Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has deliberately been cruising in neutral since the end of September while waiting for the Quebec referendum results. Major changes to unemployment insurance and old age pensions will soon be introduced, and they will hit people harder than ever before since the inception of these programs.

We are aware of the societal choice being made in Ottawa, thanks to secret documents leaked to the public. We know that this choice is totally inconsistent with Quebec's aspirations in terms of society. The wind of change coming from Ottawa is really a flurry of drastic cuts that has Quebec shivering.

Those who chose to hide the truth from Quebecers will have to take the blame for it.

QUEBEC

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the referendum result reflects two different visions of Quebec. One is that Quebec is an integral part of a united Canada. But it is more than that. Quebec is the founding province of Canada, the place where it was born, the cradle and champion of francophones across Canada.

• (1405)

The other is that Quebec is one of these world nations that, because of their history and destiny, must become independent, while of course recognizing its special ties with Canada.

What these two visions have in common are democratic values, tolerance, and recognition of the fact that Quebecers form the only predominantly francophone society in North America.

Quebec is now and forever a francophone society that is free and able to control its own destiny and development, as part of Canada and of the world at large.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers have spoken. Yesterday, they democratically chose to stay in Canada.

This referendum, the second in 15 years, clearly shows that Canada is still Quebecers' first choice. Obviously, given the numbers, there is no reason for anyone to go around bragging. Nevertheless, yesterday's vote is confirmation that Quebec does not want to separate from Canada.

In the coming weeks and months, people from all over the country, and particularly from Quebec, will ask for a Canada that better reflects who we are.

Last Sunday, in Hull, the Prime Minister said that we must never take our country for granted. We took heed of that message and we are determined to do everything to ensure the best possible future for our country.

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the great democratic tradition that prevails in Canada and in Quebec allowed for a referendum to be held on Quebec's constitutional future.

Ninety–four per cent of Quebecers voted. That, in itself, is an unprecedented democratic success, given the importance of the issue.

The very civilized campaign and consultation process show unequivocally that the principles of tolerance and freedom are valued by everyone in this country.

I want to congratulate all those who participated in the campaign. The responsible attitude and the respect displayed by both sides during that campaign reflect favourably on Canada and Quebec.

It is always reassuring to see that, in spite of the diverging views held on a given issue, the principles of democracy are shared by everyone in our country.

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux–Montagnes, BQ): My congratulations also to all of the men and women of Quebec who took part in yesterday's referendum. The issue presented to them was the choice of a country.

On both sides of the issue, our fellow Quebecers in all regions behaved with dignity and honesty, respecting others' opinions, and maintaining complete calm.

There is no doubt about it, the federal government and its crown corporations, the major Canadian carriers and the telephone companies in the anglophone provinces made major illegal contributions to the no side, illegally.

But the profoundly democratic character of the Quebec referendum process belongs to us all, to all Quebecers, and we should all be proud of this. No one can take away that pride. Building serenely upon that foundation we shall continue the struggle of the Quebec people toward sovereignty.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, most Canadians are breathing a sigh of relief today after the slim no victory. But while Canada remains united, what have we truly won?

[Translation]

The situation in which we find ourselves today is the same as the situation last night, last month, last year. It is obvious that all Canadians want changes at the federal level.

The referendum results are a clear indication that Quebecers have rejected the status quo, which has been the central element of this Prime Minister's political philosophy for the past 30 years.

[English]

We can only hope these results are enough to force our traditional leaders to leave behind their prehistoric ways and join all Canadians in the 21st century. If the overall results are not sufficient to do this, maybe the no leaders should take a long hard look at last night's results in ridings like Saint–Maurice and Sherbrooke.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Denis Paradis (Brome—Missisquoi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, after the referendum yesterday, the Prime Minister of Canada said, and I quote: "It is up to us in Ottawa and Quebec City to respond to their expectations. Mr. Premier of Quebec, I reach out to you, sir".

• (1410)

The people of Canada now echo what was said by the Prime Minister. After a week spent demonstrating their love and affection for Quebec, Canadians are ready to join Quebecers in responding to the pressing needs of our country.

I earnestly hope that the Premier of Quebec will respond to this gesture and thus send a genuine message of reconciliation to all Quebecers.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we now know the verdict. Quebecers have said no to separation and have decided to stay within the Canadian federation. The results of the referendum have indicated very clearly that the people of Quebec are divided. Some wanted a new country where they believe everything would be possible. Others voted for the country they knew and loved, also in the belief that everything is possible.

It is now time to leave division and debate behind. It is time for reconciliation and solidarity. We all have to stick together and get back to work.

[English]

I extend my hand to all Quebecers and especially my Bloc Quebecois colleagues in the House of Commons, in the spirit of mutual respect, co–operation and understanding, in order to work collectively to defend the interests of all Quebecers no matter how each one voted last night.

[Translation]

Canada and Quebec can look forward to an exceptional future. It is up to us to make it happen.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, democracy spoke yesterday in Quebec and, as great democrats, Quebecers intend to respect the verdict. Although today, half the population of Quebec is saddened by the results, our first duty is to accept these results with calm and dignity, although the majority of the No side is minimal.

For democracy is the very foundation of the sovereignist movement, and we have every reason to be proud of the democratic exercise that ended yesterday, because it reflects, more than ever before, the discipline and political maturity of Quebecers and their profound attachment to democratic values.

The sovereignist movement will gain in stature after last night. The roots of hope are firmly imbedded for the future, for the near future.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last night the people of Quebec demanded change from the federal government, sweeping change which has already been advocated by the Reform Party. By resisting change the rigid centralists of the Liberal Party brought this country to the brink of destruction.

Change must come and when it does the government must deal with each province as an equal partner in Confederation. Whatever is offered to one province must be offered to all. The government may be tempted to grant special status to one province to retain a share of its traditional power, but the lesson we learned last night is this: If the federal government continues to clutch the power to its breast, it will lose the federation.

Only the broad devolution of powers to all provinces on an equal basis will allow us to address the concerns of the different regions of the country. In order that Canada can continue to prosper the socialist dream of this overwhelming and intrusive central government must be permanently laid to rest.

Reformers will oppose special rights to any province because unity is based on equality.

SOCIAL PROGRAM REFORM

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we know the government deliberately put off tabling its reform of social programs until after the referendum in order to keep the bad news awaiting the unemployed from them until then. There have been a number of leaks of late confirming that the reform has been ready for a number of weeks already. The CSN has even made public a bill setting out exactly how they would cut the unemployment insurance plan.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Now that Quebecers have voted no in the referendum, what is preventing him from unveiling his reform of social programs, under which he is once again to make cuts on the backs of the disadvantaged?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it quite surprising that the CSN has a bill I have not yet seen.

The government is still looking at the problem, and we have not made a definitive decision. Furthermore, I am in contact with the provincial premiers, as I indicated two weeks ago in this House. The maritime premiers have made representations in this regard, and I have not finished consulting the other premiers. I hope to do so soon.

When we are ready, the government will approve a draft bill, which will be submitted to this House. The members will be able to make suggestions and amendments and, after it has been duly studied, the bill will be passed.

At this point, however, I have to say that Cabinet has not yet approved any draft bill on the matter.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, up to now, the government cited the imminence of the referendum to explain why it was not governing. Now we wonder what pretext it will invent to justify its inaction.

How can the government still claim that the reform of social programs is not yet ready, when, in the case of unemployment insurance, everyone can read the bill in the paper announcing more radical cuts on the backs of the unemployed?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have just answered the question. I repeat that no draft bill has yet been approved by the government. No draft bill has been submitted to cabinet. When it is submitted, the ministers will consider it, and there will be a resolution. I have to say we are well on the way, but I want to talk to one or two premiers who have made representations, before approving the final bill. No draft bill has been approved by the government to date.

So, we are waiting. When it is ready, we will table it in the House, and members can make suggestions or amendments, if they do not like it.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given that the unemployment insurance fund will register a surplus this year of nearly $5 billion, does the Prime Minister plan to exempt the unemployed from further cuts and to reconsider his strategy of singling them out?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. leader of the opposition read the recommendations that were made by the House of Commons committee, which indicated that one of the serious problems in the past was that the government that preceded ours, of which he was a member, substantially cut unemployment insurance premiums. When a recession hit the country they had to suddenly and drastically raise those premiums, which only accelerated the recession. Therefore the House of Commons committee recommended that a reserve be established to ensure there could be a stable state of premiums established.

As the hon. member knows, right now we are still paying off the deficit that was incurred by the previous government in the UI fund. We want to make sure we establish enough of a reserve that we will not run into the same problems the government of which he was a member encountered when it had to deal with the unemployment insurance system.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, despite the announcement in the last government budget, the Prime Minister has stated on a number of occasions that there was no question of cutting old age pensions. Despite the Prime Minister's prereferendum assurances, however, seniors are concerned.

My question is for the Prime Minister. When will he make known the contents of his planned reform of old age pensions?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was very clear in this House prior to the referendum and I am still clear after the referendum: We have no intention of cutting the federal pension benefits being received by those who are already retired—as I have said and as I say again—either in November or in the next budget.

I was very clear before the referendum and I am as clear today.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister reiterate today the commitment made on numerous occasions during the referendum campaign that his government will not cut the old age pensions of future recipients? I would like some clarification concerning "future recipients".

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have never mentioned future recipients. We are speaking of those receiving pensions. That is always what we have said, that we had no intention of changing the plan for those in receipt of old age pensions.

We have said that the federal government needs to ensure, over the long term, that the plan will be available for people who will reach retirement later, because everyone feels this is a plan requiring adjustments. There are more Canadians than in the past, in proportion to the size of the pension fund, and we need to look to the long term. We have spoken of reform for the years 2005 and 2010, and not for the immediate future.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last night this country came within a hair's breadth of breaking apart. Fortunately the no side scraped through but it was thanks to the last minute efforts of the Canadian public, not to the strategy of the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister and the no side strategists woefully underestimated Quebec's deep desire for change and up until 10 days ago were still trying to sell the status quo with a little administrative tinkering. These gross miscalculations almost cost us the country.

My question is to the Prime Minister. Three months ago the Prime Minister did not have an adequate plan to keep this country together. He did not have one last night. Does he have one today?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr., Speaker, we had a plan and the people of Canada responded well to it. We had a close referendum, which was the expression of the will of the people of Quebec. Their views were expressed. It was closer than we expected. We wanted more.

I know the leader of the opposition wanted to win. There was no doubt in his mind that he wanted to win, which is normal in such a contest. But we won.

I made a speech on Tuesday in which I said I was in favour of certain changes. I will bring about these changes very quickly. As far as the will of the people of Canada is concerned, yes, they have helped a lot. A lot of members on this side were in Montreal with the people of Canada. However, I realize that during all that campaign the leader of the third party did not do much to help us to win.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Prime Minister learned a thing from last night.

Quebecers last night registered a massive demand for change. While Quebecers said no to separation by the narrowest of margins, both sides were giving a massive no to the status quo. Yet in his speech last night and in his remarks today, all the Prime Minister has to offer are the same old meaningless clichés about change that almost put this country over the edge.

Will the Prime Minister say today what changes he is going to make in the federal system to make it work for all Canadians? Will he be fresh, clear, and specific instead of tiresome, vague, and meaningless?

• (1425)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in a federation like Canada we have to talk with the premiers too, who during the campaign, contrary to the leader of the third party, did everything they could to help me and everybody on the no side to win.

I had the chance to talk with the premiers yesterday afternoon. We discussed a certain possibility of change, not necessarily all constitutional. They are willing to work with us. That is the way to do it, which is not what the leader of the third party has done. Rather than unite with everybody to give a front of a united Canada for the referendum, the leader of the third party was always out trying to score some cheap political points.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Shameful. Mr. Speaker, if I wanted to score cheap political points, I would know where to go.

A real agenda for change that would address the demands of Quebec and other provinces has to have two characteristics: It must be within the federal government's ability to implement without constitutional wrangling and it must be capable of commanding support among all the provinces including Quebec. Reform has a list of 20 such changes. We call them the new confederation proposals.

My question will appeal to the ethics of the government. If we were to put these new confederation proposals into a brown envelope and leave them outside the office of the Deputy Prime Minister, would the government be willing to steal them so that Canadians could at least have some plan to address the demand for change in this country?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the leader of the third party had been in Quebec he would have realized that nobody in Quebec voted to dismantle medicare, free medical care for everybody in Quebec. Nobody voted for that. Nobody voted for the agenda of the Reform Party to destroy the social safety net that exists in Canada.

What the leader of the third party is trying to do at this moment is sell its very right wing agenda, to the right of Gingrich. He is using this occasion to pass his own political agenda rather than arguing for the survival of the country.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Last week, the CSN made public the minister's bill on unemployment insurance reform. It indicates that, the more workers need unemployment insurance, the less help they will get from it. The rate of benefits paid to the unemployed will in fact be reduced according to the number of weeks they have drawn benefits in the past. The minister refused to comment before the referendum.

Now that the referendum is over, will the minister acknowledge that the two–tiered unemployment insurance plan, which he claimed last spring to have rejected, is sneaking back into his bill and that seasonal workers will be hard hit by his reform?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, whether it was before the vote for Canada last night or after the vote for Canada, the reality stays the same.

What the CSN put forward has no relation to the kinds of proposals the government is working on. Any documents they are dealing with they are conjuring.

As the Prime Minister said, I have not yet presented my recommendations to the cabinet. When those recommendations are presented and approved after further discussions with some of the provinces, we will be very happy to present them in the House. The hon. member will be able to see for herself exactly what is in them. Until then, I would recommend that the hon. member not buy the kind of stuff the CSN was putting out last week.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is a bill like others that coincide with leaks from his department.

Will the minister acknowledge that the regions whose economy depends largely on forestry, fishing and tourism will be the hardest hit by his reform and that he will turn them into second class regions peopled by second class unemployed?

• (1430)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal about the need for change during the debates of the last several weeks.

Perhaps the most important change we need to make is to get ourselves into having a job system for the 21st century that will reach out to the many people who have been unemployed for long periods of time and try to create the framework, the context and the resources to help them get good jobs to help economic development in the regions.

One way we can make that change is to shift from an unemployment insurance program designed 50 years ago to an employment insurance program designed for now and the next century. The real interest of the high unemployment areas is to get a good job creation system in the country. That is what we intend to do.

THE CONSTITUTION

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it has been proven that Canadians from sea to sea want absolute equality.

In the Confederation of tomorrow what guarantee could the Prime Minister give Canadians that every province and every individual will be treated equally?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in 1980 we put in the Constitution a charter of rights that gave equality to every Canadian.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): With that guarantee then, Mr. Speaker, why is the Prime Minister threatening to open up the Constitution again? There is no support for it across the country.

He has said during this debate: "We will make the changes that are needed". Whatever that code means, whatever the changes include, could the Prime Minister guarantee to us that there will be no special status for anybody? Just say no.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are in the Constitution provisions that are not the same for everybody. For example, there is a proposition coming from Newfoundland at this time, which has a system of education that is different from those in Ontario and Alberta.

Some provisions in the Constitution guarantee forever that there will be four seats for the citizens of the province of P.E.I., even if the proportion of the voters is much lower than some constituencies in Toronto. There is also a provision that one can argue does not guarantee absolute equality, but I think it is right for the province of P.E.I. to keep its four seats. It was among the first to join Confederation.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. Through his UI reform bill leaked by the CSN last week, the minister, far from helping young people, is set to increase very substantially the requirements that first time applicants must meet in order to qualify for the support that the UI program should provide. The minister refused to confirm anything before the referendum.

Now that the referendum is over, will the minister admit that his bill will increase from 20 to 26 weeks the minimum number of weeks of work required to qualify for benefits and exclude thousands of young people from unemployment insurance, and that the minister's new program will be one more obstacle to their access to the labour force?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I have said several times now, the proposed employment insurance legislation has not been finalized. It has not been presented to cabinet. The hon. member would be well advised not to pay attention to any documents various groups have of what they think we will be presenting.

The hon. member should be looking at the fact that since taking office the government has introduced major new employment programs for young people. This year alone we will provide funding for partnerships with the private sector and with various school boards, including many in Quebec, to provide a brand new opportunity for over 25,000 young people to get the experience of moving from school to work, the vital bridge between formal education and work experience education.

We are committed to helping young people. We are not only committed but the actions we have initiated have shown how successful they can be.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last year, the changes made by the government raised from 777,000 to 800,000 the number of welfare recipients in Quebec, so you can understand why we are concerned.

Does the minister recognize that his reform will make it much harder for women to return to the labour force after a long absence, as they will no longer be able to rely on UI for support between often precarious jobs?

• (1435)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are two forms of reply. First, I would point out to the hon. member that his facts are wrong. The reality is that the statistics we have from the Government of Quebec show the numbers of people on welfare have dropped over the last three months, not increased.

Second, I would point out that one of the very strong recommendations from the House of Commons committee, which we are listening to very carefully, is to provide for improved measures for women who want to come back into the workforce. We intend to live up to that commitment.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, for two very long years now we have watched the Prime Minister and the government overspend by $80 billion. We have watched them snooze while people fear for their safety on the streets. We have watched them sleepwalk to the edge of a cliff in Quebec. It is time for a wake up call over there.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Are we doomed to repeat the endless distinct society debate that 30 years of negotiations could not resolve? If so, how does he plan to convince nine other premiers that it is in their best interest to sign on to inequality?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased at the big rally in Montreal, where there were more than 100,000 people, to see the premiers of Ontario, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia there to show their solidarity. They showed the Quebec people that they wanted Quebec to remain in Canada. They also wanted to show their appreciation for the contribution of Quebecers since Confederation. I was very proud to see the premiers there. I noted there were not many Reform people there.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, holding rallies in the country is a far cry from good strategy.

My question is again for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister commit today to a process to ensure more authority for the provinces by giving them the tools to pursue their distinctiveness by decentralizing powers equally in the federation, in particular in areas like tourism, culture, language and natural resources? Give an answer for a change.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, all the powers the member mentioned are provincial powers. The only intervention by the federal government is to give money to the provinces in these areas. We use our spending power to give money in these areas. In the area of culture, for example, yes, the province of Quebec receives more than the proportion of population because it is where the milieu of the French culture is found. The reason a lot of the grants in relation to the French language are given to Quebec is that Quebec est le foyer de la langue française. We recognize that.

However, we do not have the constitutional power in those areas. The powers are with the provinces. We sometimes distribute money to give an equality of chances to the people. The reality in Canada is that we have parts of Canada where people are rich and parts of Canada where people are poor. It is the value of the Canadian mentality that the parts of Canada that have money help the people who need money in other parts of Canada.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Cuts in transfer payments to the provinces announced in the last federal budget will mean a $650 million shortfall for Quebec next year. By 1997–98, the shortfall in Quebec caused by federal cutbacks will range anywhere from $1.2 to $1.9 billion, depending on the distribution method.

Now that the referendum is over, can the Minister of Finance tell us on what basis he plans to distribute the Canada social transfer among the provinces and if he still intends, as suggested in his budget speech, to use population as a criterion, which would mean that more than 40 per cent of all cuts made in Canada would be made in Quebec alone?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, every time the hon. member quotes these figures, he fails to mention equalization, which is a very important system by which the federal government transfers funds to the provinces and to the people of Quebec.

That being said, no distribution criterion was mentioned in the budget. We said that we would hold discussions with the provinces, and I expect to meet with my provincial counterparts before long to really get these discussions going.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question was clear, yet, as usual, I did not get an answer. When questions are put to the Minister of Finance, they never get answered anyway.

When does the Minister of Finance intend to announce the extent of the cuts he is about to make in Quebec and to disclose the actual figures that he has been deliberately hiding from the people of Quebec during the referendum campaign?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we were quite clear in the budget. We announced the framework in which we wanted our negotiations with the provinces to take place. The hon. member would not want me, I am sure, to make an announcement in this House, quoting figures that we have not even started discussing. Discussions will have to be held with the provinces, and that is certainly what we intend to do.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for Financial Institutions. One of the greatest concerns of Canadians during the referendum campaign was economic stability. After last night's vote for Canada markets have stabilized and the dollar has strengthened.

People expect the federal government to ensure the stability of the financial system. Could the secretary of state tell the House what the government is doing to protect Canadians from the shocks that may arise from unauthorized trading in derivatives?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the member's interest in that subject because the government believes the derivatives market is an important market in the country. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions has taken some major steps in the last little while to handle that.

First there has been a guideline for best practices in derivatives and then last Friday there was a guideline on derivatives disclosures to improve public disclosure. Both these measures are important developments for the safety and security of the financial system.

OFFICIAL OPPOSITION

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has catered to the separatists in the House. His government supports them as the official opposition. His government has elected them as committee chairmen and his government has changed the agenda of the House for the separatists. The separatists in the House have been granted special preferential treatment.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Why is this happening and when is it going to stop?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be the defender of British tradition in the House of Commons. Under this parliamentary system there is an official opposition. We do not choose it; we take it as it comes. The tradition is that in committees we allocate jobs according to the status of the official opposition. They are members of Parliament. They are members of Parliament elected to come to Ottawa.

They wanted to break up Canada and they did not succeed yesterday, so they are still members of Parliament in Canada and they have the right to sit on committees. With respect, it is a tradition developed in the British parliamentary system, and coming from rural Quebec I am happy to defend the British tradition.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the reason the separatists are in the House is the Liberal people who have sat in the House for some 30 years have not dealt with the problem before.

We have been in the House for 45 days and there has been no agenda except for the agenda of the separatists. There has been no legislation before us. There has been no fiscal plan. The country is leaderless and the government sits and still does not give us any leadership.

As the House leader for the Reform Party, where and when will we have an agenda for Canadians rather than an agenda for the separatists?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the House has been dealing with important legislation presented by the government each and every day the House has been sitting. It has been dealing with private members' legislation, in some cases presented by the Reform Party.

The oddest thing about the rather odd question of the Reform Party House leader is that on a number of these occasions he has participated in the debates. He must be in a dream world more than he usually is.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, allow me to remind the Prime Minister that, before making petty comments on the official opposition, he should remember that, yesterday, a majority of his constituents voted yes in the referendum.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. During the last federal election campaign, the Liberals, and particularly the Prime Minister, promised to eliminate the GST by January 1996. On March 2, 1994, the Prime Minister again said: "We hate that tax and we will abolish it".

Can the Minister of Finance tell us why, after more than two years in office, he still has not made good on his promise to abolish the GST, and whether or not he intends to fulfill that commitment before January?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a commitment was made to replace the GST with a tax that would be fair and much more effective for consumers and small businesses in Canada. Clearly, these groups want a harmonized tax. We are having discussions with the provinces, because this issue requires co–operation from both sides.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, that effectiveness is always slow to come. I have a supplementary for the Minister of Finance.

Does he still intend, as do his Liberal colleagues on the finance committee, to go ahead with a suggestion to hide the GST in the sale price and to impose that tax on food items and on drugs? Is that the type of change proposed by the Minister of Finance to his provincial counterparts?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I said, we are having discussions with the provinces on that issue. Something will eventually come out of those discussions. The hon. member knows full well that the whole issue of whether that tax will be included or not depends on the provincial laws. I am sure that he would want us to respect the true boundaries of provincial an federal jurisdiction.

TRAINING

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Human Resources Development has used every available excuse to avoid making meaningful social reform. He keeps telling us he has offered to the provinces the responsibility for manpower training.

When will the minister specifically give power to the provinces for manpower training?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to use the old saying, it takes two to tango. We can only get an agreement when the provinces are prepared to agree. We are actively engaged with several provinces at present to work out how we can collaborate and work together on developing a much more effective program.

I remind the hon. member for Calgary Southeast that the real issue in the country is what is the most effective way in which all governments can work together to get people back to work? It is not a question of jurisdiction or power; it is a question of getting people back to work and how we can work together to achieve that end.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let us focus for a minute. Yesterday and last week the minister stated he had offered manpower training to the provinces. Yet after having contacted three provincial governments I have confirmed that the minister has not made any official offer to the provinces to give them manpower training. Instead he is holding up negotiations.

If the minister is truly committed to giving manpower training to the provinces, why are the governments of B.C., Alberta and Ontario not aware of any offer?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the reason they are probably not aware is that the message was so garbled by the hon. member that they did not understand what was being discussed.

We have already signed an agreement with the province of Saskatchewan. I have met with the ministers of each of the provinces mentioned. We offered a year ago to put on the table a transfer of responsibility for institutional training to all the provinces but they do not want to respond just yet. It is their responsibility.

In the full atmosphere of open co–operation and reaching out, any time a provincial minister wants to make a deal with me I will be there for that meeting.

BANKING

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State responsible for International Financial Institutions.

The banks of this country are holding customers' cheques for final clearance often for weeks. Everyone knows the banks within our system clear their cheques within 24 hours. The United States banks are required to pay up after 72 hours.

What will the minister do to stop the banks from profiting from this practice at the expense of average Canadians?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to say we have a clearing system in Canada which does same day clearance of both the debit and credit side of items. The banks, in their internal organizations, occasionally hold funds but the credit to the account is made right away. There is no loss of interest. The interest is paid, I understand, in most cases right away from the date of deposit.

PURCHASE OF SUBMARINES

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Great Britain is maintaining its offer to sell four submarines to the Canadian Navy for $500 million dollars plus the use of our military bases.

The British Minister of Defence has indicated that the offer is still valid, despite the Canadian government's delay in proceeding with the transaction.

My question is for the Minister of Defence. Given the terrible financial situation the federal government is in, can the Minister of Defence tell us whether he has given up on the idea of purchasing four used British submarines for $500 million plus other considerations?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there has been no decision to date.

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister justify such a purchase of submarines at the cost of half a million dollars at this time, when the cold war is well and truly over and Canada has no need of such submarines?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it very difficult to justify a purchase which has not been made.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in recent days and again today the Prime Minister has indicated he may soon pursue some constitutional negotiations.

• (1455)

Is it his intention to pursue constitutional negotiations with the Parti Quebecois in Quebec. Based on past history, would he expect those to be fruitful? Would he expect to find Mr. Parizeau an open, positive and constructive participant in constitutional negotiations?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, of course if we were to have such negotiations they would be with all provinces. I hope that if they are in the interests of Quebec Mr. Parizeau will accept.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, based on his past experience after the referendum in 1980, does the Prime Minister really think it is wise to enter into constitutional negotiations with a PQ government which has lost its own constitutional mandate and which could well find itself isolated and weak at the bargaining table?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to get involved in long constitutional discussions, as was the case after 1980. That is not the intention of the government. If something can be done with the agreement of the provinces we will do it. Quebec will assess the proposition and will render a view.

I do not intend to put on the table a long discussion on constitutional change. A lot of changes can occur in Canada without touching the Constitution.

We are doing that all the time. To give an example, the Minister of Transport has planned for over three years to reduce the size of his department from 20,000 people to 3,000 people. He is giving airports to municipalities and other things are being privatized. There are lot of things we can do without having to change the Constitution and the Minister of Transport is doing some now.

Some hon. members: Liberal Tories.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, PC): Mr. Speaker, in case some members are mistaken, this is not about Liberal Tories, this is about standing up for Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Charest: My question is to the Prime Minister. My colleague from Saint John and I campaigned about change in this referendum. I know the Prime Minister also talked about change.

Given the fiscal situation of the country, I would like to know whether he would contemplate seizing this opportunity to propose to the provinces a common national plan for deficit and debt reduction so that the country could deal with the issue with one single mind and look at common objectives to balance our books and get our fiscal house in order and help all Canadians deal with what is the most pressing issue facing them today.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for his great contribution during the referendum.

We are political opponents and we will remain political opponents. Despite our political differences, we were both fighting to keep this country together. I was very proud to walk with him.

• (1500)

I would like to thank him on behalf of all Canadians, including Quebecers, for the passionate speeches he made during the referendum. It was very much appreciated. He did not try to score any political points. He just wanted to keep his country together.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): In terms of talking with the provinces about a program to reduce the deficit of every level of government, I have to report to the hon. member that the Minister of Finance is always in communication with other ministers of finance. That is a goal every provincial government is trying to reach at this moment. We try to do it in collaboration with each other because it is very important that we manage this problem.

Today, now that political stability has come back to the country the interest rate went down by 1.5 per cent and the Canadian dollar increased its value to 75 cents. We now have to get back on the real agenda of putting the affairs of this nation on the right track and creating jobs. The people will be better off for that.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

At a time when Quebec has the highest poverty rate in the country, the Liberals are making massive cuts to social programs and unemployment insurance. Given the extremely close results of the referendum, will the Prime Minister drop his devastating policies, reject the demands of the Reform Party to dismantle the federal government and keep his recent promises of constitutional reform, including recognition of the people of Quebec as a distinct society?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. We intend to go ahead with our legislative program, which is widely known, and with what I announced in my speeches last week. I intend to keep my word. How will we proceed? As I said earlier, the matter will have to be discussed with the provinces, because there are certain ways we can do it with the provinces, and there are other ways where Parliament can act alone. So we are looking at various possibilities.

As I have always said, I recognized Quebec as a distinct society and I did so during the campaign. I supported the Charlottetown accord, whereas the Leader of the Opposition did not. I supported the Charlottetown accord, which recognized a distinct society. I know that the hon. member also supported it. I also know he would do so again, if he had another opportunity.

EXCISE TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–103, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act, as reported (with amendment) from the committee; and of Motions Nos. 1 and 2.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Just before the break for question period the member for York—Simcoe was in the middle of her speech, but unfortunately because of other parliamentary business she will not be able to finish her speech. Therefore I think the House is ready for the question on the first motion.

The Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

I declare Motion No. 1 lost on division. Therefore Motion No. 2 is defeated also.

(Motion No. 1 negatived.)

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.) moved:

That Bill C–103, in Clause 1, be amended by deleting lines 43 and 44, on page 5 and lines 1 to 6, on page 6.

He said: While I have the chance, I want to pass on my congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, and also the congratulations of many members of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters for the wonderful job he did in this Chamber last Saturday night of explaining the history of this place and also reminding broadcasters and through them, all Canadians of the value of this great country. I just want you to know how deeply people appreciated that.

Mr. Speaker, I am here to address Bill C–103. Specifically in Motion No. 3, we are asking that the imposition of the 80 per cent excise tax in Bill C–103 be deleted.

I want to speak to this bill in a larger way. I want to address some of the things which came from the hon. member for Don Valley West and the member for Rosedale. They were talking about how Canadians could not compete in the face of the overwhelming economic advantage the Americans have when it comes to certain sectors of the economy.

I guess we have to remind those hon. members that we have heard over and over again the debate on how Canadians cannot compete against the Americans. I am going to have to point out that for 128 years as a country we have faced competition from a much larger and much more powerful country to the south of us, but inevitably when the trade barriers are knocked down and we compete head to head, Canadians do extremely well.

I remind hon. members and I remind the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance that it was not very long ago during the free trade debate when wine producers and grape growers were extremely concerned about the effect of free trade on their industry. It was going to be the end of the production of wine in Canada. An American juggernaut was going to roll across this country's wine producing regions, southern Ontario, the Okanagan and other areas.

For crying out loud, it was just a few weeks ago that the Calgary Herald ran a big edition about how successful the wineries are in the Okanagan region. A member across the way from the Niagara region has done extremely well with his winery despite the fact that we have free trade and despite the fact the Americans had all the advantages of the economy of scale which this government says it is so concerned about.

The government is using that economy of scale as an argument for preventing Sports Illustrated and other magazines from using split run technology, getting into Canada and going after advertisers in this country. Frankly, those arguments do not hold water. The economy of scale has always been there. Instead of complaining about it, let us use it to our advantage.

When we were talking about this legislation in the finance committee a gentleman came forward representing the interests of Quebec magazine publishers. He talked about the big bad Americans and how France was going to come in and roll over magazine publishers. He did not just talk about them, he talked about the big bad Swedes, the big bad people from Belgium and the Swiss. If my memory serves me correctly, I think we are at least as big as those countries. We are at least as economically powerful as those countries but he was worried about the effect those magazines would have on French publications in Quebec.

Instead of whining about this, instead of pretending or suggesting we are victims, why do we not simply turn the tables on them? Why do we not go after their markets? I would argue that the people of Quebec and the people of Canada can produce magazines and editorial content that can compete with the best in the world. There is no reason in the world we cannot be selling that product to the French speaking population in Switzerland. There is no reason we cannot go into Belgium. There is no reason we cannot go into French speaking and English speaking countries around the world. What are we afraid of?

I pointed out earlier today that I was at the broadcasters convention this weekend. The broadcasting entity CanWest Global is doing extremely well in New Zealand and Australia. Just the other day Power Corp. out of Quebec as a conglomerate won a bid for the fifth channel in the U.K. I am told that Power Corp. is the largest broadcaster in Europe. It is a Canadian company.

What are we afraid of? What is the parliamentary secretary and the government afraid of? Our magazine industry can compete. We do it in every other sector. Why in the world should this sector be any different? Let us forget about these phoney arguments which are old and have been proven to be false in every other sector. Why in the world can we not push ahead and compete freely? Certainly the Americans compete freely in the magazine publishing industry.

I heard these straw men being thrown up by the member for Rosedale about how the Americans are protectionist. I agree they are in many sectors but they are not in this one. Let us go head to head. Two wrongs have never made a right. No one agrees with protectionism in this House or at least members on our side do not.

Let us forget about those straw men arguments. Let us push ahead with real free trade. Let us approve this amendment and get on with the business of making sure Canadians can profit from their expertise in this industry.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for the opportunity to rise on Motion No. 3 put forward by the hon. critic from the third party, the member for Medicine Hat.

He asked a rhetorical question as to why the parliamentary secretary for finance was afraid of competition. I would like to set the record straight. Neither the parliamentary secretary nor his government are afraid of competition.

If we look at the question differently and ask what we are proud of, we are very proud of the Canadian magazine industry. We are very proud of the fact that we have within Canada a very strong and flourishing industry. In fact one of the associations involved, the Canadian Magazine Publishers' Association, has about 300 members. This gives us an idea of the strength being brought to the Canadian market by the Canadian industry.

This strength has not been there by a wish or by a magic wand. The strength of the Canadian magazine industry is in fact predicated upon 30 years of actions and 30 years of considerations by the federal government. It began with a study that is known as the O'Leary royal commission and went on to be studied later in the 1960s by Senator Davey, who is still of course in the upper chamber, who looked at the problems in the Canadian communication industry.

It is not simply a case of taking a look at one segment or the other. I was happy to see that the hon. member got a chance to meet the broadcasters and talk to them about some of their ambitions. He too probably heard from the Canadian Broadcasters' Association about how proud they are of the regulatory regime, which allowed companies like CanWest to grow and prosper.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): No, actually they are not.

Mr. Walker: I can tell the hon. member from many conversations with the people from CanWest that they would not exist if a licence had not been given to them by the Government of Canada.

The regulatory framework set up by this government in previous times is what makes it possible for that industry to get together on an annual basis. We are very proud as Liberals of the contribution we have made. Those people, because of the base they have in Canada, have gone off now to compete with the world. But we do not compete with the world until we have a company, and we do not have a company until we have a regulatory base. They did not have a regulatory base until they had a good Liberal government. It is as simple and as straightforward as that.

In the publishing industry the key thing to remember, which has not been pointed out perhaps enough in this debate, is that subject to questions of pornography and so forth, any magazine that wishes can enter the Canadian market and be circulated and read. It does not matter whether they are coming from the American market, from the European market or anywhere else in the world. They can come into Canada, put it on the newsstand, set a price, and people read it. That is competition.

What Canadian publishers have worried about and we as a government have worried about for the last 30 years is the ability of larger companies to use the strength of their organization to undercut the advertising market within Canada. We were convinced originally when we set out these measures that certain protections were needed for the Canadian industry. As a result of the steps we took we have seen an industry flourish. We have seen people have careers in writing. We have seen Canadian subjects come up. We have seen a great deal of research done. We have seen magazines make a profit and we have seen a whole new set of publications that simply were not available to the Canadian reader before that.

From time to time governments have to review their structure to make sure they are up to date with technology. The broadcasting industry is changing dramatically and quickly because of changes in technology dealing with direct broadcasting techniques, new uses of cable, new uses of the telephone system. We are working hard with the CRTC to keep up with these changes. In fact the government just appointed a commission to look at digital television to see the impact it may have on communication systems.

We have a change in technology, which made the regulatory framework we were involved with obsolete. I am not going to speak to the motivation and whether it was done by happenstance or whatever, but somebody saw an opportunity to come into the market and make use of a split run to affect negatively the advertising dollars available to the Canadian industry.

We did not move on this quickly. The last government set up a task force. The last government announced publicly that it was concerned about what had happened, that it was likely to make changes. That task force met, studied the issue for close to two years and made public its recommendations. Perhaps later I will come to those recommendations. It suggested that the government update its regulatory framework to take into account the new technology. That is what the nature of Bill C–103 is. It is an updating of a strategy that has shown itself to be very positive, very influential and supportive of the Canadian publishing industry. Those who know Canadian publishing know it is not an industry that creates tremendous wealth. It is not one in which there are moguls involved in huge companies. They are very much small shops in Canada where people take a great deal of pride in their magazines.

I have a very close friend whose magazine unfortunately did not go as far as he would have liked it to have gone, but the love of that magazine captured his life for a couple years. He enjoyed trying to strike out a market and see it published. Among his friends there is a little club of people with failed magazines. It is a proposition that is enticing and daunting at the same time. People lose a lot of money in magazines. At the same time, the desire to nourish along a project and the desire to build something unique in the Canadian market is something we admire as a government. We did not want to see practices emerge that in fact made it more difficult to survive and the publication industry more fragile.

I was struck by the arguments put forward by the Canadian Magazine Publishers' Association when they appeared, I believe two weeks ago, in front of the finance committee. Their arguments were coherent and logical. They understood their responsibility in terms of a product people will read.

Everyone in the House probably goes by a news stand on their way to the airport to go home for the weekend. They probably pick up some sort of magazine. I do not think any of us would stop and not buy something because it was from another country. I do not think we would say as a government we do not want to see these publications, not at all. If we look at the news stands we see there is easy access to magazines from other countries right in front of us. I think we should remember that. We should not raise the spectre that somehow the government has arbitrarily taken away the right to distribute a magazine in Canada or the right to make profit out of this Canadian market.

I will bet there are many Canadians, including myself, who regularly buy magazines from other countries and do not think twice about it because of the news and perspectives they bring us.

Simply stated, without Canadian advertising there would not be a Canadian magazine industry. Therefore, we have to make sure there are opportunities for those advertising dollars to be accessed by the Canadian publisher. That is the intent of this act and will continue to be the intent of this government in support of the industry.

In speaking directly about the amendment to Bill C–103 as proposed by the member for Medicine Hat, let me make the following comment. Motion No. 3 would prevent the application of the proposed excise tax on split run editions altogether. This motion is therefore inconsistent with the vote of this House to adopt the ways and means motion and the approval in principle given to the bill by the House at second reading.

By debating the imposition section of the tax on split run editions this motion fails to recognize the important objective the split run tax is intended to achieve. In particular, the tax will update the government's policy instruments in support of the Canadian magazine industry and therefore allow the government to support the continued existence of a viable and original Canadian magazine industry. That is why we are sticking by our original intent in this and will not support this motion.

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to Motion No. 3, but I do want to comment on a couple of things that were said earlier this afternoon by the member for Don Valley West and the member for Rosedale. They both talked about how our Canadian magazine industry would not be able to compete if they did not have some type of protection. I reject that notion. They are talking about national security interests. They are talking about how we will be dominated by the United States because it is so much bigger and has so much more economy of scale.

My colleague from Medicine Hat talked earlier about other experiences with free trade. When we entered into a free trade agreement with the United States we heard the argument over and over that many of our industries would take a mortal hit and not be able to compete.

We know this government was not in favour of the free trade agreement. It did a flip–flop at the last minute. Now I really question their sincerity about their commitment to free trade.

What is the experience with other industries? My colleague spoke about the wine industry and how well it is doing. I can tell members about agriculture, the industry I have some knowledge of.

Our biggest fear is the destruction of an industry. We are hurt far more from subsidies and protectionism than we are from making trade rules that let us compete internationally on a basis of fair play. We think we can compete a lot better on the basis of quality product than we can on the basis of having to subsidize, because we cannot compete with the treasuries of other countries. Canada is simply too small.

When we talk about security, what about agriculture, food supply security? Do we need regulations to protect that? We have found that we do not. The cattle industry is a good example. There was a big fear that the cattle industry in Canada would be basically decimated with free trade. What is our experience? Since 1988 we have had something like a 40 per cent increase in cattle sales to the United States.

We can do very well on the basis of a level playing field and free trade. Our cultural industries can also do very well. They can compete head to head. We have to produce a quality product to do that, but we are up to it.

The amendment we are talking about today strikes out the section of the bill that would impose an excise tax on periodicals equal to 80 per cent of the value of their advertisements. Our amendment goes to the heart of the bill and strikes out its most offensive part. It is assumed that this excise tax will never be collected because it will effectively kill the Canadian edition of Sports Illustrated and any similar ventures that could be on the drawing board.

It is folly for this government to attempt to protect Canadian culture in this or any other manner. If our cultural industries produce quality products of interest to the Americans or any others around the world, let them go out and sell to those markets in whatever way they can based on the marketplace. I am confident they will be able to compete. If Canadians prefer to buy American culture products that have been spiced up with some Canadian content, by all means let them, but I do not think we should be using cultural protectionism here because it probably hurts our industry rather than helps it.

The Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 3. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Speaker: All those opposed will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

An hon. member: On division.

The Speaker: Motion No. 3 is negatived on division.

(Motion No. 3 negatived.)

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.) moved:

That Bill C–103, in Clause 1, be amended by replacing lines 18 and 19, on page 6, with the following:

"39. Where, before the date that this Act is assented to, a particular number of".

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and address Bill C–103, particularly this amendment.

This amendment is designed to delete the clause that really takes an arbitrary poke at one particular magazine, Sports Illustrated. The legislation is retroactive and most parliamentarians probably feel it is not a good way to approach these things.

I want to say a little more about the principle behind protectionism and whether or not we can all of a sudden set aside a particular sector on the basis that it is somehow different, even though the facts show that it ain't necessarily so. We have seen this over and over again in all kinds of sectors of the economy.

When we discussed it in committee we raised the issue of the retail industry. One thing I pointed out was that we had contradictory ways of doing business. We have the retail sector and all kinds of American companies coming into the country and doing well. By the way, Canadian companies also go into the United States and do well because they are able to provide some value to the consumers in those markets. It may create a situation where people can go into a store and perhaps get something for less than they had been paying because somebody has seen they can make a profit by offering products for less. When that happens consumers have more choice, better value and ultimately more money in their pockets as a result.

Let me apply the debate to what has happened with Sports Illustrated. Sports Illustrated was coming into the country. It was offering the advertisers a product that was at least competitive or perhaps even a little less than what Canadian advertisers were charging. That was despite the fact that Sports Illustrated did not have access to the tax deductibility provisions available to magazines that carry 75 per cent Canadian content. It was still able to offer extremely good value.

People will ask what that does for Canada. It allows advertisers either to get more bang for their buck through their advertising, thereby increasing the reach of their advertising message, or it allows them to improve their bottom line, to have more profit. What does that do for the country? If there is more profit of course there is more disposable income that can be spent on other goods and services. That is basic economics, economics 101.

Even though cultural product is difficult to define, I do not buy the argument that just because it is a cultural product we can throw the economic arguments out the window. They apply in every other sector and they certainly apply in the area of culture.

I encourage my friends across the way to remember that although culture is important we cannot go around suggesting that it runs by a different set of economics. That is not the case at all.

I have pointed out with respect to other Canadian cultural industries that given a chance they will prosper. They do not need government intervention. They do not need government protection. We see it over and over again, certainly in the cultural industries but in other industries as well.

It is a very arbitrary move to go back, to pick out SI in particular and to say it is not allowed to do that. Even going beyond that I would say it is time we truly had free trade in the country and truly applied it to the cultural sector. Canadians would take advantage and turn the tables on the Americans and the rest of the world because we have a superior product. We have the best artists, the best actors and the best writers in the world. They could do battle with any country in the world and not only compete but win.

I am asking the House to adopt the measure and ultimately defeat Bill C–103.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on the last of the amendments proposed by the third party through the work done by the member for Medicine Hat.

• (1535)

The issue of split runs that we are talking about is very important to the country and, as I said earlier in the debate, has a historical context. One has to go back to the O'Leary royal commission in the early sixties and be familiar with the work of Senator Keith Davey. A decade later we dealt with the newspaper industry. Canada has constantly had to go back to look at the vehicles it should be using to promote its own culture.

This will not be an exclusionary role. This will not push away other meaningful cultures. We are very involved, for example, with the American culture. They are our best neighbours, as they have shown in recent weeks, and perhaps our most important ally in the world. It will also put into context that which we have to do within Canada to promote Canadian culture.

In so doing we try to make sure people from around the world feel welcome in our markets. If they have products they would like to distribute in the Canadian market, whether it be films, television, magazines or books, they are readily available to all Canadians.

In my former life I was an academic. Nobody more than somebody trained as an academic can feel the pressure of censorship, the pressure of not having access to information to make sure they can contribute to the dialogue in their disciplines, in the public and with our students. It is essential to have access to information that no one else has filtered.

The approach of the government is not in any way, shape or form to prohibit access to materials of benefit to Canadian sports fans. I know the Speaker has probably picked up an occasional Sports Illustrated. I have looked at the New Yorker cartoons to pass the time on a flight back to Winnipeg. These things we love to do and would love to share with other countries.

The Canadian magazine industry has been a particularly vulnerable and difficult industry. We are proud of the way it has responded to measures in the past 30 years and we hope it will continue to do so.

The cornerstone of our current policy as embodied in Bill C–103 is not the work of a group of officials working secretly in a department or of an industry led group trying to push through some protectionist measures. Rather it is a function as a result of the work done by a task force set up in 1993 by another government to deal with the issue posed by a Canadian edition of Sports Illustrated.

In chapter VII the task force talks about a renewed framework of support. Because this report is pivotal to our understanding of what we are trying to do, I thought I would take some time in the House to read some key paragraphs into the record so that we all understand why the government is proposing what it is proposing. In part it states:

> Free speech would lose much of its potency if there were no Canadian magazines. Without the means to express a distinctive voice speaking to a Canadian audience, cultural expression, social cohesion and a sense of national destiny would be impaired, if not irrevocably damaged.
> As part of their heritage, Canadians are doubly fortunate to have unparalleled access to publications from around the world. It is the task force's desire to maintain this freedom of choice, and the measures it is proposing do nothing to deny Canadians the right to purchase the magazines of their choice. We cannot make our borders impenetrable even if we wanted to, which we decidedly do not.
> The object of the task force recommendations is not to discourage readership of foreign magazines, but to maintain an environment in which Canadian magazines can grow and prosper in Canada alongside imported magazines. This is a high–wire balancing act that the task force is attempting to accomplish.
> The measures we are recommending are consistent with the broad principles of the cultural and media policies of successive federal governments since the 1930s. These policies have been developed in response to the fact that the cultural industries in this country—film, television, sound recordings, books and magazines—are largely dominated by foreign products.
> If left to market forces alone, a day could arrive when Canadians would no longer enjoy the choice that they have today between foreign cultural products and those developed for the Canadian market. There simply would be no Canadian product because of the relatively small size and the vulnerability of our cultural industries.

These are words of warning from a group that has spent a long time looking at the issue. It goes on to state:

> The Government of Canada has adopted a variety of policies and measures to strengthen the viability of Canadian cultural producers: it promotes, for example, Canadian ownership and content in the broadcast media; it requires the review of investment by foreigners in businesses relating to Canada's cultural heritage and national identity; and it encourages Canadian ownership and original content in the newspaper and magazine industries.
> The recommendations of the task force follow in this tradition, while at the same time seeking to ensure that Canada's rights and obligations under international trading arrangements, such as the GATT, the FTA and the NAFTA, are respected. We have also been careful to ensure that the measures we are proposing represent a proportionate response to the problems being faced by Canadian magazines, which have been outlined in detail in the body of this report. We are convinced that what is being proposed interferes as little as possible with freedom of expression or choice. Indeed, in the final analysis, we are seeking to expand choice by ensuring the continued availability of magazines with original content.

Later it concludes with the following:

> Although favouring the development of original editorial content, regardless of country of origin, goes beyond the narrower focus of promoting only content of Canadian origin, the task force is of the view that, on balance, it is better to aim wide and comply with trade obligations by promoting original content than to target a narrow field and end up in protracted disputes with Canada's principal trading partners by promoting Canadian content alone. In other words, although it is quite obvious that the task force is concerned with the survival of magazines expressing a Canadian perspective and view of the world, it believes that the best way to achieve that objective is to promote original content, regardless of country of origin.

By promoting magazines with original content, we will meet the objectives and at the same time meet Canada's international trade obligations.

In conclusion I will spend a minute on the specifics of the motion proposed by the member for Medicine Hat on behalf of the Reform Party. Motion No. 4 would allow split run periodicals distributed in Canada to be exempted from the split run tax based on the number of split run issues distributed in Canada during the 12–month period prior to the day the bill receives royal assent. The motion would therefore fundamentally alter the limited grandfathering treatment of split run periodicals distributed in Canada that is proposed in the bill and is therefore inconsistent with the vote of the House to adopt the ways and means motion and the approval in principle given to the bill by the House at second reading.

The motion ignores the fact that on two occasions in 1993 the government clearly warned magazine publishers that should they decide during the work of the task force on the Canadian magazine industry to undertake any new publishing activity that would contravene or sidestep the government's policy objectives for the magazine industry, they would be doing so at their own risk. The motion would also send the wrong signal in that it would reward magazine publishers whose actions, while not directly contravening tariff code 9958, offend the spirit of the legislation. For this reason the government opposes the motion.

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Motion No. 4 deletes the cut off date which qualifies Sports Illustrated from issuing split run decisions in Canada but allows others like Reader's Digest to continue. It is ironic that the government is bringing in legislation to cut off Sports Illustrated but it is going to let Readers Digest continue with the same thing. Obviously Sports Illustrated is being unfairly targeted.

Changing the date of the grandfathering provision allows Sports Illustrated to escape the provisions of the bill and averts the trade war that could result if Sports Illustrated is suddenly prevented from issuing split run editions.

It is true that Canadian culture was exempted under NAFTA's trade rules, but the Americans did retain the right to retaliate in kind if they so wished. The government believes that the Americans cannot and will not do that because the bill uses a roundabout way to protect Canadian periodicals. I think the government is wrong. Americans can make life very miserable for Canadian exporters in all kinds of ways and we may see that retaliation. They can do that whether it is justified or not, but in this case they definitely have the right to retaliate. Some other industry is going to bear the brunt of this ill conceived policy.

This bill should raise a red flag for the government. Even if the government does not have problems with the idea of this bill, it should at least recognize it as a provocation for a trade dispute and realize that the timing is all wrong. All we need is to get hit in another industry with retaliation because of what is happening with this ill conceived bill.

I support my colleague's amendment.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to take part in this report stage debate.

Bill C–103 is one element in the longstanding policy supported by various governments in Ottawa. Governments long ago recognized the importance of the Canadian magazine industry and the affirmation of the Canadian personality. Allow me to take this opportunity to describe the background of the various measures put forward by the Canadian government in an effort to support the development of this major sector of our cultural industries.

The Canadian government has been concerned about the status and survival of the Canadian magazine industry almost since the beginning of the 20th century. Government's original concern was simply to ensure that Canadians had access to periodicals from around the world. It was a question of communication, in other words, the possibility for Canadians to have reasonable access to periodicals wherever they live.

Another major concern of the government, editorial content, came later. Initially, the aim of federal policy was to give Canadians an opportunity to enjoy and appreciate the arts, so the Canada Council was founded in 1957.

The emphasis was on the quality and quantity of the cultural product in Canada. There was no specific attempt to find out whether Canadian interests were involved in the creation or production of this product. There was no concern for culture in the broader sense, only for the arts. Since 1957, the Canada Council has supported periodicals of an artistic or scientific nature with subsidies, modest though they may be.

A third concern arose sometime before the Canada Council was created and has become increasingly important in the past 30 years. I am referring to the issue of Canadian content and Canadian cultural identity in the broader sense.

[English]

While we were concerned with promoting Canadian ownership and content, we realized that we must not close the door to foreign periodicals. We simply must prevent them from gaining too many advantages on the periodicals market in terms of economic advantages arising from intensive production, distribution, access to capital, or a well established reputation among Canadian readers. The key to this policy is advertising and postal distribution.

Thanks to legislative measures implemented progressively pursuant to the recommendations of the 1961 Royal Commission on Publications, commonly known as the O'Leary commission, and the 1970 Special Senate Committee on Mass Media, magazines printed in other countries were prevented from entering Canada when they contained advertising directed specifically at the Canadian market. Canadian advertisers were thus encouraged to place ads in Canadian magazines.

I would like to elaborate on the role played by the O'Leary commission in identifying measures to promote the development of the Canadian periodical industry. In 1961, only 25 per cent of the magazines distributed in Canada were Canadian. It became imperative for the Canadian government to do something about this situation. This led to the appointment of the Royal Commission of Inquiry on Publications.

Following a long series of hearings and extensive research, the commission was able to assemble all the elements it needed to establish the status of the Canadian periodical industry in the early sixties. It was clear that the industry was facing serious problems and that the government had to act. Members of the commission found that between the two sole sources of magazine revenue, circulation and advertising, there was a durable and mutually beneficial symbiosis which they defined as follows, and I quote:

"Behind all this is an important spiralling action, fundamental to periodical publishing; the larger a periodical's circulation, the more advertising it can attract; the greater its advertising revenue, the more it can afford to spend on editorial content; the more it can spend on editorial content, the better its chances of obtaining more circulation."

It became clear that advertising revenue was essential to the Canadian periodical industry. Consequently, the government decided to do what was necessary to channel Canadian advertising revenue to Canadian periodicals. The development of a policy for this purpose was instrumental in creating a strong financial basis for the industry.

Section 19 of the Income Tax Act was adopted in 1965 and became one of the main tools for implementing the federal government's policy on magazine publishing. According to this section, only purchases of advertising aimed at the Canadian market and inserted in Canadian periodicals were tax deductible. This section also provided that to be eligible for the tax deduction, the taxpayer had to advertise in a magazine with at least 75 per cent Canadian ownership and a ratio of original editorial content of at least 80 per cent.

[English]

Second, the members of the Royal Commission on Publications recommended that foreign periodicals containing advertising intended for the Canadian market should be denied entry. Customs tariff code 9958 was created in 1965 pursuant to this recommendation. Since these measures were implemented, Canadian magazines have multiplied and diversified.

In 1959, before the introduction of these two measures, Canadian magazines represented 23.3 per cent of the magazines distributed in Canada. The proportion rose to 29.9 per cent in 1971 and 39.4 per cent in 1981. In 1992 Canadian magazines represented 67.6 per cent of the magazines distributed in Canada.

These mechanisms must now be updated in response to the advent of new technology in recent years. The electronic transmission of proof pages produced in other countries for printing and distribution in Canada was not envisaged when these policy instruments were designed in 1965.

The need to modernize government structural measures became particularly clear in January 1993 when Time Warner officially announced its intention to publish Sports Illustrated in Canada. In an effort to avoid the application of tariff code 9958, Time Warner chose to print Sports Illustrated in Canada using editorial material transmitted electronically from the United States. This situation demonstrated the existence of a loophole in our structural measures and the urgent need to update the Canadian policy on magazine publishing.

On March 26, 1993, the government announced the creation of a task force responsible for reviewing the various issues affecting the Canadian magazine industry, including its trends and evolution, the Canadian advertising market, the impact of technological progress, the international aspects, the regulations, and the effectiveness of current policy implementation measures.

The government wanted to ensure that the measures taken to promote the development of this industry were up to date and effective. These measures included Customs Tariff Code 9958 and section 19 of the Income Tax Act mentioned earlier.

Barely two weeks after announcing the creation of the task force, the government said that this task force on the Canadian magazine industry would have two joint chairmen and would be composed of volunteer experts representing Canadian magazine publishers, advertisers, consumers and the legal community.

The joint chairmen of the task force on the Canadian magazine industry, Patrick O'Callaghan, journalist and former editor at Southam Press, and Roger Tassé, former deputy minister of justice, carried out their mandate with the help of a group of seven volunteer consultants representing all regions of the country. They came from the advertising industry, consumer associations and the Canadian magazine industry; some even had some experience in international trade.

This review of the measures in place to help the Canadian magazine industry was aimed at proposing other measures that would enable the government to meet its political objective of making Canadian information and ideas accessible to Canadians through truly Canadian magazines.

[English]

In March 1994 when the task force on the Canadian magazine industry submitted its final report, the government again acknowledged the valuable contribution the Canadian magazine industry makes to our economy, our culture and our heritage. On December 22, 1994 the government announced its response to the recommendations contained in the final report of the task force on the Canadian magazine industry. The government indicated then that it would address all of the task force's recommendations, including the recommendation for a new excise tax on all split run magazines containing advertising directed at Canadians.

The government then stated that an excise tax would be imposed on each copy of a split run edition at the rate of 80 per cent of the value of all the advertisements contained in the edition. Periodicals that would otherwise be subject to the tax are exempted from the tax based on the number of split run editions that were distributed in Canada before March 26, 1993, when the creation of the task force was announced.

Finally, this bill demonstrates the federal government's continued commitment to promote the growth of a Canadian magazine industry that is viable, original and dynamic.

[English]

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on Bill C–103.

Bill C–103 will play a major role in maintaining a vibrant and flourishing Canadian magazine industry. I would like to present the House with the broader perspective of the government's ongoing commitment to this industry. This bill should be understood in the context of the long established tradition of government support to the Canadian magazine industry as well as the industry's contribution to the economy.

Most important, in a country where natural geography makes communications difficult, magazines play a key unifying role. Canadian periodicals are an essential medium of cultural expression for Canadians. They serve as channels for conveying Canadian ideas, information and values. They are an integral part of the process whereby Canadians define themselves as a nation. Moreover, beyond the direct social and cultural impact of the Canadian magazine industry there are sizeable indirect effects which contribute to the smooth functioning of the Canadian economy.

Canadian publications, both consumer and business, inform, educate and entertain but they also are an important advertising vehicle for Canadian products and services. While it is true there are other mass media which can reach consumers, the Canadian trade press fills a unique role in the economy by providing an affordable marketing tool for Canadian business and industrial suppliers.

These producers and services often face stiff competition from foreign companies which reach Canadian customers through spill–over advertising in American trade periodicals. In the absence of an active Canadian trade press reaching Canadian customers, an important segment of our economy would be left without a major communications and advertising vehicle.

Unfortunately Canadian magazines are confronted with a series of unique challenges: massive penetration of the Canadian market by imported magazines; the relatively small size of the Canadian population and its dispersion over a vast territory; the openness of Canadians to foreign cultural products; the effect of cover prices of imported magazines on the Canadian price structure; the impact of overflow advertising on the potential advertising market in Canada.

Even if the magazine industry has flourished culturally with over 1,300 titles, its financial position is fragile, with overall pretax profits of less than 6 per cent on revenues of $795 million in 1993–94.

In my opening remarks I mentioned the Canadian government has supported the domestic magazine industry and will continue to do so for many reasons. The principal reason is the importance Canadians place on having a means of expressing their unique identity and the difficult and challenging environment which the Canadian magazine industry faces.

The need for structural measures of support for the Canadian magazine industry has long been recognized by successive Canadian governments. Over the years a number of policy and program instruments have been designed and put into place which help to ensure the development of the Canadian magazine industry while not restricting the sale of imported periodicals in Canada.

Among them, the publications distribution assistance program, better known as the postal subsidy program, is one of the earliest nation building programs. It is designed to unify a country where natural geography makes communication difficult. Its main objectives are to support Canadian cultural identity and sovereignty, to ensure affordable access to subscriptions for Canadian periodicals and to provide stability in the level of distribution costs for Canadian periodicals in order to permit publishers to develop and implement long term business plans.

Canadian consumer magazines have limited access to Canadian news stands. Less than one–quarter of Canadian magazine circulation revenue is derived from news stand sales. As a result, the industry relies on subscriptions to reach its audience. The postal subsidy, which finances concessionary postal rates for Canadian magazines, has been an important instrument in helping the industry to reach its market.

In 1989 this program was subjected to a cut of 50 per cent, from $220 million to $110 million, as part of a larger government–wide exercise to reduce public expenditures. I am pleased to say that in developing a plan for the implementation of the cut, a decision was made to focus support on subscriber paid periodicals versus non–paid or free publications. Furthermore, it was believed that periodicals, which typically have a national or regional focus and rely exclusively on mail distribution, should take priority over local publications which have alternative means of distribution.

As a result, the most vulnerable component of the industry was protected then and also more recently when the government had to reduce once again the amount of available funding. For the past two years we have limited the increase of the subsidized rates to 5 per cent a year. Therefore the postal program still enables Canadian magazines to reach rural or remote readers at a reasonable cost.

Fiscal measures provide another useful tool to support the magazine publishing industry without investing a considerable amount of money. Two fiscal measures encourage Canadian advertisers to use Canadian magazines to reach Canadian readers. The first measure, section 19 of the Income Tax Act, has been in place since 1965. For advertisements aimed directly at the Canadian market section 19 limits tax deductions of advertising expenditures to advertisements placed in Canadian magazines. A Canadian magazine is defined as one which is 75 per cent Canadian owned and controlled and whose editorial content is 80 per cent different from the editorial content of any other periodical.

The second measure is customs tariff code 9958. Tariff code 9958 prohibits the physical importation into Canada of split runs or special editions of periodicals whose editorial content is substantially the same as the original edition except for the advertising which has been purchased especially to reach a Canadian audience.

Until recently the tariff code dissuaded offshore magazines from soliciting advertising in the Canadian market. Moreover, it succeeded in doing so through voluntary compliance. These fiscal measures were put in place to ensure that the Canadian magazine industry had access to Canadian advertising revenues. There is no evidence that our current policy has made the Canadian industry any less efficient or less profit conscious than its foreign counterparts.

Financial support is provided to a number of cultural and scholarly publications through the Canada Council, the Social Science and Humanities Research Council and through a modest distribution program administered directly by the Department of Canadian Heritage.

Another initiative is the cultural industries development fund which was established in 1990 with a budget allocation of $33 million. Its mandate is to provide Canadian owned and controlled firms within the cultural industries with a range of flexible financing services with an emphasis on investment loans.

The CIDF was created in order to make loan money available to Canadian owned and Canadian controlled cultural firms to compensate for the shortage of capital available to Canadian cultural businesses and to improve their financial situation, the intention being that these firms will achieve a sound financial base through the fund and thereby be eligible at some later date for conventional bank financing. The fund was established to reinforce and stimulate the growth of Canadian cultural enterprises which have proven to be dynamic and which have demonstrated their ability to improve their competitive position in the marketplace.

The magazine industry is an active user of the cultural industries development fund, having set up a travelling consultant program in addition to accessing loans through the fund.

The reluctance on the part of financial institutions to create a new financing instrument, the degree of risk involved and the perceived low earning potential of the magazine industry justify the government's establishment of mechanisms such as the CIDF. With more than 20 per cent of the loans awarded and a repayment rate of more than 90 per cent, the magazine industry has demonstrated its professionalism and its managerial expertise.

We can conclude that all of these federal measures have served the industry well. However, with the arrival of the new technological contribution to an increasingly competitive marketplace Canadian businesses must adapt to those market changes and secure and invest new capital in order to bring themselves up to date with modern technology. It is the government's role to review its initiatives and to make sure they still correspond to the new market realities.

Technology has progressed far beyond what could have been foreseen in 1965 when the tariff code 9958 was introduced as a measure of the government's support for the Canadian periodical industry. New technological developments have changed the dynamics of the publication industry. For example, it is now possible to transmit information electronically. Thus it is now possible to bypass international borders and circumvent tariff code 9958.

The proposed amendments to the Excise Tax Act will contribute to maintaining the integrity of Canada's longstanding policy on split runs. The proposed amendment to the Income Tax Act will add an anti–avoidance rule to section 19 of the act. The purpose of this provision is to ensure that newspapers and periodicals that claim to be Canadian are Canadian owned and controlled for the purposes of the act.

The Canadian government has been consistent. Its magazine policy has not changed. What the federal government is doing with these amendments to the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act is modernizing its policy instruments. In this way the entire range of government policy and program instruments can better achieve the overall objective of a vital and flourishing Canadian magazine industry.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take part in this debate today because Bill C–103 is one of the many measures the government has over time designed to assist in the development of Canada's cultural industries.

It is very important that we ensure Canada's cultural industries develop to their fullest. This is an area I have had a great deal of interest in since I became a member of Parliament seven years ago.

In the last Parliament as deputy critic for Canadian culture, I sat on the relevant committee and worked with the hon. member for Mount Royal, now the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and Status of Women, in these areas and with other members on a number of reports that talked about safeguarding our cultural industries.

It is interesting to note with our colleagues from the Bloc today that whatever our differences may be, all Canadians within and outside Quebec, agree that with our linguistic, regional and geographic differences it is very important that our very special culture in French and English be protected and that our federal government do everything possible to protect that culture.

Public policy for cultural industries has always operated on two premises. The first is that cultural products are important as a transmitter of social identity. The second is that it is difficult for the Canadian market to generate economically viable cultural enterprises.

Nobody knows this better than I. I once said I was going to have a sign made that said "pariah: do not appoint to arts boards". In my small region of Atlantic Canada I have served over the years on practically every arts endeavour and cultural endeavour that has gone belly up because we did not have the people or the money to keep it going.

It is terribly important that the federal government take a hand and ensure cultural industries do not die aborning because of regional disparity, small population, small markets, et cetera.

Policy is focused on supplementing the domestic markets' internal capacity to generate revenues with financial and institutional tools. These tools are an attempt to ensure a minimum choice of indigenous cultural works alongside the overwhelming presence of foreign ones.

In the area of magazine selection, in any store that sells periodicals and magazines Canadian periodicals are overwhelmed by sheer numbers of those that come from our neighbour to the south. It is a fine statement that they are not overwhelmed in content or in standard but merely in numbers.

As our cultural enterprises matured and in many cases became more self–sufficient, the government developed and refined the legislative and regulatory framework, the third set of tools within which these enterprises could further prosper and compete at home and abroad.

The challenge for all of us is for government to monitor and review its policies and make amendments or realignments when these are required. Today clearly, as the explosion of technology takes place all around us here in Canada and around the world, characteristics that define the current environment are challenges that confront our cultural sector.

First, the removal of international barriers to trade generates increased competition in production and distribution of cultural goods and services and global markets.

Second, the vertical and horizontal integration of conglomerates operating on a world scale is having a profound impact on the content of cultural products made available to consumers.

• (1615)

Third, the convergence between information transmitters and the producers of the content they transmit is leading to an explosion of new types of goods and services available to a an ever increasing number of consumers.

Take the first challenge as an example, the removal of trade barriers and increased international competition. In this area the impact cannot be underestimated. Access to production and distribution networks is paradoxically becoming both easier and more challenging at the same time.

Technological innovation has rendered electronic distribution of content available to increasing number of creators but the costs associated with marketing, promotion and distribution both in domestic and international markets challenged the ability of creators to exploit their new market potential. We cannot underestimate the impact of such issues as control over technology, control over access to distribution networks and the capacity of governments to regulate the flow into domestic markets of cultural products distributed electronically from abroad. Most of us are fully aware of this in our own homes on a daily basis.

Sports Illustrated Canada is a case in point. I am sorry my hon. colleague from Prince Edward Island cannot agree with me on this. We talked about Sports Illustrated a few minutes ago. For almost 30 years the policy tool designed to regulate the importation of magazines containing advertising aimed at Canadians worked well but it is technologically specific in that it addresses the physical importation of foreign magazines today. Sports Illustrated is not physically imported but beamed across the border to a printing plant in Ontario.

Our cultural sector has reached a level of economic maturity that will allow it to compete in domestic and international markets but only if it can operate within a legislative and regulatory framework that will encourage its continued development. That is why we have Bill C–103.

The government has reached the point at which it has to update its policy for the magazine industry because of such developments as the beaming of Sports Illustrated to a printing plant in Ontario. It is a logical evolution in our policy instruments and it is a necessity to protect our investment in cultural industry.

The bill demonstrates the federal government's continued commitment to the development of the Canadian magazine industry which is viable, original and dynamic.

Since 1965 there have been two legislative measures in place, section 19 of the Income Tax Act and customs tariff code 9958. The objective of both measures was to ensure an adequate flow of advertising revenues to support a vibrant Canadian periodical industry. We need to make sure Canadians have the opportunity to read their own magazines at home, to reflect upon the ideas that are home grown and home developed in this country, to ensure our culture remains strong, our sense of Canadianism and Canadian identity remains viable.

Until the Sports Illustrated case, the instruments put in place by the federal government were not as successful. However, we have a loophole that needs to be plugged. This loophole has been exploited by Sports Illustrated over the last two years. Tariff code 9958 applies only in cases in which split run editions are physically imported into Canada. As I mentioned before, Sports Illustrated got around this by electronically beaming the magazine to a Canadian printing plant.

I suppose this is a case in which the letter of the law may have been upheld but the spirit of the law was being violated. Fortunately the federal government has made a concerted effort and come forward with these amendments to change the situation so that Sports Illustrated can no longer circumvent the true spirit as well as the letter of the law.

The amendments to the Excise Tax Act take into consideration that the task force on the Excise Tax Act issued its final report in March. Its main recommendation was that excise taxes be imposed on split run editions and periodicals. The tax is designed to encourage original editorial content in magazines containing advertisements primarily directed at Canadians. It will impose a tax of 80 per cent of the value of all advertisements contained in split run editions of magazines circulating in Canada. That encourages Canadian advertisers to place advertisements in magazines which have original content. It reiterates the government's longstanding policy objectives in a manner consistent with our international trade obligations.

The amendment to the Income Tax Act will add an anti–avoidance rule. The purpose of the anti–avoidance rule is to ensure newspapers and periodicals that profess to be Canadian are controlled by Canadians.

Canadians throughout history have formed their own identity, that mosaic unique to this land and its people. In their periodic re–examination of cultural policies, Canadians are continually discovering and defining what Robertson Davies has called our national soul.

In the past couple of days our national soul has gone through quite an experiment but has come through and come out the other side. As we stand here today reaching out to each other and remembering what a joy and a benefit it is to be a Canadian, I am proud that our government is doing the nuts and bolts with the emotions to make that possible.

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–103 is a cultural policy measure designed to assist in the development of the Canadian magazine industry. It is one of many federal government's efforts to foster conditions under which Canada's artists and creators can continue to express themselves and give Canadians and the world a sense of our identity as a country, an identity which has been enhanced by the events of the past week.

By culture I mean the creators, producers and distributors of films and videos, books and magazines as well as broadcasting, the performing and visual arts, design and the vast array of heritage institutions across the country.

While I use the term cultural policy in the singular, Canada does not have a single policy respecting culture. Rather, a series of policy directions has been pursued by federal governments throughout time. In this sense cultural policy has been wrought by governments of the past and present based on a rationale which has remained relevant since the beginning.

The rationale for the state's involvement in the cultural sector in Canada is important to understand because it is more valid today than it was in the 1920s when it was for the very first time expressed. This rationale is made up of essentially two philosophies.

The first is that a cultural product that is a work of artistic expression in any form is a good that cannot be treated in the same fashion a hammer, a nail or a widget. Why? Because a cultural product, unlike a widget or a gismo, transmits a set of values rooted in the society in which the artist who created it lives. The product of an artist's expression often acts as a mirror into which society can look for greater understanding of its sense of identity as an organized social group. It allows a society to distinguish itself from others on the planet. It defines and transmits that identity which is unique.

Canada and most other industrialized countries have actively pursued some form of cultural policy which seeks to encourage our own native cultural expression.

The number and range of magazines reflect the concerns and tastes of Canadians. All regions and most large metropolitan areas boast their own magazines. There is a Canadian periodical to serve almost every interest group, economic, professional, artistic, educational, religious or recreational.

Magazines let their readers see behind the scenes of business and politics. They increase national understanding of regional issues and translate national issues into meaningful regional terms. They exalt Canadian accomplishments, profile the great and the small, as well as Canadians who at home and abroad make a difference in our everyday lives.

The second premise on which state involvement in the cultural sector in Canada is based is that in order to produce cultural works, a domestic market of a size that will allow costs to be recouped is a requirement.

The Canadian market, split along language and regionally fragmented, has never been large enough to sustain on its own a healthy cultural industry sector. This has been made more difficult by the overwhelming presence of foreign cultural product, first British and French and then American in our domestic markets. Hence early on Canadian public policy focused on supplementing the domestic market's internal capacity to generate revenues with the financial and institutional tools required to ensure minimum choice of Canadian cultural works alongside the overwhelming presence of foreign ones.

These two premises, the intrinsic merit of a cultural product in transmitting identity and the inability of the Canadian market to generate economically viable cultural enterprises, prompted the Government of Canada to develop policy tools to assist the cultural industries.

The tax measure we have before us today updates a longstanding policy of successive governments which recognizes the unique circumstances faced by Canadian magazines.

The policy implemented in 1965 introduced two measures to assist Canadian magazines in competing for advertising revenues, revenues which are essential to the industry's survival. These measures were section 19 of the Income Tax Act and tariff code 9958. Bill C–103 maintains this policy put in place over 30 years ago.

Tariff code 9958 restricts the importation of magazines containing advertisements directed at Canadians. It authorizes Canada Customs to stop the entry into Canada of the subsequent four issues of a magazine after the publication of an issue that has been deemed split run. Before this measure was introduced virtually all foreign magazines containing advertisements directed at Canadians would have been printed in the country of origin and imported into Canada for distribution.

The publication of Sports Illustrated Canada has sent a signal that it now is possible to contravene the spirit of tariff code 9958 by means of technology which was not in existence when the code was implemented.

Sports Illustrated Canada is a split run edition printed in Canada using text that is electronically transmitted from the USA. The editorial content of Sports Illustrated Canada is to a large extent the same as the content in the U.S. editions but it contains advertisements that have been specifically purchased to reach a Canadian audience.

Tariff Code 9958 is not applicable to Sports Illustrated Canada because it is printed in Canada rather than being imported. This case illustrated the limitations of Canada's existing policy instruments designed to support the Canadian magazine industry.

Consequently a task force on the Canadian magazine industry was set up to examine the problem of split run editions and to recommend new ways to promote Canada's policy objectives for the magazine industry.

Concerning amendments to the Excise Tax Act, the task force issued its final report in March 1994. Its main recommendation was that an excise tax be imposed on split run editions of periodicals.

The tax is designed to encourage original editorial content in magazines containing advertisement directed primarily at Canadians. It will impose a tax of 80 per cent of the value of all of the advertisements contained in split run editions of magazines circulating in Canada.

• (1630)

This measure encourages Canadian advertisers to place advertisements in magazines which have original content. It underscores the government's longstanding policy objectives in a manner which is consistent with our international trade obligations.

Section 19 of the Income Tax Act allows deductions for advertising directed at the Canadian market, only if the advertising is placed in Canadian issues of Canadian owned and Canadian controlled magazines.

The amendment to the Income Tax Act will add an anti–avoidance rule to section 19. The purpose of the anti–avoidance rule is to ensure that newspapers and periodicals which profess to be Canadian are in fact controlled by Canadians.

In conclusion, the government is concerned with creating policies conducive to the growth of the cultural sector. Readers are essential for magazines to prosper. So too are the other major clients of a magazine, the businesses and organizations which advertise their products and services.

Access to Canadian advertising dollars is critical to ensure the economic viability and continued existence of the Canadian magazine industry. Advertising revenues support the cost of the editorial content and make it possible for the publisher to provide the magazine at rates the reader can afford. Therefore, we must not allow split run editions to siphon off Canadian advertising dollars. We must ensure the passage of Bill C–103.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity this afternoon to speak on Bill C–103. I believe I will be one of the last speakers on the bill.

This is a symbolic time to be dealing with Bill C–103.

[Translation]

In fact, the bill we are debating this afternoon deals with Canadian culture and ways of preserving it. I know that some members opposite—and I am directing my remarks to Reformers in particular today—have it that certain Canadian cultural industries for example do not need any additional protection.

[English]

I have spoken about this before in the House, both generally and more specifically. At a Canada–U.S. interparliamentary group meeting, a United States congressman indicated that the motion picture industry in Hollywood and elsewhere was a bit upset with Canadians because we had what they believed to be rather restrictive policies in that sector.

I believe it was the former hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, Patrick Nowlan, who responded to the congressman. He said: "How would you feel if in your country 97 per cent of all the films were produced in another country and you could watch television for a day or movies for a whole weekend and never once see a scene from your country? How long would you put up with it?" The congressman said: "I guess you have a point".

The measures we were using at that time were in reference to another cultural industry, but they made the same point which is the fact that immediately to the south of us is a cultural giant. It is not a matter of our saying that our cultural industries, magazine publishers and so on are not competitive. It has absolutely nothing to do with that. It has to do with being overwhelmed by the giant to the south of us.

My hon. colleague from the riding of Halton—Peel is an artist who has participated as an actor and performer in a number of productions. I do not say this disrespectfully, but the member for Halton—Peel surely knows a lot more about these kinds of issues than do many members of the Reform Party across the way. I am sure he would agree on the importance of protecting Canada's cultural industries.

I think there is something else, in the sense that some members of the Reform Party tend to give the impression that the cultural industry belongs exclusively to a kind of elite instead of belonging to everyone in our society. That is totally wrong. These people are trying to convey that idea, and I think that it does not reflect the Canadian reality.

Poetry, magazines, television programs, and music—how can I forget music—are all part of the Canadian culture, and in each of these areas there is a Canadian cultural industry, or at least a potential industry.

Today, we are debating this issue of periodicals, magazines published or produced in another country, electronically transmitted to Canada and duplicated in Canada in an attempt to circumvent Canadian legislation. Reformers say that cultural industries can do like other Canadian industries and operate without anything to protect them in case they have to compete with foreign products.

[English]

I see it this way. The members of the Reform Party are looking at the cultural industries as if we were strictly discussing a commercial product, in other words, whether or not someone can produce a hammer in Canada cheaper than in the United States. That is not the issue. South of the border there is such immense potential for news and for drawing advertising. There is absolutely no parallel in Canada. The economy of scale in those kinds of industries operate very differently from what they do in other areas of human endeavour.

Members across the way just will not hear that kind of a proposition. They should because if ever there was a time in the history of this country where we should all rally around those instruments of Canadian culture that could bind us together, surely it is today. Surely today of all days we should be reminding ourselves of the necessity for keeping those instruments which enhance, highlight and make people aware of that which makes us different from other nations and which makes us Canadian.

It could be books. We have a number of very good Canadian authors. There are a number of very good publishing houses in Canada, many of them small. As a colleague reminded us awhile ago, some of these small publishing companies have been assisted by what is commonly referred to as the postal subsidy. It has assisted small publishing companies in putting out very excellent works by Canadian authors. What is wrong with that? Why will members of the Reform Party not see that those things are important and especially important today of all days? They do not understand any of that.

Mr. Ramsay: We are not socialist.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have been called many things but not often have I been called a socialist. Reform Party cultural gurus across the way are now accusing me of being a socialist. I find it a little ironic, particularly in view of what has been said by Reform Party members in the past about Canadian cultural industries and how they should be promoted by the Government of Canada.

• (1640)

I have the little green book of the Reform Party. I am trying feverishly to find a page which refers to the Canadian cultural industries. Perhaps I will a little later.

Some people in the Reform Party are now saying that promoting Canadian culture is somehow tantamount to socialism, and they are repeating it now. I do not think it is a particularly nice thing to say about their leader. He said the same thing not long ago. I have it in the little green book. I will defend the leader of the Reform Party against those vicious attacks from the backbenchers any time. His backbenchers need to be reminded to be more respectful of the hon. member from Calgary, the leader of that party. The leader of the Reform Party needs all the help he can get. Shall we say he is in a pretty tough spot.

[Translation]

I would like this House to know that today, we should all support cultural initiatives, any initiative designed to promote Canadian culture. The Canadian book and magazine publishing industry is certainly one that deserves the support of this House.

[English]

Other countries are not at all shy about supporting their cultural industries. Anyone who has ever visited France and who has seen the amount of effort put into promoting and preserving heritage sites, promoting culture, promoting art and so on, would know a tremendous sector of that nation lives from that alone. That is not true of that country alone, although in terms of western societies it is probably the country with more in the way of art and promoting those fields of human endeavour than any other.

We could take other examples. I am told the largest museum in the world is in Russia, in St. Petersburg I believe. That country has a very different kind of regime, one opposite to the country I was talking about previously, but it also saw fit to protect some of its cultural goods and property.

The Smithsonian Institute is another example of that, certainly not located in a socialist country. It is located in a country that is very different.

I want to end with the following immortal words: "The Reform Party supports the responsibility of the state to promote, preserve and enhance the national culture. The state may assist and should encourage ethnic culture to integrate into the national culture". I do not know if I agree with that part but in any case that is the quotation from no less than the leader of the Reform Party, who has just been accused of being a socialist by his own backbenchers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

• (1645)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The question is on Motion No. 4. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): According to Standing Order 45, the whip has informed the House that the vote has been deferred until 5 p.m. this day.

MANGANESE BASED FUEL ADDITIVES ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances, as reported (without amendment) from the committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I would like to make you aware of a ruling by our Speaker on Bill C–94.

There are two motions in amendment standing on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances.

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 will be grouped for debate but voted on separately.

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–94, in Clause 9, be amended by replacing line 27, on page 3, with the following:

"(d) the use that is made or is to be made of it;".

That Bill C–94, in Clause 10, be amended by replacing line 45, on page 3 and lines 1 and 2, on page 4, with the following:

"of its completion, file a report".

He said Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to move an amendment this afternoon on Bill C–94.

According to the Order Paper, on the first amendment you will find that clause 9 of this bill will be amended by striking out line 27 on page 3 and substituting the following: "the use that is made or is to be of it".

The reason for this amendment is that the clause as originally drafted assumes the controlled substance was used within 30 days of the transaction, which may not always be the case. In certain cases this product could be put in stock until its future anticipated use. For that reason, I moved the amendment. I believe it is a good amendment and I hope we have concurrence on that.

On the second amendment, I would ask of this House if we could have unanimous consent because of the fact that the amendment on the Order Paper has been further amended. I would like to read that amendment at this time if I may. I wonder if we could have unanimous consent for this amendment to be changed.

The motion would read this way:

That clause 10 of Bill C–94 be amended by striking out line 45 on page 3 and lines 1 and 2 on page 4 and substituting the following: "of each transaction under the authorization, file a report".

• (1650)

The reporting requirement as it is in the draft is too lax to allow for effective monitoring by the minister. As an example, if we follow the current draft it could be as much as 12 to 14 months after the transaction that a report is filed with the minister. This would be much too long.

Mr. Vena from Environment Canada agreed with the suggested amendment. Ms. Fry from the Department of Justice also indicated there was no rationale for the section as drafted, other than that this was an arbitrary line–drawing. Therefore I feel the amendment as I have placed it today is in order and should be supported.

I would therefore seek unanimous consent of this House for the amendment I have just presented.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the terms of the intervention by the hon. member for Huron—Bruce. Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to make that substitution?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the government I will concur with the first motion made by the member for Huron—Bruce. The addition of the words he has suggested puts in a much clearer perspective the issue of the 30 days authorization.

In regard to the second amendment, it would have been the position of the government to refuse the amendment the way it was previously phrased. Now that it has been changed by making much more precise reference to each transaction authorized, we feel much more at ease with the amendment proposed by the hon. member.

To sum up, the government will concur with both the first amendment and also the revised second amendment. This is going to be our position.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words to the amendment put forward by the member for Huron—Bruce.

The member had the opportunity to sit through the committee stage of this bill and hear the various witnesses who came forward. Had the member actually been listening to what the majority of witnesses were saying during the committee, he would not have been bringing forward amendments at report stage. He perhaps would have been speaking to the minister directly and encouraging the minister to scrap the bill.

Apparently the member was not at every committee meeting and as a result has brought forward two amendments, both technical in nature. I am sure that in his mind they strengthen the scope of the bill. I ask whether Bill C–94 will be strengthened or improved by these so–called technical amendments. The member knows very well that really the only way to help this area of concern is to scrap the bill, rather than to amend it.

The first amendment makes a change to clause 9. In the clause there is a reference to the record of a controlled substance. In the interpretation section of the bill, controlled substance means a manganese–based substance that is mentioned in the schedule and includes any other substance that contains such a manganese–based substance.

We are made to believe with this bill and with the member's amendments that MMT is hazardous. The government members across the floor know full well this is not so. When they have the opportunity to vote for this bill at third reading, the final reading stage, they will not only be voting in favour of bad legislation, they will be saying to the Canadian people that the government can ban a substance even if there is no evidence that the substance is hazardous.

I will close by saying that I could speak for a long time on the disappointing aspects of the bill, but I know that should be kept for third reading and will do so.

The amendments proposed by the member for Huron—Bruce cannot be supported by the Reform Party. While they may change what can or cannot be done with a manganese based substance and when a report should be submitted to the minister, they do not address the fundamental question. Before a substance can be banned should it not go through a process of independent scientific review?

The bill cannot be improved by one or two amendments. The bill needs to be reworked from scratch if it is to have any credibility in both the industrial sector as well as the environmental sector. Good legislation would propose a predictable process for any substance, not just MMT.

The minister failed and the bill will ultimately be her legacy of another administrative blunder.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to speak to the bill and to the amendment just briefly.

I could not help but notice during the last few minutes some of the comments across the way that delved into the political garbage bucket as the hon. whip for the party opposite often does. I do not want to hold up the bill because we are on record as explaining why the bill is poorly designed. It is without scientific rationale. It is a knee–jerk reaction in support of friends of the Liberal Party. That has already been well documented.

I repeat for the record that today's activities again are an example of how the party opposite does not have any kind of political agenda or legislative agenda that Canadians and Quebecers can grasp on to with enthusiasm. This is more time filling, political time wasting on behalf of a government that seems bereft of any new ideas. Its idea of change is that it is already doing it. It just does not cut.

The bill should not pass. The amendment does not address the problems within the bill. Decisions should not be made in Canada based on what we felt like when we got up in the morning. There should be some scientific facts behind them.

The government quotes studies and tests. On and on it goes. It will not submit in the House the tests it quotes from. The reason it cannot ban MMT is that the health department says it is not a hazard. The reason it cannot be banned outright is that there is no scientific reason for it. All the government can do is prevent its interprovincial trade and prevent its importation at a time when the United States of America will go ahead. The court has approved its use in the United States.

It is a shame the government cannot come up with some better idea or legislative agenda that would address the issues of importance to Canadians instead of the time fillers we have been dealing with today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The first question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will play say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

(Motion No. 2 agreed to.)

The Speaker: I declare Motion No. 3 lost.

The next question is on Motion No. 4.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if you were to seek it, I think you would find that the House agrees to apply the result of the division on Motion No. 1 of Bill C–61, at report stage, to Motions Nos. 4, 23, 21 and 22.

Again, the result of the division on Motion No. 1 would apply to Motions 4, 23, 21 and 22.

[English]

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Wayne: Mr. Speaker, I will be voting nay on Motion No. 4. I will be voting in favour of Motions Nos. 21, 22 and 23.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata was not here at the beginning. How will she vote?

Mrs. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I vote with the Bloc Quebecois.

[English]

The Speaker: The hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence was not here for the first vote. How will the member vote?

Mr. Volpe: I will vote with the government side with no equivocation.

The Speaker: So ordered.

(The House divided on the Motion No. 4, which was negatived on the following division:)

That, in the opinion of this House, all private members' bills that have passed second reading during the first session of the 35th Parliament and are presently at committee or report and the third reading stage should stand for the second session of the 35th Parliament.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Lethbridge is not present to move the order as announced in today's Notice Paper. Accordingly, the motion will be dropped from the Order Paper pursuant to Standing Order 42(1).

It being 5.55 p.m. the House stands adjourned until tomorrow, wonderful Wednesday, at 2 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Monday's events in Quebec showed us that in fact the glass is half full.

During the past few weeks we have witnessed an outpouring of emotion from Canadians across the country who went from passive observation to active participation in the affairs of their country.

We should all be struck by the depth of their feelings and their willingness and openness to change. This will is generous and the challenge for Parliament is to facilitate the development of this expression of commitment to Canada. As parliamentarians we must strive to nurture and encourage Canadians who want to be involved in the process of reshaping Canada.

Canadians need to be thanked for their willingness and openness to change. They must be valued and implicated in the process of redefining their country.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during the past two years we have sat in this House with members of the Bloc Quebecois who have made no secret of their agenda. While we profoundly disagreed with it, I treated these members with respect, and I must add, they treated me with respect. Such is the nature of democracy.

I was absolutely shocked by Mr. Parizeau's comments on referendum night and those of Mr. Bouchard a few weeks ago. The leaders of the separatist movement should be more concerned with equality within and outside Quebec and not the ethnic origin of the voting public.

That Mr. Parizeau has now resigned does not alter what he said. Nowhere has he apologized for his remarks. He has resigned and that is good, but even his resignation is clouded in duplicity.

In the days ahead one hopes the vast majority of Quebecers will distance themselves from Parizeau's and Bouchard's narrow view of Quebec's position and—

The Speaker: I would remind all hon. members that while we are members in this House we should address each other by our ridings and not by our names.

DAVID MCINTOSH

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I bring to the attention of the House the passing of a notable Canadian journalist and author, Dave McIntosh.

Mr. McIntosh served valiantly in World War II as a bomber navigator, winning the Distinguished Flying Cross. In 1946 he joined Canadian Press where, for the next quarter century, he earned a reputation as a remorselessly inquiring and rigorously honest journalist. He was a well–respected authority on defence matters and a delightfully mischievous reporter of Ottawa's and Parliament's foibles.

The Parliamentary Press Gallery honoured Mr. McIntosh when it named him an honorary life member as he left journalism. He published a number of books, including a lighthearted but chillingly honest account of his war service Terror in the Starboard Seat as well as a highly amusing collection of his governmental anecdotes Ottawa Unbuttoned.

We join his wife, Jean, his children, his grandchildren and his many friends in mourning the passing of an outstanding Canadian.

QUEBEC PREMIER

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the member for Pierrefonds—Dollard, a Quebec riding that is representative of the Canadian mosaic—its composition being 30 per cent allophone from a total of 52 different ethnic groups, 40 per cent anglophone, and 30 per cent francophone—not only was I shocked by the deliberately chosen and well thought out words of the Premier of Quebec concerning who was responsible for the defeat of the referendum, but I was also offended by his refusal to retract his words.

This attitude must be vigorously condemned, for Quebec, like Canada, offers a warm welcome to all of the world's citizens. The Premier of Quebec's words are a serious matter, having been spoken after careful consideration by a first minister, but I wish to reassure my colleagues in this House and the people of Canada that they are far from representing reality. Quebecers of all origins are proud people, and newcomers from anywhere in the world will always find an open door in Quebec.

THE SENATE

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the recent referendum the Quebec electorate set off an alarm. People in Quebec and indeed all of Canada demand change to the Canadian federation that does not involve constitutional wrangling.

The Prime Minister's outdated, outmoded, traditional political practices of stuffing the Senate with patronage appointments is unacceptable. He must begin a transition to a new Senate which would be effective, elected and equal. And the first non–constitutional step to validate that place is to elect members to the upper house.

The Reform Party demands changes based on the model of the 1989 Alberta senatorial selection act which allowed the election of the late Senator Stan Waters.

The referendum has issued a wake–up call to the federal government. The Reform Party stands as the only federal party with answers to that wake–up call. Canadians note that while the alarm has gone off, the Prime Minister continues to hit the snooze button.

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to thank all those Canadians who travelled to the no rally in Quebec this past weekend, particularly those from my riding of St. John's West.

My office has been overwhelmed with letters of support expressing kind regards to all Quebecois and a hope that Quebec will remain within Canada.

I would like to read an excerpt from one of the letters that was written to me by a woman from Argentia in my riding which expressed her feelings on returning from the no rally in Montreal:

> Dear Jean:
> I have never felt more Canadian than when we arrived in Montreal last weekend and were greeted with such expressions of love and appreciation for attending the rally. The people we met were the same—their expressions of gratitude for our presence was really heartwarming.
> "Thank you so much for your consideration", said one woman. "We need it; we don't want to be separate from Canada; we are suffering very much at this moment".

STUDIES ON DUPLICATION

Mr. Denis Paradis (Brome—Missisquoi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the wake of the Quebec referendum the message from Quebecers could not be any clearer. Quebecers want sweeping and rapid changes. I have made a promise to my constituents in Brome—Missisquoi to bear the torch of change to Ottawa.

From the floor of this House, I would humbly request that the Government of Quebec provide us as quickly as possible with the studies on duplication and overlap in their possession, so that we may set to work immediately.

Let us get moving right away, so that very soon, from one end of the country to the other, we can all together tell the people of Canada: Here is the Canada of change you have demanded.

RENÉ LÉVESQUE

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on November 1, 1987 we lost the founding father of the Parti Quebecois and of the sovereignist movement, René Lévesque.

More than anyone else, Mr. Lévesque incarnated Quebecers' confidence in themselves. He was one of the key figures who shaped the quiet revolution through his lead role in the Lesage government and he contributed to the creation of modern day Quebec, particularly by nationalizing our electrical power.

As the Premier of Quebec, he has left a lasting heritage. We need only think, for instance, of the charter of the French language and the recognition of aboriginal right to self–government.

His legacy to us was a faultless sense of democracy and healthier politics; his proudest accomplishment in this area was enactment of the legislation on political funding.

I am sure that René Lévesque, great democrat that he was, would have been proud of the 94 per cent turnout, as Quebecers exercised their right to vote this past Monday.

KEN SARO–WIWA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Nigerian author and environmentalist Ken Saro–Wiwa, the winner of the 1995 Goldman environmental prize for Africa, was sentenced to death by a special tribunal after a show trial. There is no right of appeal.

Saro–Wiwa is a founder of Nigerian PEN, an honorary member of PEN Canada, president of the Nigerian Association of Authors, president of the Ethnic Minority Rights Organization of Africa and leader of the movement for the survival of Ogoni people.

For 37 years these people have been exploited and their land ravaged by international oil interests which have taken more than $30 billion in oil and left an ecological disaster area.

I join with Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch and PEN Canada in condemning this death sentence. I call on the government to condemn the death sentence in the strongest possible terms, impose sanctions on Nigeria and call for the immediate and unconditional release of Saro–Wiwa, who has always flatly denied any involvement in these killings.

QUEBEC SOVEREIGNIST MOVEMENT

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a fundamental question is being asked today by millions of Quebecers who voted in the referendum on Monday.

What kind of soil nourishes the deep roots of Quebec's sovereignist movement? Territorial nationalism, mentioned so often in the past few months, seems increasingly difficult to reconcile with the many intolerant statements from various spokespersons for the yes side.

The time has come for solidarity and co–operation. Quebecers from every part of the province expect their governments to pick up where they left off several months ago.

We must now meet the challenge of continuing to build a strong and dynamic Quebec within a united Canada. This kind of blueprint for society cannot afford the invariably disastrous impact of segregation and intolerance.

QUEBEC PREMIER

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Monday night, the leader of the yes side put the blame for the defeat of his option on the ethnic communities. Yesterday, when he announced his resignation as premier, he did not even have the decency to apologize and in fact repeated and attempted to justify what he had said.

This throws a troubling light on the very foundations of a Quebec nationalism that apparently shows contempt for the election rules prevailing in Quebec, according to which only age, citizenship and place of residence are used as criteria for being eligible to vote.

This troubling statement, made at a crucial moment in the history of Quebec and Canada, forces us to reflect on the democratic nature of the question by which it was inspired. We want to say today that Canada is and will always remain the country of all Canadians.

QUEBEC PREMIER

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we were very moved yesterday when we heard the news of Mr. Parizeau's resignation. All Quebecers recognize his outstanding contribution to the building of a modern Quebec.

As an adviser to several Premiers, he took part in the development of a number of projects of which we are particularly proud. From the nationalization of electric utilities to the creation of the Quebec Pension Plan and the Caisse de dépôt et de placement, Mr. Parizeau forged the tools that are indispensable to Quebec society.

His outstanding contribution to our economic development was particularly apparent in the stock savings plan, the solidarity fund and, more recently, the regional development funds. He was known as an innovator and a man who held strong convictions.

On behalf of all Quebecers, Mr. Parizeau, I want to say a heartfelt thank you.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Atlantic Canadians are wondering why the Liberals are going down the same old path with talk of giving Quebec distinct society status.

All Canadians recognize Quebec's cultural, social and historic distinctiveness but they do not want one province given special powers and status in the federation.

New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island are equally proud of their social, historical and cultural distinctiveness. In fact, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were two of the four original founders of our country, along with Ontario and Quebec.

Every single province in Canada should be an equal partner in this federation. Every single province in Canada is proud of its unique history and distinctiveness. Every single province should participate in our country on an equal footing.

Reform will vigorously defend the right of the Atlantic provinces to be given the same powers and entitlements as every other province. Our Constitution should never be changed to rob them of equal status.

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to thank all those New Brunswickers who travelled to Montreal last week for our rally. It was absolutely marvellous.

I also want to thank all the members of Parliament and all the senators who helped me to get 6,000 flags to take down to the harbour station. Members should have heard them when I asked them to sing "O Canada".

They sang it so you could hear it in Victoria, you could hear it in Newfoundland and in the Northwest Territories. The walls of the building started to shake. I say to my hon. friends from the Reform Party, the people in Atlantic Canada are being well looked after. We are looking after them.

THE OTTAWA SUN

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada owes its excellent reputation on the international scene to, for instance, its high standards of tolerance, freedom and respect. We encourage debate because the clash of ideas generates the spark of understanding.

These fundamental values which are the pride of our country were crudely trampled yesterday in a caricature published by the Ottawa Sun. This caricature is not only in poor taste, it is insulting and offends any sensible person who sets moral values above basely partisan considerations.

I know I am speaking for all my colleagues when I clearly and unequivocally condemn this attack on our colleague, the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean. I hope that in future we will take an even firmer stand and show we will not tolerate this kind of degrading caricature that attacks an individual's physical integrity.

TRIBUTE TO QUEBEC PREMIER

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–St–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer a tribute today to the Premier of Quebec, Jacques Parizeau. Through his exceptional contribution to the development of Quebec, he has been one the shapers of the self–confidence the people of Quebec have now acquired.

An hon. member: What?

Mr. Bouchard: A little respect for a great man who is leaving politics, if you please. There is no one here worthy of holding a candle to him.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard: Mr. Speaker, there will be a special place reserved for Jacques Parizeau in the annals of history—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

[English]

The Speaker: As is usual in the standing orders this is the time for members to make statements. We have always and we will continue to respect one another in the House.

I again recognize the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean, and am prepared to listen to his statement.

Mr. Bouchard: Mr. Speaker, history will reserve for Jacques Parizeau a special place along Quebecers' path toward sovereignty. A pillar of the sovereignist movement, he—

Mr. Young: All Quebecers, or just some of them?

Mr. Bouchard: Mr. Speaker, I again hear the Minister of Transport starting up his insulting comments.

A pillar of the sovereignist movement, Jacques Parizeau also rebuilt the Parti Quebecois in the aftermath of a particularly difficult period. It is in large part due to him that Quebecers will soon have their own country.

A man of integrity and profound convictions, he has never doubted the necessity of sovereignty for the people of Quebec.

Mr. Parizeau, the people of Quebec will never forget your efforts to finally bring Quebec recognition within the family of nations. You will now be acknowledged, along with René Lévesque, as one of the great builders of the country of Quebec.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: The Right Hon. Prime Minister wishes to speak.

TRIBUTE TO THE PREMIER OF QUEBEC

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint–Maurice, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a short statement I would like to make, with leave of the House.

Obviously, in public life we cannot always agree with everyone, and sometimes this leads to difficult situations.

I know Mr. Parizeau well. I have known him since 1968 and I have had the opportunity to work with him. Despite our significant political differences, I can say he is a man who has given his life to politics. He is a man of considerable talent, who has worked with governments for many years. He was even an adviser to the Government of Canada, to the Department of Finance, when I was parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance.

One day, our paths separated, and he became a sovereignist, a separatist. I respect his opinion and always have, even if I do not completely agree. Now he has decided to retire. I would have hoped it could happen under circumstances less controversial for him and for everyone, but I have no control over circumstances.

I would like to point out that, here, in Canada, we have one of the finest democracies in the world. It is an example. Few countries in the world would tolerate the raising of passions as deep as those involved in wanting to break up a country and use part of it to make a new one.

It is an example for the world that this sort of passionate discourse cannot be permitted without a surprising amount of control. I have travelled with Mr. Parizeau. We have been travelling companions. He could be a most pleasant companion, at times, when we were not talking politics. Obviously, when we started talking politics, breakfasts or dinners were rather tumultuous, but interesting, I must say.

Today, he has decided to retire after serving the public for many years, and we must thank him for serving the public as he did. Unfortunately for me, he did not remain an ardent federalist. He decided not to remain one, and I did. I am very persistent. He became persistent after that and he remained the most persistent sovereignist or separatist of the group. He did not hide his opinion.

At one point, he even left Mr. Lévesque, because he did not agree with the "beau risque". He is retiring, and the people of Quebec should thank him for his contribution to the public debate, even if we did not agree. That is what is so great about Canada: we can disagree and yet serve the public to the best of our knowledge and abilities.

[English]

The Speaker: We started with Statements by Members and the hon. Leader of the Opposition made his statement. I recognized the Prime Minister who evidently was joining in and I believe we have turned it into tributes.

I will recognize—I believe that is why he is on his feet—the hon. House leader and then I propose to begin question period.

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the intervention of the Prime Minister. Would the Speaker ensure that we have the full amount of allotted time for question period?

The Speaker: The answer is yes.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE REFERENDUM

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I think both Mr. Parizeau and we in the Bloc are grateful to the Prime Minister for his fine gesture in speaking these words. I thank him for it. With the permission of the House, I would like to table the preliminary report of the count of Monday's voting.

The Speaker: It is a bit different today. Perhaps the hon. Leader of the Opposition could table it at the end of question period. We return to question period again.

Mr. Bouchard: Mr. Speaker, we, the people of Quebec, whatever our political stripe, are delighted at how democratically the recent referendum debate was carried out. In fact, the only hitch in the democratic proceedings we might criticize came about because of Ottawa and very high up in Ottawa, namely the number one guardian of Canadian democracy, the Prime Minister of Canada. We will recall that he said in this House he reserved the right not to honour a narrow yes majority in favour of sovereignty.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Knowing now that the no majority is only six tenths of 1 per cent above 50 and in view of the fact that the sovereignists have set an example by bowing to a very narrow majority, does he not think he should withdraw his remarks and apologize in the name of Canadian democracy?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Absolutely not, Mr. Speaker. Absolutely not. I should say first that, indeed, 49.4 per cent of Quebecers voted yes. However, probably between 30 and 40 per cent of them voted yes thinking they were going to stay in Canada. They did not all vote for Quebec's separation.

I was in the car a few minutes ago, and people were calling an open line show saying they did not know, they did not suspect the mandate was to separate.

The word "separation" was never again heard from the lips of the Leader of the Opposition after he was obliged to use it in front of the Americans to make himself understood.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada, as part of his duties in the House of Commons, is permitted to distinguish between votes, if I understand properly, when the votes were for the yes side.

What would the Prime Minister of Canada say if, as Leader of the Opposition, I did not recognize the very slim no majority? What would he say? He would be right in accusing me of not being democratic.

Nearly 2.3 million Quebecers opted for a sovereign Quebec on Monday. For a Prime Minister who promised us we were going to take a beating, it is quite a comeuppance.

The Quebec reality continues to escape him, however, because he now thinks he can meet Quebec's expectations with an unimportant resolution in the House paying lip service to Quebec's distinctive nature.

Can the Prime Minister be so ignorant of the reality in Quebec that he imagines he can halt the irresistible sovereignist advance with such a horrible mockery?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first, Quebecers have spoken. I hope the Leader of the Opposition will accept the verdict of Quebecers, who have decided to remain in Canada. On the night of the verdict, he was saying he was going to start again right away, whereas the people had spoken. He is the one who lost and should have accepted the verdict.

As for me, my job in this country is to ensure observance of the Canadian Constitution, only I did not have to use all the powers vested in the government, because the people of Quebec spoke and chose to remain in Canada. I hope the Leader of the Opposition will understand that Quebecers want all elected officials, both here and in Quebec City, to serve the people and look after economic growth and job creation; they are sick and tired of all the talk about constitutional problems. They want the governments to get back to the real problems: the dignity of workers in Quebec.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, for people who are fed up, a 94 per cent turnout in a popular vote is not bad.

After Monday's vote, the Canadian federal system is enjoying a respite, the result of a few tenths of a percentage point of popular vote. In this context, does the Prime Minister not see that the only realistic solution for Quebec and Canada is a new partnership negotiated between equals following the next Quebec referendum, which will follow inexorably?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the people have spoken. Democracy has spoken. Obviously, the Leader of the Opposition does not agree with democracy. Did Mr. Johnson, who lost the election last year with four tenths of 1 per cent—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Was Mr. Parizeau's government illegitimate because they won by only four tenths of 1 per cent?

• (1430)

The people have spoken and they have decided to remain in Canada, despite all the unbelievable propaganda, in which people were told that, if they voted no, there would be no more unemployment insurance and their pensions would be cut, without it ever being proven. These were absolutely gratuitous statements. Despite this, despite all these lies, they failed to win.

DISTINCT SOCIETY

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it did not take more than 24 hours after a no win based on a fraction of a percentage point for the Prime Minister to consider tabling a resolution in the House of Commons recognizing the fact that Quebec is a distinct society. And all this while hastening to add that such recognition confers no special powers or status on Quebec. He seems to agree with the Premier of Ontario who said that now was not the time to react hastily and promise things one might not be able to deliver.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Does he agree with the Premier of Ontario that any changes that would be significant in the eyes of Quebec would not be acceptable to the rest of Canada?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to me, the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society is important. It is something that the Parliament of Canada has already accepted, it was voted on in a referendum, and we voted in favour of a distinct society—

Mr. Bouchard: That is not true.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): While the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Bouchard: Everyone knows it is not true.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): —and the House leader of the opposition voted against Charlottetown. Then they went around Quebec blaming us for not delivering on Charlottetown when they all voted in favour of recognition of Quebec as a distinct society.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has conveniently overlooked the fact that he killed the Meech Lake Accord—

Some hon. members: He did. He did.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I myself asked the Prime Minister what kind of distinct society he favoured. He never answered the question. Today, I will ask him. Considering his—

Would you ask the Deputy Prime Minister to be quiet, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: The question, please. The hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, considering his sterile and meaningless draft resolution, will the Prime Minister acknowledge that his positions are identical to those of the Premier of British Columbia, and are we to understand that this Prime Minister has no trouble recognizing Quebec as a distinct society but only insofar as this does not really mean anything and does not change the status quo?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not seen the resolution. I do not know where he got his text.

Mr. Gauthier: Which resolution?

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): He said there was a resolution, and he does not even have it.

An hon. member: It is in the papers.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): My point is that the Parliament of Canada has already spoken. And the Parliament of Canada could speak again, but as far as we are concerned, we have always been in favour of a distinct society. And now very shortly, Quebecers will again see the members of the Bloc Quebecois, like the separatists they are, vote against distinct society in this House of Commons.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, almost two days have passed since the Quebec referendum and as yet no one has accepted responsibility for the mismanagement of the federalist strategy which brought the country to the very brink of disaster, mismanagement which simply cannot be repeated in the future.

Seventeen months ago the Prime Minister was strongly urged to clearly define the costs of separation by answering 20 questions on the negative meaning of a yes vote. The Prime Minister dismissed those questions as hypothetical and did nothing. As a result he almost lost the country to Quebec voters who thought they could vote yes and still be Canadian.

Canadians want to know who is responsible for those miscalculations in that campaign. Was it the Prime Minister's advisers, was it the no side strategists, or was it the Prime Minister himself?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the only person more disappointed than the Leader of the Opposition that the no side won is the leader of the Reform Party.

During the whole campaign, every day and every week, he was trying to bring in some new twist to create a problem for those who were fighting to keep Canada together. The leader of the third party was always there saying we should do this and we should do that, while the leader of the Conservative Party, the leader of the Liberal Party of Quebec and I were working out our differences to keep Canada together.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister can question the loyalty of millions of Canadians who disagree with his—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Manning: Nothing will change the fact that it was his lame brain strategy that brought the country—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Manning: The Prime Minister did not wake up to Quebec's profound demands for change until the last week of the campaign. For months and months in the House and outside the House, he insisted the status quo was good enough, plus a little administrative tinkering. It was not until the last days of the campaign that he belatedly recognized the need for change and began to talk about it.

• (1440)

I ask the Prime Minister, given the obvious desire in the country for change, who was the genius who decided that status quo plus administrative tinkering was good enough? Was it the Prime Minister's advisers? Was it some fossilized senators, or was it the Prime Minister himself?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Reform Party again is trying to do the same thing. He is just trying to build himself a position from extremely difficult circumstances which we were fighting for.

When it was very important, the leader of the Conservative Party was there, I was there and a lot of members of Parliament from this side were there, but the leader of the Reform Party was not in Montreal last Friday. He was just criticizing us like he has done during the whole campaign. We have won. Canada has won despite him.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, to compound the errors of the no side campaign, we now have the crowning miscalculation. Apparently the federal government is responding to the demands for change in Quebec by falling back on the tired old cliches of distinct society and a constitutional veto for Quebec, asking Canadians to wallow once again in the stagnant waters of Meech Lake.

This Liberal–Tory approach to national unity with its top down process, constitutional mumbo–jumbo and hollow symbolism has not worked for 30 years, and Canadians know it. They ask the Prime Minister, who in their right mind is responsible for this misguided strategy? Is it the same people who devised the no strategy? Is it his new constitutional adviser from Sherbrooke, or is it the Prime Minister himself?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when there was an amending formula accepted by all the provinces at the time of Victoria, the party of the father of the leader of the Reform Party, the Socreds, was in power in Alberta. It accepted the amending formula at that time.

The Speaker: I wonder if we might shorten the questions and answers.

DISTINCT SOCIETY

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after a crushing repudiation by his own constituents in Saint–Maurice, the Prime Minister has lost all credibility to propose any constitutional change whatsoever, because it is obvious that he is out of touch with the Quebec reality.

Is the Prime Minister aware that his inability to understand the Quebec reality renders him unfit to properly translate the needs of Quebec to the rest of Canada, and as long as Canadians and Quebecers speak to each other through him instead of as equal to equal, the misunderstanding will continue?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Parliament of Canada will speak on behalf of all Canadians when it is presented with a resolution concerning this problem. This I have promised and this I will do. Then the pretences will be over. The separatists have always been saying that they had not obtained their distinct society. But they do not want it.

Another vote will be held, and you will see that they will again vote against a distinct society for Quebecers.

• (1445)

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, even the voters of Saint–Maurice feel that the Prime Minister has never supported a distinct society. The Prime Minister does not understand the people in his constituency and the people in his constituency no longer believe him.

Does the Prime Minister not agree that he is wasting everybody's time by pretending to Canadians that he understood what Quebecers wanted?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what is worrying the Bloc Quebecois is that they know very well we are going to act. But this time they will be forced to vote. There will be no fine words. They will vote against the distinct society, and the truth will out. They are separatists who do not want to admit it to Quebecers frankly and honestly.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

It seems that the Prime Minister is preparing to offer Quebec a special deal that consists of the old traditional federal chestnuts of a distinct society and a constitutional veto. For 20 years the separatists have been saying that because Quebec is a distinct society and people it should therefore become a sovereign state.

Why does the Prime Minister think that by conceding the first part of that proposition he can prevent the second? I think the Prime Minister would like me to repeat that question.

Some hon. members: No, no.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at that time the member for Lethbridge was a member of the cabinet in Alberta, which accepted a veto for Quebec. Mr. Strom was the premier and the member for Lethbridge was a minister at that time.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, rather than comment on the non–answer, let me go on to the most unbelievable aspect of the federal strategy, this makeshift strategy for unity.

The government seems to be seriously considering giving a constitutional veto to the Government of Quebec, a separatist government committed to breaking up the country. Perhaps the Prime Minister intends this as a parting gift to the Leader of the Opposition if he goes to Quebec City.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I would beg hon. members not to impute motives one way or another. I would ask the hon. member to please put his question.

Mr. Manning: Let me put the question and let the Prime Minister listen, because it is really simple.

Is the Prime Minister really serious in saying that he is willing to give the separatist Government of Quebec a veto over the Constitution of Canada?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the third party should take the time to read my speech. I said it would be a veto for the people of Quebec.

CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGES

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, less than 48 hours after the Quebec referendum, there is no longer any agreement in English Canada on the nature of the changes that everybody was willing to offer Quebec a few days before the referendum vote. The promises for change and the outpouring of love appear today less and less sincere and credible.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Where are those thousands of people who last week were claiming they loved Quebec?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, thousands went to Montreal and, last Sunday, tens of thousands of citizens met in cities all over Canada to tell all Quebecers: "We want you to remain Canadian citizens". This happened in every provincial capital, in cities and villages all over the country. But, of course, the Bloc Quebecois is only interested in separating.

It is not interested in meeting the needs of the people, but rather in having bourgeois ambassadors at the UN, in Paris and elsewhere, whereas people want Quebec citizens to have jobs and economic stability.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, are we to understand, less than 24 hours after the referendum, in the midst of all the contrary statements by premiers in English Canada, that all the promises for change and declarations of love were nothing short of hypocritical?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like the Bloc members who agree with the statement made by Jacques Parizeau on referendum night to rise in this House.

NATIONAL UNITY

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, one sure thing that came out of this referendum is that Canadians from every province are demanding change. They want more of a say in the decision making process that will determine the future of their country. They have given up and they are sick to death of the politicians and their deal making, trying to resurrect Meech Lake and Charlottetown.

Will the Prime Minister guarantee Canadians that they will be involved in any decision that affects the future of their country?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, they are always involved. They have members of Parliament who are here in this Parliament all the time who represent their constituents very well.

If the hon. member does not think she is able to represent the interests of her constituents, that is her own judgment. But I know that the members of Parliament who have been elected generally feel pretty good when they get up that they have a mandate to speak for the people of their riding. I believe that is the way democracy works. If our judgment is bad, there will be an election.

When I campaign during the next election in the ridings of the Reform Party, the people will remember what the Reform Party members did in the last week of October 1995.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let me assure the Prime Minister that if he comes to my riding he will know that they and I voted no on the Charlottetown accord. It was dead then and it is dead now. No distinct society status ever more.

All Canadians must be involved if we hope to avoid defeat in another Quebec referendum. It is an idea that can work. It is an idea that has support from the provincial premiers, such as Newfoundland's Clyde Wells.

Is the Prime Minister willing to hold citizens assemblies across this country, or is he determined to resurrect Meech Lake and Charlottetown one more time?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of doing any of the three things the member mentioned.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

The Canadian government is now negotiating a free trade agreement with the Israeli government. Current negotiations are expected to lead to an agreement that would eliminate all tariff and non–tariff barriers between the two countries as of January 1.

• (1455)

Could the minister give us a progress report on current negotiations and indicate what steps he intends to take to, for instance, give Quebec bathing suit and lingerie manufacturers a chance to prepare for the advent of the Israelis on the Canadian market?

[English]

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the discussions with Israel are progressing. They were undertaken some six or eight months ago. They are still at a stage where various details are being considered, including garment manufacturing for example. There are some aspects of the agricultural trade between us that need clarification.

I cannot give the member any definitive report other than to say the negotiations are proceeding.

[Translation]

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister ought to know that the Israelis enjoy privileged access to the European textile market, unlike Quebec manufacturers.

Since manufacturers in Quebec are concerned about any concessions the federal government might make, does the minister, or does he not, intend to discuss the matter with the Government of Quebec as requested by the Deputy Premier of Quebec on October 23?

[English]

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yes, we will see.

CANADA POST

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post.

Canada Post is about to enter into a $300 million sale and lease back for all of its outside furniture. The government's partner in this deal is a consortium headed by SNC Lavalin, a name well known as friends of the government, which in fact contributed $73,000 to the Liberal election campaign in 1993.

Will the minister responsible for Canada Post make available a cost benefit analysis of this lease back deal? And will the minister make public the tendering process that is used to put this deal together?

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, given the absence of the minister of public works who is also responsible for Canada Post, I will take this question under advisement and a written answer will be given.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is not a nickel and dime deal. I am surprised the minister's representative is not aware of this.

My supplemental is directed to the minister responsible for Canada Post. Georges Clermont, the CEO of Canada Post, is a well–known name to this House as a result of his involvement with the developer José Perez. Apparently a major figure in the consortium that is putting this deal together as the partner of the government is in fact related to Mr. Clermont through a marriage arrangement. Can the minister confirm if in fact the CEO of Canada Post is related through marriage to the head of this consortium? Does he feel it might—

The Speaker: I am not sure that relates to the administrative responsibility of the minister.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: If this continues, we are going to be into marriage counselling. Put the question please.

