with the position put forward by the hon. member and his party as to the need for fundamental change.

We have also said in two successive budgets that what we were doing was not simply cutting spending but redefining the role of government because that must happen in the modern age.

In that area there are items on which we may or may not agree. We have said that as far as we are concerned the best controls on spending we can have are short term targets on which the government's feet are held to the fire. That is what has enabled us to hit our targets consistently and that is what we intend to continue with.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the biggest problem with our current Constitution is not so much its content but its application. The federal government has used its spending power to encroach on provincial areas of jurisdiction such as natural resources, manpower training, social services, language, culture and so forth.

The answer to the separatists is a more balanced federation which can be done by re-examining and reducing the federal role in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

Is the federal government open to this type of change, a simple withdrawal from provincial areas of jurisdiction, again changes that can be made without constitutional wrangling?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, not only is the federal government open to that kind of change but in looking at what has happened over the course of the last two years, we have done this in a number of areas.

The hon. member should look at the great openness displayed by the Minister of Human Resources Development concerning ways he would work with the provinces. He should look at what the Minister of Natural Resources has done. Look at regional agencies. Within Quebec we have taken 43 programs down to one to concentrate on small and medium size business and the delivery of federal government programs. In department after department we have effected that kind of change and we have done it without any constitutional discussion.

• (1430)

The federal government is concentrating on those areas where it can make the maximum impact and is allowing the provincial governments and municipal governments to do the same thing.

The kind of change the leader of the Reform Party calls for is in the process of happening, but it is happening without the kind of rupture and dismantlement the PQ or the Bloc would advocate. It is happening for the betterment of all Canadians.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are offering Quebecers change, real change, not superficial, symbolic constitutional change.

People cannot eat the Constitution. They cannot pay their mortgages with the Constitution. They cannot build their dreams on constitutional clauses.

What is needed today is a changed federal government that respects provincial powers, stops reckless spending and taxation, and gives all provinces the tools they need to develop the strengths of their own communities and economies. That is possible with a no vote.

Is the federal government open to these kinds of changes? Is the Prime Minister open to these kinds of changes? If the government is, how does it propose to demonstrate that openness in practical ways before October 30?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the proof is in the pudding. If we look at what the government has done over the last two years, we see that the fundamental process of change is under way. There is only one thing that can stop the process of change and that is a yes vote, which would make the country go back to square one.

The fact is that a no vote means that the evolution of the country, along with the evolution of the nations around the world, is something that is proceeding apace.

Mr. Speaker, if you want proof that the federal government is open to change, just look at the remarkable speech the Prime Minister made last night in Verdun.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

When the Prime Minister talks about distinct society, he keeps referring to a concept that is meaningless and subordinate to the principle of equality for all the provinces, a concept that was rejected by Quebecers in the referendum on the Charlottetown accord.

Yesterday, it was impossible to get a specific answer from the Minister of Labour, so we will ask her the same question today. Could the Minister of Labour tell us what kind of distinct society the Prime Minister wants for Quebec, the one in the Charlottetown accord, which is meaningless because it is subordinate to the equality of the provinces or the one in the Meech Lake accord, which the Prime Minister opposed so strenuously?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is quite simple. I will repeat in this House what the Prime Minister had to say about the meaning of distinct society.

"A Quebec recognized in Canada as a distinct society by virtue of its language, culture and institutions. I have said it before and I say it again: I agree", the Prime Minister said.

Does the Bloc Quebecois agree with a distinct society?

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister said in this House that Clyde Wells was in favour of a distinct society. Are we to understand that when the minister and her Prime Minister talk about distinct society, they are referring to the same definition as Clyde Wells, in other words, a definition that is completely meaningless and without any of the powers demanded by Quebec for more than 30 years?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is such a surprise to see the Bloc Quebecois anxious to defend the concept of distinct society, while their present leader, the leader of the yes side, Mr. Parizeau, says he does not want to hear about distinct society; he says to hell with distinct society. He is just not interested. He is interested in destroying Canada, to make a new country. That is the big difference between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Quebec.

We want to keep this country called Canada, and we want to remain proud and distinct in Quebec.

• (1435)

[English]

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the Prime Minister's speech last night and other discussions of possible constitutional changes.

Before the Charlottetown accord the Reform Party and the Liberal Party had made commitments that all major constitutional amendments should be done only through national referendum. Is it still the commitment of the Liberal Party that any constitutional changes being planned must be submitted and approved by the people in a national referendum?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what the Prime Minister said yesterday, very clearly, is that any changes in constitutional jurisdictions will only be made with the consent of Quebecers. It seems to me that, as a statement of position by the government, this is very clear.

[English]

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a wise commitment and I hope the Prime Minister is prepared to make it to all Canadians.

After the referendum in 1980 we entered into constitutional discussions with a PQ government in Quebec. That proved to be very problematic for the country as a whole and particularly problematic for Quebec.

Does the government believe that the PQ government would be a willing, open and constructive participant in constitutional negotiations?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is very clear that after this referendum, in which we hope with all of our hearts that this country will remain united, the premier of Quebec will still be Mr. Parizeau. Since Mr. Parizeau's sole dream and sole obsession has always been to create a separate country, it would perhaps be a little surprising if he were to sit down at a constitutional conference table. May I express the hope that the premier of Quebec will bow to the democratic vote of Quebecers?

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

Clearly, English Canada categorically rejects any possibility of constitutional change in Quebec's favour. This is why the leader of the Reform Party said there was no market for a distinct society, that it was old hat.

Will the Minister of Labour acknowledge that, although the Prime Minister has been saying he wants to enshrine the principle of a distinct society in the constitution, he will be unable to because of the steadfast opposition of English Canada as expressed yesterday by the premiers of British Columbia, Newfoundland and Manitoba?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the words of the Canada's principal leaders are once again being twisted.

What a number of premiers said is that they recognize the principle of a distinct society for Quebec, but wonder whether it was a priority here in Canada at the moment to sit down and change the country's Constitution.

This is what the premiers of the other provinces said. Quebecers are saying exactly the same thing. When asked what the priority should be for their provincial government, how do they respond? Over 80 per cent say it should be the economy, employment, health services or education. Only 8 per cent mention Quebec's political status. So, if we are going to respond to the priorities expressed by our fellow citizens, we must look to the problems before us first and foremost. This is what the premiers confirmed in the other provinces.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, are we to understand the reason the premiers of English Canada are so steadfastly blocking constitutional change is once again because of the bargaining that went on before the start of the referendum campaign between them and the Prime Minister of Canada in which they promised there would be no constitutional change for Quebec, as the editorial in the Daily Gleaner indicates?

Mr. Robichaud: That is disgusting, what she is saying.

• (1440)

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, probably the member for the Bloc Quebecois made a mistake when she spoke of our Prime Minister as the prime minister of English Canada. As far as I know, our Prime Minister, a francophone from Shawinigan, is the Prime Minister of all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Robillard: And as the Prime Minister of all Canadians, including Quebecers, it is his responsibility to make clear the seriousness of the choice awaiting us on October 30—the destruction of our country, Canada.

I repeat that this is not just any country in the world, it is a country which we are proud of and which we have grown and developed in. I can tell you that everyone who believes in this country will do everything they can so that everybody says no to separation on October 30.

HEALTH

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Reformers in the provinces want the federal government to respect their jurisdiction in health. The minister has resisted this approach until now.

Will the health minister today commit to respect the provincial jurisdiction in health?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons that Canada is the best country in the world is our medicare system.

The Canada Health Act respects the jurisdictions of the provinces and allows the provinces every flexibility in managing the system but does insist that they adhere to five principles to protect equal access for all Canadians in order that they receive the funds transferred from the federal government to the provinces. That has ensured that we are the best country in the world and that we have the best medicare system in the world.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the constructive changes the provinces want would be easy to achieve: stable, predictable funding along with legislation that puts the needs of patients ahead of the needs of bureaucrats.

Will the health minister today agree to meet with provinces that desperately want to have those constructive changes?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have met with provinces and will continue to meet with provinces. I will work with provinces in any way I can to ensure we have a system that meets the needs of Canadians that is not a two–tier system.

We know the agenda of the Reform Party. It wants a U.S. style two–tier system, one for the better off Canadians and one for the rest of Canadians. That is not the way we built our country and that is not what made the country great.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

In his speech yesterday, the Prime Minister indicated that he still favoured administrative agreements as a way to meet Quebec's demand that the federal government withdraw from Quebec's areas of jurisdiction.

Can the Minister of Labour tell us how Quebecers can trust the Prime Minister when he proposes administrative agreements, since the only time he proposed such an agreement—it was, may I remind you, in the area of manpower—, the minister, in solidarity with her former boss, Daniel Johnson, rejected it, calling it a third–rate agreement?

• (1445)

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again, I will have to quote the Prime Minister's statement in extenso, since the member of the Bloc Quebecois omitted part of the sentence. He said, and I quote: "We will keep open all the other roads to change, including administrative and constitutional means".

I think the intent is quite clear: to keep open both administrative and constitutional roads to change. Throughout this country's history, we have found various ways to make changes, without necessarily reopening the constitution. At this time, we only have to look at the whole issue of immigration in Quebec and all the powers granted to Quebec to choose its immigrants and welcome them into Quebec society. All this was done by administrative means. So we should certainly not set aside this way of effecting changes.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in response to Liza Frulla, who, last Monday, called for the federal government's withdrawal from the area of culture, how can the Minister of Labour answer that a mere administrative agreement could be enough to solve the problem, and will she dare give the same answer to stakeholders in the cultural industry?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister stated very clearly that this country is on the road to change and that, in order to meet the challenges of the 21st century, Canada as a whole has no choice but to change because we now face international competitors that were not even on the scene 10 years ago.

We must question our ways of doing things. We must review the role of the various levels of government and this is what we in the federal government will work on after a no vote in the referendum.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at the recent women's conference in Beijing, Canada was awarded the global award by the International Federation of Business and Professional Women.

Can the hon. Secretary of State for the Status of Women explain to us what this award means and on what basis Canada was selected to receive this prestigious prize?

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada was indeed honoured with this prestigious prize, and this goes to show that Canada is a great place to live for everyone. This is something we should all be proud of. This government has furthered the cause of women: their equality, prosperity and safety throughout the country, including Quebec. Remarkable progress has been made, and the Quebec minister herself agreed with this and congratulated Canada for it.

The men and women who attended the rally in Verdun last night recognized the benefits of living in Canada, the standard of living we enjoy in this country, and stated that they wanted to live a strong Quebec within a united Canada. They said no to separation.

TRAINING

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last night the Prime Minister admitted he is open to all paths for change to the administration of government. One area in which the provinces have long been seeking jurisdiction is training, which Reformers also have long advocated.

Will the Minister of Human Resources Development follow suit and commit to giving the provinces exclusive control over manpower training?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the commitment the Prime Minister made last night about change is something on which we invited Canadians to join with us a year ago in an honest and forthright way to engage in a look at the social systems and the training systems of Canada.

● (1450)

We have had the largest participation of any initiative of that kind. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians participated and the message was clear. They want change. They want more flexibility. They want more collaboration and they want more decentralization.

I have sat down on several occasions with my provincial counterparts to talk about how we can achieve that collaboration. For example, we offered specifically to all provinces the right to take over responsibility for institutional training, all the training that takes place in the community college system.

We have had very positive responses. Unfortunately the minister of employment in the Government of Quebec refused to have a discussion. He refused to hear our plans for collaboration and would not engage in that important dialogue.

The most important way we can give real voice and real life to the aspirations Canadians expressed over the past year about the change they need is to have a vote of no on Monday and get on with the business with the provinces of making good changes to get people back to work.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the answer from the minister of human resources. I will take this one step further, responding to the opening of the door last night by the Prime Minister to change the status quo.

I ask the minister now to commit to a time and a place he will get the provincial ministers together so they can negotiate the decentralization of manpower training.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, over the last two or three months I have held at least eight or nine different meetings with provincial ministers to the point of discussing how we might come together and get agreement.

In the member's province of Alberta we now have an agreement with the Government of Alberta to set up single delivery systems for young people to help them get back to work, particularly people who have long been out of work. We have in Lethbridge, Red Deer and Edmonton trial projects with the Government of Alberta.

Even in the province of Quebec we have come to an agreement in the city of Alma, the home of the Leader of the Opposition, to have a co–operative joint initiative by the federal and the provincial governments to help unemployed workers in Alma in a co–operative way.

The best way to ensure a speedy timetable of agreement so we can develop a job system relative to the 21st century is a no vote on Monday so we can get back to work as federal and provincial governments and design the best system possible for all Canadians.

COUNCIL FOR CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. The Council for Canadian Unity is very active these days, since its mission is to promote Canadian unity.

How can the minister justify that, when making donations to the council, large Canadian corporations, including Alcan, Proctor and Gamble, Dow Chemical and Maclean Hunter, can obtain receipts for charitable donations and thus lower their tax liability?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, several months ago, I answered a similar question from the Bloc Quebecois. Canadian charities are only allowed to deliver receipts if 90 per cent of their activities are not of a political nature. In other words, only a small part of their activities can be of a political nature. The Council for Canadian Unity has been in existence for 29 years, and it may be that these large corporations received tax receipts. We will see if the 10 per cent limit was exceeded.

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister justify that the council is enjoying the status of a charity, considering that, in order to obtain this status, an organization must help alleviate the problem of poverty, or promote education or religion?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is forgetting the other criteria related to that status. Education is one of them. Moreover, the Council for Canadian Unity, which was granted the right to deliver tax receipts, is 29 years old. It was established 29 years ago.

• (1455)

During those 29 years, the council has conducted educational campaigns in Canada. If there is a problem now, I ask the member to provide me with the facts. I will then conduct a review of that charity, and any other charity, if there are reasons to suspect wrongful conduct. If such review is conclusive, the charity will lose the right to deliver tax receipts. However, I need some specific information and details from the member.

SOMALIA INQUIRY

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Counsel from the justice department on Monday circulated a letter which sends a message of intimidation to all witnesses and potential witnesses of the Somalia inquiry. Justice department rules and Treasury Board regulations circumvent the openness of the Somalia inquiry and the protection of those giving evidence. Serving officers fear for their careers if they have to come forward.

Will the minister take some action to put a halt to this form of intimidation?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter under the purview of my colleague, the Minister of Justice, who was just called from the Chamber.

However, the letter to which the hon. member referred, written by a Department of Justice official, reflects the long-standing practice of professional conduct with respect to lawyers in that they do not deal with other people's clients without counsel's being informed. That is a basic principle which the Minister of Justice will address.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, minutes ago Justice Létourneau called this a matter of real concern.

The minister in March said in the House: "There would be no impediment to anyone coming forward with evidence". Monday's intimidating justice letter is a serious impediment.

What will the minister do to salvage the inquiry?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we do not have to salvage the inquiry. The inquiry is doing extremely well under the leadership of three very prominent commissioners.

I am informed by the Minister of Justice that his officials have been discussing this matter with all concerned, including the commission, and perhaps more will be said on this tomorrow when my colleague returns to the House.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of International Trade.

Can the minister explain to this House why the members of the Canadian Exporters Association, through their president, Mark Drake, have expressed such concern about the possible consequences a victory for the yes side might have on their future?

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are not only pleased but proud to announce that Canada's 1995 exports are 20.3 per cent higher than the same period last year.

Our trade surplus with the United States is nearly $5.4 billion higher than for the same period last year. To date our trade surplus with the world is more than $7.1 billion from 1994. This is testimony to the dynamic nature of the business women and men working together across the country.

Canada's membership in OPEC, the World Trade Organization and NAFTA places it in a position to do business in the international markets, unlike individual provinces.

This is testimony that on Monday if we want this prosperity to continue through trade, if we want jobs to increase through exports, we will vote no.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development concerning the role a company called Jobs Incorporated Canada of Campbellton, New Brunswick seems to be playing in the Canada employment department. I am referring to the fact that this company advertised at the CEC office in Winnipeg for a position that would have had the successful applicant greeting clients and explaining programs at the Canada employment office in Selkirk, Manitoba.

• (1500)

I ask the minister: Who is this company? How much privatization is going on in the Canada Employment Centres? And why is this going on without any consultation with the union?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the answer is very simple. Jobs Canada as an organization has established a coast to coast job bank, which takes application forms from prospective employers and résumés from prospective employees. It provides a nationwide service to enable job seekers to find the best possible jobs.

What we are testing out on a pilot project basis in three locations across the country is how we can take advantage of that vast network of job applications and openings at Jobs Canada and build them into our own job bank so we can substantially expand the job offerings for people who come to the CECs. It is simply one way of using new technology and developing a partnership with a private sector firm to help get Canadians better, higher paying jobs.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): I ask the minister: Why was this done apparently without any consultation with the union in Manitoba? Will he undertake to consult with the union and hear its concerns on this matter?

POINT OF ORDER

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my point of order is to correct Hansard to bring it in line with reality.

During question period, the Minister of Labour no doubt misunderstood what the hon. member for Saint-Hubert said and attributed words to her that she never spoke. She never described the Prime Minister as the "prime minister of English Canada". She did say, and I have her text in front of me: "Are we to understand that the premiers of English Canada—" This was therefore not a reference to the Prime Minister of Canada, which led to a correction and to applause from our friends across the way. Sorry, but this was not the case.

The Speaker: This is perhaps a point of clarification, but it is not a point of order.

[English]

Colleagues, I do not see any other points to be raised at this time.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: I would like to make a statement regarding the point of order raised last week by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona. I would also like at this time to thank the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster and the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader for their contributions to the discussion.

On October 18 the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona rose to question the admissibility of the auditor general's report tabled in the House on October 5. The report, which was sent to the public accounts committee for examination, contained what in the opinion of the member were "politically biased statements".

• (1505)

The hon. member contended that the auditor general had "overstepped the legal and customary boundaries of his duties as a servant of the House". He requested that I rule the tabling of the auditor general's report out of order, ask that the auditor general submit an amended report, and refer the terms of reference for auditor generals' reports to the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs.

[Translation]

The auditor general's importance to Parliament is indisputable. This House relies on the auditor general to help it ensure that taxpayers' dollars are spent for the purposes approved by Parliament and to assist it in holding the government to account for its actions. Under the terms of the Auditor General Act, the auditor general is empowered to report to Parliament. Under the provisions of Standing Order 108(3)(d), these reports are then deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

[English]

With all respect, my colleagues, any ruling that is made here in this House affects all hon. members. If any business is to be conducted other than the hearing of my decision, I respectfully ask that it be done outside.

The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has long taken an interest in the form and content of auditor generals' reports. I recall that he made a member's statement in the House on this very subject on November 23, 1994. It is clear that his view of the appropriate role of the auditor general is not necessarily shared by the auditor general.

Those who follow the proceedings of the public accounts committee know that this is an issue that is regularly the object of some discussion in the committee.

The hon. member is absolutely correct in his assertion that the auditor general is an officer of Parliament. As a servant of parliamentarians and especially of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, the auditor general must pay particular attention to whatever difficulties members encounter with his reports in the exercise of their parliamentary responsibilities.

Like any officer of the House, the auditor general should be diligent in responding to the views expressed by members, especially when there is a pattern to their complaints, lest there result an erosion of a very special relationship.

That being said, I must point out that the auditor general's co–operation with the House of Commons and the Standing Committee on Public Accounts is well known.

[Translation]

As the Chair has ruled on a number of occasions, it is not my role as Speaker to interpret the laws of Canada. The Auditor General Act lists a number of matters to be treated by the auditor general in his reports to the House of Commons. I do not feel, however, that it is up to me to interpret whether or not what is contained in the auditor general's report meets the criteria of the law. Therefore, I can neither rule the tabling of the report out of order nor demand that the auditor general submit another report, as the hon. member requested.

[English]

Finally, I must stress the fact that the auditor general is not an agent of the government. If there is to be a review of his performance, I must agree with the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader that the proper place to do so is in the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. The estimates and the reports of the auditor general are dealt with in this committee on a regular basis. It is within the committee's mandate to bring to the attention of the House, by way of report, any aspect of the auditor general's report and the conduct of the affairs of his office the committee feels the House should be apprised of and should act on.

• (1510)

Should the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona still wish to pursue this matter, he has every opportunity to bring it to the attention of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

I thank all hon. members for their contributions to this discussion.

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 95th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs in relation to the business of supply. In this report the committee respectfully requests that its deadline for reporting to the House be extended to March 29, 1996.

Also, if the House gives its consent I intend to move the adoption of this report later today.

HEALTH

Hon. CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–354, an act to amend the Criminal Code (transmission of HIV).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce my second private member's bill today, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot and co–sponsored by a number of my colleagues.

If passed by Parliament, my bill will improve the possibility of obtaining a criminal conviction of anyone who knowingly infects another person with HIV, thereby exposing the victim to the fear and risk of contracting AIDS and certain death if he or she does.

If enacted, my bill will create two new offences related to wilful or reckless acts by a person infected with HIV or a person who has AIDS. If the act results in infection with HIV, the offence is criminal infection, with a maximum sentence of imprisonment for life, the same maximum penalty now imposed for manslaughter. The rationale is that victims infected with HIV face a life of fear of contracting AIDS and certain death if they do. In the event the infection with HIV is not proven, the offence is reckless infective behaviour, punishable by imprisonment for up to seven years.

Consent is often an issue in prosecutions under other provisions of the Criminal Code, and this creates problems for the courts. For example, the question of whether a victim consents—

The Speaker: I think we have the general idea. I thank the hon. member very much for his explanation.

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the House gives its consent, I move that the 94th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in. This is the membership change report, in case members are confused.

Also, if the House gives its consent, and I believe there is consent forthcoming, I move that the 95th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in. This report is the one that deals with the extension of the deadline for the report of the committee on the business of supply.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege for me to present a petition from my constituents stating the importance of young people and how their voices must be heard when we make decisions that will inherently affect their future.

A healthy and safe environment, meaningful employment and education are issues that affect all of us but they have a more profound effect on our country's youth, as does a united Canada, a country which includes Quebec.

[Translation]

These petitioners want to make sure that, when making decisions that affect young people, whether these decisions concern employment, learning, retraining or training, the constitution or this country in general, we take into consideration our young people in Quebec and the rest of Canada.

[English]

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have two separate petitions to present.

The first one is signed by constituents of the Yorkton—Melville riding concerned about the port of Churchill. They feel that the full utilization of the port of Churchill will improve the economy not only of the province of Saskatchewan but of Canada as well. There is a need to develop a strategy to utilize this important seaport to ship other exports as well as grain.

Therefore they urge that the upcoming shipping season usage of the port of Churchill be maximized at the very least to 5 per cent of Canada's annual grain shipment.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to present a second petition on behalf of 796 concerned citizens from my riding of Yorkton—Melville regarding S–241 of the Criminal Code of Canada which was enacted to protect all individuals. If S–241 were struck down or amended, protection to the disabled, the terminally ill, the depressed, the chronically ill and the elderly would no longer exist and our most vulnerable members of society would feel an implied pressure to end their lives.

Therefore, the House is urged not to repeal or amend S–241 of the Criminal Code and to uphold the Supreme Court of Canada decision of September 30 to disallow assisted suicide or euthanasia.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am presenting two petitions today.

The first contains 25 signatures and calls on the government to amend the Young Offenders Act.

MINING

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition contains 175 signatures and calls on the government to remove impediments to the mining industry such as overlapping regulations.

The petitioners pray and call on Parliament to improve the investment climate to stimulate the industry and to keep mining in Canada.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present to Parliament a petition from the professional teaching staff of Martin Collegiate Institute in the constituency of Regina—Lumsden.

The teaching staff strongly object to the present status of Canada's Young Offenders Act. They feel the Young Offenders Act has failed to address the issue of youth crime and its negative results in our schools, communities and society in general.

• (1520)

They call on Parliament to enact legislation to significantly toughen the Young Offenders Act as quickly as possible, with a view to making young offenders responsible for their actions, making names of young offenders public and increasing severity of consequences for repeat offences.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition that has been circulating all across Canada. It has been signed by a number of Canadians from Surrey and Delta, British Columbia.

The petitioners should like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession that has not been recognized for its value to society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families who make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families who decide to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by constituents of Yellowhead who are strongly opposed to the universal registration provision in Bill C–68. They want protected the right of law–abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms.

They also are concerned that with Canada's serious deficit and debt problem such costly and unproven legislation should not proceed.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from the citizens of Peterborough and elsewhere in Ontario concerned about the massive spill of cyanide in the Essequibo River in Guyana, South America. They point out that the spill was the direct responsibility of a Montreal based Canadian gold mining firm called Canbior. They also point out that the safety, livelihood and well–being of some 18,000 Guyanese citizens are affected.

Therefore the petitioners call on Parliament to direct an independent inquiry into the incident in order that the Canadian residents and citizens who have a humanitarian and an environmental responsibility in this matter are informed of the steps being taken to arrange for the adequate compensation of people affected and have steps taken to ensure that necessary measures are being taken to correct this environmental disaster.

I have a second petition on the same topic, in which the signers point out that the river in question is the largest in Guyana; that it passes through the rice producing belt of Guyana, rice constituting one of the country's main exports; and that this is one of the worst environmental disasters since the incident in Bhopal.

Therefore the petitioners call on Parliament to intervene on behalf of the Guyanese people affected by sending a trained team of environmentalists to determine the nature and extent of the danger to residents and the environment, and to aid the Guyanese government.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have two sets of petitions to present.

The first set contains somewhat over 500 signatures from all over Canada including my riding. It requests that Parliament not amend the charter of rights and freedoms or the Canadian Human Rights Act in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a second group of petitions, again from all across Canada including my riding, numbering some 800 signatures, which prays that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 215 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

The Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

SMALL BUSINESS LOANS ACT

The House resumed consideration from October 24, 1995, of the motion that Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to speak to the House today regarding Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act.

This is a very important bill, because the program administered under the Small Business Loans Act has an impact on the Canadian economy. The amendments before the House today, which are part of an ongoing process aimed at reinforcing the Small Business Loans Program and making it sustainable, will help improve the climate in a sector that today generates the strongest economic growth and increase in employment in Canada, and I am referring to small business.

It is common knowledge that small businesses have become a major moving force in the Canadian economy. During the past 20 years, we have seen a remarkable increase in the number of new small businesses in Canada. That small businesses are so important is borne out by the fact that in 1991 Canada had, if we include self–employed workers, more than two million small businesses with fewer than 100 employees, an increase of 50 per cent over 1981.

Small businesses today, many of which are dynamic innovators, will help to define the future development of the Canadian economy. In fact, according to the statistics, Canada increasingly relies on the growth of small businesses to create jobs, diversify economic activities and compete effectively on global markets.

Small business has a profound impact on the Canadian economy and will remain the main source of economic growth and job creation.

That is why the present government's main priorities include ensuring that the small business sector is healthy and prosperous.

Take, for instance, the issue of access to adequate financing. As the government was told repeatedly by members of the industry committee, the ability to obtain financing by contracting loans is extremely important for small businesses. Lack of adequate financing will restrict the growth of small businesses and jeopardize the future prosperity of this country. That is why the government passed a bill that will enable the Federal Business Development Bank, once it has been restructured, to improve its response to the needs of small businesses. As a result of changes introduced by the government, the bank will be in a better position to finance innovative small businesses in the new economy.

The amendments to the Small Business Loans Act before us today were drafted in the same spirit as the changes giving a new impetus to the Business Development Bank of Canada. In both cases, the underlying motive is the same: providing an appropriate policy framework that supports the development and prosperity of Canadian small businesses from coast to coast.

Given its broad scope for action and implementation under the act, the small business loan guarantee program plays a large role in the launching of small businesses and in other aspects of their operations across Canada. It also has an impact on similar Canadian programs.

• (1530)

The difficulties experienced by small businesses in securing loans on reasonable terms have been described in great detail in recent years. The extensive consultations held with representatives of both borrowers and lenders during the drafting of Bill C–99 showed that most stakeholders are concerned mainly about access to financing and not so much about its cost. As far as access to financing is concerned, both borrowers and lenders confirmed the usefulness of the small business loan program as administered under the act.

They recognized that the program was especially helpful in times of economic slowdown. With the exception of farms, religious businesses and charities, Canadian based businesses with annual revenues of $5 million or less may apply for loans under this act.

Almost every small business operating in Canada can now get a loan under the program. Loans made under the act are approved by private sector lenders and guaranteed by the Government of Canada. Loans can be as high as $250,000 but in the past most loans were for less than $50,000.

The small business loans program is an important tool to encourage lenders to provide access to debt financing for high risk small businesses, including those which find themselves in one of the following situations: they wish to borrow a small amount or obtain a start up loan; the goods that they must provide as collateral are inadequate or insufficient; they wish to obtain funds to buy new technologies or specialized material; they are active in sectors which are generally considered more risky, such as tourism, retail sales or services; they are not located in urban centres, or they are in regions which are not major economic activity centres.

Clearly, the small business loans program is important to small businesses. Since 1961, when the act came into effect, over 420,000 loans amounting to more than $15.5 billion were extended to small businesses.

Given the importance of the loan program run under the act, it was a real concern when its annual deficit increased to the point where it might have exceeded $100 billion per year. Some measures had to be taken, and they were taken. Again, this shows how the program has constantly evolved, thanks to the Canadian government's ability to implement the necessary changes.

Two major changes were made to the program on April 1, 1995. An annual fee of 1.25 per cent is now collected from each lender, on the average outstanding balance of loans granted after March 31, 1995. The maximum yearly rate which a lender can set under the program was increased by 1.25 per cent, making it equivalent to the prime rate plus 3 per cent for floating rate loans, and equivalent to the residential mortgage rate plus 3 per cent for fixed rate loans. Thanks to these changes, which will be followed by those proposed in the bill before the House, the program will be completely self financing and can therefore be maintained.

Future access to the loan program by small businesses is now basically guaranteed, but the changes included in Bill C–99 are necessary to complete the process. The bill will make it possible to complete the transition to full cost recovery and to improve the mechanisms of the program relating to borrowers and institutions making small loans.

Among other things, the bill will accelerate the coming into force of the reduction from 90 per cent to 85 per cent in the amount of the state's loan guarantee under the act; authorize the making of regulations for setting processing fees; authorize the making of a regulation on the release of securities and personal guarantees accepted by lenders against repayment of small business loans under the act.

It will also serve to improve the situation of institutions making small loans, from the point of view of applications involving guarantees; to ensure that the small businesses loans program can be adapted more promptly to changes in the program and in the economy, by allowing readjustments in the proportions of the guarantee via regulation rather than legislation.

The government is clear in its intent to support small business, which it considers the motor of Canada's economic growth. It has been pointed out to the government on numerous occasions that the best way of helping business, whether small or big, was to control the deficit. The modifications to the Small Business Loans Act are obviously proposed with this in mind.

Thanks to the introduction of a mechanism for users' fees, this program will no longer add to the federal deficit. I would like to take this opportunity to again point out the particularly pleasing fact that transition to full cost recovery has received unanimous support from all interested parties consulted during the drafting of Bill C–99, lenders and borrowers alike.

Bill C–99 will be the end point in a process which will allow a program that is already a nationwide success to continue that success. The amendments will ensure that the Small Business Loans Act remains an important mechanism for implementing government policy in order to foster the growth of small business across this great land of Canada. These amendments merit the full assent of the House of Commons.

[English]

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member for Madawaska—Victoria's speech on Bill C–99 which of course was a Liberal point of view. It was just a reiteration of what she has been told to say by the government frontbench. The things she was saying do not seem to make a lot of sense to me.

The hon. member talked about how the government supports small business. Then she went on to say that the new user fee mechanism will no longer contribute to the deficit because the program is going to be on a full cost recovery basis. The reason the government was putting it on a full cost recovery basis was its concern and desire to try to balance the budget.

I agree with the government's desire to balance the budget but typically, here we are again; the government is going to do it on the backs of private enterprise. The Liberals are going to charge the businesses that borrow money under this act an excess premium on the interest rate. This money will be put into the government coffers and will be channelled through a bureaucratic system to reimburse the lenders that make the bad decisions and lend to small businesses that cannot under whatever circumstances repay the loan. If the Liberals are concerned about supporting small business, why are they doing that?

Some private sector businesses are going to reimburse the losses of other businesses. It will not cost the government one single nickel under this process, yet the hon. member says that the government supports small business. There are two contrary situations here. I would like to hear what the member has to say.

Mrs. Ringuette–Maltais: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased with the question put forward by the hon. member. Notice that the question is consistent with the third party policy of double talk. I have been here for the last two years and I have listened to the hon. member and his colleagues from the third party in this House talk about the fact that businesses in Atlantic Canada were receiving grants here, there and everywhere.

I am talking today about the federal government taking its responsibility toward the small and medium size businesses throughout this country. We are making sure that as responsible politicians, as a responsible government, we can provide the right environment and opportunities from coast to coast to coast for small businesses to create jobs, to look forward to competition and to make sure they can get ahead and increase exports. The member is saying that we do not know what we are doing.

On the one hand Reform Party members are saying to cut grants, cut everything, to even cut health care. Now they rise in this House to say it is not proper for us to make sure there is security for small businesses to have access to capital and on the same wavelength to have access to exporting their technology.

For nine years I have heard political questions in the New Brunswick legislature and in the House of Commons, but I have never heard double talk to this measure from an hon. member.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member for Madawaska—Victoria for her intervention today on behalf of small business. She has shown great leadership in the last two years for small business in her community.

No one in this House will ever forget the member for Madawaska—Victoria's very first intervention on this floor two years ago when she said: "We will be a government that is lean but not mean". Reform Party members obviously heard her say that but they do not understand where she was coming from.

• (1545)

Reformers forget about some of the great wins Canadians have experienced from Atlantic Canada in terms of business enterprise.

I want to talk specifically about a very small business which received a bit of help in 1979–80 from a Liberal government. I was there. It received about a $4.2 million grant.

Mr. Williams: Sounds like patronage to me.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): It was not patronage. I remember the principles of the country tended to be more Liberal than anything else.

It was the McCain organization. That very small business has grown to be one of the absolute jewels of industry not just in Canada but throughout the world. It has expanded its business not just in Canada but all around the world. It has created jobs and developed technology.

The Government of Canada got its $4 million back within the first year. Since 1980 we have probably received 100 times that amount in taxes and job creation.

Reform members really irk me from time to time. They talk about the importance of entrepreneurship. They talk about the importance of enterprise having a proper environment to get the job done. Most of them come from western Canada. Companies in western Canada receive the biggest grants of all, especially in the oil and gas sector. They are given grants which are buried in the tax act. Those tax grants are no different from direct cash grants.

I support the thrust of Reform Party members when they talk about cleaning up, simplifying and developing a fairer tax system. However, they cannot take a cheap shot at an act of Parliament that is trying to help small business without realizing they are giving tens of millions of dollars worth of grants to businesses in their ridings through the tax act.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his remarks. Bill C–99 is obviously another example of the way our country is constantly changing. The government cannot create employment as such, but we have a responsibility to create a suitable environment for the development of small and medium size business in Canada, right across the country, from Atlantic to Pacific.

I consider the bill to be a responsible way to meet our obligations to the people of Canada, including the people of Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act.

I believe it is the responsibility of governments to create an environment in which businesses can flourish. This is where most of our jobs will be created. On the history of job creation in Canada in the last year, 90 per cent of all new jobs have been created by small and medium size business. It is interesting to focus on this because this is small business week. Of these 200,000 jobs, one–quarter were created in the province of Quebec; 48,000 new jobs were created by small and medium size businesses.

I talked about creating an environment in which these businesses can flourish. There are two aspects that create a stable environment in which small and medium size businesses can flourish and be effective in their operations of creating new and challenging jobs for a new generation of Canadians.

These two areas are access to capital and access to stable markets. The area of access to capital deals pretty much with the meat of this bill. We have been told time and time again by some of our critics that we must make government more efficient, that we must find ways of cutting costs.

The bill recognizes the federal government was in the position of picking up bad debt losses created by lending practices, lending to some of these businesses which obviously failed.

There is nothing unusual about that. It is not a calamity. It is not a disaster. The loan loss rate within that program was somewhere between 2 per cent and 4 per cent. This is quite normal in the banking industry.

Basically the Small Business Loans Act attempts to create a federal government guarantee which encourages financial institutions to lend to small and medium size businesses.

Some may ask why these institutions do not do it without the guarantee. Most of these loans were for capital projects. Our financial institutions for a variety of reasons have become very much short term lenders. They lend on the strength of things like accounts receivable and inventory, things they believe they can quickly liquidate.

When a small business is setting up it needs manufacturing equipment, possibly delivery vehicles, whatever the case may be, equipment that has a long and useful life, but it also clearly takes a long time to pay off a loan based on the income flow from that.

Banks have not always been as active as perhaps they should. Small or medium size businesses, which are sometimes emerging businesses, also have instability to some degree in their financial records.

Quite often banks, being very conservative lenders, are looking for a long track record. Our emerging industries today do not necessarily have a long track record. Consequently they may have one or two–year financial statements and so forth but the banks are very cautious. They would rather lend to governments than to businesses.

It has been necessary for the government to recognize there are inequities within our capital markets and create a program that will attract financial institutions to lend to small businesses to get them established and create jobs.

It is no small miracle that the government can claim some responsibility for these 200,000 new jobs created in Canada in just the last year because at the same time we have witnessed the increase in the small business loans program. This program lent $500 million prior to 1993. That moved up to $2.5 billion in 1993–94 and to over $4 billion in 1994–95. That kind of tremendous growth shows the demand in the small business sector for this kind of lending.

If we take our loan loss provisions of 2.5 per cent roughly and move them through that increase in volume we will see it is possible the government could be facing loan losses of $100 million.

What has the government done? It has recognized what it should do, not unlike what any financial institution would do, and build that cost into the lending provisions. Essentially it has created a fund as part of the application fee, a new 1.5 per cent fee added to the cost of borrowing this money and then it is spread out over the term of the loan in order to provide for as much as $100 million of loan losses.

All banks do this. All financial institutions carry on this way. It is not unusual. I am surprised the third party takes some exception to this. Small business people understand it. We realize even when we go to our local supermarkets to buy consumer goods that within the cost of purchasing are things like theft. There are other provisions for products that go bad and so on. That is the normal course of business.

I commend the government for getting its economic house in order by recognizing, as small business people do, that it cannot be responsible for all small business ills. The government has created a situation in which small business can get access to capital. That is really the whole point of the Small Business Loans Act, to provide access.

I served on the industry committee which produced the report "Taking Care of Small Business". Over and over we heard from small and medium size businesses that their major concern and problem was access to capital, not so much the cost of the capital but the access.

In some of the provisions we talk about increasing the lending interest rate from prime plus one to prime plus three. Emerging businesses do not like to pay more interest than they have to but realize that a 1 per cent or 1.5 per cent increase in interest rates is still well worth it to them to get this seed money to get themselves established.

When I talk about access to capital it is interesting also to note capital markets. What has happened with our debt and deficit situation is many governments are competing in the marketplace with small and medium size businesses for capital. This is why we have to get our debt and deficit under control and why I am happy the government is very much on that course and on a target to effect that.

In Quebec a referendum is due next week. Quebec borrows something over $70 billion. That is the size of its debt right now. Interestingly, 54 per cent of it is financed outside of Canada. It seems odd that we are going through the process of a referendum in Quebec which costs $66 million, as stated in La Presse recently. By extrapolation almost $35 million of the cost of the referendum will have to be borrowed from people outside of Canada to ask the people of Quebec whether they want to be an independent country. It seems ludicrous.

That is the problem of the capital markets. I would like to address the issue of markets. Clearly, the small business man or woman is not just looking for capital for machinery. He or she needs a market to serve.

• (1600)

There has been much talk about the globalization of our economy and the need to have easy access to markets. Indeed, agreements like the North America Free Trade Agreement and the GATT address that cause.

A recent study by the OECD on the whole aspect of small and medium size business is very interesting. The European Union and other members of the OECD are very interested because all these countries recognize that small and medium size businesses are going to be the employers of the future. A recent report, I believe from October 1995 said: "Sudden national economic growth will be enhanced if government policies are co–ordinated and targeted so that they strengthen and reinforce regional and local systems. This should improve the conditions that encourage new and small firms".

While we are talking about these markets, once again we are talking about a debate that is going on in the province of Quebec that would basically balkanize those markets. It would create barriers to markets, would make the markets much smaller for these 48,000 people who are employed in small business in Quebec, because a nation defines its markets within its political boundaries and operates within those political boundaries to its own best interests.

I am trying to say that the bill is very much a necessity and should be supported. More important, some of the debates that are going on within our country today are simply ludicrous. I am talking specifically about the referendum in Quebec. It will create more barriers for small and medium size businesses. The ability to create new and challenging jobs within Quebec and to some extent in the rest of Canada is going to be adversely affected by that process.

In conclusion, I would like to say that I am very supportive of the bill. I am certain that the small business community is also very supportive, understanding, and respectful that the government has taken the initiative to continue this program to increase the volume that is available to small businesses. I am sure we will see creation of more new jobs within our economy in the near future because of it.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the member for Durham on his remarks. I especially want to thank the member for Durham for all his work in committee during the last two years since his coming to the Parliament of Canada.

One reason we have had such success and why I believe small business is heading in the right direction is because our team of Reform Party members, the Bloc, and Liberals all worked together on the committee to try to make sure we had a fist when we went to the banks and other financial institutions as we were pleading for help in accessing capital for small businesses.

My question for the member has to do with start–up. In his experience as an accountant helping small businesses deal with banks, does he not think that one area we are going to have to do a lot more work on is making sure that the attitude and culture of bank mangers changes dramatically toward people who are starting businesses versus people who have been in business for a long time?

• (1605)

With all of the downsizing going on in both large businesses and governments right now, we have many people who are starting a business for the very first time. In order to really achieve success they are going to need help from financial institutions in this country. I believe that banks are going to have to change their attitudes dramatically for start–ups.

I wonder if the member for Durham, who is also an accomplished accountant in his field, could comment on that.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Broadview—Greenwood. I have always been interested in what he says. We do not always agree 100 per cent of the time, but basically our orientations are in the right area, which is to increase capital for small and medium size businesses.

The member is absolutely right. Banks in this country have forgotten just what they were doing. Banks originally started off many centuries ago investing in ideas. They invested in people's grey matter. They invested in their ideas about making life better and increasing people's standards of living. I have noticed that banks now invest in financial transactions. Our banks in North America are very oriented toward paper currency transactions. Indeed, I think if we were to study the balance sheets of most of our banks we would see a high percentage of their assets being held in government securities, et cetera. This has become a linkage in the global environment.

The reality is that these debts and financial instruments do not do anything. They do not create any more jobs. They do not create or take a piece of technological science and turn it into something useful.

What do we see in North America? We see people like Bill Gates, who had to work out of his garage to get his ideas going. People have to go and find others who will give $50 to buy so many shares and maybe later on some of that will come back. The banks say that sounds pretty wild.

I have a specific example of this in my own riding. I had the pleasure only last week of congratulating an entrepreneur for winning the Canadian woman entrepreneur of the year award in the area of export. This woman many years ago was my client. She was making strips of fur and putting them on strings. I must admit that even to me it sounded ridiculous at the time. What she did with that was to create a reversible fur coat. I went to various banks for her, and they said: "What are you going to give us as security, strips of fur? Get out of here." Do you know who finally picked up this account? It was a bank from England, not a Canadian bank.

That woman today employs hundreds of people. It is a small business in my riding that has given jobs in basically a rural area. Her product is shipped all over the world, mainly to Japan and Southeast Asia. She is creating jobs and hard currency exchange for our government and our country without the support of banks.

Yes, the member is absolutely right. This whole attitude in our banking system has to change. We have to get on board and support our small and medium business sector.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have one simple question I have asked of other members. It is on the full cost recovery being put forward by this particular legislation.

The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood talked about the fact that small businesses needed the impetus available under the Small Business Loans Act. But here they are being asked to pay for something they think they are getting from the government. Small business people who borrow under the Small Business Loans Act are being asked to pay for absolutely everything, every benefit that is being provided under the Small Business Loans Act, which seems to me a big circle of laundering the money through the government. I would like the member's response as to what benefit this will really provide to people who are borrowing under the Small Business Loans Act.

• (1610)

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, the member for St. Albert keeps going over this. Repetition is a great educator, so hopefully he will listen a little bit more this time.

First of all, there is nothing terribly unusual. This program has been set up in the best interests of small and medium size businesses.

Let us look at the other side of it. What will we do if in fact the government did not try to recover this bad debt loss? What does it mean? Does it mean that we do not have a program, period? We know it has been very successful. We know that using this system has assisted many and has probably created thousands and thousands of jobs in Canada.

Maybe the member wants the government to fork out $100 million a year in loan losses. Is it the responsibility of Reform Party members to tell the Government of Canada to cut spending, get its act together, and if it wants to give away $100 million on loan losses that is fine by them?

There is nothing unusual about cost recovery programs. They happen in the business world every day. Here we have the government acting like a business, creating opportunities for small business but at no cost to the taxpayer.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this latest exchange between the member for Durham and the member for St. Albert reminds me of the similarity between a computer and an accountant: We have to punch the information into both of them.

Given that the banks these days have the reputation of giving you an umbrella on a sunny day and taking it away on a rainy day, and given that banks today have the reputation of tightening up their credit, I would like the member for Durham to tell us how this will force banks to increase their loan portfolio to small businesses.

Mr. Shepherd: I thank the hon. member very much for the question.

First, the whole concept of a guarantee creates the opportunity for the bank to lend money that clearly it would not lend on its own accord. I note in the legislation that in fact we have actually lowered the loan guarantee from 90 per cent to 85 per cent. If we simply look at the growth and the volume within the small business loans program in the last three years, there is no question that there has been a demand, and a demand that has been satiated, if you will, by financial institutions.

Clearly, the program is on a success course and it continues to be on a success course. In fact it was the government's orientation to say this was very successful and we want it to expand, we want it to grow more, we want to make sure there is more money available for small and medium size businesses. At the same time, we also want to make sure we are not going to be on the hook for it.

One of the complaints of this program has been that a lot of the money was getting out to businesses that could have possibly financed loans without the Small Business Loans Act; in other words, possibly banks were misusing the program or possibly larger companies were getting the benefits of the program and they did not really need it. By lowering the guarantee aspect of this loan, we will also be ensuring that we direct it at the very new and emerging small and medium size businesses.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased to have the opportunity to say a few words in the debate pertaining to small business.

It is not all that often we get a chance to talk about small business in the House, and we really should. With the indulgence of the Chair and with the indulgence of colleagues present I hope to stray a little from the direct confines of the bill. I know it is most unusual in the House to stray away from the subject matter at hand. I hope to talk about small business in general, to talk about how important small business and entrepreneurship are to our country, and to provide a few words of encouragement for small businesses out there that are struggling today.

Can we imagine what it must be like for an entrepreneur in Quebec even as we speak? We have a situation of systemically high unemployment in Quebec. It has been that way for years, ever since the last separation crisis in 1980 when the people of Quebec chose to elect a separatist government. All that did was give U–Haul one–way traffic to Toronto a bonanza. Ever since the election of the first Parti Quebecois separatist government in Quebec, what has happened? Toronto has prospered largely at the expense of the self–inflicted wounds of the people of Quebec.

All the country has profited because the separatist government in Quebec insists on shooting itself in the foot with separation every 15 years or so. I am sure that is what is ongoing in the province of Quebec.

If the people of Quebec want to do something really worthwhile for their futures, they will resoundingly reject the separatist option. They will resoundingly reject any notion of getting out of the country and will work together to make the country stronger. If they do that it will get entrepreneurs investing in small businesses in Quebec.

It is about the willingness of people. It is not banks or governments that get businesses going. It is individual people who are prepared to put up everything they have in the world, including their homes and borrowing money from their friends and their families, because they have a dream or an idea to see through to fruition. We should be celebrating the fact that we have these people. These are the people we should be asking in Quebec, because there is systemically high unemployment, how we can go about reversing it.

Let us provide stability. Let us make sure that when people start businesses, particularly in Quebec, they do not have to go through never ending navel gazing, gnashing and worrying about tribalism and nationalism in Quebec. Why would anybody put up with that if they could invest their money in a jurisdiction that does not have such problems?

We have these wonderful people who have invested of themselves. They have put their hopes, dreams and aspirations on the line. What happens when they go into a bank? I can speak from personal experience because I have gone through it, as have other members of the House, many people watching on television today and perhaps a few others who might read the debate.

It is not like going into K–Mart or some other store where they shake hands and say: "We are glad to see you. What can we do for you?" The first thing they say is: "Are you going to do that? We already have a few of these. Didn't you know that somebody just went broke doing this a while ago? If you are to do this, if you are to set up this service, if you are do that, you had better make sure that you can guarantee the borrowing of $1,000 with $2,000".

Instead of the entrepreneur being encouraged, the first remark that comes through is: "We have to protect our depositors' money. Therefore we have to make sure that we do not take any risk at all because you want to borrow $75,000 or $100,000". That is what got the Government of Canada into small business loans in the first place. We ended up as a nation guaranteeing loans that rightly should have been the purview of the banks.

The banks have a licence to print money in Canada. When is the last time we saw a small, humble bank building? In every city in Canada the four pillars on the four corners of shiny office buildings are bank buildings. That is the way it is. Meanwhile the people of Canada through the tax base are subsidizing the banks. That is what this is all about.

When they went into banks to get loans, the loan officers said that they could not have them because they did not have enough money. The banks had their houses, first born, bicycles and cars. The banks had everything they had in the world but they still did not have enough money for them to feel safe and secure about lending money. If they can lend money to another country and write it off that is okay, but they did not have anything for the small business person, the entrepreneur, the dreamer.

What happens then? The government has to step in and through the Small Business Loans Act guarantee the bank about 95 per cent of the loan at a rate of about 1.5 per cent above prime. Generally speaking any other business paid prime plus two, so there was an obvious magnetic pull to write all small business loan transactions that could possibly be written by the banks and have them guaranteed by the people of Canada, which did not make any sense at all.

The previous legislation raised it so at least the interest rate charged was on par or a little more than the interest rate charged to people who did not have a government guarantee. The amount that would be guaranteed by the government was to be reduced somewhat as well.

As earlier speakers have said, the problem with financing small businesses is not how much people have to pay for the money, within reason. The problem is how to go about getting money in the first place. No matter how good the business plan, if the business person does not have a track record, does not have money and cannot guarantee at least 200 per cent, the chances of getting the loan are somewhat remote. This is why the Government of Canada and the people of Canada, through the Small Business Loans Act, are in the business of protecting the banks. The banks will not do it unless we hold them harmless through the Small Business Loans Act.

In a perfect world we should not be in this business at all. That is what banks should be doing. However we are not in a perfect world. We need to ensure we nurture and help small business people or entrepreneurs. That is why the legislation is so worthwhile and necessary.

However our job as members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition is to oppose bills not just because we want to oppose them but because we in opposition in Parliament can cause the government to rethink some aspects of its bills and make them better. If all we did every time the government brought forward a bill was to say it was great, roll over and not pay any attention, we would not be fulfilling our function as opposition in the Parliament of Canada.

While it is basically a very good bill it has a flaw I would like to point out to members opposite. I hope the government sees the error of its ways and changes it. The amount of money involved in a guarantee could be changed by order in council. It would not have to come back to the House to be debated. That sets a fairly bad precedent. We are talking about the financial responsibility of the Government of Canada and a change to the financial responsibility of the Government of Canada. These decisions should not be decided in a backroom somewhere, even if the backroom has a cabinet table. They absolutely must see the light of day. They must have sunshine, that being the best disinfectant of all. These decisions should come back to the House. In a majority situation it is not likely they will be changed anyway. The government will have its day no matter what the opposition might have to say about it. The bill would be improved somewhat if the provision in it, which allows the government by order in council to change the ratios, was amended so that it had to come back to the House.

I should like to spend a few minutes talking about small business people and where we are going a bit off the rails. The people of Canada who are prepared to give of themselves as entrepreneurs to create wealth and employment across the country are very often at great risk to themselves and to the capital they have built up. They should in some way be honoured. It seems passing strange that the people most revered and honoured in society are hockey players, for instance, who might earn a couple of million dollars a year playing hockey but have never created a job or actually put their lives on the line.

Some accounting firms and chambers of commerce are beginning to recognize that as a nation we need to applaud and encourage entrepreneurship and innovation. To be an entrepreneur or an innovator who creates wealth is a necessary and fundamentally important function any citizen can provide.

I recall attending a meeting sponsored by the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce. The person who appeared at the meeting came from a small town in Colorado. He had won a prestigious international award. His company had gone from nothing to worldwide sales of approximately $500 million a year. His company manufactured tapes used on computers to back up the memory. They cannot make mistakes with these tapes; they have to be highly precise.

The town in Colorado had an IBM manufacturing facility. IBM wanted to move it to Florida or some such place. Many key people in the business did not want to leave their town because of the life they could lead there; they loved living there. Rather than moving they left the company. They thought to themselves that they were smart, innovative people and wondered what they could do. They decided they would make the world's best recording device, magnetic tapes for computers. They did it by innovation.

He drew to our attention that the town had since become the hub of innovation and entrepreneurship. The people in that town have a week in which to celebrate the leadership derived from small business people. The innovators and entrepreneurs are part of the social fabric of the town. They have star status because the people understand the value of entrepreneurship and innovation.

All across the land thousands of men and women, young and old, have put everything they own on the line with the bank to support their small businesses. They are truly the stars of our economic system. They are the people we should be celebrating, not the big business people who have grants, handouts and loans from the government. It just makes one sick. The bigger the business is, the bigger the hand is into the banking system and into the government system. This is what we must put a stop to. It is wrong to have our priorities so misplaced that we do not recognize what small business people and entrepreneurs contribute to our society when all we can look at are the big mega stars.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you and my colleagues for the opportunity to make the case for small business in our country. I applaud anything we can do to build and strengthen that sector of our economy.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I took note especially of the part of the hon. member's speech which dealt with the question that has been on the minds of most Canadians over the past few months. It is the question of Quebec separation and its impact on the small business community in Quebec. I thank the hon. member for his comments on that. They made a lot of sense.

The fact remains that in an independent Quebec it would be a lot more difficult for small business people. Certainly the surveys that have been conducted throughout the referendum bring this to light.

In a survey that was conducted by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce of people who create the jobs in Quebec, the small business people, almost two–thirds, 64 per cent, of Quebec businesses believe that Quebec's economic prosperity would be diminished under separation. A strong majority, 55 per cent, believe that the business relations and trade with the rest of Canada would worsen under separation. More than a majority, 53 per cent, of Quebec businesses believe that their benefits and profitability would diminish if Quebec voted yes.

In another public opinion survey almost all the respondents, 93 per cent, expect long and difficult negotiations with the rest of Canada in the event of a yes vote. More than four out of five people, 83 per cent, think that Quebec's separation from Canada would have a negative impact on Quebec's economic development.

There is another survey of small business owners. Almost two–thirds of the small business owners in this survey chose Canada. They felt that the best route, the best way for their own economic prosperity would be through staying in Canada.

I think back to my own experience in a rural part of our country. I know the hon. member is from a big city and talked about the banks in the big city. In terms of small business people in rural Canada, obviously farming and farmers are a critical component to the small businesses in rural Canada and rural Quebec also. The whole question of supply management and where that goes in a separate Quebec is a major question.

These people should not be fooled. We brought in supply management a number of years ago with the support of Quebec farmers who were a major part in getting that. The whole concept behind supply management is that we are able to protect the local market, our current market under GATT and international rules. If Quebec becomes a separate country that will not be the case. They will not be able to protect that market.

Today in the industrial milk area Quebec holds about 47 per cent of the Canadian market. It is a very important aspect of it. The hon. member knows that. It would be folly to say to Quebec dairy and supply managed farmers that they would be any better off in a separate Quebec. In fact the whole nature of it would fall down. Granted, it would not only hurt Quebec dairy farmers, it would also hurt Canadians.

I ask the hon. member if he is aware of these statistics and these polls. Is he aware of the fact that the majority of Quebec's small business people feel that they would be much better off in Canada?

• (1635)

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite raises a valid point. As a matter of fact even as we speak the tariff on milk is 350 per cent.

It just absolutely boggles the mind how members of the yes group are able to go through Quebec like Johnny Appleseed spreading these little bits of misinformation all over the place. This debate is on a level that has no intellectual veracity or honesty in it whatsoever. The debate is purely cosmetic. People who scratch below the surface of the debate will understand very quickly just how devastating the result of a yes vote will be to the people of Quebec. It will hurt everybody in Canada, but it will hurt the people in Quebec far more.

The tragedy is that nothing the Quebec nationalists want to achieve can be achieved outside of Canada that cannot be achieved within Canada. In my view, the very protection of the language and culture they profess to be so concerned about is better protected within Canada. Anyone can bet that on a wide open North American market the French of Quebec will very soon be like the French of Louisiana. They just will not have the bulwark of Canada to protect them.

Lest anyone in Quebec who is watching this thinks that my words are hollow and empty, they should be aware of trade by Quebec with the rest of the country. The hon. member's question has given me the opportunity to put this on record. Lest anyone thinks that a free ride will be achieved by the people of Quebec in terms of their economic future, they should keep in mind that in 1989, the last year for which accurate figures are available, interprovincial trade in Quebec had a balance per year of $1.8 billion dollars in favour of Quebec. If they think that would happen after a yes victory, they can think again. The bulk of that was in protected industries.

That brings us to the free trade agreement, internal trade barriers and how ludicrous it was for us to get involved and the hypocrisy of government members opposite supporting the free trade agreement now when they did not in opposition. I supported it wholeheartedly as a private business person. I certainly did not support the method by which the Conservative government took us down the road to free trade. This is apropos in my view to what is likely going to happen to the people of Quebec if they were to be irrational and vote yes.

We went into the free trade agreement and got clobbered as a country. We did so because we went into the agreement with the highest interest rates we had historically, the highest dollar we had historically and industries across the country which had been protected by tariff barriers for many years. Our industries were not competitive with those in the United States. Is it any wonder we got clobbered. Imagine the Monty Python movie "In Search of the Holy Grail". We were the knight at the bridge and when we finished we had the knife in our teeth and no arms or legs. All we could say was: "Fight fair".

I saw our chief negotiator, Simon Reisman, on the Sparks Street Mall the other day. I wanted to ask him: "Did you not think about this?" I have really wondered about this. Surely the government of the day must have been aware of the situation we were getting ourselves into. Maybe it was not, but it certainly should have been.

If that happened to us as a country, what is going to happen to Quebec as a country in a free trade arrangement with Canada and the United States? Will Quebec have a high dollar? Probably not. Will it have high interest rates? Very likely. Will Quebec have industries that are capable of competing efficiently in the North American market? Probably not. Are they going to have an easy ride of it? Probably not.

• (1640)

It would seem to me to be very prudent for those people in Quebec who are wondering whether or not they should vote yes or no, if they choose to vote yes, the one thing they can be absolutely assured of is they will be paying a financial premium for many years for voting yes. They will have many years to think about it because it is not something that will cure itself overnight.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the comments made by the hon. member for Edmonton—South West come very close to being a threat, when he says that Quebec better not think that the day after a Yes vote it will be just as easy to negotiate from province to province, and so forth, but in a way that is distinctly ominous.

However, I agreed with what he said when he commended the business community on its initiative, courage, determination and vision of the future. The Bloc Quebecois and, in fact, all Quebecers could not agree more. These people are driving 85 per cent of our economy, at present.

However, I fail to understand why, in the same breath, he attacks the people of Quebec who had the initiative, the courage and the vision to choose a country for themselves. That he does not like.

So I want to ask the hon. member this: When he says Quebec had better not think it will be easier, should we take this as a threat or simply as the way people talk who cannot tolerate the fact that others decide to simply make a decision?

[English]

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not a threat. It is a statement of the reality of the situation that faces all of Canada, but will face the people of Quebec to a greater degree for a longer period of time than it will everybody else. It is not a threat. It is a statement of the obvious. It is a statement of fact.

In the democratic process people are elected and there is a fiduciary trust responsibility we are prepared to accept the moment we stand for election. That is in everything we do, we will do it not for the betterment or enrichment of ourselves or for self–aggrandizement but we will work for the people who have entrusted their lives to us as their members of Parliament, their elected representatives.

When a person is elected to high office, which is a member of Parliament, there is a trust responsibility to do the very best one can in the interests of the people being served. It then follows that it should be to protect their economic, cultural and ideological interests. It should not be to take them down a treacherous path when they are standing above a precipice. That is not the fiduciary trust responsibility of a person elected to high public office in Quebec or anywhere else in Canada.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Before we continue the debate, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden—pharmaceutical products; the hon. member for Davenport—the environment.

[English]

Mr. Tony Valeri (Lincoln, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the subject of Bill C–99, the act to amend the Small Business Loans Act.

• (1645)

I will make some comments a little later on entrepreneurs because they are really the heroes of Canada. I echo the comments made by an earlier speaker that entrepreneurs are really the basis of what makes up the country. We need to create the climate to encourage entrepreneurship.

My colleagues have spoken at length about the specifics of this bill but I will talk about how the amendments to the Small Business Loans Act fit into the federal government's plan to create a climate for business growth in Canada.

It is often said a business plan is only as good as the economic foundations on which it is built. The federal government has targeted the national debt as the number one impediment to business growth. That is why last February the Minister of Finance introduced a budget that will cut $29 billion over the next three years, the largest set of budget cuts since Canada demobilized after the second world war.

We also undertook at the same time a thorough review of federal government administration and spending in the non–social program area. The objectives were to get government right, to ensure taxpayers were getting value for money and to encourage Canadians toward building a more innovative economy.

The result of this has been a major change in our approach to sector development in industry and in the role and function of the industry department. It is obvious old style industrial development strategies are no longer workable. Some might argue they never were, but our goal as a government is not to affix blame for the past but to set a course for the future.

The challenges for government, for Industry Canada in particular, are to help small business compete and to promote a business environment that will lead to job creation, a competitive economy that is a thriving economy, one that will take Canada to its rightful place in the global economy.

Small and medium size businesses are leading the way in terms of innovation and job creation, there is no question. I meet with constituents regularly, small business people and entrepreneurs who come to the constituency office and share their ideas and their enthusiasm to create employment and make Canada a better place to live.

During the 1980s in Canada small and medium size businesses were responsible for 87 per cent of all new jobs created. Since the last recession they have accounted for over 90 per cent of the net new jobs created. On average about 300,000 firms or self–employed entrepreneurs have started a business every year for the past 10 years. SMEs account for almost two–thirds of the private sector employment.

The main thrust of government support in industry must be small business, I think we are all in agreement in the House. Small business has a major role to play in reducing unemployment. Despite the fact that small business is clearly the way of the future in Canada, there are still too many impediments to SMEs truly coming into their own. One of our priorities is to reduce or eliminate those impediments wherever possible.

A fundamental impediment is the access to adequate financing. The banks explained to us on the industry committee the improvements they are making in this area. Entrepreneurs and small business owners stated the difficulties they are having accessing capital. It is crucial for us to deal with this issue. The availability of capital has been a source of frustration, no question.

SBLA loans have played an integral part in helping small businesses gain access to capital needed for start–ups, expansion and growth. The program's success both as an economic development tool and as an example of public sector–private sector co–operation has inspired similar government programs at both the federal and provincial levels.

Since 1961 more than 420,000 SBLA loans, totalling over $15.5 billion, have been made to small business. Virtually every small business in Canada is now eligible to borrow under the SBLA program providing that its annual gross revenues do not exceed $5 million. We are targeting the small business sector.

• (1650)

In recent years the SBLA program has been running at an annual government cost of $20 million to $30 million. However, following a significant program change effective April 1, 1993 the annual lending activity increased from $500 million to $2.5 billion in 1993–94 and to over $4 billion in 1994–95.

Assuming a continuation of the historical loss rate, this meant the annual program costs would increase by over $100 million. Clearly this was a threat to the sustainability of the program.

The potential cost of the program and the government's overall need for deficit control required that the program be brought to full cost recovery. With respect to full cost recovery, it is interesting to note that the users of this program both on the small business side and the lenders side, the parties that have been consulted, support the move to cost recovery.

Through the consultation period the government has asked for input on the changes to the program and it is reflected in what we are seeing here today.

Recommendations of the industry committee and the small business working committee were also taken into account. All stakeholders supported the move to full cost recovery. Two major changes were made through regulatory amendments with an effective implementation date of April 1, 1995.

First, a new 1.25 per cent annual administration fee is being charged on each lender's average outstanding balance of SBLA loans made after March 31, 1995. Second, the maximum interest rate that a lender can charge under the program has been increased by 1.25 per cent to prime plus 3 per cent for floating rate loans and to the residential mortgage rate plus 3 per cent for fixed rate loans.

To complete the move to full cost recovery and improve the administration of the program, other changes are now being made by Bill C–99. These proposed changes will allow the release of security, including personal guarantees, improve the government guarantee coverage for small lenders, and provide for the introduction of a government processing fee on lenders' claims.

To add flexibility to the program and permit the easier fine tuning, parliamentary approval is being sought so that future changes to the level of government guarantee can be implemented through the regulatory rather than the legislative process.

It was stated earlier that the one change the third party would recommend is an amendment to this part of the bill. In the consultations I have had with small business, one of the criticisms it has had of government policy is that government is often unable to react quickly when a situation changes.

Business groups have often asked for greater flexibility to deal with these issues. It is exactly that which this part of the bill is reacting to, adding the flexibility to the program and permitting the easier fine tuning.

These changes also mean that the SBLA will be better targeted toward small businesses that really need its help. An estimated 30 per cent to 40 per cent of SBLA loans go to businesses able to access normal commercial financing.

After the changes financially strong businesses will switch to lower cost commercial financing. During the consultations small businesses told us repeatedly that the primary issue is access to capital and not the cost of financing.

When I meet with entrepreneurs in my community, as we all do as members of Parliament, they are looking for the opportunity, the chance to make their idea work. They appeared before the industry committee. They have met with their members of Parliament. The message is getting through. By making this change we will be targeting the SBLA program at start–up companies and companies in the expansion mode that need capital.

• (1655)

During the consultations small businesses told us that making the SBLA self–sustaining will ensure continued access. We agree with that.

We have been told repeatedly, I am sure the third party would agree, that the best thing government can do for business, large and small, is to get the deficit under control. The proposed changes to the SBLA are a step in that direction. The proposed changes will ensure it remains an effective and viable instrument of support for small business in Canada. It will certainly remain an integral element of our comprehensive plan to create a business climate which will enable Canadian small business to grow and create jobs in the global economy.

The objective of the bill is to continue the process of the modernization and improvement of small business. The proposed changes relieve Canadian taxpayers of the financial burden of the program. We have been asked to do that.

Small business created 90 per cent of new jobs in 1994. The government has placed support for small business at the top of its agenda for jobs and growth.

It is crucial that we continue to bring forward bills which will help to create a climate that will encourage entrepreneurs to continue to dream and create their own companies. They will help Canada by creating employment. That is the thrust of the bill. We must convince the banks that small business people and entrepreneurs are the cornerstone of our economy; they are our future.

This and the other bills the government has brought forward are the end result of the consultation process. We have gone to the stakeholders and we have asked for their input. They have given us direction. This bill reflects that direction. It is also the result of what we have been doing in the standing committee.

We are moving in the right direction as we continue to improve access to capital for small business and encourage entrepreneurs to go forward and do what they do best, create their own small businesses, improve the economic climate and encourage other individuals to do the same. I ask all members of the House to support the bill.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

GRANDPARENTS DAY

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider designating the second Sunday in September of each year as grandparents day in order to acknowledge their importance to the structure of the family in the nurturing, upbringing and education of children.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me today to speak on Motion No. 273. This motion flows from Bill C–274, a private member's bill I introduced on September 27, 1994, an act respecting a national grandparents day in Canada.

I am pleased to have the support of my own party and that of the opposition parties with regard to this very important issue. It is important that the House recognize the contribution of grandparents and the critical role they play in strengthening the family.

Grandparents have always been important to society. One step removed from the parenting process, they can share with their children the experience and wisdom they have gained. They provide a link to the treasures of family history and can provide an objective second opinion on a wide variety of important issues facing the family today.

Many of my fellow members have addressed this issue and have gone on record as supporting the creation of a national grandparents day. In so doing, many have expressed personal memories of their grandparents and the role played by these most important relatives. Thoughtful, caring and loving, these role models cannot be underestimated in their importance in the development of young people who themselves will most likely be parents someday.

Grandparents have always been important to the vitality of the extended family but never more so than in today's society. With the increase in family breakdowns the relationship between grandparents and grandchildren has taken on even greater importance.

As we see more and more single parent families, the need for additional support and nurturing becomes more important today than ever. By officially recognizing the role grandparents play we emphasize the importance of this role in society and honour those grandparents who rise to the challenge and continue to provide love, that most important of commodities, to the most vulnerable victims, the children.

If this motion is adopted, as I hope it will be, grandparents day would give national recognition to the growing number of grandparents in Canada. Many provinces and municipalities have already recognized that grandparents contribute greatly to the family and that they are the basic and fundamental element of our society. It is time the federal government and the House recognized this fact as well.

Often when a family breakdown occurs one parent assumes custody and the children no longer have the opportunity to visit with both sets of grandparents. While this motion does not address this issue directly, it is my hope that the official recognition of grandparents day will provide a focal point to the very important issue of grandparents' rights. If a society acknowledges the importance of grandparents, a certain amount of moral force will come with that recognition. Hopefully, parents in a broken family will realize the importance of the contribution that both sets of grandparents make to the nurturing and well–being of their grandchildren.

We need to express recognition of those elements within our society that are fundamental building blocks of healthy, productive individuals. Other than that of parenting itself, I can think of no more important role than that of a grandparent in fulfilling that responsibility.

As members make their decision whether or not to support Motion No. 273, I ask them to consider the comments of fellow members who are speaking in support of the motion. I am sure their comments will lend force to the argument to officially recognize the contributions grandparents make in the lives of their grandchildren and to society in general.

In closing, I ask members for their support of this very worthwhile effort to create the much needed recognition of the role that grandparents have made in all of our lives. I urge my fellow members to support Motion No. 273 and allow grandparents of the country to celebrate the second Sunday in September every year as national grandparents day.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this House to speak in support of Motion M–273 put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Don Valley North, to designate the second Sunday in September of each year as "Grandparent's Day" in order to acknowledge their importance to the structure of the family in the nurturing, upbringing and education of children.

As the official opposition's critic for seniors organizations, I have always supported similar initiatives to designate a national grandparents' day, because seniors' organizations across the country, and in my riding of Argenteuil—Papineau in particular, are in favour of this kind of acknowledgement.

Grandparents play a crucial role for their grandchildren, providing a degree of stability and continuity that is so essential to them. Unfortunately, the situation is sometimes complicated by mariage breakdown and remarriage, with values often being disrupted in the process. But grandparents can help insofar as they are able and available during the transition period.

Seniors and grandparents can be instrumental in improving cohesion within the family. Grandparents act as the thread connecting the past, the present and the future. Many teenagers feel they stand alone against the problems of daily living. In 1993, in Quebec, seniors from Le Pélican seniors club, in co–operation with the Villeray local community service center, in Montreal, and the Regroupement inter–organismes pour une politique familiale au Québec, founded La Maison des grands–parents, or grandparents' house.

Grandparents welcome their children and grandchildren in this house, which is a co–ordination centre for family action. The house's goals are to foster social involvement, help prevent problems inherent to disadvantaged and isolated families, and promote reconciliation and co–operation within and between families.

Then, other seniors from various golden age clubs in Quebec founded centres with similar goals. In my riding of Argenteuil—Papineau, teenagers from the Vert–Pré drop in centre in Huberdeau and seniors from the gold age association in Saint–Adolphe–d' Howard worked together on a self–help project.

In June 1993, the general meeting of the Quebec Federation of Senior Citizens came out in support of bringing grandparents and their grandchildren closer together. It was the federation's contribution to the International Year of the Family. There are also groups of caring grandparents in various regions of Quebec. The purpose of these organizations is to put grandparents or seniors, both singles and couples, in touch with families with young children.

• (1735)

Their goal is to promote intergenerational contact, to help and support young families, to recognize the experience of grandparents and allow them to play an active role in society. This description of some projects is not restrictive, and I urge all seniors to take the steps required to create similar projects.

As a representative of seniors' organizations, I have always sought to ensure that the government does not penalize seniors. I took part in the debate on Bill C–54, which has a special impact on seniors' pensions through the Canada pension plan and old age security. We in the Bloc Quebecois proposed a series of amendments to protect seniors, who would otherwise be penalized by Bill C–54. Unfortunately, these amendments were rejected by the government.

I also spoke to Bill C–232, an act to amend the Divorce Act. The purpose of this bill is to exempt grandparents from having to obtain special leave of the court to apply for an interim, standing or variation order with respect to custody of or access to their grandchildren.

I am personally very concerned about the old age pension reform announced by the government, which will take effect in 1997 and possibly earlier.

In 1994, the government announced the production of a document to be tabled. It delayed the release of that document, preferring to wait until after the Quebec referendum. Thanks to the hearings held by the Commission des aînés sur l'avenir du Québec, our seniors had an opportunity to express their views regarding their future. That consultation process showed that the concerns of seniors are similar everywhere in the country, and have to do with their social and economic situation.

We are all convinced of the major influence that grandparents and seniors have on the development of children and on the well–being of families. We must give grandparents the place that should be theirs in the family context, and we must make all Canadians aware of the importance of their role.

Grandparents are an essential source of affection, understanding and experience which strengthens the family. They must be integrated to the family life.

In conclusion, the official opposition supports the motion of the member for Don Valley North asking the government to designate the second Sunday in September of each year as Grandparents Day, in order to acknowledge their importance to the structure of the family in the nurturing, upbringing and education of children.

I thank the hon. member on behalf of all the organizations representing the elderly, and also on behalf of all grandparents, young and not so young, for emphasizing their contribution to our society.

Finally, I want to point out that, should Quebecers vote in favour of sovereignty on October 30, Quebec might also recognize the contribution of its elderly and designate the second Sunday in September of each year as Grandparents Day.

[English]

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for Don Valley North for having his Motion No. 273 selected and deemed votable.

In this motion the government is being asked to consider designating the second Sunday in September of each year as grandparents day. I am very familiar with this issue as I also presented before this House on June 22, 1995, Bill C–259 asking for a national grandparents day on the second Sunday in September. I am aware that the member for Don Valley North also presented a bill asking for a grandparents day. Unfortunately, neither of our bills was votable.

It is fitting and proper that this 35th Parliament finally corrects a wrong against our senior citizens. It does not cost taxpayers any money for the government to recognize our seniors, the oldest group in our society which is becoming more plentiful as Canadians live healthier and longer lives. I would like to draw members' attention right now to the gallery where grandparents are waiting to hear the verdict of today's motion.

1994 was the Year of the Family. As I have stated many times, the family is our basic unit in society. We need to keep our families strong. There is a natural progression here: from strong families come strong communities; from strong communities come strong provinces and states; and from strong provinces and states come strong countries.

Again, if a country is to remain strong, its people must be strong, for a country reflects the value of its people. Who teaches the values to children? The parents. Who taught them? Their parents, the elders in each of our families, the grandparents and the great grandparents, those who have experience and are wise in the ways of the world. We all realize that the best way to be wise is through personal experience and hardships.

Many of today's seniors and grandparents are very active. Many are still in the workforce. Many are in volunteer organizations. My point is that these grandparents and great grandparents have given their fair share to society and many are still giving. If we are wise, all Canadians will show our seniors how much we appreciate them.

In times of restraint there is no money for new programs, especially programs for children. Patience, caring, knowledge, experience, time and love are what are needed to work with children. Our seniors have all of these requirements. Many are already giving countless volunteer hours to children.

Recognition of grandparents day is really recognition of grandchildren and their relationship to the future of our country. When we talk about respecting our grandparents, we are reinforcing the rights of our grandchildren.

Lifting the role of grandparents gives recognition to the interests of our grandchildren. It provides a bridge between the age gaps of young and old. When we see seniors working with young children, we realize there really are no age gaps. They converse very well together and understand each other very well. What better way for children and parents to say thank you than by having a nationally recognized day to visit grandparents and pay respect to these seniors?

At present I am honoured to be representing Canadian grandparents in their fight to see their grandchildren after a divorce. Too often, many are cut out of their grandchildren's lives just because the custodial parent does not think the children should continue to see their grandparents. Often it is the grandparents who in difficult times can reinforce the stability and love in a grandchild's life through a difficult divorce. In the United States where the rights of grandparents to see their grandchildren are recognized, over five million grandparents are raising their grandchildren.

So many seniors want to be grandparents that there is even an organization called Volunteer Grandparents. A very good friend of mine who has never married became a volunteer grandparent about 15 years ago. It is a very special part of her life.

We have an opportunity here to recognize all grandparents. Let us be positive and agree to this motion.

Many in the House may wonder if the rest of Canada feels that the recognition of grandparents is wanted within our country. Nancy Wooldridge, president of the Canadian Grandparents Association in British Columbia and her membership wrote to all the municipalities in British Columbia asking for their assistance in proclaiming the second Sunday in September 1995 past, which was September 10, to be declared grandparents day. The response was incredible. I have only some replies with me today but in recognition of what those communities have done, I think I should share them.

Quesnel city council proclaimed September 10 as grandparents day. Mayor Robert Bowes declared the week of September 10 to 16 as volunteer grandparents week in Surrey. September 10, 1995 was proclaimed as grandparents day in the district of Metchosin. Ralph Drew, mayor of the village of Belcarra proclaimed September 10, 1995 as grandparents day.

Ted Nebbeling, mayor of the resort municipality of Whistler, proclaimed September 10, 1995 as grandparents day in the resort of Whistler. Mayor Robert G. McMinn proclaimed September 10, 1995 as grandparents day in the district of Highlands.

On behalf of the village council and the citizens of Keremeos, Mayor Robert White declared September 10 as grandparents day.

Mayor Ernie Palfrey was pleased to proclaim September 10, 1995 as grandparents day in the district of Coldstream. On behalf of the city council and the citizens of Fort St. John, Stephen Thorlakson, mayor of Fort St. John, proclaimed September 10, 1995 as grandparents day. Mayor Mike Patterson proclaimed September 10, 1995 as grandparents day in the city of Cranbrook.

• (1745)

Kevin Mitchell, acting mayor of the city of Fernie, proclaimed September 10, 1995 grandparents day. The Trail council has considered my letter dated August 17 requesting council proclaim September 10 grandparents day. It has agreed to issue the proclamation.

Bob Cross, mayor of Victoria, British Columbia, proclaims September 10, 1995 grandparents day. Mayor Don Lockstead of Powell River at the regular council meeting proclaimed September 10 grandparents day. Marlene Grinnell, mayor of city of Langley, proclaims September 10 grandparents day.

John Bergbusch, mayor of city of Callwood, declares September 10 grandparents day. Oak Bay proclaims September 10 grandparents day. James Lomie, mayor of the district of Campbell River, proclaims September 10 grandparents day.

The Kitimat municipal council proclaims September 10 grandparents day. Ross Imrie, mayor of the district of North Saanich, proclaims September 10 grandparents day. Louis Sekora, mayor of the city of Coquitlam, proclaims September 10 grandparents day.

Parksville declares September 10 grandparents day. At Sechelt's regular council meeting mayor Duncan Fraser was pleased to proclaim September 10 grandparents day.

Osoyoos' meeting of council on September 5 resolved that September 10 be proclaimed grandparents day. Gary Korpan, mayor of the city of Nanaimo, proclaims September 10 grandparents day.

James Stuart, mayor of the city of Kelowna, proclaims September 10 grandparents day. John Les, mayor of the district of Chilliwack, proclaims September 10 grandparents day. Greg Halsey–Brant, mayor of Richmond, proclaims September 10 grandparents day.

John Backhouse, mayor of city of Prince George, proclaims September 10 grandparents day. Philip Owen, mayor of the city of Vancouver, proclaims September 10 grandparents day.

I do not know how this got in here. It is from Calgary: "On behalf of the city council and the citizens of Calgary, I hereby proclaim September 10 grandparents day".

These are only some of the responses received by the B.C. chapter of the Canadian Grandparents Association to honour our grandparents in 1995.

I cannot speak for all of Canada but I can surely speak for the cities and communities in British Columbia. British Columbians already recognize the contributions made by our grandparents, our seniors in Canadian society.

I respectfully request that we as members of Parliament recognize the tremendous ongoing contributions by our grandparents on behalf of all Canadians by recognizing from now on the second Sunday in September as official grandparents day.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Don Valley North, to designate the second Sunday in September grandparents day.

I have spoken out on the significance of grandparents in the House on a number of occasions. Grandparents play an irreplaceable role in the life of Canadian families. They form a stable link in a rapidly changing world. Where there is fragmentation because of divorce or separation they bring continuity. Today many families are headed by single parents and where there are two parents they are often found both working outside the home.

The significance and value of grandparents have increased beyond belief. I do not hold grandparents to be glorified babysitters but rather as parents' surrogates who bring love, a continuance of generational values and a sense of the child's worth to the integrity of the family.

I speak from personal knowledge and with emotion about the importance of grandparents because I was brought up by a grandparent. My parents both worked outside the home for most of my life with them. They needed to for economic reasons. It was my grandmother who nurtured me, gave me a sense of worth and moulded in many ways the course my life was to take.

• (1750)

My grandmother was my role model, my mentor and my confidant. As a strong feminist woman long before the term was invented, she taught me to be bold and confident, to stand up for my beliefs, to change things when I did not like them, to be an active participant in changing my society and my world.

Mr. Speaker, I would be so bold as to say I stand before you today because of my grandmother. Yet I have never been able to celebrate her contribution to my life. We all celebrate Mother's Day, Father's Day, Remembrance Day. We have dedicated weeks to promote breast cancer awareness, AIDS, violence against women, but we have never celebrated the worth of our grandparents to the family, to society and to future generations.

Grandparents have enriched our lives by their presence. They represent the past, our history to us in their stories, in their lifestyles and in their values. Through them we gain a sense of the continuity of humankind and through us they live forever.

I once remarked that if grandparents did not exist in nature we would have invented them because they are the embodiment of the concept of family. Because of the reverence and love I feel for my grandmother I cannot wait to be a grandparent so I can completely emulate her as my role model. Unfortunately my sons do not seem willing to comply at this time.

You do not need children of your own to be a grandparent. In British Columbia there is a volunteer grandparent's association whose members adopt, figuratively speaking, children who are not fortunate enough to know or who do not have a biological grandparent close at hand. As we all know, in this vast land of ours families can live far away from each other and many families do not have an extended family or a grandparent close by. My children did not. These volunteer grandparents bridge that gap and bring to hundreds of B.C. children the warmth and experience of having a grandparent.

Grandparents bring a sense of trust. They help us to feel safe because no matter what happens they are our refuge against often cranky parents.

In many cultures grandparents are historians. In others they are the heads of households. They bring wisdom and warmth, joy and stability, and the list of their worth goes on and on.

I will finish today by quoting the words of one young constituent who has expressed so simply the importance of her grandmother:

> The first day I was brought into this world I met my grandmother. I have come to know her very well. These past 17 years she has been there for me almost as much as my parents. My grandmother is a very special part of my life. She was the one who took care of me when I was sick or cheered me up when I was down. I get to see her almost once a week.
> My grandmother is the most interesting lady I know. She is an artist, a chef and a seamstress. This lady has a good eye for fashion and style and she always knows just what to buy me. I heard all grandmothers are good cooks but my grandmother is one of the finest. She supplies the birthday dinners and cakes for the whole family. No matter how much her grandchildren whine and complain she always keeps her cool and has great patience with us all. I am extremely lucky to have such a wonderful grandmother. Not everyone is so fortunate.
> She is the type of lady who is always doing special things for you and is always trying to please. My grandmother means the world to me. I hope she remains with me for many years to come.

By passing this bill we will make that wish come true.

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have seconded this motion put forward by my colleague, the member for Don Valley North, on the selection of grandparents day in Canada, Motion No. 273.

I believe the motion will be a model for the world by showing that Canada pays respect to grandparents, to seniors, whose love, wisdom and caring for their daughters and sons, for their grandchildren, are truly recognized.

It is my honour to support this motion.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I support this motion which would designate the second Sunday in September as grandparents day.

It is appropriate to recognize the members for Don Valley North and Mission—Coquitlam. It must bring a tremendous amount of satisfaction for these members to come to the House in their first term to present a motion that receives the support of all parties and eventually goes through the whole House. I congratulate my colleague.

• (1755)

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion agreed to.)

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you would find unanimous consent to call it 6.30 p.m. and proceed with the adjournment debate.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to call it 6.30 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT DEBATE

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal government is cutting costs and reducing services in our medicare system. In the last budget it drastically cut transfer payments to the provinces and will continue to do so each year over the next three years, reducing health care services further.

Why will the Liberals not enact cost cutting measures that would not reduce services to Canadians yet would save taxpayers a billion dollars a year or more? This could be done by repealing Bill C–91, the drug patent act, passed in the last Parliament. Bill C–91 catered to foreign drug companies that wanted to make more money by extending drug patents to 20 years for prescription drugs, in essence a 20–year monopoly to charge whatever price they want for certain prescription drugs.

In opposition Liberal members of Parliament, such as the current Minister of Health and the Minister of Industry, were present in the House on December 10, 1992 to vote against Bill C–91. Now that they are in government they support the legislation, which is a very major flip–flop.

Bill C–91 has had the effect of costing Canadians billions of dollars in their prescription drug costs. In the past eight years drug prices have increased 13 per cent every year for an accumulated total of 220 per cent. For example, the cost of Tagamet, a drug to treat ulcers, is 78 per cent cheaper when a Canadian generic drug is used instead of the brand name product. This is why our prescription drug costs are skyrocketing. Bill C–91 prevents the generic drug companies from producing cheaper copies of prescription drugs. Pharmaceutical companies have a 20–year monopoly on their patents and a monopoly pricing situation exists to the detriment of the health of Canadians.

Prescription drugs represent over 15 per cent of the total cost of health care in Canada. This amounts to over $11 billion every year. It is a fact that drugs are the fastest growing cost to medicare. It is also one of the most controllable costs to our medicare system because Parliament has the power to put forth legislation that will control the cost of drugs and end price gouging by pharmaceutical drug companies.

Pharmaceutical drug companies employ roughly one sales representative for every three doctors in Canada and spend $10,000 per doctor on promotions. Canadian taxpayers are paying for these promotions while hundreds of millions of dollars of profits are leaving the country and jobs are being cut by the drug companies. These prices have increased 13 per cent each year over the past eight years due to Bill C–91.

While in opposition the Liberals opposed the bill. While in government they are now supporting it. The government must immediately abolish the automatic injunction clause of the patented medicines regulations. The automatic injunction clause adds two more years on top of the 20 years that a drug pharmaceutical company can charge rates and prevent the generic industry from competing. This clause, if abolished, would save Canadians $750 million right off the top.

By repealing Bill C–91 in its entirety Canadians could save $3 billion to $5 billion each year on health care costs through reduction in prescription drugs, equivalent by the way to the Liberal government's cut to medicare funding over the three years proposed in its budget.

Why will the government not do this? Why is the Liberal Party allowing pharmaceutical drug manufacturers to set the agenda? It is a fact that the Liberal Party receives thousands of dollars in donations from foreign drug companies. Is this the reason?

• (1800)

The Liberal Party's inaction to rein in the outrageous brand name price increases is costing Canadians and threatening our health care system. It is time for action. The Liberal government must act immediately to abolish the automatic injunction on prescription drugs and make a commitment to abolish Bill C–91.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the member is absolutely right. In opposition we opposed Bill C–91. I not only opposed it in the House, I set up a display in my office on the Danforth pointing out the difficulties with Bill C–91.

We lost that vote, and the mechanism for Bill C–91 was put in place by the previous government. In many respects it is not unlike the GST. We campaigned vigorously against the GST and we lost in opposition, but the entire infrastructure and the mechanisms for the GST were put in place. When we were given the trust two years ago today, one of the things we had to face was the challenge of doing something about the GST. This bill is in many respects similar to that challenge.

The minister has said that we are currently evaluating the impact of Bill C–91. There is a parliamentary review process that will be invoked in 1997. The challenge presented by the drug patent policy is to ensure that it conforms with all the international trade obligations and supports the development of our pharmaceutical industry while making patented drugs available to Canadian consumers at non–excessive prices.

I want to reassure the member that we are not running away from our concern about what takes place with Bill C–91. He should know that not only the government but many members in the House share many of his views. We are very wise to the marketing in this industry. He will just have to be patient a little longer so that when we attack this issue we will do it in a rational and totally constructive way so that we will not upset the infrastructure that has been put in place and the investment that has already been started.

ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as members will probably recall, in June the Standing Committee on the Environment and Sustainable Development issued a report on the Canadian Environmental Protection Act entitled: "It is about our Health". It is a parliamentary study that aims at pollution prevention in the interest of public health. It was made possible because of extensive hearings with over 100 witnesses from all walks of life in all parts of the country. As a result of that, the committee recommended major changes to the existing act, commonly known as CEPA, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

The changes to the act, which in essence deals with toxic substances, are necessary because at the present time the legislation is too slow in protecting the public from toxic substances. For instance, the complete toxicity assessments for 13 out of the 44 substances placed on the priority list in 1988 have not yet been done. In addition to that, of the 26 substances found to be toxic, only three, those related to chlorofluorocarbons, chlorinated pulp effluents, and PCBs, have been subjected to regulation.

In addition, problems related to enforcement, problems related to biotechnology products, problems related to the role and lifestyle of our aboriginal people, in particular in relation to environmental protection, and problems related to the management of Canada's coastal zones have not been resolved by the act as it exists at the present time. To address these problems, the committee called expert witnesses, scientists and native people, industry, professional organizations, et cetera, to ensure their recommendations would have sound expert support.

The committee's recommendations reflect the principle of sustainable development as set out in the red book, "Creating Opportunity", which was produced in 1993 during the federal election. In addition to that, the committee's report builds on three cabinet documents; namely, the government's toxic substances management policy, the strategic framework for pollution prevention, and the guide to green government. The last one was signed and endorsed by all members of cabinet. Therefore, the report of the committee has as its foundation three substantial documents produced by the present government, and quite rightly so, in support of sustainable development objectives.

To conclude, the report is based on the concept of pollution prevention. The accepted norm for environmental protection policy in industry and governments in the western world is therefore in that report. Every witness before the committee urged that the government adopt pollution prevention, shifting away from the costly approach of reacting and curing to the more efficient approach of anticipating and preventing.

I see that my time is up. I thank you for your indulgence.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have to say through you to my colleague from Davenport, who has led the way for so many of us on environmental issues in this House, that as a government we must pay attention to his words right away.

When I was working on the Hill as a young assistant back in the early 1980s and the member for Davenport was Minister of the Environment, he helped put us on the international map with his campaign on acid rain. I have experienced his passion and his commitment. I have been exposed to his knowledge on this issue on a thousand different occasions.

I can only say to the member for Davenport that his words will be communicated directly to the minister and to the cabinet. With the trust that we as a government have in his advice, I am sure we will be moving on his recommendations in the near future.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

ENVIRONMENT AND SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Standing Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development has the honour to present its sixth report, pursuant to the order of reference made Monday, October 2, 1995.

Your committee reviewed Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese–based substances, and agreed to report it without amendment. A copy of the minutes on this bill is being tabled.

PETITIONS

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I take tremendous pride in representing my community, and the petition I am presenting is one of the reasons. It was organized by Mr. Jakeet Singh, a student at Waterloo collegiate. A year ago a couple of students at WCI decided that with the referendum approaching the youth of Canada would reach out to do their part in having our country remain united.

There are 4,000 signatures on this petition. These citizens of Canada want to see this country remain united from coast to coast, with Quebec as an integral part of our nation.

I am very pleased to present this petition to the House. It is in addition to the many other things done in my community in expressing its love for a united Canada.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present the following petition which comes from all across Canada and contains 1,183 signatures, making a total of over 6,200 signatures to date.

The petitioners request that in memory of Dawn Shaw, a six–year old girl who was murdered in my riding of Comox—Alberni, this petition be brought to the attention of Parliament.

The petitioners request that Parliament enact legislation to change the justice system to provide greater protection for children from sexual assault and to ensure the conviction of offenders.

I fully concur with the petitioners and endorse this petition.

The Speaker: With all respect, we need not endorse nor be against a petition but simply present the petition.

NATIONAL PARKS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of submitting a petition signed by senior citizens of my home province concerning the payment of fees to enter Prince Edward Island's national parks. The petitioners feel they have contributed their share to the economy over the year's enter the parks for sightseeing only and do not use any of the other services offered by the parks.

Accordingly, the petitioners request Parliament to review the policy of charging senior citizens entrance fees to Canada's national parks.

TAXATION

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition circulating all across Canada. It has been signed by a number of Canadians from Uxbridge, Ontario.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession that has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

EMPLOYMENT CENTRES

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint-Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today, I am tabling a petition signed by 10,000 people in my riding, which denounces the cuts in the Martin budget, particularly their impact on our riding's employment centre, whose staff will be reduced from 50 to 15 and which will become a local employment centre.

All those who signed the petition denounce the impact this will have on the regional economy. I am pleased to table this petition today.

CANADIAN FLAG

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by more than 200 people calling on Parliament to recognize that Canada recognizes two official languages but that our flag does not reflect this duality. Being only red and white it does not reflect the blue that has traditionally represented the French speaking population.

[Translation]

The petitioners are asking Parliament to legislate in order to get discussions underway on the renewal of our national emblem to include blue bands within the red borders to symbolize Canada's distinct francophone society and promote unity and harmony within the country. This addition would enhance the beauty of our flag.

[English]

The petition is the initiative of Hank Gigandet, who believes we should renew our Canadian flag.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege of presenting a petition on behalf of a number of my constituents from Stormont—Dundas and over 15,000 Canadians from coast to coast who signed a unity scroll that originated with Mr. Norm Lalonde of Cornwall and several volunteers who have contributed many hours of their time to ask Canadians to sign this unity scroll.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House their belief that all Canadians want the same from life in Canada and that Canadians want the opportunity to prosper, to grow and to preserve the rich heritage and cultures that built our great nation regardless of where we live in this vast country.

To begin this process they invite Canadians, particularly those who reside in Quebec, to stay within the Canadian family and join all Canadians in taking Canada to a united, stronger and greater future.

Therefore the petitioners call on Parliament to unite and continue to build this great country.

RAIL SERVICE

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of petitioners in my riding concerning the government's restructuring of the railroads.

The petition states that rail service is the fastest and most environmentally responsible means of travel and that the subsidies to VIA Rail are not disproportionate to the huge subsidies provided for highway infrastructure.

On behalf of my constituents I present this petition to maintain passenger rail service in Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Group No. 5, Motions Nos. 21 and 22.

[English]

I wish to inform the House that there is an error in the text of Motion No. 1 in the name of the member for Kindersley—Lloydminister. The motion should read:

That Bill C–61, in clause 4, be amended by adding after line 23, on page 2, the following:

"(b) prescribing criteria for determining whether an act or omission shall be proceeded with as a violation or as an offence".

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–61, in clause 4, be amended by adding after line 23, on page 2, the following:

"(b) prescribing criteria for determining whether an act or omission shall be proceeded with as a violation or as an offence".

He said: Mr. Speaker, we are at report stage of Bill C–61, a bill that allows the Department of Agriculture, under the jurisdiction of the minister of agriculture, to impose administrative monetary penalties for a violation to the various acts that were just read in the House and to seek compliance agreements to ensure the violations do not continue in the future.

My party and I support the concept of administrative monetary penalties. We also support the concept of compliance agreements. The House will see in the amendments we have proposed today that none of them would disallow the use of administrative monetary penalties to implement or to penalize violations of acts, particularly those that would affect regulations dealing with agriculture, health, safety and the like. Nor do any of the amendments we propose, including the one we are dealing with right now, preclude the minister reaching a compliance agreement with an offender or with a violator of any of the offences in the acts we are dealing with today.

Our amendments attempt to qualify and quantify the powers of the minister, the powers of the tribunal to which violators can appeal, and to clarify certain parts of the acts and the rights and the responsibilities of both the violator and the minister in enforcing and administering the monetary penalties and forming compliance agreements.

Motion No. 1 is incorrectly printed in the Notice Paper. It says that the minister shall prescribe "criteria for determining whether an act or omission shall be proceeded with as a violation or as an offence". The amendment requires the minister to have regulations determining the differences between a violation which the AMPs address and an offence which the court system addresses. We feel this clarification would respond to some concerns in the industry about the matter.

The Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food was given information by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food that a number of institutions and associations impacted by the legislation support Bill C–61. The parliamentary secretary to the minister of agriculture circulated a list in the committee of several organizations such as the Canadian Horticultural Council, the Canadian Meat Council, the Canadian Animal Health Institute, the Canadian Veterinary Medical Association, the Canadian Nursery Trades Association, the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, the Canadian Seed Growers Association, the Council of Forestry Industries of British Columbia, the Canadian Fertilizer Institute, the National Dairy Council of Canada and the Holstein Association of Canada.

The parliamentary secretary indicated to the committee that all these associations and organizations supported Bill C–61. The list that he circulated in the committee was titled "Organizations which support Bill C–61". He said that he would supply letters of support for the bill to members of the committee. We sought those letters of support, and when we received them only one of the letters was dated after the introduction of Bill C–61. In other words all the letters the parliamentary secretary suggested indicated support for Bill C–61 were written in 1992 and 1993, which is before the current government was elected and before Bill C–61 was in the drafting stage, let alone introduced into the House of Commons.

• (1020)

We took note of what the individuals who wrote those letters said and found that while they supported the concepts of AMPS and compliance agreements, they wanted to review the legislation once drafted and to comment on it.

To my knowledge the minister of agriculture and his officials have not yet supplied us with any letters, other than one letter from the Canadian Meat Council, that actually support Bill C–61. I bring that forward as a concern and as a rationale for some of the amendments we are proposing.

Motion No. 1 would require the minister to have regulations determining the differences between a violation which the AMPS address and an offence which the court system addresses. This must happen in any case. The amendment ensures that the minister is required to do it. The criteria must be more open and more well known in the industry and if the criteria are wrong we will know in advance, before the regulations are administered, whether or not they will be done in a fair and reasonable manner.

Departmental officials say that they are doing a great job of it right now, that they are very fair minded, very reasonable in the way they administer penalties on violations and deal with offences under the acts. That may very well be; I am not here to challenge whether or not they are doing a good job. However over time, situations change. A few years ago we had a Mulroney government that was very arrogant. We may have a Liberal government that becomes more arrogant or we may have some new arrangement in the Parliament of Canada in the years ahead where ministers and departments overstep their bounds.

The amendment is not criticizing the current administration. It is not a criticism of the Department of Agriculture. It is not a criticism of the minister's officials. It is ensuring that in the future the criteria will be very public, that no one could be biased in their determination of whether a violation would follow the AMPS and compliance route or go the court route, perhaps based on someone's politics, on which part of the country they live in or on some other unreasonable criteria unacceptable to Canadians.

The minister must set out a criterion to determine the differences. This minor amendment would ensure that happens. It would ensure the AMPS and the compliance agreements would have a reason for introduction. If the department decided not to go the AMPS route or the compliance agreement route and decided to take the matter to the courts, to the justice system, we would know the criteria on which the decision was made. It is a more open, transparent way of performing one's responsibilities.

I urge the House to accept the amendment. It certainly is not partisan by nature; it certainly is not unreasonable. Therefore I ask for the support of all members.

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity in the House today to deal with Bill C–61 and the various possible motions in amendment that have been put on the Order Paper with respect to Bill C–61.

In beginning the discussion on Motion No. 1, I start by making reference to a matter the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster referred to in his opening remarks, the level of industry support for the measure as it appears in the form of the legislation.

• (1025)

My parliamentary secretary, in dealing with the issue before the committee, indicated that there was broad support for the legislation as it appears before the House of Commons. In indicating the kind of correspondence presented to verify the support, my parliamentary secretary was not in any way misleading or attempting to mislead members of the committee. He stated quite accurately that letters of support had been received for the principle and the concept of the legislation from 11 key industry organizations. The names of the organizations have already been referred to by the hon. member opposite.

Consultation on the legislation began a long time before the bill was actually drafted. In October 1992 Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada wrote to all industry associations to inform them of the intention to move forward with an administrative monetary penalty system. After that consultation various letters of support were received broadly from the industry. Also a variety of industry groups reaffirmed their support for this type of legislation during the regulatory review process conducted by my department during the course of 1992.

Once the bill was actually drafted and tabled in the House of Commons on December 5, 1994, a letter and substantial documentation were sent to 132 industry associations informing them that the bill had been tabled. The letter went on to detail the significant features of the legislation. It specifically provided a contact point to enable further discussion and information upon request from the various industry organizations.

In response we received a few inquiries seeking certain specific clarifications about some detailed points contained in the draft legislation, but there were no letters and no other forms of communication indicating any fundamental change on the part of the industry in terms of support for the legislation.

At the same time a press release was issued to over 1,000 media and industry contacts. It indicated that the legislation had been tabled and that the concepts previously discussed in various forms of consultation had now been transformed into legislative form and were about to proceed through the House of Commons.

As the bill has been before the House for some considerable length of time, various industry representatives have been kept informed of the progress of the legislation. Certainly the indication is that a broad measure of support in the industry continues for Bill C–61.

In view of the concerns expressed at committee stage by members of the opposition wondering if the previous expressions of support continue to the present time, this week my officials have contacted a number of the groups and organizations previously consulted. This week my officials have also spoken with the Canadian Horticulture Council, the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, the National Dairy Council and the Canadian Meat Council. All the organizations again reconfirmed their support for the bill.

While I appreciate the question about earlier support and later support being raised by the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster, the evidence before us indicates fairly clearly that a broad measure of support was there in the beginning and continues to the present time.

Specifically Motion No. 1 talks about the possibility of prescribing in regulations the criteria for determining whether any contravention should be considered as an administrative violation or an offence. I have a couple of observations I would like to make.

At the present time, every contravention can be prosecuted through the court system. This bill gives to the minister of agriculture an administrative option where prosecution is seen to be too harsh or too drastic a measure. In arriving at his or her decision as to whether to proceed immediately through the court system by way of prosecution or proceed under the auspices of administrative monetary penalties, the minister of the day will be guided by a compliance and enforcement policy. That policy establishes criteria to advise and instruct the department in making decisions on the use of the various enforcement options that are available, the more severe and the less severe.

The compliance and enforcement policy is a public document. It would not be prescribed by way of regulation, but it would be on the public record for the public to know about, to understand, to ask questions about, and potentially even to suggest changes to.

The choice to be made by the minister in any given set of circumstances is whether to prosecute or whether to issue a monetary penalty. This is akin to a choice that is often before prosecutors in criminal matters where a decision has to be made about whether to proceed by way of indictment, which is a more serious method of proceeding through the court system, or by way of summary conviction, which is a somewhat less serious method of proceeding.

Because the choice in any given case is so heavily dependent upon the individual facts of the situation, there is obviously a requirement here for some degree of flexibility. I would say to my hon. friend across the way that I do not believe it is practical or realistic to have hard and fast rules set down and prescribed by way of regulations. The necessary flexibility that has to be there in making these judgment calls is best offered by relying on a policy statement, a policy document, rather than trying to etch all of that in the more rigid framework of regulations.

I repeat the point I made earlier. The policy document on compliance and enforcement matters dealing with how decisions are to be made on the choice of the various enforcement options that might be available will be open to the public. One of the fundamental things we are trying to achieve by means of this legislation is an open, fair and transparent process.

I would simply conclude by saying that in making these choices, which are difficult choices and require judgment calls to be made and some measure of flexibility, depending on a wide variety of factual situations that may confront the minister of the day, it is important for these matters to be dealt with in the form of a public policy document as opposed to trying to etch them in the more rigid form of regulations. While I understand the general point my hon. friend is trying to make, I would not be in a position to recommend support for Motion No. 1.

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I must take part in the debate on Bill C–61 today, because this bill cannot be agreed on as presented by the government, on the basis that it would save time and money for the taxpayers.

I entirely agree with the principle, and so does my party, but the government always has to leave the door open to all kinds of adverse consequences.

This bill could have serious consequences in terms of disregard for judicial fairness. If the department introduces a system of monetary penalties, it must be because it believes that this will significantly reduce the need for enforcement actions, thus generating substantial savings for taxpayers.

The big problem is that the government did not foresee the risks that making totally arbitrary decisions on the enforcement of such penalties entail. We object to reducing penalties imposed on offenders by concluding compliance agreements. That is unfair.

It would have been enlightening for the government to advise us of the potential savings resulting from this bill. This legislation contains a totally unacceptable principle, authorizing the person designated by the minister to conclude an agreement with the offender, whose fine would be reduced by $1 for every $2 invested by the business into improving its process, buying new equipment or training its employees. As far as I know, penalties are not negotiable in our justice system. Bargaining fines is not something we do in Quebec. Anyone who was stopped for speeding knows what I mean: either you are guilty and you pay the full amount of the fine or you go to court and let the judge decide.

The existing justice system provides that the person who is guilty of a fault must bear the consequences of his or her actions. Instead, with this bill, a wealthy offender, one who can more easily afford making investments to remedy a particular situation, is rewarded. In the way of unequal treatment, you can hardly find worse. This is preferential treatment based on the financial capability of an individual or business, and that is unfair.

I would also like the government to tell us who will be in charge of assessing the cost of the efforts made by offending individuals or businesses to remedy the situation. Training, equipment, all that can cost more in one region than in another. In a region where it costs more, offenders will be penalized. Moreover, will they be informed of all the means made available to them to correct the situation? And what if an offender, in collusion with suppliers, presented inflated bills? Frankly, there are tax or other incentives which could be used to promote investment and training by companies. For heaven's sake, let us not negotiate penalties.

Another unacceptable provision in this bill is the one which provides for a 50 per cent reduction of the penalty if the offender pays it without appealing the decision or asking for a hearing. With that provision, the government undermines the presumption of innocence. A number of members of this House are lawyers and they know that the presumption of innocence is a fundamental right. Indeed, under our legal system, a person is deemed innocent until there is evidence to the contrary.

Let us take an unclear situation where there would be grounds for challenging the decision. The minister would tell the individual or business that it is in their best interest to keep a low profile, otherwise, they would of course have to submit to a hearing—

An hon. member: You are not discussing the right motion.

Mr. Landry: What is the problem?

An hon. member: You are discussing Motion No. 2.

The Speaker: Is everything all right? Fine. Let us stop for a few seconds and then give the floor to the hon. member for one minute. I have a question.

• (1040)

Does the hon. member wish to continue the debate?

Mr. Landry: Mr. Speaker, I want to address Motion No. 2. I apologize. I spoke too soon. I am sorry.

The Speaker: Thank you. Resuming debate. We are still discussing Motion No. 1. The debate is on Group No. 1.

[English]

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for a westerner to be able to speak to this motion. I begin by pointing out that there has been in both recent and historical terms a need to address the problem this bill and this motion seemingly are dealing with.

The minister is charged with the duty to look at any circumstance in which there has been an infraction under the law and take that circumstance and assess whether or not it is "a very serious situation". Perhaps even out of ignorance a person may become involved in a set of circumstances that really potentially is serious if not checked.

The biggest point that needs to be addressed is the bill and the minister are trying to bring about some compliance to the degree that this infraction or this problem can be rectified.

Under the present situation, every contravention must be prosecuted. The reason the bill is being put in place is to have in place some discretionary powers whereby the bill will in fact still bring about compliance while recognizing that there are some circumstances that need not produce criminal records.

To prescribe by regulation, as the motion puts forward, the criterion for determining whether a contravention should be considered as a violation or an offence perhaps is on the surface rather difficult, but once it gets operating sets of criteria will flow and will become apparent.

I will give a couple of examples. Let us suggest that somebody has entered material into the food chain that is very harmful. This would require penalties that perhaps would be approaching the criminal level and should be dealt with very seriously.

At the standing committee my colleague said perhaps a person who is hauling animals will be putting too many animals into a trailer and unknowingly breaking the regulations. Consequently, all we need to do is deal with that individual on a user friendly basis.

I feel the motion on the criteria situation is one that in time will flow and the decision on whether or not to prosecute or put in place the monetary penalties when necessary will bring about the desired effect of compliance. The minister has the duty to make known what those criteria are as the events unfold.

• (1045)

The Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76.1(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

We will now proceed to Group No. 2.

Motion No. 17

That Bill C–61, in Clause 15, be amended by deleting lines 38 to 42, on page 9 and lines 1 to 7, on page 10.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose Bill C–61, because we feel it is unacceptable in its present form. Myself and my party fully agree with the underlying principle, which is to save taxpayers time and money. However, it seems that the government always opens the door to all sorts of harmful effects.

This bill could have a major adverse impact on compliance and fairness. Moreover, if the department is setting up a system of monetary penalties it is because it feels such a system can greatly simplify the procedures used to ensure compliance, and therefore result in major savings to Canadian taxpayers. The problem is that the government did not anticipate the possibility that some decisions related to the process may be totally arbitrary. We oppose the compliance agreements which allow the designated person to reduce the penalty imposed to an offender. Such a procedure is unfair.

The government should also have told us about the potential savings associated with the implementation of this bill. Allowing a person designated by the department to enter into a compliance agreement with an offender is totally unacceptable. Under such an arrangement, the offender's penalty would be reduced by one dollar for every two dollars that the company would invest to improve its procedures, buy new material or train its staff. As far as I know, our justice system does not allow an offender to negotiate his or her penalty. Bargaining penalties is not part of our way of doing things. Just ask those who get arrested for speeding: either you are guilty and pay the full amount of the fine, or you challenge the decision before the court and the judge makes a ruling.

Under our justice system, an offender must assume the consequences of his acts. An offender who has the means to invest money to correct a specific situation would benefit from that provision. This bill is as unfair as you can get. Such preferential treatment is based on the spending power of an individual or a company, and that is unfair.

Moreover, can the government tell us who will evaluate the cost of efforts made by the individual or company to remedy the situation? Training, equipment, all these things cost more or less, depending on where you live. Offenders would be penalized if they live in a region where these costs are high. What is more, will they be informed of all of the approaches available to them for correcting the situation? And what if, with the complicity of suppliers, our offender produces padded invoices? Frankly, there are tax or other incentives which could be used if we are seeking to step up investments or training in a company. But for goodness' sake , let us not link it with negotiation of a sentence.

Another unacceptable point: the bill calls for a 50 per cent reduction in the penalty if the person committing the violation pays the fine without contesting or requesting a review. Here the government is attacking the very foundations of presumed innocence. A number of hon. members are lawyers and they know this is a fundamental right. A person is considered innocent until proven otherwise in our legal system, is he not?

Let us look at an obscure situation in which there were grounds to request a review. The minister would tell the individual or company that it would be in his or its best interests to be seen and not heard. Of course, he could ask for a review, but with a gun at his head. He will be told that he has already been found guilty and that, if he wants to reduce his penalty, he has only to pay up without a fuss.

• (1055)

Where does the right of any individual to representation come in? Who will help the person presumed to have committed the violation to defend his point of view?

The individual may obtain a hearing before a tribunal, however, if he insists. But beware of conflicts of interest. Listen carefully to how the thing works: the tribunal is appointed by the minister. The members, whose mandate is renewable, have to assess decisions made by departmental employees.

And the latter answer to the minister. That is how it goes. It seems to me that the tribunal members could very easily be appointed by the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food after an assessment of whether the handling of certain cases has or has not caused problems. Another point not made clear is whether the individual will have to travel to Ottawa for a hearing.

This government just loves to complicate things. Another department I will not mention, Transport Canada, uses a system of monetary sanctions. Unlike Agriculture and Agri–Food, however, Transport Canada has no mechanism allowing it to reduce penalties if the offending individual decides to pay up without an argument. There is no reduction either if he decides to invest in improvements to the facilities which earned him the fine.

It is unnecessary to offer some sort of penalty reduction bonus as an incentive for violators to pay up, because in many cases, contesting the penalty costs more than the penalty itself.

The government wants to save money. So do we. The bill before the House today proposes to amend eight acts. Most of these acts concern areas that are already administered by the provinces.

Did the government start by consulting the provinces to find out whether the monetary penalty system is a concept they would recognize, and did it then consider whether the provinces would not be in a better position to administer the system? It is high time we put an end to unnecessary duplication in inspection services.

Too often the federal inspection system's only excuse for being there at all is the international standards it enforces in order to meet international trade requirements. Why not let the provinces enforce these standards themselves? Then we would certainly save money.

In concluding, we support initiatives that help relieve pressure on the courts. Consequently, as I said at the beginning of my speech, we support the principle of Bill C–61. However, we do not agree with the double standard the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food wishes to introduce by reducing penalties for violators who plead guilty without asking for a review or who will invest to correct the situation.

In fact, the agreement process the department wishes to impose is certainly not essential to the bill, especially since it is a potential source of arbitrariness and inequity. I would urge the House to vote in favour of the amendments proposed by the Bloc Quebecois, in order to correct a bill that might otherwise have a disastrous impact on the concept of equity in our legal system.

[English]

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the individuals who looked at the bill and came forward with amendments looked very hard at the issues they are attempting to address. I have to say their attempts to remedy or improve the bill are evident.

However I take exception that the actual function they are bringing forward will be a benefit to agriculture in general. I would point out that in Motion No. 15 they are asking to legislate what the maximum time frame should be tied to six months within which time the review tribunal must complete its review.

Many times when a tribunal is involved in matters it would be rather imprudent to be fixed to a particular time frame and attempt to guarantee this time frame in legislation where reason dictates that flexibility would be required and needed. Therefore, a six–month time frame would not always be suitable. I think we would have to say that some flexibility in timing would be required.

Another purpose of the motion is to remove from the minister the ability to enter into compliance agreements whereby penalties could be reduced in recognition of costs incurred by industry by taking corrective measures. The important thing in these matters is that compliance is achieved. Whether or not there is a reduced or an increased penalty is secondary in most cases to bringing about the change by the perpetrator of the infraction.

By authorizing the department to enter into these agreements the bill gives the department the tool to negotiate the implementation by industry of measures that would change the violator's practices and process. That is the key. At the same time, the violator may pay a reduced amount of penalty in exchange for compliance. These funds to effect the necessary improvements leading to a future compliance may also be used to remedy certain situations.

Compliance agreements result in immediate corrective actions. Note that we are saying immediate. When that has happened of course, the ministerial or departmental approval would be achieved. Immediate corrective action leads to a better product, improved health and safety, and more effective enforcement. Compliance agreements are optional and no one is forced to enter into these agreements. The bill provides an incentive to enter into compliance agreements by making it possible to reduce the amount of monetary penalty. As we have said, the most important outcome is that there has been a change and there has been a remedy and compliance is achieved.

To remove the possibility of a ministerial review of a notice of violation is also deemed not suitable by this amendment. I would like to speak against that point as well. A ministerial review enables a violator who wishes to challenge a monetary penalty to have a fast, inexpensive and informal way to do so. Under current legislation he must do so through the court system. As we know, that can be slow. We also know it can be very expensive. Consequently, when we hear concerns from opposite sides that we do not have enough savings by these changes, we admit that we perhaps do not have a fixed number, but we know that by taking it out of the court system we will be putting a number of dollars into agriculture rather than into the hands of people in the legal system.

The ministerial review is optional in any event. The violator may choose to proceed directly to the review tribunal. Furthermore, anyone who elects to have a ministerial review may appeal its outcome to the review tribunal.

Finally, I would like to comment on whether or not to remove the possibility for a violator to pay less than the full amount of monetary penalty where the violator does not request a review. In other words, we would be putting in place a mechanism whereby there would be a smaller amount of money taken from the perpetrator of an infraction without his even asking for it.

The intent behind including in the bill a provision that enables this to happen is twofold. First, it is to enable a violator who does not intend to challenge the assessment of a penalty to pay a reduced amount of penalty if the department is satisfied that the violator would act in good faith and take the necessary corrective measures. Again, the compliance component is paramount here. Second, it is to promote compliance without engaging in long and costly hearings.

• (1105)

Hearings are of course expensive, as we said earlier. There are other regimes. It is estimated that the average hearing cost is about $1,400, and some might be more. If we can save that $1,400, we will all be ahead of the game.

We are informed these types of reductions are common under other monetary penalty regimes both in Canada and the U.S. In these other regimes reductions are informally made on a case by case basis while taking great care to make a decision appropriately. Bill C–61 formalizes the procedure and makes the practice transparent and available to anyone.

I conclude my remarks at this point.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is rather heavy slugging; I hope you are enjoying the debate this morning.

We are dealing with quite a large number of amendments in Group No. 2. I am not going to speak individually on all of the Bloc amendments, but I will lump them together. It seems the Bloc's intention in proposing these amendments is to actually do away with the formulating of compliance agreements altogether. That is not a position I or my colleagues share. We are not opposed to the concept. We want to clarify, quantify and qualify some of the act to make it work better, which is the purpose of our amendments.

If the compliance agreement is properly administered and properly enforced, if it is balanced and gives a proper and reasonable amount of protection to both the minister and his department and to those violators or alleged violators who are affected by this legislation, it can actually be a useful tool that will take violators out of the courts and allow the situation to be dealt with in a less costly and more efficient manner.

Having said that about the Bloc amendments, I suspect the Bloc would have been wiser to simply oppose the bill and offer no amendments at all rather than to actually destroy the intent of the bill.

I would like to speak briefly to the motions we have put forward in this grouping. I will begin with Motion No. 10, which concerns clause 10. We would amend it by replacing line 17 on page 6 with the following: "reasonable security, in a form and in an amount".

This motion deals with the granting of security to ensure compliance of someone who has violated the regulations under one of the acts dealt with in Bill C–61. We suggested there should be criteria in the process, and I appreciate the minister saying that he already has a policy manual in place. I do not know why he and his government would oppose ensuring that policy manual continues and is very open to the public by means of the amendment we have proposed. I cannot understand why the government would not be supportive of the word reasonable in front of the word security. We all want to be reasonable people; I am sure the minister wants to be reasonable, as does his government.

Let us use an example of what this would prevent. It would prevent the minister and his department from demanding an entire meat processing plant for security if the cooler was of a value at least twice as great as the penalty that would be imposed upon the processor for any violation he had committed. That type of approach is reasonable and would prevent abuses by the minister and his department. On the other hand, it would also preclude the minister from going to the other extreme and just demanding the meat grinder for security when the violation was serious enough that he should have more security to ensure the compliance agreement is complied with.

That is a reasonable amendment. It makes the bill stronger. It again qualifies the bill and leads me into Motion No. 11, which deals with the same matter of reasonable security.

Motion No. 11 is that Bill C–61 be amended in clause 10 by adding after line 11, on page 7, the following:

(4.1) Where security has been given under paragraph (1)(a), the notice shall also state that the security shall not be forfeited to Her Majesty in right of Canada unless the amount of security is less than twice the amount of the penalty set out in the notice of violation.

• (1110)

This qualifies what reasonable security in this case would be. It prevents the minister and his department from demanding an unreasonable amount of security in ensuring a compliance agreement is complied with.

This is common sense. It is reasonable. It protects the department; it protects the minister; it protects the Canadian taxpayer. It is an incentive for the offender or the violator to comply with the agreement, yet it prevents abuse.

I will go on to Motion No. 15, which is also in this grouping. It states:

That Bill C–61, in clause 14, be amended by replacing lines 3 and 4, on page 9, with the following:

14.(1) No later than six months after the Tribunal receives a request for a review under this Act, it shall, by order, as

This seems a bit disjointed when it is read, but a tribunal is established under the act that can review disputes if they are not voluntarily complied with by the violator. If the offender is not able to make an agreement with the minister and his department, he does have recourse to a tribunal.

As we know, we have seen in the justice system in the United States and to a degree in Canada that sometimes these cases drag on and on. They are very costly. They are certainly not fair to the person who is accused or the person who has been alleged to have made a violation, and they are certainly not fair to the taxpayers who bear a large portion of the cost of this process.

Again, this is just a qualifier that ensures that the tribunal cannot delay making a decision forever and ever. In fact, it stipulates that in no case can the tribunal delay its action for more than six months. It requires the review tribunal to complete its review within six months of receiving the person's request for review.

Can the minister offer a very good reason why that is not reasonable or that does not protect taxpayers, why it does not protect the person who is alleged to have made a violation and even protect the department from ongoing cases where this situation is not resolved? It is better for all parties involved in this process.

I request that all members in the House look seriously at Motion No. 15. I suggest they support that as being fair and reasonable, making it a better act rather than a weaker one.

The purpose of these amendments is not to in any way criticize the government or do a one-up on the government; it is to make better legislation that is going to affect us all. It is in that spirit that we bring these amendments to the House.

I request that members opposite have a fair look at these amendments and see whether or not they can support them as being reasonable in this legislation, in this case suggesting reasonable security and a reasonable amount of time for decisions to be made.

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, these are certainly very difficult and challenging times in the field of agriculture. We see a lot of changes going on throughout the sector worldwide. We have seen with the globalization of trade that is occurring and with the tight fiscal situations governments find themselves in all around the world that this is imposing certain constraints on the way we carry on business.

This government and the minister are facing many challenges in the area of agriculture. Certainly this government and the minister in particular has achieved a number of very significant successes in dealing with these challenges of globalization and dealing with the challenges of a tight fiscal situation.

When we look at the fair and thorough handling of the Crow payout issue in western Canada, the protection of the supply management system at the GATT talks and the successful completion of the GATT talks shortly after the election by the minister and the very favourable settlement of the durum wheat disputes of the U.S., in each instance the minister has dealt with these issues in a fair and thorough fashion, getting good results for the agricultural producers of Canada.

The minister has proven to be a very forceful and successful advocate for all the country's farmers, whether in the west, in Quebec, in Ontario, or in the maritimes. He has always ensured that when dealing with the issues of farmers, each group of producers in each region has its issues dealt with on the merits of the case. This bill is another fine example of dealing with the pressures and challenges facing the agricultural sector. This can be looked at as yet another success.

It is very important to point out that we are dealing with a piece of legislation that allows for compliance agreements. Therefore when there is a violation of a regulation within various parts of the agricultural sector, the usual route is to charge the individual. The individual gets a lawyer; the government gets a lawyer. The government pays for the expense and time of a tribunal to hear the case. Down the road a year or two later there is finally a decision in the dispute. Thereafter, in the event the charged individual or corporation is found guilty, their practices are changed.

This legislation allows for a speedy and fair resolution of the violation when it occurs. It allows the producers or the person charged to come to a very quick resolution of their dispute. The offending behaviour can be quickly remedied.

In a legal dispute in which charges are laid, a person will not change his behaviour for fear that change will lead to an admission of guilt.

When there is the ability for a person to simply change behaviour and get on with business, this is what we really want to see. We want to see our food safe, our industry competitive. Both these issues are dealt with very favourably by this legislation. That type of settlement is encouraged.

As we do not have the resources we used to, the solution put forward by the minister is excellent because it allows cutting the costs of corrective measures. This is very important for all Canadians. It allows industries to continue to be very competitive, to spend their resources doing their job of processing and selling products better rather than spending resources, time and energy worrying and trying to deal with a charge. In this respect the bill is excellent and handles a number of these changes in a very positive manner.

When dealing with the security required to ensure a violator complies with a compliance agreement, it has always been the intent of the minister that it be reasonable. If not included explicitly within the legislation, it is always included implicitly.

If the matter were subject to dispute, I have no doubt the courts would simply read into the legislation that the security required by the minister or the department would be reasonable. However, I suppose one could look at this amendment and say it is exactly what the intent of the legislation is and therefore would be reasonable to include it within the legislation.

One of the motions seeks to remove the possibility for the violator to pay less than the full amount of the monetary penalty where the violator does not request a review. The intent behind the bill includes the provision which enables a violator to pay less than the full amount of the penalty which otherwise would be taken if the procedure were to go to court.

The intent behind it is twofold. It enables a violator who does not intend to challenge the assessment of the penalty to pay a reduced penalty and to get on with life. It encourages the person to take corrective measures. It also promotes compliance without engaging in long and costly hearings. That makes sense. There is a large benefit to the person charged or who has committed a violation to simply change the behaviour and to get on with business. That is what the legislation is all about. If the possibility for the violator to pay less were not there, we would not see many violators voluntarily changing their behaviour.

The legislation deals with the fiscal realities of the government. It encourages a change of behaviour on the part of violators within the agriculture and agri–food sectors. It encourages the improvement of behaviour. Canada will continue to produce high quality goods in the agricultural field and will continue to have a competitive industry. The legislation also assists Canada to compete in the international market because the resources of the companies and the government will not be diverted into long legal disputes.

The legislation accomplishes a number of goals. It is another example of the minister's dealing effectively with the challenges we are facing in the agri–food sector today. I congratulate the minister and all the people who have worked hard to make this legislation a reality.

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the motions we are discussing in Group No. 2, Motion No. 2 and Motions Nos. 6 through 17. They are all part of our discussion at the present time.

Remarks were made earlier by the hon. member for Lotbinière regarding overlap and duplication in agricultural policies and programs between the federal government and provincial jurisdiction. I will address that point for a moment.

That there might be some measure of overlap is probably to be expected since under our Constitution agriculture is specifically and explicitly a joint federal–provincial responsibility.

• (1125)

When we look at the duplication that actually exists, it is truly remarkable that the amount involved in agriculture is tiny. Two studies were conducted within the last year or so by the Government of Quebec. One was released in the spring of this year and the other was released earlier this fall.

One study indicated that at the very worst the amount of overlap and duplication between the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec with respect to agriculture might involve a cost in the order of 2.5 per cent. According to the other study, it was more like 1 per cent. According to the studies it is very minor.

On a number of occasions in the House and publicly I have indicated to the Government of Quebec and every other provincial government to the extent that overlap and duplication exist in the field of agriculture, that we should talk about it. We should work it out of the system so we have it at the absolute minimum, even though it is already very small to start with.

There really is no substantial argument to be made on the point of overlap and duplication because there is not much in the first place. To the extent that it does exist the Government of Canada is completely prepared to work with every provincial jurisdiction to identify problem areas that might exist and to work them out of the system so that overlap and duplication are minimized.

In the remarks of the member for Lotbinière I also heard an attempt to demean or diminish the importance of the Canadian federal inspection system in agriculture. That system is vital to Canadian farmers, exporters and consumers in terms of providing this country with the safest and highest quality of food in the world.

Studies, some of which we released at the time of the federal budget last February, indicated Canadians have a very high confidence level in our food system in terms of its health and its safety because of the Canadian food inspection system which ranks among the very best in the world in terms of health and safety standards. That gives our consumers a very strong and positive feeling about the quality of products they buy from the Canadian food system. It also provides our customers abroad with a very high level of expectation about the standards they can receive when they buy from Canada.

I have had the opportunity to visit with our customers in foreign markets, in the Asia–Pacific region, in Latin America, in Europe and in other places around the world. They have repeatedly told me that when they buy from Canada they know they buy the very best and they rely heavily on the high quality, high standard inspection system.

It is not accurate or appropriate to dismiss that as something frivolous or unmeaningful. It matters a lot to Canadian farmers, to Canadian exporters and potential exporters, to Canadian consumers and to our international customers. That inspection system is exceedingly important to all Canadians.

I have heard that comment repeated to me over and over by exporters and potential exporters from Quebec who know the value of the Canadian inspection system and who want to see it maintained in the best interests of Quebec agriculture and Canadian agriculture.

• (1130)

Can we make our inspection system even better? The answer to that is obviously yes. At the present time we are working very hard in co–operation with the private sector and in co–operation with all provincial governments to make that system better. We are working on areas where we can avoid costs in the system. We are working on areas where we can reduce costs in the system. We are working on areas where we can share costs in the system when there is an appropriate sharing of benefits at the same time. We are looking at a whole range of ways in which we can introduce new technology into the system to take advantage of the advances in science and technology in the field of food inspection systems.

We are also pursuing new approaches that have international acceptance such as an approach called HACCP, as it is known by its acronym, the hazard analysis at critical control points system. It is deemed in many jurisdictions around the world to be the very best system to move toward for the future. Many Canadian companies are already beginning to adopt that approach in their inspection standards.

Finally, there is the issue of more co–ordination and co–operation among all those in the system who have some responsibility for inspection.

I have seen examples of inspection situations in the country where three or four federal government departments are involved in some aspect of inspection, perhaps two or three departments at the provincial level and on occasion, some departments at the municipal level. That is an area where there is some overlap we can seriously work at removing from the system. We are trying to do that in two ways.

First, at the federal level we are working very hard on a single federal approach to inspection so that we do not have overlapping activities on the part of several federal departments all inspecting the same thing but simply repeating the process over and over again. We are making progress at working out those illustrations of federal overlap so we get the inspection job done but we do not cause repetitive actions that are in fact counterproductive and costly.

Second, we are working very hard with the provinces, as is evidenced by the last several federal–provincial meetings of agriculture ministers, to develop a Canadian national food inspection system. It is a system where all jurisdictions and all levels that have responsibility work in greater co–ordination with each other so that at the end of the day the very best inspection work gets done at a very high level with excellent standards and calibre, but we avoid costs in the system, overlap and duplication. We then have a system that performs to the very high standards we want at the very least possible cost.

The story of food inspection is one in which Canadians can have confidence and of which they can be very proud both for today and for the future. Having said that, I would add this one final sentence. It is critically important that we maintain our vigilance with respect to food inspection so that Canadians cannot only have a past reputation for being the very best in the world, but can have the absolute confidence that their reputation will continue forever into the future.

In the group of motions that are specifically before us, Motions Nos. 2, 8, 9 and 12 have already been dealt with, I believe, by my colleague for Brandon—Souris quite effectively. Similarly, Motions Nos. 6, 8, 13, 14, 16 and 17 have been dealt with by the member for Brandon—Souris in considerable detail. I do not propose to repeat what he said.

I want to focus on Motion No. 10, presented by the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster, where he suggests the insertion of the word reasonable. It is obviously our intention, with respect to the matters dealt with under Motion No. 10, to be reasonable. I have no difficulty with the inclusion of that word with respect to Motion No. 10. I would suggest though, as a consequence that it would not be necessary to accept Motion No. 11 because the point is already covered effectively by the amendment we are prepared to accept in Motion No. 10.

• (1135)

All other motions in the package I would recommend against. However, the government is prepared to accept the amendment proposed in Motion No. 10.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-61, in Clause 4, be amended by replacing lines 14 and 15, on page 3, with the following:

"committed to obtain a financial benefit, $1,000 for a first violation and $2,000 for any subsequent violation; and

(b) in any other case

(i) $1,000 for a first minor violation, $5,000 for a first serious violation and $10,000 for a first very serious violation, or

"violation and the designated person serving the notice of violation and".

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-61, in Clause 7, be amended by replacing line 33, on page 4, with the following:

Motion No. 18

That Bill C-61, in Clause 15, be amended by replacing line 13, on page 10, with the following:

"(f) the amount of any reasonable expenses incurred".

Motion No. 19

That Bill C-61, in Clause 18, be amended by replacing lines 1 to 14, on page 11, with the following:

"18. A person named in a notice of violation has a defence by reason that the person

(a) exercised due diligence to prevent the violation; or

(b) reasonably and honestly believed in the existence of facts that, if true, would exonerate the person."

He said: Mr. Speaker, we are making a little progress here. Let us see if we can make more.

The minister says he has some good news and he has some bad news. The good news is that he has listened to Reform once. Perhaps the bad news is that he did not listen to us on the first amendment which he should have supported as well.

• (1140)

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): The bad news is he is a Liberal.

Mr. Hermanson: We are dealing with motions which my party submitted in this group, Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 18 and 19. I will try to be quick and discuss the substance of the motions, dealing first with Motion No. 3. It is to suggest that Bill C-61 in dealing first with Motion No. 3. It is to suggest that Bill C–61 in clause 4 be amended by replacing some lines. We are reducing the administrative monetary penalty for first time violations.

There is a matrix in place which begins to do this, but the matrix is not included in the legislation. In our judgment, this reinforces that matrix component and ensures that the principle is enacted in the legislation.

The administrative monetary penalties fall into three maximum ranges. The first one is for a minor violation, having a maximum of $2,000, a serious violation having a maximum of $5,000 and a very serious violation having a maximum of $15,000. For a second or subsequent violations we think this is reasonable. However for a first violation, often dealing with small business and with producers, this seems rather severe.

I understand also there can be a warning issued as well for a violation. The minister and his department have that option. I am not so concerned about the norm as I am the extraordinary circumstances that this legislation has to be prepared to deal with. It is only reasonable and right that the legislation should contain the principle that on a first violation the amount of the penalty be reduced by half to protect small business, smaller producers and smaller processors.

We have another amendment further along. If I knew that amendment was going to be passed, this one would not be quite so important. My suspicions are it may not be and that precludes an alleged violator being able to use due diligence and having burden of proof put on the minister. If that fails, it is even more important that Motion No. 3 pass and the first time violations not be subject to quite as severe a monetary penalty.

Motion No. 4 is another real common sense amendment to which I hope the minister is listening and which I hope he will agree to pass. It suggests that when a person is notified of the violation, besides having his or her name served on the notice, the person who is serving the notice has to identify him or herself as well. This is an agent of the Department of Agriculture, an agent of the minister.

This is common sense and common procedure that someone who is imposing a fine, an administrative monetary penalty, on someone who is alleged to have violated regulations under the agriculture act should have the person who served that notice put his or her name on that same piece of paper. That is only common sense. It will be useful, valuable and will also protect the person who is alleged to have made the violation.

Motion No. 5 amends clause 7. The legislation states that the minister may make regulations prescribing anything that by this act is to be prescribed. That is a pretty blank cheque, particularly when it comes to time frame and some of these specifications.

When a person is served a notice of violation, we do not know how long he or she has to respond. This act does not indicate whether that person has 24 hours, 24 days, or 24 months to respond and to make a decision on whether to ask for an appeal, an appeal to the tribunal, agree to pay the monetary fine or seek compliance.

Nothing in the act suggests a time frame for the decision to be made by the person accused of the violation. The amendment we are proposing would suggest that the person have at least 45 days to make a decision on what route to go.

The minister could argue that it should be 30 days, 25 days or 60 days. I am willing to listen to his arguments. However the fact that there are no restrictions in the act whatsoever is irresponsible and could be dangerous if at some future time Agriculture Canada became very heavy handed and gave people two days to decide what course of action they wanted to follow. Several courses of action are permitted in this piece of legislation.

This gets confusing. I thank members for bearing with me. I want to make sure I have covered all the motions in this grouping. There are two more motions I want to briefly touch on. In Motion No. 18 we are inserting the word reasonable into clause 15 on line 13. If the minister and his department seize goods and dispose of them, the expenses incurred by the department in disposing the seized goods are charged to the violator.

If the word reasonable is not included in the clause, the minister could hire Lloyds of London to come in and hold an auction to sell something of small value that has been seized, say a load of produce. We do not want to see these extremes employed by the department. We want to make sure reasonable means are used and only reasonable expenses are incurred in the sale of seized goods.

Motion No. 19 amends clause 18. It reads:

> a person named in a notice of violation has a defence by reason that the person
> (a) exercised due diligence to prevent the violation; or
> (b) reasonably and honestly believed in the existence of facts that, if true, would exonerate the person.

There has been extensive debate in committee over this issue. Many members, even members on the Liberal side, were concerned that the act authorizing administrative monetary penalties and encouraging compliance of those accused of violations does not allow those alleged to have violated to use due diligence as a defence. This is a violation of some of the common law protection in Canada.

It allows for a heavy handed department to preclude people asked to pay the fines under the act from normal defences, normal access to the justice system and the normal common law defence of due diligence and honest belief in the facts as presented to exonerate people.

We were moving into an area where perhaps the rights of those charged under the act were being abused. There needed to be some changes. This was the best way that we could ensure it was an even handed piece of legislation that did not unduly burden and persecute those charged with a violation and preclude them from the defence they required if they were to adequately defend themselves from a department that may get carried away or go a little too far.

Again I ask members opposite to seriously consider each of the amendments. I appreciate that they supported one amendment that made a lot of sense. There are some here that also make a lot of sense. If they have not considered them, I ask them to look at the amendments to see which ones they can support.

I invite all members of the House to support each of the amendments in Group No. 3.

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster made an important point in his last statement when he said we support amendments that make sense.

The difficulty with these amendments, I am sorry to say, is that in terms of the effectiveness of the legislation they do not make sense. I will speak on most of them.

On Motion No. 3, we have to understand current maximum penalties are relatively modest. The bill does not make a distinction between the first and subsequent violations for the purpose of setting a maximum penalty that could be assessed.

I am surprised to a certain extent that a reduction for a first offence is being requested, given that very often when dealing with violations of law or quasi–law the Reform Party wants to go all out and go for the jugular. In this case you are asking for—

The Deputy Speaker: I ask the member to put his remarks through the Chair. I know it is a bore but it is required by our procedure.

Mr. Easter: I will do that. In this case the regulations will determine a base penalty amount range in circumstances under which penalties may be increased or reduced. Compliance history will be one of the factors set out in the regulations whereby penalties will be reduced for violators with no previous history of non–compliance and increased for those who commit subsequent violations.

Under clause 4(3) of Bill C–61 penalty amounts may be increased or decreased based on the degree of intention or negligence on the part of the person who committed the violation, the amount of harm done by the violation and the compliance history of the person who committed the violation.

In terms of Motion No. 3 the legislation has to remain as is to give the flexibility needed to enforce compliance.

On Motion No. 4, as I understand it the basic purpose of the Reform amendment is to have a notice of violation to identify the designated person serving the notice. I do not see the need for that. The bill allows that a notice may be served by various means.

Mr. Hermanson: It is a speeding ticket.

Mr. Easter: I try not to get speeding tickets. I might inform the hon. member that where I come from in Prince Edward Island we do not need to speed to get from place to place, it is such a wonderful place to be. I can understand the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster wanting to speed to get to P.E.I. some time because of its great people and great industries. We would welcome him any time but we will not pay his speeding tickets.

The bill allows for a notice to be served by various means and the server of a notice may not necessarily be the designated person. By definition the designated person is the person who issues the notice. Service of the notice is a procedural matter best addressed by maintaining a degree of flexibility. The bill allows the matter of service of all documents including notices to be addressed by regulations, for example paragraph 4(1)(g). The regulations will make provision for service in person or by registered mail, which is appropriate.

On Motion No. 5, the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster could correct me if I am wrong but its purpose is basically to legislate a minimum time of 45 days within which a penalty may be paid. This is a procedural matter to be determined by regulation. There is certainly reason for determining some of the procedures by regulation.

We must be careful not to be overly restrictive in terms of the bill.

• (1155)

The member mentioned earlier that the department could become overly heavy handed. I certainly know that if it became overly heavy handed with the current minister it would be addressed. I would expect members opposite to be forever watchful in that regard. Under this legislation I do not expect the department could become overly heavy handed.

I will deal specifically with Motion No. 5. To include time frames such as these in legislation is impractical because it is very difficult to make future changes. Procedural details are generally contained in regulations or in policy documents.

The regulation process is open and fair. The preparation and drafting of regulations include consultation with the industry and the prepublication of regulations in The Canada Gazette, part I. The process will ensure that a reasonable time frame is put in regulation for the payment of a monetary penalty. It gives us some flexibility in reviewing it in the future to redress it through regulation. It might be easier to take the member's concerns into consideration in the future, maintaining that flexibility by way of regulation.

The purpose of Motion No. 18 is to clarify that the expenses recoverable by Her Majesty with respect to the disposal of forfeited goods are reasonable. I was surprised by the hon. member's comments that maybe the minister would hire Lloyds of London to sell some goods. As he very well knows the government—and sometimes it is to the point of being of concern to some of us—is very concerned about how departments spend their limited dollars.

The House could be assured that the government or the ministry would not spend money in an unreasonable way. I challenge the member on the comment that we would go that far astray. It has always been the government's intention to administer the bill in a reasonable way. One thing about the government is that it does not need everything in legislation to be reasonable. We are a reasonable bunch to begin with and that is very well known in the community.

The last motion is Motion No. 19. Its intent is to enable a violator to rely on the defence of due diligence. We would have to oppose it. Bill C–61 allows for the issuance of monetary penalties on the basis of absolute liability. The department only needs to prove the alleged violator committed an act in violation of the regulations. The bill does not allow a defence of due diligence by which a violator can avoid liability by establishing that he or she was not negligent.

Under Bill C–61 there is no possibility of imprisonment, no record of conviction for an offence created, and penalties are modest rather than punitive in nature. Because of these factors there is no constitutional or other legal impediment to proceeding on the basis of absolute liability. It is worth mentioning that although the due diligence defence does not apply, other common law defences are available to a person to whom a notice of violation is issued. Those are my comments on the motions.

• (1200)

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to this group of motions and to some extent to the thrust of the bill.

I represent an urban area, not a rural area. One might be curious as to why a city boy is standing to talk on an agricultural bill. My family and I eat the food, I acknowledge that. We depend on this constituency for survival.

I did take an interest in the bill from when it was first introduced in the House. Initially it raised some concerns with me. These concerns were expressed to the ministry and to colleagues. They were reduced to writing; it was not just talk. In the end I see the department has adapted the bill and made changes at committee. We are still making a few minor changes in the House.

What is significant here is that the House will delegate to a department an administrative penalty program that involves a huge constituency, the whole agricultural community. Up until now the House has not delegated that kind of authority. The ability to police, to levy penalties and fines has usually been in the field of criminal law.

We do not delegate that kind of authority out of the House without making sure it is set out very specifically in our laws. In this case we have. It was done earlier in relation to airports and the field of aviation. However, in that area we are dealing with a very small constituency. Here we are doing it with the agricultural community and thousands and thousands of Canadians will be participating in and subject to this new administrative monetary penalty system.

We must be vigilant in the House, as I know all members are. The opposition is certainly vigilant, which is its job. My colleagues on the government side have been vigilant about how this process is to evolve.

We should look at other areas of Canadian life where there are rules and penalties. One that comes to mind, which is a little bizarre, is the National Hockey League in which Canadians play hockey for a living and voluntarily subject themselves to a system of rules. On the ice, hockey players can be fined and suspended. Granted it is a very small constituency but it happens in other areas of amateur hockey in Canada as well.

In this case we are talking about the entire agricultural community. As the minister has pointed out, it has bought into the new system. It is a recognition of evolution and modern government that the old way of doing things does not work any more. It is too cumbersome. Just because somebody ends up with a badly shaped potato should not be a matter subject to a criminal offence or a quasi–criminal offence.

We have a new system evolving here and I think we will make it work. The government has adapted and recognized the extreme difficulty in applying standards of strict and absolute liability. While in the beginning we perhaps were not as sensitive to the issues involved, as my colleague from Malpeque pointed out, the department and the legislation have the issue down very well.

The motions for further changes to the bill by the opposition are useful for the record even if my colleagues on this side of the House do not accept them all. I know some have been. However, it is a further good faith attempt to refine this legislation so that it will work to the benefit of Canadians.

• (1205)

I am pleased to indicate my support for the bill generally. I am sorry I cannot support all the opposition motions in amendment. The minister has the proper system and it will fly well.

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to rise on the bill a second time.

Within my riding there are urban areas and there is also a large rural area where agricultural producers provide the food which we all eat and enjoy.

With respect to this motion I will go over a number of the proposals for change put forward by members opposite. There is a motion which seeks to vary the maximum allowable penalty between the first and subsequent violations. While there could be some merit to these suggestions, in light of the fact that the current maximum penalties are relatively modest, it would not be in our interests to start making distinctions between first and subsequent violations for the purpose of setting a maximum penalty which could be assessed. That does not mean that where there is a subsequent violation a larger penalty could not be assessed.

The legislation allows for maximum flexibility when determining the level of penalty to be assessed when regulations have been violated. This flexibility takes into consideration the compliance history in determining the level of the fine. That is, it does not automatically lead to a greater fine. One must also consider all the circumstances surrounding the alleged violation in determining the penalty.

In subclause 4(3)(a) of Bill C–61 the penalty amounts can be increased or decreased based on the degree of intention or negligence on the part of the person who committed the violation, the amount of harm done by the violation and the compliance history of the person who committed the violation. Therefore we have a system in which all factors are considered in dealing with the maximum level of penalty to be set.

Motion No. 4 proposes that the designated person serving the notice of violation be identified. The bill seeks to achieve administrative simplicity, an inexpensive yet effective system. This is one of the quasi–judicial procedures required by the legislation. I do not believe it would be efficient to have individuals designated within the legislation. By the definition included within the legislation, the designated person issues the notice.

The service of the notice is simply a procedural matter. We want to see a flexible yet efficient system for ensuring that the violator of a regulation gets notice. We also want to ensure we are not overburdened with large expenses or complicated mechanisms to get the notice to the person.

The amendments to the act will allow for the provision of service to the person by registered mail. The nature of the offence is a very important factor when considering how a person should be served or notified of the offence. These offences are absolute liability offences. Therefore the procedural requirements to ensure notification, et cetera, are at a minimum level.

At the other end of the scale we have criminal law, the violation of which requires a lot more procedural care, a very much higher standard of proof. Because these offences are of a minor regulatory nature, the service need not be such that it leads to any type of inefficiency.

With respect to Motion No. 5, there is the suggestion to legislate the minimum time of 45 days within which a penalty may be paid. Dealing with time frames within legislation, at one time in our system of government it may have been quite reasonable to include within legislation time frames within which penalties may be paid or within which certain actions may be taken. However, as our legislative requirements have grown it has become more complicated.

Acts have become far more comprehensive. We are dealing with what goes into an act and what should be within the regulations. Acts are not easily amended or changed. Therefore if a provision in an act such as a time frame is found not to function properly we may be stuck with that time frame for a considerable length of time if we are looking at amending legislation to get the change.

What is being proposed is that these time frames be contained within the regulation where it is appropriate. If found to be unworkable or in need of an amendment they can be changed with the minimum amount of disruption to the system. In a cheap, effective manner they can be changed as quickly as is practical. This is what insertion of time frames within the regulations would allow.

Motion No. 18 is another motion to insert the word reasonable within the statute. It is to clarify that expenses recovered by the crown in respect of the disposal of forfeited goods are reasonable. While this was not in the legislation, certainly it was always the intention of the department to be reasonable in the charges and requirements it makes of people who forfeit goods. This is implied within the legislation.

The term reasonable would no doubt be implied in the legislation anyway. Obviously where the goods are forfeited they will not be able to make exorbitant charges. There are limitations.

The Reform Party has put forward a sensible amendment which reflects the intent of the legislation and which therefore should be accepted. It shows the openness of the government and the minister. It shows a lot of flexibility, and I appreciate that flexibility on the part of the minister.

• (1215)

The issue of allowing the violator to rely on the due diligence defence has been carefully addressed by a number of my other colleagues. I will echo those remarks.

Once again, I appreciate the effort that has gone into making this bill such a success. Congratulations to the minister for yet another fine piece of work.

Mr. Hermanson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has been brought to my attention that there is one more error in the Order Paper. I would like to bring that to the attention of the House to make sure it is corrected.

In my Motion No. 11 on the Order Paper and Notice Paper it states: "That Bill C–61, in clause 10, be amended by adding after line 31, on page 7, the following", and it goes on to state my amendment. That in fact is an error. The amendment falls after line 11, not line 31. If we look in the bill it raises it on page 7 before subclause (5) rather than after subclause (5).

I suspect that those members who looked at this carefully and perhaps felt they could not support the amendment when they saw where it was supposed to be will change their position and support my amendment.

The Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member. The table officers will check into this matter and the Speaker will get back to the House on that issue.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed delighted to have the opportunity to address this House on the subject of Bill C–61, as I represent a region where agriculture is fundamental, where it is one of the underlying sectors of the economy.

I would first like to congratulate the minister and all the members of the House standing committee, who studied the bill and have proposed amendments.

I think Bill C–61 is further proof that our government has paid heed, throughout this 35th Parliament, to all that Canadians from coast to coast have said about the need for the various levels of government and the different departments to manage time and money more efficiently.

When producers have less bureaucracy to deal with and less of an investment in time to make the result is a lower product cost; the financial benefits they reap are passed on to food product consumers. In the end, less bureaucracy and less time invested for producers means a lower product cost, which consumers also enjoy.

However, when we look at Bill C–61, we note that all the measures to protect Canadian consumers are still there, along with the added protection afforded by the effective action of departmental officials.

• (1220)

This additional protection for all those who violate the various agriculture–related bills will make it possible to adjust their penalties immediately.

And I also think we will save money if we transfer all these penalties with the possibility of an appeal before a quasi–judicial tribunal. In this way we are saving both time and the taxpayers' money the federal government would otherwise spend to bring all these violators before the courts. The violators themselves may not have to appear in court, but we all know about legal fees and what it costs to be represented in court. What is particularly important in this bill, as in other bills and measures initiated by our government in the past two years, is that it will make our economy, our bureaucracy and our judicial system more efficient.

I think that is what I see as the central focus of all bills on agriculture, because that is what Canadians from coast to coast have asked us to do, and we acted accordingly. We did this in a number of departments. I want to commend the Minister of Agriculture for having the foresight to make changes in these bills so that we can be more efficient.

According to the text of the bill and the proposed amendments, the bill will allow the imposition of penalties through an administrative process, in addition to the criminal sentences authorized by law. The department's officials will be able to set penalties of up to $15,000, based on various criteria provided in the form of tables in the regulations.

It is also worth mentioning that all consultations with the agricultural sector were held before the bill was prepared. When a government acts in good faith, all the people involved in the bill appreciate the various consultation mechanisms we set up and support the various options we provide. The bill also provides for a reduction of the penalty when the offender pays it within the time limit without challenging it or demanding a hearing to reduce it.

This is another measure that will allow all stakeholders, including governments, producers and those who market agri–food products across the country, to become more effective and efficient and to benefit from large scale savings.

In fact, the industry supports the consulting process and the work done by the standing committee on this bill because we indeed have the effective enforcement of Canadian standards, especially with respect to imported products.

• (1225)

Regarding the importation of agri–food products into our country and the time required to process offenders through the judicial system, we can take measures on site to discipline these offenders under the threat of monetary penalties. We can provide even greater, almost immediate protection for Canadian consumers.

When I look at the various aspects of this bill and of some amendments put forward by the standing committee, I think that our government has taken a giant step in assuming its responsibilities toward our agricultural industry and toward Canadian consumers. I have no hesitation in supporting this bill and the amendments proposed by the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food.

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: The table officers have considered the matter raised by the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminister. He is absolutely correct. It changes nothing. It will be amended in accordance with his sharp–eyed advice to the Chair. We thank him for making that correction.

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my comments perhaps will be somewhat limited, because I plan to deal with only one aspect of the legislation. That aspect deals with Motion No. 19 and the suggestion that the defence of due diligence should apply to the legislation.

As much as I believe in the system of justice we have and that we must always put in all defences possible for the enforcement of laws and the defendant should have available defences such as due diligence, et cetera, I am suggesting that the motion should be defeated and that such a defence should not be allowed and not be applicable in a bill such as Bill C–61. There are a number of reasons why I suggest this. It comes from looking at the system we have in Canada in the food processing industry, which is perhaps one of the best in the world. If we allowed such a defence of due diligence to apply, we would be diluting the system we have. We would be regressing rather than progressing.

Let me give an example of a possible occurrence. I have earned money in the past by defending individuals using defences like this. Let me give an example of why the system perhaps should not have this defence.

If an importer brings in a particular product, whether it be cheese, bread or whatever, and there is something wrong with the product and it is contrary to the legislation and therefore subject to penalty under this statute, the person could be brought forward and could claim due diligence. He could say: "I contacted the manufacturer and he absolutely guaranteed that there was nothing wrong with this product. The foreign processor told me that every precaution was taken to make sure this food was safe. The foreign processor told me that spot checks, et cetera, have been done on this food and it is fine. I have used all due diligence in making sure the product is safe".

If the defence is available, the person should not be subject to the penalties. That certainly does not help the consumer who may be ingesting this food and getting ill or perhaps even dying from that food. The importer must go further.

• (1230)

If the importer is subject to the penalties in this act, the importer must be in a position to say: "I did spot checks. I tested this food and I made certain it was safe". It is not good enough because if due diligence applied, the importer could always rely on it and always bring in unsafe food although the processor in the foreign country indicated it was good enough.

We require this rule so foreign processors cannot bypass the safety standards of our country. We require it so that if the importer is in violation of this act, the importer can go back to the foreign processor and say: "What you told me was not good enough. You must take other steps to ensure and guarantee this product is good. If you do not do that, I will change suppliers because I do not want to be brought forward again and punished for being in contravention of the act". That is why due diligence should not apply.

Due diligence is applicable in many other areas of our justice system but should not be in the food processing industry. Again, this shows why Canada has one of the best food systems in the world. If we allow such a defence we are going to be regressing rather than progressing in the future, regressing because errors will not be corrected and the same problems will arise. If we allow it, this would be small comfort to an individual who might ingest an adulterated food that might cause serious injury or possibly even death.

The system put in place by Bill C–61 is a quick system. It is effective but it will not be painless. It cannot be painless. There has to be some pain but it does not have to be overly excessive. The person who violates the provisions of the bill must be brought to task for what has been done. However, Bill C–61 does not provide for imprisonment. It does not give the person a record of conviction of an offence and the penalties are rather modest but they are punitive to some extent and therefore serve the purpose required. The person who is contravening the legislation does not want to be brought back over and over.

Absolute liability offences are necessary in the food industry. They are absolutely necessary to protect people. Everyone knows this. I am sure the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster knows how important it is that any grain produced on his farm is not adulterated, that it has not been treated or accidentally adulterated with some chemicals, then sold and put into the food processing chain for someone else to eventually consume. It is as important there as it is in the processing industry. It is as important there as it is in the importing business.

How do we deal with it? Do we adopt a system where a person ends up going through a regulatory system with charges laid and the process going on and on? People like me in my other world relish such a system where things would work well for me. Or, do we put in a system that is effective and efficient? I suggest when it is contraventions in the food industry it has to be done quickly. It has to be done effectively because we cannot afford to have contraventions that continue over a period of time with adulterated food that keeps entering and maintaining itself in the food system while the possible contravention is being dealt with in the court system. It has to be quick. It has to be effective. The health of our public is too important.

• (1235)

The health of the people to which we export is too important. Canada's reputation is too important. We cannot afford to tarnish it by having our food system in any way hampered and looked on by people in this country and foreign countries, saying: "We do not know if we can rely on it. It is generally a good source, but it is not that good a source". We cannot afford such a reputation. The reputation has to be that ours is superior to everyone else, or as good as the best that there is.

The policy obviously is to maintain a very high standard. We must maintain it. It helps exports in the future and it certainly helps in the production and the processing of products.

As indicated by the hon. member for Malpeque, other common law defences are still available to a person. Due diligence is not the be all and end all if we do not accept it.

For the reasons I have given, I suggest that due diligence should not be a defence. Motion No. 19 should fail.

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief word or two with respect to the motions that are in Group No. 3, Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 18 and 19. The members who have already spoken in detail about these proposed amendments have very clearly indicated why the majority of them are either inappropriate or unnecessary. I would like to congratulate the members who have participated in the debate on these motions in putting forward the arguments very clearly.

I would like to indicate that Motion No. 18 is fundamentally acceptable. As a matter of legal interpretation, it may not be absolutely necessary, but as the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster indicated earlier with respect to Motion No. 10, if it is the government's intention to proceed in a reasonable manner, which obviously it is, then is there any harm done by including that specific word reasonable?

In the circumstances pertaining to Motion No. 18, it may as a matter of legal interpretation be a bit redundant. Some may say it is sort of gilding the lily, but it is clearly the government's intention to administer the bill in a reasonable fashion. If it improves the perception of the legislation by accepting Motion No. 18 and including the word reasonable in this context, the government has absolutely no problem with that. Motion No. 18 is certainly acceptable in this group of motions, whereas we would have to vote against Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5 and 19.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak this morning on the agriculture and agri–food administration of monetary penalties act. It is good legislation in the circumstances.

Presently, when an inspector under the agri–food act determines that offences have been committed under the statute, he must proceed through the criminal justice system and the whole process gets rolling. An information is laid through the attorney general's office, appearances begin in court, adjournments are made, the cost and time of not only the court administration, the cost of defence counsel, the cost of prosecuting counsel and the time it takes from beginning to end could be months if not years, depending on what the situation is.

The alternative method proposed in Bill C–61 is to establish a system of administrative monetary penalties, so that an inspector when he determines that an offence has taken place under the agri–food act, can impose a fine on the offender immediately, rather than proceeding through the judicial system. I think that is a very good procedure to be following.

• (1240)

The objective is to create a system that allows the officials of Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada to issue monetary penalties for serious or repeated violations of the regulations. The monetary penalties vary from $15,000 for companies to $2,000 for individuals. The legislation also establishes an independent tribunal to hear appeals of the proposed monetary penalties. Safeguards are still built into the system.

The AMP, if I may refer to that acronym, adds to the enforcement options available to agri–food prosecutors. The system still provides the department with appropriate responses when dealing with the violations of regulations such as in the marketing of inedible food products or the inhumane transportation of animals.

The term administrative monetary penalty is used to differentiate the monetary penalties which are administrative in nature from fines which are imposed by the court system for convictions of regulatory offences.

I will speak to some of the motions involved, but I submit that this is good government. It still provides a framework wherein Canada's high standards for food safety are maintained. That is essential. We are also assisting Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada to enforce health and safety standards consistently, not only for imported foods but for domestic food products as well.

Further, we are regulating in a more efficient and cost effective way. In this time of restraint, cost effectiveness is a very important item. Therefore, we are going to require less time and money to pursue these offences than we would otherwise do through the provincial court system.

The maintenance of a safe food supply is essential and Bill C–61 allows for the issuance of monetary penalties and is necessary to encourage industries to adhere. We do not really want them punished if they do not comply but we do want compliance. It is necessary that they adhere to these regulations such as in the areas of pesticides and animal and plant health. On matters touching food, the food chain and public health standards of conduct, they must be extremely high and the reasons are obvious.

I would also like to refer to the competitiveness of Bill C–61. I suggest that it supports the competitiveness of the agricultural sector by responding to requests for more equitable enforcement of regulations for imported and domestic products. Our domestic industry has complained for years that the standards for safety and quality are more strictly applied to them than to their competitors, especially offshore competitors and that is not fair.

Our industry supports the system because it allows Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada to respond quickly and effectively when importers or domestic industries market products that do not conform to our high standards in the area of food safety or in the safe use of pesticides. Equal enforcement of these standards for both imports and domestics enhances the competitiveness of the agricultural sectors.

Giving Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada the proper tools to effectively enforce these standards will help it to maintain Canada's fine reputation for healthy and safe food products. It is the reputation of our agri–food sector that suffers when exported products do not meet our health standards. They blame it on us, as a domestic supplier and that is not fair. Let us bring it all up to the same standards.

As an alternative to prosecution and with my background, I think this is a very key item in times of restraint. In the current climate of restraint, we need simple, efficient, cost effective ways for dealing with industries that do not comply with the regulations for food health and safety. Bill C–61 provides a fair but quick and expedient method for responding to regulatory violations.

The administrative procedure provided by Bill C–61 is an alternative to prosecuting regulatory offences in the provincial courts. It is faster and far less costly to both the department and the offender. We have to also remember the offender has to put up the cost of legal counsel and is away from the business, et cetera.

Administrative penalties are another step in the decriminalization of regulatory infractions. Unlike the situation where regulatory principles are prosecuted by the courts, Bill C–61 creates a decriminalized system. It does not provide for imprisonment or receiving a record of conviction of an offence. We do not want to make criminals out of these people, but we do want them to comply.

• (1245)

Administrative monetary penalties are a much fairer way of enforcement we for most regulatory infractions. When it hurts in the pocketbook, it hurts. A record may be a stigma in perpetuity, but when you have to come up with some hard cash out of our pockets we often think twice, and deservedly so.

Another aspect is negotiated settlement possibilities. This allows for negotiated solutions to non–compliance. What we really want them to do is comply. Even the monetary penalties can be reduced to zero if they would use the money to buy corrective equipment. Immediate action to correct the situation is much better than money into the coffers of the judicial system.

I might address some of the motions that have been put forward. Dealing perhaps with Motion No. 3, to vary the maximum penalty between first and subsequent violations, the current maximum penalties are relatively modest when we look at them. The bill does not make any distinction between first and subsequent violations for the purposes of setting a maximum penalty that could be assessed. However, the regulations will determine a base penalty in the range amount and circumstances under which the penalties may be increased or reduced.

Compliance history is one of the factors we set out in the regulations. Penalties will be reduced for violators with no previous history of non–compliance and increased for those who commit subsequent offences, as they deservedly should. Under subclause 4(3) of Bill C–61 penalty amounts may be increased or decreased based on the degree of intention or negligence on the part of the person who committed the violation, the amount of harm done by the violation, and the compliance history of the person who committed the offence.

Perhaps I could address Motion No. 4. The purpose is to have a notice of violation identify the designated person serving the notice. Service is an essential point of any court proceeding, and sometimes technicalities arise on service that result in the offender walking from the situation.

The bill allows that a notice may be served by various means. That is progression. The server of the notice may not necessarily be the designated person. By definition, the designated person is the person who issues the notice. Service of the notice is a procedural matter and is best addressed by maintaining a degree of flexibility. We want to be flexible.

The bill allows that the matter of service of all documents, including notices, will be addressed by regulations. For example, the regulation will make provision for service in person or by registered mail. We have these procedures in other court systems, in family law, et cetera. That is not unreasonable.

The purpose of Motion No. 5 is to legislate a minimum of 45 days within which a penalty may be paid. Again I suggest that this is a procedural matter which could be determined by the regulation. To put a time frame such as this in legislation really is impractical. It makes it very difficult to make changes in the event that the penalty could not be paid within the time frame.

Procedural details are generally contained in regulations or in policy documents. That is where they belong. The regulation making process really is open and fair. The preparation and drafting of regulations includes consultation with industry and the prepublication of the regulations in The Canada Gazette to give everyone sufficient notice. The process will ensure that a reasonable time frame is put in regulations for the payment of a monetary penalty. They will not escape. We have to be reasonable. Forty–five days may not be, as the minister of agriculture has suggested.

Motion No. 18 seems acceptable to us. The object of the motion is to clarify that expenses recoverable by Her Majesty in respect of the disposal of forfeited goods are reasonable. We want to be reasonable and we accept this motion as certainly reasonable in that situation.

The purpose of Motion No. 19 is to enable a violator to rely on the defence of due diligence. Bill C–61 allows for the issuance of monetary penalties based on absolute liability. That situation happens when the department only needs to prove that the alleged violator committed an act that was in violation of the regulations. The bill does not allow for the defence of due diligence by which a violator can avoid liability for the offence by establishing that he or she was not negligent.

Under Bill C–61 there is no possibility of imprisonment. There is no record of conviction for an offence. Penalties are modest rather than punitive in nature. Because of these factors there is no constitutional or other legal impediment to proceeding on the basis of absolute liability.

From a policy perspective, the use of absolute liability is essential to encourage the food industry to exhibit a high standard of care. This is important for matters involving the food chain and is consistent with the approach of courts in civil matters. The concept of absolute liability is important to the effectiveness of the system as a preventive measure.

We had the situation of some children being allergic to peanut butter. There was a very important incident where a young lady reacted to peanut butter and died rather quickly.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.) moved:

Motion No. 20

That Clause 19 be amended by striking out line 19 on page 11 and substituting the following:

"violation are reviewed by the Minister or by the Tribunal, the Minister must".

Motion No. 23

That Bill C–61, in Clause 29, be amended by adding after line 37, on page 14, the following:

"(3) For greater certainty, no lobbyist or party to a contract with the public service of Canada shall be appointed as a member of the Board or the Tribunal."

He said: Mr. Speaker, our caucus should have discovered the word reasonable a long time ago. Perhaps we would have more good laws passed in the House of Commons. I wish we had used that in Bill C–68, the gun control bill. We probably would not have had registration. And maybe we would not have had Bill C–64 introduced at all.

In any event, back to Bill C–61. I appreciate support from the other side for a couple of my amendments, which were reasonable, included the word reasonable and were adopted by the House.

We have now moved on to the fourth group of motions. I will address Motion No. 20, which deals with clause 19. It strikes out line 16 and substitutes the following: "violation are reviewed, the minister or the tribunal". Currently in this clause it is stated: "In every case where the facts of a violation are reviewed, the minister must establish, on a balance of probabilities, that the person named in the notice of violation".

This ensures that the facts of a violation should be reviewed both by the minister and by the tribunal. It is not a matter of either or, but in fact it is both. This again is a common sense amendment. It ensures that the burden of proof is on the minister in the case of a ministerial review. It ensures that there is burden of proof on the tribunal when a case of a violation is referred to the tribunal. This is just good common practice. It is sensible. It again puts some qualifiers and quantifiers into the legislation to make it not only effective but also balanced and fair.

I cannot see why members on the opposite side would have any problem whatsoever with this amendment. Therefore I encourage them to support it.

Moving on to Motion No. 23 which deals with clause 29, this motion adds after line 37 on page 14 a new subclause (3), which would say: "For greater certainty, no lobbyist or party to a contract with the Public Service of Canada shall be appointed as a member of the board or the tribunal".

The clause prior to that says: "A member of the tribunal shall not accept or hold any office or employment that is inconsistent with the member's duties or take part in any matter before the tribunal in which the member has an interest". We certainly support that clause, but it does not go far enough. All it says is that a member of the tribunal shall not be able to enter into a contract with the federal government. What it does not preclude though is the actual appointment to the board of a lobbyist or someone with a contract with the public service.

We have had a rather negative light cast upon government and upon politicians for quite some time because of the ethics we impose upon ourselves. That perhaps might be better stated as a lack of ethics we impose upon ourselves. Yes, there are conflict of interest guidelines. There has been some question as to the effectiveness of the conflict of interest guidelines currently, even upon us as members of Parliament. There is concern in the public sector that conflict of interest guidelines be rigid, clear and enforced.

• (1300)

Other legislation precludes members of Parliament or members of provincial legislatures from serving on a board or body such as this tribunal. However what is not precluded is the fact that lobbyists, people who are working for the public service and have a vested interest in the work of the tribunal, are currently not excluded from appointment. This dips into the whole area of patronage appointments that is repulsive to Canadians. It seems that lobbyists have an inside track and are able to have influence behind the scenes far beyond their worth.

I suggest the House support Motion No. 23 that goes one step further than the conflict of interest in clause 29(2) by stipulating that no government lobbyist or person who has a contract with the federal government may be appointed to the tribunal. I appreciate the progress we have made this morning.

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will deal with the two motions in Group No. 4.

On Motion No. 20, again showing how reasonable we are, I agree with the motion. The amendment possibly brings a little more clarity to the bill. It clarifies that the minister carries the burden of proof in both the ministerial review and the review by the tribunal that the person named in the notice of violation committed the violation. This is precisely what the current wording of the bill provides. I have no objection to accepting the proposed amendment; maybe it clarifies the matter a little further. It shows how reasonable we are on this side of the House.

The intent of the legislation is to set up the administrative monetary penalties act. At present an inspector with responsibility for enforcing the agri–food act determines there has been an offence under the statute. There has been much mention that he or she should proceed through the criminal justice system to obtain a penalty for the offence. The inspector must file a complaint with the attorney general who will, where appropriate, commence proceedings against the offender.

Currently whenever a penalty is sought, the entire judicial system must be brought to bear regardless of the seriousness of the offence. The expense and delay inherent in the procedure are often disproportionate to the particular offence. In some cases the fines imposed are very small and in other cases they create a criminal record, which is perhaps too severe a penalty.

In terms of seeking an alternative the government established a system of administrative monetary penalties so that an inspector who determines there has been a violation of the agri–food act could impose a fine on the offender immediately rather than proceed through the judicial system. Basically the government is creating efficiencies in government, being fair and reasonable to all and protecting the interests of the public under the act.

I will mention a couple of points and why the minister must carry the burden of proof. There is a lot at stake and it is important the minister carry the burden of proof. The administrative monetary penalty system will be one that allows the FPI to levy monetary penalties for non–compliance with branch acts and regulations. As has been mentioned by others in the debate, it is less costly, would not tie up the court system and creates a great deal of efficiency.

• (1305)

The administrative monetary penalty system will lead to more equitable enforcement of regulations by allowing the department to take effective action against importers and domestic companies marketing products that do not meet Canadian health, safety and quality standards.

As the system starts to evolve, the industry will recognize the pressure the new system puts on it. The industry will continue to comply with the regulations without having to get into any great enforcement measures. That is important. That is the objective of the system. The criminal prosecution system will remain an option and is available should it become necessary.

It is important that monetary penalties can be offset through compliance agreements. The proposal is to reduce the fine by $1 for every $2 a company spends on new equipment, process changes or staff training to prevent the recurrence of non–compliance. That is also an incentive for the industry to comply with the regulations. In this way the system emphasizes compliance, not punishment for behaviour, which is certainly a great step in the right direction. The administrative monetary penalty system fits with the government's regulatory review agenda to improve regulatory effectiveness and decriminalize most regulatory offences.

The intent of Motion No. 20 is a good one and can be supported. However Motion No. 23 is a horse of a different colour and I cannot support it. The amendment provides that "no lobbyist or party to a contract with the Public Service of Canada shall be appointed as a member of the board or the tribunal".

The bill requires that members of the tribunal have technical qualifications related to the areas of agriculture and agri–food and are not in positions of conflict of interest relative to the matter before them. In addition, it has been clearly set out that no member of the tribunal may be employed in the Public Service of Canada.

The intent of Motion No. 23 is taken care of in other ways. If one were to incorporate the amendment, in essence it would make the legislation more cumbersome. In effect Motion No. 23 is unnecessary and I have to oppose it.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with this group of amendments I will address two related and relevant issues.

Our efforts to fine tune the legislation in the House and earlier in committee have been primarily directed toward ensuring a proper balance between the rights and liberties of Canadians in the sector we are dealing with and the administrative exigencies as they evolve in the agricultural sector. Because we are dealing with food, in many cases some of the exigencies tend to be relatively urgent and require a prompt solution as opposed to a slow, administratively cumbersome solution.

• (1310)

As we strive to seek that balance in the House with the legislation, we must keep in mind that the House realizes it cannot, as is sometimes said, micro–manage the sector. We simply do not have the ability to micro–manage in all detail everything that goes on in a particular field. That is why the House by way of regulation delegates authority to administrators in government to make regulations which deal in a more specific way with the exigencies in the field.

Even then it is tough. Even then it is probably impossible to micro–manage. Many decisions that have to be made are being made in a warehouse at a border. Perhaps they are being made in a barn somewhere by inspectors and people who are growing and transporting the commodity. We ought to resist the urge in the House to overly micro–manage the field, and that is why we delegate.

We are trying to find that balance in the House and that is tricky. There is a further challenge for Parliament. Every time we delegate we say that we are giving authority or power to an official of the government. That official, in concert with the department, will be making decisions about property of others and what others can or cannot grow and transport in this field.

The challenge for Parliament is not so much today; it is down the road. We have a committee that deals ex post facto with the regulatory authority delegated by the House, the Standing Joint Committee for Scrutiny of Regulations. The more the House delegates, the more work there is for the standing joint committee. Given the large degree of delegation taking place under this statute, I see a further challenge for the standing joint committee to deal with the scrutiny of this type of regulatory delegation.

One criteria of the committee is described as the unintended or unexpected use of power. I agree it is perhaps a little fuzzy. However, should an official, the department, the minister or the cabinet at some future date authorize the taking of a step that could be construed as an unexpected or unintended use of power, the committee would point it out to the House. The committee also has the power of disallowance which it has used a half a dozen times in the last four or five years. It prefers not to do so. It is a procedure the House would rather not have the committee use but when necessary it does so.

To the extent we are delegating and trying to fine tune that delegation, there will remain to a greater or lesser degree a significant challenge to the committee structure created by the House in reviewing the appropriateness of the use of the authority and power we delegate.

• (1315)

It is not to detract from our efforts here to find the right balance between rights and liberties and administrative efficiency.

I think all members have the same view and I will continue to participate in this debate in the hope that we achieve the proper balance so the administrators, the minister, the deputy ministers, departmental officials and the cabinet will have the right tools and the right balance so our citizens will get the best services and the best considerations under this statute.

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to once again address some of the motions by members from the other side of the House in relation to the agriculture and agri–food administrative monetary penalties act.

The purpose of the bill is to allow for expedience and resolution to breaches of regulations in the agriculture and agri–food industry. It is designed to make it a lot easier for the department and those involved in breaches of regulations to resolve their difficulties.

It is designed to ensure we get compliance with the regulations as soon as is reasonably possible. The bill does not inhibit the rights of people accused of violating the respective statutes to have the option to gain the full procedural and substantive protection that can be gained from the law if they so choose to defend themselves in traditional fashion of court hearings and due process. This is still available to those who violate the act.

The purpose of Motion No. 20 according to hon. members opposite is to clarify that the minister and the Government of Canada carry the burden of proof in both the ministerial review and the review by the tribunal that the person named in the notice of violation committed the violation. This is certainly what the current wording of the bill provides for.

We have no objection to this amendment. This is another amendment the minister has accepted from members opposite. This shows a responsible attitude by the minister of agriculture in the sense that where there are amendments that enhance the act, where there are amendments that do not do any harm to what is sought to be accomplished by the act, regardless of who brings them forward, if they improve the legislation and make it a bit clearer, the government is certainly willing to hear them.

The legislation makes clear that the minister carries the burden of proof in both the ministerial review and the review by the tribunal that the person named in the notice of violation is the one who committed the violation. This goes back to one of the fundamental bases of the Canadian justice system of due process. The system is based on many administrative procedural protections granted to people who run afoul of regulatory or sometimes even criminal law.

Our common law system has always sought to protect those accused of violations, whether regulatory offences, criminal offences such as under the highway traffic act, provincial offences or somewhere in between. Our legal system always provides safeguards to the person accused of the violation commensurate with the penalty and the seriousness of the breach involved.

Our justice system on a very fundamental basis seeks to ensure innocent people are not convicted or not held responsible for violations they did not participate in. That is why within the common law I do not think there is even any need to suggest the minister carry the burden of proof. The state in matters of breaches of criminal violations, regulatory violations and provincial statute violations always carries the burden of proof.

It is probably better that a few guilty people are acquitted rather than innocent people being subjected to the raw power, the sanction of the state when they were not guilty of what they were charged with.

In relation to the first motion, we are accepting it. The fundamental principles of Canadian law that the minister carry the burden of proof is simply a foregone conclusion and one we accept. This is not the case in all countries. Sometimes one is presumed guilty and must prove one's innocence. In Canada, the British Commonwealth system, the common law system, different considerations apply.

Motion No. 23 of Group No. 4 seeks to provide that no lobbyist or party to a contract with the Public Service of Canada shall be appointed as a member of the board or the tribunal.

The government in appointing individuals to these tribunals always appoints well qualified people who are known for their fairness so that people can trust the correctness of the decisions made by these tribunals. Each of these appointments is very carefully weighed. The people must be qualified in order to participate in these issues.

Once again common law clearly requires that people with a conflict of interest not serve on boards or tribunals such as this. As has been the track record of the minister to date in other appointments, as well as other ministers in other departments, the people sought to be placed in positions like these are qualified people. They will carry out their duties in a manner that will respect the government and the people accused of various violations of agriculture and agri–food penalties.

• (1325)

No one in a conflict of interest will end up on these tribunals. They are quasi–judicial bodies and as a result will have to be above reproach. Common law provides many administrative remedies that could be taken through the courts should there be any reasonable apprehension of bias or other grounds on which the decision of the appointed person could be put in question.

People with these types of connections will simply not be appointed. If a situation arises in which there could be any type of conflict whatsoever, administrative law procedures are available through the courts to ensure people who are being judged in this fashion are fully protected.

While Motion No. 20 says exactly what the bill says and follows the philosophy and basic underpinnings of the law in Canada, the minister will be accepting a recommendation to further clarify and ensure the law is clear and known.