Mr. Harris: Does the minister feel there may be an appearance of conflict of interest, given the relationship of the individuals involved in this deal?

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, given the fact that the hon. member alluded to the Perez–Clermont affair, it should be mentioned again in this House that the matter is in court and it would not be advisable at all to comment on such a situation.

DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Newfoundland's select committee on children's interests heard how devastating domestic violence can be for children. There is the horror suffered by one family when a woman was stabbed 33 times by her husband and left for dead.

• (1500)

Could the Secretary of State for the Status of Women tell the House what action the government has taken to help eliminate violence against women?

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague's question demonstrates quite clearly the tragic incident that two–thirds of the cases of domestic violence, homicide, involve women. The government is well aware of the concerns around sexual harassment and race and concerns with respect to the effect of violence on women.

We have acted to address these instances with the firearms control legislation, with the elimination of extreme drunkenness as a defence, with the increased effectiveness of the peace bond, with legislation on criminal harassment or the stalking issue, and with the sentencing reform that includes tougher sentences against hate and abuse of positions of trust, recognition of gender persecution, the whole question of the dangerous offenders and DNA.

The government has moved to ensure there will be safe streets, safe homes and a safer workplace. We shall move some more in this area.

WELFARE RECIPIENTS

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Human Resources Development.

On October 26 the minister, in an attempt to confuse the Bloc Quebecois, said in this House, and I quote: "In August I received a document from the Government of Quebec that pointed out the number of people on welfare had been reduced, not increased". He forgot to mention that between August 1994 and August 1995, the number of welfare recipients increased by 20,000, and that at least half of this increase was due to cuts in unemployment insurance.

Is the Minister of Human Resources Development satisfied that thanks to his cuts in unemployment insurance, Quebec has at least 10,000 people more on welfare?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have with me the actual detailed statistics from the Government of Quebec which show for example, that between the month of June and July there was a net decrease of 4,000 people on the welfare rolls. It continued to go down to the point where there was a reduction of 7,000 people on the welfare rolls over that four-month period.

That was acknowledged as well by Premier Parizeau in the National Assembly where he again admitted that there had been a decline. He took some satisfaction from that figure. So did we.

It puts into question the continued allegation by the Bloc Quebecois that these changes have resulted in increased welfare rolls. How can we have an increase when the numbers are going down?

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is time the minister understood the basis for these statistics. The increase in the number of people on welfare is calculated from year to year. And from year to year, we see 20,000 people more on welfare. I would like to table this report in the House a little later.

Does the minister acknowledge that it is entirely unacceptable that, during a period of so-called prosperity, the number of people on welfare in Quebec increases by 20,000 in a single year, as the minister prepares to introduce new reforms that will increase this number considerably?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during the past year specifically in the province of Quebec—and I do not want to exclude actions we have taken in other provinces—with the changes we introduced last year to the unemployment insurance system, we brought in a special family benefit that enabled over 130,000 Quebecers, primarily women, to receive an additional $1,000 per year over and above their normal payment.

In addition we signed an agreement with the Government of Quebec because we believe in co-operating to help those on low income, especially those with families. It was an $81 million special agreement this summer with the Government of Quebec that would provide an income top up for 27,000 families on low income. This once again demonstrates that when we work together we can finally do something as a government to help people who really have needs.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. We are over $550 billion in debt and every day I ask questions pertaining to the minister's serious mismanagement of his portfolio.

Information I have received today indicates that the minister is purchasing 150 quill pens in black velvet cases. They are engraved in gold with the words Minister of National Defence, for the price of approximately $2,000. This is pure balderdash. Could the minister explain the expenditure to Canadians?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is an Order Paper question. If the hon. member would like a pen, I will send one over.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is because of this incompetence that we are $550 billion in debt. I would like to ask the minister: Could you please send me a pen so I can hold it up to Canadians—

The Speaker: I appeal to all hon. members to direct questions through the Chair. I do not know if the minister heard the whole question or if he would like to answer.

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, no reply is necessary.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to learn this morning that we had reached our 1994-95 deficit reduction target.

During the 1993 election campaign we proposed bringing our finances under control in a balanced fashion while building economic growth and jobs in Canada.

Point of Order

Will the Minister of Finance tell my Carleton—Charlotte constituents and the House if we are still on target for next year and still to reach our interim deficit reduction goal of 3 per cent of GDP in 1997?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that we are on target. Deficit reduction is an essential component of our job creation plan because deficit reduction means lower interest rates and lower interest rates mean more jobs for Canadians.

I assure him that we will hit our interim target of 3 per cent. I assure him that we will hit this year's target of $32.7 billion. I am delighted to say to him that not only did we hit our target for 1994–95, we in fact beat it by $2.2 billion.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance and concerns the Conference Board of Canada report of a week or so ago, which indicated that productivity and profits are up but that wages are standing still.

Given that this is exactly the kind of economy critics of globalization and free trade predicted would be the case with this new kind of economy, what does the Minister of Finance intend to do about it? Is this the desired state for the Canadian economy? Or, does the government have some plan to make sure that at some point not just profits and not just productivity but wages and the standard of living go up for ordinary Canadians?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there was a bit of a slip when the hon. member asked his question. I am sure he realizes that productivity is an essential element to increasing our real incomes in the country.

From 1973 on, for about 20 years, we had declining productivity throughout the western world and that is why real incomes went down.

Nonetheless the hon. member's question is to the point. That is why there is so much effort on this side of the House to increase Canadian skills, to increase Canada's involvement in the newer economy, to make sure that Canada is not only toiling in those industries where other countries are more competitive because of lower standards of living but that we are the most modern economy possible to create.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, maybe I could ask for the consent of the House in order to table, on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition, the preliminary report on the results of the counting of Monday's votes. I ask for the consent of the House.

[English]

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the document to be tabled?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would also ask for the consent of the House on behalf of my colleague, the member for Mercier, to table statistics on welfare recipients, as compiled by the Quebec department of manpower and income security, to help the Minister of Human Resources Development. I ask for the consent of the House.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS IN QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order under citation 487(1) of Beauchesne's which states that threatening language is unparliamentary. I bring to Your Honour's attention comments of the hon. member for York South—Weston who said very clearly in the House in earlier debate: "You should be tried for treason, Preston".

Those remarks are absolutely threatening and unacceptable. I ask that they be withdrawn from the record of the House.

The Speaker: The hon. member who is mentioned is not in the House now. Your Speaker did not hear the remarks.

We will take the point of order under advisement. We will see if it appears in Hansard and we will deal with it at the earliest possible time.

DIVISIONS

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last evening during the taking of various divisions the chief government whip proposed during the division on Bill C–103 that the vote on Motion No. 19 of Bill C–61 be applied to the motion that was then before the House.

This is verified by a review of the video from last night's proceedings. However this reality is not reflected in Hansard, as recorded on page 16056 where it shows the government whip applying the vote in reverse.

The video also shows that it was you, Mr. Speaker, who following the House's decision later sought clarification from the chief government whip, although this fact is also missing from Hansard.

My first concern is that Hansard, the official report of the proceedings of the House of Commons, does not reflect the realities of last night's proceedings. While it is true that members are permitted to make slight corrections to Hansard such as grammatical corrections, this type of alteration completely reverses the intent of what the chief government whip clearly stated, which has been verified by a review of the video.

My second point is that unanimous consent was sought to apply the result of report stage Motion No. 19 to the concurrence motion at report stage of Bill C–103. This was, in fact, agreed to by the House as verified on the video.

It was only later that you, Mr. Speaker, noticed the government had applied a vote which resulted in the defeat of Bill C–103 and then asked the government whip if he had meant to apply the vote in reverse. You asked him yes or no.

It is my contention that the House had clearly given its unanimous consent to apply the vote as first specified by the chief government whip. If this was to be changed, it was incumbent upon the Speaker to ask the entire House for its unanimous consent, and not simply engage in a personal dialogue with the chief government whip. If you review the video, Mr. Speaker, you will find the evidence to support my submission.

In summation, I would first like to say how disturbing it is to see that the official record of Parliament does not reflect the reality of last night's proceedings. Second, the video clearly shows that the House gave its unanimous consent to apply a vote which resulted in the defeat of a government bill. If it was a mistake on the part of the chief government whip and he wanted to reverse the decision of this House, then he ought to have sought its consent and not simply told you, Mr. Speaker, what he meant to have said, if it was only that easy.

It is not that easy and it is dangerous to engage in such practices. My reason for raising this point of order is that the most important protection that we as members of the opposition have in this House is you, Mr. Speaker, and the rules of the House.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised a point of order that on its face sounds reasonable.

I urge him first of all to have regard to the practice of this House in relation to the words spoken in Hansard. If I am making a speech and I say words that I do not mean to say, that are incorrect, such as when I say a not when I did not mean to say a not, and then repeat the sentence correctly, Hansard does not print two sentences, one with a not in it and one without. They print it the way I intended it; it is corrected and printed as one sentence.

Similarly, if I repeat words for emphasis I get reported in Hansard, but if I repeat them because of interruptions that might come from hon. members elsewhere in the House, those additional words are not printed in Hansard. The editor takes those words out.

I submit in the case that the hon. member has raised there is clearly a misunderstanding as to what happened, as to what the chief government whip said. When it was corrected by a subsequent intervention by Your Honour in asking the chief government whip whether he intended it to be in reverse and he confirmed that he had intended it to be in reverse, there was simply a correction made by the editors to make it appear that there had not been that misunderstanding. The question was not replaced in Hansard.

First, Hansard has never followed the exact words spoken in the Chamber word for word on every occasion. That has been a practice in this House for as long as I have read Hansard, which is over 30 years. I think the hon. member will recognize that fact.

Second, last evening after the vote was applied in accordance with the request by the chief government whip, there was a misunderstanding on the part of the Chair, which I submit was the correct understanding. If the hon. whip is correct in his submission, the thing that should have happened is that the bill should have been defeated because there were more nays than yeas on the division cited. I know that is his point.

My recollection is very distinct. I have not looked at the video to check it but after the vote was applied, Your Honour said: "I declare the motion carried". My recollection is that on Bill C–103 we were dealing with concurrence at the report stage. Your Honour then put the question: "When shall the bill be read the third time?" The answer was, at the next sitting of the House.

The Chair understood the way the chief government whip intended to have the division applied, which was to carry the vote. Everyone in the House understood that the government was going to win the vote and that it was intended to be applied that way.

All the Hansard editor has done in this case, in my view quite correctly, is excised the questions that resulted in the clarification and made it appear that the chief government whip did it right the first time. He apparently did make that slip. The Chair, in my submission, understood what he meant and the correct procedure was followed, the bill was concurred in at report stage and third reading was ordered at the next sitting of the House.

Had the Chair correctly heard the chief government whip and applied it the way the hon. Reform whip is now suggesting, that would not have been the result and we would have had a clarification in an awful hurry because I was listening to the proceedings and I heard it go. I was satisfied that third reading had been ordered at the next sitting, otherwise I would have been on my feet.

While I sympathize with the Reform whip in his submission, I submit that the Hansard editors have acted very correctly in this case. The hon. member really has nothing to complain about because everything was clarified last night. Nothing was done in secret between the Chair and the chief government whip. It was done on the floor of the House where everyone could see. If there were objections to the procedure the hon. member should have raised them then.

The Speaker: I am going to come back to the whip of the Reform Party. I am now going to go to the whip of the government party.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the Chair and all hon. members will know, some time ago informal discussions were held among whips—I know it was a different whip for the Reform Party then—toward arriving at an informal system of accelerating the voting procedure, thereby saving considerable overtime and taxpayers' dollars for votes that would have traditionally taken sometimes seven or eight hours in the evening. They can now be collapsed into a few minutes. This system was established informally with the previous whip.

May I suggest there have been a number of occasions in the past when whips have sometimes indicated that they were voting yea as opposed to nay. Whips across the floor of the House would heckle informally or indicate informally: "No, that is not what you want to do", in an effort to assist each other because this informal understanding has been established with the stated purpose of condensing a process which formerly took several hours.

In order to make the system work even better, an informal document is exchanged among the various whips and given to the Table so if there is an occasional slip–up in the process, it is corrected.

Again, the then whip for the Reform Party would recognize how this was established co–operatively among all whips. I am referring here to the member for Calgary Centre.

The point I am making is that this is an informal system which was established among the whips. Whips have traditionally assisted each other in order to accurately reflect the intention of each respective party in the House and it was done that way.

We could revert to the system which existed before. The system which was in place before costs approximately $25,000 an hour. I believe it costs approximately $17,000 an hour to work regular overtime and $25,000 an hour for extended time. Even the process we used last night could have cost perhaps $100,000 to $150,000 and instead cost nothing to the taxpayers of Canada because we had developed this informal system with all the goodwill that had, up until now, been there. I only wish that the goodwill we have had may prevail after today as it has over the last year since establishing the system.

We had an extremely effective working relationship in the past with the previous whip. I hope it will remain identical with the present occupant of that position on that side of the House. It is my considered belief that when members cease to be able to function with each other, where there are disagreements—and there have been some of those today—that the whips can quickly rally behind the curtain, find out what the disagreement is among members and then hopefully assist each other in making the House work better and assisting Mr. Speaker in his job of serving all of us. That is the system under which we have all operated individually and collegially as a group of whips in the past.

I hope we can continue to assist each other in order to reflect the intention of the House and not try as whips to trip each other up at every possible opportunity.

There is the cut and thrust of debate in the House. That is fair game. I appreciate that. Heaven knows I was a member of that group for longer than many. However, in our role as whips there is also the very close working relationship we have had with each other. I hope and pray that will continue, not for my good, but for the good of this institution and for our country.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, since I am the one whip previous to whom everybody is referring, I thought I should make a quick intervention.

The point our party whip is making, and I checked it with our assistant, is that there was an intervention made by you in the Chair with a member of the House. It is that intervention which is not included in Hansard. That is the point. We respect, and I certainly do, everything that has been said here, including the intervention by the member for Kingston and the Islands.

It is okay to correct words and that is what the member for Kingston and the Islands was pointing out. But when an entire intervention is left out, it is a serious omission. I do not believe we are trying to trip up the government; we are just saying that an intervention is missing. That is the concern because what if at some time in the future it is an important intervention? That is the point.

We do intend, hope and will always try to make sure that we continue in the same spirit of co–operation that we have established over the course of time.

Mr. Ringma: Mr. Speaker, there are several points I hope to clarify. First, I endorse what my colleague has just said to the chief government whip. By all means we should continue the system we have for getting on with business. There is no other way to do it.

I would like to clarify too that there is no allegation here whatsoever of secrecy going on. That is not part of it.

I would also like to address one point made by the member for Kingston and the Islands, which is that the correction in Hansard was not a result of member's statements but was the result of another vote being taken. So there is quite a difference between the two.

Finally, I must maintain my point of order because my principal point is that we in opposition rely totally on you, Mr. Speaker, and on the rules of the House. Without that we are nowhere.

The Speaker: My colleagues, I have heard both sides and I think your Speaker has to accept some responsibility here, of course. As I recall and if I might just explain, I believe the hon. whip of the Reform Party asked me for a clarification. Upon hearing the whip of the Reform Party I asked the whip of the government party for a clarification. When he gave me the clarification, I looked over at the Reform whip. That cannot be seen in Hansard but can be seen on the video. The whip nodded to me, yes he was in agreement, so we went on.

The point that the Reform whip makes is, of course, very valid. The rules should be adhered to. I believe that by and large we have adhered to the rules in this particular circumstance.

Would members permit their Speaker to perhaps make an observation? I have been here for decades and it seems to me that the system the whips of the three parties have worked out, with the independents as well, makes the House work much better in terms of time and understanding. Usually these things are all ironed out before these votes take place.

From my perspective as a long time member of Parliament and also as the Speaker, I think it is good for the institution that we can work together in this way.

If by some oversight your Speaker has failed to ensure this was in Hansard I assure the House now that should something like this occur again, I will take it upon myself to see that exactly what is in accordance with the rules is done. I encourage my colleagues to persevere in a system which is new but which does work.

I salute the whips from all parties for what they have done for this institution to make these votes proceed a little more quickly but fairly, which is the important thing here.

I thank you for your comments. I agree with the Reform whip that of course the rules will be adhered to. As your Speaker, I assure you this will be done.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1995–96

A message from His Excellency the Governor General of Canada transmitting supplementary estimates (A) for the financial year ending March 31, 1996 was presented by the President of the Treasury Board and read by the Speaker to the House.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to three petitions.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table today, in both official languages, the 1996 immigration levels.

This package is a legislative requirement. It is something we have to do by or on November 1 each year. These packages, and this year's is no exception, are always much more than a legislative requirement, much more than something we simply have to do. Simply put, this is a map to the future, a chart which will hopefully guide us into our tomorrows.

One year ago today I stood in the Chamber and unveiled the government's 10–year immigration plan. This plan was the result of an unprecedented and extensive consultation with Canadians from all backgrounds, from all walks of life, in every region of our country. It laid out a clear path which we are following and honouring today.

The levels before the House also demonstrate our commitment to a partnership with both provinces and territories as well as our continued covenant with the people of Canada and those who would call Canada home. They also underline the government's commitment to economic growth but not at the expense of our humanitarian mission.

In 1995 the level range was set at between 190,000 and 215,000. The projection for the end of this calendar year is about 198,000 to 200,000. For 1996 the government has set the level range at between 195,000 to 220,000. The levels are slightly up from last year. This is as we expected and predicted.

Last year we took stock of our immigration program. We made some decisions and made some serious changes. We have reinforced the foundation and now we can begin to build on that program. The levels also show we have achieved what I believe is a healthy balance. We have a large influx of economic immigrants because this is where we said we would increasingly focus our attention through promotion and recruitment around the globe.

We also have preserved a strong family class component. The rebalancing of the economic and family immigrant components introduced in last year's plan is on track. Economic migrants and their families will account for 50 per cent of the overall total of immigrants in 1996. The family class component will make up 46 per cent. The remaining 4 per cent will be accounted for by humanitarian and compassionate landings in Canada.

Canada needs immigrants.

Our country needs workers and investors to maintain and improve our standard of living. We need them to help us keep sparking our economy and to create jobs.

As I have said many times in this House, and even more times in communities across this country, maintaining and improving the standard of living of every Canadian is contingent, in part, on keeping a vibrant and dynamic immigration system.

[English]

The Canadian experience shows that immigrants as well as refugees become some of the best, brightest, most self–motivated and hard working Canadians. These are the people who will work with us to build a stronger, more economically dynamic country, which is why we are actively promoting Canada as a place in which to settle. We are back in the business of promotion and recruitment internationally, something we have lacked for a number of years. We are getting the message out that Canada was, is and will continue to be a land of opportunity.

In 1996 economic immigrants will include three categories: skilled workers; business immigrants; and a new category called the provincial–territorial nominee class, which is individuals sponsored exclusively by provinces and territories.

We are aware that for people to succeed in today's rapidly changing labour market they have to be adaptable. For this reason we will also be introducing changes very soon to the criteria for the selection of skilled workers. A revamped point system will emphasize the skills needed for long term success in this nation: experience, linguistic skills, education and adaptability to the ever changing global economy.

Business immigrants represent another classification of the economic category. In this regard we expect that between 18,000 and 20,500 business immigrants will come to Canada next year. Over the past year we have worked with our various provincial and private sector partners to examine the two components of our business immigration movement, our investor and entrepreneur classes.

Since it started in 1986, the immigrant investor program has attracted more than 13,000 business people who have invested over $2.5 billion in approved businesses and funds and who in the process created 17,000 jobs for Canadians. The government wants to build on these successes. I want to ensure an even stronger source of risk capital to support growth and job creation, particularly in the small and medium size sector.

Last year the Minister of Industry and I appointed a private sector panel to examine the program and make recommendations for improvement. The report was recently made public and we are considering the responses, advice and comments submitted by Canadians across the country. A new program will be in place by Canada Day of next year.

Like the immigrant investors, the entrepreneur program has one overriding goal: to create jobs and stimulate growth. We want to attract additional business people who can contribute to the Canadian economy through their hands on management of a business entity in our country. In 1996 we will also be introducing changes to enhance the overall economic benefit of the entrepreneur program.

As I mentioned, a new provincial–territorial nominee category will recognize the simple truth about our country, that the employment needs of one province may not be the same as another.

It also acknowledges that Canada is a big country. Not only does it have six time zones, but the kinds of jobs needed in the sub–Arctic will not necessarily be the same in a seaboard community, on the prairies or in downtown metropolitan Toronto. Consequently the nominee category would allow each province or territory to identify a limited number of economic immigrants each year, which will be negotiated and flexible, to meet these special provincial and regional economic needs.

This category is built on the premise that both federal and provincial governments must work closer together, more than ever, if we are to keep pace with an economy changing with lightning speed.

The economic component of our immigration program, however, is only one piece of an intricate tapestry. Woven throughout is our continued commitment to the family and to those in need of Canada's protection.

With respect to immigration policy, the Liberal government has long recognized the importance of the family. We fully and simply appreciate the importance which family plays in the life of an immigrant and in the very life of our country. Let me assure the House that family reunification is and will continue to be a vital component of Canada's immigration program. The concept of family runs through every single category I have spoken of in the last few minutes.

In the 1996 levels plan, the arrival of 78,000 to approximately 86,000 family class immigrants will take place. The majority of these individuals are immediate family members: spouses, fiancés and dependant children of Canadians.

I would like to think our commitment to keeping families together is a good indication of what kind of country we truly are, a country that cares, a country that values compassion and humanitarian values. It is those same virtues which shine through in the refugee policies of not only our government but historically of our country.

When confronted with suffering and atrocities, Canadians do not want us to turn away.

[Translation]

Again this year, refugee levels are highlighted separately from the immigration figures, reflecting our belief and practice that the refugee program is best managed in partnership with other interested stakeholders and separately from the immigrant program.

The changes we envision will require greater co–operation between ourselves and members of the private sector. We want to continue to revitalize private sponsorship of refugees and encourage more people to get involved and make a difference.

[English]

I am happy to say that we are already making progress on this front. Recently the government and a number of non–governmental organizations formed a partnership to respond to the appeal by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for the resettlement of some 5,000 refugees internationally from the former Yugoslavia. Canada has agreed to take 10 per cent of that number. We have agreed to share the cost of settling a minimum of 500 people in Canada. The government will cover the crucial first three months of financial assistance for refugees and private sponsors will then take responsibility for the remaining nine months or until the refugees are self–sufficient, whichever comes first.

At this point I would like to thank organizations and Canadian families across the country as well as members of Parliament from all sides who have inquired about the program. I give a particularly warm thanks to those individuals and organizations who have acted. A church in New Brunswick is prepared to sponsor a family of four from Yugoslavia before Christmas. On top of the 500 Canada has committed to, the province of Quebec is prepared to take an additional 100 refugees from the former republic of Yugoslavia.

Those are examples of what people of goodwill, compassion and courage can do when they put their minds and their hearts together. Thanks to this Parliament and to a number of government initiatives, we have made a good number of accomplishments in the world of immigration.

We have strengthened the integrity of our immigration system through the passage of Bill C–44 and ushered in changes to the Immigration and Refugee Board. We have been able to obtain agreements with various countries with respect to travel documents for the purposes of removal.

We have worked with communities throughout Canada to help refugees from around the globe. We have co–operated with other departments and Canadians to make sure that Canada's voice at the world population conference in Cairo and at the Beijing conference was both forceful and eloquent.

We have initiated improvements in application processing domestically and around the globe. We are improving our structures continually, as well as looking at how we do settlement and integration of newcomers, not only for their advantage but for the advantage of Canada.

Of course there is always more to do. There are still other items on our agenda that need to be realized, and they will be. As I said at the outset, we have a plan and we are staying the course.

I am an optimist. I believe in immigration. Canada's cherished position in the world today is testimony to the undeniable fact that immigration has served our nation well. There is no reason to question, no reason to have doubts about whether immigration cannot continue to give Canada that strength and that dynamism.

In mapping out our immigration levels for 1996, our destination is very simple. It is a tomorrow that tempers economic growth with care and compassion, a tomorrow that is welcoming and accommodating for our newcomers, a tomorrow that builds a stronger country, in essence a tomorrow that belongs rightfully to Canada.

• (1550)

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on the immigration levels that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has just tabled before the House under the Immigration Act.

The minister has announced to us that Canada will take in next year a total of 195,000 to 220,000 immigrants and refugees, that is, between 171,000 and 187,000 immigrants and between 24,000 and 32,000 refugees.

He has just mentioned the efforts that Canada is making in favour of refugees. I have taken note of the fact that we have made some efforts regarding nationals from the former Yugoslavia. I would also like the minister to make additional efforts in the case of other countries and other continents, particularly in assisting women and children in distress. I think that we should put an emphasis on women and children in distress, who represent the majority of refugees in the world. Quebec will accept 27,000 immigrants and refugees next year, a quota that was established by the province in accordance with the Canada–Quebec agreement.

We generally agree with the number determined by the minister and his government. In fact, it is almost the same plan as the one he submitted to us last year, except for slight changes. The first change is a small increase of 5,000 new immigrants; the second one is that 3,500 immigrants who are subject to a removal order that is not yet in effect will be admitted for humanitarian reasons; the third change is that a new category has been established, that is, candidates sponsored by a province or a territory. A thousand new immigrants are expected in this category.

The minister has just shown his willingness to work in partnership with the provinces and the territories, but he only foresees 1,000 immigrants for the nine provinces and the two territories. That is not much. That is not a serious effort of decentralization and co–operation with the provinces. We know that the provinces, except Quebec, which already has very definite powers in that field, are also asking for powers concerning immigration. Manitoba and Saskatchewan come to mind, in this regard.

The minister's 1994 figures indicated Canada would receive between 190,000 and 215,000 immigrants in 1995. In fact, for the first eight months of this year, Canada has had only 132,000 new immigrants. I estimate that the total will not exceed 200,000 by the end of this year.

It must be pointed out that potential immigrants are less attracted to Canada, particularly those from many Asian countries. Many naturally prefer to go to the U.S. or Australia, or other countries with a high rate of economic growth. This is the case despite considerable Canadian government investment in advertising and promotion to recruit new immigrants in many countries.

The greatest obstacle, however, without a doubt for new immigrants is the $975 entry tax on top of the $500 up front processing fee. This tax represents an enormous barrier to people from poor countries.

In addition to setting immigration quotas, the minister ought to have announced measures to reduce delays in processing immigration files. Despite some efforts by the minister, which I am prepared to acknowledge, an application for permanent residence in Canada sometimes takes 18 months or more. So refugees who have been here a year or two awaiting refugee status have to wait another year or more to gain resident status, when they can bring in their spouse and children. It is inhumane to keep families apart for such long periods of time. The minister will have to take the appropriate steps on this.

I would also like to denounce the abusive use of DNA testing to prove parent–child relationships. Many members of the Haitian community in my riding of Bourassa, in Montreal North and in all of Montreal complain that departmental employees, particularly in the Canadian embassy in Port–au–Prince, require tests which they feel are discriminatory.

I should add that a DNA test costs $1,000 and, naturally, they often cannot afford it. It should be enough to present a birth certificate to prove kinship.

I would like the minister to tell us what justification there can be for this to be made a practice of in the case of Haitians. Why are European immigrants not subject to the same requirement, except in rare instances? These measures often work against the family reunification program just mentioned by the minister as being a priority for this government.

I would like to talk about the immigration tax in particular. Since its implementation in the last federal budget, the Bloc Quebecois has repeatedly expressed its opposition to this tax, and has opposed this $975 fee immigrants and refugees have to pay to become landed immigrants.

Numerous organizations in Quebec and in Canada have condemned this discriminatory measure and have campaigned against it. Last October 28, which was the national day against the head tax, the Montreal refugee services organisations round table reiterated its opposition to the settlement fees for refugees, immigrants and their families. This very respectable organization said this tax imposed an intolerable and discriminatory burden on these people.

Canada is the only country in the world which has decided to impose such fees on refugees recognized as such under the Geneva Convention. It should be pointed out that the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has voiced very serious concerns about this dangerous precedent.

Bob White, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, said that the head tax is basically contrary to Canadian values of equity, equality and progress.

• (1600)

He added that rich immigrants are able to pay this tax, but that most African, Asian or Latin–American people who want to immigrate to Canada or come as refugees cannot afford to do so. I seize this opportunity to ask the minister why the number of immigrants and refugees from Latin America keeps on getting smaller year after year. For a number of years now, it has been almost impossible to come to Canada from Latin America.

The loans system established to help those who have to pay this tax did not work. A moment ago, an official told us they have no way to assess the impact of this tax abroad. A lot of loan requests are rejected because the candidate will not have the money to repay the loan.

Once again, I ask the minister to put an end to this tax, at least for refugees. I remind him that even some of his Liberal colleagues made such a request regarding refugees. My wife, my two children and I came from Chile in 1974. If we had had over $4,000 to pay in landing fees in order to have our application examined by immigration authorities, we would never have been able to come.

Worse still, all the money collected, estimated at $146 million for 1995, goes into general revenue instead of being used for settlement services for immigrants. Of course, despite the immigration tax which, as I just said, will bring in $146 million in 1995, the transfer of responsibilities to NGOs for immigration and integration of new arrivals will mean a drastic reduction in funds and services.

Already, hundreds of civil servants have lost their jobs with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. In 1996 alone, the government will cut the number of civil servants by 20 per cent at headquarters and in the regions. Once again, I condemn these massive cuts of civil servants.

In short, I am asking the minister to pay more attention to the reports issued by the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration. It has issued several reports which were tabled in this House, but we never had any feedback from the minister. Although many witnesses have come before the committee and much effort was spent on this, the minister has not bothered to respond to these reports.

I will conclude by saying that the minister should take additional measures to launch an education and awareness campaign, directed at the Canadian people, on the contributions and other positive influence of immigrants in our society.

[English]

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as I stand today to respond to the minister's statement on immigration levels for the coming year, I am not particularly reassured by the minister's glowing picture of the state of Canada's immigration policy.

The minor increase in actual immigration numbers is somewhat irrelevant, as the actual number of immigrants who will be arriving this year is closer to the lower levels of projections for this year and will probably be the same next year. However, by announcing a modest increase of 5 per cent, the government can say it is moving closer to its red book promise.

The Liberal red book states: "We would continue to target immigration levels of approximately 1 per cent of the population each year". That works out to approximately 300,000 immigrants a year, and we are only at two–thirds of that total. I would suggest this is a much more reasonable number than the red book promise, but a number that is still likely to cause difficulty.

Part of the problem with these numbers is that the minister's own department is having difficulty handling and processing the applications. Last month one of the managers from the Vegreville office spoke to MPs' staff in the Vancouver area. At that time he announced that the Vegreville office had a backlog of over 15,000 files, with 7,000 of those files being over a year old. If we have that type of backlog now, what is going to happen if the Department of Citizenship and Immigration proceeds with its proposed cutbacks of up to 25 per cent of its staff?

Another interesting aspect of this announcement on new levels is the new category of provincial–territorial nominees. This new category will give the provinces and territories, with the exception of Quebec, the ability to share a grand total of 1,000 immigrants. As I said, with the exception of Quebec. Under the Canada–Quebec accord, Quebec already has sole responsibility for the selection of immigrants destined for that province. This applies only to economic immigrants. Nevertheless, last year Quebec had the ability to choose more than 11,000 economic immigrants who came to that province. In a sense of fairness, the federal government has decided to permit the rest of the provinces and territories to have a say in selecting a total of 1,000.

The numbers show another interesting aspect of the Canada–Quebec accord. Under this arrangement Quebec received $90 million to spend on settlement in that province. The federal government in turn spent about $270 million in the rest of Canada. Thus, Quebec's share was about one–quarter of the total allotment, which was fairly consistent with Quebec's one–quarter of the population in Canada and was fairly consistent with Quebec's intent to settle 47,000 of the immigrants to the country, or one–quarter. However, a funny thing happened on the way to the forum. Quebec settled only 26,000 immigrants last year, which is only 13 per cent of the total. Yet it still received $90 million, or approximately one–quarter of all settlement dollars.

Next year Quebec will settle only 27,000 immigrants and refugees, or approximately 12 to 13 per cent of the total. Yet it will still receive $90 million, or 25 per cent of the funding.

Given Premier Parizeau's comments about the ethnic vote in Quebec, I can understand why immigrants are reluctant to move to that province. However, the reality is that the federal government is now funding the settlement of immigrants in Quebec at a rate twice that of the rest of Canada.

Levels, numbers and dollars are only one part of the equation. Canadians are just as concerned about the quality of the immigrants we are receiving as we are about the number of immigrants we are receiving. Polls show there is not a great deal of public support for Canada's current immigration in this nation. The government likes to say it is because of the Reform Party that such support is down. While I appreciate the government's acknowledging our influence, I must inform its members that our party is just reflecting the concerns of ordinary Canadians.

Ordinary Canadians get upset when they hear that 14 per cent of sponsorship obligations are in default, to the tune of $700 million in 1993. They get upset when they read in the September 30 edition of the Ottawa Citizen that 19 per cent of welfare recipients in the Ottawa–Carleton region are immigrants and refugees. They want this government to get tough on sponsors who default on their obligations. Instead, they hear about cases like Mohammed Assaf.

In 1989 Mohammed Assaf sponsored his brother and family to settle in Alberta. Within two years his brother's family went on welfare. The Alberta taxpayers have had to shell out $40,000 in welfare payments. Despite attempts by the Alberta social services to collect the money from Mohammed, the sponsor, he ignored them. He then wanted to sponsor his second wife to come to Canada. In their wisdom, the immigration department officials said no, he could not sponsor her because he had an outstanding sponsorship obligation already.

Mohammed Assaf paid back $8,000 of his $40,000 obligation and then came up with a better idea: He would appeal to the IRB. Guess what happened? The IRB members said: "Do not worry about your debt to the Canadian taxpayer, we will let you sponsor your second wife here anyway".

What kind of message does this send, not only to the immigrant community but to the Canadian public at large? Outrageous IRB decisions like this one undermine everything the minister says he is trying to do to rectify the problem of defaulted sponsorship.

It is not good enough to blame the IRB. The members of the board are patronage appointees the minister installed. It is somewhat ironic that everything the minister is trying to accomplish through his department is being undone by the political hacks he appointed to the IRB.

While the percentage of immigrants who arrive in this country via the family reunification aspect of immigration is being reduced, it is still a major problem area. Most Canadians will acknowledge that the reunification of family members is a valid goal. However, this reunification must be limited to immediate family.

As reported in one of the studies incorporated in the book Diminishing Returns, over recent years each individual who has immigrated to Canada under the family class has had a multiplier effect of an additional seven immigrants. Unfortunately, many of these are solely done for money, be they arranged marriages for a large dowry or outright sham marriages. I have been informed of one case in which a woman was upset because she was having difficulty sponsoring her fourth husband in four years. Shams like these contribute to bringing the whole system into disrepute.

On the plus side, we have those immigrants who do make a positive contribution to Canada's economy. Studies consistently show that these people make more money than native–born Canadians.

Last year the minister proudly announced that the percentage of economic immigrants will rise from 43 per cent to 55 per cent of all immigration. While this may sound good, it is somewhat deceptive. In fact the majority of immigrants who come under the economic class are not those high income earners but the dependants of high income earners. In reality, only 17 per cent of those in the immigrant class are these high income individuals. When we add refugees to the equation, only 14 per cent of all newcomers to the country are economic immigrants.

Unfortunately, many of these individuals are becoming disillusioned with what they find here. Media reports from Vancouver recently indicated that many of these immigrants who arrived from Hong Kong are returning to Hong Kong. They cite the high and numerous taxes in Canada as well as endless government regulations that tend to discourage the creation of wealth as the main reasons they are leaving. Is it not ironic that these individuals believe they will be better off from a business perspective under the communist regime of the People's Republic of China in a couple of years than they are under the Liberal government today?

Finally, I would like to discuss Canada's acceptance of refugees. We have always been generous in accepting legitimate convention refugees, and we should continue to receive our share of those fleeing persecution from conflicts in Africa, Asia and the former Yugoslavia. Unfortunately, convention refugees are not necessarily what we are getting.

• (1615)

One of my staffers recently met with a young Somali refugee currently attending Ottawa University. The only problem is that this individual is neither a refugee nor a Somali. Rather he was born in neighbouring Djibouti and while a resident of France he came to Ottawa to go to university. When he started to run low on funds he went to a local Canada immigration office, claimed to be a Somali refugee and now the Canadian taxpayers are funding the rest of his education.

How about Tejinder Pal Singh, a convicted airline hijacker? He arrived in Canada, claimed refugee status under an alias and is now free on bail in Vancouver while the IRB hears his case.

If the government wants Canadians to openly accept refugees, then it had better make sure we are opening our doors to legitimate convention refugees and not murderers, hijackers or scam artists.

If the government wants all Canadians to support its immigration policy, then it had best make sure that it is bringing in people who want to make a positive contribution to our country, and not in the minister's own words the "wretched refuse" from "teeming shores".

CORRECTIONS AND CONDITIONAL RELEASE ACT

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–355, an act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act (arrest without warrant).

He said: Madam Speaker, this is a short bill to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act. It would allow police forces throughout the land to arrest without warrant a person who is in breach of a condition of parole or statutory release. It has been stated to me by a number of police officers throughout the country that if they had the ability to do this, they would be able to prevent a number of crimes from happening. I believe that prevention is a major concern and a major goal of all parties of the House.

When the idea was presented to me by the police forces, it was thought that it would be an extremely useful preventive tool. It would prevent death, injury and harm to property and lives of other Canadians. I hope this will become law soon.

AGRICULTURE AND AGRI–FOOD ADMINISTRATIVE MONETARY PENALTIES ACT

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.) moved that Bill C–61, an act to establish a system of administrative monetary penalties for the enforcement of the Canadian Agricultural Products Act, the Feeds Act, the Meat Inspection Act, the Pest Control Products Act, the Plant Protection Act and the Seeds Act, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak for a very few minutes this afternoon at the final stage of consideration given to Bill C–61, the agriculture and agri–food administrative monetary penalties act.

I am very pleased to be able to report to the House, as has been noted earlier in our debates, that this legislation enjoys the solid support of key Canadian agri–food industry associations. Members of the House have already had ample opportunity to consider the bill in detail. Members are well aware of the benefits of Bill C–61 and there is very broad support in the House for the principle of what we are trying to accomplish. Therefore, my comments today will be brief and to the point as I reiterate just a few of the highlights of Bill C–61.

First, this bill will provide my department's officials with a broader range of measures to effectively enforce food safety and quality regulations. For example, they will have the authority and the power to impose monetary penalties and to negotiate solutions to violation situations rather than over–reliance, which has been the case in the past, on the only tool available to them, criminal prosecution.

The bill allows the government to meet industry demands for a system that applies equal and consistent enforcement practices against both importers and domestic companies that market products which do not meet Canadian health, safety or quality standards. This will help to create a level playing field for the domestic food industry.

Bill C–61 will strengthen our enforcement at border points. It will do so by allowing us to issue monetary penalties at ports of entry for violations committed by the travelling public who attempt illegally to bring meat and plant products into Canada that could introduce animal or plant diseases that do not naturally occur in our country.

Bill C–61 is fair and it is expedient. It allows for negotiated solutions for non–compliance. Administrative monetary penalties can be reduced to zero if a violator takes immediate corrective action to come into compliance. After all, that is the objective, to achieve compliance. This results in a better product and more effective enforcement. In this way the system emphasizes compliance and not punishment.

Finally, Bill C–61 will improve the competitiveness of Canadian industry while helping to maintain Canada's well–established international reputation for high quality health and safety standards.

The use of monetary penalties is not a new concept in the federal regulatory system. It is consistent with initiatives that are being undertaken by other departments. Similar systems to the one we are proposing in Bill C–61 are in use by the Department of Transport and by the Department of Human Resources Development.

One point was raised in the committee discussion of Bill C–61, and was raised at the report stage here in the House, which I should deal with for just a moment is the erroneous suggestion that my parliamentary secretary might have in some way misled members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food with respect to the letters of support my department received from industry associations during the consultation process related to this bill.

Industry stakeholders have been kept fully informed of the progress of Bill C–61 right from day one. They will continue to be informed until the legislation is ultimately enacted.

Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada started the consultation process on the bill in early 1992. That was during a regulatory review process. The regulatory review confirmed that there was very broad industry support for the concept of an administrative monetary penalty system.

Later in October 1992 a letter was sent by Dr. Art Olson, the assistant deputy minister in my department for the food production and inspection branch. That letter went to all affected industry associations, including those referred to in the list of industry associations which was provided to the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food during its consideration of Bill C–61.

The letter from Dr. Olson informed all of those industry organizations of the department's intention to introduce a system of administrative monetary penalties. The department also during that period engaged in face to face negotiations with a number of relevant groups. After that initial contact and consultation with industry, my department received a number of letters of support from industry organizations.

On the day Bill C–61 was tabled in the House for the first time in December 1994 another letter was sent by my department, this time to 132 industry associations to inform them specifically that the process had moved beyond the consultation stage, beyond the drafting stage to the point at which there was now a formal bill printed and ready to go. It was important to inform the industry of that progress.

In addition to the letter to the 132 industry associations, included in the package was a four–page background document outlining all the important provisions of Bill C–61. The letter in December 1994 specifically invited representatives of the industry to follow up with the department if they had any questions or concerns. A few inquiries came in for further detail.

It is important to note that during that process not one of those organizations, the 132 industry associations consulted, indicated it had changed its position of support for Bill C–61. At the same time the second letter went out a news release was sent to more than 1,000 media and industry contacts to make sure they were informed as well.

Since December 1994 until now the process has moved along through the various parliamentary stages. In recent weeks departmental officials have contacted 10 of the industry associations that had originally indicated support for the legislation. These are the associations referred to by the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster when he raised questions as to whether these organizations were still supportive of Bill C–61.

Those organizations have been contacted once again to reconfirm their position. Of those 10 organizations mentioned by the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster only three said they had ever been contacted by the Reform Party. Nine said they fully continue to support this legislation. The tenth involved a person who had just come on to the job in the last number of weeks and was not yet in a position to express an opinion.

The department is making arrangements to ensure the individual in that important position will be fully briefed by the department on all the details of Bill C–61.

It is quite obvious the consultative effort here has been lengthy and thorough. The information provided to the committee and to the House by the government and representatives of the government with respect to this consultative process has been complete and accurate.

• (1635)

The process of bringing Bill C–61 now to its final stage in the House has been a good process. There has been ample time for good discussion. Many ideas have been brought forward in that process, either informally in the drafting stage or formally in the form of amendments in committee and in the House which have been very useful. The government has demonstrated openness and flexibility in dealing with all of these ideas. A number of those proposed amendments were accepted by the government and have been incorporated into what is now the final draft of Bill C–61.

The bill will provide for a system which will deal with violations and potential violations of health and safety rules and regulations. It will be faster, fairer, more cost effective and more flexible in order to increase compliance with all of our health and safety regulations pertaining to agriculture and agri–food and also to assist Canadian agri–food businesses in winning and maintaining a competitive edge.

With the thorough discussion we have had with respect to this legislation and all of the proposed amendments, I urge my fellow members of the House on both sides to support Bill C–61 and to give it speedy passage on its way to the other place.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Madam Speaker, I was not present during last week's debate on Bill C–61. It is my friend and colleague, the member for the riding of Lotbinière next to mine, who participated in the debate in this House on the official opposition's amendments to Bill C–61.

As you know full well, I had to work hard in my riding of Frontenac to campaign against my colleague who sits on the opposition benches in the National Assembly in order to obtain a yes majority in that riding. I take this opportunity to thank my constituents for supporting the option of sovereignty with partnership.

I, however, read these proceedings carefully and I must say I am surprised by the government members' frivolous comments on our amendments. Nevertheless, the Bloc Quebecois feels that Bill C–61 will allow the Department of Agriculture and Agri–Food to meet several of its objectives, in particular relieving pressure on the courts and the resulting savings for taxpayers. In this regard, the Bloc Quebecois agrees with the principle of administrative monetary penalties.

We, however, cannot support the bill as tabled by the government for a very simple reason, namely that the federal Department of Transport implemented a system of monetary penalties without allowing offenders to negotiate these penalties with the department. We in the official opposition see this opportunity to negotiate penalties as the Achilles heel of the bill. Yet, the federal department of agriculture did not consider the amendments put forward by the Bloc Quebecois and continues to support the principle of penalty negotiation.

That is why the Bloc Quebecois thinks that this bill could have a major impact on the way justice is served.

• (1640)

Judicial power differs from legislative power. Here, in the House of Commons, we can discuss, improve, analyze and review bills, but when it comes to implementing them, the judicial system takes over. In a self–respecting society, the judicial system must never have a close and direct link with the legislative power. Otherwise, what kind of society would we be living in? Does the government seek to have a totalitarian society in which our fellow citizens would be accountable to their elected representatives, and in which the judicial system would lose its authority? I certainly hope that we will not live in a totalitarian regime.

Consequently, it is very unfortunate that the federal government flatly rejected the amendments proposed by the Bloc Quebecois. These amendments sought to eliminate the risk of arbitrary decisions in the administration of penalties.

The Minister of Agriculture should recognize that the compliance agreements and negotiations which he will allow to reduce the penalty imposed on an offender are not exactly what the doctor ordered to reach his objective, which is to reduce the workload of the courts.

As his colleague, the Minister of Transport, knows from experience, it is much more beneficial for an offender to immediately pay a fine than to go to the courts, particularly if he knows that his is a lost cause. The monetary penalty system is, in itself, a good enough incentive to encourage the offender to settle the issue out of court. Any compliance agreement to reduce the penalty does not do anything more, except create a major risk of unfairness in the administration of penalties.

The amendments tabled by the Bloc Quebecois, through the hon. member for Lotbinière, sought to abolish any form of compliance agreement or negotiation between the department and the offender. The Minister of Agriculture has not convinced us, far from it, that there is no risk of arbitrary decision in this monetary penalty system. We still feel that the negotiation process allowing a departmental officer to reduce the penalty of an offender is unfair and, more importantly, dangerous for a democracy.

The member for Brandon—Souris justified the quick rejection of the amendments proposed by the Bloc Quebecois by saying, and I quote: "The important thing in these matters is that compliance is achieved. Whether or not there is a reduced or an increased penalty is secondary in most cases to bringing about the change by the perpetrator of the infraction".

The Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food fully agreed with that earlier when he said that compliance is more important than enforcement.

I was talking with the chief of police of a small community in my riding who had to go to Sherbrooke to testify. To show how ridiculous the fines and penalties have become, he told me that people indicted on seven or eight charges for offences at their summer cottages passed him on his way back to his community, such was the speed with which they had been able to settle the fines. Despite the jail sentences provided for in the case of such offences, they were dealt with so fast that they passed the chief of police at high speed, and made gestures I would not dare make in the House.

• (1645)

Our police forces are so dispirited that often they wonder whether they should do their job or close their eyes and pretend not to see, because our justice system is going downhill and bankrupt.

In other words, the hon. member for Brandon—Souris feels what matters is compliance, not whether the law is enforced fairly or not. He cannot answer that question. I am sorry, but in Quebec we do not buy that kind of justice.

Make no mistake, the amendments put forward by the Bloc Quebecois were not to abolish the monetary penalty system. As I said earlier, the Bloc Quebecois agrees with this principle which will help to reduce the caseload of the courts.

However, this is a new and intelligent approach, especially in times of financial crisis. Having said that, the caseload of the courts should not be reduced and a parallel justice system should not be created if it means the implementation of an arbitrary justice system. The possibility of negotiating the penalty with civil servants introduces an unacceptable bias in the penalty process.

More specifically, after noticing an offence, officials of the Production and Inspection Branch will recommend to their director the appropriate penalty to impose. We therefore have a centralized decision process and the department maintains that the regulations eliminate the risk of arbitrary decisions. But that is not true. It is not true and indeed the government has not even seen fit to introduce the regulations, even though they are very important in this case, to assess the relevancy of a negotiation system to reduce the penalties.

A departmental official is authorized to reach an agreement with the offender to reduce the penalty by $1 for every $2 the company will invest to improve its procedures, buy new equipment or train its employees. We are against such a principle. In our justice system, penalties are not negotiable. I repeat: in our justice system, penalties are not negotiable.

I look at my colleague, the hon. member for Brome—Missisquoi, who once was the president of the bar in his district. He knows full well that someone who has been found guilty of an offence does not have the opportunity to negotiate his or her penalty or sentence, far from it.

Imagine, Madam Speaker, that you are on highway 401 going to Montreal and that an OPP officer stops you for speeding, for example. You start to negotiate with him. You are guilty, you were doing 140 kilometres an hour and you negotiate with the OPP officer: "Look, I was doing 140, I was going down a hill, the car started to go faster, so be indulgent with me. I am the Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons. Write down on the ticket that I was doing 121 kilometres or just let me go."

Would that kind of double-standard justice be acceptable? No. I do not think, Madam Speaker, that Quebecers would accept that you negotiate your speeding ticket with an OPP officer, let alone with an officer of the Sûreté du Québec, because it would not be appropriate for a member of Parliament, especially for the Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, to do so. And it is possible with this legislation that agricultural producers and people in related industries could negotiate, by mutual agreement, an unprecedented reduction of their penalty.

This could have an adverse effect on the viability and also on the reliability of our agricultural products here, in Canada. I heard that it was possible to negotiate a speeding ticket, but you certainly understand as well as I do that it is not an ideal situation. In this case, an offender who is better off financially and who would be in a position to invest in order to correct a particular situation would be rewarded for that through a reduction of his or her penalty. For each $2 invested, the penalty would be reduced by $1. This way, the person who has enough money could have the penalty reduced to zero, whereas the person who does not have that much money could not settle the matter in the same way. Therefore, this proposal would introduce some inequity into our justice system.

People or businesses would not be treated equally; they would be treated according to their spending power. Moreover, who would assess the cost of the efforts made by a person or a business to correct a particular situation? For instance, training may cost more in a particular region, and the same applies to equipment, which means some individuals and companies will be penalized.

Will they be informed of all the approaches available to them to correct the situation? What happens in the case of padded invoices involving collusion by suppliers? If we are looking for incentives to step up training and investment in a company, we should improve on methods that already exist, such as fiscal or other incentives, but these should not be used to negotiate a penalty.

The bill also calls for a 50 per cent reduction in the penalty if the person who commits the violation pays the fine without challenging the decision or requesting a review by a tribunal. I repeat, we are opposed to this concept. Under our legal system, the presumption of innocence is a fundamental right. Madam Speaker, I would like to go back to the example I mentioned earlier. You are clocked at 140 kilometres per hour, and your fine is $225. You get your ticket, you pay on the spot or within seven to ten days, but under this particular system, if you pay without challenging your ticket, the fine is halved.

So $225 divided by two is $112.50. To avoid clogging the courts, the fine will be reduced by 50 per cent. This is ridiculous. Unless of course the government has a brilliant idea and decides to double the fines while at the same time introducing incentives. In that case, it is misrepresenting the enforcement of this legislation.

Under our legal system, the presumption of innocence is a fundamental right. For instance, in a situation that could go either way, the company or individual is given to understand that they are better off paying the fine without further ado.

The individual is entitled to a review but is told: "Listen, you have a gun at your head". He will be told he has already been found guilty and that if he wants to reduce his penalty, the best thing is to pay up without a fuss. And what about the right to representation?

The Bloc Quebecois proposed amendments to ensure that the president and members of the tribunal who are responsible for reviewing decisions made by departmental officials are able to do so. The people who committed violations could, if they so desire, have a hearing before the tribunal in order to request a review of his penalty. However, the tribunal—listen to this, Madam Speaker, this is very important—is appointed by the minister and the mandate of its members is renewable. Members are to assess decisions made by departmental employees who obviously are answerable to the minister. Is there not a conflict of interest here?

People sitting on this tribunal who would like to see their mandate renewed for a second term would be more inclined to do the department's bidding, while someone who refuses to do so would not see his mandate renewed.

In any case, I was looking at the procedure used to appoint the president of the UI Board of Referees in Thetford, in my riding. The person appointed to chair this board and rule on UI disputes was probably a good choice politically speaking, because she is connected with the Quebec Liberal Party and the Liberal Party of Canada, but she has never seen a worker or an unemployed worker up close. Why not take someone who knows about unemployment insurance, other than in books, someone who has had experience with it? This is patronage. In any case, it would appear to be a recommendation from the Frontenac riding Liberal association, which was accepted.

I hope that we are not going to go the same route here in appointing people, that the appointees will already have had a close look at the system they are being asked to work on—in short, competent individuals. Maybe competence will mean having campaigned in the Liberal Party at both levels, in Quebec City and in Ottawa—this is what makes competent people.

To ensure greater transparency in the appointment of the chairperson and the members of the tribunal, we in the Bloc Quebecois have suggested that they be appointed by the minister with the approval of the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri-food. However, the members of this government represent the majority on the agriculture and agri-food committee, as elsewhere; they control it and always get their way.

We in the opposition, with our colleagues from the third party, simply ask questions. We propose resolutions, obviously, motions that are usually relegated to the shelves, because the government party makes use of its majority. They could have circulated their list of names of the chairperson and of the tribunal members, and have the committee validate it at least. They refused. And they say their party is democratic.

You all know that the world of agriculture is a very small one. However, once again, our amendments have been quickly dismissed with a wave of the hand. The government also showed it paid little attention to the proposals put forward by the official opposition. As the Bloc Quebecois agriculture critic in this House, I note that the government has never taken amendments proposed by the Bloc Quebecois into account in this area. Although we support the basic principle of a system of administrative monetary penalties, we are well aware that there was no need for the government to add a penalty bargaining system.

In fact, this is what officials from the department confirmed during their appearance before the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri-food. On its own, the monetary penalty system is enough of an incentive to free up the courts.

The Bloc Quebecois therefore vigorously opposes Bill C-61, because it establishes a system for penalty bargaining between officials and those who have committed violations. This new form of justice is not currently practised in Quebec. It seems to me to be contrary to Quebec traditions and to our system of justice. I suspect that this sort of consideration was not taken into account when the bill was drafted. I would be curious to see whether the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food would be prepared to revise this legislation if, on implementation, it proves to be in conflict with the traditions and values of Quebec society.

In short, this bill on monetary penalties has an interesting purpose: to relieve pressure on the courts.

What we in the opposition disagree with is the opportunity to negotiate penalties. This will, I am sure, lead to abuse, to negotiations under the table, to questionable negotiations.

Mr. Robichaud: No, no, no.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): Yes, questionable. This bill may hurt agriculture instead of helping it.

Mr. Robichaud: That will not happen.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): My colleague from Beauséjour knows full well that when a fisherman is caught red-handed in violation of federal legislation, we do not negotiate on the size of the fish he caught on the sly, or on anything else. The individual guilty of fishing off his riding will be caught and prosecuted.

As I said, the judicial and legislative branches of government must not sleep in the same bed. Never. Yet, there are many lawyers in this party. They should be the first ones to denounce Bill C-61 because it is flawed.

Mr. Robichaud: No. Jean-Guy, you just said that you would support it.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): No, we will not support it. I find it disturbing, Madam Speaker.

Its purpose is commendable. To take your own example, Madam Speaker, you get a $225 speeding ticket for driving 140 kilometres an hour and you pay it. If you pay it, will your fine be cut in half? No. And that is a good thing.

• (1705)

As my colleague who was president of the Bar in his region, the hon. member for Brome—Missisquoi, knows full well, the substance of the bill is valid. However, the possibility of negotiating fines—not up, of course, but down—raises serious questions regarding the viability of administering Bill C-61.

For these reasons, I will, in closing, remind you that the Bloc Quebecois will not join the government in supporting Bill C–61.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended today by 43 minutes, pursuant to Standing Order 33(2).

[English]

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise in the House to talk about Bill C–61, the agriculture and agri–food administrative monetary penalties act.

Plans for administrative monetary penalties have been on the books in the department of agriculture for at least a couple of years. Under a system of administrative monetary penalties, or the AMP system, an inspector who determines that a violation of an agri–food act has been committed can impose a fine on the offender rather than go through the judicial system. The main goal of the AMP system according to the department is to obtain compliance rather than to punish. The United States and some countries in Europe have been using an administrative monetary penalty system for some time.

The Reform Party is not opposed to the concept of administrative monetary penalties. We like the idea of a penalty system that is more efficient and cost effective, a system that helps individuals and companies to comply with regulations. In addition, most of the organizations I have talked to support the concept of administrative monetary penalties. However there is a difference between supporting the concept of an AMP system and supporting an AMP system as proposed in a piece of legislation.

Before I discuss the problems associated with the legislation, I believe it would be helpful to the House to give a short account of the history of Bill C–61 since it started some time ago. On December 5, 1994, Bill C–61 was given first reading in the House. Second reading of the bill was given on February 10 and 13 of this year. It was then referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food for consideration, and the standing committee reviewed the legislation on March 15, 23, 30 and April 4 of this year.

On March 15 departmental officials explained the bill's provisions and answered questions. On March 23 Transport Canada officials explained the administrative monetary penalty system introduced in 1985 under the Aeronautics Act and answered questions. On March 30 Ghislaine Richard, former vice–president of the Civil Aviation Tribunal, provided evidence to the committee on the function of the tribunal particularly as it related to the implementation of Transport Canada's administrative monetary penalty system, and she answered questions.

On April 4, Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada officials returned to respond to concerns expressed by the members about disincentives to contest charges, the burden of proof criteria for adjusting the penalty amount and other issues raised during discussion of the bill. The bill was then put to bed and because of the criticism of the bill we thought it may never come to prominence in the House again.

I raised a point in committee and in the House which the minister of agriculture commented on a few minutes ago. In committee the parliamentary secretary for agriculture handed out a list of industry associations that he claimed had personally endorsed Bill C–61. He also suggested there were letters available that would verify this endorsement and that we were welcome to request copies of the letter if we chose to do so.

We requested the letters of endorsement and found that a majority of the letters had been written two to three years before the bill was tabled in the House last December. We acknowledge the fact that the department of agriculture consulted with the industry associations. However we have some qualms about the way the parliamentary secretary for agriculture presented the facts or lack of facts to me and my colleagues with regard to the endorsement of the legislation.

Most of the letters to the department endorsed the concept of an AMPS but not necessarily the bill as it exists before the House today.

The minister of agriculture suggested that we had only contacted three on the list of organizations that we were given indication had endorsed Bill C–61. The minister is wrong. Since the list was submitted by the parliamentary secretary to the committee, we have contacted directly presidents or government relations people from eight of the eleven organizations on the list.

In several cases the signatories of the letters were no longer with the organization. This presented a problem in tracking down the appropriate spokesperson. The eight organizations that we directly contacted included those on the list of the parliamentary secretary that he distributed to the committee. We were unable to speak with some of the people because they were no longer in the organizations they used to represent.

The parliamentary secretary indicated that these were the letters of endorsement he had on file for Bill C–61, and that was not true. Bill C–61 was not in existence when the letters were written. Perhaps, as the minister suggested, there was some other correspondence with these organizations. He certainly has not given us copies of any further endorsements of Bill C–61 and what date the endorsements came about. He told us he issued press releases and had communications with 100–odd organizations but he has never given us any hard copies that would validate his claims.

When we contacted the people whose names had been given by the parliamentary secretary, they were quite surprised to find out there was a Bill C–61. On a few occasions they asked for a copy of the bill and said that if they are supposed to have endorsed the bill they should at least see what it is, what it is all about and what are the details of the bill. They were rather shocked.

The minister did not clearly respond to our concerns. Specific letters were given to us that were alleged to have been support for Bill C–61. That was not true. They were not letters of support for Bill C–61. They were letters written before the Liberal government was even elected to the House of Commons.

The information we were given was wrong. If that is any indication of how the department of agriculture runs or any reflection on the capabilities of the minister of agriculture and his parliamentary secretary, those of us who are farmers certainly have a great deal to be concerned about.

As I have already mentioned, the Reform Party endorses the AMP system, but we want to know if the department of agriculture consulted the industry associations one time and then did whatever it pleased, or if it actually took the time to address some of the industry's concerns. The industry had some concerns that it put forward in letters that were not letters of support for Bill C–61 but were letters that said they supported an AMP concept.

Only after we raised a stink in the House did the minister's office call industry associations for approval. As the minister readily admitted in his speech, he had to go back and contact the organizations. I think we hit a raw nerve or created a bit of a stir. We actually followed up the leads and caused some problems for the minister because he had not done his homework and he did not know what was going on.

In talking to some industry associations about Bill C–61 there was substantial concern regarding its implementation. Associations, producers and processors want assurances the system will be applied fairly, uniformly and consistently across all programs and regions.

When department of agriculture officials appeared before the committee they repeatedly made reference to the importance of a safe food supply for Canadians and the impact the AMP system would have in ensuring that it was possible.

While some of the violations will undoubtedly touch the issue of food safety, many of the other violations will be of a technical variety. For example, the printing on a label may be a centimetre too small or there may be problems importing a certain type of herbicide that has been used in the United States for a number of years without complications.

One of the national industry agencies we consulted had reservations about the application of penalties due to technical violations of regulations such as the examples listed above. There were concerns and these organizations felt their concerns had not been properly addressed by the minister.

It would be good if the minister would clarify the situation and give us proof of recent communications with these organizations. He should give us some letters dated 1995, not 1992 or 1993.

On March 23 and March 30, 1995 meetings of the committee raised some serious concerns for members on this side of the House as well as on the other side. At that time I was not part of the agriculture committee but I have had the opportunity to review the minutes from the proceedings in question. One of the main concerns raised by committee members was the issue of due diligence.

• (1715)

Under the original legislation as it appeared before the committee the clause in question, clause 18, read as follows:

> A person named in a notice of a violation does not have a defence by reason that the person
> (a) exercised due diligence to prevent the violation; or
> (b) reasonably and honestly believed in the existence of facts that, if true, would exonerate the person.

This clause explicitly left out due diligence as a defence for individuals served a notice of violation. This provoked questions delving into whether the system of AMP should operate on a strict liability regime or an absolute liability regime. Strict liability means it has to be proven someone committed the violation with intent. Absolute liability does not consider the intent with which the person committed the violation and therefore does not allow for defence under due diligence.

Mr. Mazowita, director of legislation and compliance for Transport Canada, who appeared as a witness before the committee, commented on this question with respect to the aviation environment:

> In the aviation environment we find it appropriate to provide for the defence of due diligence—there can be all kinds of circumstances in which a pilot or a commercial operator or manufacturer has done everything reasonable that a pilot or air carrier manufacturer could be expected to do, and in our program we don't believe it is necessary to punish individuals or companies who act in good faith in such a manner.

The question was then raised of why would a defence of due diligence be workable under the Aeronautics Act but not under the agriculture administrative penalty?

This is not the first time concerns about due diligence were raised. In a memorandum dated February 16, 1995 from the general counsel to the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, these concerns were outlined. Edgar H. Schmidt, in a memo quoted the following principle which was made by the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Reference re Section 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act. It stated:

> It has from time immemorial been part of our system of laws that the innocent not be punished. This principle has long been recognized as an essential element of a system for the administration of justice which is founded upon a belief in the dignity and worth of the human person and on the rule of law.
> In my view it is because absolute liability offends the principles of fundamental justice that this Court created presumptions against legislatures having intended to enact offences of a regulatory nature falling within that category.
> Indeed, as I said, in penal law, absolute liability always offends the principles of fundamental justice irrespective of the nature of the offence.

Mr. Schmidt, in commenting further on the question of absolute liability, said the following:

> Since the advent of the Charter, certain principles take precedence even over the enactment of the legislatures. With respect to offences of absolute liability, the Supreme Court of Canada has held that section 7 of the Charter——which says that everyone has the right to life, liberty, the security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof, except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice—

> —prohibits the creation of absolute liability offences that may be punished by imprisonment. In essence the Court held that while all absolute liability offences offend the principles of fundamental justice, only when such offences interfere with the right to life, liberty or security of the person do they offend section 7 of the Charter. Since the violations contemplated by Bill C–61 cannot result in imprisonment, it is not likely that they offend the particular interests protected by section 7. However, that does not change the fact that in making violations matters of absolute liability, the bill offends the principles of fundamental justice.

Clause 18(a) of Bill C–61 effectively places violations in that category which the Supreme Court of Canada characterized as absolute liability offences. It is worth noting that violations under the bill would for the most part be a contravention of the act or regulations that would also constitute either summary conviction offences or indictable offences.

The effect of the bill is to permit the minister to transform any of the matters which are presently solely strict liability offences into matters which are also absolute liability violations by simply designating them under clause 4 of the bill. These are not my observations, but the observations of Mr. Schmidt who certainly knows what he is talking about.

The office of the minister of agriculture responded to Mr. Schmidt's concerns by suggesting that an absolute liability standard was "to ensure high standards of care for regulatees, in light of the risk that non–compliance may have on human health and safety".

The Reform Party is also in favour of ensuring high standards and protecting human health. If there are concerns that human health is at risk, I would classify that as an offence. If an individual is to be charged with an offence, that person would have the option of using the defence of due diligence, a right that is not available to individuals served a notice of violation. If someone commits a very serious offence, there is the right of due diligence as a defence. If a lesser violation is committed under Bill C–61 there is no right of due diligence as a tool of defence.

I should make it clear that not all violations under agriculture and agri–food acts can be classified even as a threat to human health and safety. The Liberals and the department of agriculture have repeatedly said that absolute liability is the only way this system can work properly. I am sure the government across the floor is saying that there are provisions within the legislation to take account of the intent of the individual served the notice of violation.

In committee a week and a half ago we raised the point with regard to this issue. Both Mr. Phil Amudsen, director general of mid–west region food production and inspection branch and Mr. Reg Gatenby, chief, legislation, food production and inspection branch addressed the point rather haphazardly. I quote Mr. Amudsen:

> In the penalty matrix, intent is part of the evaluation of what the penalty will be—.So it is part of the penalty process, but it is not a defence for getting out of the whole violation.

For example, in the penalty matrix, intention falls under the gravity of misconduct and there are four levels of intention. The first level says: "Unknowingly or inadvertently committed a violation or voluntarily disclosed and took steps to prevent reoccurrence". There are zero points charged for this category.

The second category is: "Degree of negligence (assess degree of control in place of precautions, feasibility, knowledge of hazards, degree of expertise)". For this type of violation three points are docked.

The third category is: "Intention unknown". It is a violation resulting from negligence and is docked three points for that category.

The fourth and final category is: "Knowingly committed a violation", for which five points are received.

A penalty matrix including intent is not a defence under due diligence. For example, an individual who exercised due diligence, depending on the gravity of the misconduct, will pay slightly less than the individual who knowingly committed a violation. This is not a fair system. There should be some sort of recourse for individuals to take that exercise due diligence. I am in favour of coming down hard on those individuals that intentionally and knowingly committed a violation, but we should be more lenient with those individuals who have exercised due diligence.

I will give an example. Under the Pest Control Products Act it states that farmers are to compensate for drift when they spray herbicides or pesticides. Every farmer knows that when the wind comes up they have very little control over the spray. Wind velocities and directions change in a matter of seconds. Under this legislation farmers could be charged even if they exercised due diligence in spraying. Later I will discuss a motion that we put forward regarding due diligence at report stage.

I also want to talk briefly about the time line of Bill C–61. When committee members reviewed the bill during the early part of this year, there were some serious concerns. I have only in the past few minutes addressed one of the many concerns that all parties had with the bill.

After April 24, 1995 this bill went into hiding. Why did the legislation go into hiding for over half a year? Were the Liberals waiting for the smoke to blow over? The committee had some serious concerns with the legislation. They put forward a number of amendments in committee that were to be considered. Instead, when the committee resumed this fall with a number of new members on the committee, the amendments were from the department of agriculture. Although the department adopted a couple of what I would call token amendments, the major concerns were not addressed adequately, including an amendment dealing with due diligence.

What is the purpose of the committees if any well thought out amendments are tossed to the side in favour of departmental amendments only?

• (1725)

The red book on page 22 states: "In the House of Commons a Liberal government will give MPs a greater role in drafting legislation through House of Commons committees". That is what it said but it is certainly not what it is doing.

Last week when Bill C–61 was at report stage, the Liberals accepted three amendments from the Reform Party. We brought amendments forward at report stage simply because we knew there was no way these amendments would have passed through committee.

It was quite funny to watch the clause by clause debate at committee a couple of weeks ago. A number of new members appeared at the committee. They were imported especially for clause by clause study. The meeting was set up for a Monday evening, which is very strange for clause by clause. Actually only a couple of committee members really knew what was in the bill. One of them, to his credit, was the member for Malpeque on Prince Edward Island and the other was the parliamentary secretary, the one who had given us the information that turned out to be incorrect.

However, the rest of them were simply voting machines. In fact, the member for Dauphin—Swan River had the list of amendments from the department of agriculture that it had approved and at the appropriate time she would insert a duly approved amendment from the department. It was obvious that any other amendments that would have been put forward would have been summarily dismissed without due consideration.

That does not speak very well for the committee process in this House. It tells us the attitude of the Liberal government. It tells us that committee work for the most part is a baby–sitting service for Liberal backbenchers and not a place to deal with meaningful legislation.

Although the amendments that were accepted at report stage provided some well–needed clarification to the legislation, the government failed to accept the amendments that would not only make the AMP system better but more palatable to the industry, producers and those responsible for enforcement.

The Liberals, and in particular the member for Regina—Wascana, the minister of agriculture, patted themselves on the back suggesting they had exhibited a spirit of co–operation in accepting three Reform amendments. This government constructs the facade of democracy but inevitably disregards the constructive aspects of the consultative process.

I would now like to address the amendments I put forward at report stage. As I just mentioned, the Liberal government is unwilling to consider amendments that would have had a substantive bearing on the implementation of the act. The amendments were an attempt to quantify and qualify the powers of the minister, the powers of the tribunal to which the violators can appeal and to clarify certain parts of the acts and the rights and responsibilities of both the violator and the minister in enforcing and administering the monetary penalties and forming compliance agreements.

The first amendment that the Reform Party put forward at report stage under Motion No. 1 was to set out some guidelines with regard to the minister's powers. As it now stands, there is nothing in the legislation that determines the differences between violations which the AMP system addresses and an offence which the judicial system addresses.

This amendment would have required the minister to put forward some criteria. In committee, witnesses from the department of agriculture suggested that an extremely serious violation would be considered an offence and prosecution would fall under the court or justice system, whereas a very serious offence would fall under the AMP system.

The question I would like to ask is at what point does a violation cross the threshold and become an offence? There should be some sort of consistency across the board. To arbitrarily determine on the basis of each case whether the infraction is a violation or an offence is not fair and not reasonable.

Individuals and companies should be given a clear indication what procedure the department is following in the implementation of the AMP system. It is a disappointment when members opposite disregard an amendment that would provide greater clarification.

The way the act now reads the minister can use his power to prevent his friends from receiving the justice they deserve while throwing the book at political opponents. He can also go soft on violations in his own riding but be overly aggressive on alleged violations from an NDP or Reform riding. This can digress to the politics played at lower levels in the administration. There are no checks and balances, no criteria and no parameters to restrict this type of biased administration of the AMP system.

The second amendment put forward by the Reform Party under Motion No. 3 set out to lower the fines by half for first time violations with subsequent violations being subject to the original fines set out in the legislation.

While the hon. member for Malpeque suggested at report stage that the Reform Party, in dealing with the violations of law or quasi–law, wants to go all out and go for the jugular, I would beg to differ.

• (1730)

The Reform Party believes that some leniency should be shown to small business producers and processors for first time violations. Most of the violations that fall under the agriculture and agri–food act do not require that substantial fines be levied. Remember, we are not talking about serious indictable offences. We are talking about a small business, a producer or a processor. Given the economic situation they face today, they could easily be put out of business with the levels of fines proposed under the legislation.

If the parties offend for the second time it is then that we throw the book at them. It is only reasonable that this amendment should have been given consideration.

It is ironic that when we deal with violent offenders, serious criminals, the members on the Liberal side are so compassionate. They want to be so careful and protect the rights of those people, some of them vicious and malicious and repeat offenders. When it comes to small business, when it comes to people who make their living in agriculture or the processing industry, the Liberals want to be so strict. They want to come down with harsh monetary penalties, even on a first offence, and not even allow those people the right of due diligence in offering a defence.

You wonder about the priorities of this government. Sometimes it just makes you sick.

The third amendment we proposed at report stage, under Motion No. 4, was another one of common sense. It set out to identify the designated person serving notice of the violation. As I stated last Thursday, this is a common procedure that is useful, valuable, and will also protect the person who is alleged to have made the violation. I want to stress once again that this amendment was a common sense one and I thought the Liberals had enough common sense. Unfortunately, they did not even have that minute amount to accept the amendment we proposed.

The fourth amendment we put forward, under Motion No. 5, was to improve the legislation by giving the person served the notice of violation at least 45 days to pay or ask for a review by the minister or the tribunal. The legislation outlines that the minister can prescribe any regulations in the act that require prescribing, in other words, a blank cheque. The minister can do whatever he wants.

I believe that some of these regulations can be put within the act. The Liberal members keep repeating that including time frames in the legislation is impractical because it is very difficult to make future changes. The amendment put forth requires only a minimum time period to pay or ask for a review by the minister. The intent is to prevent the minister from arbitrarily and unreasonably setting the time period in which the individual served notice of violation has to pay.

This and similar amendments are necessary parameters to allow for industry confidence in the AMP system.

The minister under this act in two days can say either pay or ask for a review by the department or by the tribunal. Two days is unreasonable. There are no parameters. It is just a wide open field. It is hunting season year round in Bill C–61.

The fifth amendment that we proposed was put forward under Motion No. 11, setting out to prevent the minister from taking security above and beyond the gravity of the violation. This amendment provides clarification as to what is reasonable security. It parallels the acceptance of the Reform amendment to clause 10 which reads: "include a provision for the giving of reasonable security"—and that was an amendment accepted by the minister—"in a form and in an amount satisfactory to the minister as a guarantee that the person will comply with the compliance agreement".

This amendment is an incentive for the individual to comply with the agreement while at the same time it prevents abuse of the system by the minister.

I would also like to comment on the sixth amendment we proposed. This amendment would have required the review tribunal to complete the review within six months of receiving the person's request for a review. This would have prevented reviews from taking longer than six months to complete. For the sake of expediency of the review process we put forward this amendment.

As I stated at report stage, cases could drag on for quite some time. This is certainly not fair to the accused, to the individual who is waiting for a review of his or her case. Most of all it is not fair to taxpayers to bear the cost of an ongoing review that could never end because there is no restriction as to how long it can continue.

All individuals who are affected by this legislation want a system that is expedient and cost effective. It is in the best interests of this House to make legislation that way and it disappoints me when the government refuses to accept constructive amendments.

The seventh amendment, proposed under Motion No. 19, was the most important amendment we put forward. This amendment sought to allow for the defence under due diligence and an individual should be exonerated if the person reasonably and honestly believed in the existence of fact that if true would exonerate the person.

I talked about this earlier in my speech and it was raised in committee. If our amendment had been accepted by the government, the concerns raised in committee by the general counsel and by industry officials would have been put to bed. However, they are still out there. Excluding due diligence from this legislation makes the bill flawed and not supportable for me and my colleagues. This is one of the main reasons we cannot accept Bill C–61.

The final amendment I will mention was Motion No. 23, which was proposed in the House at report stage. It deals with conflict of interest and appointments of the review tribunal. That amendment went one step further than the conflict of interest clause in stipulating that no government lobbyist or a person who has contracts with the federal government may be appointed to the tribunal.

When the governing party was the official opposition, when the Liberals sat over on this side of the House, there was an outcry from Liberal members almost on a daily basis about the Tory appointments to boards and tribunals. Guess what? Now that the Liberals have moved from this side to that side of the House, the Tory status quo seems to be okay.

We have been going through a time of crisis in our country with the threat of Quebec separation. It is time to start putting solutions on the table. One of the solutions to our problems, which is gaining some momentum and acceptance right across the country, is to move toward a more decentralized government.

One of the ways this federal government could put its money where its mouth is would be by not becoming so involved in appointments of every position it could possibly control from within the privy council. This government has not chosen to do that. It has chosen to have a hands on approach to every appointment on every board and quasi–judicial whatever.

That is offensive to Canadians right across the country. It has created incompetence. It could have a great negative impact upon the carrying out of administrative monetary penalties. It could have been corrected in this bill if strict conflict of interest guidelines had been placed in it. However, the Liberals chose the status quo. They chose to have their hand in the bag handing out the goodies to their friends. They wanted that option. They refused to shut the door on patronage and on being directly involved with patronage appointments.

We want this legislation to be clear and concise with regard to appointment practices. Convoluted legislation opens the door to abuses and downright confusion, as with the Income Tax Act. The Income Tax Act has become so complicated it has become a vehicle for loopholes, abuse and tax avoidance. The more government tinkers with it, the worse it seems to get.

That is why the member for Calgary Centre, the member for Capilano—Howe Sound and other of my colleagues are pushing this country to accept the flat tax. They are talking with Canadians from coast to coast about tax reform that will take away the confusion, take away the complexity and reduce the cost and the bureaucratic red tape. That is the way the department of agriculture should be moving as well.

If we could clean out some of the garbage in the bureaucracy and clean out the hands on approach to appointments, we would simplify the administration of monetary penalties, just as we would clean up the Income Tax Act if we implemented the flat tax.

The last two amendments I would like to speak about come from the less than loyal official opposition. It may seem strange, but it is true that we supported amendments put forward by the hon. member for Lotbinière. We were considering the same amendments, but the hon. member was able to table his amendments prior to ours.

One amendment requires that any governor in council appointment to the review tribunal be approved by the agriculture committee. The Reform Party fully supports this type of process. In fact the Liberal government supported it as well. The government supported it on paper. The Liberals supported it before the election. On page 92 of "Creating Opportunity: The Liberal Plan for Canada" it was stated: "We will establish mechanisms to permit parliamentary review of some senior order in council appointments".

Where are they? Where are those reviews? Where are the parliamentary committees involved in reviewing these appointments? We were told that the minister and the privy council had appointed somebody to be the chair of the CBC. It never came before the House of Commons. We turned on the news and found out that Perrin Beatty, former Tory MP, former member of the previous government that helped run up a debt of some $500 billion, was the president of the CBC. There was no input from us.

This piece of legislation allows for the formation of a tribunal, with no input from parliamentarians. We are sidelined. We are spectators. We are not participants in pulling the levers of government. We are just supposed to sit back and watch the action. If one is on the government side one has to politely applaud. If one is on the opposition side, the Liberal strategy is to ignore and barge on and hope they can buy the next election. Of course we know the dollars are gone and they cannot buy things any more. The chickens will come home to roost, just as they did for the Tories.

The Liberals are going to have big problems ahead justifying all these order in council appointments with no review whatsoever outside of the privy council, outside of the ministers and their deputy ministers.

I would like to ask the members opposite if anything has been accomplished lately with respect to parliamentary reviews of appointments. I would suggest that having the agriculture committee approve any appointments to the review tribunal would have been an excellent starting point.

I want to conclude by making one last point. The intent of the AMP system was not only to ensure compliance but to have a program that was consistent with those of the United States. It does not do much good if there is a harmonized AMP system with the U.S. while having two countries that lack harmonization or equivalency in requirements.

It is time for this government to pursue harmonization standards with countries it trades with. A number of farmers and biotech companies are expressing discontent with this government for disallowing or slowing the registration process for certain seed varieties or for certain herbicides.

One biotech company came to me and suggested that it was thinking of pulling out of Canada and taking the jobs it provided in Canada back to the United States if there were no changes forthcoming in the current process.

Millions upon millions of dollars are at stake here, not to mention the employment opportunities. If Canada is not willing to co–operate, companies will set up shop where the environment is more friendly.

The department of agriculture should have good reason when it refuses to authorize the use of a product or harmonize regulations with any of our major trading partners. At the present time it is extremely slow. It is bogged down and does not seem to come up with the goods very often.

In conclusion, as I already stated, incorporating the amendments put forward by the Reform Party in this piece of legislation would have made the bill better for all stakeholders. The Reform Party believes that an AMP system could be an effective way to increase compliance and be a much fairer way of addressing non–compliance than through the prosecution route. However, without the changes the Reform Party proposed we cannot support this legislation.

We are being heckled on the other side.

Some hon. members: No, no, no.

Mr. Hermanson: They are saying: "No, no, no. We do not want your reasonable approach; we do not want to be accountable". They are saying they just want to be left alone to go on their merry way and try to keep as much information from the public as possible.

I want to assure this House that we on this side will not let that happen. That is why we are exposing the flaws of Bill C–61. That is why we cannot support Bill C–61. It is time to start building a country that is ready to operate in the 21st century. This bill could have helped us do that, but it did not finish the job. I would ask that in future when members opposite start drafting legislation that they think a little more clearly than they did when they drew up Bill C–61.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I was not going to rise on debate until I heard the hon. member from the Reform Party talk about Bill C–61 and try to suggest that somehow colleagues on this side of the House, because they are governing members, decided to finally pass this legislation after almost a year.

I know the hon. member came onto the standing committee on agriculture a little late. I still do not remember his taking part in any of the committee meetings dealing with Bill C–61, even though he was on that committee. The hon. member should know—and if he does not know he could talk to his colleagues who would tell him—that when the bill came in it was thoroughly debated by the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food. Committee members from the government side were the ones who put forward problems they had with the bill. The bill is a good example of how the committee system around this place has worked. It goes to show how government backbench members on a committee can have some sort of say and input into the legislation.

When the bill came forward to the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food government members on the committee had many concerns. We had concerns with the bill and we informed the minister of those concerns. We outlined to the minister a number of different amendments that we wanted to the bill before we were prepared to proceed with it.

The minister, in his wisdom, took that back to his departmental officials. If we go through Bill C–61 we see a number of amendments proposed by government members, not opposition members who chose not to show up for most of the meetings. Paragraph 4(1)(d) states:

> respecting the circumstances under which, the criteria by which and the manner in which a penalty may be increased or reduced, including the reduction of a penalty pursuant to a compliance agreement—

That was not in there before. Government members felt it was important enough to put in there. Subclause 4(3) states:

> Without restricting the generality of paragraph (1)(d), in making regulations—

Again it talks about the degree of intention or negligence on the part of the person. That was put in there by government members on that committee.

Clause 7 deals with the issuance of a notice of violation and states that there have to be reasonable grounds to believe. That was not in there before. Government backbenchers felt it was important. We went through the legislation for months and months and months, and the Reform Party was not there to help us.

The hon. member also has the audacity to say that the government would not even look at reasonable amendments. The Reform Party's Motion No. 20 to clarify the burden of proof is the hon. member's amendment. Motion No. 28 to clarify expenses is the hon. member's amendment. Motion No. 10 is to provide assurance that a security requested by the minister in respect of compliance be reasonable. He uses the word reasonable, but the government accepted opposition amendments on this point. We have gone a long way in trying to allay the fears of members on the other side that we were not listening to their concerns on the issue.

The hon. member talks about orders in council and Standing Order 110 which he should read. It states that committees have a right to review orders in council. It is a very important right for individual members of Parliament who can review orders in council. All of us in our role of checking the executive should have the power to review. The hon. member knows that.

In terms of the legislation I had concerns, as I said. However I sat down as a chairman of a committee with the minister and with the department. They went further than I expected them to go in terms of putting forward proposals to alleviate some of my concerns and the concerns of members on the committee and members outside the committee in terms of the House committee on procedure.

We sat down with government officials at a number of different meetings and came forward with amendments that we thought were reasonable. I thank the minister of agriculture for accepting the amendments. It goes to show how well this place can work when all hon. members work together.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is always interesting to hear the Liberals get excited and give us some recognition.

As I pointed out a number of months ago, I used to have a red combine. It was the colour of the Liberal Party and it always seemed to give me grief. That seems to be the way the Liberal government is going with its bills. It seems as if its red combine has run out of cash and it has found another bill to get some extra cash. The combine might be beyond repair so I do not know how the cash will do it by itself. The Liberals do not have much to trade off. I do not think the money raised through the bill will buy them another election.

It seems queer to me. I have been trying to get the Liberal government to put some teeth into some of the investigative powers of the grain commission and the wheat board. When farmers complained that somehow one of the organizations had dumped 1.5 million bushels into the U.S. at half price, that there was an anti–dumping violation, it seemed strange the minister of agriculture would not even respond. That is Liberal justice.

The bill worries me. The Liberals want to increase fines from roughly $1,000 to $250,000. As far as I am concerned that is designed for big multinationals or some of the bigger corporations because they can negotiate and persuade the government to say that they will draw a lot of votes in the next election and it better go easy on them or it could backfire. That is not the type of justice we need.

It is important to start realizing that small players need some protection. Due diligence is not included. There is no recourse but to pay the fine or negotiate. If people have any money left over they might be able to go to the courts, but that is usually not the way small players work.

It is interesting to note the bill is designed so that the minister has the power over eight acts and not just one. I remind the House that when I started the investigation into the irregularities and illegalities of some of the acts the first thing I looked at was the smuggling of Grandin wheat into Canada. Snowflake is well known for that trade. If it does not happen to be wheat, it can be done with alcohol or cigarettes and it seems to be very successful.

When I insisted that an investigation be done on the smuggling of Grandin wheat, it was interesting to see that customs officers were willing to testify, willing to come before the courts. However for some reason the agriculture department claimed no wrong was being done. Suddenly I hear the government is very interested in protecting the quality of wheat and the quality of our meat through monetary funds. The court system could not prevail because it was told simply, more or less, to take a side glance and not prosecute.

I will read a statement I received through an information officer on the issue:

> In 1993 when the issue became public through an article in the newspaper, at the same time agriculture made a statement that Canada Customs erred in not stopping the wheat from entering Canada. As a result, Canada Customs no longer allows the importation of wheat into Canada.

There was proof that it was smuggled and the government allowed Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada to avoid the law.

• (1755)

How will the AMP system fix that problem? All it will do is put more money into a cash strapped Liberal government when its red combine is dilapidated and ready to fall apart. The Liberals are trying to get more funds to buy another election. I do not think it will work. To do that they should probably make it legal to smuggle liquor too, because there is more money in that than there is in Grandin wheat. Why avoid the small funds? They should go for the big cash because they will need a good combine to win the next election. I do not think it will be done with the faded old red machine I saw in the last election.

The big problem with the AMP system is that it will not deter any of the violations or minor infractions. The big players will use Bill C–61. They do not really care about the money they pay because they usually make more by violating or trespassing the law.

When the last Farm and Country paper came into my office I was very interested in watching what was going on as far as chemical harmonization with the United States was concerned. It is amazing that $10 million worth of chemicals are being smuggled illegally into Canada to be used by farmers. What did the Liberals do about it? The parliamentary secretary said that they just did not have the manpower to stop it. If they do not have the manpower to stop this type of violation, how do they think the AMP system will stop it?

They tried to stop the smuggling of cigarettes by opening the borders 24 hours a day. The customs officers were there lighting candles and making sure the roads were clear. I have news for them. At least in the Snowflake area these violators do not usually use customs offices. They usually find a little road through the bush. That is where they seem to do their best business. How will the AMP system provide protection against those fellows? I do not know how we will enforce it.

When we have a bill like this one which tries more or less to make monetary funds do the trick instead of the justice system, usually it backfires. That is why I am leery of the bill. It will take some pressure off the courts, but it will probably increase the violations and the violators who are able to afford it will become richer instead of poorer.

I will not continue too long on the subject. My colleague from Kindersley—Lloydminster touched on pretty well everything. We need a justice system that is equal for all, a justice system that imposes a certain fine for a certain violation or infraction.

The Bloc member pointed out very vividly that there is a set price for a speeding ticket for going 20 miles an hour over the limit. That is the way the program should work. There should be some guidelines that stipulate the fines to be paid by violators and they should be enforced.

Maybe someday there will be a different combine. Maybe when we get green machinery on the other side we will also have violations and infractions decrease because we will have a system of legal authority that will look after violators and transgressors in a fair and equitable way and the little guy will be protected the same way as the others.

Madam Speaker, I appreciate these few minutes and I hope that some of the amendments that Reform has proposed will be supported.

An hon. member: It is too late.

Mr. Robichaud: It is too late for amendments now.

Mr. Silye: He has been doing some good field work.

Mr. Hoeppner: It is too late for that. I was under the impression that we should do a little bit of ploughing before we start harvesting because the crop would be better.

The Liberals do not realize that we have to put in a crop before we can harvest it. They like to pluck the plums from the tree after they are ripe. We will continue to allow them to do that and hope that maybe in the next election we can change things around.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, it is requested that the vote on the motion be deferred until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), a division on the question now before the House stands deferred until tomorrow at 10 a.m., at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

AGREEMENT ON INTERNAL TRADE IMPLEMENTATION ACT

The House resumed from June 19, consideration of the motion that Bill C–88, an act to implement the agreement on internal trade, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Madam Speaker, Bill C–88 deals with internal trade in Canada. The bill frequently refers to the Agreement on Internal Trade, which includes several hundreds, and even thousands of articles. Since Bill C–88 expressly refers to the agreement, it makes sense to give an overview of the bill and of the agreement itself.

The agreement includes six major parts: a general section on the major application principles; a section reaffirming constitutional rights; a section dealing with the definition of rules and general obligations; a section on the specific rules for the eleven sectors affected by the agreement; a section dealing with dispute settlement procedures; and, lastly, a section on exceptions.

The agreement is based on three general principles. The first one provides for similar treatment of persons, goods and services, regardless of their origin in Canada. The second principle concerns the harmonization of standards and regulations, so as to eliminate certain practices which could impede internal trade in our country. The third general principle provides that we must ensure the free movement of persons, goods and capital.

The articles of the agreement to which Bill C–88 refers are essentially those relating to the dispute settlement process. Articles 1601, 1602, 1603 and 1604 deal with the establishment, mandate and membership of the committee on internal trade and its secretariat. The committee must, among other things, supervise the implementation of the agreement and facilitate the settlement of disputes.

Article 1705 is of particular interest. It concerns the appointment of a panel when disputes arise. The parties to a dispute may, after a period of mediation and conciliation, ask that a panel be established. This five member panel must rule on the validity of the dispute and on the retaliation measures the aggrieved party is entitled to take. This article defines the phrase "one of the parties". According to the agreement, "a party" is a province or territory, or the federal government itself. The parties may act on behalf of natural or artificial persons, provided there is a direct and substantial link with them.

In the case of the provinces, it is said that a link exists with a person if this person resides in the province and if the losses suffered have economic consequences for the province. In the case of the federal government, a link is supposed to exist with a person if this person is federally incorporated or if it does business in an area of activity under federal jurisdiction. In this regard, we feel that the bill is very, even excessively, generous because, as we know, the federal government has a tendency to get involved in all areas of activity, and even to encroach on areas of provincial jurisdiction.

Since, in this case, the federal government may be regarded as one of the parties and may even represent a person doing business in an area of activity under federal jurisdiction, we must proceed with caution. Otherwise, the federal government could become involved in all spheres of society, according to the proposed definition of its own role.

It must be clearly understood that the decisions of the special group are not binding, of course, but it does determine whether the measures in dispute are indeed contrary to the wording of the agreement and if they have caused prejudice.

In addition, the Committee must make recommendations to facilitate settlement of the dispute. And if the party concerned by the complaint does not comply with the recommendations of the special group, then Article 1710 applies, which sets out the sanctions which may be imposed upon the party affected by the complaint.

But the true scope of the bill is as follows: the primary objective of the bill is to implement the Agreement on Internal Trade. The Bloc has always been in favour of the liberalization of trade. The proof of this is that the Bloc and all other Quebec politicians, in particular, the members of the Parti Québécois, had defended NAFTA. However, even if we agree in principle and support the principle behind this bill, we cannot accept the wording of clause 9 which permits a far broader interpretation, which might allow the government in Ottawa to intervene and impose retaliatory measures even when not a party to the dispute.

The federal government could interfere because it is said that each time a third party has some connection with the federal government or with an activity under federal jurisdiction—and as I was just saying, we are familiar with the federal propensity to horn in in all areas—then the federal level could be all–pervasive. This clause is far too broad for us to support.

According to the terms of the agreement, still in reference to this clause, the federal government shall equip itself with the possibility of imposing retaliatory measures where it might be the injured party. The wording of clause 9 of the bill, however, leads us to voice two serious objections.

The first is to the text, which reads in the first sentence of clause 9 as follows:

> For the purpose of suspending benefits, or imposing retaliatory measures of equivalent effect against a province pursuant to Article 1710 of the Agreement, the Governor in Council may, by order, do any one or more of the following—

So here clause 9 of the bill allows the Governor in Council to "suspend rights and privileges granted to the province, modify or suspend the application of any federal law with respect to the province, extend the application of any federal law to the province or take any other measure that the Governor in Council considers necessary".

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, who will have 11 minutes remaining when we resume debate on this bill.

It now being 6.13 p.m., the House will proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed in today's Order Paper.

INTERVENOR FUNDING ACT

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.) moved that Bill C–339, an act to provide for funding for intervenors in hearings before certain boards and agencies, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am honoured to stand here today and speak in support of my private member's bill, C–339, an act to provide for funding for intervenors in hearings before certain boards and agencies.

Intervenor funding, also known as participant funding in the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, seeks to fund those who speak in the public interest at hearings held before government agencies or appointed boards.

As politicians we often wax eloquent about the need to consult our constituents. We encourage citizens to stand up and be counted to make sure their voices are heard. I ask this House as I have asked myself: What have we done to make sure Canadians are heard by their legislators and by those who govern them?

As the Minister of the Environment said during debate on the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, it is one thing to say that people have a say, it is another thing to give them the tools to exercise their right. I believe the bill before us today will give the average citizen, regardless of his or her financial assets, the tools needed for them to be heard in the decision–making process.

Intervenor funding has been known to me for years because of my interest in conservation and the environment. However, it became particularly relevant after a number of my constituents who are members of the Ontario Pipeline Landowners Association, the OPLA, told me of their difficulties in wanting to appear before the National Energy Board.

These landowners were faced with the prospect of having to raise a large amount of money in order to hire experts to oppose a change in the lease agreement of the pipeline crossing their land. Faced with evidence that the pipeline could contaminate the soil, could pose a safety risk, and could saddle them with clean–up costs if the line were ever abandoned, they wanted to make sure the NEB heard their concerns.

To make a convincing case, the landowners needed the assistance of lawyers and experts to appear as witnesses on their behalf before the National Energy Board. Such qualified professionals must be paid. The executives of the OPLA appeared on their own time, but they had to mortgage their future returns to pay the lawyers and engineers who appeared on their behalf and on behalf of the other signatories to the leases.

What would have happened if they were not able to raise the money to make an adequate representation? The National Energy Board would have had to make a decision without the input of those who faced the most risk, in this case the landowners.

It is my contention that the Ontario Pipeline Landowners Association was speaking out in the public interest. If the pipeline posed an environmental or health risk it would be to the public as a whole, and they would be the ones who suffered.

In a recent article sent to me by Mr. Stuart O'Neil, president of the OPLA, a pipeline explosion is documented in the rural community near Williamstown, Ontario. Is it not in the public interest for these concerns to be heard by the National Energy Board?

As can be seen by looking at the National Energy Board's finding in this case, the Ontario Pipeline Landowners Association presented valid concerns. I have that finding here, and I would seek unanimous consent to table this document during the hours of this debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to table the document?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Finlay: Intervenor funding will assure the public that those with a valid interest will be heard at future hearings. For many years the public has been saying that they want to have an input in government decision making. Intervenor funding guarantees their access.

I am not introducing a new concept to this Parliament. Intervenor funding was granted to environmental and native groups and municipal councils during the Mackenzie River pipeline inquiry, also known as the Berger commission, in the mid–1970s. Mr. Justice Thomas Berger determined that funding would be necessary to ensure that the many diverse interests would be represented at the hearings.

Justice Berger said in announcing the funding: "These groups are sometimes called public interest groups. They represent identifiable interests that should not be ignored. Indeed, it is essential that they should be considered. They do not represent the public interest, but it is in the public interest that they should be heard".

The Ontario government proclaimed the intervenor funding project act in 1989 as a three–year pilot project. This program has been extended through to the spring of 1996. In introducing this legislation to the Ontario legislature the then attorney general Ian Scott, who had served as counsel on the Berger commission, stated that a regularized system for intervenor funding is an essential component of an accessible justice system. My Bill C–339 is modelled after the Ontario act.

It is interesting that members of the Ontario Pipeline Landowners Association, who have discussed their situation with landowners who had appeared before the Ontario energy board, found that process to be fairer and more inclusive for both the landowner and the proponent. The success of this act in Ontario augurs well for the success of this legislation I am introducing today.

Further to experience with the Berger commission and the Ontario legislation, the federal government has had experience with intervenor funding through the CRTC and the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, as well as the Krever inquiry into Canada's blood supply, which is currently funding a number of intervenors.

The federal Liberal Party made a very clear commitment in the red book to provide for intervenor funding within the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. This commitment was honoured when Bill C–56 was passed last December. At that time the Minister of the Environment and Deputy Prime Minister, the Reform member for Comox—Alberni and the New Democratic member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake spoke in favour of this type of funding. Today I seek the same consensus of all colleagues in this House to move this legislation forward so that it can be put before the Standing Committee on Natural Resources for further study.

I would like to share with the House a statement made by the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake during the debate on the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act: "Without adequate intervenor funding there cannot be adequate assessment, quite simply because those who wish to challenge the proponent do not have the same access to capital as the proponent does". In effect, what the hon. member is saying is that we have to level the playing field so that both the proponent and the intervenor have the same ability to put forward evidence that will allow the best decision to be made.

In 1992 the province of Ontario conducted a review of the intervenor funding project act. This review, entitled "Access and Impact: An Evaluation of the Intervenor Funding Project Act, 1988", states this on the need for intervenor funding: "Participation is necessary for reasons of fairness. It also makes for better decisions, as broader information, values, and opinions are canvassed by those required to make decisions in the public interest. But those purposes cannot be achieved if the resources of participants are severely limited in relation to the case they are required to meet".

There are those who feel that people who would like to intervene before federal boards and agencies should raise the funds themselves in order to make a representation. Some feel that even if the intervenor is clearly representing the public interest, they should pay all costs. Are we then to tell our constituents that only the wealthy have a right to be heard? We cannot tell Canadians to mortgage their homes and their futures in order to make a representation in the public interest.

Am I to say with a straight face that governments make the best decisions after hearing only from those wealthy enough to afford the best lawyers and technical experts? As the member of Parliament for all the people of Oxford, it is my duty to ensure that they have an opportunity to influence government decision making. This bill not only provides that opportunity, but also will result in better decisions being made.

At this point I would like to discuss a number of key sections of this bill. Clause 2 says that the purpose of the act is to require any person proposing a project that would affect the public interest or the environment and that is required by law to be reviewed by a public process before being approved by government or an agency of government to provide funding to assist organizations that represent a relevant public interest and that wish to intervene in the review process to represent that interest.

I have been asked why the proponent should fund the intervenor. The Ontario government review, "Access and Impact", states that more effective monitoring of the costs and benefits of the process will be achieved if those who are the focus of these decisions, the proponents, are made to bear the cost. It is they who are the centrepiece of the regulated activity.

It should be noted that paragraph 4(3)(f) in my bill calls upon a funding panel to consider any representation the funding proponents make concerning the application of an intervenor. This paragraph allows the proponent to make a presentation about the public interest the intervenor purports to represent and about the proponent's own ability to fund the intervention.

In drafting the funding criteria for intervenors, I have used the criteria set out in the Ontario legislation. The Ontario legislation was in turn developed using the criteria set forth by Justice Berger, which has been the model for intervenor funding at both the federal and provincial government levels.

The member for Comox—Alberni stated during third reading debate on the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act: "Guidelines for participation should consider whether the applicant represents a clearly ascertainable interest that should be heard at the hearing and whether separate representation of the interest would assist the panel and contribute to the hearing". I believe that the funding criteria within Bill C–339 clearly live up to the standards my hon. colleague set out during the CEAA debate.

Subclause 4(4) of the bill states:

> A funding panel shall not order funding to be provided to an intervenor unless it is satisfied that the issues the intervenor intends to present are entirely or mainly issues respecting public interests rather than private interests and that
> (a) the intervenor represents a clearly ascertainable interest that is relevant to the issue before the review authority and that should be represented at the hearing;
> (b) the intervenor does not have sufficient financial resources to make the representation without funding;
> (c) the intervenor has made reasonable efforts to obtain funding from other sources;
> (d) the intervenor has an established record of concern for and commitment to the interest;
> (e) the intervenor has made reasonable efforts to cooperate with other intervenors that represent similar interests;
> (f) the absence of funding would adversely affect the representation of the interest; and
> (g) the intervenor has a proposal that specifies the use to which funding would be put, has the ability to record the expenditure of the funding, and has agreed to submit an accounting to the panel for the expenditure and allow the panel to examine its records to verify the accounting.

It should be stated that paragraph 4(5)(b) of the bill allows the project proponent to appeal a funding order to the review authority.

I strongly believe that the bill will improve the way government works and makes decisions. The Standing Committee on Natural Resources may feel that some amendments are in order. I and other witnesses who may be called would be happy to work with the committee to improve and then pass this important piece of legislation.

In conclusion, let me say that it is time to tell the people of Canada at this important time in our history that they can have a say and that this federal government believes that their interventions will improve the quality of decisions that must be made.

I ask all members of the House to support the bill and thus give all Canadians a means by which to participate responsibly in our future.

It was some 18 months ago that I stood at the last seat of the fourth row, the farthest I could get from the Chair, to give my maiden speech as a backbencher and as a member of the class of '93. One thing that concerned me the most when I came to Ottawa and to Parliament was how does the backbencher, the individual member of whatever party, influence government policy? How do we have some effect? How do we go back to our constituents and say we did this or we did that or we were able to modify, mediate, change, suggest something that became law because they told us that was what they wanted. I do not pretend to know all the answers. I do suggest and I do feel very proud to be able to present this bill today because it is one way in which the individual MP can influence government decision making.

I suggest to all hon. members that committee work is another way. I appreciate that work. It allows me to work with and learn from my colleagues on all sides of the House on important issues.

Bill C–339 is a votable item and I look forward to further debate.

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would first like to say that I am pleased to participate in this second reading debate on Bill C–339 proposed by the hon. member for Oxford. I must congratulate him for his goodwill, for trying to enhance democracy here in Canada, so that some groups can give their opinion on environmental matters concerning natural resources.

This Bill C–339 is quite simple. It has virtually only two pages, if we take out the ones containing the terminology and the definitions used in the bill. It establishes the principle that the proponent of a project that requires review and approval under federal legislation, for example, Bill C–56, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, and that affects the public interest or the environment, should fund intervenors in public hearings on that project.

On the face of it, we could be in favour of the principle of funding groups who want to participate in public hearings, because often, groups that represent less advantaged people in our society do not have sufficient financial resources to pay for scientific studies, transportation, research studies or efforts needed to prove their good faith. I am thinking here of studies needed, for example, in my region, Abitibi, or in Northern Canada or the Arctic circle, where intervenors certainly do not have sufficient financial resources to pay for their travel and their stay when defending the interests of people they represent.

We have seen in the past citizens who were penalized in their rights because, unlike large businesses or developers, they did not have the financial resources to defend their view on a project. So we are in favour of the principle that proponents pay for administrative costs related to the reviews.

But after examining this bill more thoroughly, we realize that it has a much greater scope than it purports. There are a number of questions. First of all, whether this bill was drafted to complete the program that already exists at the Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency created under Bill C–56, an act to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

It is clear that the government, by using the procedure suggested in Bill C–339, can save on the funding it now has to provide to groups that are interested in taking part in public environmental hearings. If that is the case, why not simply amend the legislation instead of drafting a whole new bill? It is difficult to determine which agencies will benefit under this program and how proponents will react. And besides, this bill would institutionalize duplication, because provincial governments often already have their own structures for evaluating the projects of proponents.

So why add to the duplication in procedures for analysing the impact of natural resource development on the environment? This bill would create one more commission that would propose further administrative constraints, in addition to the far too numerous existing ones which industry has criticized as jeopardizing project development and hence employment.

For instance, on October 18, when the mining industry, through its national organization, held its open house, one of its principal demands was that the government streamline the many unwieldy administrative structures restricting the development of this industry.

Bill C–339 would merely create one more administrative level instead of making intervenor funding the responsibility of a decision making level that already exists.

If we look at the two pages in the bill that provide a list of definitions, it is not quite clear what is meant by the term "public interest". In fact, a large number of frivolous interventions could be made claiming a "public interest", which would cause delay and add to the cost of studies or of the actual project for the proponent.

The bill would also assist intervenors with records of responsible public interest representation to put their arguments respecting the project before the approving authority. In this situation, doubt could be cast on the objectivity of the funding panel, which determines the groups to be funded by the proponent.

Clearly, in no case, should the fact of forcing the proponent to provide financial assistance threaten the feasibility of a project. However, it could happen that the proponent is the government itself. This is the case with the Irving Whale.

Thus the SVP group opposed to refloating the Irving Whale, as proposed by the government, receives no assurance from this bill of being considered an organization. The federal government does not want to recognize as an intervenor with a record of responsible representation, because the panel is appointed by the government itself.

A question arises: Who benefits from representing these public interest organizations? There is cause for concern that some may find personal interest in the process and will not hesitate to specialize in defending public interest organizations.

The question could arise, for example, during a study on the opening of a new mine, if the representative of a local group, with no expertise, but wishing to protect the environment, and having an opportunity to develop their region through new jobs, ran up against a group like Greenpeace, which could defeat the local group through its expertise and international reputation.

In clause (7)(b), contrary to what the bill proposes, funding should not be available to cover lawyers' services. The aim of public hearings is to help the government make a public, and not a legal, decision.

It has generally been observed that, when lawyers represent certain groups, the other witnesses are intimidated and refuse to express their viewpoints. The hearings then take on legal overtones. This opinion is what officials who are used to this sort of hearing have to say.

In clauses 3 and 4, the funding panel should also ensure that studies witnesses want funded have not already been undertaken. For example, the panels set up by the federal environmental assessment review office, if we refer to Bill C–56, which has this instrument already, have many scientific studies done, in addition to having witnesses testify at public hearings.

The witnesses must not be funded for doing the same studies as the panel. Bill C–339 contains no provision for such an eventuality.

In conclusion, we feel this bill has good ideas and that it is innovative, but it also contains a number of serious failings.

It should therefore be amended before submission to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources so that its objective of enabling intervenor groups to defend their points of view with funding may be possible.

Furthermore, given how open Bill C–339 is in its present form to encroachment on provincial jurisdictions, such as natural resources and the environment, we must vote against it in its present form.

[English]

Mr. Finlay: Madam Speaker, a point of order. During my speech I asked for unanimous consent to table the document of the hearing held at London, Ontario, on Monday, January 10, 1994, in the matter of applications by Intercoastal Pipe Line Incorporated and Interprovincial Pipe Line Incorporated, pursuant to sections 52 and 58 of the National Energy Board Act.

• (1840)

Madam Speaker, I seek your advice. I thought that received unanimous consent. Perhaps it did not. I am asking again.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to table the report?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): You have unanimous consent.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, today the member has brought forward Bill C–339 dealing with intervenor funding.

In this country we have established independent quasi–judicial panels and agencies to make decisions about land use. This bill deals with intervenor funding in that land use process. For instance, if a large oil company wants to work on a pipeline that runs through miles and miles of farmland, the company must first make an application to the National Energy Board. The board will consider the effects of the pipeline on other people and on the environment before allowing the company to do the work.

This bill attempts to deal with a problem that occurs when a project has the capacity to hurt people or their assets. A large company can afford to hire all sorts of lawyers to make its case and minimize the effects of its agenda so the full truth may not come out at the hearings. The board members may make a decision based on incomplete information at the board hearings which is certainly detrimental to the public interest.

There is a policy interest here. I acknowledge this problem exists. Bill C–339 seeks to correct this imbalance by requiring a large company, such as an oil company, that brings an application before a quasi–judicial agency to pay for certain other groups to oppose its own application. This is one way to provide intervenor funding.

Provincial acts exist in several provincial jurisdictions, two of which are Ontario and Alberta. Ontario's act requires the company making the application to fund its opponent. The member mentioned this is the act that he modelled his private member's bill on.

I want to applaud the intentions of the member for Oxford in putting together this bill because the proposal arises out of a difficult experience of a number of his constituents. The bill speaks to a situation in the member's riding in May 1994 in which 130 farm families had to get together to oppose an application to the National Energy Board made by Interprovincial Pipe Line Inc. to convert pipelines running through their properties.

The farmers were able to fight the action but not before it had cost them $365,000 plus interest. To oppose the pipeline they had to form a coalition across a wide geographic area and put up a lot of personal cash to get the job done. In strict economic terms, without dealing with the human side of the equation, no intervenor funding was necessary in this case. The company that brought forward the application and another body, in this case a group of farmers, had the resources and were able to marshal them together to oppose the application.

In other words, because the farmers were able to put together the money and win the case, it proved no intervenor funding was required. However, strict economic theory would say that the greater the number of people the decision might affect, the greater the pool of money that would be available to oppose it. The number of people increases as more and more people realize the decision will negatively affect their interests. This would be the case if we were talking strict economic theory.

Unfortunately, the pure world of the economist is not the real world we must live in. Many of these applications do not get a lot of coverage in the news so the people that should be concerned do not hear about it until the problems confront them personally, sometimes years later.

A large company like an oil company also has the advantage of superior information. It has been around for a long time. It has had time to develop a lot of expertise and information to present to the panel. Most big companies also have a lot of money to finance research, pay a slew of lawyers to do their work and make slick presentations before boards. They can afford to drag out the hearings over a long period of time. All the advantages are in their ball park.

This subject is very appropriate but I also have questions about this bill. For instance, I question whether it is fair for a private company to be required to finance the very group that may kill its application. This part of the bill would almost certainly be challenged in court by the companies that stand to suffer from it.

There is also an unfortunate, perhaps inadvertent, assumption made by the bill that all companies that appear before boards and agencies are large ones which can afford to fund their opponents. The bill makes no provision for the small business that has to get federal approval for some small development and would therefore find itself subject to all provisions of the bill.

For example, in my riding a very small outfit wanted to put together a silicate sand mine. It was called a mine but it was really a gravel pit. It was a mine because it involved silicate sand. The company jumped through all the hoops and did all the things it could think of to receive provincial approvals, but then it was told that it had to go through the federal approvals because it was a mine. The people finally gave up. They said: "This will cost us another $100,000 and we cannot afford it".

Imagine if a neighbour was worried about sand blowing off the silicate sand pit and wanted intervenor funding. There would be only a couple of people involved but there was no way they could ever afford to pay for the intervenor status.

Clause 4(7) of the bill states that the level of intervenor funding would not be set according to the company's ability to pay, it would be set according to the going rates of the lawyers. That would be enough to kill some companies in a matter of hours.

My second major concern is the scope of the bill, which is very broad. It applies to any project on any land, public or private, that needs approval by any federal authority, including a board or agency, or even a civil servant, where the approval process requires or even permits public input. Can you think of any project of any size at all which is started today without a raft of federal government approvals? I cannot. If intervenor funding was available for all government approvals the program might quickly become unmanageable.

Finally, the bill tends to invite litigation from all manners of groups which would demand funding through the courts if rejected by the funding panel created by the bill. Indeed, the bill tends to create groups which might not otherwise exist because of the promise of either federal funding through court challenges or funding through the intervenor act. We know that the federal bureaucracy has in this way created a demand for its own services for decades and I am sure that some government departments would love the extra work.

These are difficult problems. While I agree with the member's intentions, I have not been able to think of a way to change the bill to minimize the abuses about which I have spoken. I fear that if the proponent funding measures did not fly, that is, if private companies successfully challenged the fairness of having to fund their own opponents, or if they were unable to provide the funding in some way, that government, as usual, would have to take up the slack. It would become a typical government cash cow, milked by many different interest groups with varying degrees of responsibility and various political agendas. As we know, this particular cow at the federal level is a dry cow and there will not be any milk in it for a long time to come.

As I said before, if the panel did not like the group's agenda and refused to support it, perhaps the courts, which have become very sympathetic with intervenor groups in recent years, might force them to do so.

I wonder if the problem could be addressed, at least in part, by having intervenor groups respond to the concerns of their particular constituencies by the government allowing them to have the equivalency of charitable status with Revenue Canada. Therefore, they could receive partial assistance from the federal government. This would require a measure of financial commitment and responsibility by the intervenors and it would not require any panels or acts of Parliament to make those decisions.

I am concerned that the intervenor funding act, if it develops as I fear, may make it very difficult for companies to push forward with new projects in Canada.

Recently we met with the mining companies during the "Keep Mining in Canada" week. They told us that it takes up to three years to get all the approvals from the provincial governments and then the federal government to do the initial environmental assessments and so on to start up a mine.

The industry minister has also mentioned the problems of overlapping of jurisdictions, provincial and federal, that make it very difficult for mines to open. The industry minister is attempting to bring together some co–ordination to reduce the red tape for companies. I fear that the intervenor act may add another level of problems for companies which are trying to create jobs, wealth and opportunity within Canada. Something which we do not need at this time is another layer of problems.

I would like to talk about the basic principle of the bill. We have recently put forward a 20–point proposal on how we can realign federal–provincial obligations in this country. The very first point in our 20–point proposal is that natural resources and the care of natural resources is constitutionally a provincial jurisdiction and whenever possible should be left in the provincial realm.

I mentioned earlier that two provinces already have addressed the problem in their own realm by allowing intervenor funding through provincial legislation. I believe it may be best to leave that natural resource issue with the provinces and allow the other provinces to bring forward similar legislation to address it at the provincial level.

I recognize that the member for Oxford has brought to light an existing imbalance in the system. However, I am not convinced that the bill he has proposed would deal with the problem without creating new problems in itself. I would be pleased, however, to suggest to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources, on which I sit as a member, that the committee invite the member who has brought this bill forward and other witnesses and try to suggest ways of either altering, improving or finding ways to accomplish the purpose behind the bill.

While I would like to thank the member for his effort, I am hesitant to give my support for this bill for the reasons I have stated. I will be listening to the other speeches to see if I can approve it.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to second the motion on Bill C–339, a private member's bill dealing with the subject of intervenor funding. This is certainly a subject that deserves the attention of members of this House and of the government. I thank the member for Oxford for bringing it forward.

Intervenor funding is, as he has indicated, not a new concept for governments or for this House. It was last dealt with seriously when we debated the merits of including an intervenor funding program within the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act in the previous Parliament. At that time, members will remember that I was a strong advocate of a comprehensive intervenor funding program.

Today, Bill C–339 asks us to approve in principle that a proponent of a project which requires approval by a federal board or agency should financially assist those who are intervening in the public interest before the board and it sets out a few guidelines about how this funding program would work.

Specifically, Bill C–339 states that before receiving funding, intervenors need to meet a number of very specific criteria: that the intervenor represents a clearly ascertainable interest that is relevant to the issue; that the intervenor does not have sufficient financial resources; that the intervenor has made reasonable efforts to obtain funding from other sources; that the intervenor has established a record of concern; that the intervenor has made reasonable efforts to co–operate with other intervenors; and, that the absence of funding would adversely affect the representation of the interest.

The criteria also requires the intervenor to have a proposal that specifies the use to which funding would be put, has the ability to record the expenditure of the funding, and has agreed to submit an accounting to the panel for the expenditure and follow and allow that panel to examine its records and verify its accounting.

According to the mover of the motion, the primary objective of the legislation is to give all those who speak in the public interest the opportunity to be heard before federal boards and agencies. The goal is admirable and the criteria is strict, perhaps too restrictive, but there are a few things that I think should be said in the debate before us today.

I want to ensure that there is no misunderstanding. I and my New Democrat colleagues are strong believers in the principle of intervenor funding. We are well aware that when the proponent of a project wants to obtain a permit or a licence to construct something that proponent generally has the funding in place to make the necessary application which may require the inclusion of an environmental assessment.

Obviously the proponent wants that project approved and the information they bring forward will undoubtedly portray that project in a positive light.

On the other hand, there may be others acting in the public interest who want other information considered prior to the proponent's application being approved by the respective board or agency. These others may not have the resources to adequately research, prepare, or deliver this alternative presentation. Therefore, without an adequate intervenor funding program there is no guarantee that the alternative view will ever make it in front of the group considering the licence or the permit that would finally approve the proponent's project.

When Parliament was examining the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act a few years ago, the Canadian Bar Association supported the inclusion of intervenor funding. I quote from the Canadian Bar Association presentation: "Interim funding should be provided to groups or individuals who wish to participate in public hearings and who have demonstrated a sufficient interest in the process and the ability to make a contribution to it. It is a fair and efficient mechanism to level the playing field between parties."

The Canadian Bar Association also said that intervenor costs should be paid. They suggested that a process be established to review and possibly order one party at a hearing to pay the costs of any other party to the same hearing.