With respect to the second motion, this will be taken care of in the same manner the government has done to date. Remedies are available to anyone who feels aggrieved by a decision, who feels there may be a problem, to deal through the courts with such an issue.

I again thank the minister for his efforts in bringing these changes forward, changes that will certainly improve the—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in support of Bill C–61.

This bill adds to the enforcement option available to certain legislation administered by Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada by allowing administrative monetary penalties to be imposed. The bill also authorizes the minister, if requested, to conclude compliance agreements with persons who commit violations.

Under compliance agreements, administrative monetary penalties can be reduced or cancelled if persons agree to take the appropriate steps to ensure future compliance with agri–food acts and regulations. The administrative monetary penalties are subject to review by an independent tribunal. Now every contravention can currently be prosecuted.

The bill gives the minister an administrative option where prosecution is seen to be too harsh a measure. In arriving at his decision the minister will be guided by a compliance and enforcement policy—I underline the word policy because it gives broader perspectives—that establishes the criteria to guide the department in making decisions on the use of all enforcement controls or options.

The policy is a public document. The choice to be made by the minister of whether to prosecute or issue a monetary penalty is akin to a prosecutorial choice. It is such as we would find in a criminal case in which the decision is made on whether a matter should proceed by way of indictment or by summary conviction. Because the choice is heavily dependent upon the facts in each situation, flexibility is required. This flexibility is best offered by relying on policy rather than regulations.

It has always been the intention to administer this bill in a reasonable manner. We on this side of the House are happy to accept this approach to the bill. However, compliance agreements form an integral part of the proposed scheme. The object of the scheme is to obtain compliance rather than to penalize the violator. It is a common sense approach to bring those who are the users into a compliance mode without using the heavy hand of the law or penalties.

By authorizing the department to enter into these agreements the bill gives the department a tool to negotiate the implementation by industry of measures that would change the violator's practices and processes. The emphasis here is on change. At the same time, the violator may pay a reduced penalty in exchange for committing funds to effect the necessary improvements leading to future compliance. The bill provides that kind of flexibility.

Compliance agreements result in immediate corrective action which is the desired result of the bill. Of course, immediate corrective action leads to a better product, improved health and safety, and more effective enforcement. Compliance agreements are optional and no one is forced to enter into them. The bill provides an incentive to enter into compliance agreements by making it possible to reduce the amount of monetary penalty.

The nature of the bill is to achieve compliance. For those who do not comply and who are found out, they are counselled into compliance. If they do not comply, the second stage is enacted. The nature of the bill is to encourage people to comply.

Current maximum penalties are relatively modest. The bill does not make a distinction between first and subsequent violations for the purpose of setting a maximum penalty that could be assessed. However, the regulations will determine a base penalty amount and the range and circumstances under which the penalties may be increased or reduced. The regulations will determine a base penalty amount and the range and circumstances. The compliance history will be one of the factors set out in the regulations whereby penalties will be reduced for violators with no previous history of non–compliance. Again, it is the nature of the action. If there is a perceived resistance to compliance the enforcement of the regulation is the only tool the government has.

Penalty amounts may be increased or decreased based on the degree of intention or negligence on the part of the person who committed the violation, the amount of harm done by the violation, and the compliance history of the person who committed the violation. Flowing through this is a series of steps that is known in law as the law of natural justice. Was this a one–shot affair? Was there fair warning? Was there counselling? That is the rule of the land in our country: no one is caught out the first time. In that sense it shows fairness. If it is not fair, the person who is charged has the right to appeal.

I had the opportunity to sit through the clause by clause deliberations in committee. A number of very good concerns were raised, mainly by the opposition but from the government side as well. I see that some of them have been incorporated in this bill. It speaks for the bill having some input from members who are not of the government party.

• (1335)

I see this adhering to the laws of natural justice and due process is outlined clearly in this bill. I would like to review a few points in the bill that may give it a bit more light.

Bill C–61 allows for issuance of monetary penalties on the basis of absolute liability, that is where the department needs only to prove that an alleged violator committed an act that is in violation of the regulations. The bill does not allow a defence of due diligence by which a violator can avoid liability by establishing that he or she was not negligent.

Under Bill C–61 there is no possibility of imprisonment, no record of conviction for an offence is created, and penalties are modest rather than punitive in nature. Because of these factors, there is no constitutional or other legal impediment to proceeding on the basis of absolute liability.

From a policy perspective, the use of absolute liability is essential to encourage the food industry to exhibit a high standard of care, which the people of Canada expect. This is important for matters involving the food chain and consistent with the approach the courts take in civil cases. The concept of absolute liability is important to the effectiveness of the system as a preventative measure.

Let me give an example of the standards necessary in the food chain. To someone with peanut allergies, even a minute amount of peanut dust is enough to send them into an anaphylactic shock. To such a person, the issue is not whether a company exercised due diligence. When we see the breakout of products, even when we have HP sauce included, it is far more detailed than any other country I know of in this world. As a preventative measure, finding that a product is mislabelled in not indicating the presence of peanuts in itself warrants finding liability. That is presently in the law.

The focus of Bill C–61 is on preventative and remedial action and not in finding of fault. The use of absolute liability is also provided for in an effective and efficient enforcement system.

The resource base for enforcing regulations is shrinking. Bill C–61 deliberately designs a simple and efficient system to deal with those importers or domestic companies that do not follow our health, safety, and quality regulations. It is worth mentioning that although the due diligence defence does not apply, other common law defences are available to a person to whom the notice of violation is issued.

Bill C–61 is in my judgment a fair bill, presented and debated openly in committee. It follows the natural laws of justice and includes due process. On that basis, I give my full support to this bill.

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have just a couple of brief comments about the group of motions we are now considering, Group No. 4, which deals with Motions Nos. 20 and 23.

With respect to Motion No. 20, the purpose of this motion is to clarify that the minister of the day essentially carries the burden of proof under this legislation in both the ministerial review process and the review by the tribunal that is proposed under this legislation, the burden of proof that the person named in the notice of the violation in fact committed the violation.

• (1340)

That is how I understand the meaning and intent of the member for Kindersley—Lloydminister in putting forward this motion. I can say without any shadow of a doubt that if I have understood his meaning correctly, that is precisely what the intention of the government is in the wording that is presently proposed in this provision in Bill C–61.

Again in the spirit of co–operation that we demonstrated earlier today in other clauses of this bill, if it is the view of hon. members that inserting the wording proposed in Motion No. 20 clarifies this point, makes it more certain, more definite, I certainly have no objection to accepting this proposed amendment. It is completely consistent with the government's intention in the first place.

I suppose legal scholars and draftsmen could have some interesting discussions about how pretty the language is. Those superficial arguments notwithstanding, the meaning and intent on both sides of the House on this point are absolutely consistent. I have no problem with the amendment the hon. gentleman has put forward.

With respect to Motion No. 23, I do have a problem with this amendment. The manner of appointment for members of the review tribunal by the governor in council that is set out in the version of Bill C–61 that we have before us at the present time follows a well established practice. It is a practice that has been endorsed in this country by the courts of law, assuring the independence of the tribunal from outside interference.

The bill requires very clearly already, without the amendment that is proposed in Motion No. 23, that members of the tribunal have the necessary technical qualification related to the area of agriculture and agri–food and are not in any position of conflict of interest relative to any matters that may come before them for adjudication. In addition, specifically, no member of the tribunal may be employed in the Public Service of Canada.

Those provisions that are already in Bill C–61 adequately cover the point that has been raised by my hon. friend in his Motion No. 23. Therefore I think Motion No. 23 is unnecessary. It could, depending upon legal interpretation, add some uncertainties to a situation, which I am sure my hon. friend does not intend. I presume his intention is to make things more certain and not less certain. With the greatest of respect, we would be better off, in connection to the subject matter to which Motion No. 23 pertains, to leave the draft language as it stands now and reject Motion No. 23. The substance of Motion No. 23 is already otherwise covered in the legislation.

Motion No. 21

That Bill C–61, in Clause 29, be amended by replacing line 5, on page 14, with the following:

"nor in Council with the approval of the committee of the House of Commons that normally considers agricultural matters, one of whom shall be ap–".

Motion No. 22

That Bill C–61 in Clause 29 be amended by adding immediately after line 6, on page 14, the following:

"(1.1) No person may be appointed to the Tribunal by the Governor in Council without the prior approval of the committee of the House of Commons that normally considers matters relating to agriculture."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C–61, the Agriculture and Agri–Food Administrative Monetary Penalties Act.

I will explain Motions Nos. 21 and 22, on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois. These motions seek to limit the discretionary power of the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food.

Clause 29 of Bill C–61 provides that the chairperson and members of the review tribunal are appointed by the governor in council. Motion No. 21, tabled by us, provides that Bill C–61, in Clause 29, be amended by replacing line 5, on page 14, with the following:

"nor in Council with the approval of the committee of the House of Commons that normally considers agricultural matters, one of whom shall be ap–".

As for Motion No. 22, it provides that Bill C–61, in Clause 29, be amended by adding immediately after line 6, on page 14, the following:

"(1.1) No person may be appointed to the Tribunal by the Governor in Council without the prior approval of the committee of the House of Commons that normally considers matters relating to agriculture".

These proposed changes seek to establish a more transparent process regarding the appointment of the tribunal's members and chairperson. We cannot let the minister appoint members alone. I strongly objected to that a few moments ago. If he so wishes, an offender could be heard by the review tribunal.

In its present form, the bill provides that members of this tribunal are appointed by the minister and that their mandate can be renewed. These members must review decisions made by department officials who, of course, are accountable to the minister. Earlier, I alluded to possible conflicts of interest, and I still think that such a risk exists.

Could people appointed by the minister be pressured into making decisions which they would not otherwise make? No matter how small the risk, we simply cannot take that chance. It would make a lot more sense if members of the tribunal were appointed by the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–food, after reviewing whether or not certain issues posed problems in terms of how they were dealt with.

We simply want to avoid any risk of arbitrary decisions or patronage appointments. We understand and accept the principle underlying that bill, but we oppose any compliance agreement or arbitrary appointment by the minister.

This is why we are asking this House to at least support the amendments proposed by the Bloc Quebecois. I certainly hope that we are not the only ones here who seek transparency.

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are now dealing with amendments brought forward in group No. 5, Motions Nos. 21 and 22, in relation to Bill C–61, the agriculture and agri–food administrative monetary penalties act. I appreciate the opportunity to address the matter.

The purpose of Motions Nos. 21 and 22 is to change the process of appointing members of the review tribunal by having the governor in council appointments approved by an agriculture related committee of the House of Commons before the appointments are effective.

A point that should be made with regard to this matter is similar to one made in relation to an amendment brought forward by the Reform Party that the current appointment process and the one in the present bill and as stated by the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food is a tried and true process, one approved by the courts. The courts posses the ability to ensure that all decisions are according to the administrative law of the land.

It is proposed that an agriculture related committee approve the people who are put forward to sit on these tribunals to hear disputes between the regulators and those who may have run afoul of various agriculture and agri–food regulations pursuant to a number of acts. What is being proposed will make the procedure more cumbersome. The whole intent of the legislation is to find efficiencies in the way the government does business, to make the process cheaper, to ensure that the rules of fundamental administrative justice can be achieved and that it is balanced with administrative ease.

In my view, the proposal adds to the cumbersome nature of the appointment process. The time required to deal with the appointments will be increased. The committee could refuse to recommend any of the incumbents to these positions thereby effectively preventing these positions from being filled.

It is also important to say that this represents a move toward a more American style hearing process for the approval of various appointments to positions.

If we look south of the border we see these monstrously expensive, cumbersome processes to appoint various individuals. These individuals are subject to such scrutiny, they are basically put in a position where they are unable to defend themselves from the most vicious, partisan types of attacks.

This takes away from the dignity of a person sitting on a quasi–judicial body. It makes it difficult for people of good quality to want to subject themselves to this type of situation. Even if they are good people and are willing to submit to this type of interrogation and partisan attack on their credibility, whether or not they make it through the process, they will not be what is needed to maintain the respect of both the government regulators and the people who have run afoul of various regulations in various agricultural statutes.

There are a number of reasons I am opposed to these types of situations arising. The situation we have now is tried, it is true. It has been upheld by the courts as a method of approving these people. It takes away from the partisanship which could really detract from the dignity of the process, the dignity of the office of the person participating and assisting the country.

The Speaker: It being two o'clock we will proceed to Statements by Members.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, recently I attended a meeting of the mayors from the Toronto region. At this meeting, 30 mayors and five regional chairmen unanimously passed a resolution expressing their desire for a united Canada that includes Quebec.

The resolution reads as follows: "whereas, the mayors of the greater Toronto region have recognized and approved, by the very fact of their meeting, the strength and benefits that unity provides; whereas the unity of Canada and its people enhances the strength of and the benefits accruing to each of our regions; whereas approximately four million residents of this region have, together with the people of Quebec, built this great country of ours; therefore it is resolved that the mayors of the greater Toronto region, on behalf of its residents, express their desire to support the unity of a Canada that includes Quebec".

As the Prime Minister said last night, this is not only a battle for the future of Quebec, it is a question about the future of Canada.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the vision of doom and gloom of the No side has just been refuted in a report released by a major American brokerage house. Indeed, the New York firm of Donaldson, Lufkin and Jenrette argues that, should the sovereignty option prevail, first, the credit rating of the Quebec government would not be affected, second, market uncertainty would be short–lived, and third, the economic situation would remain stable.

This is similar to the findings of a recent study undertaken by the advisory director of the fourth major commercial bank in the United States, who said, and I quote: "In conclusion, according to the rating and the views of the capital markets, if the people opt for sovereignty, the most likely result would be between neutral and positive".

The fear tactics used by the No side are no longer credible and do not scare anyone any more. Quebec now has all the assets to face the future and take control of its economic levers.

KID BROTHER CAMPAIGN

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I want to share the thoughts in a letter sent to me from Tom Arnbas of the Kid Brother Campaign.

> On behalf of my family and the 300,000 Canadians who signed our Kid Brother Campaign petition, please accept my deepest thanks. With your support and the understanding of people such as you, I am sure we will be able to get the changes we want to this ridiculous Young Offenders Act.
> Mr. Thompson, when you speak with the justice minister, please make sure he knows Canadians believe our government provides very little justice for victims of serious crime.
> If the minister personally experiences the pain my family is going through, I am sure he'd want the criminals to be punished.
> The minister's staff tells people I am putting on a theatrical performance, but you know nothing could be further from the truth. We are real people, my brother was really murdered and it seems our justice system doesn't care.
> My family wants to know, what we can do to make Mr. Rock understand.

That is the same question every Canadian is asking.

CANADA POST

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, a trucking company in Winnipeg which carries Canadian mail is planning to reroute a significant amount of its traffic between Montreal and Winnipeg and Toronto and Winnipeg through the United States. Test trips are soon to begin with exact locations for refuelling laid out in detail to take advantage of savings in fuel costs.

This raises a number of issues. There is the issue of the higher than necessary cost of gasoline in the country and the government's refusal to lean on the gas companies to take less of a profit. It also shows how the free trade mentality has changed our ways, eliminating borders in our minds as well as on paper.

In a week when we are properly talking about our love for Canada, what are we to say of the fact that Canadian mail addressed from one part of Canada to another is being rerouted through the United States, thus eroding the tax and economic base that funds things like medicare?

If we want to be a country we should start acting like a country.

NATIONAL UNITY

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on September 27, the Regional Municipality of Ottawa–Carleton affirmed through a unanimous resolution its pride in its bilingual character, going back to pre–Confederation time.

The citizens of the National Capital area are proud of the fact that their communities on both sides of the river reflect the duality of this great country of ours. Populated for more than 170 years by the two founding peoples, the capital is the symbol of what the Prime Minister was saying last night, that citizens of different languages, cultures and origins can live together in harmony.

Like the Ottawa–Carleton region message to Quebecers, I truly hope that they vote no on October 30. I urge them, like the Prime Minister yesterday, not to break our bonds of friendship and understanding, our bonds of mutual trust.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last night, two very important messages were delivered to the people of Canada. On the one hand, they heard the Prime Minister of Canada calmly but seriously describe the country's situation as the referendum date approaches and what major impact a Yes victory would have.

On the other hand, they saw the separatist leader of the Bloc Quebecois revile another Quebecer, one who stands up for a strong Quebec within a united Canada. The Prime Minister talked about understanding, openness and positive changes, while all his opponent talked about was resentment, bitterness and revenge.

On October 30, Quebecers will dismiss this message of destruction and vote No.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the people of Quebec must understand that a Yes victory in the October 30 referendum will take away forever all the benefits associated with belonging to the Canadian family.

If Quebec separates, this means that never again will Quebecers be called Canadians. Never again will they benefit from the international recognition and respect that go with the Canadian passport. Never again will they be able to move as freely in Canada as their brothers and sisters from the other provinces and to trade as freely as they used to with them.

A victory for the Yes side will have untold but deeply felt consequences for Quebecers. On October 30, the Canadian dream must be kept alive by saying No to separation.

[English]

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am a Canadian. It is my wish that Quebec remain a part of Canada. To Quebecers I say this is their home. We are a nation from sea to sea to sea. The very ideals they search for are to be found within these borders, not beyond. However the upcoming referendum to be held on October 30 will decide whether Canada is 10 equal provinces or two nations.

All provinces should have certain rights. Reformers believe the federal government should withdraw from provincial areas such as natural resources, manpower training, language and culture, housing, et cetera. As an equal province Quebec can work within our country for a new federalism which will address its needs for change.

Quebecers are not the only ones looking for change. People in other parts of Canada are looking for change as well. I hope on October 30 that Quebecers will vote to stay in Canada.

We are a family with many strong differences like all families. Surely members of a family of goodwill can sit down and be imaginative. There is a federalism to redefine and a good nation to save.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the polls indicate that a number of people are set to vote Yes in the October 30 referendum thinking—can you imagine—that this will lead to the renewal of Canadian federalism.

Nothing could be further from the truth. A Yes vote in the referendum will not bring constitutional changes. Instead, it would bring change and development to an end. It would spell the end of Canada.

On October 30, those who want to remain Canadians and who want Quebec to remain a part of a modern and prosperous Canada will vote No.

Change will come from the No side; this option is the only one allowing Quebec to remain in Canada. The Yes side has nothing to offer, except breaking up our country and tearing it apart, and Quebecers do not want that to happen.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in his address to the nation, the Prime Minister said that the vote on Monday will determine the future not only of Quebec but also of Canada as a whole, adding that the consequences of this decision cannot be foreseen or measured.

This is a very serious warning. It clearly shows what is really at stake in the referendum. On Monday, the people of Quebec will not be voting on some way of renewing federalism or on a vague offer of partnership. They will have to decide whether or not they want Quebec to break away from Canada and become a foreign country. They will have to decide if they are prepared to abandon their history and heritage.

The people of Quebec must know that by voting Yes on October 30, they will become strangers in their own land.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, having reviewed his position, Laurent Beaudoin now says that Bombardier will stay in Quebec whatever the results of the referendum on Monday. After trying to influence Quebecers' decision, Mr. Beaudoin, faced with the imminence of a Yes vote on October 30, changed his mind.

Laurent Beaudoin did not behave as a responsible businessman by using scare tactics to try to influence the decision of his employees and of all Quebecers. Bombardier will stay in Quebec because it is doing well there.

The prophets of doom were taught a lesson in maturity by Pierre Péladeau, who said yesterday: "I think that we as business leaders have no right to try to influence our people—Fear will not solve anything; we will not solve anything by trying to scare people". That is why Quebecers will vote Yes with confidence next Monday.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on October 30, Quebecers will find themselves at a crossroads, having to make a decision on their future.

If they go right, they will vote against separation. It will be a vote against the status quo, a vote for the decentralization of federal powers and the end of the strongly undemocratic system in which we are living. This vote will put the provinces in control of their cultural and linguistic destiny.

If they go left, they will choose separation, thus causing a mass exodus of businesses, skyrocketing unemployment, and economic disaster.

I urge Quebecers to think about the future of their children and to join forces with all other Canadians in fulfilling our legitimate destiny, being the best country in the world to live in. Long live Canada, a united country.

The Speaker: With all respect I urge members not to use any props in the House of Commons.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, one of the separatist leaders took the Prime Minister of Canada up on his offer to address all Canadians. But unlike the Prime Minister, who delivered the same speech to Canadians in both official languages, the Bloc leader had two different messages for Canadians.

• (1410)

In his French language speech, the separatist leader was content to put the past on trial and to accuse the Canadian government of all the problems in the world. In his English language speech, he chose to speak from the other side of his mouth. He portrayed himself as a good, mollifying neighbour hoping for open co–operation in the future.

Quebecers have wised up to the separatists' subterfuge designed to deceive them. On October 30, Quebec will say No to this vision, which comes in different French and English versions.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said this yesterday: "As you found out this week, political instability exacts a very heavy cost".

The past few weeks of the referendum campaign, and the past few days in particular, have clearly demonstrated how dramatically our economy can be affected by uncertainty and nervousness on the financial markets, in the business community and among small investors.

Canada offers stability, social peace and an ideal haven to anyone who wants to build and develop. By saying No to Quebec's proposed separation, the people of Quebec will vote for success, prosperity and security.

Canada is the only side that offers change while at the same time preserving stability and protecting what has been gained. That is why the people of Quebec will say no to separation.

PREMIER OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, New Brunswick dropped a bombshell yesterday, when the legislative assembly led by Premier McKenna agreed to recognize Quebec's distinctive character.

It was Premier McKenna who, at the current Prime Minister's instigation, led the attack that resulted in the failure of the Meech Lake accord in the spring of 1990, going back without hesitation on the promise made by his predecessor. The very man responsible for the failure of Meech Lake would now have us believe that he recognizes Quebec's distinctive character. Just what does he take Quebecers for?

Quebecers will not again be deceived by this man who has lost any credibility he may have had. It is obvious that those who wanted to crush the side promoting change are panicking now.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in his address to the nation yesterday, the Prime Minister of Canada reiterated his commitment to bring about the changes Quebecers want.

He said, and I quote: "We must recognize that Quebec's language, its culture and institutions make it a distinct society. And no constitutional change that affects the powers of Quebec should ever be made without the consent of Quebecers".

This commitment by the Prime Minister of Canada is consistent with the No side's desire to be open and to effect change. This is a serious commitment, which opens up the most challenging prospects for Quebec and Canada the day after a No vote.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am addressing you today as a Canadian of British origin, who remembers the commitments made to the French in the Quebec Act, and as a Liberal, who is proud of the contributions made by Laurier, St–Laurent, Trudeau and Chrétien.

I am speaking as a Canadian from Upper Canada, who remembers how Papineau, Brown, Lafontaine and Baldwin made it possible for two nations to build a common future.

I am speaking as a Canadian who is afraid to see her country destroyed by a spell cast through fabrication, deceit and personal attacks.

If only I could just snap my fingers and free Quebecers from this spell before it is too late. We have shared too much to just drop everything.

Je me souviens. Indeed, I remember.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, two years ago yesterday over two million Canadians voted overwhelmingly for change by electing 52 Reformers. We have a vision for a new, revitalized country based on more effective democratic accountability, fiscal sanity, a justice system that works, and a decentralized federation that responds more effectively to regional and personal needs.

• (1415)

Today many Quebecers are considering giving up on Canada. I urge them not to do so. I urge them to vote no on Monday, to stay together as a country and to join with Reformers in all provinces to build a new confederation and a new Canada.

We believe in a strong country, a strong federation of equal people and equal provinces and less interference in our lives by a heavy-handed, intrusive federal government. We believe that power should be closer to the people. We believe profoundly that we need to build on our strengths, the highest of which is a deep commitment to understand and care for each other. Things do not need to stay the same.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in his speech to the nation, the Prime Minister wanted to reach out to Quebecers by telling them, and I quote: "I have also heard, and I understand, that the disappointments of the past are still very much alive".

Could the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, on the basis of what we heard last night, tell us whether the Prime Minister, like the Minister of Labour yesterday afternoon in this House, hopes that before they vote in the referendum, Quebecers will forget what he did in the course of his career and consider only what he has done in the past two years which, in our opinion, is not any more reassuring?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our government has accomplished a great deal since it came to power. Between 1984 and 1993 we were not there, unfortunately, but in the February 1995 budget we announced a major shift toward decentralization. Through our program review, we have to restrict the role of the federal government in the various areas for which it is responsible.

Furthermore, in addition to offering the provinces a mechanism for reducing duplication, we signed 64 agreements to that end within the past 18 months, including a dozen agreements with Quebec.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs can go ahead and repeat his set speech which is meaningless to Quebecers. That is his privilege. He decides how to answer the question.

I would like to ask him this: Even assuming that Quebecers forget the Prime Minister's past, as he asked them to do, and consider only the last two years of his mandate, do the minister and his colleagues realize that every time the Prime Minister referred to the Quebec referendum question, he said it was not in the cards, he did not want any of it and even that we would get a drubbing?

Does the minister think this is the sort of thing that would make Quebecers trust him?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the opposition should be very careful when it attacks the past of a man who has dedicated more than 30 years of his life to politics and by whom the interests of Quebec and Canada were well served.

The people in the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois and their separatist leaders have made a habit of attacking the person of the Prime Minister instead of sticking to the issues. They obviously have no more arguments of substance to prove that separation would be a good thing, so now they attack personalities. There is no doubt that the federation has evolved in a positive way in recent years.

The hon. member for Roberval says it is meaningless. Is it meaningless to acknowledge that the quiet revolution took place in Quebec within the federation, within Canada?

• (1420)

Is it meaningless to acknowledge that Quebec's language rights were asserted, protected and augmented in recent years within Quebec and Canada? Is it meaningless to point out that Quebec industrialists have managed to win back Quebec's economy and play a far more important role than they did 20, 25 or 30 years ago, in Quebec and Canada?

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the man who is responsible for closing the Collège de Saint–Jean without justification has a tendency to talk about issues for which he is not responsible. Since he mentioned the Prime Minister's career and said the Prime Minister served Quebec well, allow me to quote the Prime Minister who said in April 1992, and I will quote him verbatim: "It is pretty obvious what happened. We did not try to shaft Quebec, but we did outsmart them".

Considering these comments about Quebec, does the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs think Quebecers should trust the man whom the minister is defending and who represents the status quo for tomorrow, if Quebecers were to say no in the referendum?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all I may remind the hon. member for Roberval that Saint–Jean was one occasion when the ministers of the Parti Quebecois failed to deal with the problem. When the Péquistes could not agree, we made arrangements with the Conseil économique du Haut–Richelieu to keep the Collège de Saint–Jean open. That is the honest truth.

Second, the hon. member quoted what the Prime Minister of Canada said a few years ago. Perhaps we should ask the Leader of the Opposition what he said when he was a Conservative, or what he said when he was with the Union nationale, because he changed his position several times. What matters is the truth of what he said, not his position at the time.

As far as truth is concerned, I would really like to know why, when Mr. Bouchard, the Leader of the Opposition, spoke to the people of this country last night, what he said in English was so different from what he said in French?

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, most of the quotes attributed this week to the Prime Minister have come from his book, an interesting book worth reading.

In Le Droit on April 8, 1982, the present Prime Minister, Minister of Justice at that time, was quoted as saying he was not in the least surprised and was very pleased that the Quebec appeal court judges had been unanimous in rejecting Quebec's claim of entitlement to a veto.

My question is directed to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. How could Quebecers today trust a Prime Minister who says that no constitutional change affecting Quebec's powers will be made without the consent of the people of Quebec, when that same man stated in 1982 that he was not in the least surprised and was very pleased that the Quebec appeal court judges had been unanimous in rejecting Quebec's claim of entitlement to a veto?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I see that the opposition is unfortunately resorting to personalities and is attempting to assassinate the character of the Prime Minister. I feel this is a deplorable tactic. It is a tactic which lessens the credibility of the opposition when it is trying to convince people it has the ability to govern a country.

Because we have proven our ability to govern a country, proven our ability to make it fiscally responsible, something the PQ has so far refused to do. We have proven our ability to downsize government as was necessary, something the PQ government has not done. We have proven our ability to support the interests of Quebecers within Quebec, while the Official Opposition, Messrs. Parizeau and Bouchard, have no reality to offer, just promises.

• (1425)

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs is insulting the Prime Minister by saying that quoting him is character assassination.

The sovereignists are proposing that in future Quebec will negotiate with Canada, equal to equal, nation to nation, for the first time in history.

I am asking the minister to confirm that the federalist option is to see Quebec negotiate equal to equal, on the same footing as the other provinces, on the same footing as PEI and Newfoundland? That is their view of equality.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when the Parti Quebecois, in the person of its Minister of International Affairs, Bernard Landry, attacks the president of the United States for having stated his position with respect to Canada, when the members of the opposition are attempting to interpret everything said in such a way as to indicate their disbelief, for instance, that they do not believe the Canadian provincial premiers' offer of assistance with questions relating to the distinct society, one wonders. One wonders how they can believe they are preparing to negotiate with other NAFTA partners or other provinces of Canada when they spend all their time insulting them.

FEDERALISM

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last night the leader of the Bloc Quebecois said again that federalism could not and would not change, et cetera.

The great rebuttal to that is to demonstrate more clearly than heretofore that Canada is going to change for the better through a no vote on October 30.

One of the major ways in which Canada can change without constitutional battles is through simple reforms to our federal institutions. Parliament, the Supreme Court and the Bank of Canada can all be made more representative and accountable to every region and citizen in the country without reopening the Constitution.

My question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. Is this federal government open to changing these federal institutions—Parliament, the Supreme Court and the Bank of Canada—to make them simply more accountable and representative to every region and citizen in the country?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thought I would get some respite after the questions of the Bloc Quebecois.

Unfortunately we are plunging again into constitutional questions. On these questions I would like to indicate how much the government has indicated that it is ready to change. Not only have; we talked about questions such as distinct society and right to veto. More important, we have indicated that we are ready to give to the provinces a large number of powers. We indicated this in the last budget.

In the last budget we showed clearly that we are ready to reduce the actual size of the federal government. We have reduced our own departments by close to 20 per cent. We said that we would recentre our responsibilities and let the level of government that is the most efficient fulfil its responsibilities. That is the greatest opening to change that one can see.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was not asking about change in the Constitution or in the distribution of powers. I was simply asking about changes in the federal institutions.

In many federations the upper chamber of parliament is the place where the distinctive interests of various parts of the country are represented and reconciled. Accountable and representative upper chambers can serve as a shock absorber for potential unity problems.

Countries like Germany, Australia, Switzerland and the United States have upper chambers that actually work. Unfortunately our Senate is not even democratically accountable, let alone able to represent and reconcile regional and provincial interests.

• (1430)

In order to demonstrate its openness to the reform of federal institutions, is the federal government willing to commit to at least the democratization of the Canadian Senate, another change which can be made without constitutional amendments?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the time to approve these changes would have been in Charlottetown. Unfortunately the leader of the third party did not approve them. There was a lot of discussion at the time on questions such as those. The leader of the third party chose to oppose Charlottetown.

At present the question we face is not the approval of Charlottetown. At present the question we face is the possible separation of the province of Quebec from the rest of Canada.

The burden of proof is on the separatists, and the separatists have not discharged the burden of proof. They have not given us a single good reason why Quebec should get out of the federation. That is what we must hammer at until the vote on Monday.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister does not even address the substance of the questions being put to him.

We are not talking about constitutional changes like the Charlottetown accord. We are not talking about changes to relations between the provinces and the federal government. We are talking about some simple changes in federal institutions which the federal government can make unilaterally which would send a signal of things changing to Quebec and other provinces.

I repeat my first question. Is the federal government open to changing federal institutions, Parliament, the Senate and the Bank of Canada, to make them more accountable and representative?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the reason I am not addressing the specific question about changing federal institutions is this is merely a diversion from the present problem we are facing of why it is necessary to prevent the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada. In this I hope to have the support of the Reform Party because that is the important reform.

To change the supreme court or to change the Senate, although it is a very important question, has nothing to do with the question we are facing today, the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, according to a document we obtained from the Department of Human Resources, the old age pension system, the guaranteed income supplement, the spouse's allowance and the senior citizens' tax credit will be combined into a single new program requiring an income test.

How does the minister explain the Prime Minister's statement yesterday in his speech that the best way to protect our social benefits is to vote No, when this document by his minister indicates he is preparing to exclude thousands of seniors from old age pension benefits and to cut the pensions of thousands of others?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have been through this many times before. The Bloc Quebecois and its allies come up with a range of documents.

However, as I have said before many times in the House, such recommendations or proposals have not been presented by me or the Minister of Finance to the cabinet. The cabinet has decided it is not the policy of the government. It is simply a leak upon a leak which the Bloc Quebecois and its allies have developed.

• (1435)

I advise the hon. member not to pay attention to such spurious documents.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this document, which is version 6.3, is entitled "Serving Canada's Seniors" assumes, regardless of how pensions are distributed, that there will be a single program with an income test—in other words, the absolute end of universality.

How can Quebecers believe in a government that has deliberately hidden this unprecedented attack—

Some hon. members: Shameful.

The Speaker: My dear colleague, I would ask you to reconsider the words "deliberately hidden" and to withdraw them before continuing with your question.

Mrs. Lalonde: —a government that has deliberately delayed this unprecedented attack, which will make senior women dependent on their spouse's income and could deprive them entirely of their old age pension?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is time we went through a reality check with the hon. member for Mercier.

On April 6 in the House the member for Mercier claimed there would be tens of thousands of people coming on to the welfare rolls in Quebec. In August I received a document from the Government of Quebec that pointed out the number of people on welfare had been reduced, not increased.

On June 22 the member for Mercier claimed that as we were reorganizing the department and decentralizing we would reduce Canada employment centres in Quebec to 28. We announced 78 Canada employment centres in Quebec.

Any document sent in by this member has absolutely no credibility.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. I remind the minister that the Prime Minister has said this week it is part of his efforts to persuade Quebecers to vote no and that he would be open to change, including in some cases constitutional change.

My question is the one I asked yesterday to which I did not get a response. Is it still the policy of the Liberal Party, as it is the policy of the Reform Party, that any general constitutional change would have to be submitted to and approved by the people of Canada in a national referendum?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have read a number of studies indicating that given that past constitutional changes have been submitted to referenda, the normal way in the future would be to go through referenda.

However, I do not know that we have talked about that as a policy. Therefore I do not think as the government we are linked to that.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my understanding from the answer of the unity minister yesterday is the people of Quebec would always have a voice in changes affecting their powers and institutions.

I wonder if the government would be prepared to say to other regions of the country that it recognizes they would also have a similar say in constitutional amendments.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this question deserves very long discussion. I do not think today is the time for that.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The CSN today made public the content of the unemployment insurance reform bill. This bill has been kept hidden up to now by the Minister of Human Resources Development, because it contains a number of cuts directed at the unemployed.

How can the Minister of Human Resources Development expect to earn the trust of Quebecers when he keeps a bill, which is in fact ready to be made public, hidden from them until after the referendum?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member has been but for the past year we have consulted with tens of thousands of Canadians. We have had numerous hearings in front of the House of Commons committee. We have had debates in the House. We have had hundreds of exchanges with provincial ministers, with interest groups, with people right across the country talking about new ideas.

That party says it wants change and yet everything we hear from it is: hang on to the status quo, make no changes to get people back to work.

We want to provide the best employment system for the 21st century and the only people saying no are Bloc Quebecois members. They should get around to saying no on Monday rather than saying no here.

Some hon. members: No, no, no.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, now that his game is up, will the minister confirm that, among other things, it will be more difficult to qualify for unemployment insurance, that thousands of young people will be excluded from the scheme and that benefits will be reduced to half an individual's salary and paid for a shorter period? Will he finally acknowledge this?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to the hon. member, let me make it very clear that the government has made no decision on the presentations on unemployment insurance. We are still working on those proposals. I have not presented any recommendations as yet to cabinet.

As late as this morning I have had meetings with cabinet colleagues and with provincial ministers to get the thing right because our major intention is to ensure and guarantee the protection of low income Canadians and provide job opportunities for all Canadians, including those in Quebec.

TRAINING

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of Human Resources Development if the Prime Minister was serious about his promise of administrative changes in government and would the provinces be given the exclusive role of manpower training. The minister refused to commit to this.

Will the minister agree to the Alberta government's request to immediately convene a meeting of the forum of labour market ministers to negotiate the final decentralization of manpower training?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if memory holds me correct I am scheduled to leave as soon as question period is over for the wonderful province of Alberta. I think on my schedule is a meeting with the minister of advanced education and labour to talk about these very matters.

We have a wonderfully co–operative arrangement with the Government of Alberta on single window delivery systems for young people and ending duplication and overlap in its programs.

To the credit of the minister, Alberta has been prepared to discuss such matters, unlike the minister of employment for Quebec who has refused all entreaties and all invitations from me to get together and talk about how we can come together and provide for real and true decentralization.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, discussion time should by now be well and truly over.

The minister has failed for two years to make any solid commitment in this area. The Liberal rhetoric for change rings hollow, untrue and empty as these promises go unfulfilled.

Why will the minister not give the power and the money to the provinces to manage the manpower training as they want to?

• (1445)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member of one very important development.

A few months ago the provincial premiers assembled in St. John's, Newfoundland, to discuss social reform. At that time they established a special committee of provincial ministers who were to come together to develop a common position. Once they had arrived at a common position, they would then sit down with me, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Health and other ministers to discuss those issues.

They have not arrived at a decision yet. They have not concluded their discussions. They have not decided what their position will be. I said at the time that when the council of ministers on social security reform was prepared to meet I would be there. They are not prepared yet, but as soon as they are ready I will be at the table.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

In response to an appeal by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Canadian International will be offering discounts of between 60 per cent and 90 per cent to enable thousands of people from various cities in Canada to land in Quebec as part of the referendum campaign.

How can the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans not only be in collusion but, moreover, entice a private company to contravene the Referendum Act, especially when he now knows the decision of the Chief Electoral Officer on the matter?

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member should know that under the National Transportation Act, air carriers are free to set their own rates with regard to servicing Canadians going from one point to another and that is exactly what they have done.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, now we have heard everything in this House.

My question, however, is for the minister responsible for organizing this great manoeuvre. How can he induce his Cabinet and caucus colleagues into contravening Quebec law, as he is doing at the moment, in the newspapers?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Order. I would once again ask you, my dear colleagues, not to use props in the House.

[English]

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what various transportation companies are doing is entirely up to them. The only thing I am doing is taking my wife and my children and going to Montreal. I suspect some other Canadians who love this country and love Quebec may join me.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

FEDERAL PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of speculation recently on the possibility of the Quebec government's—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Speaker: Order. Today is Thursday, is it not? We have missed a day.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has the floor.

Mr. Bélanger: Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of speculation recently on the possibility of the Quebec government's signing an agreement with the Public Service Alliance, the largest public service union. This agreement would guarantee federal public servants living in Quebec a job in an independent Quebec following a Yes vote.

Could the President of the Treasury Board, as the employer of federal public servants, indicate to the members of this House and to the people watching us the status of these negotiations or the promises or the pseudo guarantees made to federal public servants?

• (1450)

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Parti Quebecois government has promised that all federal public servants residing in Quebec would have a job in an independent Quebec. There is no job guarantee, however, because the Parti Quebecois has not concluded any agreement with the largest union representing federal public servants. Federal public servants in Quebec should be wary of empty promises by the separatists.

[English]

FEDERAL–PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today at Queen's Park the Harris government introduced an all–party motion calling for decentralization, an end to the status quo and a shifting of federal power to the provinces. It is proof that Canada wants change and can change with a no vote on Monday.

Is the federal government open to this type of substantial change without constitutional amendments?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government has done nothing but promote change over the last two years.

We have indicated not only our intention to create profound changes but, as I have said before, we have put together a program review that is reducing the size of the federal government by 20 per cent, recentring the activities of the federal government to those that can discharge them best. We have applied a federalism principle in program review that will give to the provinces and the other levels of government the activities they can discharge more efficiently.

That is the proof not only that we talk about change but that we implement it in this government.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the message is not getting through. The separatists are wrong when they say Canada cannot change. Reformers want change, Ontario wants change; B.C. wants change and Nova Scotia wants change. By voting no on Monday Quebecers will open the door to building a new Canada, a stronger Canada, a united Canada.

Will the government assure Quebecers that a no vote means change? Will it assure the Government of Quebec?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can only agree with the comments of the member of the third party. He is underlining what is fundamental, that a no vote on Monday will mean change. A yes vote will mean rupture and disaster.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Minister of Public Works.

Yesterday, the President of CMHC authorized distribution of a memorandum encouraging employees to take part in the big no rally to be held tomorrow in Montreal, by offering them paid leave.

How can the minister approve paying CMHC employees to travel to Montreal and demonstrate in favour of the no side with the support of the President of CMHC, Marc Rochon?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I hope he will want to join with other Canadians tomorrow in support of the no forces in the province of Quebec.

This government allows its employees to decide what they want to do in this referendum. The hon. member is quite right. A memorandum was circulated. But a second memorandum has been circulated which states very clearly that if they wish to participate in the no side of the referendum tomorrow they can do so, but they will not be paid by the Government of Canada.

• (1455)

[Translation]

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I trust that we are speaking of the same directive, because the one we have obtained really said "Those who go to Montreal will have paid leave for Friday".

My second question is for the President of Treasury Board. Will the minister confirm that a number of other federal public servants were apparently offered leave with pay for going to Montreal for Friday's demonstration, and does he consider that taking part in such a demonstration is included in their job descriptions?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we will be operating as a government tomorrow. Offices will be open right across the country. Our employees will operate in accordance with the collective agreement.

Whether or not our employees go to the rally in Montreal is completely a personal decision. If they want to take a day off, they can do that in accordance with vacation leave. They can take a day of vacation. However, they will have to work that out with their managers to ensure that operationally all the government services will continue to be provided to Canadians tomorrow. That is something for the managers and the individuals to work out. However, within the collective agreement they are entitled to take days off.

BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the people of Quebec are more likely to vote no if their expectations that the government will decentralize and create a smaller federal presence are greater. They will also be likely to vote no if they can be assured that national institutions, such as the Bank of Canada, will be made more responsive to the demands and aspirations of regions.

Will the Minister of Finance consider changes to the operation and constitution of the Bank of Canada such that, like in other industrial countries, monetary policy will be made by people who are responsive to the regions?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that changes in the structure of the Bank of Canada would really have an effect on the referendum. However, I agree with the hon. member that the spirit of change which has been seen in the federal government very clearly over the last few years is an important element.

The Prime Minister, in his speech last night, talked about the acceptance of a distinct society. He talked about the right of veto and he indicated that the decentralization which was in the last budget and in the program review is an essential part of what this government wants to do.

We have to conclude that we have already started to change. That is a fact. The relationship between the federal government and the provinces is evolving all the time. We have clearly indicated our intention to change.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is very disappointing on this side of the House to ask questions about changes in the responsiveness of national institutions to the demands of the regions and the provinces.

My supplementary question also concerns the Bank of Canada. Does the minister consider it feasible for a central bank to be administered by directors who are citizens of two separate sovereign states, both of which use the same currency?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks a very interesting question. I believe some smaller, mini–states have co–operative currency boards.

The only two countries that I know of which use another country's currency are Liberia and Panama. They both use the U.S. dollar. Anybody who thinks that those two countries have some influence on the Federal Reserve Board in Washington is living in the same dream land as the separatists.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, yesterday was the second anniversary of the culmination of the 1993 election campaign. During that campaign—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Collenette: Tell us what happened.

Mr. Goodale: What happened, Bill?

Mr. Blaikie: I knew that was coming. During that campaign the Liberals made certain promises and commitments to a group of Canadians who were hurt by the way Route Canada was privatized by the previous Conservative government. They made promises that the injustices done to these people would be resolved.

I ask whoever is speaking for the government on this matter today to say what progress the government feels it has made. When will those commitments be kept? When will the injustices done to those employees of Route Canada be finally resolved to their satisfaction?

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his interest in the matter, along with a number of my colleagues on this side of the House who are very concerned about the question.

The bankruptcy trustee and the RCMP conducted extensive investigations into the company's conduct. Charges and sentences have followed. I take this opportunity to ensure members of the House and former employees of CN Route Canada that the rumours their pensions and pension benefits are at risk are wrong.

If they need additional information I encourage them to call the CN pension office. I assure them that their pension benefits have been protected by the government and that other issues will be looked at.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. On the issue of implementing policies and regulations aimed at preventing pollution, are the federal and provincial governments working together to agree on stricter standards for cars and cleaner gas?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at their meeting, Canada's Environment ministers agreed, unanimously I might add, that the country should adopt stricter standards. The federal government is prepared to proceed in this respect.

When important issues like health and environment are discussed, the federal and provincial governments have shown a remarkable degree of co–operation, and we can expect that to continue.

POINTS OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my point of order arises out of question period and the question asked by my colleague from Calgary West.

After he asked his question and received an answer from the government the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans pointed at me, the member for Beaver River, my seatmate from Calgary Southwest, and my colleague from Calgary West who had asked the question and said: "You're an ass, you're an ass and you're an ass".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Miss Grey: He then went on to say right after that: "You are snakes". Third, he said: "You would love a yes vote. You are salivating".

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to ask the member (a) to withdraw and (b) to explain how in the world this will help the cause of national unity.

The Speaker: Evidently the hon. minister of fisheries was named. If he wishes to add something to this point I would be willing to hear him.

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are only three things in the world I am sure about.

One is that we should have a no vote on Monday night; two, we should all be in Montreal tomorrow; and, three, I should have called them donkeys.

Point of Order

• (1505)

The Speaker: I did not hear any of these statements. I do not know if they will appear in Hansard. If indeed the hon. minister said these words I would appeal to him to simply withdraw them.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, if anything I have said has caused any cause for alarm by my colleague opposite, whose sensitivities are well known, I withdraw.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if the Leader of the Government would let us know what he has in mind for the next few days.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we will continue this afternoon and tomorrow with consideration of report stage of Bill C–61 regarding agricultural penalties. We will then return to second reading of Bill C–99 on small business loans. If this is completed we plan to return to second reading debate on Bill C–88.

On Monday we will commence report stage of Bill C–7, followed by report stage of Bill C–103, followed by Bill C–94. We intend to schedule the third reading debates on these bills and Bill C–61 at the earliest time procedurally possible.

As soon as business permits next week we will call the second reading stages of Bill C–95 and Bill C–96. I expect that Thursday, November 1, will be an allotted day.

This completes my weekly business statement.

POINTS OF ORDER

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on December 1, 1994 I placed the following question on the Order Paper:

> For each department, agency and crown corporation, how many employees, including parliamentary agents, governor in council appointees, armed forces personnel and RCMP personnel receive, or will receive, the following benefits for one year or more: (a) a living allowance for a second residence and (b) a transportation allowance (or transportation) from home to place of work where distance exceeds 40 kilometres, and if any receive the foregoing, (i) what is the cost per individual recipient, (ii) what is the rank, position or title of each recipient and (iii) is the tax deducted at the source for these benefits".

I thought it was a fairly simple question.

Next Tuesday it will be 11 months since I placed that question on the Order Paper. The question was prompted by the revelation that the Commissioner of Official Languages was being chauffeur driven between Montreal and Ottawa each week and had an apartment supplied to him in Ottawa courtesy of the government, all because the job was in Ottawa but he preferred to live in Montreal.

Standing Order 39(5)(a) gives a member the right to ask for a response in 45 days. This is not a problem of delay but a problem of avoidance on the part of the government. Questions on the Order Paper are methods by which we as the opposition to the government, on behalf of Canadians in general, may hold the government accountable and obtain the facts concerning benefits given to its appointees that are not available to the public at large.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to look into the matter for me pursuant to Standing Order 39(5)(a) and find out why I do not have a response from the government to my question.

• (1510)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member and Job have a lot in common when it comes to patience. I respect the fact the hon. member has been very patient in waiting for a reply, but he read his question and therein lies the problem in getting the answer.

He has asked for every department, agency and crown corporation how many employees meet certain criteria and he has asked for specifics on each of the employees. When we add up all the agencies, crown corporations and departments, including the armed forces, the RCMP and so on, the Government of Canada has over half a million employees as far as I am aware.

Every department will have to go through every list of every employee and every agency will have to do the same, including the Department of National Defence and the Armed Forces of Canada.

Ms. Catterall: How much is this going to cost?

Mr. Milliken: This will cost a fortune. The hon. member does not care about that despite their pretence of claiming they are interested in thrift. He will insist on this answer. We will get him the answer. It is nearing completion, but I am sure it will be an extremely voluminous answer.

I hope he has a long holiday coming up from Parliament so he can sit down and read it when he gets it.

The Speaker: Is the matter settled?

Mr. Williams: Can I respond to that?

The Speaker: No, I do not want to get into a debate today. You have both made your points.

AGRICULTURE AND AGRI–FOOD ADMINISTRATIVE MONETARY PENALTIES ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–61, an act to establish a system of administrative monetary penalties for the enforcement of the Canada Agricultural Products Act, the Feeds Act, the Fertilizers Act, the Health of Animals Act, the Meat Inspection Act, the Pest Control Products Act, the Plant Protection Act and the Seeds Act, as reported (with amendments) from the committee; and of Motions Nos. 21 and 22.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we are resuming debate on report stage of Bill C–61. I believe we are at the final grouping of the amendments put forward by my colleague from the Bloc, the hon. member for Lotbinière. My colleagues and I can support the two amendments because they are amendments we considered. Had not the Bloc submitted them I believe we would have introduced them.

Prior to question period I listened to debate on the two amendments by the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River. I confess that I disagree with almost everything the hon. member said.

He did not seem to want more accountability in our system. He did not want public servants in quasi–judicial bodies to be accountable or more accountable to Parliament. He did not want the role of members of Parliament in committees to be increased. It seems it would be too burdensome for the hon. member and too onerous for this astute body to look into the affairs of government, hold it accountable and diligently watch what it is doing.

The red book, if I recall correctly, promised some parliamentary reform. We got into that issue to a degree earlier in question period. Perhaps it is appropriate to raise the subject at this time. The red book talked about parliamentary reform and about strengthening the roles of parliamentary committees.

The two amendments the hon. member put forward would cause the appointment of members to the tribunal to be ratified or reviewed by the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food. In my eyes that would seem to comply with the red book promise of giving the committees more responsibility and giving the committees a more meaningful role, making them more than window dressing as they have been notoriously described in the past.

I expected members on the other side to have applauded the proposal, but the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River seemed disconcerted by the suggestion that standing committees would have more work to do and would play a more responsible role in the life of Parliament.

The role of parliamentary committees is more of a babysitting service for Liberal backbenchers. Prior to that it was a babysitting service for the Conservative backbenchers, something to keep them busy while those in the cabinet ran the affairs of the country, something to keep them away from the decision making process, something to keep them away from the actual development of legislation, the meaningful review of bills in the committee and meaningful clause by clause study of bills and an interest builder in the actual departments of government that were held responsible to review, investigate and monitor.

In the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food we received wrong information from the parliamentary secretary, which seems to indicate to me that the department, the minister, the parliamentary secretary, or whoever was responsible, did not feel the work of the committee was that important. They did not really do their homework that well.

We went through clause by clause on Bill C–61. It was kind of a scripted thing where the member for Dauphin—Swan River jumped in at the appropriate time with the amendments that were supported by the government and Liberal members sort of turned off their minds. We could see the lights going out, that they were going to accept these amendments and no others. That is why we brought our amendments to report stage rather than in the committee. Experience has taught us that introducing meaningful amendments in the committee is a waste of time. The minister is not there to review the amendments to see if they are acceptable. The government does not want any possible changes to the legislation without a lot of scrutiny. It does not trust backbenchers to have minds that could actually propose some constructive amendments in clause by clause or in the committee stage. This is just a make work project for the backbenchers.

What the amendments put forward in group 5 would accomplish is the committee would have a meaningful job to do of reviewing appointments to the tribunal that would be an appeal body for the administrative monetary penalties should someone who has violated the regulations of Agriculture Canada so appeal to that tribunal. That makes a lot of sense. That is moving the House of Commons and members of Parliament to more meaningful work, a more direct contact with the administration of government. It is more of a hands on role. It is a role with which members can go back to their constituents and say they have something to do that counts and is important.

The Liberal government does not seem willing to give the committees the added responsibility. The promises in the red book ring pretty hollow if these two amendments are not passed.

The minister and his departmental officials have said that the spirit of Bill C–61 is good, that they have good intent. I believe them. I believe they have good intent. I believe they want this new process of administrative monetary penalties and compliance agreements to work to reduce the onerous burden on our justice system. I believe they do want it to work. It is also paramount that in giving these powers to his department, his public servants and himself as minister to put some parameters around the authority and responsibility that are reasonable and responsible.

In summing up my response not only to these two amendments but to the entire bill, it all fits together. We have tried to build reasonable fences around the bill that allow enough latitude within for the minister and his department to effectively administer the powers they receive under Bill C–64.

Why they would not want the committee on agriculture and agri–food to play a more meaningful role in the ratification of appointees to the tribunal is beyond my understanding. It just seems to be the mindset of the government. I think it is wrong. I think it is unfortunate. It is sad. Perhaps it is even part of the reason we are experiencing some trouble right now.

I appeal to the minister and to members to reverse this trend; to start to make government more open, more transparent; and to make the public service more accessible and accountable to not only the ministers but to all members of Parliament. Therefore I support the two amendments. I heartily endorse the two amendments and ask other members in the House to do the same.

• (1520)

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I too want to deal with Motions Nos. 21 and 22, but I want to take issue with a couple of the comments made by the last speaker, the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster.

Earlier today we were talking about being reasonable in this House. We did agree with some of the amendments put forward by the hon. member in the third party. After the comments he made in his last remarks, one would wonder why we would be reasonable. He commented that in putting amendments forward on behalf of the government the Liberal members merely put them forward and the lights went out. Those amendments had taken serious consideration of the discussions, what the department had said and what our members had said, the discussion that Reform members had brought forward before the committee. Those amendments were given due consideration, were well thought out and indeed improve the bill, as do some of the amendments put forward by the third party.

He also alluded to, and I want to take issue with it, the remarks of the parliamentary secretary. I want to say, having sat in on those meetings, that the parliamentary secretary tried to provide the comments from the community. In response to the member that night, when Bill C–61 came out the department issued a release to quite a number of organizations that had raised concerns. It issued an overview of the particular bill. Having been a leader in the farm community for a number of years, I know organizations look at that overview, look at the draft legislation and respond accordingly. I believe they did have the opportunity to respond, and the parliamentary secretary was trying to outline to committee members the views of the community. I respect him for having done that.

We on the government side of that committee have considered these amendments very seriously, including those from the Third party.

On the motions we are now debating, I oppose the particular amendments. The minister spoke earlier on another amendment and I think his comments apply to these amendments. The manner of appointments of members of the review tribunal by the governor in council set out in the bill follows a well established practice, endorsed by courts of law, of assuring the independence of the tribunal from outside interference.

This is what is so important in terms of the appointment of members to committees. I know from previous experience that there is nothing more difficult than appointing members and trying to do it in a balanced, fair and equitable way. If we had members of the committee trying to push certain members to be appointed to committees for political or other reasons, we would be into very great difficulty in terms of trying to find balance on committees.

In terms of appointments to tribunals and so on, the minister is always accountable and responsible. Therefore, he takes a great deal of discretion in terms of making appointments. If the minister appointed the wrong individual, the first ones standing up in the House would be members of the opposition, complaining about the appointment and trying to hold the minister accountable and responsible. How could the minister be held accountable and responsible for appointments pushed by committee members and sometimes by the opposition parties? As a committee we would be in difficulty.

• (1525)

I know the intent of the member for Lotbinière is good. The objective he is putting forward is good. However, it is very problematic in terms of how it would work in practice. Let me give an example.

I am from P.E.I. and the hon. member is from Quebec. We both might be pushing two individuals for our own reasons, for our own provinces. It could create confusion and problems on the committee. It would take a lot of committee time unnecessarily. I prefer the present approach: hold the minister accountable and responsible for those appointments. That is how it should be.

Let me make a couple of other comments in opposition to the amendments.

The bill requires that members of the tribunal have technical qualifications related to the area of agriculture and agri–food and are not in a position of conflict of interest relative to the matters before them. To ensure that people are not found to be in a conflict of interest, it means their backgrounds and resumes must be examined. It is much better to do that in a private forum, rather than in the public forum the committee entails.

Having the standing committee approve all appointments would raise a number of concerns. First, the time required to deal with the committee recommendations might add considerably to the length of time required to make the appointments.

Second, the committee might refuse to recommend any of the incumbents to these positions, effectively preventing the positions from being filled. As I mentioned earlier, the opposition to incumbents might be based purely on political reasons rather than sound judgment in terms of the ability of the individual to do the job.

Third, this kind of amendment would be a move toward a more American style of government. In the past we have seen what incumbents who are looking for positions go through when they appear before boards and committees. Sometimes individuals who could do an effective job are lost because of the process. I think that is wrong.

Finally, a committee debate on the selection of tribunal members could be conducted in public and might involve hearing witnesses, raising privacy concerns and possibly deterring applicants from even considering sitting on these tribunals.

I know the amendments are put forward in good will. I know the intent to be more productive is there, but I believe they would be problematic. On those grounds, I oppose these amendments.

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have been considering the various amendments to Bill C–61 at report stage since 10 a.m., which has given us over four hours of very detailed discussion. For the most part, that discussion has been quite useful.

As the member for Malpeque mentioned, during the course of the debate and discussion the government has accepted at least three of the proposals put forward by the opposition pertaining to various administrative matters in the legislation.

On the final two motions that are now before the House, Motions Nos. 21 and 22, the arguments advanced by the member for Malpeque are very convincing and sustainable arguments as to why the two motions should not be among those accepted.

• (1530)

I might elaborate on one of the reasons advanced by the hon. member for Malpeque, which is the distinction between the Canadian parliamentary system of government and the American congressional system of government.

Under the American system there is a certain method for making appointments. It involves in certain circumstances public hearings before congressional committees. In Canada traditionally we have not taken that approach. One of the reasons we have not taken that approach is the difference between the congressional system in the U.S., which has a different system of checks and balance on the whole executive authority of government, and our parliamentary system, which has a very fundamental rudder to it. You see it from the chair every day, Mr. Speaker, in question period. That is a characteristic absolutely unique to our system.

Members of the U.S. cabinet never have to appear in a public forum like the House of Commons. They appear from time to time in carefully controlled circumstances before congressional committees. Members of the American cabinet are not members of the American Congress and therefore are not present in either the Senate or the House of Representatives. They are aloof, separate and apart from the legislative branch of the American government.

The Americans have an array of checks and balances they believe holds their system together quite appropriately. That is their system. It is a different system. They do not have the open forum of Parliament in which every day Parliament sits the ministers of the crown are in the House to face the accountability of the opposition in the open question period. It is a unique feature of our system, one that argues very well for our system as compared to theirs.

That distinction, among others, is one of the reasons we should reject the kind of administrative suggestions proposed in these two motions and stick to the bill as it is presently before the House.

Earlier in the day the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster raised questions about certain comments made in committee by my parliamentary secretary. I answered fully those questions with respect to the views expressed by my parliamentary secretary. The hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster has once again in his most recent intervention repeated the allegations without indicating that those allegations have already been completely and fully answered in the House. They ought not to be repeated without the indication that they have been answered. I answered them earlier today. He was not paying attention.

The hon. gentleman also engaged in general criticism. I hope he did not mean it seriously. It was general criticism about the conduct of government members with respect to the work done on the bill in committee.

From my experience as a minister the government members who worked very hard on the bill took their responsibility very seriously. Apart from the hours they spent working on the bill in committee, they spent additional hours doing their homework in their offices, writing letters, asking questions, getting answers and understanding the legislation so that when they went to the committee they were well prepared to deal with the issues in a thoroughly conscientious and efficient manner.

The hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster criticized them for being well organized. I commend our members for being well organized. I know the depth in which they studied the legislation because I was the one inundated by their questions on how to put the legislation together in the best and most proper fashion.

Government members have done extraordinarily well in ensuring the legislation came out in a way which serves the national interest.

The Speaker: We are dealing with Group No. 5, Motion No. 21. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

• (1535)

The Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76.1(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

We are now dealing with Motion No. 22. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76.1(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at report stage of the bill before the House.

Call in the members.

[Translation]

And the division bells having rung:

The Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), a recorded division on the question now before the House stands deferred until the usual time of adjournment on Monday, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

[English]

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you would find unanimous consent to further defer the votes until Tuesday at 5 p.m.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SMALL BUSINESS LOANS ACT

The House resumed from October 25 consideration of the motion that Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to Bill C–99 and about how the government is acting on its commitment to provide leadership in helping small business grow and create jobs.

I will spend some time discussing the consultations that have fed into this legislation and the initiatives we have taken to help small business grow and prosper.

Small business has always played a crucial role in the Canadian economy, be it a local corner store, a remote fishing camp, parts suppliers to the aerospace industry or a computer software developer.

Small businesses are a vital job creator and are contributors to our country's wealth. Today there are about 2 million small businesses in Canada. They account for almost two–thirds of the jobs in the private sector and 60 per cent of Canada's economic output. It has been stated many times that small business creates 82 per cent of all new jobs.

In my riding small business played a pivotal role in the opening up and the development of the north from small aviation companies that led the way, to the service industries that followed to support the growth, to an increasing number of aboriginal owned and operated companies which provide the services needed and which drive the engine of economic growth in the communities.

I now illustrate some of the dynamic things small businesses are doing in the north. People in my riding are becoming increasingly aware of the potential for growth when we work together to create the economic and social development so needed. An excellent example is the Dogrib Nation group of companies. The Dogrib Treaty 11 Council recognized that the best way to address the needs and priorities of its communities was to play an active role in partnership with the businesses that deliver the services needed. Therefore it created the Dogrib Nation group of companies to address economic development needs from investments in hydro–electric power generation to forestry, heavy equipment supply, aviation in partnership with Canadian helicopters and commercial catering.

The group pursues a number of industrial and human resource development activities for and on behalf of the four Dogrib Nation communities. This is a living testament to the empowerment potential that can be unleashed by small business initiatives.

Another example is the Northern Transportation Company Limited, originally a crown corporation. NTCL's primary objective is to provide cost effective, reliable and comprehensive marine transportation and related services in northern Canada and the Arctic. Now NTCL is the wholly owned subsidiary of NorTerra Incorporated, which in turn is owned by two aboriginal corporations, the Inuvialuit Development Corporation and Nunasi Corporation. The Inuvialuit people of the Western Arctic and the Inuit of the Nunavut are the beneficial shareholders of NTCL.

There is recognition for those small businesses that have been able to achieve equity. Recently NTCL was the recipient of the federal locators award given to those companies that demonstrate they can bring in the groups under–represented in the general population or general labour market areas.

When we bring small business down to the human grassroots level, we look at small communities like the community in my riding of Fort Resolution. The people have undertaken to commit themselves to the small business of running a sawmill, a very industrious and skills related industry. The community can see the results of it and have the participation in terms of jobs and watch exactly how small business grows. They have been able to develop an economic development arm which has allowed them to provide some of the supplies they need to build their homes and to provide the region with some of those facilities.

They have taken it upon themselves to get into an industry that would produce some of the materials needed for building homes such as moulds to create bathtubs and all the other things needed for use inside a home.

There are a number of other items they produce. They are expanding and diversifying which is the key to successful small businesses to either focus and do something very specialized they are good at or to capture a market. This seems to be what they are doing, and doing it very well.

During the recessionary years when large multinational corporations were laying off workers, small businesses were responsible for almost all of the net new jobs created. Why are they so successful? Small businesses embody the dynamism and flexibility to respond quickly to new challenges. They know they have to innovate aggressively in order to compete.

Canada is now moving into a new economy, one characterized by rapid technological change, intense global competition and innovation. Small business has the right stuff to succeed in this environment. However, small business cannot do it alone. It needs the right environment and the right tools to get the job done and that is our responsibility.

The task of the government is threefold in terms of small business being successful. The first thing we must do is create the best economic conditions and institutions that will allow these innovators in the private sector to get on with it. It always helps to have a country as politically stable as it is economically stable. It helps to create the right condition and the right climate for those small businesses to flourish. It helps to create an environment where new ideas are spawned and where ideas, technology, and new production processes move quickly throughout the economy. It helps Canadians realize that innovation does not just happen; it thrives best in countries that consciously understand the process and take steps to create a national system of innovation. This means we must work with the private sector to identify strategic opportunities and channel our resources toward fulfilling those opportunities.

• (1545)

In February 1994 we asked the small business community to help us create the environment and the tools it needs to succeed. The House of Commons Standing Committee on Industry, the private sector small business working committee, the chamber of commerce, and many other groups contributed to one of the most comprehensive reviews of small business ever undertaken.

Four primary messages emerged from the review. Small business told us that with the proper support it has a vast untapped potential for creating jobs and wealth. This is no secret. This is something that is quite well known and has been demonstrated time and time again. Reducing the deficit is one of the most important steps toward unleashing this potential, we were told by the various proponents. Government programs must become more efficient, effective and relevant to the needs of small business. Who knows best? Of course small business does, with its various proponents. Finally, the vibrant small business sector that Canada needs cannot be created by the government alone.

We have listened to these messages and we have acted on them. We have placed the needs and concerns of small business at the centre of our job creation agenda. Our consultations reaffirm that high deficits and a rising debt burden spoil even the best prospects for any country's economic growth. We need stable economic policies for sustained growth and job creation. The fiscal policies we are pursuing address this need.

We in Canada recognize the serious debt to GDP problem we face, and we are responding to it with the biggest budget cuts since demobilization following World War II. The 1995 Canadian budget will reduce the federal government's borrowing requirements to 1.7 per cent of GDP by the next fiscal year, 1996–97. This is the lowest of all the G–7 countries.

We also set an inflation target range of 1 per cent to 3 per cent and we have kept inflation below the midpoint of that range since 1991. In terms of inflation, Canada is the Switzerland of North America in the 1990s.

Also in the last budget the Minister of Finance announced a rollback of unemployment insurance premiums from $3.07 to $3 per $100 of wages to lighten the burden of profit insensitive taxes. We are refocusing our remaining programs to reduce duplication and serve the needs of small business in the best way we can.

The red tape and associated paperwork and complex regulatory hurdles faced by any venture can be discouraging, if not insurmountable. We have eliminated 250 regulations. We are in the process of reviewing another 370 in an effort to achieve a more efficient and effective framework for business.

We continue to work with the private sector financial institutions to improve their ability to serve small business. They have responded with new services, including specialized lending units to serve the needs of knowledge based firms. We recognize that there are some areas the private sector will not be able to serve very well.

We have responded by reviewing and then giving a new mandate to the former Federal Business Development Bank. The new name Business Development Bank of Canada is intended to highlight the bank's new approach. The bank will focus on filling our four marketing gaps. First is the knowledge gap, gaining an understanding of the information technologies, software and related industries to serve businesses where the principal assets are between the ears of the owners and not conventional hard assets.

Second is the size gap, finding ways of providing smaller loans to meet small business client needs while still breaking even financially. People do not go into small business to go broke. People go into small business to flourish, to specialize, to develop and to diversify if they have to, to capture those markets that are out there. Essentially small business means business; essentially that is what it is.

• (1550)

Third is a flexible financing gap, providing loans and other to forms of financing on flexible repayment terms, to take account of clients' variable cashflows, particularly in the early years.

Fourth is the risk gap, lending up the risk curve to provide clients with appropriately priced access to capital. This tends to be generally a big problem where there is not a lot of built–in infrastructure, where there is a lot of difficulty for small businesses to succeed in areas that may be very remote and do not have the kinds of infrastructures available in a more broadly based population.

We recognize that implementing this new mandate as a complementary lender will require nothing less than a cultural revolution. The bank is developing a corporate plan that will give effect to this new mandate. We expect that the new Business Development Bank of Canada will become recognized in Canada and around the world as a leader in developing new financial instruments for small business. The example set by the new bank will show the major banks that small businesses are worth their time and effort and will inspire them to greater participation in small business financing. Access to financing remains an important issue for entrepreneurs. However, development of a business climate that encourages growth and job creation is equally important.

We are determined that the business framework laws shall be part of Canada's comparative advantage. We are seeking to forge new partnerships among the innovative players in the economy to ensure a vibrant small business sector. We recognize that support for innovation must be sharply focused on the commercialization of science and technology. We are concentrating our efforts in two key areas: building partnerships between all players, especially innovative small businesses, and improving strategic access to information.

We have launched a Canadian technology network that will help small business acquire and manage new and complex technology by putting them in contact with the Canadian research community. We will provide business with rapid access to information on domestic technology.

We have established the technology partnerships program to promote collaboration between Canadian universities and small and medium size businesses to turn university technologies and ideas into new and improved products, processes and services. It will bring together universities and businesses in cost shared efforts to demonstrate, develop and market promising technologies.

Perhaps nowhere is there greater opportunity for innovative businesses to realize their full potential than through the information highway. The federal government is moving quickly to develop an information highway strategy that will build on national strengths in telecommunications, information and information technologies to create jobs through innovation and investment, to reinforce Canadian sovereignty and to cultural identity, and to ensure universal access at reasonable cost.

We established this commitment to small business in the Liberal Party's red book because we recognized that it is the engine of Canadian economic growth. We put this commitment into action by announcing proposals designed to help small business grow. We furthered this commitment with the measures contained in the last budget. We will continue to maintain this commitment to ensure the health and prosperity of Canadian small businesses.

We brought forward Bill C–99 to enable the completion of the process of modernization that moved the SBLA program to full cost recovery. This renewal will relieve the financial burden of the program on Canadian taxpayers while enabling the SBLA to continue to provide its benefits to small business.

I emphasize the importance of what can be accomplished when we work together in partnership as Canadians. Earlier I talked about some of the innovative and dynamic things happening in my riding as a result of people working in partnership and co–operation.

• (1555)

The United Nations recognizes Canada as the best country in the world to live in. We accomplished this by living and working together. We created the environment, economically, socially, politically, and the opportunities for all Canadians to empower themselves and in turn contribute to society. It is through these actions that we will also fulfil our promise of creating jobs and prosperity for all Canadians.

The north is no different. As proud Canadians in the north, we too want to contribute to society. We too want to contribute to the overall economy and well–being of our country. It is through an innovation like this that perhaps those opportunities and those doors of opportunity become more available.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Western Arctic for participating in this debate, for supporting the bill and talking about the importance of small business, especially in the north.

I would like to ask a question that arises from an experience I had three weeks ago when I was travelling in Austria. I met some Austrian businessmen who had travelled to the north on tourism trips to hunt and to enjoy the beauty of the Arctic. They felt there was tremendous potential and opportunity for tourism in the north, especially if there were more extensive promotion in Europe. They also thought there was an opportunity to develop a tourism infrastructure in the north.

I wonder what the member's experience has been when she talks with the small business men and women in her community who are tourism operators, who have incredible potential with the resources of the north. What has been the experience of those small business entrepreneurs with the financial institutions in this country? Do they find the financial institutions are becoming much more progressive in their thinking and are supporting these small businesses with loans to build those businesses so they can promote these opportunities? What has been her personal experience as a member of Parliament serving the tourism operators in the north?

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased the member for Broadview—Greenwood has brought forward this question. If there was ever an industry that would be next to the resource industry in the north, it is the other resource industry, tourism.

We do need the infrastructure. I suppose one of the dreams we have as politicians and one of the things I often refer to as an infrastructure requirement would be the completion of the Mackenzie Valley highway. That would open up a tremendous potential and complete the loop of having to come down to travel the Trans–Canada highway right into the north, go right up the Mackenzie Valley and travel along 1,800 kilometres of river on a highway. It would allow the resource industry that is there to have access to the Mackenzie Range and the Nahanni National Park. It would open up a tremendous amount for Canada to see. That is what makes this country so wonderful. That is what makes this country so beautiful. It makes us appreciate all parts of this country.

The Reform Party laughs. When we talk about our individual areas we tend to appreciate and respect each other, not laugh at each other. The hon. member has been to my riding. It is really important for members to see that beauty, to see that vast expanse which says this is part of Canada. This is what we are debating today. We cannot describe how wonderful and beautiful our country is. As Canadians we have the opportunity to build on it, to continue to expand and make it even better than it is by building that infrastructure.

• (1600)

The financial institutions my colleague referred to have provided this opportunity with the revamping of the Business Development Bank of Canada. It is going to open the doors of opportunity to those small businesses and tourism operators to do what was suggested and make it accessible.

There is an influx of European tourists from Germany, Austria and Japan. They are going to see the pristine north, to see the flora and fauna species which are not available in their own countries. That resource is worth sharing with Canada and the world. The way to do that is by making these institutions and resources more accessible by changing the Small Business Loans Act.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I want to clarify some of the accusations that came this way. We were not laughing at the minister. What we were laughing at is the fact that the Liberals have frittered that infrastructure money away on all kinds of pork barrel operations. Now when a highway needs to be built, there is no money left.

I would like the minister to comment on why that infrastucture money was not used for true infrastructure.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the back handed compliment from the Reform Party. It is unfortunate it could not just be an up front compliment.

I understand what Reformers are saying. In terms of the infrastructure, all projects the infrastructure money has gone to are priorities set by the people in the north. We gave them the money and they decided what they wanted to do.

For building a highway, in 1984 it cost $1 million a kilometre. Simply put, Canada does not have that kind of money. There are a lot of kilometres of road to be built and we do not have that kind of cash.

I am happy the Reformers are lobbying for a road in my riding. I would welcome them to transfer their infrastructure money to help us build the MacKenzie Valley highway. That would be great. It is a tremendous investment and even though I would like the government to make that commitment, it cannot do so at this time. In light of deficit reduction, we must be realistic in all the priorities we set. It is a long term goal, a dream of mine and a dream of northerners. It is something I appreciate the help of the Reform Party on.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I had the good fortune to visit my hon. friend's constituency this past summer. I concur that it is one of the most spectacular parts of the country.

I visited a number of business people in her constituency. One runs a small hotel or lodge and has been trying to sell it for about 15 years. He would find a potential buyer and they would try to arrange financing. He found the difficulty was that he lived in an environment that often was rather vague in the minds of southern bankers. It is dark for half of the year and has an unusual tourist season. It was not clear what the season was, whether it was summer or winter, and consequently, the individual could not get financing.

My question in a sense is a take–off from my hon. friend for Broadview—Greenwood. When it comes to financing, particularly with respect to tourist related enterprises in the north, does the hon. member agree it is a major area and that financial institutions simply do not have the financing mechanisms in place to meet the demands and needs of the emerging northern economy?

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, there is no dispute of the fact that certain operators and owners of businesses, be they big game hunters, lodge owners or whatever have had trouble because the economy has not allowed for people to buy into those opportunities. There has been some difficulty in accessing those resources.

• (1605)

Changing the Small Business Loans Act will make these resources more available. Some of the Canadian banks are developing partnerships with aboriginal communities. There is more cash available now since we have settled land claims. Potential partners are speculating and looking at new opportunities. Things are actually getting better, but there are no magic solutions.

We were very lucky. If I might compliment my colleague, my riding was made more beautiful by his presence as a tourist. I welcome more people to the north.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to say a few words regarding Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act. At second reading stage the assumption is that we are talking about the principle of the bill. On that point I want to register a deep disappointment with this initiative.

We have heard thoughtful presentations from all sides of the House regarding the value of small business, the importance of small business and the critical nature which small business has taken on in the changing economy. If this is any indication of how the government plans to react to these needs, to this new sense of dynamism in the country, it is pathetic.

My hon. friend from the territories indicated that this is a major step forward. This is not a major step forward. Quite frankly, this is a little technical housekeeping which will build total cost recovery into the legislation. Actually, it will probably make it a bit tougher for people to obtain a loan because of the loan guarantee being decreased to 85 per cent from 90 per cent. That will cause the banks to be a bit more wary in terms of lending.

Then there is the provision that through order in council the government can make changes to the legislation. I have seen changes in my short time as a member of Parliament. At one time there was a 100 per cent guarantee. Then it decreased to 90 per cent. Now it is being decreased to 85 per cent. It is fair to say that if this trend continues, we will soon see the guarantee being decreased to 75 per cent, 50 per cent, or whatever, which would essentially make it a non–program.

I am concerned about the influence which, behind closed doors, cabinet will have to change this crucial piece of legislation. I happen to think it is a good piece of legislation. However, I do have a deep concern that this is the only initiative which we are discussing.

Let me put this into context. I am one of many members who believe that the small business sector is the crucial job creating sector in the country today and will be even more so in the future. As a result of both government and private enterprise downsizing, the role of the small operation, the independent operator and entrepreneur has become more important than ever.

We are visited regularly in our constituency offices by young people who have sent out 200 resumés, who have filled out 100 job applications or who have knocked on 50 doors trying to find employment. Often these young people are well educated and well trained. They have marketable technical skills and good research abilities. They are self–starters and so on. Yet they are having difficulty finding a job using the traditional process for finding a job.

The young people of the future who will be employed will be those who actually create their own enterprise. They will realize that they will not be working for a firm. They will not be working for an accounting company. They will not be working in a small manufacturing firm. It will be up to them to actually start their own enterprise from scratch. They will be the ultimate entrepreneurs, able to take a concept, see an opportunity and put that into play.

Today we see two different types of small business operators. One type is the small business operator who finds himself attempting to start a small business or is looking for ways of starting one. He has very little experience in the world of business and probably never thought he would actually start a business.

Because of the layoffs in the private sector and the downsizing in the public sector people like him simply find themselves out of work and the only solution they see is to start an enterprise. One of the areas where government could help would be to find ways and means to enable those men and women to obtain the necessary skills to start a small business and to run it successfully, or to upgrade their skills or obtain retraining.

I appreciate there are programs in place now. I am thinking in particular of some of the work done by the Business Development Bank of Canada and others. This is one area where government can provide some service to encourage the development of these, let us say, incubator centres.

The other type of business people are the individuals who have wanted to be in business all their lives. Simply by their nature, instinct and character they are business people. They have developed the necessary skills or perhaps have them innately and have enrolled in programs or courses to bring themselves up to speed to be successful business operators.

These two types of operators are now becoming increasingly more familiar on the economic landscape of the country.

In Kamloops we are in the process of celebrating Small Business Week. I heard the definition of a small business person the other day and I thought it was very apt. I realize that when it comes to the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and other business organizations, economic organizations, banks and other financial institutions, they all have their own definitions of what a small business operation is.

The one this person came forward with was that a small business person is one who works 18 hours a day, seven days a week for the equivalent of about an eight hour daily wage. In today's economic environment that pretty well sums it up. These people are dedicated and committed to their enterprise. They are prepared to dedicate literally their entire lives. It becomes a lifestyle to see a new business start up or an existing business to continue to expand. These are the people we need to encourage in all ways.

How do we encourage them? What can we do? I have wrestled with this for many years. I sent out a questionnaire to the small business operators in my constituency a while back. I asked them to help me with ideas as to how they thought the government could help them.

They said three things: "Get out of our way, get out of our way, get out of our way. We will take care of ourselves. We do not actually need help. If you could allow us to more easily spend time on developing a new enterprise, new technologies, new processes, new marketing programs, that is what we need to do. We need to spend time on that as opposed to filling out countless forms". Mountains and mounds of red tape confront the typical small business operator. There is a lot of truth in that.

Underlying all of this is the recognition of the hated GST and what that has done and continues to do particularly to small businesses. I look across the aisle at my Liberal colleagues and do look forward to the day when that GST is replaced. I do not mean that the name be replaced; I mean that the actual tax be eliminated and we come up with a system that is less cumbersome and more fair for the small business community.

There are three good features we have seen developed over the last number of years. On the top of my list in terms of support, assistance, encouragement and nurturing for small business operators is community futures. I do not know what other people have had in terms of experience with community futures but I want to mention what I have experienced.

In the Kamloops area we set up a community futures called Thompson Country Community Futures Society. Over the last number of years hundreds of new businesses have resulted from that government program, but not the government program per se. Obviously individuals who had the ideas, the energy and the dedication to see these businesses through to completion were the critical ingredient.

• (1615)

However, the community futures program was able to provide start up funding in two ways. One program working in co–operation with Employment Canada enabled people to continue receiving unemployment insurance while they started up a new enterprise. It has been very helpful and very successful. Everyone would acknowledge that the chance of a person starting up a small business getting into a profit making situation in the first few weeks or months is very remote.

The program enabled individuals who had lost their jobs and were eligible for unemployment insurance to continue receiving unemployment insurance for a number of months while they started their new enterprises. That made the difference. That gave them a leg up, a small opportunity to provide for their families at the same time as they were starting their new enterprises.

Another program attached to community futures was the one where small businesses with good business plans could apply for up to $75,000 in funding. The decision is made by successful local business people who know the region, know the area and perhaps even know the individual. They have a very sound appreciation for what businesses are successful, what businesses have a good chance at being successful and what risky areas should be watched. They evaluate business plans put forward often with help from the Thompson Country Community Futures Society and make decisions.

They are loans, not grants, with modest interest rates attached to them with often generous payback programs that are rather creative in terms of paying back the money being borrowed. They are provided to new firms, particularly the ones that do not qualify easily in terms of usual categories for bank funding, particularly people who are trying new market areas, new technologies or creative new age businesses that do not have a lot of inventory to use as collateral in the traditional approach to lending of financial institutions.

The Business Development Bank of Canada is playing a more positive role now than it has in the past. Over the last number of years to say that I have been disappointed with the role it has played would be understating my concern. I looked at the old FBDB operation and compared it to the Royal Bank of Canada, the Bank of Montreal or whatever. It seemed that it was the most conservative lending institution on the landscape and was certainly of little help to small business when it came to lending. When it came to case counselling and so on it was another matter. That has changed somewhat and I appreciate the thrust of the new legislation is a step in the right direction.

As my friend from Western Arctic indicated, banks and other financial institutions are changing slightly. They are moving slightly in the right direction. A lot of credit goes to members of Parliament, other individuals and organizations that have mounted pressure. They pointed out that banks were simply not fulfilling their roles or were not being helpful to this growing and creative sector.

There have been significant movements in terms of bank policies with the creation of a small business trouble shooter all banks now have in place. It is somebody to phone, to complain to or to ask questions about why a loan was turned down. There is much greater sensitivity in terms of funding women entrepreneurs, women business persons and aboriginal borrowers.

It is not that I think banks are not particularly creative themselves. They are responding to public pressure. They now realize these are areas they have to move into. Perhaps a little less altruistic, they are responding to the fact that as First Nations peoples settle land claims vast amounts of money may be involved. I suspect some banks are looking forward to getting involved in that operation as a financial growth possibility and perhaps have more of an interest in funding aboriginal enterprises. Nevertheless, in reality there is positive movement in all those areas.

I point out what I think is a particular problem area. Again I acknowledge there have been some improvements in the last little while. The government's procurement programs have assisted a number of small enterprises in my own constituency. A variety of programs assist small businesses to develop new technologies. Hopefully we are looking forward to the information highway strategy. It is not only necessary but will be helpful in the development of small enterprises.

There is a need for more flexible financing, particularly in some critical areas of growth in the country such as the tourism or hospitality business. One situation that brings this to mind in my own constituency is an operation called Mike Wiegle Heli–Skiing Operations. It has been in operation for many years. It is a very successful heli–skiing operation that caters almost exclusively to overseas skiers from Europe who come for a week or two to ski down the glaciers of the mountains in central British Columbia. It is superb skiing. To set up a major resort in an isolated area far from airports or population centres and to obtain financing arrangements that allow some flexibility is extremely difficult. The Western diversification fund was helpful in the start–up period, but if we are to assist businesses to expand into new areas and if we are to be successful, we have to find ways to be more creative, and I aim these comments particularly at financial institutions.

The legislation is pathetic. I will not say much about it. Enough has been said. It will go to committee. It is a continuation of the same. It is certainly helpful. The SBLA has been helpful to many small business operators across the country including the Kamloops region, but there is much more we could do.

Let me summarize by indicating a critical initiative we need to take. When I say "we" I do not mean as a Parliament or as a government; I mean as a country. We all acknowledge that for a business to be successful or perhaps even for an individual to be successful there has to be some kind of plan, strategy or blueprint. There has to be a flexible business plan that acknowledges changing times and so on.

We need something similar as a country. We could call it the business plan for Canada. We could identify areas where obvious growth potential exists and where we would be putting our special efforts as federal, provincial, regional and local governments, financial institutions, business organizations, investors and entrepreneurs.

We can look around the world at countries that have been more successful than ourselves when it comes to economic development and job creation. It tends to be countries that have a business plan in place which everyone acknowledges. Maybe they do not agree with it but at least it is acknowledged. It sends a signal to banks of the direction of the country for the next decade. It signals entrepreneurs and investors of a direction, whether it is in pharmaceuticals, agri–business, tourism or whatever.

Some kind of national Canadian business plan would be appropriate. Then we would have to find out where we fit into it. What role would the federal government play, if any? What role would the provincial and regional governments play, if any? I suspect there would be significant roles. With that plan we would be much more successful.

Granted, this is most successful with smaller countries in which it is a lot easier to come up with a consensus in terms of direction and development. We are the second largest country in the world geographically and it causes problems that we are experiencing virtually as we speak. It is something we must look at, and it would be a business strategy for the country for the next decade or two.

I will take leave and look forward to committee work and to debating the bill at third reading.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before proceeding to questions and comments following the hon. member for Kamloops, I have a statement to make concerning private members' hour for tomorrow, Friday, October 27, 1995.

I have received written notice from the hon. member for Fraser Valley East that he will be unable to move his motion during private members' hour tomorrow.

[Translation]

Since it was impossible to arrange for an exchange of positions in the order of precedence, pursuant to Standing Order 94, I ask the Clerk to drop this item to the bottom of the order of precedence. Pursuant to Standing Order 94, the hour for private members' business for tomorrow shall be suspended, and the House shall continue with the business before it at that time.

[English]

SMALL BUSINESS LOANS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the great things the member for Kamloops brings to the House is his ability to remind the Liberal Party from time to time when it tends to move a little too far to the right. The Reform Party influence is pretty obvious in the bill, but we have to focus on some of those matters.

The bill will go to committee. Contrary to what the member said, the bill cannot be amended by regulation. We will make that amendment in committee. Hopefully all members will continue in the same spirit we have had in the committee to amend the bill.

The member alluded to an idea in the first part of his speech about young entrepreneurs needing access to start up capital. It was a very important insight into a very important issue all of us in the House must address. Even Reform Party members would agree. I notice they are agreeing.

I also noticed something in my own community. I ache when I see some young talent that has just finished engineering school or university and the old institutions or the larger corporations that used to be there to provide their first jobs are no longer hiring young people. Many of them are frustrated, and we have not addressed the issue head on in terms of providing entrepreneurial support systems that are required if they are to get going.

I am thinking aloud. When we go into committee I would be interested in the member's views or thoughts on looking at the whole list of criteria in the Small Business Loans Act. Should we look at the notion of including a clause in the bill that deals with young entrepreneurs? The bill could be a tool used by banks to make them a little more sensitive. Obviously the bill will help bank managers take the extra risk they probably would not take on their own.

What would the member for Kamloops say about possibly looking into that area as a way of altering the bill to look after young entrepreneurs?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we acknowledge that in the early days SBLA was intended to be a mechanism to provide encouragement for bankers to lend money to small businesses. In the same spirit, there is a new concern out there which the hon. member has described well. It may be an opportunity to encourage the banks to take advantage of the SBLA to provide necessary funding to these newly emerging group of entrepreneurs.

• (1630)

A mechanism is about to be put in place to track the lending of financial institutions and to see where the loans are going and to what extent the banks are responding to the new needs in society. It is a useful step.

It is time to look at new mechanisms and I will very briefly mention one. Some states in the United States had a vehicle called agri–bonds, that were somewhat like Canada savings bonds, to provide agricultural funding. These were set aside for agricultural use only. Farmers and ranchers were encouraged to invest in agri–bonds knowing that the money would go back to assist hard pressed farmers in their state. That is a bit of a generalization but it summarizes the point.

Troublesome areas, such as tourism related businesses, where it is difficult to find funding for new tourist related projects, should be identified. Could we not consider the development of a "toury" bond as opposed to an agri–bond? Investors would put their money into a toury bond, knowing that the money would go to help new Canadian hospitality related businesses to expand or be created. It would be a way to direct money to tourism, as opposed to the old favourite of much of the money, the RRSP, a certain percentage of which is being invested overseas or in other countries. I would like to see a little more channelling of some of these funds into troublesome areas such as tourist or hospitality related industries.