Another witness at the same time, the law firm of McJannet Rich, a well–known environmental law firm, argued firmly for an intervenor funding process and set out some rules they thought were important. In their presentation to the parliamentary committee the law firm said: "Intervenor funding is extremely important and should be made available for participants in public reviews in accordance with the following principles: (1) the government has the responsibility for assuring the availability of funding and for its allocation; (2) whatever the source of funds, the proponent must not exercise any control over the allocation; (3) eligibility criteria for intervenor funding must be developed and made known early; (4) a funding allocation committee independent of the panel should be established; and

(5) funding should be made early enough to allow receiving groups sufficient time to organize themselves, prepare submissions, and where appropriate to undertake necessary investigations."

Presentations by two environmental lawyers, Mr. Steven Hazell and Mr. Brian Pannell, also stressed the need for intervenor funding. Again I quote from their presentation to the parliamentary committee: "Public participation in environmental decision making is essential. A community has a right to participate in decisions affecting its interests. Public involvement is the best way to introduce into the process relevant information and values that would otherwise be excluded. Moreover, the public can provide independent scrutiny of the basis for a proponent's actions. This allows for a full exploration of all alternatives and makes the decision and process better and more credible and ensures greater accountability of decision makers."

Pannell and Hazell go on to say that the effective participation by the public requires funding. They say: "The disproportion of resources between proponents and the public necessitates the establishment of an independent funding body to provide adequate amounts of funding to allow full and meaningful participation at all steps to committed members of the public." They say intervenor funding should be levied from the proponent and allocated and administered by an independent body.

I cannot stress enough that an adequately funded clear and agreeable participant funding or intervenor funding program must be put in place as soon as possible. With an ever increasing emphasis being put on resource development, with an ever increasing number of projects being proposed, and with an ever increasing lack of public confidence in government programs dealing with environmental issues, this has never been more important. We must be very careful though in what we do.

I do not think we should let the government off too easily. There is a need to establish an adequately funded program that has some certainty to it. Although Bill C–339 requires virtually nothing from the federal government and puts too much onus on the proponents, we should be looking at a program that has a little more onus on the federal government.

We have to be careful that the specific rules about funding the program do not totally focus on the proponent. I am concerned, as the previous speaker was, that community and co–operative proponents of smaller more locally based projects may be unable to complete their project applications and otherwise community friendly proposals may never become a reality if in fact the bill goes through as is.

There will be times when the proposal put forward today by my friend from Oxford will actually threaten to increase proponent costs in cases like this one to such a degree that community proponents, especially in rural and northern Canada and perhaps in First Nations communities, will simply give up. I would hate to see that happen.

However I stress to the House that I will support the bill before us today. The member for Oxford has done us a great service in bringing the issue forward and bringing it to the attention of the government. We need a clearer and more defined intervenor funding process that perhaps has more independence to it. I look forward to the opportunity to address the issue more fully in committee.

I commend the member for Oxford for his initiative in this regard. If he is successful in achieving full parliamentary review of the legislation, I urge him to look more carefully at the process and perhaps conclude that the next step would be an amendment to establish an independent funding agency rather than leave the decisions to the boards and agencies that actually have to hear the applications.

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on private member's Bill C–339, the intervenor funding act, sponsored by my hon. colleague, the member for Oxford.

The purpose of the bill is to require any person proposing a project that would affect the public interest or the environment, and that is required by law to be reviewed by a public process before being approved by government or an agency of the government, to provide funding to assist organizations that represent a relevant public interest and that wish to intervene in the review process to represent that interest.

Intervenor funding is certainly not a new concept in our country. The province of Ontario currently has the intervenor funding project act and serves as a model for Bill C–339. The Ontario act was in turn modelled upon the funding provided for intervenors before the Mackenzie Valley pipeline inquiry known as the Berger commission in the mid–1970s.

The commission charged with the duty of investigating the appropriateness of a pipeline through the Mackenzie Valley in the Northwest Territories determined that the many diverse interests in the region should be represented in the hearings. In order to level the playing field to compete with the finances available to the proponents of the pipeline, it was deemed necessary to provide money for citizens' groups so that they could properly research their intervention.

While funding for the Berger commission was provided by the federal government, Bill C–339 does not call upon the Canadian taxpayer to provide funding for intervenors. Instead the proponent of the project would have to provide the funding.

This is an interesting and unique proposal. It is based upon the contention that if the proponent is required to bear the cost of intervention, it would motivate the sponsor of the project to work with the potential intervenors in finding solutions before submitting the proposal before the relevant board or agency. The Ontario experience has already shown the effectiveness of the funding.

After witnessing the recent proceedings of the National Energy Board hearing that involved a bid to convert an unused oil pipeline running from Sarnia through my riding of Lambton—Middlesex to Milton, Ontario, I am more convinced than ever that a system of intervenor funding should also be available when federal boards or agencies are involved.

Since this converted pipeline would have run through prime agricultural land in southwestern Ontario the landowners of the region were understandably concerned with the proposal. After several months of hearings the National Energy Board sided with the landowners, clearly taking the interest of the public safety to heart. While happy with the decision, the landowners also spent over $300,000 of their own money participating in the hearings process which had come under the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board.

Had the companies involved in the proposal been registered as Ontario businesses, the hearings would have fallen under the provincial jurisdiction of the Ontario Energy Board and the legal costs associated with participating in the hearings would have been covered by the applicant company. Unfortunately for the intervening land owners the applicant company was from Alberta. Therefore the intervenors did not qualify under the Ontario act.

I certainly agree with the landowners' spokesman who correctly stated that the state of affairs was prohibitive for landowners or anyone else to defend their rights and interests in an application that falls under federal jurisdiction.

On a number of occasions over the past year my southwestern Ontario colleagues and I have been in touch with the particular landowners association. Collectively we have searched for solutions and we have all come to the same conclusion, that there must be changes to the National Energy Board Act whereby landowners or other parties intervening in NEB hearings and acting in the public interest should be granted intervenor funding prior to NEB hearings.

We have also concluded that the granting by the proponents of intervenor funding at the federal level would yield at least three favourable results. Intervenor funding would, first, allow for equal treatment of all interested parties; second, ensure greater public safety by opening up the process to the public; and, third, save public money in the long run.

The more than $300,000 spent by the landowners' association would be minimal compared to the current practice of maintaining a much larger government agency to scrutinize pipeline proposals.

While the National Energy Board Act presently allows for limited intervenor funding for detailed route hearings, certain technicalities in the act preclude intervenors from receiving funding for natural gas pipeline matters. Unfortunately for the landowners in southwestern Ontario, the Alberta company had proposed a conversion of the unused oil pipeline to natural gas. Therefore the landowners were out of luck under the terms of the NEB act.

In communications with the Minister of Natural Resources I have been informed that the department is currently engaged in an exercise with the NEB to review a variety of NEB functions and to address a number of deficiencies in the NEB act. I have been assured by the minister that the issue of intervenor funding has been included in the exercise. At the same time I have been informed by the Minister of Natural Resources that the government's fiscal situation strongly suggests that any intervenor funding would likely be on a proponent pay system.

This is precisely where Bill C–330 could fill a void in federal policy. It would dovetail nicely with the current review of the National Energy Board.

The bill is designed to assist those with bona fide concerns. It is certainly not meant to provide funding for special interest groups. The bottom line is that it would improve the way in which the federal government and its agencies and boards make decisions that affect all of us. Perhaps best of all, by calling for the proponent of a particular project to provide funding for the intervenor it would take the onus off the government to empty its pockets every time there is a hearing. Instead the government board or agency would devote 100 per cent of its efforts into judging the soundness of the proposal at hand.

Bill C–339 calls for the relevant authority to appoint a funding panel to determine who will benefit from the project. It would hear applications for funding from intervenors and the panel would determine who should be funded. Before receiving funding the intervenor would have to satisfy a number of important criteria.

The intervenor would have to represent a clearly ascertainable interest that is relevant to the issue before the review authority and that should be represented at the hearing. It would have to be established that the intervenor does not have sufficient financial resources to make the representation without funding. There would have to be reasonable efforts to obtain funding from other sources. The intervenor would have an established record of concern for and commitment to the interest in question. Reasonable efforts would have to be made to co–operate with other intervenors that represent similar interests. It would be incumbent upon the intervenor to demonstrate the existence of a proposal that specifies the use to which funding would be put and to submit to an examination of all records by the panel to verify the intervenor's accounting.

These are more than ample safeguards to ensure that no application for intervenor status would be made on frivolous grounds.

I am deeply impressed with the bill. Not only would it allow for a responsible means by which intervenors could put forward their perspective in a way that would allow the board or agency to make a decision with the best information available, but it would do so without making onerous financial claims on the government.

I can certainly understand why the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs decided to make this private member's bill a votable item. It is because it fills a void in federal government policy and offers a unique means to address a pressing public interest issue without extending a hand for more government dollars.

I urge all members of this House to give this bill the support it deserves.

Mr. Larry McCormick (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to rise and speak on Bill C–339, as introduced by my colleague representing the riding of Oxford.

I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate and thank my colleague from the great riding of Oxford for the impressive amount of work and research he has put into this bill.

The primary objective of this legislation is to give all of those people who speak in the public interest the opportunity to be heard before federal boards and agencies. With this bill, federal boards and agencies will make better decisions with a higher level of public input, consultation and participation.

Bill C–339 is designed to assist those with bona fide concerns. It is not meant to provide funding for special interest groups. It is in the interest of each of us for the public interest to be heard. This bill will ensure that the public interest is heard.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order, please. The hon. member will be able to resume his remarks the next time the matter is debated.

It being 7.13 p.m., the time provided for consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

The House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to two petitions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTION M-473

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would like to seek the House's assent to change Motion No. 473 for Motion No. 474 on the order of priorities for private members' business. I seek the consent of the House in this.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Does the House give its unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member for Calgary West has the floor on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If I understand the motion correctly, it is to not debate the issue of the international laws that pertain to the recognition of Quebec's right to self-determination. As it is obvious from the statements from the Bloc that we will be debating this in the future, we in the Reform Party believe it is important that Parliament, which is representative of all of Canada, have a chance to debate this issue. Therefore we will not agree to dropping this off the Order Paper.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): We do not have unanimous consent, therefore.

PETITIONS

SMALL AND MEDIUM SIZE BUSINESSES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour of presenting this petition on small and medium size businesses.

[English]

Almost everyone knows that small and medium size businesses in Canada are important to job creation and are important to the quality of life of Canadians. These petitioners are simply requesting that whenever governments make decisions that could impact on small and medium size businesses they recognize the importance they have for Canada in terms of jobs and in terms of adding to the quality of life.

BOVINE GROWTH HORMONE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to table a petition from 33 Canadians in the Prince Edward—Hastings area calling on Parliament to take steps to keep the bovine growth hormone out of Canada by legislating a moratorium on the use and sale of the bovine growth hormone until the year 2000 and examining the outstanding health and economic questions through an independent and transparent review.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from several hundred persons, young people who are demanding that the Canadian government amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to include sexual orientation as the tenth illegal reason for discrimination.

I enthusiastically support this petition and trust that the government will act it on expeditiously.

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition that has been circulating all across Canada. This portion of the petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Stratford, Ontario.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession, which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

PARLIAMENTARY PRAYERS

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from citizens of the city and county of Peterborough. The petitioners state that whereas the name of Our Lord Jesus Christ and the Lord's Prayer have been included in the historic parliamentary prayer of the House of Commons since 1867; and whereas Canada was founded and built upon the principles of Christianity and a large majority of Canadians profess the Christian faith; therefore they call on the House of Commons to close the parliamentary prayer with the words "through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen" and reinstate the Lord's Prayer at the conclusion of the opening prayer.

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have another petition from numerous citizens in eastern Ontario.

The petitioners point out that acts of discrimination against lesbian, gay and bisexual Canadians are an everyday reality in all regions of Canada and that this kind of discrimination is unacceptable in a country known for its commitment to human rights, equality and dignity for all citizens.

Therefore these petitioners call upon Parliament to act quickly to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and to adapt all necessary measures to recognize the full equality of same sex relationships in federal law.

DIVORCE ACT

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure today to present a petition signed by 111 residents of Labelle County in my riding.

The petition is about an issue that concerns many Canadians. It asks Parliament to amend the Divorce Act by including a provision identical to section 611 of the Quebec Civil Code, which provides that parents cannot, without serious grounds, interfere with a child's personal relationship with its grandparents and that if no agreement can be reached by the parties, the terms of this relationship shall be determined by the court.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[Text]

Question No. 239—Mr. White (Fraser Valley West):

Concerning CPC, for the most recent available 12-month period, (a) what was the detailed cost breakdown of all expenditures on hospitality for customers and other business clients, with particular reference to private boxes and season tickets at professional sports stadiums and arenas, including expenditures paid out through employee expense claims, and (b) what were the expense claims for the top four Canada post executives in Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): As a commercial crown corporation, Canada Post is not subject to the Access to Information Act. The government made the decision to exempt crown corporations such as Canada Post, in recognition of the requirement that they operate in a competitive environment. The Privacy Act also protects personal information from third party access, these are deemed as commercially confidential.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

AGREEMENT ON INTERNAL TRADE IMPLEMENTATION ACT

The House resumed from November 1 consideration of the motion that Bill C–88, an Act to implement the agreement on internal trade, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): When the House last considered Bill C–88, the hon. member for Joliette had 11 minutes left.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Madam Speaker, when I had to break off my speech yesterday to let the House proceed with the Orders of the Day, I was discussing the actual impact of Bill C–88 and, more particularly, clause 9 of the bill.

The wording of clause 9 allows for a very broad interpretation. For instance, the federal government would be able to intervene and impose retaliatory measures even when it is not a party to the dispute.

Although the Bloc Quebecois has always been in favour of free trade and, in fact, we cannot do otherwise but support this concept, when a clause like this one gives the federal government sweeping powers, we must object to adopting the bill as tabled, or at least to the wording of clause 9. In fact, this clause could lend itself to two very different interpretations.

• (1040)

One interpretation could result in the federal government's giving itself powers, because of its obligation under the agreement to have the option to impose retaliatory measures, in the event and only in the event it becomes an aggrieved party. We believe clause 9 does not provide this. In fact, the first part of clause 9 reads as follows:

> (1) For the purpose of suspending benefits or imposing retaliatory measures of equivalent effect against a province pursuant to Article 1710 of the Agreement, the Governor in Council may, by order,—

So the federal government may intervene and impose a variety of measures, which I will not read in their entirety, but will simply summarize: suspend rights or privileges, modify the application of any federal law; extend the application of any federal law to a province or take any other measure it considers necessary.

As it stands, we could interpret the meaning. In the case where a party is found to be in the wrong, under the terms of article 1710 of the agreement, the federal government, whether it is a party to the dispute or not, will be entitled to impose retaliatory measures against the party in question. As we saw yesterday, the parties may be a province, the federal government or any third party with close ties to either the province or the federal government.

We also pointed out yesterday that, because of its spending power, the federal government was already meddling in many areas or activities that are strictly provincial in jurisdiction and already had considerable latitude because of the way the parties were defined. Because of the considerable latitude it already enjoys under the definition of "federal government", it would be superfluous to add more here and permit the federal government to intervene even when it is not an aggrieved party. We believe this interpretation is contrary to the intent of the agreement.

The agreement does not, in fact, provide that the federal government may impose retaliatory measures against an injuring party. It could do so only if it was recognized as an injured party in this dispute.

The second possible interpretation of this provision, and the one with which we might agree, is that if the federal government wanted to retaliate against a party at fault pursuant to article 1710 of the agreement, it could do so only as the injured party in the dispute.

If this is what this provision means, we might agree. However, since the wording may be ambiguous and leave room for interpretation, we would like to clarify this paragraph by amending it so that if the federal government is recognized as a party injured by a measure imposed by another party in violation of the agreement, the governor in council may, by order and pursuant to article 1710 of the agreement, take the measures as listed in clause 9. This is our first comment regarding clause 9.

Another point I wish to raise is that the range of retaliatory measures of which the federal government may avail itself pursuant to clause 9 of the bill is much too broad.

By giving itself the power to modify or suspend the application of any federal law with respect to the province, to extend the application of any federal law to the province, or to take any other measure deemed necessary, the federal government is granting itself inordinate retaliatory powers that may affect the entire population of a province. The problem is that the federal government's legislative power affects all Canadians and that it already imposes laws on the provinces. These powers are denied to the provinces and we think in this case that, once again, this article could allow the federal government to impose its will on the provinces.

The federal government's retaliatory powers should be strictly limited to the trade areas already defined in the agreement. So, if we agreed on these restrictions, the federal government could no longer retaliate in social areas and go after the Canada social transfer, for example.

For the Bloc Quebecois, this is another way of looking at this article, which we regard as very important.

Finally, I would like to point out another controversial aspect of this bill. Clause 14 of this bill deals with the powers of appointment.

> The governor in council may, by order, appoint any person to fill any position that may be necessary or advisable, in the opinion of the governor in council, for carrying out the purposes of the agreement.

Again, as in many other areas, the Bloc Quebecois thinks that these appointments should be ratified by the House of Commons instead of simply requiring an order of the governor in council. As in the case of appointments to several important boards, which are ratified by the House of Commons, we feel that—in this case involving billions of dollars in interprovincial trade subject to this act, this agreement—it is very important that all appointments be made public and subject to some scrutiny by the House. In fact, we ask that these appointments be made or suggested by the governor, but that they be systematically ratified by the House of Commons.

Those are the three points I wanted to raise with respect to clause 9.

[English]

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am happy to rise today to speak about the so–called agreement in Bill C–88 on internal trade barriers.

This bill is a total sham and should never have been introduced in the House. It has nothing to add to internal trade that is not already in place in the BNA act. It does not even maintain the same standard. Let me quote from section 121 of the BNA act. This is what we had before: "All articles of growth, produce or manufacture of any one of the provinces shall be admitted free into each of the other provinces".

What do we have now under article 101 of this provincial trade agreement? It states that the objective of the agreement is to reduce and eliminate, to the extent possible, barriers to the free movement of goods and services.

Is that not somewhat less than section 121 of the BNA act which says shall be admitted free? Obviously it is. I am concerned that the bill is like a Hollywood movie set. It looks good on the outside but there is nothing behind it. There are no teeth in this agreement and I have good reason to say that.

• (1050)

I tested the bill. A company in my riding has a contract with CN Rail to move its workers from Grand Prairie, Alberta into the Dawson Creek area of B.C., some 60 miles away. What did the company find? It cannot get a permit to go into B.C. It is being restricted even though it has a contract to move its cabs into that area.

We decided to test the new internal trade agreement. We asked the Department of Industry and the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade to get involved to see what they could do to help this company resolve the problem. They can do absolutely nothing.

This so–called trade agreement is nothing. It is just a loose agreement of empty words. It certainly will not do anything to address the problem of internal trade barriers which cost Canada between $8 billion and $10 billion a year. We simply cannot afford these kinds of costs. We are in a very competitive global trading environment and we have to give our companies the ability to build some economies of scale here at home before they launch into international business.

Let us talk about international business for a moment. Canada has signed some very good trade agreements internationally. We have signed the new GATT agreement, the Uruguay round. We have signed the NAFTA and previous to that the Canada–U.S. free trade agreement. We have better international agreements for trade than we have agreements for trade between the provinces. It is absolutely ludicrous. To pretend that this bill addresses the problem is just misleading the Canadian public.

The European Economic Community is now 15 member countries. There are fewer barriers to trade between those 15 countries in the European Union than we have between the provinces. Some decentralized federation. We need a workable agreement between the provinces and the federal government has to show leadership. That is what it involves. It must show leadership and broker the kind of agreement that is necessary. Obviously Bill C–88 does not do that.

Whole segments of the economy are not addressed in this bill. It does not include agriculture. It does not include certain government procurements or regional development. Those are all very significant barriers to trade.

A good example of how silly the trade gets within this country and the barriers we meet can be told in one simple example. A trucking company in Alberta had a gravel contract nine miles from the British Columbia border. It was working well within the province of Alberta, but at the end of the day the drivers wanted to drive their trucks into the nearest town to stay overnight in a hotel and eat in the restaurants. They were not allowed to do so. Why not? It is because their trucks did not meet the requirements for the regulations in British Columbia. They had to have different axle spacings, an empty truck, certain permits they could not get without considerable expense. They had to bring in a special vehicle to take the workers into British Columbia to the hotel. That is how ludicrous this gets.

I suggest this is the type of situation there was in Russia some 10 years ago under communism. Surely we have to move beyond that if we are going to be effective in the world economy.

Nothing has been resolved in the area of natural resources and energy, all key areas of trade in Canada. The cost is estimated to be $8 billion per year. We cannot afford those costs. We must have a government that shows leadership and we certainly did not get it here.

The Prime Minister said that this was a modest proposal. Modest indeed. Most Canadians would see it as a complete waste of time and money. I am appalled that the Minister of Industry would bring this forward in the guise of a bill that is going to address the problems of trade restrictions.

I would ask him to go back to the drawing board. Bring the provincial premiers together. Bring the industry players together and show them what the cost is to our society. Show them what the cost is to their own industry. We can do much better. I challenge this minister to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I would like to remind the House that we are now at the ten minute speech stage, with no question or comment period.

• (1055)

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to pay tribute to the people of my riding who have voted yes in the referendum, in a proportion of 52.7 per cent, in the provincial part of Shefford as well as in the Iberville part. In the riding of Iberville, 56 per cent of voters said yes.

From the outset, you should know that I intend to continue sitting in this House for the duration of my mandate as a member of Parliament for the Bloc Quebecois.

This morning, I rise to speak on Bill C–88, an act to implement the Agreement on Internal Trade. As you know, Quebec—and Quebec members elected to this place in 1988—is responsible for the passage of the Free Trade Agreement. Had it not been for Quebec and its voters, Canada would have had a much harder time entering into this agreement between Canada and the United States that has greatly benefited both countries.

Quebec is a state which is open to the world. At present, and this is very sad, it is easier for Quebec to trade with the U.S. than with the rest of Canada because there was no legislation like this, and that made interprovincial trade extremely difficult. As the Minister of Commerce indicated, the difficulty came from the fact that Canadian laws dated back to the 1940s and that there was an unwillingness to evolve.

As I said a moment ago, Quebec trades mainly abroad, with the United States of America becoming our main trading partner. We also trade with the rest of Canada, although less and less as time goes by, and our trade relations with the rest of Canada or our provincial partners are also important.

Bill C–88 will normalize a situation that did not exist before. Take clause 9 of the bill for instance, which we have a problem with. It reads:

> For the purpose of suspending benefits or imposing retaliatory measures of equivalent effect against a province pursuant to Article 1710 of the Agreement, made between the provinces

> the Governor in Council may, by order, do any one or more of the following:

The fault we find with this bill is that, once again, the federal government gives itself the prime role. In the context of federal–provincial relations, Canada has always give on itself the prime role and retained the right of disallowance. In this case, penalties could even be imposed instead of deferring to an arbitral tribunal, as would normally be the case between states or provinces.

We totally disagree with Ottawa giving itself the kind of power this legislation would afford it. As I said earlier, Quebec has always been in favour of interprovincial trade in Canada.

What I cannot understand is why Canada manages its internal trade the way GATT managed international trade in the late 1940s. Mr. Manley himself, the current trade and commerce minister of Canada, said so.

• (1100)

The important thing to remember is that, in clause 9 of this bill, the government gives itself a power to disallow and punish. We also object to clause 14, which reads as follows:

> 14. (1) The Governor in Council may, by order, appoint any person to fill any position that may be necessary or advisable, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, for carrying out the purposes of the Agreement.

This provision means that, once again, Parliament will not have a say regarding these appointments. The Liberals always talk about reforms. They always say that they want to change the system. Yet, when they introduce bills, we realize that this is impossible, that the system cannot be changed and that there will not be any reform.

Once again, the governor in council has the privilege of making appointments, without asking for Parliament's approval. Sometimes, we wonder what we, elected representatives of the people and regions of Canada, are doing here. We meet in this House as representatives of the people and that, as you know, is a costly process. However, when the time comes for the government to place its confidence in our assembly and seek its approval, that government bypasses the whole parliamentary process and makes appointments through orders in council or departmental orders.

If Canada is considering reforms, it must correct that situation and give much more power to this Parliament. Canadians and Quebecers are not stupid, you know. They are increasingly aware of the fact that we do not make many decisions here; we just talk. Everything is already decided, and this is what I strongly object to. Reform members also denounce that situation, and this is to their credit, even though we may disagree on what needs to be done. We happen to think that we are a different country. We feel that the chaotic situation in Canada could be corrected by making some constitutional changes.

The ball is now in the court of the people opposite. What will they do? Probably nothing. We will wait and see. We expect that futile discussions will go on for the next 30 years, but I have to say that we do not intend to stick around very long.

In conclusion, this bill provides once again the federal government with the power to act alone and not consult the provinces, something which is unacceptable. It is unacceptable because, in a partnership—as trade relations should be—one side cannot give itself the power to control everything.

Federalism will once again create difficult situations. This bill will probably be passed without amendments, like a number of other ones, thanks to the Liberal majority. By staying within the Canadian federation, Quebec will have to suffer the consequences of that legislation, which will increase the power of the federal government, at the expense of the provinces.

[English]

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Madam Speaker, here it is at least a year after the legislation was introduced. It wends its way through the labyrinth of our political process and finally finds itself back on the floor of the House of Commons.

I thought I would be speaking to the bill yesterday so I thumbed through November 1 in history. Of course today is November 2. Interestingly Michelangelo completed his work on the Sistine Chapel, but it only took him four and a half years. The legislation is progressing apace, but no one will compare it with Michelangelo's work on the Sistine Chapel.

Actually to many observers it looks like a make work project. Anyone who has given the matter even a modicum of thought understands and appreciates how ludicrous it is in our country, united from sea to sea to sea, that it is more difficult to trade internally than it is to trade with any other trading partner we may have in the United States or elsewhere in the world.

When the legislation was being put together and the debate among provincial trade delegations was taking place, more people were sitting around the table trying to break down the barriers of interprovincial trade in our country than there were sitting around the table when we were trying to break down the trade barriers with the United States and to shape the North American Free Trade Agreement.

We had a situation where we were hopefully to have a North American Free Trade Agreement between Canada, the United States and Mexico and there were fewer people sitting at the table than when we were trying to break down internal trade barriers within Canada.

How did we end up in that situation? How is that our country ends up in a situation like that? Just a moment ago my hon. colleague from the Bloc spoke. I have had the pleasure of spending many hours in committee with the member listening to him defend the unilateral interests of Quebec. I have never once, in the two years that we have been here, heard him mutter one word about the rights, the interests or the values of Canada as a nation. Every word that has come out of the hon. member's mouth and the mouths of all members of the Bloc has been directly related to Quebec, how they can better the interests of Quebec.

The precise reason we have a problem in interprovincial trade in our country is that we have a kind of parochialism about our institutions. It is one of the primary reasons there is so much discontent from coast to coast to coast. For years citizens of Canada resident in the regions of Canada on the east coast, the west coast, the prairies and the north were merely markets for the manufacturing centres of central Canada in Montreal and southern Ontario.

We now have an opportunity to break down trade barriers within Canada, which would greatly strengthen the economic prospects of all regions of the country, including the manufacturing heartland of Ontario and Quebec. And what happens? We get around a table to debate the opportunity to make our country better.

Canadians spent $1.5 million or so to have Professor Michael Porter of the Harvard Business School do a study on Canada's competitive situation in the world. Interested viewers may know the same study or a study very similar to it could have been obtained for $2,000 U.S. from the Harvard Business School video series. It is exactly the same; it is on competitive strategies.

In any event this $1.5 million study has a recommendation at page 98: "Extend efforts to increase rivalry". It is a well known fact that to get a better product at a lower price we need competitive situations; we need rivalry. Professor Porter in his study asked how we were to be competitive internationally if we were not first competitive at home. How are we to be competitive at home if we have trade barriers that restrict competitiveness? It just makes sense.

This reminds me of the situation we found ourselves in when we entered into the free trade agreement with the United States which members opposite, I would remind them, fought so vigorously. By and large members on this side and I were very much in favour of it.

• (1110)

An hon. member: They are born again.

Mr. McClelland: My colleague says that the Liberals are born again. They are learning. Here they are in government embracing the free trade agreement for the good of all. We are glad to see they have learned the error of their ways.

How is it that we entered into a free trade agreement with the United States, the most aggressive, strongest trading nation in the world, and had not first broken down the internal trade barriers in Canada? It is like getting into a fight with the biggest person in the school yard and saying: "I am going to fight fair. I am going to tie one hand behind my back just to make it fair for you because you are so big. Oh, by the way, just in case you think I might whip you, even though I have one hand tied behind my back, we will have the highest interest rates we have ever had, a high dollar, and we will fight with you in a free trade environment".

It was kind of like a Monty Python skit with the knight that had a head and a torso but no arms or legs. He had the knife in his teeth and was saying: "Fight fair, fight fair. I can beat you". That is what we did. We prostrated ourselves by having high interest rates and by having a high dollar, but most of all we had not broken down trade barriers within Canada so that we would be more efficient before getting into the free trade arena, the global trade arena in the world we find ourselves in. It is absolutely essential the trade barriers be broken down.

This speaks to the nub of the reason we are not supporting the legislation. People would ask: "How on earth can the member speak so positively about the necessity, the absolute need to break down trade barriers, and yet they will vote against the bill?" The reason is that the government has the responsibility to provide leadership and to make sure we actually break down trade barriers.

We get together with the provinces and have months and months of gumming this thing. Nothing happens. The disparity between the provinces in the way they approach the issue is enormous. The fault honestly should not be laid totally at the feet of the government because the provincial governments are involved as well. When the Alberta government came to the table to negotiate the free trade agreement it had one page with one line on it, that there should be no barriers to free trade in Canada. Our neighbouring provinces, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, came to the same meeting with a large stack to protect this, that and the other thing. Ontario, as I am told, made significant concessions. Quebec had to protect everything including the dairy industry and everything else it had.

This is where leadership comes into play, but the federal Liberal government did not lead. Its mandate is to keep people at the table to ensure laws are made to best accommodate the necessities of our country in the future.

In conclusion I will point out what leadership is all about. The Liberals will look at this era in history and hope that the writers and history will look kindly at them. They will look kindly at them if they seize the opportunity to make history, not to be carried along by events and overtaken by them.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity this morning to speak to Bill C–88, an act to implement the agreement on internal trade.

This piece of legislation is historic. With it we will be implementing within the federal jurisdiction the obligations of the federal government under the first comprehensive domestic trade agreement in Canada since the British North America Act, 1867.

In the 128 years since 1867 the Canadian economy has grown and evolved in ways never imagined by the Fathers of Confederation. The federal government still has under section 91(a) of the Constitution responsibility for trade and commerce and specifically interprovincial trade.

Since 1867 the world has changed significantly. The provinces have assumed prominent roles as influencers of economic growth and the regulation of trade and commerce within their respective territories. As a result, trading arrangements and regulations have developed in an ad hoc way often in response to a regional need.

Many of those measures have, often unwittingly, created barriers to trade as the impact on the free flow of goods, services, people and capital within Canada. Such barriers can lead to the inefficient use of resources and limit the ability of industry to take advantage of the economies of scale and to maintain competitive market positions. The result has often been to reduce the competitiveness of Canadian business and to adversely affect the Canadian economy.

There have been many examples of such impediments: different professional and occupational standards in different jurisdictions which limit labour and mobility between provinces; selective listing policies by some provincial liquor boards that discriminate against products from outside their provinces; different transportation regulations, safety codes, inspection arrangements and vehicle standards in each province which make it difficult for truckers to cross provincial boundaries; government procurement polices that give preference to local companies; provincial incentive programs for industry development; and construction procedures that differ from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. These are some of the more common examples of barriers and impediments to interprovincial trade and commerce as exist in Canada.

A recognition that the patchwork of regulations, standards and other barriers to interprovincial trade which have grown around us was an unacceptable feature of the domestic market in Canada. It led governments to agree to negotiate the agreement on internal trade. Growing concern and evidence that these barriers to trade seriously affected our ability to remain competitive in the international trading environment fuelled the urgency of establishing a new trade regime in Canada: one based on more interprovincial trade; one that would not impede the movement of people and investment within the country; and one that would allow for co–operative approaches to the resolution of domestic trade disputes.

Bill C–88 represents the federal government playing its part in doing just that. This bill establishes the framework that will allow us to continue to work to create a trading regime that will remove barriers to interprovincial trade in goods and services; that will reduce impediments to the movement of workers and investment capital between provinces; and that will provide a forum for the resolution of individual trade disputes without resorting to the courts.

The process leading up to this bill has been a long one. It has involved many people and considered many issues and perspectives. In addition to the federal, provincial and territorial governments at both the ministerial and official levels, representatives of the private sector have been actively involved in the process.

Representatives of the private sector and of business interests in particular, have kept the pressure on us at all levels of government to deal with the problems of interprovincial trade barriers and the consequential economic costs to Canada. The Canadian Manufacturers Association has estimated that barriers to trade in our domestic market cost the Canadian economy over $7 billion annually in job and income loss.

There has been a long and thorough process under way to identify problem areas and to develop practical, workable solutions. A key characteristic of the process has been the spirit of co–operation which all the parties involved have demonstrated. In fact, the agreement on internal free trade is an outstanding example of what can be accomplished within a co–operative framework in Canada.

It is also important to note that political parties of all stripes and all regional perspectives have been part of the process.

One fundamental point agreed on by all the parties in the negotiation process is a recognition that a more open trading environment will be good for Canada.

While the process was of long duration, it was characterized by co–operation and a sense of shared mission. The agreement represents a major step toward our shared objective of improving the domestic trading environment and to eliminating barriers to trade, investment and labour mobility in Canada.

The agreement on internal trade provides for the following: a rules based system for trade within Canada; a dispute settlement mechanism to resolve issues on internal trade matters; a standstill on new barriers; commitments to future negotiations to broaden and deepen the agreement; a code of conduct to prevent destructive competition from investment; increased labour mobility; and a commitment to reconcile standards related measures. These are significant achievements.

A key part of this agreement, indeed a key part of any trade agreement, is in how it resolves disputes. This agreement represents a unique solution to our unique Canadian circumstances. It has a made in Canada solution and it provides the basis for promoting compliance through consultation and co–operation rather than by resorting to more formal court based procedures. It is built on rules that draw on established concepts in the international trading environment, but has been refined for use in a Canadian context.

In the international trading environment there are several examples of accords and agreements which set out rules for trading between nations. There are many, many different models for settling disputes and achieving compliance. Well known examples include the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, commonly known as GATT, and now the new World Trade Organization, the WTO, the European Union and the North American Free Trade Agreement.

There have been suggestions that we in Canada should just use one or another of these models in the Canadian situation. These suggestions overlook the important issue of the sovereignty of the parties to an agreement, as well as the degree of political control that the parties themselves are willing to give up to a compliance mechanism.

In the case of the European Union for example, the central authority is supreme over that of the individual member countries. The European Union accord is a comprehensive agreement which gives the central governing authority the overriding power to propose and enact legislation that applies to all parties. That system is based on a legislative and judicial framework, so that a business firm or an individual who feels aggrieved by an action under the law of a particular nation can bring the case to the European Union council as the supreme authority.

Thus the parties to the European Union agreement have relinquished their sovereign authority in areas of trade law, competition policy and government support for industry and have agreed to accept a formal dispute settlement mechanism with the power to enforce decisions. If we applied this model to Canada, it would mean that the federal government would exercise authority over all the other jurisdictions. I wonder if those who recommend the European model are aware of that.

The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, GATT, offers a different model. Under GATT, member nations do not relinquish sovereign authority and disputes are brought forward by a sovereign government representing its national interest. Disputes are referred to an ad hoc panel that can recommend that a trade policy or course of action be changed, but the recommendation cannot be enforced in law. Thus parties to GATT retain their sovereign right to enact and enforce laws within their own country, but do not have recourse to an enforcement mechanism to change non–compliant behaviour outside their own boundaries.

The North American Free Trade Agreement is closer to the GATT model in that sovereignty remains within the national government of each state and disputes are brought forward by governments to the NAFTA commission, which is made up of the responsible ministers of each country who will set up a panel to consider specific disputes.

Whereas parties to the NAFTA retain sovereign authority with respect to enacting and enforcing national legislation, they have agreed to accept the authority of the NAFTA commission to administer retaliatory measures on behalf of aggrieved parties as enforceable sanctions. Thus, under NAFTA, parties remain sovereign states but have effectively ceded some of their sovereignty.

While all of these models have useful elements, none was applicable to the Canadian situation.

The internal trade agreement created a committee on internal trade to oversee its implementation and continuing operation. All governments who are party to the agreement, that is the federal, provincial and territorial governments, are members of the committee.

The committee will be supported by a secretariat which is to provide administrative and operational services. Part of the mandate of the committee is to assist in the resolution of disputes arising out of interpretations and applications of the agreement.

The working philosophy of the committee and of the agreement is to use consultation and conciliation in dispute resolution. Disputing parties will be encouraged to make every attempt through co–operation, consultations and other forms of dispute resolution to arrive at a solution.

I would suggest that Bill C–88 should be supported by all members of this House. It is a progressive measure, a progressive law. It will be good for the country. It will be good for the constituents of Erie riding which I represent.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am speaking today on Bill C–88, an act to implement the agreement on internal trade.

• (1125)

As we are aware, the federal government must implement that agreement through Parliament. There are a number of points covered in this bill: the process for appointment of a federal representative to the Committee on Internal Trade; payment of the federal government's share of expenditures associated with operating the secretariat; the power of the governor in council to suspend, in special cases, the benefits granted under the agreement. Also, no private course of action may be taken based on the text or its implementing orders, nor the provisions of the agreement, other than specific exceptions, without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada. Here are a few more: retaliatory powers where the federal government is an injured party; changes in certain federal legislative texts to bring them in line with the agreement, such as the Financial Administration Act, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, the Interest Act and the Motor Vehicle Transport Act.

The role of the Committee on Internal Trade is to supervise implementation of the agreement and to facilitate dispute settlement. This bill ensures equal treatment of individuals, goods and businesses, regardless of their origin within Canada. It harmonizes standards and regulations in order to eliminate certain practices which might present an obstacle to interprovincial trade. It calls for the free movement of individuals, goods and capital.

The eleven sectors covered by the agreement are public contracts, investments, labour mobility, consumer measures and standards, agrifood products, alcoholic beverages, natural resource processing, communications, transportation, energy, and environmental protection. These various sectors are affected to varying degrees.

Retaliatory measures may be taken by the injured party against the party not complying with the agreement. A party may be a province, a territory or the federal government.

The main purpose of Bill C–88 is to implement the Agreement on Internal Trade. As other members of my party have already said, the Bloc Quebecois has always supported free trade, both internally and internationally. Consequently, we support the principle of this bill, and I must say I never understood why trade barriers existed between the various provinces in Canada.

I may point out that I object to the wording of clause 9 which provides that:

> For the purpose of suspending benefits or imposing retaliatory measures of equivalent effect against a province pursuant to Article 1710 of the Agreement, the Governor in Council may, by order, do any one or more of the following:

It could be interpreted to mean that the federal government may intervene and impose retaliatory measures even when it is not a party to the dispute. Through this bill, Ottawa acquires a mechanism for imposing sanctions on the provinces. In fact, the federal government could impose all kinds of sanctions, including a reduction in transfer payments for provinces that do not abide by the agreement. This new intrusion by the federal government is unacceptable.

I said the Bloc Quebecois supports free trade both internally and internationally. I would like to comment briefly on NAFTA and continental free trade in the Americas.

At the summit meeting attended by presidents and government leaders in Miami, in December 1993, there was some discussion of this topic, and it was decided to expand NAFTA to include all countries in the three Americas in the largest free trade zone ever, from Alaska to Tierra del Fuego.

The first country to sign this free trade agreement after the United States, Canada and Mexico will be Chile, and I fully and strongly support the decision of Chile, my country of birth, to become a member of NAFTA. The Bloc Quebecois has done so as well. Everything was in place for Chile to become a member of NAFTA on January 1, 1996, but unfortunately, the fast–track legislation was not passed by the U.S. Congress, and there will be no quick negotiations as planned. It will take several months more before Chile can sign this agreement.

I would also like to say that, although I am in favour of free trade zones, including NAFTA, I am very critical of the agreement, especially its lack of a social dimension, although a parallel agreement on labour was adopted and a secretariat is starting to operate in Texas with officials from all three countries. Last March, I attended a conference in San Juan, Puerto Rico, to discuss the social aspects of NAFTA with participants from Mexico, Puerto Rico, the United States, Canada and Quebec. We noticed, as I do now, that unfortunately there has been very little debate in this Parliament and in Canada as a whole on the impact of NAFTA on workers. I found that unions do not play a role at all in the operation and administration of NAFTA.

Having lived in Europe for a number of years, I am familiar with the European integration process. I found that Europeans had more social concerns. Their treaty, for example, contains provision for the creation of a special fund to assist workers affected by the European common market; a social charter, containing principles and provisions protecting workers, and an economic and social council where employers and workers may meet to discuss European integration.

Unfortunately, NAFTA contains no provision for minimum working standards, except in three areas: minimum standards must be met in health and safety on the job, child labour is prohibited, and each country in NAFTA must comply with its minimum salary legislation. No standards are set, however, for the three countries. There is no standardization in either social or labour terms. Provision could have been made for the inclusion of international labour standards in NAFTA, such as the convention on the right to unionize, unrestricted collective bargaining and the right of association. NAFTA contains no provision on the free movement of labour and nothing to protect immigrant workers. International free trade agreements must contain a social element, just as this social element must be included in free trade or common market agreements.

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the agreement on international trade came into effect on July 1. Bill C–88 is intended to make it possible for the federal government to comply fully with its obligations under the agreement. I therefore believe that it is important for the House to proceed expeditiously in its consideration of Bill C–88.

• (1135)

For years, business and private sector groups have complained to both the federal and provincial governments about domestic trade barriers and impediments to a free and open internal market. Numerous studies going back as far as the 1940 Rowell–Sirois commission have recognized the issue and documented the broad scope of the problem.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association in 1991 estimated the cost associated with barriers and economic inefficiencies to be approximately $6.5 billion annually. The most recent Statistics Canada figures indicate that interprovincial exports of goods and services in 1990 were worth $141 billion annually and responsible directly or indirectly for 1.7 million jobs.

A recent study by the chamber of commerce underlined the fact that the Canadian internal market is the most interdependent of any area in the world. In agreeing to negotiate the agreement, Canadian governments recognized that how well our domestic economy works is key to how we will prosper as a nation and how we will compete in the international economy. An open domestic market and economy will allow Canadians and Canadian companies to strengthen their international competitiveness and develop new opportunities to grow and prosper. The alternative offers only an ultimately self–destructive protectionism that benefits only a few special interests at the cost of the country as a whole.

When they agreed to negotiate the agreement on internal trade, the federal, provincial, and territorial governments all recognized and accepted the importance of working together in the national interest. In concluding the agreement, Canadian governments have demonstrated that they are prepared to work together, both now and in the future.

As the Minister of Industry has said in the House, the agreement is a consensual agreement. Some members opposite have criticized the agreement as inadequate and insufficient. The agreement may not be perfect, but it represents an improvement from where we were before. It reflects a consensus on the principle of an open and efficient national economy. It establishes a detailed rules framework for internal trade and it provides a consistent and defined process for preventing and resolving disputes that may arise over specific issues or measures.

All the parties have accepted to a greater or lesser degree disciplines that in the sectors covered will improve how the national economy functions in the future. It will be possible, indeed it is the government's intention, to work to improve the agreement in the future and to expand its scope and coverage. For the moment it is a start, a point from which to start to work. We can and we should build on that.

Some members have also criticized the government for not exercising its constitutional authority over interprovincial trade to open an internal market more forcibly. The national economy has become considerably more complex than it was when the constitutional powers of the different levels of governments were first agreed to in 1867. In the context of today's economy and modern Canadian federalism, the views of these critics are, frankly speaking, simplistic.

If anything is clear it is that a country operates most successfully when all levels of government work co–operatively in the national interest, not unilaterally and certainly not by fiat. Governments were not negotiating constitutional change in the agreement on internal trade. Rather, they were developing the basis of working together with their respective powers and responsibilities to make the national economy work more effectively and efficiently.

Unilateral action may be theoretically possible as a method to achieve the same ends. Some may consider it to be a desirable way of proceeding. However, it is simply not an effective or acceptable way to make Canadian federalism work.

Some members opposite have suggested that the government has a hidden agenda on Bill C–88, that it conceals a power grab and is intended to provide a means to force provinces to the will of the federal government. That is purely and simply wrong. The Minister of Industry has responded at length and in detail to those allegations. I will not dignify them with further comment. Those should preclude even the most obtuse interpretation of the bill's language.

Bill C–88 does not deal with the responsibilities of the provinces or provincial measures, only federal responsibilities and measures. It is intended only to make it possible for the federal government to comply fully with its obligations under the agreement and to play its part in making the agreement work.

Bill C–88 gives the government specific authority or makes changes to certain pieces of legislation to enable it to act in accordance with its obligations. It also changes some existing legislation to make it easier for provinces to comply with some of their specific obligations under the agreement.

The Minister of Industry has indicated in a response to his provincial counterparts and to Senator Roberge that he intends to propose one or two amendments to Bill C–88 when it is considered in committee. I expect those will remove the grounds for misinterpretation or misrepresentation that some have made of the government's intentions.

We should be clear in our understanding that Bill C–88 does not by itself legislate or give life to the agreement on internal trade. The agreement has already been signed by the parties—the federal, provincial, and territorial governments. When it came into effect July 1 all those governments became bound by the obligations they accepted when they signed the agreement.

Each government is responsible itself for complying with its obligations and for living up to its responsibilities under the agreement. At the annual premiers conference this summer the provincial premiers and territorial leaders renewed their commitment to the agreement and to removing barriers. Two provinces, Alberta and Newfoundland, have already passed their implementing legislation.

As I said earlier, I believe it is important that we on the federal side proceed expeditiously in our consideration of this legislation. The federal government has played a leading role in getting all governments to work together in the interests of all Canadians on international trade issues.

Bill C–88 does what is necessary to ensure the federal level of government will be able to continue to play its role in the co–operative intergovernmental process. We should not delay it further.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I want to speak for a few minutes on Bill C–88 and look at some of the allegations that have been made in previous debates by some members about Bill C–88 and the unwarranted concerns those allegations may have engendered in other quarters.

The opposition's allegations about Bill C–88 stem from an inability or an obstinate unwillingness to understand the plain meaning of the text of the bill. The Minister of Industry responded in detail to those allegations in this House in May and in June. I will refer to some of the points that need repeating.

Only in rare cases would the federal government be a complainant in a dispute under the agreement on internal trade. If a dispute were resolved in favour of the federal government and if the province involved refused to comply with the impartial panel's findings, the federal government could withdraw benefits of equivalent effect.

Such retaliation would have to be in the same sector as the original violation or in another sector covered by the agreement. Retaliation could not involve—this is important—transfer payments or social programs because those things are not covered by the agreement.

Bill C–88 does not make the federal government the policeman of the agreement on internal trade, as the opposition mistakenly insists. Any careful reading of the headnotes to clause 9 of Bill C–88 and article 1710 of the agreement on internal trade, combined with a minimum of logical reasoning, immediately gainsays the wild allegations that have been made.

It is important to stress that Bill C–88 deals only with what the federal government must do to live up to its obligations under the internal trade agreement and nothing else. Notwithstanding that the concerns expressed were totally unwarranted and clearly tactically motivated, the Minister of Industry has spent some time in committee and in other places speaking to the amendments in Bill C–88.

I will reaffirm that to date, Alberta and Newfoundland have passed legislation to implement the agreement and to comply with their respective obligations under it. Since tabling Bill C–88 in the House on May 1, in the cold light of day the actual substance of the bill has proven to be uncontroversial and designed only to enable the federal government to comply with its obligations under the agreement on internal trade and to meet the negotiated commitments, both legal and moral, to the other parties to the agreement, that is, the provinces and the territories.

There is so much one can say in support of this bill. I want to stress that this straightforward consideration of the bill has been more or less reaffirmed in the discussions and debates which have taken place. It is important to note the urgency of what we are asking now. The passing of Bill C–88 is important to underscore the federal part in ensuring the agreement is implemented.

This is a historic piece of legislation. It will allow the federal government to continue to play a lead role in concert with the governments of the other parties to the agreement. It is also intended to implement the first comprehensive domestic trade agreement in Canada since the British North America Act in 1867.

In the 128 years since 1867 the Canadian economy has grown and evolved in ways never imagined by the fathers of Confederation. The federal government still has constitutional responsibility for interprovincial trade and commerce, but successive governments as a matter of policy have chosen to work co–operatively with the provinces to address internal trade problems.

Barriers and impediments to internal trade lead to the inefficient use of resources. They limit the ability of industry to take advantage of economies of scale and to maintain competitive market positions. The result is to reduce the competitiveness of Canadian business and to adversely affect the Canadian economy.

It is incumbent on all Canadian governments to work together to make the national economy work as effectively and efficiently as possible so that all Canadians can enjoy the benefits of strong economic development, growth and prosperity. I call on all members to look at this straightforward legislation which will provide the needed facility as we work together to provide the kind of environment needed by our businesses.

We have sought to work co–operatively. The whole process which produced the agreement is testament to that. Our approach has been one which speaks to the fact that we are a truly responsible Canadian government. As a truly responsible Canadian government we can take those working arrangements between provinces into the future. I call on hon. members to give their support.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

• (1150)

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(7), the chief government whip, with the agreement of the whips of all recognized parties, has requested that the division on the question now before the House be deferred until Monday at 6 p.m., at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Michel Dupuy (for the Minister of Finance, Lib.) moved that Bill C–103, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am delighted to introduce for third reading Bill C–103, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act, a measure in support of Canada's magazine industry.

Canadian periodicals are a vital element of our cultural expression. They provide news and information, critical analysis, informed discourse and lively dialogue, all of which contribute to our sense of identity as Canadians.

In cultural terms, the Canadian magazine industry is a flourishing sector with over 1,300 titles available from over 1,000 publishers. The editorial pages of Canadian magazines contain ideas and information that are the page equivalent of 2,500 books per year.

Magazines reach specialized audiences not accessible to the other media, such as newspapers and television. They target new audiences and give them an opportunity to speak, thus creating a bond between readers who share similar ideas. Clearly, they offer very significant cultural advantages to a society as scattered and disparate as our own.

Canadian magazines also provide writers and artists with a means of expression. About 92 per cent of the editorial content of Canadian periodicals is produced by Canadian writers employed by these periodicals or working for them on a freelance basis. Canadians are also responsible for over 92 per cent of illustrations and photographs.

Canadians have access to a wide array of Canadian periodicals, from current affairs magazines like L'Actualité and Maclean's, to special interest publications in areas such as the arts, science and leisure, to general interest magazines aimed at a wide audience.

Some of these publications are academic in nature while others are low circulation magazines whose openness to experimentation in the arts and literature leads to cultural renewal.

The first Canadian periodicals were created in Nova Scotia at the end of the 18th century by immigrants from New England. The history of periodicals in Canada follows that of many writers, artists and merchants. It has led to the conception of innovative ideas, to the creation of original visual images, and to the emergence of new forms of cultural expression.

More importantly, the history of periodicals in Canada is also a political saga in which individual interests have survived in an environment dominated by foreign interests.

• (1155)

For the government, the challenge has always been to strike a balance between preserving Canada's cultural autonomy and allowing the free flow of ideas.

[English]

The factors that define the environment in which Canadian publishers compete for Canadian readers include: the impact of foreign magazines on the market; the relatively small size of the Canadian population; the difficulties and cost of distribution over our huge territory; the openness of Canadians to foreign cultural products; the effects of the cover prices of imported magazines on the Canadian price structure; news stand competition from foreign magazines; and the impact of overflow advertising on the potential advertising market in Canada.

In addition, today's tough financial and fiscal environment takes its toll. In 1992 for example, more than half of Canadian magazines had no operating profits. The average operating profit for the industry as a whole was only 2.36 per cent. The success of the Canadian magazine industry can be better described as cultural rather than financial. Canadian publishing ventures of all types have been sustained by the creativity of writers and publishers and the interest of readers.

Magazines must build and maintain their readership over the long term. Also essential to their survival are advertisers. Canadian magazines depend on advertising for 65 per cent of their revenue.

The government's policy concerning the Canadian magazine industry is to encourage Canadian businesses to advertise in Canadian periodicals and in periodicals whose content is original rather than recycled, and to help publishers reach their market.

Since 1965, two measures have helped inject advertising revenues into the Canadian magazine industry. These two measures are customs tariff 9958, which prohibits the importing of split run periodicals, and section 19 of the Income Tax Act, which permits the deduction of the costs of advertising directed at the Canadian market, provided this advertising is placed in Canadian editions of Canadian owned or controlled periodicals.

In April 1993, the arrival of Sports Illustrated Canada in our newsstands marked the beginning of a new way of dealing with the Canadian market for the American magazine industry.

[English]

Sports Illustrated Canada was able to sidestep tariff code 9958 by electronically transmitting the main editorial content from the United States to a printer in Canada instead of physically importing the split run edition into Canada. Domestic ads were substituted for foreign ads and some original content was added to the existing editorial content. Thus, Sports Illustrated Canada demonstrated that the tariff code was no longer completely effective in dealing with split runs.

This new development underscored the need to update the legislative measures in place to support this vital sector of our cultural industry. It has been asserted that Investment Canada Act guidelines announced in July 1993 effectively foreclosed the possibility of any further split runs in the Canadian market. These guidelines however, can only apply to businesses in Canada. As we have seen with Sports Illustrated Canada, the publisher does not need a place of business in Canada in order to publish split runs in our country. Hence, Bill C–103.

First, an amendment to the Excise Tax Act will impose an excise tax on split run editions of periodicals attributed in Canada.

Second, an amendment to section 19 of the Income Tax Act will add an anti–avoidance rule relating to the deductibility of advertising. This will ensure that newspapers and periodicals that purport to be Canadian are in fact Canadian owned and controlled.

These are measures that will level the playing field for the Canadian magazine industry. That is fair. It is our responsibility to ensure that the Canadian magazine industry can compete for ad dollars.

The task force on the Canadian magazine industry was set up because the Sports Illustrated Canada case had demonstrated that the existing legislation could be circumvented. And I would like to clarify an important point here.

The problem does not rest with the general idea of publishing a sports magazine in Canada. It has to do with advertising revenues. The fact that a split run edition of Sports Illustrated Canada was sold in our newsstands shows that split run editions can enter the Canadian advertising market in spite of the existing legislation.

The task force set about its task in April 1993. Its mandate was to find sound and practical ways to ensure that the federal policy of assistance to the Canadian magazine industry would remain effective.

Task force members had an extensive knowledge of and experience in the Canadian magazine industry. There were members from every region of the country, including advisors working for the advertising industry or the Consumers' Association of Canada, representatives of the Canadian magazine industry and international trade experts.

This group of highly competent individuals carried out their task superbly. Not only did they provide us with an in–depth and up–to–date analysis of the Canadian magazine industry, but they also demonstrated the need to update existing legislative instruments governing the Canadian magazine industry.

[English]

We have relied on the advice of the task force because it examined closely all possible options. For example, the task force concluded that split runs could lead to a possible loss of 40 per cent of the industry's advertising revenue. That is $200 million annually.

Fiscal concerns ruled out establishing an industrial support program of such magnitude. The proposed tax is the most reasonable and practical structural measure. At 80 per cent, the tax can effectively achieve its objective of encouraging original content.

The task force concluded that the adoption of an excise tax measure that encourages ad revenues to flow to periodicals containing original editorial content in magazines would be the best way to assist Canada's magazine industry in a manner consistent with our trade obligations. By promoting original content, the tax will also ensure that all publishers are competing on a more even footing for Canadian advertising revenue.

A number of questions and concerns have been raised during the debate on Bill C–103. I would like to take this opportunity to address some of them.

It has been suggested that Canadian magazine publishers should take advantage of the opportunities provided by the free trade agreement and sell into the United States. American popular culture is part of the every day life of Canadians and so the editorial content of American magazines is generally of interest to Canadians. The reverse is not true. Canadian popular culture and Canadian issues are not part of the every day life of Americans.

• (1205)

To succeed in the United States, Canadian magazines would have to change their editorial content to such an extent they would no longer be Canadian magazines.

The question has been raised whether the proposed excise tax is a valid use of the federal taxation power. Let me assure the House that Bill C–103 is a valid exercise of the federal taxation power. The measure is of general application, since it will apply to any split run edition distributed in Canada. Tax measures are not always solely for the purpose of raising revenue. Tax measures may also be used for other economic and social objectives.

Examples are the tax treatments of RRSP contributions and the child tax benefits.

[Translation]

Finally, to those who criticize such a tax because of its discriminatory nature, I say that this tax measure would apply to any split run edition, whether produced by a Canadian publisher or a foreign one.

With Bill C–103, the government's objective is not to limit access to foreign magazines, but to preserve a market in which Canadian publications can do well in our country and continue to be sold alongside foreign magazines.

The federal policy of supporting the Canadian magazine industry has been in place for a long time and remains unchanged. In fact, Bill C–103 reinforces that policy by adapting it to the new reality. This legislation will enable the industry to meet the challenges created by technological changes, such as those which have resulted in the split run edition phenomenon in Canada.

An open and stable structure for transborder exchanges is one of the greatest assets for our country. In a huge and diversified world market, with globalization increasingly prevalent, our culture allows us to be different from the other countries. As a government, the challenge is, as always, to maintain efficient policies and policy instruments that will promote cultural development. We must also seek to achieve a balance between the sometimes competing interests of our foreign trade, on the one hand, and the preservation of our cultural identity, on the other.

[English]

Bill C–103 meets those important objectives. Canadians value who they are as a people and as a country. They want and deserve access to cultural products that mirror the Canadian experience and outlook, to give Canadians what they want and deserve, means ensuring that our cultural industries remain healthy.

It is not enough to say, for example, that the circulation of the top Canadian magazines has increased while the circulation of the top U.S. magazines in Canada has decreased. The reality is that Canada's top magazines are up against the combined force of the much larger number of American magazines in circulation.

In conclusion, the 1970s and the 1980s saw an unprecedented explosion of cultural activity which produced a broad range of Canadian artistic products. During this time Canadians continued to define themselves and their values in a uniquely Canadian way.

The federal government has taken several measures to increase the share of the internal market held by Canadian cultural products, and to improve the ability of Canadian artists and cultural industries to create and market their products in our country. In the nineties, the Canadian cultural policy expanded, so as to include many new components. This complexity is the result of market globalization, as well as the extraordinary development of our artistic and cultural activities.

• (1210)

The main objective of our cultural policy still is to make sure that Canadians have access to Canadian products in order for them to share common values and symbols and continue to develop a cultural identity fitting their image.

Bill C–103 is an extension of our cultural policy. Even if the challenges are many, our track record shows that we can not only meet them but do an excellent job of it.

[English]

I will conclude with a quote from the report of the task force on the Canadian magazine industry. "Magazines help foster in Canadians a sense of ourselves. They enable us to see ourselves as no others see us. They also enable us to view the rest of the world from a Canadian standpoint. They are the thread which binds together the fibres of our nation".

I urge my colleagues to support Bill C–103 at third reading.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today we are debating, at third reading, Bill C–103, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. On behalf of the Bloc Quebecois, I rise today to reiterate our support of this bill, which is basically aimed at putting an end to the distribution of split run editions in Canada and at strengthening the provision granting tax deductions to Canadian companies advertising in Canadian newspapers and magazines.

For the benefit of our listeners, I should add that a split run edition is an edition in which more than 20 per cent of the editorial content is of foreign origin.

It is important to note that this bill was made necessary by the government's lack of action to take the required steps to ban split run editions in Canada.

In 1993, Time Warner advised the Canadian government that it intended to distribute a split run edition of Sports Illustrated in Canada. As I said in my September 25 speech, instead of acting, the government chose to appoint a task force to study the issue. Sports Illustrated went ahead with its plan unhindered and with the full knowledge of the government.

Time Warner simply decided to electronically send the editorial content of its American magazine to Canada. It then sold advertisement to Canadian companies, and printed and distributed its magazine in Canada. Therefore, dumping advertising was possible for Sports Illustrated because its domestic market already covered its production costs. It could sell ads much cheaper and undermine the magazine industry in Quebec and Canada.

However, and I want to be clear on this point, that measure is not aimed only at Sports Illustrated. In fact, it became necessary because Sports Illustrated was the first magazine to circumvent the intent of the Canadian law. I know, and it was said repeatedly at the finance committee, that other businesses are only waiting for a slight bending on the part of the Canadian legislators to do exactly what Sports Illustrated did, that is transfer some editorial content to Canada and practise advertisement dumping.

I would also like to remind you that this bill was requested by representatives of the magazine industry in Quebec and Canada mainly for two reasons: first, because the industry could not have grown without the proper protection measures and second, because there is no financial security in that sector of the cultural industry.

For example, at the finance committee, Mr. Jean Paré, editor of L'actualité and representative of the Association québécoise des éditeurs de magazines, when speaking about the impact of the measures implemented by Canada to protect the Canadian magazine industry, told the committee that most of these magazines would not exist without the measures that successive federal governments have implemented over the last 30 years to level the playing field for Canadian businesses in the international market and ensure fair competition.

"The proof of our argument is that, before this legislation was adopted, our industry was nonexistent. The magazine I represent will be just 20 years old in a few months. When it was started up, only three of the 57 periodicals I represent today were in existence. The combined annual circulation of those in existence at that time was a mere six million copies. Today, our 57 members have a total of 80 million annual circulation; with the nonmembers added in, the figure is 138 million. The legislation adopted 25 years ago triggered investment in these businesses. The magazine industry in English Canada has followed almost the same path."

In his presentation to the finance committee, Mr. Paré indicated that, at first sight, one might think that these figures indicate that the magazine sector is a healthy one, but this is not the case. In fact, his statement to the Committee confirmed the conclusions of the task force on the Canadian periodical industry. Mr. Paré said:

"One might think that this is a robust and flourishing sector of the communications industry. Not in the least. Nine out of ten of these magazines are not cost–effective and are in existence solely because the publisher has a few profitable titles. This minority of profitable magazines, moreover, has to settle for profits that, on the average, barely exceed 10 per cent, far from what is considered a minimum in the US. Between 60 per cent and 70 per cent of these magazines' revenues come from advertising and a 10 per cent cut in advertising would probably wipe out the entire Canadian magazine industry".

Sports Illustrated also testified before the finance committee. During its presentation, the company stated that Bill C–103 was unfair because it specifically targeted Sports Illustrated.

In fact, it is true that the bill calls for imposition of an 80 per cent excise tax on the advertising revenues of split run magazines, and that this measure must be applied to Sports Illustrated. The bill states that this measure does not apply to those split run periodicals which were already published and distributed in Canada as at March 26, 1993, and Sports Illustrated began its Canadian distribution on April 1, 1993.

Contrary to what Time Warner, the publishers of Sports Illustrated, would have us believe, this measure is not solely aimed at its magazine. In his presentation to the finance committee, Mr. Paré described as follows the competition Quebec magazines might face if Bill C–103 were not passed by this House, and I quote:

"The publishing giants are not all American. They do not publish in English alone. The competition comes from German, French and British companies as well. These gigantic concerns, which may own hundreds of different magazines, the smallest with a circulation that sometimes exceeds that of the biggest Canadian magazines, are increasingly publishing in all languages in compact editions with adapted content, in order to skim off advertising revenue in as many markets as possible. These international publishers are now discovering Canada".

So Bill C–103 is not exclusively aimed at Sports Illustrated, as Time Warner would have us believe, but also at all the other magazine publishers who are waiting to see what will happen to this attempt by an American magazine to enter the Canadian market.

In its presentation to the finance committee, Sports Illustrated insisted that it participated in Canadian life, first by printing stories on Canadian teams and athletes like the Toronto Blue Jays and Elvis Stojko, and second, by creating jobs in Canada. In this respect the magazine's representatives stated, and I quote:

"—the company saw this as an opportunity to create jobs for Canadians in printing and distribution, and assignment opportunities for Canadian journalists and sports photographers".

According to our information, however, Canadian content in Sports Illustrated is minimal. Furthermore, it seems that the stories in Sports Illustrated that feature Canadian athletes would have been included in any event in the U.S. version of the magazine. Elvis Stojko may be a Canadian, but he also won the gold for figure skating, which makes him an international star, so it is not surprising he would be featured in Sports Illustrated. In fact, it would be surprising if Sports Illustrated did not have a story on Elvis Stojko.

As for job creation, I am told that the contribution of Sports Illustrated in this area is rather meagre. With both versions of Sports Illustrated being produced entirely in the New York, Canada's editorial contribution was to all intents and purposes nil. As to the job of printing, one printer estimates it takes a maximum of nine hours press time to print an issue of Sports Illustrated. We really have to ask ourselves just how much Sports Illustrated contributes to Canadian culture and employment.

On the other hand, Sports Illustrated clearly creams off the advertising market by selling its advertising space at cut prices. In its brief to the Standing Committee on Finance, the magazine announced its intention to change from a monthly format to a weekly one, an announcement that will hardly be reassuring for the Canadian industry, if the government does not act diligently.

This legislative measure is important for the magazine industry. I would, however, like to take this opportunity today to remind the government that it must also implement the other measures put forward by the task force on the magazine industry.

They are: first, freeze the funds set aside for the postal subsidy program at their 1995 level and second, remove the GST from all reading materials. The Liberal Party of Canada made clear and formal commitments in this regard. It passed a resolution to the effect that a Liberal government would reaffirm the historical principle of not taxing the publishing industry and would remove the goods and services tax, the GST, from all reading materials. We are still waiting for these promises to take effect.

Third, the Government of Canada should be obliged and the provincial governments encouraged to place advertising messages to the people of Canada in Canadian magazines only. Fourth, the Investment Canada Act should be amended to ensure that the Department of Canadian Heritage vets all measures approved by Investment Canada concerning periodicals and magazines.

[English]

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to address Bill C–103.

The real question governments have to ask themselves when they are creating legislation that deals with issues like cultural trade policy is who is the real guardian of cultural trade or culture in Canada. We have to ask ourselves who is the real protector of consumers. Is it the government or is it Canadians themselves? Those are the critical issues.

I will not talk today about the technical aspects of this piece of legislation. We have done that in committee and over the last several days in other speeches. I will not get into that, but I want to talk a lot about the principle that surrounds who determines what culture is, which culture is worth protecting and why culture should be protected at all. That is the critical issue underlying the debate today. We are having a technical debate about this piece of legislation but it goes deeper than that. It goes right down to who is the guardian of culture in Canada. We can even extend that and say that it applies to the debate we have had on what is going on in Quebec, the referendum campaign, and who makes determinations about who knows best what is culture and that kind of thing.

I will talk about that matter over the course of my speech from a couple of different perspectives. I will talk about it from the cultural perspective and from the economic perspective. Again the question is: Who knows better what is best for the ordinary consumer of cultural and the protection of culture and who knows best for the ordinary consumer, the ordinary person who pays taxes? I would argue in both cases that ideally it is individuals themselves and failing that it is lower levels of government.

First I will talk about the economic issues. The minister spoke at great length about how it was important to protect the magazine industry in Canada and that we needed the legislation to do it. What about all the other people affected by the legislation? It is not just the magazine industry that has a stake in it. Certainly advertisers use magazines as a vehicle to get their message out to the consumers. What effect will the legislation have on them?

I will give an example of how the legislation harms the ordinary advertiser and why that is a problem. A business somewhere in Ontario is selling computers and using Sports Illustrated to get its message out because it had the perfect demographics and the right audience. All of a sudden it will be denied that vehicle. However its competitor, IBM out of the U.S., will not be denied that vehicle. It will be able to use SI's North American circulation to deliver that message against me. In doing that it will have an unfair competitive advantage.

It is not the fault of the business in Ontario that is trying to sell computers. It is the fault of the government that is denying Sports Illustrated the chance to come into Canada and sell advertising to businesses like that. These products have a value to the people who use them. That is why they spend money on them.

We are denying that business a chance to use that vehicle to capture its own market. We may have a situation where IBM is coming in and is dominant in Canada because it has access to very cheap advertising that the business from somewhere in Ontario does not have. We are discriminating against the advertisers, the businesses that are employers of people and pay taxes to the Government of Canada. We are denying them that chance. That is one reason the legislation is wrong.

The hon. minister talked about the fact that there are many Canadian magazines and people have access to them. What about the magazines we do not have access to because of the legislation? We do not know which ones they are. One of the theories of economics is that we never see the sometimes unintended, invisible results of economic policies.

What about those who cannot afford the subscription rates? What about those magazines? What about the ones that use the advertising revenue to get a wider distribution so that they can charge more for their advertising? We will never hear about those magazines. They will never come here because they cannot support their subscription rates with more advertising rates. We are denied access to those. We will never know what we are missing because we will never see those magazines.

The same argument goes to the price that we pay for the ones that get here.

It is well known that prices are much higher in Canada for American or foreign magazines than they would be in their country of origin. I would argue that the reason is that the subscription price cannot be underwitten by the advertising revenues. Therefore we again have a situation in which the consumers are taking it in the ear so that we can protect a certain privileged class, a group of people who publish magazines in this country and are lucky enough to enjoy the protection of the Canadian government.

In all these ways, consumers and advertisers are paying a high price for this government's policy. I point out again that in doing that we are denying people the chance to take their disposable income and spend it in other areas and cause the economy to grow and create jobs, the multiplier effect, et cetera. That is precisely how it works when there is free trade.

Before I talk about free trade in general I want to talk for a moment about the idea of an 80 per cent tax and about the principles on which the Canadian magazine industry has fought this issue. To find out where those principles come from we have to go back to an earlier debate, to the debate about the GST.

There was an enlightening article in the Montreal Gazette on Monday, October 30, which I would like to quote. I think it puts the argument of the Canadian magazine industry into perspective and helps us to understand where they are coming from. This is from an article by William Watson, economic affairs editor of the Montreal Gazette:

> Those who support the law, i.e., the Canadian magazine industry, argue the Americans have an unfair advantage. Their U.S. stories have already been written and therefore cost the split run virtually nothing. By contrast, editorial content in all Canadian magazines is all new for the Canadian market, so the playing field is uneven.
> Well, the playing field for bananas and oranges is uneven too: tropical countries produce them much more cheaply than we do, but we do not insist Canadian fruit lovers buy Canadian-made oranges and bananas. If Canadian readers prefer cheaper U.S. editorial content to more expensive Canadian editorial content, why should Ottawa interfere with their choice?
> When the GST was first being debated, the Canadian publishing industry ran an ad campaign, the gist of which was that other countries used to burn books, we just tax them. But now the very same industry is pushing an 80 per cent tax on one form of reading material.
> Burning books is OK, I guess, so long as the books are American.

A very good argument is made in this article against the argument the Canadian magazine industry was using. They also make a very cogent argument for individual Canadians to be the protectors of culture. They are saying that individual Canadians should be the guardians of culture in this country.

It is the old cliché that beauty is in the eye of the beholder. While the Government of Canada may think something is not very good editorial comment or content and it may somehow be un–Canadian, other people may appreciate it. It enriches their lives, as reading always does. They find it fulfilling. That is why they read it.

By denying some of these magazines a chance to earn revenue by picking up advertisers in this country, we are in some cases denying them the chance to actually send their magazines into this country. This article absolutely explodes the argument of the Canadian magazine publishing industry, going back to the GST debate, about the GST being a form of book burning then, but when there is an 80 per cent tax on Sports Illustrated it is somehow different.

I really do think this argument is all about who should be the real guardians of culture in this country. I could go on about that in more detail, but I want to get on to the whole idea of free trade and something I talked about yesterday. It makes the point and so I will raise it again.

I remember from the free trade debate in 1988 all the articles and various newspaper, video, and TV clips that we saw about the effect free trade was going to have on the wine industry in Canada. I bet a lot of people remember that. I remember how people said it was going to devastate grape growers and the wine industry in Canada. There were all kinds of protests. We saw them in the Okanagan and also in southern Ontario.

At the end of the day, completely the opposite was the case. Not only did the wine industry thrive, it is now acknowledged around the world as one of the finest wine industries in the world. We have won all kinds of rewards as a result of the competition free trade brought in, which forced wine growers to become efficient and among the best in the world.

The same happens in every sector when we allow it to happen. It gets back to this whole argument about who decides what is right for the country. Should it be the government or vested interests? Should it be particular interests, which of course will never turn down protection from the government? They will invite it. However, at the end of the day, what is best for consumers? Consumers end up with a cheaper product. They end up with more selection. They end up with the highest quality. Should that not be the standard we strive for? That is exactly what we get when we have free trade, even in the cultural industries.

Again I say that Canadians themselves should be the guardians and protectors of their own culture. They are more than capable of doing that. They are very sophisticated people. They can make those decisions for themselves. I want to point to some examples where I think the cultural industry is doing extremely well, where it does compete in the world extremely well.

Before I do that I want to touch on an issue the minister raised. He talked about general interest magazines being of interest to Canadians when they come from the United States but not necessarily the other way around. In other words, Americans may not be very interested in general interest magazines that come from Canada. I do not really disagree with that; It is probably true. We could make some arguments that if there are retired Canadian people in the States there may be some interest in these general interest magazines. That is probably true, but that is really not the point.

I take the minister's point. However, what about all the specialty magazines? What about, for instance, a golf magazine? Why does a golf magazine have to come from the United States? Why cannot golf magazines come from Canada and be exported into the United States? For crying out loud, there is no difference in the game from one country to the other. In fact we have Canadian golfers on the professional golf tour. Why can it not work that way?

We had a witness before us who I guess was representing the interests of the Canadian magazine industry, but that person acknowledged that their magazine has about 30 per cent of their circulation into the United States. Obviously that is not something they would want to lose. It helps them to make a profit and strengthens their industry.

I would argue that if we want to strengthen the industries then we cannot rely on the tiny population, relatively speaking, that Canada has compared to the United States or the rest of the world. To further make the point, when we had a member of the Quebec magazine publishing industry before us he talked about the threat Quebec magazines faced if split run publishing was allowed in Canada. He talked about the possibility of all these magazines from other countries in the world coming in. He was not so worried about the U.S., of course, because it did not publish that often in French, but the big competitor was France. He talked specifically about France and actually Germany. He also talked about the Swedes, the Swiss, the Belgians being a threat. That struck me as very odd, because here are tiny countries, smaller in some cases than Canada, and they are a threat to Canada with their publishing industry. That struck me as extremely odd.

If a person thinks about it, what they have realized and what they are doing is saying they cannot survive, probably the French juggernaut as well, by remaining insular, by looking inward. They have to take their product and market it to the rest of the world. They were trying to do that in Quebec and no doubt in other places around the world. That is how they were not only surviving but thriving.

To me that makes eminent sense. If one has a small market, the best way to turn the tables on the guys who are using the economy of scale on the person is to turn around and use it back on them, to use one's editorial comment and mass produce it to get into other countries around the world. In specialty magazines that can be done. We are seeing it to some degree through Canadian magazines already in the United States, but there is certainly a tremendous market to keep doing it or there is a tremendous market there and tremendous potential to keep expanding.

If we put impediments in place that prevent us from doing that, like the clause in the split run bill, Bill C–103, which does not allow Canadian magazines—this is unbelievable—that have a circulation in the United States that is less than it is in Canada to send back the editorial content via split run to Canada, then we are putting up an impediment that prevents our magazine industry from becoming bigger and from going out into these other countries and really making it more viable over the long run. I do not understand why in the world we are doing that.

We had people before the committee and one of the magazines doing that is Harrowsmith, a Canadian magazine that has a circulation in the United States. It is publishing out of New York and sending stuff back by split run to Canada and using the same content, but it is a Canadian magazine. Those people voluntarily said that if this is to be an argument used against this legislation, they will quit doing split run because at the end of the day it is in their best interest. That is not an argument, in my judgment. It is fine for them to say that; they are established down there now. But what about the guys who want to go down there and get established by having, for instance, a specialty magazine that appeals to Canadians and to Americans and to anybody who speaks the English language? Why are we standing in the way of that? That is the way to make our industry viable.

From what I have seen in the book publishing industry, we have some of the best writers in the world. We can produce editorial content that is better than anybody else's in the world. We have proven that before. Look at the book publishing industry and at how widely read Canadian books are around the world and you will know we are producers of great writers. We can do that. The same argument applies when we are talking about French writers. We could produce some of the best editorial content in the world, but we are being denied the right to do that, partially through this split run clause in the legislation.

It is more than that. It is the attitude. We are saying do not let the Americans in and we will not go in there. It is kind of a saw–off. It is crazy when we have so much to share with the rest of the world, the best artists and writers and creators of all kinds in this country. It is absolutely crazy that we are doing that.

Yesterday I mentioned this, but I will bring up again the Canadian Association of Broadcasters convention I attended on the weekend. The minister was there as well and spoke to the convention. What I want to talk about is how Canadian broadcasters have really gone out and made a success of themselves around the world because they have not been afraid to use the economies of scale, taking Canadian product and using it across the world.

One of the best examples of this is CanWest Global of Winnipeg which is huge in New Zealand and in Australia. Another very good example is Power Corp. which is now very big in Europe. I understand it is the biggest broadcaster in Europe and is doing extremely well. Another example is Electrohome Ltd. and there are others.

These companies take the programming they produce here and to take full advantage of the economies of scale they have marketed around the world. They have done extremely well. It means jobs for Canadian film makers, jobs for Canadian actors, jobs for Canadian screenwriters. Already we have the beginnings of a cultural industry which is doing extremely well in so far as it is allowed to compete freely in the world.

We should not be looking inward. I go back to what I started with, the real guardians of Canadian culture cannot be the government. It cannot make those determinations. There are too many different opinions out there. The real guardians of Canadian culture have to be individual people. People are very intelligent. They can make these determinations. They do not need the government dragging them around by the nose telling them that this is worthy of protection. That is crazy. We are too grown up for that.

Another issue needs to be raised and that is the whole issue of what may happen if we become too protectionist of our markets. It was not very long ago—the minister was involved in this—that we ran into precisely that type of problem when we decided to kick CMT out of Canada. CMT was Country Music Television, a video network, which had been in Canada for several years. Then a Canadian service came on and CMT was thrown out. It caused a rift between us and the Americans.

We are an exporting country. I hate to see that market close down for Canadian producers of culture because we make so much money from it. It enables those people to survive. What we saw in the CMT incident was the possibility that we were going to have the market closed off to us for our cultural exports. That is extremely dangerous. A good example of its importance is to look at how fast the private sector cultural industries have grown in the last few years.

As the subsidies from government diminish—the minister will certainly acknowledge they have diminished over the years—the private sector cultural industries have boomed. First, they need neither cultural protection nor subsidization. Second, they have been successful and are continuing to be successful at exporting their products to the United States and other countries around the world which has certainly meant substantial growth in that sector. Returns were around $16 billion in 1993 and were up to $22 billion in 1994, about 3.7 per cent of the GDP. This sector is actually growing very quickly which I believe bodes well. I will discuss this in more detail shortly.

Protectionism is a very dangerous route to go if we depend on other markets to make our cultural industries profitable. If they are closed down we are in big trouble.

I want to talk for a moment about what I see as the way to make cultural industries prosper and really do well in this country. I touched on the fact that private sector cultural industries are growing like crazy due to a couple of reasons. One of the reasons is that as the population ages people are spending more of their money on cultural products like movies, going to the theatre, books, magazines and so on. In a speech in the House not too long ago, the minister pointed out that as disposable income has increased over the years we have seen the Canadian magazine industry do extremely well. Having more disposable income is the real key.

That brings us back to the whole debate about the deficit, the debt and taxes. I hate to mention it again. I mention it every time I speak but it is a huge cloud that hangs over our heads. The debt in this country is $560 billion. Yesterday we found out that 34 cents, or one–third, of every tax dollar goes toward interest on the debt. That is an unbelievable amount of money.

Can members imagine if we did not have to pay that, if we could keep it in our pockets, how much more people could purchase? Cultural industries would absolutely boom. We would not even be having this discussion about protecting the nation's cultural industries. They would absolutely explode.

In my judgment, we should not be wasting all this bureaucracy and people's valuable time to come up with more regulation and more protection. What we should be doing is beating down the debt, beating down the deficit, getting to a point where we can keep more money in our pockets. Canadians will go out and support magazines, not because they are Canadian but because they speak to us about things we are interested in.

As I said in committee, as long as politicians are wasting money in Ottawa and as long as there is crime in the streets, people are going to want to know what is going on in Ottawa, in their government and in their country.

The best way to do that is to find out from the people who publish Canadian magazines. Canadian magazines already have a huge head start. They already have the history, and the people running them who understand the country. That is a huge advantage over anything that comes in from outside the country.

If they have disposable income, Canadians will make those decisions themselves. Those people are the true protectors of Canadian culture. They will make those decisions for themselves.

Canadians over the years have demonstrated time and time again, better than government, that they can make decisions about important issues far better than politicians in Ottawa can, far better than the bureaucrats can, far better even than the provincial governments and even municipal governments can. I argue that those two levels of government make better decisions than the federal government. Ultimately people have displayed that they are more than mature enough to make excellent decisions on behalf of themselves, their communities and their families.

What this whole debate has been about, if one just sort of looks past all the technical issues and the details, is who should decide what is best for me. Should it be the government or should it be me? My colleagues and I would argue and a whole bunch of Canadians would argue that they should make the decision for themselves. Let us get away from the idea that the government knows best because people do not buy into that any more. Let us get away from the idea that one man or a cabinet can decide for 30 million people and all the different groups that make up those 30 million what is culture, what is art.

It is impossible. It is crazy. We have a chance to roll that tide back by voting against this legislation. I encourage all members to take a close look at the principles behind this legislation and to ask themselves who the guardians should be of Canadian culture. Should it be the Government of Canada, bureaucracies or should it be people themselves?

At the end of the day in their heart of hearts, they will admit that the people are more than capable of making those decisions.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring coherence to this debate and to speak to Bill C–103. Bill C–103 will play a major role in maintaining a vibrant and flourishing Canadian magazine industry. I want to use my time to present a broader perspective of the government's ongoing commitment to this industry.

• (1255)

This bill should be understood in the context of a long–established tradition of government support to the Canadian magazine industry as well as the industry's contribution to Canada's economy. More important, in a country where natural geography makes communication difficult, magazines play a key unifying role.

Canadian periodicals are an essential medium of cultural expression for Canadians. They serve as channels for conveying Canadian ideas, information and values. They are an integral part of the process whereby Canadians define themselves as a nation.

Beyond the direct social and cultural impact of the Canadian magazine industry, there are sizeable indirect effects which contribute to the smooth functioning of the Canadian economy.

Unfortunately Canadian magazines are confronted with a series of unique challenges: massive penetration of the Canadian market by imported magazines; the relatively small size of the Canadian population and its dispersion over vast territory; the openness of Canadians to foreign cultural products; the effect of the cover prices of imported magazines on the Canadian price structure; and the impact of overflow advertising on the potential advertising market in Canada.

Even if the magazine industry has flourished culturally with over 1,300 titles, its financial position is fragile with overall pre–tax profits of less than 6 per cent of revenues of $795 million in 1993–94.

The Canadian government has supported the domestic magazine industry and will continue to do so for many reasons. The principal reason is the importance that Canadians place on having a means of expressing their unique identity and the difficult and challenging environment the Canadian magazine industry faces.

The need for structural measures of support for the Canadian magazine industry has long been recognized by successive Canadian governments. Over the years a number of policy and program instruments have been designed and put into place to help ensure the development of the Canadian magazine industry while not restricting the sale of imported periodicals in Canada.

My friends across the way who speak to this issue are somehow misguided. We are doing much collectively to provide a dynamic and original culture which nurtures our national identity. Questions such as, what is culture, or do we have a single overarching cultural policy, may be good subjects for discussion. The truth is that cultural challenges in Canada have always been addressed by specific cultural policies put together by governments.

If we look at cultural policy goals pursued by consecutive or successive Canadian governments over more than half a century, their consistency is remarkable. Specific policy objectives developed by a succession of governments clearly reflected the reality of an original Canadian culture. Uppermost among these objectives is Canadian ownership and control of cultural enterprises, a made in Canada broadcasting system, the protection of sovereignty in the arts, cultural expression, the creation of an environment enabling cultural industries to sustain themselves and the recognition on the world stage of Canada's artistic and cultural accomplishments. Our global cultural policy was designed to promote the development of a diverse yet distinctive Canadian culture fostering mutual understanding, identity and quality of life.

Successive governments have recognized that Canada with its two official languages benefits from easy access to two of the greatest cultures in the world. The presence of our First Nations peoples and the diverse origins of our population have been justifiably looked upon as a fertile source of inspiration.

Canadian governments have also understood the influence of the United States on Canada's culture and identity. On one hand the fabric of our society can be enriched by our direct access to American cultural products and means of expression. On the other hand, this same access can weaken our ability to create and express ourselves in a distinctly Canadian fashion in our own country.

Canadian governments could see the evidence that Canadians do want Canadian cultural products and that Canadians are prepared to pay a price for them. Canadians also accept that government has a role in striking the right balance between supports to Canadian cultural development and access to other cultures. In short, Canadian governments are involved in cultural policy because the public interest is at stake.

Perhaps more than anything else, Canadian culture is vulnerable. We said in the red book:

> Culture is the very essence of national identity, the bedrock of national sovereignty and national pride—. At a time when globalization and the information and communications revolution are erasing national borders, Canada needs more than ever to commit itself to cultural development.

Canadian culture is also the substance and the reflection of who we are and what we form as a people. Our landscape is part of it; our tastes, our languages, our pastimes, the way we view the world, these all enter in. Our culture and our life as a nation are intertwined. As the reflection of who we are, our cultural expression becomes the aggregate of our voices and creative energies. For those reasons alone, Canada's cultural development and the quality of its cultural expression are worthy of government's attention.

My Reform friend said governments should stay out, but we know that Canadians are enthusiastic about the state of the arts in Canada and the involvement of all governments in that state of the arts. The quality and abundance of creative work and performance have never been higher. My friend noted that. Strength and certainty are now evident in the work of our writers, our artists, our performers. We celebrate their achievements as well as their commitment, a commitment after all to ourselves.

As a society we wish to reward our artists. They need not only our interest and attention, but also material conditions within which they can engage in their work and their art. In so doing, they can offer all of us a better chance to reach our own potential as a people and as individuals. I have many friends in the arts world and I know of individuals who are struggling to keep body and soul together and bread on the table.

Culture is a complex whole. It includes the knowledge, beliefs, art, morals, laws, customs and all other capabilities and habits acquired by the members of a society. Like other fundamental concepts, culture can only be understood by a familiarity with the realities it summarizes. It may be difficult to define American, French or Canadian culture, but the artistic products of those cultures, their books, magazines and films for example, can readily reflect and inform the cultures of which they are products.

Canadians are avid consumers of cultural products. After the Dutch, we are the second highest per capita purchasers of records and tapes in the world. We are also among the world's great film and movie goers.

Canadian culture flourishes in our major cities. It thrives in every hamlet and draws strength from every region. It comes from passion, talent, commitment and hard work. The wonder of Canadian culture in all its diversity is its ability to expand our horizons as individuals and to bring us together as human beings and as a society. Our culture, our Canadian, diverse, original culture, is part of our identity and greatness. We must stand on guard for it. It is the soul of our country.

Our bookstores, our news stands, our record shops, cinemas and television screens testify to Canada's position as one of the greatest importers of cultural products in the world. We enjoy our access to other cultures. However, we repeatedly ask ourselves whether there should not be a more normal balance between Canadian perspectives and those from elsewhere. This is the crux of the bill.

Together, our arts and cultural industries contribute over $24 billion to the gross domestic product or 4 per cent of the GDP of the entire economy, and important for us, 660,000 jobs. This did not happen by accident. This did not happen, as our friend across the way would say, by letting the individuals do it. It was the result of a combination of the desire and determination of successive governments and the great talent which exists in our country.

The challenges facing the Canadian market for cultural content are growing increasingly complex every day. There can be little doubt that today's reality of fiscal restraint will continue to affect our future activities. Policy priorities change to take account of new challenges, world trends and windows of opportunity. The goals to be met by those priorities however should not change. The scene changes, the values do not.

This is important work, work which government has been doing successfully for years through such policy tools as public cultural institutions, support measures, and legislation and regulation. In fact, the development of legislative and regulatory measures has been particularly effective in promoting Canadian cultural sovereignty. Few measures have been more efficient than those dealing with Canadian content.

Canada has not been the only country to implement such legislative and regulatory measures. For example, specific restrictions are common for publishing, film and videos in countries like Argentina, Brazil, France, Mexico and Australia. Need I go on?

Venezuela has specific policies and requirements for newspapers and periodical publishing. In film and video, France, India, Indonesia, Mexico, the Philippines, Portugal, Spain and Switzerland maintain varying degrees of restrictions on inward investment. Mexico maintains limitations in film and video, broadcasting and periodical publishing. Brazil has grouped television, radio and the print media as one of the strategic industries to which it applies the same foreign investment restrictions.

We cannot go by a rule which says the one with the deepest pockets wins. As a market, Canada is one–tenth the size of the United States. The cost of producing a film or television program is the same in Canada as it is in the U.S. Our ability to recover those costs is one–tenth.

I must emphasize that it is never an issue of keeping other products out. That is not the intent of this bill. Canada is the most open country when it comes to enjoying the cultural products of other countries. The issue is ensuring the development and distribution of Canadian content and ensuring that Canadians know it is there and they have access to it.

• (1310)

The Canadian government has been consistent. Its magazine policy has not changed. I will say this for the information of the Reform members who spoke against this, with these amendments to the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act, the federal government is modernizing its policy instruments. In this way, the entire range of government policy and program instruments can better achieve the overall objective of a vital and flourishing Canadian magazine industry.

Those in the industry are depending on those of us in this House to ensure that Bill C–103 gets swift passage.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH ACT

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.) moved that Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise with great pleasure to speak in support of Bill C–95, a bill to create Canada's Department of Health.

I want to say a word about the referendum this week. Like many members of this House, I am pleased with the result, but I do not want to downplay the challenges that lie ahead of us. This government came into power with an agenda for change that it will implement appropriately to improve efficiencies and to create better bottom up management that recognizes the regional differences and specific needs of this vast country of ours. We remain committed to change, for Quebec and for all of Canada.

Since taking office, we have embarked on reforms to make the country work better, to eliminate duplication and top heavy administration and to ensure that services are delivered by the level of government that is most appropriate and best able to do the job. Let me talk about some of these changes.

We have signed agreements with nine provinces to reduce federal–provincial duplications. We have signed agreements with all provinces to end internal trade barriers in Canada and to promote efficient movement of goods and services across the country.

In keeping with our commitment to forge partnerships with all levels of government and the private sector, an unprecedented team Canada trade mission with nine premiers and many municipal leaders went to China. The team brought home more than $8 billion in deals for Canadian businesses that benefited every province.

We have eliminated unnecessary boards and committees making government leaner. We have eliminated subsidies to businesses and other groups in order to make government relevant and less intrusive. We have turned over the management of many programs to local authorities, streamlining and removing duplication and inefficiencies. It is in keeping with this move toward efficiency and relevance that we introduced the legislation before us.

Bill C–95 is a milestone in the evolution of a health system that is the envy of countries around the world. Over more than two generations, Canadians from across this great country under the leadership of Liberal prime ministers and ministers of health have built Canada's health system with great care and courage, foresight and compassion. We are proud and honoured to carry the torch of their vision forward, unaltered, while at the same time responding to the need and the challenge for finding new ways to implement the goals.

The bill will change the name of the federal department to give it a more focused mandate. It will confirm and strengthen the raison d'être of the Department of Health, which is to promote and preserve the health of Canadians. It will reaffirm its mission of helping the people of Canada maintain and improve their health status. It will continue to fulfil these objectives through medicare and public health initiatives, through research and investigation, through education and awareness, and through the monitoring and investigation of food, drugs, devices and products that would compromise the safety of Canadians.

However the social assistance and income support programs of the government once contained within the Department of National Health and Welfare have been turned over to the Department of Human Resources Development, and for good reason. As we move into the 21st century issues such as poverty, unemployment and social welfare have become inextricably linked with the notion of empowerment through creation of opportunity via skills, training and education, all aimed at developing the human resource potential.

Bill C–95 addresses the need for a clear and proactive focus on Canada's primary resource, its people, and on ensuring that their quality of life and health status are balanced, enhanced and improved. It allows us to concentrate on the broader spectrum of issues that affect the health of Canadians today, the challenge and enticements to come to terms with and to explore the complex new discoveries, drugs and technologies that spring up with such dizzying rapidity in the world of biomedical science.

These innovations have on the one hand presented us with exciting new opportunities for prevention, diagnosis and treatment of disease and alleviation of suffering and on the other hand raised conflicting issues of safety, cost effectiveness, ethics and evaluation of social values.

The act will allow our department to create a vision for the future and at the same time to renew and strengthen our commitment to co–operation, co–ordination and partnership with all Canadian jurisdictions, provinces, territories, organizations and communities. In keeping with this evolution, the bill brings about the change that is the promised mandate of the government.

There is more to renaming the Department of Health than a mere change of name. There is a clarification of focus and an opportunity to formulate a new vision of the future that will improve greatly the health status of Canadians and make innovations that will enhance and strengthen what is already one of the best national health care systems in the world.

This is no more clearly spelled out than in the portion of the act that declares the health aspects of social well–being are the responsibility of the Department of Health. We all know that social well–being is multifactoral in its linkages and that it concerns in an interlocking manner the policy makers of every government department and every minister. Social well–being is interrelated with the economy, with justice, with employment, with poverty or wealth, with cultural and spiritual issues, with gender and ethnicity, and with the environment. The new health definition is more than just the absence of disease. It has to do with the quality of the individual's life and ability to cope with disability.

In the case of Health Canada this responsibility, which has always been implicit in its mandate, is now being explicitly acknowledged. The context of the words in the bill make it clear that the department's scope to exercise this broad definition of health is confined to matters over which the health minister has jurisdiction. It obviously does not give the Minister of Health the mandate to infringe on other ministers' responsibilities. By using the specific words in the bill, Canada has declared its commitment to the definition of health used by the World Health Organization which says that there is more to health than health care. It says that health means much more than the absence of disease.

Health is the complete state of physical, mental, spiritual and social well–being. This is what the new department aspires to for every Canadian. Its renewed commitment to a long and glorious tradition has inspired Liberal governments, politicians of every party and Canadian people over many years, indeed over many decades.

Many eminent Canadians have been intimately associated with the growth of Canada's health system: the hon. Judy LaMarsh, the hon. Paul Martin, Senior, Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, the hon. Marc Lalonde, the hon. Monique Bégin and the late hon. Tommy Douglas. I mention only a few. We can see how the vision of health has known no political boundaries in the past. Though members of the third party as we well know have tried to challenge it in the present, we can trace the evolution of the commitment to social well–being through the contributions of each of these people.

In particular it was foreshadowed just over 10 years ago when Parliament debated and unanimously passed the Canada Health Act under the direction of the hon. Monique Bégin, the federal Liberal Minister of Health at the time. This major milestone, the Canada Health Act, contained a preamble that called for an assault on the social, environmental and occupational causes of disease. The idea that shaped that statement was a growing awareness of the importance of nutrition, stress management, physical fitness, safety in the workplace and the environment generally. These concepts deal with health, not sickness. These are concepts the hon. Marc Lalonde, another federal Liberal Minister of Health, created and championed. This definition has since been taken up by many other countries of the world and is now considered indisputable fact.

These concepts of health deal with prevention and promotion, not only cure, as the strategy for achieving health. It is a strategy that speaks of long term planning, not only reactivity. It represents the real health care revolution in the country.

Inherent in Bill C–59 most emphatically the concentrated focus on health statement does not mean that our vision of the future of health is intrusive or limiting. Clause 12 of the bill like the act it replaces makes it clear that nothing in the act gives the Minister of Health or any Health Canada official authority to exercise any jurisdiction or control over any provincial health authority. As I have just related in detail, it certainly defines health in its newest and broadest terms.

The bill confirms and strengthens the national interest of the federal government in health and answers those who would Balkanize health care. We know that health care is primarily local in nature. People who become sick are generally treated close to home by their own medical practitioners. If necessary, they are taken to hospitals in or near their town or city. It is well accepted colloquially and constitutionally that the managerial and administrative aspects of Canada's health system fall under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Canada's intrinsic values, beliefs and ideals are not local in nature. They define who we are as a people and what we stand for. These values and beliefs are reflected in the principles of the Canada Health Act.

While the federal government's financial contributions to the provinces and territories subsidize a substantial share of the cost of health care, the role and contribution of the Government of Canada in the area of health extend well beyond its funding responsibilities.

The work of the Department of Health touches the life of every Canadian every day. It monitors the safety of the foods we eat, the medication we take, the consumer products we buy for our families. In effect it is the watchdog of consumer safety. Health Canada identifies the health risks we should avoid and undertakes the research programs that improve the health of children, women, seniors and all other segments of society. It is a machine of proactive care.

The protection aspects of health care begin long before health interventions for the sick. It extends more broadly than mere treatment of illness. It is in the national interest that systemic examination of disease trends and health risks be in a single accessible place where public health intelligence from within Canada and around the world can be assembled and evaluated and that there be a centre where population health strategies can develop and where national health status benchmarks can be set.

To this end the laboratory centre for disease control located in the department is dedicated to programs preventing, controlling and reducing the impact of chronic and communicable diseases in Canada.

There is a national interest in working with other countries to combat and control health threats that know no borders. The Government of Canada supports international collaboration against the common threat of disease. It is in the national interest that research into the causes and treatments of disease be carried out.

The federal government spends many hundreds of millions of dollars a year on health research. The results of research are available to all provinces, all hospitals and all doctors throughout Canada. The outcome of research benefits all Canadians. It saves the lives of all Canadians. Health Canada's role as co–ordinator, database gatherer and clearinghouse is clearly invaluable.

It is in the national interest that drugs and medical devices be evaluated to ensure that regardless of where they are purchased and used they are safe for public use and they do what the manufacturers claim they do. The Department of Health analyses pharmaceuticals that are submitted by manufacturers and certifies their effectiveness and safety. The Department of Health works to assure Canadians that their food supply is safe, nutritious and of high quality. It is in the national interest that the Department of Health does these things. It is also in the national interest that standards are set and enforced so that Canadians can be ensured of comparable health care services no matter what province they reside in or visit.

It has been well documented by many surveys that Canadians want a national vision for health and social well–being. Poll after poll has found that the health care system is in first place as one of the things that binds Canadians together. They see it as a defining aspect of Canadian values.

The latest Canada Health monitor findings show that 89 per cent of Canadians support the principles of the Canada Health Act. The third party across the way that seeks to trample on those principles should get in touch with the people of Canada.

Health Canada has a clear role to play in public awareness and education on health issues as well as a responsibility to protect those who are disadvantaged. The government is proud of the measures it has taken on behalf of groups with special needs whose health status is more compromised such as First Nations persons, children, seniors and other disadvantaged groups. At the same time, because the health status of First Nations people requires concentrated ongoing efforts we have expanded and enhanced health programs for First Nations and Inuit people.

For instance, last year the Minister of Health announced the building healthy communities strategy. In consultation with First Nations and Inuit leaders we will implement the strategy to strengthen efforts in three critical areas: solvent abuse, mental health and home care nursing.

We are well aware that health programs designed and delivered within First Nations communities are often more successful than those delivered by outside agencies. I have proof of this not only from my own experience as a physician working with aboriginal communities to improve their health but more recently as I travelled with the Standing Committee on Health across Canada visiting native communities and seeing firsthand what worked and what did not work.

We are working with the First Nations to increase control over their own resources. We have helped many bands to move through the transition that will eventually culminate in full control of management and administrative powers that will enable self–government.

It would take too much time to tell the House of all the initiatives now under way to empower Canadians who are least able to help themselves, those disadvantaged by need or by neglect. However with the indulgence of the House I will mention only a few. An example is our seniors. We currently support research into alternatives for care that promote independence and allow the elderly to stay in their homes, close to friends, family and familiar surrounding. We do this by funding groups that provide community programs for seniors. This is what we mean by health status encompassing quality of life objectives.

For our children Health Canada is a key player in a network of government programs designed to improve the life chances for children at risk. The clear understanding is that the future of children depends on critical inputs during the first years of life. The federal government administers a number of programs for Canadian children and their families to help improve access to the best opportunities for health and development. The department directly supports a wide range of strategic programs targeted at children at risk of abuse or injury, social or physical disease.

What about women? For too long, women have taken second place on the health agenda. Our government has taken dramatic steps to correct this grave inequity. We have given strong support to the Canadian breast cancer research initiative. We have introduced gender specific elements into health promotion programs such as Canada's drug strategy and the tobacco reduction demand strategy, working with community groups to ensure that women get help at the local level.

Statistics Canada showed that the prenatal death rate in this country climbed in 1993. As a physician, I know that good nutrition in pregnancy is a key factor in decreasing the rate of low birth weight babies, who are at highest risk for chronic disease and disability. Health Canada's prenatal nutrition program for low income and other at risk mothers was a red book response to this tragic occurrence. I am proud to say that this simple and effective program would benefit many at risk babies in the future.

The hon. members of the third party with tunnel vision may rest assured that spending on these health programs does not fly in the face of the debt reduction priority of this government. Each dollar that goes to prevent ill health saves tens and hundreds of dollars in health care and treatment costs.

I turn now to the specifics of the bill before the House. As I have said, essentially it renames the department to conform to its new singular focus on health. Hon. members will find that most of what is in the bill carries over from the previous legislation. There are a few new items included in order to clarify the mandate of the department and to extend its abilities to discharge its mandate. I will deal with some of these very briefly.

The bill defines the minister's powers in clause 4 as the promotion and preservation of the physical, mental, and social well-being of the people of Canada. Hon. members will understand the meaning of social well-being in light of my earlier comments in the context of this bill. We are concerned solely with the health aspect of social well-being, because health is more than just health care. It involves the total environment in which the organism lives and develops, in which human babies are born, youth develops, and seniors find quality of life. Health is based in the social order of the community.

We speak then of the social well-being of Canadians in the same breath as we speak of their physical, mental and spiritual well-being. Not only does this wording reflect the reality of human existence, it echoes the wording and usage of the World Health Organization of the United Nations.

A subclause of this section confirms the department's responsibility for the safety of consumer products and workplace equipment, which is a transfer from the former Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

By virtue of clause 5, Health Canada officials will gain the same powers to inspect possible disease carrying agents entering the country as they now have to enforce the Food and Drug Act.

Clause 6 authorizes the minister, under the supervision of Treasury Board, to recover the cost of services provided to business. I hasten to explain to the third party that for medically necessary care this does not apply to user fees and they should never confuse it. Members know that we remain unalterably opposed in this government to any user fees.

What we really refer to under cost recovery is the cost recovery of charges to businesses for the cost of government services that have commercial value, such as evaluation of drugs, devices, pesticides, et cetera, which we all agree taxpayers should not subsidize.

I would like to reassure hon. members and the Canadian public of one overriding truth, the clear mandate and mission of Health Canada. Our mission will continue to be to help the people of Canada maintain and improve their health. We will continue to enforce the Canada Health Act so that all Canadians will have universal access to a comprehensive range of medically necessary quality health services. Our objective as a Liberal government has historically been to ensure that the health care system remains accessible to Canadians when they need it.

In this vein, hon. members are aware that the Minister of Health has given the provinces until October 15 to disallow user charges for medically necessary services in private clinics or experience reductions in transfer payments. The message is clear and simple: we will do what is required to stop user charges in their tracks, to push them back wherever they have crept forward, and to prevent the development of a two tiered system of health care, a system which contradicts every one of the five principles of medicare, to which Canadians have stated full commitment.

We do not oppose the use of private clinics. They can be a creative, cost effective way to deliver services, and they can do so without contravening the Canada Health Act if they are set with clear, well defined criteria.

We are committed to consulting openly and thoroughly with our provincial colleagues. We have shown our commitment to working with them to resolve outstanding issues and renew their health care system—indeed as they must—in a way that preserves and respects the underlying principles and values of the Canada Health Act. However, the bottom line remains fixed: no Canadian will suffer financial hardship because of illness in this country. This principle has not changed since Emmett Hall's report and since Liberal Prime Minister Lester Pearson enacted medicare. It will not change in the future as long as there is a Liberal government in Canada.

We will continue our wide range of activities aimed at preventing disease and promoting health. We know this is the best investment in the health status of Canadians that we can possibly make.

We know that 60 per cent of disease is preventable. We know that early screening, public information and awareness, research, and healthy public policy can make a remarkable difference to the lives of Canadians, even in diseases where there is no known cure. We have instituted a breast cancer information exchange. We have implemented strategies to reduce tobacco use, to counter family violence, and we have introduced a prenatal nutrition program to improve prospects for newborns at identifiable risk. We have announced an aboriginal health head start program to address the needs of aboriginal children living in urban centres and large northern communities. We have embraced the axiom that good health is the result of proper exercise and diet. My department provides guidelines on nutrition and financial support for physical fitness and active living.

Nobody wants to spend more money than is necessary on health. We want to get the maximum value from every dollar. The road to this objective passes through the prevention of illness and the promotion of health through the development and support of healthy communities.

Dr. Brock Chisholm, former deputy minister in Canada and first director general of the World Health Organization, once recast the age–old saying that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Dr. Chisholm said "You can only cure retail, but you can prevent wholesale". We subscribe to that.

The new Department of Health will continue all the essential work that has helped Canada reach and maintain its place on top of the world rankings in health. However, as I said at the outset, we intend to do far more than maintain hallowed traditions. We intend to be a dynamic player in a world filled with new challenges and innovative and creative opportunities for health and health care.

We will be open to exciting visions of the future that take full account of the discontinuities and uncertainties of fast changing times. We look to the national forum on health to help develop this new vision for Canada's health system in the 21st century. We believe the forum is an appropriate vehicle, one that respects the rights of Canadians to be consulted on this matter of primary importance. It brings expert opinion from many areas to bear. It promotes dialogue with all segments of the public. It respects the established and effective conference of federal–provincial health ministers. The personal involvement of the Prime Minister as its chair reflects the importance this government assigns to its deliberations.

The national forum on health, which will maintain a dialogue with Canadians, is a unique and important milestone in the evolution of Canada's health care system. It also makes good on a promise the Liberal Party made when it sought and received the support of Canadians in the last election, a promise to strengthen partnerships, to open doors to public input. The forum would bring in for the first time in a meaningful and practical way the third player on the health care team, the consumer.

I point out to hon. members that significant progress has been made on the health commitments of the red book. Consider the forum, aboriginal head start, prenatal nutrition, centres of excellence for women's health, and on and on. Health is everybody's business. It is an investment in the Canadian economy. Health is an economic resource. Healthy people work, play, and are active consumers.

Studies done by many economic think tanks have shown the loss to the economy through illness. It is important to understand that Canada's financial commitment to health care provides considerable value for every dollar spent.

In 1972, when our health insurance system was completed, Canada and the United States were spending approximately the same level of gross domestic product on health, at 8.4 per cent of gross domestic product. Since then we have done a far better job of controlling spending. Last year Americans spent more than 14 per cent of GDP on health, with 35 million citizens still uninsured, while we spent about 9.7 per cent of gross domestic product on a universal, comprehensive system where every Canadian has full access, regardless of income level. This translates to $30 billion a year in savings on health compared with the U.S. spending levels.

What about outcomes? OECD and WHO statistics show that Canada ranks in the top three and sometimes is second in health outcomes, while the United States still ranks between 15 and 17. I say to the third party that more money does not mean better care.

Who gains from these savings? Canadian employers. Who has high overhead costs to insure their employees against basic health risks? Not Canadian businesses. We are among the big winners. In fact major American companies have admitted that this is one important reason to invest in Canada. Moreover, Canada's labour market is more flexible and more mobile because problems with health insurance do not deter workers from changing jobs.

This Canadian health dividend is not simply in the delivery of health care services. It is sometimes unfairly alleged that medicare is bureaucratic and eats up funds in administration and red tape. The truth is quite the opposite. Health care administration costs about $272 per person in Canada. In the United States it is about 250 per cent higher, at $615 U.S. per person.

Public administration, as one of the five principles of health care, works. We only spend about 5 per cent of our health care dollars on administration. The United States spends 25 per cent. It was once decided by the United States Department of General Accounting that if that 25 per cent spent on administration in the United States were put into health care services, the 35 million Americans who are not insured would be insured.

We are committed to managing effectively and prudently in difficult financial times. There are many management strategies in health care that are innovative, save dollars, and still ensure quality, such as evidence based care, appropriate acute care, community care, and assessment of technologies. But this all means working in close co–operation with provinces and territories. This government has taken great care to avoid duplication of programs and services. If the provinces can administer a program better, and in many cases they can, we let them do it. Our aim is to co–operate and be flexible with the provinces in ways that ensure there is no wasteful overlap. We consult widely within the field and among all Canadians before we act.

I have spoken about the record of the health department that has been its history and portends well for its future. It has been the instrument for promoting high quality health care and improved health status for Canadians at reasonable cost. It has earned and maintained an international reputation for its efforts on health promotion and disease prevention.

I am therefore proud to sponsor this bill to create Canada's new Department of Health. I urge all hon. members of the House to afford it swift passage through Parliament.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to speak for 40 minutes to Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain acts.

In fact, the purpose of this bill is to shorten the name of the Department of Health and Welfare to Department of Health. Yet, in reading Bill C–95, we realize that some sections have been amended, repealed or added so that the government can, under the pretence of providing good government, give the Minister of Health the legitimate power to interfere once again in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. We are faced, once again, with this overwhelming desire to centralize everything.

Since I like setting the record straight, I will give you a short history lesson.

As the type of political system that would prevail in the future Canadian union was being defined in 1867, it was easy to see the emergence of two opposite views of federal–provincial relations. On one side, John Macdonald wanted a strong central government that could devolve certain powers to the provinces as it saw fit. On the other side, Cartier definitely favoured a highly decentralized confederation. In French dictionaries, confederation is defined as the union of several sovereign states.

We know only too well what this led to. Powers were indeed distributed between the two levels of government, so that each would have exclusive jurisdiction over their own areas of responsibility.

But things are never as clear cut as they seem with the federal government. The government kept in its hand what it considered as a trump card, which proved to be harmful to federal–provincial relations: the power to spend and to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada.

This way, the federal government could still do as it pleased in any provincial area of responsibility, without paying attention to the distribution of powers guaranteed by the constitution. And this was definitely planned and hoped for. This is confirmed by Alexander Galt, one of the fathers of confederation, who stated that the distribution of powers, as described in the British North American Act of 1867, did not provide the provinces with enough funding to properly look after the areas falling under their jurisdiction. This means that the very document that gave rise to a new Canadian union provided that the provinces would not have sufficient funding and that the federal government should step in to compensate the members of this union.

Unable to have a highly centralized federal system from day one, John Macdonald made sure that its power to encroach would enable it to intervene in any jurisdiction it pleased and to impose its views on the provinces, even with respect to exclusive provincial jurisdictions.

It may be difficult for some to recognize that this is what those who drafted the British North America Act had in mind. It may be difficult for them to believe that what they like to refer to, wrongly I must say, as the most decentralized system in the world, already provided, in its embryonic state, for increasing centralization of power in favour of Ottawa.

Yet, the comments made by Alexander Galt, whom I quoted earlier, leave no doubt as to those initial intentions, and nor do the remarks made by another architect of the Act of 1867, who said that, in the long run, the provinces would become nothing more than large municipalities under the control of the federal government, on which they would greatly depend. We were not there at the time to see what was going on, but these people were, and they even wrote about it.

This is how the structure in which we still live, unfortunately, was developed and set up. I made reference to our history at the very beginning of my speech to show that, to this day, and contrary to what many would like us to believe, nothing has changed. This centralizing vision which gives greater power to the federal government is not mentioned in the speeches of today's key players on the federal scene, but it is obvious in their actions. The best example is certainly the health sector in general, where the federal government has been interfering constantly and increasingly for decades. Bill C–95, which is now before us, is evidence of that.

Section 92.16 of the Constitution Act gives provinces jurisdiction over health related issues on their territory, by generally providing for all matters of a purely local or private nature within a province. Moreover, sections 92.7, 92.13 and 92.16 of the same act also give the provinces jurisdiction over hospitals, the medical profession and practice, as well as health related laws in general, on their territory.

We can say that this is an area of provincial jurisdiction since it involves ownership and civil rights.

In the light of what I just said, it is obvious that health care is an area which should come under provincial rather than federal jurisdiction. However, the federal government has been interfering in this area, in various ways, for many years now.

The Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, the Medical Care Act and, more recently, the famous Canada Health Act, which combines both previous acts and crystallizes so–called national standards, show how the federal government deals with areas of shared jurisdiction. Its initiatives aimed at increasing the federal presence in these areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction are being justified by its spending power, which creates problems not only in the health care area, but I will not have enough time to list the many disputes it has caused, others will do it for me, I am sure.

For my part, I will paint a picture showing what happens when a government is unwilling to admit that it cannot afford to do and decide everything on behalf of the provinces. This picture has, as a backdrop, the acute crisis the health care system is going through in Canada and Quebec.

The federal government's temptation or desire to interfere in the health care area is not new. In fact, right after the second world war the federal government took over all major fields of taxation to make sure it would receive almost all the taxes normally levied by the provinces.

At the end of the war, the government got a bright idea: instead of giving the taxing powers back to the provinces, it would redistribute the money through grants conditional on standards set by the federal government. That was an ingenious way to encroach even further upon areas not within the federal jurisdiction, at a time when the London Privy Council, the equivalent in those days of our Supreme Court, wanted to restrain the federal government's tendency to centralize. In the health area, the Established Programs Financing Act is a good example of what I said earlier: this government refuses to accept that it cannot do everything and be everywhere.

Created in 1977, the EPF program has kept the same structure ever since. However, the growth rate has not been as expected over the last ten years. That is what brought about the shortfall, as we call it, for the provinces and Quebec in the health area. In 1986, the federal government reduced the growth rate of transfers by 2 per cent. It was the beginning of a long series of payment cuts: in 1989, the indexing factor was again reduced by 1 per cent; in 1990, Bill C–69 froze transfers to the 1989–90 level for two years supposedly; in 1991, the government announced that the freeze would be maintained for three more years. During most of that blighted period for the health care system, the opposition cried its outrage. It said loud and clear that this process could only push the system to its own ruin.

But the same party, now in government, is weakening the system even further. Between 1977 and 1994, the federal contribution to health went from 45.9 per cent to 33.7 per cent, a drop of 10.6 per cent which Quebec and the provinces have had to absorb as best they could. Unfortunately, the mismanagement condemned not so long ago by the Minister of Labour and the Deputy Prime Minister seems to still be with us.

My predictions for 1997–98 are that the federal contribution will slide as low as 28.5 per cent of funding. Over the years, as Ottawa disengaged itself from health funding, Quebec alone was left $8 billion short. Eight billion dollars which the Government of Quebec had to scramble to find elsewhere. To that figure can be added the projected cuts in the Canada social transfer of $308 million in 1995–96 and more than $587 million in 1997–98.

The leeway that was to be afforded by the Canada social transfer is in reality merely the opportunity for Quebec and the provinces to make their own choices as to where they would make the cuts to absorb this unilateral disengagement. This is how the present Liberal government sees decentralization. This is what it means by flexible federalism. No thanks, we are not interested.

As I have already said, articles 92.7 and 16 of the British North America Act allocate health and social services exclusively to the provinces. There is, however, also a federal health department.

Next year, the federal Department of Health will cost the taxpayers in excess of one billion dollars, a billion dollars wasted doing what the governments of Quebec and the provinces could very well do themselves.

Moreover, this superfluous department allocates sizeable amounts for programs and projects already in existence in Quebec. Let me give you some examples of these, Mr. Speaker: the strategy for the integration of persons with disabilities, the campaign against family violence, the new horizons program, the seniors secretariat, the tobacco strategy, the drug strategy, the AIDS strategy, the program on pregnancy and child development, the children's bureau—I could go on and on.

The federal cuts should have been in these areas of duplication, but it insists on having a finger in every pie, and the disastrous effect on public finances does not seem to be enough to convince it to accept reality.

The Speaker: I must interrupt. You will have the floor again after question period. It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members.

VANCOUVER GRIZZLIES

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today the Vancouver Grizzlies basketball team will play its inaugural game in the National Basketball Association in Portland, Oregon. Arthur Griffiths and general manager Stu Jackson will undoubtedly lead our new Vancouver basketball team to many victories.

There is a lot of anticipation in Vancouver. The Grizzlies will be playing in the state of the art GM Place stadium which will give to the team an advantage over the rest of the teams in the league. The fans will not be disappointed because they will be treated to one of the most exciting and popular sports in the world.

Canadians should be proud that they have two teams in the NBA they can call their own. We have to build on the success of what Canadian Dr. James Naismith started. The Vancouver Grizzlies and the Toronto Raptors will do us proud.

I would also like to take this opportunity to wish to the Vancouver Canucks good luck and success in their new season. The Canucks will also be playing in the GM arena under general manager Pat Quinn who assembled a talented and skilled team.

To the Vancouver Grizzlies and the Vancouver Canucks, bonne chance.

CANADIAN UNITY

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, surely this government finally gets the message that millions of Canadians want change.

Today, Canada's borders may be intact but the unity of the Canadian people is not. Canadians are divided into at least three groups. One group, unhappy with today's way of life, wants to leave. Another group wants to stay but leave our way of life as is, the status quo. The third group wants to stay and make the necessary changes to improve the Canadian way of life.

The group advocating the status quo by that very fact created the existence of the other two groups. The status quo is not effective and must now go into our history books. The group advocating separation has been denied.

To avoid this reoccurring, this government must show leadership and make the necessary changes. I invite the government to make use of the new Confederation plan put forward by Reform. Copies are available upon request, in plain brown envelopes if desired.

BILL C–101

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–101 is about much more than the restructuring of the rail system in western Canada. In reality and especially in response to the loss of the Crow benefit, the legislation shifts the balance of power unfairly to the ultimate benefit of the railways.

I ask the House not to forget that there are captive shippers out there whose entire economy will be affected by the outcome of this bill. More than 60,000 farmers in Saskatchewan have a direct interest in the outcome of this bill. These farmers now pay the entire cost of the shipping themselves. They are at the bottom of the chain so to speak and cannot pass increased shipping costs on to anyone else.

It is important to these producers to have quality railways and quality, affordable rail services. It is also important to Canada to have a successful farm sector because without these producers and shippers the western economy will not grow.

Once again it seems that the Liberals are more concerned about corporate profits than they are about the livelihoods of thousands of prairie farmers.

REFUGEES

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, since the founding of the United Nations the plight of unwanted displaced peoples has occupied a central role in the affairs of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Since its creation in 1950 this organization has provided temporary protection to millions of people displaced from their homes by war, famine or political persecution. Canada has worked with, supported and financed United Nations efforts to ensure that people displaced and who are living in fear of persecution are protected and resettled.

Refugees are a fundamental fact of the world in which we live. Our challenge is not just to provide protection but to work with the United Nations in peace building and creating the conditions for safe repatriation of refugees to their countries of origin. Canadians can rest assured that the government will continue to nurture the excellent working relationship that it has with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

BUTTERFLY RESERVES

Mr. Gar Knutson (Elgin—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the House today on a significant event that is taking place in my riding.

The Long Point national wildlife area, Point Pelee National Park and Prince Edward Point national wildlife area have all been officially dedicated as Monarch Butterfly Reserves. As part of the Canada–Mexico environmental co–operation program this dedication adds to the already recognized environmental initiatives that Long Point is involved in.

Long Point is a special place and is home to a diverse variety of wildlife. Long Point is already recognized as a biosphere reserve and Ramsar site. The combination of public and private lands that make up this fragile piece of landscape together produce one of the most unique and sensitive ecosystems in Canada today. Long Point is one of three locations where the Monarch butterfly concentrates before its long journey to its wintering grounds in Mexico.

Most of us recognize the Monarch as a special butterfly and by ensuring the future health and well–being of this insect Elgin—Norfolk and all Canadians can take pride in being part of this important environmental initiative.

I commend the Long Point Bird Observatory and the Norfolk field naturalists.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada has once again shown world leadership. We have conducted a civilized debate on the most serious subject a nation can face: its own existence.

Where other countries have resorted to armed violence and devastation to impose change, we have conducted a spirited but peaceful campaign with the ultimate decision being made at the ballot box. Let us all accept the decision made by the people of Quebec with tolerance, openness and mutual respect. Let us promptly respond to the need for change to our Confederation fairly and equitably for all provinces and territories.

Let us work out our differences in the spirit of co–operation and reasonable compromise. That is our trademark; that is the Canadian way. Let us enter a new chapter of our illustrious history and again face the world with confidence and pride. O Canada, we all truly stand on guard for thee.

NEW BRUNSWICK PREMIER

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the behaviour of New Brunswick Premier Frank McKenna, who is courting Quebec businesses to bring them to his province, is utterly disgraceful. While begging Quebecers to vote no in the referendum and asking them, once again, to believe in Canadian federalism, Mr. McKenna was secretly working to take away their jobs.

What a great demonstration of love for the people of Quebec from the Premier of New Brunswick. This is the man who, when Quebec was in a weak position and making minimal demands, was the first one to stab it in the back by repudiating the Meech Lake accord.

The next time Quebecers have to make a decision on their future, they will not be fooled by the real intentions and hypocritical attitudes of people such as Mr. McKenna.

ALBERTA

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Alberta government recently announced its own referendum on the future of Albertans.

The vote is about freedom for Albertans. The vote is about the devolution of power from the federal government to the province and the people. The vote is about the very right of Albertans to conduct business the way they choose in the future.

• (1405)

In a country where people would respect the results of a referendum which would allow one province to leave Confederation, surely the government and the minister of agriculture will respect the results of a plebiscite to give farmers a choice on how to market their grain.

Between November 14 and 24, Alberta's 50,000 wheat and barley farmers will have their say. The choice is between a continued wheat board monopoly on buying wheat and barley or the right to sell through the board or directly to any customer.

For Alberta farmers now is their chance. They should let their voice be heard, get out and vote.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the recent Quebec referendum was like the proverbial Chinese two–sided coin. It created on the one side a feeling of deep anxiety and on the other it awakened a sense of national pride in all Canadians.

Even though the margin of victory was narrow, in the end we were all winners. It is better to work for change together within a united country than to negotiate bitterly as separate nations.

Quebecers showed faith in Canada by voting no. British Columbians rekindled their national pride and francophones in B.C. feel secure again in their heritage. It is time for the healing to begin.

The strength of our country, which is its respect for differences, must lead us forward together in a spirit of understanding and compromise.

Canada has set out to prove that a diverse and multicultural people with linguistic duality and varied heritage can live together in peace and tolerance.

The world looks to us for inspiration and hope. Flawed though it is, Canada is still the best country in the world in which to live.

LEADER OF THE BLOC QUEBECOIS

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois showed unprecedented contempt for democracy in a statement he made the day before yesterday as he was leaving the House.

He said, and I quote: "Never again will sovereignists beg the rest of Canada for anything. Never again will we negotiate on unequal terms". The Bloc leader must set his personal frustrations aside and accept the outcome of Monday's referendum.

Quebecers have rejected the option of Quebec separation. As a federal member of Parliament representing a Quebec riding, the Bloc leader must acknowledge Quebecers' wishes. Separation has been rejected. Let us now work on bringing about the changes that Quebecers want within Canada.

RIDING OF SAINT–MAURICE

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's own riding, the riding of Saint–Maurice, voted yes in the referendum. This was a strong yes, with 56 per cent of the voters saying yes, or 9 per cent more than in the 1980 referendum.

The people of his own riding sent the message to the Prime Minister that his vision of Quebec was not the right one. The yes vote in the riding of Saint–Maurice means that people want more than just the meaningless cosmetic changes proposed by the Prime Minister. The yes vote in the riding of Saint–Maurice very clearly shows that the people of Shawinigan want a country, a very different country from the one that the hon. member for Saint–Maurice is trying to sell them.

PARTI QUEBECOIS LEADER

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Parti Quebecois has announced that he will be leaving the political arena. This announcement comes on the heels of one of the most incredible statements of intolerance ever made by the leader of a political party in the history of Quebec.

Some separatist strategists are already busy trying to convince us that, with their leader gone, any trace of racism or xenophobia that may have existed in the ranks of Quebec separatists will now disappear. Let us not forget that the PQ leader was not the only one to make this kind of racist comments.

Many of his associates have also indulged in this kind of discriminatory remarks, but have not yet resigned. What are they waiting for?

Only by respecting the verdict of the majority and finally getting down to the real problems will the separatists convince the people of Quebec that they really represent all of them.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, remarks by the Prime Minister and Deputy Prime Minister reveal their contempt for the principles of fairness and unity.

While the Reform Party leader advanced a vision of Canada with Quebec, it was the Prime Minister who proved to be the most destructive force in the "neverendum" referendum.

Last night the Prime Minister compared the slim no vote victory to a hockey game where one team wins by a goal. The coach should be fired. This team went into the third period with a nine–point lead and almost blew it.

• (1410)

The Deputy Prime Minister praised the Liberal do nothing campaign in Quebec and the efforts of their Mulroney soul mate from Sherbrooke. She also attacked her opponents as being vultures. In fact the only vultures that will be seen will be those across the way, hovering over the discredited leader of the Liberal Party as they look to replace him.

Still, this type of Liberal Party tactic does not surprise Canadians because, as they know, if it looks like a rat, if it walks like a rat and if it squeals like a rat, it is a member of the Liberal rat pack.

PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last night in Toronto, the Prime Minister of Canada delivered an important speech in front of a large audience of business people.

Not only did he highlight our government's main achievements and reiterate our commitment to our red book promises, but he also raised the issue of national unity. In his first major speech outside Quebec since the referendum, he urged all Canadians to join forces in bringing about the changes that are so anxiously awaited from coast to coast.

The message delivered by our Prime Minister is one of stability, reconciliation and optimism. I am pleased to associate myself with what my leader said and I can assure the people of Canada that we are fully committed to making this country a symbol of unity and of prosperity.

PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, over the last few days, the Prime Minister once again showed his true colours. The architect of the unilateral patriation of the constitution in 1982 has once again decided to put Quebec in its place. Indeed, after stating that he would not abide by Quebecers' decision if they voted yes, the Prime Minister is now saying that he will muzzle them by keeping them from holding another referendum.

The Prime Minister said that he would not hesitate to use every power available to keep Quebecers from exercising that legitimate right again. Nothing has changed. The uncompromising and centralizing federalism of Pierre Elliott Trudeau is still very much alive in the Prime Minister's mind.

As far as he is concerned, Quebec is a province like any other, and it must stay that way. Just forty–eight hours after Monday's referendum, Canada is in a catch 22 situation since federalism remains impervious to any real change, while Quebecers are not interested in the status quo.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there are rare occasions in the history of a nation when fate opens a window of opportunity that can change the course of a country forever. Such an opportunity now exists.

The referendum process and subsequent results show Quebec to be a province that is deeply divided and have highlighted the intense desire for all provinces to deal with the problems that affect us all.

We must seize the opportunity now to move ahead to decentralize federal powers. The people must also be allowed to choose their representatives in the Senate and in the Supreme Court. However, let there be no mistake. These changes must occur for all provinces because when preferential treatment is afforded to one province over another it only creates divisions and resentment.

We must move ahead. The time now is for leadership. We must not look back in history and use past history to justify breaking the country apart. We must move ahead and heal the wounds that exist in the country today to bring all Canadians together in a strong and united Canada forever.

TRIBUTE TO QUEBEC PREMIER

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, PC): Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to Mr. Jacques Parizeau who, two days ago, resigned and announced his intention to retire from political life.

Notwithstanding our conflicting views on Quebec's future, the fact is that Mr. Parizeau has played an extremely important role in the building of a modern province.

He was an economic advisor to several premiers. He helped set up the Quebec deposit and investment fund. He provided advice to the government of Mr. Lesage on the government's takeover of the hydro sector. He was a key player in the quiet revolution.

Mr. Parizeau was also a man of conviction who worked hard to achieve his objective. I want to express my deep respect to Mr. Parizeau and to his wife, Lisette Lapointe, as they begin another stage of their lives.

• (1415)

THE REFERENDUM

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in a speech he made last night in Toronto, the Prime Minister made a new contribution to Canadian democracy. First, he confided it was frustrating to see Quebecers vote in a referendum on their sovereignty and thus undermine Canada's political stability. In concluding his speech, he made it clear that he would intervene to prevent any more votes of this kind.

My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Would she oblige by telling us what the federal government intends to do to prevent democracy in Quebec from voting in accordance with its own laws?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the difference between the Prime Minister and the Premier of the next party the Leader of the Opposition will soon be leading is that the Prime Minister of Canada says he recognizes the fact that all Quebecers have the same right to vote.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Except that he wants to take that right away from them, Mr. Speaker.

The same rights, meaning that no one will be able to vote.

Mr. Speaker, living in a democracy is clearly getting to the Prime Minister.

Are we to understand that from now on, instead of rejecting the results of the referendum, as he was about to do if the yes side had won, the leader of the federal government will prevent any future referendums? By even considering such extreme positions, is this gentleman not demonstrating the depth of his despair and his utter inability to overcome his inertia?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the difference between the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister of Canada is that the Prime Minister accepted the results of the referendum.

We heard the Leader of the Opposition say on the night of the referendum that he accepted the people's decision. I hope that when he arrives in Quebec City very shortly, he will listen to his own ministers, including Serge Ménard who said Wednesday, and I quote: "It seems sensible to have only one referendum. This effort to reach a consensus, which is the whole point of a referendum, means we must consult before imposing. We will have to wait until the next election when we will tell them what our plans are. We must deal with the problems of Quebecers, get our public finances back into shape and govern".

Mr. Speaker, we also heard comments from the Minister of Justice in Mr. Bouchard's new government, who said, and I quote: "You do not have a referendum because you lost the first one and you think you will have a better result three weeks later". That shows respect for the democratic system.

The Speaker: Again, my dear colleagues, I would ask you to refer to each other by the names of your ridings.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, all sovereignist Quebecers who voted Yes, 49.4 per cent, are still paying taxes to Ottawa and observing federal laws because they acknowledge the fact that democracy in Quebec has spoken. I said it before and I say it again: We are democrats first and foremost, and the first duty of democrats and citizens is to respect a democratic vote like the one held Monday in Quebec.

That being said, we should also realize that the people are masters of their right to vote and that if some day the people of Quebec decide to have another referendum, they can do that. We just had a reference to what was said by the Minister of Justice, who was merely referring to the Quebec law that provides that, in order to have another referendum, there must first be an election. And eventually we will have an election in Quebec, since we are a democracy and elections are part of being a democracy.

People will always be able to vote in Quebec. That does not seem to be the case in Canada.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister admit that the federal government is now resorting to such undemocratic measures as banning a vote, simply because it is afraid that a future referendum will make Quebec a sovereign country?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the difference, and I say this again because it is very important that it be remembered, is that on the evening of the referendum, Mr. Parizeau himself said that they lost because of the ethnic vote and people with money.

Three weeks before, the leader opposite made an appeal to the white race and never apologized. The difference between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition is that the Prime Minister respects the word and the vote of all Quebecers. All Quebecers voted in the referendum, and the majority voted no. We respect the outcome. And we assumed he would do the same.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister cannot get off like that. When we are talking to her about respect for democracy—

An hon. member: What respect?

Mr. Gauthier: —quoting words from all over the place. This is not the question at issue.

This is not the issue, Mr. Speaker. The issue is respecting democracy. In his speech in Toronto, the Prime Minister said yesterday that the rest of Canada had been—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gauthier: They should listen, Mr. Speaker, this would show them what their Prime Minister thinks. It is not always nice.

In his speech in Toronto, the Prime Minister said that the rest of Canada had been extremely generous in letting Quebec hold not one, but two, referendums.

Mr. Bouchard: Such generosity.

Mr. Gauthier: What generosity, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Loubier: Thank you very much.

Mr. Bouchard: Thank you so much.

An hon. member: Quebec, we love you.

Mr. Gauthier: In addition to our warmest thanks to the Prime Minister.

An hon. member: Thank you so much.

An hon. member: We love you.

Mr. Manley: Sit down and shut up.

Mr. Manning: If there is no question, sit down.

Mr. Gauthier: Are we to understand, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister of Canada is now questioning the right of Quebecers to decide their political future? That is the question.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite is hauling out words from all over the place. The words I quoted earlier—

An hon. member: Answer the question.

Ms. Copps: —are not words from all over the place, these are the words of the Quebec justice minister, who, I wager, will be in the Leader of the Opposition's caucus soon. He said that Quebecers do not hold a referendum because they lost the first one and think they could score better three weeks later. These are the words of the Quebec justice minister.

What is important is that we remember the words of the Leader of the Opposition the evening he talked about the results. He said that the referendum debate had demonstrated Quebecers' discipline, political maturity and their profound attachment to democratic values, and that the wishes and democratic vote of Quebecers deserved respect.

We cannot chose a white race, like the Leader of the Opposition did. We must respect the vote of all Quebecers. Let us hope he will do so.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, there are limits. The Prime Minister of Canada has just said we are lucky he allowed us to hold a referendum. We question the Deputy Prime Minister on it, on the right of Quebecers to decide their future themselves, and she answers any old thing. This is scandalous.

Some hon. members: Indeed.

Mr. Gauthier: Are we to understand that the Prime Minister of Canada has just taken upon himself to decide the limits of democracy in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister in his speech last night defended the right of all Quebecers. He took a page from the book of the Leader of the Opposition who said last Canada Day that we live in the most democratic country in the world. The people of Quebec spoke.

• (1425)

An hon. member: That is not true anymore.

Ms. Copps: It was true on Monday night. Between Monday night and Wednesday somehow it is not true anymore but the reality is—

Mr. Bouchard: You have changed it.

An hon. member: No way. You can't take the heat.

An hon. member: Vote yes and it is democratic.

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, on the subject of democracy, the most unfortunate part is that the Leader of the Opposition never took back the words spoken by Mr. Parizeau the other night. The Leader of the Opposition's remarks about the white race three weeks ago were never taken back. This reveals that it is not the Prime Minister who fails to respect Quebecers' right to vote, it is Lucien Bouchard and the Parti Quebecois.

[English]

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in his speech last night, the Prime Minister indicated that he is not prepared to tolerate any more referendums on Quebec sovereignty.

My question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. We are wondering exactly how it is that the government intends to achieve this. For example, is it considering a federal law to outlaw provincial referendums? Exactly what is it proposing?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again there is an opportunity for the Reform Party to join the ranks of Canadians who frankly want all of the country to get on to governance. Instead, he is salivating for another referendum because he did not like the results of the first one.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, what Canadians want from this government are answers to some simple questions. They do not want to see the government defending the same kind of demagoguery we have here sometimes.

If the separatists cannot have another referendum on Quebec sovereignty, which I suspect they would be ill advised to pursue in the near future, they may try simply to seek a mandate through an election, something which would be much easier to achieve.

Does the government really think this would be a better alternative for Canada than a referendum?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the best way to avoid another referendum is clearly to effect changes in the distinct society clause or in the right of veto, but especially changes that affect the respective powers of the federal and provincial governments.

We have already started to make these changes. They have been indicated. The federal government is now redefining its role and responsibilities. We are doing it at a lower cost to Canadians because we will be reducing the size of the federal government by 20 per cent.

• (1430)

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the government's nascent constitutional agenda, it would be advised to pursue unity by pursuing those issues on which Canadians agree and not those issues on which they are divided.

Yesterday the Prime Minister said he would propose a constitutional veto not for the Government of Quebec but for the people of Quebec. I would presume that is by referendum. Now he says he does not want more referendums in Quebec.

Does he foresee further consultations of the people in Quebec and outside Quebec on their constitutional future or not?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that considerable changes are needed in the Canadian federation. I think we all agree on this.

The federal government has to play a leadership role. It has to redefine its roles and responsibilities. It has to clean up its act. It has started to do that. The various means that will be used in the future either to clarify the constitutional position or to redefine the jurisdictions of all levels of government will be taken whenever necessary by whatever means necessary.

But we must not forget that Canada is not just an addition of 10 provinces. It is all Canadians voting together in a federal set-up in order to elect a government and representatives that look at national interests, not only provincial interests.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition publicly dissociated himself from the words of Mr. Parizeau the very next day here in this House, and I therefore accuse the Deputy Prime Minister of having knowingly lied to this House a few moments ago.

The Speaker: My dear colleague, I must ask you respectfully to please withdraw the words you used here a few minutes ago concerning the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, I respect you, but I also respect what I am as well as the truth, unlike the Deputy Prime Minister, and I cannot withdraw my words.

NAMING OF MEMBER

We are in pretty tense times for our nation. If it surprises you that I am going to act as quickly as I am, I do so knowing full well that my primary responsibility in the House of Commons is to see to it that the institution itself is respected by all of us.

THE REFERENDUM

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last night the Prime Minister told Canadians that he understood full well their frustration at having to sit on the sidelines during the referendum and said that he would not let it happen again.

However, in question period yesterday the Prime Minister flatly rejected the idea of consulting Canadians directly through constituent assemblies.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. If not through referendum, if not through constituent assemblies, then how does she plan to consult Canadians on the future of their country?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a few days before the final vote a call went out to Canadians from coast to coast to coast to come to Quebec to show their solidarity with Canada.

Members of Parliament from every political party responded to that call. Unfortunately of 52 Reform members of Parliament, 51 of them were too busy doing other things to respond to the call to Canada.

We have a responsibility as members of Parliament with our constituents to continue to work for a better democracy. Hopefully the next time the Reform Party will be working with us and not against us.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, may I remind the Deputy Prime Minister that Reformers from across the country were at the Montreal rally, the people, not the politicians speaking out.

It was evident from the results of the Charlottetown accord that Canadians do not want to see distinct society status or constitutional vetoes brought in. They want to see the federal government decentralizing power, in fact loosening the grip and the stranglehold it has on powers. The west wants it, Ontario wants it, and Quebec Liberal leader Daniel Johnson wants it.

When will the Deputy Prime Minister start living up to this promise of changing the way the federation operates and begin the actual transfer of powers to the provinces?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in 1929 the Senate recognized that women politicians were persons. I hope that when we were in Montreal, we the people were there but we the politicians were also there.

Unfortunately it was a calculated decision of Reform Party members to sit on the sidelines. It was a reflection of the decision they made throughout the campaign because frankly they did not support the option of Quebecers staying in Canada.

Speaking of the sharing of power, I was in Whitehorse only 10 days ago when we had unanimous—

Miss Grey: Giving, not sharing.

Ms. Copps: "Giving it", she says, "not sharing it".

In Whitehorse only 10 days ago we had unanimous agreement of all ministers of the environment, including the minister of the environment for Alberta, of harmonization where we share responsibility, not just a giveaway.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ.): Mr. Speaker, knowing that the Leader of the Opposition dissociated himself immediately and the day after from Mr. Parizeau's words, I would ask the Deputy Prime Minister through you if she will have the decency to apologize in this House, asking the pardon of the Leader of the Opposition for having put words in his mouth that he never said and for which he apologized publicly. I would ask her to have the decency to withdraw her words.

• (1440)

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it must be kept in mind that the present leader of the Parti Quebecois was not the first to bring up race. In fact, in a speech before the referendum, it was the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean who played the race card, who asked those in the French speaking white race to have babies.

I asked for an apology the next day. I have never, never heard any apology from the member across the floor, and I am still waiting for one.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the longer the Deputy Prime Minister talks, the more she piles it on, and the more she lies to this House.

An hon. member: Liar.

Mr. Bellehumeur: She is a liar.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, this is the second time today.

Mr. Bouchard: She is the one that needs speaking to.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

[English]

The Speaker: You can see, my colleagues, the reason why it is not acceptable to use unparliamentary language.

I would remind you with all respect, that we are the parliamentarians of Canada and this is where we have come to debate, with respect and with dignity.

I am asking once that the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm withdraw his words.

Mr. Bellehumeur: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition publicly dissociated himself from the words of Mr. Parizeau. I shall withdraw my words only once the Deputy Prime Minister has retracted—

NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has been promising us that big administrative changes are in the works. Under the Constitution, natural resources are the exclusive domain of the provinces, yet the federal government continues to meddle in this area of provincial responsibility. Reform's new confederation proposals would reduce the federal government's role in natural resources to a bare minimum.

What specific changes does the Prime Minister propose to reduce the federal role in natural resources?

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

I can take this opportunity to explain that we are not meddling in the area of provincial jurisdiction. In fact, during program review last year leading up to the February 1995 budget, my department took the opportunity to consult with all the provinces. We have worked co–operatively and collaboratively with the provinces so that we do not have overlapping duplication any longer in the resource sectors.

We have defined our role and the provinces have defined theirs. As far as I know, they are reasonably happy with that.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the provincial ministers of energy and mines have been urging their federal counterpart to harmonize regulations. Over the past two months their letters to the minister have gone unanswered as they have tried to organize a meeting with her, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and the provincial ministers of energy and mines and resources. In fact in a letter the ministers expressed "major concern about the lack of recent progress and the loss of momentum on harmonization efforts".

Will the minister arrange today a meeting with her, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and their provincial counterparts to discuss the harmonization issue?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the ministers of intergovernmental affairs, both provincial and federal, are always discussing these possible changes. In fact just today I was in contact with one of them in order to try to see whether we could increase the harmonization in terms of questions of natural resources, decentralization, and the efficiency of the federation initiative.

We are working all the time, trying to reach new ways of governing the federation that are less costly to people and that permit the federal and provincial governments to govern where they are most efficient.

WELFARE

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The minister will probably be interested to read in today's newspapers that during the first four months of the current fiscal year, from April to July, Quebec was $322 million over budget on welfare payments. This sad state of affairs is due to the fact that more families in Quebec are on welfare than was expected.

Will the minister finally admit that repeated cuts in unemployment insurance are to blame for this sharp increase in welfare costs in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have been over this ground several times.

It is important to point out to the hon. member and to members of the House that in fact the rate of increase for social assistance caseloads in the province of Quebec has declined over the past year, from an average rise of about 8 per cent down to 1.5 per cent, which simply does not jibe with the facts she is putting out. Over the last four months, since the month of August, there has been a net decline of about 7,000 in the caseloads. The reason for that, as we know, is that we have been very successful in creating over 125,000 jobs in Quebec over the last two years.

Under the UI changes we brought in last year, we provided a special benefit for those on low income so that those who have dependants or children would be able to receive an additional $1,000 over and above their regular benefits, which meant that over 130,000 Quebecers alone were able to get those additional benefits.

This summer I was able to sign an important agreement with the Government of Quebec to provide $81 million directly to social assistance recipients so that they would receive an income supplement that would enable them to go back to work and receive enough income.

Rather than spending her time trying to argue about small minutia of details and figures, what we should be talking about is how we come together as two levels of government to help the real people who have real needs. That is the real issue.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if the minister refers to 20,000 more people on welfare as small minutiae, details and figures, in a so–called period of prosperity, at a time the government is about to cut welfare subsidies in the Canada social transfer, what will it be like in the next recession? This is unacceptable.

Will the minister finally admit that further draconian cuts he is about to make in unemployment insurance will put even more families on welfare and make the budgetary problems of the Quebec government even worse?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the hon. member and other members of the Bloc and the Parti Quebecois have been trying to say to the people of Quebec in a really quite deliberate effort to give out misinformation, I will tell the hon.

member that one of the most important elements we are putting together as part of the new unemployment insurance package is what the Prime Minister talked about in his speech last night. He said that we will provide basic protection for families on low income with children. It is something we have been talking about in this country for a long time, and we intend to do it.

I would say to the hon. member that rather than arguing old arguments she should be putting her attention now to helping govern this country better so that we can really help poor people, rather than simply trying to break up this country. That is the best way of providing security and civility.

SRI LANKA

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the secretary of state for foreign affairs.

Canadians are concerned about the Sri Lankan government's current major military offensive on the people of the Jaffna Peninsula. The civil war and massive attack is resulting in a serious threat to the civilian Tamil population and the further displacement of large numbers of people.

Can the secretary tell the House what role Canada is playing to stop this bloodshed?

Hon. Raymond Chan (Secretary of State (Asia–Pacific), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this moment to pay tribute to our ambassador to China, who passed away Tuesday. Ambassador John Paynter served Canada well, both in India and in China. We offer our condolences to his wife Inga and his three children.

To answer the hon. member's question, indeed we are very concerned about the situation in Sri Lanka. This summer I personally travelled to that country on a fact finding mission. During that trip I told the President of Sri Lanka that we were disappointed at the unilateral resumption of hostility in Sri Lanka by the LTTE on April 19 after 14 weeks of peace. However, at the same time we also expressed our concern to the government that a military solution was not an option in Sri Lanka. We continue to urge the government and the LTTE to resume negotiations for a peaceful solution.

Canada has been saddened at the continuation and escalation of the conflicts in Sri Lanka and with the large loss of life. Canada totally condemns the slaughter of innocent persons, both Tamil and Sinhalese, in Sri Lanka in recent days. This slaughter is not helping the situation.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister for Human Resources Development admitted that the Canada pension plan is unsustainable. In response, he announced another tax grab. He is raising payroll taxes despite the fact that in his budget the Minister of Finance stated that payroll taxes are a cancer on job creation.

How high is the government planning to raise payroll taxes to prop up a system facing collapse?

We will be tabling in the House before the end of the year a paper that will put forward a series of recommendations. It is an area that must be worked out with the provinces. It is a joint sharing of responsibility to ensure that the tens of millions of Canadians who rely upon the Canada pension plan, which is a pooled sharing fund, will be able to sustain it and be able to give absolute certainty and surety to not only this generation of pension holders but future generations that the Canada pension plan will provide a very stable foundation for their security in old age.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that last comment is not even worth responding to. The system is facing collapse by the year 2010.

Our plans for renewing the Canada pension plan include protecting seniors' benefits without raising payroll taxes. These are the kinds of positive changes Reform is offering in its new confederation.

Is the Minister of Human Resources Development prepared to roll back this tax increase and forget this obscene attack on jobs?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says she does not want to comment on the program that has been in place for several decades helping to provide protection. In fact the hon. member tabled a report from the Reform Party that would totally eviscerate any kind of security for disabled people, for survivors with children, for seniors, and which would eliminate all kinds of payments for low income Canadians.

This member is the authoress of a program that would totally undermine the public pension plan of Canada.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, again today prairie farmers are attempting to freelance grain sales into the United States, increasing trade tension with the United States and risking the imposition of yet another cap on sales.

Is the minister of agriculture prepared to say today that he will not let Canada run the risk of being shut out of the U.S. market by telling Canadians that he is prepared to ensure the enforcement of single desk selling through the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the law of Canada with respect to the powers and authorities of the Canadian Wheat Board is very clear. That law has been on the books of this country for a long time, and by and large that law has been respected. It ought to be respected.

Those who hold contrary views and wish to see some changes in the legal system that presently exists can bring their views forward and let those views be debated and discussed. We have established a procedure for that to occur.

I would advise those who deliberately violate the law that they are in no way advancing their own case. They are in fact in the process of undermining democracy. Beyond the point of the illegal nature of their actions, they are also raising the spectre of a very serious trade problem with the United States, which could undermine the incomes and the livelihoods of all Canadian farmers.

I would carefully advise those who contemplate violations of the law that they ought to respect the law, because illegal activity does not accomplish anything. Second, they are running the risk of very serious trade repercussions.

PRIVILEGE

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

The Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition is rising on a question of privilege. Could he tell me whether it concerns something that happened during Question Period?

Mr. Bouchard: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition, on a question of privilege.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, just now everyone heard the Deputy Prime Minister say I did not dissociate myself from the comments made by Mr. Parizeau on the night of the referendum. In fact, the very next day in a media scrum here in the lobby of the House of Commons, I publicly and clearly dissociated myself from his comments. I also pointed out that those who voted in the referendum on Monday were all Quebecers, that we are still all Quebecers and that no distinction should be made between the votes cast.

My statement was brought to the attention of the Deputy Prime Minister earlier today, twice in fact, by two Bloc members, but she refused to withdraw her accusation.

What she said implies that, by remaining silent, I approved of and agreed with what Mr. Parizeau said. This constitutes a violation of my rights as a parliamentarian and an attack on my reputation.

In the name of parliamentary democracy, I would ask you to discuss this with the Deputy Prime Minister and give her one last chance to do the right thing by asking her to withdraw what she said.

The Speaker: My dear colleagues, what the Leader of the Opposition heard or did not hear may be very unpleasant and he may feel aggrieved. However, in my opinion, what someone said or did not say constitutes not a question of privilege but debate. That is my decision.

Instead of seeking to continue what is in fact a debate, my decision is that this is not a question of privilege.

I have a point of order. The hon. whip of the Reform Party.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I may need your help on this. The closest I can get in Beauchesne's is perhaps citation 481(e). The point is this. The Deputy Prime Minister today made two deliberate falsehoods: one concerning, alleging—

• (1505)

The Speaker: I address myself, of course, directly to the whip of the Reform Party.

My colleague, the words that you have used that one of our members made a deliberate falsehood is not acceptable and I would like you to withdraw it.

Mr. Ringma: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the words deliberate falsehood, although I believe it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I put it to you squarely, my colleague. Will you withdraw, yes or no?

Mr. Ringma: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the word falsehood.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I accept the withdrawal completely, without explanation. I am going to let that sit there.

If the hon. member has a point of order, I would like him to put it to me forthwith.

Mr. Ringma: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that there were two wrong statements made in the House this afternoon.

One accused the Reform Party of deliberately having a policy of not supporting the parade in Montreal and the other was a statement that the Reform Party deliberately wanted the yes side to win.

Those two statements are totally erroneous.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: My colleagues, it is not for your Speaker to judge that which is or is not erroneous in the statements made in the course of debate or question and answer period.

With all respect to my hon. colleague, the Reform whip, I would say that what he has said could be a point of debate, surely. If he does not agree with this statement, we go through this every day in here.

My decision is that it is not a point of order. I will hear a point of order from the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, in light of what you had to do today in naming two members, does it mean that because the numbers have changed that we are now the official opposition?

• (1510)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): We want the money.

The Speaker: That might be a point of clarification, but it is not a point of order.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, tone of voice in this place can be as important as what is actually said. During question period the Deputy Prime Minister, in answer to a question from the member for Beaver River, said that 51 Reform MPs were too busy doing other things to attend the Montreal rally.

The tone of voice used by the Deputy Prime Minister imputed motive and inferred that—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

The Speaker: We will have the Thursday question in a moment. I want to give my response here.

[English]

Colleagues, it is true that not only words may be offensive in this House, indeed unparliamentary. It is true that the tone of an answer might also cause your Speaker to say that such and such a statement is unparliamentary.

I was listening very closely to the debate. Although many statements today were offensive to one side or the other, in my view as far as the decorum of this House and the conducting of the question period are concerned, they were within the area of acceptability.

With regard to that question of privilege, I would rule it was not a question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rise, not on a point of order, but to ask the Thursday question. I would like our colleague to tell us what is on the legislative agenda.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking today as government House leader.

The Speaker: You will forgive me, you look the same. The hon. government House leader.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I want the record of the House to show I am speaking in a calm, measured tone of voice with no intention of sarcasm or innuendo.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gray: It is our intention to continue with the list of items already being considered by the House today. I am referring to second reading of Bill C–95, the reorganization of the Department of Health; third reading of Bill C–94 relating to fuel additives; second reading of Bill C–96, the human resources development department reorganization, and report stage and third reading of Bill C–52, the Department of Public Works and Government Services reorganization.

Tomorrow we would like to deal with Bill C–108, the National Housing Act amendments. We would then resume the list I have just read out.

Finally, we will be in ongoing consultations with the opposition parties about the scheduling of other business, including opposition days.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the government House leader? My colleagues and I are deeply concerned about the government's fall agenda.

The facts, as I look at them, in the last 46 or 47 days are as follows. Just four new bills have been introduced in this House, no aging paper has been presented, no UI legislation has been tabled. There has been a refusal to call bills which the separatists object to. Twelve of nineteen bills were such—

The Speaker: I would take it this has to do with House business. With all respect, I would ask the House leader of the Reform Party to please put his question.

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will do that.

I plead with the government House leader to commit this House to a serious legislative agenda before the end of this fall session and I would like to know what it is.

• (1515)

At this point in time we have had no indication of any kind of serious legislation; not even the voice of intent, never mind something in concrete form.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, when we resumed the session I said we had some 30 measures waiting on the Order Paper from the end of the session in June for debate. I said that we would be proceeding in an orderly fashion with those measures as a priority.

I do not know why our colleagues think we should have scrapped all those measures. I thought they wanted a measure to tighten up the parole and correction system, Bill C–45. Now they are on record as opposing that. I thought they wanted a measure to have a better witness protection system, Bill C–58. Now they are on record as opposing that.

Now that we have dealt with a bill to create an environmental auditor general, they are in effect saying that was not worth while. Now that we are dealing with measures on dangerous fuel additives, they are saying they did not want those measures to be debated. Now that we have debated a measure to update our transportation regulations, the Reform Party is saying that was not worth while.

I will conclude my remarks without your saying anything, Mr. Speaker. I can see your face; a tone of voice is not necessary. On each and every one of the measures they participated in the debate. They put down amendments. They called for votes. By their actions they are saying the House leader for the Reform Party simply does not know what he is talking about.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to begin to debate a bill and be interrupted by question period, but I will nevertheless summarize a bit what I said and then to on.

We are debating an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain Acts. I had said that, in fact, the bill was aimed at replacing the name of the Department of Health and Welfare by the shortened title of Department of Health.

Generally, not a lot of sections have changed, but in reading this bill, we realize that certain sections have been changed, repealed or added, only some. In some cases we see that the government, as a good government, is once again legitimizing its authority and is giving the Minister of Health authority to intervene yet again in areas that are under exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

I gave a brief history and I am going to summarize what I said to conclude with the clauses I mentioned earlier, which provide the powers of the minister, who may intervene in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

Under section 92(7.16) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and according to the courts, the sectors of health and social services are exclusively under the jurisdiction of Quebec and the other provinces. Since as far back as 1919, Ottawa has been getting increasingly involved in these sectors, forcing Quebec even here to comply with so called national standards and objectives.

As far as we are concerned, federal initiatives in the area of health and welfare, except for those dealing specifically with certain groups of people—members of the Canadian Forces, sailors, Indians, immigrants and prisoners—have no clear constitutional basis. They depend entirely on the federal government's spending power, which allows it to take many more major initiatives.

In 1919, the Department of Health was created and the first subsidies granted. In 1948, the national health subsidy program was introduced. In 1957, the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act was passed by Parliament. The Medical Care Act was passed in 1966, and the Canada Health Act, known as Bill C–6, in 1984. The Canada Health Act replacing the 1957 and 1966 laws set national standards and imposed requirements limiting the autonomy of Quebec and the provinces. Bill C–6 set out provincial obligations: universality, accessibility, interprovincial portability, public administration, and comprehensiveness. Failure to meet these criteria may lead the federal government to withhold transfer payments to the provinces for health care.

As early as 1926, Quebec denounced the federal government's interference in the area of health, and the reservations then expressed by the Taschereau government were reiterated by every succeeding administration. Health Canada has become so big that its 1995–96 estimates set aside $1.5 billion for operating expenditures—$347 million for personnel costs and $703 million for goods and services—and $6.9 billion for transfer payments. However, this contribution to the provinces, which is, as I was saying, subject to compliance with national standards, does not prevent the federal government from going ahead with its own health and welfare initiatives, as shown by the list I just gave you on the subject of duplication.

The 1991 national strategy for the integration of persons with disabilities, with a budget of $46 million over five years; the 1991 federal initiative against violence, with a budget of $136 million over four years; the new horizons program; the seniors secretariat; the national strategy to reduce tobacco use; the national drug strategy; the national AIDS strategy; the pregnancy and child development program; the children's bureau, the national forum on health. All these initiatives directly encroach on existing programs. Such cases of overlap and duplication cost a lot of money.

I would now like to make a few comments on the government's red book commitment with respect to the national forum on health. With respect to health, the federal government does not intend to allow any slack to the provinces, as promised in the fall 1993 election campaign, when its intention to hold a national forum on health, if it was elected, was made public.

The federal health minister made no secret of Ottawa's centralizing designs. During its election campaign, the Liberal Party of Canada released a document entitled "Creating Opportunity: The Liberal Plan for Canada", better known as the red book. Reference is made in this book to being committed to holding a national forum on health, and the way this commitment is worded hardly conceals the federal government's desire to take control over health care in Canada. Let me read you what it says. "The role of the federal government should include the mobilization of effort to bring together Canada's wealth of talent and knowledge in the health care field." If that is not the expression of a will to centralize, I do not know what is. "This is a societal issue in which every Canadian has an interest. The federal government must provide the means to ensure that Canadians are involved and informed, and can understand the issues and the options."

On June 29, 1994, despite the objections of the provinces, the federal health minister announced the creation of this forum. To date, four work sessions have been held, and not one province is represented at this forum. The forum's mandate is to develop a vision of what the Canadian health care system will be in the 21st century; foster dialogue with Canadians concerning their health care system to ensure that, while respecting the general principles of the system and preserving its benefits, the renewal process under way will make the system better and lead to greater public health; establish priorities for the future and bring about a wider consensus on the changes that are required.

Following the invitation sent by the federal health minister, Mr. Rochon, Quebec's minister of health and social services, gave the following reasons, in a letter dated October 14, 1994, to explain why the Quebec government would not participate.

> The mandate of this forum is an encroachment by the federal government in a field which essentially falls under provincial jurisdiction, and that is unacceptable. The clearly stated objective of your government, which is to give the forum a mandate to define future priorities, in the context of health care reform, and to define the means to that end, is a direct intrusion in provincial governments' affairs. This is something that cannot be hidden behind the consultative nature you ascribe to the recommendations that would come out of this forum.

That was the Quebec health minister's response to his federal counterpart.

Quebec's health minister also pointed out that Quebec had not waited for the presumed leadership of the federal government to undertake a reform, adding that important concrete measures had been taken, that an extensive public hearing process had enabled Quebecers to state their views and their needs, thus fostering a joint effort to define priorities and means of action, and that, in recent years, the federal government had made major cuts in its transfers to the provinces.

What we have here is yet another measure which demonstrates the federal government's intention to get involved in the health sector. Indeed, Bill C–95 includes provisions which clearly give the health minister a legitimate power to interfere, yet again, in fields of provincial jurisdiction.

If we look at these clauses, far from acting in good faith by withdrawing from this area that does not come under its jurisdiction, the federal government has every opportunity to gradually take over areas of provincial jurisdiction when it is in its interest. I am not saying that this is a major bill; it has been portrayed as harmless and inconsequential, but the reality is far different.

Subclause 4(1) of Bill C–95 sets out the powers, duties and functions of the Minister of Health. It proposes that the minister's powers extend to "all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction relating to the promotion and preservation of the health of the people of Canada".

The Department of National Health and Welfare Act contained a similar provision. Parliament's jurisdiction over public health could cause confusion. This provision should be more specific.

The following clauses are more subtle. Subclause 4(2) lists the health minister's powers, duties and functions, including "the promotion and preservation of the physical, mental and social well–being of the people of Canada".

This provision would give the federal government the authority and legitimacy to interfere in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

Subclause 4(2) then mentions "the protection of the people of Canada against risks to health and the spreading of diseases". This does not appear in the original act that Bill C–95 would replace.

• (1530)

This would allow the federal government to move to protect the health and safety of the people in the name of national interest and of the power to ensure peace, order and good government. Paragraph 4(1)(c) places investigation and research into public health, including the monitoring of diseases, under federal jurisdiction.

This provision creates a problem, since clause 12 provides that "nothing in this act or the regulations authorizes the minister or any officer or employee of the department to exercise any jurisdiction or control over any health authority operating under the laws of any province". There is obvious confusion here.

How does Health Canada plan to ensure this continuous disease control monitoring without having access to the necessary information? According to the Act respecting health services and social services, health care institutions are health agencies governed by provincial legislation.

Is that really a problem? Does clause 12 effectively limit federal intervention in health matters or is it a mere front put up to reassure the provinces, a line that the federal government will have no qualms crossing if and when it pleases, as it has done in recent years?

Clause 4 may therefore be interpreted rather freely and broadly. There certainly is cause for concern about the real scope of this clause, which can be interpreted many different ways and ascribed many intentions. This is how, as usual, the federal government tries to expand into provincial areas of jurisdiction through a seemingly simplistic and innocuous project.

But no one is fool enough not to guess what it is up to. Bill C–95 is another fine example of the federal way of doing things: silently, without making any waves, because it knows full well that no one agrees with its handling of health care.

Needless to say that, for all those reasons and many more—that my colleagues will have the opportunity to raise later on—, we cannot support in any way Bill C–95. Mr. Speaker, before closing, I would like to table the following amendment to Bill C–95.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following: "this House declines to give second reading to Bill C–95, An Act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain Acts, because the principle of the Bill does not provide for including in the Minister's powers, duties and functions, the power to award full and entire financial compensation to any province wishing to exercise fully its jurisdiction over health".

• (1535)

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–95 is really not much more than a bill to change the name of the Department of Health. On that basis it is surprising that we will spend so much time debating it. If I asked a high school class how long they thought it would take to change the name of a department, they would tell me it would probably take a minute.

I see this debate being used by my colleagues as an opportunity to talk about health care in a broader sense and I will seize that opportunity too. This bill is what my House leader said it was a few moments ago when he said it was a pretty thin soup on the legislative agenda we have seen lately.

Let me start my comments about health care in general by making a statement I would like to have emblazoned across the forehead of my colleagues across the way as coming from the health critic of the Reform Party. I will say it over and over again until they finally recognize and plainly hear what I am saying: Medicare is our best social program. Medicare is the program I think we should protect with all our resources.

Let me follow that by saying U.S. style medicare, U.S. style medicine is absolutely unacceptable to Canadians and to Reformers. There is no desire anywhere in Canada to move toward a system like the U.S. has. How many times can I say that? How many times can I express it? How many times can I emblazon it on the foreheads of my colleagues?

Our public system which is tax supported, which is universal, which is comprehensive, which is accessible to all and which is publicly administered, is truly unparalleled. Medicare is our best social program. This social program however has some cracks in it. The cracks must be talked about and addressed. If we simply stand idly by and let the best social program we have break down, we have not done what we should be doing as legislators.

I beg my colleagues across the way to stop the rhetoric. I beg them to stop this nonsense about a U.S. style two tier system. I beg them instead to listen carefully to the actual proposals I make. I beg them to actually debate with me those proposals line by line instead of with buzzwords, instead of with rhetoric, instead of with platitudes. Please debate the concerns.

Why does our medicare system have cracks? What are the cracks I see? I see an aging population in Canada. Each one of us knows that as we age, medical expenses go up. In the last three years of life, 70 per cent of our health care expenditures are spent.

I see new innovative technology coming along that was never envisaged when medicare came on the scene. I see organ transplants, joint replacements, things we never dreamed about when health care was set up. Some of those things are profoundly expensive. Some are very difficult to fit into the framework we have.

Finally what are probably driving the cracks, and I wish they were not, are the funding shortfalls. We are in a position now where the federal government is spending over $1,200 per person to service the debt, that is servicing the interest on our debt annually while we spend $268 per person on medicare.

If nothing else, those three things which are happening in medicare have produced profound cracks. Ignore them, pay no attention to them and our most valuable social program will not just have cracks, it will implode. It will not survive.

If anyone takes from that that I say medicare is finished or done, I will say it again: Medicare is our most valuable social program. It needs support. It needs protection. It does not need U.S. style two tier changes. How many times must I say it?

There are two routes to travel in health care changes. Surely we know that health care changes must come but there are two routes to travel as I see it.

One route is to ration the procedures we do. That is avenue number one which we are on today, the rationing of services. We can ration by waiting in line. We can wait so long that we scream, or sadly in some cases, we can wait so long that we die. Rationing by waiting.

We can cap budgets and say that this is all we can afford. Anything beyond that point will not be done. We can have 30 operating room days instead of 100 operating room days. We can close beds. We can actually remove them from the system. It is being done. We can fire nurses and say to them: "You cannot do your nursing any longer. Step outside the system. Maybe you would be just fine as an accountant". That is one route and the one I am afraid we are on today, the rationing of services. I decry that and say it will not suffice.

The other route we can travel is if our medicare system does not meet the needs of an individual, they should have the choice to step beyond the public system and access something else. That is where we should go. Please remember that does not mean tossing our good public system away. It means our tax supported system will maintain itself, but if medicare does not meet the needs of an individual patient, they should be able to step outside. I can only explain this best by giving some examples.

A little girl by the name of Stephanie, a tiny patient, has adenoid problems and fluid in her ears. She is in pain. This is not a life threatening problem but she cannot hear as well as she would like. She is constantly concerned. She goes in to get her antibiotic and the specialist tells her parents that Stephanie really needs to have her adenoids removed and the fluid drained from her ears. Her parents ask the doctor how soon this can be done. It is an eight–month wait in Nepean for that procedure today.

Stephanie is not in the worst difficulty, but what happens for the eight months she has to wait? She is on antibiotic every three weeks, and the antibiotic cost is about $40. There is actually some extra discomfort for her, so she misses play school. When she misses play school mom has to stay home from work or have a babysitter come in. Those things are economic, and I would set them aside and say that they are okay. But for Stephanie herself, the pain and disruption is there. Her parents ask what choice they have. The public medicare system is going to provide her service in eight months. Is there nothing that can be done? Yes, there is something a Nepean couple could do today. They could go to Rochester. They considered very carefully going to Rochester for their sweetheart to get her adenoids out.

There is another choice. I am sad to say that it does not exist in Ontario now. The choice is a little clinic in Alberta. This clinic is run by an ear, nose, and throat surgeon exactly of the same capability as hers. He got ticked off with the fact that the waiting list in Alberta was eight months. He said there had to be another way. There were not enough bed opening times for him to bring kids into the hospital. This is not a hard procedure. The facilities will cost him about $30,000, and he can get the operating room microscope, which is not that difficult to sterilize. He could do it in his office with an anaesthetist and the equipment for that. He wondered if there was a demand for this.

Today in Alberta he is doing that. The cost is $125 out of the patient's pocket. The waiting time is two weeks. Little Stephanie in pain is given the choice. This is what I want. I want Stephanie's parents to have the choice. If the public system and the eight–month wait is okay for Stephanie and okay for them, so be it. If they say that it is not acceptable to them, I want them desperately to be able to access that facility. And it should not be in Rochester; it should be in Ottawa.

If there is anyone in the Chamber who would deny that sweet little girl that choice, I want them to stand now. I cannot imagine a Canadian who would do that.

Thin edge of the wedge? Our public system cratering because of the potential of choice? Find me the country in this world that has a public system like Canada's and a complementary private clinic that has caused the public system to crater and I will sit down. There is no such country.

Let me take the other side of the coin now. My mother, who is living in Alberta, recently had a cataract operation. She had a choice. There is a clinic in Alberta that would do her cataract operation for $1,250 out of pocket, with a very short waiting time of two weeks. The waiting time in the public system for her was four months. "Twelve hundred and fifty bucks, boy, that's a lot of loot", says my mom. "How bad are my eyes? Not so bad at all. I can still watch TV. I can still read the newspaper. I think I will wait. I think I can easily wait for four months." And she did. Her surgery was performed trouble free. This was a public system providing for her needs in the way it should.

If there is no demand in Canada for options outside medicare, there will be no such clinics springing up. Interesting enough, in a country I am familiar with, some of the private clinics, these choice clinics that have sprung up, have now gone bankrupt because the public system has become so efficient, provided all the services, and pushed them aside.

Why do Canadians not have more confidence in this most valuable social program to say that it will crater if some choice springs up? How is it that this most valuable social program would not survive if there were choice and if the only choice were to go to Europe? It makes no sense to me whatever.

I talked about how funding goes down because of debt. What happens if funding from the government drops so low that there is not enough in a community?

Tomorrow I am going to my twin riding of Saskatoon to speak to the law faculty. I have already had the opportunity of being there. I found out that in Saskatoon the provincial and federal funds have given them no capital expenditures for the last three years—none. They said they had some things the people in Saskatoon want, and they raised through foundations $2 million—from corporations, individuals, and people who are involved in the health care field doing projects. They put those funds into capital improvements: equipment and new technology.

The public will not stand for an inferior product in health. Health is more important to Canadians than any other thing we have or we can give them.

I say again that the individuals in this country who will not debate this issue straight up with Reformers who are willing to talk openly about the cracks—not the explosions, not the breakdown, not a crisis, but cracks in our most valuable social program—are ideologically driven and not driven by care, not driven by health needs, and not driven by common sense.

I am going to end my discourse today by saying that medicare is our most valuable social program. The biggest threat to medicare in Canada is politicians who wrap themselves in some kind of a flag and will not truly address the issues.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We now move on to the next stage of the debate on Bill C–95. For the next five hours, members will have a maximum of 20 minutes to make speeches, and 10 minutes for questions or comments.

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first, I want to congratulate the minister sponsoring this bill. She has strongly and successfully defended the principles championed for half a century by the Liberal Party, while developing Canada's health care system. Over the years, medicare was threatened many times, sometimes from one quarter, sometimes from another.

True to the tradition upheld by her illustrious predecessors, the minister has just repelled the most recent attacks on medicare, and all Canadians are grateful for that.

This Liberal government is proud, and deservedly so, of all the pioneers who saw to the proper development of medicare. Successive Liberal governments improved the system, so as to preserve its soundness and effectiveness. This is why Canada now enjoys a health care program that is second to none, both from a technical and a social standpoint. The quality of our health care remains unsurpassed. Equal access for all is also guaranteed to the fullest extent possible.

Social development is contingent upon health. A healthy nation is a productive nation. It can enjoy those things that make life worth living, it stands a better chance of being happy, and its people can build a strong nation.

One of the ever present challenges faced by the health department is to find which policies and programs can best contribute to the health and well–being of Canadians.

Without taking anything away from Canadian health professionals, I want to congratulate the Minister of Health and Health Canada for giving priority to essential programs such as disease prevention and health promotion.

In the past, preventive medicine meant things like vaccination, which practically eliminated afflictions like smallpox, diphtheria and poliomyelitis for previous generations. Today, sophisticated tests and equipment warn us about dangers and allow Canadians of all regions to add many years of good health to their lives.

Twenty years ago, a Liberal minister of Health, the hon. Marc Lalonde, published a working paper entitled A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians which was to have an impact on health systems across the world. It was a visionary document for the time. It is comforting to see that so many aspects of Mr. Lalonde's vision have been realized thanks to the department whose name we are discussing today.

Many fundamental elements of the health system we know today came out of the Lalonde paper. The preamble to the Canada Health Act which mentions the social, environmental and industrial causes of diseases was also inspired by that document. The causal factor model which the National Forum on Health is now studying also comes from the Lalonde working paper.

According to A New Perspective on the Health of Canadians, and I quote: "When the full impact of environment and lifestyle has been assessed, —there can be no doubt that the traditional view of equating the level of health in Canada with the availability of physicians and hospitals is inadequate". The document predicts appropriately that, to improve the health of Canadians in the future, we will have to clean up the environment, reduce risks we expose ourselves to, and improve our knowledge of human biology.

This is the source of the reasoning in favour of social well–being, which is at the heart of this new bill, as members will note. This is the source of the arguments against tobacco and excessive alcohol consumption, which underlie Health Canada's tobacco demand reduction strategy, and the activities of the Canadian Centre on Substance Abuse.

This is the source of the arguments in favour of health research, which are guiding Health Canada in its laboratory work, and the Medical Research Council in its operation; the latter does not report to the department but to Parliament through the health minister. This is the source of the argument that everyone is responsible for his or her own health and must keep sufficiently fit to ensure his or her own well–being. As the members are aware, responsibility for the promotion of physical fitness was given back to Health Canada.

From now on, it is incumbent upon the health department to encourage Canadians to stay physically active throughout their lives because physical activity is essential to good health. Health Canada helps many organizations make physical activity more accessible and readily available to all Canadians in general and to the disabled in particular, because the latter are probably the ones who need it most and have to overcome the most obstacles in that regard.

With the reorganization of the health department—the main reason for introducing Bill C–95—another determining factor relating to the health of Canadians is being added to departmental operations. Product safety in now being transferred from the former Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the Department of Health. Product safety does indeed come under the broader field of health protection. Accidents in the home and on the job are major causes of death and injury for people between 5 and 35 years of age. Because of such accidents, we have people who can no longer live a full life, economic losses and an increase in medical and hospital bills.

A lot of these accidents involve consumer and household products. Health Canada is responsible for the enforcement of the Hazardous Products Act. This act deals with the sale, the advertisement and the importation of certain hazardous products and ensures that consumers are well informed about the risks associated with the misuse of other products.

Before I conclude, I want to raise a point we seem to forget when we talk about what contributes to improve the health and welfare of Canadians. The provinces are, of course, responsible for providing health services to the public, but some health problems know no provincial boundaries. Their causes are deep–rooted in the social fabric of our nation.

For Canadians to enjoy good health, their basic needs must be met. They must have a job and a reasonable income and be able to care for their families. This is where the federal government plays an important part. It must help to maintain a viable economic structure so that these goals can be reached.

The Jobs and Growth government agenda will greatly contribute to improve the health of Canadians. We can expect positive economic results from the deficit reduction, which will help to improve the health of Canadians. We all stand behind Health Canada in this cause. These are the reasons why I wholeheartedly support Bill C–95.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to comment on some of the things the hon. member for Macleod had to say in his speech. I notice the hon. member is not here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I wish to remind the hon. parliamentary secretary that it is not within the norms of the rules of the House to make reference to the absence of any member, particularly when we are all aware of the constraints put on our time at different periods.

Ms. Fry: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. I would like to comment on the statements of the hon. member for Macleod. With all due respect to William Shakespeare, methinks the hon. member doth protest too much in his speech when he continued to repeat over and over that the Reform Party did not mean to have a U.S. medical system, that the third party supported medicare.

The hon. member repeated this and repeated this to make a point. However, with respect, I would submit that rhetoric and repetition of words mean nothing when the actions following the words are supporting a two tier medicare system that would definitely dismantle Canadian medicare as we know it.

The hon. member spoke about waiting lists.

• (1605)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I seek some clarification from the hon. parliamentary secretary.

I recognize that the member for Macleod spoke prior to the last speaker who was a member of the government side and to whom the question and comment period is designated. I appreciate comment can be made about a previous speaker and then, in terms of relevancy, the member goes back to the intervention of the last spokesperson, the member for Pierrefonds—Dollard. I ask her to get to the comments of her colleague, the last speaker on the floor of the House.

Ms. Fry: Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on medicare and on the way the system is to be restructured. It would deal, as my hon. colleague said just, with some of the structural changes that are necessary to move the system into the 21st century.

The cost of medicare and the changing of some of the ways that the system works, as I said in my speech and as the hon. member just reiterated, have to do with the fact that there are national concerns and a national interest in a new national Department of Health.

Research covers a broad spectrum. There are local areas of research and local areas of health promotion and prevention that must come from the provinces because they deal specifically with issues concerning regional problems, regional environmental issues, and regional and local differences that need to be addressed.

Across the spectrum there are broader issues concerning the whole spectrum of health facing all Canadians. It is efficient and effective for the federal government and for national health to take these issues into consideration. It is effective in that the data collection in one place creates a cost efficiency and a base where everyone can co–ordinate and use the information as they need it, rather than have duplication of service and duplication of information gathering in 12 different areas such as would come about if we allowed each province and each territory to repeat, to duplicate and to reinvent the wheel. They would deal with the broader issues of health care, promotion and prevention that cut across provincial boundary lines and have nothing to do with specific regional and local interests.

There is a specific role for the Government of Canada in research, promotion and programs pertaining to low risk babies. It is common to all Canadians; it is not specific to any one province.

If we are talking about efficiencies and appropriateness of care and appropriateness of effort, we need to focus on them, and it is appropriate for the federal government to do so. It is more appropriate for the federal government to do it than for provinces, as I said before, to deal with it individually. When the ministers of health met in the past they all agreed that it was a very real role.

In terms of safety it is much easier as drugs, devices and foods come into the country for one agency to assess and to deem whether or not they are safe. Goods and services travel across the provinces and therefore go to every person as far away as Prince Edward Island and Vancouver Island. Therefore safety should be carried across Canada so that there is one level of safety and it is not spottily done in different areas of the country.

The national interest of health and the need for a national Department of Health are not intrusive. It is an appropriate way for the federal government to look after safety, health promotion and prevention.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I would only like to know if the hon. member for Pierrefonds—Dollard has any comment to add to those that were made on his speech.

The hon. member for Pierrefonds—Dollard has the floor.

Mr. Patry: Mr. Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary to the minister of Health. I submit that today's motion is very important because it is a positive move for health. New emphasis will be put on prevention and the department of Health will assume responsibility for certain regulations, like the one on hazardous products and other similar products, and also for fitness.

• (1610)

I personally think that the future of health in Canada is prevention. We talked a lot about health care, but before things get there, there is prevention. That is the objective of the bill and I am proud of it.

[English]

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is a physician. He listened very carefully to my colleague in the Reform Party make a very eloquent and, I might say, one of the best speeches I have heard in the House. He listened to his recital of the tragic case of Stephanie. The member must have had many patients who endured terrible pain and suffering because essential services were not available to them since the Canada Health Act rationed essential services.

The Minister of Health has often said in the House that we must provide Canadians with access, access, access to essential health care services and that we in the Reform Party were espousing ideas that would somehow limit that access. How is access served better when we have increasing costs, an aging population and increasing demand? When demand on our limited resources is actually increasing, how will we provide individuals with access to essential health care services?

We want to amend, not destroy, the Canada Health Act to enable private clinics to exist and to enable private services to be provided to Canadians. Only private moneys would be exchanged in the private clinics. Not a single dollar of taxpayers' money would be spent in the clinics. We would have a system that provides for greater access for all Canadians regardless of the care than what they have now.

How will our plan somehow destroy health care in the country when we will give better access to all Canadians regardless of their income?

Mr. Patry: Mr. Speaker, what struck me in the speech made by the member from the Reform Party, before my colleague made his comments, is that he told the House that the Canadian health care system is one of the best if not the best in the world and that he did not want in any way a health care system based on the American model.

I think that having private clinics, as suggested by my colleague, would be the beginning of the end of our health care system as we know it in Canada and the birth of a two tier system, one for the rich and one for the poor.

I am well aware of cases like the one mentioned by the member for Macleod, the case of Stephanie. Such cases exist in every riding in this country, but I think that, at the present time, the provision of essential services is good. Of course, there is room for improvement in the area of essential services, and these improvements must be made through prevention. I think that, without prevention, we will have problems in the future. But prevention is an essential part of our government's vision of health care, and that is the direction we are going to take as we move toward the next millenium.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain acts. To begin with, I feel I must remind my fellow citizens that health is a provincial jurisdiction.

Pursuant to subsections 92(7) and 92(16) of the Constitutional Act, 1867, and according to the way the courts have interpreted these provisions, it is clearly established and acknowledged that health and social services are exclusively a provincial jurisdiction.

Yet, federal interventions in matters of health are numerous and have been going on for a long time. As a matter of fact, since the beginning of this century, the federal government has passed the following acts concerning health: in 1919, the government established its own health department and gave its first grants: in 1948, the government launched a national health grants program; in 1957, it enacted the Hospital Insurance Act; in 1966, it enacted the Medical Care Act, and in 1984, the Canada Health Act which sets out the federal principles of the Canadian health system.

The Government of Quebec has always condemned the interventions of the federal government in matters of health. In 1926, the Taschereau government was the first to protest against federal interference in health issues. Since then, every Quebec government has done likewise.

As the years went by, all this intrusion by the federal government became increasingly expensive for the taxpayers of Canada and Quebec. Ottawa was able to be generous since it was paying its expenses with the provinces' money or with borrowed money. That is what put us all in debt.

I will remind members that, in World War II, the central government in Ottawa used the war effort as an excuse to encroach upon personal and corporation income taxes. Up to then, these taxes were collected exclusively by provinces. This supposedly temporary measure is still in effect today.

The federal government clearly gave in to the temptation to control more and more, without giving back to the provinces the tax powers they had before the war. It decided instead to grant subsidies, provided programs created by the Canadian government were implemented.

Such a control of tax revenues allowed the federal government to constantly centralize operations thereafter, which caused untold duplication and shameful waste of public funds. Worse still, to stay in office, several generations of federal politicians distributed gifts which created a burden of debt for future generations of Quebecers and Canadians.

At the present time, and despite the fact that it is clearly operating in a provincial area of jurisdiction, Health Canada looms large: its operating budget is more than $1 billion in 1995–96, while transfer payments to the provinces are $7 billion for the same year.

The federal government has never indicated that it intends to loosen its grip on the Canadian health system. Indeed, during the 1993 election campaign, the Liberal Party of Canada said in its red book, and I quote: "The role of the federal government should include the mobilization of effort to bring together Canada's wealth of talent and knowledge in the health care field.

This is a societal issue in which every Canadian has an interest. The federal government must provide the means to ensure that Canadians are involved and informed, and can understand the issues and the options".

For once, the Liberal Party kept its promise. On June 29, despite the opposition of all the Canadian provinces, the Minister of Health announced the establishment of the National Forum on Health. The mandate of this forum was, first, to develop a vision of what the Canadian health system would be in the 21st century; second, to promote dialogue among Canadians and Canada about the health system; and third, to define the priorities for the future.

Jean Rochon, the Quebec minister of health and social services, wrote to the federal health minister on October 14, 1994, to remind her of this:

> The mandate of this forum is an encroachment by the federal government in a field which essentially falls under provincial jurisdiction, and that is unacceptable. The clearly stated objective of your government, which is to give the forum a mandate to define future priorities, in the context of health care reform, and to define the means to that end, is a direct intrusion in provincial governments' affairs. This is something that cannot be hidden behind the consultative nature you ascribe to the recommendations that would come out of this forum.

Mr. Rochon further wrote that Quebec had not waited for federal leadership to adapt its health care system to today's needs and that he had already held major consultations with Quebec population.

The Quebec minister of health and social services reminded the federal minister that the cuts made in transfer payments to provinces with regard to health were not the best action a government could take to preserve and promote a health care system in Canada.

Those major cuts are a threat to the very principles advocated in the federal health act.

At the same time as the federal government was seeking to encroach on a provincial area of jurisdiction, it was unilaterally and drastically reducing its funding for health programs in the provinces of Canada.

In the spring of 1995, the National Council of Welfare, an organization whose role is to advise the health minister, warned her against such action and said: "It would be extremely hypocritical to reduce contributions to the provinces while raising the standards required of them".

But that is exactly what the government is doing right now. We should recall that when the finance department created the so–called EPF program providing transfers to provinces for welfare, health and post–secondary education, it was agreed that transfer payments would be indexed to the rate of growth of the Canadian economy.

Since 1986, however, the federal government has been cutting back constantly on those payments to reduce its deficit. It has been doing so unilaterally, without taking into consideration the provinces' capacity to pay. Between 1982 and 1995, it saved $8 billion on medicare alone, at the expense of Quebecers. Because of this shortfall, Quebec had to raise taxes to offset the federal withdrawal from funding.

A study by the C.D. Howe Institute has shown that, while spending for established programs financing remained stable between 1988 and 1992, other federal program spending rose by 25.5 per cent. In other words, the federal government told the provinces they should tighten their belts while it went on spending freely and increasing its deficit.

The lack of stability in the federal contribution to medicare is a serious problem. Payments are frozen, reduced, or deindexed at the whim of the finance minister and his financing requirements. There is no longer an agreed upon financing formula. The amounts are set unilaterally and arbitrarily by the federal government, irrespective of the real costs of the provincial programs.

This constant variation in funding, always downward, has become a nightmare for everyone involved in the health field.

What is more serious is that the Minister of Finance appears oblivious to the fact that he is playing not only with columns of figures but with the health of the men and women of Quebec and of Canada.

• (1625)

Last February, in his last budget, the Minister of Finance chose to once again reduce transfers to the provinces for health. As a result, Quebec will have to absorb a shortfall of $650 million for health and social services alone, in 1996–97, and 1.9 billion in 1997–98. One of the benefits of federalism, no doubt.

In the spring of 1995, the National Council of Welfare made the following comment on the planned cuts to funding Canada's health programs: "The projects announced in this budget—would have the probable consequence of bringing about the dismantling of a national system—of social services it took us a generation to build up".

The Minister of Health for British Columbia had the following to say about these cuts:

[English]

"Last February's budget which cut transfers to provinces for health—has forced provinces to look at unpalatable cuts that threaten medicare".

If the Canadian health system were really so dear to the heart of the Minister of Health for Canada, she would have followed the lead of her colleague from Notre–Dame–de–Grâce and opposed her government's last budget, which attacked social programs. She would have stood up at the cabinet meetings where these decisions were made, and would have held up against the Minister of Finance's figures the pressing needs of the Canadian people for quality health care. The Minister of Health could have suggested that the government seek its resources from the rich, with their numerous tax shelters, starting with the list of the generous bankrollers of the Liberal Party, and not forgetting the Minister of Finance's companies.

But that is not what she is doing. Today, she introduced a bill that perpetuates the federal government's control of health care, an area over which the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction. Paragraph (2)(a) and paragraph (2)(b) of clause 4 could easily be used by the federal government to interfere even more with the administration of health care in Canada.

The bill before the House today is hypocritical to the point that in clause 12 we read, and I quote:

> Nothing in this Act or the regulations authorizes the Minister or any officer or employee of the Department to exercise any jurisdiction or control over any health authority operating under the laws of any province.

When as a result of its budget cuts, the federal government drastically reduces funding for health care in the provinces, it affects the way authorities operating under the laws of a province function by reducing their capacity to maintain a level of services commensurate with the needs of the citizens of Quebec and Canada.

The Bloc Quebecois condemns this bill because it sanctions federal encroachment on provincial jurisdictions. Quebec has its priorities in the health care sector and should have the right to manage those priorities, in accordance with the present Constitution. This bill does not mention providing adequate and stable funding for health care. The minister has abdicated her responsibility in this respect and bowed to the imperatives of the Minister of Finance.

This bill constitutes an attack on the provinces while failing to deal with any of the pressing problems of the health care sector, so much so that even the most ardent federalists have decided to fight the initiatives of the Minister of Health.

The Ontario Health Minister, Conservative Jim Wilson, stated on September 19 that it was necessary to fight the federal government's insistence on dictating to the provinces its interpretation of the principles that should be the foundation of the health care system, and I quote:

[English]

"The federal government should be fought on principle for dictating its interpretation of medicare to the provinces".

[Translation]

That same day, Ralph Klein, the Conservative Premier of Alberta, also condemned the federal government's lack of flexibility, and I quote:

[English]

"Marleau—does not send a good signal to Quebec. It says there is no flexibility within the Confederation".

[Translation]

In a joint press release after a meeting of Health ministers, the provinces declared that the federal government's insistence on making unilateral decisions on health care funding, on interpreting standards or setting arbitrary deadlines for consultations was not helpful at all.

• (1630)

Since the federal government is unable to provide adequate safeguards for the health of Quebecers and Canadians, since continuing cuts are the main threat to the health of Quebecers and Canadians, the federal government should withdraw from the health care sector and transfer to the provinces the fiscal resources that would enable them to do the federal government's job far more successfully.

[English]

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I did enjoy the hon. member's comments. I wish I could speak fluently enough in the beautiful French language, but I must speak in English. I am not good enough yet to carry on detailed conversations in French.

In health care, the needs of the people of Quebec are the same as those of the people in my province of Nova Scotia. All of the provinces have serious deficit situations and we have had to begin dealing with deficit reduction. I remind the hon. member that the province of Quebec has not attempted to reduce its deficit as the other provinces have done. This is a major concern in dealing with health care.

Another variant which occurs in the health care system is that some provinces give credence to many health care needs. For example, some of the provinces consider cosmetic surgery part of the health care program. Through the years in Nova Scotia we have had more than basic coverage in programs such as dental care for children, an excellent program covering dental care up to the age of 16.

What has happened under the broad umbrella of health care is the provinces have added on things encompassing more than basic health care. They cannot afford them. We have heard recently that Quebec must close some 25 hospitals. This is not due to the federal government's cutbacks. This is due to the overspending and the additional encompassing programs which have come under health care.

What the federal government wants, and I ask the hon. member if this is not her desire too, is to preserve the health care programs for all Canadians as to basic needs, so that this is a very unifying factor for this country. Without the strong federalist approach to the health care needs, we will miss out.

[Translation]

Mrs. Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my colleague of a few things. First of all, I thank her for her question and comments. I wish to remind her that, between 1988 and 1992, established programs financing remained stagnant. Meanwhile, the federal government wasted money on other programs, resulting in a 25.5 per cent cost increase.

So when they tell me that we must cut because of the deficit, I say we must start by cutting waste in defence spending, among other things.

Mr. Milliken: Ah, yes. The same old tune.

Mrs. Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): Funding for health care programs remained stagnant from 1988 to 1992.

Mr. Milliken: You must calm down.

Mrs. Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): Let me speak, you, the hon. member across the way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I simply wish to remind my colleagues from both sides of the House that they must always address their comments to the Chair. I think that members would even then be able to express themselves as forcefully as they need to. They must, however, always remember to address their comments to the Chair.

Mrs. Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, fair enough, thank you for reminding me. Before saying what she said about Quebec, my colleague should get her facts straight. Quebec has made major changes to its health program.

• (1635)

Quebec may even have lost the referendum because of these. One of the reasons why we lost the referendum may be the Rochon reform. So we made major changes in the area of health. Of course, Quebec provides health services that are not available in other provinces. For example, women can have access to abortion if they want to; other provinces do not offer this service. We have moved toward ambulatory care and reduced hospitalization time considerably. We have closed hospitals. We have modified the functions performed and services provided by some hospitals; some day hospitals now provide long term care and inpatient services.

So before looking at what is happening in the neighbour's backyard, I would invite the hon. member to look at her own province where, on the eve of the referendum, the Minister of Finance said he would no longer be able to control his finances if Quebec separated from Canada.

[English]

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want first to make a few comments on the hon. member's speech and then ask her a question.

The hon. member gave us a wonderful history of what has happened since 1919. At the end of that history, the hon. member mentioned it culminated in what we now know as Canadian medicare, which I hasten to say was enacted by a Liberal prime minister.

That medicare we know benefits all Canadians, including Quebecers. It is also the envy of the world. Every single survey and study that has been done has shown that 89 per cent of Canadians in every province, including the province of Quebec, believe it is something they would like to keep. It is important to them as Canadians. It is the most important thing we can possess as a country. In fact medicare and this history lesson led to something which is very positive and which Canadians still hold very dearly.

I also want to speak about the member's comment on the encroachment of the national health forum on provincial jurisdictions.

The forum is made up of members from every province, including the province of Quebec. The forum is made up of members of the public. It is not made up of people from government.

Perhaps the member could tell me whether she believes that the Canadian government does not have the right to speak to Canadian people in every province, which is what the forum is doing. The forum is not changing anything; the forum is having a dialogue with ordinary Canadians. Can the Canadian government not speak with ordinary Canadians? Something we promised in our red book was the ability to speak and to get input from Canadians, from real people and not just from government.

The hon. member speaks of cuts and interference in provincial jurisdictions. Health Canada's authority with regard to the Canada Health Act and with regard to medicare is a contractual one. The Canadian government signs a contract with provinces to receive money from the federal government. In turn, those provinces agree to the conditions based on getting that money.

The provinces do not have to accept any conditions, but then they cannot also accept the money because on a contract both sides have an agreement. One side agrees to give money and the other side agrees to abide by certain terms. That is clearly what provinces do when they sign the contract.

Finally, the hon. member spoke of how cuts are affecting the provincial government's ability to provide services in Quebec. The Quebec government has a budget of $13.4 billion for health for 1995–96. That government made a cut of $565 million to its health care budget well before the federal government presented its cuts for 1996–97 within the Canada health transfers.

I ask the hon. member, why did her province's government make those cuts if it really needed money in the system? Why were there $565 million in cuts when the hon. member says that Quebec's health care system needs more money?

• (1640)

Mrs. Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): Still, Mr. Speaker, it is a sad day when you hear the kind of things we are hearing in this House. Attempts were made to convince the people of Quebec that there are no benefits to belonging to the Canadian confederation and, every day since we reconvened, evidence of a total lack of understanding of what is going on in this country has been building up. People are blind. Politicians are blind.

We are criticized, on the one hand, for not making cuts, and on the other hand, for making cuts too soon. I think that our government acted responsibly. An overhaul was required in the health care system, because funding cuts are expected. Shortfalls of $650 million one year and $1.9 billion the next year add up to nearly $2.5 billion over two years. It seems to me that the thing to do for a responsible government is to plan ahead. But where I find fault with this government across the way is when it decides to stop paying but wants to keep controlling everything anyway.

When I was young and lived at home, I lived by the rules my father had set because he was providing me with room and board. But when I moved into my own apartment and had my own money, I lived by my own rules.

When you stop paying, you lose the right to tell others what to do with their money. You have no right stealing a jurisdiction away from others and telling them: "Its is yours, but we can do what we want with it." So little sensitivity and understanding and so much arrogance, contempt and affront coming from you, Sir, is unacceptable, under the present circumstances. We have had it.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before proceeding with the debate on Bill C–95 I would simply ask colleagues in the House on both sides that we continue this debate in a respectful fashion. We had all hoped and set out to do that with great commitment when we first came to this House following the last federal election which brought us here together to this House of Commons in this 35th Parliament.

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am going to support Bill C–95. The Department of Health is very important. It is the department of drug certification, the department of product safety and the department of health act enforcement. It is the department of defence against disease, that common enemy of all Canadians.

From time to time hon. opposition members have criticized the Department of Health. They say it spends too much money. I say it is money wisely spent and not at all more than its responsibilities require. Consider the array of vital activity the Department of Health supports under its mission to help the people of Canada maintain and improve their health.

• (1645)

Health Canada plays a major role in protecting the health of Canadians. This House has been preoccupied with paring back for some time, but hon. members know very well that certain demands on the system will not go away simply because budgets are cut.

Health threats allow no fiscal restraint. It is a challenge of the Department of Health to maintain an infrastructure that guarantees quality health care to Canadians in good times as well as in bad.

More than 2,000 people work in the department to protect the health of Canadians by regulating goods and services mostly under the Food and Drugs Act, but also under the air and water legislation.

Health Canada has an environmental responsibility to manage chemical and radiological hazards. Each year a way must be found and the resources must be provided to review 1,000 new medical devices before they reach the market.

Health Canada prevents or regulates the sale and advertising of dangerous products and warns consumers about those in circulation. With everything else on their minds, people do not want to be worried about those details in their daily lives. The department helps take that worry away.

Product safety is part of the larger picture in maintaining health. Accidents in the home and at work are a major cause of death and disability between the ages of 5 and 35, causing not only the loss of enjoyment of life but economic loss and heavy medical and hospital expenses.

Each year thousands of field inspections, almost 3,000 last year, are carried out among food and drug establishments. Each inspection leads to an average of five analyses of food, drug and medical devices, some 14,000 last year. The department is responsible for the nutritional quality of food, for making sure that additives, agricultural chemicals and processing methods are safe.

In 1994 more than 77,000 tests of suspected illicit drugs were carried out. Health Canada administers the Narcotic Control Act. It also works to ensure that drug products which may be effective when used one way do not pose unacceptable risks in another way. All pharmaceuticals in use in Canada must be certified by the department. A revised drug certification renewal process is designed to improve protection of consumers and to increase their access to important new drugs.

Over the past year, investigations were conducted into 20 outbreaks of disease including TB, cholera, hepatitis B, hanta virus and the hamburger disease. We do not know enough yet about some emerging infections to be able to prevent or control them. Radio, television and the press report to Canadians every day on the gaps in our ability to track threats such as drug resistant bacteria and those surfacing viruses. The public is more knowledgeable than ever in history.

Health intelligence is shorthand for pooling awareness, information and understanding of health problems and approaches among various jurisdictions and health sector partners.

• (1650)

The Department of Health's laboratory centre for disease control is now strengthening Canada's health intelligence network. This initiative, which will include participation in a new global network designed to detect emerging diseases, is endorsed by the provincial governments. The provinces know that national leadership in this area is essential if we are to make the most cost effective choices among all available health technologies and options.

The path to the government's objective of getting more value for every dollar spent on health is paved by preventing illness before it starts and by promoting healthy living. Each dollar that goes to prevent ill health saves tens of hundreds of thousands of dollars in treatment costs.

Health intelligence is one of the tools used within the department to address perplexing and persistent issues, such as mental health, cancer, AIDS, family violence, heart and lung disease, and prenatal deprivation. The department supports research to determine what will enhance health. It then promotes these activities by education and awareness campaigns and by developing infrastructure and programs.

For instance, the department is at the penetrating point of a network of government programs for children. The clear understanding is that the future of children depends on critical input during the first year of life.

The government as a whole directs more than $15 billion annually to Canadian children and their families to support health and development. Health Canada provides a wide range of programs for children at risk of abuse or injury, social or physical diseases. This year its child development initiative includes a ground breaking childhood cancer information system and strategies to address children's mental health.

Hon. members have heard of the department's prenatal nutrition program to reduce the tragedy of infant disability due to poorly nourished mothers. This is a comprehensive effort that includes diet supplements as well as counselling in nutrition and lifestyle issues such as smoking, substance abuse, stress and family violence.

As we come to pass from one century to the next, we might reflect that when our great grandparents witnessed the last such passage, their average lifespan and that of their friends was many years less than ours. As recently as the 1930s the average lifespan of a Canadian male at birth was only 60 years. A baby boy born today can expect to live at least 25 per cent longer, the equivalent of an extra week per month, or 13 weeks annually, or 15 years of extra life. A female baby's longevity has been extended by 18 years.

Better nutrition, better housing, better working conditions, and better sanitation have been major contributing factors to our better health and longer lives. Also there are marvels of human ingenuity applied to the field of health. The cholera and typhus that assailed our ancestors was controlled. Our children were defended against smallpox, diptheria and polio by simple vaccination. We learned to deal pre–emptively with the ravages of syphilis and tuberculosis. In each we triumphed. We spared thousands of lives and prevented a huge loss to the productive capability of this nation. Billions of dollars have been saved in the cost of care.

The federal government spends many millions of dollars each year on health research and makes it available to all provinces, all hospitals and all doctors throughout Canada. The outcome of this research saves the lives of Canadians.

The unfortunate reality is that illness still exists. Diseases afflict us unpredictably and haphazardly. Most illnesses, especially the major ones, are blind accidents. We are only able to deal with them after they have made an appearance. We must use the methods of medical care for this.

In Canada fortunately, disease is not made twice tragic by having a sick person bear the cost of the treatment. Expenses are paid in full by Canada's comprehensive and universal medical insurance programs which pay family physician and specialist fees as well as the charges for tests, radiotherapy, chemotherapy, surgery and hospitalization, any or all that are required. This system is a source of deep national pride.

Patients in some provinces were asked to pay the difference between what health care providers were charging and what their provincial health plan would pay. This practice became known as user charges. As well, some doctors were billing patients over and above the provincially approved rates. Extra billing and user fees were a serious threat to our national medicare system.

To stop this erosion the Liberal government of the day instituted the Canada Health Act in 1984. This established in law the five principles on which the system remains supported. Everyone is covered for all medical necessities. Access to care is on an equal basis. Coverage is portable among provinces. Administration and payments are handled by the public sector. It is this act which still governs the health care system that has evolved in Canada and which is the best health care system in the world.

It is the Department of Health that administers and enforces this act, this cornerstone of Canadian cohesion. It is this bill, Bill C–95, that positions the department even more surely to discharge its responsibilities so essential to our national interest. It is therefore my intention to vote for its passage which I trust will be swift.

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the member's speech. At one point in his speech he made the comment that sickness in Canada is not made tragic because the system pays for everything. I would like to tell a short story and ask a question of the member about that very aspect.

In 1989 a man I know noticed some blood in his stool so he went along to the doctor. The doctor said it looked pretty serious and that he would have to book the man in to see a specialist. It was going to take six weeks to see the specialist in Vancouver. That is not uncommon. Anybody who has been to a doctor and has had to go to a specialist knows that sort of waiting list is common in Canada. The man said to the doctor: "I am not prepared to wait six weeks for something that could be life or death. Give me the name of someone I can see in the United States because when it comes to life and death, I am prepared to pay".

The doctor said he would see what strings he could pull. The doctor pulled some strings and voilà, in two days the man suddenly received attention. It was not because it was fair that he jumped to the front of the line but because he made a lot of noise about it. He visits the specialist and the specialist says: "You really need an MRI to determine exactly the extent of the problem. It is going to take 10 weeks to get you an MRI at St. Paul's Hospital in Vancouver because there is not enough money to run it. It can only do five scans a day and only one of those is for anything other than cranial scans". If one has a cat that is sick they can take it to the MRI after hours and it can be scanned. A person can pay for their cat to be scanned but they cannot pay.

This person said: "I'm not prepared to wait 10 weeks for an MRI. Give me the name of a place in the United States". The doctor said: "Okay, if you go down to Bellingham, St. Joseph's Hospital can do it for you. Let me call and make the arrangements". He called up and the man was offered an appointment the very next day, not 10 weeks, the very next day.

The man decided it was a little inconvenient the next day so went two days later. He was treated like a client, not a number. He was shown into the hospital. He was not even asked whether he could pay or not.

I know this is the truth because it was me. The man was not even asked if he could pay. He was invited into the hospital. He had his test. He had the MRI. The doctor said to him: "If you will have lunch and a cup of coffee, in two hours come back and we will have the report written up and all the pictures for you".

I had my entire tests done and was back in Vancouver in four hours with the results that would have taken 10 weeks.

The worse thing about that whole exercise was when everything had been done, and I had been given the package, they said: "How are you going to pay for this?" I had to pay $1,000 U.S. to St. Joseph's Hospital in Bellingham when I would rather have paid it to St. Paul's Hospital in Vancouver.

What sort of a stupid system is this? This is not rich and poor. It is life and death.

When the member says that the Canadian system does not make sickness tragic he should think a bit more about real cases. It is real. Luckily I had the choice to go across the border and pay $1,000 U.S. to save my life. The sick, despicable system that the government continues to support would have resulted in my death because of the waiting lists and no choice.

All that the Reform Party wants in the health care system is choice. That is all it is. It is not to deprive anybody of anything. If I had been able to spend that $1,000 at St. Paul's Hospital in Vancouver I would have subsidized an MRI for somebody else who could not afford to pay. That is the principle.

That is why the eye clinics in Alberta work so well. That is why the waiting lists are down. The people who have a little extra money and are prepared to go some other place reduce the waiting lists.

I would like to hear the member's comments about that and why he would support a system that would have resulted in my death.

Mr. Culbert: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to attempt to reply to the hon. member's statement and possibly a question.

He called the greatest health care system in the world, that is admired by citizens in every country throughout the world, a stupid system. Yet it is based on not how many dollars you have got in your pocket, but on need.

The hon. member did not go on. I see him moving out now—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I would like to remind colleagues that we are not to refer, reflect or certainly not mention the absence of any member in the Chamber at any time.

Mr. Culbert: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for reminding me of that. It is a usual courtesy that when one asks a question to wait around and hear the answer.

I am amazed that the hon. member would prefer the system of our good friends in the United States where there are literally millions of people who have no health care. We have all heard the horror stories of their losing a lifetime of savings, losing their homes as a result of a health problem some time during their lives. I am sure the hon. member was not suggesting that we should look at that type of system for Canada.

The principles that were put in place were put there to protect the health care of all Canadians so that all Canadians would be treated equally.

I would suggest to the hon. member that if his situation, to which he referred, was an emergency situation, most hospitals that I have been involved with over the years—I served on a hospital board for some 15 years—always set aside time both in their outpatients, in their emergency rooms and in their OR for emergency situations. They also schedule those selective procedures that have to be done. Some may be in day surgery, some may be a little more serious and take more time.

The world is not perfect in each and every hospital, but in the situation the hon. member describes that certainly his doctor—I am not being critical of his doctor—should have interceded on his behalf if indeed it were an emergency situation and obtained the OR time or the day surgery time and made sure that it was scheduled. There was some responsibility there.

We have the greatest health care system in the world. We see this on a daily basis. However, there is always room for improvement, which is exactly what we are doing. We are trying to work with the provinces to avoid those areas of duplication and to assist in putting together a better program.

The provincial health care ministers are trying to develop a better program that will continue to evolve and improve in order to make it even better than it is today. I suggest that it takes all the health care practitioners working to improve the program and maintain those principles who have made the health care program in Canada envied throughout the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We have approximately two minutes left in the question and comment period. I would ask the hon. member for his co–operation that I might also give the member for Carleton—Charlotte equal time to respond.

Mr. White (North Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I will give him time to respond. I thank him for giving me the opportunity to say that no, I do not support a United States style health care system. Neither does anyone else in the Reform Party.

Reform members have made it very clear that we support medicare plus which is a lot different. Sweden uses a similar system. I can also give an example from New Zealand of my 82–year old mother who needed a cataract operation. The waiting list in the public system was years. If a person is 82 and has to wait six years, then what? Since there is a choice down there she paid a couple of thousand dollars to have one of her eyes done. So many seniors did the same thing that the waiting list came down. When she went for her second operation she had it done within the public system and it only took two weeks. The waiting list vanished within a very short period of time.

We do not support a U.S. system. We support choice in addition to the present medicare, common sense.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank the hon. member for his co–operation. I would ask the same from the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte.

Mr. Culbert: Mr. Speaker, indeed I will respect your wishes. I am pleased to hear that the hon. member and his colleagues support the health care system we have in Canada. I cannot speak at great length about the system that might be in place in New Zealand to which I believe he referred. I do not have any expertise in that area so I will not refer to that part.

However, I do know, and I have seen it personally over many years, of the benefits of the medicare system in our country. Yes, we can improve it. Yes, we should continue to work toward improving it and making it even better. It is a system that has been admired throughout the world and we should continue to promote and protect it for years to come.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, before I begin I would like to commend my hon. colleague from North Vancouver because he laid bare in the House a personal health care matter. I say to the people across the way who have been heckling him that if he had not gone down to the United States he would be dead today. It is a very real example of how our health care system failed him as it fails other Canadians from coast to coast. The reason why he was able to have a life saving operation in the United States was that he had the money. That is what the government is preserving today. It is preserving a system that enables the rich to get better health care than the poor.

Today we are dealing with Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health. It is a housekeeping bill, a bill of wordsmithing, a bill that changes words, a bill that does not have anything to do with devolution of powers, nothing to do with personnel changes, nothing to do with any vision to save health care in this country; health care I might add that is in critical condition and needs emergency help.

It is profoundly tragic that we have this bill in front of us. In the last two years the Minister of Health has yet to put a single piece of legislation on the table to amend and improve health care for Canadians, Bill C–7 notwithstanding, which did not come from her department but came from another source.

The minister keeps on saying that we do not have a problem, that we are moving toward reorganization. She claims that Reform members are in favour of a system that prevents access for the poor. The problem is access. Canadians are not getting access to essential health care services from coast to coast. That is the problem. The government is defending a health care system that is crumbling from within.

I will give a little background. When the Canada Health Act was written in 1984, the people who wrote it with very noble intentions simply could not envision the increasing costs, the increasing demands and the changing demographics of an aging population. That was not envisioned. Today we are using a health act organized over a decade ago to deal with problems that did not exist then. Therefore we see the failure that the Canada Health Act has in trying to address the problems that we have today.

If we continue to pursue the course we are on now we will not have a health care system in this country. We will only see people suffering to varying degrees. Those who will suffer the most are those who are the poorest. I will give an example.

Operating rooms are closing across the country. They are closing because hospitals have to save costs. However, waiting lists are increasing. In the hospital in British Columbia where I worked patients decided to have their own blood transfused and banked for operations in case they needed it. It cost the patient $125. The Minister of Health in British Columbia, Mr. Ramsey said: "No, you can't do that because it contravenes the Canada Health Act". One month later we had an acute blood shortage in British Columbia.

I had patients with fractured hips, bleeding to death, with low haemoglobins and no blood was available. If the province had allowed the autologous blood transfusions we would not have had that problem. Is that access? I hardly think so.

In Victoria the wait for radiation therapy for prostate cancer is 16 months. What happens? Patients are sent down to Washington state where an entire industry has grown to serve Canadians. Is that Canadian access?

People with carpal disorder in the wrists have to wait six months before they have surgery. They are off work six months. This surgery could be done in a private clinic within two weeks. Is that access?

Imagine one of your grandparents needs a hip transplant, Mr. Speaker, and is in severe pain. If they live in British Columbia, 40 per cent will wait over 13 months to get that hip replaced and all of that time they are in pain. Is that access? Not at all.

The health care system is falling apart. To get around this, those who are rich go down to the United States for their health care needs. The politicians in this government say that the Canada Health Act is sacrosanct. They say: "We the government are defenders of the health care for all Canadians because we want to ensure that they have access, because we don't want those terrible Reformers amending the Canada Health Act and having an American style system that enables only the rich to have access while the poor suffer". That is the complete opposite to what we have.

My colleagues and I never got involved in this matter to destroy health care. We saw the suffering occurring in emergency rooms in hospitals across the country. We got involved to save health care. We recognize there is a problem. We do not want to destroy health care. We got involved to amend the Canada Health Act to ensure that all Canadians, regardless of income, have their health care services performed in a timely fashion. My colleagues and I have given examples to indicate that is simply not occurring.

We have proposed a system that would amend the Canada Health Act to allow for private clinics. Basically people could pay money to a private clinic for health care services. Not a single penny of the taxpayers' money would go into the system. Is it an unequal system? Yes, it is. However, is it not better to have an unequal system with better access for all people than the relatively similar access we have today that provides for declining access for all Canadians. In the present system the rich can go to the United States for their health care services while those in Canada suffer and die.

In Toronto, where I trained, the waiting list for coronary artery bypass grafting is seven months. People are dying waiting for bypass surgery. I know a similar example happened in 1986 when I was finishing my training in British Columbia where men and women in their fifties were dying waiting for bypass surgery in Vancouver. That is not access.

We have declining funds and increasing demands, but caught in the middle is the most important element of all, the patients who are sick, scared and worried. Their families are worried and scared. At a time of their greatest need our health care system may fail them. That is not what we want. That is not what Canadians want. That is not what the government wants. That is certainly not what the Reform Party wants.

I implore the Minister of Health and the government to stop the political rhetoric. Let us move away from political postering. Let us work together to build a new Canada Health Act that enables all Canadians from coast to coast to obtain their health care services in a timely fashion. We want to protect medicare, not destroy it.

We cannot sacrifice, as my hon. colleague from Macleod said, the most important social program we have today, the health care system. We simply cannot let that program, which is a defining characteristic of Canada, disappear. We must preserve it because it is the most valuable thing each and every one of us have as individuals.

As an aside I ask the hon. minister to look at some interesting work being done by one of the greatest minds in the country, Dr. Fraser Mustard. In Toronto he looked at the determinants of health care. He has a new vision with respect to health care. The determinants of health care are somewhat different from what we have seen in the past. A investment in the early development of children will pay Canadian society in many aspects in the long run.

I implore the minister to look at the work this man has done because it is ground breaking and something we can incorporate federally and provincially into the health care programs that exist today.

The government also needs a fiscal plan. As we unfortunately saw about six weeks ago, the IMF downgraded us by 50 per cent, saying very clearly to the Minister of Finance that if we do not get a plan to decrease the debt Canada would be in very serious and dire straits. We can read into it that our social programs will be in dire straits. Nobody in the House wants to see that. We want to preserve them in a financially sustainable fashion. Health care will suffer the same blows as all other social programs. Unfortunately sick people are the ones who will suffer.

I implore the hon. Minister of Health to speak to the Minister of Finance and other cabinet ministers to look at our zero in three plan and utilize aspects of it to put our fiscal house in order.

One of my colleagues said today that rather than amending the Canada Health Act we need to look to preventive measures. That is all well and true. However, will prevention lower taxes on tobacco? Is prevention cutting the tobacco reduction strategy by 50 per cent? Is prevention putting legislation programs and plans in place that are actually increasing tobacco consumption, especially among the youth, by 10 per cent or 15 per cent.

Mr. Thompson: Liberal prevention.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): That is right. The government is talking prevention out of one side of its mouth. On the other hand it is causing hundreds of thousands of youths to take up tobacco smoking and will cause between 40,000 and 200,000 premature deaths over the next 20 or 30 years. That is not prevention.

If the government had enacted sensible solutions with respect to tobacco, we could accept it and work with it. I cannot accept talking about prevention on the one hand as a solution to health care problems, while on the other hand lowering tobacco taxes and decreasing the tobacco reduction strategy. That simply does not make sense.

I implore the government to work with us to amend the Canada Health Act so that medicare can provide essential services to Canadians from coast to coast. It must also realize that we have a problem. Pedantic statements about preventive health care, saying that somehow we will build greater efficiencies into the system and quoting laparoscopic surgery as the panacea for health care cost control will not work. It will take more radical, thoughtful, sensitive changes for all Canadians to have their health care needs met.

It disturbs me greatly that members of the House across the way accuse us of wanting an American style health care system. They accuse us of saying that what is in our pockets when we need health care services is what matters. We deplore that. It is anathema to us and we will fight against those types of attitudes every way we can. In my estimation as a physician we are the only party in the House putting forward a plan to save not only health care but all our social programs.

If we can put aside the political rhetoric and work together to build strong and sustainable health care and social programs, we can build a better country for all Canadians. We are building the country for Canadians from coast to coast. We are particularly preserving health care programs for those most in need.

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting here all day; there is nothing closer to my heart than work and health care.

I was fortunate at 12.30 today to listen to the great American fighter, Ralph Nader, talk about health care to the nurses association. He said that in the United States of America some 80,000 people died in hospital due to malpractice. That is more people than those killed by accidents and those killed by homicides. His contention was that it was malpractice and that some doctors in their system were actually operating on Americans who had no disease at all.

We hear a lot about systems in the world. Mr. Nader said, and I think the parliamentary secretary from Vancouver Centre said it as well, that our system rates between one and three in the world. There is no question about that. Mr. Nader also mentioned that some 38 million Americans do not have any health care. He said the longest waiting line in the world is for those with no health care at all.

Our friends opposite talk about having a two tier system. I want to cover that point. We have a $72 billion pot of money. What happens if we start to shift the money over? Profit will motivate many people such as insurance companies. Most doctors are very good. I would not say anything against them because many of my friends are doctors. They follow the Hippocratic oath. They are well versed, Christian and want to help people. However, there is the occasional doctor who looks at the balance sheet.

I got a pile of books from a friend in Los Angeles on their medicare system. They talk about waiting lines as if there is a panacea in the United States. There are many scam artists in the United States. They go for capitation. If five doctors each have 1,500 patients and each patient pays about $200 a month, it amounts to a pile of money. A patient can select one of the five doctors. However if the doctor sends too many people for CAT scans and various other expensive procedures he is called before a procedure committee and the patients are stacked up.

There are no easy answers. Our system is good. It needs to be fixed. We cannot legislate against stupidity or when people do not do things right. If there is a waiting line for hip fractures I am sure the hospital board will allocate enough resources to shorten the line.

How does my friend from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca envisage this two tier system? When people are sick and cannot pay for services we end up with a two tier system. The doctor says he will see the patient in the clinic across the street at night because there is not enough money in the system. That is what happens in a two tier system.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member raised a couple of points. He illustrated the salient misunderstanding of health care on the part of the government.

He spoke about taking part of the $72 billion and putting it into a private clinic system. That is what we are opposed to. Not a single penny of public moneys, not a single penny of taxpayers' dollars, will go into a private system.

When people are in the private system they have actually left the public system and are spending their own money. They are still contributing through their taxes to the public system and therefore the pot of money in the public system will be preserved.

Because the numbers of people on waiting lists in the public system will decrease there will be a greater amount of money on a per capita basis in the public system, which will provide for greater access and better equipment.

Another point the member raised was that if hospitals saw an urgent need for something they would find the resources or the money. The problem is that they do not have the resources. They are rationing all manner of services and are not getting access together. We have an opportunity not to duplicate any other system in the world but to enable an excellent system to continue to be excellent. We can do that by making the changes necessary to preserve publicly funded medicare in this country through amendments to the Canada Health Act. If we do not do that, we will not have a health act in this country. We will not have publicly funded health care access to people in this country in a timely fashion. That is going to be the tragedy if we continue on our present course.

The Speaker: My colleagues, it being 5.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

"ON TO OTTAWA" TREK

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government, on this 60th anniversary of the "On to Ottawa" Trek, should offer an unequivocal and official apology for the government of the day having perpetuated the following:

(1) having caused, through the use of violence as administered by the combined police forces of the Regina City Police and the RCMP the termination of the trek in Regina, Saskatchewan on July 1, 1935, with attendant loss of life, injury and imprisonment;

(2) having contributed to, rather than detracted from the plight of the unemployed by:

(a) forcing many unemployed young men into work camps,

(b) having prevented all the trekkers from coming to Ottawa to express their democratic right for better conditions in the work camps,

(c) abrogating its responsibility of providing the necessary leadership in a time of high unemployment which would have created decent and rewarding full time employment;

(3) displaying a total lack of policy initiatives which would have provided meaningful work and wages for the unemployed, and for the violent attack on the participants of the "On to Ottawa" trek.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I have this opportunity to present the motion in the House today. This year marks the 60th anniversary of the "On to Ottawa" trek. This motion calls for an apology, which is 60 years overdue.

In Regina we have an historic marker set in front of the Regina city police station. On it appears the following:

At 8.17 p.m. July 1, 1935, rioting erupted here in Market Square when RCMP and city police arrested the "On to Ottawa" trek leaders as they addressed trekkers and city residents. Rioting then spread to the 11th Avenue and Scarth Street area. Ending near midnight, it left extensive property damage, numerous injuries, and a city policeman, Detective C. Millar, dead.

The trekkers were single men en route to Ottawa from B.C. to demand better conditions in relief work camps set up for the unemployed. They were stopped in Regina on June 14 by the federal authorities, who feared a revolution if the trek reached Ottawa. At a meeting between trek leaders and the federal cabinet, mistrust grew, and trekkers were prohibited from advancing or going home. To break the deadlock, Ottawa ordered the leaders' arrest. In the furor of the resulting riot, the frustration of the trek's failure and years of unemployment were released.

The next day the provincial government arranged for the trekkers to return to their homes.

Signed by the Government of Saskatchewan in 1979, the text on this marker refers to the tragic events known as the Regina riot. The text is short and temperate and barely explains why the provincial government signed an epitaph commemorating a riot. I will attempt to do that.

Facts will show that the riot was planned and provoked not by the trekkers but by the police on direct orders of the federal government, which in so doing illegally usurped the authority of the provincial government, which was in the process of negotiating a settlement with the trekkers.

The riot was the climax of a strike of the relief camp workers begun on April 4, 1935, in British Columbia. With a set of demands adopted at a meeting of the relief camp workers' union in Kamloops on March 10, 1935, the strikers stayed for two months in Vancouver and then started east to Ottawa to put their grievances before the government of Prime Minister R.B. Bennett.

Before arriving in Regina, the trek's ranks were augmented with new recruits. By the time the trekkers reached Regina the numbers had swelled to 2,000. Unbeknownst to the trekkers and the Saskatchewan government, Regina was their ultimate destination, not Ottawa.

Having stopped them in Regina, Prime Minister Bennett arranged to meet with a few representatives. He obviously did not want the entire trek to arrive in Ottawa, with however many more who would have joined along the way.

Unfortunately the meeting with the Prime Minister was unproductive. Bennett offered a temporary camp near Lumsden, Saskatchewan, where the trekkers would go until arrangements were made to return them to the permanent camps and the same inhumane conditions they had left. All along the only option the federal government was prepared to give the trekkers was no option. The status quo is the operative word.

When the trekkers' representatives returned to Regina from Ottawa, they attempted to undo the deadlock the Prime Minister's offer had presented by developing a revised proposal. They worked diligently to set up meetings with all the authorities. The trek leaders also decided to hold a public meeting to inform the citizens of the result of their meeting with the Prime Minister. Posters went up, and it was known that only a few trekkers would attend the rally.

Early in the morning on July 1, the trek leaders initiated negotiations with both the federal and the provincial governments in the hope of obtaining an agreement for an early withdrawal. One of the trek leaders, Arthur Evans, requested a meeting of federal, provincial, and trek representatives. The chief federal representative in Regina refused to meet with provincial officials but agreed to meet with the trek representatives at 10.30 a.m.

At this stage federal officials in Ottawa refused an excellent opportunity to reach a peaceful compromise. They refused any compromise whatsoever. However the trek leaders did not give up. They went to Liberal Saskatchewan Premier Jimmy Gardiner, who promised them a reply the following morning. The premier had arranged for a cabinet meeting that evening.

The fact is, when the trekkers were conferring with Gardiner the federal government was preparing warrants and strategy for the arrests of Evans and six other leaders of the trek. At the public rally that evening a crowd of 2,200 had gathered to hear a report of the trekkers' delegation to Ottawa. In this crowd there were no more than 300 trekkers, as most had already been informed and were slated to attend a ball game elsewhere. In other words, it was a known fact that the meeting was for citizens rather than trekkers.

Why the choice was made to arrest the leaders in front of a mass meeting of their supporters raises serious questions. Why they did not wait until after the meeting, after the crowd had left, to make the arrests has never been fully explained. However, it does not take a rocket scientist to understand that it was the nature of the arrangements and the means by which the police carried them out that provoked the Regina riot. A more discreet and less provocative arrangement could have been devised and the arrests could still have been carried out successfully.

The riot that resulted from this action left plainclothes detective Charles Millar of Regina city police dead, scores of trekkers, citizens and policemen injured, and several trekkers and Regina citizens hospitalized with gunshot wounds. Downtown Regina was left in a shambles.

The riot began as the Premier of Saskatchewan and the provincial authorities were considering the trekkers' proposals. The provincial government had not been informed of police intentions. Premier Gardiner wired the Prime Minister late that night, both protesting the police action and offering to disband the trek under provincial auspices. It is not difficult to understand how this marked the beginning of a dispute between the federal and provincial authorities. Gardiner was fearful that the intransigent federal attitude would lead to a resumption of hostilities and he demanded the federal authorities take a more reasonable position.

The federal government had taken over provincial jurisdictions, starting with control of the RCMP, which had moved to organize the Regina city and railway police forces. Preparing for a showdown, the federal government also moved into other provincial areas, namely transportation, blocking the trekkers from access to roads and allowing them to leave only if they agreed to go to the camp near Lumsden.

The federal authorities had obviously taken it upon themselves to instruct the RCMP in Saskatchewan in the enforcement of the ordinary criminal law and not merely in matters under the Railway Act. This represented another violation of provincial jurisdiction.

Based on the exchange between the Bennett and the Gardiner governments, it is more than fair to say that the Premier of Saskatchewan placed the responsibility for the tragic end to the trek in Regina squarely on the shoulders of the federal government of the day. The premier was not by any means alone in believing that.

Ten years ago, on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the "On to Ottawa" trek, I presented a similar motion in the House. At that time I had the benevolent support of one of our colleagues who now sits on the other side of the House. She said: "We should say that we are sorry. While it may not mean much in terms of individual compensation for the agony suffered by those people who lived through the Depression, it would certainly be a first step on the road to clearing the record". This is quoted from the Commons debate of October 7, 1985, when the present Deputy Prime Minister supported an official apology to the trekkers and the citizens of Regina.

She also stated: "And we, both as members and as the government, should apologize to the unemployed workers who were forced to take to the streets to seek their own rights, which they should have been given by the Prime Minister at the time, who abdicated his responsibilities in this respect".

Like our colleague in 1985, I now challenge the government to listen and redress this pivotal event in our Canadian heritage. I want to believe this government is different from the previous one. History need not repeat itself once again.

Ten years ago the Deputy Prime Minister and member for Hamilton East accused the Mulroney government of taking the same attitude as the Bennett government of taking a hands off approach to solving the unemployment crisis. She said: "It does not want to be involved in the creation of jobs because somehow Conservative governments see something distasteful in direct government job creation. In fact, the Bennett solution at that time was to send the workers off to work camps, where they lived in intolerable circumstances and in fact were not ever able to have the dignity of a democratic election in those particular camps".

The tables have turned. The hon. member now sits in power, where she can actually do something to ensure there is not only democracy but also employment, social justice, and a future for our young people.

This government started its term with job creation and the infrastructure program, but something terribly wrong has happened. This government has been hijacked by some group with another agenda.

The motion I have placed before the House might merely be regarded as a footnote in history were it not for the fact that history has a tendency to repeat itself. Since this year's budget, instead of jobs we got cutbacks and massive decreases in provincial transfers. Jobs, we are told, are not for the governments to create; they will appear out of market forces—as if Prime Minister Bennett has been resurrected one more time.

By leaving the provinces in the lurch, some of the provincial leaders are quickly turning the country's clock back to the 1930s. The present government still has an opportunity to make good on its election promises and the hope they offered. The federal government does not need to starve the provinces by abandoning its responsibility to the people. The deficit reduction plan does not need to be inhuman.

I agree with the endorsement from the member for Hamilton East of my 1985 motion, when in reference to the apology she suggested that "that act of good faith and goodwill on the part of the government would begin to restore the credibility this government has lost in insisting upon measures that are anti–worker, anti–family, anti–labour, and anti–union. Work must be done or the government's word cannot be believed. Now is the chance for the government to win back some of the credibility it has frittered away since"—to which I add, the end of October 1993.

Let this government show us that it is not just another job eliminator party. The Liberal government has its chance to stand up and finally set the record straight by making to these people, the strikers, a general, all–encompassing public apology.

The Deputy Prime Minister further stated 10 years ago: "If it"—meaning the Mulroney government—"is truly sincere about beginning to gain back the confidence of young working people, young unemployed people, older working people, and older unemployed people to realize that the time has come for it to endorse an all–party resolution which calls for an apology to redress an event which occurred 50 years ago and which is indicative of the type of Conservative mentality which has led all Canadians to realize that Tory times are tough times".

The sad fact of the matter is that history, as I have just outlined, is in many ways and places across the country repeating itself. Many of the problems for which the trekkers sought solutions in the 1930s have returned in spades in the 1980s and continue in the 1990s. Once again we have massive unemployment. Once again we are faced with widespread business failures, farm foreclosures, personal bankruptcies, food banks, user fees, head taxes, and policies that are reminiscent of an era we had hoped to have surpassed.

The political repercussions and the legacy of the trek have a lot of parallels with today's environment. The National Council of Welfare's 1995 report on the last government budget states: "The policies of the 1990s will take us back to the 1950s". Recent statements and actions from at least two provincial governments would confirm that. In a 1987 article in the Canadian Review of Social Policy by Duncan Rogers, a former deputy minister of the Alberta Social Services described the 1950s period as "the remnants of the old relief days of the 1930s". He goes on: "It was not uncommon for children, particularly from larger families, to be apprehended as neglected and become wards of the crown simply because there was insufficient money available to the family".

The Liberal government is often accused of continuing the Tory legacy, while at the same time promising initiatives which will create jobs and opportunities for all Canadians. With nearly 10 per cent of our population unemployed, unemployment has become a chronic condition. Youth under employed is still worse, at 18 per cent. The rate for Canadians aged 15 to 24 years is nearly double the national average and costs the economy at least $4.5 billion per year.

However, that is not the dearest price we are paying. Canada now has the third highest rate of teen suicide in the world, which has increased fourfold since 1960. The social and economic conditions under which kids are living are creating a social phenomena described as existential despair. Is that the best country the world?

Will more jails and longer sentences deter the problems? They will do nothing if there is no hope for a future that brings rewards and fulfilment.

I acknowledge the tremendous financial debt this country and the public sector faces due to the gross mismanagement of previous governments. I acknowledge the challenge that lies ahead for all of us to begin to solve our financial problems. Surely we must find ways of dealing with our problems other than on the backs of the old and the poor.

As a Stats Canada study has shown, it is not increases in government expenditure that has created the debt. In fact, only 6 per cent of the debt is due to increases in public expenditure. The rest is due to loss of revenue and increases in interest rate payments. Of that 6 per cent increase in government expenditures, only 2 per cent is due to increases in social programs.

It is not the social programs which have created our debt. Yet it is our social programs that are paying for it. It is the cutbacks in health services, in unemployment insurance, programs to help train and create jobs for young people. That is where the burden is being placed to rectify the terrible, physical mistakes that past Conservative and Liberal governments have made.

We are in a period of declining standards of living. Recently, Stats Canada issued a report that in 1993 the average family income in Canada declined by some 3 per cent, inflation factored in. The decline for single parent families in that one year was 8.3 per cent. We are in a downward spiral.

New challenging solutions are needed, but the solutions of R.B. Bennett did not work then and will not work now. I challenge the government to come forward with new imaginative proposals to give hope to our young people, to give employment to our young people and to give young people a future.

I urge the House to adopt the motion to extend an apology for how those strikers were treated in 1935 in Regina some 60 years ago. They wanted to come to Ottawa to express their hope for a new future, to express their desire to work. They did not want welfare. They did not want the dole, they wanted jobs. Today the mass of unemployed young people are looking for work. They do not want handouts, they want a future.

I urge the House to adopt the motion as a symbolic gesture to our young people that we are concerned about their future.

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the motion of the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle concerning the 1935 "On to Ottawa" trek and the Regina riot.

The hon. member's motion recalls a time and place far removed from the Canada of today. It was the time of the Great Depression, a time of staggering unemployment, prolonged and terrible drought and the near collapse of national economies. There were shrinking markets and falling prices, all of which contributed to human misery and hardship on a scale seldom seen before in North America.

This was a time when a woman working in a textile factory in Quebec could work a 60–hour week and earn only $5. The millions of acres of prairie wheat fields were turned into dust bowls and farmers walked away from family farms they had worked all their lives.

In 1929 when the depression began there were 107,000 unemployed in Canada. By 1933, the worst year of the depression, there were 646,000 unemployed, approximately one–quarter of the Canadian work force at that time.

The response of the Bennett government to the depression for younger men was to organize work camps. These work camps were organized under the Department of National Defence. The workers within them were paid 20 cents a day. This was an early and very harsh form of workfare.

Conditions in the camps were well described by the member for Qu'Appelle. They were camps in which work was done for the sake of doing work. "We are playing at highway building", reported the striker in his diary. "What a joke we are. We make a ditch one day and then change the plans and find that it is in the wrong place". A public servant for the Conservative government: "Not one cent of public money has been spent on reading material and recreational equipment".

The member has performed a service in drawing to our attention the consequences of this kind of attitude toward the unemployed and the consequences of using work camps, workfare or whatever to deal with the unemployed.

One of the workers wrote at the time: "It is really the fact that we are getting nowhere in the plan of life that moves us forward to march to Ottawa. We are truly a lost legion of youth rotting away for want of being offered a sane outlet for our energies".

The work camps were organized in B.C., it must be said, largely by communist workers. The workers organized for the trek to Ottawa and by the time they got to Regina in June of 1935 there were 12,000 workers. The Liberal premier of the province, Premier Gardiner, protested that the government of the day had decided to stop the workers there. Prime Minister Bennett met with the workers. The reply he gave them was very harsh and indeed he would not even let them talk.

On July 1 unfolded the tragedy that has been described by the member opposite. One policeman died and we mourn his memory. Dozens of policemen and others, workers obviously, were injured. It is a black mark in the history of the depression. It is a black mark in the history of the city of Regina as well.

The hon. member's motion suggests that the Conservative government of the day bears much of the responsibility for what took place in Regina and the judgment of history. The judgment of history in this case does largely bear out the hon. member's claim. I might add that during the depression solutions were not easy. Many kinds of solutions were made in various countries. The new deal in the United States was a very successful response to the depression but one that was thought to be authoritarian by many others.

There were responses. In Italy Mussolini responded by making the trains run on time but also causing wars in places as far away as Abyssinia and responses in Germany where public works projects did create jobs.

The party that the hon. member represents, the CCF, was formed during the 1930s and it sought solutions too. I quote from the Regina manifesto which called for complete social ownership and public management of the Canadian economy. It stated: "All financial machinery, transportation, communications, electric power and all other industry and services essential to social planning should be nationalized and operated by the state; furthermore there be no compensation for bankrupt private concerns for the benefit of promoters and for stock and bond holders".

That is not the stand of his party today obviously. I mention this only because we have to give credit to people's views and their times and not to support R.B. Bennett's decision on that day in this particular case. However we can recognize that for us to judge today what they thought then reflects the judgment of a later day. We cannot, except in exceptional circumstances, apologize for history. The only people who can apologize for what took place in Regina, July 1, 1935 are the people who made the fateful decisions that precipitated the riot and they are dead.

To apologize for the actions of a government in 1935 would be a well meant but futile gesture. If we cannot change history we can learn from it and we can look at the past wrongs through actions today.

If you look at the demands of the strikers in 1935, you can see that the men who marched on Ottawa have in many ways had their wishes come true.

The Canadian people tossed the Bennett government out of office in Ottawa in October 1935 and the Liberal government, which took office under Mackenzie King, righted many of the wrongs against which the strikers protested. For example, section 98 of the Criminal Code, which had been used for arbitrary arrest of strikers and others, was abolished.

By 1940 we had unemployment insurance in this country. After 1940, we built a social system that offered a kind of minimum that the strikers and the people in the depression did not have.

The best monument to the memory to the strikers of 1935 is the Canada we live in today. It is in our health care system which was created about 25 years afterward. It is in our system of unemployment insurance. It is in our comprehensive social services and it is in our fair hiring practices which was central to the protest made by the workers in Regina in 1935.