It is another idea on which my friend from Broadview—Greenwood could respond at some later time. The Canadian toury bond could be a take–off on the U.S. agri–bond.

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the member for Kamloops that I found his speech very interesting. I share his enthusiasm for small business and realize the importance of it. I am concerned about one particular item, community futures. I would like to have his expertise on this.

Taxpayers' money is being used by community futures. Granted, some of the businesses that apply do very well and have some excellent results. However a high rate of those businesses do not succeed and, at least in the ones I happened to scrutinize, there does not appear to be any accountability for losses. This is the taxpayers' money and I am sure taxpayers feel they should know how it is being spent. The Privacy Act seems to get in the way when we inquire about accountability.

I wonder what the member for Kamloops feels regarding losses in the community futures program and does he feel there should be some accountability?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. Of course there needs to be more accountability built into the program. That is one of the continuing areas of concern with the community futures program.

In my estimation and my experience the value of the program depends on the personnel who manage it and the expertise of the individuals who decide who gets a loan and who does not.

In Kamloops we have had a very high success rate. But there will be losses, just as there are losses with bank loans and other kinds of loans. Even if there was a certain loan loss, it might be an indication of some success. The role of community futures seems to be to provide funding for those relatively high risk business ventures that cannot, for whatever reason, obtain funding from more traditional lending sources and therefore appeal for support from community futures boards.

If I may use this opportunity to mention a shortcoming of the existing system, individuals who have submitted business plans and have what appear to be good business ideas and are encouraged to continue, but when they are rejected it often seems to be just luck. They are just rejected. The client walks away after spending many weeks or months preparing a thoughtful, careful business plan only to have dreams and hopes shattered. We must have a better system of appeal or a follow–up educational program to indicate to those men and women where they may be a little in error in their planning. This is another shortcoming.

• (1635)

Of all federal government programs of which I am personally aware and have some understanding of their use and value, this community futures program is far the best.

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, before I was listening closely to the member for Kamloops. I know of his interest in the banking industry, of his lengthy experience here in the House and I believe on the finance committee.

In his remarks he used words such as deeply disappointed and pathetic and other kinds of language. However, in Toronto recently with the Standing Committee on Industry we heard from the banks. I believe the testimony was in July or August. In the promotional material from either the Royal Bank or the CIBC, in which the hon. member had spent six weeks, it was using comments of his praising the banks. I was disappointed to see that.

It gives me pleasure to speak to this bill. The provisions of the bill are the result of consultations with leading Canadian business people such as the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. Equally if not more important to the undertaking was the report of the Standing Committee on Industry "Taking Care of Small Business". I had the privilege to sit on that committee as a government member from western Canada.

The legislative measures introduced in Bill C–99 are ultimately about access to capital for small business. Following the recession which began around 1990 small businesses in Canada had undergone unprecedented restructuring for a new and emerging global economy. These challenges have been more difficult because of the impediments and constraints to access to much needed capital.

Bill C–99 through amendments to the Small Business Loans Act will provide a more predictable relationship between the banks, the Government of Canada and the business community. I will not reiterate here the specific provisions of the SBLA but will merely state its intent and purpose is to enhance that financial environment and relationship between borrowers or small business and the Canadian financial institutions.

Stated very simply, the Government of Canada agrees to stand with small business and where the banks have refused to take the risk on new or expanding businesses, the government will partner and stand with small business to ensure small business loans are available to those who need it the most.

It is instructive to state that legislative changes are, in addition to reacting to the recommendations of the business community, in keeping with the government's belief that small business wants this government, and indeed all governments in Canada, to reduce their expenditures including those which include direct and indirect subsidies to small businesses.

In recent years the SBLA program has cost taxpayers almost $20 million to $30 million a year. However, the loan loss coverage for the year 1994–95 is estimated to run at close to $100 million, threatening the sustainability of the program itself.

Of equal importance is the fact that 40 per cent of the loans covered by this insurance program would have been made regardless. We are told by outside experts analysing the loan applications made through the banks that 40 per cent of those loans would have been made anyway. They did not need this expensive coverage that government was providing.

Without the high cost of the subsidy these firms would now be seeking financing at a much lower cost than under the provisions of this bill. Furthermore, this will allow those firms that really need financing to have those 40 per cent move out into the traditional lending areas and those new small businesses will occupy the space at the bottom or the top of the lending priorities and we hope creating new jobs.

During the presentations made to the committee on industry the witnesses told members that they would be willing to pay higher premiums, for instance, in the knowledge based industries if they could get the capital needed. Repeatedly the 60 interveners and witnesses that we saw and an equal number the presentations that were submitted to the committee were saying to us that they did not mind paying 1 or 2 per cent more on a loan because if they have a knowledge based industry they are prepared to pay that kind of money to the financial institutions if they are willing to take a risk on them. The point spread was not the real issue.

It is interesting that small business community people continually talk about the importance of the cost of borrowing money. They were so convinced of their product, so convinced of their market access, so convinced of their success in those small businesses, that they did not mind paying another point or two. They needed an opportunity and somebody to stand with them to take a risk on those businesses.

I would like to talk for a moment about western Canada and in particular of my riding of Provencher in Manitoba. Farming and small business is really the backbone of that constituency. Increasingly I am told by finance officials in the department of finance in Manitoba that small business in the agricultural sector is going to increasingly in the 21st century provide the cash receipts for the finance department as well.

This reflects the fact that in western Canada the number of people employed in small businesses is almost 40 per cent. What is really striking, and a lot of folks perhaps do not realize it, is that in Ontario it is only 32 per cent. These statistics are quite revealing and demonstrate clearly to me, as a member from Manitoba, the importance of small business in western Canada and in the next five or ten years how important this sector will become in our area.

During the first quarter of 1994 in Manitoba, for example, companies with up to 50 employees accounted for almost 20,000 jobs, far in excess of those larger companies with 300 employees or more. In 1994 companies with less than five staff also accounted for many of the growing small businesses in Manitoba. I am told 4,737 new business name registrations were filed in Manitoba in 1995.

A profile of these is very important. I speak to this issue as a member from rural Canada, from rural Manitoba. A profile of the start–up businesses in western Canada demonstrates that a typical new firm, 87 per cent, have less than five employees and for the most part, 57 per cent, are located in rural areas and run out of the homes of the operators. In other words, most of the small business growth is probably a young or middle aged couple who have started a small business out of their home, are looking for a loan, probably less than $25,000 to start. This is what we are told in the data we have received from the banks. These small businesses are creating the jobs in rural Manitoba and indeed in my riding of Provencher. There have been great gains made in terms of the start–up of companies. In 1990 there were almost 600 registered bankruptcies in Manitoba. In 1995 there have been 96. That demonstrates quite clearly what is happening. The economy and the dynamics of capitalism are restructuring. Larger companies are laying off people but young entrepreneurs are stepping up to the plate, trying to get access to capital in order to start a small business.

• (1645)

Here we see a profile of the 21st century entrepreneur who is younger, working out of the home and more likely to be involved in agriculture related small business.

What is the federal government doing? In addition to the changes to the SBLA and the Small Business Development Bank of Canada, what other kinds of measures is the government employing, particularly in western Canada, to help these people?

Through the auspices of the Department of Western Economic Diversification the government will provide a fund of $30 million for debt capital. These resources will be directed toward biotechnology and agri–biotechnology with loans ranging from $50,000 to $500,000. There is also an innovative 10–year program creating a $100 million capital pool to assist Canadian agricultural value added processing firms through patient debt capital. The government will partner these agreements.

The banks have complained both publicly and to the standing committee that in responding to the needs of the business community the government was bank bashing. I want to make it clear this was never the intention of the committee. It was merely to prod the banks, as the hon. member for Kamloops suggested, to open up their gates for small business to have access to capital.

Congratulations to the banks for doing that. The Royal Bank of Canada and the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce have joined with the western economic development fund to provide this patient debt capital and they should be applauded for that. However, there is a lot of work to do and a long way to go.

What the government is prepared to do through these public and private instruments is reach to the small business community, to stand with it and encourage it to take the necessary risks.

There have been a number of recent initiatives in my riding which are important and give testimony to the growth in the agricultural and small business sectors. There is a great change going on not only in the small business sector. As we have heard many times, the government is cutting back on its expenditures. That is what the Canadian people have asked it to do. The government has made changes to the Western Grain Transportation Act and those subsidies to business pursuant to its obligations under the WTO.

What has been the outcome of these programs in western diversification? Recently I had the privilege with the Minister of Western Economic Diversification to join with 25 farmers from the Altona region of southern Manitoba, where we produce some of the best durum wheat in the world, to provide them with a $1 million loan for a pasta plant.

These are the initiatives young farmers are asking the government to undertake with them. They intend to build a $5 million plant. They will put in $1.5 million of their own money and hopefully there will be a financial institution, perhaps in southern Manitoba, which will step up to the plate and say it believes in the process as well. It will create jobs in the community of Altona and St. Jean.

It is vital to not only ship our raw resources out of the country but to keep them within our borders, to create the value added, to create the jobs, to keep the wealth and the technology in Canada. This is increasingly important.

• (1650)

Recently there was an announcement by McCain of a $55 million expansion of its potato processing plant. I had the privilege of joining with some private sector investors and my colleagues in the province of Manitoba, the provincial government, to make an announcement for a $55 million canola crushing plant.

Farmers, rather than paying $800 to ship their canola to the west coast or through Thunder Bay, can now drive their trucks 50 or 100 miles down a two lane highway to deliver that product to that plant. The jobs and the wealth from the value added of that product will stay with those farmers.

The pasta plant provides such a dramatic example of that. Farmers last year were getting about $160 a tonne for durum wheat used for pasta. Astoundingly, Canadians had imported 77,000 tonnes of pasta, packaged, at a price of almost $1,600 a ton. It is a great idea that the Government of Canada would stand with those 25 farmers and say: "Instead of shipping your product to the U.S. where it is being processed and shipped back to Canada, we will provide you a loan, not a grant, not a giveaway, a loan". Through that loan and working with those people that $1,600 will stay in our communities. That is a good thing, a positive thing.

We are expecting within a few months, after the announcement of the changes to the Crow, close to $500 million of investment in Manitoba alone. The banks have a role to play in this. The government cannot repeatedly be the instrument and the primary catalyst for these kinds of undertakings. The banks have a fiduciary responsibility, having the privilege of banking in this country, to act and react and join in partnership with small business. This is the one of the key areas they have forgotten.

I conclude my comments on a recent initiative in my riding of Provencher, again through the auspices of the minister responsible for western economic development, with the francophone communities in Manitoba. The francophone communities have developed a francophone chamber of commerce with ten different communities, six of which are in my riding.

We have said we are willing to stand with those communities and work with them to utilize their capacities of their French language, their entrepreneurial skills, their low labour costs, their style of living which is outside of Winnipeg in wonderful communities. If they choose they can send their children to an English school or to a French school. There are both there. We have stood with these mayors and reeves and people in the French communities to provide funding of up to $1.5 million over five years to work with them.

We hope and believe that people from across the country and indeed the world will invest in those French communities and capitalize on their capabilities in precisely the same way that Mr. McKenna in New Brunswick has been doing over the last two years.

This is a clear example of a French community in western Canada, in rural Manitoba, whose origins are from the St. Maurice valley in Quebec, Lagimodière and the first settlers who came from the St. Maurice valley and settled in the west, whose descendants are Louis Riel, the first member of Parliament for Provencher, the seat I now occupy.

I am here to report to the House that these French people I service and have the privilege of servicing in the riding of Provencher in rural western Canada are doing very well indeed.

They have their French language. They have their French culture. They have their French communities.

• (1655)

They are not asking to remove themselves from Canada. They are not asking to tear themselves apart from the people of Manitoba. They are telling me to tell the House they are doing very well and that they are joining with the Government of Canada in these kinds of initiatives.

They are not abandoned. We are with them. The Government of Canada is with them and I believe all Canadians are with them.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was enjoying the speeches of the hon. member and the hon. member for Kamloops.

One certainly has to agree and be thankful and glad for individuals being successful in the member's riding on these new enterprises. The help they got is great.

The difficulty was mentioned by the speaker from Kamloops when he talked about a survey he did in his riding. He talked about what we can do to help enlighten the ideas of new enterprises and help them begin and grow; not just for new entrepreneurs but for older ones who may change careers from time to time.

All of that is very important. It is especially important when one hears his response when they say get out of the way, get out of the way.

In the early part of the 1990s in my area of Wild Rose, which is likewise rural and small towns, many small businesses through the first two or three years following the GST went into receivership. In many of the cases they declared the GST was the straw that broke the camel's back.

They were struggling. They were having a tough time. Along came the GST and that really brought the final crunch. That was not the case in all of these. I am sure every member would be able to find some enterprise that flopped specifically because of the GST.

People say to the governments get out of their way, stay off their backs, stay out of their pockets and they will make it. Give them that initial boost they need. I certainly support that idea.

I carry with me in my briefcase the red ink book, the book of broken promises. It says the Liberal government will replace the GST with a system that generates equivalent revenues—I worry where that equivalency will come from—is fair to consumers and to small business and minimizes disruption to small business, all very key statements and very important.

I also read of the mandate of 12 months for this to happen. We are now in the 25th month and nothing has happened with the GST. It would not be fair of me to ask the hon. member why the deputy minister has not resigned with the promise of doing so within this 12–month period.

I wonder if the member could enlighten the House in any way as to what small business has to look forward to beyond being able to get started. That is the first step. Will we achieve things to help them continue and get out of the way and not be disruptive?

Will we see the GST replaced? How long will it take? Obviously it will take longer than this book says.

Mr. Iftody: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. He raises some valid points and concerns. It is no small secret that the Canadian business community is very concerned about the goods and services tax. It was concerned about it when it was announced and of course it still is. However, that never did the government or the Prime Minister or the Deputy Prime Minister say that we did not need the revenue. In its previous form as the manufacturers' sales tax in 1984 of 9 per cent and then moving up, I believe, in 1992–93 to about 13 per cent or 14 per cent, prior to being changed to the GST, the Government of Canada has been dependent on those revenues and will continue to need them.

• (1700)

The difficulty is the structure and the nature of the tax. The member is quite correct when he states that the imposition of the GST had an inflationary effect and stalled purchases. For example, someone may want to build a home in the riding of Wild Rose or Provencher. That person would order a $100,000 of materials and then there would be labour involved. When taking that lumber out of the yard that person would be stopped at the gate and charged another $7,000. That, of course, is going to kill investment and purchases. I think people have been painfully aware of that.

The government has made it quite clear, particularly leading up to the next budget that we will be addressing the matter. The parliamentary secretary has spoken about the GST only in the last couple of days and mentioned that we are equally concerned about it on this side of the House.

I ask the hon. member from Alberta to speak to his provincial counterparts and ask them to join with the other provinces and with the Government of Canada to work out some reasonable solutions to deal with a harmonized tax which will be in the best interests of all Canadians and therefore the Canadian economy.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate at this time to recognize the member for Provencher for all the work he has done in our industry committee during the last two years.

When we started the debate on how we could improve access to capital a lot of people thought we would have one or two meetings, bring the banks in and they would probably give us a good public relations speech which would take our eyes off the ball and we would then lose focus on the issue.

I acknowledge the member's courage, commitment and support in keeping a rigid focus on making sure the whole bank attitude toward small business really changed. It was not just a PR show then put on the back burner. It is something we have stuck with over the last two years. The member for Provencher has made a fabulous contribution to the industry committee. I know all members from the Reform Party and from the Bloc Quebecois would certainly support the view I express here today.

My question for the member has to do with the great story about the past operation in his riding, the value added. That was an exciting story for me to hear. I felt like I wanted to rush out to Manitoba. It sounds like there is more action there than in a lot of the regions in the country. I salute the member for that.

I want him to tell me why those entrepreneurs got so excited and moved from exporters of raw products into taking the risks of turning themselves into manufacturers, taking a raw product and going to the finished packaged good? How was that done?

Mr. Iftody: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. Basically, the praise for this particular initiative rests not with the member for Provencher but with the Prairie Harvest farm group from Altona which came up with the idea.

• (1705)

The role of the Government of Canada throughout this whole process has been one of facilitator. These kinds of innovative ideas with respect to secondary processing of our natural resources, which the World Bank has just said that Canada is number two in the world, have been there for quite some time.

I point out our trade difficulties with the U.S. and the cap on durum wheat which was unfairly placed on us by the Americans. The Government of Canada responded to that unfair trade action by going through the office of the Prime Minister to the minister of agriculture and indeed the minister of western economic development to say: "If we cannot ship our durum over the border, let us be really smart and keep it in our own back yard. We will process it and sell it to Canadians and Americans".

The short answer is that the Prairie Harvest group out of Altona came up with an idea, approached the Government of Canada for some help and we were glad to act as a lever on this important project.

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on this bill but there are some things that have concerned me for some time about small business and this is an opportunity to say a few things.

Bill C–99 gives access to capital for small businesses in Canada. My concern is basically if it is really looking at small business, the value of small business to our country and just what small business needs. That is where my concern stems from, where the banks have refused to take a risk. I contend that the banks should have taken a risk in the past. We do have the Federal Business Development Bank which was in the past supposed to be the bank of last resort. Often this has not been the case and somebody else has had to come up with the funds.

If we are talking about other programs for small business, like community futures, it really does depend, as the member for Kamloops said, on the expertise of those that run those programs. I have had some experience with it and I have found that perhaps that is one of the reasons why some of the losses are a little greater than they should be.

Of course there is risk involved. There is a risk involved for anybody going into a small business and we expect some losses. However, we do not expect the amount of loss to be higher than normal businesses would have going through the banks.

There have been some successful businesses through the community futures. Some good ones are still running right now in my community. However, the difficulty with the community futures program is that some of the businesses that are successful could have been funded by the Federal Business Development Bank which is the bank of last resort. It should have been funded there, not with the taxpayers' dollars in another program.

What I am trying to say is that community futures has to be accountable. There is no bottom line. We have a Privacy Act and we cannot access that information. That is not acceptable to the Canadian taxpayers. I found the rate of losses higher and, being unaccountable, therefore unacceptable to me as an MP responsible for taxpayers' dollars.

I felt that the people going into the community futures program were protected so that perhaps the incentive to succeed may not be as great if one knows one does not have to worry if one has a loss. In small business there is always a challenge and a risk. Those people who go into a small business are usually entrepreneurs who have some wonderful talents and expertise. We usually see good results. Unfortunately, often in community futures we do not see this because the accountability is not there. Wherever we do not have accountability we have a future problem of breakdown.

The purpose of the Federal Business Development Bank is that it is a bank of last resort. It is supposed to be the money lender of last resort.

The member for Kamloops said it very well. He said that small businesses just want the government to get out of their way. Being in small business myself I can say that this is exactly true. We need a healthy marketplace if we are in business. We need to have fewer burdens on us.

• (1710)

The tax structure is far too heavy today to encourage anyone to go into small business. The first couple of years are difficult. In the past if businesses had troubles the Federal Business Development Bank was not always there to back them up but often put them into receivership at a time when all they needed was some support to get through. I would suggest the Federal Business Development Bank has not always done its job in the past.

Small businesses want less government interference. They need some incentive. We are talking about younger people coming into the marketplace. I have often mentioned this in my community and I have talked to small businesses in my community about this. There is a program in Europe where small businesses apprentice a younger person coming out of a college, a technical school or whatever. If our small businesses apprenticed a young person for a year, they would be providing a training program built into the most natural area possible. It would be built into the marketplace, the economy, into a natural spot in the economy, in a working spot in the economy.

When speaking to small businesses this is an avenue we could travel. Considering small business supplies about 80 per cent of jobs, I feel this is an ideal opportunity for our young people that are unemployed with nowhere to go to get the training they need if they do not have it.

Why is the small business person going to do this? There would obviously have to be some incentive. Perhaps a tax break in some area would help as small business is overtaxed already. They have the fewest tax breaks. Big business seems to qualify for them where small business does not. I would really like to see the government take a look at some serious ideas for helping small business in this area.

The banks have not always lived up to their responsibilities. They are there to encourage small business and they are there to do it in a realistic way.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed today's debate because it clearly illustrates the different philosophies of the different parties. We on this side believe the role of government is to act as facilitator, to aid small businesses, to give them the types of tools required not only in the financial sector but also in the development of human resources.

The hon. member who has just spoken cited some of the areas in which she would like to see an improvement. She was referring to the concept of developing an apprenticeship system which might give some tax breaks to small business and providing the sorts of incentives that would result in the development of the type of workforce that may be more in tune with the economic reality of today's marketplace.

The federal government has initiated a number of programs in co–operation with the private sector which speak to the issues raised by the hon. member.

I had the pleasure on August 28 to be in the province of Quebec with the president of Chrysler Canada, the CARS Council and a local school board to engage in the type of partnership that will lead to approximately 1,000 jobs for young people. This is done through the youth internship program in co–operation with the National Sectoral Council.

I would like to speak about these initiatives because they address the human resources planning that a modern, developed nation should be addressing. In fact, surprisingly, the minister of education from the Parti Quebecois was present and co–operated with the federal government in kicking off this initiative.

• (1715)

What does this really mean? It means that we on this side of the House have realized we cannot have a program for every challenge we face. The answers are really found at the community level, at the industry level. Our role as a government is to bring about the meetings of the minds around the table, so that we can institute programs which deal with the challenges of the ever changing nature of the workforce.

At that announcement, Chrysler committed itself to provide an internship program for 200 young people. The sectoral council initiative committed itself to a cumulative number of 1,000. That means these young people will go through an internship program and will have a job waiting for them at the end of their one year or nine months worth of training.

This federal government initiative has been extremely successful. Under our red book commitment we originally stated that 24,000 young people would participate in this program. To date, 27,000 young people are participating. They are participating in programs I am certain will bring about positive changes in their lives.

Equally important is that for the very first time all sectors of our society, the educational institutions, industry, labour and management, together are addressing standards for the industry. They are addressing issues and concerns that have blocked the progress of a particular industry.

Whom are we linking these industries with? We are linking them with Canadians who are willing to learn a profession or trade so that they will have the type of skills required in the ever changing Canadian economy.

Why are we excited about these prospects? We are excited because we see our role as a facilitator to be a very important one in setting the parameters of economic development within our country. That is one initiative which has worked very well. We have linked our initiative not just to any industry, but we have linked our initiative to industries that provide jobs with a future.

For example in the automotive industry, gone are the days when there were mechanics. Those are jobs of the past. My father was in the trucking industry for a number of years. He would have the local mechanic look at his truck and the mechanic would put his ear near the engine to hear the noises. That is gone. Computer chips are now a very important part of the engine. The job of a mechanic is obsolete. What do we do? We have to retrain people to become auto technicians, to give them the tools to understand how the new engines work.

I give that example because I think it is a fundamental one. It clearly illustrates how quickly our country and our economy is changing. In the same way we cannot fix a 1995 car with a 1965 car repair manual, we certainly cannot fix the challenges we face in 1995, whether it is labour market strategy or small business initiatives, with 1965 programs.

This is very important to this government. It is for this reason that we have taken up the challenge to modernize Canada's social security system. This is the reason we are reviewing all our training programs. This is the reason we are promoting innovative programs and effective and strategic partnerships that speak to a modern economy.

How does this translate to the local reality where I live in my riding? What does this all mean to the residents of Aurora, Woodbridge, Maple, Richmond Hill, Oak Ridges, King and Nobleton? What does it mean to the over 260,000 people I represent in the House of Commons? How do I as a member bring about this vision of how we modernize and become more innovative in real terms? How do I make the translation from this beautiful Chamber of the House of Commons on to where the people live, play and work?

Yesterday was our anniversary as elected officials here. I have spent the past couple of years building the partnerships required to have real change occur at the community level. Last year I began planning and setting priorities for my area. I developed the York North technology strategy. Today I take this opportunity to outline some of its major principles.

Along with the residents of York North, I have realized quite clearly that in order to succeed in the new economy we cannot fear technology. We cannot fear technology infusion in the workplace. We cannot fear that in certain cases technology may reduce employment opportunities in old economy industries.

Instead of fear, the response I received from the residents of York North was one of excitement. Change in a society brings about two emotional responses: one either gets anxious about change or one gets excited. The people of York North decided that there was no great happiness in being anxious about change and technology and that we should not only absorb the technological revolution which is occurring globally but we should also find ways in which we could lead the way in our area.

I called a meeting of local stakeholders in my community, mayors, business representatives, members of labour unions. I called local school boards and people from the Career Foundation, the foundation which brings all these people together. I said that perhaps we should begin to experiment to find new ways of dealing with the technological changes that were occurring.

On September 11, 1995 we announced a major local economic development strategy, the York region strategic alliance. For now, it is a pilot project. What does it do? It gives the businesses in my area an opportunity to place their business in a database which can be accessed worldwide. We are not happy with just being able to access it within Canada. We understand the potential for export. We also are fully committed to building worldwide strategic alliances in order for business in my community to prosper. This is what some of the partners have said about the initiative.

• (1725)

Steve Quinlan, president of Seneca College, said that Seneca College, York region, the federal government and other partners have co–funded and developed a strategic alliance partnership to strengthen opportunities for jobs and growth. This initial research is a valuable resource, using information systems technology to rapidly assess regional needs in response to a changing global economy. This initiative is a pilot model to show how business, government and education can in fact work together.

Eldred King, chair of the Regional Municipality of York, stated that the strategic alliance initiative is an important component of the region's visions and plans for the 21st century. The region must provide leadership if change is to occur. He said that their plans strike a balance between economic growth, healthy communities and sustainable development.

Mayor Lorna Jackson from the city of Vaughan said that she was very excited that Vaughan was chosen as the test site. Not only is it one of the fastest growing cities in Canada, it is a bastion for industry. She stated: "I have no doubt that we will serve our country proud".

The reason I bring these names to the floor of the House of Commons is to clearly illustrate to Canadians that partnerships at the local level can work. Government, business and labour can come together to create the type of environment in which jobs flourish. This partnership is not just found in the riding of York North, it is found in every single community in Canada.

Hon. members should return to their ridings and engage local stakeholders to take charge of the future of the community. They should excite people about the new economy. There are great opportunities.

If there is one thing about the information highway, if there is one thing about the new economy, it is that they have redefined time and space. They have made geography less important. Now we are linked by satellite. The information highway will link us to the world. This is something we should be getting excited about.

We need to give people the tools. That is why I am happy with the commitment of the federal government to establish the Canadian Business Development Bank, which is providing people with the important capital to start their businesses.

That is why I am happy that on October 2 of this year I was able to establish the Vaughan Technology Enterprise Centre where 60 young people will be taught entrepreneurial studies. They will be linked with small business people in the community in a mentorship program. They will acquire the skills which are so important in creating jobs.

That is why I am so happy that the federal government has a program called self–employment assistance which has enabled 34,000 unemployed Canadians to create their own businesses. Better still, not only have they created businesses, they have created over 68,000 jobs.

That is the type of transition we want. We want people to get off the unemployment rolls of the country and onto the payrolls of this nation. It is happening in every single community.

I have a very clear message that we on this side of the House understand the important role small business plays. We want to clearly reach out in as many ways as possible to bring about positive change, jobs and healthy communities throughout this land.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I would like to inform the House, particularly the parliamentary secretary, that when we resume debate on Bill C–99 he will have approximately five minutes remaining, should he so choose, when the bill comes back to the House for debate.

Private Members' Business

It being 5.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

PROTECTION OF PERSONAL INFORMATION OBTAINED BY CERTAIN CORPORATIONS ACT

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.) moved that Bill C–315, an act to complement the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individual with respect to personal information about themselves obtained by certain corporations, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to the House today on the issue of personal privacy and specifically on Bill C–315.

Canadians are living in a world that seems to get smaller with each passing day. The distances that separate us from our families and friends are becoming easier to traverse. It has become easier to communicate with our families and with others around the globe. Sometimes, though, it feels like these same distances are becoming a little too short and the rest of the world is getting a little too close.

What has led to this dramatic change in our society? The answer is simple: the industrial and technological revolution that has so dramatically changed the face of Canada over the past 100 years. The telephone has brought friends and family from hundreds of miles away to within earshot of our voice. The car and the aeroplane have reduced long distance trips from months to a matter of hours. The computer has put volumes of information at our fingertips. The Internet has provided a gateway for the free flow of information to a knowledge hungry world.

Each of these changes has brought convenience to our daily lives. With each change came a loss of some small piece of our personal privacy. Historically our laws and traditions have responded to some aspects of the loss of our personal privacy. Trespassing laws and exclusion orders, for example, keep those we do not want to associate with at a distance.

Recent telephone innovations like call display and call blocking help us see who is trying to contact us and help us prevent unwanted calls.

Where we as a country fall short, though, is in our response to the growth of computer technology. This technology has the ability to retrieve, store and send vast amounts of information. The information age has brought a booming industry, creating a $300 million per year industry in the buying and selling of personal information.

Ontario's assistant commissioner for privacy recently exclaimed that privacy as we know it may not exist in the year 2000. The Privacy Commissioner of Canada, Mr. Bruce Phillips, agreed when he stated earlier this year that Ottawa should consider protecting the right to lead a private life and that in the next year or two is really going to tell the tale. Mr. Phillips clearly believes it is time for action in protecting personal information.

The Privacy Commissioner of Canada is not the only one who believes the time is now to protect privacy. The information highway advisory council, created by the Ministry of Industry, reported last month: "Manipulation of data may occur without the consent of the individual from whom it was collected. Moreover, the information is often used for purposes unrelated to those purposes for which it was originally collected. Because of the enormous potential for abuse there is a need for effective privacy protection. Only Quebec has enacted specific legislation governing its private sector. The council believes strongly that there should be national legislation to establish fair information practices on the information highway".

• (1735)

A recent Gallup poll conducted for Anderson Consulting, a private financial consulting firm based in Toronto, found similar concerns about privacy and the information highway: "Notwithstanding strong interest in the information highway, Canadians have a high level of concern as to how it may affect their privacy. Asked to indicate their level of concern for their privacy because information about them might be collected by companies involved in the information highway, 83.7 per cent described themselves as very concerned or somewhat concerned".

Bill C–315 responds to these calls for privacy protection. I should put forward a definition of the term personal information. The definition of personal information used in crafting Bill C–315 refers to data on an individual that are recorded. This could include name and phone number, business address and phone number, any identifiable physical characteristic, religion, national or ethnic origin, age or any information about education or financial history.

This information is recorded in many ways, including electronically such as on a floppy or hard disk, manually on paper or microfilm, or virtually as in computer memory or an electronic network.

Historically there are several sources that reaffirm the right to personal privacy. There is the right to privacy as guaranteed in both Bill C–62, an act respecting telecommunications, and in the 1989 case of the Queen v. Dyment, when it was established that the right to privacy does exist in Canada, that it existed before the charter of rights and freedoms and that the charter has not diminished that right. The CRTC has been vigilant in protecting this right especially with regard to junk faxes and messages.

There is the right to anonymity as determined by Telecom decision CRTC 92–7. In other words, all Canadians have the right to be left alone and the right to remain anonymous as they go about their daily activities.

In addition, the Organization for Economic Co–operation and Development, of which Canada is a member, has established a set of basic principles to help define and support the protection of personal privacy. These principles share a common theme that the collection of personal information should be open, accountable and limited to the purposes intended.

Canadians are often surprised when they learn how information is being collected and where it ends up. Personal information on Canadians is being collected in a wide variety of ways. Credit card applications, contest forms, polls and surveys, warranty cards, magazine subscriptions and other means are all used in one form or another to collect personal information.

By combining these individual client lists a detailed profile of an individual can be made without the knowledge of that individual. Firms in Canada and around the world are able to have multiple lists, cross referenced, and create a remarkably accurate portrait of an individual.

Allow me to quote from a recent consumer report study: "By overlapping the data available through thousands of information systems it is now possible to create a remarkable picture of anyone. That picture could include your age, income, political party, marital status, the number of children you have, the magazines you read, your employment history and your military and school records. A database might also know what kind of breakfast cereal you eat, the make of the car you drive and even the brand of diapers your children wear".

A recent article in "Telecommunications Policy" entitled "Will My House Still be My Castle?" added to this concern: "In the future things will be very different. It will essentially be one stop shopping for the data gatherer in the digital super highway. Information gathering, analysis, correlation and dissemination can all be automated, depersonalized and made inexpensive. The time to establish coherent public policies and safeguards is before such systems are in place and adverse precedents and vested interests become established".

• (1740)

Currently Canadians enjoy very little personal privacy protection. The current Privacy Act, Bill P–21, is limited to information held by the federal government and certain federal institutions. Similar laws exist in eight of our twelve provinces and territories.

In the Northwest Territories, the Yukon Territory, Prince Edward Island and Alberta action has not yet been taken to protect personal information held by these provincial and territorial governments.

When it comes to controlling information held by the private sector the picture is far less promising. Only Quebec has taken the bold step of limiting the sale and access of this personal information.

Through bill 68, the province of Quebec has given its citizens the power to say no to the sale or exchange of their personal information. No other provincial government has acted as decisively as Quebec in this important area. I applaud Quebec for its initiative here.

Even Quebec's law, though, is far from complete. Many areas of business such as banking, cable television and numerous transportation companies are beyond the reach of Quebec's bill 68. This leaves Quebecers as vulnerable to privacy breaches in the federal jurisdiction as their counterparts in the rest of Canada.

Private industry, in a bid to avoid further federal and provincial control, has tried to address these privacy concerns. The Canadian Direct Marketing Association has created a bureau to deal with client list complaints and circulates the names of individuals who do not want their names on any member lists. However, individuals must repeat the request several times a year to ensure their names stay off the computer lists. As well, not all direct marketers are members of the CDMA, making privacy protection a hit or miss exercise.

Recently the Information Highway Advisory Council called on the Canadian government to regulate the flow of personal information. The Canadian Banker's Association has also created a set of voluntary privacy guidelines. According to a director with the office of the privacy commissioner, though, these guidelines are wide enough to drive a logging truck through. The bank guidelines are so ineffective that the Royal Bank of Canada admitted in 1993 that it sometimes included client card numbers, names, ages and addresses to market research firms without the client's knowledge.

We have to face the facts. Self–policing is not working. I have seen case after case in which guidelines and bureaus have turned their heads when the corporations break the rules or, at the very best, have given them a very light slap on the wrist. Industry has clearly failed Canadians in this area and it is time for Parliament to take action.

With this in mind let us turn our attention to Bill C–315. The bill stems from the concerns of a constituent of mine, expressed to me when he learned he had ended up on some questionable mailing list through which he had received advertisements for explicit pornographic material. After doing some extensive research I learned the federal government has yet to seriously address the issue of personal privacy.

Bill C–315 is the first step in addressing this serious oversight. The bill was designed to work in harmony with provincial privacy laws such as Quebec's bill 68 and to respect provincial jurisdictions as outlined in the Constitution. At the same time, it sends a tough message to companies around the country that the misuse of personal information is a concern and that the privacy of people has to be respected.

Bill C–315 would require all companies covered by the Canada Labour Code to abide by some very strict privacy protection guidelines.

• (1745)

Before selling any list containing an individual's personal information, the person shall be sent a notice stating, first, that personal information about the individual as listed in the notice is held by the company; second, that permission is needed to keep the person's name on the list; and, third, that the person shall be told his or her name can be removed at any time at no cost to the individual.

At the same time any corporation using purchased lists shall send each individual on the list a notice containing, first, the source of this information; second, a description of the information held; and, third, a statement outlining how the individual can have that personal information removed from the list at any time and at no cost to themselves.

Companies receiving a removal request must comply within 10 days and confirm with the individual that his or her request has been acted on. Breaking this law would be classified as a summary conviction. For a first offence a company or individual breaking this law would face a fine of up to $5,000. A repeat offence could double the maximum to $10,000. Charges would have to be laid within one year of the offence.

I will be the first to admit that these are tough measures. In my view they only reflect the importance people place on their own privacy. Polls have shown time and time again that Canadians feel their privacy is at risk and action must be taken to reverse this trend.

Interesting enough, the criticism I have received concerning the fine limits is that the proposed fines are not high enough, that for large institutions affected by the bill the suggested fines would merely be a nuisance or a slap on the wrist.

The Canadian public wants to have more control over personal information. A national privacy survey published in 1993 discovered that 71 per cent totally agreed that privacy rules should apply to both government and business. Sixty–six per cent believe that the government should be working with business to come up with some guidelines on privacy protection in the private sector.

The Privacy Commissioner of Canada estimates that the average Canadian has his or her name crunched through various computers across the continent perhaps five to ten times daily. He further estimates that in the private sector alone $300 million a year annually changes hands in the buying and selling of client lists.

This industry is growing at an incredible rate as technological information becomes more widespread. The privacy commissioner thinks that now is the time to take action in the protection of personal information and I agree with him wholeheartedly. The rights to anonymity and privacy are constantly being threatened in the pursuit of information. It is time to restore a balance and return to Canadians their right to have some control over their personal information, privacy and anonymity.

Let us respect this right by supporting Bill C–315 when it is brought to a vote.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity to speak on Bill C–315, a private member's bill put forward by the member for Cariboo—Chilcotin.

I came into the House not as supporter of the bill initially when I read it. However after listening to the member's speech I became more and more convinced that he had the basis of a solid piece of legislation.

I cannot stand here today and make a final decision on what the government will decide in terms of voting on the legislation, but as a government we will have to look at the bill to see if there is some way to get it into committee.

Basically I support the aim of the bill. I want to make it perfectly clear that the way to achieving that aim should be modified. Some views have been put forward indicating that the bill is unduly burdensome on the industry and that it has a narrow focus when broad based measures are needed to ensure a level playing field for industry while protecting the privacy of Canadians.

Let us deal with the issue of it being unduly burdensome. The bill, and I am not saying it cannot be amended, would require that each time a mailing list is sold would necessitate notification and individual consent. More flexible approaches have been suggested such as the one using a combination of general principles and legislation coupled with industry self–regulation.

Another concern that has been put forward is about the focus of the bill being too narrow at this time. As the bill is written now it applies only to the sale of lists containing personal information when in reality the normal business practice is the rental of such lists. The bill focuses narrowly on lists when a vast amount of personal data can be blended and put together from the consumer transactional data currently exchanged between firms or within a large organization. The definition of personal information provided in the bill is unduly narrow. It is more restrictive than the definition of personal information found in the federal Privacy Act.

Also the bill only applies to corporations when mailing list information is often transferred between individual proprietorships and partnerships that are not organized into corporate forms. That can be fixed also.

Bill C–315 applies to the narrow range of corporations engaging in a federally regulated activity. As used in the bill, federally regulated corporations would include, most notably, those firms operating in the interprovincial and international transportation sectors: broadcasting, telecommunications and the banking industry. Needless to say, many corporations and sectors are exchanging personal data that fall outside these delineated categories.

The effect of the bill is to protect consumers in a narrow range of circumstances from a narrow range of commercial actors in a burdensome fashion without any co–ordination or harmonization with other current or proposed privacy initiatives. If passed in its current form, the result would not be a level playing field of the clear and consistent privacy rules applying to all sectors but a patchwork quilt of uneven privacy obligations from sector to sector, firm to firm, and jurisdiction to jurisdiction.

Other initiatives currently under way might provide a better approach. At least we can listen to some other initiatives. We are currently studying the options, as the hon. member knows. Most notable is the Canadian Standards Association model privacy code ratified in September by a committee consisting of a broad cross section of consumer, private sector and government representatives including Industry Canada's office of consumer affairs, Spectrum Information Technologies and telecommunications units.

Three years in the making the model code sets out 10 principles governing how personal information should be collected, retained, kept up to date, used and disclosed by the private sector. Adoption of the code by firms using mailing lists would tend to ensure that consumers are informed of the existence of such lists and are given the opportunity to consent to their use and to verify their accuracy.

• (1755)

The code is voluntary in nature but a number of different parties have suggested that it could become the basis for flexible framework legislation, leaving it to industry sectors to determine how they would meet the CSA, the Canadian standards.

The CSA code provides a clear example of the commitment and ability of consumer groups, the private sector and governments to work together to develop privacy protection solutions. As the member mentioned in his speech, the Information Highway Advisory Council recommended a broad based, flexible privacy framework legislation drawing on the CSA model code as a basis. We have also received a recommendation from the Canadian Direct Marketing Association urging the creation of a flexible national privacy framework legislation using the CSA model privacy code as a basis.

The essence of both recommendations is the recognition of the need for coherent national privacy standards, protecting the consumer while providing the private sector with a flexible and level playing field.

The member has done a lot of terrific work on the legislation. We have heard him put forward many good ideas in his speech. Over the next while we will have to review the bill to see if there is some way to make some of the necessary amendments.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C–315, entitled the protection of personal information obtained by certain corporations act, sponsored by my colleague from Cariboo—Chilcotin. The bill seeks to enhance the protection of every citizen's right to privacy. Each and every citizen has a right to privacy that protects any confidential information.

Personal information is much more than data, much more than a simple product. It is the essence of who we are and defines our uniqueness. It not only describes the facts but the nuances of our life patterns and our choices. The importance of the right to protect that individuality is a measure of the importance of the individual in society.

The right to privacy is well established in our constitutional and legal history. It is recognized in our common law and has been recognized to be included in the charter of rights and freedoms. In Canada we value privacy to such an extent that we established a Privacy Commissioner of Canada in 1983. There are also provincial and territorial privacy commissioners including in my home province of British Columbia.

The importance of privacy for individuals and Canadian families is shown in that through 1994 and 1995 the federal office of the privacy commissioner processed over 1,300 investigations and dealt with over 10,000 inquiries from the public.

I should like to focus on the relationship between privacy, family and our current laws. Family is the fundamental building block in our society. It is the family that provides the social cohesion necessary for stability and prosperity in society. Many things are needed to promote and provide stability for families. Privacy is one of the essential elements needed to ensure inviolability of the home.

Increasingly, though, the family home is being subjected to intrusion from a number of sources. The age of contemporary information technology has meant that personal and confidential information has entered into the public realm with little or no safeguards established to protect the use and distribution of the information. With technology, data collection and assimilation become easier and less subject to scrutiny. Information from a multitude of sources can be accumulated, cross–referenced, and misrepresented with increasing facility and speed. While the public becomes increasingly conscious of uncontrolled information flow, they worry that the knowledge may lead to manipulation and intervention into their lives.

There is increasing public unease over the issues surrounding privacy. Almost 90 per cent of Canadians recently replied that they are concerned about their privacy. There is a mounting public pressure to initiate greater control to prevent abuse.

Of course the single largest collector of information on people is the government itself. We have legislation in place to attempt to control that information through the Privacy Act. A quick look at the statistics from the privacy commissioner is meaningful. According to the 1994–95 privacy commissioner's annual report, the number of complaints increased over 38 per cent from the previous year. The number of inquiries has risen from just over 1,000 in 1985 to nearly 10,000 in 1995.

The use of the multiple information database can construct a complete information profile on an individual or that individual's family. It can contain everything from their name to their age to their political affiliation, military service, and even information about related family members. As my colleague mentioned, it can contain the stores you shop at, the kinds of food you eat, and perhaps even your medical history.

The privacy commissioner has estimated that the average Canadian's name is processed through a computer five to ten times on a daily basis. I believe it is crucial for us to take the measures that are necessary to safeguard the privacy of individuals and their families. I believe Bill C–315 will do much to assist that.

Under the federal Privacy Act only government departments, ministries of state, and certain federal institutions are covered. This bill would expand those privacy laws by increasing protection to include federally regulated institutions. This bill would require that those companies that fall under the jurisdiction of the federal Canada Labour Code notify an individual whose personal information will be sold as part of a list to another corporation or client. It would also require that the individual concerned give their permission if they want their name on the list. This notice would outline the source of the personal information, a description of the information held, and a statement that the individual can have their name removed from the list at no cost to them. If an individual requests that his or her name be removed from the list, then the company concerned will be required to comply with that request within ten days and send a confirmation of that removal to the individual concerned.

This bill expands protection by amending section 2 of the Canada Labour Code to include banks, radio broadcasting companies, air transportation companies, any shipping lines that operate between provinces or between Canada and another country, any company involved in the railway, canal, telegraph, or other industries linking provinces, and any work identified under the Canada Labour Code or deemed for the general advantage of Canada. All these fall under federal jurisdiction and are federally regulated.

The dilemma of privacy issues has been all too common in our news lately. The news stories illustrate the tension that exists between cost efficiencies and the protection of the integrity of information for the protection of the individual.

For example, in my province of B.C. the provincial jurisdiction of privacy limits was recently tested with the introduction of a database on prescription drug usage. This program was introduced in the name of cost efficiency in the ever–diminishing health care system funding and for the health benefit of preventing incompatible or dangerous prescription overlap. However, there was a huge public outcry that the privacy of citizens would be threatened by the potential misuse of this database. The government did set about to dispel those fears and in fact has come up with some instructive examples of safeguards for a shared database.

I want to draw to the attention of the House a statement by the B.C. privacy commissioner, Dave Flaherty, who said that too many people have too much access to too much information on the computer system. That pretty well sums up much of the problem of all the world as we proceed with this privacy debate.

The banks are probably one of the largest non–governmental processors of private information and are also one of the strongest resisters to privacy legislation. They maintain that their voluntary code should be sufficient. There have been noteworthy attempts in all sectors to voluntarily protect the privacy of information. In addition to initiatives by the banks, in 1993 the Canadian Direct Mail Association adopted a compulsory code of conduct for its members.

• (1805)

I commend those in the private sector for voluntary measures they have taken. However, it is interesting to note that one of the largest public outcries to the privacy commission was as a result of a recent Visa gold card application of the Royal Bank. Typically, banks require a social insurance number specifically and solely for the issuance of interest statements under the Income Tax Act. Unfortunately, the Royal Bank's recent request for consent was far broader. It reads: "If I have ever given you my social insurance number you may treat it as information and use it as an aid to identify me with credit bureaus and other parties. Even if I am no longer your client or this agreement terminates, you may keep information in your records and use it for the purposes noted above."

It is such liberties that make the unbiased and arm's length controls of information necessary. With banking institutions offering services in diverse fields of deposit taking, trust processing, securities and insurance subsidiaries, it is necessary that the interests of the consumers and the marketplace be protected by comprehensive guidelines.

Potential for abuses must be recognized both in what services are allowed and in the regulation of the privacy of the information that is collected. With legislative rules and penalties there will come a predictable and enforceable protection for citizens.

Like all government initiatives, privacy regulation involves cost. Quebec introduced privacy legislation in the private sector two years ago. The Quebec experience would seem to indicate that their new private sector privacy commissioner has generated minimal resistance, very mild activity, with only 300 complaints, and minimal cost. This would seem to indicate that there can be an ongoing affordable privacy control within the private sector.

Ideally, the federal system should be designed to be self–funding if possible. The one question I would have of my colleague's proposal is the possibility of cost recovery for the program. The penalties imposed on large institutions seem small and may not serve either as a deterrent or be cost effective.

The challenge of protection of the right to privacy is great. The growth of that challenge will be exponential as new technologies and falling international, provincial, and private borders become more and more a reality, not only in the marketplace but in our homes. Government and voluntary attention must be given to this crucial concern.

Today I urge my colleagues from all parties to support my colleague on Bill C–315.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before I resume debate, there has been an oversight by the Chair. In the normal practice of private members' hour on the first round I would see if a member from each of the official parties was seeking the floor and then revert to the normal procedure of government, opposition, and so on. An oversight caused me to fail to recognize a member from the Bloc Quebecois on the first round. I will now go to the hon. member for Drummond and then I will look to the government side, if in fact one should choose to speak. That will bring us approximately to the conclusion of the first hour of debate.

If there should be any questions, feel free to approach me at the chair and I will explain it further with the appropriate time allocations that have been distributed evenly this evening.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to speak to Bill C–315 standing in the name of the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin.

The purpose of this bill is to complement the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals with respect to personal information about themselves obtained by certain corporations. It is part of a debate that has been going on for several years about the best way to protect personal information obtained or held by federally regulated private corporations.

In the public sector, the federal Privacy Act already protects employees and the public against abuse of this information. However, this legislation does not in any way affect the activities of private companies that are subject to the Canada Labour Code. The latter are therefore free to act as they see fit.

• (1810)

Although it is certainly not my purpose to point an accusing finger, we must admit that in some cases, this could lead to abuse both unpleasant and unfortunate.

In Quebec, as the hon. member pointed out on first reading of this bill, a number of unique legislative measures were introduced to improve the protection of personal information. In fact, Quebec's Civil Code deals with the issue of protecting individual privacy, which provisions came into force by a decision of the National Assembly in 1993.

The Commission d'accès à l'information, chaired by the former director of Le Devoir, is responsible for implementation of the various provisions included in the Act respecting access to documents held by public bodies and the protection of personal information. Finally, since 1994 the same commission has been responsible for implementing legislation on the protection of information in the private sector.

This goes to show that the protection of personal information, both in the private and public sectors, requires considerable co–ordination between the various acts and regulations and the activities of those responsible for compliance and enforcement. Although I did not say so explicitly, it is of course not easy to protect privacy fully and effectively. In this respect, Bill C–315 may seem to be somewhat lacking.

First, in its present form Bill C–315 regulates only the sale of lists. These lists of names containing personal and confidential information could therefore be lent or given away without breaking the law. Since these are still the same lists with the same information, it seems to me that the mere fact of passing them on to various organizations, for purposes for which they were not intended initially, should be prohibited and punished in the same way, whether or not any money changed hands.

Another aspect I think is unsatisfactory is the description or enumeration of what constitutes personal information. As we read the bill, we see that information as important as mother tongue, place of birth, sexual orientation and political affiliation is not included. Does this mean that this kind of information is not important enough to warrant protection? It would be important, in my opinion, for all information liable to trafficking, or rather to commerce, to be protected.

Another point: Bill C–315 deals with the transmission of lists containing personal information. This implies that any entrepreneur so desiring may, in total legality, sell information concerning one individual without risking any sanction. This point, in my opinion, constitutes a significant glitch in the very principle the bill is defending.

Before I conclude, looking at the sanctions set out in the bill, it will be seen that fines for noncompliance range from $5,000 to $10,000. To large companies, which generally have fairly sizeable lists, these fines do not mean much, particularly when we know the price a list containing confidential personal information can command.

There is no point here in continuing to examine Bill C–315 line by line. Merely reading its contents, plus a proper knowledge of the situation it is trying to control, is enough to understand that this bill, although well intentioned, is far from being equal to the objective it has set itself. There are many shortcomings in this bill. A number of amendments could be made to it. It seems to us that the best way of ensuring a complement to the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of Canadians might have been to follow the same path as the new Quebec Civil Code. However, since the bill represents at least a small step forward, the Bloc will support it.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I applaud the efforts of the hon. member to address a practice that is of concern to many consumers. He and I are two of them.

It is certainly true that when we speak about the problems of protecting personal information, probably at the top of the list are complaints and calls by telemarketing firms that usually call at the dinner hour and follow those calls up with unwanted flyers and advertisements.

While I agree with the spirit of the bill, I have discovered that it has its gaps. It is also cumbersome and overly restrictive, particularly in light of the more broadly based and flexible options that are currently on the table. I will get back to that in just a moment.

As part of a global economy, we can expect that cross–border consumer transactions will of course only increase, and with them a related growth in direct to home sales of the type that make regular use of mail lists in order to gain access into Canadian homes.

Mailing lists, when combined with other transaction related databases such as credit ratings and financial accounts, can be assembled into profiles of individuals. These records can cross national borders, be exchanged, resold, reused, or integrated with other databases often without consent or remuneration for purposes unrelated to those for which the data was originally collected.

In some ways this type of information sharing can be beneficial to Canadians in the sense of targeting marketing of services and products to consumers with particular interests in particular items. However, consumers are frustrated and angry when subjected to perceived intrusions by commercial interests into their personal domain.

Personal information privacy is an issue of considerable importance to Canadians. I have a copy of a survey released earlier this month, October 5 to be exact, conducted on behalf of two Canadian consumer groups, indicating that 90 per cent of consumers are concerned about personal information being shared between private firms. However, that same survey also suggests that consumers do not want any additional burdens imposed on them in order to protect their privacy.

While I think my friend across the way has presented some good ideas, and my colleague for Broadview—Greenwood has suggested that a bit of tweaking in the bill might find some favourable response, the approach adopted in this particular bill is truly highly restrictive and even burdensome.

The bill would require that an organization notify each individual on a mailing list each time the list is sold to another organization and then ensure that an individual's consent has been received. In addition, it requires that the organization buying the list also notify the same individual that their name has been obtained. Organizations would have up to 10 days to comply with the requests from individuals to have their names or certain elements of information removed from the lists. Fines for repeat offenders, if I heard it correctly, can reach $10,000 or more.

Not only is this burdensome for the consumers, preventing them from consenting to occasional mailing list exchanges between firms in prearranged circumstances, it is also burdensome to individual firms. More often than not, increased burden to firms translates of course into increased costs for products and services ultimately paid for by, guess who, the consumer.

Bill C–315 also has a number of gaps in the following areas. First, it applies only to the sale of lists containing personal information, when in reality the normal business practice is the rental of such lists.

Second, the bill focuses narrowly on the lists, when in fact a vast amount of personal data can be blended and put together from the type of consumer transactional data currently exchanged between firms or within a large organization.

Third, the definition of personal information provided in this bill is narrow and more restricted than the definition of personal information found in the federal Privacy Act.

Fourth, the bill applies only to corporations when in fact mailing list information is often transferred between individual proprietorships and partnerships that are not organized into corporate forms.

• (1820)

Fifth, Bill C–315 applies only to that narrow range of corporations engaging in a federally regulated activity. As used in the bill, federally regulated corporations would include those firms operating in the interprovincial and international transportation sectors, broadcasting, telecommunications, and banking. Needless to say, there are many corporations and sectors exchanging personal data that fall outside of those categories.

The effect of the bill then is to protect consumers in a narrow range of circumstances from a narrow range of commercial entities in a restrictive and even burdensome fashion without any co–ordination or harmonization with other current or proposed privacy initiatives. If passed the result would be a patchwork quilt of uneven privacy obligations.

The hon. member might not be aware of other positive initiatives that are currently under way. I think some of them have already been referred to by my colleague, the member for Broadview—Greenwood. I do not know if the hon. member is familiar with the Canadian Standards Association model privacy code. It was ratified last month by a committee consisting of a broad cross–section of consumer, private sector, and government representatives, including Industry Canada's office of consumer affairs and spectrum information technologies and telecommunications units.

Three years in the making, the model code sets out 10 principles governing how personal information should be collected, retained, kept up to date, used, disclosed by the private sector. Adoption of the code by firms using mailing lists would tend to ensure that consumers are informed of the existence of such lists and given the opportunity to consent to their use and verify their accuracy.

The CSA code provides a clear example of the commitment and ability of consumer groups, the private sector, and governments to work together to develop privacy protection solutions. The Minister of Industry is currently considering the recommendations of the Information Highway Advisory Council, which reported to him September 27. Among other issues, the Information Highway Advisory Council addressed the privacy implications of interactive converging telecommunications and information technologies.

The Information Highway Advisory Council stated: "In order for consumers and users to benefit from electronic information networks, there is a need for a coherent national standard as to what constitutes effective privacy protection in an electronic environment among business, consumer organizations, and governments. The council believes that such a standard can be best achieved through legislation".

As well, the council stated that the federal government must take leadership through the creation of a level playing field for the protection of personal information on the information highway by developing and implementing a flexible legislative framework for both the public and private sectors. The legislation would require sectors or organizations to meet the standards of the CSA model code while allowing the flexibility to determine how they will refine their own codes.

The minister has also received a recommendation from the Canadian Direct Marketing Association urging the creation of flexible national privacy framework legislation using the CSA model privacy code as a basis. I am reiterating the CSA's model privacy code as the basis for these different approaches, but that seems to be the foundation for those approaches. The essence of both these recommendations is recognition of the need for coherent national privacy standards, protecting the consumer while providing the private sector with flexibility and that level playing field we have been speaking of. The CSA model privacy code represents a potential basis for development of flexible national standards.

I am in agreement with the spirit of Bill C–315 as put forward by our colleague opposite and I can applaud the efforts of the hon. member in this regard. However, because of the gaps and some inconsistency for the national perspective and some of the burdensome regulations that are addressed in the bill, I cannot support its contents.

All of us have characteristics and facts about us which are of interest to many people. I cannot begin talking about all the information private firms would like to have about us without also thinking of that vast array of information the government has about us. We know of some of the abuses of that information, its lack of accuracy and its inaccessibility to the individual in order to check its accuracy.

There was a very interesting case about which I will not divulge all the details. As a member of Parliament, I was approached by an individual who was caught in a cross web of government databases. Before he knew what was going on, he was having some very serious problems with the government. The government thought there was money owing on a student loan account but there was not. It took a lot of work to get that straightened out. The information was wrong. He had a lot of trouble finding out what information the government had on him. Information was missing. The government said that because it did not have that information, what he was alleging was not true. It went on and on.

The same thing is true with data which is gathered by private firms in order to know more about us. To a degree, I agree with this. There is a value for organizations like financial institutions to maintain databases. It protects us. That is if the databases are properly managed and there is accountability built into the system.

For example, I do not think credit ratings are all wrong. I like the ability of applying for a loan and receiving speedy service. That is only possible because businesses can very quickly check whether I paid my last loan. If they could not do that quickly and reliably then of course it would take them longer to check it out.

Also, as a consumer I could end up paying for more people who take loans and then disappear without paying for them. With the modern database systems it is possible to find out a person's history and consequently deny that person a loan because of his unreliability in repaying. As a person who pays interest to financial institutions I could then be spared the cost of picking up the tab for both the principal and the interest which was lost.

There is some merit to this but certainly as in many other areas, whether it is government or corporations, there needs to be accountability. We ought to look very seriously at the proposed bill in terms of the accountability and accessibility it would provide to a person who wants to find out what is known about him.

The government likes to have all kinds of data on us, income tax information, where we earned our money, how much, how much we gave to charity and all the details of our personal financial lives. These data need to be accurate. Like government, organizations like to keep census. They like to know everything about us, our religion, how many children we have. They want to know whether we own or rent our residence. They want to know whether other people live with us. On and on it goes. There definitely needs to be a limitation on business and government on how much data can be gathered.

• (1830)

In order to make this efficient there should be a procedure where individuals give consent at the time of giving the information or where they may refuse it. Although the private member's bill says the firm which proposes to sell a list needs to check with the individual on the list to gain permission, it would be much better if each database were flagged. If I indicate at the time I give information that my name is not to be passed on to another buyer of the list, it could simply be another field in the database. Then that information would not be given and it would not incur the cost the hon. member opposite was complaining about.

Certainly to mail consent forms to thousands of people on a list would be very costly. This could be done in advance and would protect individuals from having their data circulated all over.

I was able to find a few examples of people who use databases incorrectly. Many of us are now involved with the Internet. I remember when I first signed on with the firm I am using, at the top I was asked: "Do you give permission for your name and your Internet address to be in the database that is searched by other members?" I gave permission because I want people to be able to find me. If they look for my name in the city where I live, my name and my Internet address will come up.

There have been some serious examples of breaches of this principle. An example to which I take great offence is from New Zealand. A chocolate factory there obtained a client's list from a weight reduction clinic and used that client list to produce some personalized advertising for their chocolates. That is an unfair intrusion into a part of the population that might have a weakness in that regard. That type of thing also needs to be prohibited. Of course there have been many cases of people who have used databases for illegal purposes.

It is most important that consent be given either in advance or at some future time before the data are passed on to another firm or another business.

I had a very interesting example of my name coming up. I received a brochure that was mailed to me. It had my name and my correct address. When I opened it I was amazed to find out it was totally in French. Unfortunately I do not speak French, I wish I did. I could not understand it but I could figure out that it had to do with a contest. There was a picture of a new car. I thought: "This has to be my lucky day. They have written me a personal letter to tell me that I have won this car".

I wrote a letter back and apologized for not knowing the language. I also told them that clearly from what information I could gather I had won this new vehicle and I would be very willing at their convenience to show up at the specified place to collect it. I thanked them greatly for that.

That is a very dramatic way to emphasize it but I knew that I had to do something that was really spectacular in order to get their attention because of other situations where I have received information and could not get off the mailing list. I tried and I could not. I wrote a letter and the mail kept coming. It seems these data lists go from one owner to another and even though the last purchaser may purge the list of my name, the next week the parent corporation sends an update of the list and my name appears again. It is virtually impossible to find out from where the name originates because these lists are passed from one firm to another to another.

I commend my colleague for this bill. It certainly points out a need. I am not sure that in all details it totally answers the question.

I would like to see that little amendment to give a disclaimer or a refusal to pass on the information at the time of giving information. In general the principle of the bill is sound and I am glad to support it.

SMALL BUSINESS LOANS ACT

The House resumed from October 26, consideration of the motion that Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege for me, as the member for London—Middlesex, to address the House of Commons this morning on a very important subject, Bill C–99.

[English]

I am very pleased to speak on Bill C–99 this morning as the member for London—Middlesex. We like to think that London is the unofficial capital of southwestern Ontario. Our business community is quite diverse, with small business being an important part of it.

With Your Honour's indulgence, I must confess that as you called for a moment of silence this morning my thoughts then and even now are with people from all across Canada and many people from the London area. I know my staff worked very hard to organize 11 buses from London and area. They are on their way to la belle province of Quebec to tell the people there how much we understand that they face a very crucial decision and that our prayers and our hopes are that they will remain a part of Canada.

It is with some mixed thoughts that I stand this morning to speak on the subject of Bill C–99 when frankly I would like to be with friends and fellow Canadians from all parts of Canada who are on their way to Quebec to make it clear to our fellow Canadians in Quebec that we sincerely hope they will continue the partnership in the great country we have built together. I did not feel that I could launch into debate on Bill C–99 without sharing a few personal thoughts.

Bill C–99 is very important. It continues the process of modernization and improvement that has moved the Small Business Loans Act program to a full cost recovery. We could ask ourselves what is so important about the bill since we deal with so much legislation in the House and most of it, if not all of it, is important and significant. I believe it is particularly important given that we are discussing it at the end of 1995 and as parliamentarians we face the enormous challenge of trying to help the country prepare for the 21st century. As I have already said, we certainly hope it will be a united country that heads into the 21st century with all members of the family intact.

We obviously need an economic recovery. We have made some steps in the right direction toward it over the past couple of years. Quite candidly, we have had some backward steps in that regard. It has not been a steady progression forward as we would all like. It has been a two steps forward one step back process. However we must continue and we must persist in an economic recovery as we prepare the nation for the 21st century.

There is no area of greater importance in my mind as a Canadian and as a member of Parliament than the area of small business. In times past we would lure a large employer to a community who would create 1,000 jobs. It seems appropriate to use a baseball analogy with the World Series going on. We used to look for the grand slam home run in economic terms in wanting a major employer. I have several in my riding such as General Motors Diesel and 3M, to name two.

The days are gone of attracting major employers to our cities, except for rare circumstances. We will not see situations in which we instantly gain 500, 1,000 or more jobs. It seems evident that our number one crisis is the job crisis. The debt and deficit are very crucial. My colleagues opposite certainly know that, as they speak to it all of the time. While we may differ on the pace of the deficit reduction as part of economic recovery, I do not think we differ on the goal.

In spite of the importance of the debt and deficit, the number one crisis in the country we all love is the inadequate number of jobs. The best way to solve that crisis is through encouraging small business. It will be through new small businesses starting up and employing three, five, ten or twenty Canadians that we will create new employment. We would love to see the large corporations coming in and suddenly creating 1,000 jobs, but I do not think we will see that happen too often.

The evidence is clear that Canadians can succeed in small businesses but they need help. That is what the act is specifically designed to do. In my riding many women, for example, have shown great entrepreneurial spirit, have launched small businesses, have been successful in that regard and have employed three to five people who before were unemployed.

There is a fairly significant immigrant population in my riding. There are many Arab Canadians and a large Polish Canadian community, people from all parts of the world. I see evidence time and again of how immigrant Canadians come to Canada and successfully launch new businesses, despite the xenophobia Canadians are from time to time perhaps prone to engage in. I can give many examples where new Canadians have come to Canada, started businesses and employed three to five Canadians who were born here in their quite successful businesses. The evidence is there that small business will really be key to economic recovery and to solving the jobs crisis in Canada. That is not totally new but it is much more obvious to us now that it will be the case.

Since 1961 more than 400,000 SBLA loans totalling close to $16 billion have been made by financial institutions to small businesses. The SBLA helps entrepreneurs whose firms have less than $5 million in annual sales.

I should like to speak about that number for a moment. Within my party there has been considerable discussion about this subject. None of the businesses that I referred to earlier do $5 million in annual sales. Some small businesses of three, four, five or ten employees do not do $5 million a year in business. We might have to look at that number as we fine tune. What is a small business? Does it need sales of up to $4.5 million to $5 million to be considered a small business? I think not. We should have a look at that definition.

The program success both as an economic development tool and as an example of public and private sector co–operation has inspired similar guaranteed programs at both the federal and provincial levels. The program will engender new approaches to encourage small business in Canada. That will be one of its most important purposes.

I will share with my colleagues in the House today—we are not as numerous as normal because many of our colleagues are on their way to or already in Montreal to make their feelings known about Canada—that the city of London has two important initiatives in the area of small business worth mentioning. The first is the advanced manufacturing technology centre that we hope will soon come to fruition. The groundwork has been laid. It is our government that announced it. It looks like we might have to scale it back somewhat because of the economic times we face.

However, at the research park at the University of Western Ontario in the city of London we are awaiting very anxiously, along with municipal and provincial government officials, the completion of the advance manufacturing technology centre. It will be located in an existing research park and will be a very important part of helping to encourage innovative technologies and business opportunities as it combines with research opportunities available at the university right now.

There has been quite a bit of time spent on the project. It will come to fruition soon and is anxiously awaited in London. I have been very pleased to spend quite a bit of time working on the project along with my colleagues in London. It will be a big benefit not only to London, Ontario, but to the whole region of southwestern Ontario.

In southwestern Ontario the agri–food industry is a major industry. We ought not to forget there are many opportunities in urban centres and in the agri–food industry for small business. The centre is awaited with anticipation.

The second successful venture that has been under way for several years in the riding of London—Middlesex is a small business centre just inside the eastern part of the city of London. It is a converted plant that closed some years ago. It was formerly called Prototool. I remember it well, being that it was my first summer job. I was there recently for a ribbon cutting ceremony because they had refurbished and expanded the centre. I made the point that every time I went there, as much as I enjoyed it, it seemed as if I was going back to work.

• (1015)

The small business centre is located in the George Stewart building which was named in honour of a well known Londoner who has put many, many years into the facility. It is a business incubation centre. The centre helps those people who are starting up a business with one or two employees. These people need mentors. They certainly need start–up capital. They need the help which is available to them largely through the voluntary efforts of London's successful business people who are now mostly retired and are willing to help younger people launch small businesses. The small business centre in my riding of London—Middlesex has been very successful. It is an example of the type of program the SBLA meshes with very nicely.

I look forward to the visit of the industry minister to this centre in November. He will see firsthand the success we can have with this kind of program. It is an excellent example of why our government must continue to consider small business as a key part in our attempt to get the economy moving again.

In recent years the SBLA program had been running at an annual government cost of some $20 million to $30 million. Significant changes were made in April 1993. There was a major increase in activity from some $500 million to over $4 billion in 1994–95. In historical loss rates, this increase in lending was projected to cost over $100 million which was obviously a threat to the program in these economic times.

It is a very correct change to the program and a wise for the government to move to full cost recovery on this program. We might say it is a bit of a user pay concept, which we are seeing more of at all government levels. My previous government experience was at the municipal level in London, Ontario for 13 years. There is certainly a call for more of a user pay concept at all government levels.

I would never subscribe to the user pay concept for things like health care. Certainly we on this side of the House would not subscribe to the user pay concept in health care and in certain other fundamental core services which as Liberals we believe must be available to all Canadians regardless of their ability to pay. There is however a place for the user pay concept in our society.

Moving the SBLA program to full cost recovery is employing that concept. I applaud the effort of the government in that move. To this end, the government initiated a review of the program which included extensive consultations with major stakeholders representing both borrowers and lenders. Likewise we heard from the Standing Committee on Industry and the small business working committee. All of these groups were unanimous in recommending to the government that we proceed on a full cost recovery basis which is exactly how the government has responded.

Two major changes have been made through regulatory amendments which came into effect on April 1. First, a new 1.25 per cent annual fee was levied on each lender's average outstanding balance of SBLA loans made after March 31, 1995. Second, the maximum rate a lender can charge under the SBLA has been increased by 1.25 per cent to the prime interest rate plus 3 per cent for floating rate loans and to the residential mortgage rate plus 3 per cent for fixed rate loans.

Bill C–99 will continue the process of renewal by putting in place additional changes to the Small Business Loans Act. As I said at the start of my remarks, if we are to make a serious attempt at solving the job crisis and getting the economy moving again on a steady basis, we will have to focus our efforts on small business.

I applaud the government for the changes in the bill. It clearly indicates the intention of our government. That is what I am hearing from Canadians. In all parts of Canada people are speaking out with that kind of message. Certainly in my riding of London—Middlesex new business opportunities and job creation are happening in the smaller micro–firms with one to four employees. The government is moving in the right direction.

We need to consider what is a small business; $5 million dollars strikes a lot of people in business as a pretty big number to achieve. They would be thrilled with that, but they do something like $750,000 or $1 million worth of business each year. We have to continue to look at that number to determine exactly what constitutes a small business.

I want to say very clearly that this bill is a major step in the right direction. I am pleased as a member of the government to be part of the team which recognizes that we have to make this a priority.

[Translation]

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by thanking the hon. member for London—Middlesex for expressing these thoughts inspired by our prayers this morning. I share them. I think the people of Quebec are focused on this crucial moment in their lives and accept the mark of affection shown by anglophones today.

We are sure that this demonstration of affection, friendship and even love, as some were saying, will last more than one day. Indeed we are confident that this demonstration of love and friendship will last for more than one weekend and that the best way to ensure that it does is to accept and respect the decision of the people of Quebec and thus transform these marks of friendship into acceptance of a rewarding and effective partnership between our two nations.

As far as the bill is concerned, I must deplore one thing. It is true that the bill raised the maximum for small and medium size businesses. However, one of the main problems for job creation, especially in Quebec, is the fact that very small businesses do not have access to these loans because the criteria have become more restrictive.

We must not forget that nearly 90 per cent of all new jobs, according to the figures for Quebec, are created by very small and medium size businesses. They should be helped. These are not businesses that require start up capital in excess of $250,000, $500,000 or one million dollars.

Last month, I witnessed the birth of thirty or so very small businesses in my riding, started by people who were on unemployment insurance, people who had decided to take the initiative and create their own jobs, set up their own business. In the process, they created some forty new jobs, and they were able to get started thanks to loans which, in most cases, did not exceed $10,000.

In other words, what we need to help these small businesses is not a higher maximum. There was nothing wrong with the maximum. The problem is a lack of more flexible criteria that would give these very small businesses access to more readily available venture capital.

I do not think the bill makes any provision for this, although in some respects it is well intentioned. I think the bill will not do anything to promote very small businesses. I would appreciate the hon. member's comments.

Mr. O'Brien: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his comments.

He addressed the outpouring of affection—and concern of other Canadians that Quebec remain part of the Canadian family. He spoke about his wish that this would continue. I fully and completely support that as a francophone who for most of my life has understood and appreciated the importance of Quebec in this country.

Every chance I get I emphasize to people in my riding that we need to make clear that we understand and realize the importance of Quebec in this country. I can assure the hon. member that if the vote is a no vote, as I hope it will be, I will continue to say that after Monday. I applaud that sentiment.

I disagree with the hon. member about the need to forge a new partnership. I simply ask him and all Quebecers to reflect on the fact that we have had a successful partnership in Canada for a long time. Yes, we have had our problems. We have had our quarrels as families will, but we have been able to work through them. We have worked them out. It was not lightly or easily that Canada was recognized as the best country in the world in which to live.

I ask him and all Quebecers, as the Prime Minister has done much better than I can do, to reflect very carefully on the fact that together we have built the best country in the world. It would be a tremendous risk and gamble to vote to break up our family. I sincerely hope Quebecers will not do that when they vote on Monday.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the member for London—Middlesex speaking on Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act.

I conducted a survey of my constituents. In my householder I asked questions about increases in government spending. There were some increases in the area of regional development loans, particularly western diversification which affects my part of the country and also FORD–Q and ACOA.

People in my riding were very opposed to these loans being offered to regions outside of our area of the country. Even on loans granted through western diversification which affected them, there was about a 50–50 division on whether it was the right procedure.

I would like the member to comment on the problems loans based on regional development are causing in the country and perhaps some of the divisions we are dealing with in the referendum campaign which perhaps have been caused by the regional development approach. Maybe the better route would be to put more of our eggs into this type of basket, a national program. This would affect small business right across the country on the same basis with the same rules rather than dividing the dollars into regional development programs, often loans, particularly to Atlantic Canada through ACOA or to western Canada through WED.

Those programs are causing hard feelings. Western Canada has looked at ACOA and said it has not worked. We have been pumping regional development dollars either through grants or loans into Atlantic Canada and unemployment is rising in Atlantic Canada. We have been pumping dollars for regional development into Quebec and some Quebecers want to separate. We are hoping less than 50 per cent want to separate, but it is not creating national unity by putting dollars through grants or loans into regional development.

Would it not be better to put money into loan guarantees for small business or national programs? It might make us feel as if we are all playing on a level playing field rather than making people angry by dumping some money into western Canada, some into Atlantic Canada, some into Quebec and some into the north.

Mr. O'Brien: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my colleague's questions and comments on this program. I do not think he used the phrase but I think he is questioning the efficacy of the whole concept of regional economic expansion.

I come from southwestern Ontario, which is a rather successful part of Canada when we look at the full nation, although we certainly have some problems to solve such as unemployment. We are doing our best in that regard.

• (1030)

My colleague opposite comes from the province of Saskatchewan and he understands that his part of Canada is quite successful. However there are some problems as well.

The question my colleague puts is an either/or. Should we put all of our attention on to the small business loans approach or should we continue with the concept of sharing economically through a regional economic sharing of resources? Frankly, as a Canadian I reject the choice. I do not think it is an either/or. The answer to my colleague is that we should do both. I believe there is a place for both.

The people I represent by and large understand and appreciate that they are economically in an advantaged part of Canada. They are quite prepared and magnanimous enough to share with other Canadians as part of the price to pay to have a nation from coast to coast.

I will be candid and say that we had a little dispute recently about the idea of some workers coming from Cape Breton. The question was never where the people came from. We have thousands of Atlantic Canadians and Canadians from all other provinces living and contributing to the community. The only question was to what degree the trip would be subsidized.

As far as the concept of sharing and being open to Canadians to come to our city or sharing our resources with people from coast to coast, the people I represent endorse that. They see it as an important part of being a Canadian. It is a small price to pay to be part of the great nation we all live in.

The Speaker: That concludes the portion of the debate of 20–minute speeches and 10 minutes of questions and answers. What we are going into now—

[Translation]

From now on, those wishing to speak will have ten minutes, but there will be no questions and comments.

[English]

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today to support Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act. This legislation is just part of the whole Liberal approach to government.

Members may recall the current Liberal government was elected on a jobs and growth agenda as promised in the red book. Two years ago the government was given a mandate to revitalize Canada's economy. All Canadians, including the people of Quebec, are benefiting from these promises.

Our economy is still recovering from one of the worst recessions in our history. The recession was not only just a slowdown of our economy but a massive reorganization of how our economy operates. It has been a painful journey.

The previous government led us down this debt ridden path but we are getting Canada turned around and moving back toward prosperity. The Liberal government through its jobs and growth agenda is creating an economic atmosphere conducive to job creation. Over the last two years we have created approximately half a million full time jobs.

The main pillar of our approach is to reduce the deficit. By reducing the deficit the government will break the crutches that are slowing down our economy. The federal government, as we all know, is under tremendous financial strain. Some people criticize our cuts, they are not enough or they are too much. But the government is committed to a balanced and a realistic approach. In contrast, the third party proposes devastation through its plan to eliminate the deficit in three years. I am no economist but I know that such a plan is much too severe and would do more harm than good.

• (1035)

Our deficit reduction plan is based on credible analysis of our situation. We have instituted short term goals that have been reached. We are on the track to achieving this year's target of $32.7 billion. In next year's budget we will reach our election promise of a budget deficit of only 3 per cent of GDP.

It will not stop there. We will continue to set short term goals and before the end of the century we will see the light at the end of the tunnel.

The proposed amendments to the Small Business Loans Act follow our plan. Some may ask how. We did not call our red book "Creating Opportunity" for nothing. These amendments will create more opportunities for small and medium size businesses to access the capital they need.

More entrepreneurs will obtain loans to make their business dreams become a reality. Through these new private sector initiatives, made possible by the Small Business Loans Act and the proposed amendments in Bill C–99, new jobs will continue to be created.

As some of my colleagues have already pointed out, the Small Business Loans Act is not new. However, earlier this year we made regulatory changes to the act in order to make it more effective and accountable. Only those who truly need our assistance will receive it.

The fee structure introduced in April of this year serves to encourage those applicants who are more financially secure to seek capital loans directly from financial institutions without the federal guarantee. It will also provide an incentive for borrowers to down the road seek normal commercial financing as soon as possible.

This is consistent with the many other policies we have introduced. Our government believes that it must carefully review all government activities, to recognize areas where we can achieve our objectives more effectively.

We conducted one of the most, if not the most, extensive program reviews by any federal government. This is one of those areas and we have made some necessary changes. Due to the competitive environment of the financial sector, we believe that the new fee structure, whereby the administration fee is incorporated in the interest rate, will improve the effectiveness of the program.

A further step has been taken by the amendments contained in Bill C–99. We have already made the program more effective and accountable on the user side of it, but now our side must be streamlined. Bill C–99 addresses that matter. With the implementation of this bill, the program will be a full cost recovery program. As I mentioned earlier, we are reducing our deficit. It is through changes like these that allow us to reach our deficit targets.

We will also be improving the loan guarantee coverage for low volume lenders. This is an important aspect that should not be overlooked. Better coverage for the smaller lenders will strengthen our financial sector. These financial institutions may be small, but collectively they count for a significant portion of the loans administered by this program.

Previously these lenders in relative terms were vulnerable to a greater proportion of losses. Due to the existing regulations, these institutions were limited in the amount of losses that could be claimed to the federal government. The new provisions create a more equitable arrangement for these small lenders.

On Tuesday I heard some members from across the floor state that this bill violates the democratic process. On the contrary, extensive consultations were held to get the views of all sides of the issues. We reviewed the report of the Standing Committee on Industry. What more do they want? We listened to the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. We listened to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. We listened to the Canadian Bankers Association, to name a few. Through those consultations we obtained substantial support for proposed changes.

Furthermore, some of the provisions of this bill were a direct result of the report from the industry committee. Going back to the red book, we promised to regain the confidence of Canadians. We want Canadians to be able to believe in the political process.

Over the last two years we have been reintroducing integrity into the political process. Again, someone might ask how. It is by holding consultations with Canadians, by listening to Canadians, which is more than I can say for official opposition members. They are so busy listening to themselves that they cannot hear Canadians, including Quebecers, telling them they want Quebec to stay in Canada.

The Small Business Loans Act plays an important role in my province of Prince Edward Island. In the previous fiscal year loans under this program totalled $21.8 million. This is a substantial amount of money for a small province. Our economy is seasonal by nature. Any initiatives to create business operations that can counter the seasonal aspect of our economy are very welcome. Small firms wanting to expand can do so with financing under this program. Entrepreneurs with dreams of owning a successful business are given a chance under this program.

• (1040)

Our economy has an abundance of small and medium size firms. The Liberal government acknowledges this reality and knows how to address the concerns of Atlantic Canadians. When it comes to small business, a loans program is not the only solution. This is just part of a larger package. We have refocused our regional development programs on small businesses, in particular I am referring to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. ACOA has been instrumental in assisting small businesses in Atlantic Canada and it has done so through many varied ways.

I would like to point out a few recent activities of ACOA. Just last week ACOA hosted a delegation of trade representatives from the Russian federation. The delegates were here to pursue joint ventures between Russian and Atlantic Canadian firms. Among the topics discussed were geomatics, aquaculture, agriculture products and current trade activities in other sectors.

This is an important step for business in Atlantic Canada. We are becoming more aggressive in pursuing world markets and the Russian federation, although poor economically in many standards, is open for investment opportunities.

In September the Atlantic Canada Home Program was held in Halifax. The program was designed to take advantage of opportunities created by the deregulation of building standards in Japan which permits a wider range of home construction. Prince Edward Island was represented there by the provincial minister of economic development and tourism.

Canada is always searching for new markets to access throughout the world. Our economy is geared toward exports. Our relations within the global economy are helping to drive the Canadian economy.

The government is working with the private sector and the provincial governments to open up new markets abroad, to ensure that Canadian firms have access to markets they need to grow and create more jobs. We need to do all we can to assist in that aspect and Bill C–99 in part does just that. We are improving a federal program so that it can adjust to current demands and be more flexible to meet our future demands.

Last week, on the eve of small business week, the Association of Atlantic Women Business Owners hosted a conference, trade show and an Atlantic Hall of Fame for Women Entrepreneurs, a ceremony sponsored in part by ACOA. The theme of the conference was "New Markets and Opportunities for Growth".

To me that sounds a lot like our jobs and growth agenda. Is it not funny how our approach is similar to private enterprise? I believe that would suggest that we are going about our business in the correct fashion.

Earlier in the fall also in Halifax key stakeholders in the Atlantic Canada economy discussed the business support system for young entrepreneurs. This was hosted again by ACOA. It was designed to highlight the needs and challenges facing our young entrepreneurs and establish services to meet those needs as well as to encourage young people interested in starting their own businesses. These young people are the future of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for allowing me the time to speak in support of this bill because I believe it will give to the small business community the impetus it needs to get up and get going.

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to speak on Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act.

Along with my colleague from London—Middlesex this morning, I extend my thoughts to those people who have travelled from our various communities today to the heartland of Quebec, to Montreal. Our thoughts are with these people. We all share the same common sentiment that we want Quebec to remain a part of us and share the business climate we have in this country come Monday of next week.

As the member of Parliament for Huron—Bruce, representing a small yet mostly rural riding, I do not have large municipalities. I do not have large urban centres. The largest community in my constituency is the town of Goderich which has 8,000 people. In Goderich there are two main plants, which employ 900 people: Champion Road Machinery, a manufacturer of road graders and other roadbuilding equipment, and Sifto Salt Mines, which produces the third largest quantity of salt in North America.

• (1045)

As a rural constituency, the businesses we have are largely small in nature. Many of the businesses are agri–related. When I was elected to be the member of Parliament for Huron—Bruce, I believed, as do all members of the House, that we were elected to create a climate of employment in Canada. We spoke about jobs and growth. This bill goes a long way in helping us to achieve those goals.

How do we create jobs? Government cannot by itself create jobs. Government jobs are largely jobs that do not contribute to the GDP of our country. While government cannot create jobs, government can certainly create an environment in which business can grow and prosper. The importance of Bill C–99 is that it becomes another avenue for small business to access capital and operating moneys.

As I said earlier, I represent a small rural constituency. We have many resources in our riding. Most of them are rural agricultural resources: wheat, hogs, beef and all the other commodities we grow so well in Huron—Bruce. The riding produces more dollar value in agricultural products than any riding east of Winnipeg. I therefore speak with a great deal of pride about my riding this morning.

The greatest resources in any riding are the youth of our communities. When we closely examine the resource of youth we find that many of these young people upon completion of their secondary education move on to other communities. For the most part they leave to further their education and then go on to careers often in large urban centres simply because job opportunities are not as plentiful today as perhaps they were a decade ago, certainly not in small communities.

Some of these youth are now returning to their communities of origin simply because jobs in the urban centres are not as plentiful as they once were. The young people are returning to their communities, in some cases to enter into a partnership with a family business or to enter into a partnership with an established business. In some cases they are coming home to seek the future they have dreamed of, a career of choice based on and related to the training and educational background they have achieved.

This is where the banks and the lending institutions become involved. Allow me to give a personal example. About eight years ago our two sons had a dream. Upon completing their secondary education they wanted to pursue a business career. One of the first things they had to do was find the capital required to begin a business. That was the first experience. Of course they had to visit the bankers. They found that the bankers were not all in agreement with their dream. In many cases they were turned away. However, there was one banker who, because of his appreciation for young people, sensed that there might be merit in the dream and that it might go somewhere. He invited them in. He asked their father to sign a few papers and these two young men began a business.

It has been eight years since they began the business. They have realized their dream. The dream will continue. It was only six months after they had begun the business that they asked the banker to remove their father's name from the papers. People are realizing their dreams in the country. This is an example of what can happen when we take those dreams to the ultimate end. Now that they have established their business it is the bankers who are knocking on their door to see if they can lend them a bit of money.

• (1050)

My point is that the risk in doing anything is always great but I believe we have to take some of these risks. When I chose this position in Parliament I accepted a risk. I was walking away from a business that had given me 21 years of fruitful employment. My background in small business and in the agricultural sector gave me an appreciation for and insight into the borrowing needs of small business.

Early in my new career as a member of Parliament I quickly became aware of the inability of entrepreneurs to gain access to business capital. If there has been one area of frustration in my career as a politician it has been that of my being unable to resolve the matter of banks and small business.

A few months ago Bluewater Fibre Inc., with 150 employees in the northern part of my riding, found itself in the very untenable position of risking closure of its plant if a resolution of a border tax was not found. To the credit of the Minister of Finance's department, this issue was resolved and the jobs of 150 people were ensured.

Another situation concerns Tackle Windpower, a manufacturer of rotor blades for windpower electricity generation, which just recently began manufacturing in Huron Park in the southern part of my riding. Before this company turned one employee hour in its plant it had $9.5 million in guaranteed orders for a product it was about to build, but it had difficulty in obtaining a $500,000 operating loan. Through much difficulty and a great deal of effort on the company's part and a small effort on my part, financing was finally procured. This company started with two, three, four employees, and has now reached 28 employees and is quickly moving to full employment of 70.

Stories like this go on and on. How many members here would have believed that so much of our time would be spent on helping small business achieve funding and financing?

There are two million small businesses in Canada, and 82 per cent of new jobs are created by small businesses. When one puts these numbers in perspective it puts a new importance on entrepreneurialism. If every small business would employ just one more person we would eliminate unemployment.

This is an important bill for two reasons: the increase in the maximum size of the loan to more accurately reflect the realities of doing business, and the movement of the SBLA to full cost recovery, a measure in keeping with our promises as a government to maintain fiscal management policies.

Given the extensive consultations with the major stakeholders, it is imperative that we seek swift passage of this bill for the benefit of all small businesses in Canada. I look forward to supporting this bill at a future time in the House.

[Translation]

The Speaker: The hon. member for St. Boniface has the floor. As you know, dear colleague, you will start your address and will finish it after question period. Agreed?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): So, Mr. Speaker, I shall have two speeches.

I am pleased to speak today on the Small Business Loans Act. I shall address the key principles rather than its details, which some of my colleagues with an in depth knowledge of this field have already done.

I wish to point out that this bill is part of a total strategy for supporting the growth of small businesses, particularly their access to capital. This must be clearly understood. We wish to provide more help to small businesses so that they may grow, have greater access to capital and thus create additional employment. We are very much aware that the bulk of jobs created over the past decade have been in small and medium size businesses. The figures indicate 85 to 90 per cent. This is very impressive.

This bill was proposed after much consultation with lenders and borrowers. It is not something that we just decided to impose. It is not something where we are just going ahead without consultation, without advice from all sides. We believe that the way to have an excellent bill, with a better chance of success, with a better chance of being accepted by those targeted by it, is to ensure that there have been consultations. This has been done country–wide with the groups I have referred to.