Look around and ask, could the "On to Ottawa" trek and the Regina riot happen in Canada today? The answer is an unequivocal no. The hon. member has done a service to the people by placing the motion before the House, but while I cannot agree with this call for an official apology, I can applaud the sentiment that inspired this motion expressing profound regret that this government, indeed, all Canadians feel for what happened to Canadians during the Great Depression.

It would be more fitting to honour the memory by taking the opportunity presented by this motion to re-dedicate ourselves to the principles of social justice that were lacking in Canada in 1935.

Let us then work together to build a country where there is social equality and equal opportunity for all. It seems wrong to look at our own times and compare them to the 1930s and suggest that the conditions today, in any way, resemble those of the 1930s. The pay for the young men in the work camps was 20 cents a day. There was no unemployment insurance. There was no health insurance. There was no social system. There were no easy answers as well.

Today, for whatever problems our economy faces, we have an unemployment rate that is probably one-third of what it was in the depression. We have protection for people who have lost their jobs. We have a government that is committed to creating jobs and work for Canadians and to maintaining a social system that protects the interests of all Canadians.

I hope members will agree, including the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, that what we have accomplished since 1935 is itself the best memorial to the strikers in Regina in July 1935.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the motion tabled by the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, regarding the "On to Ottawa" trek which started in Vancouver and ended in Regina, on July 1, 1935.

I think it is important to tell our viewers how this episode came about, and to see if there are lessons to be drawn from it. It must be remembered that 1935 was one of the worst years of the Great Depression, which was probably the worst economic disaster of our century.

It must also be remembered that this disaster occurred at a time when governments were saying: "The less we get involved, the better it is. The less we try to control, the more we will promote wealth and its distribution". Reality, however, turned out to be quite different. There was an enormous lack of confidence in the economy. Unemployment suddenly soared to astronomical levels, which had nothing to do with reality, but which meant that people could not get enough income to ensure their survival.

We must not forget that, in those days, there were no social programs such as welfare and unemployment insurance. The safety net was not yet in place; consequently, those who lost their jobs had nothing to fall back on except begging.

• (1800)

Faced with this situation, the government of the day decided to set up work camps. Unfortunately, conditions in these camps were absolutely appalling, and this eventually led to the strike.

There is a lesson to be drawn from certain important aspects of this strike. We are about to launch a reform of the old age pension and unemployment insurance programs, and crucial decisions will also be made regarding things such as social assistance funding. It is easy, when you overlook certain factors, to make quick assumptions on the actual impact of such measures.

Finally, measures were established to ensure a distribution of wealth, a distribution of income and an opportunity to balance consumption. When essentially everything is in the hands of the rich, what remains, once the rich have taken what they require to satisfy their basic needs, becomes luxury. This situation moves the economy a lot less than if everybody had enough to live on and to feed their families.

This sort of strike, which was stopped by violence, happened because the government of the day lacked sufficient means to distribute wealth.

In order to avoid the excesses of the past and to permit redistribution of wealth, we must absolutely avoid behaviour such as that of the Government of Ontario, which drew up a list to show people they could live and feed themselves on $90 a month, forgetting milk for cereal and really crazy things. This sort of thing could lead to behaviour similar to this strike. We forget about respect for basic human dignity.

The other point we should remember is that mandatory work under unacceptable conditions is one thing that should be rejected as an option, because this too represents a failure to respect people's dignity. It leads to behaviour, which may not be justifiable, but which can be understood on closer examination.

There is also another component, which got less attention this afternoon, and that is police intervention. There have been a number of police interventions in Canada's history which have been more or less justifiable in the past. In this case, we are talking about an intervention that affected workers in western Canada in 1935.

In Quebec, there was another one that affected us in a very particular way. It happened during the October crisis in 1970, where a lack of control over police action resulted in unacceptable behaviour and unwarranted arrests, as was described earlier in connection with events in Regina. The same thing happened in Montreal and Quebec City during the October crisis in 1970.

As a state, as a country claiming to be one of the most democratic in the world, with highly interesting democratic practices we can boast of to others, we still have a number of lessons to learn from these examples, which must drive us to ensure that our police forces have very clear mandates and proper training to deal with the situations that arise. They must obtain mandates from a judge in special situations, so that such excesses never occur.

I think we can say, with hindsight, that these young men—for it was mainly young men in these work camps—represented in some way the future of Canada at the time the strike took place. The way that they were crushed is something that must never happen again.

One of the participants in the march, Joe McEwen, summed up the situation in a way by stating in the conclusion to his description of what happened "We were the salt of the earth". Young people, aged 20, aged 30, wanting to work, wanting acceptable conditions, not finding them, and taking steps to let the government know how dissatisfied they were. Their expression of the need for change fell on totally deaf ears which led to aggressiveness and unacceptable behaviour, probably on both sides, but this must serve as a lesson to us today to make sure that we are not demolishing everything that has been built and to avoid such situations.

If the next unemployment insurance reform requires, as we fear it will, 26 weeks of work rather than 20 weeks in the first year of eligibility for unemployment insurance, we will see an increase and a perpetuation of the current statistics which show more and more people on welfare because they are not eligible for unemployment insurance. This type of reform leads directly to violent behaviour, because when people cannot feed their families and provide them with the basic necessities it is somewhat normal for them to seek some way out, to show their dissatisfaction, sometimes in an aggressive manner.

The other reform from which similar lessons must be learned is the reform of old age pensions. Over the past 15 to 20 years, we in Canada have developed a program which has enabled our seniors to enjoy greater security than before, at least from the economic point of view. In the upcoming reform, we must make sure that this economic security is not threatened, so our seniors may continue to have a decent income, one that enables them to meet their basic needs and to make a proper contribution to society.

Often when these things are being discussed, there is talk of fearmongering and a desire to frighten people. I think we have to learn from the past and see that history often repeats itself. We must always be sure that rights are protected, and this is the main lesson I have learned from the motion, which asks the federal government to make an official and unequivocal apology for the reprehensible acts committed by the government of the day.

The main lesson I can draw today, in 1995, is that we must ensure that the government opposite, as Parliament, does not repeat the same mistakes and that it provides a system of social programs that meets the needs of the 21st century. Globalization of trade does not mean standardization of social programs and this seems to me to be the challenge of the 21st century for Quebec and for Canada.

[English]

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as a Saskatchewanian born and bred, I cut my teeth on stories of the Dominion Day riots and the much worse events that actually took place at about the same time at the coal mine strike in Estevan.

I do not think there is anyone of proper mind who would deny that the work camps are a blot on Canadian history. I do not think anyone of my acquaintance would deny that the decision of the government of the day to arrest the trek leaders was stupid and unjustified.

Unfortunately, history is a chronicle of violence and injustice. Historical revisionism notwithstanding, there is nothing you can do to change history. As the bard said, "what is done is done and cannot be undone".

I am very uncomfortable with the principle of apologizing to people who suffered in the past because of my ancestors, if you will. We are faced with a stream of people who want to be apologized to for things their ancestors have suffered. At the moment there are Canadians of Ukrainian descent asking for apologies for the internment of their grandfathers and great–grandfathers during the first world war. There are Canadians of Chinese descent asking us to apologize as a society for the head tax.

Where do we draw the line? Are we going to continue apologizing forever? I had ancestors who were dispossessed of their lands in Scotland in order to make room for sheep. Am I supposed to go out and ask for apologies from people who had nothing whatsoever to do with that? I do not believe so.

More important, besides the question of where to draw the line, what is the point? Nothing we say or do here can undo the evil that was done 60 years ago. To be meaningful, an apology requires a certain degree of contrition. Frankly, I do not feel any guilt for actions that took place in my province when I was just a little boy. I did not break any heads, and I am not acquainted personally with anybody who did.

If the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle wants to assuage his personal conscience or wants to go on a guilt trip, I am not going to accompany him. I would respectfully suggest that if he really wants to do something he should take a few thousand dollars out of his bank account, track down each surviving protagonist and buy each one a bottle of the best. That would be a commendable and meaningful gesture, which I would applaud wildly.

What is being proposed here in the House today is meaningless; it is window dressing. We are not going to resurrect the dead. We are not going to heal the wounds of people who had their skulls cracked 60 years ago. Let us get on with our lives. We have more important things to worry about in the House.

I will not be supporting the motion made by the hon. member.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one interesting thing about being a parliamentary secretary is that one gets to stay up late. So here we are. I thank the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle for keeping me up this late and bringing the motion before the House.

The motion before us calls on the federal government, on the 60th anniversary of the "On to Ottawa" trek, to apologize for its actions at the time. According to the motion, the government's reaction to the march displayed a total lack of concern for the unemployed and the government was responsible for violence, loss of life, injuries, and the questionable jailing of several participants.

In proposing the motion the member has given us a chance to consider the progress we have made in the last 60 years. I would like to reflect on where we were then and where we are now as relates to the labour movement. That is basically all we can do, because we cannot turn back the clock.

On June 3, 1935, over 1,000 unemployed men began the "On to Ottawa" trek. They were frustrated and angry about their plight and determined to tell their political leaders and the nation that they deserved better. The trekkers made stops in Calgary, Medicine Hat, Swift Current, and Moose Jaw before arriving in Regina.

At Regina a delegation of eight men was chosen and sent to Ottawa to meet with the Prime Minister. These talks failed. After attempts were made to arrest the leaders of the trek the situation deteriorated rapidly, leading to the Regina riot. By the end of it one policeman was dead, several dozen protesters, constables, and bystanders were injured, and 130 protesters were arrested. The events of July 1, 1935 were incredibly traumatic and they stand out in the pages of our history. What then did the trek accomplish? What lessons can we continue to draw from it today?

I think we can draw a number of lessons. First, it is vital that we do not put ideology ahead of people's needs. Governments should never let adherence to a particular ideology or fear of a particular ideology blind it to the real needs of the people. Some parties in the House should take that message to heart.

Another lesson of the trek is that if we as a society aspire to economic prosperity and social peace, we have to encourage the involvement of citizens. People have to take advantage of the opportunity to act through anti–poverty groups, social organizations and trade unions.

We hear a lot of union bashing by right wingers these days, but it is a simple matter of fact that free societies and free trade unions go hand in hand. Societies that do not have a vigorous union movement challenging them to examine and re–examine their policies and attitudes are sorely lacking. The sweeping economic and social policy changes that we saw in Canada after World War II came about because the people demanded change to the status quo. These demands were translated into effective policies.

Without people who agitate—that is probably how I would classify my colleague across the way—criticize governments, challenge policies and organize their fellow citizens we would stagnate. We would not have made the progress we have in Canada.

It is because of the challenges issued by the trekkers and others that we have built up social policies that go hand in hand with economic growth and prosperity. For example, there is free universal health care. Not only is it socially enlightened but it gives Canadian businesses a competitive advantage. Medicare has reduced the cost of health care to the economy and has left more money in the pockets of individuals and businesses.

Similarly, good and balanced labour legislation that acknowledges the rights and needs of trade unions promotes stability in the workplace, improves productivity, maintains purchasing power and results in the creation of pension funds that are then accessed for both public and private investment.

I could give other examples but I think I have made my point. Our collective experience with hard economic times, an experience that includes the "On to Ottawa" trek, has given us a certain perspective on social policy, a view of the meaning and purpose of social programs. In the short term the "On to Ottawa" trek probably did not accomplish much. In the bigger picture, though, it represents a shift in attitude. The work of the trekkers and other activists of the era contributed significantly to the rise of the Canadian labour movement.

The trek did not create a formal organization but it created stirrings among the unemployed and among workers. It created the conditions in which the labour movement could grow. Before a strong labour movement could take root, working people had to become conscious of their power, their value and their dignity. The "On to Ottawa" trek led to this awareness. Since then unions have become a major force in Canadian society. Unlike the United States where only 10 per cent of the workforce is organized, unions here are relatively healthy and represent about 30 per cent of workers in Canada.

Canadian society has developed in large part because of the work and prodding of trade unions. I value and appreciate the role they play in Canada. I have a significant bias as that is what I used to do for a living before I came to this place. The labour movement of today owes a lot to the "On to Ottawa" trekkers and to all other men and women who struggled to make the Canadian society more just, compassionate and democratic. With the rise of the labour movement came new labour legislation. A milestone was PC order 1003 in 1944 which put into law the right of workers to join unions and to engage in collective bargaining. That was not all that long ago.

Since then governments have adopted a number of laws involving work standards, workplace health and safety, and worker protection. I am proud our laws are much more progressive and responsive to working people than the laws in the United States.

In order that our laws continue to reflect and meet the needs of today's workforce we are in the process of a comprehensive review of the Canada Labour Code. In the spring we anticipate presenting legislation to the House for all members to consider. Our goal is to ensure a balanced system that benefits all of us.

Again I thank the member for introducing the motion. It reflects on how difficult times were for millions of Canadians 60 years ago. The changes the trekkers were trying to achieve was time well spent. It gives us an appreciation of how far we have come in working together to create conditions for social peace. This is a heritage we have to protect so that working Canadians can continue to build the country and continue to create opportunities for all.

I agree with members opposite who have spoken before me that we cannot go back in time to try to understand why people did what they did. However we can learn from our mistakes and we can advance as we have in the country. As I have mentioned, let us hope the lessons we have learned from the trekkers will be put into legislation. They will always have a place in our hearts and our history simply because they helped to start the labour movement in Canada.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak but since there is some time remaining I will say a few words on the motion of the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, which I was pleased to second.

My reason for seconding the motion was to allow us to debate an event in Canada's history that serves as a reminder to us all of some difficult periods in our history that have in a sense given birth to many of the progressive pieces of social legislation and programs we now enjoy in Canada.

It serves us well to remember events such as the march to Ottawa, the "On to Ottawa" trek of 60 years ago, and the struggles our forebears undertook to pave the way for some of the social programs we regard with such pride today.

On the question of offering an unequivocal and official apology, I am not sure I would support that part of the motion for the same reasons that have already been expressed by my colleagues on both sides of the House. In this day and age we cannot judge the actions of our ancestors. We can only learn from them. I express that caveat in my endorsement of the debate the hon. member initiated.

I was a little uncomfortable with the member's attempt to compare current circumstances with the depression that led to the "On to Ottawa" trek and the unfortunate occurrences that took place in Regina on July 1, 1935. Canada has moved a long way from those unfortunate days. The struggles and the sacrifices of the workers who paid that price were part of what brought the country to where it is today.

Even though we presently have our own economic difficulties in Canada, in no way do they compare to the difficulties those workers experienced in the dirty thirties which have been eloquently described by the hon. member and others in this House. Those difficulties are part of the past which Canada must learn from.

With those caveats, I want to commend the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle on having introduced his motion and on having brought our attention to this chapter in Canada's history. It has allowed members on both sides of the House to draw some lessons from that period in Canada's past.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Colleagues, we only have a few minutes left in this private members' hour. Would it be the disposition of the House for the member under whose name the motion stands to close the debate on this motion by taking no more than two minutes under right of reply and then we would adjourn?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the members of the House for giving me this opportunity of closing the debate.

I do wish to thank the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso for being a seconder, in that way allowing the motion to be introduced today and allowing the debate. Since there was no member of my party here, his gracious action in allowing his name to be used to second the motion is greatly appreciated. I recognize as well that when he did that, he did not necessarily endorse everything in the motion, nor all the comments I would make.

Despite what some hon. members say, we cannot rectify the past. We cannot mend broken bones nor can we raise the dead, but it is important that in some instances we say that what was done back then was wrong. We should do it in an official way by extending an apology.

To me it then becomes a signpost in the evolution of our civilization. A formal act of this Parliament, for example apologizing and stating that what occurred in the Regina riot was wrong, becomes a signpost in our evolution.

I hope as well that what some of the hon. members particularly from the government side have stated is true, that there is a great difference between conditions then and now. Indeed, there are many differences. but the fear of many of us is that we are sliding into situations quite similar to the last depression.

That was one of the reasons I also wished to bring this item up. While there are differences, unfortunately there are also growing similarities, particularly the sense of hopelessness many of our young people feel, the lack of jobs, the lack of a future, the lack of opportunity. Surely those young men in those camps must also have felt a sense of hopelessness for the future which motivated them to start the trek to Ottawa to bring to the attention of Parliament the conditions which existed.

I hope those conditions will never return again. The reality is however that many of our young Canadian citizens face the future not with hope and aspirations, but with dejection and unemployment.

I hope the government and this Parliament will remember what the Bennett government did back then and will reject it as a solution to the problems we face. I hope that we will work together toward a new solution to the problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Public Works and Government Services) moved that Bill C–108, an act to amend the National Housing Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move that Bill C–108, an act to amend the National Housing Act, be read a second time and referred to committee.

This is an administrative bill whose purpose is to increase the ceiling of mortgage loan insurance under the National Housing Act. This will enable CMHC to continue underwriting home mortgage loan insurance within the legislative limit. Bill C–108 will increase the existing limit on outstanding loan insurance from the current $100 billion to $150 billion. The bill also includes a provision to increase the ceiling further through appropriation in the future.

Members of the House should know that CMHC loan insurance is self–financing and self–sustaining and does not cost the government anything. The mortgage insurance fund is regularly evaluated according to rigorous insurance principles and is fully adequate to cover all insured losses as well as overhead.

While the amendments contained in this bill represent administrative matters, passage of this bill is essential to the continued operation of CMHC's Mortgage Loan Insurance. Allow me to take a minute to explain why this bill is important to Canadians.

[English]

The desire to own a home remains very strong among Canadians. Yet many people who can afford the monthly mortgage payments are still unable to access home ownership because they find it difficult to save for a down payment for a conventional loan.

With mortgage loan insurance, home buyers can secure up to 95 per cent financing with a lender because CMHC insures the mortgage.

Because CMHC assumes the risk of borrowers defaulting, mortgage lenders are able to supply more mortgages to Canadians. By reducing the down payment required to purchase a home, the Mortgage Loan Insurance Program makes home ownership more accessible to moderate income households.

It is a vital component of ensuring that all Canadians, regardless of where they live, have equal access to mortgage funds needed to acquire decent, affordable housing.

[English]

Let me give you an idea of the extent to which Canadians depend on mortgage loan insurance in order to fulfil their dream of owning a home. Mortgage loan insurance has allowed many people to become homeowners, some who would not otherwise have been able to buy, others who would have been able to make their purchase sooner because of the lower down payment.

In 1994 alone, CMHC mortgage loan insurance helped to house over 300,000 Canadian families at no cost to the government.

My colleagues will also be interested to learn that this means that approximately 40 per cent of the residential mortgage stock in Canada has involved financing by CMHC mortgage insurance last year. Without mortgage loan insurance, Canadians who do not have a 25 per cent down payment would generally never have access to home ownership.

[Translation]

CMHC Mortgage Loan Insurance has demonstrated the flexibility to facilitate innovation in housing finance. This is a critical feature, given that the needs of mortgage borrowers, and the market within which these needs are met, are constantly evolving. In 1987, the program was improved to allow for the insuring of second mortgages, an innovation that has been particularly helpful to people who need additional money for renovation.

[English]

In the following year, the chattel loan insurance program was introduced as a five–year experiment to cover loans made on mobile homes and to help people who choose this kind of affordable home ownership. This coverage for mobile homes has now been made a regular part of the mortgage insurance program as per the announcement made by the the minister responsible for CMHC at the beginning of this year.

• (1010)

In 1992 the mortgage insurance program was expanded to accommodate the reduced down payment for first time home buyers making home ownership even more accessible to moderate income households.

This program, called First Home Loan Insurance, has provided Canadians with their entry point to home ownership. May I reiterate to my hon. colleagues that the success of this initiative has been achieved without any cost to the government.

[Translation]

We want to ensure that CHMC can continue to provide that kind of market support in the future. That is why this legislation is before the House today. CHMC is continually reviewing the Mortgage Loan Insurance Program and regularly introduces changes to make it more effective and more convenient for both approved lenders and home buyers.

[English]

By exploring new housing finance options for Canadians we are looking to promote greater choices, lower the costs, increase the accessibility of housing finance and assist borrowers to meet their financing needs within their own resources.

CHMC will continue to encourage innovation and creativity in housing finance through the Mortgage Insurance Fund to promote greater access to housing markets for the benefit of all Canadians.

[English]

Besides helping Canadians to become homeowners, CMHC mortgage insurance has been key to the health of the housing industry in Canada. By fully protecting approved lenders against default on the part of the borrower, mortgage insurance encourages investment in residential construction.

The federal government, through CMHC, has been providing national mortgage insurance for four decades. CMHC has remained a significant player throughout this time with a mandate from the federal government to provide mortgage insurance to support loans to all Canadian home buyers regardless of where they live in Canada at the smallest feasible down payment and the lowest feasible cost.

Today, the private housing market is able to meet the housing needs of the vast majority of Canadian households. There is no doubt that CHMC's Mortgage Loan Insurance has played a critical role in that achievement. CHMC's Mortgage Insurance Program experienced a record year in 1994 in terms of volume. A number of unexpected factors led to the significant increases in activity last year. Mortgage rates dropped to their lowest levels in 30 years, much lower than anticipated. Low inflation has kept house prices stable and more affordable.

As well, the rapid and continued success of homeowner incentive policies, including the First Home Loan Insurance Program and the RRSP Home Buyers' Plan, contributed to record volumes of insurance activity last year.

[English]

When the Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada stopped underwriting new mortgage insurance business in April 1993, CMHC had to assume 100 per cent of residential mortgage insurance activity. Furthermore, a greater proportion of all mortgages have been insured by CMHC in recent years.

In 1994, CMHC insured 40 per cent of all residential mortgages initiated, up from 22 per cent in 1991. Because there is some lag time between insurance loans and receiving the reports from the approved lenders, it was only in 1995 that all the figures for 1994 were compiled. At that time it was realized that the $100 billion maximum aggregate loan insurance currently stipulated in the National Housing Act had been exceeded. For this reason the provisions of this bill are effective starting 1994. I hope members of the House will see fit to give swift passage to Bill C–108 so that CMHC can continue to promote access to home ownership through mortgage loan insurance.

As I have stated and as my colleagues are aware, the purpose of the bill is to increase the maximum aggregate mortgage loan insurance. This will enable CMHC to continue underwriting home mortgage loan insurance within the legislative limit. Considering the housing sector's importance to the well–being of the nation, CMHC is committed to a stable supply of housing that increases economic and social opportunities for all Canadians.

With CMHC's mortgage loan insurance program qualifying home buyers anywhere in Canada can secure up to 95 per cent of home financing with an approved lender. Mortgage insurance through CMHC also provides a means of introducing guarantees for innovative mortgage products to benefit consumers, for example mortgage backed securities which increase the pool of funds available for mortgages and competitive rates.

The corporation continues to develop new initiatives and adapt existing ones to meet the challenges of housing Canadians adequately into the new millennium. Among the new initiatives being examined are alternative financing mechanisms for homes such as reverse annuity mortgages and shared equity financing.

CMHC has a role to play in helping Canadians to access decent affordable housing. CMHC continues to provide social housing assistance to support more than 661,000 existing units that house over one million low income Canadians whose housing needs cannot be met through the housing market. This housing assists some of the most disadvantaged members of our society including seniors on fixed incomes, aboriginal people, persons with disabilities, single parent led families, social assistance recipients and the working poor.

To solve today's housing problems and define tomorrow's housing needs CMHC is involved in research and development both independently and with industry and government partners. CMHC's research into sustainable development, quality of life, housing technology and building science promotes good living environments that are safe, healthy and sustainable. As well CMHC is helping the Canadian housing industry to promote the Canadian housing system abroad by helping to develop housing export strategies to assist the Canadian housing industry to market Canadian housing technology, products and services in world markets.

Through its Mortgage Loan Insurance Program, CHMC continues to make housing more accessible for Canadians. The Corporation is also working to improve housing affordability.

The federal government through CHMC is committed to a stable supply of affordable and accessible housing that increases economic opportunities for all Canadians. CHMC's market housing programs promote affordable housing and equal access to financing through financial instruments such as mortgage loan insurance.

[English]

Moreover, CMHC provides mortgage insurance to all Canadians regardless of where they live in Canada at the smallest feasible down payment and at lower cost. To improve access to an affordable form of housing CMHC also provides mortgage insurance for manufactured housing, for example mobile homes. In January 1995 the minister of public works recently announced an expanded chattel loan interest program that includes resale of manufactured housing units.

CMHC also helps to ensure Canadians are well housed by pursuing and encouraging housing innovation and by developing national housing policies in concert with provincial and territorial partners, the housing industry and non–profit groups.

[Translation]

One important way CMHC levers the efforts of its partners in Canada's housing sector is CMHC's Canadian Centre for Public–Private Partnership in Housing. The Centre acts as a catalyst and a source of expert advice.

• (1020)

It brings together the public and private sectors, non–profit organizations and private citizens to develop low to moderate income housing projects without the need for government subsidies.

[English]

CMHC is also contributing to making housing more affordable through better housing regulations. The affordability and choice today program funded by CMHC encourages regulatory innovation in municipalities across Canada. The ACT program encourages the housing industry and municipalities to work in partnership to improve housing affordability and choice. More than 80 ACT projects are developing a wide range of practical approaches to streamlining approval processes, developing new forms of affordable housing, facilitating infill and conversion, and adopting alternative development and building standards.

As I have said Bill C–108 is an administrative bill. As my colleagues know, the bill is crucial to ensuring that CMHC can continue to offer mortgage loan insurance to Canadians. Through its mortgage insurance activities CMHC has been responsible for helping many Canadians become homeowners and we want to ensure that it can continue to do that.

I would like to take a few minutes to talk about a complementary initiative, First Home Loan Insurance, introduced by CMHC in February 1992, to make home ownership even more accessible for first time home buyers. Earlier this year, the Hon. David Dingwall announced that the maximum eligible house prices for First Home Loan Insurance were increased in 30 communities across the country.

This initiative allows more first time homebuyers to purchase a home with a down payment of as little as five per cent. Anyone who buys or builds a home in Canada as their principal residence is eligible for the lower down payment, as long as they have not owned a home at any time during the last five years.

[English]

First home loan insurance was initially in effect for a two–year period but was extended for an additional five years until 1999.

The 5 per cent down initiative has been a major success in helping to increase home ownership in Canada. Thanks to the reduced down payment home ownership has moved from a dream to a reality for the many Canadians who can afford monthly mortgage payments but are having trouble saving for down payments.

The statistics speak for themselves. Since November 1993 over 210,000 Canadian households have taken advantage of the lower down payment to become the proud owners of either a new or existing home. In April 1994 a survey of Canadians who bought homes with less than 10 per cent down showed that 72 per cent of them would not have been able to purchase their homes when they did without the reduced down payment.

The first home loan insurance initiative is constantly being monitored to ensure that it continues to meet the needs of Canadians. CMHC is committed to helping Canadians who desire to own a home and have the proven financial management capability to do so.

First home loan insurance is an excellent example of CMHC's ability to adapt its mortgage loan insurance activity to ensure that Canadians can enjoy the benefits of home ownership.

Allow me to speak on the importance of Bill C–108 by describing an initiative of CMHC which has as its foundation the flexible use of the mortgage insurance fund. I am referring to the Canadian Centre for Public–Private Partnerships in Housing which I mentioned earlier. Allow me to take a moment to provide the House with some details about the important work being undertaken here.

The partnership centre was established by CMHC in 1991.

[Translation]

Its objective is to bridge the public and private sectors to facilitate the production of cost–effective and accessible housing for low to moderate income households, including those with special needs. The centre ventures into new areas through such means as innovative financing and tenure arrangements.

• (1025)

Much of the centre's activities are accomplished at the grassroot level with a view to encouraging a wide variety of people active in their community to become involved in newly created housing partnerships.

[English]

The partnership centre identifies opportunities and brings together potential partners to develop and implement public–private partnerships. It acts as a source of best advice by offering an advisory service to potential partners to identify the key legal, financial and regulatory issues that need to be considered in structuring a deal.

Since its inception the centre has ventured into innovative tenure arrangements such as occupancy rights, life leases, equity co–ops, as well as a home ownership equity partnership program. As at the end of June of this year the centre had facilitated the realization of 79 projects totalling in excess of 4,200 housing units.

Allow me to take a minute to outline a few innovative projects that have been made possible by CMHC's Canadian Centre for Public–Private Partnerships in Housing.

Vancouver's Khatsahlano Equity Housing Co–operative offers affordable housing for families. Equity co–operatives are ongoing housing co–ops that are financed entirely or partly from the investment of their members.

Traditionally aimed at seniors, they are now becoming an affordable housing alternative for a growing number of Canadians. This project demonstrates that it is possible to provide families with affordable housing options in a market where starter homes are very expensive.

[Translation]

Two non–profit groups in the province of Quebec, both dedicated to helping people with psychiatric and developmental handicaps, are buying and renovating houses and will run them as group homes. In Montreal, Centre de crise "Le Transit" is purchasing a house in a mixed residential downtown neighbourhood to accommodate eight adult residents referred to them by city–run and charitable social services agencies.

A similar project in Granby will house 12 residents in a triplex being purchased by L'Autre Versant Inc., a local non–profit group organized five years ago to provide homes for people with psychiatric and development handicaps. Both these projects are being made possible thanks to CMHC–insured mortgage loans supported by the Partnership Centre.

[English]

Clearly CMHC's partnership centre and its innovative uses of mortgage insurance are making great strides in increasing the supply of affordable housing for low to moderate income Canadians including those with special needs.

As I have stated before, Bill C–108 is an administrative bill to facilitate the continuation of mortgage loan insurance under the National Housing Act. As my colleagues well know, CMHC has an important role to play in helping Canadians gain access to home ownership.

CMHC's mortgage loan insurance with its mandate to provide equal access to Canadians throughout the country is important to achieving that goal.

CMHC has a unique role of ensuring equal access to Canadians throughout the country. This is one of the major factors that distinguishes CMHC's operation from mortgage loan insurance operations. Without CMHC's commitment to provide mortgage loan insurance in the small communities of the country, places that private insurers have not traditionally wanted to serve, many Canadians might not be able to buy homes.

Let me illustrate how important CMHC loan insurance is to Canadians in small communities. Take for example CMHC loan insurance activity in the municipality of Brooks, Alberta, with a population of 10,000. In 1994, 137 households were able to access home ownership thanks to CMHC's mortgage loan insurance.

This year, as of September 30, 153 households became proud homeowners, again thanks to CMHC. Make no mistake about it, if CMHC were not in the mortgage loan insurance business these 290 families in Brooks, Alberta, might not have been able to buy their homes. I would further like to point out that these 290 households represent 83 per cent of the total number of 349 households who bought homes in Brooks, Alberta, during that period.

• (1030)

The government knows just how much Canadians value home ownership. It represents a major portion of wealth accumulated by households. For some it is a source of retirement income. It is also an important component of quality of life.

[English]

We believe that every Canadian should have access to home ownership. CMHC mortgage loan insurance can turn the dream of owning a home into a reality. It is therefore critical that CMHC be able to continue to provide mortgage loan insurance to Canadians now and in the future. This is why I support Bill C–108.

I hope my colleagues will see fit to give swift passage to this administrative bill so that CMHC can continue to help Canadians realize their dream of owning a home.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Good morning, Mr. Speaker. We will, of course, support the bill introduced by the parliamentary secretary since we agree with what it proposes to do, which is to increase the aggregate amount of loans that may be approved by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to $150 billion, but the fact remains that it all seems very unsatisfactory.

We must admit that, at the very least, there is something embarrassing, disturbing and unsatisfactory about the fact that we have before us a bill that reminds us that the federal government's involvement in the housing sector, through this flimsy vehicle, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, consists exclusively of loan guarantees.

We must not forget it has been some years—in fact, since 1989 but even more so since 1992—since the federal government withdrew altogether from the construction of social housing. Remember this: It completely withdrew from this sector, and I intend to give chapter and verse later on. There is something here that arouses a sense of outrage and indignation—and I hope the parliamentary secretary, who I know is sensitive to these issues, will share my sense of outrage and indignation—when we see that the federal government, with all the resources at its disposal, has nothing to offer except loan guarantees through the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Meanwhile, it has withdrawn from the construction of social housing, it completely abolished its co–operative housing policy in 1992, which the Liberals had promised to reinstate, and plays no role at all in housing renovation.

We have a definite problem with this. And anyone in this House who has a social conscience must feel the same. As for amending the National Housing Act and having a debate on housing, what are we entitled to expect from the government? We have a Liberal government that does not believe that poverty is acceptable, that believes that being a Liberal means embracing the philosophy of liberalism. Embracing this philosophy means believing that the state has a role to play in putting an end to the disparities in our society.

I know the parliamentary secretary agrees with me. As the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, I am disappointed. And if the hon. member does not agree with the substance of what I am saying, I am sure that by the end of my speech he will have changed his mind.

The issue is one that concerns me, as the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve and as a former member of the board of a technical resources group that examined these issues. I have been involved in housing issues since I was 20, and I am now 33, although I may not look it. The fact remains that I have been involved in the housing sector for nearly 13 years. And I am shocked that this government has nothing to offer in the way of social housing.

It is particularly shocking this morning, when we are asked to discuss the role of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation at a time when poverty, both in Canada and Quebec, is more widespread than ever before. This is serious.

• (1035)

As members of Parliament, we all represent ridings, and when it comes down to it, we all want to work for the people who elected us. We all know that housing, the right to have a decent roof over your head at a decent price, is something that is central to people's lives.

The debate this morning comes at a time when there is more poverty than ever before. Mr. Speaker, let me quote a few figures. When we talk about poverty, we should remember that in Quebec, to give you a very specific example—or perhaps we should look at the situation in Canada as a whole, where the poverty rate is now 17.4 per cent. So what does poverty mean? Poverty is when a household has to spend more than 55 per cent of its income on three basic items: rent, food and clothing.

We live in a society where poverty is more widespread than ever before. And since we live in this society, we have every right to expect the Liberal government to be a little more enterprising, to come up with a proposal this morning that is more intelligent and more pro–active than approving loan guarantees, since even the parliamentary secretary admitted this did not represent any additional cost to the public purse. The parliamentary secretary was very frank at the beginning of his speech when he said this was a program, a loan guarantee that was self–financing and did not cost the treasury a cent.

Is the parliamentary secretary satisfied? Does he approve of the fact that his government, considering its responsibilities at a time when more people are poor than ever before, when, according to Statistics Canada, we have never been so short of housing? When the parliamentary secretary goes to bed tonight with his beloved, will he be pleased that his government has nothing to offer but a loan guarantee which puts no strain on the public purse?

That does not satisfy me. I do not think that it is politically defensible. So 17.4 per cent of Canadian households are classified as poor. This means that 17.4 per cent of the population belongs to a household which spends 55 per cent or more of its income on the three basic items.

I know we are just coming out of a referendum campaign, and that events in the months to come will mean that the issue is not totally closed, but speaking as a levelheaded, rational man—two qualities which I think the parliamentary secretary will agree describe my character—I feel that, when evaluating federalism, it is our duty to recall that Quebec, as we speak, is the province with the highest rate of poverty.

As we speak, Quebec has the highest number of poor households anywhere in Canada. If the parliamentary secretary is sceptical, I can provide figures. The most recent figures available are for 1993: Newfoundland, 17.7 per cent of households; P.E.I., 9.9 per cent; Nova Scotia, 5.5 per cent; New Brunswick, 14.5 per cent; Quebec, 20.7 per cent.

This means that 20 out of every 100 households are those of people who are among the poorest in Canada. This is the reality the federal regime has inflicted upon us. And this is not a mindset, a political pipedream, but something confirmed by Statistics Canada.

So the figure in Quebec is 20.7 per cent; in Ontario: 15.6 per cent; in Manitoba, 18.1 per cent; in Saskatchewan, 17 per cent; in Alberta, 17.6 per cent. In a context where Quebec has the highest number of poor households, in a context where we are aware of the importance of housing in balancing individuals' and families' budgets, we find ourselves faced with a government that has nothing to propose except the addition of a measure like any other government action relating to shelter, a loan guarantee. One that they have the gall to describe as not requiring anything from the government, from the public purse, because it is self–sustaining.

As the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, as an individual who believes in democracy, I wish to state that it is my belief that the government is not assuming its responsibilities, that this is shameful, that this is unacceptable, that it is just one more reason to separate, because we have no need of a government that cannot offer us anything in the area of housing.

If the parliamentary secretary finds that I am overdoing it, he has only to get up off his chair and add some substance to his proposals on housing—at this time, as we speak, all of my friendly feelings for the parliamentary secretary notwithstanding, we have every reason for dissatisfaction. But I want to get back to the subject of poverty in Quebec.

Quebec has 24 per cent of the total Canadian population. The federal government gains 23 per cent of its income from Quebec's individual or corporate taxpayers. Thirty per cent of all of those living in poverty live in Quebec. There is one other reality which characterizes Quebec and militates in favour of more government involvement in social housing: more Quebecers rent their homes than the Canadian average.

This means that more individuals in Quebec have insufficient income to own property. This is why we feel a government must be involved in social housing. What is social housing in its co–operative or NPO form? I shall come back to that later.

When a government sets aside public funds for social housing in co–operative or NPO form, this is because of a belief that there are people whose income alone, without a little help from the government, will never enable them to own property.

This is a trend which a self–respecting government, a government with some social democratic leanings will take action to correct—and I am sure that the Government whip either lives in a co–op or has plans to do so, since he shares our slight socialist bent.

All of this to say that, in Quebec, 44.4 per cent of households are tenants; 44.4 per cent rent their homes, while the Canadian average is 37.1 per cent. We would, therefore, have had reason to expect this morning that the government would have a somewhat more substantial policy to provide support to the provinces in the whole area of public housing.

I say "a somewhat more substantial policy" with respect to the provinces, because it is clear in my mind that federal government involvement in housing must take the form of a transfer of funds or budget allocations, where the funds are managed by the government of the individual provinces. I say this, because it is clear, constitutionally, that the federal government has no authority to intervene in the matter of housing.

When it does, it is obviously contravening the Canadian constitution, because neither section 92 nor section 93 accords the federal government jurisdiction over housing. We must remember, however, that, if the federal government is to be involved in public housing, as I think it ought, it is by transferring money to the provinces, which want to be involved.

No one is saying the government should not set funds aside. We acknowledge that it has a fiscal capacity, access to areas of taxation that justify its setting money aside for the provinces.

I have an example for hon. members. Quebec has a program, I do not know if the parliamentary secretary is familiar with it, called Logirente. It targets people 55 years of age or older, who have difficulty paying their monthly rent on the basis of their incomes alone.

The government of Quebec assists those who meet the eligibility criteria with their rent payments monthly.

• (1045)

Some 60,000 people benefit from this program at the moment. Quebec officials asked the federal government if it could also get involved and make some money available.

Had the federal government agreed, through an administrative agreement, to become involved in the operation of the Logirente program, we estimate that 145,000 households and families could have been helped, instead of the present 60,000.

This is the role of government. What is the point in having a federal government that could care less about getting involved in people's lives when the most fundamental of needs are at issue? You will not be surprised to learn that the federal government refused to get involved in the Logirente program, thus ensuring that 60,000 households rather than 145,000 could benefit from it. This is one case where federalism is not working, and where a sovereign Quebec could have, on its own and totally, a housing policy it alone established, one that functioned independently under its control.

I would like to come back to something I consider absolutely essential, something that could have helped us through the difficult years of the last recession and could help Canadians through the next recession. The program we must talk about and one I encourage the federal government to re–establish with the provinces is, obviously, the co–operative housing program.

Mr. Speaker, you will remember that, in 1992, the federal government of the day abolished it without so much as a warning cry, a hint of its intention or consultation of any sort. Of course the parliamentary secretary will say it was not his government. That is true. Nevertheless, his government has not taken any positive action to date to re–establish it. Despite the fact that the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is relatively well off, we have not found a way to use public money to establish a co–operative housing program.

What does a national co–op program entail? First of all, a national co–op program requires that people be responsible since co–op members must choose a board of directors and acknowledge their responsibility to manage and maintain the building in which they live. This implies that they feel concerned about their environment.

There are now 40,000 people—I hope the parliamentary secretary will admit that these are real figures, and I invite him to check their accuracy—on the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation's waiting list for co–op housing. As a member of Parliament who believes in co–op housing, I am proud to remind you that, between 1973 and 1992, 85,000 units were funded by the provincial and federal programs then in effect, particularly by the federal government because it is mostly at that level that programs were available.

Co–op housing was found for 255,000 low income people. What is the reality? The reality is that, as we speak in November 1995, 66 per cent of households in co–op housing have incomes less than $30,000, or a third of what MPs earn. We should keep this in mind. We can still agree that, in 1995, a yearly income of $30,000 is certainly a modest or average income.

In the past, and especially during the last federal election campaign, I heard members say that some co–op members were making $60,000, $70,000 or $80,000, and that co–op housing was reserved for the better–off in our society. When we look at the figures a little more closely, we see that co–op housing is a tool available to the poor or to honest, middle class people, since 66 per cent of co–op members, 66 per cent of households, make less than $30,000 a year.

Thirty per cent of households in co–op housing across Canada are headed by single mothers. These women are their families' breadwinners. This shows that there is a need, that there are poor people who, for all kinds of reasons, were not able to buy their own homes.

It is reasonable to think that a decent government, one that lives up to its responsibilities and cares about the people, could not tolerate a situation in which the federal government has nothing to offer people with housing programs.

The main paradox of the federal government's withdrawal from the housing sector, especially from co–op housing, is that, in the past three years, unemployment in the residential construction sector has hovered around 20 per cent. I think that the hon. members in this House would agree with that figure.

As our grandparents used to say, and I am sure that your grandmother also said it, "as the construction industry goes so goes the world".

Why is it that, with an unemployment rate of 20 per cent in the residential construction sector, the government does not realize that one way to revitalize the Canadian economy would be to promote the construction of co–op units?

Let us not forget that, for every 1,000 co–op units built—I have the figures here—2,000 direct jobs are created. The parliamentary secretary should never forget that, every time public assistance makes it possible to build 1,000 co–op units, 2,000 new jobs are created.

There are not many sectors in which government initiatives give a 200 per cent return. But in the housing sector, for every 1,000 co–op units built, 2,000 direct jobs are created.

Why does the government not understand that reality? Why is the government so dull witted and narrow minded? Whay can the government not see the obvious? Can we rely on those government members who represent ridings, in Montreal and in the regions, where there is a need for co–op housing? I ask these members to get a little more involved and show a little more respect for the people who need the government's assistance to take action.

The influence of the Quebec Liberal caucus on cabinet is aptly described by the movie title The Silence of the Lambs. We truly feel that the Quebec Liberal caucus has no desire to make representations to cabinet to correct the major fundamental injustices suffered by Quebecers because of policies put forward by this government, particularly in the housing sector.

Since 1989, the federal government has drastically reduced its support in the renovation and the co–op housing sectors, including its support to homeowners. That withdrawal has had the effect of destabilizing public finances, as well as the economic situation of the poor in our society.

Let me give you an example. There used to be a rehabilitation assistance program for rental housing, which allowed people living in non–profit housing to get financing for up to 50 per cent of the costs of renovations to a housing unit. That was a joint program, with the federal and the provinces, Quebec in this instance, each assuming 50 per cent of the costs.

Then, all of sudden, without any warning, without any consultation, and in a period of widespread poverty, the federal government withdrew its financial support to the program. This resulted in a $20 million shortfall for Quebec.

Let us take the important issue of social housing. There are, in every riding, people who live in low rental housing. We are proud of these people, because they are a very dynamic group within our community. People who live in low rental housing create a feeling of solidarity. They have community halls which often alleviate the problem of loneliness.

Mr. Speaker, believe it or not, the federal government bluntly withdrew its support to that sector. Since 1992, not a single low rental housing unit has been built in Canada or in Quebec. I am shocked and I find this irresponsible. I was hoping that, this morning, the federal government would have shown a desire to do more in the important co–op and social housing sector.

The Speaker: It being 11 a.m., we will now proceed to Statements by Members. Our colleague for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve will, however, have the floor again after question period.

The hon. member for Moncton now has the floor.

MINING

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like today to speak to regulations in the mining industry.

[English]

Regulatory reform has been an issue of great concern to the government. A climate of change will serve as impetus to continue pushing these efforts.

Canadians in Quebec and across the country have made their voices heard and have called on us to continue to make the changes necessary to do business differently.

The mining industry is a prime example of where regulatory reform must take place. It is also one of the six economic sectors targeted by the government.

The Minister of Natural Resources has responded to the challenge with the Whitehorse mining initiative and most recently a new policy paper on sustainable development in mineral and metals that was unveiled in Vancouver in September.

All parties must be prepared to address this issue with greater vigour and with the conviction that mining is essential to our economic balance sheet. Mining is a $20 billion industry in this country and we need to ensure its viability for future generations.

We will do what has to be done to ensure the future of the mining industry.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has stated that one element of fulfilling the government's red book commitment is to "not require blanket extinguishment of aboriginal rights in the settlement of land claims".

A few of the Yukon bands that signed the umbrella final agreement after 20 years of negotiations are now refusing to abide by its terms. They want to know if they might get more with the new inherent rights policy. They want to know if they can sign a final agreement for hundreds or thousands of square miles of territories now, and not surrender their right to ask for more 10 years down the road.

Instead of certainty, the government has created uncertainty. The minister must clearly state that a land claim is final, that self–government does not mean entrenching special rights based on race in our Constitution.

We all agree we must reach fair and affordable settlements of outstanding native claims but we cannot and must not achieve finality by sacrificing the fundamental Canadian principle of equality.

ERIC ROBINSON

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am most pleased to offer congratulations to Mr. Eric Robinson, named to the Atlantic Agricultural Hall of Fame.

Eric's love for agriculture can be seen in his family, his farm, his community, and the company that bears his name. The company maintains two farming operations and also buys and sells potatoes for the domestic and export markets.

Eric's extensive travels throughout North America and Europe resulted in the introduction of new equipment that led to complete mechanization of the potato industry in Prince Edward Island. He was one of the first to use a bulk harvester and to import and grow the Russet Burbank variety, now the common variety grown in P.E.I.

A volunteer to many organizations, Eric was a member of the original P.E.I. potato marketing board in 1950.

Although he claims he is retired, Eric looks in daily on the operation. Eric Robinson is indeed most deserving of this honour. Congratulations to Eric and his family on his induction into the Atlantic Agricultural Hall of Fame.

WILKESPORT COMMUNITY CENTRE

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to relate a success story in my riding of Lambton—Middlesex, based not on government handouts but on true community spirit.

I am referring to the recent facelift of Wilkesport Community Centre in Sombra township. The hall was built 17 years ago by holding various fundraising events in the community. The community centre consists of of a 500–seat hall and three ball diamonds, which incidentally have brought Sombra township two Ontario championship teams and seven runners up.

Volunteers have given their time and effort to keep this hall successful by providing the township with a focal point for a wide variety of community events. Seventeen years later, this community is still strong and vibrant. The hall needed a facelift, and the community provided it.

My congratulations to all the residents of Wilkesport and area, whose hard work and dedication exemplify a united community spirit.

ED PEPPLER

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to acknowledge one of my constituents who has returned from the Caribbean as a volunteer with the Canadian Executive Service Organization.

Mr. Ed Peppler of Hanover, Ontario recently completed a CESO project in Dominica. He was asked to start a furniture manufacturing workshop within a woodworking factory that was only producing small gift type items. Mr. Peppler oversaw the purchasing of machinery and taught the staff how to make furniture. The staff members were soon busy filling orders for the new products and were looking to hire three or four new people. The machinery, furniture, hardware, and tires for their vehicles were all purchased from Canadian manufacturers to help the plant.

Ed Peppler's efforts stand in the tradition of Canadian aid to the developing world. I and the town of Hanover, with its rich heritage in furniture manufacturing, and indeed the people of Bruce—Grey applaud the spirit of volunteerism and international co–operation of Mr. Peppler.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on October 16 we witnessed an act of great courage in the House when a government member stood to speak out against the way the employment equity bill was handled in committee. His words from Hansard were: "I am a first time MP. I never dreamed ever that laws were created in this fashion".

At least 52 other members in the House agree that changes must be made to the system so that Parliament will function in a much more democratic manner. The present system is perfect for enacting a political agenda, but Canadian voters who pay our salaries are fed up with having Parliament force its will upon them and they are voting for change in greater and greater numbers.

We need more system changers in the House. If this does not happen before the next election it will surely happen during the next election. In the meantime, I ask the House to join me in congratulating all members of the House who have already shown that voting to represent their constituents takes precedence over the orders of the whip or the party line.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to thank the constituents of my riding of Prince Albert—Churchill River for their support for a strong and United Canada.

On Friday, October 27 a large number of Prince Albertans gathered to demonstrate their solidarity with Quebecers and support for a united country. Many others also signed a petition in which they stated their deeply held belief in Canada.

I wish to recognize four individuals from my riding who travelled to Montreal to attend the no rally: Lois Holcomb, Arlene Harper, and Jason and Karmen McNabb. I also wish to thank Val Longworth, who spearheaded a fundraising drive to assist these people to go to the Montreal rally. I also wish to thank those who financially contributed to this event.

• (1105)

While in Montreal I was particularly moved by the 150,000 voices singing O Canada and the outpouring of love for Quebec and Canada.

In closing, I wish to commend the constituents of Prince Albert—Churchill River for their commitment to our common values of democracy and tolerance and to a strong and united Canada.

HOLDING ANOTHER REFERENDUM

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is once again working to reduce the powers of the Quebec National Assembly, duly elected by the people of Quebec. This is 1980 revisited. The member for Saint-Maurice wants to use the defeat of the referendum to silence sovereignists and prevent them from holding another one.

In learning that he would not recognize a slim yes vote, we realized his contempt for democracy, but we would never have imagined that he would ever consider restricting the democratic rights of his own people. If this is how the Prime Minister of Canada responds to the 49.4 per cent of the population of Quebec that voted yes last Monday, Quebecers will do everything they can to retain their right to speak freely on their future. Let the Prime Minister just try to muzzle Quebecers; they will have an answer for him.

NATIONAL UNITY

Ms. Susan Whelan (Essex—Windsor, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the thousands of Canadians who went to the rally in Montreal and Canadians elsewhere in the country.

[English]

Canadians from all across Canada, including those from Windsor and Essex county who chartered buses from Windsor or joined the buses from London or drove or flew to Montreal on Friday, made a real difference by showing their support for Quebec and the Canadian Confederation. I want to thank them for their efforts and dedication.

[Translation]

I would also like to thank the other Canadians who did not go to Montreal, but who were there with us in their hearts.

[English]

Finally, I would like to thank Barry Fowler and all the Windsor Jaycees for creating the central image of the final days of the campaign with their monstrous six metre by nine metre Canadian flag, the largest in Canada. By holding and walking under the flag, Canadians at the rally created the key image on the front pages of the newspapers and on televisions in Quebec and outside of Quebec: that of the Canadian flag awash on a sea of support for national unity, carried by Canadians gathered from coast to coast.

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a week ago today well over 100,000 Canadians converged on Place du Canada in Montreal to stand on guard for their country. From every part of Canada they came because they care. The rally last Friday was a defining moment in the referendum and in our history. It was a beautiful moment, a moment the people of Canada cannot let us politicians forget.

All week I have been getting calls from people asking me what they can do to make sure their message was understood and remembered. I have a suggestion. I invite those who were in Montreal last Friday to take a few moments to put their thoughts to paper, to share with others how they felt and why they were there.

We must capture the spirit of the rally and build on it. Once you have done that, people of Canada, send me a copy of your letter or send it to your member of Parliament. I will undertake to safeguard those letters and make sure that every premier in the land gets a copy. Do it now. Keep up the pressure.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in light of the disgraceful events yesterday in the House, the Deputy Prime Minister is clearly incapable of doing her job. In response to questions by the Official Opposition, she persisted in citing incorrect information in disregard of her responsibilities.

Her attitude certainly left something to be desired. Unable to justify the undemocratic remarks of the Prime Minister of Canada, she delighted in using diversionary tactics, which are inappropriate at this critical point in Quebec's and Canada's political history. Clearly, this government has lost control, and the Deputy Prime Minister no longer has any credibility, not only among Quebecers, but among all Canadians.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Monday some 49.5 per cent of Quebecers who voted yes to separation did so because they believe that status quo federalism is bankrupt and the government is incapable of carrying out necessary reforms. Others voted yes because they believed the claims of the separatist leadership that when countries split apart the process is quick, painless, and amicable.

• (1110)

The best way of combating these twin errors is for Canadian federalists to adopt a two–track approach. First we must advocate and implement a new confederation consisting of reforms that will decentralize the Canadian federal system. The Reform Party's 20–point new confederation proposal released several weeks ago outlines one method of doing this.

The Reform Party will also pursue a second stream intended to outline a formal Canadian position on the terms and conditions of separation if ever necessary. Such a position will make crystal clear to all concerned exactly what trials would be involved should the separatists ever attempt to lead Quebec out of Canada.

By outlining a more attractive vision—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Saint–Denis.

QUEBEC ECONOMY

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers have quickly turned the page on the proposal for a separate Quebec, as we learned this morning from a SOM–Le Soleil—Radio–Québec poll.

The poll, which was conducted between October 31 and November 2 among 812 people from all regions of Quebec, shows that 73 per cent of respondents want the Quebec government to participate in the renewal of the Canadian federation.

The poll also shows that Quebecers give priority to unemployment and deficit reduction as the first tasks that the federal government should tackle. Only 16 per cent of respondents see the renewal of federalism as a priority.

The people of Quebec have spoken once again. Let us hope that PQ and Bloc members will set their obsessions aside and address people's priorities.

YVES BLAIS

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is only one word to describe the comments made by Yves Blais, the PQ's regional delegate in the Outaouais, and that is blackmail.

When he visited the Outaouais in June, Mr. Parizeau made a commitment to give $15 million to the Outaouais economic diversification society.

Mr. Blais said that only two promises were conditional on achieving sovereignty: the one I just mentioned and the promise to hire federal public servants living in Quebec.

Mr. Blais is making up excuses to justify his lack of respect for the people of the Outaouais who voted no to Quebec separation. After the regrettable remarks made by his leader, the PQ member is showing us another hidden side of the separatist movement.

QUEBEC

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in the wake of the Quebec referendum, the Canadian provinces' great unanimity and unconditional declarations of love for Quebec have given way to backtracking and to a total lack of consensus. Once again, Quebec has been left to its own devices and its demands have been ignored.

Premiers Filmon and Romanow want to take this opportunity to make cosmetic changes to the constitution. Premiers Klein and Harcourt, however, would rather wait until 1997 before doing anything. And what about the ineffable Clyde Wells, who is still incapable of understanding what Quebec is all about?

As for the Prime Minister of Canada, he will certainly not be the one to propose comprehensive changes. Is he even willing to consider Quebec's legitimate aspirations, or does he simply intend to put Quebec in its place?

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am aghast at the seeming arrogance of the Minister of Justice.

First he neglects to adequately consult his provincial counterparts and aboriginal representatives on Bill C–68, while claiming otherwise. Then he dismisses the concerns of the rural members of his own caucus. Next he grabs for himself the power to prohibit any firearm that in his opinion is not reasonable for use in hunting or sporting purposes.

During report stage of Bill C–68 the justice minister changed one of his own colleague's amendments, which would have limited the autocratic powers of the minister. The justice minister's extensive knowledge about firearms banned the Olympic shooting pistol.

For the first time in history the justice minister has granted the federal government the power to commence proceedings under the Criminal Code, clearly infringing on provincial jurisdiction.

Finally, the minister on his own has rendered the Senate useless. He has said that even if the Senate dares to amend his gun legislation he will not accept it.

Confidence, Mr. Speaker? No, I say arrogance.

CANADA REMEMBERS

Mr. Paul Zed (Fundy—Royal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on October 23 I had the distinct pleasure of presenting awards to the Minto Elementary and Junior High School and Chipman Junior–Senior High School in Queen's county, New Brunswick. They placed first and second for their contributions to the Canada Remembers contest in Atlantic Canada.

The contest was part of the Canada Remembers program. It encouraged all junior and senior high schools to participate in the commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the second world war.

It is this kind of community spirit which has been demonstrated in Minto and Chipman, New Brunswick which has led to the success of the Canada Remembers program and the successful commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the second world war.

I am extremely proud of the commitment demonstrated by the students. All of us congratulate them. We are very proud of their contributions.

DEMOCRACY

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday on Téléjournal, the Radio–Canada news program, the Minister of Justice clearly mentioned the possibility of resurrecting a federal power that has not been used for more than half a century, the federal government's power of reservation and disallowance, to try and prevent Quebecers from voting when they see fit on their political future.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister agree it is inconceivable the federal government should try to use a power that has become obsolete, as the Supreme Court of Canada admitted, to prevent Quebecers from voting democratically on their political future?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers made a clear choice Monday night. Even the Leader of the Opposition agreed that the democratic position was to accept the fact that they voted no to separation. In Quebec, the Parti Quebecois was elected with a majority of one–quarter point. And in this case, the Leader of the Opposition made it quite clear he would not challenge the referendum results. I think that if his members have any respect for democracy, they should not challenge them either.

The best way to prevent a second referendum is to renew federalism, and that is what 73 per cent of the population wants, according to a poll released today.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am serious. The federal Minister of Justice says the federal government wants or may wish to use the power of disallowance to go over the head of the Quebec National Assembly. The minister is off topic and using all kinds of excuses to try to evade the issue.

How could the federal government even consider ignoring the powers of the Quebec National Assembly by using a power that, according to the Supreme Court, has become obsolete? Are we to understand that with this government, democracy comes second to federalism?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let us hope the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois respect democracy. Because if they have the slightest respect for democracy, they will accept the outcome of the vote last Monday, and they will abide by the wishes of 73 per cent of Quebecers who want the Quebec government to work towards renewing federalism. That is democracy. Democracy spoke Monday night, and the Parti Quebecois should listen.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this from the Deputy Prime Minister of a government that, I may remind you, was formed by the party that introduced the War Measures Act in Quebec in 1970. We know your democratic propensities. A party that, through its Minister of Justice, tells us it will use a power now obsolete, the power of disallowance, to flout the authority of the Quebec National Assembly and ignore its decisions. And this party, which according to the Prime Minister would not have respected the results of the referendum, now wants to give us a lesson in democracy.

An hon. member: The nerve.

Mr. Gauthier: Are we to understand that because they have nothing to propose, because the provincial Premiers are starting to reconsider, because the government has no plan and because they know that next time, the Yes side will win, the government is desperate, and its only option is to deny the democratic system, either through the power of disallowance or by going before the courts?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wonder what Anita Martinez thinks of democracy according to the Parti Quebecois. Anita Martinez is a 23 year old worker in Quebec who was accused by the Deputy Premier of Quebec of not being a real Quebecer.

Those people over there want to teach us a lesson in democracy, but we respect the results and we respect the fact that whether it is cast by a Nunez, a Martinez or a Lucien Bouchard, a vote is a vote, and the results of Monday night's democratic vote should be respected by the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in the last stretch of the referendum campaign the Prime Minister of Canada, along with several premiers of English speaking provinces, clearly implied that changes were coming in Canada, particularly the formal recognition of Quebec as a distinct society. It would appear that the Prime Minister is planning in the very near future to make a "motherhood" announcement of his intentions toward the distinct society.

Does the Prime Minister realize that bringing in any federal legislative measure whatsoever on the recognition of distinct society status will not offer any response at all to the legitimate aspirations of the Quebec people, for Quebecers want more than cosmetic changes with no true meaning?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when will the party of the official opposition give up on continuing to fight a lost referendum, and when will it start addressing the true problems of Quebecers, which are problems of unemployment and problems of investment?

We face the official opposition here as a government which is attempting to develop Quebec and Canada, which is attempting to reduce unemployment. We know that Quebecers want us to renew federalism and want to see the economic situation improved. And the official opposition is continuing to debate arguments that were settled on the evening of the referendum. Quebecers decided democratically that they did not want out of Canada, and I implore the official opposition to return to the path of duty and to defend Quebecers, to help us create jobs and investments.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister talk about the real problems of Canadians, when the government is tabling no legislative measure whatsoever in response to those very problems?

Now, to my question. How can we have any faith in the Prime Minister when it comes to the distinct society, when his allies in English Canada wasted no time immediately after the referendum in diluting the content of the resolutions they had adopted in their legislative assemblies, particularly when we are familiar with the views of the Prime Minister, the man who killed Meech Lake, on the distinct society?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the person who changed sides, who jumped ship one month after the Meech Lake agreement, was the Leader of the Opposition.

It would be advisable, if the hon. member does not want to listen to the voice of the people as expressed in this morning's poll, for him to listen to the former leader of his party, Pierre–Marc Johnson, who today stated according to the Parti Quebecois that "the government ought to get busy instead with governing, given the unemployment situation and the pressures on the public purse".

If they will not listen to Daniel Johnson and the Liberals, they might at least listen to Pierre–Marc Johnson.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadian federalists must never get into any future contest with Quebec separatists—and regrettably there will be one more contest—as ill prepared and ill equipped as they entered the last referendum campaign.

If we are to keep this great country together, we have to fight the separatist dream with a federalist vision, not the status quo. We have to fight separatist deceptions not with panic or propaganda, but with the naked truth about what separation really means. The time to prepare the ground is before, not during some future campaign.

I ask the intergovernmental affairs minister, in this period prior to the next real confrontation with the separatists, what is the government going to do to make the real consequences of secession crystal clear to every Quebecer?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during the campaign the economic arguments against separation were done well. They convinced a large number of Quebecers that separation was not in their economic interests and would be very costly especially to the vulnerable elements in society the separatists say they want to defend.

What is more important is that federalism is not the status quo. Federalism has been flexible. We indicated in fact, not in words like the opposition, that we were ready to reduce the size of the federal government and we were ready to review the powers of the various levels of government.

We are presently doing that. The federalism test we have applied is presently resulting in all kinds of powers being reassessed between the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it may be that some of the economic arguments on the dangers of secession were presented.

The sad fact is that on October 30 over 30 per cent of the people who voted yes thought they were voting for a new and better economic union with Canada rather than for a separate Quebec. The federal government and the no campaign failed utterly to get through to those voters on the negative implications of a yes vote. That simply cannot be allowed to ever happen again.

To prevent that from happening again, will the government begin to clearly and openly answer from a Canadian perspective all the what if questions which are raised by a Quebec secession and which I presented to the Prime Minister on June 8, 1994 prior to the last campaign?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the question asked was confusing. We said that during the campaign. A number of Quebecers who voted yes voted yes under the misapprehension that a partnership was possible and that it was a mandate to negotiate.

What is important now is not to relive the referendum. It is important now to see that we have to reform Canada. The government has not only agreed to that, but we indicated that especially in last February's budget where we re-established fiscal responsibility and where we indicated the future elements of decentralization that should take place.

We are not in favour of decentralization for the sake of decentralization. We are for decentralization to the extent that it serves the people of Canada by making the various levels of government more efficient. We will not move in the direction of decentralization without justification.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government can try to ignore 30 per cent of the yes people who thought they were voting for something else. I suggest that is keeping the government's head in the sand. That is not going to win the battle with the separatists the next time around.

Quebecers must know the Canadian position on terms and conditions of separation. Quebecers have to know the Canadian position on debt division, the Canadian position on boundaries, the Canadian position on protecting Atlantic Canada and the Canadian position on terms and conditions of trade.

Since over 30 per cent of yes voters thought they could keep all the benefits of Canadianism and vote for separation, will the government begin to spell out the Canadian position on terms and conditions of separation in order to make the negative consequences of separation clear to every Quebecer?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian position includes Quebec. It is still part of Canada, thank God, after Monday night.

Even if the leader of the third party will not listen to members of the federal House who ask for his help in the rebuilding process, would he at least listen to the leader of the no forces, Daniel Johnson, who said yesterday: "Mr. Manning is playing into the hands of those who want to break up Canada by not recognizing some of the self-evident truths that this country is founded on". Please listen to Mr. Johnson and join Team Canada.

The Speaker: My colleagues, even though we are quoting someone else's statement, I would appreciate it if we would address each other by our ridings or our titles in the House.

RIGHT OF VETO

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The day before yesterday, the Prime Minister stated in this House, and I quote: "I said it would be a veto for the people of Quebec". When questioned about the meaning of this statement, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs suggested that we ask the Prime Minister himself for clarifications, because he was unable to tell us what the Prime Minister meant.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister clarify for us what the Prime Minister was referring to when he spoke of a veto for the people of Quebec?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois is asking all kinds of questions about the promises made by the Prime Minister, but I can assure the Bloc that we will keep our word. We will stand by the Prime Minister's promise for change.

Let us just hope that the Bloc Quebecois will respect the result of Monday's vote, in which a majority of voters in Quebec said no to separation. They now want the PQ and the Bloc Quebecois to focus on the issues. Unemployment figures were released today. We should work together to find effective ways of dealing with the unemployment problem, instead of continually quarrelling about the constitution.

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the people of Quebec regard as important the questions that we, as the official opposition, ask in this House.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister explain how the Prime Minister can refuse to clarify what he really meant with respect to the right of veto, when the minister responsible, one of the brightest members of cabinet, admits to not knowing what the Prime Minister was talking about?

• (1135)

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, obviously, members may ask any question they want. The question the people of Quebec are asking themselves right now is: When will the Government of Quebec and the Bloc Quebecois start focusing on the economy?

We know for instance that the Parti Quebecois was prepared to put on the line billions of dollars from the Quebec old age pension fund, as Mr. Parizeau himself indicated when he said: "The defensive tools we are referring to certainly include the deposit fund. This, of course, represents a lot of money. Hundreds of millions of dollars". In fact, it is more like a few billion dollars. The Premier of Quebec was prepared to put on the line billions of dollars that Quebecers have contributed to the Quebec old age pension fund to further his own separatist ambitions, and the people have said no. Let us hope that he will respect their wishes.

FEDERAL–PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the federal government collects money from taxpayers in Quebec and other provinces. It then spends that money, after keeping some of it, on programs for manpower training, for immigration settlement and a whole range of programs, all with lots of strings attached that the provinces do not like.

My question is for any minister responsible for such spending programs. For the sake of unity, why do not the ministers responsible for this spending simply call up their counterparts in the provinces and say: "As of the first of next month we will send you the money, totally without strings attached, for you to spend any way in which you wish for the sake of unity"?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have to remind members of the third party that we were elected by Canadians like they were and Canadians did not ask us to implement every desire of the premiers of the provinces.

They asked us to act in their interests by spending the taxes we collect from all Canadians for the benefit of all Canadians, not for the benefit of province a, b or c, in particular, but within province a, b or c, for the benefit of all Canadians. This is how we differ from provincial governments.

In this case the question to be asked is are the interests of Canadians being served well? The record is clear. The country we have created is the proof. As the federal government we have been serving Canadians right. There are some fields where the powers of the various levels of government must be reassigned. But it must be done for reasons of efficiency and service to citizens, not for reasons of ideology.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question did not reveal ideology. It reveals a new position in which this country is finding itself, one over which the last election was not fought. At that time we did not know how strongly Quebecers felt about their desire to have control over these kinds of spending programs.

The ball game has changed. I would like to get to the question of spending another $750 million on yet another program that not only we cannot afford but also impinges on provincial sovereignty, namely spending on day care facilities.

When will the Minister of Finance cancel the program that not only destroys national unity, but ruins spending programs?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal of discussion in the House in the last few days about democracy. One clear responsibility of a democratic system is to respond to the desires of people as they express them at the ballot box.

• (1140)

In the last election in 1993 this party put forward a proposal for assistance to the provinces to enhance child care. In that way we could ensure a basic standard of development for children right across Canada regardless of the respective wealth of different regions. We want to ensure that in this new workplace where many families have both parents working, where there are many single parents who want to go back to work that need good care for their children, the federal government would provide assistance. The government does not want to impinge, does not want to take over. It wants to share, as we have always tried to do in this party.

In 1993 we received the mandate of 178 seats elected. That is why we are the government. That is why we intend to carry out a major investment in child care. It may not be the priority of the Reform Party but we happen to think that good care for children is a real priority for all Canadians.

CANADIAN TELEPHONE COMPANIES

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

As we know, several telephone companies ignored the CRTC's ruling or ban and allowed tens of thousands of Canadians to phone, at no cost, Quebecers to influence their vote on sovereignty.

Can the minister tell the House what penalties might be imposed to the telephone companies that violated the Quebec referendum act and ignored the CRTC's ruling?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this really is a question for the CRTC. At this point, we do not have all the facts. As the hon. member knows, the CRTC made a ruling last Friday regarding the special rates announced by the telephone companies. That ruling should have been complied with by those companies.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell the House whether he intends to make sure that this issue will not be shelved and that these telephone companies will be given the maximum penalty, so that they do not again ignore the CRTC's rulings?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the request that the member puts to me is one that is not within my powers.

I find it surprising that the separatist movement is so frightened that Quebecers would hear the true views of Canadians from across the country that they want to put up walls around their province to keep those voices out.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we both know and a lot of Canadians know there are a lot of problems in this country, not the least of which are the high levels of taxation and the huge debt this finance minister is proud to add to at the rate $37.5 billion per year.

He said this on Wednesday: "This is a marked improvement in the fiscal situation and one which illustrates that making forecasts based on prudent assumptions will pay off. This is another good news report".

I am glad his family business is in trust because if he ran his business the way he runs the country he would be broke.

When will the finance minister do the responsible thing and present a balanced budget to all Canadians?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought the hon. member would take some comfort in the fact that for the first time in over a decade we have a government that is capable of hitting its targets which is obviously very important in establishing the credibility of one's position.

At the same time we have indicated that the best way to control spending, the best way of keeping government's feet to the fire, is to operate on the basis of a set of rolling two–year targets. That is a process which clearly works and is one that we continue.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let me try to keep the finance minister's feet to the fire.

Two years ago I ran to get rid of a government that ran up a $38 billion deficit. Here we are two years later and nothing has changed. We are still bringing in deficits in the $35 billion to $38 billion range.

Once again for the good of Canada, for the good of the global market, when will this finance minister—if he is not capable, step aside—present a budget that is clear, that sets out a target as to when we will be at a zero deficit? When will he quit adding to the problem and quit playing his games with our future?

• (1145)

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the deficit number two years ago that we inherited was not $38 billion. It was $42.5 billion. We improved on it by $4.5 billion.

For the good of Canada, for the good of global markets, could the member opposite please get his numbers right.

REFLOATING THE IRVING WHALE

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Early this week, the intrepid Minister of the Environment took advantage of the absence of Bloc members to accuse them of obstructing her plan to refloat the Irving Whale. The truth is, the minister is so incompetent that she is desperately looking for a scape goat to hide her own inability to find a safe solution to the problem of the Irving Whale.

Would the minister agree it is high time she showed some flexibility and agreed to appoint a panel of independent experts who would be able to find a safe solution that would take into account the presence of PCBs aboard the barge, something she has failed to do so far?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we do have a safe solution. We plan to refloat the barge next spring, despite the official opposition which is still obstructing this plan and always has.

Mrs. Tremblay: Now look, it was the courts, not us. Really, now.

Ms. Copps: It is unfortunate that the Bloc is obstructing. One thing is clear: the Magdalen Islands RCMs are on my side, because they want the Irving Whale to be refloated.

Mrs. Tremblay: Exaggerating again.

Ms. Copps: And that is not what the Bloc Quebecois wants, that is the truth.

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we have just spent $12 million for absolutely nothing. This is money citizens will have to pay.

Will the minister admit that the reason she is faced today with a worldwide campaign by Greenpeace, not just Greenpeace Canada but Greenpeace International, which has condemned her incompetence in this matter, the reason is she is incapable of considering an alternative to the least costly solution, which will cost twice as much as initially estimated and which is also the most dangerous one?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Greenpeace campaign stresses how important it is to refloat the Irving Whale. I hope Greenpeace will acknowledge there has been only one government in the past 20 years that had a policy for refloating.

Unfortunately, when the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean was Minister of the Environment, the Irving Whale was at the bottom, and there was no question of refloating. We are going to refloat it, over the protests of the Bloc members, and I am glad Greenpeace acknowledges the fact that refloating is important to prevent a crisis as a result of the leaks that are now occurring. That is why fishermen, the population and the RCMs on the Magdalen Islands support the policy adopted by the Government of Canada.

SEXUAL ABUSE

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago in Halifax the solicitor general announced the second phase of a national program to help protect the young and the vulnerable from sexual abuse at the hands of people in positions of trust.

Could the solicitor general tell the House how the new program would protect our children from potential sexual abuse?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is working with the Canadian Association of Volunteer Bureaus to carry out a program to educate voluntary organizations on the need for screening people who are seeking employment or volunteer positions working with children or other vulnerable individuals.

The program involves sending briefing books and videos to over 200 volunteer bureaus across Canada and to some 1,900 police services. There will also be a series of workshops conducted in over 200 volunteer bureau areas.

This will supplement the program I announced last year of using the Canadian police information system computers managed by the RCMP to provide a screening system to help prevent people involved in sex abuse from taking up positions as volunteers or employees when it comes to working with children or vulnerable individuals.

• (1150)

The program is a worthwhile one and responds to the objectives of all Canadians. I hope it will have the support of all members of the House.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians are aware of the horrific torture of three Ottawa teens and the death of 17–year old Sylvain Leduc at the hands of a vicious youth gang.

The minister is aware the studies his department has received by noted criminologists state that young offenders believe there will be no serious consequences for criminal action and they will commit unlawful acts that include torture and violence.

Would someone on that side of the House explain why the minister will not put severe consequences in the Young Offenders Act for brutal, violent, sadistic crimes committed by young offenders?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government has brought forward legislation to tighten up the Young Offenders Act and provide more severe penalties. The law has been adopted. It will go a long way to responding to the kinds of concerns raised by my hon. friend.

At the same time, the justice committee of the House has been mandated to carry out an overall review of the work with respect to young offenders. I hope it will be able to take into account the understandable concerns of my hon. friend. I appreciate his raising this important point.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the minister that these types of crimes are showing up more and more often and that they need to be stopped. If he is referring to Bill C–37, forget it; it will not do the trick.

I have a supplementary question. When will the minister change the Young Offenders Act so the names and pictures of violent and sadistic gang members such as the Ace Crew, regardless of their age, become available to the general public for its own protection?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this information is available to and used by law enforcement agencies. The hon. member's suggestion is one that can be given active consideration in the course of the wide ranging and urgent review of young offenders provisions currently under way in the justice committee.

I urge my hon. friend and his colleagues to take that review seriously and participate in the hearings so we will have a good result in the interests of all Canadians.

HAZARDOUS WASTE

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux–Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Recently, the Globe and Mail revealed that some people have managed to find a way to follow the advice of the Minister of the Environment, who wished to see Canada transform its environmental challenges into economic opportunities. Despite its regulations, Canada is in fact exporting hazardous waste to the third world.

Does the minister confirm her departmental employees' complaints of being so short of resources that they cannot assume their responsibilities and apply the regulations on hazardous waste exports properly?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): In fact, Mr. Speaker, during the review of the budgets for environment, the budget for protection was increased.

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux–Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today the minister is avoiding direct answers with surprising regularity. I shall, however, try a supplementary.

Does the minister understand that she ought to ensure that her departmental employees apply existing regulations properly, rather than seek to set national standards and to continually meddle in areas of provincial jurisdiction?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, I am trying to follow the lead of the former Minister of the Environment, the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean, who stated that the federal government had not only a duty to be concerned about the environment, but a responsibility. And I endorse that statement by the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean.

VIOLENT CRIMINALS

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, one of the men wanted in the torture slaying of Sylvain Leduc was on parole at the time of the killing and wanted on a Canada–wide warrant. John Richardson was on mandatory release from Millhaven penitentiary after serving just two–thirds of his sentence.

• (1155)

Reform has been asking for the elimination of mandatory release but our pleas and the pleas of many Canadians and victims of violent crimes have fallen on deaf ears.

My question is for the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General of Canada. In view of the murders of Sylvain Leduc and Melanie Carpenter, also murdered by an offender on statutory release, why will he not move immediately to eliminate mandatory release?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend in beginning his question said that the individual in question was on parole. The person in question was not on parole. He had not been released pursuant to any decision of the parole board.

Instead, as the hon. member said later in his question, the individual was on mandatory release. The conditions in the law for the automatic sending of the person's case to the parole board for a detention hearing had not been met because the person's original offence did not involve crimes of violence or drugs.

With respect to the basic point he is making, most of the people on mandatory release are not involved in further offences. Experience has shown that a controlled period of supervision at the end of a sentence is the best way of ensuring that there are not further offences, something I hope the hon. member will support. I hope he will support measures designed to avoid further offences rather than steps that might create more.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, John Richardson was denied parole not once but twice because the parole board said: "There is indication of behaviour that demonstrates a potential to commit an offence involving violence".

When Richardson was released by statutory requirement, conditions were attached because: "You remain a high risk to reoffend". This evidence clearly indicates that the death of Sylvain Leduc could have been prevented.

When will the minister move to eliminate mandatory release to keep dangerous offenders locked up? When?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at this point the individual in question is wanted for questioning. Charges have not yet been laid against him.

The hon. member is jumping to conclusions which may or may not turn out to be correct. At the same time he is raising an understandable concern which I share. However the point he is making with respect to the absolute abolition of mandatory supervision does not fit in with reality. The best way to help ensure further offences do not take place is to have people under a form of supervision and controlled release into the community so that they will not do things that are likely to lead to further offences. Most cases of mandatory supervision turn out well and tragic incidents are the exception rather than the rule.

There is a provision in the law whereby if a person is considered to be likely to carry out further offences and certain conditions are met the case can be referred to the parole board for a hearing which can lead to the person's detention to the end of sentence. Unfortunately the conditions were not met because the person's original conviction was not for one of the offences in schedule one or two.

The hon. member calls for changes in the law. This can certainly be considered. If we present changes to the law I hope he will co–operate in ways that protect public safety rather than simply making a lot of noise about it.

TRADE

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

This week the House has been debating at second reading an act to implement an agreement concerning Canada's internal trade. Certainly in the province of Ontario members of the business community and consumers strongly support the legislation because it is good for our economy.

Will the agreement be as good for Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Another economic study last week indicated that the provinces of Canada do twenty times the business among themselves they do with the United States, once differences in size and distance are taken into account.

This reveals the importance of internal trade for jobs and Canada's economic growth.

• (1200)

[English]

In trying to make the internal market work better in Canada, it would be very helpful in the context of the current debate if some members of the House were less concerned about what powers are exercised in what capitals and more concerned about looking at ways to make the internal market of Canada work better to create jobs and opportunity for Canadians across the country.

PUBLIC FINANCES

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, PC): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Like the rest of us, the Minister of Finance noted the profound desire for change in the referendum. He is obviously very attuned to the question of public finances.

I wonder whether the Minister of Finance might not use this opportunity to put forward a national plan to the country to eliminate the public deficit and debt with objectives we could all support and joint deadlines and whether now is not a singular time to do so for the benefit of the country as a whole.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party is entirely right to talk of a desire for change that is reflected right across the country, from Atlantic to Pacific. He should know that this very thing was discussed at the last two meetings of the country's finance ministers. I agree with him totally about what must be done, namely, drawing up a federal–provincial master plan with very clear objectives of consolidating public finances at both levels of government.

I can also tell him that the provinces have made a lot of progress, with one exception, perhaps, and that the federal government is now on the right track. We will have to continue in this vein, and I hope all the provinces will take part.

PETITIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition that has been circulating all across Canada. This particular petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Langley, B.C.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Charles Hubbard (Miramichi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from my constituents concerning the methods our government might use in the area of furniture moving.

The petitioners indicate a concern that the proposed method, if adopted, could indicate that one company would have the entire system of moving furniture for all governmental departments. They petition that the former system, the one that has been in place for some years, be continued and that all companies across Canada be given some portion of that movement.

PAROLE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present another 1,239 names to the tens of thousands of signatures already submitted.

These 1,239 signatures represent people from across the country who are asking that Parliament enact legislation against serious personal injury crimes being committed by high risk offenders by permitting the use of post-sentence detention orders and specifically by passing Bill C-240.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition this afternoon signed by a number of people from all across Canada.

The petitioners pray that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

Question No. 209—Mr. Hart:

With respect of the Department of National Defence's white paper promise to purchase new search and rescue and shipborne helicopters, (a) does the government intend to purchase one helicopter for both roles or two, (b) what is the total amount of money the government is allotting to the purchase of new search and rescue and shipborne helicopters, (c) over how many years will the new search and rescue and shipborne helicopters be purchased, (d) how much money will be allotted annually to a program to purchase new search and rescue and shipborne helicopters (e) is the government considering purchasing a scaled down version of the EH-101 and if so will companies awarded penalties due to the cancellation of the former government's EH-101 program be getting new contracts?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): With respect to the purchase of new search and rescue and shipborne helicopters, the Minister of National Defence has not yet brought recommendations to his colleagues. Therefore it is premature to state what the government's intentions will be with respect to these projects.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C-108, an act to amend the National Housing Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-108, an act to amend the National Housing Act. I am speaking on behalf of the member for Comox—Alberni, the Reform critic for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

This is actually a very brief bill and its intent is quite simply explained. Bill C-108 proposes to increase the aggregate amount of outstanding CMHC loan insurance from $100 billion to $150 billion, plus any additional amounts that may be authorized by Parliament. That means that CMHC's liability limit will be increased by $50 billion. That is billions, not millions—fifty thousand million dollars, a huge increase over the present liabilities.

I am not surprised that the Bloc would support such an increase in liabilities. It really thinks it is getting something for nothing. It thinks money grows on trees. The fact is it is a much more complex situation than that.

Many areas of concern are raised by this bill, concerns that are being voiced by Canadians right now. It surprises me that given the nature of this bill the government is not listening to those concerns. On second thought, maybe it is not such a surprise, given the history of the government so far.

• (1210)

Canadians are already very concerned about the current debt load. They are carrying that debt load and it is creating an inability for them to move forward financially or personally because of high taxes. Every way they turn they are being taxed over and over. There is no room to move. Pretty soon there will not be much left to tax.

The bill does nothing to halt the trend to ever bigger government and increasing public liabilities. It appears that the government is willing to gamble taxpayers' dollars at a time when the present debt is already more than $564 billion and climbing by $100 million every day.

Increasing the liability limit for insuring mortgages is nothing more than government speculation without any money. It is a trend that has been going on in other departments and it really must come to an end. The Liberal government has borrowed more than $80 billion in the first two years of its mandate, and it is continuing to spend beyond its means. This year alone the government had to borrow another $32 billion.

CMHC finances are actuarially accounted for every 20 years, so the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation does not know what its ultimate liability will be or what it really has outstanding right now. Bill C–108 should be of great concern to all Canadians, who can clearly see that the government is continuing to spend well beyond its means and incurring liabilities that on a standard accounting balance sheet would show that we are actually in very deep trouble.

By increasing Canada's liabilities we are increasing our risks. Although Bill C–108 does not ask for actual cash per se, it is increasing the liability, which will in the end cost taxpayers a tremendous amount of money if there is a major default. Loans and mortgages are not guaranteed; they can fall back on the government and lead to a further lowering of Canada's international standing and raise the overall debt.

Canadians are already staggering under an oppressive tax burden. They do not need government to dig them a deeper hole. They want to get out of the hole, as proven by the types of provincial governments they have been electing of late.

The government will not disclose its ongoing liability. I would like to see it publish a standard accounting style balance sheet once a year, as was done in New Zealand. Members know that I am originally from New Zealand. There is a law there that requires the government to actually print once a year all of its liabilities in standard accounting form. The first year the country did that, it discovered there was a negative worth in the country and it had to cancel a lot of the liabilities.

If standard accounting practices were used here in Canada to show the liabilities, we would probably find a network of debt and liabilities all strung together in a way that would be completely unacceptable and illegal probably in the private sector.

It certainly appears the government does not know how large the liabilities will be 10 or 15 years from now. Yet it is continuing to increase that liability load on us. This trend of increasing government liabilities across the board will only lead to the government overextending itself, to the detriment of taxpayers who bear the burden of the national debt.

Last week on television the Prime Minister spoke from Montreal with desperate pleas to Canada and promises to Quebec that the Liberal government would make changes if Quebec would stay in Canada. Yet it is ironic that on the eve of the Quebec referendum the government had the gall to table this bill. While the Prime Minister was in Montreal making overtures of a new and decentralized federal government, at the very same time his representatives in Ottawa were tabling a bill that takes us in exactly the opposite direction. So it should not be a surprise if Canadians find that the Prime Minister is trying to back down on his promise. Looking at this bill, it is obvious the government has no intention of decentralizing and that it really wants to cling to every piece of power it has.

When asked about promises of decentralization, all the Prime Minister could say is: "That is going to require a lot more thought and discussion, but I am sure there is going to be some of that". Some of that—what does that mean? Has the government not learned anything from the Quebec result? Did it not do any forward planning? Demands for decentralization are being heard across the country. They did not start with the Quebec referendum; they were there long before that. It takes a major crisis of unity in the country before the government will even begin to address the problems.

When asked about what degree of decentralization the government was considering, the Prime Minister responded that he did not know at this point in time. He did not know. More waffling as usual. Canadians are getting pretty tired of all the waffling from the Liberal Party.

The answer is right here in this bill. The government does not want to decentralize. It is looking to strengthen its federal control. Canadians are not going to tolerate the double talk for too long. Misrepresentation of intent from the government can be seen in the changes that are now sweeping the country at the political level.

The Liberal government's response to Canadians' desire for change has been totally inadequate to say the least. The status quo has got to go if we are going to move forward as a nation.

There was an example today in question period when we asked yet again about the Young Offenders Act. We have been asking week after week after week for two years and the government has done nothing to address the concerns of people. We still have these young punks out there who do not have their names or their pictures published. We have to get this government doing something for Canadians for a change.

Lingering uncertainty in Quebec continues to plague Canada's economic security. Only a few days ago it was reported in the newspapers that the bond raters are still uncertain about Canada's economic future because the Quebec situation remains unresolved. If the government cannot take steps to address the problems at hand, we are simply headed for more chaos.

The future financial stability of this country depends on how well this government addresses its fiscal problems. So far, the picture does not look very rosy. Canadians want a smaller federal government.

The minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation claims that his departments and responsibilities, including CMHC, are headed in that direction. However, this bill shows the federal government is actually moving in the opposite direction.

Instead of downsizing and moving away from the housing market, the government wants to put another $50 billion of mortgage liabilities on the backs of Canadian taxpayers. This will increase the federal role, not downsize it as the government claims. If the government is as committed to decentralization as it would want us to believe, then why is the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation grabbing for more money?

The federal government must realign its responsibilities with other governments in this country and the time to start doing it is now. It is absolutely necessary that the government take steps in the right direction, not backward as it is doing with bills like this one. In the light of the disastrous campaign the government led during the referendum debate, it is a pity it has not learned any lessons.

Canadians are taxed to the hilt with all the levels of government they are financing. Not only are they paying for services whose needs are often questionable, but they are paying for the same services again and again through user fees, not just at the federal level but at the provincial and municipal levels as well.

The Reform Party proposed in its recent 20–point plan for decentralization to totally transfer over to the provinces a number of areas of operation at the federal level that are duplicated at the provincial level. Those areas illustrate mostly a federal level of meddling in affairs that are actually set under the Constitution to be provincial. The federal government is long overdue in getting out of those areas of provincial responsibility.

This is not the time for the government to put up its feet and relax because it thinks it won the Quebec debate. It is time for the government to start coming up with a plan that truly decentralizes. One of the things it could be doing is moving total responsibility for housing to the provincial level. If the government would come up with such a plan, it would begin to save the taxpayers some money.

Perhaps it would not be such a bad idea if the government tried adopting the suggestions the Reform Party has made. We have offered the government the entire plan. We have dropped the plain brown envelope on the floor outside the office door of the Deputy Prime Minister. All she has to do is look inside the envelope to see what good ideas are shown there.

Yesterday in his speech at the Canadian Club in Toronto, the leader of the Reform Party received a standing ovation for the suggestions in that 20–point plan. It was very well received as could be seen by the live telecast of that speech on the "National" yesterday.

• (1220)

The Reform Party has been listening to Canadians. If government members need some help heading in the right direction, we are more than happy to assist. They just have to pick up the plain brown envelope off the floor outside the Deputy Prime Minister's office.

As I said, one of our proposals is for the federal government to get out of the housing business. If crown corporations like CMHC are truly self–supporting let us turn them over to the private sector. Areas which are perhaps socially oriented should be turned over to the provincial level.

Not only do Canadians want an end to federal interference in areas of provincial responsibility, they also want clearer distinctions of responsibility between the provinces. They do not want this muddled thing we have right now where municipal, federal and provincial governments get all mixed up together giving one another grants. It is like government incest in a way.

Canadians also want an end to federal interference in the private sector. They are sick and tired of the federal government interfering unnecessarily in their affairs.

Bill C–108 allows the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to significantly increase its presence in the mortgage market. It represents a further intrusion into a private market and will lead to further distortions of that market.

The federal government is artificially inflating mortgages in urban areas in order to subsidize rural areas. The government's policy of cross–subsidization of mortgages means that houses in urban areas cost more to Canadians than they would if the federal government stepped out of the housing business in the first place. It is all very well to offer a lower price to rural residents, but why should urban areas bear the brunt of that cost? Federal meddling in the housing industry also means that private companies like GE are offering mortgages at a higher rate as well.

It is time for the government to stop artificially jacking up mortgage rates and to stop subsidizing one kind of mortgage by gouging rates on another. Let private industry do what it does best, provide consumers with competitive mortgage rates.

In terms of the 5 per cent down program, there is a very real danger that any economic downturn which continues the trend we have seen lately where property prices have been falling could create a situation where homeowners are left holding mortgages worth more than the property. It is a simplification for the government to say that the liabilities we are incurring have no cost. If the property market turns down and homeowners walk away from some of those commitments, the taxpayers are left holding the can.

I was in the U.K. in August over the summer break. Incidentally, my trip was paid for with my own funds and not those of taxpayers. I met with some bankers while I was in London. To my astonishment, I was told that because of the property downturn in the U.K. some banks are now holding a lot of mortgages in their portfolios which are currently valued at 120 per cent of the properties on which the mortgages were originally taken out.

The banks are also holding in their portfolios huge numbers of vacant properties because people have walked away from those commitments. That is a sign of the sort of disaster which can happen if the government does not take into account where these liabilities could lead.

It is pretty frightening that we are building up a liability account in this area of something of the order of $150 billion. It is wonderful to offer this opportunity for new homeowners to get into home ownership, but to do it on the backs of the taxpayers is not a good idea.

For that reason among others, the Reform Party does not support an increased federal role in the mortgage market. We do not support increasing federal liabilities. We do not support federal meddling in the private sector and therefore, we do not support this bill.

In conclusion, I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following:
> this House declines to give second reading to Bill C–108, an act to amend the National Housing Act, because the principle of the bill does not address the issue of transferring the responsibility of housing from the federal government to the provinces.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The motion the hon. member just moved was a substantive motion and not an amendment to the motion now before the House. I do not believe it is in order.

• (1225)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We certainly take every consideration necessary before making the proper ruling. Having reviewed the full contents of the motion and its form as it is written here, the motion is in order.

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak about housing.

Since giving my first speech in this House during the throne speech debate, I have pledged to be one of those members who tries to make a difference and tries to make things work.

A wise man was once asked which was the most important level of government: provincial, federal or municipal. The wise man thought for a little while and responded by asking which was the most important leg of a three–legged stool.

We have had the referendum. I must say that I work in this House with all members from all sectors, the independents, the BQ, the Reform Party, the NDP, the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party. There is a lot of talent. Many of us are spending a lot of time on other things when the taxpayers have indicated there are so many restructuring things happening and the Canadian economy needs to be addressed. Yet we get into partisan discussions which are sometimes pretty nonsensical. We talk about devolution, restructuring and downsizing. Some people do not even know what the heck they are talking about with regard to those.

As a member of this House I am going to start talking directly to the Canadian people. They have sent us to this place to do a job. We have talents and we have to use those talents. We must use Canada's resources, both human and natural, to the best advantage for Canadians. Canadians expect to have jobs. They expect to have good health care and they expect to have good housing.

To address one of the points raised by the hon. member of the Reform Party, I remind him that the mortgage insurance premiums charged by the CMHC are sufficient to meet the risks being assumed at no cost to the government. The viability of CMHC's mortgage insurance fund is assessed annually by an independent actuary. An actuarial evaluation of the fund as of September 30, 1994 has confirmed its long term solvency.

Since 1946 CMHC has returned $1 billion in the form of taxes and profits. The mortgage insurance fund contributed an additional $35 million in 1992 to the consolidated revenue fund. The member also needs to be reminded that the activities of the fund contribute to the stable supply of affordable housing for all Canadians, including the handicapped and poor people.

No province has expressed an interest in moving into this sector of the economy. There is no duplication. A change in the market is essential for the viability of the fund. This balances the economic and budgetary risks. Clearly the third party is ignoring 320,000 Canadians who have purchased homes throughout the land with the fund.

• (1230)

Before returning to the substance of the bill I would like to address some comments by a member of the Bloc Quebecois. On one hand we have the Reform Party balance sheet argument. On the other hand I had a lot of sympathy for my friend from the BQ because he was looking at disadvantaged people. He talked about the fact that some of them made only $30,000 and had problems.

I will return to the facts. I say as a mayor of a community that we needed intervention by governments. There were slum landlords. There were cockroaches. There was inadequate housing. The heat would be turned off at certain periods of time. That intervention has brought real standards so that we could have good homes for all Canadians.

The member opposite did not give the correct statistics with regard to the amount of funds spent in Quebec. I will address some of his comments. Between 1986 and 1993 Quebec received 29 per cent of all federal social housing units committed nationwide. In 1994–95 in Quebec $357 million was spent on social housing. The member simply chooses to ignore the importance of that contribution.

That contribution means that 140,000 units of social housing received federal assistance in Quebec. It also means that Canadians in Quebec have benefited from federal programs like the residential rehabilitation assistance program.

One factor the member should be aware of is that the funding for new social housing commitments in Canada has been distributed according to a model established on need. That is why Quebec received 29 per cent of all federal units between 1986 and 1993. Additionally between 1992 and 1994 there were more than 53,000 instances of first home loan insurance for Canadians in Quebec. This is one example of what the federal government can do to assist all Canadians.

This program costs the government nothing. CMHC has returned more than $1 billion in profits and taxes to the federal government. Over and above this amount, the federal government has received $55 million from the mortgage insurance fund. This amount was returned to the consolidated revenue fund in 1992. It is being applied to reduce the federal deficit.

We have a great country in Canada. We have our problems but we have solutions to the problems. When we work collaboratively on the solutions the country will do well. That is why we are the best in the world, between number one and number three. That is why we have good standards.

Notwithstanding that globally we have a lot of structural change, Canadians will come out better because we will apply the programs for which the government was elected. We have the talent to do it and we have the will to do it.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in support of Bill C–108, an act to amend the National Housing Act. This is an administrative bill, the purpose of which is to increase the ceiling of the CMHC mortgage loan insurance from the current $100 billion to $150 billion.

My colleague also described for us the importance of the role of the CMHC's mortgage loan insurance, the importance that it played and continues to play in helping Canadians to have access to home ownership.

Home ownership is a cherished dream held by many Canadians and there are good reasons for it. Home equity is a major portion of wealth accumulated by households and has been a great source of retirement savings for Canadians. The concept of home speaks to one of our basic human needs. Home is a place where people feel secure. Owning a home gives people a stake in their community and a sense of belonging.

• (1235)

Home ownership is a concept that the people of Canada support. That is not likely to change at any time soon. It is therefore critical that CMHC is able to continue to provide mortgage loan insurance to Canadians today and in the future.

One of the most important aspects of CMHC mortgage loan insurance is the public policy mandate to provide equal access to mortgage financing at the lowest possible cost for all Canadians regardless of where they live in Canada. Equal access is achieved through cross–subsidization. Surpluses generated from lower risk businesses are used to fund shortfalls in higher risk businesses.

The public policy mandate of equal access distinguishes the CMHC in a major way from the private insurer. Without access to CMHC mortgage loan insurance Canadians in some parts of the country would have to come up with a conventional 25 per cent of the value of the house as a down payment. Needless to say, many Canadians would hardly ever be able to purchase a home if this were the case.

CMHC's mortgage insurance is therefore critical in helping Canadians to access home ownership. CMHC has long recognized that the housing financial needs of Canadians are diverse. The corporation's mortgage loan insurance has traditionally demonstrated the flexibility to respond to varying needs.

I refer to an example that has helped hundreds of Canadians realize the affordable home ownership dream. The manufactured housing or mobile home industry has contributed greatly to giving Canadians access to good quality, affordable housing. CMHC has been working in partnership with the manufactured housing industry for many years because of the importance of the housing sector in the economy of Canada as a whole.

Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation introduced its chattel loan insurance program, known as CLIP, as a five–year experiment in 1988. The objectives of CLIP were twofold: first, to improve access to alternative forms of affordable housing without involving government expenditures and, second, to help place manufactured homes in a more competitive position with conventionally built homes.

CMHC completed an evaluation of CLIP last year which confirmed that the program is an important instrument in increasing access to good quality affordable housing without involving government expenditures. The evaluation also confirmed that CLIP has had a positive impact on the manufactured housing industry and mobile home park developments.

Following the results of the evaluation the minister responsible for CMHC was pleased to announce an expansion of the chattel loans insurance program. As a result it now includes new homes, resale homes and manufactured homes in Canada.

CLIP is an affordable alternative for many of the approximately 335,000 moderate income rental households that could not previously afford to purchase a mobile home. The CMHC and the manufactured housing industry have enjoyed a productive partnership for many years. They have been working together to help Canadians gain access to good quality, affordable housing and to enhance the viability of the industry. The enhancement of CLIP will lead to greater access to mobile homes as affordable options for many Canadians and will encourage growth in the housing industry.

CMHC and the mobile home industry have done their part. The consumers have shown they are interested in mobile homes as a housing option. Certainly there can be no doubt of the importance of NHA insurance in making the program possible.

This is only one example of how NHA mortgage insurance has met the specific need and why NHA mortgage insurance must be maintained as a public policy instrument capable of evolving to meet the future housing needs of Canadians.

With any eye on future needs CMHC is currently working to develop a variety of new housing finance instruments made possible by innovative uses of mortgage loan insurance. In developing new products CMHC is looking to challenge the creativity of the financial community to ensure that the largest possible number of borrowers can find a product in the marketplace to meet their precise needs. A variety of choices will encourage lenders to compete on a basis of service and product differentiation.

The financial environment in which CMHC's mortgage loan insurance business operates has undergone significant changes in recent years. The introduction of one–stop financial services, the increased use of technological systems to support businesses and operations, and the need to manage expenditures and facilitate better risk management are factors that have had an impact on the way in which CMHC runs its mortgage insurance operations.

CMHC has responded to a changing environment by continually reviewing its processes for delivering mortgage insurance and introducing improvements and efficiencies where needed. Ensuring that CMHC's mortgage loan insurance remains relevant and capable of responding to the changing housing and financial needs of Canadians adds a major focus to the activity of the corporation.

CMHC is now focusing on the introduction of new processing mechanisms which will utilize the capabilities or electronic communications between CMHC and its approved lender clients. The enhancements will allow the corporation to serve better the needs of the Canadian housing consumer.

Mortgage loan insurance has played a significant public policy role in the past. CMHC's stewardship will continue to evolve to meet the changing needs of Canadians and the financial community.

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have one question for the hon. member in relation to the overall concept of CMHC.

My understanding is that it was felt necessary in the past that we had to develop this corporation to address the needs of Canadians who were incapable of meeting the 25 per cent, et cetera, to realize their own homes.

If we are to put another $50 billion into it, it implies that more Canadians are in need of it. Since the economic situation in the first place did not allow them to buy their homes we created the program and now we are expanding it. Would it not be better to put the $50 million into the economy so the people can get work, meet the 25 per cent requirement and reduce CMHC instead of increasing it?

Mr. Jackson: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. The corporation and the Government of Canada are responding to the housing need.

In the construction industry housing is a major motor of the Canadian economy. When the housing sector falters the whole system falters. Many people are looking for jobs right now. In my earlier dissertation I alluded to the fact that nobody in the private markets is not responding.

The initiative does not cost the government a cent. Using my old hat as mayor of Owen Sound, we have had private sector and CMHC interventions. The main role of CMHC is to make sure that handicapped people are looked after, that the heating requirements and other construction requirements are met before they are allowed insurance. There has to be a balance in the system. If the government intervenes too much it probably affects the private sector people. In the communities there is a groundswell to keep that from happening.

I assure the member there is a need for the initiative. Infusion in this category is probably better than putting it in other places because of the spinoff effects of building homes in communities. There will be a multiplier effect on the dollar and job creation. The activity it will create in the hardware store, the corner store and for construction workers, et cetera, will be enormous.

It is simply that there is a real need and it is a great thing to happen. As I have said before, health, work and housing are the three most important things for Canadians. This initiative helps those exactly.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise again to tell the Canadian audience that the speech made by the hon. member for North Vancouver was somewhat wrong. First, I wonder if he has read the bill and second, I do not know why he disagreed so strongly with the fact that this is a cost revenue neutral program.

As a matter of fact, the Government of Canada made money in 1994. The mortgage insurance fund gave $55 million back to the treasury. It is beyond my wildest imagination why members of the Reform Party would so strongly object to this bill.

My colleague from Bruce—Grey made an eloquent speech. It was obvious that he had read and understood the thrust of the bill which says essentially that $50 billion in liability will be added to the $100 billion that the Government of Canada already has to provide those Canadians with low incomes the backing to be able to own their own homes. This is extremely important because in many cases a 25 per cent requirement for a down payment is not there. They simply do not have the revenue. However, if they have 5 per cent or 10 per cent, the Government of Canada comes in and guarantees their loan with any bank in Canada.

I would like to ask my colleague from Bruce—Grey how important is this initiative for those Canadians who would not otherwise have the opportunity to buy their dream home?

Mr. Jackson: Mr. Speaker, the CMHC gives Canadians a choice of mortgage loan insurance. Without the CMHC Canadians would be served by a private sector monopoly. The risks with a monopoly are higher prices and fewer choices, making housing less affordable, particularly for first time home buyers.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and speak on Bill C–108, an act to amend the National Housing Act.

In 1987, CMHC introduced National Housing Act mortgage backed securities, a new way of attracting investors into the mortgage market and increasing the supply of funds available for home buyers. Since then the program has become a key part of the financial system in two respects: first, as an attractive real estate based investment offering very good yields and maximum safety; second, as a source of financing for the Canadian housing industry. The mortgages are all insured under the National Housing Act.

The fact that these blue chip securities are the only ones of their kind backed by the federal government makes them as solid as Canada Savings Bonds but with the added advantage of higher yields. Yields are greater because their liquidity is market based and their value fluctuates with market interest rates.

MBSs help to increase the amount of private capital available to finance the construction and purchase of homes and rental accommodation and encourages competition in the mortgage market. MBSs help to support the availability of lower mortgage interest rates by assisting smaller approved lenders to compete with the larger ones.

MBSs have also improved the security of tenure for Canadians through longer term mortgages. Before they were introduced, mortgage terms usually ranged from six months to three years and now consumers can benefit with terms of up to 25 years. Over $25 billion worth of mortgage backed securities have been issued since the initiative began in 1987.

Turning to the bill itself, it is quite straightforward. It is intended to increase the maximum aggregate mortgage loan insurance from $100 billion to $150 billion. It sounds like a large sum of money, but at the same time we have heard members on this side of the House explain that this is really a profit making venture on the part of the government, which contributes to the reduction of the national debt and at the same time encourages housing construction.

Many really do not understand what we are talking about when we say mortgage insurance. Some people have the view that it is like life insurance and it is something that is put on a mortgage to insure someone's life. Most lending institutions will only lend up to 75 per cent of the value of a house or a property available for construction, so there is the leftover portion of roughly 25 per cent. That can only be accommodated in one of two ways, either the person who is building the home or buying the home comes up with that 25 per cent, or the financial institution receives a guarantee that it will be paid back that 25 per cent. That is where mortgage insurance comes in and that is why it is essential.

It is clear from everything I have read that if mortgage insurance was not available for that 25 per cent, housing construction would literally grind to a halt and we would see no activity at all.

I have gone through the joys of constructing a house of my own. I use the term joy very loosely. It is a challenge more than a joy. I contracted out the work myself, which means I used to be seven feet tall and had no grey hair, but after having being beat up by all of the contractors and chasing around, I realized exactly what goes into constructing a home.

What I was struck by in the process was the amount of employment created in the construction of just one home. People have no real appreciation of the facts because a lot of people have contractors build their homes and do not really see the full effect of what one house has in the construction industry.

I had five framers working on my house for six weeks. Those are the people who build the house and do all the rough construction. I had two plumbers working on my house for at least two weeks and three electricians working for another two to three weeks. Eight roofers put on the roof in two days, which I was very impressed with, but there were eight people scampering all over the roof. Four people put up the gyprock and another two put on the plaster. As well, there were painters and finish carpenters.

I was lucky to have fixed contracts so that I did not get beat up by the time that it took on this particular contract, or else I really would have been looking stupid, but fixed contracts are very important in these circumstances. What struck me was the sheer number of jobs created. That does not even account for the other people who were involved, the building supply people, the manufacturers of the pipes, the sinks, the toilets, the sewer pipes and those types of things, the cabinet makers, the people who do the hardwood floors and the carpets.

I am sure I have forgotten some of the people who were actually involved in the process. My wife is sitting at home telling me I have forgotten about this and I have forgotten about that because she did it all and that is why I do not know. She did most of the contracting rather than me.

The fact is that literally hundreds of jobs are created because one person chooses to build a house. If we can make that happen throughout the country, then we are really going to be creating a large amount of employment. It is clear that housing is a major contributor to the creation and the maintenance of employment. That is why mortgage insurance and CMHC have a very critical role to play.

In this major indication of commitment, the government is saying it wants to spur on the housing industry. For those on the opposite side that say it is crazy, that we should not do it, that we should let the marketplace do it on its own, I would like to read some of the stats that are put out by the housing industry.

In a press release in September of this year CMHC forecast housing starts of 112,500 for 1995, an astonishing 30,000 drop from the initial forecast of 141,000 starts at the beginning of the year and far below national housing requirements of 165,000 starts. While the news is a little better in 1996 with CMHC forecasting another 127,000 starts, the housing industry is at recession levels. Ways have to be found to encourage the housing industry because it creates the employment Canada needs.

The press release went on to state that lower interest rates are not the cure all for the current situation. Lower rates will not address the principal problem, the loss of confidence among many Canadians in their employment prospects.

That is why we have a double barrelled task here. First, to create that confidence, which is what the Liberal government is doing now by getting our financial house in order, while at the same time providing those mechanisms like mortgage insurance so that the housing industry can easily facilitate the increase in construction which is necessary. I want to emphasize that the key is confidence. We have to establish confidence. We have now turned the corner on the referendum. It is time to start talking about confidence, about creating employment and carrying this country into the 21st century.

New approaches and new directions for financing the housing industry have to be found. I know the industry has brought forward a number of imaginative approaches. It talked about RRSP loans for mortgages and all of those things. I found it interesting to look at some of the things that Central Mortgage and Housing is actually doing now. I thought I should read those into the record because they are important as we try to grapple with housing. If this country is going to succeed, one of the areas which will help cure crime problems, create jobs and, in effect, fuel a positive, caring society is through the provision of adequate and proper housing.

Here are some of the objectives of the National Housing Act and what CMHC supports. Through social housing, CMHC works with provincial, territorial and municipal housing agencies and with local non–profit organizations, co–operatives, urban native groups and First Nations, for those whose needs cannot be met by the private market. Assistance is provided to more than 661,000 social housing units.

CMHC's direct lending program enables CMHC to act as a break even lender to public and private, non–profit and co–operative projects that are subsidized by CMHC.

CMHC is helping the Canadian housing industry to promote the Canadian housing system abroad by helping to develop housing export strategies to assist the Canadian housing industry market Canadian housing technology, products and services in world markets.

CMHC's Canada Centre for Public–Private Partnerships in Housing facilitates housing partnership projects involving the production of affordable and accessible housing for low to moderate income households without ongoing federal subsidies.

CMHC continues to provide leadership in improving not only Canadian but international housing standards. Those are just a few of the things that are ongoing.

In conclusion, this bill will be pooh–poohed by the members opposite, some saying it is too little and some saying it is too much. Mortgage insurance has been one of those key catalysts to keeping the housing industry functioning and a positive contributor to the economy and to the creation of jobs. At the same time, as has been mentioned before, it makes a contribution to the reduction of our debt as CMHC returns a profit to the Government of Canada.

I am sure that members opposite will see their way clear to quickly support and pass this piece of legislation.

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am really pleased to hear the hon. member's comments regarding this bill and the positive forces it will have on the economy of our country.

Only a few weeks ago I had the ambassador from Poland in my riding of Cumberland—Colchester, Nova Scotia. The purpose of his visit was to look at housing for Poland and eastern Europe. The interest is there because they know that Canada and particularly Atlantic Canada have numerous sawmills making new houses constructed of wood, high insulation products and meeting the R–2000 code for insulation standards.

• (1300)

When we had the G–7 conference in Halifax in June, we produced a G–7 model home. This was the interest the east European countries had in looking at Canada and the great potential in development. Could the hon. member elaborate a bit on the value of this construction, on the high prestige of construction of homes, on the value to the world structure, on the peace and economic development it will bring, as well as bringing jobs here at home and adding to that great potential of export for our country?

Mr. Rideout: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for her question. It is an interesting one, because in a country the size of Canada, with a population of roughly 30 million, the key to a lot of our economic success is the role we are to play on the international market and what we will accomplish there.

What is very gratifying for me in my role as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Natural Resources is dealing with companies that are actually building model homes or sending building materials into the international marketplace.

I recently had a meeting with a model home builder who is building homes for the Japanese market. A lot of people said that would not happen, that we could not crack that market. The manufacturer was telling me that he cannot supply the demand, that if he could generate more he would. The market is flooded with the types of housing that do not fit the strict criteria necessary in the Japanese market. Canadians have developed the techniques, the building standards, and those types of things that make it easier for us to introduce our products into the international marketplace.

I hear the Reform Party from time to time talk about doing away with the Department of Natural Resources, saying that the federal government has no role to play. As we set the standards so that we can meet the international criteria and the International Standards Association requirements, as we do the research and the development that is necessary and develop the new technologies that allow our industries to compete in the international marketplace, we are making that contribution to creating jobs in Canada. That is where the housing market has an integral role to play.

In my home province, Kent Homes, part of a larger company, is building model homes and is trying to sell those all around the world. Just as I described the number of people who were working on my house when I was building it, the same sorts of things are going on in the construction of model homes. These are job creators. They are a transfer of money, jobs, and growth to the international marketplace so that we can then reap the returns from those activities.

The Department of Natural Resources has an excellent role to play, CMHC has a role to play, and we at the federal government level have a very important role to play in creating employment through housing. This bill will make one small step for that approach.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In closing the intervention of the hon. parliamentary secretary, the word from Moncton from many subcontractors is they wish he had stayed in Ottawa and let Mrs. Rideout look after the contracting.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a lot has been said about CMHC's involvement in providing insurance so that more people can afford homes. I would like to touch on the area of social housing and the way the National Housing Act and CMHC have helped in the social housing. I would like to use experiences in my riding.

Canadians of Lithuanian descent in my constituency saw the need for housing for seniors. In no way could these seniors afford individual homes, et cetera, so they built Vilnius Manor. How did they build it? They got a long term mortgage from CMHC at a very low percentage over a long period of time. Today these seniors are enjoying one of the most beautiful homes in Toronto, probably. In this home the seniors not only mix with Canadians of other heritages but they can also hear their own language. They can also see part of their own culture that they brought with them to Canada. It is a real success story, situated right on Bloor Street in Toronto.

• (1305)

An example of a similar project, again funded or assisted by CMHC, is Copernicus Lodge. A group of Polish descent built Copernicus Lodge as a home for seniors. It was filled up before it was even completed. In these models some people have to pay the full rent and others get a subsidized rent. Again, there is a women's auxiliary with this Copernicus Lodge who provide activities for the seniors. You will not see happier Canadian citizens than the ones living at Copernicus Lodge.

Another example in my constituency is Wawel Villa. Again thanks to CMHC funding a group of seniors can live in Wawel Villa just opposite High Park. They can walk through the park and enjoy life in their older years.

I had the experience also of helping Canadians of Latvian descent to build Kristus Darzs in the Woodbridge area. Again, this home would never have been built if it were not for the assistance of long term loans from CMHC.

I hope this program will never be cut. We have thousands of such homes across Canada providing comfortable living for those in these kinds of homes.

A problem is beginning to develop that I would like to share with the minister, the mover of this bill. As these people age in these homes they now need more intensive care. Many need ongoing nursing care. Many require chronic care assistance and they do not want to move out. These homes were not built for these kinds of clients.

Do they move out? Where do they move to? Most of them want to stay. All the homes I have mentioned are looking. Copernicus Lodge has already built a second phase. They have floors that provide more intensive care for the people who need it. This is a problem that is facing our country. We build affordable homes for senior citizens as they get into their eighties and nineties. And I am so pleased that many are living into their eighties and nineties, and some are reaching a hundred and over. But they need special care.

Rather than move the people out, we have to provide in these homes more intensive assistance, which requires a different kind of personnel. It requires highly trained nurses, psychologists, social workers, and so on. Yet these are the areas where unfortunately the Conservative provincial government is cutting back. I do not know why the premier of Ontario wants to cut back on the backs of seniors. I believe we have to reduce our deficit. We have to run a much leaner government, but not a meaner government, such as the province of Ontario appears to be doing. This is an important issue, which will be facing the country even more intensively.

This brings me to the issue of jurisdictions. We have been talking over the last month about perhaps moving some of the powers the federal government has to provincial jurisdictions and co–operating with the provinces to decide who can deliver these programs the best.

We are talking about federal programs in housing. The province of Ontario also is involved in housing. If someone in the greater Toronto area wants a subsidized unit, they go to the metropolitan Toronto level. The city of Toronto has a program called City Homes to help people with affordable housing. There are four levels of government—federal, provincial, metro Toronto, and Toronto—all involved in housing.

If we want to keep the country together, these are the areas we must look at to see who can deliver the housing programs best, most efficiently. And let us talk with the other levels of government. If there is one level that can do it better, fine, it can take over a certain area. If the federal government can do it better, it would take over, with the caution that the federal government will still need a strong central government to maintain standards coast to coast to coast, be it in housing, day care or health care.

I wanted to put on the record the kind of assistance my constituency received thanks to the type of bill we are amending here today, the National Housing Act.

The House has heard the problems that are facing the Parkdale area of my riding, with prostitution, drug trade, high school dropouts, et cetera. We are trying to analyse why in one part of my riding there is such a heavy concentration of all these social problems yet in another part of the riding there are not the same problems. One thing, in my analysis, that contributed to this is the lack of home ownership in the troubled area. In that area only six per cent of the population own their homes.

Again, if all levels of government got together to make it possible for people to afford their own homes and build a family unit, we would reduce the numbers and the kinds of problems facing the Parkdale area. We are working on it, but we do need help from legislation such as we have here today.

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's comments about the value of housing to seniors. I am sure every member in the House can appreciate that in his or her own community.

So often we hear criticism about CMHC, about government involvement in mortgages. I would like to ask the hon. member why the government is involved or should be involved in the issuing of mortgages for housing here in Canada.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, wherever government involvement creates unfair competition, I feel government has no right to be there. However, the mortgage insurance that is provided with this legislation is fair and equal competition. It provides insurance for people who would normally not get it through private insurance companies. By providing this alternative, it keeps the rates down also. If we believe in the free market forces, which I do, it is good for consumers, because it does keep the rates down and it makes mortgage insurance available to those who otherwise would not get the insurance and consequently would not be able to purchase a home.

We made some amendments not long ago about allowing first time homebuyers to make a down payment of just 5 per cent. This was another good move to make home ownership more accessible and affordable to more Canadians. It is the same with the insurance.

• (1315)

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it has been interesting to listen to the comments of my colleague and others who have spoken on the bill and to understand the intricacy of this legislation. It touches the aspect of social housing, to which my colleague has just referred. Previously we heard how it will impact the building trades and local economies across the country.

We also understand that this legislation will have an impact on our ability to trade in foreign markets. As the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Foreign Affairs knows, this is an important aspect of this legislation as well. Here we have a bill presented in the House of Commons that is prepared for the national good and yet we have the third party challenging it, wanting this responsibility for housing to be devolved to the provincial level.

I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary if he can see any real value in that kind of solution, given the kinds of things that we are hearing and the facilitative role that this particular and single piece of legislation has for all Canadians in so many different ways.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her concerns and for raising these issues. She ran and I ran and I think most people in this House ran on one theme in our platform, which was prosperity and job creation.

The more homes made available to Canadians the more jobs are created. When you consider what is bought when someone purchases a home, people mention immediately fridges, stoves, et cetera, but those you need in an apartment when you do not buy a home. Think of all the other infrastructure, the landscaping, the garden, the paving of the driveway and how many jobs this creates.