Another very important aspect of this bill is self–funding. Yes, costs will be higher, because we want it to be self–sustaining, but this is in keeping with two government policies. The first is to decrease grants and subsidies to business. We realize that, in today's reality, there is less financial flexibility and that we must reduce the costs of government. Reducing these financial supports to businesses is one way of being proactive and attaining that objective.

Another objective is reduction of the deficit and the debt. Since this program will be self–supporting, there will be less government money going to businesses. This will have a positive impact on the deficit and the debt. I must add that the new program will provide a better response to businesses needing funding. This is very important.

We are well aware that 30 or 40 per cent of businesses receiving assistance at this time can go to a bank or a caisse populaire and have their needs met by those institutions. So, if 30 or 40 per cent go elsewhere for solutions to their financial needs, more financial assistance will be getting to the businesses that need it.

I have spoken to a number of Manitoba businessmen and businesswomen in my riding and all have indicated to me that this was a step in the right direction. This is an example of a federal government initiative which is country–wide, an example of what we can do together. I will close on this and pick up where I left off later on.

The Speaker: It being 11 a.m. we will now proceed to Statements by Members.

[English]

I know this is a very special time for all of us but with all respect, should you be tempted to use what I call props, I would prefer that you did not.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

CANADIAN UNITY

Mrs. Carolyn Parrish (Mississauga West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, through a project called "Cher ami", 5,000 children in my riding of Mississauga West have written in French to the children of the province of Quebec in a gesture of friendship. They want to show that French is spoken all over Canada and that there is no such thing as "English Canada".

I will read today a few excerpts from the children's letters. From six–year–old Diane:

[Translation]

"Hello, my name is Diane. I am six years old. I like speaking French. I love Canada and Quebec."

[English]

From a grade eight student at St. Rose de Lima School:

[Translation]

"Dear friend, I love Canada, because I love the winter and the summer. I love Canada, because it is a multicultural country. It is important to have friends in Quebec, because that gives us a chance to learn about another culture".

[English]

If children can understand that fundamentally we belong together, so should we. Several hundred thousand people demonstrating in Montreal today also agree.

Mr. Speaker, I will respect your wishes and not lift this box of a thousand letters on to my desk.

The Speaker: I do thank you for that.

S. O. 31

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday constitutional lawyer Peter Hogg and former deputy minister of justice Ian Binnie appeared before the Senate justice committee on the gun control bill. These two respected lawyers stated unequivocally that the government has not consulted with the aboriginal people, as required by section 35 of the Constitution. According to this testimony the constitutional rights of the aboriginal people have been abrogated by the government. Bill C–68 will directly affect aboriginal treaty rights and therefore they should have been consulted.

• (1100)

Mr. Binnie went on to say that Bill C–68 indicates that the government did not consider how the legislation would affect aboriginal people and called it an abdication of their responsibility.

The justice minister states that Bill C–68 is a done deal. I suggest nothing could be further from the truth.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I speak on behalf of my colleague from Peterborough who lost his voice and on behalf of the people of St. Catharines.

Four buses, two from each city, two cities which normally compete with each other, today drive together to join people from all over Canada at the no rally in Montreal.

Today Canadians are voicing their opinion. They are in Montreal to say to Quebecers that they want to stay together, they want to stay united. They are also reminding Quebecers of the seriousness of the vote.

Canadians are asking Quebecers to say no to destroying our political union, to say no to destroying our economic union, to say no to destroying Canada as we know it and as it has existed for many years.

Keep the family together. On Monday vote no. As proud Canadians we say let us keep the country together. We join in spirit with our constituents in Montreal in saying our Canada includes Quebec.

JOHNNY MILES

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise today to offer birthday wishes to a great Canadian.

On October 30, Mr. Johnny Miles will be celebrating his 90th birthday. Mr. Miles is a two–time winner and the oldest surviving winner of the Boston Marathon.

As a native of Sydney Mines, Nova Scotia, and a current resident of Hamilton, Ontario, Mr. Miles has been a role model for generations of young athletes all across Canada.

He is a distinguished ambassador of Canadian amateur sport who has been honoured with the Order of Canada and inducted into the Nova Scotia and Canadian Sports Halls of Fame.

As a proud Canadian, Mr. Miles has said that nothing gives him greater pleasure than to do something for his country. We should all take pride in what this fine Canadian has achieved. I am sure my colleagues will want to join me in wishing him a very happy 90th birthday.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe passionately in this country and its citizens. Whether we belong to one of the three founding realities in Canada, the aboriginal people, the French or the English, or whether we hail from a group that chose to come to Canada to find a nation that provided hope and opportunity, we love our country.

This summer I visited communities in the Gaspe region of Quebec. I did not meet wild eyed separatists with an animosity toward Canada. Instead I met people who deeply respected Canada but were also proud of their distinct culture and traditions.

I will not raise the letter I have on my desk, but I have a letter signed by 65 seniors in my riding asking me to tell Quebecers to stay in Canada so that we may continue to be together in the world's best country.

The only way to do this is to vote no on Monday.

[Translation]

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Bob White, the most powerful union leader in Canada, warned Canadian political leaders against being vengeful following a victorious yes vote in the referendum on Monday. He called on them to act responsibly and to negotiate with Quebecers, saying that millions of Quebecers want a different relationship and different recognition by Canada, and so serious discussions will have to be undertaken.

Mr. White acknowledged that it was in Canadians' and Quebecers' interest to establish an economic and political partnership. Given the size of the stakes involved, it would probably not be hard to find support among business people to defend and promote a partnership with Quebec.

Quebecers will vote yes on Monday, confident in their ability to finally negotiate with their Canadian partners as one people with another.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today, we should express our true sentiments. People know where I stand, I support a no vote on Monday. I am for a French Quebec in a united Canada.

During this referendum campaign and since my election here, I have had the opportunity to improve my ability to speak the beautiful French language. I am very grateful indeed for the patience, tolerance and friendship of federalist and sovereignist Quebecers.

I think people are fortunate to be Quebecers. They are part of a large family. In my view, this family has long been divided by this national question. I hope that, whatever the outcome, the family will be reunited Monday evening after the vote.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Parti Quebecois claims it will save $3 billion in an independent Quebec through the elimination of the overlap and duplication of the federal system.

How does Premier Parizeau expect to achieve this objective when he is promising to hire the thousands of federal public servants living in Quebec? Premier Parizeau said in August of this year that an independent Quebec could not hire all the federal public servants working for the departments of Agriculture and of the Environment, for example, because Quebec's departments in these areas are already fully staffed.

The so–called promise the Government of Quebec is making to hire federal public servants living in Quebec reminds me of the generous collective agreements the Parti Quebecois accorded Quebec public servants prior to the 1980 referendum. Following the rejection of the referendum question, the Parti Quebecois government then cut provincial public servants' salaries by some 20 per cent. Federal public servants have therefore every reason to mistrust the Parti Quebecois promises.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today, the federal government and the Canadian establishment are putting all their power at the service of the No cause: a paid holiday for employees who want to attend the rally in Montreal, transportation services subsidized by the major Canadian carriers, and I could go on. Even Ottawa high school teachers are using school buses to send their students to the rally in Montreal.

As the director general of elections in Quebec reminded us, all these referendum related expenses by the federal government and private enterprise violate Quebec's referendum act, since any service that promotes a referendum option constitutes a regulated expense. The Liberal Party of Canada and the federal government are supporting these illegal referendum expenses.

This rally in Montreal was meant as a demonstration of love. Is it becoming a giant intimidation manoeuvre paid for with taxpayers' money, in defiance of the referendum act and of all Quebecers' idea of democracy?

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at this very moment, thousands upon thousands of Canadians from coast to coast are gathering at Place du Canada to join the most popular Prime Minister ever to lead the best country in the world.

In this great Canadian pilgrimage, hundreds of constituents from my riding of Mississauga East are opening their hearts to their friends and relatives in Quebec, going even further for a strong and united Canada.

Today's rally will show the rest of the world that the Canadian people are a great people whose warmth transcends any division in this united nation they love with all their heart.

Canadians are together and want to stay together because Quebec and Quebecers are at the heart of the Canadian dream.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to members across the way cry out with self–righteous and sanctimonious indignation about the need for a code to govern freedom of speech in the Chamber. Perhaps they should start with their own party.

Recent remarks made yesterday by the minister of fisheries and by the Deputy Prime Minister about members of the Reform Party have reached an all–time low. The Deputy Prime Minister stated publicly that the Reform Party wanted Quebec out of Confederation. This is not only totally untrue but it is so untrue that it is offensive. We are communicating in the newspapers with one million Quebecers this week on our proposals for decentralization which will contribute to national unity.

• (1110)

If the Deputy Prime Minister wishes to do something positive for national unity, she should stop misrepresenting the views of loyal Canadians.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the members of the Bloc Quebecois keep focusing on the past, and only on the negative aspects of the past. They do not remember the positive aspects, like what we have built together, what we have become collectively and the efforts made by many Canadians to give Quebecers opportunities and rights that no other province has.

I would like to inform this House that the constituents of my riding of Vancouver East and of every riding in this country, from Tofino to Signal Hill, including a large number of Quebecers, are saddened by the actions of those whose goal is to destroy Canada. On the other hand, you have people like the Prime Minister, who have been fighting for many years to make sure that all Canadians have equal rights.

Today, Canada is doing as well as any country with a huge territory, a small population and diverse needs can expect.

Canadians are fond of their country. They do not say it too often, but they are proud of the maple leaf, their passport, the freedom they enjoy and the respect they are shown everywhere else in the world by people who cannot understand—

The Speaker: I am sorry for interrupting. The hon. member for Shefford.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, just four days before the vote is held, the Prime Minister of Canada is still beating around the bush about recognizing the referendum results.

If 51 per cent of the population vote no, that is a good result, but if 51 per cent vote yes, that is a different story. The Prime Minister of Canada is out full time on the referendum campaign trail, and he will be voting on Monday. He is taking part in the referendum, yet he still refuses to commit to recognizing a yes victory.

There is nothing more democratic than a referendum in our society, and Quebecers will not tolerate having their choice put down.

On Monday, the majority of Quebecers will vote yes. This strong yes will show that they are united and stand as one. It will ensure that, as a sovereign people, their laws and values will be respected.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I stand today to add my voice to the chorus of voices ringing from coast to coast to coast calling for a united Canada.

Yesterday three 16–year old high school students from Russell, Manitoba landed in my office en route to Montreal for the no rally, hungry and tired. They had driven all night to get to Winnipeg to catch a plane to Montreal. They were spending their hard earned money to demonstrate how important their country is to them, how their country Canada includes Quebec.

The courage and commitment of these young people is a shining example of the belief western Canada has that a strong Canada is a united Canada. They represent the sentiments of thousands of Manitobans who could not make the journey but whose hearts are in Montreal today for their love of the greatest country in the world. Vive le Canada.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, separatists and traditional federalists say that it will be either black or white with the referendum, that is independence or status quo.

By contrast, the Reform Party pledged to renovate the Canadian home. You do not burn down a nice house just to get rid of a few cockroaches. You simply clean it.

Millions of Canadians, including many outside Quebec, have felt frustrated and threatened by the centralizing governments which have dominated our confederation by taking advantage of regional splits and claim that they were acting in the national interest.

• (1115)

A no vote in the referendum will open the door to a new decentralized Canada, patterned on the model proposed by the Reform Party, which is designed to give greater autonomy to the provinces.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at this important time in our history, we must remember that environmental issues know no political boundaries.

Federal initiatives such as the Fisheries Act and the Canadian Environmental Protection Act protect public health and all Canadians. For example, those who live close to the St. Lawrence River benefit a great deal from these laws. Indeed, since 1990, the federal government has spent millions of dollars to clean up the St. Lawrence River.

Moreover, the international agreements negotiated by Ottawa on acid rain have benefited all Quebecers. Consequently, those who take the environment seriously should reflect on the positive aspects of Canadian federalism, before casting their vote on October 30. Let us not forget these major federal initiatives.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, Mr. Bob White, said that Canadian workers should continue to maintain close ties with workers in Quebec the day after a yes vote and that negotiations with Quebec should start without delay.

Politicians in the rest of Canada should do likewise to ensure the stability of Canada and Quebec the day after a yes vote. Yesterday, the Prime Minister said that 50 per cent plus one was enough if it was a no but not if it was a yes.

My question is directed to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. How can the Prime Minister of Canada question the validity and outcome of this democratic exercise and go so far as to say that 50 per cent plus one is all right for a no but not for a yes?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we should recall that a few months ago, the Leader of the Opposition said clearly: "If it is yes, it is sovereignty; if it is no, we will do it again".

The Official Opposition should not be surprised if we say: "We expect it to be no". That would be the right answer, for Canadians who are now in Montreal to show their solidarity to Quebecers and for Quebecers who have gained so much from Confederation.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on this last sitting day of the House of Commons before the referendum, I think it would be appropriate for the minister to be accurate and direct in his answers to my questions.

He knows perfectly well that the Leader of the Opposition and all the people on the yes side have always said, on every occasion, that they would respect the verdict of the people, the outcome of this democratic process.

My question, and I would appreciate a straight answer, is this: Why, when it is about their side, does the Prime Minister seem unwilling to commit himself to respecting the democratic process, going so far as to say: "If those are the results for the no side, we agree, but if the same figures turn up for the yes side, we do not"? Let him explain that instead of trying to skirt the issue.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Roberval implies he has the right to make preambles in which he says things that are inaccurate, makes statements that do not correspond with the facts and indulges in innuendo directed at those involved in the campaign, as he just did in my case.

He seems to think we will be less than democratic as we explain our position. He should know better, considering his experience in the House.

• (1120)

We made it quite clear that we believe the no side will win and that Monday Quebecers will realize that separation is not the way to go, and that is why we are clearly indicating that with a no, we will be able to continue to implement reforms in Canada.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but the minister will not get off that easily. I am entitled to three questions, and so for the third time I will ask him to make his position clear to Quebecers, to set aside his customary arrogance we have seen enough of and give a clear answer to Quebecers.

Can the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, who is speaking on behalf of the government today, explain clearly, honestly and frankly how the Prime Minister of Canada can say: "Fifty per cent plus one for the no is fine. I can go along with that. Fifty per cent plus one for the yes, I am not sure". What explanation does he have for an attitude that is so obviously unacceptable? I would like an answer.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this day and the next few days are too important for us to waste our time responding to invective from the opposition. Their attitude is not very parliamentary.

On the fundamental issue, we have always said that we recognize the democratic right of Quebecers to vote in a referendum, but we have also clearly indicated our position and the fact that we believe the no side will win.

The Leader of the Opposition has indicated that if it is a no, he would not accept the outcome, so why does the hon. member for Roberval not talk to his own leader and tell him that his answer is not democratic because he does not accept the answer given by the people, while we believe our position is democratic, especially considering that 32 per cent of Quebecers have indicated that a yes vote means they very properly want the province of Quebec to remain a part of Canada.

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, I am sure that today, like all other days, we will always show respect in speaking to each other here in the House of Commons.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, let us make things perfectly clear. The Leader of the Opposition has said that he would respect the decision of the men and women of Quebec, which does not prevent our continuing to battle for our ideals as in 1980. René Lévesque kept his word, which the Prime Minister of Canada did not, and once again will not. If the minister cannot see the difference between continuing to fight for one's ideals and implementing a legal decision, he has a big problem, and it is not from the neck down.

The Prime Minister, who is seeing the choice of Quebecers being increasingly confirmed, has been quick to abandon the attitude of openmindedness and understanding adopted in his message to the nation, an attitude that is unusual for him, and has reverted to his true nature, menacing and vengeful toward Quebec.

My question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. Does the Prime Minister's attitude augur well for the day after the referendum, when we already see him threatening not to respect the result, the referendum verdict, showing his true colours as a non-respecter of democracy, allowing the Quebec referendum act to be violated with impunity, non-respecter of democracy that he is?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe that history speaks for itself and that our Prime Minster has shown over his thirty years in politics that he is a democrat. He has expressed his opinions clearly, expressed his options clearly, and has never backtracked; he has never changed political affiliations during his career; he continues to believe in the values in which he believed in the past; he has always defended both Quebec and Canada, and continues to do so.

The arguments of the Bloc and the PQ will not do anything to change reality. The reality is that our Prime Minister has defended both Quebec and Canada well, and will continue to do so. A no is a no, one which will again work in favour of Quebecers, and Quebecers will come to see that it is in their interests to continue to make the reforms and changes they want within the federation, as they did during the first quiet revolution.

• (1125)

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister has said two things that are true. First, the Prime Minister has not changed his opinion; he continues to mock Quebecers and to do things behind their backs. He has not changed. Second, when the minister tells us there will be a second quiet revolution, he is right and that revolution will start with a yes on Monday.

I am asking the minister how Quebecers can trust the Prime Minister when he engages in doubts and threats to force them to choose Canada, rather than admitting that the days following the yes vote have already been anticipated by the government, which will have to adopt a responsible attitude toward the international financial market for once, as Quebec certainly will?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Once again, Mr. Speaker, I think that no one will accuse our Prime Minister of not having made his thoughts clear, and of not having changed his way of thinking as he went along.

But I have a quote to offer to you, Mr. Speaker, and it is as follows:

[English]

"I am a Canadian. Who will doubt that? I was born a Canadian and we have been Canadians since 1636 in Quebec. I am very proud to be a Canadian."

[Translation]

In English, the quote is: "I am a Canadian. Who will doubt that? I was born a Canadian and we have been Canadians since 1636 in Quebec. I am very proud to be a Canadian". Who said this? Lucien Bouchard.

[English]

The Speaker: Once again I ask you not to refer to hon. members by their names but by their titles in the House. I know you will respect that.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, throughout the Quebec referendum campaign Reformers have made every effort to show Quebecers that Canada is open to real change, that is not founded in the exaggerated promises of the separatists and change that is not found in symbolic constitutional amendments.

We want a no vote on Monday to mean a mandate for a new Confederation, a decentralization of power and the reform of federal institutions. Reformers and provincial governments are going to work for those changes. The tens of thousands of Canadians who are going to Montreal will work for those changes.

On the eve of the Quebec vote, does the federal government have anything more substantive and constructive to say on its agenda for change, something that would persuade a soft sovereignist or a discontented federalist to vote no on October 30?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister has indicated on a number of occasions this week that he is ready to continue to implement change and to consider further change.

• (1130)

What he has said about the distinct society and the right of veto are important announcements in terms of constitutional change. What is as important is that a number of provinces, including Newfoundland, have now passed resolutions on distinct society to indicate their respect for the province of Quebec and their desire that they continue to work in a strong and united Canada.

In terms of non-constitutional change, which is as important, we have indicated in the budget that we are ready to revise programs and jurisdictions in order to let the level of government which is most efficient do the work. We intend to continue in that direction.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thought the minister might have said that one of the most important changes the government could initiate the morning after a no vote would be to start real reform of this institution, the House of Commons.

Canadians inside and outside Quebec want their priorities and their concerns to be better represented in the Chamber. That can be achieved through a simple government commitment to freer voting in the House and the exercise of less party discipline by the governing party. Are these the sort of practical and positive changes the government would be willing to vigorously pursue after a no vote on October 30?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the leader of the third party that we have to increase the amount of change we are making in this country.

I remind him again that we did program review and the budget downsized the government by 20 per cent. We started to reform the various programs in order to make the federal government more efficient. We indicated very clearly that we want to change and we want to listen to what Canadians tell us.

In terms of the House, I only have to indicate the reforms which have taken place to reduce its costs and increase its efficiency. We hope to continue in that direction.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the most compelling reason for making changes in the Chamber have been provided by the Quebec referendum debate.

Here we have a debate on the future of federalism and the country itself, but where has it occurred? Not directly, not forcefully, not thoroughly on the floor of the Chamber, but everywhere else. While the number one priority of the agenda of the people has been the future of their country, formal debate in the Chamber has focused on manganese as an additive to gasoline and the national horse act. That is why the House must change if the federal government is ever to lead change in the country.

Is the government open to changes in this institution so that the agenda of the people and the country becomes the agenda of the House?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the debate about the referendum has taken place mostly in Quebec because it is a Quebec referendum.

I certainly agree with the leader of the third party that all Canadians feel personally involved. I am especially happy to see that desire for involvement has finally been met by the huge rally which is presently taking place in Montreal. It shows that all Canadians from every part of the country consider that the choice being made in Quebec is the choice of their own country. That choice affects them personally and is one in which they want to have a voice.

I am proud so many people have found it possible to go to Montreal. They are expressing not only their love for Quebec and their desire to stay together but also their view that Quebecers and the rest of the Canadian population will be able to go through problems in the future much better if they stand together, which is what we hope will happen, than if they divide.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs earlier quoted Lucien Bouchard as saying he was proud to be a Canadian. He neglected, however, to add that this statement was made before Meech Lake, that is, before the hon. Jean Chrétien's fancy tactics to sabotage the accord.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Laurin: The hon. Prime Minister's, pardon me, Mr. Speaker.

• (1135)

The Speaker: Thank you, my dear colleague. You will address our colleagues by their proper and acceptable title here in the House.

Mr. Laurin: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry.

The director general of elections for Quebec, Pierre F. Côté, criticized those offering paid holidays or lower priced tickets for demonstrations in connection with the referendum debate. According to him, it is making a mockery of the Referendum Act, it is a real expression of contempt. He went on to say that this sort of behaviour encourages civil disobedience.

How could the federal government itself contravene the Quebec Referendum Act by allowing subtle arrangements to be made for its employees to be away from work in order to go to a demonstration in Montreal without loss of salary?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first, I will deal with part of the hon. member's opening remarks, when he talked about the statement by the Leader of the Opposition, which was made in 1988, that is, well after the start of the Meech Lake accord debate.

Here is a quote that indicates the transparency of his statements now. When Mr. Bouchard, when the Leader of the Opposition, pardon me, spoke on Wednesday, he spoke in French and English. In French, he said: "Alliances—thanks but no thanks". A total refusal. In English, he said: "I am deeply committed to this partnership". So, once again, when opening remarks are used to deliver messages, they should not be based on the misleading appearances created.

As regards the rally currently going on in Montreal, we must remember that Canadians and Quebecers are equally proud of demonstrating their patriotism in Montreal and are doing so on their own initiative. The federal government did not organize the gathering. It was born of a desire by Canadians, inside and outside Quebec, to express their pride in Canada, and the federal government is not paying their way. On the contrary, a Treasury Board directive provides that, if they go, they must take leave to do so.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the alliances the hon. Leader of the Opposition was talking about were the alliances René Lévesque had had with the other provincial ministers before the night of the long knives. This is the sort of alliance the Leader of the Opposition was alluding to.

How does the minister explain that federal government managers were informed by telephone that they should allow their employees to go to Montreal after they signed an insurance form. Even this leave is paid by the government.

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is operating today. Offices are open from coast to coast. In accordance with common practice which has existed for time and is in the collective agreements, if employees want a day off, they can ask for a day off.

Mr. Duceppe: All together, all at the same time?

Mr. Eggleton: Yes, they can take it as a vacation day. They can take a vacation day if they want. They can do it today, on Monday, or any other time of the year, providing they get the permission of their manager. In each case it is a personal choice. Nobody is being forced to do anything.

A lot of people who work in the public service feel strongly about the country and want to be part of today's rally in Montreal. They are doing it all in accordance with the rules, practices and collective agreements of the federal government.

HEALTH CARE

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

Improving our medicare system is on the agenda of all Canadians. Reformers have proposed a series of constructive alternatives to solve the problems with our health care system for all Canadians. What changes are the minister and the government considering in the field of health care to make Canadians, including Quebecers, feel more at home in this Confederation?

• (1140)

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a lot of work is ongoing with the federal government in co–operation with the provincial ministers of health and their officials.

One which is ongoing is the work on the vision for the future of the health care system in Canada. Many actions are being contemplated. We are very optimistic that we can continue to deliver first class health care in Canada and that we can make that health care equally accessible to all residents.

Even people who live in Quebec appreciate our medicare system. They too are concerned that rapid changes would decrease their ability to access equitably a health care system when they need it. The government is committed to ensuring equitable access for everyone.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, like Reformers, Canadians affirm the value of medicare. We desire medicare to be a core set of national standards. We desire a system that is publicly funded and universally accessible, regardless of one's ability to pay, but that system must make room for choice to be sustainable. Is the minister open to this kind of change?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are open to any kind of change that will make our health care system better.

We are committed to equitable access, access based on the need of the individual person and not on his or her ability to pay. That is one of the essential cornerstones of medicare in Canada. We believe it is that particular form of medicare which makes Canada the very best country in which to live.

REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has launched an operation to bring thousands of federalists from across Canada to Montreal. The government is even urging its employees to go there to put pressure on Quebecers under the pretence that they suddenly love them.

Does the minister not feel that the best way to show Quebecers they are loved would be above all to respect their laws, starting with the referendum act?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again, we did not organize the rally being held in Montreal. This spontaneous rally shows that Canadians from every region in the country are concerned about what is happening in Quebec and want to show their solidarity.

I am proud to belong to a country where all parties are so concerned by the situation in Quebec that they are willing to make an effort to travel to Montreal and to clearly express their feelings toward Canada and Quebecers. Quebecers who, like us, are federalists and want to remain part of this country feel that other Canadians are expressing clearly the feelings we have always believed in, that is to say, they are supportive of Quebec, they are with us, and they want the No side to win on Monday so that our nation can continue to help and support its citizens.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what better way is there for the federal government and the rest of Canada to show their commitment to Quebecers than to respect the democratic process, thus allowing Quebecers to make a decision on their future without any interference?

• (1145)

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, since the only people the official opposition believes are those who share their views, I will point out that, in an interview he gave at Magnan tavern this week, the Leader of the Official Opposition stated very clearly that he agreed that people from the rest of Canada could come to Montreal because, as he said, they will be affected by the referendum result.

For once, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois is right, and he expressed this pride in being Canadian he had asserted so clearly in 1988. We are proud to belong to a country, a nation that is willing to give its more vulnerable parts a helping hand as a sign of friendship and solidarity.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

On Monday and Tuesday the minister met with provincial counterparts in Whitehorse. The Canadian Council of Ministers of Environment has created a framework agreement to harmonize the provinces' respective roles. Canadians have a deep desire to see real co–operation.

Following the Whitehorse discussions, can the government tell the House what we can expect to see in respect of the environmental harmonization process being put into place with the provinces?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report that my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, together with provincial and territorial environmental ministers, agreed to release a draft environmental framework. This framework has been released for public discussion.

Hearing the views of Canadians on whether this draft accomplishes our shared objective is very important in terms of a consistent high level of environmental protection.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, clearly there is a need for a new confederation, a balanced federation of provinces in Canada that the Minister of Environment should no longer resist.

The process of environmental harmonization has been going on for two years. Can the minister tell the House what the spectrum of changes the government is prepared to make to produce a genuine harmonious front to protect the environment?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, while there are often points of discussion, the environment ministers, for example, agreed unanimously to look at automobile emissions and regulations for cleaner gasoline. The federal government is committed to acting on these initiatives.

Meanwhile, the provincial ministers of the environment are also free to look at taking the actions necessary to protect the air that the people in their provinces breathe.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. Yesterday, the CNTU revealed that the HRD minister's bill on UI reform does exist. And its provisions are identical to what has been leaked from various sources since June. The draft bill is dated October 10, 1995.

Will the minister admit that the bill on UI cuts is indeed ready, as evidenced by the existence of this document, and that its tabling is being delayed by the government to hide these cuts from Quebecers until after the referendum?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have been working on reforming the UI program, and in fact the social security system as a whole, for the past two years. We never hid the fact that we were putting our fiscal house in order and reviewing various social policies.

Regarding unemployment insurance, we announced in the last budget exactly what our plans were, and the Prime Minister stated in this House that a bill would be produced by the end of the year. Cabinet has not approved, passed or even seen the bill, and the document referred to may well be one of the many versions of the bill that could eventually be submitted to cabinet. This is a normal process, one that does not involve cabinet for the time being and that must follow its course.

• (1150)

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased to hear the minister admit that the bill does exist.

Will the minister try to deny the obvious or will he admit that his bill will reduce UI benefits, exclude thousands of young people and women from the system, and put in place a two tiered system for seasonal workers? What is keeping the minister from admitting the truth? The imminence of the Quebec referendum?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again, the opposition is twisting my words. I said "may well be" because I do not know if the bill the hon. member is referring to even exists. However, I do know that it is only natural for us, after promising to overhaul social programs, including unemployment insurance, to be working on it.

No decision has been made so far. There is therefore nothing to say on this issue. It is clear that, as announced in the budget, a reform will take place to make the system more efficient and reduce the burden of government on Canadian taxpayers, including Quebec taxpayers. We urge the Parti Quebecois to put its fiscal house in order as we did with ours in the budget we tabled in February.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

On Wednesday President Bill Clinton stated that a strong and a united Canada has been a powerful and loyal ally to the United States and a model for the world on how people from different cultures can live in peace and harmony.

Would the Minister of Foreign Affairs elaborate on the president's statement? Also, would he address the comment made in the Wall Street Journal regarding the negative effect that a possible yes vote in Monday's Quebec referendum might have on NAFTA and our bilateral relationship with the U.S.?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question.

[Translation]

President Clinton clearly said that Monday's vote is a domestic issue. It is for Canadians to decide. However, the president also said that his country hopes to maintain relations with a strong and united Canada. I have no doubt that, after Monday's vote, Canada will remain united and strong.

As for the other part of the question, I fully agree with the opinion expressed by the hon. member.

[English]

The question of trading arrangements in the context of sovereignty will be the one described by the hon. member.

SOMALIA INQUIRY

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week government lawyers were chastened by Justice Létourneau of the Somalia inquiry. He was concerned that a letter from crown counsel would put a chill over the inquiry.

The government has tried to gag members of the forces before. Now it is trying to filter both the information and the sources of information.

Why are both the justice department and the Department of National Defence working to intimidate soldiers and keep them from testifying before this important commission? Why?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well there is no truth to that assertion.

The government has nothing to hide with respect to the engagement of Canadian forces personnel to Somalia. It was this government in opposition that had asked the former government to set up a board of inquiry. That was long before the election. We did that once the court martials were dealt with.

However, what happened this week is rather unfortunate since the tone of a letter sent by a Department of Justice official has given the wrong impression to the various counsel. The chairman of the commission has called for the various counsel to discuss this matter and to make sure the impression the hon. member has reached that somehow we want people not to come forward is dispelled.

The lawyers for the respective individuals before the commission and the commission lawyers themselves are working this matter out.

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, indeed I would really love to see that impression dispelled. In a hierarchical society such as the military, even subtle signals from the top permeate down and can cause an undesired effect below. In this case it is telling the troops to keep quiet. The commissioners are doing their best to send the soldiers the signal that the inquiry is open, but the assurances must come from the very top. The very top in this case is the Minister of National Defence.

• (1155)

Will the minister put himself in the position of our uniformed troops and recognize that he has a responsibility to reassure the military personally that all is fine, they can speak as they will.

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, no one has ever accused me of being unduly subtle. Every member of the Canadian Armed Forces has an obligation to come forward to that commission. The government will not tolerate any intimidation toward any of those people.

I hope the hon. member understands the message. Certainly the members of the armed forces understand it.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Yesterday, the minister refused to admit that a document from his department entitled "Serving Canada's Seniors" does indeed show the direction his government intends to follow in restructuring old age security programs.

The government has been saying since its budget of February 1994 that it would table a document unveiling its new approach.

How can the government justify that, after reviewing Canada's old age security program for over 18 months, the human resources minister still claims that he has not yet made a decision on the new direction to be taken? Mr. Speaker, it has been 18 months.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe the answer sought by the hon. member is included in a statement made last night by the Prime Minister to Mr. Mongrain, regarding the issue of pensions. The Prime Minister said: "What I do know is that, if people vote no on Monday, all those who receive pension cheques will still get the same cheque. Some tried to make me say that I was going to cut pension cheques. I clearly said in the House of Commons that there will be no statement in November to the effect that the government is cutting pensions, and that the February budget will include no changes to old age pensions. I cannot not be any clearer than that".

This quote shows that we looked at the issue of old age pensions and that we arrived—as the Prime Minister clearly said—at a conclusion which is valid now and for next February.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as both Reform members and Canadians, we sincerely believe in a strong and united country now and in the future. I am confident that the Liberal government shares our vision of decentralized powers.

My question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. What changes in the powers and responsibilities attached to social programs will he offer the provinces to show them that a no vote is not a vote for the status quo?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think that, in the past two years, our government has indicated very clearly that it is upholding the Liberal tradition of supporting the most vulnerable members of our society. We are forced to do so in a context of financial and economic constraint. I feel that we have assumed our responsibilities within a responsible fiscal framework by stating in the February 1995 budget that we would continue to help the neediest in our society.

There is no question that, in order to help the most vulnerable in our society, we must overhaul our social programs to make them more effective, efficient and productive, and that is what we are doing. The changes under way to improve government will also help us convince Canadians, including Quebecers, that the Government of Canada looks after the interests of all its citizens, including Quebecers, and that it is in their interest to vote No on Monday.

TOURISM INDUSTRY

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Industry briefly mention the main initiatives he has undertaken, since the announcement, last February, of the establishment of the Canadian tourism commission, and could he also give us some details on the impact that these initiatives have, and will have, on the tourism industry and on the Canadian economy?

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian tourism commission has already spent $50 million, while its partners have invested $35 million.

This year, revenues related to tourism increased by 18 per cent in our country. Clearly, a united Canada, in which the provinces and the federal government co–operate, is the best thing for Canadian tourism. It is definitely an argument in favour of a no vote on Monday, so that we can indeed have a united country and the best possible environment for tourism.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SMALL BUSINESS LOANS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–99, an Act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Deputy Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board has the floor. He has six minutes remaining.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat the key points I made earlier and continue my speech. I said that the Small Business Loans Act was part of a global strategy by the government to boost the growth of such business, and more particularly its access to financing and capital. I also said we did a lot of consulting, before we went ahead. I said, as well, that this project would be self–supporting, and that the government's action was in keeping with two of its policies: to reduce subsidies to business and to reduce the deficit and the debt.

• (1205)

I also indicated that the new program would better suit businesses with a greater need for access to capital, because, according to our research, 30 per cent to 40 per cent of businesses are getting from the existing program capital which could be used elsewhere. I added that I had talked to many business men and women in my riding of St. Boniface, who told me this was a step forward.

I concluded the first part of my speech by saying that this was the sort of government initiative that reached across the entire country—an example of what we can accomplish together.

Now for the second part. Speaking of what we can accomplish together, let us have a look at what we have already done in Canada. We all know that Canadians are respected around the world, for a number of reasons. We all know that we are the best country on the whole planet, and we are not the ones to say so. Organizations are saying so. We all know that people in many countries, in the vast majority of countries, would like to join us.

We are a pretty formidable economic power, since we rank seventh based on our gross domestic product. We know that the government is evolving, and even when people do not have the same philosophy of government, I think they should realize that governments and government institutions evolve and change. And that is exactly what this government has done for the past two years. To put it another way, it has embarked on a review of the federal government's mandate and that of other levels of government in order to eliminate duplication and overlap.

It has done so while respecting the authority of other levels of government and at the same time reducing government expenditures. it has taken steps to ensure that this initiative will be able to continue, because we still have some way to go.

Consider what we have done together so far. If we look at the past two years, we see that more than 600,000 jobs have been created. That is a lot, but it is not enough. We must create more jobs. We need a climate that is conducive to job creation. Our objective with respect to the debt and the deficit is a case in point. We wanted to ensure that the deficit would not be in excess of 3 per cent of the gross domestic product. We think we can achieve that.

Interest rates are among the lowest we have seen for a long time. The inflation rate is much lower than it was. Consider our growth figures. Economic growth has increased by 33 per cent. Exports have gone up by 5.2 per cent; investment in materiel and equipment, for instance, has increased 11.6 per cent; deliveries in the manufacturing sector have gone up 10.9 per cent.

Quite frankly, we have done remarkably well in a pretty difficult situation. Our concern, and this includes both government members and the members of the opposition, should be the results of the vote on October 30. Because we must continue to do well.

• (1210)

These successes improve Canadians' quality of life. These successes can assure us of growth, of keeping our number one status, if you will, as the best country in the world. I have a few quotations here I wanted to share with you on the successes we have enjoyed, the successes others have applauded us for.

[English]

For example, Sherry Cooper, chief economist at Nesbitt Burns, responded to the drop in September's unemployment rate to 9.2 per cent by saying:

> Today's buoyant job report is yet another arrow in the quiver of economic recovery.

That was on the CP wire on October 6.

Andrew Pyle, Path International senior economist, responding to the drop in September's unemployment rate to 9.2 per cent said:

> One would expect in October barring any surprises we should see even better job growth.

Robert Fairholm, chief economist with DRI/McGraw–Hill, in reacting to the Statistics Canada report showing that the country's GDP increased by 0.1 per cent in July, said:

> Pull out a microscope and you'll see growth in July. But it's an improvement and that's encouraging for the markets.

Gordon Thiessen, Governor of the Bank of Canada, said:

> I know the economy is not booming along, but it is performing in such a sound way, such a basically sturdy way.

I could go on. I have another dozen quotes from influential, knowledgeable, insightful people that show the country is working. As has been said by the Prime Minister on many occasions and by many colleagues, it is not perfect but it is the best country in the world. The commitment of all of us, whatever our political preferences, political values or political ideologies, ought to be to make this country, which is the best, better still.

[Translation]

For this reason I hope from the bottom of my heart that Quebecers who see all of those Canadians rallied together in Montreal will listen to their heartbeats, listen to what they have to say. Some would like to have us believe this is not real, not spontaneous. It is real, it is spontaneous.

There is a deep affection for Quebec, for Quebec men, and for Quebec women, and that affection is being manifested today in Montreal. If on October 30 we can have a no vote to separation, to the breakup of this country, we are going to continue to improve the quality of life of all Canadians, whether they live in Quebec or in other parts of the country. This is why I want a no vote, and I hope from the bottom of my heart that is exactly what the answer will be. No to separation, no to breakup, so that we can continue to progress.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak to Bill C–99.

Since taking office two years ago the government has created an economy of employment that has grown. Good fiscal management is the foundation of the government's jobs in a growth agenda. The 1995 budget marks a decisive turning point, making $7 in cuts to government spending for every new $1 of tax revenue raised. The deficit is being reduced, as planned, and the red book target of 3 per cent of GDP by 1996–97 will be met.

Small business has been the engine of job creation in Canada in the last decade. To fulfil its promise to help them compete, the government has cut red tape and has increased access to government services, financing new technologies and export markets.

Our trade missions to China and Latin American led by the Prime Minister brought home $10 billion in trade deals for Canadian businesses and positive jobs for Canadians. Barriers to trade within Canada are dropping, thanks to the agreement on interprovincial trade. These efforts help Canadian businesses find markets for their products and services at home and abroad.

Changes to the Small Business Loans Act is one of the most significant efforts of the government toward a strong economy and creating opportunity for growth. The changes made by Bill C–99 will enable the completion of the process of modernization and improvement that has brought the SBLA program to full cost recovery. This renewal will relieve the financial burden of the program on Canadian taxpayers while enabling the SBLA to continue to provide its benefits to small business.

• (1215)

Over the years the program carried out under the Small Business Loans Act has been very successful. The SBLA was passed in 1961, and since then more than 420,000 SBLA loans, totalling over $15.5 billion, have been made to small business.

The benefits of SBLA are widely recognized. It provides needed help to small businesses, which are so important to the Canadian economy. The program is open and simple to administer. It is delivered by private sector lenders who have great expertise in the granting of credit and the monitoring of loans.

The program's success both as an economic development tool and as an example of public sector and private sector co–operation has inspired similar guarantee programs at both the federal and provincial levels in Canada.

In recent years the SBLA program has been running on an annual government cost of $20 million to $30 million. However, following a significant program change effective April 1, 1993 the annual activity increased from $500 million to $2.5 billion in 1993–94 and to over $4 billion in 1994–95. Assuming a continuation of the historical loss rate, this meant that the annual program costs would increase by over $100 million. Clearly this was a threat to the sustainability of the program.

Both the potential costs of the program and the government's overall need for deficit control required that the program be brought to full cost recovery. Consequently the government initiated a review of the program. Extensive consultations with major stakeholders representing both borrowers and lenders were held in October and November 1994. Recommendations were also provided by the industry committee and the small business working committee of the House of Commons. The views of the federal Liberal caucus task force on small business were taken into account as well.

The major recommendation of all those consulted was unanimous: the government should act quickly to put the SBLA program on a full cost recovery basis. We have responded.

Two major changes were made through regulatory amendments which came into effect on April 1, 1995. First, a new 1.25 per cent annual fee was levied on each lender's average outstanding balance of SBLA loans made after March 31, 1995. Second, the maximum rate a lender can charge under the SBLA was increased by 1.25 per cent to the prime interest rate plus 3 per cent for floating rate loans and to the residential mortgage rate plus 3 per cent for fixed rate loans.

These changes have put the SBLA program on a sustainable cost recovery basis for all loans made after March 31, 1995. Now Bill C–99 will continue the process of renewal by putting in place additional changes to the SBLA. It will grant an authority respecting the release of security, including personal guarantees taken by lenders for the repayment of SBLA loans. It will grant an authority to make regulations for the establishment of a claims processing fee.

Bill C–99 will improve government guaranteed coverage for low volume lenders. It will enable the SBLA program to respond more quickly in future to changing economic and program circumstances by allowing the guaranteed percentage to be adjusted by regulation, and it will potentially accelerate an already legislated decrease in the percentage of an SBLA loan that is guaranteed by the government from 90 per cent to 85 per cent.

The changes that will be brought about by Bill C–99 will complete the transformation process that has made the SBLA program sustainable. Putting the program on a full cost recovery basis has caused the cost of loans made under the SBLA to increase slightly. However, the federal government's consultations with all parties recognize the need for the program to be self–sustaining.

The changes we are making are entirely in keeping with the need to reduce subsidies to business and the overall need to get the deficit under control. These changes actually mean the SBLA will be better positioned to target its loans toward those small businesses that really need its help.

• (1220)

At present, an estimated 30 per cent to 40 per cent of SBLA loans go to enterprises that are able to take advantage of normal business financing. Without the subsidy implicit in the present interest rate, the higher cost of SBLA loans will mean that these financially strong businesses will probably now switch to lower cost commercial financing.

Even the most successful programs must be kept relevant and responsive and must be run in an effective manner, especially in these days of deficit fighting and limited government resources. The increase in government costs resulting from the surge increase in SBLA activity was a challenge that had to be met if the SBLA was to continue to serve the needs of small business. That challenge was met, and now the changes we are proposing will further enhance the administration of the SBLA program.

I bring to the attention of the businesses and people in Quebec who have been part of this program and who have participated in it in an effort to better not only the economy of Quebec but also the economy of Canada that this is very beneficial to the province of Quebec. Obviously we hope that all those businesses, when it comes to voting on Monday in the referendum, will recognize the importance of staying within Canada and vote with the rest of Canadians with a resounding no.

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate that we discuss Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, at this time because this week is small business week.

We know that small business is the lifeblood of our economy. Statistics tell us that 99 per cent of businesses in Canada have fewer than 100 employees. Because of their numbers in small businesses they tend to drive the economy. Growth in small business means economic growth, but the bottom line is that the government does not create jobs, businesses create jobs. Small businesses create almost 80 per cent of new jobs in Canada.

Government plays a very key role. It creates the climate and builds the framework for economic growth. The Liberal government has taken important steps to create the right climate.

We have reduced regulation. We have eliminated 250 regulations already and amended another 300–plus. The process continues to eliminate paperwork and regulations and streamline the cost of doing business.

We have improved the access for small businesses to technology through programs like the technology partnership program.

We have reduced the paper burden and red tape that small businesses struggle with. Ten business service centres have been opened up across Canada from coast to coast, which provide 24–hour a day services.

We have just announced the business networks initiative, which brings businesses together. Networks and working together with people makes things happen and makes business grow. We have introduced a single window business number at Revenue Canada so businesses can make one call instead of four.

We have introduced new legislation like Bill C–102, which creates the equivalent of free trade zones in Canada and allows Canadian businesses like those close to the U.S. border in my riding to compete against the U.S. companies head on. This bill will also assist businesses throughout Canada, wherever they may be.

We have the team Canada trade strategy aimed at helping businesses export. SMEs produce only 10 per cent of our exports, and only about 4 per cent of the small business sector exports. We need to improve this record. We need to make continuous improvements to assist small and medium size entrepreneurs to export. This is where government can play a key role.

As a member of Parliament I have been able to work with a committee in the St. Catharines–Niagara area to help small business understand what it takes to export and how really easy it is if we know the system. By teaching this system the committee is trying to assist some 350 small exporting companies in my area.

• (1225)

This leads us to a problem, because we know it takes money for small business to expand. Business needs access to capital. One of the largest problems facing small business people and entrepreneurs is financing. Here too government has played a major role. The industry committee of the House has studied this issue extensively. It was very interesting to see the participation of all parties, the Bloc, Reform and the government members, working together on improving the system within the industry committee, such that we could make more improvements for all businesses no matter where they are located in Canada.

Banks have responded to introduce codes of conduct and an alternate dispute resolution system and some have ombudsmen. Maybe there has been some picking on the banks and maybe it was required, but they are also working with many of the small businesses and many community committees to really get things happening.

Government also plays a direct role in lending to small businesses. We do this through the Business Development Bank and the Business Development Corporation. We lend through the Small Business Loans Act.

The Small Business Loans Act creates an economic development tool for the government. The act was first passed in 1961. Since that time more than 420,000 loans have been made, totalling over $15.5 billion.

Recently the SBLA has been running at a cost of $20 million to $30 million per year. This is a cost the government incurs; in other words, it is a cost to taxpayers. As lending has increased over the last couple of years, we are now looking at a loss of over $100 million annually. Over five years the program will be tripled, from $4 billion to $12 billion, and then we are looking at a potential liability of $12 billion plus. That represents a problem for the government and for the taxpayer. That is why the government initiated a review last year and consulted with borrowers and lenders from across the country and the various agencies and institutions involved.

For a government that is tackling the deficit and the debt, we know that we cannot sustain this SBLA program on taxpayers' backs forever. The government has had to reduce its spending. We have cut overall expenditures by 19 per cent, the public service by 14 per cent, transportation subsidies across this land by some 97 per cent, business subsidies by 60 per cent. This is only a small sample of our cuts to reduce the deficit.

The important item I would like to bring forward to the House is that while we have been doing this cutting, we have done it in a progressive manner. We have done it by getting input from all the people involved and understanding the facts that are required as we go through these cuts.

Yes, we are making changes, and for the last number of weeks changes seem to have really hit the House. We have been making those changes a little at a time, not going from one extreme to the other but making those continuous improvements that are so important to industry.

The reason we have Bill C–99 before us today is to make the small business loans program revenue neutral for the government over time. When this legislation is implemented, we will be able to recover the cost of the program and the burden will not be placed only on taxpayers.

As has been mentioned, several actions have already been taken as of April 1, 1995. There is a new 1.25 per cent annual fee levied on lenders' average outstanding balance of loans made after March 31, 1995. The maximum rate a lender can charge increased by 1.25 per cent, the prime interest rate plus 3 per cent for floating rate loans and for residential mortgages it is rate plus 3 per cent for fixed rate loans. This means the program has been put on a cost recovery basis for all loans made after March 31.

Bill C–99 makes further changes to the Small Business Loans Act. The amended act will grant authority respecting the release of security, including personal guarantees taken by lenders for the repayment of the SBLA loans. It will grant authority to make regulations for the establishment of a claims processing fee. The bill will also improve government guaranteed coverage for low volume lenders.

The bill will enable the SBLA program to respond more quickly in the future to changing economic and program circumstances by allowing the guaranteed percentage to be adjusted by regulation, to be adjusted as mentioned as the future unfolds. As things change around the world, we are in the global economy and we will be able to adjust and make those changes on an ongoing basis. As has been said over and over, in this world nothing stands still; everything changes slowly and continuously.

The amended act will potentially accelerate an already legislated decrease in the percentage of an SBLA loan which is guaranteed by the government from 90 per cent to 85 per cent.

The theme for small business week this year is, New Markets –Opportunities for Growth. The government wants to help small businesses grow and expand. I have outlined the many ways in which we are doing that. However, we are not doing a favour to businesses if we hand them money while increasing the deficit which thus reduces the strength and growth of our economy.

We are working to get the basics in place. We are providing several sources of income to small businesses which have difficulty attaining access to capital through other sources. We are improving and refocusing these programs so they will better target those who really need them.

Without the subsidy in the SBLA program's present interest rate the higher cost of these loans will mean financially strong businesses will switch to lower cost commercial financing. More funding will be available to small businesses that really need the programs. We will be doing this in a revenue neutral manner which will not cost taxpayers extra dollars they do not have.

This is important legislation which builds on the government agenda to help businesses succeed. We want a strong and vital growing economy and we need businesses to grow to accomplish that. This bill means financing will be available to help the small business person and it will be provided without an additional cost to taxpayers.

The government has put forward many programs to assist small business. Community groups, of which I have one in my community called the FMP group, are excited about the changes this government is bringing forward to help small business.

I urge all members in the House to join me in support of Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, so that we can work together across the country. We have shared this country and have made improvements across this country. Likewise, I hope that when the people of Quebec, including Quebec's business people, come forward on Monday they will vote no in order to continue to share and make improvements in this great country of ours.

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to add my voice to those of my colleagues today in speaking on Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act.

As parliamentarians we are frequently called upon by our constituents to assist in the creation of employment in order to boost the economies of our ridings and subsequently the economy of our country.

Often two very significant areas, increased employment and minimal debt, are found to be in contrast with one another. Bill C–99 will provide a vehicle whereby businesses have greater access to capital which of course in turn creates more employment resulting in a healthier economy.

• (1235)

In my riding of St. John's West, the community of Argentia was struck about a year ago by the closure of the U.S. naval base. The closure of that base caused the residents of the area a great deal of distress. However, they did not roll over and die at the thought of losing their jobs. Instead they decided to build on what had been left on the base by the Americans.

With the very generous assistance of this government, they are now slowly beginning to open a few new businesses. One of the greatest setbacks to many of those new businesses is the inability to obtain financing in order to keep the businesses going. They seem to be having difficulties obtaining the required financing because of the size of their businesses. This new act will be a major asset to them.

Bill C–99 is a vehicle those people will be able to use hopefully in the very near future so they can continue to keep their businesses operating. This loans act is a part of the government's overall strategy to provide a positive environment for the growth of small business, especially with regard to accessing financial capital.

The SBLA came into effect in 1961. Its purpose was to continue to increase the availability of loans for the establishment and improvement of small business enterprises. Since then more than 420,000 loans totalling over $15 billion have been made to businesses. For over 30 years the SBLA has been helping such businesses obtain capital for improvements and expansion. This government is committed to maintaining the basic nature of this successful program.

The goal of the program is to assist small businesses in obtaining fixed asset financing which is otherwise unobtainable because businesses lack sufficient collateral, they are too new, or they are not located in large growth areas such as central Canada. Of all SBLA loans, 35 per cent go to start–ups and a further 20 per cent go to businesses under three years old.

As I stated earlier, the SBLA is particularly significant in my riding of St. John's West because it does provide funding for the formation and stabilization of an economic foundation based on small enterprise. The benefits are widely recognized. It helps small businesses which are so important to the economy right across the country. They are the foundation for economic strength and stability. The future economy of our country has been built on small business and it will continue to depend on them.

The cod fishery off the coast of Newfoundland has suffered a destruction and now there is a moratorium. Alternate measures must be found to promote the economy of that area. The SBLA mandate provides for funding to be targeted toward small businesses which are lacking collateral, which are not new and which are not located in the large centralized or industrial areas of Canada.

Newfoundland is a province with an abundance of culture, an educated populace and an international accessibility through trade due to its coastal location. Throughout my riding of St. John's West, industry based resources are abundant. There are natural harbours, forestry, and watershed management, to name a few.

Since April 1993 activity under the program has increased dramatically. A potential program deficit of over $100 million annually based on the 1994–95 activity levels was threatening the sustainability of the SBLA. The proposed changes would decrease the costs and increase the efficiency of the SBLA. The resulting strengthening of the program will enable it to continue to provide benefits to small businesses.

The proposed legislation was developed after extensive consultation with lenders and borrowers alike. Recommendations of the Standing Committee on Industry and the small business working committee have also been addressed. The major recommendation of all those consulted was unanimous: the government should act quickly to put the SBLA program on a full cost recovery basis, a move initiated by a regulatory change effective April 1, 1995.

• (1240)

Bill C–99 moves to initiate full cost recovery. The regulatory amendments of April 1 include a new 1.25 per cent annual fee which is levied on each lender's average outstanding balance on loans made after March 31, 1995. The second amendment states that the maximum rate a lender can charge under the SBLA is increased by 1.25 per cent to the prime interest rate plus 3 per cent for floating rate loans, and to the residential mortgage rate plus 3 per cent for fixed rate loans. These changes have put the SBLA program on a sustainable cost recovery basis for all loans made after March 31, 1995.

In addition to full cost recovery incentives, Bill C–99 provides for improvements relating to borrowers and low volume lenders. These changes are secondary to the major regulatory changes of April 1, 1995 which introduced a new annual fee on lenders and an increased maximum interest rate.

Bill C–99 will continue the process of renewal by putting in place additional changes to the SBLA. It will permit the release of security, including personal guarantees, taken by lenders for repayment of the loans. It will also permit the establishment of a claims processing fee by regulation. It will improve government guarantees for coverage for low volume lenders, to improve competition among lenders particularly in the smaller communities, such as those in my riding.

Bill C–99 will permit the SBLA program in the future to respond more quickly to changing economic and program circumstances by allowing the guarantee percentage to be adjusted by regulation. It will accelerate a previously legislated decrease in the percentage of an SBLA loan which is guaranteed by the government from 90 per cent to 85 per cent.

These changes are of particular importance to my riding of St. John's West because of the emphasis on smaller communities.

In addition, new resiliency clauses which will be implemented into the SBLA are tailored to help small business respond more quickly to changing economic circumstances.

In summary, the changes incorporated into Bill C–99 will ensure that the program will continue to be successful in assisting small businesses in obtaining the financing which they so badly need for expansion and the creation of jobs throughout the country.

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak in support of Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act.

I could start out by stating the obvious, that we are reminded daily that the future of jobs in Canada is to come from small business. We are reminded daily that it is the fastest growing sector with respect to job creation. In fact, it is that sector of our economy where there is opportunity for work. I have been reminded three times in the last six days of the importance of the small business sector.

Last Saturday I met with the chamber of commerce in my riding. In a brief which was submitted to me it was stated that there is nothing that can replace a job created by a small enterprise. We all agree with that.

On Wednesday night I was in the city of North York and had the opportunity to attend a small business fair which took place at the city hall. There was a large display by support agencies. There were all types of computer consultants and business consultants. It is important to note that the banks were also there in large numbers. There are groups within the communities which are willing to facilitate ongoing small business and are willing to work with people who want to create small businesses.

Last evening in my riding of Sarnia—Lambton the board of directors of Lambton College agreed to proceed with an innovative international trade centre. I am quite pleased to say I have been actively involved in this project. I started it with the college in conjunction with my neighbour across the river in the United States, Congressman David Bonior from the 10th congressional district of the state of Michigan.

We are working together on both sides of the border to facilitate small businesses in order that they can find markets on both sides of the border. We want to work in partnership so we have linked these two centres located at community colleges in Canada and in the United States by modem. Now a Canadian small business person can find a partner and can obtain the kind of information he or she needs to enter the American marketplace.

• (1245)

There are 40 million people living within an hour's drive of my riding. There are 80 million people within an eight–hour drive. The marketplace is not just within Canada for small business. Indeed, for many of us it is in the United States. I am pleased to say that small businesses are awakening to this marketplace.

I know of one small business operator in my riding who employs 17 people. He was able to increase his business by some 35 per cent by working actively in the city of Port Huron in the state of Michigan, 400 yards away from Canada.

The marketplace out there is huge. I know of another gentleman who employs two other people making ice boats. His market is in the area surrounding the city of Detroit on Lake St. Clair. He is able to do that from Canada.

There is a huge marketplace out there for small business but there are two areas of specific need that must be addressed to assist small business people. First, small business needs access to capital. That is stating the obvious. We must remember that job creation in the private sector requires an investment. It can vary.

I am talking only about the private sector. In the high tech business, the cost of creating a job, if I can put it in such blunt terms, is $750,000. In other words, that corporation must, to add a person to it, often invest up to $750,000.

In manufacturing in a general sense that number is somewhere between $750,000 and $1 million. That means a corporation must have several million dollars of capital invested to employ people. For those that are specialized the numbers increase even more. I can speak firsthand of the petrochemical and refining industries where the investment required of the corporation can be anywhere from $1 million to $1.5 million.

Changes in the way large industry works are in fact changing that ratio. Across North America we are undergoing a phenomenon known as restructuring. Large corporations examine their workforces and they tend to remove those who are not tied directly to production so that the ratio of job to investment is increasing all the time.

It is because of this that we have to look to small business where we know jobs can be created when an entrepreneur invests anywhere from $3,000 to $25,000. It is because of numbers like those that tells us the future of the job market is in the small business sector.

We all know also that access to funds is the number one obstacle encountered by small business. The Small Business Loans Act is there to support lenders and in turn help small business obtain debt financing often otherwise inaccessible to them.

I state the obvious when I say that if one reads any number of newspapers one will note there are, across the country, often complaints of the lack of access to funds. Although this will not remove every obstacle, it is working toward it.

It is important to realize that the Small Business Loans Act program is delivered not by government agencies but by private sector lenders. We know the Small Business Loans Act has been around for some 34 years now and this bill simply reflects what the realities of today are from a fiscal perspective.

Organizations such as the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, which I should point out is a group which never is hesitant to express its opinion, have supported this bill. That is an important factor to point out. There is support for this bill not just in the House but where it really counts, within the business community and especially within the small business community, a great number of whose representatives are members of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business.

• (1250)

As a result it is important that the House support Bill C–99. It has, since 1961, resulted in a program which I suggest has been successful. We are told that there have been some $16 billion lent by banks under the Small Business Loans Act since 1961. In many people's opinions it is not enough when one considers that in other economies around the world much greater numbers are spent on an annual basis on small business expansion. However, it is important that this tool be there. It is there as an economic tool and it is there as an example of public sector and private sector co–operation and partnership. That is becoming more and more important in government at all levels.

It is also important to remember that government costs associated with this program have escalated quite dramatically in recent years to the point where its sustainability has been called into question. This, quite frankly, is the reality of government today.

As a result, the government has initiated a review of the program and extensive consultations were held over a year ago involving all concerned parties. It is not a unilateral consultation. It is a bilateral consultation involving the public and the private sectors. We are certainly aware of the valuable input that the industry committee provided on this subject.

It is safe to say that the overwhelming consensus from all the major stakeholders is that the government must act swiftly to transform the Small Business Loans Act program into a full cost recovery situation. It must be operated on a full cost recovery basis.

The bill accomplishes this objective and will grant authority respecting the release of security. Many other speakers before me have laid out the technical details of it. I believe that the changes contained in Bill C–99 will complete a transformation process to make the Small Business Loans Act sustainable and realistic and a program that has the support of small business and business associations across the country.

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to add my support to everyone in Montreal today for the walk for unity. Canadians have come from all parts of Canada and I truly wish the best for everyone in Montreal, especially today. This is truly a reflection of our great Canadian spirit and our great Canadian family.

I am pleased to speak on Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act. For almost 35 years now, the Small Business Loans Act program has provided a valuable means of assisting Canadian small businesses to obtain the financing they need for capital, improvements and expansion.

The government is firmly committed to maintaining the basic nature of this successful program. This act is truly important for the riding of Lambton—Middlesex. I represent a rural riding with the largest urban centre being Strathroy with a population of about 11,000. My riding depends on the small business for economic growth and success. Businesses vary from the manufacturing of clothing and footwear to food processing and auto parts, to name a few.

The Small Business Loans Act encourages financing for small businesses which typically have difficulty in securing fixed asset loans financing for the establishment, expansion and/or modernization.

Under the SBLA, the federal government guarantees loans up to $250,000 which are made to small businesses by private sector financial institutions. New and existing businesses which are not farms or religious or charitable enterprises are eligible for Small Business Loans Act loans as long as their annual gross revenues do not exceed $5 million annually. It is safe to say that the SBLA has been to some degree responsible for the dramatic success of the small business sector in helping keep the Canadian economy vibrant.

• (1255)

Job creation is one of the most important economic contributions made by the small business sector. Since the late 1970s, smaller firms have been the key contributors to net job creation. Between 1979 and 1989 alone, businesses with fewer than 100 employees created over 2.3 million net new jobs in the Canadian economy, 87 per cent of all growth in private sector employment during that period. The self–employed added a further 400,000 new jobs to this total.

The role that the SBLA plays in nurturing small businesses, particularly start–up businesses, is significant. The objective of the act is to assist in the establishment of small businesses and the stats indicate that this objective is being met. From 1990 to 1994, 40 per cent of SBLA loans were made to start–up companies, which together with other very young businesses, those three years old or less, have obtained about 50 per cent of all SBLA loans.

The SBLA is meeting its goals and objectives in other ways as well. As is intended, the average size of loans made is modest. From 1989 to 1993, the average size SBLA loan was $38,000 and 38 per cent of the loans were $20,000 or less, 63 per cent were $40,000 or less. In 1994 the average loan size increased to $58,000, mainly because of an increase in the permissible maximum loan limit.

While these stats confirm that the program is serving start–ups in young business and providing loans of smaller amounts, there is other evidence to show that the SBLA is promoting the establishment and expansion of businesses in other ways. In a review carried out by independent consultants in 1992, some 60 per cent of the borrowers surveyed indicated that they would not have been able to obtain a bank loan without the assistance of the program. The review cross–checked and confirmed this finding when lenders surveyed reported that 50 per cent of the loans would not have been granted in the absence of this program.

Another study of the SBLA was undertaken in 1994 by a team of analysts under Dr. Allan Riding of Carleton University. Dr. Riding surveyed SBLA loan files and also worked with the Canadian Federation of Independent Business survey data. Dr. Riding found that the SBLA borrowers tend to be those targeted by the act and, as intended, their businesses tend to be smaller, more risky and with fewer resources than the non–SBLA borrowers.

Dr. Riding concluded that some 50 per cent to 70 per cent of the SBLA loans are truly incremental; that is, the lender and the federal government as guarantor are demonstrating confidence in the borrowers because of the risky nature of his or her business.

The SBLA program is an important one for small businesses and a popular one. A fivefold increase in the use of the program has resulted in a potential annual program deficit of $100 million or more. Clearly this would have been an intolerable burden on the taxpayer, one which would have made the SBLA program unsustainable.

The importance of the program to small businesses required that it be updated and modernized so that it can continue to provide its benefits. In particular, the program needed to be truly sustainable through a move to a full cost recovery. Full cost recovery was supported by all those who made their opinions known, both borrowers and lenders, during the extensive consultations that preceded both the changes before us today, as well as the changes of April 1, 1995.

Significant action has already been taken by the government to achieve cost recovery. Effective April 1, 1995, a new annual fee of 1.25 per cent was introduced on lenders' outstanding balance of SBLA loans made after March 31, 1995. The maximum interest rate charged by lenders was increased by 1.25 per cent to the prime rate plus 3 per cent for floating rate loans and to the residential mortgage rate, plus 3 per cent for fixed rate loans.

• (1300)

Bill C–99 will institute a second set of changes, some of which relate to program improvement and others to the recovery of the program cost. These changes include accelerating already scheduled decreases in the government loan guarantee from 90 per cent to 85 per cent. They will grant authority to make regulations for the establishment of claims processing fees and regarding the release of security, including personal guarantees taken by lenders in repayment of SBLA loans. They will improve the government guarantee coverage for low volume lenders.

Furthermore, they will enable future changes to the level of government guarantees to be made through the regulatory rather than the legislative process. This will add flexibility to the program and permit easier fine tuning in the future.

The move to cost recovery for the SBLA and the introduction of a new fee structure were announced in December 1994 when the Minister of Industry presented the paper "Building a more innovative economy" to the House of Commons. After consultations with all stakeholders the annual 1.25 per cent fee was deemed necessary to achieve immediate cost recovery on all new loans made after March 31, 1995.

The losses being incurred annually under the SBLA program were threatening to spiral out of control. They were in excess of $100 million a year. The SBLA shortfall was also adding considerably to the overall deficit the government is determined to reduce. The program is a good one. The SBLA performs a valuable service, one that should be continued.

With the changes being brought about by Bill C–99 the move to bring the SBLA to full cost recovery will be completed. Efficiency in making future changes to the SBLA will be improved. Unnecessary subsidies to businesses will be ended and a significant advance will be made in the government's fight to control the deficit.

I urge all members of the House of Commons to work for swift passage of the bill.

Mr. Reg Alcock (Winnipeg South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to speak to the debate today. I have been involved in the question of how we provide financing to small business for some time and it is my feeling that the act in some way is somewhat misnamed.

If we reflect on it for a moment, perhaps we should call it the Canadian banking system failures act, because it is the failure of our banking system to adequately provide support to small businesses that makes the act necessary.

In the late 1980s and early 1990s I had the privilege of co–chairing a task force on the Manitoba economy which travelled the length and breadth of the province. It held meetings with chambers of commerce, town councils, small business people and large business people from all over the province of Manitoba. The one thing we heard over and over again was that for small, remote centres access to financing was extremely difficult.

We must ask ourselves why that is. We have a comprehensive system that the government has supported since the creation of the country. Banks throughout the country function in an oligopoly and have incredible protection from competition. They have the ability to fall back on the government and the taxpayers to bail them out whenever they make a mistake in a foreign country.

Why cannot banks, which as a result of that protection have become incredibly profitable, adequately meet the needs of small business? That is an important question we must ask ourselves and must keep asking the banks until we get an answer. We are correcting a flaw that should be corrected by the banking system.

• (1305)

We are talking about raising the loans, capital or equity available to small business to an average level of about $4 billion a year. We say that will cost us, if it spirals the way it has been, about $100 million a year. I ask members to reflect on what percentage of last year's bank profits is $100 million. If they do the mathematics they will find that it is something less than 1 per cent. Is it too much to ask the Canadian banking system to invest 1 per cent of its profits in Canadian small businesses? Why is it incapable of meeting this challenge?

An example that comes to mind is a small business in south central Manitoba in the riding of the member for Lisgar—Marquette. It had 12 employees and made electrical equipment. It designed a yard light. The principal of the business was something of an amateur inventor. He developed a number of successful products that are now being marketed throughout the world and can certainly be found in almost every farmyard in western Canada.

Through ingenuity and hard work he managed to convince a giant company, Quebec Hydro, of the efficiency of one of his products. Quebec Hydro gave him an order. It is a huge company that is certainly capable of paying its bills. The first order in the series was something like $9 million. However there was a catch. He had to meet the time requirements that are quite common in today's business world. He had to increase his inventory to a level that would meet the demand requirements of the order from Quebec Hydro.

Despite the fact he walked into the bank he had been doing business with for 20 years with the signed contract in hand, he could not get the bank to lend him the money. It could not happen because it was larger than the bank's policy for that area or because the bank did not understand that a business capable of doing that amount of business could exist in a small rural town in Manitoba. Whatever its rationale the bank did not respond to his need.

The banking system that we protect, that we bail out when it gets into trouble, that we protect because we want to have secure access to capital available for the economy, could not respond to his need. It is a tragedy.

If we look at what we are talking about here and we look at the Carleton study, the average business which received funding under the legislation had 7.5 employees. They have annual sales of roughly three–quarters of a million dollars and before tax profits of just under $50,000. These are the small businesses of the country.

On average 88 per cent of the businesses that received funding under the act created 5.3 new jobs. They did what we have claimed small business would do. If we give them access to capital they will create the jobs and they will create per dollar more jobs than large corporations. That is one of the reasons we agreed to increase the total lending available under the legislation.

Nearly 30 per cent of small businesses reported that as a result of the loans they were able to obtain they became more efficient and decreased their costs and 41.7 per cent reported their loans helped their firms to survive.

I support the legislation. It is a necessary and important change that makes it possible for small businesses in Canada to continue to fulfil a role in our community that is important to all Canadians, the creation of jobs, allowing people to obtain work and live in dignity. This is the foundation of the economy. Why cannot large banks, the banks with the billion dollar profits, find it within their operations to fill this niche? Why can they not find resources within their huge operations to meet the needs of small businesses?

We have a real problem. I was disappointed today to hear the question of the member of the Reform Party from Lloydminster who spoke strongly against regional economic development and against the provision of capital to businesses in western Canada. It showed a profound misunderstanding of some of the problems businesses face.

Another example I will use that came across my desk recently is of a company in Winnipeg, not a small town but a relatively large centre with some financial strength, which is extremely profitable and doing very well in the construction sector. It has lots of work and has never been at risk. All of a sudden its credit lines were changed. It had not defaulted on anything. Its business was still strong. It was doing well. It inquired into why there was a change in the payment of certain bills from 90 days to 30 days.

The answer had nothing to do with western Canada. It had nothing to do with that business. The answer was that losses had been sustained in southern Ontario.

There is a real problem. If we talk to people in medium size businesses in western Canada we find there is a serious problem. They can grow to a certain size but to get above that the capital is not there. Or, if it is there, they have to work harder and pay more for it than a similar business in Toronto. That is not right. That is a failure of the market in the same way that the legislation represents a failure in our banking system.

Those are the places where government can play a role. Those are the places where government can act to ensure that the necessary resources are available so small businesses continue to produce the jobs members of Parliament and our constituents want them to produce.

I support the legislation I am sure all members of our caucus support it. We will be voting for the legislation when it comes forward. We are saddened by the fact that the banking system has been unable to respond to this need. We feel it is such a vitally important area that the government must continue to be involved and strengthen its involvement in support of small business.

CANADA HEALTH ACT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP) moved that Bill C–284, an act to amend the Canada Health Act (conditions for contributions), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am in the happy position today of being able to report to the House that a great deal of progress has been reached on this issue since I introduced this private member's bill. I understand that a protocol such as this bill would have provided for is more than just in the works. There may even be a document outlining the protocol in circulation for comment, although it is hard to pin that down.

I thought the best thing I could do at this point is give a bit of a history of the development of this issue leading up to the present and a few words about where I think it should go now. I thank the hon. member for Hamilton West for seconding the motion.

Many members of the House will be aware that firefighters have been lobbying for a long time for a national contagious diseases reporting protocol. They have their annual lobby on the Hill and they meet with many members of Parliament. This is one of the three or four items they have been stressing for a number of years now.

Firefighters and other emergency responders have been concerned about developing a protocol so that they could be informed if they were likely to have been in contact with a contagious disease in the course of their work and provided with the appropriate medical treatment and counselling in the event of exposure on the job.

In February 1992 NDP labour critic Joy Langan, the former member for Mission—Coquitlam, introduced a private member's bill that found an elegant solution to the constitutional problem which had presented itself with respect to this issue; that this was regarded as being in the provincial jurisdiction.

• (1105)

Her bill would have amended the Canada Health Act to make it necessary for provinces to set up their own protocol if they were to receive federal health funding. The idea was to use the federal spending power in health to establish a contagious diseases protocol in exactly the same way the federal spending power was used to establish medicare nationally and to establish other conditions for the receipt of federal transfer payments for health care. In effect the establishment of this kind of infectious diseases protocol would have been another national standard, so to speak.

Although the bill was never debated in Parliament there was all–party support for the idea among members. After negotiations the NDP at that time managed to get the matter referred to the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare.

The committee held hearings in early 1993 and tabled a report in June of that year. The committee recommended, among other things, that the federal government "encourage the provincial and territorial governments to develop and implement within their jurisdictions a protocol for post–exposure management and follow–up of emergency response personnel exposed to airborne and blood borne diseases". It asked the government to report back to the committee in one year on the progress in establishing such a protocol. This amounted to a substantial endorsement of the principles of Joy Langan's bill.

Although it was too much to ask that the federal bureaucracy actually fulfil the one year deadline set up by the committee, in September 1994 the Liberal government did hold a national symposium on infectious diseases and emergency responders which I attended in part as an observer in my new capacity as the NDP labour critic.

The symposium brought together provincial and federal officials as well as a wide range of stakeholders among emergency responders. The symposium heard very good reports on the development of a protocol in the province of Ontario in which an NDP provincial government at that time, responding to firefighter concerns, had taken the initiative. There was a lot of enthusiasm for its development and application in other provinces and territories.

I say with some pride this was not the first time an NDP provincial government led the way on such issues. By taking the initiative and by doing the pilot project it put pressure on other provinces and the federal government to do likewise. While we are talking about the Canada Health Act this is how we got our publicly funded health care system in the first place, medicare, when the Saskatchewan NDP government of many years ago did a similar thing in the sixties.

I tried to add to the momentum building for a national protocol by tabling a private member's bill early in this Parliament. It was very similar to Joy Langan's but added a section that would have improved the privacy concerns about the release of private medical information. That was one of the concern's about Joy Langan's bill tabled last Parliament.

Even with all this momentum building toward a national protocol, the two private members' bills by NDP members, reports by a House committee and a national symposium and the Ontario protocol, it appeared that in May the government was backing away from a national protocol. I remember asking the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Health about the government's intentions in this regard. She appeared at that time to be washing the government's hands of the issue and she answered me only that health was a provincial responsibility, and that was the end of the matter.

However, the International Association of Fire Fighters, to its credit, kept up the pressure and in June of this year a meeting was held between federal and provincial health officials and other stakeholders in which a national protocol was agreed upon. I have yet to see the final version but it is my understanding the International Association of Fire Fighters was very satisfied with the results of that meeting.

What I understand to have happened between then and now is the federal and provincial governments have agreed to a protocol that would allow emergency workers to learn of any health risks they may have been exposed to in the case of significant exposure to blood borne infectious diseases.

I understand the agreement has built–in protections for the confidentiality of patients' medical records, setting up a procedure through which emergency response personnel who have had significant exposure to blood can contact the local medical officer who in turn seeks information from the hospital on behalf of the affected emergency personnel.

In June the federal government said it would release a document by mid–October. I understand from conversations I have had with the firefighters as recently as Friday that this has not yet been done. I also heard from officials in the health minister's office that at least they think there is a document in circulation for comment.

At this point in the development of this issue there seems to be some confusion. Perhaps whoever is speaking with the knowledge of what goes on inside the government today can clear this up. People feel progress has been made. It certainly appears progress has been made. We had the successful meeting in June, the agreement on a protocol. Firefighters have an understanding of what that protocol will be like. However, there is still no document which outlines the details of that protocol so that firefighters and others like me would be able to respond with some knowledge of what has actually been agreed upon and what the details are.

It would have been nice if that document had been released and in an obvious and available kind of way in mid–October. On the occasion of debating this bill we would have been able to talk about the details of the bill. If there were some constructive criticisms to make they could have been made here or they could have been responded to here. However, we are not in that position now.

Unfortunately with these kinds of things we will not be in this position ever again because the bill will be debated only for this hour; it is not a votable bill. Frankly, given there is this kind of progress, unless we are all being mislead in some way there is really no need for the bill to go to committee or for it to proceed. We do have a protocol but we are not able to comment on the details at this time. I invite members opposite who may be in the know to say more about this.

I do not mean to single this out for special praise or commendation, as there are others, but it is an example of how through the private member's process an issue can be advanced, pushed and kept on the agenda. Eventually the government finds itself in a position to respond because it feels it has to or it finally becomes convinced of the need to respond or it is one of those mysterious political democratic things where at a certain point something becomes acceptable and doable that seemed very difficult to accomplish only a short time ago or yesterday, as one hon. member has said.

I am very glad to see there has been this kind of progress. It is preferable to have happened in this way. We are in a debate now about the imposition of national standards and conditions through the use of federal spending power through the Canada Health Act. It probably would not have been the preferred route given the current political and constitutional climate, shall we say, to have invoked the Canada Health Act as a way of achieving this. Although if push came to shove that procedure was there and that was a way to have the federal government seized of the issue and putting the government in a position where it could not say there was nothing it could do because this was a matter of provincial jurisdiction.

I think federal spending power ought to be used in areas where it is important to delineate and to enforce national standards. In that respect I am sure I have some disagreement with some of my colleagues in the House.

• (1115)

I am attached to the Canada Health Act. I was here in the House when it was passed in April 1984. I was a member of the health and welfare standing committee which studied the bill. There are amendments and phrases in the bill which I moved myself. In my political judgment, the bill owes its existence in part to the pressure which we brought to bear on the government between 1980 and 1984. In fact, in her book, Medicare in Crisis, Monique Bégin openly credits the NDP for the role it played in pressing the government to bring in the Canada Health Act.

I raise all of this because now there is a different third party in the House, our Reform Party colleagues. I often see a stark contrast between what we called for when we were the third party and there was a Liberal government and what the Reform Party is calling for. We said to bring in the Canada Health Act and to eliminate user fees and extra billing. Now the third party in the House is saying: "Get rid of the Canada Health Act and let us not have national standards any more. Let us permit the provinces to do what they will". There are two competing visions of what is a national government.

One of my concerns today as we contemplate the vote in Quebec, is that regardless of the outcome, if I hear the Prime Minister and others correctly, even if there is a no vote we are on the verge of major decentralization. I urge my Liberal colleagues, no matter what changes may be undertaken in response to a no vote by way of decentralization, that what we achieved together, the NDP and the Liberal government at the time, on the Canada Health Act and the notion that when it comes to health care there are values, procedures and standards we all hold in common as Canadians wherever we live from coast to coast to coast, be held up and not surrendered in the wake of a no vote.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Private Members' Bill C–284, an act to amend the Canada Health Act.

Let me say at the outset that I am extremely sympathetic and supportive of the plight and concerns of emergency response workers. Their devotion to preserving and protecting the lives of others often puts them unwittingly at risk of injury or exposure to disease. They are not aware of what the patient is carrying.

I understand and support the motive behind Bill C–284. Unfortunately, the Canada Health Act is the wrong instrument. The amendment is not within the scope of the act. The Canada Health Act sets out the broad principles under which the provinces are expected to operate medicare. An amendment dealing with the disclosure of infectious diseases is inconsistent with this purpose.

While the protection of health care workers from contagious diseases is an extremely worthwhile public health objective, the Canada Health Act is not the proper vehicle by which to achieve this. Let me explain.

Our health care insurance system is composed of 12 interlocking plans which are managed at the provincial and territorial levels. The federal health insurance legislation, which is what the Canada Health Act of 1984 is, establishes the criteria provincial plans must meet in order to qualify for a full share of federal health care transfers. Federal transfer payments may be reduced or withheld if a province contravenes the conditions of the act.

I will discuss these criteria, the cornerstones of Canada's health care system.

There is accessibility, which means access to medically required services regardless of ability to pay. That translates into no charges at point of service. There is comprehensiveness, which means a comprehensive range of medically required services. Universality means the coverage of all provincial residents must be given equally regardless of pre–existing conditions or diseases. Portability ensures that benefits go from province to province and abroad. Finally, public administration of medicare means that the plan must operate on a non–profit basis.

• (1120)

In addition to those five principles, the Canada Health Act requires that provinces provide medicare information to the federal minister when she needs it. In order to qualify for federal cash contributions, provinces also need to give recognition to the fact that the federal government does transfer payments.

The Canada Health Act also discourages extra billing or user fees. If this is broken, there will be automatic dollar for dollar reductions or withholdings of federal cash contributions to that province or territory. The threat that user charges and extra billing would erode accessibility to medicare was a major reason for the development of the Canada Health Act in the first place. It was enacted to protect those five fundamental principles of medicare I just spoke about. Nearly all provinces have committed themselves to upholding these principles even while making needed reforms to the system.

Canadians support the five principles and feel that medicare is a defining Canadian value. Results of a recent poll indicate that support for these national principles is higher than ever.

The Canada Health Act which defines medicare is close to the hearts of Canadians. It is something too risky to tamper with. The amendments to change the Canada Health Act as proposed in Bill C–284 by my hon. colleague cannot be supported.

The amendments ask that the name and nature of an infectious or contagious disease be disclosed to emergency response workers who may have been unknowingly exposed to that disease. While I support this objective, the amendments themselves affect the definition of hospital services. This will change the Canada Health Act criteria which deals only with the principles and funding of medicare. Rules are set out concerning the non–compliance with the Canada Health Act and are part of the act.

In short, Bill C–284 asks that provincial and territorial plans impose a responsibility on hospitals to disclose to emergency response employees whether a patient to whom they are providing service has an infectious or contagious disease which is fine. However, it seeks to do this by making it a criteria of the Canada Health Act.

The disclosure of infectious or contagious diseases is a public health issue. It is not of the same nature as the principles and funding issues in the Canada Health Act. The protection of emergency response personnel is not even close to the purpose of the Canada Health Act.

Moreover, the act deals with the organization and delivery of health care services at the provincial and territorial levels and not with the regulation of internal operations of hospitals which falls under provincial and territorial jurisdiction. It would be intrusive to ask the federal government to impose on or intrude into the federal–provincial primary responsibility for hospital management which is a constitutionally protected right.

Moreover, Bill C–284 raises issues with regard to civil laws and rights and privacy laws in the provinces and territories. The federal government cannot really interfere in these issues.

What I am trying to say is that worthwhile though the member's intent may be, the Canada Health Act is not the proper place to regulate such matters which constitutionally fall under provincial jurisdiction and should be better handled at that level. The federal government cannot dictate to a province or territory how to run its health care plan, much less tell it how to run institutions. All it can do under the Canada Health Act is to place conditions on transfer payments to the provinces and territories.

At a meeting of health ministers in Victoria recently, provincial and territorial ministers reaffirmed their support for the principles of the act and agree to continue to collaborate in interpreting and applying its provisions. Provincial and territorial ministers agreed with the federal Minister of Health to work together to develop a vision for the future of medicare.

• (1125)

Contrary to the misunderstanding of certain parties, the Canada Health Act is not an impediment to the management changes which are needed to meet medicare's challenges. In fact, the flexibility inherent in the act has always been one of its strengths.

Since the enactment of the act in 1984, the federal government has attempted to work with the provinces in order to make the act a viable piece of legislation. The federal government recognizes that provinces and territories have primary responsibility for the management, organization and the delivery of health care services, including institutions and health care providers. Sufficient flexibility to operate and administer their health care insurance plans is obviously necessary if they are to meet the regional and local needs and conditions.

At the August conference, provincial premiers and territorial leaders were unanimous in their support of the publicly funded national health care system and reaffirmed their commitment to the principles of the Canada Health Act. It would be dangerous therefore, to tamper with those principles when they have received such wholehearted support. If we want medicare to survive, we must be vigilant against seemingly innocuous tampering as against more blatant threats such as user charges which as we know arise now and then.

I come back to the point that while the protection of health care workers is a serious concern and one which I share with the hon. member, the Canada Health Act is not the vehicle with which to address it. At the same time, the department has been involved with the prevention of infectious diseases and the protection of emergency response personnel for a very long time and is continuing to work with them on issues of concern. Let me give a few examples of our recent achievements in this area.

In 1994 a national symposium on risk and prevention of infectious diseases for emergency response personnel was held to explore the same question the member is talking about and to look at implementing where possible preventive and protective actions for those workers.

In June of this year a consensus conference was held with the objective of establishing guidelines the provinces and territories could use to develop and implement an infectious disease notification protocol for emergency responders. These guidelines are good examples of how the provinces and territories look to the federal government to provide a leadership and co–ordinating role in discussing issues related to health protection.

I have confidence in the ability of emergency response workers as the ones who are best qualified to seek solutions in conjunction with their provincial and territorial governments, health professionals and experts in infectious diseases. They have our support.

The Canada Health Act which protects our universal and comprehensive health care system agrees with that commitment. However, facing the challenges and finding solutions to problems which arise over the years took commitment as well and the commitment is still there today.

Today we can look back with pride on our past accomplishments, but we cannot be satisfied to rest on our laurels. The systems and the federal provincial relationships face many challenges and the issue raised by Bill C–284 is such a challenge. To this end, we as a federal Ministry of Health have taken the appropriate steps to support the concerns and efforts of the emergency response workers. At the same time the federal government cannot support an amendment which has no place in the Canada Health Act.

I encourage all hon. members to participate in the discussion of this issue with emergency response workers at the constituency level and to take appropriate steps to assist them in this important and worthy objective.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–284 today, an act to amend the Canada Health Act, sponsored by the member for Winnipeg—Transcona.

The purpose of the bill is "to incite the provinces to make sure that the health care insurance plan of a province provides for the obligation for hospitals to disclose to emergency response employees who provide emergency medical or rescue services to a patient, the name and nature of an infectious or contagious disease that the patient might have transmitted to them". The essence of this bill is to ensure the safety of those who work in medical or rescue operations who are at risk of being exposed by an infectious or contagious disease.

The dedication of the people to whom this bill is addressed is to be commended and admired. I have talked with different emergency response workers and know their dedication and the risk they face each time they respond to an emergency. These professionals are police officers, firefighters, emergency medical technicians and paramedics.

• (1130)

I can agree with the intent of the bill. However, I disagree with the the means by which it seeks to accomplish and implement that purpose. Specifically, the bill seeks to amend the Canada Health Act by adding additional criteria to the list.

I must agree with the Liberal parliamentary secretary that the Canada Health Act is not the vehicle for this. I will go on to explain why.

Clause 2 of the bill amends section 7 of the Canada Health Act. Section 7 outlines the principles of the Canada Health Act. These are public administration, comprehensiveness, universality, portability and accessibility. The bill would add an additional criteria to that list and that is the disclosure of infectious or contagious diseases.

The Reform Party has consistently demonstrated how the Canada Health Act has allowed the federal government and others to play a carrot and stick game with the provinces. The carrot is the money that the federal government transfers to the provinces for medicare. The stick is the heavy handedness of the Canada Health Act that allows the federal government to financially penalize the provinces.

Sections 14 and 15 of the Canada Health Act allow the federal government and the health minister to financially penalize provinces if the minister has found that the province is in violation of sections 8 to 13 of the act. These sections deal with the five principles, as I have mentioned, of public administration, comprehensiveness, universality, portability and accessibility and finally, the conditions for the cash contributions or payments to those provinces.

The bill adds an additional criteria to a list that Reform members feel is intrusive already. It adds the disclosure of infectious or contagious diseases. By adding it to the program criteria of section 7 of the Canada Health Act, it would create another basis for the federal government to financially penalize these provinces. We have just gone through a recent example of how the federal government imposes its will on provinces with the issue, debated in this House, of private clinics in Alberta and other provinces.

Although the purpose and the intent of the bill is commendable, I disagree with the way it is designed to legislate that purpose.

Reform has a different and fresh philosophy to approach medicare in Canada. Our approach, and we call it medicare plus, contains the following: first, we reaffirm that the value of medicare is the best health care safety net in the world. Second, we would define medicare as Canada's comprehensive set of core national health standards, publicly funded, portable across Canada and universally accessible to all Canadians, regardless of their ability to pay. These are essentially the principles that now exist in the Canada Health Act.

We differ from the Canada Health Act and from the view of the government and the approach taken in this bill by removing the restrictions and the ability of the federal government to penalize provinces within these criteria. That is the plus of medicare plus and the third of our proposals. We would give provinces greater flexibility to administer and deliver the health services within their own respective jurisdiction. That is our general philosophy and our approach to federal involvement in medicare.

It would apply to Bill C–284 as well. We believe the provinces should decide whether or not to pass legislation on the disclosure of infectious or contagious diseases rather than be compelled by a federal government through the Canada Health Act.

As my colleague mentioned today, in June there was a federal–provincial notification protocol established in this area. This dealt with blood borne diseases and took into account the confidentiality concerns and the procedures that would result. I commend the government for proceeding in this direction.

One question I have today of the government, as my colleague also had, is why this was not proceeded with and then the information given to the people discussing the bill today? Again this is a reflection of the inactivity in the House or the lack of proaction on real measures that need to be addressed within this place. This is unfair to Canadians, specifically to the emergency response personnel for instance within this very bill.

• (1135)

Bill C–284 illustrates once again the failure of the government to proceed with substantive steps in the proper areas where Canadians need things addressed.