I am glad we are having this debate because the member mentioned her experience with the Polish ambassador and his interest in our housing system. When I was taking cour des français in Saint–Jean, I met with a representative of a company from Quebec who wants to export 240 homes to Krakow, Poland. The technology is totally Canadian, totally Quebec. It would be shipped out to Poland all prefab and later put together.

Imagine the kind of job creation that project alone would have. However, the problem in Poland is that people cannot get mortgages to buy those homes. Poland is looking very closely at the legislation we are discussing today because through such a program the people in Krakow, Poland could buy those 240 homes.

If it is successful, we can repeat this model not only in Poland, but in Ukraine, in Russia, all over the world. This would be a niche for Canadian manufacturers of housing. This would be a niche for getting into the export field.

The Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs and International Trade is now looking at how we can help the SMEs, the small and medium sized companies, to get into the export market. We have such great entrepreneurs who are sharing their expertise with our foreign affairs committee. Again, I keep stressing jobs because if you increase exports by $1 million, you have created about 35 new jobs. When you are exporting in the billions, imagine the kind of jobs that will create.

We have a beautiful country. We have a country like no other in the world. Let us stick together. Let us co–operate with every province and the nation. Let us co–operate with every province and the world. We have expertise such as I have mentioned here and we will keep our number one position. Not only that, but we will improve the lifestyle of people in other countries.

I thank the member for that question.

• (1320)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, a recorded division stands deferred until Monday, November 6, at the ordinary hour of daily adjournment.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find a disposition on the part of the House to call it 1.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Shall I call it 1.30 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 1.30 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.) moved that Bill C–343, an act to amend the Criminal Code (arrest without warrant), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C–343 which I am happy to address today is not a lengthy bill. I do not believe it will require a lot of debate. I would like to read the actual amendment:

> Subsection 495(1) of the Criminal Code is amended by adding the following immediately after paragraph (c):
> (d) a person who has committed the offence described in subsection 740(1) or who on reasonable grounds, the peace officer believes has committed or is about to commit the offence.

The purpose of this bill is to give the police or a peace officer the power to arrest without a warrant a person who is in breach of a probation order binding the person.

This is not an idea that was dreamed up out of the blue. It came to me from talking with a number of police officers during many of the ride–alongs I had with various police units throughout the country including Calgary and particularly Toronto. The officers had mentioned to me on a number of occasions that if they had the power and authority to arrest individuals who were in breach of a probation order, it would be a good preventive measure to stop a lot of crimes.

Let me give a couple of examples. When I was riding in a Toronto police car a couple of officers identified a young offender who walked by on the street at two o'clock in the morning. They named him and said he was a young offender who was on probation for dealing drugs. He was not even supposed to be on the streets past six o'clock in the evening.

I asked what they would be able to do. They said that they would take the name and report to the probation unit that this individual was in breach of probation. However, they had no authority to do anything. A young fellow who had been convicted of drug dealing being out at two o'clock in the morning probably meant that something was not right. It is the belief of those officers, and they have a number of cases they can name, that had they had the authority and the ability to take the person into custody for breach of probation that the crime, which was committed later in the evening by the individual, would have been prevented.

• (1325)

Another example. An individual, because of an alcohol problem, was on probation for either a domestic dispute or for committing crimes while under the influence. Whether there has been a court order or this individual is under probation, the individual is not allowed to enter a bar or a drinking establishment. This is part of the probation order. Police have told me that a number of times they see such individuals breaking their probation orders by either being seen consuming alcohol or going into places where they were directed not to go.

All the police can do is report to a probation officer which may take as much as one or two weeks because of the lack of manpower. Had they been able to just arrest the individual on breach of probation, summary conviction, that it would have prevented problems later in the evening.

A number of other times in one particular area there had been young offenders arrested on 52 counts of break and enter. These are young offenders who are required to attend school, are required to be at home by six o'clock in the evening and are required to do a number of different things. They were obviously in breach of probation on a number of occasions by being out very late at night. There were 52 charges of break and enter but only one conviction. They were found guilty on all charges. There was the one conviction but they were not incarcerated. They were put on probation and were expected to follow the rules.

More break and enters followed because these individuals were out late, clumped together and kept stealing. The police said: "If only we had the authority and the power we could have prevented some of these problems". They do not even have to arrest and lock them up. The fact that they would have the authority to stop them and ask them what they are doing breaking their probation orders, maybe giving them an opportunity to get the heck out of there and go home, would help. However they need the authority to do it.

This small little bill is just one measure that would help a great deal in the prevention of crime throughout the country. It is something the police have asked for. It is something that I have agreed to submit on their behalf. It was awhile before my name was drawn. I was lucky enough to get it drawn so I am putting this forward.

In the near future I will also be putting forward legislation that would give police the authority to arrest people who are in violation of parole and statutory release. Whenever there are conditions to a release somebody should have the authority to do something when they are in obvious breach of those conditions.

I do not believe any member in the House can say for a moment that it would not be a good idea to stop crime before it happens. There is no doubt in the minds of all the enforcement officers I have talked to that if they had the authority, which they do not have now, if they had the ability, which they do not have, they would be more than pleased to do these things because they feel that would be a major part of their job. Let us face it. Enforcement of the law is a major part of their job, but so is prevention. If those in the enforcement agencies can prevent it from happening, they do so.

That is why they stop drunk people from getting behind the wheel of a car and driving off. They do not wait until a drunk person drives off, they prevent it by trying to stop that person from getting behind the wheel.

This is a perfect example of something this House should do by adopting this kind of measure. I do not have much more to say on it. It is a common sense measure and does not encroach on anyone's rights or privileges. We always seem to be worried about the charter and the interference we may run into on a charter challenge.

The supreme court judges surely would get the message from legislators that this kind of legislation is serving a purpose. This purpose appears in the red book. It is in the Reform Party policies. It is in the Bloc policies. One of the policies of every party in this House is to make Canada a safer and better place in which to live. This kind of legislation would do that.

I encourage support from everyone in the House to put into the hands of the police departments throughout the country the power and the ability to do this. They do not have it now. I repeat, they cannot do it now. Let us make it possible for them to do so. Let us take the burden off the understaffed and undermanned probation departments. They are running at an unbelievable pace trying to keep up with all the difficulties they now have.

It is a way of accomplishing what we all said we would do in our policies. It is a small way, but a good place to start. I suggest that we adopt this bill immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I see the member for New Westminster—Burnaby rising. It is not for me to manage the operation of the House but in private members' hour the mover of the motion has 20 minutes and the other speakers have 10. I do not believe the member for Wild Rose gave any indication as to whether he might be splitting his time. He did use only 10 of his 20 minutes. Perhaps the member for Wild Rose could help the Chair.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I did not make any arrangements to split my time. It does not take 20 minutes to talk on this topic. I am willing to share my time with either one of my colleagues, with agreement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Upon that clarification, certainly if another member of the hon. member's party wishes to split that time, there is 10 minutes remaining. I will recognize the member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, after further consultation with my colleagues, let us go in the rotation order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): As you wish.

Mr. Ian Murray (Lanark—Carleton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–343. Let me begin by acknowledging what I understand to be the objectives of the member in putting this bill forward.

The objective is to make it easier for a peace officer to arrest someone who is breaking the terms of a probation order. The target group for this measure is anyone who is under a probation order. Such an order could include many types of conditions, for example, that the probationer refrain from alcohol, stay within the jurisdiction, avoid use of firearms, or attend counselling.

We may be talking about family situations where someone is convicted of an offence and is ordered to keep away from other family members. It might be a situation where an offender is ordered to keep away from public parks or school yards.

Failure to comply with a probation order is an offence under the Criminal Code. I suggest that this is good criminal justice policy. Under the current provisions, an offender's probation can be revoked because of a serious breach of a probation condition. He can be arrested and charged for the distinct offence of breaching a condition.

• (1335)

Let us examine some situations and where it leaves a police officer who encounters someone who appears to be breaching one of the conditions of his probation. The police officer's authority is defined in section 495 of the Criminal Code which authorizes the peace officer to arrest without warrant a person found in the course of committing a summary conviction offence.

Say for example the peace officer finds someone loitering around a public park where children are playing. If the peace officer is suspicious of the person he sees loitering at the park, he can investigate in the usual way. If he finds that the person is bound by a probation order which forbids the person going near public parks, he may actually be in a position to arrest him on the spot. Just being present in the park may constitute an active criminal offence.

At the moment, breach of probation is a summary conviction offence and the peace officer's authority to arrest without warrant is limited. To arrest without a warrant the peace officer currently must satisfy the conditions set out in section 495 of the Criminal Code which states that a peace officer shall not arrest a person without a warrant where on reasonable grounds the public interest may be satisfied without so arresting the person at the time.

In making this judgment the peace officer must have regard to all the circumstances, including the need to establish the identity of the person to secure or preserve evidence concerning the offence, or to prevent a continuation or repetition of that offence or another offence. In effect the peace officer has some discretion to arrest on the spot but he must exercise that discretion according to several criteria laid out in the Criminal Code.

Bill C–343 would make the policeman's job easier by freeing him from having to satisfy these conditions. If breach of a probation order were an indictable offence, fewer conditions would need to be satisfied. In that case the police officer could arrest the person if he believed on reasonable grounds that the person had committed the offence or was about to commit it.

This is precisely what Bill C–41 does. Bill C–41 deals with Criminal Code amendments to improve and modernize our system of sentencing. It makes failure to comply with a probation order under section 740 a hybrid offence, that is, one that can be proceeded with by way of indictment or by summary conviction procedure. Hybrid offences are considered the same as indictable offences for purposes of arrest without warrant.

The bottom line is that the police officer will now have the flexibility the member for Wild Rose would like. The police officer can arrest without warrant where he believes the person has breached or is about to breach a condition of his probation and not just during the course of the offence.

Bill C–41 received royal assent on July 13, 1995 but is not yet in force. Therefore the first part of Bill C–343 will be unnecessary as soon as Bill C–41 comes into force.

I would also like to bring to the attention of this House another relevant modification included in Bill C–41. It is a modification to section 740 that may make it easier for the police officer to do his job. Section 740 refers to someone who "wilfully" refuses to comply with a probation order. Bill C–41 changes the wording to "without reasonable excuse". This may make it easier for a police officer to legitimately challenge a person, in the situation I have described, to provide a reasonable excuse for being in the park or near the school yard in apparent violation of the probation order.

Bill C–343 would give more freedom to arrest than Bill C–41 would give. Bill C–343 would create an exception to the general rule for this offence of failure to comply with a probation order. The arresting officer would not have to bother considering the overall circumstances, or whether it was necessary to take the person into custody in order to establish his identity for example.

It is evident there is a preference in our criminal law for using appearance notices or summons as opposed to arresting persons on the spot. Taking someone into custody without warrant should only be done where it is necessary. Alternatively the peace officer is expected to seek a warrant or issue the appearance notice.

Why should we make the breach of a probation order an offence different from most other offences in the Criminal Code? Why should the peace officer not be bound to respect the safeguards placed into the code to guarantee basic rights and liberties?

It is unacceptable to exempt this particular offence from the rules governing arrest powers for other criminal offences. I am not sure whether an argument could not be made that such an exemption is arbitrary or otherwise excessive and therefore contrary to the charter of rights and freedoms. The real issue here is controlling the risk to the community or to particular individuals presented in various situations.

• (1340)

Probationers are subject to the active supervision of probation services and this supervision provides an additional measure of control. Probation officers are experienced in judging when a breach of probation order is merely a technical violation or something more serious that deserves revocation of the probation or an arrest and separate charges under section 740 of the Criminal Code.

Police and probation officers work together to monitor these conditions. I believe peace officers have what they need to handle almost every situation. If a suspect is actually committing the offence of breach of probation, they have authority to arrest that person without a mandate. Similarly, they have that authority when they believe the suspect has committed the offence or is about to commit an indictable offence. Alternatively, they may choose to issue an appearance notice or even seek a warrant.

They are not overly restricted in their ability to arrest someone who is hanging around a park or drinking alcohol or attempting to approach the residence of a former spouse without a reasonable excuse. If they believe a loiterer is about to repeat that offence or commit another one, they can exercise their good judgment and arrest that person.

I do not believe the criminal law modifications proposed in Bill C–343 are necessary.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few extemporaneous, spur of the moment observations to make.

Perhaps I can provide some perspective on the bill, seeing that my previous profession was that of probation officer and I was in a situation where administratively I dealt with the relationship with the 24–hour contact agency, which is the police, and saw the behaviour of probationers. Often on a Friday or Saturday night things were happening in the community, but the probation officer generally worked in an office in a day situation.

Certainly the well meaning intention of this private member's bill comes from legitimate police concern. It also can be seen that it comes from public concern. I am adding that it also comes from criminal justice probation officer concern.

The bill gives some reasonable discretion for giving additional tools to the police. That is not to say, as the member for Lanark—Carleton would say, that this is unjustifiable in the panoply of what is available to police officers. However, we must look at what are the administrative instructions to police specifically concerning their justice time and the allocation of dollars. They are under administrative control to be very careful not to arrest on a summary conviction unless they are absolutely pushed over the limit and it can be justified.

The operational difference between what happens on the street and the permutations that may be technically possible under the Criminal Code are quite different.

I am saying that the bill is going in the right direction because it conforms to the principle of minimal intervention and intrusion to achieve a public good. Rather than trying to change the offence from summary to an indictable offence, it looks at a specific exception to the law, which is a minimal change. It is the minimum possible to achieve the objective. It provides an exception to the summary procedure in a special case where the police officer decides for the general social good that it needs to be done. Currently, because of administrative procedures those are simply avoided and discounted by saying we really cannot intervene. Why should we do this?

The administration of justice has been brought into disrepute by the current operation in the streets. Probation orders are often seen to be not worth the paper they were written on. Orders are given and they must be obeyed. They will be obeyed increasingly if there are regular consequences that flow. We are talking about general deterrence and the community reputation that develops around the operation of these court orders, especially conditions of probation such as not to enter premises where alcohol is sold or not to be out after a certain hour, not to frequent a particular bus exchange where it seems that criminals have a tendency to meet, geographic prohibitions or prohibitions to stay at least one block away from a girlfriend's residence because of a history of assault or threats. The community expectation is that these orders will be obeyed and can reasonably be administered without unnecessary administrative barriers. We see in the newspaper that the offender received a sentence and was placed on certain conditions, and the public can feel good about it. However, when we investigate it, we find the administration of the order actually breaks down.

• (1345)

The probation order must have some real meaning. The public delegates to the authority and then has an expectation that the order will be administered properly. The orderly operation and administration of court orders are very important. I think the public reputation is that court orders are not that well administered.

We have to overcome the community notion that the order is not worth the paper it is written on. There are administrative barriers that could be put aside by this measure. The bill is minor in size but I am saying it is very meaningful in its practical form.

The member for Lanark—Carleton outlined in some technical sense how this bill went beyond the current bill before Parliament. I am recommending it is an additional permutation that would be very helpful for the administration of criminal justice in the community.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will take a few minutes to express some of my feelings and concerns about the area addressed by the bill.

For what purpose do courts issue prohibition orders? They feel under the circumstances it is the adequate action that should be taken to protect society. Probation is a comforting term, an order of probation. It is not unlike mandatory supervision term we hear.

Is it comforting that someone will be released before his or her time on mandatory supervision? The state is to conduct supervision over the person to ensure the safety of the public. We have seen how absolutely useless that type of condition is in protecting the Melanie Carpenters and the Sylvain Leducs from the kind of action the court has surmised will never take place.

I support the bill. If the court issues a probation what is it asking? It is asking the accused person to obey certain requirements: to stay away from bars, perhaps to stay away from the classroom or perhaps to stay away from a spouse who has been subjected to abuse, physical or otherwise. Does the court expect the person will simply obey those orders? What happens if he or she fails to obey? Probation officers do not have the manpower to deal with circumstances late at night. We also know police officers are usually there. At least they are on duty 24 hours a day. The public has access to them in case a probation order is violated.

If a wife realizes her husband is to stay away from liquor under probation and he is at a bar at two o'clock in the morning and she is sitting at home in fear of his attendance, what protection does she have? Should she phone the probation officer? Nonsense. That is impossible. She could phone the police under the circumstances. The police do not have any authority whatsoever to intervene to protect her from her husband even though he is in violation of a probation order set as a result of his violation of her.

I listened to the hon. member across the way speak about the laws being in place now to prevent that. If that were the case we would not be receiving feedback from police officers about the violations of individuals they have brought before the courts and the courts have placed on probation. They have seen the violation of those probation orders and can do nothing about it except to report the situation to the probation officer on Monday morning and if the probation officer has time he will follow it up perhaps two or three weeks later.

This is a common sense response to the cries of the police to give them reasonable tools to prevent crime and criminal acts from occurring. I suggest violation of probation is a criminal act. I do not think anyone will deny that. Why not place within the hands of our peace officers the power to do something about it? Therefore I support the bill.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. At the time of preparation of the bill I discussed it with a number of people, particularly those of legal mind, who felt it was an important bill to pursue. They also felt that it completely qualified under the 12 or 15 points that clarify whether a piece of legislation is votable or non–votable. It certainly met the criteria in all their eyes. I have also talked to a number of police authorities about it and they said it was the kind of thing they could use to help prevent crime.

I do not believe it is in contradiction to or identical to Bill C–41. I have been advised that is not necessarily the case. Therefore, with the idea that all of us are here to do whatever we can to prevent crime, it would be a small step in the right direction if we all supported it as a votable item. If there is unanimous consent I would move that Bill C–343, for the sake of the safety of Canadians, become a votable item.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the terms of the motion by the hon. member for Wild Rose. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There being no unanimous consent, there being no further members rising for debate and the motion not being designated a votable item, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired and the order is dropped from the Order Paper pursuant to Standing Order 96.

It being 1.52 p.m., the House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24.

RAILWAY COMPANIES

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should oblige all railway companies that receive National Transportation Agency authorisation to abandon branch lines or sections under the National Transportation Act, 1987, to offer such branch lines or sections for public sale before abandoning them.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank my colleague in the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, for letting me take his place this morning and for taking my turn last Monday. As you know, last Monday, this House, at the behest of the Leader of the Government, went so far as to sit on the day a referendum important to the future of Quebec and Canada was held in Quebec. Another demonstration of love and affection from our colleagues in the Liberal Party.

I just want to say that in Quebec, we have a useful motto: Je me souviens. I can tell you Quebecers felt this decision was highly improper, as was the demonstration of love and affection in Montreal by 60,000 people on the Friday preceding the referendum and financed by Canadian Airlines, Air Canada and VIA Rail.

I repeat, we have a useful motto in Quebec: Je me souviens. I can tell you that as the transport critic, as soon as I get a chance I will certainly return the favour to these three companies.

Motion M–494 reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should oblige all railway companies that receive National Transportation Agency authorisation to abandon branch lines or sections under the National Transportation Act, 1987, to offer such branch lines or sections for public sale before abandoning them.

Perhaps I may explain that the purpose of this motion is, in a way, to apply retroactively a provision that appears in Bill C–101. I imagine this will not be news to anyone who is familiar with the railway sector and especially with the decisions of the National Transportation Agency. As you know, when a company, either CN or CP, used to go before the National Transportation Agency, permission to abandon lines was practically automatic.

Bill C–101 now before the Standing Committee on Transport provides that before a line is abandoned, it will first be offered for public sale. I should explain that if Bill C–101 is adopted in its present form, railway companies will have to submit a three–year plan, starting in 1996. The fact remains, however, that some branch lines are already in the process of being abandoned, although interested groups or provincial governments may have shown an interest in continuing operations.

The purpose of this measure is therefore to deal with part of what has happened recently. However, if Bill C–101 is adopted as tabled, which means offering for sale prior to proceeding with abandonment, our party will not object to the substance of the bill. However, we will try to obtain extensions of the time limits because some are really too short to allow for a proper evaluation of the operations offered for sale. But we will have a chance to discuss that later on.

As I was saying, the purpose of this motion is to save segments of railway lines for which a decision of abandonment has been issued by the National Transportation Agency. Bill C–101 provides that the railway companies must offer for sale the segments they wish to abandon. Even considering all the deficiencies of the abandonment procedure in Bill C–101, this measure should make it easier for these segments to be taken over by short line railway operations, because it would oblige railway companies to sell segments that are to be abandoned.

There are segments in Quebec that would probably be viable as short line railways: the decision of abandonment has already been issued, but the tracks are still intact. Today we have no guarantee that railway companies will first try to sell to short line railways, in order to maintain segments. In fact, we could hardly expect railway companies to sell to short line railways if it is more attractive to sell a segment for uses other than railway transportation. It is common knowledge that railway companies in Canada own large amounts of real estate. They may prefer to speculate in real estate as opposed to continuing a railway operation. That is the point I wanted to make.

Public interest is not a consideration in commercial decisions by railway companies. That is unfortunate because, as you know, in some cases these companies obtained the land around a right of way when this country was first settled. Furthermore, Canada expanded from east to west thanks to the railways. Western Canada was developed thanks to the railways. These companies were given crown land for their railway rights of way and now are acting more like speculators.

• (1110)

In Quebec there are at least three major branch lines in this situation: Chapais, Lachute and Québec Central, totalling some 550 kilometres. Negotiations are currently under way concerning some of these lines.

The effect of our motion would be to ensure that railway companies negotiate in good faith with those interested in creating SLRs to run these branch lines. You will note that my trust in the national railways is rather limited. Had we had been able to have faith in them, this motion would have been totally unnecessary; the necessity for it arises out of our less than total confidence in them.

The Government of Quebec has already done its part with respect to the Lachute branch line by forbidding any change in its land use. If CP lets the situation get any worse, however, the tracks that are in place will deteriorate and no longer be useable.

It is therefore important for the CP to put this branch line up for sale promptly. It is also interesting to see, since Quebec does not of course possess the fullness of its powers that would have come with sovereignty, the concrete action taken by Minister of Municipal Affairs and Regional Development Guy Chevrette in announcing this past October 16 that the rail corridor linking Mirabel and Thurso would be declared a special intervention zone. Publication on October 11 in the Quebec official gazette of a draft decree to that effect had the immediate result of reserving the land covered by the decree for railway purposes and of forbidding any operations contrary to that use.

I would like to take this opportunity to praise Mr. Chevrette, the minister responsible for regional development, for he—unlike certain of our friends across the way, the Minister of Transport for Canada in particular—is well placed to appreciate the importance of a rail line, an airport or a seaport as a tool of regional development. I mentioned before in this House and it bears repeating that several businesses are interested in locating in outlying areas of Quebec or elsewhere and insist as a prerequisite—it is sometimes their principle condition—on there being a deep water port, an adequate highway and superhighway system, and a rail line if the material to be shipped is very heavy and cannot be trucked. Merely looking at the state of our highways and superhighways is enough to again convince us how lax the federal government is, compared to the U.S., when it comes to truck load limits.

As an illustration of the railway's worth as a tool of economic development, let me give the example of a cement plant project at Port Daniel in the Gaspe, in the riding where my spouse was born. This is a village of some 3,500 people, with a very high rate of unemployment—we are all aware of the state of the fishing industry in Gaspe—and the developers interested in the cement plant have set two conditions. First, there must be a deep water seaport, which the Port Daniel bay provides, and second the cement dust, or powder, or whatever it is called, must be shippable by boat or by railcar, thus making the presence of a rail line a condition for the deal. CN is considering abandoning the Gaspe rail line. Obviously, if there is no rail line, the 450 jobs that would be created by the cement plant will never see the light of day, because of the two conditions set by the developers.

I am pleased to inform the member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, who once again reveals that he is totally disconnected from his riding. He should, perhaps, go there a bit more often and be a bit more active. He should be aware that this was another of the requirements set by the promoters.

What is a special intervention zone, such as the one the Government of Quebec established for the Mirabel—Thurso railway corridor? Quebec's act respecting land use planning and development permits it to establish special intervention zones in order to resolve land development problems whose urgency or seriousness justifies such an intervention.

This is the first time, since the law came into effect in 1980, that a minister has used such power to declare a special intervention zone by order. This decision stresses the importance the government accords to maintaining the rail link between Thurso and Mirabel to protect the economic development of the region.

I would also like to stress how important and how timely this matter is. We could perhaps come up with a short list to justify just how relevant and current our motion is. We could quickly make a list of abandoned lines. We could name some in each province.

In Ontario, for example, the CN Chatham line is scheduled to be abandoned on July 14, 1996. There is also the Newmarket line. In Quebec, there is the CN Chapais line, from Franquet to Chapais, 97.34 miles long; the CN Taschereau line, from La Sarre to Cochrane, 82.42 miles; the CN Montmagny line, from Harlaka to Saint-Romuald; the CN Chandler line, from Sainte-Adélaïde to Gaspé—you can see with what I was saying about the cement plant project earlier, how relevant this motion becomes—; the CN Sorel line, from Sorel to Tracy; and the list goes on.

In British Columbia, there is the CP Slocan line; in Manitoba, the CN line at Erwood; there are other lines in Ontario; the CN line from Foothills to Spur Turo; the CN Graham line; the CN Manitouwadge line; the CN Midland line, and the list goes on. All of this adds up to a total number—and I will try to find my figures here—of abandoned lines for the year representing, by region, 48 per cent in Ontario, 19 per cent in Quebec, 23 per cent in the Maritimes and 10 per cent in the Prairies.

This motion clearly illustrates the urgency of ensuring the availability of lines already approved for abandon, until new provisions in Bill C–101 apply, if they are passed as a whole, and thus of ensuring that the recent past is covered, rather than have the companies ruthlessly abandoning lines with the support of the National Transportation Agency, because, I repeat, it was almost automatic. I had an opportunity to experience the trauma of arguing before the National Transportation Agency, when I argued in favour of the CP Lachute line, and we saw which way the Agency invariably leans. It is unfortunate, but, I think the number of decisions the Agency has made in favour of the railways clearly illustrates what I am saying.

In conclusion, what we are seeking with this motion, is to force the government to implement the provisions of Bill C–101 immediately in order to preserve railway branch lines that are important for Quebec, until Quebec achieves political sovereignty, of course, which we expect to be very soon. Then, it will be able to exercise its powers to the fullest and will not have to go and beg before the National Transportation Agency of Canada for decisions to be made. As Jean Lesage said in 1960, we will be "Maîtres chez nous", and that is what Quebecers want.

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to the motion put forward by the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans.

His concerns reflect an appreciation for the approach advocated by the government toward rail line rationalization. The wording of his motion implies support for the line rationalization process set out in Bill C–101, the National Transportation Act.

The government has noted the widespread concerns expressed by several interested parties regarding the existing rail line rationalization process. Deficiencies have been recognized and we believe a remedy has been proposed through Bill C–101.

On October 2, 1995, Bill C–101 was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport. Committee hearings are currently under way.

Canada's rail network is overbuilt. Eighty–four per cent of CN and CP traffic is moved over one–third of the network. Traffic density is only 60 per cent of the average of the top seven major railroads in the United States. It has been estimated that some 50 per cent of current CN and CP tracks are surplus to their needs. However, many of these lines could be successfully operated by short lines or regional railways.

Rationalization is under way but it is occurring slowing due to the complicated abandonment process contained in the National Transportation Act, 1987. There is widespread recognition that future rail financial viability will depend greatly on the railway's ability to accelerate plant rationalization and restructuring its networks.

Bill C–101, the National Transportation Act, is intended to streamline and modernize transportation regulations. In particular it will lift the regulatory burden on rail to increase its competitiveness in an increasingly continental market.

The bill contains provisions to streamline and shorten the current process for rail rationalization, making it commercially oriented, less adversarial and more conducive to the sale or lease of surplus rail lines to new operators. In conjunction with those provisions, the process for entry of smaller low cost rail carriers to operate in co–operation with CN and CP has been eased.

As demonstrated by the U.S. experience following deregulation of its railway industry in 1980 with the passage of the Staggers Act, railway rationalization need not result in the abandonment of track. In the United States since 1980, although 34 per cent of the total rail route miles were trimmed from the rail line railroad networks, less than half that track was abandoned. Almost 30,000 miles of track were sold to successful short line railways and saved from abandonment.

Today there are over 500 short line railway companies in the United States, of which 263 were created since 1980. In Canada only 10 new independent short lines were created since 1988.

Let me emphasize that the line rationalization process set out in Bill C–101 is not as radical as that in the United States. However one of its main features is that it will provide opportunities for any interested party to acquire lines surplus to the needs of CN or CP for continued use as rail lines.

In the event that there is a lack of interest in purchasing a particular line for rail purposes or a sale agreement is not reached, each level of government will have an opportunity to decide whether or not to acquire a line at net salvage value for public purposes.

Only after a railway company has gone through the process I have described and it has been unsuccessful in transferring the line to a new owner, whether it be a private company or a government, will it be able to abandon operations over the line and dispose of the land corridor and track assets. This will be a major improvement over the current process.

The current process has caused some parties significant concern. For example, some provincial governments have expressed their wish to preserve an economic rail line, even though they have not had any traffic on them for many years, in the event that some day there may be a need for them. However, it has been normal practice when lines are put forward for abandonment that the provinces do not take positive action to find a new operator or acquire the lines themselves.

Under the National Transportation Act, if a rail line is not purchased by new operators for continued rail purposes the onus is placed on governments at all levels to come forward and express their interest in the rail corridors by financing the cost of their acquisition at net salvage value.

Even if the government possessed the powers to comply with the action requested in the member's motion there would be no beneficial outcomes. Currently only five rail lines have been ordered abandoned by the agency. Three of them are scheduled for abandonment in 1995 and the remainder in 1996. Negotiations are under way for the purchase of one of the lines to be abandoned in 1996 and no interest has been expressed by anyone in the purchase of the others.

There is really nothing more to add except that on the strength of the motion I look forward to the hon. member's support of Bill C–101, the National Transportation Act. We should not delay the bill, as the hon. member has suggested, but should get on with, hopefully in the next two to three weeks, getting it through the House so that the process is improved and interested parties, be they short lines, governments or other interests, can take advantage of the opportunities presented by the new rationalization policy of the government.

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as I prepared to speak on the motion it seemed the hon. member from the Bloc must not have realized what was in Bill C–101, because it is exactly what he is asking for.

However I listened to the content and the direction of his speech and obviously he was aware of it. It seems as though he went around in a circle and fell out the middle. I am not really sure what his purpose was unless it was simply to take another 20–minute opportunity to bash Canada and promote Quebec's separation.

The member is looking for a particular provision that is contained in Bill C–101, specifically in clauses 143 and 145. On the one hand he says this is an urgent matter and that he wants to get it done very quickly. At one point he used the word retroactively. There are a couple of things with the Bloc Quebecois that I would like to do retroactively.

There is a bit of a paradox here. While the hon. member stood to say this was an urgent matter that needed to be taken care of quickly, Bill C–101 is scheduled to go for clause by clause consideration and to come back to the House for final passage the week following next week's break. He also said that Bill C–101 needed to be extended, that there has not been enough time and that he wants to stretch it out.

I do not know why he needs more time. We have heard dozens and dozens of witnesses, intervenors in committee. The hon. member, as the transport critic for the official opposition, is a member of the committee. Perhaps he needs more time because he has not been at many of the committee meetings. He showed up once or twice.

I am the national transport critic for the national opposition party and I have been at those meetings. Any time I have not been able to attend my colleagues have been there in my support and in support of people across Canada. People can approach the government and make application to the government. They can also approach a creditable, viable opposition party when they do not happen to agree with what the government is doing or they want to ensure there is more pressure and support.

The hon. member has shown up at committee meetings on occasion. I cite one of those occasions to show how his interest has nothing to do with national transportation or with the act. It only has to do with his own sovereignty, separatist agenda. Last week one or two witnesses had already spoken and then we heard from a group of representatives of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities representing municipalities across the country, including in Quebec.

• (1130)

Toward the end of the intervenors' presentation the hon. member joined the committee for a brief period of time. As questions to the delegation opened he immediately tore into them, in a very vicious and embarrassing manner, because the brief was not presented in French as well as in English. Had he been there at the beginning he would have heard the explanation and apology for the fact that it was not available in French, that it would be available the following day, that the delegates had only completed the brief that morning, that they would have normally done this, that they always do but on this occasion they did not have the time to do it. It was quite an embarrassing outburst from someone who claims to be a member of the national official opposition. It may be official by name, but it is certainly not national.

The hon. member stayed for the next presentation, which happened to be by a delegation from the province of Quebec, and then left before any further presentations were made.

I do not know what his real bottom line is. If his real bottom line is to have the amendments made that have been outlined in his motion, they are contained in Bill C–101. He can come to the committee and aid us in completing that bill. I am sure amendments will be offered. I shudder to think what will come from his party, but I am sure amendments will be proposed. I can guarantee that there will be amendments proposed by the Reform Party. Amendments have been proposed by the Liberal Party. The bill is there to be examined. The committee will hear presentations and will react to the needs of the Canadian people.

If the hon. member comes to the committee for the purpose of aiding it and seeing the bill completed, then he will get the very things he asked for this morning. However, if he comes to the committee to delay and extend the proceedings, after having not been to any of them, then he is fighting not against Bill C–101, not against the Liberal government, but against his own motion. That will be a very interesting aspect for him to take up.

I close by pointing out one item for clarification. From time to time, prior to and since the referendum, the Reform Party has raised the question of who rightly should be the official opposition in the House. By past precedent it falls to the Bloc Quebecois because it has a superior number of one. Some people, both those sitting opposite and some misinformed people in the media, have claimed that the Reform Party has done this by way of opportunism. It was not opportunism; it was our duty to the Canadian people and our obligation as members of the House to represent all of Canada on all bills, including national transportation bills, rather than the narrow views of one separatist group within one province.

If the hon. member co–operates he will get his wish.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to speak to Motion No. 494 this morning. The motion is somewhat redundant, but at the same time it is important to speak to an issue that is fundamentally important to all Canadians; that is, the national transportation system and in particular what takes place when rail rationalization occurs in a country that continues to change, as it normally would in a federation. The needs of the public and the regions of the country are changing as well, so it is important to understand that transportation needs change.

Under Bill C–101 there are a number of clauses that deal with rail abandonment. In particular, the bill deals with the ability to transfer rail. This is a unique change in direction by the Government of Canada. It is a welcome change.

For those of us who have followed the transportation system and the abandonment of lines, under the NTA of 1987 the process that had to be followed for certain lines to be abandoned was that they first had to go to the NTA to prove that the particular line did not have commercial viability. Imagine how easy that would be to do if first of all the line was demarketed, which is what was done to start with.

• (1135)

Most railway companies would not admit this, but when I had the opportunity to chair a special committee that went across the country to look at CN privatization we ran into some documentation that proved that in certain cases high ranking officials in CN sent out memos to their regional management, dictating and explaining to them how to demarket a particular branch line so they could go to the NTA and have them signify that it was not commercially viable and allow them to abandon it.

Bill C–101 and the motion presented by the member this morning suggest a different way of doing business. That is, to acknowledge that transportation companies are no different from any other business in Canada and that they cannot be forced to deal with what governments are dealing with every day, and that is the public interest, when in fact transportation companies are more interested in the bottom line. If we force them to try to maintain a particular line without compensating them in a manner that would help the company to be successful, they will go about it in one fashion or another to make sure those lines do get abandoned.

Public policy and public interest are a very important portion of this bill. The critics who look at it are continuing to say that the government is getting out of the public interest business in transportation, but we are putting it where it belongs. Public interest is being taken out of the hands of every day companies in the transportation sector and put back in the hands of the politicians, to make decisions whether they want to subsidize certain lines in this country and whether for regional purposes they want to maintain certain branch lines. Those particular public interest initiatives and policies will have to be put back in the hands of cabinet and parliamentarians if we are going to have a private sector transportation system that works.

In the member's presentation to the House this morning he talked about time frames. It is important to talk about time frames because there is a perception left by the member that the government is not serious about short line railways becoming a new phenomenon in Canada, that it is just lip service and more than likely most of these lines will be abandoned because of the time frame.

I totally disagree with the member, as is unfortunately usually the case. The time frame for sale of a line starts with the unique process in the bill of forcing the railways, through clause 141, to put forward a three–year plan that is available to anyone, including ourselves as members of Parliament. Can you believe that? They are going to let us see something for a change. In that three–year plan they will signify whether they want to continue a particular line or whether they are interested in selling it or if they cannot sell it whether they will eventually abandon it.

That three–year plan, which the governments have asked the railways to table on a regular basis and to revamp whenever necessary, will give members of Parliament and the public an opportunity to review just what lines are not in the best interest of a private corporation's business plan.

The next process is the intent of any individual municipality, any regional government, whoever is interested in owning a particular line that the other railways do not want to own. They will have 60 days to signify interest in that particular line. Within 60 days all they have to do is write a letter to CP or CN or any other corporation that owns a railway and say they would like to look at purchasing that particular piece of track. Then the 60 days will be allowed to elapse. When that elapses, they have five months after the 60 days to sit down and negotiate the sale of that line to that individual, that municipality, that provincial government.

As can be seen, 60 days is two months and after that is the five–month negotiation process, which gives seven months minimum. Of course if the negotiation is a serious one and both parties are moving along in their negotiations, I am quite sure the railways would be interested in an extension, because it is not in a railways' interest to abandon a line if they do not have to. If they can get an agreement with an individual to run a line to bring a particular shipment of goods from a particular corporation at the end of the line, which is the reason the railway is there and get it down to the other end, certainly they would do so.

I want to emphasize this. In clauses 141 and then 143 to 145 it lays out very specifically how these rail lines would be transferred from one corporation to the next. In the final analysis, if nobody is interested, be it the Quebec government, a municipality in Quebec, or a private sector individual, why would anyone want to force a corporation like CP or CN to run a line that absolutely nobody else would like to run? Quite frankly, I think it would have a right to abandon that line.

I want to emphasize that the real issue is not whether a piece of track is torn up, it is what is done with the right of way. That is the real issue in the long term. One of the problems the U.S. is having with the Staggers Act and the changes in policy it made for line abandonment is that when it abandons a line it does not look after the right of way but sells it to the private sector. Depending on where the land is, it is chopped up for residential lots and things like that. That land cannot be re–acquired 20 years from now without expropriation.

One of the main issues that is going to face us as we rationalize our railway system is what to do with that right of way when we tear the track up and pull it out there. That is all salvage value, which is fine, but if we keep that particular right of way we can always put the track back at some future date. Most people do not see the significance of that right of way.

In southern Ontario, for example, that is a major issue because most of that land is privately owned outside of that right of way. Once the private sector gets hold of it we are never going to get it back. Governments, in particular provincial and municipal, have a very important role to play on that issue. It is not a federal government jurisdiction. It is a provincial jurisdiction. That is where the member should be focusing his attention. That is the mistake that was made in the Staggers Act. Some companies in the U.S. wish they had not sold the right of way but kept it for future use and land banked it.

Powers in this place rest in a number of ways and in a number of fashions. The Minister of Transport in this bill still has the power to subsidize branch lines. He still has the power to subsidize certain rail lines. I will use just one rail line as an example, which is close to my home.

There is a line that runs all the way up to Churchill. It is a very important line to northern Manitoba for regional development. The line could be abandoned tomorrow if it were dealt with in dollars and cents, because it does not make a profit. However, the line is important in the long term to the viability of northern Manitoba. I would suggest that if the people of northern Manitoba, the municipalities that exist there and the shippers on that line were really interested in regional development and if the federal government would enter into a co–operative arrangement with them, someone else who is interested in it could run that line. Maybe they can make it closer to being profitable than it is now. At the same time, it is very transparent that we are subsidizing a line that does not make money because of regional development needs.

The public interest should lie in a transparent fashion. Whether we want to subsidize a losing operation is a different story. However, forcing railways to carry losing lines is not the way to go about the business of running a corporation, whether it be private or public. I differ with many people on that argument.

I hope the member who brought this motion forward, as has been mentioned by the Reform Party, spends less time trying to break up Canada and more time in the committee. He will realize there are some very good parts to this bill. At the same time if he supports it he will find there are some good entrepreneurs in Quebec who would love to run a railway and who could run it a lot better than CN or CP ever did.

• (1145)

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to my hon. colleague from Kootenay West—Revelstoke when he expressed his views on the official opposition. He believes it would be much more interesting if the Reform Party formed the official opposition in this debate about railways. I can assure that I, for one, will stick to the matter under consideration.

The matter at issue is that the National Transport Agency has authorized CP and CN to abandon a number of sections on some important rail lines, in particular the Lachute, Chapais and central Quebec lines.

These abandonments will certainly have a major, serious impact on regional development. For example, I will only talk about the Lachute line because my colleague from Argenteuil and myself tabled a brief asking that this line not be abandoned. The matter at issue is the abandonment of part of this line—that is, the central part and not the start or the end. Talk about a rational decision: they leave the start and end of the line but remove the middle.

To show you just how lightly the agency gave this authorization, I will mention the fact that, in concluding that the line was not profitable, the commissioners simply relied on the argument that the railway had not made enough money over the past three years, when everyone knows that we were in a recession and that these three years therefore did not reflect the railway's real earning potential.

During these hearings, it was conclusively proven that CP had made no effort to develop or even keep its clients. On the contrary, it seemed to try to drive them away.

It got to the point that the Quebec Ministry of Transportation, using its urbanization powers, had to issue an order to at least prevent the dismantling of the Lachute line. The ministry cannot oppose the end of operations, but it can prevent the line from being dismantled.

This brings me to the topic of Bill C–101, on which we will vote very soon and to which my colleague from Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans and myself will propose amendments.

True, Bill C–101 will require CP and CN to sell the branch lines they abandon. However, it is clear that the government has a new rail policy in that, first, there will no longer be any public hearings and, second, the National Transportation Agency, whose name and role will change, will no longer have any authorization to give.

In other words, the government has just about set aside the notion of public service in favour of a strictly for–profit mentality. I think that this is another example of the government's general tendency to disregard the public interest and think like an accountant rather than an entrepreneur. One would have expected a responsible government to encourage railway companies to contribute to regional development, thus spurring their own development and bringing in tax revenues for the government, instead of helping them sell off the branch lines they are not interested in.

• (1150)

In conclusion, as my colleague pointed out, I think that only Quebec sovereignty will result in making the public interest a priority in government decisions.

[English]

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans wants the government to require the railway companies to put lines that have been ordered abandoned up for sale.

I contend the lines have already been advertised as available for sale. The fact they have been subjected to the long abandonment process which is now in place should be seen as a clear indication the railways do not want them.

Currently there are only five line segments that fall into the category defined by the member's motion. The CP Cornwall subdivision from Soulanges, Quebec to Cornwall, Ontario was approved by the National Transportation Agency for abandonment on December 27 of this year.

The CP Chalk River subdivision from Smiths Falls to Pembroke is scheduled for abandonment on November 19 next, as are the CP Chalk River and North Bay subdivisions from Petawawa to Mattawa, Ontario. A segment of the CN Chatham subdivision between Bloomfield and Tucumseh, Ontario is to be abandoned on July 14, 1996. Finally, the agency has ordered CN to abandon the segment of the Newmarket subdivision between Barry and Longford, Ontario on September 21 next year.

It should be noted that VIA has already expressed interest in acquiring the Chatham subdivision from CN, and the Ontario government has held and is holding discussions with CN regarding the Newmarket subdivision.

As is clear even from the wording of the motion, Parliament has delegated the responsibility for regulating rail line abandonments and conveyance to the National Transportation Agency in accordance with the provisions of the National Transportation Act, 1987. Briefly, the agency's powers under the act extend to the receiving and processing of abandonment applications. The criteria for reaching an abandonment decision are set out in the act. Any line abandonment application results in an abandonment order if there is no opposition to that abandonment.

However, if there is opposition expressed by anyone, the agency must publish the actual losses incurred from the operation of the line. Based on traffic and financial information provided by the railways and evidence submitted by intervenors in writing or at public hearings, it must make a determination as to whether operation of the line is economic or uneconomic.

If the agency finds the line is economic, the application is dismissed. Where the agency finds the line is uneconomic it is then required to make a further determination as to whether there is any reasonable probability that it could become economic in the foreseeable future. If not, the agency must order abandonment. If yes, the agency must order continuation of operations over the line if it is in the public interest.

For lines ordered continued in the public interest, the agency is required to reconsider the abandonment application at least once every three years. The agency is given some discretion in fixing abandonment dates to not less that 30 days or not more than one year after the date of an abandonment order. If VIA operates over the line the abandonment date is fixed at one year after the date of the order.

The governor in council has powers under the abandonment provisions to postpone the date of abandonment if certain criteria can be satisfied. This is in addition to powers accorded under section 64, whereby the governor in council can rescind or vary any agency order, decision, rule or regulation.

• (1155)

As members may have noticed neither the agency, the minister nor the governor in council has power to issue orders to the railways with respect to what properties they should put up for sale and when they should do so. It has always been possible for other governments, as my colleague from Rainy River said, to take an active role in promoting the sale of a line, or even to purchase the line itself.

No other business sector or mode of transportation is subject to such strict regulation of exit as has been imposed on the railway industry. With the enactment of the Canada Transportation Act, the government hopes to place the responsibility for rail rationalization where it belongs, with the railway companies.

The decision to withdraw from a certain segment of business is a commercial decision and does not justify government intervention. For example, if a trucking firm decides it no longer wants to serve a particular city because it is losing money, it simply stops going there. Why should a railway company not have the same freedom? If a grocery chain decides it wants to close a store at a particular location and possibly open one at a more profitable location, the government does not interfere. Why should that same government prevent a railway company from doing the same thing? This government does not exist to tell competing businesses such as transportation companies how to conduct their business.

It is clear there is no overriding reason why the government cannot comply with the member's Motion 494. The member will find that the advanced publicity regarding railway rationalization plans required under the Canada Transportation Act fulfils the general intent of his motion.

I appreciate the member's interest in this important topic. We are at a stage where we are moving from one railway regime to another. There are difficulties inevitably involved with that transition.

The decisions made are very important indeed. To that extent I greatly appreciate the member's interest. However, I argue that his concerns are well met under the existing legislation.

[Translation]

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, as no other hon. member wishes to speak, I recognize the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans on debate. There are two or three minutes remaining.

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to use the time remaining in the debate on this motion, pursuant to our Standing Orders.

I would like to correct something my hon. colleague from Kootenay West—Revelstoke, who sits with me on the Standing Committee on Transport, said in his remarks.

He indicated earlier, in summarizing the motion to some extent, that the usefulness of such a motion is unclear, since Bill C–101 will do what the hon. member is asking for. I think he should have read the motion and listened to what was being said. He would have realized that the motion in question is to ensure—not in a distant future; Bill C–101 has not yet been passed—that railways lines recently slated for abandonment will be covered by the provisions contained in Bill C–101, once passed. Again, my colleague from Kootenay misconstrued my meaning.

Also, the hon. member of the Reform Party complained again about his party not having become the official opposition yet. I would like to inform the Reformers, through you, that if the Bloc Quebecois is the official opposition, it is neither to please the Liberal Party, nor to annoy the Reform Party. British parliamentary tradition has it that the largest minority group in the House of Commons forms the official opposition. We never asked to be the official opposition. It is just the way it is and shall continue to be, since we have decided to continue sitting in this Parliament to unmask the Liberals.

• (1200)

A common thread goes through the whole federal transportation reform: the government intends to shift infrastructure costs onto municipalities, RCMs or the Quebec government, while at the same time maintaining control and keeping corresponding revenues. In fact, these so–called improved management objectives hide a sucker's deal.

The defence of Quebec's interests is no longer tied exclusively to fruitless objections or demonstration too often ignored. It is now predicated on Quebecers taking the transportation issue into their own hands to ensure their future and the future of Quebec businesses and regions whose development depends on transportation.

Only by becoming sovereign will we be able to put in place an integrated transportation policy, in which our local and public sector partners will be the first to gain from a unified transportation role within Quebec, combined with a partnership with our Canadian neighbours and NAFTA allies.

We, members of the Bloc Quebecois, the official opposition, will keep on repeating this as long as it takes in this House.

The Deputy Speaker: The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH ACT

The House resumed from November 2 consideration of the motion that Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment.

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of Bill C–95, legislation which will establish the Department of Health.

Two weeks ago I spoke on another piece of legislation. I reminded the House and particularly our friends from Quebec of the desire of my constituents for a united and strong Canada. With the end of the referendum that desire still continues. The people of Guelph—Wellington, all crusaders for Canada will always support Canada first. We have a strong attachment to this great country. We celebrate the privilege of being Canadian and we thank the people of Quebec for saying no to separation.

Over the past several weeks Canadians have heard much of the word change. We have before us a bill which changes the name of the Department of Health. That, as was said by the hon. Minister of Health, is the simplest part of this legislation. Within the bill there is a new focus. Bill C–95 contains a new vision of the future that promises to make improvements in what is already the best national health system in the world.

The people of Guelph—Wellington want to give a clear message to Parliament. We want our health system preserved. We reject those who want to dismantle what we have built in favour of a system that judges patients on how much money they have rather than how sick they are.

We recognize the need to respond to areas of concern, but we will not compromise the protection that is given to each of us by the Canada Health Act. This act declares that the health aspects of social well–being are the responsibility of the Department of Health.

We all know that we were elected to assist the well–being of our constituents and also of every single Canadian. It is the obligation of the government in every department and of every single member of the House to ensure the well–being of the people who have entrusted us with all of their confidence. The people of Guelph—Wellington have elected me to be a member of a government that is tempered with compassion, motivated by care and strengthened through its ability to make Canada a better place to live.

Our health care system is one of the values which makes Canada the best place in the world in which to live. Whether Canadians reside in Guelph, Ontario, Drummondville, Quebec, or St. John's, Newfoundland, they know they can depend on a federal government that is determined to protect the fabric of their health care system.

• (1205)

This legislation clearly acknowledges the responsibility of the Department of Health to care for the social well–being of my constituents and the people of every single region throughout Canada. Through this legislation we are acknowledging that there is more to health than health care. Health means the complete state of physical, mental and social well–being.

The people of Guelph—Wellington are fortunate to have quality health care providers who work for the benefit of our community. Organizations like the Victorian Order of Nurses, Homewood Health Centre, St. John Ambulance Association and the Wellington–Dufferin–Guelph Health Unit work together to provide assistance, plan health services, give information and support the people of my community.

While Guelph—Wellington welcomes change, our people do not want an end to the government's commitment to the long tradition of ensuring health protection for every single Canadian. Ten years ago the Canada Health Act was debated and passed without any member voting against it in this House. Those were the days when the opposition parties joined the government in support of every Canadian regardless of their income.

The Canada Health Act contains five principles: public administration, comprehensiveness, universality, portability, and accessibility. This act was the result of the efforts of strong ministers of health including Hon. Allan MacEachen; the father of the current Minister of Finance, Hon. Paul Martin Sr.; Hon. Marc Lalonde; and Hon. Monique Bégin. They were supported by Canadians in their quest for a health care system that offers care and protection. They were supported by opposition members who defended the rights of all Canadians, Canadians who deserve members of Parliament who wish to preserve our health care system rather than to destroy it.

I mentioned organizations that work in my community to preserve quality health care. These are joined by hundreds of individuals working alone or through various agencies in building a growing awareness of the importance of nutrition, stress management, physical fitness, safety in the workplace, and the environment.

We are fortunate in Guelph—Wellington because in addition to quality care institutions like the Guelph General Hospital and St. Joseph's Hospital and Home, there are people who care. These people deal not only with cures but with prevention. They realize that health prevention is the real health care revolution in this country.

My own family has been blessed with family doctors like Allan Simpson who was there when my children were born and has cared for them ever since. Anne Simpson, his wife, has also been a nurse and caregiver in our community. Without people such as them our health care system would not be the best in the world.

Our government is determined to save, sustain and improve Canada's health care system. We will continue to fight against those who fail to recognize that health care weaves the fabric of our very nation.

As part of the promises that we have kept since our election, the Prime Minister has initiated the National Forum on Health and has taken a real leadership role in finding solutions to the difficult questions facing all of us. The Prime Minister and Minister of Health are to be congratulated for this effort.

The National Forum on Health is asking: Are we getting the best results from our expenditures? Should we be spending more in some areas and less in other areas? Are we taking full advantage of new opportunities in the health field? How can we learn from experiences within Canada and from other countries?

These are important questions which deserve our time and our consideration. Canadians must dialogue about what our health system should look like over the longer term. We must develop a vision of the future. When I discussed priorities for federal spending with my constituents prior to the last federal budget, they told me that health care must remain a priority in Canada. In fact most of the people in Guelph—Wellington who responded to a questionnaire that I sent out clearly stated that health care should not be cut in any way. They are concerned about abuses. They are anxious to find solutions to what is wrong with our health care system but they absolutely reject the Reform Party's vision for health care in our community.

As in everything else we do, we want to work on a solution that will make our country better. We cannot accept the doom and gloom that is so often embraced by the third party in this House. We know there are challenges to making these improvements, but the people of Guelph—Wellington welcome these challenges because we want to make our health care system work for our children and our grandchildren.

I am pleased that one of the tasks of the national forum is to document case histories of health care approaches that have succeeded in improving the health of the population. I look forward to the policy recommendations that will be made in this area. The forum has taken the Guelph—Wellington approach to problems: build on successes, learn from mistakes and identify priorities.

Health is more than health care. There are many aspects of life and lifestyle that go toward making people healthy. As a government we must continue to rebuild our society to make it healthier. How can we do this? We can provide employment to those unemployed, give hope to Canadians who feel a sense of abandonment. We can provide a strong social support network for our Canadian family. We can build a better education system, find more agreeable working conditions for our workers, free the environment from pollutants and rid ourselves from unsafe products that contribute to an unhealthy environment. Health care means all facets of our society.

Each Canadian is also responsible for his or her own well–being. Personal health practices which include a positive outlook help reduce the risk of heart disease, diabetes and cancer. I have encouraged my constituents to work with the many organizations in Guelph and Wellington county that promote, educate, assist and support my constituents who suffer from epilepsy, cancer, the effects of a stroke, and cystic fibrosis to name but a few. In Guelph—Wellington we believe that by supporting each other we can build a better community and a better Canada.

The government continues to look at positive ways to improve the health care of our country. I wish to take a few seconds to speak about the prenatal nutrition program which was promised in the red book and implemented by Health Canada in July 1994.

We know that prenatal and childhood health experiences will affect us throughout our lives. Low weight at birth is a problem for the growing child and in some cases contributes to ill health in adults and sometimes premature death. There is also increasing evidence that the way children are cared for at an early age influences their coping skills and health for the rest of their lives. We also know that it is possible to reverse some of the ill effects and positively influence later health and well–being by intervening with supplementary and enrichment programs at critical stages in the development of children and youth.

The prenatal nutrition program is providing $66.4 million over four years to set up or expand prenatal nutrition programs for low income expectant mothers. This is an example of a positive contribution of government for the well–being of our future. As a mother of three, I know how precious children are. I worked with many children through my efforts at the Wellington County Board of Education. Preventive health, positive lifestyle promotion and health education are going to contribute to bettering the health of our children and saving valuable health care dollars in the future.

Our health care system is probably regarded as one of the finest in the world and this is no exaggeration. At a time when Canadians are reflecting on what makes us so great, we need only to look at our health care system as an example of a country that truly works.

True, there are ways that we can improve our health care system. It is not perfect, but it works and it works well. It ensures that the poorest of our citizens receive help when they are most in need. It ensures that our seniors need not sell their homes in the event of a lengthy illness. More important, it ensures that the people of Guelph—Wellington and those in all parts of Canada can concentrate on getting better when they are sick, free from the worry of who will pay for their health care. That is the kind of protection needed and wanted by a vast majority of Canadians.

• (1215)

Many Canadians deserve credit for our health care system. Those who in the past had a vision of caring led the way. Volunteers throughout communities such as Guelph—Wellington ensure that people are cared for and educated about prevention programs. Health care professionals have the responsibility for providing care which has become extremely complex and extremely demanding.

Advancements in health care have meant an explosion of medical knowledge and information involving all kinds of advances in equipment and procedures. The front line workers are there first to care for the sick and their families. They feed us, give us medicine and often are there to care for us when we die.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to pay tribute to the dedicated physicians, surgeons, nurses, attendants, paramedics, researchers and administrators who, along with many associates, have built for Canadians a health care system which is the envy of the world.

I saw them care for my mother and I see them in their dedicated work when I visit hospitals and nursing homes throughout Guelph—Wellington. This past week they cared for my father–in–law who was struck down with a heart attack. They are wonderful people and we are lucky to have them.

We have a good health care system. We are facing new realities and we are confronted by old problems but I am confident that the foundations are sound. I know the people of Guelph—Wellington support legislation which promotes the well–being of every Canadian. I know they do not want a society in which the poor, the elderly and those less fortunate cannot get quality health care.

We in Guelph—Wellington are proud of Canada. We are proud of our health care system. There are those in the House who may wish to erode the principles of medicare, but in Guelph—Wellington we refuse to put a price on our health care system. To do so is to ignore our past and to let down our future. We accept the challenges ahead. We want to build on the principles of the Canada Health Act.

Later this month I will meet with members of the Wellington County Medical Society. I meet with concerned constituents every week who have asked me to protect their health care system. I will tell the members of the society we stand with them and we will not abandon health care in Canada. This is why this legislation needs our support.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Wellington told us about the goodwill gestures made by her constituents towards Quebec. I hope that she and her constituents are sincere. However, the fact is that, according to a recent poll, only 30 per cent of Canadians outside Quebec agree that constitutional changes should be made, while two thirds of Quebecers are in favour of such changes. Today's reality is very different from the show of love witnessed before the referendum.

My question relates to the hon. member's comments to the effect that we must preserve Canada's health care system. How will we preserve that system, given that the federal government has been cutting for years in the transfers to the provinces, and that these cuts will likely be even greater following the next federal budget? How does the hon. member reconcile the preservation of Canada's health care system with the drastic cuts being made by the federal government?

• (1220)

[English]

Mrs. Chamberlain: Mr. Speaker, I will address the first comment by my colleague. When I spoke we did make eye contact. He asked if I was sincere about Quebec's staying in Canada. I have never been more sincere about anything in my life.

There are many Guelph—Wellington residents who want Quebec to stay in Canada. They joined in the rally. They signed a petition last year stating that fact. They care. They know that united we stand and divided we do fall. We truly do want Quebec as a part of Canada. We will work with Quebec and all provinces to make everything we do stronger and better.

This brings me to the health care issue we were talking about earlier. The question my hon. colleague put to me is about maintenance if transfer payments decrease. As we know, in this time of fiscal restraint all money is tight. We all have deficits, including provinces like Quebec which has a huge deficit. We all know that. We know we have to be protectors of health care. I believe Bloc members are protectors of health care. I also believe they know that in order to protect it, being a part of Canada will give them a much better opportunity. It will be preserved and it will be much stronger.

When we talk about preserving health care, we have to look at new methods. We have to look at other countries. We know, as the Prime Minister has stated many times, our health care is the envy of the world.

Last week I met with Ralph Nader from the United States. He told us horrific stories about what is going on there with the health care system. He warned us to be very careful and ever vigilant not to move to the right, not to move with the Reform and look at a two tiered system. He warned us that would be the end of our health care system.

I call on all members in the House to stand with us and with the health care professionals who have done a wonderful job in our communities to preserve our health care.

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member to look at the medicare system or the health insurance program and one of the five principles, accessibility.

Accessibility tends to conjure a cost factor, that everyone is equal from a cost point of view. However, I would like to bring up two or three other points. The first is transportation, those in the north getting to the services. If anyone breaks a leg in the city, he or she can call an ambulance and go to the hospital. However, the same kind of accessibility is not readily available in the north. That is one aspect of accessibility.

The second is waiting lists. We are looking at health from a preventive point of view, a stitch in time saves nine kind of thing, but we have horrendous waiting lists. It deters accessibility if one has to wait to have a lump examined or whatever.

The third point is accessibility of services. Should we provide all services to all people in all areas? We can get into debates about whether there should be heart surgery in every hospital, every community hospital, or kidney machines, these kinds of things which are not economically feasible.

Therefore from the accessibility point of view, which everyone tends to zero in on, cost and the availability and the individual's economic position for accessibility, could you address the other three or four points?

The Deputy Speaker: I am sure the member meant to say "would the member address the issues".

Mrs. Chamberlain: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased about the three points my hon. colleague brought up. People in the north not being able to access services as quickly is an important factor. We have to always be vigilant on that in our decision making. We should not look only at the cities or the large centres, which is convenient and easier. We must always be thinking about our constituents in the far north or the far south.

• (1225)

The issue of waiting lists is also an absolutely valid point. Wherever we can we have to be constantly monitoring, constantly rechecking, constantly evaluating. What can we do better? I thank the hon. member for bringing up these things forward because only through evaluating what we do now can we get better.

Regarding services in every hospital, I do not know that every service has to be available in every hospital. There are centres with several hospitals. From an economical point of view we may have to look at certain services in one hospital and others located in a hospital five kilometres away, perhaps heart and kidney machines or whatever.

I am in full concurrence with the three points the member brought up. Again I call on every member in the Chamber to keep looking at the points my colleague brought forward. How do we make it better? How do we improve our health care? How do we save lives? How do we make a better quality of life in Canada?

We will do that not simply by feeding money into the system but by priorizing and by being very careful to hone our knowledge, to talk to other countries, doctors, nurses and caregivers who can tell us what we should be doing.

We have to make a call to all members that we need universal health care. We cannot start to erode this. I firmly believe in this principle.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, beyond the nice rhetoric on Canada's health care system, the real purpose of this bill is to confirm and expand the self-proclaimed federal mandate in the health sector, a sector which clearly falls under provincial jurisdiction and which is clearly Quebec's responsibility.

I want to draw your attention to the amendments, the additions to that act. Paragraph 4(2)(a) reads:

> (2) Without restricting the generality of subsection (1), the Minister's powers, duties and functions relating to health include the following matters:
> (a) the promotion and preservation of the physical, mental and social well-being of the people of Canada;

Paragraph 4(2)(b), which was not there before, reads:

> (b) the protection of the people of Canada against risks to health and the spreading of diseases;

We are talking about an expanded mandate regarding prevention. Incidentally, the former act included a section on the protection of the social well-being. That provision is no longer there. It has probably become a responsibility of the Minister for Human Resources Development, who will call it something else.

There is a federal will to take over the provinces' responsibilities—I will refer to Quebec throughout my speech; the other provinces can use a different approach if they wish—in fields which not only clearly fall under provincial jurisdiction—we will not discuss jurisdiction for the sake of jurisdiction—but in which only Quebec can work efficiently, because Quebec alone can implement an integrated policy.

• (1230)

As for amendment (b)

> b) the protection of the people of Canada against risks and the spreading of diseases;

I find that this is evidence of incredible gall on the part of the government after the disaster—the word is not even strong enough—the horror of the tainted blood problem. There was a hue and a cry in that connection to identify those who were to blame for the tainted blood, and everybody seemed to be responsible except the department. And now this is the responsibility we want to broaden here to include risks to health.

Risks to health are so closely linked to general conditions of poverty, sanitation, access to healthy accommodation, education, life, organization of life that one wonders how, in what appears otherwise to be merely a technical bill, the department's mandate could be made that broad.

Either there is a need felt in the federal government, in Canada, to assign itself responsibilities it is not able to meet because they affect people, or there is an inability to admit that the exercise of those responsibilities falling strictly within federal jurisdiction has been a lamentable failure. And I am not referring only to the budget. I could also address transportation policies, communications policies, even, recently, international policies with the disgraceful events surrounding the visit of the Chinese Premier.

It is, nevertheless, dangerous to lead citizens to believe that one is responsible for preventing risks to health when, in reality, one does not and cannot have the means to do so. To really have the means would require taking over the provinces' place. So, far from putting an end to duplication and overlap, the bill is typical of the inefficiency that exists in areas where there is the most crying need at this time, when resources are increasingly scarce.

In reality, it is far more important to ask who is responsible than to ask who is competent, for this reaches people more directly. When talk is of competency, in reality the term that ought to be used is responsibility.

Quebec is the one with responsibility, but not with the means because, as the Minister of Health has pointed out, since 1982–83, eight billion dollars have been cut from health alone, money which represented firm commitments to supposedly allow establishment of the health and social services system in Quebec at a time when—not because money was any more plentiful in Ottawa than in Quebec—there was an extraordinary central concentration of tax dollars. The original reason for this had been financing the Second World War, and that concentration suited to a T all of the senior public servants and politicians who had worked to get decisions on economic and social policies centred in Ottawa, with the provinces only as subcontractors.

• (1235)

This policy was rejected unanimously in Quebec, by all parties. The money that was collected and is still being collected, something which Duplessis, yes Duplessis, tried to get around when he decided Quebec would have its own tax collection system, the federal government used this money so it could determine the direction, development and control of economic and social policies, instead of the Government of Quebec.

This bill confirms clearly and unreservedly the government's policy of overlap and duplication and the irresponsibility we saw in the tainted blood scandal, for instance.

The federal government takes credit for introducing the health care system, as though it would never have happened otherwise. I will not get into the history of this policy which, although its origins go back to Saskatchewan, became a Canadian policy. A respected author on the subject, Thomas Duperré, said in 1987 before the commission of inquiry on health and social services in Quebec that establishing federal programs merely shifted to the federal level a debate that had already started at the provincial level and would have led to the same results over the same period of time, give or take a few months or a few years.

Quebec Health Minister Jean Rochon is, as everyone knows, an expert on these issues. He was involved in the work of the Castonguay–Neveu Commission and later chaired the commission that started its sittings in 1985 and developed the policies of both the previous and present government. So this is not a partisan position, anything but. According to Mr. Rochon, "the Canadian health system is a myth. The truth is, we had developed a health and social services system, despite the fact that the federal government centralized its control over resources while ignoring exclusive provincial jurisdiction in this area as conferred under the constitution of the Canadian confederation".

The minister went on to quote the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs and Welfare René Lévesque. At the federal–provincial conference on poverty in 1965, Lévesque, federalist minister in a Liberal government in Quebec, said that it had become imperative to establish a genuine economic and social policy. This policy should be integrated, flexible in its mechanisms and include a social security system centred on the family and based on the right to assistance on the basis of need.

The same sentence, with few changes, could be used to express the same urgency voiced by sovereignists quite recently. Mr. Lévesque went on to say that for the sake of efficiency and on constitutional grounds, the Quebec government alone could and should, within its own territory, design and implement such a policy. Quebec could not let the Government of Canada assume this responsibility. Quebec did not, however, exclude interprovincial co–operation and mutual consultation.

He also said that the social and economic development policy they had formulated would create an integrated social policy, regional development policy, manpower policy, health policy, housing policy and job training policy.

Fourth, the federalist minister said that the general policy, while he did not necessarily condemn it, did not necessarily correspond, in terms of its spirit and terms of application, to one the Government of Canada might opt for. The people of Quebec would enjoy at least as many if not more benefits than other Canadians might.

The central government's repeated interference, expanding into preventive medicine, is an affront to the intelligence of the history of the past 30 years. It is compromising, in a way—and here I am talking of Canada outside Quebec—and it compromises, it seems to me, a now necessary reorganization. Instead of decentralizing, the federal government is busy reaffirming ever more resoundingly its responsibility for all areas of economic and social development. Through cuts and the transfer of the deficit, it is, moreover, usurping the ability of the poorest provinces, at least, to replace them.

This is a historic moment in the history of Quebec and of Canada. It is not without some emotion that we view these bills—we will be debating Bill C–96 this afternoon or tomorrow and the human resources investment fund and unemployment in the days and weeks to come—that we note that the thinking behind all these bills is one of increasing centralization.

It is an approach, as the Canada social transfer demonstrated in the budget, whereby the only thing transferred to Quebec is the deficit. We are moved by the fact of having to say that the central government wants to take over protecting the public against health risks, when we know the extent to which poverty affects health significantly. We know that centralized and centralizing policies are not going to provide us in Quebec with the tools we need to fight unemployment, poverty and with poor health at the more disadvantaged levels of society.

• (1245)

We will continue to express the thoughts of the large majority of our fellow Quebecers. Even those who voted no, know that, through their municipal governments, their social groups and their Government of Quebec, closest to them, and the most effective integrator, they will not get to heaven, but at least they will have the assurance that every effort was made to provide equality for all in Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to the comments of the member for Mercier. I am always very interested in her deep understanding of social issues.

As I listened to her speech, it ran across my mind what she was talking about were communicable diseases. I wondered whether she thought diseases like AIDS or other diseases knew national boundaries. Are specific diseases that could possibly occur in Quebec unique to the borders or indigenous to the borders of Quebec, or are they diseases that can occur throughout the country and indeed throughout the world?

When we are talking about research in diseases and communicable diseases it seems to me that as a country we need to consolidate our work in these areas to try to find solutions rather than be fragmented and have separate research areas throughout the country.

Next is the whole aspect of governments being closer to the people. We have talked a lot in the House about the issue. I have often wondered if it is psychological talk. We look at a map and we see Ottawa and we see Quebec City. However, what does it mean to someone in Chicoutimi, Arvida or other places in Quebec to get government services closer to the people?

I know in my province, for instance in the area of education, we say that it should be close to the people. The reality is our education system is operated from Toronto. It is not any closer to the people than if it were in Ottawa. I suspect this is true in Quebec as well. The government getting into the lives of people on the streets of those communities is not any more well developed from Quebec City than it is from Ottawa.

An issue that really concerns me about Quebec and its economy is the over–preponderance of provincial debt in that province. Also there is the preponderance of the province of Quebec to borrow, incidentally outside its borders. Some 54 per cent of Quebec's debt is funded outside Canada with foreigners. The referendum actually required the Government of Quebec to borrow $35 million from foreigners to ask its people if they wanted to be an independent country. It seems a little absurd, quite frankly.

Could the member address some of these issues but mainly the whole issue about how we are to get government closer to the people? The federal government, for instance, pays old age pension cheques and the Canada pension plan. It deals directly with people. The Canadian employment services are in our communities. It is the federal government but it is not in Ottawa. It is in our communities and are dealing with community problems. I ask her whether some of this stuff is psychological.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mercier will have as much time to answer as her colleague had to put his question.

Mrs. Lalonde: I have more time, Mr. Speaker? I will be brief, because the hon. member took a lot of time asking his question.

The Deputy Speaker: I said that the hon. member would have as much time as the member who asked the question.

• (1250)

Mrs. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I mentioned health risks, and AIDS is not the only one. But for the sake of example, let us take the tainted blood issue. Do you think that it was any comfort to Quebecers to know that the so–called responsibility was being assumed nationally? It is important to know.

Second, our hon. colleague seems to be telling us that, in Canada in general, people may feel it is quite normal for the central government to try to be the one that is the closest to the people. But in Quebec, it is not so. René Lévesque himself said: "We have nothing to prove". We are a people and a nation, and we know that without one being necessarily better than the other, social, economic, cultural and political organization varies from one nation to another. That is what we are asking for with regard to health as well, and if I say so, it is because I know that I am speaking on behalf of the vast majority of Quebecers.

As for the debt, we think that when the debt is high, it is essential that we be the ones to make the choices, as hard as they may be, and also that we concentrate our resources in areas where a structuring effect can be expected, which is not the case at present in the federal system. Employment centers are indeed a case in point. We have been fighting unanimously for years with ineffective weapons in Quebec to get back control over manpower training, because we know that manpower training is an essential economic development tool.

[English]

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member a question about education in the province of Quebec, an area that has always interested me.

Education, as the hon. member knows, is exclusively a provincial jurisdiction. Over the years Quebec has had complete control of it. If it was so important and useful in such a supreme system to have exclusive jurisdiction in this area and if it was better for the people, why is the dropout rate in Quebec one of the highest in Canada?

[Translation]

Mrs. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, this is an excellent question, and I am convinced that the drop out rate is a reflection of our whole social organization. The drop out rate has something to do with poverty. It has something to do with the lack of hope within Quebec and, if you must know, many people are sovereignists like me and will continue to pursue sovereignty because they are convinced that this is the only way to give people hope and make them drop back in.

While there are technical means to bring young people back to school, we know that those who drop out do not do so because their teachers are boring. We know what makes them drop out. We know that an underprivileged youngster is much more likely to drop out.

[English]

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to speak in support of Bill C–95, an act to fix the name of the Department of Health, I am inclined to ask how many hon. members know that above all it is a department that puts its money where the greatest need is no matter where in the country.

Counting all Canadians from coast to coast to coast the greatest health needs are found among the First Nations. For native peoples life expectancy is seven years lower than the Canadian average. Newborns die four times as often. Substance abuse is prevalent. Sickness is more pervasive. Children are most at risk for malnutrition. For these reasons two out of every three dollars spent by the Department of Health excluding transfers to provinces go to enhance native health. More than 2,000 employees of the department are in the direct care business, mostly dedicated to helping Indians on lands reserved for Indians.

At a time when most government programs are being cut back, the Minister of Health prevailed to secure additional funds for native health in the recent budget. The government remains committed to mending the inequities that have persisted far too long.

• (1255)

The growth in expenditure will gradually taper down but lead time has been provided for native leaders in consultation with the department to explore alternate approaches to achieving the same levels of quality care that other Canadians have come to expect as their right. It is an essential part of Health Canada's mandate to help First Nations achieve the highest possible standards of health care. The department is expanding some programs and introducing others.

Health Canada's building healthy communities strategy is funded by $243 million over five years to strengthen and expand existing health programs for native people in areas of critical need, including solvent abuse, mental health and home care nursing. The strategy is designed in consultation with First Nations and Inuit leaders.

Last May the minister announced supplementary funding under the solvent abuse program for six new permanent treatment centres to deal with solvent abuse among First Nations and Inuit people. The centres are located in northern B.C., Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, southern Ontario and Quebec.

Last May the minister also announced the aboriginal head start aimed at helping disadvantaged children overcome some of poverty's life–drag effects. As it evolves it will provide more and more children with a positive self–image, a desire for learning, and an opportunity to develop social, emotional, physical and learning skills.

Aboriginal people have told us there is a need for programs for young children and families that reflect the culture and experience of their communities. Together with Canada's aboriginal community we have embarked on a mission that will support the need. All Canadians can be proud of the program because its design was developed with input from aboriginal people in both urban and northern communities across the country.

Aboriginal head start represents a made in Canada approach that can begin to address the unique needs of First Nations, Metis and Inuit preschool children and their families. There is ample evidence of the health and educational differences that exist between the Indian, Inuit and Metis people when compared with other Canadians. We know that by working together we can better deal with these problems.

Over half of Canada's aboriginal population does not live on reserves and this population is very young. While 7 per cent of Canada's total population is under four years of age, 13 per cent of the aboriginal population is under four, nearly twice as high. Studies of head start programs have proven that investing in young children is one of the best investments society can make. Head start programs for young children can have a profound and positive effect on their lives.

The elders tell us that every child has his or her own gift and that it is the responsibility of the community to identify that gift, nurture it and ensure that each child is aware of how special she or he is and that she or he is a gift from the creator. This traditional belief is a natural starting point for a healthy beginning in life. Aboriginal head start is similar to a community based early intervention program developed in the United States more than 30 years ago. Those who are familiar with the head start program will be pleased to know that while we will build on their many successes we hope to improve on what they have done.

An important recommendation from our talks with aboriginal people was to make the program flexible. Doing so allows the uniqueness of the First Nations, Metis and Inuit communities to be respected. Aboriginal head start is not complicated and it will have little red tape. It focuses on local non–profit organizations controlled and administered by aboriginal people who see the parent as the natural advocate of the child. Grandparents and elders play a significant role in aboriginal head start projects. Young aboriginal children will benefit from their wisdom and knowledge of tradition. All aboriginal head start projects will have strong parental involvement.

Aboriginal head start will be guided in each region by a committee comprised of aboriginal people who have been nominated by their peers and bring with them an appreciation and understanding of aboriginal cultures, values, traditions, experience and educational expertise. They will assist in identifying priority sites and selecting projects.

As well, a national aboriginal head start committee is being established to ensure the initiative has support and strength across Canada. Its members will be chosen because they have a broad understanding of early childhood development.

• (1300)

It is clear to the federal government that programs for aboriginal people, designed and delivered by it, are more successful than those delivered by outside agencies. I have no doubt that aboriginal head start committees and local head start projects will succeed.

We have placed our investment and trust at the community level because we believe one of the ultimate goals of this initiative is to help parents and children build better futures for themselves. The Government of Canada will continue to work in strong partnership with Indian, Inuit, and Metis people in fulfilling the commitments made in the red book. Through the aboriginal head start program we are continuing to promote community action and empower communities by providing the tools and resources to improve overall economic and social opportunities for children and families.

Although it was inspired by a community based program of early intervention and had its start in the U.S. more than 30 years ago, this head start program is much improved, based on substantial input from aboriginal people in urban and northern communities.

Aboriginal head start will be flexible, respecting the unique characteristics of First Nations, Metis, and Inuit people. Grandparents, elders, and parents will play significant roles and the program will be guided in each region by a committee of aboriginal people nominated by their community.

Head start programs for young children have profoundly positive long term effects. Their impact on aboriginal communities will be even greater elsewhere because in these communities there are nearly twice as many children under the age of four, nearly twice as many in proportion to their share of Canada's population.

One specific program illustrates the care and concern manifest in this department. Last May, Health Canada was the major sponsor of the third annual international conference on diabetes and indigenous peoples, which was held in Winnipeg. Hon. members may be aware that diabetes is one of the most serious chronic diseases among aboriginal populations in Canada. Diabetes rates for natives are from two to five times greater than for Canadians in general.

Health Canada works in partnership with aboriginal people to improve knowledge and treatment of diabetes. The department recognizes what the minister calls the critical role for traditional aboriginal practices in the healing process. This recognition of the value of traditional practices is of fundamental importance and reflects the department's major focus on the native front, which continues to be transfer of control of programs to First Nations.

Over the years, Health Canada has come to recognize that health programs designed and delivered within aboriginal communities are often more successful than those delivered by outside agencies. Therefore, it now works with First Nations to enhance their control of health resources. There have been more than 40 health transfer agreements concluded, involving about 100 First Nations, and the annual expenditures are more than $43 million. About twice as many again are under negotiation. Self–administered health care is one of the powers that will eventually enable First Nations to achieve self–government.

I have used this occasion to remind hon. members and all Canadians of the commitment in this department to improving health and longevity for Canada's first peoples. There remains much to be done, but I know that our Department of Health, rechristened and recharged, will reconfirm its dedication to those most in need.

I am pleased to support this clearing of the deck and positioning for the future brought about through Bill C–95.

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a couple of things in the bill. One is that there is a tendency to think of it as a housekeeping bill because it is a change of name. There are a couple of reasons for changing name. First, it can be done because we do not like the present name. Second, the mandate or the content of the department can be changed. I would like to suggest that the bill represents a little more than just changing the name of the department.

I find it a little amusing that we are discussing the creation of the health department two years into our mandate. I believe we are going to be doing human resources a little later. Also, through Bill C–107 we have created the B.C. Treaty Commission approximately two years after it began functioning.

• (1305)

Getting back to the health department, the fact that it has been up and running under this mandate for two years gives me a little concern as to what its mandate actually is. Whether its mandate has been increased or decreased is the focus of what I am looking at here.

The Department of Health is a product of the phasing out of the Department of Health and Welfare and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is my understanding that most of the mandate that was the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs went to the Ministry of Industry. I am assuming that a lot of the welfare aspect of the Department of Health and Welfare went to the Department of Human Resources Development.

I am wondering what is left for the Department of Health. When we talk in our debates about health we tend to zero in on the health insurance or the medicare component of this department. I would think there is a lot more to health than that particular aspect. That is one component of what a good and functioning health department should be.

If we look at clause 4 of the bill itself, it states that the health department will promote and preserve the preservation of health for the people of Canada. I might add that it states it will do that where it has not been otherwise delegated to other jurisdictions within the government structure.

The second part expands on that a little more. Paragraph 4.2(a) refers to the promotion and preservation of the physical, mental, and social well–being of the people of Canada. I would argue that the social well–being, as we heard earlier in the debate, involves such things as housing, jobs, et cetera. It goes into great parameters from that point of view as to our individual well–being. I would suggest that possibly that aspect is being removed with the removal of the welfare component. Consequently, the health department is in a position of having to collaborate with a number of other industries in actually addressing some of these concerns.

The physical and mental component of that statement is relatively easy to address from a health point of view, because one can certainly look at that within this mandate. However, with the removal of the welfare component the mandate for health has been diminished to a point that now we are in more collaboration and co–operation with the other departments. There is not the same authority there the department once had.

When we move further down the list to what the mandate of this new department will be, in paragraph 4.2(b) it talks about the protection of the people of Canada against risks to health and the spreading of diseases. One would tend to think immediately in that component of communicable diseases and such other diseases that do not necessarily meet the definition of communicable diseases such as HIV–AIDS and possibly hepatitis B and C. These are pandemic kinds of situations. I would hope that a health department would have a major role in addressing these types of things that affect the Canadian people.

We have had some experience in the past two years with both these issues. In my opinion, the response of the government has been reactive. I am wondering if this is a sign of some weakening in the department's ability to pick up the reins and lead when these situations occur.

• (1310)

We go down to paragraph (c), which is "investigation and research into public health, including the monitoring of diseases". I am not sure if it is the only reference, but I believe it is the only reference made in the act to research.

In this context, one tends to think of investigation and research, more studies. We are going to research this, study it. As we all know, we have done a lot of studies. In some areas the feeling is that we have done enough studies over the years and it is time to get into some action.

I also would like to suggest that the research component of health is very important. It not only should be addressing diseases that are out there, but we should be looking at where we are going in the future from a technological point of view and how these things will affect our health.

I am a little concerned that this is the only reference made to research. It tends to imply that we would be looking at diseases.

Paragraph (d) states that the health department will establish and control the safety standards and safety information requirements for consumer products and safety information requirements for the products intended for use in the workplace. That is a program called WHIMS, which is being carried out by the provincial governments. The federal role in that now tends to deal with a problem within a company in which they feel the giving out of that information on their product may violate the marketing aspects of their product, put them in jeopardy of being duplicated or whatever. I would suggest that the federal government's role in WHIMS is minimal now that it has actually been established and implemented.

Paragraph (e) refers to the protection of public health on railways, ships, aircraft and other methods of transportation. Here is a situation I made reference to earlier. The health department is in a position of not having necessarily authority in these areas but having to collaborate with other ministries. I suggest that this will weaken the leadership of this department.

Paragraph (f) moves into the promotion and preservation of health in public servants and other employees. That stands on its own. The health department definitely is a major player there.

Then we move into an environmental type of clause, international, dealing with the United States and others. Now we have another situation in which I am suggesting health is again in collaboration with another department, in this case environment, which means that there has to be a meeting of minds between the two departments for leadership to evolve in whatever situation has to be there.

Paragraph (h) refers to the Statistics Act and the collection, analysis, interpretation, publication, and distribution of information relating to public health. I would like to say that this aspect is being well done and has been well done in the past. We have had experience in our past where people have been able to get information about specific things. Having worked in the health care field before, I know that if one put the effort into obtaining information one certainly could get it. I suggest that the various departments in Health Canada, the bureaucratic component, have been the major bonus in this aspect of things.

We are gathering information and correlating it and then disseminating it to the people. I have dealt with the health programs and services branch with Kay Stanley, specifically in relation to cardiac situations. I must say it has been excellent.

• (1315)

Two positive mandates of the health department have come up in my dialogue so far. One is the education and correlation of information and the other is public servants' health care.

The last item is the co–operation with provincial authorities with a view to the co–ordination of efforts made or proposals for preserving and improving public health. My interpretation of that is it is the one which addresses medicare or health insurance. Again, the role has been delegated to the provinces to provide the service. The federal role is the Canada Health Act and the five principles thereof which ensure that the provinces meet those five standards.

Through the amalgamation of departments we have weakened our health department with respect to giving it the necessary authority to address a great number of issues. Many other aspects of the health department, other than the health insurance aspect which has been transferred to the provinces, are tied up with other departments. One really does not know who has jurisdiction.

Being the critic for aboriginal concerns I have seen many studies. We just heard a member speak about programs. There are numerous studies, such as the EAGLE study which is being done in collaboration with the environment department. There is a drinking water study in progress on which the department of health is collaborating with the department of Indian affairs. As a matter of fact, with respect to the drinking water project, I believe an education program has been established.

All of these things are necessary. There is a great concern regarding the health of our aboriginal people which we should be addressing. We know that breast cancer is another problem which we should be addressing. There are many problems which need to be identified and addressed.

The authority to address these health problems within other jurisdictions, for example, aboriginal people falling under the department of Indian affairs, tends to weaken the authority of the health department. We can get caught up with money, priorities or other things. My point is that I think it is a weakness.

There is an abundance of money in the health care budget. There is a tendency to think of that money in relation to the health care insurance plan. We hear all kinds of dialogue about withholding transfers to the provinces and cutbacks in services. I realize there is a formula which is based on a dollar amount per head.

I might suggest that when we start looking at all of the areas in which health is involved, such as the studies and the various programs in collaboration with other ministries, possibly some of that money might be better used on the other side of the health department which is health insurance and medicare. I realize that entails changing the formula.

• (1320)

The moneys available in health care for health insurance—and I do not know what the percentages would be on that through the whole budget—should be revisited in relation to all the other things the health department should or could be doing with the dollars it has but has allocated elsewhere into studies and various individual programs.

Returning to the reference I made earlier that this bill is creating the health department, this department has been functioning for two years. It may support my argument that the department has been weakened. I hope there is a little more activity coming from the health department. We have had no legislation to date other than this bill. Bill C–7 was referred to the health committee but it was not introduced by the health department to this House.

We had the tobacco situation early last year which again had a negative effect on the health situation. We have had the blood tainting and HIV–AIDS situations. We have had comments about the transfer payments to the provinces in the west. We have had TB in the women's prisons and also the assisted suicide issue arise. There was not really any leadership from the health department. The medical profession actually expressed the pros and cons and the ethics of this and the other House undertook the study on palliative care issues.

I have concerns. We are not just dealing with a name change. I have concerns about the role of the government. I have great concerns that it is being diffused.

I have had some discussions with the Canadian Nurses Association. The association expressed the concern that with the removal of welfare the department would be restricted in its ability to address the whole human being which is important. The approach of health care workers in Canada has changed from an illness approach to a wellness approach where they must look at the whole body. There are concerns from the Canadian Nurses Association on that.

The association is also concerned that the national standards coming from the department relate specifically, from what we have heard so far, to the Canada Health Act and the five principles which relate to the health insurance program.

Those are some of my concerns. I will certainly be supporting this bill when the vote comes. I am concerned that it is being diffused. The team leader, the Prime Minister, calls the shots when it comes to setting up the ministries. I do have concerns that this department has been extremely weakened.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the hon. member's comments, some of which were well thought out. I appreciate her supporting the bill.

The most important recurring theme I heard the hon. member refer to was that this new act will weaken the Ministry of Health in that the Ministry of Health will have to collaborate and co–operate with other departments. I do not see it that way.

As the hon. member rightly said, health is more than just the absence of disease. Health has to do with environmental issues. It has to do with issues relating to poverty and socioeconomic status. It has to do with issues of public health which has to do with contagious or transferable diseases.

• (1325)

Departments such as environment, Indian affairs and northern development and human resources development are already in existence and are already dealing with these issues. What happens is a duplication of efforts. In the past, programs were going on within other departments and health would be duplicating some of them. The idea is that if there had been a concerted effort, then health and the other department, which in turn deals with its colleagues at the provincial level, can create a better understanding of the issue. Then the appropriate department working with health can set a healthy public policy with regard to those things.

The positive thing is that in the past many departments have felt that they did not have an impact on health. There is now a real opportunity for departments to understand that health touches every single aspect of our lives. Those departments, whenever they make policy, can focus on looking at the healthy public component of their policy instead of focusing on the other aspects that did not include health and left the health components up to health, in which case it was very diluted. It was more diluted in that case than it would be in this way.

For example, let us look at the issue of poverty and the transfer of the welfare component of health and welfare to human resources development. We know that one of the things that has to do with poverty has to do with creating opportunity for people for employment training to become independent contributors to society. This is already a major part of human resources development. Therefore, developing human resources is going to decrease poverty in the long run which will then impact on health.

This gives better focus to all of the departments which will in turn see that health is an important component of whatever they do across the spectrum. It also gives the Ministry of Health the ability to look at developing clear health promotion and disease prevention guidelines, focusing on research and some of the things the hon. member spoke about.

Research in terms of disease is not the only component of research one wants to do. The Medical Research Council is looking at health promotion research which will lead to the promotion of positive health status as opposed to just looking at the disease components.

This gives the Department of Health a better focus on some of those issues including public health which, as members well know, means taking healthy public policy with regard to things like sewers, contagious diseases, quality of drinking water and safety, as the hon. member mentioned, which is an important part of what the department does right now. The department will focus on those issues very clearly and will work in co–operation and collaboration with the other departments. This will be a learning process with the other departments to see how what they do impacts on health.

Ms. Bridgman: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's comments. I also appreciate that progress can be achieved much more quickly if we work together.

I recognize the validity of ministries getting together and talking to avoid duplication and channelling their energies in the correct direction. This just does not apply to health; it can also be applied to the environment. Environment affects all the ministries as well.

My concern is that somebody somewhere has to have the authority to take leadership in these situations. When one starts collaborating to that point, is it a committee decision, a health decision, or a ministry decision that we are talking about? How does the priority for recognizing the problem which has been identified actually come into being?

• (1330)

The authority of the department is diminishing because its role is becoming more of an associate or advisory role to the other ministries. It is picking up the gauntlet and running with the program out of its own budget. That is where my concern is. I have no problem with collaborating. That is excellent and it is time we got to it.

I do not see any authority in this paper. If we have a health problem what authority does the department have to put it on the front burner? That is what I am concerned about.

Ms. Fry: Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member's comment. It is like the chicken and the egg syndrome.

According to the member's vision of health it would be a super ministry encompassing all the ministries that will in turn look to the Department of Health to make decisions. Obviously that is not possible but it is an interesting concept.

This is what we have to move to. If we are talking about sharing jurisdictions and incorporating, we are also educating other departments so that people do not continue to focus in a narrow tunnel vision in specific departments on only one component of what they do. It is better for public health policy if the Ministry of the Environment recognizes that whatever it does impacts health, as opposed to the Department of Health constantly saying that it must do this and that, and so on for every other ministry.

I see it as a positive move as opposed to a negative move.

Ms. Bridgman: Mr. Speaker, it might be the chicken and egg syndrome, but the concern first came to me with the EAGLE program. To my understanding that program is being done with the involvement of an aboriginal group. There is probably a specific group around the Great Lakes. The program is studying the effects on aboriginals of the Great Lakes environment. I believe it is being done in collaboration with Indian affairs.

This collaboration is ongoing. We are studying the effects on aboriginals of the Great Lakes environment. I am sure it is affecting other people as well but because it was done in collaboration with one department we have zeroed in on a specific group. This is the trend I am seeing. Instead of the effects on Canadians, we are studying the effects on aboriginals because of the ongoing collaboration. That could get out of hand eventually.

Ms. Maria Minna (Beaches—Woodbine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am supporting Bill C–95 because of the important role Health Canada plays in the life of Canadians. Too often Canadians, and even some hon. members of the Chamber, do not realize that there is more to health than the Canada Health Act. Health Canada supports unique federal roles and responsibilities. The work undertaken by the department is far reaching and important.

Health Canada not only provides the benefits of universal health insurance, it also ensures the safety of food, drugs, cosmetics, medical devices and consumer products. It invests hundreds of millions of dollars in health research. It monitors disease in developing pathogens and it conducts a wide variety of health promotion programs and activities.

Finally, Health Canada administers health services to First Nations, federal public servants, Canadian civil aviation personnel and Canadians in need of emergency health and social services in case of national civil disaster.

The department touches Canadians every day in all aspects of their lives. Canadians look on their health system with pride. They have an overwhelming degree of satisfaction with what the department is doing. They expect governments to work hard to adapt to changing times and priorities. They understand the need for cost effectiveness, but they demand the security of a department concerned with maintaining and improving the health of all Canadians.

• (1335)

The government has recognized that economically disadvantaged, unemployed or poorly educated Canadians are more likely to suffer from ill health and to have a lower life expectancy. Like governments everywhere we will strive to deal with these problems. We are committed to an equitable health care system. The vast majority of Canadians are solidly behind the efforts being made by government, professional groups and other stakeholders to improve the efficiency of the system.

Canada has a long history of commitment to these principles in serving a dispersed population in a federal system of government. We will maintain our commitment to these principles notwithstanding some difficult economic reality that we, as many nations of the world, are experiencing at the moment.

Canadians look to Health Canada for reassurance whenever there are natural or civilian disasters or threats to national health from chronic diseases such as cancer and tuberculosis or communicable diseases such as AIDS, HIV or the Ebola virus.

Within Health Canada 6,400 employees work to provide Canadians with the research data, programs, information and support they need to make positive lifestyle decisions. The business of the department is conducted in offices and laboratories, in cities and on reserves located on sites all across Canada. Just over half the department's employees work in the national capital region while the rest work in regional offices, collaborating with their provincial, territorial and non–government counterparts.

The Canada Health Act is administered by about 25 employees in Ottawa. The face of Health Canada comprises many names and many talents. Forty per cent of Health Canada staff are involved in the area of health protection, keeping Canadians safe from risks to their health arising from emerging diseases, dangerous products, the environment or unsafe food or drugs.

Defining, assessing and managing current and emerging health risks are also among branch responsibilities, along with maintaining the country's health protection infrastructure. More than 2,000 employees of Health Canada work in the area of First Nations health within the medical services branch. It is often forgotten that two–thirds of the budget of the department, excluding transfers to provinces, is devoted to native health.

Health Canada provides community health services to status Indians on reserves and to residents of Yukon through 600 health facilities across Canada. In order to help First Nations to achieve the highest possible standards of health care, the department has undertaken a variety of initiatives. These include the five–year building health communities strategy and the aboriginal head start program aimed at children. The latter is a government red book initiative.

However the department's major focus remains the transfer of control of programs to First Nations. The first main program of Health Canada is the health promotion and programs branch involving some 525 people. They provide support to groups at risk, including children, families and seniors, and develop programs to prevent and reduce heart disease, breast cancer and other illnesses. They also work with and assist Canada's many national voluntary organizations.

It is not well known that the federal government spends about $340 million on health research annually. Altogether we estimate that in Canada we spend about $1.5 billion a year on health research. This is a very impressive number.

Each of the three program areas has staff in every province and territory. Not only are offices located in provincial capitals but members will find Health Canada staff in smaller centres like Trois–Rivières, Hamilton, Thompson, Port Qu'Appelle, the Sarcee reserve at Tsuu Pina in northern Alberta, and Prince George.

Most of the remaining thousand or so employees work in the national capital region managing the department, developing health policy and legislation, undertaking consultation and managing essential departmental services. About 250 people work in the Pest Management Regulatory Agency, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board and the Hazardous Materials Information Review Commission.

Canadians have a strong attachment to their health system and the federal role in it. They look to the federal government to provide a viable, well managed national health care system. According to an Angus Reid poll of March 1995 almost all Canadians want national standards in health care, with 94 per cent saying such standards are somewhat or very essential.

• (1340)

At a time when so much is changing in Canada and in the world people need security to cope with change. They expect their governments to play an important role in that regard by providing Canadians with the best health care system in the world and by reassuring them that they will be taken care of if they are sick, that the products they use are safe and that the most advanced research goes into the measures Health Canada takes to prevent disease. The Department of Health does this to earn the trust and confidence of Canadians.

We have proven over and over again that a publicly administered health care system is the most effective, most inclusive and most successful system one in the world. Privatization of the health care system is a weakening of the system of health care. It only makes the private corporations wealthier at the expense of those who need health care and at the expense of accessibility.

This is why I support the bill and I encourage all members of the House to do so.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, we are considering Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health.

This bill contains a number of disturbing clauses, and the Bloc members who spoke before me in this debate pointed out that the provinces will have to pay close attention to how the federal health minister implements these clauses, because they give the federal government an opportunity to encroach on an area of provincial jurisdiction.

I think that our concerns are totally justified; I would like to go beyond the clauses themselves and look at how the Department of Health has been positioning itself for some time now.

As hon. members will recall, in the throne speech almost two years ago, the government announced the national forum on health with great fanfare. What has happened since then?

I would like to think about this because I think it puts the bill before us in a special light and allows us to express a number of reservations with arguments that everyone can understand better.

This forum on health officially started its operations on October 20, 1994, under the chairmanship of the Prime Minister and the vice–chairmanship of the Minister of Health. The mandate of this forum is to improve the health of the Canadian people, increase the effectiveness and efficiency of health care services, and make recommendations to help the government achieve these goals.

We should point out here that the federal government does not miss any opportunity to interfere in the area of health. The federal government therefore decided to participate in the debate and even to initiate the consulting process to assess the Canadian health system, despite the fact that this is an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, while setting future priorities in order to improve the quality of health care.

The federal government is making a lot of claims. As you will recall, it turned down the request by provinces to participate fully in the work of the national forum on health. Instead, the Liberals decided to let the provinces attend the forum but only as observers.

How, I ask you, could the federal government disregard the main stakeholders in the area of health, namely the provinces? On September 27, 1994, the current Minister of Labour, who was then Quebec's Minister of Health, told La Presse: "The federal government's conduct does not make any sense. How can they contemplate reviewing the health care system without the participation of the provinces, which must provide the services. It is simply unacceptable".

• (1345)

Senator Thérèse Lavoie–Roux said, in the other place, on May 31, 1994, that the government was headed in the wrong direction by overlooking the role of the provinces. She said, and I quote: "Are the provinces not considered major partners? Why were they not invited to participate in the forum? Does the leader find it appropriate for the government to be acting unilaterally on a matter of provincial responsibility?"

Needless to say that the federal government went ahead with its national forum on health, in spite of the strong objections of the key players in the health sector, namely the provinces.

On October 21, 1994, during question period, the Prime Minister said, and I quote: "We in Canada cannot afford to lose our health insurance system because we did not take the time to plan for the future".

That statement from the Prime Minister is telling in more ways than one. First, the federal government sets itself up as keeper and promoter of the quality of health care services provided to the public. According to the Prime Minister, it is thanks to the federal government if the health care system, as it exists, is the pride of Canadians.

Following a meeting with provincial officials in Victoria, the health minister said, in a press release: "The October 15 date is final. However, I believe we can reach an agreement to end extra–billing by clinics to cover essential medical services. It was never my intention to penalize the provinces, but I firmly intend to preserve and to protect Canada's health care system".

Meanwhile, the federal government is careful not to mention the dramatic consequences of its financial withdrawal which, for Quebec alone, will have resulted in a shortfall of over $8 billion between 1982–83 and 1994–95. That is a lot of money, considering that the government claims to be the keeper of health care in Canada.

The government is also trying to give the impression that it is the only one able and willing to propose efficient solutions to solve the thorny issue of funding for our health care system, as it currently exists. The federal government goes so far as to assume the responsibility of defining priorities to preserve the future of quality health care services.

The Prime Minister's statement shows to what degree the federal government sees itself as the "great thinker" regarding Canada's current and future health care systems, as well as the one which can ensure that it remains accessible, free and universal.

Let me quote an excerpt from a document on the federal–provincial perspective prepared by Thomas Duperré on behalf of Quebec's commission of inquiry on health and social services: "By using several programs gradually put in place over the years, the federal health department tends to give itself overall responsibility for health and social services, and it does not hesitate to describe itself as the main architect of the implementation and smooth operation of Canada's health system. It should be noted that, for the Canadian government, health services (and, to a lesser degree, social services) in this country form, to a large extent, a nationwide system. Indeed, Ottawa sees provincial governments as mere health care providers, and provincial programs, which never seem to form a global structure, as mere elements of the national system. Provinces, and particularly Quebec, sometimes find it hard to understand the federal government's attitude in the health and social sector. This is because they forget that, rightly or wrongly, the central government gives itself a much larger role than the one provided in the constitution".

Nevertheless, it is obvious that the provinces constitute the ideal sociopolitical agent for health system reform. According to the distribution of powers under the 1867 Constitution Act, only the provinces have the power to create, deliver and administer health and social services to the public.

Let us look at the example of the various actions undertaken by the government of Quebec to transform, modify and improve the health system over the past ten years. Let us think of the Rochon Commission, which took a critical look at the entire health system in Quebec. Each component of the system was placed under scrutiny and a number of groups involved in the health field spoke before public Commission hearings, in order to make known their concerns, their anguish, and their suggestions for improving the irritants inherent to the system.

After this brief review, I hardly need point out in connection with Bill C–95 that the provinces and Quebec are the ones best placed to intervene directly and knowledgeably in the system of health care and services. Who better than the provinces is able to know what the true issues are, and what solutions are required, to keep the health system accessible, universal and free of charge?

The better solution by far would be to hand over to the provinces all taxes earmarked for health care, allowing them to provide their populations with appropriate and suitable health services. Interaction between the provinces would result in agreements to ensure the delivery of services that, while homogeneous and equivalent, were tailored to the specific requirements and means of each province, Quebec in particular. I shall close on this note, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for your kind attention.

[English]

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments.

The hon. member spoke about the health forum. He said the health forum is encroaching on provincial jurisdictions. The health forum is a dialogue by Canadians who form the forum and who were chosen from every province. They have an ongoing dialogue with Canadians about their vision for health system as we move into the 21st century.

I believe it is appropriate for the health forum to do exactly that because Canadian medicare is Canadian. It is pan–provincial. It is a Canadian institution. Eighty–nine per cent of Canadians from every province agree and support medicare as something they treasure as a Canadian system of values and as being completely Canadian in its context.

The provinces deliver services. Nothing in the dialogue the health forum is having with Canadians should interfere with that. These are Canadians speaking with Canadians to get a vision of their health care and reporting back to the Prime Minister on what they believe in. It is appropriate for the federal government to meet and speak with the Canadian people. We talk about a bottom up approach to health care. Everyone agrees we need to know what people think.

Decisions in health care have always been made between governments and through discussion among governments in the health ministers' forum. It is very rare that the people of Canada get an opportunity to have an ongoing dialogue. This is putting the health care system into the hands of the people and letting them describe a vision for Canada as opposed to governments describing a vision for health care in Canada. I believe this is extremely appropriate.

Nothing in this interferes with the parallel meetings that occur constantly between deputy ministers of health in every province and the deputy minister of health in the federal government, and between ministers of health of every province and the federal Minister of Health. They are parallel. They are government to government. They discuss what governments can do.

• (1355)

This is important. Health care is a three–legged stool. That stool comprises the consumer, the Canadian public, who uses those services, the provincial governments which provide, manage and administer those services and the federal government which has been given the mandate under the Canada Health Act to ensure the five principles of Canadian medicare are kept. One leg of that stool has been pretty shaky. No one has bothered to talk to that leg for a long time.

The Prime Minister has said it is important for the people of Canada to speak about their vision. This is extremely appropriate if we see Canada as one country.

[Translation]

Mr. de Savoye: Mr. Speaker, you will permit me to disagree completely with my hon. colleague's remarks.

Health is a provincial matter. If the federal government wants to keep an eye on all the provinces, it should not go through the people of the provinces, but through the governments, whose job it is to administer the system within their province. When you start short–circuiting the authority of the individual provinces and going directly to individual citizens, you are short–circuiting a process that is normal, natural and desirable, because it is practical and necessary. You mess up the whole thing.

In June 1994, a journalist called me and asked me about the forum. I said it was window dressing. I say the same thing today, almost two years after the speech from the throne, this forum has served absolutely no purpose. We have not made any progress, and the provinces are increasingly aware that they are being given responsibilities and deprived of the means to carry them out. This is both unfair and inefficient, and, in the final analysis, the provinces will have the last word, because common sense always prevails.

The Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m. we will now proceed to Statements by Members.

CANADIAN VETERANS

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the past year we watched Canadian veterans return to the Netherlands to places they had fought and where many of their comrades laid down their lives in the defence of freedom. These veterans were greeted as the heroes they are. Dutch children have been taught about the Canadian sacrifice to liberate their country.

It is imperative for Canadian children to learn those same lessons. This week is National Veterans' Week. My home province of Newfoundland has also signed a proclamation declaring this Remembrance Week, the first province to do so. The flag of remembrance will be flown outside schools and municipal and provincial buildings across our province.

These tributes are important. We must take the time to remind ourselves and to teach our children about the courage and sacrifice of Canada's veterans.

In wartime and in peacekeeping missions around the world they have left a legacy of which we can be extremely proud.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the latest information on the practices of the former Airborne Regiment in Petawawa is distressing. The revelation of more and more repugnant practices by former members of the Regiment not only tarnishes the reputation of Canada's armed forces, but indicates that a significant change must take place within the armed forces.

How could anyone tolerate a celebration of the anniversary of the massacre of 14 innocent women at l'École polytechnique? These sordid celebrations are an insult for and an attack on all women.

I call on the Minister of National Defence to act quickly to put an end to the unacceptable behaviour of the Canadian armed forces, which, it would appear, took place with the approval of higher ranking officers. Women are entitled to a public apology.

ARMED FORCES PENSIONERS/ANNUITANTS ASSOCIATION

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Armed Forces Pensioners/Annuitants Association contracted a group dental insurance plan, but only under the proviso that monthly premiums be deducted at source.

The request to do so went to Treasury Board in October 1993. Only after many follow-up inquiries did the minister, almost two years later, finally agree to consider the pension deductions.

However, planned implementation could be no sooner than the summer of 1996 and at an estimated cost of "no less than $100,000" for system development.

Treasury Board already processes payroll deductions for income tax, union dues, United Way campaigns, Canada savings bonds and other insurance plans. The software programs are in place and do not require the massive rewrites suggested by the minister.

The association is willing to pay reasonable administrative charges so there would be no cost to the taxpayer. Rather than letting his bureaucrats place unreasonable impediments in the way, the minister should direct Treasury Board to provide this service to a group of people who simply wish to protect their dental health.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Jag Bhaduria (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, Ind. Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the people of Quebec for the patriotic and historic decision they took last week by opting to remain in Canada. Fellow Canadians living outside Quebec are grateful for this expression of confidence.

At this time I also express my personal gratitude to the constituents of my riding who travelled with me by bus to Montreal on Friday the week before, and to the more than 50,000 South Asians living in Montreal and elsewhere in Quebec who worked with me over the past two months on the Canadian unity campaign. To all of you I say your efforts are deeply appreciated by all Canadians. The dedication and tireless efforts to serve your host country will long be remembered.

Finally, it was a pleasure to work with the various South Asian community leaders in Quebec during the referendum campaign. In a true sense you have made Canada strong and free.

TAKE OUR KIDS TO WORK DAY

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as members may be aware, this Wednesday is Take Our Kids to Work Day.

Sponsored in part by the federal human resources department, 150,000 grade nine students from across Ontario will spend the day at the job of a parent, relative or other adult. This program is an integral part of the grade nine program and is supported by a majority of school boards across Ontario. Through direct experience it shows young people how important skills, training and education are to their success.

Today I have a constituent, Natalie Martz, shadowing me on the job. I am pleased to participate in such a valuable program and I encourage all members who have the opportunity to do so.

RADARSAT

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada has just launched Radarsat, its first earth observation satellite. With Radarsat, Canada undertakes a new international business venture using satellite imagery to monitor our environment and manage our natural resources.

In addition to providing us with exclusive images of our planet, Radarsat will allow us to follow the movement of ice in the Arctic, monitor the risks of forest fires, and detect pollution in coastal waters.

Radarsat is among the first symbols of the evolution of our knowledge–based society. It also provides concrete evidence that space science can have major commercial benefits on earth.

ANNE BEAUDRY–GOURD

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the audience at Place des Arts in Montreal witnessed the triumph of the human spirit and the overcoming of physical barriers to success.

At 75 years of age, Anne Beaudry–Gourd became the oldest graduate of the University of Quebec in Montreal when she received a Master's Degree in death studies.

This great achievement comes after Mrs. Beaudry–Gourd raised nine children, cared for a sick husband, hosted the radio program Au pays des livres in the Abitibi region for several years, founded the two municipal libraries in Rouyn and Noranda, and won a literary prize with, among other things, an article on the German writer Gertrude von Lefort.

Mrs. Beaudry–Gourd succeeded thanks to her great determination and tremendous potential. Congratulations to a much loved and admired woman.

NEW BRUNSWICK PREMIER

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Premier McKenna is on a mission in western Canada. He wants to explain to his colleagues that the distinct society clause to which the Prime Minister of Canada and he himself are referring is indeed the meaningless concept set out in the Charlottetown accord, even though this accord was rejected by a majority of Quebecers and Canadians.

To support his arguments, he can also remind those unfamiliar with constitutional wrangling of the key role he played in killing the Meech Lake accord. Despite Mr. McKenna's assurances on the purely symbolic value of the distinct society clause, the premiers of Ontario and western Canada are incapable of recognizing, even half–heartedly, the existence of the people of Quebec.

• (1405)

Since we know that two out of three Canadians do not want to reopen the constitution, Quebecers will quickly realize that the vague promises of change and the McKenna–style machinations in favour of distinct society are nothing but a ruse, and that real change can only be achieved through Quebec sovereignty.

PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in opposition Jean Chrétien told minister Kim Campbell that—

INDONESIA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, December 7 of this year will mark 20 years since Indonesia illegally invaded East Timor and began a campaign of genocide and human rights violations. This November 12 will be the fourth anniversary of the Dili massacre.

Over the past two months repression has intensified as Indonesia tries to suppress protest in advance of these anniversaries and before the upcoming visit of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights. Several hundred people have been arrested and it is feared they are being tortured. Others have been killed.

Given all of this, it is totally inappropriate for the Minister for International Trade to be planning a trade visit to Indonesia for November 11 on his way to the APEC summit in Japan.

This trip by the Minister for International Trade on the very eve of the Dili massacre anniversary demonstrates once again the complete moral bankruptcy of Canada's foreign policy.

I urge members of the House to support the New Democratic Party's proposal to end Canadian aid and arms sales to the Government of Indonesia and I urge the minister to reconsider his visit.

FIRST NATIONS

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask my colleagues to join with me in congratulating these aboriginal Canadian communities: the James Bay Cree, the Walpole Island First Nations and the Sanikiluak Inuit community.

Recently these three communities were honoured by the United Nations for their achievements in overcoming great hardships to improve the quality of life of the members of their communities.

As recipients of the United Nations award "We the Peoples" our three aboriginal communities were held up as models to others facing hardships. The award serves as a testimony to the ability of communities to come together under a common banner to promote positive change in the harshest of circumstances.

I thank the peoples of the James Bay Cree, the Walpole Island First Nations and the Sanikiluak Inuit community for reinforcing our hope and resolve in bettering the lives of aboriginal Canadians from coast to coast.

THE LATE YITZHAK RABIN

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one who kills in the name of morality kills nothing except one's own morality.

The world has suffered the loss of a great peacemaker. Mindless violence has claimed a leader whose foresight and courage led his nation from the twisted path of endless conflict and pointed it toward the road to peace.

I was honoured to nominate Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin for the Nobel Peace Prize in January 1994 and overjoyed when he was awarded that honour in December 1994.

Yitzhak Rabin was a soldier who fought for his country and yet he grew to realize that the only solution was to become a soldier for peace. He survived conflict as a soldier but died as a soldier of peace.

When I met him last year in Canada he promised he would continue to work toward a lasting peace.

I extend my deepest condolences to Mrs. Rabin, her family and the nation of Israel.

THE LATE YITZHAK RABIN

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this evening at the Beth Israel synagogue in Peterborough people of all faiths will be meeting to mourn and remember Mr. Yitzhak Rabin.

I met Mr. Rabin once. He impressed me greatly.

Israel is an extraordinarily democratic nation. The struggles of the great majority of Israelis to solve their enormous problems through the democratic process are an example to us all.

Mr. Rabin's career was a key thread in the fabric of a democratic Israel from its birth to today. He showed us the path of moderation is not a soft option. It is a tough road beset by the pitfalls and traps of extremists. It is a path often shrouded by the fogs of apathy.

• (1410)

Our thoughts are with Mr. Rabin's family and the state of Israel at this difficult and tragic time.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government's head in the sand approach to running the country must stop. Our debt is $567 billion and Stats Canada reports the October jobless rate increased to 9.4 per cent.

The Pollyannas across the way no doubt have been told: "Don't worry, be happy; the economy is improving". The 65,000 new entrants into the job market will not be happy until they find a job.

The increase would have been even higher if it were not for the spinoff from the resurgence of the U.S. economy. While the Prime Minister and his cabinet were perfecting their do–nothing routine during the referendum, they failed to realize the status quo approach to the economy will bring Canada even closer to financial collapse.

The minister of HRD's orchestrated leaks about new job creation schemes show he is still clinging to the socialist notion that governments can create jobs. History has proven this approach to be an unmitigated failure.

Why does the government not get out of the way so the private sector can create some real jobs?

TRAGIC DEATH OF PRIME MINISTER OF ISRAEL

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, following the tragic death, two days ago, of Yitzhak Rabin, Israel and the whole international community have lost a great statesman.

Yitzhak Rabin was one of the main architects of the peace process in the Middle East. His death must not end the hope for lasting peace between Israel and its Arab neighbours.

Yitzhak Rabin was like a reflection of his country and of the whole Middle East. Born in a country under foreign control, he fought for national independence before becoming his country's defence chief of staff, and eventually ambassador, prime minister and peacemaker. It is thanks to his dedication to peace if, in recent years, we witnessed a rapprochement between Israel and its Arab neighbours.

More than anything else in his distinguished career, Yitzhak Rabin will be remembered as a man of peace who was loved by his people, by neighbouring nations, and by us all.

[English]

THE LATE YITZHAK RABIN

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, only two years ago Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin proclaimed to the world: "Enough of blood and tears. Enough".

Today citizens of the world remember those courageous words as they mourn the tragic loss of this great peacemaker. It is indeed ironic that a man of peace should be taken from the world so violently.

Today as we mourn his death we also celebrate his life. We shall continue to remember him for the legacy he has left behind: peace in the Middle East which will be treasured by every child who comes of age in a better world.

Mr. Rabin knew the soul of his people and his people came to him for leadership in war and in peace.

As we grieve with his family and his nation, let us resolve that his death shall not still the life of peace.

THE LATE YITZHAK RABIN

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when a man of war becomes a general of peace, we have surely witnessed a miracle. When a man can turn a hawk into a dove, we have surely witnessed a miracle. When a man can learn to give instead of take, we have surely witnessed a miracle.

This miracle will be remembered as Yitzhak Rabin. The history he has written will become a beacon of hope, a symbol of peace, a miracle of humanity for all the world to share.

As but one who has watched his leadership and listened to his words, I share the grief, I feel the sorrow and I know we have lost someone rare.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the first set of supplementary estimates was tabled last week and with these estimates the government is proposing $936 million in new spending; spending that only six months ago was unforeseen, unimagined and completely unanticipated by the government.

I am appalled by some of this spending. The government's failure to collect information and its efforts to hide information have led to an expensive Somalia inquiry budgeted at $7.4 million. This could have been, would have been and should have been avoided if the Department of National Defence had done its job correctly.

There is a $4 million subsidy to Canada Post Corporation for providing services to the north. I thought Canadian postage rates are supposed to pay for delivery everywhere in Canada. Does Canada Post need an additional $4 million subsidy to do the job it is already paid to do?

PHARMACY AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to bring to the attention of all Canadians that November 1 to 7 is Pharmacy Awareness Week.

Each year there are 12,500 deaths, two million lost work days, and $150 million in lost earnings in Canada because people do not take their medications properly.

The purpose of Pharmacy Awareness Week is to recognize the important role pharmacists play in health care, particularly in the use of medication. It also serves to encourage a dialogue between pharmacists and their patients on the proper and safe consumption of prescription drugs. Pharmacy Awareness Week is an opportunity for patients and pharmacists to reduce the risk involved with unsafe medication consumption.

I recognize the efforts of pharmacists in the field of health and I encourage them to continue their efforts to ensure that medications and their proper use continue to improve the good health of all Canadians.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday, in response to a question, the Prime Minister said he was in favour of a veto right, not for the Government of Quebec but for Quebecers.

When asked about this last week, both the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and the Deputy Prime Minister were unable to explain what the Prime Minister meant.

Could the Minister of Justice explain what the Prime Minister means when he talks about a veto right for Quebecers?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last week we said that the best way by far to give Quebecers the veto was to proceed with the good government we had started to put in place and implement the changes and reforms that were clearly demanded by the public. That was the best way to prevent the next referendum.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I directed my question to the Minister of Justice because I thought that directing it to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs would not give us more of an answer than we had last week.

I will again put my question to the Minister of Justice. Could he confirm his government's plans to table legislation in the House of Commons authorizing federal referendums in five regions in Canada, including Quebec, for the purpose of amending the constitution?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, obviously the government speaks with one voice, whether it does through the Prime Minister, who is in charge, the Minister of Justice or myself. Furthermore, the questions now being asked by the hon. member for the opposition are about purely speculative matters on which the government is not prepared to commit itself.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we will keep trying to find out a little more about the vacuum that exists on the other side.

Does the Minister of Justice realize that this plan to hold federal referendums that might amend the Canadian constitution means that his government intends to go over the head of the Quebec National Assembly, as it did in 1982?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of a referendum is to find out how the public feels. We know how the public feels. People want to stay in Canada, and they want changes made within Canada. They expressed their opinion. It is over. Because we believe in democracy, we concluded that their no was a real no, and we are acting on that basis. That is why we are going to put reforms in place in Canada.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice refuses to rule out, as a scenario for amending the constitution, the possibility that the federal could hold its own referenda in the five regions of Canada, including Quebec.

My question is for the Minister of Justice. In this context, are we to understand that the right of veto for Quebecers the Prime Minister of Canada referred to would consist in violating the authority of the Quebec national assembly by flouting its prerogative to hold its own referenda?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Everyone but the Minister of Justice answered, Mr. Speaker.

My second question is for the Minister of Justice. Is this federal initiative not an indication that Ottawa is trying to pave the way for another dirty trick like the one it played on us in 1982 by amending the constitution without the consent of the Quebec national assembly? They are at it again.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker.

SECURITY OF PRIME MINISTER

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians were shocked to hear of the break-in at 24 Sussex Drive on Saturday night.

The Prime Minister deserves to be protected. He must be protected, especially in his own home. The more Canadians learn about this, the more outraged they are at this breach of security.

I ask the Solicitor General of Canada, where in the world did our security system go wrong on Saturday night?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Madam Speaker, this is a very unfortunate situation.

I met with the commissioner yesterday and discussed it with him again this morning. I can confirm that I have asked for a full investigation and he has agreed that such an investigation be carried out into the security of the Prime Minister and that of all official residences.

A full investigation is being carried out into this incident by a senior officer of the RCMP not connected with the management of the security system. The purpose of this investigation is not only to find out what happened but to make sure it does not happen again.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister says it was an unfortunate incident. In fact it was terrifying. I have sympathies for Mrs. Chrétien, who went to the door and found such a frightening thing. It is not acceptable that it just be deemed unfortunate, especially on the heels of the tragic murder on that same day of the Israeli Prime Minister.

It took the RCMP almost 10 minutes to respond. If Mrs. Chrétien had called the fire department, their response time would have been three and a half minutes. Why did it take so long?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have already pointed out that this incident is totally unacceptable. The commissioner of the RCMP had a press conference earlier today and expressed his shock and dismay at what happened.

Obviously a full investigation has not been completed. It would appear that the RCMP officers on the site did not follow procedures. Instead of moving immediately to the house, they surrounded the house before going in and arresting the person who had broken into the house and placing him under control.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, platitudes and investigations and all these kinds of things are one thing, but Canadians are demanding more. They are demanding action, not just reports and tabling of reports. They do not feel safe in their own homes. Now they find out that their Prime Minister is not safe in his.

How can the solicitor general assure Canadians that this government has taken immediate steps so that this will never happen again? Will he commit today to tabling the report that is brought forward so that all Canadians can look at it?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the report is going to be made to me by the commissioner. I will review it. To the extent that information can be made public without undermining security, I will certainly attempt to bring it forward to this House.

I can also confirm to this House that enhancements and improvements to the security at 24 Sussex have already been made. The RCMP and the government are not waiting for the report before making necessary improvements in security.

Above all, this incident is shocking and dismaying. It is unacceptable. As far as I am concerned, everything possible will be done to make sure it never happens again.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Saturday he confirmed that the federal government is opposed to any constitutional recognition of the distinct status of Quebec and that it is preparing instead to table in the House of Commons a simple and inconsequential resolution which will not change anything concretely for Quebec.

Are we to understand that the fact that only one Canadian out of three outside Quebec would be prepared to modify the constitution explains the federal intention to offer Quebecers only a simple resolution on the distinct society which will serve no useful purpose to the men and women of Quebec?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I never said that, but it is our intention to respect the Prime Minister's commitments.

• (1425)

As my colleague stated today, the most important thing is to ensure good government; then another referendum campaign will not be necessary.

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the reply by the real Minister of Justice. But I must regret the lack of insight in his answer, which lead to my supplementary question.

Because two out of three Canadians are opposed to reopening the constitution, will the Minister of Justice admit that the only true path to change for Quebecers is the sovereignty of Quebec?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, polls over the weekend indicate that in the wake of last week's no vote a strong majority of Canadians, both inside and outside Quebec, feel that the country should be more decentralized. The polls also indicate that support for a distinct society clause is weak and that such a clause would likely run into problems if the government tries to introduce it.

Given these sentiments, will the government commit to abandoning the distinct society clause?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have made it clear that we intend to proceed with the engagements taken by the Prime Minister during the course of the referendum. We intend to respect those.

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the answer is a little vague, but let us try to pin it down a bit more.

Will the minister not agree that rather than trying to enshrine a distinct society into the Constitution, if that is what is meant by the answer, legitimate aspirations of everyone can be met through the devolution of powers for language and culture from the federal to all provincial governments without the need for constitutional change?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians made it clear, both Quebecers who voted in the referendum and other Canadians across the country, that they want governments that embrace change and governments that are prepared to challenge the status quo.

We are the government that over the last two years has not only challenged the status quo, we have laid out a path for harmonization to make sure that governments that can best deliver to the people are the governments that are in the position of doing so. We believe that process should continue.

We challenge the status quo. Unfortunately, the two parties that seem to hide behind the status quo are the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party.

REFERENDUMS

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last week as he left a cabinet meeting, the Minister of Justice clearly raised the possibility of dusting off an ancient federal power of disallowance which has not been used for more than half a century or going before the courts to stop Quebec if someday it wanted another referendum on its political future.

My question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Could the minister confirm that he intends to use the power of disallowance which, according to the Supreme Court, has become obsolete, to prevent Quebecers from voting democratically on their political future?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the real question, the most important one for the future, is good government for Canada. The Prime Minister promised to provide good government for Canada. Constructive changes in the government's administration have been discussed, and once these are implemented, we are confident there will be no need for another referendum campaign in the future.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if I understood correctly, the Minister of Justice does not deny what he said last week, so I am back with a supplementary.

Does the Minister of Justice not think it was indecent to consider resurrecting the power of disallowance or going before the courts to silence the voice of the people of Quebec?

• (1430)

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the questions last week about constitutional powers were technical but the concerns of this government are not only about constitutional powers but about this government's responsibility for political stability in Canada. The source of that stability is good government.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is kind of sick to think that the Conservative and Liberal governments over all these years have raised the debt in this country to $567 billion.

On the very day of the referendum, the government quietly tabled legislation to increase Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation's loan liability by $50 billion, from $100 billion to $150 billion.

I would like to ask the minister of public works why is this government adding a further $50 billion liability to this country and an already overburdened economy, thereby expanding the government's authority in the area of housing?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at the question from the hon. member who continues to show a lack of understanding of the various programs operated by the Government of Canada.

In the premise of his question, once again the hon. member alludes to facts which are incorrect. The hon. member and all hon. members should know that this fund is self–sustaining. There are no appropriations from the Government of Canada for this fund. In point of fact over 330,000 Canadians have benefited from this program.

I would suggest to the hon. member that once in a while he should get his facts straight.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I guess after the rough ride the minister had this summer he wants to get back. That is interesting.

There are two types of liability in this country. One type is on the books of the government and the other rest in the 24 seats in the front here.

I confirmed with the vice–president of finance for CMHC that if any of these mortgages are defaulted they are a liability against the government. Perhaps the minister missed that idea.

Will the minister commit today to introducing legislation to guarantee exclusive provincial control of housing, and if not, why not?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the hon. member's question is no. The reason is that unlike the third party, the government does not have an ideology that the role of the national government is to be a Visa or Chargex for provincial governments.

We believe there ought to be a role for the Government of Canada in the affairs of the nation. Such a suggestion which has been proposed by the hon. member is not shared by other members of his own party who are asking the government to put more money into housing programs across the country.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

As my colleague from the Reform Party pointed out, an individual armed with a knife broke into the Prime Minister's official residence with disconcerting ease, thereby highlighting the shortcomings of the security system designed to protect the Prime Minister and all other Canadian parliamentary leaders.

How can the Solicitor General explain the fact that an individual was able to break into the Prime Minister's residence so easily, and does this come as a surprise to security officials?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a complete review of the security measures to protect the Prime Minister and the official residences is currently under way.

• (1435)

Security measures have already been tightened, and once this review is completed, I will receive a report, in light of which we will take all the measures required to prevent such incidents in the future.

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Does the minister promise to table in this House the results of this internal investigation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the House would want the report to undermine in any way the security measures for the Prime Minister's residence. So, as I just said, I will do what I can to disclose the content of this report, but it may be impossible to release all the information, at the risk of undermining the security measures. I think that priority must be given to the security measures required to protect the Prime Minister and his family.

MIDDLE EAST PEACE PROCESS

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are shocked and saddened by the tragic death of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin of Israel. They are also concerned about the future of the peace process and our role in the Middle East.

Will the Minister of Foreign Affairs tell the House what role Canada has played and what future role we will play in the Middle East peace process?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, indeed we are saddened by the tragic and senseless death of Prime Minister Rabin. It is a tremendous loss for the peace process of a man who dedicated his life to his country and gave tremendous impetus to the peace process.

Canada has been a full supporter of the peace process and is playing an important role as chair of the refugee working group. Canada believes there will not be full peace in the region until the question of refugees is totally resolved. Canada will continue its efforts in this regard.

We hope that despite this great loss and tragedy the work engaged in and started by Prime Minister Rabin will be pursued and that all of Israel's neighbours will sign and agree to lasting peace in the region.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Penticton Indian band and the British Columbia government have failed to reach an agreement regarding the Green Mountain Road, a federally owned road. Yet another Indian band in British Columbia is poised to set up roadblocks and the band has threatened violence.

We have been constantly asking the government to exercise its constitutional duty to be responsible for Indians and lands reserved to Indians.

What is the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development going to do about the situation?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is the B.C. treaty process which was really a creature of the present leader of the Reform Party in B.C. when he was a member of the other government in cabinet. We have to make it work. We have put a lot of money and lot of time into it. That deals with related issues.

The hon. member knows because we have discussed it that on roadblocks all kinds of other issues come in. The roadblock is used per se, almost as a bargaining tool for land, for the Penticton lodge, for all of these things. We have to keep those in the B.C. treaty process or we will destroy a process that we both support. It will not work unless we go to that process.

Specifically on roads, I met with the B.C. minister of transport Jackie Pement for an hour just before question period. We are trying to set up a process where we can work collectively if it is a road issue. If it is a broader issue we are trying to encourage the First Nations to go to the table. Otherwise, if there is success on all the issues just because there is a roadblock, there will be more roadblocks and the 70 per cent of the First Nations of B.C. at the B.C. table will walk away.

• (1440)

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows full well that there is no roadblock at this particular point.

I have spent the past two weeks personally seeking out the minister in an attempt to have him do something about this situation. The British Columbia government is helpless. Its hands are tied. Canadians have already learned that the federal government's inaction was a major cause of the Oka crisis. The B.C. government has been consistently reminding the federal government of its duties and responsibilities.

Will the minister take action now and prevent another Gustafsen Lake?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the premise. We are working positively with the B.C. government and it is doing fine work.

In October 1993 we came into office. In December 1993 we opened up the office of the B.C. Treaty Commission. No other government before us was able to do that.

We have worked 10 solid weeks to get the formula which members have seen in the paper in the last few days and it is getting there for the B.C. treaty process. We are close to settling the Nisga'a. We deal positively on all matters.

My problem is not with the B.C. government; my problem is with the Reform members who come from B.C. and refuse to address the issues.

COPYRIGHT

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

Following a question asked on May 15 about copyright, the hon. member for Saint-Hubert was finally told, five months later, by the justice minister that he would transmit her question to the ministers responsible, namely the industry and heritage ministers.

Given that Quebec and Canadian composers, authors and performers have been waiting eleven years for this bill, will the Minister of Canadian Heritage pledge to table this legislation in the House as soon as possible?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly normal to have several ministers involved. There is of course the Minister of Justice, since the bill must be drafted by his department. There is also the Minister of Industry, since he is responsible for the Copyright Act. And, finally, there is the Minister of Canadian Heritage, who is responsible for proposing amendments to the act.

The three ministers work together, make decisions together, and will get results together. As for the duration of the process, I publicly stated on several occasions that we are going as fast as we can, that the issue is complex, and that the bill will be tabled in the House as soon as it is ready.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Will the Minister of Canadian Heritage make sure, through the copyright bill, that the rights paid to creators will not be reduced by providing numerous exceptions?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have to find a good balance between the rights of creators—we are establishing new ones—and the rights of users. This is the real issue. This is where we have to find a balance, and the hon. member will see how we do it when the bill is tabled.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we spent the last few weeks discussing Quebec sovereignty in the House. I think it is high time that we turned to another sovereignty issue and that is Canada's failure to assert sovereignty over the Northwest Passage in the Arctic.

On June 13 the minister told the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs that the United States informs Canada when its nuclear submarines travel under Canada's Arctic ice.

Will the minister confirm the existence of this, as he put it, novel diplomatic arrangement, when it was signed and whether similar agreements exist with other countries?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have a number of bilateral agreements with the United States. One of them provides for the movement of U.S. vessels in Canadian waters upon agreement of such a manoeuvre.

When the U.S. requires such permission, they let us know that they intend to use our waters and we acquiesce.

• (1445)

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if the minister is speaking about the 1988 agreement he will know full well that agreement only covered surface vessels such as icebreakers and not submarines.

It is ironic that Canada as a world leader in acoustic technology does not even monitor subsurface use of our Arctic waters.

Will the minister provide us with a timetable today for the installation of the promised Arctic subsurface surveillance system in the Northwest Passage.

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is one measure that was foreseen in the white paper. It is a matter that officials are working on.

It is a very expensive proposition and any move toward implementing the system for underwater detection in the high Arctic has to be made within the financial constraints of the government and the department's budget.

TRADE

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I come from a region where small and medium size businesses compete not only directly with one another but also with American businesses across the border. These American businesses have an advantage because of the so–called free trade zones.

Could the minister tell the House what measures he has taken to allow Canadian businesses to compete more effectively in the international market?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–102, designed to amend the Customs Act, has exactly that purpose in mind. It will encourage businesses to locate in Canada. It contains improvements that will streamline the duty deferral program and will make programs more user friendly and accessible. It will remove administrative restrictions and will ease cash flow pressures by providing as much up front duty relief as possible.

Regions, municipalities and businesses will be able to co–operate as a result in promoting their communities because a critical component of the bill encourages partnerships to encourage economic development.

I congratulate the member for St. Catharines because he has been a leading proponent of many of the initiatives in the bill.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Defence. Last week, we learned that, on two separate occasions, members of the former regiment from Petawawa organized dinners to celebrate the massacre of 14 innocent victims at l'École polytechnique. A 14–round salvo was even fired.

Will the minister confirm that the Canadian Forces private who organized these dinners has since been promoted to Master Corporal?

[English]

This allegation was raised at the hearings of the commission on Somalia last week. We are looking into the matter, but I can say on behalf of the government that if indeed this were true it was totally unacceptable, totally abhorrent and something we will not tolerate.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister not agree that every promotion granted to any CFB Petawawa official, for example that of Colonel Peter Kenward, should be cancelled or suspended for the duration of the inquiry?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what I am prepared to do is when I receive a report on the allegations and if indeed they are verified, I will submit the report to the commission.

It will be made public at that time and may therefore have some relationship with respect to its ultimate deliberations.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last year when the minister of immigration introduced a document entitled "A Broader Vision", it acknowledged that defaulted sponsorship obligations cost Canadian taxpayers close to $700 million in 1993. The minister announced that initiatives would be introduced in five areas to reduce that amount.

Could the minister advise the House whether these initiatives have been successful and has the taxpayers' burden to default sponsorship been reduced?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the member may know, the Peel project has started in earnest. It is working well. We are finding out information that will no doubt prove useful to an eventual position that the government will take.

We have struck a committee that liaises with all provincial governments. They too are very supportive and collaborative.

• (1450)

It is our intention before the House of Commons rises for Christmas to have a final response on the whole question of family sponsorship.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in 1989 Mohammed Assaf sponsored his brother and family to settle in Alberta. Since then Alberta taxpayers have shelled out $40,000 in welfare payments to support the family.

Assaf then attempted to sponsor his second wife to Canada and was refused by immigration officials. He decided to go to the IRB that in turn ruled that Assaf did not have to pay his first obligations before sponsoring his second wife.

How will the minister accomplish the task of reducing sponsorship defaults when the IRB is telling sponsors that it does not make any difference whether or not they repay those defaults?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unlike the Reform Party that uses a negative, cynical case analogy or example, we prefer to deal with issues on a national basis with some degree of thought, due course and reflection. We will not be deterred by listening to comments on the floor of the House of Commons about individual cases.

We can always learn from cases whether they are in my portfolio or anywhere else, but we would be wrong if we looked at one case, generalized and made it applicable to all immigrants or refugees coming to Canada. We will not engage in a small kind of world that simply tries to create perceptions which may not be true. Let us deal with facts. Let us find solutions that work.

I ask my hon. colleague if she would find the time and place to come on board with that kind of attitude rather than negatively parade individual cases before the House and then extrapolate from them irresponsibly.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the legislation which privatizes CN guarantees that Montreal will always be the headquarters of CN. The Transcona shops have just as proud a place in the history of CN as Montreal does, yet many are worried that Transcona is slated for extinction given the 485 layoffs on Friday last and the 266 before that in September.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister or for the Minister of Human Resources Development answering in his capacity as regional minister. Will the minister now, in the interests of regional fairness and national unity, instruct CN either administratively or legislatively to stop the decimation of the Transcona shops, to keep Transcona as CN's main repair shop and to ensure the Transcona work is not siphoned off to CN's wholly owned subsidiary in Montreal, AMF, or anywhere else for that matter? Will the Liberal government give Winnipeg the kind of guarantees that Montreal has received?

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question but I think he ought to get the facts straight.

The jobs being lost at Transcona in Winnipeg are only of a temporary nature. Therefore to assume that these are permanent layoffs by Canadian National would be inappropriate.

The hon. member would know that CN is on the brink of its commercialization and privatization. It needs to get its house in order so that it can be a competitive and viable railroad, providing service from sea to sea to sea and providing employment to all Canadians across the country.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, will the government give a guarantee that the recall date will be honoured and that the recall date is not just a way of appeasing employees?

Will the government answer my first question? Why guarantees for Montreal and no guarantees for Transcona and Winnipeg that have just as much a place in CN as anyone else?

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again I tell the hon. member that the layoff notices are temporary.

I am sure as CN moves toward privatization it will become much more efficient as a national railroad in the country. In fact there will be future job opportunities for everyone in Canada, not only in Quebec but in Winnipeg, B.C. and Atlantic Canada.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ron Fewchuk (Selkirk—Red River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

• (1455)

Last Friday new figures were published by Statistics Canada showing continued full time employment growth in the Canadian economy. Given the concern of some Canadians that the government is not doing enough to fulfil its jobs and growth agenda, could the Minister of Human Resources Development explain the latest changes particularly as they affect my province, Manitoba, and young Canadians today?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, amidst the tumultuous events of last week a very important milestone was not properly recognized.

The government has now served two years since it was officially elected by the people of Canada. The most appropriate way to celebrate that event is to point out, with the employment statistics released on Friday, that since the election over 500,000 full time permanent jobs have been created in Canada.

In particular it is important to point out that last month alone 46,000 jobs were created for young people, which is the highest increase in one month for young people since June 1986.

I am happy to report that in the province of Manitoba, which I share with the hon. member—

Mr. Cummins: Time.

Mr. Morrison: Order.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): They just do not like to listen to good news; that is their problem. They are just the Bad News Bears.

I will simply conclude by saying that the figures show there is still a lot of work to do. There are still far too many unemployed people in Canada. We have now shown that the foundation has been laid and the next two years will be even better.

AMATEUR SPORT

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

In about 40 per cent of international competitive sports, national coaching certification training programs are given in English only. It is obvious that, in amateur sports, there is discrimination against francophones even in elite coaching training.

How does the minister explain that a mere 14 per cent of all Canadian coaches trained for international competition are from Quebec and that coaching training courses for 40 per cent of competitive sports, including biathlon, hot dog skiing and synchronized swimming, are offered exclusively in English?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, responsibility for the training of coaches as well as athletes rests with specialized agencies and not with the heritage department. However, if my colleague cares to provide me with details, I will, of course, be delighted to take a look at them.

CANADA HEALTH AND SOCIAL TRANSFER

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The minister would know that as an unintended result of the block transfers for the Canada health and social transfer many of the Canadians who are most vulnerable or who feel most vulnerable are Canadians with disabilities.

To date Canadians with disabilities have not yet been assured that there will be consultation with the provinces to ensure that persons with disabilities will not be financially affected by the Canada Health and Social Transfer Act. Would the minister make those assurances today?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

I know the hon. member would be interested that on Thursday I will be appearing before of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. At that time I will be setting out a series of principles and directions for a disability strategy which the federal government would like to retain.

In particular, the inauguration of the Canada health and social transfer gives us a real opportunity to sit down with the provinces to work out a mutually satisfactory strategy to deal with the very important issue of disability. It gives us the opportunity to collectively work together, to share resources and to come up with a common approach we think will be beneficial to over two million disabled Canadians who are without work.

I hope the hon. member will be in attendance at the committee because I would welcome his remarks.

AIR SAFETY

Mr. Elijah Harper (Churchill, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Recently the Transport Safety Board released its report on the tragic crash of a Keewatin Air flight at Thompson airport in June 1994. Two people died in this crash and one was seriously injured. In light of this tragedy, can the Minister of Transport reassure northern air travellers by telling us what action he will take in response to the board's recommendations?

• (1500)

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his great interest in this matter concerning northern air travellers.

As he has indicated, the Transportation Safety Board has tabled its report. Transport Canada officials are reviewing the recommendations. Within 90 days, in the middle of January, the Transport Canada minister will make those recommendations known.

I can assure the member that Transport Canada and the minister will do everything possible to ensure safety in our airlines and ensure that northern air travellers have nothing to fear.

The Speaker: My colleagues, this would bring to a close the question period.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the House for consent. Tonight there is a vote scheduled for 6 p.m. and another one for 6.30 p.m., which now will likely be held at 6.45 p.m. In order to permit the House to save on overtime costs and to permit members to attend vigils tonight, would the House consent to taking both votes at 6 p.m.?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

THE LATE YITZHAK RABIN

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, humanity has lost a peacemaker of extraordinary courage. Israel has lost a leader of extraordinary devotion. Mrs. Rabin and her family have lost a husband, father, and grandfather.

On behalf of the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada, I wish to pay tribute to Yitzhak Rabin.

[Translation]

A man of great bravery was struck down by an act of cowardice. Through their prayers all Canadians are with Mr. Rabin's family and the people of Israel. Let us hope that these prayers will bring peace to the souls of all of us who are mourning today.

Prime Minister Rabin dedicated and finally gave his life to the service of his country and his people. As a soldier and war hero, Yitzhak Rabin fought for the survival of Israel.

Tributes

[English]

As Prime Minister, Yitzhak Rabin pursued a future of peace and prosperity for Israelis and for all people in the Middle East. The pursuit of peace became Yitzhak Rabin's mission.

When Prime Minister Rabin was assassinated on Saturday, he had just spoken with a great sense of joy and accomplishment. What he accomplished is truly remarkable. Will any of us ever forget when Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat shook hands—a simple act of reconciliation, a profound act of destiny.

As Prime Minister Rabin said, "Our land of milk and honey has flowed with blood and tears for too long. Enough, enough." With incredible dignity and enthusiasm, Yitzhak Rabin has allowed the world to dream of the day when Israel will be at peace with all of its neighbours.

The history of Israel stretches back to the beginnings of humanity. In that struggle, we have witnessed both the barbaric acts in the history of humanity and some of the most noble aspirations of which we are capable as human beings. Prime Minister Rabin died pushing all of us to speak and to act for the better side of human nature.

[Translation]

The death of Prime Minister Rabin should be an inspiration to us to let our thoughts, words and actions reflect the best in our human nature. As we emphatically reject the act of cowardice that took his life away, we also have an obligation to embrace the cause to which Yitzhak Rabin was dedicated.

[English]

As we act today, let us remember the history of time as Yitzhak Rabin understood that history. Let us reflect Prime Minister Rabin's understanding that it is up to us as individual human beings to shape the forces of destiny.

As we grieve for the man, let us pursue his dream. As we pay tribute to Prime Minister Rabin with our words, let us pay tribute to him with our actions.

• (1505)

Canadians continue to extend the hand of friendship to the people of Israel. We shed our tears of condolence for Mrs. Rabin and her family and we pay honour to Yitzahk Rabin for the nobility of his spirit and his actions.

Shalom, Yitzahk Rabin. Shalom, Israel.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we were all astonished and deeply saddened by the news of the assassination on Saturday of the Prime Minister of Israel, Mr. Yitzhak Rabin. Today, we want to pay tribute to a man who dedicated his life to the defence of his people and his ideals.

A joint recipient of the Nobel Peace prize, Yitzhak Rabin believed in the reconciliation of the Israeli and Palestinian people and struggled to find ways to bring them closer together. The peace accord signed by both nations shows that his efforts have borne fruit and brought hope to this part of the world. We are convinced that he did not sacrifice his life in vain and that the road to reconciliation now taken by his people and the people of Palestine will lead to a better future for all who believe in peace in the Middle East.

We earnestly hope that his violent death will not halt the diplomatic negotiations he initiated with Yasser Arafat to establish a plan for peace in the region. We firmly believe that the process started by these two leaders will prevail over radical movements that are oblivious to democratic values and condone violence.

On behalf of my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois, I wish to express our condolences to the family and relatives of Mr. Rabin, the Jewish people, the international Jewish community including that in Quebec, and to show that we share the grief of losing a unique human being. Shalom Yitzhak Rabin!

[English]

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my leader and our party I rise this afternoon to pay tribute to the late Prime Minister of Israel, Yitzahk Rabin.

Rabin earned his reputation with Israelis as a soldier and then as a politician. His first hand knowledge of the military and his deep commitment to preserving Israel's security, first through arms and later through peace, made him undeniably one of the world's greatest statesmen.

It is well known that Mr. Rabin earned his credibility on the battlefield. However, Rabin's greatest honour and truest victory came through his pursuit of a lasting peace with his former enemies.

He sought peace not through fear but through courage, seeing it as the only hope for the future. He understood that true peace is not the absence of all differences, but genuine goodwill and the putting aside of those differences for the common good. Of the necessity for peace, Rabin said: "We should not let the land flowing with milk and honey become the land flowing with blood and tears".

Yitzahk Rabin truly believed that "the majority of people want peace and are ready to take a chance for peace". He took that chance and paid recently with his life.

Just six weeks ago, King Hussein of Jordan, President Mubarak of Egypt, Chairman Arafat, and Prime Minister Rabin signed a peace agreement on the White House lawn. In words that seem almost prophetic today, Prime Minister Rabin said: "Only poets have dreamt of this moment, and to our great pain soldier and civilian went to their deaths to make this moment possible".

He was soldier and civilian both, as well as one of Israel's greatest leaders. We hope and pray that his death, although tragic and untimely, will leave a legacy for lasting Middle East peace, for which he sought so valiantly.

Our sympathy and prayers are with Mrs. Rabin and her family. Shalom, Prime Minister Rabin.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, Yitzahk Rabin was a soldier in war who became a soldier in peace. He fought as hard to achieve peace as he did in war. His greatest victory will unfortunately come only after his death.

The proof of the strength and durability of the move toward peace that Prime Minister Rabin created is that there can be no doubt this peace process will continue. It will continue until we reach the comprehensive peace that Mr. Rabin so eloquently lauded in the speech he gave before hundreds of thousands of Israelis demonstrating for peace last weekend, just shortly before his tragic death. There remains much to be done, but Mr. Rabin has made a start possible.

• (1510)

Together with two other New Democrat members of Parliament, Howard McCurdy and Ian Deans, I had the privilege and opportunity to meet with our Labour Party colleague, Yitzhak Rabin, in the mid–1980s. We had a vigorous exchange of views and certainly some profound disagreements, but there was a sense of openness and mutual respect.

Since his election as Prime Minister in 1992, I have been enormously impressed by his courage and determination to bring a just and lasting peace to the Middle East. As others have noted, we were all profoundly moved to see Mr. Rabin and Yasser Arafat shake hands on the White House lawn. That handshake symbolized the partnership in peace that has been forged between Israel and the Palestinians.

The member for Beaver River and the Deputy Prime Minister both quoted some of the words spoken that historic day. I would like to quote some others. He said in prophetic words: "We the soldiers who have returned from battles stained with blood, we who have seen our relatives and friends killed before our eyes, we who have come from a land where parents bury their children, we say today in a loud and clear voice: Enough of blood and tears. Enough."

On the evening of his death, Mr. Rabin made a passionate plea against violence. "Violence, he said, undermines the foundations of democracy in Israel. It cannot be condoned and must be condemned." During the weeks and months that preceded the tragedy on Saturday night, statements made by certain politicians and citizens of Israel in the course of the debate on the peace accords were not only filled with anger but showed undercurrents of violence. Yitzhak Rabin has proven that in a civilized society, political debate, however deep its roots, must be based on respect for every individual.

[English]

In closing, I would like to extend condolences on behalf of myself and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party of Canada to Mr. Rabin's family, the people of Israel, and the Jewish community in Canada and around the world. We share your profound sense of anguish and loss. Remember that the Kaddish, the Jewish prayer for the dead, is an affirmation of the power of faith and hope in the midst of despair.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, like millions of people in Israel and around the world, I was shocked and saddened to learn of the tragic death of Yitzhak Rabin Saturday afternoon.

I was shocked because his death came just after he had spoken and sung for peace at a rally of 100,000 Israelis. I was shocked because his murder was completely inconsistent with the way of life in Israel, where this kind of violence has not been a means of dealing with political differences. It has not been a part of the life of that democratic country. I was shocked and also saddened that Prime Minister Rabin's own life, so filled with achievement and service, had been cruelly ended before his main work could be completed: the work of making peace between Israel and all its neighbours.

Yitzhak Rabin proved he could be successful as a leader in making war. He was proving he could be equally successful as a leader in achieving peace. He had made war to protect his country, but he wanted and preferred peace for Israel and all the peoples of the Middle East.

It has been said that Yitzhak Rabin was a martyr for peace. Therefore, the best way to honour his life and his memory is to make sure that his work for peace continues and is successfully concluded.

Just after this government took office, two years ago last week, its first official visitors were Yitzhak Rabin and his wife. I, together with my wife, had the honour of officially welcoming them to our country. At that time, in talking with him all too briefly, I was struck and impressed by his mixture of firmness, resolve, personal modesty, and his commitment to achieving his goal of peace for Israel with its neighbours.

• (1515)

There is a word in Hebrew that is used as a greeting. It is also used to say goodbye and at the same time it signifies peace, that most sublime of human conditions. Unfortunately we cannot extend a greeting to Yitzhak Rabin on this earth again, but we can say goodbye by using that word which had come to mean more to him than almost anything else. We can say shalom. Shalom Yitzhak.

The Kaddish prayer said by Jewish mourners concludes with these words: "He who maketh peace in his high places, may he make peace for us and for all Israel".

[Translation]

I want to express my sincere condolences to Mrs. Rabin and the family of Yitzhak Rabin.

[English]

To Mrs. Rabin, to her family, to the people of Israel and to all people of goodwill everywhere, I conclude with the traditional Hebrew words of sympathy and condolence:

Hamakom y'nahaim etkhem b'tokh sh'ar availai tziyon veeyerushalayim.

May the Lord comfort you with all the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to send our deepest condolences to the family of Yitzhak Rabin and the people of Israel.

Although Mr. Rabin has fallen, he leaves behind a tremendous legacy of peace and a lifetime of work for the people of Israel.

As a soldier, Mr. Rabin learned to meet adversity with courage and determination and as a statesman this courage continued as he dared to make peace with the Palestinians and with Jordan, even in the face of bitter criticism from the opponents of peace.

In a world filled with conflict and strife, Mr. Rabin did not despair or allow anger to move him. He chose instead to dedicate his life to laying the groundwork for a peace that will be enjoyed by his children and grandchildren and by all the children of the Middle East.

On this sad day, though the torch must be passed, Mr. Rabin is gone but the need for hard work in the name of peace endures. As Mr. Rabin said, we will continue the peace process. There is no alternative to that regardless of what the enemies of peace might do.

We must remember these words. In so doing I join with all Canadians in hoping that others will step forward to finish the peaceful battle so well fought by Mr. Yitzhak Rabin, an example for us all.

PETITIONS

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present.

The petitioners on the first, out of respect and concern for the sanctity of human life, pray and request that Parliament continue to prohibit euthanasia and assisted suicide. The petition bears 135 signatures.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition, which bears 56 signatures, prays and requests that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

• (1520)

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition, which bears 208 signatures, requests that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or homosexuality.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present 209 signatures of my constituents asking that Parliament urge the government to review the Young Offenders Act in an open and accountable process which addresses the following principles: deterrence of the offender, the accountability of the offender, and the rights of the victim.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. This petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Ancaster, Ontario.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 195 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No.195—Mr. Riis:

With respect to the government policy regarding the protection of workers from environmental tobacco smoke (ETS), (a) are there any estimates of the number of workers under the federal jurisdiction who are (i) exposed to ETS resulting from smoking where smoking is permitted, (ii) exposed to ETS resulting from smoking where smoking is not permitted, and if so, what are these estimates, (b) are workers who are exposed to ETS justified in quitting their jobs within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act, and (c) since 1989, (i) have any inspections been made to ensure compliance with the Non–Smokers' Health Act, and if so, how many, (ii) have any tickets been issued pursuant to the Non–Smokers' Health Act and if so, how many?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour): The Non–Smokers Health Act affects almost 650,000 workers in about 26,700 workplaces under federal jurisdiction and approximately 240,000 employees of the Public Service of Canada.

(a) (i) There is no estimate of the number or percentage of federally regulated workers who are exposed to environmental tobacco smoke resulting from smoking where smoking is permitted and (a) (ii) where smoking is not permitted.

(b) Under the UI act, "just cause" for voluntarily leaving an employment exists where, having regard to all the circumstances, the claimant had no reasonable alternative to leaving employment.

Working conditions that constitute a danger to health or safety is one of the 13 specific circumstances identified by the legislation that may constitute just cause for voluntarily leaving employment.

Before leaving the employment, a reasonable alternative for the person working in such a place would be to report the situation to the employer and/or the union so that the situation can be remedied within a reasonable period of time. If the situation still does not improve and the working conditions likely affect his or her health, a person could reasonably prove his or her point by means of a medical certificate or other similar document.

(c) (i) The national statistics at our disposal reveal that from April 1, 1990 to March 31, 1995, there were 144 inspections and 467 complaint investigations conducted under the Non–smokers Health Act.

(c) (ii) Until the Contraventions Act (Bill C–46) is proclaimed, issuing warnings or initiating prosecutions are the only alternatives to "ticketing" an individual for non–compliance. To this end, labour branch officials ask the employer or employee to sign an assurance of voluntary compliance (AVCs), by which they make the commitment to cease the contravention within a specified period of time. Failure to do so can lead to prosecution. From April 1, 1990 to March 31, 1995, a total of 156 AVCs have been received by safety officers and no prosecutions have been initiated.

[Translation]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment.

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we consider Bill C–95, hon. members will want to reflect on the business of the Department of Health as it embarks on its new life, its new beginnings.

The department is no longer responsible for social assistance. Does this reduce its importance in the national structure? Is it fading away? Is it weakened? Far from it. As I read the results, the Department of Health is now poised and primed to take on perhaps the greatest challenge it has ever known. It has gathered its strength in order to guard the health of Canadians through an era of stress, strain and dislocation that is testing us all.

It is finding alternatives to the financial resources once thought inexhaustible but now known to be limited alternatives described by words such as collaboration, knowledge and intelligence, waste reduction and value for money. These are the watch words of the new department, focused today more than ever on health because it is focused on health alone.

The basic facts of Bill C–95 are as follows. The department is renamed. Some inspectors are empowered. The social well–being dimension of health is acknowledged and there are to be charges to businesses for services that have business value.

A new name means a new focus. This is what the bill is about, what is in the bill and who can object. It is eminently reasonable. It has been well set out by the minister and by other hon. members and the significance of the new name, the Department of Health, is personified in that single word because of the very importance of health to Canadians.

I would go one step further. The Department of Health is a symbol of a new beginning. This nominal act speaks volumes about a determination to focus intensely on the health of Canadians, our most precious resource.

• (1525)

The renamed department will continue all the essential work that has helped Canadians reach the top of the world rankings in health. However, it will do far more than maintain hallowed traditions. It intends to be a dynamic player in a world filled with new challenges and opportunities for health care.

The department is in business to protect the health of Canadians but it is doing that business in a new way, streamlined by a new vision of the way things must work in the future.

What indicators are there of this new approach? None is more practical or more telling than the consolidation in the department of 11 separate activities distinguished as such even up to the recent main estimates into just four business lines. This move reflects what has been learned from the program review process and participation in the science and technology policy review. More than this, it reflects a willingness to consult, to listen, to learn and to change.

The first of the new business lines will position the department to support and renew the health system in Canada. It will try to achieve a better balance among health care, disease prevention and health protection and promotion.

Quality health care services contribute to the health of the population, but good health is not simply the result of health care. Rather, it is more true to say health care is the result of ill health. Good health arises from a host of social, economic and environmental lifestyles and genetic factors.

Hon. members are aware of the initiatives undertaken by the Prime Minister's national forum on health to determine the necessary and sufficient conditions for health and identify the root cause of illness. The recommendations of the national forum will guide the department in its efforts to make the system healthier for all Canadians.

It will work with the provinces and territories to contain costs, including the costs of prescription drugs, in order to ease spending pressure on governments and the private health care system. It will lead consultation aimed at interpreting the Canada Health Act but it will not cease to enforce the act so that universal access to appropriate health care is maintained throughout Canada.

Canadians look to the federal government, to hon. members here in the House, to create bridges among the provinces. They want us to ensure national standards for health care. They insist we intervene to remedy inequalities and protect infrastructure. For all of this the Department of Health is our means, our instrument.

Another line of business the department has recently adapted will focus on the health problems of disadvantaged groups. This involves marshalling a number of existing programs toward this single objective. It involves new programs to be delivered in partnership with the provinces. As well, it involves improving the flexibility to respond when a new health need arises.

The department will intervene to help protect those at most risk when it is clear that the federal government is placed to provide the best care at the lowest cost. Affordable health care of the highest quality is the aim, the objective, while eliminating overlap and duplication with the provinces and other partners.

I will not dwell on the delivery of health services to First Nations, Inuit and the people of Yukon. I pass over it not because it is less important. Indeed it accounts for the largest share of the department's entire budget. I pass over it because it has been thoroughly explored in the representation of the minister and other hon. members speaking on the bill.

This is the new business line that flows least change from the department's previous portfolio of responsibilities. Helping native people and northerners attain a level of health comparable to that of other Canadians who live in similar conditions has long been a goal of this department, a goal of this government. The goal has not yet been achieved, but great strides are being made in the right direction to serve the people of the north.

The fourth reconstituted business line of the Department of Health seeks to reduce the health risks to Canadians arising from food and drugs, from consumer products and medical devices, from disease and disaster. This is the regulatory and compliance thrust of the department. This is the heart of health protection, where the department stands on guard to preserve the health of Canadians. It is here that Bill C–95 adds some muscle and meat to the refocused mission of the Department of Health.

The transfer of responsibility for the safety of consumer products and workplace equipment is formalized in the bill. Officials of the department get powers in the bill to inspect possible disease–carrying agents entering this country by way of foreign products. The costs of services provided to businesses may be recovered under a provision of the bill. If risks to Canadians are going to be managed effectively in an era of restraint, new ways to meet those costs must be found. This is one such way.

The late Lewis Thomas was a physician who taught at Yale. He was a great essayist and was called the poet laureate of 20th century medical science. Dr. Thomas wrote that the term health industry provides the illusion that it is in a general way all one thing and that it turns out on demand a single unambiguous product which is health.

Thus, health care has become the new name for medicine. Health care delivery is what doctors and nurses do along with hospitals and other professionals working with them. They are now known collectively as the health providers or the health team. Patients have become health consumers. Once we start on this line, there is no stopping.

We tend to forget sometimes that health is not simply a product distributed in neat little packages from a constantly replenished inventory on a shelf somewhere. We also forget sometimes in our rhapsodies over a multibillion dollar health system that it ultimately comes down to one patient, often hurt and scared, and one medical professional who may or may not be sure either about the cause of the complaint or what to do about it. It is a face to face, one to one confrontation as to what to do. This reality is part of the new understanding of the department which will be renamed with the passage of the bill.

I take the minister at her word, given to doctors at the CMA leadership conference in March, that decisions will be based on solid Canadian values such as fairness, compassion and respect for the fundamental dignity of all people, of all Canadians.

In the October edition of the Fraser Forum, which is published by the Fraser Institute, there was an article entitled: "Two–tier health care system". I quote from the article:

> I would say that of all the government health plans in Europe the German system is the king among the blind. However, it's still one–eyed, it is still inferior compared to a purely private system, I believe. Now, the German system does not guarantee universal coverage—

The Canadian system is the best system, the single tier system. Only last week we heard that great American, Ralph Nader, telling us here in Canada to be vigilant, to be watchful and not to lose that single tier system where all Canadians have access to excellent health care.

I am pleased to speak on Bill C–95 today. I am pleased to enunciate for the second time the new name, Department of Health, and the significance we in this government place on the health of our people and the well–being of all Canadians. It is because of this naming, the single word health, that we give no extended situations to other things but singly the health of Canadians and the prominence it will play within our government.

• (1535)

I urge hon. members in this House to support the government with this very important bill. It is the fibre that helps this country maintain the strength of its unity.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain acts.

The main change brought about by Bill C–95 is the change in designation from Department of National Health and Welfare to Department of Health. I welcome this opportunity today, because this bill speaks volumes about this government's intention to further centralize and strengthen its powers despite its pre–referendum rhetoric about decentralizing.

On the face of it, this bill looks completely innocuous, technical, minor and inconsequential. Yet, some provisions of this bill could have a major impact on the exclusive provincial jurisdiction over health care.

I will go over them rapidly because my colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois have already reviewed significant health issues since the beginning of the Canadian confederation. Just the same, it is imperative, in my opinion, to bear in mind what, obviously, this government tends to forget, and that is that, under the constitution, health is an exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

Everyone agree on this. How can certain provisions of this bill be justified in that context, I wonder? I am referring in particular to clause 4, which states that:

> 4.(1) The powers, duties and functions of the Minister extend to and include all matters—relating to the promotion and preservation of the health of people—
> (2)—the Minister's powers, duties and functions—include the following matters:
>
> (a) the promotion and preservation of the physical, mental and social well–being of the people of Canada;
> (b) the protection of the people of Canada against risks to health and the spreading of diseases;
> (c) investigation and research into public health—
> (d) the establishment and control of safety standards—for consumer products—
> (e) the protection of public health on railways, ships, aircraft—
> (f) the promotion and preservation of the health of the public servants and other employees of the Government of Canada;
> (h)—the collection, analysis, interpretation, publication and distribution of information relating to public health; and
> (i) cooperation with provincial authorities with a view to the coordination of efforts made or proposed for preserving and improving public health.

These are provisions which are far–reaching and whose legal implications are difficult to foresee. This is especially worrisome since part of these are new provisions which were not found in the former act, that is to say the act respecting the Department of National Health and Welfare.

• (1540)

This bill reveals the federal government's will to centralize, as do other facts. I refer you in particular to the red book published by the Liberal Party of Canada, which called for widespread consultations on health care in the form of a public forum. I quote from page 80 of the red book: "The role of the federal government should include the mobilization of effort to bring together Canada's wealth of talent and knowledge in the health care field. This is a societal issue in which every Canadian has an interest. The federal government must provide the means to ensure that Canadians are involved and informed, and can understand the issues and the options". These sentences speak for themselves and clearly show the Liberal Party's intentions even before they came to power.

In June of 1994, the Minister of Health announced the creation of this forum. Though its own Minister of Health, Quebec vigorously denounced this initiative and refused to take part in this exercise. And Quebec was not the only province that registered a protest. To this day, no province is a participant in this forum.

A few days before the referendum, some federal spokespersons changed their tune in order to win. They were focusing on change, decentralization, and powers to be negotiated with the provinces. What is happening now? Exactly a week after a significant vote that clearly revealed Quebecers' desire for change, we in this House are debating a bill that brings us back to the sad reality. No change can be expected from the current government.

The government has no intention of relinquishing any of its powers, despite what it said before the referendum. I hope that the minister will fully comply with clause 12 of the bill, which reads as follows:

> 12. Nothing in this act or the regulations authorizes the minister or any officer or employee of the department to exercise any jurisdiction or control over any health authority operating under the laws of any province.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to give a historical overview of the legislation and of the federal government's interference in the area of health care. First, let us not forget that section 92.16 of the Constitution Act gives the provinces overall jurisdiction over health issues on their territory, by providing the following, and I quote: "—generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province".

Moreover, subsections 7, 13 and 16 of section 92 recognize the provinces' jurisdiction over hospitals, the medical profession and practice, as well as health care, on their territory.

Health is clearly a provincial, not a federal responsibility. However, the federal government has always managed to interfere in that sector, either through legislative measures such as the Food and Drug Act, or indirectly through its spending power.

Such interference has often generated tension and conflicts between the central and provincial governments. Quebec has certainly been the one denouncing most often and most directly Ottawa's interference in its field of jurisdiction. In 1919, the federal government established the health department and gave it the authority to provide grants.

• (1545)

In 1945, during a federal–provincial conference, the federal government proposed the establishment of a national health care program for which it would assume total responsibility. It should be pointed out that, in those days, after the war, the federal government exercised almost total control over the primary fields of taxation.

In 1948, a national health grant program was set up. In 1957, the federal Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act was passed, followed in 1966 by the Medical Care Act. The Canada Health Act was then passed in 1984, after a long debate and a lot of criticism. The central government had decided to legislate to ensure that health care and services that were medically necessary would remain accessible, available to all and free.

That federal act had the effect of imposing on the provinces the obligation to comply with these principles, in spite of budget cuts that the central government would make in transfer payments to the provinces for the health sector. The federal government also gave itself the power to impose monetary penalties on non–complying provinces. That act establishes national standards, namely, as I said, the universality of services, accessibility, transferability from province to province, public management and comprehensiveness. If these standards are not met, Ottawa can withhold its transfer payments for health care.

Based on the 1995–96 budget, Health Canada will spend some $1.5 billion to operate the program and some $7.4 billion in transfer payments. This department funds, among other things, the integration of people with disabilities, the fight against domestic violence, the new horizons program, the Seniors Secretariat, the fight against smoking, the national anti drug campaign, the national AIDS strategy, programs on pregnancy and child development, the Children's Bureau and the national health forum.

I have always supported a health insurance scheme that is universal, free, provincially administered, funded by our taxes and available to all. I do not support a system with two tiers: one for the rich and the other for the poor. I am, for example, concerned about what is happening in the United States, which does not have a public health scheme, preventing millions of people from having access to proper health care. Health, in my opinion, is people's most precious possession. This is why we must protect this system, and make preventing disease and promoting health our priority.

Naturally, with Canada's and Quebec's aging population, health care costs more and more. But services must not be rationed, nor cuts made unjustifiably. Unfortunately, Canada's entire health care system is in an acute state of crisis. Since the program's inception in 1977, the rate of growth of its funding has not kept up. This has meant a shortfall for the provinces. For example, in 1986, the federal government cut the rate of growth of transfers by 2 per cent. In 1989, the indexing factor was reduced by 1 per cent. In 1990, Bill C–69 froze transfers at the 1989–90 level for a two–year period. In 1991, the federal government extended the freeze another three years. All this time, the Liberals were vigorously criticizing these cuts.

Now that they are in power, they have totally changed their position and continue to nibble away at the Canadian health system. Scandalous.

It must be pointed out that, between 1977 and 1994, Ottawa's contribution to the health system dropped from 45.9 per cent to 33.7 per cent, and Quebec and the provinces have had to absorb this 10.6 per cent shortfall, with great difficulty.

The forecasts for 1997–98 indicate that the federal share of funding will be 28.5 per cent. Total cuts for Quebec alone are $8 billion dollars. To this must be added the $308 million reduction for 1995–96 and the $587 for 1997–98 in the Canada social transfer.

Is this what the flexible federalism of the Liberal government means? The only thing it is decentralizing is the deficit.

My fear is that these cuts will lead to the end of the health system as we know it. I am against social program cuts, as I have stated in this House on numerous occasions, particularly cuts in health programs through the drastic reductions in transfers to the provinces.

I support the campaign by the Canadian Labour Congress, the CLC, to save the Canadian health system. This coming December 5, the leaders of that organization will be here to meet some of the ministers and members as part of their campaign. The same battle is being waged in Quebec by the FTQ.

As a sovereignist, I voted Yes on October 30 because of my conviction that we in Quebec can build a more just society, a more egalitarian, more humane society. I am concerned about the Liberal Government's lean to the right, its blind cuts in unemployment insurance, social assistance, old age pensions, postsecondary education and so on. I am concerned about the antisocial orientations, with their lack of concern for what becomes of the least advantaged members of society, developed by the governments of Ralph Klein in Alberta and Mike Harris in Ontario, both Conservative governments.

In addition, I am greatly concerned about the right–wing, sometimes ultraright philosophy of the Reform, particularly when it comes to immigration, firearms control, cuts and the battle against the deficit.

The British Columbia NDP government's decision to refuse social assistance to anyone who has not been in the province for three months concerns me.

So, nearly all of English Canada is aligning along the most conservative of lines. In my opinion, the federal government ought to show some compassion, understanding and generosity towards our poor and needy fellow citizens. Canada has the means to protect the unemployed, the welfare recipients, the sick and so on.

My wish in closing is for the federal government to do everything necessary to preserve the health system in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the words of the member for Bourassa. I wonder if he could clarify a few things.

He again reminds us that he is a sovereignist. I do not know what that has to do with this bill. I would remind him to reflect on the words the former Premier of Quebec and his own leader used about the kinds of people they want to live in that part of Canada. So when he says he is a sovereignist, I assume he means that he is a Canadian sovereignist.

• (1555)

I got this feeling from statements made in the foreign affairs committee and in the House that to that party everything seems to be a provincial jurisdiction. There seems to be nothing left for the federal government and provinces to co–operate on. Here is a bill that calls for co–operation to maintain health standards across Canada and keep costs down, and the hon. member cannot even support that.

He quoted from clause 2. I refer him to paragraph (i), where the minister's powers, duties, and functions relating to health include "co–operation with provincial authorities with a view to the co–ordination of efforts made or proposed for preserving and improving public health". Is the hon. member honestly against this kind of a bill?

He also went on to say that he is against the two–tier system. Great, I agree with him. So am I, and so is everyone on this side of the House, the government side. How does he expect to prevent the two–tier system if he allows health care to be the total responsibility of the province?

My wife happens to live in Ontario and her brothers live in Quebec. Their mother used to switch from Quebec to Ontario. She would live at her son's at one time and at her daughter's another time. If each province is responsible for its own health system, their mother could not have done that. Under the present system she was able to move from province to province and have her prescriptions, doctor bills, and everything covered. Thank God, she lived to 89. She had gone through Siberia and had the kind of life that no one would want to hear about in this House. Yet she lived in this country happily until she was 89 because of the health system in this country and because of the standards that were kept from province to province.

I would like the hon. member to clarify what he means. He is against the two–tier system, yet he wants no federal involvement at all. How does he expect to maintain Canadian standards if he wants health to be the sole jurisdiction of the provinces?

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member, as I did in my address, that health is a provincial matter, not because I say so, but because the constitution says so. Very clearly. I quoted section 92 earlier.

I am sure, as I have already said, that we in Quebec are capable of providing care to the entire population, care funded from our taxes, quality care. We in Quebec have no need of the federal government to provide our entire population with such care.

Furthermore, the health system in Canada is at risk today, not because of the provinces, but because of federal cuts in transfers to the provinces. That is where the true danger lies.

I think that the hon. member ought to get up to criticize his own government's cuts in the system of transfers to the provinces. I trust that he will react to the next federal budget because it will seriously aggravate the situation. The government will be making cuts everywhere, including health care, in the next budget.

[English]

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to comment on the hon. member's statement.

Much has been said about paragraph 4.(2)(a) and that it in fact has begun to encroach on provincial jurisdiction. I would like to refer the hon. member to clause 12, which states:

> Nothing in this Act or the regulations authorizes the Minister or any officer or employee of the Department to exercise any jurisdiction or control over any health authority operating under the laws of any province.

That clearly specifies that the bill does not move into provincial jurisdiction.

• (1600)

I will quickly touch on the issue of transfer payments. In 1991–92 federal health transfers as a percentage of provincial expenditures were 31.2 per cent. In 1993–94 to Quebec it was 31.9 per cent. In 1994–95 it was 31.7 per cent. In 1995–96 it is 32.2 per cent. I may not be an accountant but I surely know that is an increase in terms of percentage of expenditure.

The major transfer to Quebec will approach $11.7 billion in 1995–96. It will account for over 30 per cent of Quebec's estimated revenues in 1995–96. It means that roughly $1,590 per person is spent in Quebec by the federal government.

[Translation]

Mr. Nunez: Mr. Speaker, briefly, I appreciate the hon. member's comments but I find that there are certain contradictions in clause 12 of this bill, which have been pointed out by the critic for our party. Furthermore, practice and experience have shown us that, even where there are clauses to forbid federal interference in provincial matters, the federal level retains the spending power, which it sometimes uses to interfere unduly in provincial matters.

[English]

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during the last number of years a significant trend has occurred in health care in Canada in relation to the average length of stay that Canadians have in hospitals. In Ontario alone the average length of stay has reduced from some seven days to about 4.2 days.

There has also been a major shift toward ambulatory care. Rather than having people go to the hospital and wait for a day for surgery and so on, they come in on the same day of surgery and are out a lot quicker; similarly with regard to maternity.

The member should also appreciate that there have been substantial changes in medical technology as well as in medications and that in fact Canadians are living longer today than they have historically. They continue to live longer. In addition there has been a tremendous elimination of duplication of services between hospitals and community agencies.

All this results in a substantial reduction in health care costs. Yet the member will clearly find out, if he checks the figures, that our health care institutions province by province have been able to service as many or more Canadians with less facilities. Those are the savings.

Because the savings have been achieved by the provinces the federal government has not achieved any benefit from the savings. The member should realize that health care is much cheaper to provide now and that the cuts simply reflect the lower cost of providing health care to all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Nunez: Mr. Speaker, as I said in my speech, I am in favour of a universal health system that is free of charge and funded from tax revenues. I think that this is a major benefit for the population, and one I would not like to see endangered. That is why I would invite the hon. member across the way to pressure the Minister of Finance to stop making cuts in transfer payments to the provinces in order to finance the health program.

Contrary to what the hon. member states, I feel that costs are on the upswing at present, particularly because of longer life expectancies. The population wants care, increased care. In my riding of Bourassa there are very many seniors who complain of not having proper health care. We can work together to improve the system, but not to destroy it, as you will by making cuts in the health field.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, may I say that it gives me a great deal of pride today to speak in support of Bill C–95 to establish the Department of Health.

• (1605)

My pride lies not just in the federal government's record of accomplishment and achievement in the broad health domain, although I have a great deal of pride in that, but also in a health system that is the envy of the world. In addition I have pride in the knowledge that the genius of Canada's Constitution is found in the fact that the world's finest health system did not come about at the expense of a fundamental respect for the letter and spirit of our Constitution.

While we are batting around our good and much maligned Constitution I should like to make a slight comment. Members of either the official opposition or the third party who are fond of making comments about the Constitution could perhaps learn a bit if they would read the Constitution. Many of the misapprehensions we have heard from both those opposition sides might be cleared up if they would merely read it. Maybe they need some help in reading it. However they should read it.

We could speculate on how the Fathers of Confederation would have dealt with health care had they any idea of the enormous technological changes that would take place in the first century of our country's history and in the even more profound technological advances that continue to arise each and every day. Perhaps we could speculate on how the Constitution would have been written if anyone in 1867 could have imagined the day when health expenditures would account for about one–tenth of Canada's economy.

Last Thursday the hon. member for Drummond enumerated the various heads of power over health the Constitution assigns to provincial legislatures. She drew particular attention to subsections 92(7), 92(13) and 92(16) which deal with health institutions, property and civil rights, and local matters. The hon. member could have added that subsection 92(2) deals with local taxation and spending and has health implications.

Those listening to the hon. member's stirring defence of Canada's Constitution could have been forgiven for thinking that everything the Constitution has to say about health is encapsulated in subsection 92. The fact of the matter is that other subsections also have considerable relevance. In the interest of peace, order and good government and in the interest of ensuring the people of Canada understand what is actually happening I should like to name some of them.

Subsection 91(27) gives the Parliament of Canada exclusive jurisdiction over criminal law. "Ah", I hear some people cry, "what does that have to do with health?" I will tell them. It is the basis of a number of statutes protecting public health and safety. That is federal jurisdiction.

Subsection 91(2) assigns to the federal Parliament responsibilities for international and interprovincial trade. It again supports the basis for federal regulations, as a small example, in the area of drugs and medical devices. That is federal jurisdiction once again.

Subsection 91(11) gives the federal Parliament explicit power over quarantine and marine hospitals. That is an interesting sidelight. It reveals a good deal of the thinking in 1867 about where matters cease to be local and take on national significance: quarantine and marine hospitals. It is not too big a stretch to see that should be and indeed is constitutionally within the federal domain.

Subsection 91(7) concerns the military and veterans. It is federal. Subsection 91(8) has to do with the federal public service and subsection 91(4) concerns aboriginals and lands reserved for aboriginals.

All these powers account for a great deal of the federal role in health. They account for the considerable array of the duties and responsibilities set out in clause 4 of Bill C–95 and by extension they account for the vast majority of Health Canada's operating expenses.

When viewed from the perspective of federal constitutional responsibilities, health is clearly a great deal broader than my hon. friend's narrow view of health care delivery, important though that is. No one in the Department of Health and no one on the government side is trying to minimize the responsibility of the provinces in health care. It is clearly not my intention to reopen the Constitution on this occasion but to separate myths from reality, particularly as they regard the application of federal spending powers in the health field.

I will again reiterate my earlier comment. The Constitution is a wonderful compilation of documents that has been much maligned both by the official opposition for obvious reasons and by the third party for reasons I can only claim are obscure. Most of their reasons are pretty obscure to me.

The biggest myth is that the spending power broadens the sphere of federal regulation. The reality is that nothing in the Constitution gives the federal Parliament the means to regulate provincial matters in the guise of spending power. Perhaps I could say it again very slowly. It can attach conditions to the funds it makes available to the provinces. However, just as it cannot compel the provinces to accept the funds it offers, neither does it buy jurisdiction when its offer of funds is accepted.

Clause 12 of Bill C–95 makes the limitation clear just as the existing Department of National Health and Welfare Act also makes it clear. It states:

> Nothing in this act or the regulations authorizes the minister or any officer or employee of the department to exercise any jurisdiction or control over any health authority operating under the laws of any province.

That is why the Canada Health Act does not forbid user fees. It does not require that provincial legislatures forbid them. It simply makes it clear that any province which decides to finance medically necessary health services through such means cannot count on receiving the full amount of financial assistance the federal government is prepared to offer.

This brings me to the matter that the federal government is intruding into provincial prerogatives. There is an immense distinction to be drawn between intrusion and involvement. The motivation for the federal government's involvement in health financing does not derive from any desire to centralize powers or to colonize a field of provincial jurisdiction.

The federal role in health care has been the exercise of leadership. There are those who would hold that leadership is a dirty word or a symptom of megalomania. I hold differently, as do members on this side of the House. I hold that leadership is a characteristic all Canadians value. All Canadians from all regions of the country expect and demand their federal Parliament to display leadership. It is not a dirty word. It is a great word which we over here absolutely applaud.

It is here that doctors and hospitals cease to have just local significance. The value that all Canadians share transcends being merely local. The importance that all Canadians attach to the principles of universal health care is a defining characteristic of the Canadian psyche. This is who we are. This is what we stand for. This is what we are proud of and this is what we fight for.

How is it possible to overlook this aspect of health care? I do not understand it. It is beyond me. At a time when all Canadians welcome the positive forces of reconciliation and partnership, I cannot understand how we in the House would allow ourselves to ignore the positive contribution that the federal government has made and continues to make to the health and well–being of all Canadians and to the articulation of the spirit of community that hold us in high regard the world over.

Before I close I should like to tell a little story about something that took place in my first session of Parliament in the House when we were in opposition. There had been a debate, again I believe it was an opposition day debate on the question of health care. After the debate was over, I joined two of my colleagues, one from my own region of Atlantic Canada and another from Ontario. We talked about how important medicare and the Canadian health care system was to each one of us.

• (1615)

It turned out that each one of us had had fathers who had suffered and families that suffered because of injury and illness prior to the development of medicare in this country, prior to the Canadian health care system. We came from three different backgrounds, from three different areas of the country, but all three of us remembered what it was like in childhood and how our families had suffered because the Canadian health care system had not yet been put into place, put into place I might add by the federal government, a federal Liberal government.

This is why I am pleased to have had an opportunity to speak in support of Bill C–95. This is why I and my colleagues on this side of the House in the Government of Canada will fight and maintain the Canadian health care system in the face of all odds.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak today in the debate on Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain acts.

I feel particularly concerned by this bill since in my riding, 50 per cent of the population lives below the poverty line and the quality of health care is extremely important. Although the government claims it is only a technical bill, its purpose being merely to change the name of the Department of Health, that is not the case.

Since 1919, we have seen the same situation time and time again. Once more, the federal government has shown its desire to invade provincial jurisdictions, as we will show later on.

I must firmly condemn the latest in a series of hijackings by the federal government. It hijacked the jurisdiction of the provinces over health care. It started many years ago in 1945, and it is about to finish the job.

Particularly revealing in this respect is the well known national forum on health. This forum, announced during the election campaign in the fall of 1993, was established a year later. Its mandate was very clear: to develop a vision of the future of Canada's health care system, to foster discussion with Canadians on their health care system, to identify priorities for the future and to achieve a broader consensus on the changes that are required.

We know that the provinces, which according to the constitution have jurisdiction over health care, are not involved in the forum.

What does this mean? The answer is simple. Instead of showing some willingness to respect the jurisdictions of the provinces, the government has simply gone over their heads without consulting them. The membership of the forum is a case in point, and I quote the Minister of Health: "The forum now has 22 members with a vast experience in health care, either as professionals, volunteers or consumers, and it will be a pleasure to join them in the months to come to work on a wide range of issues".

As you can see, the federal government did not bother to appoint representatives for the provincial governments. Consumers, professionals and volunteers come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. If any doubts remain as to the determination of this government to get the provinces out of this area, let me eliminate them immediately by quoting what was said by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Health at the twelfth international convention of the International Society for Quality in Health Care last May. She said, speaking on behalf of the government: "Canada has already taken many steps to achieve its goal: renewal of the health care system. We are reinforcing the community aspect of health care, improving the role of consumers in this respect and looking for a more integrated approach to health which goes beyond care as such". She went on to say: "We want to improve the effectiveness and quality of health care, and one of our common priorities is to promote the use of guidelines for clinical practice. We want health care to focus on the practices that are most effective for various high–risk groups".

• (1620)

These are fighting words for the provinces. Since when has the community aspect of health care or the role of consumers and health care been a federal responsibility? Are these not the exclusive responsibility of the provincial governments?

Why did the federal government, as it paid lip service to eliminating duplication and overlap, set up the national forum on health? I wonder. The answer is clear: this government is caught up in its desire for centralization and its obsession with encroachment. It never intended to withdraw from the areas of provincial jurisdiction it has invaded with impunity since 1919.

It is too bad that public opinion and the opinion of governments, including that of Quebec, are not important at all to this government. If only this duplication could be an asset, but unfortunately, that is not the case, as we shall see.

Let us look at the repercussions of this obnoxious policy on provincial governments. In Quebec, the provincial government has for a number of years considered the changes that will be necessary to deal with budgetary constraints and at the same time improve health care services to the public.

Through broad public consultations, Quebecers had a chance to express their needs and expectations and help identify priorities and implementation mechanisms. The Quebec government's action plan is ready and is now being implemented. Is there any justification for the expense of the new consultations carried out by the forum? Would it not have been better to respect the autonomy and jurisdiction of the Government of Quebec and transfer all moneys concerned directly to it for the benefit of Quebecers?

I am sure this option never crossed the mind of the federal Liberals. Now it cannot be done, because the federal Minister of Health announced in March her firm intention to direct all health policy matters.

As they were thus assuming their so–called leadership, they cut transfers to the provinces, thus depriving those who provide the services of the funds they need to set up their own policies. In fact, provincial governments, not only Quebec, will have to slash health spending. In addition to their own budget constraints, they will have to deal with cuts in federal funding.

Once again it will be women who will feel the effect. A report on women's health prepared by the International Federation of Gynaecology and Obstetrics revealed a year ago that women were sick or incapacitated longer than men. Moreover, as their life expectancy is longer than men's, it is primarily they who will be deprived of necessary health care because of the expenses arising from duplication in health matters and cuts in federal spending.

For Quebec, these cuts represent more than $8 billion over 10 years. The provinces were not consulted, although they have to incorporate them and suffer the wrath of their citizens. We have to bear the unbearable.

Allow me to conclude with a quote from an article that appeared in La Presse on March 4, 1995, which aptly summarizes the situation. It said that, together with the provinces, Ottawa would have to establish a list of essential services that would continue to be covered by the health insurance plan. It felt that this was the way Ottawa intended to allow the provinces to deal with increased health costs in a context of reduced federal transfers. In the end, according to the article, the bill for services not considered essential would have to be paid by taxpayers.

The aim of Bill C–95 is to enshrine government control over health. We have no intention of supporting this greed, which will mean Quebecers and Canadians alike will suffer.

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the comments made by my colleague from Quebec. She raised what I think is an extremely important point, which I would like her to develop further.

She talked about centralization and decentralization. We now see that the federal government, in particular the Department of Health, is trying to centralize a number of health matters, especially the general direction of health care in Canada.

• (1625)

At the same time, we see that the provinces, including Quebec, want to make innovative, creative decisions to better manage health care within their territories. In Quebec, there is a wide consensus to decentralize health care decisions to administrative regions. I am not talking about Canada's administrative regions but about administrative regions in Quebec. We see that the people want to be able to define in their own communities the kind of health care services they need and to have access to them.

This is in complete opposition to the tendency evident in the federal government's measures. Our concerns are justified. The federal government's centralizing vision is totally out of touch with the expectations of people in every province, including Quebec.

I would like the hon. member for Quebec to expand on this, to give the people listening to us and the members of this House an overview of Quebec's favoured approach, which seems to strike a chord in some other provinces.

Mrs. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, of course, this debate we are having today, members and ministers of previous governments have already had it. Legislation has been passed since 1919 that basically encroaches on provincial areas of jurisdiction.

That is not what the constitution of 1866 intended. What it intended was for the provinces to have full and complete jurisdiction over health, education and manpower training. I think that what is happening—When I look at the federal government's expenditures, I think that the problem comes from the federal spending power.

Federal spending for 1995–96 is $1.5 billion for operations, $347 million for personnel and $703 million for goods and services. If this money had been transferred to the provinces, Quebec and the other provinces would have had more money for health care, and would not have had to impose budgetary restraints and to cut back personnel and services at the taxpayers' expense.

What do you do at a forum? You discuss. You try to find a way to sing the same tune as the other provinces. But in the end, as minister Rochon pointed out in the Quebec national assembly, all that the provinces do at meetings and federal–provincial conferences is complain about not having enough money. There are costs involved with holding forums and conferences. When you do not have enough money, you stop discussing and start acting.

And in acting, you need money to follow these actions through. I think that agonizing choices lie ahead. Quebec's goal has always been to provide a safety net in several areas such as social services, health and education.

The federal government is driving us back against the wall by providing less funding. Federal transfers to the provinces have been reduced by $8 billion. Who does the public turn to? To the one making the cuts, the one that says: "We will not be improving services this year because we do not have enough money. Instead, we will be downsizing". As a result, employees too are concerned.

I think that I am not the first person to make this point. Since 1919, other parliamentarians, from Taschereau to Jean Lesage, have made it before me. There must be some truth in what we say. I cannot understand the federal government. We have to keep hitting it with the same arguments over and over again. What a waste of time. Time has come to act. And to act, we need money.

[English]

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the speech made by the hon. member. I would like to try to put this in a simpler context. I think what the hon. member and what many Bloc members are saying is that they would like the province to be totally responsible for health care with no federal involvement whatsoever.

• (1630)

I would like to give the member a simple example and ask the member to comment on one particular aspect of health care that we take care of, and that is the research, study, and recommendations to deal with specific problems Canadians have. One of them I am quite interested in is fetal alcohol syndrome or fetal alcohol effects. That disease affects about one in 500 births. It also accounts for five per cent of all fetal defects in Canada. That particular disease results in central nervous system disorders, brain damage, cognitive problems, attention problems, and so on. It is a very serious problem.

The federal government, using part of its money, one of many studies and programs it does, looked into this in 1992 and apparently is coming out again with a joint statement with the provinces with regard to a strategy to deal with fetal alcohol syndrome and fetal alcohol effects. That is just one example.

Does the member not agree that there are problems of health in Canada that are much better dealt with as a national Canada–wide effort—AIDS, aboriginal health, alcoholism, drugs, and so on—and are better handled by the federal government rather than handled individually in each and every province?

[Translation]

Mrs. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, I do not deny that there are health problems, but the provinces are certainly able to meet the needs of the public. The federal government is not there to set standards, organize forums and make studies. Rather, its role is to transfer money to the provinces, so that they can act directly where it is needed. I do not deny that there are problems with alcoholism. However, I believe that Quebec is certainly capable of setting up its own programs and making realistic decisions, based on the existing demand and need.

You talk about national standards. These may be appropriate for a province, but less so for another. When you set national standards, you must also provide financial support. We are discussing eligibility for all. I agree with that principle. However, do you not think that the federal government jeopardizes access, for the population as a whole, to quality health services, by spending and generating costs without even seeking our approval?

The issue is not health care, but transfer payments and the provinces' responsibility.

As I said before, ministers and members of provincial legislatures, not only in Quebec, have been wondering about decentralization since 1919. The word "decentralization" was not invented in Quebec. Other provinces are also concerned. Just look at what is happening in Ontario and in British Columbia, which will pass a law that may not please everyone. The federal government interferes in fields of provincial jurisdiction. Given that $603 million is spent on goods and services, and another $347 million on personnel, the federal should let the provinces spend the money where it is really needed and avoid duplication of services and personnel.

[English]

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the House in support of Bill C–95, an act respecting the Department of Health.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister who proposes this bill for the efforts she has made over the past year to defend and strengthen the principles enshrined in the Canada Health Act that underpin Canada's magnificent medicare system. I might add, it is a system of which I was proud to be a part in my previous position as a health care professional.

• (1635)

The department this bill deals with is an essential part of the fabric of this nation. The minister has said that it touches the life of every Canadian every day. Medicare in Canada transcends medicine. It is both a service for Canadians and a critical bond with Canadian federalism. Without it we would suffer as individuals and as a country.

It is essential that medicare be sustained and strengthened and that it remain as a bond within the country. This is the challenge and the responsibility of this department. This is the reason for Health Canada, and the reason I will support Bill C–95 without reservation.

It is true that the provinces have primary responsibility for the design and delivery of health care services. This is as it should be. Health care is a local responsibility. Doctors and hospitals work in communities. Provincial control of health care is not a weakness of the system, it is a considerable strength. The values, beliefs, wants and aspirations that define Canada and the Canadian identity are not unique to any sector of the Canadian population or to any region of this great country of ours. But the circumstances in which health care is delivered differ across regions, and the health care needs and priorities of these regions will differ. What we have is an opportunity system, where 12 variations on a common set of principles all going at medical problems in slightly different ways provide administrators and practitioners in different parts of the country with the opportunity to learn from each other.

The provinces plan, manage, and operate the health care system, but through the exercise of the federal role and through its transfers to the province, a national health system is the reality in Canada.

There are clearly many important health matters that require national leadership and co–ordination. There would be little to be gained, for example, if the work of the federal laboratory for disease control were duplicated in each province.

Many federal initiatives in the areas of health promotion and disease prevention have stimulated provinces, public health authorities, and non–governmental organizations to work to improve the health of all Canadians. Health Canada also has a special role to play with respect to the delivery of certain health services to First Nations, which will continue until the process of devolving responsibility for self–government has been completed.

After World War II ended, our forefathers and our predecessors, federal and provincial, looked down the road and asked what kind of nation we wanted to have. What kind of health care system do we want to have? What kinds of values do we have? As a country, as a people, and as the Liberal Party, we concluded that top–flight medical care was of paramount importance. We also recognized certain principles of fairness, equity, and efficiency that reflect the ideal of Canadians. Out of all this, our system of medicare was assembled just over a decade ago. It was anchored by the Canada Health Act.

If I may remind hon. members, the Canada Health Act came into being in order to defend the principles that were the foundation of medicare, principles of equal and universal access, principles that were even then under attack by various schemes that allowed extra billing and user fees.

In 1983, extra billing in various provinces amounted to $100 million, a total that had doubled over the previous five years. An erosion of medicare was taking place. The erosion was stopped by the minister in 1984. When there were signs of it restarting in 1994 under the guise of private clinics, it was stopped again by this minister, who has insisted that the federal government will ensure that the fundamental principles of the health care act are maintained.

The minister has said that it is not her intention to preclude the use of private clinics, which are often a cost–effective way to deliver services. She has said though that they have the potential to create a two–tiered system of health care: one level of service for the wealthy and another for the rest of Canadians. This is unacceptable today, just as it has been unacceptable through all the years we have been building and defending Canada's medicare system.

There is no mistaking where Canadians stand on this issue. Canadians want effective federal leadership in the health field. This is evident from the favourable reaction to the minister's announcement regarding user fees at private clinics.

• (1640)

Hon. members who have concerned themselves with the evolution of the health care system will be familiar with the work of Dr. Michael Rachlis. He was co–author of Second Opinion, an influential book that examined the Canadian system. Dr. Rachlis recently criticized the combining of public and private medicare, saying "it entails a wrong prescription for what is wrong with our health care system and then issues a wrong diagnosis".

Frank Maynard, former Deputy Minister of Health for Manitoba, warned:

> We already have the beginnings of a two–tier system; we should not enlarge it. Health care is not a commodity, so it is not a valid choice to offer the rich faster access to required medical service.

Wendy Armstrong, president of the Alberta chapter of the Consumers' Association of Canada, wrote:

> What happens is private clinics choose to treat things with the least risk of complication, least overhead cost and with potentially high volume. It's skimming the cream.

I could multiply these quotations by the hundreds, but I will conclude with only one. This segment is from a letter to the editor published by the Calgary Herald on October 16, 1995:

> It is time for Albertans to stand behind the federal government and demand universality of health care. This issue has nothing to do with political affiliation. It has everything to do with preserving a cornerstone of what makes Canada the best country in the world.

That just about sums it up. We are all in it together. For the most part we are all delighted to be in it, because there is no better system to be in, anywhere in the world.

The role of the Department of Health is to sustain and improve Canada's health system, to keep it intact. That is why I support the department, and that is why I support this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we know that transfer payments for health and postsecondary education have been reduced over the last several years.

I personally asked the Minister of Health to give me the figures in constant dollars on a per capita basis. There has been indeed a 7 per cent reduction over the last four or five years. Obviously, this has had an impact on the provinces' ability to assume their responsibilities with regard to health.

In Quebec, for example, we know that the Minister of Finance has announced a $1.5 billion reduction in transfer payments for health and postsecondary education for next year. At the same time, we learn that the federal government is going to spend $2 billion to buy armoured vehicles.

There is some type of dichotomy here. I want to believe that we do need armoured vehicles, but health is also essential. Armoured vehicles will not be much help to us when we get sick. There are societal choices to be made.

I know that Quebec would not have made that choice. I know that if Quebec had collected its tax money directly from the taxpayers, it would not have chosen to invest that money in armoured vehicles rather than in health care.

I would like my colleague opposite, if she can listen to me, to talk about the societal choices that are made here, in this House, and that have an impact not only in Quebec but in every province. These are the choices that have Canadians increasingly worried about their province's ability to provide them with the health care services they need, considering the fact that they have paid for these services but, for some reason or other, that money seems to have come to Ottawa on a one way ticket.

How is it that this money finds its way here but is not being returned where it should to fund something as essential and fundamental as health?

[English]

Lip service is a nice thing, but we should do something more. We heard from the MP opposite. I am waiting for your answer.

Mrs. Ur: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his questions. To reassure the member, I indeed was listening. I had my earphone in and I did understand his question.

• (1645)

I can certainly vouch for the efficiencies within Health Canada as a health care professional. Dollars are being cut and a lot of Canadians are going to suffer.

The member can rest assured that with efficiencies within Health Canada, new technologies and research and development, they enable us to work more efficiently with less dollars and to look at eliminating duplication and look at where services can be done differently. This is the direction we are headed. It does not mean that Canadians will be getting less health care, but that they will get health care that all Canadians can afford, rich or poor. I can attest to that avenue in the health care system or any other department.

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to expand in other areas the act covers besides the medicare or health insurance component.

One concern I have is in relation to section 4(2)(a) where it actually says that the department will be responsible for the promotion and preservation of the physical, mental and social well–being of the people of Canada. What I am thinking about here is the social well–being component of the statement. With the removal of welfare from the health and welfare department making it strictly health, does the hon. member not think that addressing the social well–being aspect is being inhibited now by having to deal and collaborate with other departments? Following on that, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was deleted and a lot of that mandate went to industry.

I feel that the department is being diluted in its ability to address the actual social component.

Mrs. Ur: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for her question. We have worked hard at health committee meetings and I understand her sincere question.

There has been sufficient research and involvement within Health Canada to make this diversity within the ministry as to who best can allocate for all Canadians. I believe the right choice has been made by looking at the ministry and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs working in conjunction with Health Canada. It is going to be more productive because of the avenues taken and it will be beneficial to all Canadians.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex on her debate on this important bill.

I know the member is a nurse by training. I also know she is a member of the important health subcommittee on AIDS. It is important for all members to understand that the federal government has a role to play in terms of major diseases such as AIDS which affect all Canadians.

Perhaps the hon. member would like to comment on the work she has seen through the subcommittee on AIDS that the federal government has been doing for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mrs. Ur: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be one of the members on the subcommittee for HIV–AIDS. It certainly has been a learning experience to say the least, to sit on that committee and hear witnesses.

The ministry has been allocating dollars proportionately to research regarding HIV–AIDS. Many issues have been addressed. This disease certainly is not under control by any means, judging from the stats that come by our desks daily. The dollars that have been funded through the minister have been allocated most effectively. I hope that in the not too distant future we will see positive ramifications from those dollars. There has been very good ongoing research.

Again, sitting on that committee has been a learning experience. I am sure its work will be most valuable to the House.

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened a few moments ago to the answer of the hon. member opposite. She said that access to health care should not depend on the wallet, that poor and rich people should have equal access to services. I could not agree more with that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. de Savoye: I thank the members opposite for applauding these words. However, the question is: What kind of services? I have a problem I want to share with the hon. member. She will probably have an interesting answer and I am eager to listen to it.

Two years ago, former first minister Bourassa had skin cancer. Where did he go for treatment? Washington, D.C. I want to know if people with a fat wallet will have to cross the border to get proper treatment. How come Mr. Bourassa could not be treated either in Quebec or in Canada? What was special? How would health care in Canada be able to cope with such a situation?

I am sure the member has a proper answer and I am eager to hear it.

Mrs. Ur: Mr. Speaker, I again thank my hon. colleague with whom I had the pleasure of working on the health committee. I know his question is most sincere.

With respect to that individual, I believe it was freedom of choice. It was his choice to seek medical help elsewhere. I can also relate a story. My husband had a heart attack five years ago. I did not have to go south; I was able to deliver my husband to an emergency room. He was having a heart attack and they did not ask me what my bank account was. I was able to go in there with my only concern being to make sure my husband had the best health care service. I knew he had it because that is Canada's health care system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): This brings questions and comments to a close. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is the following one: the hon. member for Mackenzie—public works.

[English]

We will now move on to the next stage of debate. We have exhausted the five hours of debate with 20–minute speeches and 10–minute questions and comments. We now go to straight 10 minute speeches without questions or comments.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my colleagues to speak to Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain acts. I want to assure all Canadians who are watching today's debate that this is a housekeeping bill. It is not a bill encroaching on provincial powers. It is not a bill kidnapping powers. It is not a bill discussing a two tier system, one for the rich and one for the poor.

In any of the polls done, it has been shown that 89 per cent of Canadians believe we have the most important and the best health care system in the world. They believe in the principles involved in the health act: universality, portability, accessibility, comprehensiveness, public administration.

Health Canada has certain responsibilities that are implicit in its mandate. Bill C–95 is attempting to make this explicitly acknowledged. Bill C–95 is before the House at a time when so many things within the world of biomedical technology are before us.

Bill C–95 affirms a whole series of things we promised in our red book. Partnership and co–ordination are words that are very important to us as we move on this issue. Those are the reasons for this proposed legislation. It is to confirm the existence of the Department of Health and to specify that mandate working with the provinces, working for a holistic approach to health, taking into consideration the social as well as the physical and mental well–being of our population.

This proposed legislation contains a series of provisions concerning the transfer of responsibility. I want to affirm—I think there was general agreement on all sides—that the history of universal medicare and the health department are intertwined.

The department has played an essential role in the evolution of medicare from its infancy in the 1950s and 1960s to its current status as one of the most respected health systems in the world. Why is Canada's health system so respected? One of the reasons is that it is predominantly a single payer, publicly financed health system. That unique feature of our health system has been there from the beginning.

When we were putting in place universal hospital insurance coverage under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, the federal government cost shared the start up of this component of the health system. The same happened when it came time to establish universal coverage for physician services under the Medical Care Act. Federal cost sharing was essential to assisting provinces and territories in establishing their medical care insurance programs. Medicare as we know it would not have gotten off the ground without the federal role in and commitment to health and its financing.

Cost sharing gave Canada universal hospital and medical care insurance, but cost sharing had its shortcomings. The change in financing arrangements in 1977 to block funding under the EPF, established programs financing, provided the provinces and territories with the flexibility necessary to focus beyond the traditional hospital and medical components of their health systems.

Anyone who says that the federal government is not a financial player in health is not looking at the numbers, which I will provide. In 1995–96, $15.5 billion in EPF health contributions will go to the provinces and territories. The long tradition of block funding and the flexibility it affords provinces and territories in their health programs will continue with the Canada health and social transfer.

Scheduled to begin in 1996–97, the CHST will transfer $26.9 billion to the provinces and territories for their health, post–secondary education and social assistance programs. In 1997–98, the CHST will contribute $25.1 billion. No one is denying the importance of the CHST reductions but let us put these reductions in perspective.

The reduction of $2.5 billion for 1996–97 amounts to less than 3 per cent of total estimated provincial spending on health, post–secondary education and social services and less than 2 per cent of provincial government revenues. The CHST is a balanced and fair approach to dealing with Canada's deficit and debt in making our health system fiscally sustainable.

Federal transfer reductions do not threaten our universal publicly financed health system. The minister has said this over and over in the House. Let us not be fooled by those who say it will and that privatization will save the health system.

The Canadian experience bears out results from studies by the Organization for Economic Co–operation and Development and the World Bank. Both have said that cost containment is more successful in health systems with a high share of public financing. The public share of health expenditures in Canada was about 72 per cent in 1993. The rest, 28 per cent, came from private sources ranging from employment based supplementary benefits to individual out of pocket purchases.

• (1700)

In terms of cost control the public sector succeeded in containing the rates of increase to 2 per cent in 1993. Private sector health expenditures grew three times faster, with an increase of 6.4 per cent.

Canada's publicly financed, single payer health system has the built in capability to pull various levers to rein in costs. Global budgets for hospitals and capping payments to physicians are two examples which come to mind. There are many others which provinces and territories can use without resorting to privatization or putting national health principles in jeopardy.

The federal government and the Department of Health played a key and necessary role in building our publicly financed, single payer health system which continues to reflect the values of fairness and equity on which the system was originally built. The need for a strong federal presence and role in health remains important in ensuring that fairness and equity are at the centre of our health system.

I assure all Canadians, especially the seniors in Etobicoke—Lakeshore who are watching the debate in the House, that Bill C–95 is a housekeeping bill and deserves the attention of all members.

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak today to Bill C–95. Health is one of the most important things in Canadian life, if not the most important. The human being is the most valuable resource we have. We can talk about resources, human and natural, but it is our human resources which make Canada the best country in the world.

Today a fundamental piece of legislation for the operation of the federal government is under discussion. Contrary to what has been implied in the House, the role of the federal government in health care is very important. It is crucial for the continued health and well–being of Canadians.

Everyone is familiar with the major role the federal government has played as the architect of a national health insurance system for Canada. Everywhere in the world it is regarded as an excellent example of public sector innovation in a crucial field of service provision. We should not forget what the health system in Canada was like before the advent of national health insurance.

Lack of infrastructure in the health area was highlighted during the Depression when financing was so desperately short that many doctors had to go on relief in the western provinces because patients could not pay their bills. Military recruiting drives for World War II demonstrated the poor health of the overall population, especially military aged males.

Saskatchewan pioneered the national health insurance model, first for hospital services and then for medical services.

The national health system we have today owes its origins to the leadership of consecutive federal governments, first to build infrastructure with hospital grants, with the Hospitals and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medicare Act, and in our own era with the Canada Health Act and established programs financing.

Who among us doubts the importance of this multi–decade effort to build a national health insurance system, both in terms of nation building and in terms of the security it provides each and every Canadian that their medical needs will be met regardless of their pocketbook.

We should not forget that the Canada Health Act, the last incarnation of this major national effort, is a piece of legislation which received all–party support in 1984.

Since this government was elected it has taken its responsibilities under the Canada Health Act very seriously. Under the private clinics policy a rigorous distinction is being drawn between the public health sector for insured services and entrepreneurial medicine. This is a critical distinction. No Canadian should be able to buy his or her way to the front of a queue for services. Services ought to be rendered on the basis of medical need, not by the pocket book.

• (1705)

As important as the CHA is, however, it is but a small part of the federal role in health. Health Canada is operative across Canada to ensure that the food Canadians eat, the drugs they consume and the medical devices they use are safe. It is important to recognize how much the department is operative behind the scenes to guarantee security in these areas. For example, for well–being during a baby examination, the immunization series is provided by a provincially paid practitioner but the quality of the vaccine and vaccination is ensured by the federal government.

Health Canada also plays a major role in encouraging both the public and private sectors to promote health and prevent illness and accidents.

Whatever the hazard of the day, smoking, AIDS, nuclear fall–out, radon, ebola, the plague, there is a Health Canada employee with direct responsibility for ensuring Canadians have the information they require to reduce their risk and that they are aware of the various protective strategies that exist to combat risk. They can build on those factors in their social and physical environment which will ensure Canadians are protected now and into the future.

Let us look at an instance of how this works. The ebola scare is fresh in Canadian minds. The Quarantine Act was recently invoked to ensure there was no risk of the ebola virus spreading in Canada. Networks of federal officials from Health Canada and with Health Canada's lead, many federal departments were mobilized to ensure security was always in place to reduce risk and follow up on any and all suspicious circumstances.

Working with Canadians across this great country of ours, using our public health intelligence of the highest calibre, Canadians acquired worldwide respect for their handling of the ebola crisis and their management of a situation with a high potential for panic and public disorder.

Ebola is but one of the many instances in which Health Canada rolls into action to protect Canadians. Many hazards have less public profile. Many require detailed risk assessment to determine how they should be managed. At all times Health Canada has the responsibility for dealing with the national dimensions of hazards to health and reducing them to ensure the high quality of life Canadians enjoy.

Another key role in the department is in the population health area. Recently we have come to understand the power of using population and sub–populations as the primary unit of analysis in the development of health policy and programming. The health status of populations is heavily influenced by a number of key health determinants including biology, income, education, environment, to mention a few. The department is now in the process of operationalizing the health determinants perspective on issues with the help of many of the country's most creative thinkers in the health area.

As an illustration, take Canada's children as a key sub–population. Concern is increasing about key social indicators such as rates of youth offences and incarceration. Quite recently there was a study on young women which is very troubling.

The preconditions for these increases in rates are set much earlier in the development of a young person. There are recognized determinants that are predictors of pathways that lead to healthy child development; for example, supportive families, social networks, parental employment and so on. There are others that are strong predictors of difficulties in achieving healthy development; for example, inadequate nutrition, high risk socialization patterns.

Important policy factors in development include developing positive relationships, experiencing success and developing self–esteem.

We need to take these types of development considerations into account if we are to build a society in which all young people are able to thrive.

• (1710)

Health Canada is working to make this possible. Programs such as prenatal nutrition and aboriginal headstart are breaking down many of the barriers to a healthy development.

With a population optic on these issues and key investments targeted early in life, we will achieve much to reverse some of society's most ingrained problems.

Health Canada has therefore a major role to play in improving Canadian society. Proof of these important efforts lies in the high quality of life Canadians continue to enjoy despite the rigours of the economic climate of today, the quality of which is unrivalled in the world and will do much to strengthen the federation as we proceed to implement the important post referendum change agenda.

I come from a rural riding. In that riding medicare is important but with the changes we have, the changes in technology for instance, practitioners and people with experience could use video conferences. We will be recruiting very young, good positions and finding ways to look after rural ridings.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

MANGANESE BASED FUEL ADDITIVES ACT

Hon. Michel Dupuy (for the Minister of the Environment, Lib.) moved that Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances, be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I will explain to the House what is in Bill C–94 and why we are taking immediate action against MMT. I will also respond to some of the misplaced concerns expressed by members of the opposition as well as identify why the government is addressing the MMT question.

As many members are now aware, MMT is a manganese based fuel additive used to increase the octane rating of gasoline. It has been used in Canada since 1977 as a replacement for lead in unleaded gasoline. Lead was phased out of virtually all Canadian gasoline by 1990. Canada is one of the few countries that use MMT. The United States banned it from unleaded gasoline in 1978.

Gasoline containing MMT adversely impacts the operation of sophisticated onboard diagnostic systems. These OBD systems are important because they monitor the performance of emission control components in vehicles.

The auto industry has made the decision that it will no longer accept the risk of increased warranty repair costs caused by MMT related damage.

• (1715)

Some companies have even indicated they will disconnect the OBD systems in whole or in part and may reduce Canadian vehicle warranty coverage starting with the 1996 model year if MMT continues to be used in Canadian gasoline. That means the increased cost of maintaining these systems would be passed on directly to the Canadian consumer.

The Canadian Automobile Association is a 3.7 million member consumer advocate organization for automobile owners. During its presentation to the standing committee it articulately outlined concerns facing Canadians both environmentally and economically. It stated that MMT is a heavy metal based fuel additive. When the sensors of the OBDs are coated with the heavy metal they cannot properly detect oxygen.

It is easy to see then that when sensors give a false reading, the warning light signals the motorist and the motorist would bring the car in for unnecessary warranty covered repair work. This cost will undoubtedly be transferred to the consumer down the road in the form of higher automobile sale prices, making already difficult car purchases an impossibility for many prospective car buyers.

Because the new OBDs are an advanced system of detection that catches ignition problems as soon as they fall below standard, the CAA states that the new system of OBDs will be one of the best things that could happen to cars from an environmental perspective, and if MMT would reduce its effectiveness, CAA wholeheartedly endorses a ban on the substance.

Consumers will opt not to use MMT in their fuel. The Reform Party is against this ban. The Reform Party should remember to represent its constituents and not take the position of defending a special interest lobby group against the wishes and protection of the people of Canada.

Who is the Reform Party standing up for, Ethyl Corporation, an American based firm which is the sole manufacturer of MMT? Ethyl Corporation manufactures MMT in the U.S. and ships it to Canada.

The Reform Party claims there is no reason for this bill. It says the minister is unilaterally pushing the legislation through. This process began under the previous government, which saw the necessity to examine the MMT question.

Last October the Minister of the Environment urged both the automotive and petroleum producing industries to voluntarily resolve the issue of MMT in Canada by the end of 1994, otherwise the government would take action. This deadline was subsequently extended into February of this year to review automobile and petroleum industry proposals.

The matter was not resolved and so the federal government has had to step in. The result is Bill C–94. The MMT issue is no longer an industry dispute and this is important to understand. Its outcome can affect the vehicle emissions programs we are putting into place. It could also negatively impact the automotive sector which would pass the newly incurred costs on to the Canadian consumer.

Some members of the House have gone so far as to suggest MMT creates great benefits for Canada's environment. They suggest that nitrous oxide emissions are reduced by 20 per cent when MMT is used. What they do not say is that this claim is based on data collected by Ethyl Corporation, the makers of MMT, from test cars that were driven 50,000 to 110,000 miles. This was then extrapolated to 195,000 miles.

This does not take into consideration the adverse wear and tear of the automobile which is degraded over time. Because of this it has been determined that there has been no rigorous scientific basis for applying the Ethyl Corporation's average emission values to Canada–wide projections.

When examined in the context of the current Canadian fleet, Environment Canada's analysis indicates that NO_x reduction would be only about 5 per cent. This has been substantiated by the University of Waterloo institute for improvement in quality and productivity. The report also indicates that the results of a study by Ethyl Corporation on reduction of NO_x emissions greatly overestimates the reductions in NO_x.

The Ethyl Corporation experiments have not been shown to be representative of field vehicle use, and the scientific rigour of the experiments is uncertain.

Ethyl's research was conducted and presented by a private consultant from the U.S. When I asked about the extreme differences in statistical data between the Ethyl Corporation report and the University of Waterloo analysis, she replied: "Statistics is not an exact science. There isn't only one right way to look at a set of numbers".

• (1720)

As every member of the House knows, the University of Waterloo is a Canadian university whose research is of national and international acclaim. The University of Waterloo does not have a particular vested interest, being a public university. So whose interpretation of the statistics is more likely to be in the public interest?

What would the Reform Party know about scientifically proven environmental concerns? Very little. This is the same Reform Party whose member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia stated earlier in the House: "There is an awful lot of voodoo science around with respect to the effects of man made carbon dioxide on global warming". Can anyone believe this? Voodoo science?

I am continuously shocked by statements made by the Reform members who choose to ignore accepted realities. Of the 196 living Nobel Laureate scientists 99 along with roughly 2,000 other world scientists jointly signed an urgent warning to humanity. In their declaration they appealed to the people of the world to take immediate action to halt the accelerating damage threatening humanity's global life support systems.

I quote from their media release when I say human activities may so alter the living world that it will be unable to sustain life in the manner we know. A great change in our stewardship of the earth and the life on it is required if vast human misery is to be avoided. This kind of consensus is truly unprecedented.

The urgent appeal goes on to say that no more than one or a few decades remain before the chance to revert the threats we now confront will be lost and the prospects for humanity immeasurably diminished.

The Reform Party openly scorns the leading scientists of our planet. Voodoo science? Is the Reform Party suggesting the Nobel Prize is a mystical, voodoo award?

To return to the claim by Ethyl Corporation of a 20 per cent reduction of NO_x emissions, if this 20 per cent reduction claim were true, why would the people who make cars in this country be working hard to make onboard diagnostic systems so advanced if MMT fuel could do the job by itself? The reason they are working hard is simple. MMT does not provide the answers to NO_x reduction that its makers claim. Let us be very clear about this.

Los Angeles has some of the worst pollution problems in North America. California has taken strong action against environmental pollutants, including a ban on the use of MMT. If MMT is what Ethyl Corporation and the Reform Party advocate as a product to reduce NO_x emissions, perhaps they should consider why the state of California has acted decisively on the issue.

Canada is one of the few countries that uses MMT. While we are on the topic, some members opposite are citing a recent U.S. court hearing in favour of the Ethyl Corporation, the producers of MMT. MMT will still be banned in California and in those states that require federal reformulated gasolines to be used. That means 30 per cent of the United States will continue with the ban on the use of MMT in fuel.

Furthermore, witnesses have told the committee that given the negative consumer attitudes toward MMT it is very likely consumers will demand to use MMT free gasoline, just as the consumers have chosen to use unleaded gasoline. What is more, we have yet to see if the U.S. government will appeal the decision.

Some members opposite also quite conveniently fail to talk about what the onboard diagnostic system does and what can happen if and when MMT causes the system to fail. Onboard diagnostic systems are designed to monitor the performance of pollution control systems, in particular the catalytic converter, and alert the driver to malfunctions.

If the OBD system is not working a 50 per cent reduction in the efficiency of the catalyst translates into a twofold increase in emissions compared with a properly functioning vehicle. What we are talking about is the failure of new emissions technology in automobiles resulting in increased car emissions harmful to our environment.

Let us also be clear about the economic impact of removing MMT. Some members of the House have suggested the cost would be in the billions of dollars. In fact the costs will be small for the entire petroleum industry. Estimates of the costs of MMT removal provided by the industry itself range from $50 million to $83 million per year which means an additional one–tenth to one–quarter of a cent per litre increase at the pumps.

• (1725)

Furthermore, likely alternatives to MMT would be produced in Canada, creating more jobs and opportunities for Canadians, whereas MMT is produced exclusively in the U.S. My question to the members of the Reform Party is why are they opposing this bill? Whose interests are they protecting?

The bill has a number of important improvements for Canadians. here are some of the key highlights of the bill. It will prohibit the import or interprovincial trade for a commercial purpose of MMT or anything containing MMT. It will give the minister the power to authorize exceptions for MMT that will not be used in unleaded gasoline subject to a monitoring requirement. Coverage of the act can be expanded by order in council to cover other manganese based substances used in automotive fuel.

The act is binding on all persons and entities including the federal and provincial governments. The enforcement tools are similar to those in the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. The penalties are strict. For the unauthorized import or interprovincial trade of MMT the maximum penalty on summary conviction is a $300,000 fine and/or six months in jail, and on indictment the maximum fine is $1 million and/or three years in jail. For knowingly providing false or misleading information on the importation or interprovincial trade of MMT the penalties are the same but with a maximum of five years in jail instead of three on indictment.

On conviction, as in CEPA, the court can also order an additional fine equal to the monetary benefits resulting from the offence, prohibit conduct that may lead to a repeat offence and direct the offender to notify third parties about the conviction.

In summary, we have two polarized positions on this issue. On one hand, over 20 automotive manufacturers, competitors, independently came to the same conclusion that MMT is harmful to OBD systems on their cars, OBD systems that are necessary to reduce emissions. The CAA, a consumer advocate organization, supports this position. A report from the University of Waterloo supports its claims with regard to NOx emissions. It has undertaken a considerable amount of work to prepare its support of the ban. If MMT really reduced NOx in the quantities suggested by Ethyl Corporation it could reduce emissions for the automotive manufacturers for free.

On the other hand, we have an American company, the sole manufacturer of MMT, holding an opposing position. I remind the House that Ethyl Corporation fought against the reduction of lead in gasoline in 1984.

This legislation is for Canadians. It is to protect Canadians from increases in automobile prices. It is legislation to protect our environment by ensuring the effective use of new, advanced onboard diagnostic systems for cleaner exhaust emissions. It is my commitment to the people of York—Simcoe for a better community.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Madam Speaker, we are now at third reading of Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese–based substances.

This bill is more directly aimed at prohibiting the commercial use of MMT in Canada. MMT is added to gasoline to raise its octane level, and, consequently, to improve engine performance. The Minister of the Environment reached this decision on April 5, and today we are being asked to vote on the decision to ban the use of MMT in Canada.

But the minister has not been very convincing in this matter. Indeed, there are many questions on this bill, which remain unanswered, and the minister totally refuses to look at them. She is dismissing all other analyses, studies and solutions put forward. It cannot be said that open–mindedness and a sense of conciliation are the strongest qualities of the Minister of the Environment, who is also Deputy Prime Minister.

In this case, as in many others, the minister has decided and stands firm, in spite of the strong opposition of the petroleum industry and Ethyl, the company producing MMT. The minister is closing her eyes and seems to be simply responding to the carmakers' lobby which, strange coincidence, is concentrated in her part of the country.

• (1730)

I am not saying that the automotive industry does not have valid reasons or arguments for not wanting MMT in its vehicles. I am simply saying that the minister is leaning to one side and that she does not listen to the arguments of the other side. But this attitude on the part of the Minister of the Environment is not new. In many other instances, she has acted the same way.

There is, among others, the ongoing and very disturbing case of the Irving Whale. Once more, the minister, through her lack of openness which, in my opinion, looks more and more like a lack of competence, is creating very serious problems that threaten the environment. The issue of the Irving Whale, a total fiasco, is a case in point.

By refusing to take into account studies made by Marex and CEF, the minister has embarked on an adventure which is dangerous for the environment of the gulf and which has already cost $12 million. This amount represents the total cost initially forecasted and the barge still lies on the bottom of the gulf.

It must be pointed out that the method chosen is not the safest one. The operations we saw this summer proved it and smacked of amateurism. I would also underline that the barge is still leaking, now more than ever. According to a report of the Canadian Coast Guard, more than 500 litrres have recently leaked from the wreck.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member for Davenport on a point of order.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt, but I believe that the hon. member is not dealing with the bill presently before the House, Bill C–94.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I believe you have raised a matter of debate.

Mrs. Guay: Madam Speaker, there are facts which have to be brought to light and this is part of the bill. The minister does not want to go further on this issue as in the case of the bill we are debating today. She stubbornly refuses to be further advised on such important decisions that have to be taken. Her reasons for refusing any new course of action clearly appear to be unfounded.

I would even go further and say that the minister definitely shows her bad faith on many issues, as we saw during Question Period in recent days. Her answers to questions relating to the environment showed her ignorance and incompetence. All she tells us, and I think it is totally childish and silly, is that, when he was Minister of the Environment, Mr. Bouchard, our leader, said this and that, did this, did not do that, and so on. This is how the minister has been answering our questions for the last two years.

Come on. Let us be serious and exercise a little intellectual rigor. On any other question, she is big on quotes, which proves that she is no authority and misinformed on important issues. Frankly, I think that such behaviour from a deputy prime minister is quite alarming.

As for the Irving Whale, she rejects the solution recommended in the Marex study, although it was commissioned by her department and the Coast Guard—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I recognize the hon. member for Davenport on a point of order.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, I am sorry but again I must remind the member that the bill is about gasoline and the manganese content of gasoline. It is not about the Irving Whale. I invite the member to discuss the bill—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Again, this is a matter of debate.

Mrs. Guay: Madam Speaker, as for the Irving Whale, the minister says she rejects the solution recommended in the Marex study, although it was commissioned by her department and the Coast Guard, because, according to her, this firm has financial interests in the pumping method it recommended.

Last week, after last summer's failed refloating attempt that cost us $12 million, the minister said she was rejecting the offer to strike an expert panel to review the issue, made by the Société pour vaincre la pollution, or SVP, on account of Daniel Green's financial interest in this proposal. I recall that, last year, the minister went as far as claiming in this House that SVP had gone bankrupt. She has some nerve. What is obvious is that the minister is always trying to discredit those who think differently from her in order to compensate for and hide her incompetence and lack of action in several areas

Discrediting is what the minister does best. On another—

• (1735)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order, please. The member for Davenport, on a point of order.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, again I am sorry, but it seems to me that we must adhere to the rule of relevancy. We are debating Bill C–94.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I would ask the member to make a connection between her comments and the bill before us.

The member for Gaspé, on a point of order.

Mr. Bernier (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, currently the Bloc Quebecois is the official opposition in Ottawa. Whether they like it or not, people will have to listen to what we have to say. The member for Davenport is simply filibustering.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): This is not a point of order.

Resuming debate. The member for Laurentides.

Mrs. Guay: Madam Speaker, if I was allowed to make my speech, the connection with Bill C–94 would become obvious; I would ask the member for Davenport to listen for once and stop his filibustering during my speech. I will respect his to the extent he will respect mine. Allow me to continue.

To another question I was asking him regarding—

Mr. Caccia: It is about time.

Mrs. Guay: Madam Speaker, could you call the member to order and ask him to show some respect?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order, please.

Mrs. Guay: I can go on then. I asked the minister another question concerning the ban on PCB exports to the United States. The minister said in this House that she was making representations to the EPA, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency.

A few days later, we received confirmation from the chair of the hearings on the PCB issue that the EPA had never heard from our environment minister on that issue, in spite of the invitation extended by the EPA to the minister. Just smoke and mirrors once again, Madam Speaker.

Why is the minister saying such poppycock? Does she really think Canadians are that naive?

It is easy to see that environmental stakeholders are disenchanted with the minister's performance. She who was to be the great champion of the environment became the great speechmaker on the environment instead. As we say in Quebec, she is all talk and no action.

Bill C–94 follows this erroneous way of—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member for Peterborough, on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Adams: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I listened to part of this speech on television and I have just arrived in the House. I was under the impression that we were debating Bill C–94, the Manganese based Fuel Additives Act. I wonder if I have arrived at the wrong time.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I would ask the member to make sure her comments relate to Bill C–94.

The hon. member for Gaspé, on a point of order.

Mr. Bernier (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, two liberal members have now interrupted my colleague. She is doing a good job.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): This is not a point of order either.

The hon. member for Laurentides.

Mrs. Guay: Madam Speaker, I will go on until my speech is finished.

Bill C–94—I hope this will please my colleagues—is just one more example of this improper way of doing our best. The minister started out with an idea and she will not change her mind, even if her idea is not the best one. It is impossible to go any further with other studies and analyses. The minister said no, and her no is irrevocable. Yet, there is room for debate on the issue of MMT. Let us look at the arguments both sides are making, and try to find the best route to follow.

First, we will talk about the MMT lobby, which is composed of oil companies and Ethyl Corporation. This lobby came to defend MMT before the standing committee, besides meeting many members of Parliament.

The MMT lobby tells us that by removing this additive from gasoline, we will aggravate the problem of urban smog, since we are increasing the nitrogen oxide emissions by 20 per cent. Health Canada studies indicate that the MMT additive does not constitute a major threat for human health.

• (1740)

Independent laboratory experiments prove that, contrary to the statements made by the automobile lobby, MMT used in Canada is totally compatible with the new onboard diagnostic systems for pollution control, the OBD–II systems.

Also according to the MMT lobby, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency should reintroduce this additive very soon in that country. In fact, under an October 20 ruling by the United States Court of Appeal, District of Columbia, in the case Ethyl v. Browner, chief administrator of the EPA, the EPA has been compelled to register MMT as an additive for unleaded gasoline, something the EPA had refused to do until now. In its ruling, the court stated:

[English]

On November 30, 1993 the EPA found that MMT had no adverse effects on automobile emission control systems.

[Translation]

Consequently, the EPA was recognizing de facto that MMT did not adversely affect pollution control systems. At the refining stage, MMT allows to reduce some polluting emissions. It would cost refineries about $100 million in capital and about $10 million in operating expenses to replace MMT. Plants would then have to extend the whole refining process. Extra refining costs more money and pollutes more.

So, these are essentially the arguments made by the MMT lobby. I want to emphasize that, to substantiate its arguments, only Ethyl Corporation made a series of experiments on the effect of MMT on vehicle pollution control devices. You tell us that those tests go back quite some time and that the same components are no longer used? That may be, but Ethyl was the only one to conduct those tests, which seem to prove that MMT does not gum up the systems.

Furthermore, the carmakers' lobby claims that MMT affects the emission control system and more specifically the electronic pollutant detection system. In concrete terms, this system uses a light to indicate that your car's emission control device is defective.

However, there is no scientific evidence to sustain the theory of MMT causing a malfunction of this light. The carmakers' lobby tells us they have evidence, but they have made nothing public to prove it. Besides, the industry in the United States is only just beginning to conduct scientific tests to support its claims.

To bring more pressure to bear, the minister, together with the carmakers' lobby, is claiming that it could cost as much as $3,000 more to buy a car, that guarantees could be reduced, and even that the famous detection device could be disconnected.

After checking recently, we found that the guarantees on 1996 cars have not yet been changed, contrary to what the minister was claiming. This pressure can be seen as a form of blackmail on the part of the industry, but according to the minister, it is serious.

The other major argument used by the minister has to do with the harmonization of fuel standards in Canada with those in the United States. Now, as we saw earlier, the U.S. could very soon have the same MMT rates that we presently have in Canada. Some even talk about next December, when close to 50 per cent of American refineries could use MMT.

If this should happen, the minister, who is now talking about harmonization, would look rather silly. Why not wait a few weeks and see what happens in the United States? This is what both sides are saying.

The minister, who naturally tends to lean towards the car manufacturers' lobbyists, has decided to order this ban, not because of the toxic or polluting effects of the MMT on health, but because of its impact on a new electronic system being used in cars.

MMT in itself is not recognized as a toxic or hazardous product as evidenced by the fact that the minister cannot regulate the use of this product through the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, or CEPA, which deals with toxic substances. The minister has no other alternative but to pass a specific act on the sale of this product.

In her press release dated April 5, the minister indicates that this decision follows almost two years of discussions between the oil industry and the automotive industry. One can wonder about the relevancy of these discussions and their true value, since the minister has warned both parties that, if they did not come to an agreement, an act banning MMT would be passed.

• (1745)

In saying so, was the minister not telling the automotive industry: "There is no need to discuss this much further, since I support your position and will legislate on this matter."

Again, the minister was showing her clear support for the automotive industry, which does not want to use MMT anymore and does not seem to support any of the fuel additives. Therefore, I wonder what will happen to ethanol, a favourite among additives, for which the government has recently set up a $70 million investment program.

If the automotive industry does not want to hear about additives, why would the government want to develop such a product? What a blatant inconsistency it is to ban one additive while speaking of developing another one, when the automotive industry does not want any additives at all.

How can we be sure that the automotive industry will not soon ask the government to ban ethanol because of its negative effects on a component or some equipment used in their cars? It is certainly not easy to rule in favour of one side or the other. The arguments used look valid. However, the ball is now obviously in the court of the automotive industry and of the minister who, once again, has not done her homework in a responsible and transparent manner.

Granted, the automotive industry knows these systems well but its concerns about the effects of MMT are not based on scientific studies. It is important to note that the automotive industry has made great progress in the exhaust emission control over the past 25 years. According to a study by the Canadian Automobile Association, the adoption of emission standards has greatly improved air quality. Indeed, the study reveals that, for every kilometre driven, a 1970 model polluted as much as 20 cars made in 1995. As far as I know, all this progress has been made in spite of the presence of MMT in fuel.

One can give the benefit of the doubt to the automotive industry as the minister does, but that does not seem enough. I firmly believe that it would be a great mistake to always give the benefit of the doubt on environmental issues.

One needs accurate information to make the best decisions. One must not to be afraid to ask for more. On environmental issues, asking for too much is better than asking for too little. It is the future of this planet that is in jeopardy, the survival of our children. Care must be taken not to make decisions lightly and without sufficient justification.

The minister has not done so, right from the beginning of her mandate. I would like to quote an article over the byline of Terrence Corcoran in the Globe and Mail of October 21, headlined "Sheila Galileo meets MMT". It reads as follows:

[English]

> Scientific rigour has never been at the heart of the environment movement, nor does it appear to be the first love of Canada's Environment Minister—In a speech last Monday, Ms. Copps demonstrated her scientific flair by accusing all who doubt the existence of the greenhouse effect as "the same kind of people who rejected Galileo".
> Now there's nothing deeply offensive about that accusation, except that it came from Ms. Copps midway through a speech in which any kind of science, let alone good science, was totally ignored. Speaking to the international panel on climate change in Montreal, Ms. Copps reviewed a list of "weather events from this summer documented by scientists" to prove the existence of the greenhouse effect.
> Space does not permit a full rundown, but here are some of the items identified by Sheila Galileo as evidence for the greenhouse effect: the second worst year in history for forest fires; record rains in Alberta; record electricity production in Ontario; the death of a half million chickens and turkeys on one August weekend; wind damage on every property in Oxbow, Saskatchewan; a record number of icebergs floating off Newfoundland; a steady stream of migraine sufferers, heart patients and asthmatics admitted to hospital emergency departments.

> Ms. Copps said "these are facts provided by Canada's leading scientists". Could be, although the list looks more like the output of a good newspaper clipping service.
> There's already evidence that bad science, or no science at all, drives environmental politics in Canada, and Ms. Copps is at the leading edge of the movement. Indeed, her department and the entire Government of Canada are now up to their test tubes in a murky scientific and political game they've been playing over a gasoline additive called MMT. In the wake of a ruling yesterday by a Washington court over MMT use in the United States, there's now a good chance that Ottawa's entire fuel emissions program is about to go up in a cloud of smoke, the victim of scientific and political negligence.

End of quote, Madam Speaker.

So much for the scientific rigour of the Minister. In light of the information available at this time, and recent developments in the US, I feel that delaying adoption of this bill is mandatory. It seems vital for studies by independent experts to be carried out to set us completely straight, so that we will have a clear idea of the impact of MMT—and why not of any other additive such as ethanol—on pollution control systems. This would be a more appropriate and more reasonable approach as things stand at the present time.

When the Minister of the Environment is constantly speaking of harmonization, bragging that this is what her policy is all about, a lot of questions come to mind. Canada is composed of provinces, each of which has an environmental policy, each of which has different needs depending on its industries. Our environment must be constantly improved, and I am convinced they are all aware of that.

In Quebec, the environment is the third–ranking priority after jobs and health. The minister must learn how to listen to people instead of stubbornly dictating her philosophies to them. The mistakes in the Department of the Environment have done nothing but constantly increase under her leadership. Her reputation as a brawler was normal when she was in the opposition. But now that she is in power, it is her duty to examine issues thoroughly, carry out studies when uncertain, and harmonize with the provinces, in other words forget all that stuff about sustainable development and the environment.

Let the minister show us, and prove to us, her true desire to make positive and realistic pro–environment decisions, not politically dictated ones. It is obvious that she seems determined to move this bill through at any price. We cannot support it, therefore, because we feel it lacks a large number of elements for banning MMT in Canada. In the aftermath of the American decision of October 20, we find it extremely difficult to support a bill that will no longer harmonize in the least with the US decisions.

Madam Minister, get back to your books, and you can write a makeup test later on.

[English]

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise again to take part in the debate on Bill C–94.

First I thank all the witnesses who came before the committee to discuss and make presentations on this subject. It really was unfortunate that it was apparent right from the introduction of the bill and the hearings in committee that members of the government were not really interested in hearing, listening or learning any of the facts behind the issue. They were destined to support the political agenda of the Minister of the Environment or they would face the wrath of the minister. We on this side of the House certainly know how intimidating that can be.

From the very beginning it was apparent to me that either one side or the other on this issue was distorting the facts brought before us. Therefore my staff and I spent the summer doing extensive research into the issue. The more we studied, the more convinced we became that the minister was not so much concerned about protecting the environment as she was about fulfilling a political commitment.

I will review some of the facts that led me to this conclusion. On the issue of the onboard diagnostic computer system, the contention brought out in committee was the question of whether or not MMT gums up the OBD II systems.

In December 1993 following the largest fuel additive testing program in the history of the U.S. EPA, it was concluded that the use of MMT would not cause or contribute to the failure of any emission control device or system including onboard diagnostic systems.

• (1755)

The EPA, the U.S. court and subsequently the U.S. Court of Appeal rejected concerns about the impact of MMT on OBD systems as presented by U.S. automakers. U.S. automakers have experienced significant difficulties with the certification of OBD systems in United States where MMT is not currently used in unleaded gasoline.

The U.S. EPA and the California Air Resources Board have recently changed their regulations to allow for certification of vehicles that do not comply with the OBD II requirements. The U.S. EPA stated in the federal register that automobile manufacturers have expressed and demonstrated difficulty in complying with every aspect of the OBD requirements. Such difficulty appears likely to continue into 1996 and 1997 model years.

In Canada, the Motor Vehicle Manufacturers' Association appears to be blaming OBD II system difficulties on MMT. MVMA members have lobbied the Canadian government threatening to disconnect OBD warning systems and pass costs on to consumers unless the government passes legislation to ban MMT. The Canadian government appears to have responded to the threats without noting that vehicle manufacturers have failed to achieve OBD II certification in the U.S. for most new car models.

Furthermore I should like to know how the minister could explain her statement that if vehicle manufacturers carry through on threats to remove OBD systems it would result in a tenfold increase in vehicle emissions. This is simply representative of the rhetoric coming from the minister and from that side of the House with no real facts to back up those statements. This false claim shows a fundamental misunderstanding of the technical issues involved and underlines the need for an independent technical assessment of the MVMA claims.