Generally my philosophy would be that it is grassroots not Ottawa that must reform an ailing health care system in terms of the Canada Health Act. Bill C–284 speaks to increased federal control over a medicare system that is increasingly unaffordable at the federal level. Ottawa's share of our medicare system was originally 50 per cent and is now down to approximately 24 per cent or less. Its share will likely disappear within 10 to 15 years.

The symptoms that we see are bed closures. In my own provinces hospitals have closed. There are long waiting lists, up to seven to twelve weeks for procedures. There has been a de–listing of medical services so that each province may have a different base from which to work. There is reduced medical coverage for Canadians travelling abroad. As important as any of the others, there has been an exodus of some of our expert medical personnel from our land.

Reform says that the five program criteria should be maintained but we have to re–examine the definition of those program criteria. We have to allow room for provinces to exercise administrative jurisdictions over the funding and delivery of our health care system. The crisis in our country is not what is done but of federal government intrusion into provincial jurisdiction.

Today, we think of Canada as a grand old house that has fallen into a serious state of disrepair. Today I stand with great trepidation as I see the foundations of that house facing a great test. It is true that the house of our nation has an unsustainable mortgage. It has a cracked foundation. It has serious problems with some of the ways that the walls are fitting together and how the communications work within that house.

However, within the last few days I have seen many Canadians speak out with a great love and a newly discovered feeling of the importance of this country to them. This is all the more reason that I feel today it is time for the government to recognize that there has to be a new relationship within this House, new federal–provincial relationships outside the Constitution. Our own party has suggested 20 ways where we can bring provinces and the federal government together so that as a nation we can stand together today and tomorrow in order to make this country work.

Decentralizing those powers includes a medicare system that works for all Canadians, that is sustainable and that will be here today and tomorrow. I challenge the government to change our medicare system so that it will work. I also challenge the government to look at many other things, as we have suggested, so that we have a Canada today and tomorrow.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the subject of a private member's bill, C–284, an act to amend the Canada Health Act.

Under the Canadian Constitution the responsibility for health care falls primarily under the jurisdiction of the provincial and territorial governments. In other words, the provinces and the territories have a primary responsibility for the provision and delivery of health care services to the people of Canada.

This means that they act as planners, managers and administrators of their own health care systems. In practical terms, this includes negotiation of budgets with hospitals, approval of capital plans and the negotiation of fee agreements with medical associations. For its part the federal government by law is responsible for the promotion and preservation of the health of all Canadians. The Department of Health is responsible for bringing together parties on health issues of a national and interprovincial concern.

• (1140)

The federal government also assumes a responsibility for setting national policies and for providing health care services to specific groups such as treaty Indians as well as the Inuit.

It is appropriate when describing federal responsibilities in health care to note what the federal government cannot do. It cannot interfere in provincial and territorial responsibilities as defined under our Constitution. Nor can it be seen to be infringing on these responsibilities.

Bill C–284 attempts to require provincial and territorial health insurance plans to impose a responsibility on hospitals to disclose to emergency response employees whether a patient to whom they are providing service has an infectious or a contagious disease. I sympathize with the concerns of emergency response workers. They must be commended for accepting the fact that they are at risk of exposure to diseases that may not be completely preventable in serving the public.

Indeed my wife and several members of my family are employed in the health care field as well as in the emergency response field. Therefore I understand and support the motives behind Bill C–284.

However, it is the provinces and territories that are responsible for all matters dealing with their hospitals. This represents what would be perceived as an intrusion on provincial and territorial responsibilities under our Constitution. It is not an easy solution as one would think. There is in this country a longstanding partnership between the federal, provincial and territorial governments with regard to health care.

The enactment of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act of 1957 and the Medical Care Act, 1966–67 established a framework for this partnership between governments. At this time the federal government provides a sharing of the cost of medically necessary hospital and physician services in return for the adherence of the provincial and territorial health insurance plans through the principles of a national program.

Federal legislation, the the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act recognized the constitutional position of provincial and territorial governments and left each with the responsibility of administering its respective plans.

Concerns over hospital user fees and extra billing by physicians led to the passage of the Canadian Health Act in 1984. This was achieved with all–party support. The federal government's aim in passing the Canada Health Act was to reaffirm its commitment to the original guiding principles expressed in earlier legislation. It was also to provide a mechanism to promote the provinces' and territories' compliance with the act's criteria, conditions and extra billing and user charge provisions.

In short, the Canada Health Act was intended to encourage reasonable access to necessary health care services on a prepaid basis for every resident of Canada. The provinces and territories have retained their responsibility of administering their health insurance plans under the Canada Health Act. They continue to be responsible for negotiations with physicians and hospitals.

Since the introduction of government sponsored health insurance, physicians have been free of the administrative constraints of managed care found in the United States and this continues under the Canada Health Act. Hospitals retain the freedom to charge for semi–private or private rooms and for meals and accommodations for chronically ill patients who are more or less permanently resident in hospitals.

The Canada Health Act's criteria is known to most Canadians and regarded as the defining principles of medicare. The principles of public administration, comprehensiveness, universality, portability and accessibility are valued and cherished by Canadians who will not accept changes to them. The results of a recent poll indicate that support for these national principles remain at an all–time high.

Provincial and territorial ministers of health share this support. On many occasions the provincial and territorial ministers reaffirmed their support for the principles of the act and their agreement to continue co–operation in interpreting and applying its provisions.

The Canada Health Act's criteria relate to the organization and delivery of health care services at the level of provincial and territorial health insurance plans. Bill C–284 proposes to add disclosure of infectious or contagious diseases to the Canada Health Act's criteria. However this addition deals with a hospital requirement, while the Canada Health Act pertains to provincial and territorial health insurance plans.

If such legislation could be enacted we would be concerned that it may give false assurances to emergency workers and their families that if they are not informed they are not infected. Unfortunately some diseases may not be detectable, at least using current methods, until some time after the infection. Solutions must be sought to meet this problem.

• (1145)

Health Canada has been involved with the prevention of infectious diseases and the protection of emergency response personnel for a very long time. Let me give a few examples of our recent achievements in this area. In 1994 a national symposium on risk and prevention of infectious diseases for emergency response personnel was held to explore the risks emergency responders face and the preventive and protective activities presently available.

In June 1995 a consensus conference was held with the objective of establishing guidelines the provinces and territories could use to develop and implement an infectious disease notification protocol for emergency responders. These guidelines are a good example of how the provinces and territories look to the federal government to provide a leadership role in issues related to health protection.

I also have confidence in the ability of emergency response workers themselves, as those who are admirably qualified to find solutions, to join with us to alleviate the risk of infection along with the provincial and territorial health departments, health professionals and experts in infectious diseases. Given the large burden for our health that emergency response workers carry, I am sure that provincial and territorial governments are sympathetic, supportive and eager to co–operatively find solutions. I know I am.

The evolution of federal, provincial and territorial relations in health care has maintained a distinction in federal, provincial and territorial roles in health care, which is consistent with the Constitution's definition of jurisdiction. This is clearly stated in the preamble of the Canada Health Act:

> that it is not the intention of the Government of Canada that any of the powers, rights, privileges or authorities vested in Canada or the Provinces under the provisions of The Constitution Act, 1867 (formerly the British North America Act, 1867), or any amendments thereto, or otherwise, be by reason of this Act abrogated or derogated from or in any way impaired;

Some would argue that to pass Bill C–284 would disrupt this historical distinction and balance and for this reason it cannot be supported by the federal government.

I encourage all hon. members to participate in discussions about this important concern in their communities in order to find a way to protect the emergency response workers whose job it is to protect us all. Few would argue the fact that the problem is serious. It is incumbent on all levels of government to hammer out a solution. The time is now.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, while I wholeheartedly endorse the spirit of Bill C–284, a private member's initiative moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, which I had the privilege of seconding, I cannot see where we can support his idea to put it through the Canada Health Act.

Perhaps what we have to do today is not talk about what we cannot do. I have to agree with the position taken by the parliamentary secretary. She very eloquently put forward the reasons we cannot put it through the Canada Health Act, as was proposed by the member for Winnipeg Transcona; rather, we should find a mechanism, a way to accomplish our goal.

Since I was elected in 1988, firefighters from Hamilton and across this great country have been lobbying legislators to set up a contagious disease protocol. They stress, and all of us who have heard their lobby agree, that it should be of national importance, which it is; that it must be co–ordinated nationally, and we agree; that we should establish national standards and conditions, which can happen. We need a way to administer the protocol that is being proposed.

The international association of firefighters has been meeting with provincial and federal representatives since June. They have had quite a bit to say about this. There have been some resolutions. Progress is being made. Maybe the amendments being put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona are a worthwhile public health objective and need to be examined.

The purpose of Bill C–284 is to incite the provinces to ensure that the health care insurance plan of a province provides for the obligation for hospitals to disclose to emergency response employees who provide emergency medical or rescue services to a patient the name and nature of an infectious or contagious disease the patient might have transmitted to them.

As I said at the outset, maybe we have to look at what we can do. What we can do is search out a central organization that would work with the hospitals to create that information–sharing proposal. I wonder if the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has considered approaching the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. That particular centre, which is located in my riding of Hamilton West, receives a government subsidy, although it has been cut back. To its credit, it has been sharing information with the private sector and actually selling a product to employees and companies, both here in Canada and in the United States, to obtain the money it needs.

I wonder if the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has approached the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, which has created a database of infectious diseases, of products different companies across the nation use in their workplaces, et cetera. For example, the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety is there for the major corporations in product identification. It is also there for an individual employee, someone who may be working on the shop floor in Winnipeg when a drum spills over and some glop pours out. The employee can see that the barrel is marked XT–2000. He is not sure what XT–2000 is, so he calls the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety to find out what the product is and whether it will be harmful to his health.

I wonder if the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, in looking for a way to accomplish a very credible goal, has looked at the options. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Health made it quite clear today that it is not really in the domain of the federal government, but rather a central organization. This could address the opportunities the member spoke of, could satisfy the needs of the medical emergency personnel and rescue services people who are responding to the patient who might have an infectious or contagious disease.

Maybe we could use this opportunity to dovetail with organizations that by consequence are also today forming partnerships with the private sector. It is the private sector that understands that this database is beneficial. If the private sector finds that it is worth while, then it can share its information with the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, which can also share its information with hospitals provincially.

Let us germinate the seed today. This is an option the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona can look at. Having seconded the bill, I would be more than happy to sit down with him and get together with officials in Hamilton at the CCOHS to try to accomplish the very worthwhile goal this member and other members of the House have been trying to achieve since I was elected in 1988 and even before that time.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Since there are no more hon. members left to speak and the motion has not been selected to be voted on, the time provided for consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96, the item is dropped from the Order Paper.

[English]

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, perhaps the Chair would suspend for about four minutes and then we could proceed to government orders.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the intervention of the chief government whip. Is there unanimous consent to suspend the House until 12 o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(The sitting of the House was suspended at 11.56 a.m.)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 12 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CONTROLLED DRUGS AND SUBSTANCES ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–7, an act respecting the control of certain drugs, their precursors and other substances and to amend certain other acts and repeal the Narcotic Control Act in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the committee.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.) moved:

That Bill C–7, in clause 60, be amended by replacing lines 13 to 15, on page 44, with the following:

"portion of an item, after the governor in council has consulted with those persons who will be directly affected by the amendment".

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand unanimous consent is being sought to debate the amendment, even though it was not moved previously. I indicate to the Chair that we do not have any objection to it. We concur, with the understanding that we will immediately go to third reading after the amendment is disposed of.

Mr. Hill (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, we are seeking unanimous support and agree to third reading going ahead with the same support.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Hill (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–7 has been a complex bill that has taken some time going through the House. There is some vast improvement in the bill by opening up choice in the health food industry.

However the power to make regulation is still flawed in relation to the bill. The particular clause we have zeroed in on is clause 60:

The governor in council may, by order, amend any of schedules I to VI by adding to them or deleting from them any item or portion of an item, where the governor in council deems the amendment to be necessary in the public interest.

I have a few words to say about that clause. I believe it is dictatorial, arbitrary and opaque. Other words that come to mind are words like behind closed doors. This ability should not rest in the hands of a few. The particular amendment suggested will address a significant flaw.

One of my colleagues will speak at length on the issue a little later.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the third party amendment to clause 60 of Bill C–7.

I agree with the hon. member, the bill is a complex and at times controversial bill. All parties were eventually unanimous in the substantive changes and amendments to the bill that improve the bill a great deal.

However I speak to the specific amendment of the hon. member to clause 60 that would read:

"portion of an item, after the governor in council has consulted with those persons who will be directly affected by the amendment".

The purpose of the amendment is to get the governor in council to consult with those who would be directly affected by a change in schedule made by the governor in council.

There is already in place a democratic process within the machinery of government that answers the particular concern the hon. member for Macleod brought forward. Government is required to consult with those who will be affected by the proposal and the public at large before making any changes.

• (1205)

The only exception to this requirement is where public safety is concerned and where on an urgent and emergency basis one needs to make a change to the schedule within 24 hours. Even then there is a process wherein an emergency scheduling provision in the interests of safety of the public would allow it to happen.

Turning to the broader process the member is speaking about, the process provides for the machinery of government. Government is required to prepublish for a minimum period of 30 days in the Canada Gazette, part I, any proposal to change scheduling. The prepublication period may vary, depending on the nature of the proposal.

For example, if the proposal was to have international implications and would therefore have impact on GATT, there is an agreement in GATT that there would be a minimum of 75 days of prepublication to allow other countries to respond. Not only would interested parties respond if this were done, but they would respond at a national level.

Any citizen at all could provide comments or suggestions about the content of the proposal and about their concerns on the proposal. The government would then be obliged to report to the governor in council on those consultations, the feedback or input from parties directly affected, from concerned citizens or from the public at large. It would also have to report on the proposed remedies to be brought forth to address concerns. If this amendment represents a major shift in the original proposal, and if the concerned parties that have had input want another shift, there is a requirement to prepublish once again to discuss the new shift.

As all the bells, whistles and hoops have been jumped through in the process already, I fail to see what the hon. member's amendment would do to improve the process in any way, shape or form. It is already public. It is already open to disclosure. If disclosure requires change there is a requirement for further disclosure and for a further period of 30 days to discuss it. As I said before, internationally there is a requirement to prepublish for 75 days.

There is a fail safe mechanism already there to answer the hon. member's concerns about the issue.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak to the amendment to clause 60 of Bill C–7. It states that the clause should be amended by replacing lines 13 to 15 on page 44 with the following:

> "portion of an item, after the governor in council has consulted with those persons who will be directly affected by the amendment".

The parliamentary secretary responded to the amendment by asking why we need it. We already have the proper bells and whistles in place to deal with the public consultation process.

The parliamentary secretary to the health minister is correct. The amendment will put in place the requirement for public discussion and public consultation on changes to the bill.

In many pieces of legislation the Liberals have succeeded in taking more and more power from the people by putting in place the ability to make changes to legislation through the governor in council. This is one such move on the part of the government. The most important example in Bill C–68, the gun control legislation, gives incredible power to the governor in council. Bill C–61 deals with several agricultural acts and gives the minister and the bureaucrats the power to impose fines of up to $15,000 with the onus on the people fined to prove their innocence. That is one negative point about the legislation. Another is the control given through the governor in council without debate happening in the House. That is not democratic.

Unfortunately the anti–democratic move in the bill that gives more power and ability to make more decisions through governor in council is not unusual. The government has shown in many ways that it does not want to make things more democratic in the House. We have seen what has happened to members who dared to vote against their party line or against the government on bills such as the gun control bill, Bill C–41. I could name others. These members have been punished harshly for voting differently than the party position. They have been thrown off committees and the Prime Minister publicly threatened to refuse to sign their nomination papers. What kind of a democracy is that?

The amendment will at least ensure a small amount of consultation. Liberal consultation is different from the Reform's version of consultation. Reform believes that when we go to the people to ask for consultations we really want to hear what they have to say and to act on it. The Liberals have shown that is not what they see as consultation. For example, in the gun control bill the justice minister's idea of consultation was to have meetings to which people attended by invitation only. Other interested people were not welcome. That was complete and utter nonsense. The amendment will in a small way give a bit of the power back to the people by requiring consultation.

I will refer to a couple of other amendments but first I will show that this amendment has in a small way dealt with the concerns of some of my constituents. I have found that Bill C–7 and the changes to the legislation are very important to people in my constituency. Many people have come to me in public meetings asking questions about specific clauses of the legislation, and this is one of them. People have written letters to me that refer to specific clauses of the legislation.

I will read a letter from one of my constituents. It is a form letter but personal comments are included with it. It represents the concerns of a wide number of people, often people who want access to herbs, spices or other traditional medicines. They do not want the pharmaceutical companies or the government to be able to limit access to these products in some way. It is very important to them.

The letter states:

> I'm writing to request that Bill C–7 be withdrawn.

That is what should have happened with the legislation. It should have been withdrawn or at least large parts of it should have been withdrawn. It is an omnibus bill that deals with many parts of the act. It is so broad or wide ranging that I wonder how the House of Commons can be asked to vote on the bill. It would be far more useful to have more specific legislation dealing with similar concerns.

Not all parts of the legislation should be thrown out. There are many good parts. However, because it is an omnibus bill and deals with a wide range of issues, parts of it should certainly be thrown out. The letter refers to the parts this constituent feels should be thrown out. A good summary of the legislation is given:

> Bill C–7, the Controlled Substances Act, combines the Narcotic Control Act with the portions of the Food and Drugs Act. Combining criminal law with regulatory health is inappropriate and puts my right to buy natural health products in serious jeopardy.
> Bill C–7 is a Criminal Code framework which would implicate many common herbal remedies and natural supplements because of their "stimulant" or "relaxant" properties. I believe that public safety can be ensured without Criminal Code restrictions on food supplements—

• (1215)

Mr. Szabo: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My understanding of the rules of this place is that a speaker must speak to the subject matter before the House. We are now dealing at report stage with a specific amendment. The member is speaking about the whole bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): With the greatest of respect, that is a matter of debate and not a point of order.

Mr. Benoit: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised by the continual interruptions on the part of members opposite when we try to make a point on behalf of our constituents.

It was important enough for my constituents to write this letter to me. The member does not want to let me rise in the House to read a letter which shows how this amendment has at least in some small way dealt with this concern. It is anti–democratic—and one more thing, the Liberal way. It is not what we expect in the House. I become upset when I have this type of an interruption.

The letter goes on to say:

> Further, I object that the control of any bioactive components or synthetic analogues of natural herbs by Bill C–7 will replace criminal sanctions to the herbs themselves.
>
> Health Canada should not be allowed to seize, remove or illegalize safe products from the shelves of distributors or hold them at the border without clear and convincing evidence of a lack of safety or misbranding. Health Canada should bear the burden of proof.
> I believe that natural herbs and health supplements do not belong in the Criminal Code. These products should be considered as dietary supplements and regulated as such. Natural substances should not be considered as drugs.
> I expect that you will represent my interests and oppose Bill C–7.

We will of course oppose Bill C–7. If this amendment does pass, and I would be surprised if it did not, all it does is put in place a consultation process. There is nothing guaranteeing it will be a valid consultation process but it is certainly a move forward. The onus will be on the government to show that it has consulted.

If we as an opposition party ask the government to show us it has consulted, it will be forced to at least demonstrate that it has had some consultation with all interested parties.

Other things have happened with this bill; other amendments and really the deletion of one clause I think has been extremely important. I credit my colleague, the member for Macleod, for successfully having clause 3(1) removed. It is certainly an important change to this legislation.

• (1220)

Clause 3(1):

> For purposes of this act a substance included in schedules I, II or III shall be deemed to include any substance;
> (a) that is produced, processed or provided by a person who intends that it be introduced into the body of another person for the purpose of producing a stimulant, depressant or hallucinogenic effect substantially similar to or greater than that of a substance included in schedule I, II or III, and that, if so introduced, would produce such a substantially similar or greater effect; or
> (b) that is represented or held out to produce, if introduced into a human body, a stimulant, depressant or hallucinogenic effect substantially similar to or greater than that of a substance included in schedule I, II or III.

Again I congratulate my colleague for successfully having that clause thrown out. That is a substantial change to this bill and it will help. Unfortunately there are still so many concerns—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I regret the member's time has elapsed at report stage.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

(Motion negatived.)

Hon. David Dingwall (for the Minister of Health, Lib.) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

(Motion agreed to.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): When shall the bill be read the third time? By unanimous consent now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Dingwall (for the Minister of Health) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of Bill C–7.

The revisions to the bill, the changes made since it passed second reading in the House, combine two quite different approaches to the control of drugs. The approaches are different but they are actually complementary.

The first enshrines an attitude of tolerance, compassion and concern for the drug addicted person. The government believes that someone convicted of a drug offence, a user who shows genuine desire to recover from his or her addiction, deserves the chance and opportunity to rebuild and renew their lives on a healthy, law–abiding basis.

This component speaks therefore of rehabilitation and speaks to the health aspect of drug use.

• (1225)

The second approach is to reinforce our longstanding condemnation of violent behaviour or any drug dealing that harms our youth and other vulnerable citizens.

The government believes drug offences and the negative social impact of drug offences escalate directly in proportion to the age of the person, which means the younger the person, the greater the social and physical harm that occurs as a result of the use of drugs.

These approaches to the control of drugs reflect the spirit of the red book "Creating Opportunity". A principal objective of this book is to strengthen Canadian society by protecting individuals from crime and violence on the streets and in the playgrounds.

Bill C–7 works to achieve this end. It clearly identifies a need for extra protection against crimes around schools where young people are involved. However, it goes further in creating opportunity. It creates opportunity for offenders to get treatment. It creates opportunity for enforcement to be more effective. It creates opportunity for the justice system to deal more even handedly with the various substances and offences that are the subject of the bill.

Bill C–7 is more than a housekeeping bill. It achieves a balance between the need for compassionate health and social components of drug use and the need to punish and deal with the criminal and violent aspects of drug use.

True to this purpose, we have brought the Narcotic Control Act and parts of the Food and Drugs Act together to deal with controlled substances and narcotic preparations. It modernizes procedure to a certain extent. It expands control over a wider range of substances, but it is more comprehensive than that.

In the case of one substance that has caused major concern for policy makers and the public over many years, it incorporates a revised and more current understanding of how Canadians want to deal with marijuana. Cannabis and its derivatives from now on will have a distinct schedule in the bill, schedule I(i). Cannabis has been set apart from other hard drugs. It is being treated separately.

As we will see from this amended bill, government has taken very seriously the concerns expressed by witnesses of committee hearings and also by members of the House who have come together to tell us what they think of the bill. I am therefore pleased to say changes and measures have been instituted in order to reflect a more Liberal policy with regard to harm reduction, rehabilitation and the societal aspects of drug use.

Hon. members know the consultative process is inherent and very important in the parliamentary committee system. Committees collect the views of people on the street. One of the strengths of the process is that it brings forward a range of opinions and perspectives not necessarily obvious to those who prepare the original drafts of legislation. On this note I congratulate all members of the subcommittee from all parties and thank all witnesses who provided testimony on this legislation.

When we start talking about illicit substances such as marijuana and cocaine people want to broaden the horizons. Many of the witnesses who came to the subcommittee on health were not really addressing Bill C–7 specifically. They wanted to put broader issues on the agenda such as a more socially responsible approach to dealing with cannabis. It is argued there may be times when people are guilty of simple possession by aberration. They have been to a party, accepted a gift and have been caught. In such a circumstance the criminal mark should not be on record for the rest of their lives.

It cannot be denied that a large number of Canadians are at least tolerant of soft drug use. They have heard a former Prime Minister and the President of the United States admit to experimenting with marijuana. They see courts routinely granting absolute or conditional discharges for simple possession charges while imposing fines for simple traffic violations.

Some people in the subcommittee were even saying we should decriminalize marijuana. However, by international law we cannot decriminalize it. We have to consider it a criminal offence but we can deal with the consequences associated with marijuana. That is one of the changes that has come through in this newly amended bill.

Specifically for possession of marijuana, 30 grams or less, we have reduced the seriousness of the offence. The negative impact on someone charged with this offence will be changed. No fingerprints or photographs will be taken by police officers. No traceable record will appear in national criminal databases. The law has been modified.

This does not mean that the penalties have been reduced. They have not. The penalty for possession of 30 grams or less of cannabis continues to be a $1,000 fine or six months or both. It is the ancillary impacts that will change. A conviction on this charge will not curb one's ability to travel internationally, for instance. It will not interfere with getting a job.

Another concern raised in subcommittee was to put something in the bill to ask the courts to move toward rehabilitation and treatment instead of automatically treating all users as hardened criminals. Therefore the introduction of section 11, which deals with sentencing, addresses this concern. Judges are encouraged to order rehabilitation and treatment in appropriate circumstances.

This said, it was not the government's intention that the bill would alter or review existing drug policy. It was meant to bring aspects of administration up to date from existing legislation that dates back to the 1960s and it gives effect to Canada's commitments on the various international agreements dealing with narcotics and psychotropic substances.

There is a change in penalties for trafficking in three kilograms of cannabis or less. Here the maximum penalty is lowered from 14 years down to 5 years less a day. The reason for this is not because the gravity of the offence has been diminished. In fact the subcommittee wanted to deal with trafficking as harshly. However, the lesser sentence achieves another goal: it leads to a streamlining of the judicial process. It hastens cases through the courts by eliminating requirements for preliminary hearings and trials by jury. It is not expected to change actual sentencing patterns. Even though the courts have been able to go to 14 years, they have not really been giving sentences anywhere near that length.

From now on drug charges will represent the true offences. Until now, when trafficking has been the issue prosecutors would often reduce it to a possession charge rather than proceed through a full pre–trial and trial by jury. Now prosecutors will be more likely to lay the charges they should have been laying. In fact there is no intention to give any signal that the penalties that are currently being given for the offence are not appropriate. This is not getting soft on traffickers. Streamlining the prosecution of these offences would be a net gain for the criminal justice process but would not mean an actual reduction in sentences given current practice.

I alluded to the approach this bill takes to discouraging violence and any drug dealings involving youth. The approach is simply the following. Offences under Bill C–7 have penalties attached to them, including imprisonment. Judges have discretion in sentencing and may choose not to impose a prison sentence in any particular case. However, if an offence is accompanied by violence or the threat of violence, or if it takes place in or near the grounds of a school, or if it involves dealing with someone under the age of 18, the court is to consider any of these circumstances an aggravating factor. If it decides in such a case not to impose a prison sentence, then the bill requires that the court give reasons for such a decision.

There are very substantive changes between the current Bill C–7 we are discussing and its original version. I have mentioned the instructions to the court to consider rehabilitation and treatment at sentencing and the reduction in the impact of a conviction for simple possession of cannabis. The following is a representative sample of a dozen or more other changes to the bill.

The previous subsection 3(1), which dealt with controlling unlisted substances that have an effect similar to scheduled drugs, has been completely removed. It has been deleted. It had been objected that the conduct subject to criminal sanction in this subsection had not been specified enough and that herbs or natural extracts might be captured. Removing this subsection should remove all doubts on that score to those who sell herbs and have been concerned about this. It is no longer going to affect an individual even if they thought it might have. Now they need not worry on that count.

Subsection 30(1) has been amended to ensure that inspectors have reasonable grounds to believe that a place is used for an illicit purpose mentioned in the bill before entering the place.

Paragraph 30(1)(c) is amended to exclude the possibility that inspectors can examine a person's medical record and therefore infringe on the confidentiality between physician and patient.

• (1235)

Paragraph 54(1)(h) is amended to eliminate any risk that regulations made under the act could apply to medical practitioners or other professionals who are not targeted. That was a concern from those professionals who under the act were licensed to give prescription drugs. However, the definition of trafficking has been broadened to include the sale by a licensed practitioner of a prescription to obtain drugs.

Every one of the concerns raised in subcommittee has been carefully examined in the reconstruction of this bill. This is not to say that every concern that was expressed has led to an amendment. Some were felt to be without foundation, such as the fear that the bill would threaten the viability of the existing needle exchange program. It was decided after examination that there was no such threat and there needed to be no amendment.

Other observations or criticisms will be more properly addressed in a general drug policy review rather than in Bill C–7. In fact that was a recommendation from the committee.

It has been suggested by some that this is not a health bill. Many of the issues that have come up deal with justice and enforcement. It should be made abundantly clear that controlled substances are not all bad substances. Many of them indeed are very good when used as prescribed. They are important to the health of the nation. They are major tools in the medical kit. Drugs and drug abuse are basically social and health problems. They find their way, however, into the criminal justice system not because they naturally and necessarily belong there, but because we have yet to devise a better method of control.

Prohibition has had very limited success and very high cost. Many believe that programs to increase awareness, education and treatment would be more successful for less money and less violence in drug enforcement. In fact the main thrust of Bill C–7 is that it allows for these controlled substances to be used for medical and scientific purposes. We need codeine, morphine and similar drugs to treat patients. Unfortunately they are also subject to abuse. Therefore, we need to build into the law how we deal with their diversion to non–medical purposes and their abuse potential. That is where most of the justice issues come into play in this bill.

The bill facilitates the placing of safeguards at all levels of production and distribution of high–risk drugs and allows them to be used as prescription drugs. This reduces the risk that drugs produced for legitimate purposes would be diverted into the illegal street market.

Canadians will have access as before to physicians, dentists, pharmacists and other licensed health care providers for whatever drug they need to treat their illnesses. They need not be concerned about that. Bill C–7 is not a catch–all for pharmaceutical preparations. It does not affect antibiotics, for example. It names clearly the drugs it would control, which are generally those used to treat pain and many psychotrophic or mood–modifying drugs.

By including the concepts of treatment and rehabilitation, this bill also acknowledges the important health dimensions of drug abuse. It begins to rebalance that emphasis on substance over user and coercion over persuasion. It is not a new policy and it is not even a big change, but it is an important shift in perspective. It opens the way to alternate approaches and choices in addressing a disease that afflicts hundreds of thousands of Canadians and the social well–being of Canada.

Bill C–7 is meant to control dangerous substances. We want to control these substances because in the wrong hands and used in the wrong way they can cause great harm to Canadians and to the social fabric of this country.

I say this even though I recognize that drug use is not a major concern for Canadians in general. In fact an Environics poll that focused on justice and crime issues last year found that only 2 per cent of respondents said that illicit drug use personally troubled them far more than other crimes. This was far behind phenomena such as domestic violence, youth gangs, breaking and entering and crimes against children.

There is another reason to control these drugs, and I believe it is a far more important reason. Many substances we are dealing with here have strong medical components. This bill aims to make them available to health professionals and their patients for legitimate medical purposes. These substances, as I said before, are an essential part of our armaments against human suffering. We need painkillers, tranquillizers and similar drugs to treat patients suffering from pain, anxiety, stress, depression and other illnesses that in fact are born of our age of worry and anxiety. These are substances for medical use.

• (1240)

Because Bill C–7 sharpens the tools we use to control the production and distribution of high–risk preparations that can be made available safely for prescription drugs does not mean that we are condemning those drugs. Patients will continue to have access to prescriptions through their doctors and pharmacists. Patients will always have what they need to treat illness and the medical records of patients will not be violated.

Health Canada's goals and priorities have repeatedly found support from the Canadian public, who rate the performance of health care in the current system at the very top of government activities. This is from Ekos Research.

Side by side with medicare on Health Canada's priority list is the protection against risks to Canadians' health. Therefore, illegally obtained and unsafe drugs are among those risks. Drug dependence is not only a criminal issue, it is very much a health and social issue. With some of these amendments we have tried to bring a positive approach to treatment programs for those who are afflicted by drug addictions. We support the help and appropriate treatment for those who want to get back their health and resume a normal life. We will continue to authorize methadone treatment for those who have a drug dependence. Methadone, as members will know, is a controlled substance that assists many opiate users to re–establish a constructive life. I want to assure the House that is not changing.

The department is also responsible for the national program to reduce the spread of HIV and AIDS. We will not be affecting the needle exchange programs, which in many communities have had massive positive results and have been so successful in curbing the spread of HIV among intravenous drug users. Medical devices such as needles were deliberately excluded from criminal sanctions in Bill C–7. So this effective public health program in fact will continue its good work.

The bill protects the rational use of some controlled substances as medicines while acting against the illicit distribution of these same substances. It recognizes that controlled drugs are indispensable and that their availability should not be restricted or compromised. It promotes the judicious use of medications by indicating ways in which controlled drugs can be handled, distributed and used. These substances are included in the legislation, as I said, to protect the health and safety of the public.

For example, Bill C–7 makes it possible for cancer patients and those who are terminally ill to obtain pain relief from prescribed medications such as morphine. In a hospital setting or for out–patients under strict medical supervision, even heroin is available for the treatment of pain and suffering. This legislation ensures that cocaine can be safely used in examination and in surgical procedures. Other medications aimed at treating less severe but still incapacitating conditions such as migraines are contained in the schedule of substances we are dealing with here. These will continue to be made accessible under this bill.

Some of these drugs are also used on the street and therefore are subject to trafficking. While these substances all have the opportunity to create good and help patients who are ill, they have a strong potential for abuse. It is not surprising that the enforcement aspect of Bill C–7 has therefore attracted attention. However, we must not forget that access to these substances must be preserved for the benefit of all those who are afflicted, which may include a majority of Canadians at some time in their lives. These substances are powerful. They have the power to do good but also the power to do harm. If a drug is prescribed by a physician and is used more than is prescribed by a physician, the addictive properties of these drugs could be forgotten. We do not want that harm to occur to patients.

As legislators, our task is to find a balance that will maximize good and minimize harm. I believe we have struck the appropriate balance in this legislation. I urge hon. members of the House to support it, as I will.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, good old Bill C–7 has been with us since my arrival in the House and I have followed it with fascination. It was of course a Tory bill introduced before this Parliament sat and was opposed then by my Liberal colleagues. I watched as it became a Liberal bill and was embraced with some degree of enthusiasm.

• (1245)

I invite people listening today to reflect on the parliamentary secretary's words during her original speech on this bill. I am sure they will find that the parliamentary secretary wholeheartedly supported Bill C–7 in its unmodified form. To be kind, that wholehearted support was somewhat enthusiastic.

This bill has gone through such a dramatic change in the committee process. That is what I am going to spend my time on today. Can the public influence a bill? The general perception in Canada is that the public cannot influence a bill. The fact is that the public can influence a bill, not only its tone but its actual final outcome.

What actually happened during the process of modifying this bill? I found, as did many people in Canada, that clause 3(1) and (2) could have significant potential harm to the health food industry. This clause stated that substances could be deemed to have a stimulant, depressant or hallucinogenic effect. It was plunked into the bill. Individuals across the country said it was too broad, too vague and not specific enough.

I received a host of requests for information. As an opposition health critic people said to me: "This seems to us to be a point where an opposition critic should step up to the plate". What did we do? We formed a very specific newsletter, which I have with me today. It states: "C–7 threatens choice in health care". It also mentioned areas of this bill that could have a profound effect on health care.

The newsletters went out along with a request for petitions to health food stores and to individuals who wrote asking for more information. The outpouring of support for this position of choice in health care was profound. I wish I could touch that nerve in other areas. I wish I could touch the nerve of the health food industry in other areas.

People contacted the subcommittee on health. I am convinced the committee members could not believe the outpouring. People contacted the minister, their MPs and me. Did I have a big role in this? I was only able to provide a small vehicle for the outpouring of personal sentiment. I do not put myself as a great individual in this debate at all, but the focus of the input was fascinating to me. The whole issue was choice in health care. Those individuals said: "Deny us that choice and you are treading on our toes".

The result and specific part of the bill I found so offensive was the ability for legislators to deem substances such as stimulants, depressants and hallucinogens to be stricken completely. There has not been a great deal of fanfare about that.

I want to tell the Canadian public that this was a huge victory for those who wanted to choose what they take. There are those who say that people could make mistakes in their lives and I agree with that. However, when should regulators be involved in someone's personal decision making? When there is proven harm, when there are potential side effects, and when there is fraud in claims, doses, source or contents. Otherwise the public tells the legislators to step aside. No one knows better than the individual how they feel and what works for them when it comes to things they take into their body.

• (1250)

There is a price for this freedom. The price for the freedom is to be informed. The public says: "Government stand aside; we have spoken". I say to those who would regulate and legislate in this area, no one can be better informed than the citizen who has a need which is not met by bureaucrats and legislators, driven by internal pain, anxiety or wants. They want to seek out time honoured remedies. They said loudly and clearly: "You will never usurp this right".

People find that interesting coming from a physician and surgeon, someone who occasionally is criticized for being too narrow in focus. I have seen individuals not helped by my profession. I have seen individuals seek alternative therapies. I have seen individuals beg for the ability to do that. I believe they have and need the right to do exactly that.

Why did we bring an amendment to this bill, a bill that frankly has dramatically improved over the way it first came to this House? We brought an amendment because there is still a regulatory mechanism, the power to make regulations which still gives the government the power it had in clause 3, to deem something to be included in the bill without broad public debate.

Is the mechanism of public consultation sufficient? In my view it is not. When something is put into the Canada Gazette for 30 days, it can be missed. Things have been missed in the past. There needs to be a greater flag. I would have preferred to have had those amendments come to the parliamentary committee studying health related issues. That would have been a better step. My basic premise is that legislators should at least be involved. It should not be an almost behind the doors process.

I will strongly state to anyone who will listen that the power to make regulations can be passed with virtually no public scrutiny. Powers delegated to the governor in council are broad, vague and border on dictatorial. Our subcommittee recommended that this be reviewed. I would like to hark back to the parliamentary secretary's comments when she said that the public scrutiny which is present today is just fine. Why would the government which controls this subcommittee agree to review if those powers are just fine? Those arguments are inconsistent.

I am also very sceptical of the committee recommendation. I think that recommendation is going to fall into a black hole. I am going to give an example of why I think that will happen.

The first duty in the health committee was to look at order in council appointments. I asked a question in the health committee that if we were going to review these order in council appointments, how many of them had been turned down in history. The answer was that members looked at me as if I were crazy. Surely the committee would not have the power to turn down an order in council appointment. I asked: "Why then are we striking a subcommittee on order in council appointments"?

My premise was that the committee should review appointments at the appointment stage rather than at the nomination stage. Sure enough we went through a whole host of witnesses and the recommendation of the subcommittee was that order in council appointments, if they were to be reviewed by the committee, should be done at the appointment stage. There would be no power taken away from the government. If everyone on the list were up to snuff, there would be a checkmark beside each name. It would be a good time to review. Then the government could choose which individuals it wanted from those.

I asked the following question in high school after a class: If you were asked to review something, would you want to have that review be meaningful? The kids nodded to me. We would think it was nonsense to do it any other way. Where has that recommendation that order in council appointments be referred to to the health committee gone? It has gone into a black hole somewhere, into government reorganization.

That indicates to me how cynical the government process sometimes can be. If a group of high school kids can see that it makes sense, it surely must make sense to the legislators. I will watch with profound interest the recommendation from the committee to review this power to make regulations. If it falls into the black hole as well, I will be greatly disappointed.

Bill C–7 has come a long way. If the power to make regulations were righted, I would support it. On the basis it is not righted, I will not support it.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak on behalf of Bill C–7, an act respecting the control of certain drugs, their precursors and other substances, and to amend certain other acts and repeal the Narcotic Control Act in consequence thereof.

This bill received first reading in February 1994 and passed second reading in April 1994. At that time it was referred to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Health which in turn struck an all–party subcommittee. I was appointed as the chair to study that bill, to receive witnesses from all parts of Canada representing major interest groups and to receive and consider submissions from major interest groups and Canadians from all walks of life. The committee received dozens of submissions and literally thousands of letters for its consideration.

As a consequence of our consultation and discussions, a number of questions and concerns were raised. The committee took the interventions very seriously and requested answers and explanations from officials. The bill is the responsibility of the Minister of Health but numerous aspects relating to enforcement and justice matters necessarily involve the solicitor general's office and the Ministry of Justice.

Officials from all of the ministries were very actively involved in the review of this bill after second reading and co–operated fully throughout the process. I want to give special thanks to them, particularly to Mr. Bruce Rowsell, director of dangerous drugs, health protection branch, Health Canada; Carol Langlois, project manager, bureau of dangerous drugs, health protection branch, Health Canada; Gérard Normand, counsel, national security group, Department of Justice; Mr. Paul Saint–Denis, senior counsel, criminal law policy section, Department of Justice; and Ron Dykeman, senior policy analyst, policing and law enforcement in the solicitor general's office.

The role of parliamentarians and their powers of influence as members of Parliament and members of standing committees of this House has changed dramatically in this Parliament. The subcommittee charged with the responsibility to study Bill C–7 demonstrated that the proposed legislation is subject to change. Indeed Bill C–7 has been changed in many important ways to address the legitimate concerns of Canadians.

As a result of our work, the committee has sought amendments on a number of critical elements of the bill. I am pleased to inform the House that the government through its relevant ministries has brought forward substantive—I emphasize substantive—amendments which fully satisfy the concerns raised by the committee. Some of the areas relate to the whole aspect of rehabilitation and treatment: the issues raised by practitioners, particularly by the Canadian Medical Association; the integrity of needle exchange programs; confidentiality and access to information; the scheduling and particularly the criteria for scheduling of products; the aspect of criminal records; the issue of fortified drug houses.

• (1300)

One of my colleagues from Edmonton came before the committee and made a plea on behalf of the law enforcement agencies of Edmonton to advise us of what is called fortified drug houses.

Very briefly, fortified drug houses are dwellings that have been altered substantially to ensure that enforcement agencies would not get ready access in the event it was determined there were illegal or illicit activities transpiring within that dwelling.

Initially the bill could not address that. Reasons were given but the committee did not accept them. Thanks to the intervention of our colleague and member for Edmonton West, this bill now provides the mechanism necessary for our law enforcement agencies to deal with the serious problem of fortified drug houses.

We also dealt with some complex matters concerning hybrid trafficking offences. I can tell members that the bill has changed significantly since second reading with regard to the amounts and the penalties.

As has been mentioned, we dealt with the deeming provisions under section 3.1 which I will speak to more fully a little later. We also dealt with section 59, the administration procedure for adjudication, a very important section.

The work of the committee was quite extensive and broad on a number of fronts. I am pleased to inform the House that the bill, as amended, received the support of all parties.

Some 69 amendments were made to a bill that contains 56 pages, 94 clauses and a large number of schedules listing drugs and various other aspects. We believe we have returned to the House a better piece of legislation which effectively meets the intended objectives of Bill C–7.

The subcommittee actually went beyond its mandate to address Bill C–7. Not only did we discharge our responsibilities with regard to the bill as was directed by the Standing Committee on Health, but we also made a further report to the Standing Committee on Health putting forward certain recommendations flowing from the work we did in considering the provisions of Bill C–7.

In brief, I would like to outline what those additional recommendations were. The first recommendation was that an expert task force be formed to devise rational criteria for schedules 1 to 7 of the control of drugs and substances act.

We would like to see this task force include the assistance and the consultation from organizations such as the Addiction Research Foundation, the Canadian Centre for Substance Abuse, the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, the Canadian Medical Association and the Canadian Foundation on Drug Policy, not to mention the Canadian Medical Association, particularly, and any other relevant bodies. We would like them to form a special task force with a mandate to establish precise criteria for the scheduling of substances under this act.

As a number of speakers will mention in speaking to the bill today, it deals with a large number of drugs. As was dealt with in the report stage motion with regard to governor in council changes to regulations, it is quite an onerous task to deal with the changes that would have to occur to scheduling if we have to go through committee every time a certain drug arises.

The second recommendation has to do with Canada's drug policy. I am going to talk quite a bit about drug policy because I believe Canadians should understand more fully the intent and the rationale for Bill C–7 and how it relates to Canada's drug policy, indeed the Canadian drug strategy.

The subcommittee on Bill C–7 recommends that the House of Commons Standing Committee on Health undertake a comprehensive review of the existing drug policy. I am pleased to report that the Minister of Health has already informally given her concurrence that a comprehensive review of our drug policy should be conducted.

• (1305)

The final recommendation has to do with the motion that was moved at report stage by the member for Macleod. It deals with the scrutiny of regulations and orders made by governor in council. This motion, in fact an amendment, was dealt with at subcommittee. Based on the conversations we had with all members and the debate that was held, it was clear that the question being raised was not generally relevant only to Bill C–7 but rather a matter of principle. A number of the previous speakers have referred to that principle: what can this place do and what authorities can it second in terms of amendments to legislation.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Health outlined very clearly that there is a mechanism in place for the exposure of changes proposed, whether they be regulations or other changes. More important, those changes are not substantive changes to the legislation and to the intent of the legislation. It is more important that those governor in council authorities be available so that changes can be made which are consequential to other changes that occur and that things can happen quickly.

I will comment a little later, particularly with regard to section 3.1, the deeming provision, on new drugs and the reason why we have to pursue avenues to be able to address new drugs as they come on line. It has to do with technology and it has to do with the sophistication of those that produce illicit drugs.

We have asked the Standing Committee on Health to direct a question to the government House leader whether the House of Commons standing committees could have the authority to approve or at least review all relevant regulations or orders made by the governor in council prior to coming in force. I believe that recommendation satisfies the member for Macleod. He withdrew the amendment at subcommittee and supported the principle of assessing whether or not governor in council orders are being abused.

It is a valid question and that is why the committee agreed with the member for Macleod to pose the question to the government House leader, so that all members of Parliament could more fully understand the mechanics and the rationale for governor in council orders.

We believe all committees should make appropriate recommendations consequential to the work they have done in studying legislation on what they have heard from the people of Canada. I am very proud that this committee took it upon itself to produce a supplementary report to the bill, which I feel is going to add substantially to the role of parliamentarians.

I wish to move more specifically to the bill. The parliamentary secretary very eloquently outlined a number of the technical aspects of the bill. I want to go back to the genesis because I know that for many members on all sides of the House their first exposure to this bill was the old Bill C–85 from the former government. It is a draconian Mulroney bill.

It is time for us to move away from the partisan apprehension about certain legislation because there are important reasons for Bill C–7 to be before this place and to be passed by this House.

Bill C–7 forms part of the national drug strategy. It is a multi–year program set up to combat the illicit drug trade within our boundaries. The bill consolidates and supplements the provisions found in the Narcotic Control Act and Parts III and IV of the Food and Drugs Act.

The supplementary provisions are necessary for a very important reason and that is because Canada must pass certain changes to its drug legislation so that we can be in conformity with certain international obligations to which we are a party.

Those treaties are three. The first is the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs of 1961. That treaty dealt with things such as the cultivation of the coca bush.

• (1310)

The second treaty was the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, dated 1971. Among other things, it dealt with the expanded control over amphetamines.

Finally, the so–called Vienna convention is the United Nations Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, dated 1988. Among other things, it deals with the import and export control over precursors.

Why is Bill C–7 so important? That is a question which members of Parliament must understand for their own edification because of the concerns which have been raised at second reading and throughout the genesis of the bill.

Because Bill C–7 provides for the scheduling of drugs which are controlled or restricted, it attracted substantial attention from groups and individuals who wanted to address Canada's drug policy with a view to taking a softer stance on drug possession and use and to treat it as a health problem rather than a criminal problem. This was the argument.

Our drug policy is reflected in Canada's drug strategy. Seventy per cent of our spending is directed at rehabilitation and treatment alternatives. Bill C–7 is part of Canada's drug strategy and addresses the enforcement aspects of our drug policy.

Many of the witnesses and interveners were critical of Bill C–7 because they wanted the opportunity to fully debate the overall drug policy, of which Bill C–7 is simply a part. Their interests were beyond the purview of our subcommittee but their concerns were noted in our recommendations which I referred to earlier.

The most important rationale for Bill C–7 was to bring our drug laws into compliance with the international conventions to which we are a party. It is this aspect on which I would like to elaborate.

Canada has been in violation of its treaty obligations for many years. As such, it has increasingly come under criticism by its treaty partners and the International Narcotics Control Board. This is the first time that a jurisdictional body has been mentioned, so I would like to highlight the International Narcotics Control Board.

Over the past 80 years a worldwide system to control drugs subject to abuse has developed gradually through adoption of a series of international treaties. The key multilateral conventions concurrently in effect are, as I mentioned: the 1961 Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs which was modified by the 1972 protocol; the 1971 Convention on Psychotropic Substances; and the United Nations Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, which was adopted in 1988. Each of these treaties has built on regulations already in place and has advanced international law.

From the beginning the principal objective of drug control treaties has been to restrict the use of these drugs to medical and scientific purposes.

The International Narcotics Control Board, known as the INCB, is an independent and quasi–judiciary body mandated to apply the United Nations conventions on drugs. It was created in 1968 by the 1961 Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs. Its predecessors were created by previous conventions on drugs, dating back to the League of Nations. The board is responsible for promoting the application of drug control treaties by government. These treaties set out its tasks, which are essentially of two types.

First, with respect to the legal manufacture, trade and sale of drugs, the board ensures that there are sufficient quantities available for medical and scientific purposes and that none are misdirected from legal sources to illegal trafficking. To that end, it administers a narcotics evaluation system and a system of voluntary evaluation of psychotropic substances and monitors international drug trading through a statistical reporting system. Moreover, it monitors the measures taken by governments to control chemical products that can be used in the illicit manufacture of drugs, assisting them in preventing their being channelled toward illicit trafficking.

The second area of the mandate is with respect to the illicit manufacture and trafficking of drugs. In this regard, the board detects weaknesses in national and international control systems and helps to improve the situation. As well, it is responsible for assessing what chemical products used for illicit drug manufacturing might be placed under international control.

Our failure to comply, particularly in the area of control of benzodiazepines, was clearly singled out in the 1994 report of the International Narcotics Control Board presented to the United Nations on February 27, 1995. I want to quote from this report because it clearly demonstrates to all members why it is so important that Bill C–7 is passed by this House.

Paragraph 89 states: "A few parties to the 1971 convention, including Canada, Luxembourg and New Zealand, do not yet control international trade in all benzodiazepines. This represents a violation of the treaty obligations under the 1971 convention. The board has been in communication with those countries for a number of years, but their response has thus far been insufficient. The board reiterates its request to those countries to begin controlling without further delay their imports and exports of all benzodiazipines listed in the 1971 convention."

The report further states in paragraph 180: "Although Canada ratified the 1971 convention in 1988 and the 1988 conventions in 1990, national legislation is not yet in conformity with some of the provisions of those conventions and the Canadian authorities have not been fully implementing those provisions. There are indications that Canada is a source of benzodiazepines entering the rest of North America."

Paragraph 182 states: "In Canada, organized gangs trafficking in metamphetimines, PCPs and lysergic acid diethlamide, known as LSD, are increasingly becoming involved in illicit trafficking in precursors and other chemicals."

The final reference comes in the appending news release issued in conjunction with the INCB report. It states: "The black market in the United States is another main target for diversion and smuggling of benzodiazepines. Canada, where imports and exports of these substances are not yet controlled, appears to be the main source of benzodiazepines diverted in the region. In one such case a broker company in the Bahamas established as a front by drug traffickers obtained from 1992 to 1994 large quantities of diazepam tablets from a Canadian origin to a local wholesaler. The company claimed that the tablets were to be exported to other countries in the Caribbean. In fact they were smuggled into the United States."

There are a number of other references. I think all members would understand clearly that Canada has been embarrassed in front of the United Nations, through the World Health Organization and through the International Narcotics Control Board because we have not met our obligations under the international treaties to which we are a party.

Once Bill C–7 is passed, it will bring Canada's laws up to date and in fact satisfy all the provisions of those treaties to which we are a party.

• (1320)

In March 1995 I had an opportunity, along with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Health, to meet with representatives of the INCB to discuss our deficiencies and review the progress of Bill C–7. I am pleased to advise that they were satisfied that Canada had finally developed a piece of legislation that was going to address those concerns. We are looking forward very much to advising our treaty partners that our laws are now in order with regard to those treaties. That is the most important reason for this piece of legislation.

Finally, I would like to make some brief comments about certain issues that attracted substantial attention throughout the subcommittee's work. The first issue, which I think has been on the minds of a number of members on all sides of this House, is our approach to illicit drugs. Many criticized Bill C–7 initially because they alleged that it reaffirms a criminalization and interdiction approach to illicit drugs instead of a public health approach.

As I mentioned, Bill C–7 forms only part of Canada's drug strategy, under which 70 per cent of our efforts are indeed directed at rehabilitation and treatment as alternatives. Bill C–7 also now includes, which it did not at second reading, a specific section addressing and promoting a rehabilitation and treatment approach to illicit drugs. Bill C–41, the omnibus sentencing bill, also makes reference and encouragement to the courts and provides that alternative to the court system to ensure that wherever possible and appropriate, rehabilitation and treatment are desirable.

Some also argue that a softer approach should be taken on illicit drugs because they cause fewer health problems than alcohol and tobacco, which were omitted from the bill. Alcohol and tobacco are no longer omitted from Bill C–7. If we are to be successful in taking a hard line on their use under our laws we cannot get soft on drugs. Health impacts are not the only consideration. Far too many lives have been ruined by drugs, which costs our system billions of dollars annually in health, social and justice programs. We will continue to work with our treaty partners in the World Health Organization, the UN and the INCB to fight the war on drugs.

An awful lot has been said today with regard to subclause 3(1), which has to do with a deeming provision. In simple terms it basically states that if a drug or a substance is the same as or similar to an illicit substance it would be deemed to be covered by the act. The member for Macleod and some other speakers tended to paint one picture. I would like to provide a different version of the realities having to do with subclause 3(1).

The subcommittee and members of Parliament were literally swamped with letters and petitions from the distributors and users of natural and herbal remedies, as was stated by the member for Macleod. Industry leaders were alarmed because the bill referred to substances that had a similar stimulant or depressant effect to listed substances but were not themselves listed.

All products sold to the public through natural and herbal remedy outlets have been approved for use in Canada under our existing laws and jurisdictional authorities. The effect of these substances we are talking about is so minuscule relative to the potency of the drugs covered by this bill that there was never any interest or intent to even mention herbal remedies and products such as camomile tea or ma huang. These are very mild stimulants or depressants, many of which are included in everyday cough syrup. There was never intent in the bill. In fact, there is a very important reason why the bill initially attempted to deal with unnamed or unknown substances.

• (1325)

For those who have a need and a desire to use natural and herbal remedies, I say that if they can be obtained legally before Bill C–7, they will still be obtainable after Bill C–7 passes. The bill does not affect those.

I do want to comment on the misinformation that was generated by certain parties with regard to subclause 3(1). We have received some 4,000 letters and petitions from people with regard to this. I saw the trade magazines, which stated and showed very clearly that if the bill passes stores will be closed and remedies will only be available from a doctor. They stated that these remedies will all be illegal and will never be available again. With 4,000 Canadians being driven to write to the committee, and I do not know how many wrote to other members of Parliament, imagine the alarm that was raised because of this misinformation.

I wonder how much the industry had to do with trying to raise this concern simply for business reasons so that people would go out and stock up on these products. There was absolutely no basis for concern. I believe that kind of approach to political opportunism is totally inappropriate when we are dealing with the people of Canada on matters that are important to them.

Subclause 3(1) was intended to cover substances that were chemically very similar to listed substances and produced the same or similar effect but were not themselves listed. The rapid changes in the technology of drug production makes it necessary for us to respond quickly to new drugs. If new drugs are to be developed and they are chemically very close and not on the schedule, it will take a long time to get them on the schedule and covered by the legislation.

Governor in council orders allow at least a period of approximately 30 days to get something on a schedule. As the parliamentary secretary pointed out, if international implications or feedback or input had to be received from outside the country I believe it would be extended to 75 days. Those are the reasons we need this.

Although the provisions of subclause 3(1) would have been helpful, there was sufficient concern within the committee about the violation of a fundamental legal principle that requires that conduct that is subject to criminal sanction must be specified clearly in the act. This is the reason why subclause 3(1) had to be removed. Deeming a provision and saying it was the same or similar did not name a substance, and it was potentially going to cause a problem. The provision was dropped from the current bill, although I suspect it will have to be reconsidered should problems arise with new drugs arriving on the streets of Canada.

The commercial production of hemp was raised with the committee. Substantial lobbying was done to have Bill C–7 permit the commercial production of hemp. Given the time I have, I would simply indicate to those who are interested that this particular bill does not at present permit the commercial production of hemp. There is a window whereby if it were deemed appropriate a mechanism could be triggered. However, this process could take years. I would simply say with regard to the commercial production of hemp that it is a long way off, if indeed it is appropriate at all.

Finally, I want to comment on the subject of marijuana. Not surprisingly, a number of Canadians urged the committee to decriminalize marijuana. They argued that the penalties were too harsh and did not reflect the attitudes of most Canadians or the lenient practices of the courts or the police.

• (1330)

No evidence was presented to us on the attitudes of Canadians. Not dealing with the drug policy in our committee, none was asked for as well.

However, there is no disputing the courts were clogged. This bill deals with that by changing the process for simple summary convictions for simple or first time possession. There is fast tracking for dealing with those offences.

The bill, passed by the House at second reading, included a provision that simple possession of cannabis was a criminal offence. As such any proposal to decriminalize marijuana would have been ruled out of order.

The committee could not even have dealt with the question because it was a change in drug policy. This committee had no mandate to deal with drug policy.

The issue is one of drug policy. More important, under the provisions of the various international treaties to which Canada is a party marijuana possession must be a criminal offence. As such it is very unlikely Canada will consider such a change.

A recent article in the Telegraph Journal in New Brunswick reported: "For possession of small amounts of cannabis, the amended sentence is six months and a $1,000 fine instead of seven years and a $2,000 fine". That simply is not true. It is misinformation and may lead the reader to believe the bill proposes the law to be more lenient on simple possession.

Under the existing Narcotic Control Act the maximum penalty for simple possession of marijuana on first offence and by summary conviction is $1,000 and six months imprisonment. Under Bill C–7 the penalty is identical. We did not deal with drug policy.

Attitudes of many Canadians toward marijuana were developed many years ago when many failed to realize the technology of breeding plants has allowed producers to drastically increase the potency of marijuana by increasing its THC content, tetrahydrocannabinol.

Marijuana is about 15 times more potent today than it was 10 years ago. Marijuana today is as potent as cocaine was 10 years ago. Let there be no confusion, marijuana is a dangerous drug which can have serious health impacts. Its possession or use even in small amounts continues to constitute a criminal offence in Bill C–7 and in the laws of Canada.

I thank the members of the subcommittee for their due care and diligence in addressing Bill C–7. I believe we have made a better piece of legislation and demonstrated once again that all members have the opportunity to significantly influence the development of effective legislation for Canada, which as we all know includes Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We will now proceed to the next stage of debate in which members will be entitled to a 20–minute maximum subject to 10 minutes of questions or comments.

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in support of this bill. Like its predecessor, Bill C–85, this bill is intended to improve and modernize the drug abuse provisions currently contained in the Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act.

I believe all of us here recognize the need for some reform in this area. Parts of the legislation are more than three decades old. It is obvious we cannot fight the drug problems of the 1990s with 30–year old legislation.

Some members have raised concerns about various aspects of the bill, particularly the health provisions which constitute the major part of the bill. Maybe those members are not aware that many of the concerns they have expressed have already been addressed by changes incorporated in Bill C–85 last year.

Although it is for the Minister of Health to respond to those concerns which have not yet been addressed, it is necessary to emphasize two points regarding the health provisions before I turn to the smaller but important law enforcement component of this bill.

This bill must not be looked at in isolation. It is not a stand alone piece of legislation. It is the last and most important in a series of pieces of legislation designed to support the Canada drug strategy.

• (1335)

This federal program is a 10 year, $480 million campaign launched back in 1987 to fight substance abuse and drug trafficking in Canada. As part of that strategy Bill C–7 is an important element of the government's overall campaign to curb substance abuse.

Some members have raised alarming images of innocent doctors and pharmacists unable to practise their professions, of violations of doctor–patient confidentiality and of the potential for law–abiding citizens to be prosecuted for the use of every day substances such as caffeine. Of course nothing could be further from the truth. I believe that even the members who mouth that kind of fear know they are engaging more in fear mongering than in fact dissemination.

The initial health regulations to be proposed under this new bill will be identical in effect to those which currently exist under the Narcotic Control Act and parts III and IV of the Food and Drugs Act. Further, all of these existing regulations were developed in close co–operation with the people they most affect: the doctors, the pharmacists and the veterinarians. We are not reinventing the wheel. We are simply building on a solid and proven foundation with the advice of the people most directly concerned.

The bill would eliminate ambiguity and broaden the scope of existing legislation so that governments and police services can respond effectively to the Canadian drug scene of the nineties. Undoubtedly new health regulations will eventually be promulgated but not before they have been developed in full consultation with the people most directly involved. That can hardly be described as acting in haste or with lack of forethought. This is simply acting with common sense.

The same common sense has been applied to the police enforcement aspect of the bill. Any police officer on the street will tell us that drug traffickers today use increasingly sophisticated methods to evade police efforts aimed at halting their deadly trade. To keep up with the traffickers the police need equally sophisticated investigative techniques such as reverse sting or sell–bust operations.

I hope my friend from Edmonton is getting all of this.

Mr. Hanrahan: You are going slow enough, Roger.

Mr. Simmons: Good to see you. We meet here every day at the same time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I certainly do not want to diminish the friendliness that arises in the Chamber through debate but I urge members to please direct their interventions through the Chair.

Mr. Simmons: I thought I had done so, Mr. Speaker. If I did not, I apologize. I believe I was referring to my friend from Edmonton in the third person.

During this type of sting operation it is frequently necessary for the police to sell small quantities of drugs to traffickers to establish credibility and further investigations. These techniques already exist but at present have no specific legislative basis and consequently are open to legal challenge. The bill would ensure the police have an appropriate statutory basis on which to mount operations against drug traffickers in a manner consistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I know an hon. member has argued such authority already exists for all police services under section 18 of the RCMP Act and he asked why we need this new provision. The answer is simple. First, section 18 of the RCMP Act applies only to the RCMP and not to any other police service. Second, section 18 of the act does not provide a clear statutory authority to the RCMP for mounting undercover drug operations.

• (1340)

It only imposes a duty on the RCMP alone to enforce the law using powers that already exist under other statutes such as the Narcotic Control Act. Clearly there is a world of difference between this broad statutory obligation and similar obligations in provincial police acts and the specific authority needed by all police services, federal, provincial and municipal, to carry out sting operations, an authority provided for in this bill.

It is also important to note that the police enforcement regulations contemplated in this bill build on the existing narcotic control regulations and the food and drugs regulations. Both sets of regulations authorize police officers to possess narcotic and restricted drugs when directly related to police work.

What is new is that the bill removes ambiguity that exists in the current legislation and gives police services a firm and clear statutory base for carrying out undercover drug operations.

Again, we are not acting in haste here. The text of new police enforcement regulations have been published in the Canada Gazette, part I, to allow time for consultation and comment from all interested parties. Consistent with this, I am also pleased to announce that the solicitor general has provided to his provincial and territorial colleagues a discussion paper on the enforcement provisions of Bill C–7. This paper was also made public to members of the House and to the public. The paper outlines the policy underlying the new police enforcement regulations that will be made pursuant to this act.

This is an example of a government committed to consultation and the careful and methodical development of legislation that answers the needs and concerns of all stakeholders. That is how the government does business and how it should do business.

There have also been concerns that Bill C–7 may permit an unwarranted intrusion by the federal government into provincial areas of jurisdiction, in this case the conduct of provincial and municipal police anti–drug operations. That concern is without foundation. Bill C–7 expressly recognizes that both the federal and provincial governments have clearly defined jurisdictions in the area of drug enforcement. The authority of the provincial ministers responsible for policing over provincial and municipal police services is expressly stated in the bill.

Domestic issues aside, the bill is also important in that it will allow us to fulfil our international obligations. Canada is, after all, a signatory to three UN international conventions designed to counter substance abuse and drug trafficking: the Single Convention on Narcotics Drugs, a Convention on Psychotropic Substances and the Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs Substances. These international conventions are crucial in the fight against drug traffickers.

Drug trafficking is an international problem requiring international action. We need only look at reports such as the RCMP national drug intelligence estimate to realize how true that statement is. Money laundering through international banking systems, illegal drug routes criss–crossing the entire world and drug production centres ranging from South America to the Middle East all emphasize that international co–operation and co–ordination are necessary to effectively fight drug trafficking. That is why it is important Canada fulfil its international obligations to the best of its ability.

The bill will give our police services the tools they need to do their jobs properly and to ensure they are at least as effective in their anti–drug operations as their counterparts in other countries.

Aside from providing the police with a statutory basis for carrying out undercover drug operations, the bill also provides three other measures that will assist the police in their anti–drug activities. First, the bill will provide for controls on the import, export, production and distribution of controlled substances while at the same time allowing for the use of substances for medical, scientific and industrial purposes.

• (1345)

Second, the bill will provide a control on the import and export of precursors, which are chemical substances used to produce controlled substances.

Third, the bill will provide for the forfeiture of any property used to commit such offences and for a comprehensive search and seizure mechanism consistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I hope in my remarks during the past few minutes that I have made it clear the police enforcement provisions of Bill C–7 are a carefully considered set of measures designed to give police the powers they need to do their job properly. The provisions do not embody any new and exceptional powers, contrary to what has been suggested in the Chamber. The provisions do not infringe on provincial jurisdiction, contrary to what has been suggested during the course of the debate. The provisions are subject to consultation and review. They balance the needs of the police against the interest of the community as a whole.

In short, it is modern legislation designed to respond to the demands of a modern world. Our police services deserve all the support we can give them, particularly when it comes to fighting drug traffickers. In the past we have shown our support through the passage of the proceeds of crime amendment and the Seized and Restrained Assets Management Act. Speedy passage of Bill C–7, the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, would both complement the previous two pieces of legislation I have mentioned and be a further demonstration of our commitment to support the police in their fight against the drug trade.

Therefore I have much pleasure in inviting my colleagues on all sides of the Chamber to give their unfettered support to this excellent piece of legislation as expeditiously as possible.

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure today to address Bill C-7. The problem of addiction and those who profit from addiction troubles the nation, my constituents in Lambton—Middlesex and people throughout Canada. Speaking as one who was elected to represent the same constituents, it troubles me.

The illicit drug trade and those who live off its avail exact a heavy toll, especially on that segment of our population at the greatest risk: our youngsters, a prime and favourite target of those dealing in illicit drugs. Drugs destroy families. They destroy careers and they destroy futures. They also destroy young lives. Perhaps most of all, whilst doing so they put cash into the hands of criminals.

In the early eighties there were more casual drug users among young people. While we see today a steady decline of casual drug use, there remains a hard core group of heavy drug users. What is worse is that those who make up the majority of the group are the youngsters hardest to reach.

Street youth today are consuming far more drugs than frequent drug users who are still in school. The battle against illicit drug use is being waged in our cities, where the problem is most visible, through programs and high profile media campaigns. It has also been carried out in smaller communities across the country.

Do we need more compelling reasons to advance the case against drug abuse? These people, the young, the abused, school dropouts, street kids, the unemployed and off reserve aboriginal youth are hard to reach.

• (1350)

It therefore follows that the critical path to addressing the issues of substance abuse lies in education, prevention, treatment and rehabilitation. We must also strike at the root of the problem. We must equip law enforcement professionals with the tools needed to deal effectively with those who prey on the addicted. This bill provides the tool. We must promote sound law enforcement if we are ever to advance in the broader social goal of maintaining safe and peaceful communities. The bill provides the means of accomplishing this goal.

We have also heard how the bill looks to the future. First, it provides a flexible framework for controlling the import, export, production, distribution and use of controlled substances.

Second, it provides a mechanism that will allow us to implement our international obligations and to restrict the production or trade of regulated substances to the medical, scientific and industrial purposes.

Third, it enhances enforcement of the law by the police and the courts as it provides the police with the necessary tools to enforce the law and provides for the seizure and forfeiture of property used in offences involving controlled substances.

Additionally, by reaching a broader range of controlled substances, the new legislation will help make it more difficult for drug dealers to reach children and will strengthen sentences handed down by the courts. It will make it easier for the police to arrest people who deal in illegal drugs.

Drug dealing in and around schools and in or near public places usually frequented by minors will constitute an aggravated factor at the time of sentencing. This means that judges will have to justify their decision when not imposing a jail sentence.

The new bill also places safeguards at all levels of production and distribution of controlled substances. This should ensure that they are not diverted from medical, scientific and industrial channels to the illegal street market.

Right now as we debate the bill designer drugs are being produced in some clandestine laboratory and cannot be subjected to prosecution until they are included in the schedules. These designer drugs have the same basic properties as more familiar substances such as stimulants, tranquillizers and painkillers. However their chemical properties have been slightly altered. The result is that these substances are not covered by existing legislation and can be sold with impunity.

Under the bill law enforcement officials will no longer have to wait for the drugs to appear on statutory schedules to stop criminals from selling them. So-called precursors, legal substances used in the manufacture of illicit substances, can also be obtained in large enough quantities through devious means.

The bill contains enhanced controls for anabolic steroids. Studies in the United States and Canada have shown clearly that the problem of steroids is not confined to the high stake arenas of international competition. This was confirmed by Justice Dubin's findings. High school and college athletes use steroids in hopes of winning athletic scholarships or to shape up more quickly. Recreational athletes, adolescents and adults alike use steroids to improve their physique.

It is no secret that even taken in limited doses for legitimate medical purposes steroids can cause serious side effects. Information from law enforcement agencies suggest that most steroids used by athletes are not prescribed by physicians. The mixture sold on the street may be of inferior quality or could pose unknown health risks.

Under the proposed act not only will it be easier to arrest and convict traffickers but it will enable governments to seize and forfeit the proceeds of crime and property used or intended for the purpose of committing a drug related crime.

It is only through the adoption of the measures of education, prevention and law enforcement that we will have the necessary means to foster healthy communities free of addiction, degradation and criminal oppression.

Children are entitled to grow up and develop in a supportive and caring environment, one which spawns honest, healthy and productive lifestyles. The bill before us is one way we can help to promote such a climate for the children of Canada.

• (1355)

At this point I stress three particular concerns brought to the attention of the subcommittee during its study of Bill C–7 with respect to the definition of practitioner. A number of witnesses appearing before the subcommittee, in particular the Canadian Medical Association, had grave concerns. We have addressed those concerns by setting out the definition of practitioner in clause 2 and by specifying that a practitioner be a registered and licensed individual. We have removed any possibility of the regulated activities of professionals being equated with trafficking.

The next issue is subclause 3(1). As originally drafted the bill deals with the effect similarity of substances not covered in any of the bill's schedules. Concerns over the particular subclause were raised by many groups and individuals. Their perception was that certain herbal products might be inadvertently covered by it.

Because of these concerns the subcommittee agreed to delete subclauses 3(1)(a) and (b) entirely. Essentially the effect similarity provisions have disappeared and we believe this would definitely erase all concerns regarding herbal products.

I will respond to some criticisms raised by members of the opposition during debate at second reading. Both the official opposition and Reform members identified the absence of regulations as a fundamental impediment to obtaining a full understanding of the impact of the legislation. The activities of pharmacists, physicians, dentists and veterinarians are currently subject to the regulations under the Narcotic Control Act and parts III and IV of the Food and Drugs Act.

The Speaker: The member will have time left in the debate after question period. However, it being 2 p.m., we will now proceed to Statements by Members.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, over the last 128 years Canadians have built a country that is the envy of the world. We have built a land that is prosperous and a country based on shared values such as peace, compassion and tolerance.

We are also a nation profoundly attached to remaining a united country, a nation that includes Quebec. The mutual social, economic and political benefits of a united country or a united Canada have been clearly stated by the leaders of the no campaign.

All Canadians from coast to coast have spoken from their hearts. They have reached out to say loud and clear that we want Quebec to stay. Now is the time for Quebec to look at the facts. When it does so, I believe Quebec will reject confusion, uncertainty and separation.

On this important day I believe Quebec will clearly express its intention to remain in a united Canada.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today the people of Quebec are making a decision that will affect not only Canadians living in Quebec but all Canadians. Our country will be profoundly changed regardless of the outcome of the Quebec referendum.

There are two ways to confront change: first, to resist at every opportunity, drawing comfort from that which is familiar; and, second and more difficult but potentially much more rewarding, to accept the inevitability of change, to embrace change and thereby have the opportunity to manage it.

Our country is poised at the precipice of such change. We have an opportunity to put aside past partisanship, past bias, and to look to the future with an open mind.

We have an historic opportunity to fashion a new federation that is flexible enough to accommodate our different visions, strong enough to weather life's storms, and gentle enough to be a beacon of hope to the world.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the health minister has repeatedly stated her government's commitment to maintain the quality of health care. However, with federal government programs cut by a staggering $7 billion over three years and more to come after, the government's commitment to equal and quality health care for all Canadians is simply unbelievable.

The Reform Party wants a two–tier health system, a good one for the rich and a poor one for everyone else. Both will lead to the end of the health care system we all treasure.

The minister should show some leadership on the question of health promotion, which the World Health Organization defines as the process of enabling people to increase control over and to improve their health.

The province of Saskatchewan leads the field in Canada on the front of health promotion and health prevention. Even American insurance companies are more committed to health prevention than the minister is. It is not anything new; we have been hearing this for years.

With the continuing federal cuts, the challenge to continue to provide equal access to quality health care is a serious one. It is surely time for the government to begin looking at concrete methods of saving money and improving health care through a concerted initiative toward preventative health care.

It is time for the minister to show some real leadership and work with provincial ministers, health care professionals and—

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to provide an example of how much constituents in my riding believe in maintaining the unity of Canada.

Last week in the Parry Sound council chamber, the Canadian flag, flanked by the flags of Ontario and Quebec, joined that of the town of Parry Sound. Mayor Cunningham pointed out the inclusion of the Quebec flag, noting its special significance at this point in history. She went on to say: "It represents our tie to Quebec and our wish and hope that Quebec remain a part of Canada, our appreciation of its differences and what it adds to the nation".

The mayor went on to quote a local columnist who had noted that many individuals would feel as if they had lost a substantial part of their identity and their sense of Canadianism if Quebec were to separate.

Mayor Cunningham reflects the vast majority of constituents in my riding who believe in the unity of Canada. They know that Confederation has worked for all parts of our nation and recognize that our unity and prosperity depends on a no vote today.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is referendum day in Quebec. All Canadians await anxiously the results of this vote.

I have received many letters and phone calls on this subject. I would like to share one such letter from the Canadian city of Montreal.

> Canada is a nation made up of numerous nationalities besides French and English, people who left their native countries to contribute their intelligence, energy and talent to their new nation, Canada, to build a better life in peace for themselves and for their children.
> When they were separated from their homelands they had in mind a new project of integration because they believed that unity is a strength and to live in a united and strong Canada would bring them both strength and prosperity. After years of contributing to the growth and success of la belle province, it is heartbreaking to see those who would destroy our nation Canada.
> As we have built this nation together we must vote to keep this country united.

The letter is signed by the Assadourian family.

I urge all Quebecers to reflect on these thoughts.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today Canadians are watching and hoping for a strong no vote in Quebec. Reformers believe that no means not only no to the separatists but no to the status quo as well.

We must all acknowledge the problems that have led us to this point, starting with the top down style of federalism that dictates to provinces and people, instead of bottom up grassroots democracy.

The problems of ever increasing taxes, the enormous debt, unacceptable levels of unemployment and a failing criminal justice system are the result of failed policies of the past.

Reform has recently published 20 proposals for a renewed Canada. Without constitutional change, we would give power back to the provinces in language and culture, in natural resources and manpower training.

We would give Canadians direct democracy through recall, referendum and free votes in this House.

I urge my fellow Canadians in Quebec to vote no today and in doing so, say yes to a renewed Canada.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Monday and Tuesday of last week I had the opportunity to meet with 50 students from Collingwood Collegiate Institute and to be part of their demonstration for national unity.

These students took it upon themselves to show their deep commitment to the people of Quebec by coming here to Ottawa–Hull to talk with and to share their concern and love for this great country with students from Quebec. They implore the people of Quebec to vote no today and to share their dream of a united Canada that is respectful of their language and traditions, as well as being judged one of the best countries in the world in which to live.

I have with me today a petition from 359 students from Collingwood Collegiate Institute asking Quebecers to keep their faith in Canada and Canadians.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, people from all over Canada, including my riding of Lambton—Middlesex, gathered by the thousands last Friday in Montreal to show their support for Canadian unity.

The future of this country is for our children. In that vein I am happy to report that some children in my riding have sent a message of support to our Prime Minister and to Canada. It consists of a huge 10-foot unity poster which was put together by the grade 5 and 6 class of Caradoc North Public School in Caradoc township near Strathroy, Ontario.

The idea for this poster which consists of 400 pairs of hands and 400 accompanying signatures came from the children. Its theme of course is unity among Canadians, all Canadians and its message is heartfelt and sincere. Over the top of the 400 pairs of clasped hands is a message in French and English: Ne separez pas. Don't let go.

For the sake of our children, let us keep this wonderful country, our Canada, together.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we Canadians are lucky. Our country's political and democratic institutions are sound and have the confidence of the people. They have served us well in a long history. They were used to resolve some of the most fundamental conflicts any society can face, the role of government in private lives and the power of centralist institutions in conflict with regional aspirations.

The resolution to these and many other conflicts were never supported by all Canadians. Before votes, they were discussed widely and heatedly. They divided families, friends and regions. After the votes were counted, the democratic decision was accepted. Losers licked their wounds and resolved to fight again by the same rules.

This democratic tradition will be tested severely when the votes are counted today, when the stakes are higher than they have ever been before, when many fear the end of Canada.

I pray that all Canadians and especially we in these chambers continue to follow our successful democratic tradition and accept the people's—

GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the second anniversary of the Liberal government of course has now come and gone. Increasingly in the provinces and territories people are very concerned about the future. I wonder why.

The Prime Minister stated that he would tear up the FTA and would only sign NAFTA if major changes were made. No changes were made and the Prime Minister has become the strongest cheerleader of the NAFTA program down south.

The Liberals promised a new Bank of Canada policy. When they assumed office the rate was 4.3 per cent and today it is closer to 7 per cent. Canadians thought that the new policy meant lower interest rates not higher ones.

The Liberals promised a national child care program. Instead they have cut funding for the existing child care programs across the country.

The Liberals promised to abolish the hated GST. Today the GST continues to be collected and the government now is thinking of only changing the name of the GST.

Looking at the future we see reduced UI payments, reduced pension coverage, reduced—

UNITED WAY

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise today in the House to pay honour to my city of Estevan, Saskatchewan. Estevan has wrapped up its United Way campaign with a telethon which generated $139,000. This year they reached their objective faster than any other city in Canada. And this is not the first time; they have done the same eighteen times in the last nineteen years.

Estevan was the first city in the country to reach its United Way objective. Estevan is a perfect example of the values that are important to both Canada and the United Way: compassion and generosity to all Canadians. Let us tip our hats in honour of Estevan, the most generous city in all of Canada.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today as a Newfoundland MP and a proud Canadian. I speak on behalf of my constituents of St. John's East and the majority of Newfoundlanders. My message is to the people of Quebec and it comes from our hearts:

Today you will vote in a referendum to separate from Canada and the outcome affects us all. It was not that long ago that the people of Newfoundland voted to join Canada. You welcomed us and we have lived together in one peaceful nation.

We may come from different regions and face different circumstances but we share many of the same values and principles.

• (1410)

Like you, I want the best for my family and for my children. I want them to be able to find good jobs, to have the service and programs they need and to live in a generous and compassionate country. These goals are possible in a united Canada. Anything is possible in a united Canada. Let your children inherit the best country in the world, Canada. Vote no.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, after 128 years of nationhood we find ourselves on the brink of massive change. Today millions of Quebecers will be asked to decide whether they want to stay and build Canada or to leave and construct a nation of their own.

Regardless of the outcome of this vote, regardless of whether Quebecers choose to stay or to go, one thing is clear: This country will never be the same again. If nothing else, the referendum has demonstrated the bankruptcy of the status quo.

A narrow victory for the no will not change the fact that millions of Quebecers have voted for fundamental change. Whether to stay or to go is for Quebecers to decide, but on behalf of my Reform colleagues I send the following message to Quebec: If you choose to remain Canadian you will not be alone. There are millions of reform minded people like you in every province of this country. Join with us. Together we can build a renewed federation which addresses our concerns. Vote no for sovereignty and yes to the new Canada.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec referendum debate will have had the side effect of encouraging the people of other Canadian provinces to express the heartfelt feelings they harbour toward Quebec.

For more than a week now, hearts in all of Canada beat in time with those in Quebec. This harmony of thoughts and feelings reached its peak with the monster rally last Friday in Montreal.

There was only one message to be delivered at that rally, and I believe that it was: our brothers and sisters in the other provinces understand and love us. They do not want to see their country broken apart, and they cannot imagine a Canada without Quebec.

By voting no this evening, the men and women of Quebec will allow us to continue this great adventure of tolerance and openness. My wish on this October 30, 1995 is: long life to Quebec, long life to Canada.

WORLD TRADE ORGANIZATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, China is now in the process of applying for membership in the World Trade Organization, an application which the Liberal government supports in spite of China's appalling record on human rights and labour rights.

The WTO does not have any rules regarding labour rights, despite the efforts of the NDP working alongside many labour movements, social democratic parties and others around the world. To join, China must therefore prove it will respect foreign investors' intellectual property rights but not the rights of many child labourers, prison labourers and conscript labourers who suffer in China's unregulated labour market.

Trade will improve human rights in countries like China if and only if international trade rules offer the same protection for the human rights of citizens and workers as they do for the rights of investors.

I call on the government to take the lead internationally in making China's membership in the WTO conditional on the respect for basic labour rights.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have good news and bad news today.

The good news is that Bounjan Inthavong, the bad guy from Laos who participated in the murder of young Kirby Martin by beating him with a baseball bat, has been deported. The minister of immigration assisted me in that deportation and I thank him for that. I hope the next time it will not take a year and a half to get his act in gear.

The bad news is that there are many more to deport, like Karel Kral and Hector Lopez. Standing in the way of these deportations is an inept, incompetent refugee board.

Most Canadians do not know this but these refugee boards are not required to look at criminal convictions of non–Canadians at refugee hearings, only the consequences of sending them back to the receiving countries—

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FEDERAL–PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, regardless of the outcome of the Quebec referendum, Canada must go on with important changes in the federal system. The priorities of the Canadian people must be met. The federal debt has risen to over $560 billion. Canadians are staggering under an oppressive tax burden. Our health care system is on the critical list. Canadians are increasingly concerned about their public safety.

My question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. Is the government willing to make changes, real changes, in these important areas to prepare Canada for the 21st century?

[Translation]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Thank you, Mr. Manning, for this vote of confidence in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we saw on Friday and again throughout the weekend the power that Canadians can exert when they work together. Tens of thousands of Canadians joined together in a common cause and voiced a common concern. They want a united country and a Canada that is open to change. On that point I think I can speak for every member of this House when I say that we love this country and we will fight for change within a united Canada.

Is the government prepared to invite greater public input and greater public participation, like we saw on the weekend, in developing and implementing a Canadian agenda for change?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, certainly we can agree with the Reform Party on one point. The show of strength of Canadians from across the country who converged on the city of Montreal to show their solidarity with Quebecers and to show Quebecers that not only is Canada good for Quebec, but Quebec is a very key part of Canada, with that we can certainly agree.

We look for the continued support of the leader of the Reform Party to implement an agenda where Canadians can feel at home in any part of their country, in any language.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in order to address many of the concerns on the Canadian agenda there needs to be a realignment of responsibilities between the federal and provincial governments.

Canadians want the control of the financing of services, like social services that affect their daily lives, to be in the hands of the level of government which is closest to them. They want the federal government to play a co–ordinating role in the establishment of national standards and a stronger role in the area of international trade on which so many jobs and incomes depend.

My question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. In the days following the referendum is the government prepared to fundamentally rethink its relationship with the provinces and realign important federal and provincial responsibilities?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there was one message which came out very loud and clear from the people who gathered in Montreal from every corner of the country. The message was that they were tired of political fights. This was not a discussion among politicians. It was a heart to heart talk among the people of Canada. I personally spoke to a lady in a wheelchair who came from Peace River, Alberta with her husband. She met me in the elevator and she said:

• (1420)

[Translation]

"Ms. Copps, I do not speak French, but if you could tell Quebecers their being part of this country is important, tell them, because their Canada is my Canada". And that is the message we must give Quebecers today, not the message that Canada does not work. Canada can change. Canada will change. And it will change with the heart of Canada inside it: Quebec.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, whatever the outcome of the referendum today, Canada's deficit crisis remains. The difference between the government's spending and revenues is nearly $100 million every 24 hours of every week, of every month, at least for this year.

Can the Minister of Finance assure the people of Canada that whatever the outcome of the referendum, he has decisive plans for the prompt elimination of the deficit?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government has a clear plan to reduce the deficit and to move from 3 per cent of GDP to a balanced budget. We have followed our plan.

Despite the changes in the economic environment, as the finance minister says, come hell or high water we are going to meet our targets in reducing the deficit. The best way of doing that is what we have done, to keep our feet to the fire with rolling two year targets. We have done that and we are going to continue doing it.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, whatever the outcome of the referendum today, Canada's debt will still be $560 billion. Our generation imposes an irresponsibly high burden on young Canadians.

Can the minister assure young Canadians that he has decisive plans to deal with the burden of the debt on young Canadians?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the Reform Party were really interested in the financial state of the country, instead of using question period on this very important day to score cheap political points, it would be working with the Government of Canada to keep Canada together which is the best message for the Canadian dollar that we can expect.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

I think it is fair to say that citizens in all provinces and territories today are concerned about what they hear of the government's plans to reduce the unemployment insurance program, reduce pension coverage, reduce health care funding, reduce post–secondary education funding, reduce support for all social programs and last, high interest rates and high unemployment levels.

Knowing that this is in place and these are the trends, why should Canadians in any province and territory today be hopeful about the future?

[Translation]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question, because it gives me a chance to repeat the message I sounded loud and clear in the Gaspé on Saturday.

It was that Gérald Larose, who for 25 years has worked for the sole cause of separation, is spreading false versions of the federal government's policies on unemployment insurance. I can assure the hon. member, as I did in the Magdalen Islands yesterday, that the documents prepared by Gérald Larose and the CSN are pure separatist propaganda and of no value in the current debate.

[English]

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns integrity in government and particularly in this government.

The Deputy Prime Minister promised Canadians that if the hated GST was not abolished immediately that she would resign her seat. Why has the Deputy Prime Minister not resigned her seat?

• (1425)

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when I hear a member of the New Democratic Party from British Columbia talking about integrity, I want to say "bingo".

An hon. member: Under the "N" for New Democrats.

Ms. Copps: I will say that during the election campaign I gave my word to the people of my riding that if we did not scrap the GST before the next election, I would resign and I intend to respect that promise.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, regardless of the outcome tonight, the government should proceed with important, positive and constructive changes in the area of taxation.

The Liberal red book clearly states that fairness, simplicity and harmonization should be the key objectives of Liberal tax policies.

If they want to meet this promise, when will the Minister of Finance commit his government to full parliamentary review of our convoluted, complicated, confusing income tax system?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, compared to some other tax systems, ours is a model of simplicity. We review it every—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: Have a pack of yahoos taken over the seats over there?

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let me try again.

The charter of rights and freedoms has 7,000 words, the Bible 773,000 words, the Income Tax Act has 1,200,000 words. Our current system of taxation has become an enormous social experiment which can no longer be understood, much less justified. Given that the United States is looking at flat tax reforms being brought forward by almost every Republican candidate for the next presidential election and this parliamentary secretary jokes about simplicity, when will the government follow suit and offer Canadians some hope in the form of tax reform and tax relief?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, every time someone proposes the flat tax, I ask them: Are you going to pay more taxes or less taxes under a flat tax system? They always answer one way. They are going to pay less. I do not know who is going to pay the taxes under a flat tax system if that is the case.

I know under the Reform Party plan who will pay more taxes. The poor and the middle class are going to pay more and the wealthy are going to pay less because that is the Reform Party platform.

CANADIAN FORCES

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence.

Yesterday, the first Canadian Forces flight to leave Bosnia arrived in Quebec City. A second flight will arrive today. These members of the peacekeeping force have worked under very difficult conditions in an extremely difficult situation.

Could the minister tell the House about the role these Canadians have played in saving the lives of civilians and opening the door to peace in a region torn by war?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. I wish to commend all members of the Canadian Forces who worked in the former Yugoslavia during the past four years.

They served with great distinction, and we are proud of all members of the Canadian Forces.

• (1430)

[English]

It is not very well known that Canada now has, joining among its citizens upon the return of members from the armed forces, more veterans from armed conflict than at any time since the Korean war. The men and women who have served in Bosnia and Croatia have seen terrible hostility. They have seen a society that has been ravaged.

They have brought the best principles of civility, tolerance and compassion of a united Canada to bear upon their service in that area.

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister.

Could the minister tell us of the prospects for the future deployment of Canadian peacekeeping forces in Bosnia?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has said, Canada would consider participating in any force set up to help keep the peace in Bosnia after the appropriate peace settlement is negotiated. That is an option we are keeping open and one that we will consider.

Canadians appreciate that we have worked very hard in that area for the last three or four years and that we have contributed much. That does not mean to say we would not be prepared to continue our co–operation with any new force.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as Reformers and as Canadian we sincerely believe in a strong and united Canada both today and for the future. I know the Liberals share our vision for a more decentralized federation.

Regardless of today's vote, to indicate an end to the status quo what specific powers and changes is the Minister of Human Resources Development prepared to offer to the provinces in the area of social programs?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the opening question of the leader of the third party asking us to engage Canadians in a major debate.

Up to now the Reform Party has opposed the major public participation that we encourage in looking at the changes to social programs. I am glad to see there has been a change in attitude on the part of the Reform Party.

One of the most important lessons out of the dialogue that has taken place with hundreds of thousands of Canadians is when they are talking about decentralization there is much talk about giving the individual more choice, providing more resources in the hands of individual Canadians and local communities to allow them to help shape, design and customize employment programs and social programs to meet the requirements of their own local communities.

As the hon. member will know, we have already taken a major step to fundamentally decentralize the operation of the Department of Human Resources Development which serves 11 million Canadians. It is the largest service delivery organization in the country. We have already announced those steps to bring the locus of responsibility, accountability and decision making to the local level so that we can work in partnership at the local level with individuals.

That is an indication of the kind of changes we want to make.

[Translation]

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in French, please.

The Reform Party would like to offer more hope to Canada and all the provinces, including Quebec. We believe we must decentralize control over social programs. Canadians are calling for it and so are the provinces. We want the provinces to have the final say over training, education and social assistance programs.

Will the minister of human resources be consulting in this regard?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Calgary Southeast knows, we have, in the past year, offered all of the provinces the option of full responsibility for training so they would have all the flexibility they need to manage this area of jurisdiction. I set up a negotiating process with all the provinces and many agreements have been reached.

• (1435)

As far as unemployment insurance is concerned, I hope that, with the reform, there will be a new system, a new network for Canadian jobs. There will be a lot of opportunity to continue negotiating with the provinces, the unions, businesses and social groups in order to come up with a new approach to developing an employment system for all Canadians.

JASWANT KHALRA

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for Asia–Pacific.

Jaswant Khalra, a human rights activist who appeared before Canadian parliamentarians in March, was abducted from his home in Amritsar, Punjab, India on September 6 by unknown persons. He has not been heard from since and police investigations in India have revealed no information as to his whereabouts.

Mr. Khalra's abduction is of great concern to many Canadians as well as to the international human rights community. What action has Canada taken regarding the abduction of Mr. Khalra?

Hon. Raymond Chan (Secretary of State (Asia–Pacific), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, after my department learned of Mr. Khalra's abduction our high commission in New Delhi made immediate approaches to the Indian authorities regarding this case.

We have contacted the human rights person in the Punjab state regarding his abduction. I raised the case of Mr. Khalra with the foreign affairs minister of India in New York when I attended the United Nations conference earlier this month.

The Prime Minister and I will be travelling next week to New Zealand for the Commonwealth conference. At that time we will continue to follow up with the Indian government regarding this matter.

JUSTICE

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, regardless of the outcome of today's referendum, Canadians continue to be extremely concerned about their safety. The early release of violent offenders is one issue that will not go away.

Can the solicitor general explain to Canadians why a first degree murderer is allowed to appeal his parole eligibility after serving only 15 years of a life sentence?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, section 745 has been part of the Criminal Code for almost 20 years. The debates which accompanied its introduction those many years ago disclose a will on the part of Parliament to provide the possibility after 15 years for persons to go in front of a jury to ask for permission to apply for parole in certain circumstances.

What must be borne in mind is this is not the right to parole. This is simply a provision permitting a prisoner to go before a jury drawn from the community to test the question of whether they should be permitted to apply for parole to the Parole Board.

That was the will of Parliament when that provision was adopted 15 years ago.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, murderers Jim Peters and Robert Brown raped, stabbed to death and burned the bodies of their victims Laurie Boyd and Debbie Stevens. The Boyd and Stevens families are outraged to think that Peters could be eligible for a parole or even for parole review after serving only 15 years.

Since the solicitor general says he cannot intervene in the decision making process, will he support the repeal of section 745 of the Criminal Code and ask his party to support it as well?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, over the last two years I have met with dozens of victims of violent crime, women whose husbands have been killed, children left without parents, men and women whose children have been lost to violence.

I have listened to the message those Canadians have expressed. As part of Bill C–41 we changed section 745 to ensure that the courts on application for permission to apply for early parole will be obligated to hear from the families of victims as a factor to be taken into account in making that decision.

• (1440)

There are those who say that is not enough. Let me respond to the hon. member further. When the private members' bill to repeal section 745 came before the House there was in essence a free vote on that subject. That bill has now gone to committee. I have encouraged the committee to look broadly at the whole subject and make recommendations. We shall pay close attention to those recommendations once they are made.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Canadians everywhere well remember the members of the present government's forceful opposition to the previous Conservative government's cutbacks on health care, post–secondary education and social programs when in opposition.

Yet since moving from the opposition benches to the government side there has been a change of heart. This government's cuts to health care, post–secondary and social programs are the deepest in the last 50 years. While implementing an 8 per cent cut across the board, there is a full 25 per cent cut in these three areas.

Does she feel that tearing down the very institutions which define us as Canadians and which we hold dear is the way to build a strong, unified country?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker. On a day that all Canadians should be rallying to support Canada, on the eve of a very critical vote for all of us, I am rather surprised the NDP has joined the chorus of naysayers on the Reform side of the House.

I can only hope that between now and the time the polls close tonight in Quebec the message will not be coming out—the one that seems to be coming from the opposition benches—that Canada is in a mess and that it does not work.

The people of Canada have stated loud and clear they want universal health care available to everyone. The government has taken that suggestion against the opposition of certain premiers and certain political parties. We will fight to ensure that every single Canadian has access to health care because that too is part of the Canadian dream.

IRVING WHALE

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, according to an article in La Presse last Saturday, a large quantity of oil is leaking from the Irving Whale. Could the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment give us some information on the subject and reassure fishermen in the gulf?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give hon. members my assurances, as I did yesterday when I met with representatives of the RCM in the Magdalen Islands, that Canada will be there to take its responsibilities as soon as possible. It is too bad the Bloc Quebecois is trying to obstruct the refloating of the Irving Whale, but as soon as we can, and in fact this spring, despite the crushing opposition of the Bloc Quebecois, we will refloat the Irving Whale. And the fact that oil is leaking now goes to show how important it is to do this as soon as possible, and we will do it in Canada.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, regardless of today's vote Canadians know changes to our social programs are essential. The Department of Health recently spent $2.5 million on public opinion polling. With all that money the minister must know what changes Canadians want. Would she tell us?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member speaks about polling and the money that was spent, the majority of the money was spent on tobacco. It was for a number of surveys including the study on plain packaging.

As a result of the Supreme Court decision, before any actions are taken or any pieces of legislation brought forward, we need to have evidence on which to base that legislation. It is necessary to have these surveys. I am a very careful with money but there are times when we have to spend those dollars.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister is fond of saying we want a U.S. style health care system.

An hon. member: No she isn't.

An hon. member: Wrong party.

• (1445)

Mr. Hill (Macleod): It has very little to recommend it, frankly. Canadians are looking at a system much more like that in Europe. There they have a public system complemented by the private system. The costs go down and the access goes up.

Is the minister polling to improve medicare or simply to protect her legislation?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, medicare in this country is about more than money. It is about more than cheap politics. It is even about more than health care.

Medicare concerns our self–understanding as a people and as a country. It concerns our identity as a fair, just, compassionate and pragmatic people. It is an identity that was fashioned by our commitment to shared fundamental values. It is an identity that is cherished by every Canadian.

Medicare recognizes the very best of what we are as Canadians. Without the medicare system we have now, Canadians would lose a very important mirror on themselves. We will not allow that.

U.S. BORDER TAX

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

Last February an American senator assured us that a plan to impose a fee on Canadians crossing into the States was "as dead as Elvis". Elvis may be dead, but I think he has been appearing in Washington before a Senate committee because they are talking about moving ahead with this plan.

Will the minister please tell us what the government is doing to persuade the Americans not to tax Canadians entering their fair country?

An hon. member: We want Elvis.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I believe there have been a few sightings recently. In fact the House leader, who is something of an expert in these matters, has reported one such sighting.

The United States Senate judiciary subcommittee did indeed agree to a dollar tax on people entering the United States, but when it goes to full committee it is unlikely to carry. We are quite confident that when the full committee reviews the recommendation it will not go forward.

In any event, I would add that we have consistently pursued our point of view with the United States government, which is that, as the member suggests, such a measure would be in conflict with the United States commitments under NAFTA, a point that my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, made when he visited Washington recently.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, no matter what happens with the vote in Quebec tonight, Canada must proceed with important constructive change.

Four years ago the Canada–Quebec accord was signed, which gave Quebec a significant voice and federal funding for immigration matters in that province. I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if this government is prepared to sign similar agreements with the other provinces.

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, it really does matter what happens tonight.

Some hon. members: Right on.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: Bravo. The Reform Party might have to learn to live with a no. That will be tough.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, our Prime Minister has made it abundantly clear that change has been a defining characteristic of this government.

With respect to immigration, we have not only talked about change, we have actually gone out there and done it. There happen to be seven provincial agreements with the federal government on immigration. We are actively negotiating with the three other provinces that do not have an agreement. British Columbia and Manitoba are already well entrained and Ontario is advancing very nicely.

• (1450)

We also talked to the provinces about renewing the way we integrate, so we will be moving from a position of not only Ottawa knows best but going local because if it does not happen locally it does not work nationally.

We have talked to the provinces and are working with the provinces on promotion and recruitment from abroad and also with respect to giving additional powers to the provinces.

We will have more to say when we announce the levels on Wednesday afternoon.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is encouraging to hear that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is willing to let the provinces have more control in immigration.

I would like to know if the minister, when he announces the immigration projections for the new year on Wednesday, is going to allow the provinces to have input in the immigration levels of their provinces.

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, not only will they have input from Wednesday on, I have actually discussed with and written to every one of my provincial counterparts to consult with them as to what the numbers ought to be and, beyond the numbers, what categories there should be in this country and what kind of latitude the provinces should have.

For instance, with Manitoba, along with the Minister of Human Resources Development, we have been discussing very intensely in the last number of days and weeks its need for garment workers. That is not solely an immigration matter, not solely an HRD matter, and not only a matter for the province. It is a matter for governments in general to get their collective acts together.

We are moving in the right direction. We recognize that it is a shared jurisdiction. I would hope the hon. member would stand up and applaud our efforts.

YOUTH SERVICE CANADA

Mr. Janko Peric (Cambridge, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I understand there has been an evaluation done on Youth Service Canada. Can the Secretary of State for Training and Youth provide us with some of the highlights of this report?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, normally I would want the secretary of state to give the answer because she has done yeoman's service in ensuring that the young people of this country have been provided with new opportunities for employment. However, in her absence, as it comes under my general responsibilities, I would like to answer.

At this time we have over 200 projects operating in the country in which young people have been given an opportunity for community experience as well as being able to earn a stipend so they can return to school. Over 80 per cent of the young people involved in the first year have indicated that they will be using the experience they have gained plus the honorarium they have earned to return to school, to start their own businesses, or to gain further employment.

It shows that when we give young people a chance in this country they are not the problem, they are the solution.

ABORIGINAL LAND CLAIMS

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, according to polls the number one issue in British Columbia is aboriginal issues. Among the provincial political parties there is a growing divergence of views on aboriginal issues.

With the current lame duck NDP administration in the waning days of its mandate, will the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development assure the House that he will not entertain completion of any comprehensive agreements, such as the Nisga'a claim, until there is a new administration with a fresh mandate?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this government is prepared to entertain anything on which there has been consultation, which looks feasible, which will result in something better than when we started, and which takes into consideration the history of the aboriginal people. I see nothing in the proposal of the Reform Party that suggests it has adhered to any of those four criteria.

The Nisga'a have been waiting almost 80 years for justice and now the Reform member is saying do not do anything until the non–Nisga'a government changes in British Columbia. To do the honourable thing we should move ahead.

• (1455)

I want to point out that the native people in this country have expressed their love for Canada in the last week by the Montagnais voting 99 per cent no, the Inuit voting 95 per cent no and the Cree voting 96.3 per cent no. Do we treat them and their sense of feeling for this country by saying do not deal with them but wait for the next provincial election? My answer to the hon. member is no, absolutely not.

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this month the B.C. Minister of Aboriginal Affairs publicly stated that settling B.C. land claims will cost $10 billion. The federal minister's department this month estimated costs of $5 billion. My numbers tally with those of the provincial minister.

When there are radically different estimates on such a critical issue does the minister not agree that the public deserves financial transparency and a cost–benefit analysis on this issue?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what the public needs is some straight talk from the Reform Party.

The member for Athabasca, who sits on the Reform Party's policy committee, said: "The Europeans came to this country 300 years ago, opened it up and settled it. Because we did not kill the Indians and have Indian wars does not mean we did not conquer these people. If they were not in fact conquered then why did the aboriginal people allow themselves to be herded into little reserves in the most isolated, desolate, worthless parts of this country?" That is what has happened in B.C.

The hon. member now says we should not do anything. Well now is not the time to take that position. I wish the Reform Party would support the BCTC legislation, which they may, so we can start negotiating and doing the job we were elected for: to support the very people the Reform Party represents. This hon. member has half a dozen to a dozen First Nations in his riding. It is about time he realized that they are Canadians and voters and have grievances that we must begin to resolve.

MEDICARE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Deputy Prime Minister talked earlier about fighting for medicare. I do not doubt the Deputy Prime Minister's commitment to medicare. However, I would like to ask her a question. Does she and the government not see that if this government continues the trend toward unilateral withdrawal of the federal government from the fiscal partnership that medicare also was—it was not just a partnership with respect to standards and services—they will be unable to maintain national standards because they will lose the critical moral edge they need and the Reform Party will win by default?

We have to fund medicare as well as fight for it. When will this government start funding medicare so that we can save it?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have stated unequivocally that we would continue to fund medicare in this country with stable, ongoing funding.

There are many myths out there and one has to do with the decrease in funding by the federal government. Since we have been in power we have not decreased the funding at all.

Let me give the member an example of what is happening in Alberta in terms of our share of funding for health care expenditures. When we took office the level of federal funding in Alberta was 33 per cent of its health care expenditures. The following year it rose to 37 per cent of its health care expenditures. This year federal funding for health care in Alberta, as our share of its spending, will be 40.6 per cent.

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is on the environment. On Friday we were assured in the House that the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment draft environmental framework would be released for public discussion.

• (1500)

Can the government inform us of this discussion schedule and the implementation time frame that will make this agreement a reality instead of another paper proposal?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the ministers agreed unanimously at the meeting in Whitehorse to release the document. We are ready at the federal level. We are speaking with our provincial colleagues and hope it will be released within a few days.

PENSIONS

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions.

Ninety per cent of the neediest senior citizens in this country are women. Because of their traditional roles and the fact they were usually paid lower salaries, many women can expect to receive little or nothing in the way of pensions in their old age.

What does the minister intend to do to enforce the principle of equity between men and women with respect to pension reform?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Ottawa West for raising the issue.

Canada is world renowned for having one of the best retirement systems in the world yet one disadvantaged group in our country is single, elderly women. In recognition of that fact, Liberal governments have in successive years improved the security of low income, elderly women. The result is that retirement incomes for elderly women have been drastically improving over the last 10 or 20 years. The proportion of low income, elderly, women has declined significantly.

That is in contrast to the proposal on pensions from the Reform Party which would have the opposite effect of making the single, elderly woman less well off.

POINTS OF ORDER

SINGING OF O CANADA IN HOUSE

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order to seek the consent of the House for a small amendment to the standing orders which I think every patriotic member will support.

All of us participated enthusiastically today in the singing of "O Canada". Many of us, if not all of us, would like that to become a regular feature of the House just like the flag.

Eighteen months ago an amendment to this effect was referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs but nothing came of it.

I, therefore, seek the unanimous consent of the House for the following motion:

That Standing Order 30(1) be amended by adding immediately after the word "upon", the following:

Point of Order

On Wednesdays, immediately after prayers, the Speaker shall cause Canada's national anthem to be played or sung in the House.

That Standing Order 30(2) be amended by deleting all the words after the word "prayers" and substituting the following:

Or on Wednesdays after Canada's national anthem has been sung or played, the business of the House shall commence.

And that the clerk be authorized to make any consequential amendments to the standing orders in this regard.

If this was the only piece of business we did on this particular day I think it would be a good piece of business for Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member on his very helpful suggestion.

I can indicate to him that having given me some notice this morning of the fact that he intended to raise the matter, although I did not have the specifics of the motion he had planned, I spoke with the chief government whip who, as he knows, is a member of the procedure and House affairs committee which I have the honour to chair. The chief government whip indicated to me his enthusiasm for the suggestion and he is quite prepared to consider it in committee. While I am happy to take the hon. member's motion under advisement, it would be inappropriate to make changes to the standing orders of the House here on the floor without notice.

• (1505)

Normally notice is given of these motions if they come at all through other than the committee. I think it appropriate that the committee take the matter under advisement and report to the House. I will undertake to see that the committee does study it at an early date.

The Speaker: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: My colleagues, I asked the House if we had unanimous consent to proceed with the motion. The House has refused it. Therefore this particular matter is set to one side.

If the hon. member has another point of order, I will gladly hear it but if it is on the same subject the House has decided.

The hon. member, for clarification.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is the very same motion I brought to the procedure and House affairs committee a year and a half ago.

Can we have two motions the same? It seems ludicrous to me that it was already sent there. How could we then send the very same motion back again? Let us just do it.

The Speaker: My colleague, you ask for clarification. What the committee does is the committee's business until there is a report to the House. I do not recall a report coming to the House.

To go back, we had a request for unanimous consent and the unanimous consent was turned down by the House.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege. Perhaps a false impression has been left with my constituents that the Liberal Party opposes the singing of the national anthem in the House of Commons.

The fact that unanimous consent was denied does not mean that the Liberal Party is opposed to the merits of the resolution. The fact that unanimous consent was denied only means that it was denied with respect to the process that the Reform Party is following to—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: That is enough now on this. The point has been made and I have heard interventions. We asked for the unanimous consent of the House and it was denied. I permitted two interventions which perhaps in hindsight might have been done at another time.

We are going to proceed now to the tabling of documents.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say on behalf of my constituents from Nova Scotia that those who came to Montreal on Friday and sang "O Canada" loud and clear—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Tabling of documents, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

PETITIONS

INCOME TAX

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important day for Canada which we all know includes Quebec.

Pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. The petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the chronically ill, the disabled or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

CONTROLLED DRUGS AND SUBSTANCES ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–7, an act respecting the control of certain drugs, their precursors and other substances and to amend certain other acts and repeal the Narcotic Control Act in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex has about 10 minutes left in her speech.

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the regulations made initially under the new legislation will not differ substantially from those that currently apply to such activities under the existing legislation.

One of the purposes of the regulation making power is to enable the government to respond quickly to changing professional practices. The flexibility provided by regulations will ensure the availability of such drugs for appropriate medical and scientific purposes while complying with international drug control conventions.

Any changes in the regulations will only be made following full consultation with all affected parties using a regulatory consultation process that has been used for years by the Department of Health. Both the official opposition and the Reform Party member suggested there would be inconsistencies between various provisions of the bill and the charter of rights and freedoms.

One of the aspects of the bill identified as giving rise to charter challenges relates to the powers of inspectors under part IV. Reference was made to the interim order provisions of section 34 which permit the Minister of Health to act to limit professional drug distribution activities where there is substantial risk of immediate danger to the health and safety of Canadians. In addition the requirement to answer an inspector's questions was equated with self-incrimination in a criminal context.

In reply the solicitor general pointed out to members that the Minister of Justice must examine every bill for compliance with the charter before it is tabled.

Inspections that we are referring to here are inspections conducted to determine whether regulated persons are complying with the requirements under which they carry on their business or their profession. There are many acts, both federal and provincial, which confer broad powers of entry on inspectors in the interest of ensuring public health and safety.

• (1515)

These provisions are not criminal law in the true sense but administrative provisions that either have an independent existence or are incidental to criminal law. The applicable charter principles are not those that apply to criminal law provisions but those that apply to administrative inspection regimens.

These types of provisions have been in force in Canada under federal drug control legislation for over 80 years. They effectively establish a federal regulatory scheme that governs the distribution and use of scheduled drugs in Canada in a manner consistent with limiting their diversion to the illicit drug market and consistent with Canada's international obligations under the United Nations drug control conventions currently in force in Canada.

Contraventions of designated regulations give rise to a hearing before an adjudicator as indicated in part V of the bill. It may result in a ministerial order which should effectively prevent a reoccurrence. No penalty of fine or imprisonment applies to a breach of these provisions of the regulations. Charter principles that would apply if imprisonment were available as a penalty are not applicable here.

Another area of criticism relates to the impact of the bill on physician-patient and pharmacist-patient confidentiality. Both members identified access to confidential files of patients as an unacceptable interference in the private lives of honest citizens. There is very little new here.

For over 30 years, under the narcotic control regulations the Minister of Health has exercised legislative authority to require a practitioner to provide any information concerning a patient treated with narcotics to the bureau of dangerous drugs, including the diagnosis, history and prescribing information relevant to the patient. This is the very information inspectors are being authorized to copy. Similarly, pharmacists are required to report prescriptions every two months to the bureau of dangerous drugs. Approximately 4.2 million prescriptions are reported to the bureau each year.

Subject to legitimate program activities required under the current and proposed legislation to protect public health and safety, physician-patient and pharmacist-patient confidentiality is and will be fully maintained. This information currently obtained is also subject to the Privacy Act, which prohibits its use or disclosure by any official except in accordance with that act. The Privacy Act ensures that all information collected by the federal government for program purposes is treated confidentially.

Concerning the so-called doctor shopping or double doctoring offence, the official opposition member cited evidence given by the Canadian Medical Association before the legislative committee which examined Bill C-85. It was argued that Bill C-7 would be unsatisfactory to doctors as they would be included within the ambit of clause 5(2). The Reform member asserted that this provision would mean that seeking help for an addiction would be a crime.

In fact the criticism was accepted by the committee and it was proposed that the provision be changed to essentially return to the existing section found in the Narcotic Control Act. As a result, the provision now refers only to persons who receive prescriptions from doctors.

The Reform member's comments are difficult to understand. Clause 5(2) of Bill C–7 as it now stands could not be applied to a person who goes in any one month to only one doctor for his medical requirements. This provision deals not with dependent persons seeking help, but rather with dependent persons who are seeking drugs from many doctors but help from none.

We all understand that control of controlled substances is a complex matter which requires a carefully constructed legal basis in order to be effective, judicious and fair. I believe this bill is a most appropriate instrument for the administration of the laws and regulations we need.

We are dealing with an aspect of society which demands proper protection of the innocent, the inexperienced and the vulnerable. It also demands forceful prosecution of the exploitive, the criminal and the ruthless.

I believe this bill strikes just the right balance between these two requirements.

• (1520)

While we continue to minimize harm through education and prevention, and while we continue to show compassion for victims through treatment and rehabilitation, we must also strike at the criminal heart of this problem. In passing this bill, we will be making contributions to successful battles against drug abuse now and well into the future.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this bill today. This bill concerns controlling drugs and substances and addresses one of the most compelling issues with which society is faced today, the issue of drug abuse. Constituents in Erie riding have demanded action and this government has responded.

As each member of the House is only too aware, drug abuse and the untold suffering it causes knows no geography, no socioeconomic class, no social graces. The problem is widespread. It strikes hard and with devastation. It destroys families, careers and lives. We must stop this waste.

According to a United Nations survey, trade in illegal drugs is second only to world trade in arms. This is a very sobering fact. The incidence of drug abuse rises considerably among teenagers and young adults who are school drop outs, unemployed or homeless. Do not be fooled. This disease, this cancer is in our schools as well. Ask your children. Ask your grandchildren. It is truly frightening.

While recognizing that there is a need to emphasize demand reduction, it is important that the Government of Canada complement these efforts with drug law enforcement and crime prevention.

This bill is intended to consolidate, modernize, enhance and streamline the government's drug control policy underlying two current acts of Parliament and to fulfil Canada's obligations under three international conventions.

In 1961 the government of the day enacted the Narcotic Control Act as a follow up to the single convention on narcotic drugs. In anticipation of the 1971 convention on psychotropic substances, in 1961 and 1969, Parliament passed parts III and IV respectively of the Food and Drug Act. In essence, much of our existing legislation framework is now more than 30 years old and must be reviewed. It is for this reason among others that this legislation is necessary.

Furthermore, as a signatory to three international agreements on the illegal drug trade, Canada is obligated to the terms of the single convention on narcotic drugs of 1961, the 1971 convention on psychotropic substances and the relevant parts of the 1988 United Nations convention against illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and psychoactive substances.

Consequently, the controlled drugs and substances bill is designed to achieve three prime objectives. First is to provide the government with the flexibility required to better control the import, production, export, distribution and use of controlled substances. Second is to provide the mechanisms needed to implement our obligations under international agreements. This relates to the restricted production or trade of internationally regulated substances destined for medical, scientific and/or industrial purposes. Third is to enhance the ability of the police and the courts to enforce our laws.

The bill provides for the seizure and forfeiture of property used in offences involving controlled substances. It also allows for the restraint and forfeiture of fortified drug houses. The use of fortified drug houses for the purposes of drug trafficking is an increasing problem.

The houses are generally family dwellings that have been modified for use as centres for drug trafficking. They are veritable fortresses of crime. The houses are fortified by adding steel doors, boarding up windows and adding cement walls. In some instances, trap doors are used to exchange money and drugs so that there is no contact between the trafficker and the purchaser. The purpose for building such houses is to delay or prevent entry by police. During the extra time it takes the police to gain entry, any evidence of drug dealing is destroyed.

The existing Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act do not effectively deal with emerging trends in drug abuse. We must be able to adapt to rapidly changing criminal activity. These trends see the appearance of new illicit or new designer drugs which can escape effective control under current law. Their methods, their tactics and their products are forever undergoing change. We must respond and quickly. We need flexible legislation which allows those on the front lines of enforcement to adapt quickly to these new developments as they occur.

• (1525)

For example, one of the more recent developments in the drug underworld is the production and illicit sale of so–called designer drugs. Designer drugs are potent substances with chemical structures slightly different from substances presently controlled by the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act, substances such as stimulants, tranquillizers and pain killers. Yet these drugs affect abusers in similar ways and can lead to the same health and social problems produced by more conventional drugs. Much harm can result from the abuse of these drugs. Primary targets are often school age children.

The manufacture and sale of the designer drugs can be a very profitable business. Under the current Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act drugs must first be listed on a schedule to the act. This regulates the conditions for the sale of that particular substance in Canada.

Only once a given substance is listed can it become an offence to sell it. To correct this deficiency the controlled drugs and substances bill proposes the inclusion of analogues to cover these substances. Analogues are non–listed substances that have highly similar chemical structures to those of listed substances. Under the proposed act new illicit drugs appearing on the street which fit this description will be covered automatically.

The bill also permits the control of precursors. Precursors are chemical substances used to produce controlled substances. New provisions contained in the bill will enable authorities to regulate the import and export of these substances.

Other sources of drugs sold on the street are substances intended for medical or scientific use. They may be stolen from a hospital, obtained through illegal prescriptions, secured by obtaining numerous prescriptions from different doctors for the same ailment or via a forged prescription.

People who deal in diverted pharmaceutical drugs are collecting very large profits. This bill enhances present controls that deal with this issue. Under this bill the monitoring of the distribution of drugs will continue.

We know there exists a criminal element which is using more and more sophisticated networks to illegally produce, sell, export and import controlled substances in Canada. These people buy property and consumer goods to further their criminal activities and bolster their personal wealth. As I see it such people should be prevented from retaining illegally obtained capital and goods.

The bill before us today in tandem with the proceeds of crime legislation strikes at the heart of criminal enterprises. Together the legislation will enable the courts to strip criminals of profits and property illegally amassed through drug dealing. Traffickers will no longer be able to flaunt their Rolex watches, fancy cars and mansions, flashy boats and planes, and rightfully so.

Trends in illegal production, distribution and use of controlled substances change frequently and quickly. This bill is designed to deal with current problems and to anticipate future needs. This bill proposes a significant strengthening of our current legislative framework.

Nonetheless I believe this bill merits the support of all members on all sides of the House. Given what is at stake, I submit Canadians expect no less of us.

Ms. Bonnie Brown (Oakville—Milton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to speak on Bill C–7, the controlled drugs and substances bill. I would like to discuss for a few moments the rationale for this legislation, in effect why Canada needs this bill and why the government is appealing to members of this House to support it.

The current situation the world faces regarding illicit drugs is unsettling. The problem of addiction and those who profit by addiction troubles the nation. It troubles my constituents and speaking as one who is elected to represent those same constituents, it troubles me. The bill is a major contribution to effective law enforcement and prosecution of offenders as it consolidates, enhances and modernizes current drug legislation.

• (1530)

It is true in many communities that there has been some decline in drug abuse among the general population but there are also some distressing trends. Some abusers are taking much more potent drugs and the results are very harmful. Others are using drugs in very dangerous combinations.

There has been continuing inclination by youngsters to adopt the dangerous practice of taking anabolic steroids to try to build up their bodies. Unfortunately, prompted by constant and uncritical coverage in the media, uninformed people have come to abuse the drug without thinking of the consequences and equally unfortunately dealers have responded to this new demand.

Abuse has now spread to gymnasiums and high schools, putting at risk the health of young men and women. As is common in drug dealing, the anabolic steroids may be adulterated, raising the risk even higher.

The bill is designed to provide the government with improved means to prosecute people who deal illegally in anabolic steroids. It furnishes a framework to target purveyors of poison, the drug dealers who are the instruments of destruction of too many young citizens.

Despite a gradual decline in the abuse of most drugs, there are several alarming trends emerging on the horizon. Many drugs which are abused today are extremely potent with more potentially damaging consequences. Abusers are consuming drugs by much more dangerous means and they are using drugs in more dangerous combinations.

There is a growing frustration among law enforcement officials, community leaders from across the nation and Canadians in general. They are calling on provincial governments and the Government of Canada to assign a higher priority to dealing with drug abuse and its costly impact. Demands are being made for more severe sentences, a streamlining of the judicial system and assignment of the proceeds of drug crimes to help finance education and enforcement programs.

Court delays and complexities of administering the law have only helped to fuel the public's growing concern. Some law enforcement agencies have declared that the costs of enforcing the law against drug dealers have become high.

The government recognizes that these concerns require deliberate and sustained action, including combating the evil of addiction on three fronts: education and prevention, treatment and rehabilitation, and enforcement and control.

Bill C–7 corrects the deficiencies of existing drug control legislation. It encompasses all listed substances and declares them illegal for other than legitimate medical, scientific or industrial use.

In conjunction with the proceeds of crime legislation adopted in 1988 and proclaimed on January 1, 1989, the bill will empower the courts with the right to confiscate all property and capital accumulated as a result of or used in the commission of drug related crimes. This will provide police forces and the judiciary with the tools they need in a manner consistent with the charter of rights.

With the bill Canada will fulfil its international obligations found under the 1961 single convention on narcotic drugs, the 1971 convention of psychotropic substances and an international treaty governing the trade of illicit drugs.

The proposed bill can become an effective instrument in enforcing the law and controlling the import, export, production, sale, distribution and possession of illegal drugs. The bill seeks to update, enhance and consolidate a section of the Food and Drug Act and the Narcotic Control Act, both passed long ago in the sixties.

While the whims and wants of society have become more and more sophisticated since that time, unfortunately so has the network of drug producers and dealers.

• (1535)

The bill is designed to correct certain anomalies and shortcomings in our current law. In so doing it will enable law enforcement agencies to deal more effectively with a cunning, determined and resourceful adversary, the dealer in illicit drugs.

The new main provisions of the bill include controls on the import and export of precursor chemicals used by drug manufacturers. These chemicals include substances, usually not themselves psychoactive, which criminals can change easily into illicit drugs.

The bill also provides for provisions to control the production, sale, distribution, import and export of androgenic–anabolic steroids; provisions to control the possession, production, distribution, sale, import and export of designer drugs developed by dealers for the purpose of evading current laws; provisions to search, seize and have forfeited property used or intended for the purpose of committing drug offences, also known as offence related property including fortified drug houses.

The bill also includes a complete scheme for obtaining search and seizure warrants; the expansion of offences concepts relating to trafficking and production; the enhancement of control over disposal of controlled substances including forfeiture; new provisions to control the possession, production, distribution, sale, import and export of designer drugs; provisions which will facilitate Canada's commitments under the international conventions; and treatment by the courts of drug dealing in and around schools and other public places frequented by children and dealing drugs to minors as aggravating factors at the time of sentencing.

The principal purposes of the bill are to provide one comprehensive act for the drug control policy of the government and to provide for the enforcement and control aspects of Canada's drug strategy.

I will review briefly the seven principal parts of the bill as well as the introduction. Part I sets out the offences and punishment commensurate with breaking the proposed new law. The particular offences may include possession, trafficking, importing and exporting, production, possession of property obtained as a result of certain offences, and the laundering of proceeds obtained as a result of certain offences.

Part I also sets out specific aggravating factors to be considered by the court at the time of sentencing. These are directed particularly at drug dealers who target children, those who use weapons and violence, as well as those who have previous drug related convictions. This part also included a purpose clause dealing with sentences and, more particular, encouraging rehabilitation and treatment in appropriate circumstances.

Part II deals with enforcement of the proposed act by police. This includes provisions relating to search, seizure and detention of property or illegal substances, forfeiture of offence related property, as well as a complete scheme for protecting innocent third party rights over such property and forfeiture of proceeds of drug related crimes.

Part III outlines procedures for disposal of controlled substances. Part IV covers administration and compliance.

There are seven parts to the bill and its most important provision is that it moves Canada 30 years in time from the sixties to the nineties. It codifies and empowers police while at the same time it protects citizens. It gives us a Controlled Drugs and Substances Act that has merit and is enforceable.

The Speaker: Notice was given to another Speaker and I was just given a paper indicating that the member for Oakville—Milton is splitting her time with the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister. The parliamentary secretary has approximately 9.5 minutes.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C–7, a bill in which many in Etobicoke—Lakeshore have an interest. I am talking about individuals who work in the areas of education, prevention, rehabilitation, treatment, enforcement and control. Those individuals are very interested in the general types of control substances outlined in Bill C–7.

• (1540)

Narcotics are covered under the Narcotic Control Act, as well as some from the 1961 single convention. Examples of drugs in this group are cocaine, opium, codeine, morphine and marijuana. Controlled drugs, as defined under the Food and Drugs Act, are stimulants such as amphetamines and sedatives such as barbituric acid. Restricted drugs come under the Food and Drugs Act, the so–called designer drugs, as well as the anabolic steroids, the precursors and the drugs from the 1971 convention on psychotropic substances.

The majority of the substances are diverted from legitimate manufacturers and then illegally imported and sold. Until recently dealers have been able to sell the steroids at up to 20 times their prescription value with little risk of getting caught.

The amendments to the Food and Drugs Act and its appended regulations contained in the bill have resulted in 42 androgenic–anabolic steroids and their derivatives being classified as controlled drugs.

In the grim world of the effects of illicit drugs on the lives of abusers can be severe. This is the crux of my argument. If the effects on the lives of the abusers can be severe, the penalties proposed for convicted dealers in the most dangerous drugs should be severe. Sentences for the most serious offences of trafficking, importing or exporting narcotics remain life imprisonment in the bill.

We know that the specific provisions of the bill have been given the close scrutiny they deserve by a subcommittee on Bill C–7 of the Standing Committee on Health. I will comment on the work of that committee. Members heard from many national groups and associations representing a community of thousands of people, as well as officials from the departments of health and justice.

I will quickly list some of the groups that made representations before the committee: the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Canadian Centre on Substance Abuse, the Department of Public Health, the city of Toronto, the Addiction Research Foundation, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Foundation for Drug Policy, Lambton Families in Action for Drug Education, the Quebec Bar Association and the Criminal Lawyers Association, et cetera. Many groups appeared before the subcommittee.

The subcommittee fully addressed each and every concern with the intent of improving the bill before us today. Several amendments were made at committee stage. Some particular issues of discussion resulted in amendment. The main amendments to Bill C–7 are the ones in which my constituents are interested.

The amendments create a new offence for possession of marijuana and hashish involving certain quantities. They create a new offence for trafficking in marijuana and hashish in certain quantities. They provide for a purpose clause dealing with sentences and, more particular, they encourage rehabilitation and treatment in appropriate circumstances.

The aggravated circumstances section has been expanded to cover in or near public places usually frequented by minors. This means that when an offender has been convicted in those circumstances a judge will have to give reasons for not imposing a jail term.

The amendments will delete subsection 3(1), which was meant to cover non–scheduled substances having or presented as having the same effect as scheduled substances. There were some apprehensions among other things that it might cover herbal products.

At the same time there is a limit on the ability of inspectors to examine the records so that they may not examine the records pertaining to the medical condition of patients.

• (1545)

The bill clarifies those situations where a practitioner would be considered to be trafficking by providing that unless authorized by the regulations it will be illegal to sell a prescription to obtain a scheduled substance. Several things have been done and several amendments have been made to the original Bill C–7.

I am confident that the current situation facing Canada today as it relates to drug abuse will prompt each member of this place to consider the facts in his or her own constituency, to reflect on the implications for the future and to respond accordingly by supporting this bill.

Through education and prevention we must continue to inform our young people, alerting them to the seductive snares of addiction. Through rehabilitation and treatment we must reach out and free those already trapped in the nightmare of dependence and desolation. Through enforcement and control we must strive to disinter the roots of those criminal enterprises that prey on the young and defenceless, those who otherwise risk being enticed into a never ending cycle of addiction and deprivation.

The bill gives the police new authority without giving them sweeping authority. It gives us greater power to prevent dangerous substances from entering the country. It gives us the tools to help ensure that justly prosecuted criminals do not benefit from their crimes.

I submit that passage of the controlled drugs and substances bill is but one step toward a healthier and safer tomorrow. It is nonetheless a very important step in the right direction. I urge all members from all sides of this House to give this bill the scrutiny it richly deserves. Anything less would be an abdication of our responsibility.

Let us pass this bill so the government can get on with its mandate to protect and promote the health of Canadians in a way consistent with what we have a right to expect. I call on everyone to support this.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to some excellent presentations today on Bill C–7, an act respecting the control of certain drugs, their precursors and other substances and to amend certain other acts and repeal the Narcotic Control Act in consequence thereof.

On balance I find myself in support of all the concerns raised. Members have pointed out some of the highlights of this legislation and its attractiveness. As the previous speaker has just mentioned, it is one step toward a healthier and safer tomorrow. On that there is no question.

However it does pose a more fundamental issue. Yes, this bill takes some steps to fight drug dealers in their pushing of illicit drugs and illicit substances of all kinds. Some time or other we have to have a debate that asks why so many people, particularly young people, are attracted by these illicit substances. What is it about their lives and the way they view the world that makes abusive substances such an attractive option? What are the causes of drug abuse? What are the causes that enable drug dealers and drug pushers to make such lucrative incomes in our country? That is the debate that is absent here.

If we believe that passing legislation and getting tougher on drug dealers is going to solve this problem, we have to admit that it will not. Yes, indeed it is a step closer. Yes, we have to get tougher. I particularly like the section of the bill that refers to those traffickers and so on who are trafficking illicit substances in or near a school, on or near school grounds, or in or near any other public place usually frequented by persons under the age of 18 years.

To say that those convicted who have been pushing their illicit drugs in and around schools will obviously receive a harsher sentence is an excellent start. However I do have to say that until Parliament starts addressing the fundamental causes of drug abuse it is not going to solve the problem. I do not think we want to feel too good about ourselves, that passing this legislation is going to be a major step toward the elimination or reduction of the use of illicit drugs. As the previous speaker said, and I think very accurately, it is a small step in the right direction.

I have two concerns about this legislation. One is the fact that once again we missed the opportunity to deal more effectively with marijuana and the use of marijuana. We all appreciate that this legislation began under the previous Mulroney administration and was brought forward by this administration with very few amendments at that point.

At that point one of the hopes a lot of people had, particularly those involved with the court system and with the real world of illicit drugs and substances on our streets, was the possibility that marijuana would not be listed in the same penalty class as heroin and cocaine, that perhaps now was the time to follow the call from the police and so on in terms of the decriminalization of this substance. I am not saying the legalization; I am talking about the decriminalization.

Alas, Bill C–7 continues the tradition of treating marijuana possession as a criminal offence. All of us have known probably on a personal basis friends and constituents who now possess criminal records for having had in their possession a small amount of marijuana. They are lumped into the same category in many cases with cocaine dealers and that problem element in our society. This was a missed opportunity.

I want to make a few comments about the herbal remedies that were once a major part of this legislation. It is fair to say that increasingly Canadians are turning away from traditional medical systems and sources to more natural ways. The herbalists are coming into their element and coming into their time. People realize that many of the substances we use in the traditional pharmaceutical way are in fact derivatives of natural substances. Increasingly today physicians will say that many Canadians are taking advantage of natural herbs to solve some of their medical problems.

The lobbying that went on by those involved in herbal medicine was quite astounding. I suspect all of us received numerous petitions, letters and visits from people who were concerned that this legislation in its previous state would have eliminated a whole set of possibilities that herbalists were using. I particularly refer as an example to Natural Way Herbs, headed up by Mr. Jim Strauss and his son, who led a tremendous campaign from the western part of Canada to point out to parliamentarians that many of the substances that were being eliminated under this legislation were in fact being used very successfully today to resolve people's medical problems.

I am aware in a personal way of dozens and dozens of people who found the traditional, if you like, medical approach to their illnesses and physical problems were failing and yet found the solution in the use of natural herbs. I thank Mr. Jim Strauss and his son, seventh generation herbalists, for the contribution they make to their community and their patients. As a result of much of this positive lobbying, the herbal remedies continue to be regulated by the Food and Drugs Act. That was a good change in this legislation.

I will leave it at that. It is appropriate that we get on with this legislation. For those two reasons, I will oppose the legislation. That is not to say that there are not a whole set of very positive elements in the legislation. I want to acknowledge that. However, the hassle the natural herbalists experience today is partly as a result of lobbying by the traditional health care system and the international pharmaceutical companies. We have to be aware that there is a holistic approach to solving medical problems and that the natural way, the use of natural herbs, is one way. We ought to be taking more steps to encourage that as opposed to hindering it.

• (1555)

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond briefly to the two very important points the hon. member just made. One had to do with herbal remedies. It was the last one so I will deal with it first. I will be very quick.

There was never anything in Bill C–7 that impacted on the use of herbal remedies in health food stores. That was disinformation and misinformation, whichever way we want to look at it. The sale of herbal remedies in health food stores is dealt with in parts I and II of the Food and Drugs Act. This bill only deals with parts III and IV, so it never was going to impact on it. We removed that whole section because of so much disinformation and so much concern. We thought if we struck that whole clause it would in fact allay these fears.

The second point the hon. member made was regarding the cause of young people using drugs. That is such a multifactorial question. It deals with so many other issues. As a result of that and as as result of looking toward that kind of broader prevention and long term strategy, the hon. member should know that a recommendation came out of subcommittee to the Minister of Health asking that Canada's complete drug strategy be reviewed. This is obviously going to deal with some of those issues.

I would be distressed if I thought the hon. member would withhold voting on what is a very important, creative and progressive bill for two reasons that actually I hope I have answered to his satisfaction, one of which will be dealt with and the other of which never existed at all.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the member's response to my latter issue and I accept what she says as being accurate. Disinformation was prevalent across the country and caused undue alarm to a lot people unnecessarily. I am pleased she has pointed out how that was dealt with. However, I do not accept quite so easily her latter comments that there has been a recommendation to have a broader approach to combating drug abuse in our country.

Perhaps the record will show that this is the crucible where critical debate takes place in Canada. This is the centre where government and on occasion opposition members through opposition days and perhaps even private members' initiatives bring forward the issues we feel are important. By and large, we acknowledge that the government sets the agenda for most of what goes on in this House. However, I do not recall in all my years in Parliament ever having a debate on the fundamental causes of substance abuse in our country. In other words, yes, debate takes place on specific pieces of legislation, but I am talking about the fundamental causes of drug abuse, like poor housing and educational opportunities. We all know the causes as opposed to the symptoms.

I appreciate what my hon. friend is saying. I do look forward to a time when we say to ourselves in this country that passing legislation, imposing stiffer sentences and getting tough on drug dealers is only a small step to resolving the growing substance abuse in our country.

I was disturbed recently when I was visiting a number of junior high schools in the constituency of Kamloops. After the formal talks and presentations I arranged a lunch get together with students who were interested in talking about issues. In every high school concerned students raised the matter of drug abuse in their schools. These were junior high schools, not senior high schools. Their views were that large percentages of the students were becoming regular drug users, and of course cigarette use was leading this initiative.

As parliamentarians, all of us are concerned about this issue. Are we doing anything to come to grips with the fundamental causes of this growing use of drugs in our society? I think not. As a matter of fact, if I were going to be truthful with myself today I would say that we are taking a number of steps that will enhance drug abuse in the future, will make life more miserable for more Canadians, tougher for more Canadians and will abandon more young people as a result of policies that are being considered or brought forward in these times.

• (1600)

I appreciate the minister's intervention but perhaps in six months we will look at the record of Parliament and ask ourselves how much time we spent as elected representatives dealing with the fundamental causes of drug abuse in our country.

That is the way we will measure whether we are taking this seriously.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary answered the first two items. I simply advise the member that under the three international conventions to which Canada is a party and to which Bill C–7 addresses the problem we have with, for instance, benzodiazepines, it is required that simple possession and use of marijuana remain a criminal offence. This is not an option for Canada in terms of opting out, as the member might suggest.

We did not miss an opportunity. What we did was bring our legislation into line with the requirements of the international conventions to which Canada is a party.

With regard to the attitude, I agree with the member. There is no question we have to look for every opportunity. Our national drug strategy spends 70 per cent of the moneys available to it on rehabilitation, treatment and prevention programs, most of which, as with regard to tobacco, is directed at our young people, those most susceptible to these problems.

I agree with the member that there should be a review. Our subcommittee, of which I was the chair, has recommended to the Standing Committee on Health and to the minister that a comprehensive review of Canada's drug policy and our overall drug strategy be conducted.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the intervention by my hon. friend. I accept gratefully the comments he has made.

A number of major initiatives have been taken as a result of our relatively comprehensive drug strategy. Let us also acknowledge that as a result of the transfer payment reductions now being imposed on the provinces, many of the programs they have in place will have to be curtailed or abandoned as a result.

On one hand we might be expanding and on the other hand we are making it more difficult for provincial jurisdictions to continue their programs.

I quote the Prime Minister when he was the justice minister in Pierre Trudeau's government in 1980, referring to marijuana decriminalization: "It is our intention to bring about changes which will serve to lessen the severity of penalties for possession of this substance".

Granted my friend has said what is true, but in 1980. This legislation does not do that. It continues with the same penalties we have had in the past.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am distressed to hear the hon. member make the statements he did because I agree in every way with what he has said with regard to young people and the use of drugs.

As a family physician, I can tell members that nothing has been of greater concern and has caused me more pain over my 25 years of practice. Voting against this bill would serve neither of the hon. member's objectives. It will really be throwing the baby out with the bath water.

See this bill as a scaffold. See the recommendation the committee made to review this strategy as an open door to make very important changes that will be necessary. This is a springboard. It may not be all that he does, but voting against the bill will certainly throw away the opportunity.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have been here for a few years and I have heard the same comments time and again that in dealing with major problems facing our country this is a tiny baby step in the right direction.

This issue inflicts so much pain on so many people and on so many families, that not to do whatever possible to combat this is perhaps questionable in terms of our work here.

I do not take these slight steps in the right direction with much enthusiasm but I accept that what she is saying is accurate.

• (1605)

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak today on Bill C–7, the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act.

Bill C–7 consolidates and supplements the Narcotics Control Act and parts III and IV of the Food and Drugs Act. It combines a regulatory scheme for drugs used in medicine with the criminal law regime for illicit substances.

The bill is a reintroduction of Bill C–85, the Psychoactive Substance Control Act, introduced by the Conservative government in the previous Parliament. Bill C–85 died on the Order Paper in the last Parliament due to the election call. While it was reintroduced into this Parliament by the Minister of Health, aspects of it fall under the concerns of the Department of Justice and the Solicitor General of Canada.

One main object of the bill as originally conceived was to bring our drug laws into conformity with provisions in certain international agreements we had signed. These agreements include the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961, the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, 1971, and the relevant portions of the United Nations convention against illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances, 1988.

In keeping with the spirit of these instruments, Bill C–7 adopted an interdiction and criminalization approach to the production, traffic and the possession and use of illicit substances.

The legislation was also supposed to cohere with Canada's drug strategy which had been unveiled in May 1987. The key object of the drug strategy is to reduce harm to individuals, families and communities caused by alcohol and other drugs. Canada's drug strategy was designed to place greater emphasis on reducing demand for illicit substances through prevention, education and drug treatment programs instead of relying solely on the interdiction efforts of police and penal institutions for the reduction of the supply of illicit drugs.

In contrast to these methods, harm reduction seeks to reduce the harm caused by those who have a problem with substance abuse, including harm done to themselves, to their families and to other persons. It takes a public health approach to the problem of drug abuse rather than a moralistic, punitive one which views such abuse as criminal in and of itself.

The bill passed second reading and was sent to a subcommittee of the Standing Committee of Health in April last year. As members will recall, the red book promised us that MPs would be given a greater role in drafting legislation through their work on House of Commons committees. The work done on Bill C–7 by the subcommittee chaired by the member for Mississauga South and the participation of other parliamentarians in making significant changes to the bill despite its having passed second reading is a perfect example of this commitment put into action.

Officials from the Departments of Health and Justice have explained that the bill was a consolidation of existing legislation and that the changes it contained were required to fulfil the international agreements we had signed. They emphasized that our international partners were exerting pressure on us to pass this legislation.

As the subcommittee analyzed the bill more closely and listened to the arguments of witnesses a variety of issues began to emerge. Although there was not a single unanimous view, nonetheless members of each of the three parties expressed similar concerns about the substance of the bill, as did other parliamentarians including me.

As many Liberals see it, Canada's approach to illegal drugs has required adjustment for some time. At different times the Liberal Party of Canada has in non–binding party resolutions advocated certain fundamental changes to our drug policies. To simply consolidate and thereby reaffirm existing approaches to drugs would be to miss an important opportunity to effect modern rational policies on drugs.

What were the concerns some had with the original Bill C–7? Bill C–7 is a complex piece of legislation. In my view the following were among the most important concerns. First, the bill lacked provisions for rehabilitation and treatment options for sentencing as an alternative to incarceration or fines. Second, the bill categorized illicit substances according to outdated schedules.

Third, the bill reaffirmed lengthy maximum prison terms and increased the fines for the simple possession of cannabis in contrast to current court practices and evolved societal attitudes.

Fourth, Bill C–7 included a deeming provision for illicit substances which seemed to us to contradict the fundamental legal principle that conduct subject to criminal sanction should be specified clearly in acts.

Let us deal with these concerns. First, the bill lacked provisions for rehabilitation and treatment options for sentencing as an alternative to incarceration and fines. Many members felt Bill C–7, drafted under the lead of the Department of Health, did not squarely address the public health dimensions of the illicit drug problem. Among experts in public health and addiction research, the consensus has emerged in recent years which emphasizes a strategy called harm reduction. It emphasizes the broader reduction of harms to society caused by illegal drug use, as well as by inappropriate institutional responses to drug problems.

• (1610)

As the experts know, a harm reduction approach seeks to reduce the harm caused by those who have a problem with substance abuse, including harm done to themselves, to their families and to other persons. It evaluates strategies for dealing with illicit substances in part by situating them within the context of substance abuse generally, including that of alcohol and tobacco. A less ideological perspective on the problem begins with honest epidemiological comparisons to strategies for dealing with such legal and potentially very dangerous substances.

Harm reduction initiatives include needle exchange programs, methadone treatment, counselling and rehabilitation efforts. Education efforts which stress the health risks associated with legal and illegal drug use are also important in the prevention of drug dependencies or addictions.

I contrast this approach with what I would call prohibitionism. One treats the consumption of drugs as a moral evil where criminal sanction is seen as the only appropriate response. Rather than recognizing the users of illicit substances as endangering their health and taking appropriate steps to help them, the prohibitionist perspective would treat them solely as criminals who require the threat of criminal penalties and a criminal record to deter them from such behaviour.

Were this an effective approach, the United States with its heavy emphasis on interdiction and punishment would be nearly drug free by now. As we know, the number of prisoners in jail for drug offences in that country continues to grow with little sign of any stemming of the insidious drug trade or the use of illegal drugs.

Despite being part of Canada's drug strategy which emphasizes harm reduction as its primary goal, Bill C–7 in its original form did not mention or encourage judges to consider rehabilitation or treatment as alternatives to fines or incarceration for those convicted of possession of illicit substances. This was a concern now remedied.

Criminal sanctions should not be our only tool for dealing with illicit drugs or for changing the habits of persons who are addicted or at risk of drug addiction. Prohibitionism toward drug users on its own arguably inflicts greater harms on individuals and families than the harms it purports to prevent. We should also bear in mind the far greater number of deaths and amounts of disease associated each year with the use of such legal drugs as tobacco and alcohol. In my opinion the sums and energies we expend in fighting the use of illicit drugs should be allocated with due regard for their overall impact on population health.

Wisely and responsibly, the government has amended Bill C–7 to include a clause that addresses rehabilitation. Clause 11(1) declares: "The fundamental purpose of any sentence for an offence arising under part I is to contribute to respect for law and the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society, while encouraging rehabilitation and treatment in appropriate circumstances of offenders and acknowledging the harm done to victims and to the community".

The second concern I raised was that the bill categorized illicit substances according to outdated schedules. No one would dispute our drug policy must be reflective of current scientific knowledge. The parliamentary committee repeatedly stressed the schedules proposed in Bill C–7 are outdated. This was put forward by witnesses. While they are housed in the 1971 UN convention, their arrangement derives from public policies of the 1920s when policy makers knew relatively little science about the nature, the effects and the potential for societal harm posed by these drugs.

The most serious example of the lack of pharmacology reflected in the schedules was the placement of cannabis in the schedule I of the UN convention. Schedule I is supposed to be reserved for the most socially harmful drugs such as morphine, heroin and opium.

Heavy regular use of cannabis can certainly sap motivation and affect short term memory. Many will contend that while it may be carcinogenic, the risks of the light use of cannabis do not appear to be significantly worse than those associated with moderate use of legal substances like alcohol. While we have heard calls from some for decriminalization, in my opinion dependency on marijuana should be strongly discouraged. Nonetheless, the drug schedules used in Canada should reflect the best scientific knowledge we possess. We should not be obligated to accept outdated schedules.

In response to the concerns raised, the bill has been amended to incorporate an additional schedule, I(i), which deals exclusively with cannabis and its derivatives. Read together with the new penalty provisions which I shall discuss next, this amendment takes cannabis out of the company of far more deleterious drugs like heroin and cocaine while keeping it within the realm of the Criminal Code. In a minute I will also discuss the international schedules and our response to that issue.

• (1615)

The third concern with the original Bill C–7 was it reaffirmed maximum prison terms and increased the fines for the simple possession of cannabis, in contrast to current court practices and involved societal attitudes.

Should pot smokers have the threat of a lengthy jail term hanging over their heads? Is this the best way to discourage use? Does it make Canada safer? Does it make it healthier?

As originally drafted, Bill C–7 retained a maximum penalty of seven years for simple possession of cannabis. It doubled the fine for a first offence and more than doubled it for a second offence. These maximum penalties contrasted with what is generally now meted out by Canadian courts for a first time offence, which is usually a small fine and sometimes an absolute discharge.

It is estimated that we charge over 40,000 people a year with simple possession of cannabis, a costly burden on the court and the police systems. This represents approximately 3 per cent of the estimated over one million regular cannabis users in Canada.

Further, while 3 per cent of those charged will face incarceration, over half a million Canadians have criminal records because of cannabis convictions. These people can apply for pardons in due course, but the convictions they have can be a serious hindrance to employability and for travel. Penalties tend to vary with different police officers, the judges, the regions of the country and the socioeconomic status of the accused. Would that it were not so, but it is true.

In many communities across Canada, the courts, the legal profession, the police on the beat and the average person do not appear to view cannabis possession as meriting the severe penalties set out for it in existing law. Reaffirming these penalties would effectively express our legislator's faith in the existing penalty structure. What signals should such reaffirmations send to our courts? When law lags behind court practices and societal attitudes and such laws come up for review, the laws must be adjusted, not reaffirmed.

Penalties for offences under the act should be proportionate to the social and personal harm they entail. In keeping with this principle, the bill has been amended to incorporate a new schedule which establishes threshold amounts of cannabis for the offence of simple possession. Persons charged with possession of lesser amounts will be subject only to summary conviction proceedings, with a correspondingly lower range of penalties. This is still a criminal conviction and I stress this. However, in those cases involving the lesser amounts with simple possession charges, there will not be fingerprinting, there will not be photography or entering into a CPIC system for tracing purposes.

By reducing penalties and recommending treatment and rehabilitation alternatives in Bill C–7, we send a clear signal to the courts encouraging them to pursue the available harm reduction avenues.

The fourth concern I originally mentioned, that the bill as originally drafted included a deeming provision for illicit substances, appears to contradict the fundamental legal principle that conduct subject to criminal sanction should be specified clearly in acts.

The deeming provision in Bill C–7 allowed new, previously unscheduled substances to be deemed by regulators to belong to a particular schedule and the attached penalty provisions to come into force at that point. The bill would have extended a definition of controlled substances and their analogues beyond drugs cited in the schedules to such drugs as were deemed by regulators to have an effect substantially similar to, or greater than, schedule substances.

Using this provision, the government would thus have been able to adopt regulations to control, govern and limit the use of as yet undesignated substances. This would be a significant departure from current provisions of the Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act, the offences and associated punishments set out in these acts would apply only to such drugs as are specifically cited in the attached schedules. The purpose of this provision would be to allow regulators to respond quickly to the introduction of new so–called look alike drugs on our streets.

While this purpose is laudable, it has yet to be shown that this problem of undesignated drugs is out of control and in guarding against it, we must be careful not to trample on other fundamental legal principles. Citizens must know what the law is beforehand so that they can govern their behaviour accordingly. If something is illegal, then there must be a law saying so unambiguously. To declare x a crime after the fact is unacceptable.

Further, many consumers and vendors of natural health remedies expressed concern that this provision could allow regulators to declare these products included in restricted or banned schedules. This provision in fact only dealt with parts III and IV of the Food and Drugs Act and herbs have historically been covered by parts I and II. Accordingly, this provision has been deleted now as the amended act Bill C–7 by the government.

I have dwelt at some length on the substantial improvements that members were able to bring to this bill after second reading.

Most of my remarks have concerned the demand side of the drug equation. There is also the supply side to consider. Bill C–7 introduces three important measures to combat drug trafficking. First, it includes a provision whereby judges are required to take aggravating factors into account when sentencing. Written reasons will now be required of a judge who fails to impose a prison term in the presence of any one of a list of aggravating factors.

The court will be required to regard as aggravating factors: first, use of a weapon or use of threat of violence; second, trafficking on school grounds or to a minor or in or near public places frequented by minors; third, any previous convictions of a drug offence; and fourth, using the services of a minor in the perpetration of a designated substance offence. It is anticipated and hoped these provisions will deter drug dealers from using weapons, threatening violence, selling to young people or recruiting their services.

Second, schedule V in Bill C–7 introduces the notion of precursor substances, adding them to the list of controlled substances. This innovation keeps us in line with our international obligations under the single convention on narcotic drugs, 1961 and the 1988 Vienna convention.

Precursors do not by themselves produce any psychotropics or psychoactive effect but can be converted or used to produce designer drugs, look alike drugs or scheduled substances. Regulations enacted to control the import and export of precursors would attempt thereby to thwart the production of psychoactive substances in Canada and elsewhere. Canada has become a conduit for these and we owe it to our international partners to put a stop to this.

Finally, Bill C–7 allows police to use reverse sting measures, that is selling quantities of drugs to dealers for the sake of making arrests. Under the regulations of the Narcotic Control Act police officers have been permitted to possess drugs as part of their undercover work but without legislative authority to sell. Quite reasonably they wish to have clarified that they are so permitted by including a clause exempting them from the criminal provisions of the new act. That has been done.

Legislation is an evolutionary process as it should be. I believe that Bill C–7, as amended, has come a long way. The subcommittee has also recommended that a comprehensive drug policy review be undertaken by a parliamentary committee. Further, there has also been a recommendation that a task force of experts be established to examine and redefine the criteria for the the scheduling of drugs. Thus Canada could be a leading force in the modernization of international drug scheduling.

Although I admit to not being an expert in these matters, I do know that it is the time to look forward to a drug policy appropriate to the 21st century, one that incorporates criminal law, enforcement, public health and modern societal attitudes.

I publicly commend our ministers, the subcommittee members and our colleagues in the House from all parties in the development of the bill as deliberated today and I will support it.

Mr. Reg Alcock (Winnipeg South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the remarks of the member for London West we see the excellence that is brought to the work of this Chamber.

I want to speak very briefly on the process rather than the substance of this bill. For me the bill personifies and represents everything that is good about what we said we would do when we came to this House.

The very low number it has, Bill C–7, should indicate to members that a considerable amount of time has elapsed between the time this bill was introduced and today. The reason for that is quite simple. We said when we campaigned in the election in 1993 that we would introduce processes that allowed backbench members to get involved in a hands on way with the drafting of important legislation, which is exactly what happened with this bill.

The members for Vancouver East, Beaches—Woodbine, Oakville—Milton, Fredericton—York—Sunbury, London West, Etobicoke—Lakeshore, Saint–Denis, Lachine—Lac Saint–Louis and many others spent hundreds of hours arguing through the articles of this bill. They were concerned. This bill is a holdover from the previous government. As many members have said, when they first heard the testimony they thought something was wrong, that the bill did not meet the test that we campaigned on.

Members of this House worked exceptionally hard with the full support of three ministers, the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General of Canada and the Minister of Health. They struggled to improve the bill and have it reflect the principles and the values which our party brings to this House.

In so doing, we received tremendous support from staff in the various ministries. I want to single out an individual, Mr. Paul Genest, from our research bureau who put in all of those hours with each of these members as they thought through, argued through and worried about the details. It is not easy being a backbencher and approaching legislation in the face of a cadre of experts, lobbyists and in this case people from other countries who come in and said that the legislation must be written in a particular way to meet their particular needs. It took a long time. It took much thought. It took very hard work.

I believe we have produced legislation that will, as the member for London West has suggested, put Canada in the forefront of leading the war on drugs from a perspective of harm reduction and not simply following the U.S. model that was established earlier in the eighties under Ronald Reagan.

This whole process has been an exercise in excellence and one in which our caucus should be very proud. I want to thank those members on the staff and in this caucus who worked so hard to do what we said we would do when we came here and that is allow every member of this House a hand in drafting important legislation.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to four petitions.

* * *

TAXATION

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on this first and new day for Canada I present a petition that has been circulating all across Canada. It has been signed by a number of Canadians from Uxbridge, Ontario.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill and the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill and the aged.

BOVINE GROWTH HORMONE

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions this morning to present.

The first petition calls on the House of Commons to do an independent and transparent review of whether we should allow BGH, a synthetic bovine hormone, to be used in Canada.

JUSTICE

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition draws to the attention of the House that there is a problem with serious personal injury crimes being committed against people across Canada.

The petitioners call for a list of nine different things they would like to see the House of Commons address, including keeping dangerous sex offenders locked up for life, eliminating statutory release and so on.

I agree with my petitioners on that.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition calls on Parliament to go slowly on the negotiations with native land claims in British Columbia and turn the Indian reserves over to the bands in fee simple.

The Speaker: Just a gentle reminder that we need not agree or disagree with the petitions we present. We should simply present them and let them stand on their own.

MINING

Mr. Brent St. Denis (Algoma, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from dozens of citizens in the metro Toronto area and small communities around Toronto expressing their support for the mining industry in Canada. Mining employs tens of thousands of Canadians and is an important part of the economic strength of the country.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CUSTOMS ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–102, an act to amend the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff and to make related and consequential amendments to other acts, as reported (with amendments) from the committee.

Hon. Christine Stewart (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

(Motion agreed to.)

The Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Stewart (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

• (1010)

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of beginning the debate on Bill C–102 at third reading.

I also have the privilege of being the first member of the government to speak to the House of Commons after the rather monumental day we had yesterday. I welcome back all members who participated in the referendum. We will continue to debate the affairs of the country, as we have in the past, with the good spirit and dignity all members bring to the House.

Although we have felt very passionately and very differently in the last while about things, I expect we will continue to work together both in committee and in the House in the spirit of improvement during the coming months.

Before I get into the details of Bill C–102 I will discuss the efforts of the government, particularly the Minister of Finance and the Department of Finance. I will discuss the improvements we are making in the framework to deal with questions of tariff and trade.

In a general way governments have during the last 10 years endeavoured to change our relationship with our major trading partners. That resulted in the emergence of the free trade agreement, which was a bitterly contested piece of legislation, becoming law in 1988. In its original form it caused a great deal of dislocation in Canadian industry and trade. Since we have formed the government we have made some improvements to it and we now find it an effective framework for dealing in North American trade.

At the same time the less controversial agreement, NAFTA, which was as influential as the free trade agreement, came into effect and set out our trading relationship with Mexico.

More important, from a strategic point of view the underlying agreements around the world have changed in the last few years. I am referring to the World Trade Organization. Canada is now participating in a whole new regime which affects its trading relationships. It affects the way disputes are being adjudicated. It changes the specifics of tariff regimes on a whole number of commodities traded around the world. It is a giant step forward and Canada has played a leading role.

As Canada fights for its interest on the world trade stage, it continues to have a number of disputes with its trading partners and it must aggressively pursue its interests. I do not have to tell the House how frequently the minister of agriculture has had to defend and promote the interests of western Canadian grain farmers against, in the trade sense, parochial interests from the United States.

Similarly, the fur trade industry is threatened by new European regulations which will come into effect on January 1. The regulations will affect a large part of the fur export business. However, the Canadian government, under the leadership of the Minister for International Trade, has been very aggressive in pursuing changes to these regulations which will not only achieve the environmental and humane aspects of the fur trade business but also promote our access to markets.

We have suggested a number of worthwhile compromises. Leaders from Europe have visited Canada. They have visited our research stations. They have visited the north to speak with the aboriginal people involved in the fur trade.

• (1015)

In the end we are going to find ourselves with an agreement which is more acceptable to everyone. Failing that, we are willing to take the dispute to the World Trade Organization. Although not many cases have been made before it since its inception, this is a very strong case and we can promote it.

Returning to the ground level of the World Trade Organization, we are constantly going through our regulations and trade structure to make sure that our own rules and regulations conform to the international situation. For example, our tariffs have to be reviewed constantly.

There is a new trade structure in Canada for arbitrating among different industries. The CITT is an example of a trade tribunal which allows different industries to present their case as to what the levels of tariffs should be. This too is a new dispute mechanism which we think in the overall picture is a very important change. It gives the different sectors of the economy a chance to make a plea in front of a regulatory body instead of simply making a plea to the political leaders, which at times because of the specific interest and regional needs can be a very difficult act for industries to get involved in. Everybody prefers the new tribunal to the old system. It is dealing with its first case and we will see how that proceeds.

Bill C–102 fits into the good government theme we have been pursuing since forming the government two years ago this month. The red book, the speech from the throne and the budget each year have promoted this good government theme. We believe we are bringing to Canadians changes that are necessary, essential and desired to make for a more effective and productive economy.

A number of the measures in Bill C–102 build on the government's review of Canada's tariff regime announced in the 1994 budget. They are designed to ensure that Canada remains a favourable location for producing goods for investment and also that Canadian businesses, including small businesses, are placed in a better position to profit from Canada's free trade agreements.

Certain amendments we put into this piece of legislation, for example, the enhancements to duty deferral programs and tariff reductions on manufacturing inputs, are designed to lower input costs for businesses and to maintain and enhance the competitiveness of Canadian businesses in Canadian and world markets. In addition, Bill C–102 provides for a number of technical changes to simplify, clarify and modernize the customs tariff and its administration and to make it easier and less costly for business to access tariff relief programs.

The amendments to facilitate the processing of travellers at the border will allow Revenue Canada to focus on other important border issues such as smuggling and the processing of growing commercial imports. I want to speak to that for a moment. One of the aggravations which has developed in Canada and U.S. trade is not among big corporations or even in our professional relationships but as individuals travelling back and forth.

It has been a long time since these regulations have been modernized. We are trying to achieve a threshold so that people returning from the United States, Europe, Asia, or from wherever they have travelled can bring back a reasonable amount of goods, taking into account what the prices really are around the world, without having to go through a lot of processing and trying to figure out how to cook the books and evade the law.

More important, for those people who conform to the law or who are regular travellers, new systems have been designed for them to cross the border without having the complication of constantly being checked and having to fill out forms. Those people are in the vast majority of Canadians who, when they travel back and forth between the United States and Canada, do so without complication and without any idea of trying to avoid the border crossings. Allowing them to go through quickly allows Revenue Canada without any increase in resources to concentrate on contraband and smuggling. The large movement of goods or services costs the Canadian economy money. They are illegal and we want to keep them out of the country.

These are productive changes which reinforce the message that good government is responsive to Canadians. Good government means providing an easy way for people to carry out their activities in accordance with the law at the same time creating a more effective police force to deal with those who are not conforming with the law.

These changes were first announced last June and have been well received at border crossings. Canadian businesses have not felt any undue hardship because of the increased limits for travellers. In the coming winter travel season Canadians will appreciate the ability to get across the border more quickly. We anticipate an increasing tourist industry for Canadians travelling abroad, but more important for people coming to Canada. It is incumbent upon us to make sure that people can come into this country easily.

Vancouver is emerging as a very important port in the cruise industry. We have done things to facilitate the movement of people into Vancouver and on to those ships without tying them up for hours at border crossings or causing unnecessary procedural delays.

I commend the Minister of National Revenue, who is from British Columbia, for many of these initiatives. He was very proud when the Prime Minister visited the Vancouver airport a couple of weeks ago. That visit by the Prime Minister showed that real progress has been made in the area of customs and customs administration.

I look forward to input from members of the House who have border crossings in their ridings on whether they now find the service more effective. As the service is extended from coast to coast over the next few years more and more Canadians will appreciate the changes being made by the Minister of National Revenue. He has the full support of the government. I again commend him on his initiatives and activities.

[Translation]

As hon. members may recall, this bill provides for important customs changes that will give Canadian businesses and individuals significant benefits on the long term.

These changes include the improvement of Canada's duty referral programs and the reduction of tariffs on a broad range of inputs. They will allow us to improve the competitiveness of Canadian industry by lowering the cost of inputs.

The proposed amendments will also update travellers' exemptions. Together with other measures proposed in this bill, this provision will facilitate the processing of travellers' applications and allow customs officers to focus on the real priorities such as processing the ever increasing number of trade imports and the fight against smuggling.

The bill also contains technical amendments that will make the customs system more effective. The customs value of imported goods is one of the most important changes in this regard.

[English]

The finance committee had a very good hearing last week. Several witnesses met with us and talked about questions of evaluation and answered questions on how to proceed with the law. Tariff is an obscure part of what we do, yet for many businesses and many professionals who specialize in tariff regulations it is at the heart of the way they do business. Witnesses came forward and told us that we should be doing some things in a different way. The government was very interested and listened to them.

• (1025)

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association had a dispute over how we were dealing with tariff relief on certain types of items. After a couple of years it was found that if the government decided that a particular item, for example a table in the manufacturing process, was not tariff free, a tariff could be retroactively applied. The committee broke at that point and national revenue officials went up to my office with officials from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Consequently, they came down with an amendment and changes were made.

That is an example of being very productive in the way we approach legislation. It is very respectful of the finance committee.

Under the leadership of the member for Willowdale, the finance committee has to deal with many different subjects. It is probably one of the busiest committees in the House of Commons. The areas under consideration can be very complex. For example, in the last two weeks we have had to deal with the tax treaty with the United States in Bill S–9. We have had to deal with tax treaties with other countries in Bill C–105. We have had to deal with measures from the budget in Bill C–90. We have had to deal with Bill C–103, which is the change in the Income Tax Act to deal with split runs, and we have had to deal with Bill C–102.

All of this shows the wide range of interests members on the committee have and their ability to respond relatively quickly to the needs of a minister, whether it is the finance minister, the national revenue minister, the minister of citizenship, or the heritage minister. We have had to respond very quickly and find out what the subject issues are.

When witnesses come forward and say to be careful, that we may be making a mistake, it is not taken lightly. As I alluded to a moment ago in the case mentioned earlier, changes were made on the spot when we saw that the association had a very good point.

One of the issues I wish to address is to make sure that the witnesses understood why we did what we did and why some changes were not made. The major amendment we introduced in committee was to reduce tariffs on manufacturing imports which would remove the competitive disadvantage that currently burdens Canadian manufacturers, since the U.S. tariff rates on average are lower than ours.

Another amendment enhanced, streamlined and consolidated Canada's duty deferral programs resulting in lower import costs for Canadian exports, easier access to programs by small and medium size business and the greater ability of Canadian regions to compete with U.S. free trade zones.

The most controversial area is the free trade zones. I will take a minute to explain what our strategy is because members opposite probably have local businesses, chambers of commerce, or whatever coming forward and saying they want a free trade zone. They want to have an area where economic activity can take place in a zone free from any taxes or taxes shared by others.

Free trade zones have emerged around the world as a very important tool in reducing costs for businesses in dealing with their markets. The Europeans have one in Amsterdam around the airport. The Americans have several. There has been a longstanding demand for a free trade zone in Canada.

Going back to the early 1960s, at least for the last 35 years we have made a number of efforts to target slow growth areas in this country and create some regional development programs. It goes back to the days of DRIE and DREE. There was also the tax credit which was eliminated last year. There have been a number of them.

The premise behind this is the isolation of slow growth areas from faster growing ones, or in the vocabulary of economists, it is red pencilling certain areas. We can isolate by census track those areas in greatest need. We can take the lowest 5 per cent and say that arbitrarily we are going to help everybody who lives in the lowest 5 per cent of the census track as judged by unemployment rates, industrialization and population size. There are many factors we can take into account. What we have found over the years is that the schemes have not been particularly effective. Despite 35 years of pretty extensive programming and tax measures there has been limited success in attracting industries that are of long term benefit to a region.

• (1030)

Since we have formed the government the three regional development agencies we have, Western Economic Development, FORD–Q, and ACOA, have all changed their strategy as a result of the recognition of what I have just said, which is that many of our programs have been ineffective. This applies not only to the federal government but also to the provincial governments that are hesitant to get involved aggressively in regional development schemes which frequently do not work and cost the taxpayer a lot of money.

Having said that, we still have to find very effective ways to increase the capabilities of our industries for producing goods and transferring products from the Canadian market into our export markets, because that is our fastest growing area. Those who have been watching the economy very closely for the last 18 months know full well that the growth in our economy has come from exports and not from the domestic market. We still have a reluctant consumer. We have a very low demand on residential housing and commercial real estate is also slow. But we do have to our credit a very productive and fast growing export oriented industry which crosses several different sectors: manufacturing, agriculture, professional services and the automobile industry. We have been very effective in developing expertise that takes us around the world.

A number of cities have come to us, Calgary being one, as well as some suburbs just outside of Vancouver, Halifax and my own town of Winnipeg. They have told us that if we help them form a free trade zone they will create an atmosphere to increase exports, particularly into the American market. Winnipeg, through a new group called Winnport, has been very aggressively profiling Winnipeg as a transfer point from the European markets to Southeast Asia and into the United States. I wish the leaders in this campaign every success in achieving its new ambitions.

They have come to us and asked why we do not help them form a free trade zone. They ask us why we do not take the area around the Calgary or Winnipeg airports and create a zone that eliminates tariff barriers. In some cases in the United States this would eliminate labour laws and a whole number of regulations to make it easier to export to the United States.

We are very much interested in exports to the United States. However, at the federal government level we are preoccupied with enhancing the activities related to the export and not to the geographical region which goes back to what I said at the beginning. The regional development strategies where we delineate zones for special treatment tend to be counterproductive. If we take an area around an airport, what do we do with the exporter who is two blocks away? Do we want the exporter to take down his plant and move it, or do we want to move the zone over two blocks? If we move the zone two blocks, what about the architectural firm that happens to be three blocks away? Do we move the zone three blocks away?

We have said to the municipal governments that the local development authorities, the chambers of commerce, and the provincial governments that have come forward with different schemes should be organizing and stacking up the provincial and municipal programs they want. If they want as a municipal government to zone certain lands and create an industrial park to encourage exporters to move there and show them the benefit of being close to an airport or a truck route or whatever mode of transportation is important, they should go ahead.

What we are interested in is a tariff regime that makes it effective for exporters to get their goods out of Canada and into the United States. We will change the rules and regulations to make it as easy as possible for businesses to import the products, the goods and the services they are working with to make whatever it is they are exporting so they can get them to market with minimal intrusion by the federal government.

• (1035)

We think Bill C–102 goes a long way to accomplishing that goal. We believe that once this becomes law exporters will find themselves within a regime that makes it a much easier decision to get into export markets, a much easier decision to import certain inputs and to add value into export to the United States, Europe or Southeast Asia.

I must say we have deliberately decided not to get into free trade zones as traditionally defined at the local level but instead to tell people who come to us with proposals to do what they think has to be done in their local market and we will be there to support them through a national regime that will facilitate the activity, which will in turn create jobs and economic growth.

This returns us to one of the premises of our government, which is that good government means the production of jobs and the expansion of the economy. The heart and soul of this government rests on the jobs and economic growth strategy. We feel that Bill C–102 contributes directly to this.

The legislation also contains changes to improve the operation of the customs tariff and the Customs Act. One of the most important changes concerns the valuation provision of the Customs Act. This valuation provision was discussed by many witnesses before the finance committee last week.

It is essential that the rules for determining value for duty not be vulnerable to manipulation or abuse. Otherwise, both government revenues and fair competition would be put at risk. In this connection, Bill C–102 contains provisions that would clarify existing Canadian valuation policy. That policy is that the basis for duty and tax assessment on imported goods is the price payable by the Canadian purchaser. This is consistent with the thrust of the GATT–WTO valuation code and with NAFTA. Furthermore, the provision corrects problems that have also been identified and corrected by some of our major trading partners. These measures will ensure that Canadian producers receive the full protection they are entitled to under Canadian legislation.

In going through the bill in more detail, I would like to begin with the enhancements to Canada's duty deferral program. Duty deferral programs defer or relieve custom duties on imported goods that are subsequently exported but are awaiting formal entry into Canada. Bill C–102 will enhance, streamline and consolidate Canada's existing duty deferral programs: duty drawback, inward processing and bonded warehousing. This is what I was speaking to a few minutes ago when I talked about our response to the free trade zone concept.

The results will be lower costs for Canada's exports, programs that are more easily accessible by small and medium size business and greater ability of Canadian regions to compete with U.S. free trade zones. This will help attract and keep investment in our country.

I would like to emphasize the changes are a result of extensive consultation with business and enjoy broad industry and regional support. I can attest that after consultations with us people in Winnipeg see more clearly what we are trying to do and how their plan fits in with our plans.

Related to the enhancement of duty deferral is a change to the Access to Information Act. This change would protect the confidentiality of taxpayer information provided by the importing community under the Customs Act, customs tariff and the Special Import Measures Act. This is very important for businesses dealing with us.

Most export sectors are very competitive. If individual manufacturers feel that the information about their companies is being shared, they will not participate. At the same time we desperately need their participation in order to have a better understanding of what is happening.

• (1040)

Another major amendment proposed in the legislation is a reduction of tariffs on a wide range of manufacturing inputs. The amendment is also directed toward the relief of customs duties on manufacturing inputs so that our producers can compete more effectively. This amendment will enhance the competitiveness of Canadian producers both at home and internationally.

In essence we will be removing the competitive disadvantage that currently burdens Canadian manufacturers vis–à–vis their American counterparts by reducing tariffs on some 1,500 tariff items covering manufacturing inputs to more competitive levels, generally to the levels seen in the United States. Since the United States is our major trading partner, we feel it is very important that our levels be consistent with their levels to maximize the competitive advantage of our industries.

The competitive problem is mitigated by the fact that exporters are entitled to receive full reimbursement of their input duties through duty drawback. However, as of January 1, 1996, existing duty drawback entitlements on exports to the U.S. will become more restricted under the NAFTA commitment. Therefore, to ensure that Canadian manufacturers enjoy the full benefit of Canada's free trade agreements we must bring our tariffs on imported inputs to more competitive levels. The 1,500 input tariff reductions I have referred to account for over $2.5 billion in dutiable trade.

Another important amendment is the increase in duty exemptions for Canadians travelling abroad. This is a simple updating measure, which brings Canada's exemptions into line with those of its major trading partners. The bill will raise the levels of exemption as follows: to $50 from $20 after a 24–hour absence; to $200 from $100 after 48 hours; and to $500 from $300 after seven days, with the once a year limit being dropped. I would remind hon. members that the new travellers exemptions are already operating without disruption.

A further measure in the bill will also help to streamline Canada Customs clearance procedures for travellers under what is known as a basket tariff item basis. Under this measure the government is proposing to replace the thousands of existing categories of goods with as few as 12 categories. That will be of great benefit to Canadians travelling abroad.

In addition to the amendments I have discussed, the bill contains a number of other changes of a largely technical or housekeeping nature. Most will serve to clarify the intent of existing customs and tariff provisions. Perhaps the most important of these deals with the value for duty of imported goods, also known as the valuation provisions of the Customs Act. It is essential that the rules for determining value for duty not be subject to any manipulation or abuse. Otherwise, revenue and fair competition will be put at risk.

Bill C–102 contains provisions that clarify our existing practices in dealing with valuation. It is founded on the concept that the price paid or payable should form the basis for assessing duty and taxes on these imported goods. The valuation policies and practices that are used by Revenue Canada are in fact the same ones that have been in place since the introduction of the GATT valuation code in the mid–1980s. The amendment to the valuation provisions of the Customs Act will provide protection to Canadian businesses as envisioned by the legislation.

Members of the House will recall that Bill C–102 contains one tariff rate increase which I would like to explain. The British preferential tariff is being withdrawn from certain rubber footwear, thereby restoring the 20 per cent most favoured nation tariff rate. Former British preferential trade imports will now compete on the same basis as other foreign suppliers. At the same time the bill allows for future improvements to preferential tariff treatment for the world's poorest developing countries.

• (1045)

Finally, several motions were introduced in committee, as I mentioned before, and amendments were made. For the most part the changes introduced by the government were minor technical amendments, but I should like to make sure the House fully understands what these were.

Of note, one amendment responds to requests from Canadian importers by allowing rubber footwear in transit to Canada on June 13, 1995, when legislation was introduced eliminating the British preferential tariff free rate, to take advantage of the lower tariff free rate rather than being subjected to the 20 per cent most favoured nation tariff rate.

The other notable amendment responds to the concerns expressed by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce about the proposal to shorten the filing time limit for remissions under the machine program. The government has responded to this concern by allowing importers up to four years to claim remissions on goods eligible for duty free treatment under the program.

To sum up the specifics of the act, the legislation is about improved competitiveness, increased exports and enhanced employment prospects for Canadians. Bill C–102 will help to promote the continuing good health of Canada's large and vital export sector. It will help Canada maximize the benefits we enjoy under the free trade agreements and the changes proposed in the legislation will be welcomed by the great majority of Canadians affected by them.

As I alluded to when I began my speech, this is a piece of legislation which may not have high visibility to average Canadians. However, to those who are working in manufacturing plants, to those travelling abroad regularly and to those seeking the most competitive position because their own jobs are at stake, this is one of the most important steps the government is taking in its workaday fashion, its desire to make the economy work and its desire to get government right. This is one of the steps we are taking that we think will in the end provide for greater job security and the enhancement of our export sector.

It is with a great deal of pride I presented the bill to the House and have taken it through committee. It will make a major contribution to the Canadian economy. For that reason I call on members of the House to support the bill and to see to its speedy passage.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I find very telling the fact that the first bill to be considered following yesterday's referendum in Quebec would deal with free trade.

I think that, in a way, this confirms the opinion held by the vast majority of Quebecers, who believed that a partnership with the rest of Canada would have been possible. We received some confirmation this morning that the federal government wishes to improve Canada's economic relations with the U.S. through a bill which basically makes trade between these countries easier. This is very telling indeed, in my opinion.

Quebecers were the first to agree with and to support free trade between Canada and the United States and Mexico. I would just add this must go on, and efforts must be made to ensure that markets are available regardless of which political entities maintain them.

This is true particularly for small business, which accounts for 80 per cent of all job creation taking place in Quebec and which has taken on the challenge of dealing with the U.S. and Mexico.

• (1050)

However, free trade must definitely be seen as more than merely an economic issue. The challenge for all Quebecers and Canadians is not to trash the social programs that may have been put in place in Canada. It seems to me that this is a major consideration.

We will not win this free trade battle with the U.S. and Mexico by trying to make anything and everything match the American standard. I think that this will be particularly true in what lies ahead in terms of social program reform, including unemployment insurance and old age pensions. The government of Canada will come up with options which it will hopefully table soon and which will enable us to determine whether it has given in to American competition and agreed to play their game or else decided to play the free trade game while preserving the values unique to our society.

Accelerated harmonization will only result in making people increasingly dependent on the economy, and increasingly the poor will be going after a limited number of available jobs and, while their employability will increase, their incomes, wages, gains may not follow. In examining a free trade bill, therefore, it is important to look at the other side as well, that is to say the larger system within which free trade will take place.

So, yes to free trade, because we want trade conditions to be eased. We even made a proposal in that sense during the referendum campain, but it was not accepted by a majority of Quebecers. I think that Quebecers should be congratulated for respecting the democratic choice made. Results such as those of yesterday are not necessarily easy for anyone to take, considering that, for each group of 100 Quebecers, a single person made the difference.

This is true regardless of who that person is. I am not trying to make individual distinctions, but the fact is—and you people know what it is in terms of winning an election—that, for each group of 100 persons, a single Quebecer made the scale tip in favour of one side instead of the other. And you know what it is to win elections. Given that result, people deserve a great deal of respect for accepting, as they did in Quebec, such a close decision. This is not to say that we are giving up on our ideals. Certainly not.

I want to point out another aspect of the bill which, I feel, is important for both Quebec and Canada, namely the need to ensure that the protection granted to the cultural industry will not be jeopardized by a bill such as this one, which concerns goods, including a number of concrete physical products. But there is the whole cultural sector, where we will have to maintain such protection. Indeed, the debate that just took place in Quebec made Canada realize how fragile its position was in relation to its U.S. neighbour. We have to take a close look at some of this.

In fact, Americans should perhaps go back to their history books. It seems as though they decided, in recent days, that no change was better than good change. Sometimes, such things lead to short term victories. However, from a medium term perspective, these issues must be looked at more closely, since Canada, as a member of NAFTA, will, in the future, be confronted with such situations, particularly when countries with economies comparable to that of Chile, likely the next nation to join NAFTA, will become partners under that agreement. We will have to show the same respect towards these countries, whether they are big or small, and treat them for what they are.

When the free trade agreement was signed, we were told that it would take a few years before we started to notice a real difference. It is important to understand that this bill allows for an increase in the value of goods travellers can bring back, to bring these values in line with those set by our main trading partners.

With this bill, therefore, there will be concrete action to increase exchange, to facilitate exchange. It must be looked at from that point of view, and it will be seen that there may be some advantages to Quebec consumers, Canadian consumers and American consumers once these regulations are in place. At the same time, we must ensure that our economy and our industrial structure are capable of following suit.

There is one aspect which the representative of the government has not addressed, but which I would like to present. This type of bill will impact upon the regions of Quebec and of Canada, because a change in customs operations can impact upon the number of customs offices there will be in a region, for instance, and on how businesses will be serviced.

I refer in this connection to clause 12 of the new bill, which states:

> Goods, other than goods of a prescribed class, that have not been removed from a customs office, sufferance warehouse or duty free shop within such period of time as may be prescribed may be deposited by an officer in a place of safe-keeping designated by the Minister for that purpose.

That may seem gobbledygook to some, but basically the question that must be asked about this clause is the following: in regions where customs offices are closed, will that mean businesses are farther from their markets and therefore less able to service them?

We must ensure that proper choices will be made. There have been some indications that have not been very reassuring. For example, the government has announced the closure of five customs offices in eastern Quebec. There will, in fact, be none further east than Quebec City. The offices that used to be located in Rivière-du-Loup and Rimouski, the customs officers right out to the Gaspe, all those will be done away with. Can these changes be made without negative impact, ensuring that acts such as this one will facilitate trade?

These are matters that must be looked into. Care must be taken to ensure that the thing is done correctly. This is not really a change in legislation but rather a change in administrative application, and the government must ensure that its decisions do not penalize the outlying regions.

I have already stated, and return to the point here, that it is highly significant in my opinion that the intent of this bill is to concretize aspects of the partnership between Canada and the U.S. Throughout the entire referendum campaign we were told many times that the same thing is not possible between Quebec and Canada. It is very surprising, but at the same time very instructive, to come upon it again this morning, and this allows those who have taken part in the debate to see where the reality of that debate lay.

How can we arrange things in this area to avoid the bureaucratic complications experienced in a number of other sectors? Bill C-102 contains many technical elements, such as clause 5, according to which the operator of a sufferance warehouse or duty-free shop > —shall keep in Canada such records—and shall, where an officer so requests, make them available to the officer.

In other words, customs brokers, the people who work in this sector, have a list of items—a, b, c, d, e, f, and up to i—which they are supposed to keep, so that in future they can produce them for the federal administration. From this side, it looks much like an approach that was often used in the seventies, which I think is not necessarily a good idea for the future, because when I talk to owners of small and medium size businesses today and ask them what the government, any government, could do to improve the situation, I get two answers.

The first one may seem rather surprising but is understandable. They suggest reducing subsidies but doing it across the board. The second one is about bureaucracy.

• (1100)

I am referring to the administrative paper burden for small and medium size businesses, which means they often have to spend as much time on paperwork as much larger companies in order to meet government regulations. In this bill we will have to ensure that what customs is asked to do—maintain certain records—can be done efficiently without getting into the same problems we had with the GST, for instance.

Finally, Bill C–102 implements the effects of the free trade agreement. Generally speaking, we ought to applaud the fact that these regulations will be put in place, since they will provide for a better trade relationship between the signatories to the free trade agreement, which is what everyone wants.

Quebecers were among the instigators of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, and they certainly hope this will continue. At the same time, we should remember that countries do not necessarily need very big borders to engage in mutually beneficial trade. In the nineteenth century, wars were fought to expand a country's territory and thus its domestic markets. As we approach the end of the twentieth century, we realize this can be done quite differently by simply letting everyone engage in trade, thus shifting the scene from the battlefield to the economy, where people who can produce goods and have a stable society are able to survive and contribute to economic development. That is where we are today. And we hope this trend will continue, but always with due respect for the society we represent.

One sector that is more or less affected by this bill and that I would like to bring to your attention is the dairy industry. Farmers in Quebec and five other provinces in Canada signed an agreement in the summer of 1995 which covers milk supply management throughout their territory. This agreement is valid at least until 1999, when it will be reassessed. It could last much longer. The producers reached this agreement in an effort to face the approaching challenge as the GATT agreements reduce tariffs in milk sales, which are of concern to them. We have set them a big challenge. Fortunately, however, they have already faced major challenges.

This sector, which is more vulnerable than a number of others requiring appropriate measures, needs all the support it can get to face the upcoming changes. One is the partnership between Quebec and five other provinces in Canada to deal with this market and also to obtain appropriate forms of assistance from government in increasing productivity to enable producers to provide a better quality product and to make products available in market niches that do not yet perhaps exist. One example of this is biological milk production.

It is important to be able to forecast developments in industry, in agriculture and in other sectors and to see what is coming up. When we fail to do this, we find ourselves in situations like the one in Quebec last week, when, suddenly, the federal government realized the situation in Quebec was special. After two years of saying that Quebec's situation in Canada would be resolved through good federal government, it had the lesson of its life, discovering that, in both Quebec and Canada, the problems were more than just economic. There are problems of distribution of wealth and of balance between the country's two founding peoples. The message from Quebecers was very clear: without specific change and without concrete proposals acknowledging Quebec's place in this country, in the very near future, a majority of Quebecers could well decide to change the situation.

That was an example involving the agricultural sector. One thing Parliament could do, in my opinion, through the standing committee on agriculture, for example, would be to ensure the options chosen for the coming years, and I am referring not just to the term of the present agreement, which lasts until 1999, but afterwards, are relevant to the priorities of the sector.

There is something distressfull about the fact that there are fewer and fewer actual people farming, but their economic impact remains as strong as ever. We must not fall into the trap of elected officials who say that, if fewer people are involved, less concern is warranted. We must instead establish the sensitivity of this sector and the type of action to be taken. This latest referendum campaign was a real revelation for me: it showed me the importance of these situations and of knowing how to plan ahead. I think we may be judged on this as well.

Bill C–102 is therefore here to be passed. The Bloc Quebecois feels it should be passed. It will support it. It also feels that bills enabling us to make progress should always be passed. We should never be afraid of change for its own sake.

When change is appropriate, we have to know how to integrate it. When it is not appropriate, we can reject it. However, when it is appropriate, we have to know how to integrate it. This is very important and, much later, this is how what we have done will be judged.

I would therefore like to say, in conclusion, that Quebec put its faith in free trade and will continue to do so, so that, in the end, each of the characteristics of the components of North America, and of the francophone people in particular, may be recognized, validated and further developed, and Bill C–102 is one tool that will help in this regard.

[English]

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party also supports the bill. I will be speaking generally in favour of the bill.

Before I do I will take a couple of seconds and speak to the referendum last night. We cannot pretend that did not happen. We cannot just walk into this place and sleepwalk toward a further disaster.

The hon. parliamentary secretary had a few words to preface his remarks and my blood ran cold when I listened. The essence of what he said was that he welcomed those people who were trying to break up our country over the last couple of years and last night. He welcomed them back and said let us go on as before, working in committee and working in the House.

For the last two years going on before meant that every single word that came out of the mouth of the Bloc, and everyone in the Chamber knows it, has been to one direction, toward building a preface for the referendum last night for taking Quebec out of Confederation.

We cannot go on as before. We have to turn the page on that. We have to go forward. We have had 30 years, all of my adult life, of trying to appease people who would break up the country. It is time to stop it. All it does is foster a festering tribalism evidenced last night for everyone to see on national television by the premier of Quebec.

If we pretend this kind of thing is not going on in our country we are not doing our jobs as representatives of the people who sent us here. Tribalism is tribalism and that is what we have had here for the last two years. Let us not call it anything else.

• (1110)

To the embarrassment of Canadians everywhere, because the vast majority of Liberals opposite are afraid to confront the Bloc, to confront this tribalism, to confront these people, at every opportunity they get they back away. They back away from it in committee. They back away from it in all opportunities in the House. We recognize the Bloc has 53 seats. It is the loyal opposition but that does not need to be the way the House operates.

No one has ever retreated to victory. One does not build a country on appeasement. One builds a country on the values we share. We should be defining the values that make up Canadianism to be a Canadian. It does not matter what language one speaks, what race one is, these are the values that unite us as a country.

I will get on to Bill C–102. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance explained in good detail exactly what the bill is all about.

We support it for essentially the reasons he said. It is a step in the right direction. It is a step to breaking down trade barriers. My hon. colleague from the Bloc is quite right when he asks why we would set up trade barriers between the rest of Canada and Quebec when we are trying to knock trade barriers down between us and the United States.

We are in the process of breaking down trade barriers. One of the ways to do that in a free trade agreement is to, as GATT has forced us to do, start looking at the zillions of financial transactions that take place with us and the Americans on a daily basis and ask how we can make them easier. That is what the bill does.

Many Canadians travel very often to the United States, as I have on occasion with my family, with our pooch Rex in the back seat. Coming across the border, as we are wont to do, we add up all of our purchases. Especially after becoming a member of Parliament I start sweating about an hour before I get to the border making sure I have everything because the last thing I want to do is find myself in Frank magazine for having smuggled something across the border.

I start to sweat about an hour before we hit the border and I have a list. By the time we get a little closer my wife is upset. She says: "For goodness sake, why do you not forget it? Let's just go". We have everything listed and we are prepared to stop and pay the 5 cents or 50 cents or $5 duty or whatever it is.

The last time we got to the border and we had these itemized lists the customs agent asked how long we had been gone. I said six days. We had our list ready and he said he had good news for us: "Keep on going, there is no duty applicable on this".

That makes great sense. We are absolutely thrilled the government is doing this. The government is also going one step further. It is trusting Canadians to make declarations on what they have.

It is very prudent of the government to carry a big stick. If we as Canadians break our trust and smuggle things through, we do not pay the duty or we do not pay the sales tax applicable, the government should reserve the right to come down hard on us.

The changes in the bill, forced by GATT, by the free trade agreement, are obviously steps in the right direction which we support wholeheartedly.

However, it would seem to me that if somehow we could inculcate within the whole apparatus of government the notion of common sense, we could make life a lot simpler for a whole lot of Canadians doing business.

I want to recount the story of Western Carpet Distributors Inc. in my constituency. A few years ago it was one of the primary distributors of carpet in western Canada. The carpet manufacturers had distributors who would in turn sell their carpets for them. Recently the carpet industry in Canada became vertically integrated. That means that the manufacturers started to sell directly to the retailers without the middleman, without the distributor. When one started doing it they all started doing it.

• (1115)

This left my constituent, the founder of Western Carpet Distributors, in a kind of bind. He had built his business over the years and it was a prosperous, successful business. All of a sudden he found that his suppliers were selling direct and no longer selling to him. The carpet manufacturers bought up many suppliers, but for whatever reason they did not buy his business. He was left in a situation where he was competing with the very companies he had built in the first place by supplying product to retailers.

When faced with this, as a businessman is wont to do, he found other suppliers. The other suppliers he found were in the United States. He then had to import material from the United States and sell in competition to the vertically integrated suppliers manufacturing and selling their own carpet in Canada. Because these manufacturers sold in Canada, he had a significant tariff put on his product.

Now it starts to get fairly complicated. The cost of his product should include the retailing or the selling expense. He was not allowed to claim that and had to pay duty on it, yet his competitors did not. This was a fairly substantial blow to him. There is a thick file at Revenue Canada, as he has been trying to get this changed but to absolutely no avail.

There is another situation in which he is caught up, adjusting to that, paying the premium. He is now in a situation where a company that manufactures in the United States, sells to its Canadian subsidiary, a wholly owned subsidiary which then retails and is able to get a cash discount before delivery of 5 per cent. This is within its own family. The manufacturer sells to its wholly owned Canadian distributor but can take a 5 per cent discount. The same Canadian distributor I am talking about does a deal with his competitor and he is not allowed to take that. That is considered a reduction in price and he has to pay duty on it.

We are treating two apples like apples and oranges. This should not be. If we are prepared to give individual citizens the freedom and the right to be held personally liable and give them the trust to come back and forth across the border, should we not also do exactly the same thing with Canadian businesses? Should we not give Canadian businesses the same trust and responsibility? If they misuse that responsibility, we should come down hard on them like a ton of bricks. But if in the normal course of business they are doing what is not only reasonable but right and makes common sense, why do we not extend that to this sector as well?

Perhaps it is because there would be an army—I do not know; I am sure no one has even thought of it. But if we take this to its natural conclusion, there are a lot of things in our Canadian lives that we could do as citizens and not need governments to do for us. We do not need a whole building full of people with sharp little pencils trying to figure out who is right and who is wrong, who is doing what and who is not doing what. If we are going to have free trade, let us have free trade.

In conclusion, I want to put a few remarks forward on this bill just to ensure that they are on the record.

Bill C–102 and bills like Bill C–102 restore faith in the business sector in imports and exports. They help to bring our country to a competitive level. This is good. However, because of our complicated tax system Canadian investors are still investing outside of Canada more than they are in Canada.

We would support this bill. We would ask that the government continue to bring forward bills such as this and try to make life simpler for Canadians as individuals and businesses so that we can face the future in a much more competitive spirit.

• (1120)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We will now move on to the next stage of debate, where members will be entitled to a maximum of 20 minutes for their speeches subject to a 10–minute question or comment period.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to join in this discussion today on Bill C–102, an act to amend the Customs Act and the customs tariff and to make related and consequential amendments to other acts.

I know there are many in Etobicoke—Lakeshore, the business and industry community, the manufacturers, the exporters, the trading companies and those who travel either as tourists or in business, who are very interested in these amendments.

I thought I would have to debate some of the issues in the bill and call for support from the opposition. I was pleased to hear the support of my hon. colleague from the Bloc and also support from the Reform member who spoke just before me.

It seems as though there is general agreement among all members that the amendments in Bill C–102 would do a number of things. They would increase the capability of transferring goods to export market, enable us to be competitive and encourage and improve the capacity for people doing business in Canada and across our borders.

I want to draw attention to some of the concepts of good government as we see them in Bill C–102. A number of measures provided for in this bill build on the government's review of Canada's tariff regime.

I want to take the opportunity to compliment not only the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue, whose work and whose departments have brought forward these amendments, but also the committee on finance that worked on many pieces of legislation, such as S–9, C–105, C–90, C–103 and these present amendments before us.

This bill introduces tariff reductions on a broad range of goods used as inputs in Canadian manufacturing operations. The bill also introduces changes. I believe there was general agreement on these changes to enhance, streamline, and consolidate Canada's duty deferral programs and also to make them more accessible to all manufacturers. These changes exist not only to enhance but also to reduce input costs. These changes allow for regions to more effectively market the programs in competition with the U.S. free trade zones to attract and keep investment in Canada.

There are several amendments to Bill C–102. In the context of good government these amendments are designed to lower business input costs and maintain and enhance our competitiveness and therefore create more jobs and opportunities, as we promised in our red book.

Bill C–102 provides for a number of technical changes to simplify, clarify, modernize and bring up to date the customs tariff and its administration, to make it easier and less costly for business to access tariff relief programs. We heard earlier some examples of individuals in the business community who work with rules that are bureaucratic, out of sync with the way of doing business in today's world.

• (1125)

Several amendments to Bill C–102 resulted from broad consultations with the private sector and at the request of those sectors. We heard earlier from the parliamentary secretary about the changes that were made as a result of the input from consultations and presentations that were made to the committee in the drafting stage.

The measures adopted in the bill will do a number of things. They will provide $60 million in import tariff relief to Canadian manufacturers to level the playing field with NAFTA trading partners. I can say that in Etobicoke—Lakeshore business people are very concerned about this area and I am sure will be quite pleased with the tariff relief section.

These amendments will also position Canadian businesses with a duty deferral program to more easily attract investment and compete in expanding world markets with a minimum of customs overhead. Again, I think every member in the House who is in touch with export business people knows the issue is an important one for them.

The amendments will also assist and provide opportunities for provincial and municipal governments to enrich the duty deferral program with local incentives. It is always the way in which we on this side of the House work to ensure that the municipal, regional, and other levels of government work in accordance with policies and with what we are attempting to do in the House.

The improvement of services to travellers through simplification of customs procedures will allow customs to focus on smuggling and commercial importation. Those who have been out of the country recently and have come back into the country with goods would already know the implication of this change.

Enacting this bill will not only ensure competitiveness and make all of the housekeeping amendments, but it will also increase the value of goods travellers can bring back to Canada after absences abroad. As someone who has travelled in the last few months, I had to fill out forms and state what I was bringing back into the country. I also became aware of exemptions Canadian travellers are allowed versus the U.S. exemptions, as we cross from the U.S. into Canada. It is a positive step toward the accord we recently signed on our shared border.

There are several other technical things within the bill. I want to stress a few that I am sure my constituents in Etobicoke—Lakeshore, who are watching very closely the passage of this and who are awaiting its full implementation, would like me to emphasize.

I would like to draw attention specifically to amendments which allow for possible future improvements to preferential tariff treatment for the world's poorest developing countries to improve their export opportunities. This is very important for a number of people within the communities attempting to do business in this area.

• (1130)

The protection of all goods and jobs and the withdrawal of the British preferential tariff, or the BPT rate as it is called, on certain rubber footwear ensure that all manufacturers and producers are on an even playing field. I mentioned earlier travellers' exemptions and the basket tariff items to facilitate the processing of travellers.

In the context of good government I stress that the amendments will facilitate smooth business across our borders. They will encourage competitiveness. They will respond to our manufacturers, small business people and exporters. They will provide opportunities to provincial and municipal governments to come up with local initiatives to deal with free trade arrangements. All the amendments in Bill C–102 will give Canada the climate to ensure that we have the facility to trade across our borders on an equal footing. The Access to Information Act will protect the confidentiality of taxpayer information provided by importers pursuant to the Customs Act and the customs tariff. Those changes would be greatly appreciated by business people.

The housekeeping and technical amendments contained in Bill C–102 ensure that competitiveness will be increased. They will also ensure that the exemptions for Canadian travellers will be in line with those of our major trading partners. The amendments will ensure that related and consequential amendments will be made to all acts that impinge upon the Customs Act and the customs tariff.

These amendments are needed and desirable. I join with my colleagues in saying that the amendments are excellent. Therefore I ask members to ensure that Bill C–102 receives swift passage.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister for getting involved in the debate as it affects all Canadians.

I appreciate that growth is the heart of the Canadian economy. It is very important for all of us to remember that the growth of the wider Toronto area has been in large part based on the export industries. Major cities around Toronto house the auto industry, the direct manufacturers being the big three, and small firms that feed into it such as the parts suppliers. In Toronto a number of different industries export across Lake Ontario into the heartland of American industry.

• (1135)

The message the government is trying to get across to Toronto area business people is that we are there to support them in the expansion of the economy and the expansion of their businesses. We are there to make sure they can get through customs at Buffalo or Windsor quickly.

Individual travellers or those who own businesses and use border crossing points know there are long lines and it can be very difficult. It is one thing for individual citizens to be tied up for a few hours on a Sunday. It is frustrating if they are with their children. However it is another thing for truck drivers to be constantly held up as they do business. It extends the working day too long. It makes the cost particularly for businesses with just in time delivery systems very expensive.

We are trying to recognize the new realities in the legislation. We are trying to have members such as the parliamentary secretary take an interest because it helps us to give the message to the business community. The hon. member would probably want to go to the business community in Toronto to explain some of these points.

By way of a question I ask the hon. member whether or not the business community on the export side, as far as she knows, was beginning to understand the changes and the fact that we can accommodate tax free transitions as goods are brought into Canada and exported not only into the United States, which accounts for a large part of what we are doing, but also into Europe and South America. The Pearson airport is a centre for such transactions into new markets.

The Toronto business community would be very interested. I ask her to discuss it with her colleagues from Toronto. Perhaps we on this side of the House, those from Ontario and others, could help to take the message into the business community and promote Canadian exports through the new legislation.

Ms. Augustine: Mr. Speaker, the comments made and the questions asked are very important and are the basis of my decision to speak to Bill C–102.

Perhaps I can speak to the fact that Etobicoke—Lakeshore is geographically centred in an area close to major highways, the Toronto airport and the borders through Niagara Falls and Windsor. There are thousands and thousands of small businesses, small industries and small manufacturers that are very interested in ensuring their businesses prosper, continue to grow and are a hub of activity in Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

When I speak to business people one thing they say is that governments can do just so much. The business people need to keep government out of the way they operate. They need governments to facilitate. They need the bureaucracy, the paperwork and all such things to be facilitating. If the policies, guidelines, rules and tariffs are facilitated, we can do what we do best. We can produce. We can make sure our production lines are moving, make sure we provide opportunities for individuals and make sure we are part of the global world before us.

We should look at tariff regimes and at what we are doing to ensure that the bureaucracy and the paperwork are minimized for businesses. We should ensure that businesses continue to grow and develop and that we produce employment for individuals.

Not only would I take the message back, but I would make sure that businesses in my area have copies of the legislation and that they understand fully what the government is ensuring will happen for them.

Mr. Brent St. Denis (Algoma, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in the debate on Bill C–102, an act to amend the Customs Act. I am especially pleased to do it today, the morning following a major decision in Quebec to keep Quebec in a strong Canada.

I made mention of that because Bill C–102 is all about keeping our country strong. Keeping our country strong has been one of its elements and trade is very important to ensuring that our nation remains strong and continues to grow and prosper for the benefit of ourselves, our neighbours, our children and our grandchildren. We can now look forward to getting on with other agenda items for the country. We can focus on some very important matters.

While Bill C–102 contains numerous items that on the face of them appear to be relatively minor, people involved in importing and exporting know they are very important.

I will talk about trade in the larger context. Most Canadians, my constituents included, will read in the newspapers from time to time about Canada's trade balance compared with the rest of the world or that it has x billions of dollars in surplus with our trading neighbours, particularly our American neighbours to the south. This is an important number but it does not give the whole picture about what trade does for our nation, our citizens, our businesses and the world.

Trade opens and keeps open lines of communication. When the Prime Minister led a delegation dubbed Team Canada to China not long ago, in some quarters he was criticized because there were deemed to be certain problems in China over the issue of human rights. The message was made very clear by the Prime Minister of Canada. We have concerns about what happens in terms of human rights in China, but the way to improve human rights there and elsewhere in the world is principally through trade. Through trade is communication. Through trade is learning. Through trade is job creation and growing and strengthening economies. Trade is the best way to improve our understanding of each other around the world. As is so often the case dollars talk. Free enterprise and capitalism when properly undertaken can in themselves drive the entire world toward higher standards of living and better relations among all people.

The bill is part of the big picture. It is part of what Canada needs to do to ensure that all our small, medium and large businesses compete in the world and at the same time contribute to the world. It is very much a give and take situation.

Canada, with its vast human resources, natural resources and technical know–how, has been able to maintain a relationship with the rest of the world that has been very much to our advantage. We have seen the maintenance of hundreds of thousands of jobs in many sectors of the economy. My riding of Algoma is a riding in northern Ontario which one might not think is dependent on trade. It includes part of Sault Ste. Marie, a border community. I will talk a bit later about what it means to be a border community. We also depend on tourism which is very much a trade item. We also depend on forestry and mining.

• (1145)

I had the chance recently to meet a delegation representing the mining sector during their visit to Parliament Hill on a lobby day. It is easier to appreciate that even mining involves trade, the trade of minerals, the trade of natural resources and also the trade of people.

There is no question that without trade we cannot as a nation make the advances necessary to continually improve the lot of our citizens and the citizens of other countries.

I would like to pick out a few of the items in this bill for special mention. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister have capably outlined some of those provisions. I would like to relate some of those provisions to experiences I have had in years past in my own work life, for example measures to deal with duty deferral and the tremendous red tape that is involved in importing an item which will be further processed and perhaps become part of another item which will then be exported.

In the seventies I was the manager of a small electronics manufacturing company in my riding. We were producing an electronic product. It was necessary to import a couple of components which simply were not available in Canada. The red tape we had to go through to import those items which would be included in a final product which would then be exported caused more headaches than I could possibly describe in the short time I have today. The lost manpower, the loss of time and resources were incredible.

If there is one commitment this government will keep to business, particularly small and medium sized business, it is the reduction of red tape. Bill C–102 is going to combine the drawback provisions, the numerous provisions that are presently required of small business. Inward processing and bonded warehousing are other examples of red tape now facing importers who require products from outside the country for inclusion in a product which is made here and then exported.

If there is anything we can do for small and medium sized businesses it is to reduce the red tape. From my experience I can say this is certainly a most welcome addition to the streamlining this government is committed to making.

Numerous small companies in my riding export. In Elliot Lake, ELMAR Co. manufactures products for the mining sector. More recently it has diversified to include consumer products such as special clothing for handicapped children and other products. It has faced numerous difficulties with the very issue I raised a moment ago, that being the importation of a good for inclusion in the final product which is to be exported.

The fact that Bill C–102 will also streamline and reduce tariffs is a very welcome measure for this company and others involved in export. The books which contain the tariff codes are huge, about two feet thick. We should do whatever we can to simplify and reduce the requirement that small businesses need to call their broker or a government office to find out about a particular product and its code standing. Whatever we can do to eliminate the necessity of businesses to do that, we are adding that much more to the productivity of that business. Red tape never actually adds profits to the bottom line.

I think business accepts that there needs to be a certain amount of involvement with provincial and federal governments when it comes to paperwork, but there is far too much of it. We made a commitment in the campaign to reduce the amount of unproductive work required by businesses in this regard.

Mention has been made about streamlining border crossings for travellers, tourists and truckers. As I mentioned a moment ago, part of Sault Ste. Marie is in my riding. The border crossing at Sault, Michigan and Sault, Ontario is popular. Some years ago there was a tremendous problem with cross border shopping at a time when our exchange rate was not such as it is today.

Happily, I can report that is not a major problem right now but line–ups are a problem. Line–ups are created because even though 99.9 per cent of travellers are honest citizens and would tell customs or immigration agents the truth when asked, a tremendous bureaucracy has been created to catch the less than 1 per cent of people who are dishonest and might be trying to hide something.

I see in Bill C–102 a recognition that most people are honest. Let us find ways to zip them through the border crossing and instead focus our energies on those who would try to avoid duties or would try to smuggle something into the country.

We have the modern technology and we have seen some pilot projects in B.C. and elsewhere that will lead us to fulfilling the commitment made between President Clinton and our Prime Minister during the president's visit to this country some months ago. That commitment was that the border between our two friendly nations be made more open. We have seen it with open skies in the airline industry. We are also seeing a push toward opening the border, being respectful of the need to manage our different citizenship and our different cultures, but at the same time recognizing that this border, the longest, friendliest border in the world as I understand it, needs to be managed in a way which recognizes that most people crossing the border are honest citizens with nothing to hide.

When I see the provisions of Bill C–102 that are moving us toward that goal, I am very pleased for my constituents of Algoma riding in northern Ontario who are not very far from the U.S. at Sault Ste. Marie.

I do not think we know for certain how this will all work out, what regimes will be put in place to simplify the crossing for visitors and truckers, but if there is a will, there is a way.

I mentioned truckers. What a waste of time for a trucker with a load to deliver to have to wait at the border for some official to go through endless paperwork and examination before allowing him to cross the border. Like our visitors, I am sure 99 per cent of our truckers are carrying legitimate loads to legitimate destinations. Whatever we can do to speed things up, we will be adding to that company's productivity. We will be able to help companies reduce their transportation billings to their customers. Down the line it will mean less expensive products at the consumer level. We are doing everyone a favour when we streamline our border crossings.

• (1155)

Also in relation to borders, there have been attempts by the Manitoulin Economic Development Association to establish a ferry service between South Baymouth on Manitoulin Island and Alpena, Michigan. Sadly, that project has been put on hold for a while because of cutbacks by the Ontario government and because the Ontario Northland Transportation Commission has had to cut back.

As part of the project I had made a commitment to work with the Minister of National Revenue and his officials to find a way to establish an international ferry between Canada and the U.S. on Lake Huron. Tourists would benefit from a streamlining of the relationship between our two nations.

Even though this project has been put on hold for the time being, it is very important that we push ahead with initiatives right along the border between Canada and the U.S., be they land or marine borders and that the ability for travellers to enter each country be made as easy as possible. This is in recognition of the fact that most people are honest and do not want to deliberately deprive the province or the federal government of their small share of taxes or duties.

There is an issue which arose in committee and which the parliamentary secretary referred to dealing with the valuation for purposes of calculating duty. In simple terms, the confusion arose over the value placed on an imported good if it was shipped from the manufacturer but the order was placed by a third party who charged a mark–up for the good. The debate was should the value be the price from the manufacturer or the price the third party actually charged the final user in Canada? Very good arguments were made by a number of excellent witnesses who said that the price should be from the manufacturer level.

The committee was not convinced the proposal in Bill C–102 was different from practices in the U.S. or Europe, although good arguments were made that we were undertaking a practice that was different from either the U.S. or Europe.

In moving ahead with Bill C–102 and with the valuation provision we have made a commitment that, as for all trade related legislation, this legislation will be sent to an international panel for review to make sure it fits within the terms of our international trade agreements. A WTO panel will look at the trade provisions of Bill C–102 to ensure it is consistent with our commitments to our trading partners around the world.

I am sure if a problem is found, being a responsible government we will look at any comments or suggestions which come back from the WTO panel. The majority of committee members were convinced the provisions of Bill C–102 with respect to valuation were consistent with our European and American trading partners in particular.

In my concluding moments I would like to go back to the general theme of Canada as a trading nation. It is important that we maintain our integrity as a good and honest trading partner to the world.

• (1200)

We are a trading partner that can be relied on to deliver product on time because our small, medium and large businesses are strong and able to produce and deliver on time. This requires that we not stand in the way of business to produce quality products, that we do not stand in its way to be profitable and that we ensure our education system, our manpower training system, is always there ready and able to provide qualified workers who know how to produce excellent products, who know how to do the research required to enable Canada to maintain its proper place as a leading trading nation.

We look forward to seeing Bill C–102 implemented.

Mr. Larry McCormick (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–102 represents the opinion and the majority belief of most of us that most Canadians are honest.

I cross the border. I live within 30 miles of the border at Thousand Islands. My riding of Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington extends from the Thousand Islands to Algonquin Park. We have a steady flow of tourists back and forth. We have small businesses exporting and importing.

Whether I was driving back from the United States or whether, as in a previous life, I was importing, I could see the honest person with the small company was being confronted with too much paperwork. There was a real lack of support for the small business person who was being put behind the eight ball.

Certainly there is smuggling today. If a person wants to smuggle something he would target our area of the St. Lawrence River. I do not want to see us penalize the honest person. I do hope Bill C–102 will help eliminate some of this overburden of paperwork.

The large corporations in our part of eastern Ontario are expanding at a great rate. Bombardier is shipping $595 million worth of cars to Malaysia and other places around the world. Celanese just got an expansion. It has invested $191 million so it can export most of that. It is a polymer based product. Basically the polymer to make a shirt is the same product used to make a two–litre plastic pop bottle.

These companies have the resources, the income, the background and the experts to help with the trading nation philosophy we have. However, the small businesses do not always have all this information available. I certainly hope Bill C–102 will help in this respect.

We need to send the message as the bill progresses that we will ally with small businesses so they can access this neighbouring market.

Small businesses in my riding are getting the spinoff from these major orders. Almost $1 billion has been invested into our area this year. From that many small businesses can take the opportunity to reach into the United States, Mexico and to the fourth amigo down the road. Yet the atmosphere is not always there which says we care about small business. We all acknowledge small business is the engine of the economy. That is where our jobs will come from. How many people are not certain the government is really looking after small business?

This is a great opportunity for Bill C–102 and for us. It is my responsibility following this to show how this will help our small businesses.

I want to get the opinion of my colleague from Algoma that the mandate of Bill C–102 will help our small businesses and in what ways. I know he has studied this bill much more than I have.

Mr. St. Denis: Mr. Speaker, my colleague has always expressed the concerns of his constituents and small businesses across the country very well.

• (1205)

Whatever we can do to lift the burden from small business, be it at the border, in sales tax, at the level of corporate reporting, whatever kind of red tape we can lift from the backs of small business is something we can do to improve productivity, improve the bottom line and improve therefore the ability to create and maintain jobs.

The fact that we can plan through Bill C–102 to move trucks through the border more quickly and efficiently means less time for that load between point A and point B and therefore less cost in terms of wasted fuel, manpower, et cetera. This fact alone may only mean pennies on a item in a load, but multiply that millions and millions of times; take two pennies on something worth a dollar and that is 2 per cent.

If we do that over and over, day in and day out, the accumulation of benefits to the small businesses trucking goods to consumers, to workers, will accumulate indefinitely. The present value of those would virtually be immeasurable.

When coupled with commitments the government has made to deal through regulatory reform with the issue of red tape in all areas, we are as partners to small business. I know some members of the third party say we should be out of business altogether. I am not in favour of government's being overly involved in business but it has a role to play in assisting businesses to trade in the world, to take their proper place in the community, but not to be there as a burden. Government can work with businesses to ensure that even though they have to pay taxes those taxes are used wisely and are as low as possible.

If there is one thing the government can do to assist our economic growth and renewal it is to reduce and eliminate where possible the red tape burden that now hangs over too many small businesses.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Algoma for his speech. The work done by the finance committee was very important in the development of this legislation.

Members of the finance committee over the last year and a half since I have been involved with it have had to deal with a number of different subjects. It requires a lot of work behind the scenes to make sure they understand each of these different bills.

A member such as the member for Algoma who is close to the border, an area which also has a lot of tourism, really depends on the operation of Canadian borders not only for industry but for tourism. A member such as the one for Algoma has to spend a lot of time making sure he or she understands this legislation and is able to contribute to the debate.

The witnesses who came in to talk about Bill C–102 were all very knowledgeable and very expert witnesses. They had very different opinions sometimes from what we wanted to do. It was up to the members of the committee to really strike a balance, to review these interventions and to come out with what I consider to be a first class piece of legislation.

Could the member comment on some of the things he heard in committee and whether he thinks the bill accurately reflects the best way of proceeding on these various issues?

Mr. St. Denis: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary in being succinct as usual has been accurate in his reflection of the facts as he was referring to me. I did not want to be self–effusive. His comments about me were what I was talking about.

• (1210)

There were a number of issues raised in committee. I spoke about valuation. I would like to spend another moment speaking on that because it was certainly the most contentious issue. In fairness, other matters were raised, of which the parliamentary secretary spoke, which were resolved during the meeting. As a member of the finance committee I was very impressed with the willingness of witnesses and officials to actually work out solutions to problems that needed to be addressed immediately.

On the issue of valuation, witnesses might have gone away from the meeting not feeling totally satisfied that we were able to accommodate them. The issue really boiled down to whether the proposals in Bill C–102 were in line with the actions and policies of our U.S. trading partner and the European communities. We were not persuaded there was much difference.

The WTO panel will look at Bill C–102, once enacted, and will let us know whether it is consistent with our obligations to our trading partners around the world.

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to address Bill C–102, a government bill, and to have Her Majesty's loyal opposition stand before the House to support the bill and to have the Reform Party also stand before the House to support the bill. After four very difficult weeks it is a great day for Canada to bring in a piece of legislation which the major parties and the Government of Canada can support wholeheartedly.

Bill C–102 will amend the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff. It is a bill of language and a bill of clarity; it clearly defines, enhances and streamlines the duty deferral program.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce made interventions in committee that perhaps if we did not bring the bill in on a time line acceptable to business more generally some companies would lose or forfeit the duty they may have paid to Revenue Canada because they could not reclaim on time. We have made adjustments so this would not be a problem for business.

These changes are designed to help improve the competitive position of Canadian industry and Canadian business. The amendments will allow regions of the country to be more effective in marketing their programs and their products in a competitive manner which allows Canada to attract investment and to keep business at home.

The aim and the strength of the bill lie in its clarification of legislative provisions to make the tariff framework more clear and to eliminate confusion and ambiguity for Canadian companies, importing companies and travellers.

The bill also prescribes the terms and conditions on which licences for the operation of sufferance warehouses or duty free shops may be issued to include the provision of security which may be required in the operation of these warehouses or shops. It includes the duration of licences and the fees or the manner of determining the fees, if any are to be paid, and for which licences. It is a very specific and clear bill.

The bill also clearly defines the circumstances by which licences for the operation of sufferance warehouses or duty free shops may be issued, in which way they may be amended or suspended, renewed, cancelled or reinstated: the process of accountability.

Bill C–102 also seeks to provide standards for the operation and maintenance of these facilities, sufferance warehouses or duty free shops, and in particular the manner in which the receipt of goods in these warehouses is acknowledged, the circumstances by which and the extent to which goods may be manipulated, altered, unpacked, changed or combined with other goods to make a new product while in the confinement of sufferance warehouses or duty free shops, in a clearly given constituency. The definition of these confinements is also clearly prescribed by these legislative enactments.

This bill and these amendments clearly spell out what are considered designated goods. This clarifies the language and establishes standards for the operation and maintenance of the sufferance warehouses or duty free shops.

Under this bill the framework is laid in which the importer operates his place of business and the respect and manner wherein he maintains his records of operation, his records of imported goods, so that he may be able to make them available to an inspection officer at any given time and answer truthfully to questions in respect of such importations.

The sufferance warehouses and duty free shops are places where imported goods arrive. The manner in which the receipt of these goods is acknowledged, the circumstances and the extent to which these goods may be changed or altered, as I have indicated, is clearly prescribed and defined in this legislation.

These changes should improve efficiency. These changes should reduce the costs of doing business in Canada. These changes allow business, in a very accountable way, to carry on in a very honest and accountable fashion and reduce the red tape for those people who operate legitimate business and manufacturing companies here in Canada.

There is one point that was of great contention in the finance committee. That was a point my colleague talked about for a moment, an evaluation provision. Under proposed section 48 of clause 18, the value for duty is a transaction value of the goods if the goods are sold for export to Canada. The transaction value of goods shall be determined by ascertaining the price paid or payable for the goods when the goods are sold for export to Canada. We have changed that. The proposed amendment to subsections 45(1) and 48(1) are that we define the purchaser in Canada. The value for duty of goods is the transaction value of those goods if the goods are sold for export to Canada to a purchaser in Canada. Those are the key words, "a purchaser in Canada", and the price paid or payable for those goods can be determined. This is not a change in the process of doing business here. It is simply a clarification.

I will give an example so that members understand more clearly what our Canada customs officials have been practising for the last decade. If, for example, a foreign manufacturer makes a product valued at $80, that is the price leaving the foreign country. That product may go through several middlemen and maybe there are transaction values added through this process. When the product finally arrives to the Canadian purchaser, its value may be $100. Therefore, which is the value for tariff, the $80 at the foreign country doorstep where it left the foreign country, or the $100 when it arrives at the Canadian doorstep? This amendment clarifies very clearly that the value provision in this amendment is the $100 value, or the value to the purchaser in Canada.

I took a moment to make that clarification because this is not a new change. This is simply a clarification to the existing regulations and the current practices that govern importation of goods in Canada today. It is the practice that has been going on for 10 years. The clearly defined value for duty is the value that has been assigned. I repeat: this value has been used by Canada customs and tariff officials when assigning value for duty for the past decade. All we are doing today in this amendment within this bill is to allow every importer in Canada to know clearly the rules concerning the value of goods as indicated on the invoice to the purchaser in Canada to be sure that he understands this value to which tariffs and duties will be assigned.

There will be arguments as there were arguments in the debates in committee that the value for duty should be in fact the $80 value that was assigned at the foreign country at the time of export before the transactions of the middlemen intervened. However, we felt as a committee that the value when it arrives on the Canadian doorstep is the value after all transactions have been incurred.

Presentations were made to our committee by both the Canadian Importers Association and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants in opposition to this bill, more specifically to this very section, "purchaser in Canada". They said this is a residency requirement; this is new. We argued that it was not new, that it was simply clarification, identifying the purchaser in Canada and that it had been the practice of Customs and Tariffs Canada for the past decade; it was simply clarification and we were in compliance, not confrontation, with our world trading partners.

I elaborate on that point because it was very important and a great point of clarification. It sends a message to our businesses in Canada, our manufacturing businesses where we have value added jobs, that here at home we will do our utmost to protect those jobs through good legislation that is acceptable to our global trading partners.

The bill introduces tariff reductions on a broad range of goods used as input into Canadian manufacturing operations, thereby bringing our input tariffs more in line with those of the United States. It does reduce tariffs on many finished goods that are required and requested by Canadian producers.

Part of our red book commitment was to reduce government red tape and streamline government operations so that business in Canada could be more efficient and we could provide manufacturing jobs in a more competitive global economy. That is what Bill C–102 does.

Bill C–102 allows Canadian travellers to bring back to Canada after their absences abroad goods of increased value. This will bring Canadian travellers' exemptions into line with those of our major trading partners and for administrative purposes ease border congestion. We know the majority of those travellers are honest, law–abiding citizens. This bill allows that to occur with more ease and allows us to spend greater time on those who are involved in criminal offences and criminal activities.

This is a positive step forward for Canadian legislation. It is a positive step forward for our Canada–U.S. agreements and our shared border commitments to ensure that activities between these two peaceful countries occur with ease and with the greatest efficiency for both countries.

Other amendments to the customs tariff and the Customs Act contained in this bill are aimed at clarifying the intent of certain legislation or involve changes to make the tariff framework clearer and more predictable for Canadian companies and the importing community. Those are very important words, "more predictable", when one is in business.

I had the experience of being in a manufacturing biological business for some 25 years. I was a co–founder in Nova Scotia of a scientific company, a tremendous challenge of a high tech biological company in a part of the country that is known for its hewers of wood and drawers of water. It was a challenge indeed, but we established that company and were able to provide scientific jobs for young Canadians in Atlantic Canada.

• (1225)

I know the value of predictability and stability in regulations on importation of goods into a manufacturing process. It is all part of maintaining jobs, maintaining accountability to employees and maintaining a stable marketplace and economy for all Canadians.

These amendments will afford protection to our manufacturing jobs and enhance our capacity to export, which is what Canada is so well known for. These amendments clean up the wording of the act so that importers in Canada, those who own businesses and Canadians who are travellers, will understand and appreciate the regulations more clearly. The clarification and wording are clearly conforming with our trading partners, not confronting them, as some might suggest.

These are progressive amendments. In an accountable and trustworthy business trading partnership they enhance Canada's credibility in competitive global trade. I am very pleased to hear this morning that all parties of this House will support this legislation.

I am eager. I am very pleased to be on the finance committee and to have heard the arguments on both sides to bring this into the House and let our business community in Canada know that we are progressive.

We are listening. We are reducing the red tape. We are trying to streamline so that business can be competitive, so that we can ensure those Canadian jobs in all regions and make Canada the number one place economically that we are forecast to be in the next couple of years.

Mr. Brent St. Denis (Algoma, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I greatly enjoyed the member's speech. Based on her experience in the private sector she is extremely qualified to talk about matters that affect small and medium sized business in this country. This also eminently qualifies her to be a member of the finance committee of the House of Commons.

She made reference to the red book. I prefer to call it the well–read book, because so many Canadians have had a chance to be exposed to its contents, to be exposed to the commitments this government made during the 1993 campaign, which when implemented will do the kinds of things this country needs to take its proper place in the world as a trading nation that can, being strong economically, provide jobs for its citizens, especially our young people.

She mentioned her experiences in business with the biotechnology firm in the maritimes. No doubt she has many personal experiences with the red tape that faced her and her colleagues in that business. I wonder if she could share with us from her personal experience the loss of productivity, the loss of human resources, the wasted time that attends the paperwork burden imposed on business in this country. She might say how it will be a liberating thing for business not to have this load weighing down on them.

To watch the women work on the sewing machines at Stanfield's I believe they could compete with any women in the world in the garment sector. It does my heart good to watch our manufacturing people, to see the jobs created. These are value added jobs and the goods are sold in Canada and exported.

Everyone in the House knows how our exports have risen during this past year. It is a sign we are doing the right thing. This legislation is part of that progressive activity. It is progressive legislation for this government. To see Her Majesty's loyal opposition this morning announce it would support it after four very difficult weeks in the country and to hear the third party say it would support this legislation can do nothing but enhance jobs at home. I am proud to be part of the legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It sounds like Fruit of the Loom is doing well in the hon. member's riding.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are close to 1 million small and medium sized businesses in Canada. Many of them are manufacturers; others are exporters or importers.

To stimulate the economy and promote job creation, the government has considered the demands and needs of small business and introduced Bill C–102, an act to amend the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff and to make related and consequential amendments to other acts.

I am pleased to support this bill. In summary, the bill before us would reduce tariffs on a broad range of goods used as inputs in Canadian manufacturing operations, which would bring our tariffs closer to those of the U.S. It would also reduce tariffs on certain finished goods, as requested by Canadian manufacturers. In addition, this bill would enact changes to streamline and consolidate Canada's duty deferral programs—duty drawback, bonded warehousing and inward processing—and to make them more accessible to all manufacturers. These changes are aimed at making Canadian industry more competitive by reducing input and administrative costs and easing the pressure on business cash flow.

The changes to duty deferral programs will allow the regions to market more effectively the programs competing with U.S. free trade zones in order to bring investors to Canada and keep them here.

[English]

This enactment also increases the value of goods travellers can bring back to Canada with them after an absence abroad. This will bring Canadian travellers' exemptions into line with those of our major trading partners and, for administrative purposes, ease border congestion so that customs is able to focus on smuggling and the growing number of commercial importations. It is also a positive step toward the recently signed Canada–U.S. accord on our shared border.

• (1240)

Other amendments to the customs tariff and the Customs Act contained in the bill are aimed at clarifying the intent of certain legislation or involve changes to make the tariff framework clearer and more predictable for Canadian companies and the importing community. These changes should improve efficiency and reduce the cost of doing business in Canada. One change will result in higher tariffs and the withdrawal of the duty free British preferential tariff rate on rubber footwear to protect Canadian production and jobs.

[Translation]

The bill would also amend the Access to Information Act in order to protect the confidentiality of information on taxpayers provided by importers pursuant to the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, and the Special Import Measures Act.

Some of the provisions in Bill C–102 result from the government's review of Canada's tariff system, as announced in the 1994 budget. Their purpose is to ensure that Canada remains a good place for producing goods and that Canadian investors and businesses, including small businesses, are in a better position to benefit from the free trade agreements between Canada and other countries.

Some changes such as the improvement of duty deferral programs and the reduction of tariffs on manufacturing inputs are designed to lower the cost of inputs for business and to maintain and increase the competitiveness of Canadian business on domestic and international markets.

Bill C–102 contains some technical changes to simplify, clarify and update the Customs Tariff and its administration and to make tariff reduction programs more accessible to, and cheaper for, business.

The changes to facilitate the processing of travellers at border crossings will allow Revenue Canada, Customs to focus on other important border issues such as smuggling and the need to process an increasing volume of Canadian imports.

Many of the amendments in Bill C–102 were made following consultations with business and meet their demand for help in facing the competition.

[English]

The measures adopted in the bill will provide $60 million in import tariff relief to Canadian manufacturers to level the playing field with NAFTA trading partners in tariff reductions.

They will position Canadian businesses with the duty deferral program to more easily attract investment and compete in expanding world markets with a minimum of custom overhead. They will provide opportunities for provincial and municipal governments to enrich the duty deferral program with local incentives.

They will improve service to travellers through the simplification of customs procedures and allow customs to focus on smuggling and commercial importations.

In the current economic context and given the value of the Canadian dollar at this time, we have here a tremendous opportunity to encourage our industries, our small and medium sized businesses, and our Canadian as workers and consumers. Everyone would benefit from this bill and I am pleased to see that on this day, the day after the referendum, all the parties sitting in this House support this bill.

This bill will benefit all Canadians, including small businesses and manufacturers in my riding of Carleton—Gloucester, and I commend all those who worked on it in committee. I will gladly vote in favour of this bill.

EXCISE TAX ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–103, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act, as reported (with amendment) from the committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Colleagues, I would like to make you aware of a ruling by Mr. Speaker on Bill C–103, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act.

There are four motions in amendment standing on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C–103, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act.

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 will be grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 1 applies to Motion No. 2.

[Translation]

Motion No. 3 will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 4 will be debated and voted on separately.

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–103, in Clause 1, be amended by deleting lines 33 to 36, on page 2.

Motion No. 2

That Bill C–103, in Clause 1, be amended by deleting lines 30 to 42, on page 5.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the reason I have moved these motions to amend the legislation is that I am concerned that our government is placing an impediment in the way of Canadian magazines. I am very concerned that by doing this it is jeopardizing the future of Canadian magazines.

For people who are not familiar with what exactly this bill is about, I will provide some background. Bill C–103 is legislation that would retroactively apply most specifically to Sports Illustrated magazine. It would prevent the use of split run technology to publish their magazine in Canada and also pursue Canadian advertisers. I will address that whole issue in a moment.

This clause does not permit Canadian magazines which have circulations in the United States that are less than what they have in Canada to use split run technology to get back into their own market. By introducing this clause, the government is effectively blocking the way for the expansion of Canadian magazines which does not make any sense.

This weekend I was at the Canadian Association of Broadcasters meeting in Ottawa. As a former broadcaster I thought I had a pretty good handle of what was going on with broadcasters. However I was quite surprised to find out that some Canadian broadcasters have extended far out into the rest of the world. In doing so they have not only strengthened their balance sheet and profit picture, they have also provided tremendous opportunities for Canadian actors, writers and producers. As an example, I found out that Power Corp. out of Quebec is the largest broadcaster in Europe. I was surprised by that.

• (1250)

That tells us something about what we should be doing if we really want to give Canadian cultural industries a leg up on the competition. We should not be looking inward, becoming insular, engaging in navel gazing and putting up protectionist walls. We should be putting in place legislation that encourages free trade, that gives businesses the incentive to go out and compete in the world by getting into Europe as Power Corp. has done. It has provided all kinds of jobs for Canadian actors, writers, producers and all kinds of other people involved in the Canadian cultural community. That is the right approach.

The same applies to CanWest Global which is involved in New Zealand and in Australia. The company I used to work for now has a MuchMusic type operation in Argentina which is doing very well.

The point is that what applies to broadcasting applies to the magazine industry. At the end of the day the cream rises to the top. Ultimately consumers get the best products. They get the most choice at the cheapest possible price.

I fail to understand why we are putting in legislation that impedes the ability of Canadian magazines to not only compete in the world market but even in their domestic market against all the American and foreign magazines which are coming into Canada. It is ridiculous to have a situation where if you want to establish an operation in New York in addition to the one you have in Canada you will not be allowed to use split run technology to get back into your own country. That is crazy. It makes absolutely no sense.

Our amendment is designed to get rid of that clause. Canadian magazines would then have an incentive and the government would not be standing in their way penalizing them for trying to expand and provide jobs for Canadians and to ensure that Canadian culture and the Canadian cultural industries, particularly the magazine industry, are strengthened in this country. Why in the world are we doing this? It makes absolutely no sense.

I am not going to belabour this. There are several motions before us and I will not talk for a long time on all of them. However, I really do feel that although the whole principle behind this legislation is flawed, this clause in particular needs to be addressed and this motion would be the ticket to do it.

[Translation]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are here today to consider four amendments to Bill C–103. This bill contains major amendments to the Excise Tax and the Income Tax Act in areas that will benefit Canadian periodical publishers.

It has been a longstanding policy in Canada to channel Canadian advertising revenues into Canadian periodicals. The Canadian magazine industry actually depends on these revenues, as they represent 65 per cent of total revenues. More than 30 years ago, in 1961, the Royal Commission on Publications, commonly referred to as the O'Leary commission, looked into the situation of the Canadian magazine industry.

After a comprehensive review, the commission recommended that steps be taken to increase the flow of advertising revenues toward the Canadian magazine industry to give this industry a sound financial footing.

• (1255)

As a result, two legislative provisions were enacted in 1965: (i) section 19 of the Income Tax Act, limiting income tax deductions for advertisements directed at the Canadian market to advertisements bought in Canadian periodicals, and (ii) Code 9958 of the Customs Tariff, which prohibits the import into Canada of split–run editions or special editions of periodicals whose content is substantially the same as the content of the original edition, except for publicity specifically tailored to a Canadian market.

[English]

Over the past 30 years, section 19 of the Income Tax Act and tariff code 9958 have been successful in supporting the government's policy objective of encouraging Canadian advertising revenues to be directed to Canadian magazines. These two policy instruments have allowed the Canadian magazine industry to expand and to prosper.

However, a potential threat to the Canadian magazine industry arose in January 1993 when Time Warner announced its intention to publish Sports Illustrated Canada, a Canadian split run edition of the U.S. magazine Sports Illustrated. It would be printed in Canada using editorial content electronically transmitted from the U.S. Since Sports Illustrated Canada would not involve the physical importation of split run magazines in Canada, tariff code 9958 would not apply.

Time Warner's initiative demonstrated that there was a loophole in tariff code 9958 and a need to update Canada's magazine policy. As a result, in March 1993 the Government of Canada established a task force on the Canadian magazine industry. The task force was asked to examine existing policy instruments and to propose new measures which would ensure the continued effectiveness of federal policy in support of the Canadian magazine industry.

In its final report, the task force presented 11 recommendations to the government, two of which are addressed in Bill C–103: an excise tax on split run editions of periodicals distributed in Canada; and an anti–avoidance rule relating to the deductibility of advertising expenses in non–Canadian newspapers and periodicals.

The proposed excise tax will be levied on split run editions on a per issue basis at a rate of 80 per cent of the amount charged for all advertising appearing in the issue. Without this measure, the task force noted that new split run editions would likely enter the Canadian market and the Canadian periodical industry would risk losing up to 40 per cent of its advertising revenues over a five–year period.

The proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act will add an anti–avoidance rule to section 19 of the act. This will ensure that newspapers and periodicals which claim to be Canadian are in fact Canadian controlled for the purposes of the act.

The proposed amendments to the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act update our policy instruments in support of the Canadian magazine industry. They maintain the government's longstanding policy respecting Canadian magazines and underscore the federal commitment to support the continuing existence of a viable and original Canadian magazine industry. I wanted to put that before the House to give a context to the amendments which are being discussed.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the hon. member for Medicine Hat for his participation in the finance committee deliberations. He is not normally a critic in the finance area, but rather in the heritage field. However, this bill went to the finance committee because it affects legislation which is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance. His participation was greatly welcomed and contributed to the questioning of witnesses and our general deliberations.

• (1300)

I will now deal with the first two amendments presented by the member that are grouped together. In Motion No. 1 would delete the definition of excluded edition. An excluded edition is defined as an edition primarily distributed outside Canada. This is a key concept that appears in several provisions of the bill. If the motion were adopted, a periodical edition distributed in Canada could be a split run edition if its editorial content is more than 20 per cent the same as that of another edition primarily distributed in Canada.

Thus the motion would result in regional editions of Canadian magazines being subject to the split run tax, even though at least 80 per cent of their editorial content is original to the Canadian market. This would be contrary to the government's stated policy objective for the Canadian magazine industry. It would also be inconsistent with the vote of the House to adopt a ways and means motion and the approval in principle given to the bill by the House at second reading.

The purpose of the bill is to encourage publishers to include at least 80 per cent original editorial content in magazines containing advertisements directed at Canadians. However, provided that a magazine satisfies this editorial content objective there is no intention to discourage the publisher from publishing regional Canadian advertising editions of the magazine. For that reason the government will have to reject the motion.

The second motion would eliminate exceptions that would exempt certain types of publications from being subject to the tax on split run editions. The first exemption specifies the tax will not apply to an edition primarily distributed outside Canada even though it has some circulation in Canada. This exception would allow regional editions of foreign magazines to continue to be distributed in Canada provided that the editions are primarily distributed outside Canada.

The second exception would allow a publisher of a foreign magazine to distribute in Canada an edition that contains some but not all the ads that appear in one of the editions distributed in a magazine's home country provided that the edition distributed in Canada does not contain any new ads.

These two exceptions are intended to allow foreign magazine editions to continue to be distributed in Canada without being subject to the split run tax provided that they do not contain ads primarily directed at Canadians. By deleting these exceptions the proposed motion would extend the scope of the split run tax to magazine editions not intended to be subject to the tax.

Thus the motion is inconsistent with the vote of the House to adopt the ways and means motion and the approval in principle given the bill by the House at second reading. For this reason the government will reject the motion.

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise today to discuss report stage of Bill C–103, an act to amend the Excise Act and the Income Tax Act.

I will spend the majority of my time today discussing Reform amendments that have been put forward to alleviate some of the serious problems or flaws that have worked their way into the bill.

As I stated during second reading, Bill C–103 will impose an excise tax in respect to split run editions of periodicals. The tax will be implemented at the rate of 80 per cent of the value of all advertisements contained within the split run edition. The split run editions are essentially periodicals distributed in Canada. More than 20 per cent of their editorial material is the same or substantially the same as the editorial material that appears in one or more periodical edition distributed primarily outside Canada and they contain advertisements that differ from country to country. Reform's amendments lie at the heart of this issue.

• (1305)

It is all too clear the issue of a split run edition of foreign magazines is one of predatory pricing or dumping its product on the Canadian market at unreasonably low prices as it means a siphoning off of Canadian advertising. If this is happening then punitive measures should be applied against the violators.

The ultimate question is whether publications such as Sports Illustrated are in fact dumping and in so doing bleeding the Canadian periodical advertising market dry. To effectively determine if split run periodicals dump their product on the Canadian market, we should examine the fees charged for advertising and compare them to a competitor or another publication with similar numbers or readership.

I will use readership as a quantitative measure in comparing Sports Illustrated with two other magazines simply because the same value was selected by the Canadian Magazine Publishers Association for comparing costs of advertising between publications. Sports Illustrated Canada has a readership of just over 650,000 compared with Equinox which has a readership of 783,000 and Outdoor Canada which has a readership of 621,000. The readership numbers are relatively close for those who read the three magazines and are relatively the same cross section of the populace.

Specifically Sports Illustrated charges $5,800 for a standard, full four–colour page advertisement, while Outdoor Canada and Equinox charge $4,300 and $5,500 respectively for the same standard, full four–page edition. Therefore it would seem logical that if Sports Illustrated is dumping the amount it charges, advertisers'costs should not only be lower but significantly lower. This, however, is not the case. It appears the opposite is true since Sports Illustrated charged more than the other two magazines for advertising space.

Even if we look at the unit costs per 1,000 copies for the same three publications after taxes, Sports Illustrated has a higher unit cost per thousand than the other two. Again, if Sports Illustrated were dumping, these costs would be significantly lower and not higher. This evidence has been seemingly overlooked or ignored by the Liberal government.

Further evidence is based on a 1983 study that the 10 most popular United States magazines in Canada commanded a collective circulation of approximately 2.8 million. Over the last 10 years the names of the magazines have changed yet the most popular U.S. magazines in Canada today have 25 per cent less circulation than their counterparts a decade ago.

Interesting enough at the same time the top 10 Canadian magazines have increased their collective circulation by almost 15 per cent. It appears that Canadian magazines are winning the battle for readers. This is happening not because of government intervention but because of the quality of articles in the magazines.

If we look at the amount of revenue generated for split run editions through advertisement, the lion's share is remaining in the hands of Canadian based magazines. Last year Sports Illustrated had six split runs that brought in ad revenues of slightly more than $1 million, which is minuscule compared to the $867 million in the Canadian magazine industry as a whole.

A final note on this issue is that Canadian magazine publishers admitted to the Standing Committee on Finance that advertising revenues in the Canadian magazine industry have increased 4 per cent over the last year despite the alleged dumping and predatory pricing of Sports Illustrated Canada that were supposed to have taken place during this time.

• (1310)

Moreover, the Canadian Magazine Publishers Association agreed there was no Canadian magazine in direct competition with Sports Illustrated Canada in its unique market niche for its readers. Even if there were, the Canadian competitor would survive not because of an end to split runs of a competitor but because Canadians wanted to read it and because it was quality material. In other words it would stand on its own merits. Advertisers would be attracted to certain publications for their readership and because they were Canadian or American.

The complaints of Canadian publishers are based on a much simpler concept than predatory pricing called economies of scale. To say therefore that economies of scale inevitably doom Canadian culture is to say that domestic and foreign cultural products compete strictly on price, that is Canadians do not distinguish between them on any other basis.

If there is one truth among nationalists it is that the two are not perfect substitutes. Canadian tastes are distinct and therefore indigenous production fills a need that foreign art cannot meet, in which case Canadians would be willing to pay a premium for the product. If we are not very different from the Americans, the advantage of economies of scale should be just as open to us as to them. A perfect example of this would be Hockey News, a Canadian publication running split run editions in the United States.

Should clauses 1 and 2 not be amended as we have put forward, future Canadian publications would be prevented from expanding into the United States. Not only does the bill impede the flow of imports, it also takes away any incentive for Canadian publications to grow, to expand and to take full advantage of the U.S. market. That is shameful. For this reason Motions Nos. 1 and 2 should be passed.

Bill C–103 implements a retroactive grandfathering clause as well. Clause 1 on page 6 dealing with section 39 clearly illustrates the meanspirited nature of the government in that it sets the exemption date for the legislation approximately one week before Sports Illustrated started running its northern edition. The bill therefore aims directly at disqualifying only them. This is grossly unfair and our amendment will remedy the situation by changing the enforcement date of the legislation to the day after the act is assented to.

We on this side of the House oppose the bill for the following reasons. First, Reformers do not support the notion that state sanctioned cultural protectionism is a good policy to implement. Second, Bill C–103 conjures up the view that Canadian magazines are not of sufficient quality or merit to compete with foreign counterparts. We on this side of the House know this is 100 per cent false. Canadians are among the best in the world. We compete through our talent and our products, not through government sanctioned protectionism.

It is clear therefore that the Reform Party cannot support the legislation without our amendments being passed. Bill C–103 represents the worst of giving special interest groups an advantage at the expense of all taxpayers who will now pay a higher price for many magazines they choose to buy.

On behalf of my constituents in Edmonton—Strathcona I thank the Liberal government for taking even more money out of their pockets.

• (1315)

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join in the report stage debate of Bill C–103 and to stand in support of those members on this side of the House who were speaking to this bill.

I want to begin by giving a bit of my background as an educator and as someone who has enjoyed and is very concerned about the Canadian magazine industry. A task force on this industry was established in March 1993 with a mandate to recommend the update of existing policy instruments and to propose new measures in support of the Canadian magazine industry, which so many of us have enjoyed and are enjoying.

Since 1965 there have been two legislative measures in place to support the Canadian magazine industry: the Income Tax Act section 19 and the customs tariff code. The objective of both of those measures was to ensure an adequate flow of advertising revenues to support a vibrant Canadian periodical industry. These instruments of public policy have in large part been successful. However, technological developments in an increasingly global trading environment have meant those two measures which have been in place for almost 30 years are no longer completely adequate to meet the policy objective for which they were designed.

The first thing the task force had to do was learn about the industry. I would like to take this opportunity to give some background on the industry to put this bill in perspective to see whether the Reformers would appreciate some of the aspects of the bill that we are supporting on this side of the House.

The task force commissioned two reports. The first was prepared by Informetrica Ltd. and examined the economic environment within which the Canadian magazine industry operates. The second, prepared by Lee Anderson of Carleton University, analysed the Canadian advertising market with particular reference to the Canadian magazine industry. The Informetrica study provided some basic information on the economics of periodical publishing, its products, markets and cost structure.

In 1991–92 the Canadian industry produced 1,440 magazines, with revenues totalling more than $846 million. The Canadian magazine industry is one of the most important media pipelines between the generators of Canadian information, ideas and views and the Canadian public.

In 1990 more families participated in buying magazines, both Canadian and foreign, than any other cultural activity except perhaps the buying of newspapers. Compared to 1978, the percentage of households buying magazines increased by 10 per cent to an average of 69.8 per cent.

The domestic market is measured by Statistics Canada. Statistics Canada estimates that there are more than three million subscriptions to U.S. periodicals not included in the trade data. In 1991 Statistics Canada information presents one view of the size of the market and the Canadian magazine publishers' share of that market. Using these measures, Canadian publishers account for 54.8 per cent of the total domestic market.

• (1320)

One area of difficulty, is that subscriptions ordered by Canadians directly from the U.S. and mailed from the U.S. to Canadians are not counted by any of the existing statistical systems. The value of magazines imported is the value at the border with no real measure of the advertising contained therein. Therefore, with adjustments an alternative measure based on circulation revenue suggests a Canadian publishers' share of about 25.5 per cent of the domestic market.

Although editorially rich and diverse, the Canadian industry is not on strong economic footing. We do not have to go very far from the House to recognize this. The 1991 statistics show that more than half of Canadian magazines had no operating profit. The average operating profit for the industry as a whole was only 2.4 per cent. In any business that is really not good.

Despite the strength of our mix of editorial content and diversity and the size and profitability of Canadian magazines they are still very much limited in terms of their potential for revenue. The issue here is one of relative market size and economies of scale.

Magazines have two clients, the reader and the advertiser. The building blocks of a magazine are circulation, editorial content and advertising. The larger a periodical circulation the more advertising it can attract. The greater a magazine's advertising revenue the more it can afford to spend on editorial content, which in turn makes the magazine more attractive to consumers and increases its circulation. Circulation is crucial to advertisers and therefore crucial to a magazine's advertising revenue.

The Informetrica study reported that circulation revenue accounted for $245 million or 29 per cent of the total revenue of Canadian magazines in 1991 and 1992. Magazines can be circulated on news stands or through subscriptions. For Canadian magazines, approximately 10 per cent of English language and 27 per cent of French–language magazines are sold on news stands. By contrast, 89.3 per cent of all imported consumer magazines are destined for news stands. That is not to suggest that the government or the domestic magazine industry are interested in restricting the access of foreign magazines to our news stands. These statistics are merely presented to demonstrate the competition Canadian magazines are up against on news stands.

Subscriptions are the main source of circulation revenue for most Canadian magazines. A large subscription base provides a publisher with stability, helps in scheduling production units and is particularly important for cash flow since most subscriptions are paid in advance or early in the subscription period. I am sure that most of us who have subscribed to magazines know that we hear from the magazine far in advance of the expiry date of the subscription.

Advertising revenue is a lifeline of the Canadian magazine industry and is crucial to the survival of Canadian magazines in an indigenous Canadian magazine industry. Sixty–five per cent of all revenue of Canadian magazines is derived from advertising. An adequate advertising revenue base is essential to the economic foundation of periodical publishing in Canada.

Without a healthy Canadian magazine industry Canada's policy objective of ensuring that Canadians have access to Canadian ideas and information through Canadian periodicals cannot be met. Policy instruments that have been in place since 1965 are designed to achieve that purpose. Encouraging magazine advertisers to reach Canadian consumers through Canadian magazines and periodicals is as important today as it was 30 years ago.

The advertising study commissioned by the task force showed that magazines have experienced more annual declines in advertising dollars than any other medium in Canada. Television's rise as an advertising medium over the 30–year period is perhaps the most significant trend behind the declining share of magazine advertising revenues.

• (1325)

Magazines tend to be disproportionately affected in economic downturns through drops in circulation. Whereas people will continue to watch TV, they would cancel their magazine subscriptions to save money and have cash flow. That affects the entire industry.

The bottom line is that the amount of money spent by advertisers to reach the Canadian consumer is not likely to grow. Therefore, within the Canadian advertising market it is extremely unlikely that the share held by periodicals will increase.

The two studies that were commissioned demonstrate very clearly the precarious situation the Canadian magazine industry finds itself in. This is a point I want to underscore, the precarious situation the Canadian magazine industry finds itself in. It must compete in a market that is dominated by imported magazines and it must compete for advertising revenues.

The consequence for the Canadian magazine industry and thus for Canadian cultural development will be very serious if we do not take the necessary steps to maintain the structural support necessary to continue to meet the government's longstanding policy objective for Canadian magazines of ensuring they have adequate access to advertising revenues.

The measures in Bill C–103 are designed to support the Canadian magazine industry so that it can conduct business and be competitive. It is simply an extension of Canada's longstanding policy against split runs. The measures strive to plug a loophole in the tariff item so the exploitation by Sports Illustrated Canada over the last two years can be dealt with. However, Sports Illustrated Canada got around the measures by electronically beaming the magazine to a Canadian printing plant.

I know members across the way are speaking in support of Sports Illustrated. I want to make clear these measures in the present bill are in no way designed to limit Canadian access to foreign publications. Canadians will still be free to read whatever they want, including an imported edition of Sports Illustrated. Our borders remain open to the millions of copies of American magazines that are bought here each year. The best way to support the Canadian magazine industry is to adopt measures that will encourage original content regardless of the country of origin.

We do not want a kind of recycled editorial material that is commonly dumped in split runs. We must continue to finds ways—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. I have been as generous as I could. Short of the member asking for unanimous consent to conclude her remarks, I would have to resume debate.

Perhaps the hon. member could mention to the House how much longer it would take to conclude her remarks.

Ms. Augustine: Mr. Speaker, I was right at the very end.

We must continue to find ways to maintain a place for the rich tapestry of ideas and information we now have in Canadian periodicals. To that end, I urge the House to promptly pass this legislation.

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to rise today to support the motions of amendment put forward by my colleague for Medicine Hat. First, I do that, I would like to take a moment to speak about Bill C–103 which is the basis for these amendments in the first place.

What we have here is a form of cultural protectionism. It is protectionism for an industry that I do not think really wants it or needs it. This government seems to assume this industry cannot stand on its own two feet, that it does not have a quality product which can be sold throughout the world on the basis of that quality. I really disagree.

• (1330)

I wonder what has happened to the Liberal government. At the same time those members have been talking about trade liberalization, bringing in NAFTA, the GATT agreement, they seem to be moving in the opposite direction in the area of culture.

In this area specifically we are talking about split runs for the magazine industry. What they do not realize is that Canadian magazines also use this technology very effectively. We have an industry in Canada competing in the international market and we can do it without government help. Those Canadian magazines will get sideswiped in this whole process.

This goes against the whole grain of free trade, of trade liberalization. Canada does not want to set this example. We want to set an example that we are free traders, that we can compete on the basis of quality.

The question of whether this is actually a dumping issue was raised by my colleague earlier. If this is a dumping issue, that the Americans are dumping cultural property into Canada, it should be addressed as such. We have a basis for discussing that with a NAFTA trade dispute panel. Why does it not go there instead of taking this round about way of hitting them with an excise tax?

We have to simply move away from this whole idea that we cannot compete unless we have government subsidies. Our cultural industries are actually being adversely affected by our assuming that and we have to get on with the process of competing on the basis of quality.

I want to talk to the first and second amendments proposed by my colleague. The first amendment deletes the term "excluded edition" from the bill. An excluded edition is an issue of a periodical that has less circulation in Canada than outside Canada. The second amendment deletes references to split end editions.

The purpose of these two amendments is to ensure the Canadian magazines we talked about earlier, which circulate in the United States and do split end runs, do not end up paying excise taxes in Canada in their attempt to penetrate the American market.

They are being penalized by an attempt to exercise cultural protectionism. The whole purpose of liberalizing trade between Canada and the United States is to allow goods and services which are superior and which are in demand to find a much larger market. We defeat that purpose of free trade by taxing Canadian periodicals which have a chance to stand, to make it at home and abroad.

Canadian periodicals should be free to export our good ideas and our great culture to the United States. They stand a better chance if they can do so by using the split end run technology on their editions abroad and not be penalized here at home. Presently there are two Canadian magazines, Harrowsmith and The Hockey News, which will be caught in the net of the bill.

Amendments Nos. 1 and 2 by my colleague ensure these and other Canadian magazines are excluded from the bill's provisions. I would like to see our amendments passed this afternoon.

Mr. John Godfrey (Don Valley West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will address some of the arguments put to us this afternoon by members of the Reform Party.

I will limit my remarks essentially to four arguments. The first made by the member for Medicine Hat is an economic argument about market choice. It is an interesting theory about the ability of consumers to know their own needs best. It is a very alluring theory but there are flaws with that theory which I hope to point out.

The second argument is that of the member for Edmonton Strathcona on the apparently arbitrary nature of Bill C–103 with regard to its targeting Sports Illustrated, its split run and the timing of the proposal.

The third argument deals with the whole notion of state sanctioned cultural protection, alluded to by the members for Edmonton Strathcona and Peace River. The final argument deals with the whole notion of whether we can compete without this kind of government subsidy, an argument made by the member for Peace River. Let us review those arguments in order.

• (1335)

How does the world actually work? The world actually works in economic theory and in economic practice in two different ways. We have what could be described by any economist as imperfect market conditions in many of our relationships with the United States.

This is particularly true when, because of the market size and dominance in the cultural industries, there is a virtual monopoly condition which unless counterbalanced would essentially wipe out Canadian culture. It is true not only of magazine publishing but equally of broadcasting, movie distribution, popular music and many other cultural areas.

Our experience in this country is a sad one going back to the days of radio in the 1920s and 1930s when we discovered there was simply no place for a Canadian voice unless we created it, unless we legislated some protection, some place for Canadian voices to be heard, which led to the creation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

We noted in a later era that in popular music Canadian voices could not be heard unless there was some place they would be protected initially so they could form a critical mass and then become competitive. We have noted in film distribution there is still no place for Canadian voices because of the enormous market power of the American distribution systems. We have noted it in magazine distribution where a 1961 market share of 25 per cent of publications available in this country has declined to 21 per cent. With the introduction of various measures designed to prevent this kind of dumping Canadian magazines started to increase in their number and in their proportion of the marketplace.

In other words, we are talking about public policy that actually has a track record of working, public policy that has worked in broadcasting with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, public policy that has created a vibrant successful popular music business which can now compete successfully in the United States and public policy that has supported a vibrant Canadian magazine industry. Public policy works.

The argument has been put on the second point that this is grossly unfair to Sports Illustrated, a magazine that deliberately tried to violate the spirit of the law against this kind of dumping by trying a technological device not available at the time of Time magazine or Reader's Digest when we had to deal with this problem previously. It was a deliberately provocative act which demanded a deliberate, measured and firm response, which is what this is about. The spirit of the law is quite clear and it has been violated by Sports Illustrated.

The third argument has to do with the notion of state sponsored cultural protection. It is very interesting that we are not the only country to try to protect our cultural industries. It is also clear the United States does exactly the same thing. It is not possible for a foreigner to own a television station in the United States. The foreigner has to change nationality. We might argue that is a form of cultural protection. The Americans put it in a different way. They see that as a matter of national security so if ever they had to clear the air waves, a station would not be owned by some nefarious Canadian who would stop them. It is a form of cultural protection under the guise of national security.

The Americans do all sorts of things in this area. They do not allow foreigners to own significant amounts of the merchant marine because it might be required for national security. Surely if we chose to do so in this country we could simply redefine what we are on about here as our form of national security, our national cultural security. We also have something at stake here but we do not fight so much with arms as we do with our culture.

[Translation]

I think that, for all Canadians in whatever cultural or social group, our culture is nonetheless worth fighting for, since this culture, whether expressed in French or in English, represents us.

I think that we will also benefit from the European model, which reflects similar concerns with respect to culture. Our French counterparts have done the exact same thing, taking action for instance against the distribution of American movies and television programs. The problem is the same, it has to do with who they are.

That is what this is all about and why we are entering into a kind of alliance with the French and the Europeans on culture, in spite of American provocation if I may say so.

• (1340)

The Americans look upon us as a kind of Trojan horse. And if they cannot prevent us from taking such action, they will not be able to do so, even with the Europeans.

[English]

I suppose the argument, particularly by the member for Peace River, is whether we can compete without a government subsidy. The answer to that is quite clear. We cannot compete in an unfair market in which superior economic power is evidenced by dumping. The product coming across the border in the form of the split run by Sports Illustrated has been légèrement canadianisé. It is not a true Canadian product. It violates all of the agreements we put in place when we dealt with Reader's Digest and Time magazine. It was designed to do that deliberately. We have to take deliberate action against it.

As for being a subsidy, it is not a subsidy. It is simply a provision of the Income Tax Act which does not allow Sports Illustrated to have favoured treatment because they have come up with a clever technological trick.

For all these reasons I reject the arguments of the members of the Reform Party and urge the House to support this measure.

[Translation]

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address Bill C–103. Before discussing the content of this proposed legislation, I want to say a few words about culture and the importance of the Canadian culture.

Canadian culture includes a vast array of things. Ultimately, it is the essence and the reflection of who we are as individuals and as a nation. It reflects the way Canadians see each other, as well as the way they perceive the world. Our culture and our life as a people are inextricably intertwined. Cultural events, which are a reflection of ourselves, show the result of our creative voices and energies.

Culture is a complex notion. It includes the knowledge, beliefs, arts, moral values, laws, customs, as well as all the other skills and customs developed by the members of a society. Culture does not only refer to art. It includes the periodicals and books that we read, the records and the programs that we listen to. Canadians are avid consumers of cultural products.

Unfortunately, the majority of these products are of foreign origin. I say unfortunately because I wonder, as a member of this Parliament and of our Canadian society, how we are going to pass on our values and principles to our children and to our fellow citizens, if we have no control over publications, at least over a large number of publications, including cultural ones, in our community.

In this era of mass communications, our industries, including the film, book, periodical, radio, television and recording industries, must face an enormous challenge. Not only must Canadian producers assume the very high costs and risks inherent in a small market, they must also compete with foreign products which are generally cheaper and which have free access to our markets. If our cultural industries are not relatively sound from a financial point of view, our cultural development will suffer and we will no longer be heard. This is precisely what this bill seeks to avoid.

These reasons explain why Canada's cultural development deserves the full attention of public authorities, and particularly that of the members of this Parliament. As the hon. member for Don Valley West pointed out, every state takes similar measures. He mentioned Europe and France. Europeans have what they call "cultural exceptions" to protect, through rules of European content, their cultural institutions.

• (1345)

And remarkably, as my colleague for Don Valley West pointed out, the Americans are precisely the ones who generally treat questions of culture and cultural exports as purely commercial products. They also have the necessary means to protect American culture, American communications, American films and so on.

It seems to me, therefore, that the member for Peace River has somewhat oversimplified the issue. Yes, we live in a world of free trade. That is true, but we must never forget that our American competitors are experts in transforming free trade principles into elements of protection when it suits them to.

[English]

I have a friend in the United States who uses a wonderful expression. He has often said that as far as his people are concerned, free trade ranks somewhere between Christianity and jogging on a list of things much talked about but little practised.

Another American colleague of mine recently said at a meeting I was at that, as some of us recognize, that achieving free trade is like going to heaven; we all want to go to heaven but not just yet.

[Translation]

That is the problem. These are principles easily expressed but, regardless of the country, there are always impediments to prevent culture from being protected. The reason for this is a very significant one: culture is the very essence of a society.

We must be very pleased about what happened yesterday in the province of Quebec. We must all rejoice and I cannot pass up this opportunity to state how thrilled I am with the wise decision the people of Quebec made in yesterday's referendum.

I venture to think that the cultural aspect played a strong role in that decision, because Quebec's contribution to Canadian culture and the Canadian identity is enormous. Quebec makes it possible for the French language to flourish in Ontario and other provinces, and therefore contributes to the preservation and protection of French in North America, thus serving the interests of Quebec and of Quebecers themselves.

Now we can work together in the interests of the French communities, the English speaking communities, the multicultural communities, to preserve this focal point of hope our country represents to the whole world, which is reflected in the culture this bill is attempting to protect for all Canadians within this somewhat limited context.

The Government of Canada has fully assumed its responsibilities in this area. Over the past 35 years, it has put into place a wide range of organizations and programs in support of Canadian culture, to bolster what has been accomplished within the country. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the National Film Board and our national museums and archival institutions, through the Canada Council, distribute grants to artists and cultural organizations across the country.

The government promotes investment in cultural products by granting tax benefits to funding agencies such as Telefilm Canada. It helps Canadian periodicals attract the advertising revenue they need for their survival and facilitates their distribution to a very dispersed readership.

Nevertheless, the problem of very high production and marketing costs still exists. In other industries, sales revenues are usually such that companies are able to break even. Although it has always been difficult for Canadians to finance production of cultural goods from national sales because of the small size of the market, it becomes practically impossible as a result of the advantages enjoyed in Canada by foreign, especially American competitors. This is certainly not to criticize foreign competitors, many of whom enrich our cultural life.

• (1350)

The purpose of this legislation is only to highlight the structural and financial obstacles to the distribution of Canadian cultural products. Among our Canadian cultural industries, the one that concerns us particularly today in the context of this bill is the periodical industry.

As was pointed out by the authors of the report of the Royal Commission on Publications in 1961, periodicals "can give us the critical analysis, the informed discourse and dialogue which are indispensable in a sovereign society".

In the past thirty years, the Canadian periodical industry, both francophone and anglophone, has become more creative and, to some extent, more profitable. Unlike most of our cultural industries, the periodical sector is generally under Canadian control.

In fact, our Canadian periodical industries include more than 1,300 magazines, each with their own characteristics. These periodicals target various groups, use a variety of distribution methods and are regional or national in scope. Their content may be very specialized or very wide–ranging.

The large number and diversity of periodicals published in this country—consumer magazines, business publications and specialized periodicals—reflect the concerns and tastes of Canadians.

All regions as well most large urban centres have their own magazines. There are magazines for almost every field of endeavour: economics, professions and trades, arts and letters, science, religion, recreation, and so forth.

The relative success of this industry is largely due to government measures aimed at giving Canadian periodicals access to advertising markets and the public. Although their editorial content is rich and varied, the state of Canadian periodicals is precarious. In 1991, more than half failed to make a profit.

The Canadian market is more limited and is also shared by two main language groups. Canadian magazines will never have more than a fraction of the circulation of what are mainly American magazines. Circulation revenues of Canadian magazines will tend to remain below those of imported magazines. American magazines, for instance, collect more subscription revenues in Canada than do Canadian magazines.

Advertising sales play a vital role in the magazine industry. Publishers of periodicals cannot break even unless they manage to attract advertising. This is true in all countries, but Canadian publishers are often faced with strong competition from imported magazines, especially from the United States.

That is why about 30 years ago, Canada took steps to make it attractive for advertisers targeting the Canadian market to use the Canadian media.

The Canadian government was able to ensure that our periodicals would have more equitable access to their own markets. A complex set of measures involving postage, taxation and customs, together with subsidies, has contributed to the growth and stability of the industry.

This particular measure and this legislation are an attempt to complete a system that protects not only our magazines but, more broadly, the culture, ideas and values these magazines communicate to Canadians and their children, by propagating and protecting Canadian culture. This government is to be commended for taking measures we feel are absolutely indispensable to preserve—

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in Montreal on Friday, October 27 Canadians from coast to coast shared their love for Canada and Quebec. My riding of York—Simcoe sent six buses and turned away 200 more. In other ways, in rallies and vigils and in presentations of song and drama, they celebrated Canada.

• (1355)

Mr. Solberg: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the member's intervention is relevant to Bill C–103 and the motions on it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): During the last few hours I have been paying close attention to all interventions from both sides of the House. At the beginning of members' statements, whether on report stage of Bill C–103 or other matters we dealt with earlier, some members took a few moments to reflect on the historical event which took place yesterday.

With the greatest of respect and fairness which the Chair owes to all its members, I am certain the member for York—Simcoe will be dealing with the matter at hand.

Mrs. Kraft Sloan: Mr. Speaker, my introduction has tremendous relevance for the importance of the magazine industry in Canada. It is really unfortunate the members of the Reform Party do not understand how valuable the Canadian magazine industry is to the country.

Compared with the United States, Canada may be small in numbers, but Canadians everywhere have shown that they are big in heart and are capable of creating a mighty roar for Canada. The Canadian magazine industry is an important and vital contributor in defining us and explaining who we are. In comparison to the American industry it also is small in number in terms of its potential circulation but it is very important to Canadians. It represents a wide diversity of interest and must be supported.

Magazines have two clients, the reader and the advertiser. Over the past 30 years—

The Speaker: My colleague, you will have the floor when we resume debate after question period. It being 2 p.m. we will now proceed to Statements by Members.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

[English]

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to talk about our great nation, Canada.

While the results were close last night, we as a nation have so much to build our future on. Canadians from coast to coast share many of the same values and priorities. We all care about finding and keeping good paying jobs, that our streets are safe from crime and that future generations will inherit a compassionate and prosperous country.

The love for our country remains.

Last week the citizens of my riding organized a rally to demonstrate their desire for Quebec to remain a part of our great nation, and thousands upon thousands of Canadians travelled to Montreal to declare their love for this country.

These are the things that will hold us together. These are the things that we can build on in the weeks, months and years ahead.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when it came to the WGTA payout, the unique concerns of Peace River farmers were ignored by the government.

To ensure this does not happen again with the impending sale of the federal fleet of 13,000 hopper cars, I would like assurances from the Minister of Transport that BC Rail will will be given an option to buy some of these cars.

As a grain farmer I am well aware that BC Rail has had serious problems getting timely and reliable access to these government owned but CN controlled cars for years. In the more competitive market created with the elimination of the Crow rate, it does not make sense the government would limit the sale of its fleet to a couple of select players and force BC Rail to lease cars from its main competitors.

On behalf of the farmers of the Peace, I believe BC Rail must get its fair share. Farmers need to know there will be sufficient cars to get their grain to market in the future.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, while celebrating the fact that we Canadians remain together in a single country, we must ask ourselves some very important questions. What is a country, really? How did we weaken our political attachment to our country in the past 15 years? How can we renew the values we uphold and our vision of Canadian society?

[English]

In this respect, on behalf of the NDP we do not see uncritical decentralization and the offloading of federal responsibilities as a panacea, particularly if it is just a cover for the further dismantling of the very Canada that both Quebecers and non–Quebecers lament the continuing destruction of.

• (1400)

A house divided against itself cannot stand, but even an apparently united house—

[Translation]

—without a foundation of social and economic justice, is a house built on sand.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the outcome of the referendum gave us all a glimpse of the consequences that would result from the breakup of our great country.

The tiny majority won by the no side gives us an opportunity to strengthen confederation from the inside. I think that Canada is a better country with Quebec, that Quebec's culture and economy make Canada stronger, and that Quebec is stronger within Canada.

Being part of a large entity is beneficial to Quebec's economy and culture, as they are supported by both francophone and non–francophone citizens across the country. I thank all Peterborough residents who travelled to Montreal last Friday and all the people who expressed their attachment to and support for Canada during the campaign.

Let us join forces to make Canada an even greater country.

NATIONAL UNITY

Ms. Jean Augustine (Etobicoke—Lakeshore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in a show of support for national unity, thousands of students and residents of Etobicoke—Lakeshore are holding out a friendly hand to Quebecers.

As a friendship offering, the vast majority of people in Etobicoke—Lakeshore have put their hand prints and signatures on huge banners that will be sent to the people of Quebec. This gesture shows that they have respect for Quebec and hope to see this province remain in the Canadian fold.

[English]

With "Here's My Hand", the community of Etobicoke—Lakeshore of all races, colour, creed and ethnicity asked Quebec to take pride as we do in what we have accomplished together. Now more than ever, we must extend our hands and continue to work together for our future as one strong and united Canada.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I spent the last five days in the Quebec provincial riding of Labelle. I spoke to many Quebecers about their concerns and frustrations.

[Translation]

The day before yesterday, it was obvious that a majority of Quebecers do not want Quebec to separate from Canada but they do want changes. They have this profound desire to have their language and culture recognized and respected. They want renewed federalism. They want to live in an open and tolerant country.

[English]

We in the other provinces must live up to the promise of the past week. We have had on both sides a frightening failure to understand each other and a failure to understand the consequences of a yes vote.

[Translation]

Never again must Canada be allowed to come so close to the brink of destruction.

We must talk and take action.