OBD systems do not reduce emissions on vehicles. OBD is a monitoring system designed to notify the driver when emission control equipment does not operate properly. Removal or more likely the disconnection of OBD systems would only serve to prevent a dashboard malfunction indicating light from illuminating, which is exactly what is happening already in the United States without MMT. No emission control equipment would be removed from the vehicle.

The issue of sparkplug failure was used by the minister with great gusto to demonstrate her reason for banning MMT. General Motors Canada has claimed that MMT is responsible for warranty claims for sparkplug failure being 17 times higher in Canada than in the U.S. It is alleged that higher claims are due to manganese deposits on sparkplugs causing the plug to arc under certain conditions from electrode to the outer shell rather than from electrode to electrode.

Arcing leads to sparkplug misfire which can contribute to drivability problems. The Minister of the Environment has cited these claims to help justify her proposed legislation to remove MMT. However she failed to point out that automakers' claims related to one type of platinum tipped sparkplug used primarily in a one–engine version used in GM automobiles. The sparkplug in question was discontinued by GM indicating the problems were related to the design of the plug, not MMT. No casual link was ever established between MMT and sparkplug problems and no warranty data have ever been made public.

To further assess the validity of GM's concerns independent testing was conducted by the Southwest Research Institute in San Antonio, Texas, using the platinum tipped long life plugs used in all 1994 2.2 Chevrolet Cavaliers. The goal of the study initiated with General Motors Corporation in the U.S. was to determine the differences between new sparkplug failures and the plugs were provided by GM.

The sparkplugs were fired under a power supply that increased output to the plugs in a ramped manner. Current leakage until the plugs fired was measured and movies were taken to document whether arcing occurs between electrodes or from electrode to shell.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare the amendment lost.

Adjournment Debate

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Madam Speaker, on October 19, I questioned the minister of public works regarding some problems over the summer with harassment of a female engineer on the job site outside the Peace Tower.

The ministry of public works subsequent to that harassment rewarded one of the subcontractors with further work, including the whole of the Centre Block. I was wondering why the minister would allow his officials to do that. He replied that "notwithstanding the fact it is beyond the legal ramifications of the Government of Canada in terms of privity of contract, we will ensure this kind of behaviour is not tolerated".

Since that time it has come to my attention that officials at public works have been closing their eyes to this sort of behaviour for some time. In fact, this same company, Colonial Builders, and Mr. Karmash who is the perpetrator on this site, have been active on other sites in previous summers, including the Kingston military college and the Kingston penitentiary. Harassment of another female engineer took place to the point where her supervisor took over because it was virtually impossible to work with the subcontractor on the site. He would simply have nothing to do with a female on his job site.

Public works should have been aware of this pattern of behaviour, yet it has continued to permit the company and this individual to do work of very great importance since that time, including work on the Parliament Buildings.

Public Works officials have not shown much competence or judgment, not only in this matter but in other matters related to it. The minister is aware that the female engineer's crew walked off in sympathy with her plight and were left being owed approximately $165,000. Public works officials have not acted there either.

In order to receive pay for work completed, the contractor and subcontractor have to fill out statutory declarations. They swear that all work they are billing the government for has been completed and that all payments have been made. The statutory declarations could not have been very accurate on the Peace Tower project because if the declarations were true, the group of workers who were with Ann Raney and who are still owned some $165,000 would have been paid. Yet the statutory declaration stating that all accounts are paid and up to date have been submitted and paid by Public Works Canada.

That they are owed the money is not in dispute. The court has in fact found in their favour and has permitted a lien to be placed against the Peace Tower project. Surely that should tell officials at the department of public works that something is wrong. The minister should be aware and should be making certain that he finds out why his officials are so lax in their duties. Not only does public works appear to support and justify the harassment of women on the worksite, but it appears to be ignoring the basic management and accounting procedures that are its role as well.

I call on the minister to assure us that his department will act honourably and see to it that justice is done in this case. These workers who had the strength of character to do the right thing in resisting the unfairness of the harassment against their female engineer must not be the only Canadians who resist harassment of females on the worksite.

The public and this House expect nothing less than fair treatment and justice from our government departments and from their officials. The minister must act now.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Mackenzie for giving the government a chance to respond to this matter because it is a very important subject.

[Translation]

First it is a matter of taking stock. Public Works and Government Services Canada concluded a contract with Fuller Construction, the principal contractor in the Peace Tower restoration project. Therefore, this department must ensure the quality of the work being done on the Peace Tower and that the work done by Fuller Construction, the general contractor, meets very high standards.

[English]

The issue raised by the member for Mackenzie concerns a dispute between two subcontractors working on the project, Pro–Tech Building Restoration and Colonial Building Restoration. The dispute, based on the non–payment of wages and harassment, has resulted in Pro–Tech being removed from the job by Colonial. An employee of Pro–Tech, Ms. Ann Raney, has made allegations of gender discrimination.

[Translation]

In this matter, the government has a contractual link with Fuller Construction only, whereas the dispute involves the two subcontractors: Pro–Tech and Colonial. Public Works therefore has no direct involvement with the subcontractors working on the project.

[English]

However, the contract with Fuller Construction, like any other major work contract, includes an anti–discrimination clause. As I said before, Public Works Canada's contract specifications do not permit discrimination in hiring in the workplace.

[Translation]

As the general contractor, Fuller is responsible for settling this dispute.

[English]

I am pleased to inform the House that progress is being made and that the general contractor has taken steps to ensure that a solution is reached in the very near future. Both parties have agreed in principle to resolve the alleged discrimination issue through a third party independent arbitrator. Until the issue is resolved, the party alleged to have harassed has been removed from the job by Fuller.

[Translation]

The member for Mackenzie also raised the question about ownership of the tools. I would like to take this opportunity to set the record straight. On August 18, 1995, tools worth $5,000 were taken from the site. These tools remain in the hands of the Ottawa–Carleton police.

[English]

I would like to assure members of the House that complaints of the nature raised by Ms. Raney are taken very seriously by the minister of public works. His department does not tolerate harassment or discrimination.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table in both official languages the government's response to two petitions.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table in both official languages a report entitled "The Special Commission on the Restructuring of the Reserves".

PETITIONS

TAXATION

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. It has been signed by a number of Canadians from Deloraine, Manitoba.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

• (1005)

JUSTICE

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to present two petitions signed by people in my constituency who were outraged over the murder of Melanie Carpenter and who continue to press for changes to the criminal justice system to address what they feel are inadequacies in the system.

The petitioners call on Parliament to permit the use of post–sentence detention orders and to limit the freedoms of high risk offenders. If Parliament hears this petition, innocent people like Melanie Carpenter will remain alive, and dangerous ones like her murderer, if he were still alive, would stay behind bars.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

The House resumed from November 6 consideration of the motion that Bill C–108, an act to amend the National Housing Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to Bill C–108 at second reading, a bill to amend the National Housing Act.

I can speak from firsthand experience of the federal government's concern in social housing matters. I am pleased to represent the riding of Etobicoke—Lakeshore where the government is funding projects such as Kilcooley gardens co–op and William Kinnett co–op housing, housing residents who are single parents and persons with disabilities.

I am proud to be part of a government that supports non–profit housing, promotes the security of tenure and a sense of community among its members. I can also speak to the benefits of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation's mortgage loan statistics.

In my riding of Etobicoke—Lakeshore from 1992 to October 1995 a total of 1,567 home buyers took advantage of CMHC's mortgage loan insurance. Of these, 708 were first time home buyers who were able to gain access to their home under the CMHC's first home loan insurance, the 5 per cent down program as we call it.

I am pleased to speak in support of the bill because I understand the crucial importance of it to ensure that CMHC can continue its mortgage loan insurance activity.

I am bewildered why certain members of the House are not able to support the bill. I can only assume it is because they do not fully understand the provisions of the bill and cannot appreciate the important role mortgage loan insurance will play in helping Canadians to gain access to decent affordable housing.

Many of my colleagues have already spoken to this issue. However, it is obvious the message has not gotten through. Allow me to spell it out one more time more clearly for the benefit of those having difficulty understanding why the bill is important to Canadians.

NHA mortgage loan insurance makes home ownership accessible to millions of Canadians regardless of where they live. This access is under similar terms and conditions with the smallest feasible down payment and at the lowest cost to borrowers. CMHC is able to provide this insurance at no cost to the government.

Bill C–108 is required in order for CMHC to continue to underwrite home mortgage loan insurance within the legislative limit. Let me be very clear on this point. If CMHC cannot continue its mortgage loan insurance activity, thousands of Canadians will not have access to home ownership. It is as simple and as serious as that.

NHA mortgage loan insurance works like this. Most lenders cannot make a mortgage for more than 75 per cent of the value of a property without mortgage loan insurance. This means those not able to save a down payment of 25 per cent would be locked out of home ownership without mortgage loan insurance. NHA mortgage loan insurance provides approved lenders with insurance against borrower default of residential mortgage loans.

NHA mortgage loan insurance allows Canadians to take out a mortgage with an NHA approved lender with a down payment of only 10 per cent of the property value or 5 per cent for first time home buyers.

NHA mortgage loan insurance requires the payment of application fees and insurance premiums. It is not just handed out for free by the government. These premiums are charged as a percentage of the loan based on the amount of the loan and its ratio to the value of the property. Premiums are set so as to ensure the fund always contains enough to cover any claims.

Since mortgage loan insurance protects lenders against default losses, they are able to charge the borrower the lowest possible rate of interest, which means mortgage loan insurance plays a critical role in reducing the cost of home ownership for Canadians. It also plays a critical role in ensuring relative equal access to mortgage financing in all parts of the country. This access is made possible through the cross–subsidization of higher risk business against lower risk business. In this way the mortgage insurance fund is self–financing. In other words, it does not cost the government anything to provide mortgage loan insurance to lenders so Canadians can have access to decent affordable housing.

We recognized a few years ago that even a 10 per cent down payment was difficult for some people to manage which is why the government introduced the first home loan insurance initiative in 1992 and reduced the minimum required down payment to 5 per cent for first time home buyers. The initiative was introduced for a two–year period but was extended for an additional five years until 1999.

As many members will know, this 5 per cent down initiative has been a tremendous success in helping to increase home ownership in Canada. By further reducing the minimum required down payment, home ownership has moved from a dream to a reality for the many Canadians who can afford monthly mortgage payments but who are having trouble saving for a down payment.

Certain members might not be aware there are Canadians who cannot afford a down payment of 25 per cent of the price of a home, even the most modest home. Are there members in the House who would refuse these Canadians a chance to become homeowners? I must assume my colleagues are not so out of touch with the economic realities facing many Canadians that they are not aware of the difficulties some people have in raising enough money for a convenient 25 per cent down payment. This is a reality for many people. That does not mean we should exclude them from access to decent housing. The government supports families and individuals who aspire to be homeowners.

We know many Canadians have a strong desire to become homeowners and we understand the tremendous importance of helping them to do just that. We know how important a home is to people not only in terms of an investment but for the impact on their quality of life.

• (1015)

When people are well housed, they are better able to participate in their communities. They enjoy a greater sense of control over their lives. It is no surprise that Canadians are willing to make great sacrifices to achieve home ownership. Saving for a down payment is a major undertaking, yet Canadians do it willingly because they want to fulfil their dream of owning a home, a place of their own.

Perhaps it has been a long time since some members of the House had to worry about such mundane matters as saving money to buy a home. Let me tell them that a down payment even on a starter home represents a substantial amount of money for many Canadians. It is not easy to save for a down payment these days.

Does that mean we should just close the door on those people, tell them and their children that they cannot own a home? What kind of a country would we have if we did that? Certainly not a country I would want to live in I can assure you.

Home ownership is part of the Canadian dream, a dream which this government believes should be shared with all Canadians, not just a privileged few. We believe that all Canadians deserve the chance to become homeowners. We believe that the federal government should continue to play a role in helping them to do so. And we believe that NHA mortgage loan insurance is the best way for us to fulfil that important role at no cost to the government.

Millions of Canadians depend on NHA mortgage loan insurance. In fact, members of the House will be pleased to learn that more than 3.5 million Canadian households have been helped to purchase a home since the government initiated NHA mortgage loan insurance in 1946. That figure represents nearly one–third of Canada's housing stock. In 1994 alone, CMHC provided mortgage insurance for 40 per cent of all residential mortgages in Canada. That represents over 300,000 housing units.

In the riding of Calgary Southwest for example, from 1992 to October of this year, 5,600 households accessed home ownership through NHA insurance. Two thousand, two hundred and fifty of these households were first time buyers taking advantage of the lower down payment to become homeowners.

This year alone, more than 1,000 homeowner units were insured in Calgary Southwest under the NHA with over half, 538, being first time homebuyers. Obviously CMHC mortgage loan insurance is a huge success, a very popular vehicle for Canadians to gain access to home ownership.

Today we are presenting a bill to ensure that Canadians can continue to have access to home ownership, a bill that will ensure the continued operation of NHA mortgage loan insurance, a bill which is good news for all Canadians, a bill which this government would like to see passed.

Those members who oppose this bill should keep in mind the disservice they are doing to Canadians. Are Reform members aware that 63 per cent of the adult population living in rental accommodations plan on buying a home? Are they aware that 40 per cent of all residential mortgages finalized in 1994 were NHA insured?

Does that party know that 230,000 first time homebuyers would not have been able to purchase a home if not for the first home loan insurance initiative made possible by NHA mortgage loan insurance? Do they know that new construction to the end of October 1994 totals more than 24,000 units, including single detached homes, apartments, row houses and manufactured homes? Do they not realize the tremendous economic opportunities, especially the significant employment generation, resulting from all this activity, opportunities that would have been lost if not for NHA insurance?

As I have stated, the mortgage loan insurance has enjoyed overwhelming popularity over the years precisely because it is so crucial to helping Canadians enjoy the benefits of home ownership.

• (1020)

Opposing this bill means opposing the expectations of Canadians to become homeowners. Some might argue that the government should get out of the business of mortgage loan insurance and leave it to private industry. A little bit of thought on that subject would turn up some reasons why it is not a good idea to leave this important area to the private sector alone.

First, without CMHC providing mortgage insurance, Canadians would be at the mercy of a private sector monopoly. Higher prices and fewer choices would be the result. Housing would then be less affordable, especially for the first time home buyers.

Second, we know from past practices of private insurers that homeowners in all parts of the country would not have access to mortgage insurance. What would happen to the many Canadians living in communities which the private sector would refuse to serve?

Historically we know that private insurers have underserved rural areas. If NHA mortgage loan insurance were not available in rural communities, many rural Canadians would have to leave those areas in order to access home ownership because there would be areas which the private insurer would not want to serve, make no mistake about it. What would happen to the people living there? Quite simply, they would have very limited access to home ownership.

As long as CMHC is around to provide equal access to mortgage loan insurance, we do not have to travel that ugly road. With CMHC in the industry, Canadians have continued access to low cost financing. Canadians living in areas of the country that the private insurers will not or cannot serve are able to obtain housing financing at relatively equal terms and conditions.

It should be obvious to members that competition is the best way to keep prices at the lowest possible level to encourage innovation in the mortgage industry to meet the changing needs of Canadian housing finance consumers.

Millions of Canadians have benefited from NHA mortgage loan insurance in the past. Thousands continue to benefit each year. Members of the opposition should clearly understand and support this bill. I have to wonder why they are having such difficulty with this very simple issue.

The federal government has a constitutional responsibility for banking and finance. CMHC mortgage insurance and guarantee are a demonstration that the federal government is fulfilling this responsibility. Without CMHC there would be a federal policy vacuum in the system of housing finance. The result would be unequal access to home loans across the country. Furthermore, marginal borrowers could pay more for low down payment mortgages or have no access to financing altogether.

What is the motivation of those who question the crucial importance of NHA mortgage insurance? Surely it cannot be to save the federal government money. CMHC operates its mortgage insurance fund at no cost to the government. CMHC insurance is provided at no cost to the Canadian taxpayer. I repeat this. CMHC is required to achieve self–sufficiency strictly from the premiums and fees that it charges. CMHC is not part of the problem. In fact, it is part of the solution.

Members might be interested to learn that CMHC has returned to the Government of Canada over $1 billion since its incorporation in 1946. In addition, in 1992, $55 million was contributed to the government from the mortgage insurance fund.

We in Canada are fortunate to be one of the best housed nations in the world. There can be no doubt that NHA mortgage loan insurance has had a significant role to play in bringing us to that enviable state. If we are to maintain that high standard, CMHC must be able to continue providing NHA mortgage loan insurance so that Canadians will have relatively equal access to low cost mortgage financing today and in the future.

Yes, we are fortunate to have such a high standard of housing in the country. Over the years, with the leadership of CMHC in the housing sector, Canada has developed a broad range of housing expertise in the public and private sectors as well as in the academic community. We are willing to share that expertise with countries all over the world. Representatives from a variety of countries come to Canada to learn about our operations because they believe that we have not one of the best, but the best system of public mortgage loan insurance in the world and they want to learn about it.

• (1025)

I want to conclude by saying that CMHC involvement in the international arena is not limited to helping other countries develop mortgage insurance, it also shares and explores possibilities in many other areas. I ask all members to support Bill C–108, which will make it possible for all Canadians to have their greatest dream fulfilled: owning a home.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to confirm what I think I understood, so I would like to ask the following question. I believe this loan insurance is self–financing and self–sustaining and does not cost the government anything. I want to make sure that I have understood that correctly.

The other point which I would like the parliamentary secretary to mention once again is this. How will this help Canadians in terms of housing? I believe that needs to be repeated because I do not think it is sufficiently clear in the minds of people.

I would ask my colleague to clarify those two points.

Ms. Augustine: Mr. Speaker, those two questions cover the crux of Bill C–108.

It is important for everyone to understand that there is no cost to the government. Actually, a benefit is derived from that involvement.

It is also important to note that the United Nations has acclaimed Canada as the best country in the world in which to live. We must ensure that quality of life. What goes into that quality of life? Accessible, affordable, decent housing and home ownership. Therefore it is important for us to continue to have the necessary mortgages, loans and availability of funds. With the minimum down payment, individuals will have the opportunity to access housing and all of the things that come with having a roof over one's head and providing for one's family.

It is important that we as a government continue the financing and support the National Housing Act and the CMHC to ensure that we provide loans to families to access housing.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the insurance program. I understand that there are two programs: one is offered by CMHC and one is offered by a private organization.

The hon. member is adamant in telling us that there is no cost to the government. I am trying to understand why the government is involved.

I was talking the other day about the Small Business Loans Act, which again is money being channelled through bureaucrats at no cost to the government. I am trying to understand what benefits are being offered through this program if they are also being offered through the private sector.

• (1030)

If there is no cost to the government, why is the government involved in cycling the money through bureaucrats by charging people who buy houses to compensate the lenders who have mortgages that go into default? Why is the government even in the business? The private sector can do it just as well, just as efficiently, and under the rules there is no cost to the government. Why is the government even involved if there is no cost to the government and the private sector can do it better?

Ms. Augustine: Mr. Speaker, I thought I addressed in my statement as part of this debate why I think the private sector cannot do it better and also the constitutional responsibility for banking and finance, which responsibility rests with the federal government.

CMHC mortgage insurance and guarantee are a demonstration that we are fulfilling that responsibility. To leave it up to the private sector, we would have a patchwork. As I said earlier in my statement, there would be regions and areas of this country where the private sector would find it not viable to do business.

When we are looking at our country from coast to coast to coast, it is important for us to recognize that if we are looking for equality and access for all Canadians, no matter where they live, rural, urban, et cetera, we should provide the avenues and the support so that we do not leave this solely to the private sector, whose bottom line is always dollars.

Ms. Maria Minna (Beaches—Woodbine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt of the importance of the federal role in housing. It is not that long ago that modest income Canadians were able to buy a modest first home, but that is no longer the case. Finding a large chunk of money to put down is no longer possible.

I know there are still members on the opposite benches who have problems with this. I would like to know if the hon. member could give us the national benefits for the federal government investing in this area. It is important to look at not just regions or certain areas where there is accessibility to housing, but at the national interest as well, in terms of ensuring that modest income Canadians are able to buy modest homes for the first time in their lives, which gives them a sense of some form of stability. Would the hon. member do that for us?

Ms. Augustine: Mr. Speaker, I will focus on one aspect, and that is the provision for assistance given to social housing.

The federal government continues to provide $2 billion annually in social housing assistance to support the more than 661,000 existing units across this country. Over a million low income Canadians whose housing needs cannot be met through the private sector market benefit from this assistance. This housing assists some of the most disadvantaged members of our society, including seniors on fixed incomes, aboriginal people, persons with disabilities, families led by single parents, social assistance recipients, and the working poor. It is important to note that this support, which is also part of the debate here today, cannot solely be left to the private sector. CMHC activities contribute to that stable supply of affordable housing, which increases the economic benefits for all Canadians and provides our quality of life.

CMHC's research demonstration and information transfer activities improve housing and living conditions and make the housing market more efficient and competitive. New technology, housing technology, building science, and promoting good living environments all provide us with safe, healthy, and sustainable development. These are all part of the work of CMHC and the research that is being done in that area.

• (1035)

When we talk about support that is given to the whole issue of the CMHC mortgage insurance fund and the support it needs, it is important to note not only the quality of life but also the science and technology aspect, which provides employment for Canadians.

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to speak to Bill C–108, an act to amend the National Housing Act. This is a very brief bill, just four lines long, but the impact is significant.

I listened to my colleague's debate, and her argument is basically that CMHC is going to turn off the tap. That is not true. This bill is about raising CMHC's loan limit from its present $100 billion to $150 billion. We are not talking about limiting what is already there. The pot is huge, $100 billion. That is $100,000 million that CMHC has to deal with presently. This bill would raise it by another $50 billion.

We object to that because of the state of the country. This country is now $564 billion in debt. We cannot continue to carry on programs that are going to cost the government money. I object to my colleague's statement that this does not cost the country. It does indeed cost the country.

If we are going to address our debt, the first thing we must do when we are in a hole is stop digging. Right now this bill continues to dig the hole. We cannot increase our debt any more. The country is broke. Let me repeat that: we are broke. This bill is going to add more liability to the country. It does not stop anything. It does not stop the $100 billion that is already in the pot. It is an increase.

I would like to comment on the experiences of New Zealand. We were briefed on this bill by CMHC and I asked what is CMHC's ongoing liability, because it is into mortgages 5, 10, 15 and 20 years ahead. It does not know. Current accounting practices say that you only have to be five years ahead. That is the window. I find it incredible that a corporation dealing with this amount of money does not know its total liability.

New Zealand put in legislation which states that every year the government has to publish all liabilities of the government and all crown corporations. It was a real eye opener, because a number of areas like CMHC had to disclose exactly what their liability was. Right now CMHC is not doing that.

Another concern we have is that the government is sending mixed messages. It wants to decentralize. The Prime Minister has said that. We had a referendum in Quebec the other day that was about decentralization. Yet the bill goes in exactly the opposite direction. It enshrines more power into the federal government at a time when the federal government should be passing its powers down to the provinces.

Canadians want a smaller federal government. We are over-governed, overregulated. Business is telling us to get out of their faces and let business do what business does best, run their business. The best thing the government can do is get its house in order. This bill goes in exactly the opposite direction.

I offer to my colleagues across the way a 20–point plan to decentralize the federal government. In fact Preston Manning spoke at the Canadian Club last week and got a standing ovation from the business people who recognized that a number of points of duplication between the federal and provincial governments have to end. Environment, natural resources, culture, and housing should all be done at the provincial level.

• (1040)

Private enterprise is already into the mortgage business. CMHC is already into it to the tune of $100 billion. There is no need to increase it by another $50 billion. One hundred billion dollars is just fine, thank you very much. Let private enterprise do what it does best and deal with this issue.

My colleague was saying that this does not cost the government any money. Let me remind you about the downturn in the early eighties. We can all recall that people in the housing market in Toronto, Vancouver, and Winnipeg were walking into their banks, dropping the keys on the desk and saying: "Take it". Because of the downturn in the market, their mortgage was worth more than their house. If that happens, ladies and gentlemen, guess who is going to carry the can? The Canadian government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): With the greatest respect to ladies and gentlemen, I would remind members to address the Chair. Clearly I am of one gender and not the other. I think it is far safer for our debates to go through the Chair.

Mr. Gilmour: Mr. Speaker, my apologies. I shall certainly go through the Chair.

People will remember the number of people who walked away from their mortgages back in the eighties. The government, CMHC, had to pick up the tab. That is what will happen in this case if there is a market downturn.

To say that there is no cost to the government is completely wrong. There may not be today, but with the volatile interest rates and with the Quebec situation the money markets are very unstable. There is an excellent potential that this could end up hurting Canada, hurting the government, and costing us money.

Another point in the bill that concerns me is paragraph (b), which refers to "any additional amounts authorized by Parliament for the purposes of this section under an appropriation act or any other act of Parliament". This concerns me, because I am not sure whether additional funds would come back to this House or whether in fact we are talking order in council. That concerns me greatly. If it comes back to this House, that is fine. If it goes to cabinet, that is not fine. Then we are not sure what is going on behind closed doors.

I would like to conclude by saying that I do not believe this government is listening. We are broke. CMHC is already in to the tune of $100 billion. We object to putting Canadians further in debt. That is the reason Reform will oppose this bill.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with great interest to members of the Reform Party digressing on this bill. To date all of them have led Canadians who are listening to us to believe that this extra $50 billion in liability insurance would be added to the deficit and the national debt that exists already. This is absolutely false.

My question for the hon. member for Comox—Alberni is: In terms of numbers, how much is it going to cost the Government of Canada with this new mortgage insurance fund?

Mr. Gilmour: Mr. Speaker, the amount will depend on exactly how bad the downturn in the market is. When people walked away from their mortgages in the early eighties, the difference between the value of the house and the mortgage is what CMHC had to pick up.

I cannot give a number. It is going to depend entirely on how much interest rates go up and how many people walk away from their mortgages. It could be a very large number, in the billions of dollars.

• (1045)

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a previous statement was made by a member of the House. When we questioned the idea of turning this kind of enterprise over to the private sector, the reply was that it was not viable in some areas for the private sector to do it. That means if it is not viable then it must cost. Why would the private sector not do it if it does not cost?

Does the hon. member agree that if the private sector is saying in some areas it is not viable there is a cost that is recognized by that sector?

Mr. Gilmour: Mr. Speaker, of course there is a cost. CMHC has nearly 3,000 employees. They are not counting the cost of running the operation. A private insurance company does not have that cost. The cost to the Canadian people is clearly there.

I have difficulty with a member's comments earlier when she said there really was not any cost to the government. She said they were going into areas that were not viable. They cannot have both. It is either viable and we are making a profit, or if CMHC is going in there and it is not viable somebody is losing money. Guess who? It is the Canadian people.

Ms. Maria Minna (Beaches—Woodbine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member across has made a great to–do about what it costs the government but he has not told us what that is. Perhaps we should put some facts on the table.

Concerning the CMHC's mortgage insurance fund, the premiums charged by the corporation in addition to the value of the property assist in covering the liability. That is why the fund has been more than self–sustaining. It has thus far returned $55 million to the government. The fact of the matter is that it is self–sustaining. It has not cost us.

We should have figures on the table when accusatory statements are made.

Mr. Gilmour: Mr. Speaker, I guess any accountant can make figures talk and I can certainly talk to members opposite.

CMHC has been self–sustaining in the past few years. It was losing buckets of money until it got its house in order. If there is a downturn in interest rates it will cost us more buckets of money. Clearly they are talking out of both sides of their faces.

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member aware that approximately one–third of the housing stock in the country has been built with the assistance of National Housing Act insured financing? In other words, without this kind of financing, one–third of the houses with all the benefits and all the spinoff effects they had for the economy would not have been built.

Is the member for Comox—Alberni aware that 3,944 of his constituents have purchased homes using funds insured by CMHC since 1992? Is he aware that 917 of his constituents have purchased homes taking advantage of CMHC's first home loan insurance program since 1992?

Mr. Gilmour: Mr. Speaker, the member is absolutely correct. However the bill increases the numbers. We are saying the $100 billion already in the pot created the numbers the member just stated. They are absolutely correct.

We are opposed to increasing that amount by another $50 billion. We are not opposed to having the $100 billion or CMHC doing business as it is presently doing. We are opposed to increasing the liability limit.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, coming from downtown Toronto I have to stand to defend the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation vigorously. It represents in the greater Toronto area not just support for those in the home building industry. It also sends a signal of confidence to all other sectors of the economy, from the carpet makers to the makers of stoves, refrigerators and the various accoutrements that go into putting a home or an apartment together. Quite frankly those spinoffs have an effect on every region of the country.

• (1050)

When we calculate the contribution of Canada Mortgage and Housing we must not forget its contribution to all spinoffs in the economy.

Mr. Gilmour: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his comment. It is agreed that CMHC is a benefit to the economy, absolutely. We do not dispute that. The difficulty we have is upping the ante.

We recognize where CMHC has been and will continue to be. To this point in time it is fine. The country is broke. Right now we cannot see increasing the ante by $50 billion. We think it inappropriate at this point in time.

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues know, the purpose of the bill is to increase the ceiling for mortgage loan insurance under the National Housing Act. This will enable Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to continue underwriting home mortgage loan insurance within the legislative limit.

The bill is an administrative bill. Bill C–108 will increase the existing limit on outstanding loan insurance from the current $100 billion to $150 billion. The bill also includes a provision to increase the ceiling further through appropriation in the future.

Members of the House should know that CMHC loan insurance is self–financing and self–sustaining and does not cost the government anything. Moreover, it has great benefits for the country.

The mortgage insurance fund is regularly evaluated according to rigorous insurance principles. It is fully adequate to cover all insured losses as well as all overhead.

[Translation]

The amendments in this bill deal with administrative matters, but they must be adopted to allow the CMHC to continue to provide mortgage insurance. Allow me to explain briefly how important this bill is for Canadians.

[English]

The desire to own a home remains strong among Canadians. Yet many people who can afford the monthly mortgage payments are still unable to access home ownership because they are finding it difficult to save for a down payment for conventional loans.

[Translation]

Because the CMHC assumes the risks if borrowers fail to meet their obligations, approved mortgage lenders can loan money to more Canadians. By reducing the down payment required to buy a house, the loan insurance program allows more middle income households to have access to home ownership. This is an essential element of the system to ensure that all Canadians, wherever they live, can have the same access to the mortgage loans they need to buy adequate and affordable housing.

[English]

Let me give an idea of the extent to which Canadians depend on mortgage loan insurance to fulfil their dream of owning a home. My colleagues may be interested to learn that this means approximately 40 per cent of the residential mortgage stock in Canada involved financing by CMHC mortgage insurance last year.

Without mortgage loan insurance Canadians who do not have a 25 per cent down payment would generally never have access to home ownership.

[Translation]

The CMHC mortgage loan insurance has already proven flexible enough to allow for innovative housing financing. This is an essential feature given the constant evolution of borrowers' needs and of the markets meeting these needs.

• (1055)

In 1987, the program was modified to insure junior mortgage loans, an innovation especially helpful to those needing additional funds for renovations.

[English]

In the following year the chattel loan insurance program was introduced as a five–year experiment to cover loans made on mobile homes and to help people who choose this kind of affordable home ownership. The coverage for mobile homes has now been made a regular part of the mortgage insurance program as per the announcement made by the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation at the beginning of this year.

In 1992 the mortgage insurance program was expanded to accommodate a reduced down payment for first time home buyers, making home ownership even more accessible to moderate income households. This program, called the first home loan insurance program, has provided Canadians with their entry point to home ownership. Again I reiterate to my hon. colleagues that the success of the initiative has been achieved without cost to the government.

[Translation]

We want to ensure that the CMHC can continue to provide this assistance to the housing market. This is the intent of the bill before us today. The CMHC is constantly reviewing and making regular changes to the mortgage loan program in order to make it more effective and convenient for both approved lenders and home buyers.

[English]

By exploring new housing finance options for Canadians, we are looking to promote greater choices, lower the cost, increase accessibility of housing finance and assist borrowers to meet their financing needs within their own resources.

[Translation]

The CMHC will continue to encourage innovation and creativity in residential financing through the mortgage insurance fund, in order to improve access to home ownership for all Canadians.

The private housing market is now in a position to meet the needs of the vast majority of Canadian households. There is no question that the CMHC mortgage loan insurance played a crucial role in this achievement. The CMHC mortgage loan insurance program had a record year in 1994 in terms of volume. Several unexpected factors led to a significant increase in activity last year. Mortgage interest rates fell to their lowest level in 30 years, a level that was much lower than expected. The low inflation rate kept house prices stable and affordable. In addition, the rapid, consistent success of incentive policies, including the loan insurance program for home buyers and the home buyers' plan, helped generate a record level of insurance activity last year.

[English]

When the Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada stopped underwriting new mortgage insurance business in April 1993, CMHC had to assume 100 per cent of residential mortgage insurance activity. Furthermore a greater proportion of all mortgages has been insured by CMHC in recent years. In 1994, CMHC insured 40 per cent of all residential mortgages initiated, up from 22 per cent in 1991.

Because there is some lag time between insuring loans and receiving the reports from approved lenders, it was only in 1995 that the figures for 1994 were all compiled. At that time it was realized that the $100 billion maximum aggregate loan insurance currently stipulated in the NHA had been exceeded. For this reason, provisions of the bill are effective starting in 1994.

• (1100)

I hope members will see fit to give swift passage to Bill C–108 so that CMHC can continue to promote access to home ownership through mortgage loan insurance.

[Translation]

Through its mortgage loan insurance program, CMHC continues to make housing more accessible for Canadians. The corporation is also working to improve housing affordability. Through CMHC, the federal government is committed to a stable supply of affordable and accessible housing that increases economic opportunities for all Canadians.

CMHC's market housing programs promote affordable housing and equal access to financing through financial instruments such as mortgage loan insurance.

[English]

Moreover, CMHC provides mortgage insurance to all Canadians, regardless of where they live, at the smallest feasible down payment and the lowest cost.

To improve access to an affordable form of housing, CMHC also provides mortgage insurance for manufactured houses and mobile homes. In January of this year the Hon. David Dingwall announced an expanded chattel loan insurance program, CLIP, that includes a resale of manufactured housing units.

CMHC is also contributing to making housing more affordable through better housing regulations. The affordability and choice today program funded by CMHC encourages regulatory innovation in municipalities across Canada. The ACT program encourages the housing industry and municipalities to work in partnership to improve housing affordability and choice.

More than 80 ACT projects are developing a wide range of practical approaches to streamlining approval processes, developing new forms of affordable housing, facilitating in–fill and conversion and adopting alternative development and building standards.

As I have said, Bill C–108 is an administrative bill. As my colleagues know, the bill is important in ensuring CMHC can continue to offer mortgage loan insurance to Canadians.

[Translation]

I would like to take a few minutes to talk about a complementary initiative, first home loan insurance, introduced by CMHC in February 1992, to make home ownership even more accessible.

Earlier this year, the hon. David Dingwall announced that the maximum eligible house prices—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): When referring to another member in the Chamber we basically have two options, either by riding or by portfolio. I know sometimes there can be omissions but the same name has come up more than once already. Therefore I simply remind the hon. member for Halifax West.

Mr. Regan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for that reminder. I apologize for the error.

[Translation]

Earlier this year, the Minister of Public Works announced that the maximum eligible house prices for first home loan insurance were increased in 30 communities across the country. This initiative allows more first time homebuyers to purchase a home with a down payment of as little as five per cent. Anyone who buys or builds a home in Canada as their principal residence is eligible for the lower down payment, as long as they have not owned a home at any time during the last five years.

[English]

First home loan insurance was initially in effect for a two–year period but was extended for an additional five years until 1999. The 5 per cent down initiative has been a major success in helping to increase home ownership in Canada. That speaks to the importance of the bill.

• (1105)

The statistics also speak for themselves. Since November 1993 over 210,000 Canadian households have taken advantage of the lower down payment to become the proud owners of either a new or existing home. In April 1994 a survey of Canadians who bought a home with less than 10 per cent down showed that 72 per cent of them would not have been able to purchase their home when they did without the reduced down payment. That says a lot.

The first home loan insurance initiative is constantly being monitored to ensure it continues to meet the needs of Canadians. CMHC is committed to helping Canadians who desire to own a home and who have the proven financial management capability to do so. First home loan insurance is an excellent example of CMHC's ability to adapt its mortgage loan insurance activity to ensure Canadians can enjoy the benefits of home ownership.

As I have stated, Bill C–108 is an administrative bill to facilitate the continuation of mortgage loan insurance under the National Housing Act. CMHC's mortgage loan insurance, which provides relatively equal access to Canadians throughout the country, is important to achieving that goal. This is one of the major factors which distinguishes CMHC's operation from private mortgage loan insurance operations.

Without CMHC's commitment to providing mortgage loan insurance in the small communities of the country, places that private insurers have not traditionally wanted to serve, many Canadians might not be able to buy a home.

[Translation]

Our government knows just how much Canadians value home ownership. It represents a major portion of the wealth accumulated by households. For some, it is a source of retirement income. It is also an important component of quality of life. We believe that every Canadian should have access to home ownership. CMHC mortgage loan insurance can turn the dream of owning a home into a reality. It is therefore critical that CMHC be able to continue to provide mortgage loan insurance to Canadians now and in the future.

[English]

That is why I support Bill C–108 and why I hope my colleagues will see fit to give swift passage to this administrative bill so that CMHC can continue to help Canadians realize their dreams of owning a home.

The concept of home speaks to our basic human needs. Home is a place where people feel secure. Owning a home gives people a stake in their communities and a sense of belonging. Home ownership is a concept the people of Canada support. It is therefore essential that CMHC be able to continue to provide mortgage loan insurance to Canadians today and in the future.

The corporation's mortgage loan insurance has traditionally demonstrated the flexibility to respond to varying needs and must be maintained as a public policy instrument capable of evolving to meet the future housing needs of Canadians.

With an eye on these future needs, CMHC is currently working to develop a variety of new housing finance instruments made possible by innovative uses of mortgage loan insurance. In developing new products CMHC is looking to challenge the creativity of the financial community to ensure the largest possible number of borrowers can find a product in their marketplace to meet their precise needs. A variety of choices will encourage lenders to compete on the basis of services and product differentiation.

The financial environment in which CMHC's mortgage loan insurance business operates has undergone significant change in recent years. The introduction of one stop financial services, the increased use of technological systems to support business operations, and the need to manage expenditures and facilitate better risk management are all factors which have had an impact on the way CMHC runs its mortgage insurance operations.

CMHC is now focusing on introducing new processing mechanisms which will utilize the capabilities of electronic communications between CMHC and approved lender clients. These enhancements will allow the corporation to better serve the needs of Canadian housing consumers. In light of all these good arguments, I urge passage of the bill.

• (1110)

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the member said if the bill is turned down, CMHC will not be able to continue to operate. That is simply not true.

CMHC will still have the hundred billion dollars it has had for years to operate. This bill is about increasing that limit. It is not about whether CMHC operates or not. I believe there is an attempt by members on the other side to make it appear that if this bill fails, all mortgages across Canada will collapse. That is not true.

In the event of a collapse in the market, as in the early eighties, and if CMHC will not cost Canadians any money, in the event of a downturn, who picks up the tab on these defaulted mortgages?

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, the first question is what will it mean to Canadians if the mortgage insurance fund is capped at $100 billion. That is the point. We have a delay in the time between when mortgages are approved by local lenders and when we get the full figures for a year. We need to have it retroactive to 1994 to cover the fact that in that year there were more than $100 million worth of loans insured. That would be a huge problem for CMHC.

The other important point is what it would mean to Canadians if it were capped at that level. CMHC's ability to assist Canadians to access home ownership would be curtailed dramatically. It would mean that the 3,944 Canadians in the riding of the member for Comox—Alberni would be the last to achieve home ownership through these means. It also would mean that rural Canadians would be faced with even more obstacles when planning to purchase a home.

We can look at all the negatives and talk about the collapse of the economy. We would be in all kinds of problems if we had a huge collapse of the economy in any event. We have to look at the important role CMHC plays in building our country, in building home ownership, in building our housing stock and in helping the economy. If we can expand the amount of home ownership insurance CMHC can provide, we can expand the amount of housing activity.

I do not know about the member's riding but in my riding and in my region of Atlantic Canada, and I think across most of Canada, there is a need for increased activity in the housing sector. There are real problems in that sector. People need to have a shot in the arm. This will help not only that whole sector, which will boost the economy, but it will help people who want to own their own homes.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister indicated that not only would this legislation not cost the government any money, that is, increasing the ceiling on the mortgage insurance, but that there is a return to the government. That is important.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister also indicated that this kind of initiative permits the enhancement to the quality of life for Canadians because it ensures that additional housing is available, thereby creating jobs. We all know that appropriate lodging is a basic fundamental plank in the quality of life for not only Canadians but people throughout the world.

I find that rather interesting and it is important that we look at that very carefully and embrace that kind of concept, an initiative which will ensure that the quality of life for Canadians is enhanced through pieces of legislation such as this one.

• (1115)

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with the hon. parliamentary secretary that this program permits us to enhance the quality of life of Canadians.

If we want to recognize what the quality of life means in terms of housing all we have to do is leave our country and go to many other countries in the world. In June I had the opportunity to visit Haiti as an election observer with the OAS. I certainly got a real appreciation of how fortunate we are to have the kind of housing we have and what it really means to quality of life when I saw the kind of housing that exists in Haiti.

Haiti is the poorest country in this hemisphere. It is not by any means the only country in the world with a lower standard of housing than we have. In fact, the vast majority of the world's inhabitants do not have the quality of life and quality of housing that we enjoy. Some do not even come close.

It is very important to recognize that this measure of expanding the loan insurance of CMHC is critical to the quality of life of Canadians. It is important for the housing industry in terms of job creation.

When I was in Haiti I saw houses that had dirt floors. Imagine the problems with disease and insects. There were houses that did not have facilities which we consider proper in Canada such as indoor plumbing. We are very fortunate to have the ability to expand a program like CMHC which will add benefits to Canadians and to an important resource such as our housing stock.

When I visited Haiti I was struck by the many problems of extended families living in a house which would be the size of a small room in a normal Canadian house and how that affected their quality of life. It was really a shock. We often hear about people facing cultural shock when they visit foreign countries. Well, I certainly experienced it. When I came back to Canada it made me much more aware of how fortunate we are to live in this great country and to have the opportunity to live in good quality homes.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am amazed at how the member can avoid the question we are asking. The member went through all this rhetoric, made all these comparisons between Canada and Haiti as if the Liberals somehow can take credit for the standard of living that we enjoy.

We have posed a question, which I will pose again to the member. Who is left with the tab? Who is going to be on the hook for $150 billion if the economy turns down? If we go into hard times, who is going to be responsible for the billions of dollars in defaulted payments if this goes on?

The member has avoided that question. He has to answer the question before the debate can conclude.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, it concerns me that members opposite have so little confidence in the economy of Canada. However, they should be aware that the mortgage fund insurance is actuarially sound. It returns money each year to the government which helps provide for any problems which may occur in the process. There are funds provided each year for non–repayment of loans.

If the situation arose where Canadians defaulted on $150 billion in mortgages, imagine what would happen to the banks across the country. It is somewhat like saying, why should we have banks because they may fail if people do not repay their loans. How can we trust putting our money in the banks because if people do not repay their mortgages, they will all fail? That is true also. We have to operate on certain assumptions that we will have good growth and an economy that works.

I am sure the hon. member will listen to my answer. We cannot assume the whole economy of the country is going to collapse tomorrow. We have to operate on cautious and reasonable assumptions. We have to take precautions. We are taking precautions with this bill. It is actuarially sound. It provides funds for failures and it is in good shape.

• (1120)

More important, it is interesting to me that the members opposite want to look at all the possible problems while ignoring the benefits of this very important program.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am really pleased to have the opportunity to speak in support of Bill C–108, an act to amend the National Housing Act. I am pleased for two reasons, one because it is timely.

Yesterday in my riding, I went to a conference of the BCNPHA which is a group of diverse peoples. They are people who are disabled, who have low incomes, who have moderate incomes. They have come together to talk about ways in which they could afford housing in Vancouver which is a city in which housing has gone off the map. Some of these people can never hope of owning a home. Because of this legislation there is hope for those people.

The second reason is that as a physician, I know that housing is a key component of the social structure that enables Canadians to have a positive health status, not only for the physical reason that housing is important to the health status of people but also because of the psychological and sociological reasons. It enables people to have hope, to have a stake in the future and to be able to say that they are contributing to the economy.

As everyone has said before, this is an administrative bill, the purpose of which is to increase the ceiling on CMHC mortgage loan insurance from the current $100 billion to $150 billion.

Members of the House should know that CMHC loan insurance is self–financing and self–sustaining. I speak those words slowly and to stress them so that they can actually be heard. It does not cost the government anything.

Not only is it a sound and healthy fund, but CMHC's mortgage loan insurance has played and continues to play a role in helping Canadians to access home ownership. Home ownership, members have heard said here this morning, is a cherished dream held not only by Canadians but by all peoples. There are good reasons for this.

Home equity is a major portion of the wealth that is accumulated by households as well as being a source of retirement savings. The concept of home speaks to our basic human needs. Home speaks to security. Home speaks to health. Owning a home gives people a stake in the community and a sense of belonging. Home ownership is a concept the people of Canada support. It is therefore critical that CMHC be able to continue to provide mortgage loan insurance to Canadians today and in the future.

It sounds as if there is a certain amount of repetition in some of these speeches. The repetition is so that the message can be put clearly both to the people of Canada and maybe to some of the members of the third party across the way. Since November 1993, 210,000 low income Canadians who did not have the down payment were able to own their own homes because of this program.

One of the most important aspects of CMHC's mortgage loan insurance is that it provides relatively equal access to mortgage financing at the lowest possible cost for all Canadians. This is what we heard from those 210,000 people who since November 1993, regardless of where in Canada they live, bought homes. It speaks to the national context of this bill.

Surpluses that are generated from lower risk businesses are used to fund shortfalls on the higher risk businesses. That is a basic economic equation that I am sure most people who know business, who have taken risk on business and who have had businesses in the past, and I am sure many members of the third party across the floor know that, that lower risk businesses are used to fund shortfalls of higher risk businesses.

That is a principle of any insurance program. Without access to CMHC's mortgage loan insurance, Canadians in some parts of the country would have to provide the conventional 25 per cent of the value of a house as the down payment that the private sector charges. Needless to say, many Canadians would find it difficult to purchase a home if this were the case.

CMHC's mortgage insurance is therefore critical to helping Canadians access home ownership. It has long been recognized that the housing needs of Canadians have been financed and supported by CMHC over the years, not only for one group of people, but for various income sectors and for diverse groups of people.

The corporation's mortgage loan insurance has traditionally demonstrated the flexibility to respond to varying needs. In other words, there is a performance level we can mark here. I would like to take this opportunity to inform the House about one such example that has helped hundreds of Canadians realize an affordable home ownership dream and that is the manufactured housing or mobile home industry. It has contributed greatly to giving Canadians access to good quality affordable housing, not to mention the fact that it helps jump start the economy in terms of the manufacture of mobile homes.

CMHC has been working in partnership with the manufactured housing industry for many years because of its importance to the housing sector and to the economy of Canada as a whole.

Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation introduced its chattel loan insurance program which some members have mentioned. Known as CLIP, it was a five–year experiment that began in 1988. The two objectives of the CLIP program were first, to improve access to alternative forms of affordable housing without involving government expenditure and second, to help place manufactured homes in a more competitive position with conventionally built homes.

CMHC completed an evaluation of the CLIP program last year. This is another component when we talk about whether something is working or whether we are taking a risk. We not only look at performance but we also go back and evaluate the performance in a quantitative way. The evaluation confirmed that the program is an important instrument in increasing access to good quality affordable housing without involving government expenditure.

The evaluation also confirmed that CLIP has a positive impact on the manufactured housing industry. There is another issue. Jobs are being created not only in the manufactured housing industry but in mobile home park development, so economic development results as well.

Following the results of the evaluation, the minister responsible for CMHC was pleased to announce an expansion of the CLIP program. As a result, it now includes both new and resale mobile manufactured homes.

CLIP is an affordable alternative for many of the approximately 335,000 moderate income rental households that could not previously afford to purchase a mobile home. CMHC and the manufactured housing industry have enjoyed a productive partnership for many years. They have been working together to help Canadians gain access to good quality affordable housing and to enhance the viability of the whole industry.

The enhancements to the CLIP program are leading to greater access to mobile homes and an affordable option for Canadians. I want to stress again, and it may sound repetitive, but this not only gives moderate income and low income Canadians access to homes, but it jump starts the economy. It continues the economy and jobs, the flow of capital. All of that goes on, which is what makes this country move ahead.

This is only one example of how NHA mortgage insurance has met a specific need. It explains why NHA mortgage insurance must be maintained as a public policy instrument that is capable of being flexible and evolving. We have seen how the CLIP program has evolved to meet the future needs of Canadians.

With an eye on these future needs, CMHC is currently working to develop a variety of new housing finance instruments made possible by innovative uses of mortgage loan insurance. I want to talk about that flexibility, creativity and innovation, where CMHC not only sets up policy but it sets a policy after it has talked to the consumer, after it has talked and worked with the private sector to bring about innovative ways of creating housing.

In developing new products, CMHC is looking to challenge the creativity of the financial community and to ensure that the largest possible number of borrowers can find a product in the marketplace to meet their precise needs. That is flexibility and that is innovation. A variety of choices will encourage lenders to compete on the basis of service and product differentiation.

The financial environment in which CMHC's mortgage loan insurance business operates has undergone significant changes in recent years. For instance, the introduction of one stop financial services, the need to manage expenditures and the need for better risk management are all factors which have an impact on the way in which CMHC runs its mortgage insurance operations. It also speaks of the ability to be accountable. Change and making sure factors like managing and assessing risk are important components in any business venture.

CMHC has responded to the changing environment by continually reviewing its processes for delivering mortgage insurance and introducing efficiencies. Ensuring CMHC's loan insurance is viable is extremely important.

CMHC is now focusing on the use of electronic communications between itself and approved lender clients. These enhancements will allow the corporation to serve the needs of Canadian housing consumers even more effectively. Mortgage loan insurance has played a significant public policy role in the past and with CMHC stewardship, it will continue to evolve to meet the changing needs of Canadians and the financial community.

I underline at this time for members of the House that not only is the CMHC mortgage loan insurance a self–financing operation that involves no federal subsidies, CMHC has also returned to the Government of Canada over $1 billion since its incorporation. In addition, in the year 1992, CMHC returned $55 million to the Canadian taxpayer directly from the mortgage insurance fund. CMHC does not only provide access for various and diverse groups of housing. It also provides jobs, stimulates the economy and puts money into the treasury.

I will address some of the questions that surfaced with my hon. colleagues in debate last Friday respecting CMHC, namely questions concerning the federal government's role in public housing. I remind hon. members that notwithstanding severe financial constraints, the government is continuing its expenditures to help society's most vulnerable citizens.

The federal government is very much concerned with the shelter needs of low income Canadians. The federal government is making considerable ongoing social housing expenditures of about $2 billion a year to support more than 661,000 needy households, notwithstanding the need for considerable fiscal restraint and the need for deficit reduction.

The commitment of resources by the federal government is indicative of the government's concern for the plight of society's most vulnerable members: seniors on fixed income, aboriginal people, persons with disabilities, single parent families, social assistance recipients and the working poor. These people also need to have some investment in Canada, some piece of equity, some dignity.

The 1995 federal budget struck a balance of the dual objectives of reducing the size of the federal deficit, thereby contributing to economic growth, and at the same time making social housing programs more fiscally sustainable over the long term.

In its first budget in 1994 the government announced that it would reinstate RRAP, the residential rehabilitation assistance program, for two years. The program assists in the upgrading of substandard housing. We are taking existing housing stock which is recyclable and using a $100 million commitment which also fulfils a red book promise. We are taking housing stock and putting money into fixing it and making it reusable.

The government has also provided for new rental and rooming house components of RRAP, $16 million for 1994–95 to repair approximately 2,500 rental and rooming house units. These programs are being delivered in 1995. I must say that in my riding there are rooming houses for some of the very poor that I would not want a dog or a rat to live in, although many rats already live there.

New commitments under the on reserve housing programs have continued. As well the federal action on family violence has been extended to March 31, 1996. Some $4 million is being provided to help address the shelter needs of women and children who are victims of family violence. This again is what we talk about when we talk about health and justice. Women and children who are the victims of family violence and various forms of abuse need a safe place to live.

Therefore CMHC is not only engaged in access to housing, jobs and the economy. It is also responding to a social need.

We will continue to work with all levels of government, the private sector and community groups in a co–operative partnership. Partnership is one of the things the government said it would embark on, and we are doing it.

One way we are accomplishing it is through the CMHC's Canadian Centre for Public–Private Partnerships in Housing. The partnership centre was established in 1991. Its objective is to bridge the public and private sectors to facilitate the production of cost effective and accessible housing for low to moderate income households, including those with special needs.

We say that government cannot do everything for everyone so we are asking how the government can work with and help the private sector to move along and do the things we want done. Also there are essential ventures into new areas through such means as innovative financing and tenure arrangements. Much of the centre's activities are accomplished at the grassroots level with a view to encouraging a wide variety of people active in their community to become involved in newly created housing partnerships.

The partnership centre identifies opportunities and brings together potential partners to develop and implement the partnerships. It acts as a source of advice by offering an advisory service to potential partners to identify the key legal, financial and regulatory issues that need to be considered in structuring a private–public deal. Since its inception the centre has ventured into innovative tenure arrangements such as occupancy rights, life leases, equity co–ops and home ownership equity partnership programs. At the end of June this year, the centre had facilitated the realization of 79 projects totalling in excess of 4,200 housing units.

I will take a minute to outline a few innovative projects that have been made possible by the new public–private partnership. In my riding of Vancouver the Kitsilano Equity Housing Co–operative offers affordable housing for families. Equity co–operatives are ongoing housing co–ops financed partly from the investment of its own members. Traditionally aimed at seniors it is now branching out to help many other Canadians.

The project demonstrates that it is possible to provide families with affordable housing options in a market where starter homes are very expensive. This type of project is being made possible thanks to this partnership. Clearly the partnership centre is working. It was an experiment and we have seen that it is working very well.

Some may ask, especially members of the third party, why the government is involved with mortgage insurance when the private industry is offering the same product. The straightforward answer is choice. CMHC gives Canadians a choice of mortgage loan insurance. Without CMHC, Canadians would only be served by a private sector monopoly that can do what it wants with rates and down payments. The risks of the monopoly are higher prices and fewer choices, making housing less affordable particularly for first time buyers. The federal government has a constitutional responsibility for banking and for finance. CMHC's mortgage insurance guarantees and demonstrates that the federal government is fulfilling its role.

I have heard members talk about the risk involved. When looking at the risk in any business we look at marketplace needs. Some 74 per cent of Canadians have said they would like to use the program. We then look at past performances and we see that $1 billion was given back since its inception and $55 million last year. This tells us that it is a good business risk.

I am pleased with CMHC's efforts in my community. I have spoken of the Kitsilano project. There are some Kitsilano senior projects. There are projects for single senior women who live alone. There are projects in British Columbia that are helping Canadians to be able to get a foothold and become contributing members of society.

In 1994, CMHC's loan insurance helped to house over 300,000 Canadian families at no cost to the federal government. This is because mortgage insurance is self–financing. Most lenders cannot provide a mortgage above 75 per cent. The program helps people to own homes. The approved lender is able to charge the borrower the lowest possible rate of interest. With these insurance provisions Canadians will have access to home ownership, to major renovations and to rental units.

• (1140)

It not only does that. It creates an opportunity. In the red book we talked about creating opportunity. This is creating opportunity for Canadians. It levels the playing field. It gives them a piece of the Canadian dream. It gives them an economic stake in the country and an opportunity to become contributing citizens. It is not just a simple act; it is a broad, social and economic move.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the government brings a bill before the House to increase loan liability not by $50,000 or $50 million but by $50 billion. Yet it gets insulted and attacks the opposition party for questioning what is in the bill.

The government is suggesting that Reformers do not like affordable housing. That is a shallow argument. Our job is to ask why the government is increasing the liability by $50 billion. The government had better get used to it, because we will continue to ask these kinds of questions. It is about time somebody did. The government has been in place for two years and has overspent by $80 billion. It is about time somebody asked questions.

Every speaker talked about the minister of public works as though he came up with an innovative bill to help the country. Part of that was a PR exercise for a minister who has been in trouble for the last two years. Now that a cabinet shuffle is on the way, they are trying to make him look good. That is what this is about.

The previous speaker said that it would not cost the government anything. In the recession of 1980 when the Liberal government was in power, were any liabilities charged against the loss on defaulted loans? How much contingent liability is recorded on the books of the country for the current $100 billion and the next $150 billion when the $50 billion is added?

Ms. Fry: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to answer that question. The very asking of the question, which seems to be the one repetitive question the Reform Party asks in spite of the answers being given, tells me that members of the third party are really not in touch with the people of Canada. They do not understand a single thing about the needs of the people.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Answer the question.

Ms. Fry: If the hon. member will allow me to do so, I will. I would like to answer the question.

Reform members are not in touch with the people of Canada. Seventy–four per cent of Canadians say that the program is important because it assists them in buying homes. We are not talking about an elite group which thinks that only people with a lot of money should be able to own houses.

To return to the issue, I mentioned in my speech, and I will repeat it, that any insurance program and any insurance company base whatever they do on an actuarial risk basis. This has been shown on a routine, standard, normal actuarial risk basis to be sound. This is not only because of the need in the community for it, but over the years since its inception the program has returned $1 billion to the coffers of the treasury. Just last year alone it returned $55 million to the coffers.

• (1145)

I do not know if I have to speak loudly or clearly or what I have to do to get those facts on the table. Maybe repetition is the only way to go.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the member.

Insurance exists in the private sector. Insurance is there whenever there is the need to protect against some sort of hazard. One of the hazards is that occasionally mortgages will be defaulted.

It is the belief of Liberal governments that the private sector will provide inadequate coverage for such risks, so the government has to step in. If the insurance that is being provided is profitable then there is no need for the government to step in, because the private sector would do it.

It is not reasonable at the same time to say it will not cost anything, that it is only something we are facilitating in the economy and it does not cost anything. If it does not cost anything, why is the government doing it? Everyone knows that whenever such activities get privatized efficiency goes up and consumers are more satisfied. So why is the government in there? It is because it is subsidizing an activity.

The question then becomes: Why subsidize housing? Why not subsidize food, cars? Why not subsidize clothing? There are all kinds of things that are essential for human life. We are running out of finances in this country. We are going bankrupt.

What do we do as we are going bankrupt? We take over a function the private sector could provide, but of course it is not doing it adequately. It is not giving enough subsidy. So here we are creating a program that gives more subsidy to an activity that some believe is no more worthy and no less worthy than any other of the kinds of things we consume in Canada.

Is there a prima facie case for the fact that this activity of the organization that is having its liabilities raised by $50 billion is one that requires a subsidy in the form of contingent liability? Could the member please explain to us, since she has studied the subject, how big the contingent liability is that Canadians see when they look at the annual budget?

Ms. Fry: Mr. Speaker, I thought I answered that question before. Perhaps I will have to try a different way of getting my message across.

I want to quickly say that in the riding of the member who asked me the first question, 5,580 constituents have purchased homes using CMHC funds. Since 1992, 1,663 constituents have purchased houses. In the riding of the member who asked me the last question, since 1992 some 1,525 constituents have purchased homes. Since 1992, 254 have purchased homes by taking advantage of the first home loan insurance program. We have here a party that professes to represent its constituents. I hope the party is representing its constituents here.

I want to deal with the issue of default on mortgages. The premiums and the fees are actually what allow CMHC in this program to continue to subsidize to get this program to work on a basis where it brings money back into the system. There is a low risk component to this insurance program. The low risk component, as is always done in insurance programs, subsidizes the high risks so that they balance out. That is the basis on which most insurance programs work.

• (1150)

Mr. Bélair: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I see that the hon. member has already asked a question of the parliamentary secretary and this is not allowable.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): So what?

Mr. Bélair: There are rules. Just in case you do not know it, there are rules here.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): So your person should ask the question? This is the opposition asking the question.

Mr. Thompson: We do not need any more of your guff.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): While this other discussion is taking place, the clock is running.

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak in the House today in support of Bill C–108, an act to amend the National Housing Act.

As my colleagues well know, CMHC has an important role to play in helping Canadians gain access to ownership. While listening to the debate and the questions, I am wondering what is at issue here, whether we are discussing the essence of contingent liability, as opposite members referred to it, or whether it is the issue of whether they agree with giving access to housing to moderate income Canadians. Is that the real issue? Is it the issue of subsidization they are interested in weasel wording about, or is it that they want to carry on with their right wing agenda and do not want to give anything to middle income and poor Canadians? Is that the real debate? That is the question we should ask members.

In terms of subsidies, a clothing subsidy was mentioned. Well, they have a clothing subsidy, a subsidy for the suits for their leader. That is interesting.

Mr. Thompson: Your pension would make house payments too.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: I earned it, thank you. I forfeited one pension and I am not ashamed to accept my pension.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Another shallow argument.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: What is really shallow here is the debate coming from the other side.

I want to focus on the issue of CMHC's mortgage loan insurance and its mandate to provide equal access to Canadians throughout the country. It is important to achieve that goal.

As an aside, there is a shortage of housing across the country. Some 11,000 units are needed. In my riding I believe 3,400 units are needed. There is overcrowding, health problems, young people in overcrowded situations where it makes learning and living difficult. The safety and security of the person is at risk here. That escapes the rhetoric coming from the opposite side.

I should also say that there is absolutely nothing wrong with having Canadians gain access to housing. That is a real source of empowerment. It is a way to give integrity to the family, to the individual, and a way for people to build a life in this country, to build security and stability. Homeowners across the country throughout many decades have said that the main source of empowerment is to own a home and build from that home for their children.

The party opposite says it is family oriented. What is more family oriented than owning a home? Reform members talk about the value. They call it a shallow argument that home ownership is related to family values. Let us think on that one. The weasel wording of that one sad opposition member is very shallow and indeed is misdirected. People are very well aware of that.

CMHC has the unique role of ensuring equal access for Canadians throughout the country. It is a major factor that distinguishes CMHC's operation from private mortgage loan insurance operations.

CMHC'S commitment is to provide mortgage loan insurance in the small communities of the country, the places private insurers do not traditionally want to serve, such as my riding. In many parts of my riding, which is very isolated, and in rural parts of the country we do not have access to the banking system. We are right off the financial institutional grid.

• (1155)

Those people are not eligible to get mortgages. Even if they had a high income, a moderate income, or double income, they are not eligible to get into home ownership in terms of the financial institutions. They are not served in that way. That is a fact. In places private insurers have not traditionally wanted to serve or have not been able to serve, many Canadians might not be able to buy a home.

Let me illustrate how important CMHC mortgage loan insurance is to Canadians in small communities. Take CMHC's loan insurance activity in the municipality of Brooks, Alberta, with a population of 10,000. In 1994, 137 households were able to access home ownership thanks to CMHC's mortgage loan insurance. Take for instance the importance to the Northwest Territories, where I come from, in terms of home ownership. I guess it is very difficult, but looking at the statistics in the Northwest Territories, 660 loans were let out and were insured to $110 million. These are for people who want to own their homes.

Under the Northwest Territories Housing Corporation assistance program, in August 1995 CMHC accepted as equity grants provided under the NWT's down payment assistance program. This helped families who could afford the ongoing operating and maintenance cost of home ownership and purchasing their own homes. Since its introduction, 24 families have purchased their own homes. It is very significant for our population of 72,000 people to have loans that were given to that many people so they would be able to move into their own homes.

In fact there is one other special need you could look at: the underwriting on federal lands reserved for Indians. This is an issue that should really get the opposite members hot under the collar. Anything for Indians would be almost not spoken of or forbidden.

Mr. Thompson: Oh, come off it. Give your head a shake.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: In October 1995, CMHC provided mortgage loan insurance—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. There is no doubt that any debate can raise some very strong views and strong emotions, but in the best tradition of this 35th Parliament I would remind members to direct all their interventions through the Chair.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, through you to my colleagues in the House, there is an underwriting on federal lands reserved for Indians. In October 1995 for instance, CMHC provided mortgage loan insurance to an operating company of the Yellowknife Dene band so it could access bank financing to build a 10–unit apartment building on federal land reserved for Indians. The apartments will be occupied by low income families and the operating costs of the project will be subsidized by the NWT Housing Corporation. That is a fact.

Many of those communities do not have access to those financial institutions. They are looking at innovative ways of getting housing for those people. There are 34 housing units that are needed in the north.

The south does not have the inclement weather and the harsh climate we have, nor the heating costs we have. Maybe they do in some of the northern parts of the provinces. Really, look at the opportunities these people have carved out for themselves to empower their people, to enable their people to become independent and self–sustaining. One of the first ways they look at is home ownership, by building that infrastructure and making it possible for people to own their own homes.

• (1200)

This year, as of September 30, going back to the community of Brooks, Alberta, 153 households became proud homeowners thanks again to the mortgage insurance funds. Make no mistake, if CMHC were not in the mortgage loan insurance business 290 families in Brooks, Alberta might not have been able to buy their homes. These 290 households represent 83 per cent of the total number of households, 349, that bought homes in Brooks, Alberta during that period.

The government knows how much Canadians value home ownership. Home ownership has always been valued at the community level. The first thing the settlers of this country did was build a home. Many were eventually able to get assistance from the banks and their communities to do joint projects to build homes. That is the way it was done and there was nothing wrong with that. Home ownership is much valued as the Canadian way. It is a source of retirement income for some. It is the one thing they may hang their hat on and feel security from. It is also an important component of quality of life.

We believe every Canadian should have access to home ownership. CMHC's mortgage loan insurance can turn the dream of owning a home into a reality. It is therefore critical that CMHC be able to continue to provide mortgage loan insurance to Canadians now and in the future. That is why I support Bill C–108. I hope my colleagues will see fit to give swift passage to the bill so that CMHC can continue to help Canadians realize their dream of owning a home.

There is an abundance of ideas out there, but many challenges befall Canadians who are isolated or in remote areas or who are not in the high income brackets and who face many fiscal challenges. Those people need help from various levels of government and organizations.

There are so many things that happen but when it comes right down to it we can talk in technical terms and be very abstract. We can talk about the whole fisc and all that but when it boils right down to it we are talking about the quality of life for people. The real meaningful essence of this is that people have access to homes, that they are able to own their own home and build a life for their children and themselves; real security and in practical terms, stability.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that with the previous speaker I asked how much of a contingent liability is recorded on the books and how much the government lost by loan guarantees in the eighties recession. The answer, which was passed down to the member from the lobby, was that there were people in my riding who took advantage of a CMHC approved loan. That is the answer to those two questions.

I presume therefore the member is suggesting that because people in my riding took advantage of a CMHC approved loan I should be in favour of increasing the loan liability from $100 billion to $150 billion. There is more logic. It boggles the mind where some of these shallow arguments are coming from.

When this legislation was brought in one person in opposition spoke to it. Since then it has been all Liberal members speaking to their own bill. The reason is there is no legislative agenda from over there whatsoever. For a country that has overspent in the last two years by $80 billion, for a country $566 billion in debt, for a country where crime is very serious, one would think there would be a legislative agenda. But no, what we have are Liberal MPs talking to the bill and nobody on the other side making speeches to it. I think it is a disgrace.

• (1205)

My question to the member is the same as to the previous speaker. Surely she can get an answer from the lobby on this. How much of a contingent liability is recorded on the books of the government?

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member, and I am a little doubtful about the hon. part—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. secretary of state will withdraw that statement immediately.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it.

The hon. member fundamentally asks whether the MIF is in trouble. Is this an additional $50 billion liability to the federal government? The mortgage insurance premiums charged by CMHC are sufficient to meet the risk being assumed at no cost to the government.

The viability of CMHC's mortgage insurance fund is assessed annually by an independent actuary. An actuarial evaluation of the fund as of September 30, 1994 has confirmed its long term solvency.

The member is creating a worst case scenario that is not justified by the facts. Government members have explained again and again that CMHC charges premiums that cover the risk. The fund is sound and has helped thousands of Canadians.

The real liability is the sense of uncaring, the sense of indelicacy on the part of this member, not caring that people of moderate incomes have access to home ownership. That is the real liability. If past governments had taken that attitude, nobody would own a home today.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): You do not know what you are talking about.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: You think you know what you are talking about, you idiot.

Mr. Strahl: Mr. Speaker, we have a real problem here.

The Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. The Speaker seems to have walked in on an interesting discussion.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate debate in the House. Whether they like it or not, it is going to happen. However, this is the second time now and I would like the member to retract the word idiot.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, the member himself has hurled many abuses across the floor. We have sustained them. We have taken them but I can be honourable enough to retract the word idiot as I referred to the member.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's speech. I did catch what she talked about, the importance of home ownership in Canada, which many of us believe in. It is important for many reasons, whether for enhancing the family, sense of ownership, pride and so on.

She mentioned the necessity for CMHC to be involved specifically in lending money to build homes on native reserves. I agree with the member it is very important for people to own their own land. I would like to see the right to own property entrenched in the Constitution, something we do not have constitutionally now.

• (1210)

I wonder if the member thinks it would be useful to allow natives on reserves to actually own the land. Then they could mortgage it and put houses on the land, just as everyone else does in Canada. It is a bit of a problem. The federal government is the only lender which will guarantee those mortgages because the natives do not own the land they live on in fee simple.

She talked about the pride of home ownership. I wonder if it would not be a move in the right direction to allow natives to own the reserves in fee simple so they could then take out mortgages like any other Canadian and have the pride of ownership she spoke about earlier.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague brought up a very interesting point. It is a very complicated question. The issue to which he referred would involve changing the Indian Act and making a number of constitutional amendments. It is complicated.

It is not in my mandate to make such a pronouncement. However, if we attempt to ensure that aboriginal people can gain access to home ownership, the issue we are debating today, we know the hon. member would support us. If it involves any kind of work dealing with aboriginal rights, dealing with self–government, dealing with the empowerment of aboriginal people, of course the hon. member would support the government. We appreciate that. Essentially that is what it would take to answer the very complicated question he asked.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to relay for the information of the House that one aspect of the CMHC loans has not been mentioned: CMHC guarantees do not always kick in. There is an example in my riding of a condominium which failed to keep up its premises. As a result the directors of that condominium corporation were liable. There are inherent risks not necessarily covered by the insurance.

I compliment the secretary of state for bringing the essence of the debate down to the importance of home ownership. I ask her again to remind the House of the importance of the home to Canadian life.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, it bears repeating that we must look at the question in the light of how it affects the majority of Canadians but also those with specific and unique needs, including aboriginal people, who often live in remote and isolated regions, the disabled and single parents. That is a very important issue.

I cannot express enough that the real empowerment of the family or the individual is home ownership. It provides a great deal of stability economically, emotionally and in terms of a safe environment. The safety and security of the person is dealt with in the sense of providing a home. It gives an opportunity for the future.

I have some additional information on the aboriginal housing policy the hon. member asked about. This has addressed the failures, experience and inefficiencies of previous programs and has led to self–sufficiency. Is there any new aboriginal policy? The government through CMHC is providing $307.8 million in this fiscal year to support social housing both off and on reserve.

Every bit of achievement in giving home ownership to individuals in remote regions or to aboriginal people who live on reserves or off reserves is a major struggle. Each time we achieve something it is not done without hard work and compromise. It is very difficult, and every time you make progress it is a major achievement.

• (1215)

The Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the time has expired. There are two more members who wish to ask questions. Is there unanimous consent to extend the question period?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: I hear members saying no.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Debate.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on the National Housing Act.

This bill will enable Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to continue underwriting home mortgage loan insurance within the legislative limit. I put the stress on the words "loan insurance" because when I listen to my friends from the Reform Party it sounds as if they feel that Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is essentially giving loans. This is loan insurance. As a result, that responsibility of the government to come in and cover when someone defaults is minimal.

I want to go back to 1987 when I was first nominated to be the Liberal candidate in my riding of Broadview—Greenwood. I said to my supporters in a room in the Slovenian Hall on Pape Avenue that one of the things I was going to try to work on was bringing Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation out of mothballs. We had just come through three and a half years when the Brian Mulroney Conservative government had effectively parked the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In some instances, they not only parked the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, put it in mothballs, but they also devolved a lot of responsibility for housing to the provinces.

I am one of those members in this House who believe the national government has a major role to play in the economy. I never did share in the dismantling of the national government that Brian Mulroney and his colleagues engineered over 10 years. Even to this day, I have debates and differences with some of my own colleagues as we sell off, dismantle, and in some instances literally give away Government of Canada assets, Government of Canada instruments. I sincerely believe that by giving these instruments away or dismantling them we will lose our capacity to run this very large country.

Mr. Grubel: It is against the will of the people in the regions.

Mr. Mills: No, it is not. It is not against the will of the people. The people believe in a strong national government. They do not believe in this decentralizing system that is evolving right now. They do not believe in it. I am going to be very candid. I am not walking away from what got me elected. If it means I will even have, from time to time, some differences over here, so be it.

Today the Government of Canada, through the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, is returning to traditional Liberal values. It gives me a great deal of satisfaction to stand in the House today and pay tribute to this minister. They are few and far between these days who will go back to traditional Liberal values and say they are going to bring Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation out of mothballs and make sure it has the proper envelope to go out there and make sure the housing sector is given all the support it needs to get back on its feet.

• (1220)

The member for Capilano—Howe Sound, the senior economist and finance critic for the Reform Party, asks at whose expense. For two years I have been listening to members of the Reform Party. The thought process is cut, cut, cut, dismantle, give away. They have actually to their credit done so well in communicating that message that in fact we in the government have listened to the Reform Party too much.

We support eliminating waste and eliminating duplication, but we must also have growth in this country. The Reform Party cannot differentiate between those instruments of government that can accelerate and support growth and those areas where we support as well the elimination of waste and duplication.

The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is an instrument of the Government of Canada supported by the people of Canada that will help growth. That growth will generate jobs. It will generate an expansion of our economy.

When we talk about housing, we should not just focus on the craftsmen, craftswomen, and all of the trades related to the housing sector. We should also reflect on what other industries benefit from a strong, healthy, vibrant housing industry: landscapers, carpet manufacturers, stove and refrigerator manufacturers, people who make drapes. The list is endless. That is something the Reform Party is missing.

I am not trying to be partisan. I come from downtown Toronto. In my community if the housing industry is flat, if we have no growth in the housing industry, the ripple effect is almost catastrophic. It affects the entire confidence of the community.

The economist from Capilano—Howe Sound knows full well that when developing a sound economic equation you cannot ignore the confidence factor. The confidence factor is the biggest factor in that equation. If in a community like Toronto there is a housing industry that is absolutely flat, it affects all other sectors of the economy.

When members of the Reform Party came to this House they said they were not going to be here just to oppose for the sake of opposing. When a good idea came along that would not cost the treasury a lot of money they were going to support it.

There have been a couple of ideas that have come forward from the Reform Party that I have supported. In fact the government has become so right of centre in its actions that I think the Reform Party should back off a little. If we get so far to the right that we cut all of these instruments that can generate growth, we are all going to be in trouble.

Going back to this housing bill, it is so important that we do not just think of housing itself. These are not loans. We must think of all the spinoffs.

• (1225)

It is important for Canadians to realize that this home loan insurance is not a loan; it is an insurance on the loan. This insurance package is something most of the supporters of the Reform Party want. Most Canadians would agree that it tends to be larger businesses, like the financial institutions, which are so focused on deficit and debt, more so than I would be, that are actually encouraging us to get behind the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation loan insurance system. I know this for a fact.

There are big developers in my riding. The leaders of these organizations do not vote for me, although now and again I get a little contribution. I know a lot of their employees vote for me. Does the member for Capilano—Howe Sound know what these big developers say? The big developers say that when they go to their banks they are told that in order for them to get their development loan for their projects they need to produce a certificate of insurance from the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In other words, the major banks are saying to bring in that insurance guarantee and they will get behind the great job creation project.

By the way, I know of a lot of projects in Toronto. To the credit of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, under the direction of the minister from Cape Breton, one of the few traditional Liberals left in the House, the insurance guarantee is critical for the homebuilding industry to get on its feet. But he is not just saying to accept any project. Many good projects in the greater Toronto area have been turned down because the element of risk was just a little too high.

I say to the member for Capilano—Howe Sound that Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has really become a much more efficient, more streamlined, more risk averse crown corporation. When we see that kind of behaviour in that crown corporation, it should give members of the Reform Party some confidence so that when the minister responsible says let us increase this envelope from $100 billion to $150 billion where the downside is negligible, in fairness the Reform Party should get behind us.

I want to make sure that some of the fundamentals of my argument are put on the table and the member agrees with them. First, I know the economist from Capilano—Howe Sound, the finance critic, would agree that a vibrant homebuilding sector is really a vital component in any economic equation. Second, he would agree with the spinoffs related to the housing sector. Third, he would also agree this is not a loan per se, it is a loan insurance plan.

He would also agree that this should be a national instrument, that this is an instrument we should not devolve to the provinces, an instrument the national government should continue to operate. We should not chop it into little pieces like a lot of other things we have done around here lately.

• (1230)

The last point I want to make concerns traditional values that all members in the House share, the values of caring and sharing, looking out for each other and family values. The member for Capilano—Howe Sound knows what a home, a roof over one's head and pride of ownership do in terms of strengthening the moral fabric of the country.

The Reform Party has been successful in the last two years in generating cuts, dismantling and offloading. Now that a good bill comes before the House that will accelerate growth in a most important sector of the economy, the housing sector, I appeal to the member for Capilano—Howe Sound to be fair and get behind it.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have been named so often in the member's address. I will summarize what I as an economist consider the argument against the bill to be.

One view we have heard again and again in today's speeches is that CMHC is self–supporting, that it does not really cost anything. Economists are asking why the government is in the business if this is so. Are members opposite suggesting that the free market will not work, that the free market does not produce services more efficiently than the public sector? The evidence is strongly against that because throughout the world, governments are privatizing and taking these kinds of activities out of the market.

Strangely enough, other members are bragging about the fact that the CMHC system is providing subsidies to others so that they can have houses that otherwise they would not have. How is this possible? If the organization is breaking even, where does it get its resources with which to pay the subsidies? It is conceivable that some activities undertaken by CMHC are creating a surplus. Thus a surplus is being forced or squeezed out of some unsuspecting Canadians participating in CMHC. It is taken by the system to subsidize others.

As a conservative I would suggest that is not the way we should run our society. If there are reasons for subsidizing some types of housing such as that for natives, I believe we could reach agreement on it. Let us make it obvious. Let us make it transparent. Let us not have it hidden in the operation of some huge bureaucracy or in some obscure book.

Another point made by the hon. member was that the housing industry would collapse unless the insurance was there. Whenever we have a subsidy program the economy and the industry adjust to take advantage of it. If we take away the subsidy there is a reduction in output. If subsidies are offered to banks or to anyone they will take them. That is not an argument in favour of saying that we need it.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): It is not a subsidy.

Mr. Grubel: The hon. member says it is not a subsidy. It is breaking even, but where does the organization get the resources to do what it is claiming? It is making it possible for some people to have houses who otherwise would not have them. By definition that is a subsidy. Where is the money coming from?

To say that unless we subsidize and encourage the housing industry the economy will not boom is what we call vulgar Keynesianism. Vulgar Keynesianism means that unless we run a deficit and subsidize a certain activity, the economy left on its own will never produce a full employment equilibrium. That idea was current and fashionable in the 1960s. Today it is totally defunct. Most members opposite seem to have gone to university and have studied it in the 1960s, in the dark ages of Keynesian economics.

• (1235)

We know today that if we subsidize some industries by raising—

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): This is a speech; this is debate. Where is the question?

Mr. Grubel: This is debate.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): It is called questions.

Mr. Grubel: Mr. Speaker, this is debate. This is not question period. We are debating the bill and I am giving an opposite view. I want to conclude with one last point.

If the government takes money that it does not have and gives it to an industry to expand, the industry will employ people and there will be an increase in output. However we have found people as a whole look at the increase in the debt. They begin to realize that their future tax obligations will go up to service the debt. They are worried about their children and grandchildren. This is why we find the spending of those who have to pay the bills in the future is down. That reduces demand, output and employment the same amount by which deficit spending increased on the other side.

That is a very well accepted proposition in economics.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief and to the point on the member's questions.

First, the member asked why the government was in this business. If the government were not in the business at this moment in time there would be a virtual monopoly. Is the member from the Reform Party promoting monopolies? I do not think so.

Second, he called it a subsidy. It is not a subsidy. The whole premise of the member's argument was based on the word subsidy. It is loan insurance. It is not the Government of Canada making direct loans. In the judgment of the officials it is a collaborative effort by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the banks and the private sector.

The third item has to do with why we are all in this room. This room is not a bus going down the street so that we can look out the window and see people crying out for our help, whether they be young people, middle aged people or older people. This room is not a bus that drives by and says that it only has time for those who can look after themselves.

In essence we are in this room so that when we look out the window of a bus driving down the street, stop the bus, get out and help people in need. There are many people who do not have financial resources either to own a home or have shelter over their heads without this lever or this instrument of national government. I am getting sick and tired of being in the House of Commons with the Reform Party encouraging the bus to go down the street and disregard the people who are crying out for help.

The bill before the House looks after disadvantaged people and the Reform Party should get behind it.

The Deputy Speaker: The time has expired for questions and comments.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH ACT

The House resumed from November 6 consideration of the motion that Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I take the opportunity to speak to Bill C–95 and to discuss the health care system.

There are several issues to be talked about. The most important is that the bill is only a name change. It transfers responsibilities and we accept that. However overriding the bill is what we will do with health care.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Scrap it.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): The hon. member says scrap it. We do not agree with that.

We need the highest quality of health care for all Canadians while not increasing the pressures of finances on the public. If we look at where many people come from today, the health care system in communities is an ever increasing cost. The disappointing part is the federal government has not increased its costs. It has actually decreased its expenditures toward the health care system over the years, thereby putting pressure on the provinces to come up with more and more money.

I have had occasion in the province of British Columbia to work in one of the municipal organizations. I know full well what rising costs are due to in part. Labour negotiations, for instance, over the years have produced increases that are extraordinarily high. Communities had difficulty trying to pay as the costs of labour increased. We know the cost of equipment in hospitals is high and necessarily so, because it has to be state of the art.

On top of all this we have a government saying that we must have universal health care which it relates to medicare. I will talk about the differences in a moment. The government wants it to be universal but is not prepared to pay 50 per cent or a higher percentage than it is today. It has been ever decreasing.

Many people are not happy with the health care system. They have to wait in line for operations, and services are ever decreasing. There are bed shortages, not enough nurses at times and so on.

• (1245)

I have been attending the Royal Columbian Hospital in Vancouver where my niece has been in neurosurgery for the last nine weeks. She was in a very serious car accident. I must say that I have been totally impressed with the health care system in that regard.

I am sure many people have gone through hospitals, have spoken to doctors and have been completely impressed. However, the fact remains that the services are decreasing. I see it when I visit the hospital. There are not as many nurses as we would like to see on staff and so on. The demands and the expectations which people have for health care today are perhaps more than what the provinces can afford. Therein lies a good part of the battle.

Some myths have been promoted across the country. I believe they are more political myths than reality. We hear from the other side that Canada's health care system is the best in the world and that any changes would be detrimental. I do not subscribe to that thesis. The fact is that the health care system in Canada is very good. I cannot from my experience determine whether it is the best in the world, but I am sure it is very high up there.

The Liberals are saying that any changes would be detrimental. I disagree with that. In this day and age what is truly required, because of the costs and the limitations on the resources, is a core set of services that would be provided throughout Canada on a cost shared basis. It could be called a core medical service. Over and above that, we have to allow the provinces to innovate and provide other services. That only stands to reason unless the federal government is prepared to provide more funding into its shared responsibility.

The government cannot have it both ways. It cannot say: "The rules are going to go our way, but we are not going to give you enough money to operate". It is unrealistic to think that way.

If you are looking for changes in health care, we have offered a program for change with a core medical service. Organizations such as the Canadian College of Health Service Executives are coming to the conclusion that there has to be some kind of core service. Trying to provide all things to all people within a very limited finite budget will not work.

Some myths about health care are attached to this party. They are political myths. I can understand when we are campaigning or when we are debating in the House that statements are made to promote one side or the other. Some of the myths are that the Reform Party will dismantle medicare; that it wants a U.S. style of medical system; the Reform Party is in favour of a cash register medical system; it favours private insurance; it is in cahoots with insurance companies; it is a proponent of a two–tier health care system.

The fact is that the Reform Party is a lot more realistic than the government. Unless the government is prepared to look at the funding it provides to the provinces, I do not see how the provinces can expect to live by the standards which have been set by the federal government. It is not realistic.

The biggest burden of cost is on the provinces. The government cannot stand by and promote such things as block funding without eventually finding out what the problems are. I have had a lot of experience with block funding. It is just another way of saying: "You have the same amount of money. You can spend it on whatever you like. If you want more money for health care you can spend the bulk of it but that will take away from welfare transfer payments or post–secondary education". It is still the same amount of money. The government has not really resolved anything other than to change the name and provide the money which has been decreasing over the years.

We have to define medicare today. I do not believe medicare and health care are necessarily synonymous. Medicare to me is a comprehensive set of core national health standards, publicly funded, portable across Canada and universally accessible to all. Canadians regardless of ability to pay should be able to use and access the health care system.

If we get to defining the problem we will be better off. However, if the Liberal government merely says: "The rules are this and we are only going to give you a finite set of dollars to live within", the provinces are not going to take that any more. That is what the debate is on constantly in this House.

We have to remove—

The Deputy Speaker: You have one minute left.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): So soon? I cannot even get into the report from the Canadian College of Health Care Executives but if possible in a minute I would like to read some of the conclusions which illustrate where its members are coming from today.

One of their concerns is with the political concerns of this country. The report says: "With the increased importance of health care to the public, main issues have become campaign issues for many elections. There is concern that pledges to balance budgets will result in reduction in the quality of health care provided".

They are really saying that politics are limiting this, and that politics are part of the problem in the health care system. I agree. The Liberal government has to open up on the issue of health care and get away from the idea that we have a traditional system, there is no other way to do it and that it is finite.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of Bill C–95 because I believe in the importance of a federal department of health. I am among those Canadians who value their health care system as one of those things that tie us together as a nation.

This system for which you and I share responsibility is central to our identity as Canadians. More than any other program of government it reflects our belief that we are mutually responsible for each other's well–being. We exist as a nation and will continue to exist as a nation precisely because we do care for one another.

However, if we are to preserve what we value we must be aware of the changing times. The budget signalled a new era of fiscal responsibility and smaller government. We cannot escape the financial facts of life which mean we will have to abandon some old ways of thinking and some old expectations of government.

I hardly need to emphasize how far we have come together. We know that Canadian health care is second to none in the world. Everyone in Canada has reasonable access to health care. We establish our priorities for treatment based on medical necessity and not on how much money we have. No Canadian need fear now or in the future that a catastrophic illness will result in financial disaster.

As we approach the 21st century there is a new fiscal reality. The government has recognized it and is acting responsibly to deal with it. We are committed to protecting social programs. Indeed, the government's budget was about taking the fiscal steps necessary to do so.

Our national health care system is rooted in our common Canadian values of equity, fairness, compassion and respect for the fundamental dignity of all. The goal of the new Department of Health is to preserve medicare and put our fiscal house in order.

Many of the values that make up Canada's social fabric are reflected in the five principles of the Canada Health Act. They reflect the Canadian concern for justice and equity in our health care system and they are not going to disappear. Canadians will not allow that to happen. The Canada Health Act and its five principles of universality, accessibility, portability, comprehensiveness and public administration will be maintained. The principles of the Canada Health Act are not just words. Their meaning has stood the test of time. In their totality they assure both the provision of quality health services to all and the containment of costs.

• (1255)

As Canadians, we believe all must have access to services. People cannot be de–insured because they might be too costly for the system to cover. They cannot be turned away at a hospital door because they have not paid their quarterly tax bill or their provincial premium. If we need health care, we will be treated the same as anyone else. That is what Canadians mean by equity. This recognizes our dignity as human beings and thus demonstrates that we are a fair and compassionate people.

Of course, new realities require new thinking about how we will do things. That thinking must be pragmatic and stand the test of both fairness and fiscal reality.

This fiscal year the federal government is transferring $15.5 billion to the provinces and territories for health services. The total federal health, post–secondary education and social contributions for 1995–96 will be about $29.7 billion under the established programs financing and the Canada assistance plan.

With the introduction of the Canada health and social transfer in 1996–97, total transfers will be $26.9 billion. The transfer reduction for 1996–97 represents, and I stress, less than 3 per cent of the estimated provincial–territorial expenditures for health, post–secondary education and social programs. It is also less than 2 per cent of provincial government revenues.

What is important to highlight is that the federal cash contributions under the Canada health and social transfer will not disappear. In fact, when you take into account the economies that provincial governments are putting in place, the federal proportion of funding in most provinces will remain steady or even increase. Make no mistake about it, the federal government is in medicare to stay. There will be stable, ongoing cash in the system to ensure that it is sustained.

Sustaining the health system does not mean spending more; it means spending better. Research demonstrates that there is no direct relationship between increased health spending and improved health outcomes. It is not the amount of money we dedicate to our health care system that will ensure a healthy population. Rather, it is the way we spend it.

We can do more with less, without in any way jeopardizing universal access to quality health care on uniform terms and conditions for all residents of Canada. In fact, we are doing more with less, as comparisons with the United States continue to demonstrate.

Traditionally, the split between public and private spending has been about 75–25. Currently, the private share is rising and is now over 28 per cent. This is a trend that must be examined as we look at ways to keep health care affordable to all residents.

We are doing this for several reasons. One of the most important is that the threat facility fees pose to the public system's ability to continue to deliver the efficient results that we have come to expect. By billing both the patients and the taxpayers private clinics does not take pressure off the system. They take resources away from the system. Facility fees fracture a system whose greatest strength is cohesion.

Look at the issue from the point of view of efficiencies and economies. Encouraging the growth of private clinics with partial public funding takes all of the strengths and efficiencies of our health system and turns them on their head. It reduces economies of scale. It undermines our bargaining power.

Like the U.S. system, a movement toward publicly funded private clinics could shift more of the Canadian economy's resources to health care at the expense of other areas that could provide greater benefit to the health of Canadians. It could very well end up costing more while providing less. It would be hard to think of a better example of counterproductivity. Moreover, it threatens to create an under supply of services to the majority of Canadians and an over supply to the wealthier minority. It would be difficult to think of a better definition of inefficiency.

Medicare is based on fundamental principles, but they are not abstract principles. They are pragmatic. They were designed to make it possible to provide every Canadian with the level of health care he or she truly needs. We must do so at a cost we can genuinely afford.

I will comment briefly on the Reform Party position on Canada's health care system. It is advocating a two tier system of core services in which Canadians have to pay and in which the rich can jump the lines and get ahead. This demonstrates a lack of vision. It demonstrates a sincere lack of understanding of the fundamental principles of the Canadian health care system.

We will not transfer our Canadian system into a U.S. style system. Canadians know full well the quality of health care in the United States and it certainly is not the kind of health care system Canadians want.

Canadians look on their health care system with pride. We have an overwhelming degree of satisfaction with what we have created. They expect governments to work hard to adapt to changing times and to priorities. They understand the need for cost effectiveness in what we do. They expect governments to work as a team to meet goals they set years ago, goals such as access and universal coverage. They are still valuable and still appropriate.

The new federal Department of Health is ready to take up this challenge. I am proud to add my support to the bill. I indicate most emphatically that the Reform Party is seeking to undermine the fundamental principles of the Canada Health Act, which Canadians have come to rely on and which they deserve.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, at a time when we are considering the act to establish the Department of Health, the first question we could ask is: Why have a federal Department of Health? The British North America Act says in section 92.7 and section 16 that health and social services are a provincial jurisdiction. So why did the federal government get involved in the health care sector?

To refresh our memory, I may recall that during the Second World War, the federal government obtained the right to collect income tax on a temporary basis, as they said at the time, to pay the country's war debts. However, by the end of the war, since people were now used to it and considering spending powers under the Canadian constitution, the federal government felt it would be useful to to continue to be involved in this area.

This led to the creation of several white elephants, to take action in areas for which the federal government had no responsibility. Today, the Department of Health is an interesting case in point. Quebecers and Canadians should know that for 1996–97, the annual cost of the federal Department of Health will be more than one billion dollars, which includes $347 million in salaries for staff and $703 million for goods and services, this in addition to administering $7.4 billion in transfer payments to the provinces.

We can see the insidious effect of what happened at the end of the Second World War, when the federal government, having obtained the right to collect taxes, returned this money to the provinces in the form of transfer payments. On the other hand, if every province had kept the right to look after health care, it would have been able to raise taxes so that citizens would know exactly what amount is spent on the health care sector and whether it is well spent. Unfortunately, that is not the model we developed in Canada. Today, we have a rather extraordinary situation where the federal government, while reducing its contribution to health care from year to year, nevertheless maintains national standards and thus puts the provinces, with their responsibility for the day to day administration of health care, in an impossible situation.

The federal government says emphatically: no extra billing, but at the same time it denies the provinces the funding they need, and there is no reduction in the tax points the federal government collects.

• (1305)

The provincial governments are unanimously opposed to this state of affairs and are trying to do something about it. The federal government wants to create a Department of Health that would be a continuation of previous departments, but at the same time the government assumes the right to intervene in a number of sectors, and that is why we think this does not augur well for the future of Canada. In the months and years to come, important budgetary decisions will have to be made.

I repeat that if we have two bureaucracies looking after health care in Canada—and in fact there are not two, there are more, as many as ten or eleven, because each province can have its own department of health—there will be unnecessary spending, unavoidably. When they say: "The government has no more money, where could it cut spending, how will we determine our social options for the future?", the first place to look is where we have duplication.

Are there not areas in this sector that should not be the responsibility of the federal government? Should the federal government not withdraw and give the provinces the right to take care of a sector that is theirs under the constitution?

I would like to give a few examples of this encroachment. For instance, for the strategy for the integration of persons with disabilities, funding will be $46 million over five years, $46 million to be spent on the integration of persons with disabilities. If we consider the situation in Quebec, the province already has its Office des personnes handicapées which does the job, and here we see two governments involved in the same sector. Of course the whole $46 million will not be wasted. There is money that goes directly to people, to the client. But let us say this amount includes $5 million for administration costs. If only one intervenor was involved, we could save that much and relieve some of the pressure on the federal budget, while services could be maintained quite adequately.

Another sector is family violence. A program was set up that would cost $136 million over four years. Again, this is a valid activity and government action is desirable, but the fact that two governments are involved undermines the effectiveness of these programs.

Say that in this case 10 per cent goes to administration costs, we could save $13 million. In the end, the same taxpayer pays the taxes. Whether he is paying municipally, provincially or federally, he always pays his taxes. So it is not surprising that those advocating decentralization so areas of jurisdiction may be recognized are critical of this sort of legislation by which the central government wants to impose its decisions on the provinces in areas where it has no responsibility, in areas where the provinces have constitutional responsibility.

Let us continue down the list of programs duplicating the action of the provincial governments. The new horizons program for seniors is another example of duplicate administration and duplicate bureaucracy. Members should see the forms the senior citizens clubs have to fill in to obtain these receipts. Often the administration costs for these programs equal what is paid out to senior citizens' clubs. This sort of thing is unacceptable, and people are rebelling against it. They want elected officials to clarify the situations.

Other examples include the seniors secretariat, the fight against smoking, the anti drug campaign, the national AIDS strategy, the children's bureau and, the best example of all, the national health forum.

Imagine. The federal government gave a team of experts a mandate to look at health management in Canada assessing the relevance of maintaining existing programs and of making change, but without the provinces taking part in the forum on health. This, for me, is the height of federal interventionism. From within an area of federal jurisdiction, a decision is made to interfere in an area of provincial jurisdiction, the provinces do not participate in the forum on health and no one has the patience or wants to do the negotiating necessary to have them there.

This means that, in the end, when the Prime Minister receives the report from the committee responsible for the forum on health, as its chair, he will be also be handed a total rejection by all the provinces of the report's conclusions.

We cannot ask people we have not included in the process to accept the conclusions reached. First of all, a determination should have been made of who ought to take part in the forum—was participation by the federal government really appropriate. Then, steps should have been taken to ensure that the provinces had a strong and appropriate voice that would have allowed them to address actual situations, because all the institutional networks are provincial.

These include hospitals, community health centres, shelters. Practical decisions are needed: reforms in individual provinces, the need to strike a balance between active treatment beds and extended care beds. At the moment, the provincial governments are bearing all the weight of the difficult decisions in this area, while the federal government, washing its hands of it, is reducing the funds it gives to this sector annually.

I will conclude on this point. When, in upcoming months it is looking for a place to save some money, one of the first could be the federal government bureaucracy enshrined in the Department of Health. How much can it save of the $347 million used to pay the salaries of officials working in the same area of activity as the provinces?

[English]

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in support of Bill C–95 not only because it provides a framework for Health Canada, not only because Canadians are renowned worldwide because of their health care system, but because today more than ever we need the support of a vigorous health care system.

There are those who condemn the cost of uniform health care to all Canadians. These individuals fear that a changing economy and a fast moving society will make it more difficult to maintain the current system.

As technology improves and surgical breakthroughs evolve, expenses increase. Transplants and bypasses are becoming more common and the therapy and equipment associated with these operations are more costly.

We are moving from an industrial age to an information era. Associated with this transformation are economic and social disruptions which bring greater demands to the system.

Our current system though stressed is simply reflecting the pressures associated with change. We already have a system that has provided a foundation stable enough to support change and we now maintain that system as the cornerstone of our society.

In my riding of St. John's West unemployment rates are some of the highest in the country. Every rise in the unemployment rate brings a greater increase in stress related diseases.

Our country represents a nation united. This could be seen in the strong support that Quebecers received, including support from those in my riding.

As our nation experiences change, we see fluctuations of high and low points in the economy of each province. What we need is stability. We need stable variables to rely on. One variable must be our health care system. This system must serve to maintain stability and unity within and between the provinces, a symbol of what it means to be Canadian.

Increases in stress related diseases produce associated afflictions such as increase in spousal abuse, alcoholism, drug addiction, high blood pressure and cardiac problems. The stress of not having the stability of a uniform health care system to rely on will certainly generate increases in stress and stress related diseases.

Members opposite have from time to time criticized the Department of Health because they say it spends too much money. I say it is money well spent, and not more than its responsibilities require.

The Department of Health is the department of defence against disease, the common enemy of all Canadians. Health allows no fiscal restraint. It is the challenge of the Department of Health to maintain an infrastructure that guarantees quality health care to Canadians in good times and in bad regardless of their economic position.

The health system I see is one that does not represent a net cost to the country, but a benefit. It is not an expense but an investment. Every element of economic and social life in Canada gains from medicare. Canadian patients are freed from the extra burden of health spending when the trauma of illness weighs heavily. Physicians are assured of payment for their services, while retaining professional freedom. Hospitals have more financial security and can better serve Canadians.

• (1315)

Most important and least obvious is the fact that Canadian medicare provides many economic benefits to the country as a whole. To take one example, more than $7 out of every $10 that is spent on health care in Canada is paid out of a provincially administered insurance plan. This single payer system in each province has built in efficiencies that allow considerable control over total expenditures. This efficiency is what holds per capita health costs in Canada well below comparable costs in the United States. Because of this control over spending, personal resources are freed for other priorities, of such as education, housing, and nutrition, all of which enhance the well–being of Canadians.

There are aspects of medicare that provide Canadian business with competitive advantages in the global market. Some international firms have established plants here because the cost of providing employee benefits in Canada is significantly lower than in the United States. Medicare enhances labour force mobility, and access to quality health care helps to ensure a healthy and productive workforce.

In St. John's West the labour force mobility is currently essential to long term sustenance, and the maintenance of our health care system is vital to ensuring the people of Newfoundland have a fighting chance in terms of labour mobility. Healthy business means economic growth, which in turn results in jobs, less unemployment, a healthier population, less stress related disease due to undue stress in the workplace, fewer demands on the health care system, and lower health care costs.

Health must be everyone's top priority. We must commit a large percentage of resources to maintaining health. It is our right and responsibility to do so. At the same time, we must be vigilant and innovative to ensure that what we are spending is done with economy in mind.

Among the areas the Department of Health is investing in is health intelligence. This initiative, which will include participation in a new global network designed to detect emerging diseases, is endorsed by provincial governments. The provinces know that national leadership in this area is essential if we are to make the most cost effective choices among all available health technologies and options.

Inevitably, there will be an increase in movement toward international standards or international processes. This department on Canada's behalf is very much in the forefront of this trend and will lead, not follow, other countries in establishing health standards.

The minister has spoken about maintaining traditional values and at the same time getting value for money. In St. John's West and throughout Canada tradition is what has made our country so unique. Health Canada promises to work closely with the provinces and territories in order to avoid duplication of programs and services, contrary to the comments made previously by my colleague in the Bloc.

All in all, I have confidence that the department that will be brought formally into being by this bill has its priorities straight. It will serve Canadians. It will guard our health and our health care system. It will do this with regard for efficiency and for getting at least $1.10 of value for every $1 it spends. Above all, it will continue to provide assurance that our national life and economy will stay vital at the domestic level and competitive abroad based on a healthy and vigorous Canadian population.

I have no hesitation in supporting the passage of this bill to create the new Department of Health. I urge my colleagues across the floor to do the same.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to try to get a point clarified.

I do not know why we are debating the creation of a Department of Health. Do we not have a Department of Health? Do we not have a Minister of Health? Is this the kind of legislation we should be debating in this House, talking about things that already exist? Did not Kim Campbell set it up two years ago and it has already been operating? Is this the best this government can offer? I cannot believe we are taking up two hours voting for the creation of a Department of Health that already exists.

• (1320)

Why does this government not get on with governing the country and providing the provinces with some leadership? Government members know very well that all the provinces are angry that we almost lost one province and this country almost broke up. Why do they not do something about the promises they made during the referendum campaign and get on with some serious legislation that would help this country?

Mr. Speaker, do you really think that debating this bill and creating the Department of Health will now make the province of Quebec want to vote to stay in Canada, that it is going to convince the yes voters to vote no because this is exactly what they were looking for from the Government of Canada? The Prime Minister is now off on another trip. I do not understand what this government is all about.

Where does the member for Mississauga South get off attacking the Reform Party on its health care position in an aside from his scripted speech that was written by the department, as if our health care position is out to destroy health care in Canada. Either the member does not understand our platform or the issue, which is more likely the case, or he has nothing better to do.

Our party has put forth some concrete suggestions to reform health care in this country. I find it ironic that this government prides itself in introducing the health care act, that it is proud of the health care act to the degree it keeps preaching about some of the fundamentals, that it will protect health care for Canadians in terms of accessibility, portability, affordability, and equal access to all, unlike the Reform Party which favours a two tier system and would kill health care. What is the government afraid of in terms of the Reform Party?

We also want to preserve all of the items in the Canada Health Act. However, the one element the government conveniently forgets and the one principle the Liberal government conveniently leaves out of this equation is that in the Canada Health Act it promised to pay for 50 per cent of the services, 50 per cent of the cost of the program. It has now reduced it to 27 per cent.

This wonderful new Minister of Finance who cannot balance a budget and this new wonderful Minister of Human Resources Development are now going to further reduce what they give to the provinces for health care; they are going to further reduce what they give the provinces for education. They are saying to the provinces: "You must stick by these principles; you have to retain this level of services and we are going to give you less money to do it".

If by chance the provincial governments decide to be creative enough to come up with a method of delivering the same level of service with less money, of reducing the line ups at no cost to the federal government, they cannot do it because that is the American style. The government says: "Listen to us. We know best because we are the federal government".

This is a stubborn headed type of attitude that is tearing this country apart at the seams. It makes me mad to come here as an Albertan and see those people sit on that side of the House and not listen to concrete suggestions, to always put them down and say we are destroying everything. We are here to offer constructive alternatives.

When it comes to health care, we want and need to recognize that the level of support and the level of funding for the various social programs we have are of such a high level that we can no longer afford to sustain spending at these levels. Therefore we must all look at ways and means of reducing the costs while delivering an effective service, ways and means of getting people in and through the system who really need attention rather than preventing them from moving forward.

Let me talk about the principle this government will not talk about. It is out of money; it is broke. Yet it still talks about all the wonderful things it can do for the people of Canada. Mr. Speaker, I know we are not supposed to use certain words, so I will try to get the word right. That is a gross misrepresentation and a lack of intellectual honesty in terms of the Canadian public. Here we have people who are supposed to be responsible, who are supposed to be giving Canadians what they need, yet they play politics rather than play with the facts and the reality of the situation.

Why not have a good debate and a discussion about issues like topping up a health care system that badly needs topping up with a system of an insurance policy in place in provinces if a person wants to do that to have access and pay for certain operations? If somebody's life is saved, what is really wrong with that? Why not? Do the rich not deserve as much as the poor?

I do not understand the debate the Liberals always use. Anything that we suggest always favours the rich and is against the poor. We are talking about lives. Anybody in this country who needs attention should get that attention. We are trying to suggest ways and means by which they can get it quicker, so they can get at the point of service in a way that saves them, that reduces the line ups and the pressures, a complete overhaul of the system itself, the inefficiencies in hospitals, the inefficiencies of visiting doctors and how they go through their check-ups.

If this government really wants to do its job and do it well, why does it not just stop collecting money for health care, impose the rules and regulations by which the services must be delivered in all the provinces, and get back to doing what a government should do? Why does it not get into the area of regulations on behalf of all Canadians coast to coast so that it is standard, portable, accessible, all these things, but leave the collection of the funds and cancel this stupid Department of Health and leave the raising of the moneys for the services to the provinces? This government takes $2 out of every $5 it collects for health care and blows it on a bureaucracy that is ill-prepared to deliver the services in all the regions of Canada.

Let us stop this mismanagement of government programs. The federal government has to get out of certain areas. These guys and gals are too proud to recognize that the federal government is intruding into a lot of people's lives. It is intruding in such a way that its members are imposing their perceived—

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): What are you going to do with the weaker provinces?

Mr. Silye: It is obvious that I have the government listening to me, but those members really do not want to listen, they just want to interject. That is all right, I am used to that.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Such a nerve. All they do is babble.

Mr. Silye: I am used to that.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Say what you believe.

Mr. Nault: Come on. We know you do not believe any of that nonsense. That is Reform rhetoric.

Mr. Silye: I know what sexual harassment is, but I have never really felt verbal harassment.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): We will help.

Mr. Silye: I have my troops here now. One for one. You guys go at it and I will just talk to the Speaker.

Seriously, we have a major problem in health care. We have a solution called medicare plus. We have a solution that will allow people to have access to the health care they need at the lowest possible cost and the maximum level of service possible. Unlike this government, which just keeps harping about giving them less and they should do with less, we have something to offer.

If the member for Mississauga South really wants to understand before the next time he gets up and points a finger at the Reform Party and says they want to do this, they want to do that, let me tell him two things.

One, the Reform Party has a plan. He would be well advised to read it, because members in his constituency are going to get a copy of it. He had better be able to answer why it is not good and why it will not work for the people who are sick in his riding and are in line ups and are dying, rather than taking cheap political shots in this House.

Two, let me tell him another thing. The time of putting people down the way he does, as he has done for two years, every time I speak about remuneration, salaries, or any time I talk about health care—

Mr. Szabo: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I take exception to the indictment that I am putting people down. I am here to speak on behalf of the Canadian health care system.

The Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the member has a point, but it is certainly not a point of order. It is a point of debate. The hon. member for Calgary Centre will not have that time come out of his time.

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you have shared this, because with your background as a lawyer you must have met a lot of people in your lifetime who really like to dish it out. They really like to put the knife into people. They just love it. However, when the opportunity comes for them to have to listen for a while, boy, they have a thin shell. They cannot take it. These people were in opposition for so long that they still have that tender shell around them. When they were on this side they said outlandish things. They made promises. To get elected they even promised to quit if the GST was not replaced. It still has not been replaced.

• (1330)

We are debating the organization of the Department of Health as if we do not have one. Canada does not have a Department of Health, ladies and gentlemen. We have to do something about it. We have to pass a bill fast to create a Department of Health. We have to do it quickly because it will bring in efficiencies, it will be effective and it will deliver services. That is important. Give me a break. We have a Department of Health and Canadians know it.

We have a system which is rupturing. It is breaking apart. What we have to do is find a way to help those people who need help in a way which is quick, effective and efficient. That will not be done by reducing the funds and saying to the provinces: "You guys handle it". The way to do it is to say to the provinces: "We know we have a dilemma. We cannot give you as much money as we have been. We have to give you less. Are there ways you can still deliver the services? We will be flexible". The Prime Minister promised flexible federalism and the only things he is flexible about are his travel arrangements.

We have to let the provinces come up with suggestions and work with them. Will we still have the same health minister if there is a new Department of Health?

Mr. Abbott: I doubt it.

Mr. Silye: My point is the provinces should be listened to and that is not happening. All the Reform Party is trying to do is make recommendations on ways and means by which we can deliver a service which is still effective at a lower cost and which still respects the principles of the health act. That is what the Reform Party is about, not what the hon. member for Mississauga South preaches every time he stands up.

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–95. Today I wish to address the leadership role and responsibility which the federal Department of Health has had in shaping the development and the evolution of Canada's health system.

Our national health system, popularly called medicare, is made up of 12 interlocking health care insurance plans administered by the provinces and territories. The provinces and territories are responsible for the administration, organization and delivery of health care services, including human and financial resource allocation, financing and regulating health professionals.

The system is referred to as a national health care system or program in that all provincial and territorial insurance plans are linked through adherence to the national principles of the Canada Health Act, which comes under the authority of the federal Minister of Health.

The federal health legislation sets out the basic principles and conditions for the payment of federal financial contributions to the operation of the provincial plans. This year the federal government will contribute over $15.5 billion to the provinces and territories in support of their health programs and services through established programs financing.

The federal Department of Health is also responsible for the promotion and protection of public health, for example through our public health intelligence and awareness initiatives and drug approval regulation activities, providing health services directly to registered Indians.

Canada has an excellent health system and the federal Department of Health has been a key player in its evolution. It was under the leadership of the former minister of health, the Hon. Paul Martin Sr., that the federal government introduced and passed legislation to implement the first component of our national health system.

The passage of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Act in 1957 encouraged the development of hospital insurance programs in all provinces and territories through the offer to cost share hospital and diagnostic services. This legislation allowed the government to share in the cost of provincial hospital insurance plans that met minimum eligibility and coverage standards. By 1961 after all 10 provinces and 2 territories introduced public hospital insurance plans, Canadians no longer had to worry about facing crippling hospital bills if a member of their family became ill.

• (1335)

The Department of Health followed with respect to medical insurance in the 1960s and with the introduction of public insurance for physician services in 1962. The federal government offered a cost shared program to the provinces and territories in 1966 to encourage the development of a national medicare insurance program.

The federal medicare act was implemented in 1968 and by 1972 all Canadians enjoyed public medical care insurance in addition to hospital insurance. Leadership was shown again by the Department of Health in 1984 when medicare was reaffirmed by Parliament with the passage of the Canada Health Act.

The minister of health of the day, the Hon. Monique Bégin, detected an erosion of the principles that support medicare. Canadians were telling her their access to necessary health care was being impeded by user fees and she took action to restore medicare.

The Canada Health Act with special provisions to discourage provinces from allowing extra billing by doctors and user charges by hospitals was successful in eliminating user fee medicare. The act provided for an automatic dollar for dollar penalty deducted from the transfer payment. For every dollar a province allowed to be charged in the form of extra billing or hospital user charges, one dollar was deducted from that province's transfer payment for health. Within three years all provinces that had allowed extra billing and user charges eliminated them. Canadians across the country were once again enjoying unfettered access to necessary health care services.

The Canada Health Act is a great symbol for Canadians. It symbolizes the values of our society: equity, compassion and caring. It is also more than a symbol. It embodies the principles which underlie the Canadian medicare system and provides the mechanism for preserving medicare.

The first national principle is universality. Every eligible provincial resident must be entitled to coverage by the provincial health insurance plan. Coverage is linked only to residency in the province and not to jobs and not to the payment of premiums.

The second principle is comprehensiveness. The provincial plans must provide coverage for all medically necessary hospital and medical services.

The third is accessibility. Insured services must be reasonably accessible and without financial barriers. This means in part there can be no point of service charges for medically necessary services, no extra billing by doctors and no user charges in hospitals. Patients do not receive medical or hospital bills for insured services. The province pays the bills directly on their behalf.

The fourth principle is portability. This is vital to a national system. It means that when Canadians travel or move they continue to be covered by provincial plans.

The final principle is public administration. The health insurance plan must be operated on a non–profit basis and must be accountable to the provincial government.

It is adherence to these national principles that gives the provincial systems a set of common features. This commonality is what makes our health care system a national system. The Department of Health monitors provincial and territorial compliance with the principles of the Canada Health Act and informs the Minister of Health of any problems. Where there is non–compliance the act provides the minister with the authority to direct deductions from transfer payments. These deductions are the mechanism by which the Minister of Health enforces the Canada Health Act and protects medicare.

The government is committed to a national health insurance system, to medicare. That is why the Minister of Health has taken action against semi–private clinics that charge user fees in the form of facility fees. Barriers to access must be discouraged.

• (1340)

The government has also shown its commitment to medicare by making sure the new Canada health and social transfer supports medicare. In order to qualify for full cash contributions under the CHST, provinces and territories must comply with the Canada Health Act.

The Department of Health has played a key role in the development, protection and preservation of medicare. Bill C–95 will ensure the Department of Health continues this valuable role.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as luck would have it, this morning I read in the Saguenay—Lac–Saint–Jean daily that, last evening, the health action committee of the chamber of commerce of La Baie and the Lower Saguenay asked elected officials to oppose any cut affecting the health sector in my region, so as to preserve what took so long to obtain.

Incidentally, a document clearly shows, and this has been confirmed, that cuts of over $131 million have already been made in my region, concerning that sector. Most of these cuts were, of course, made because of overlapping federal and provincial activities in that sector. It goes without saying that, when the federal government makes cuts affecting transfer payments for the health sector, there is an impact in Quebec.

In this bill, the federal government, claiming to be a good government, gives itself the right to act directly or indirectly in the health sector. It could use its spending power to that end. Indeed, a quick look at a few clauses of the bill will tell you that the federal government wants to get involved in that sector.

Contrary to what one might think, the health department has an enormous budget. According to the 1995–96 Estimates, Health Canada's operating budget is $1.05 billion, that is $347 million for personnel alone and $703 million for goods and services, whereas transfer payments amount to $7.4 billion. These figures immediately tell the story about the costs of overlapping activities.

We must ask ourselves what the federal government does with that $1.05 billion. Under the pretext of developing a strategy, the federal government, to put it bluntly, is once again interfering in a field of provincial jurisdiction.

Let me give you a few examples, starting with the new horizons program. This program used to help our seniors in several ways, for example by allowing them to buy entertainment and recreation equipment and participate in group activities. This program was, at least in my riding, well received by golden age clubs and by associations for the defence of retirees' rights. It gave some clubs and associations the tools to help our seniors, for whom these organizations are often the only resource available. In addition, these tools and activities helped participants stay in good physical and mental health.

• (1345)

After over a year of consultations, of shelving the various demands with respect to the new horizons program, our seniors are being offered a totally new program that is focused on health. The federal government is cutting a service in an area of pressing need and jumping head–first into another area where Quebec was present, where Quebec was already well equipped to deal with the situation. This can only be described as a case of wasteful overlap.

New horizons is but one example among many others. I could also mention programs such as the federal initiative on family violence, the national strategy to reduce tobacco use, and the pregnancy and child development program, which are still in effect in Quebec. Why multiply services? All these contributions show that the federal government has no qualms about going ahead with its own health and welfare initiatives.

They go ahead with these initiatives without considering the fact that, in the past few years, Quebec has focused on areas such as prevention and fitness. Quebec has also shown leadership in occupational health and safety matters.

The federal government is only interested in visibility and is ready to pay the price. One of its latest initiatives is the national forum on health. Again, to achieve visibility, it showed its will to intervene in this area without the consent of provincial authorities. All provinces without exception openly criticized the federal government's attitude in this regard, since it relegated them to a position of secondary importance in matters of health.

Quebec recently spent several months reviewing the measures required to make its system more effective and less costly while keeping medically necessary services free for everyone.

Quebec did not wait for Ottawa to renew its health care system. It took concrete action in this regard. For several months, wide public consultations have been held throughout Quebec so that Quebecers can give their opinions and express their needs. I had the opportunity to attend these proceedings in my riding last weekend. Again, this is a consultation process; this is how we must proceed, instead of creating parallel structures that are a shameful waste of public funds.

Through Bill C–95, the federal government is quietly trying to convince us that this harmless looking bill is the bill of the century. Quebecers, however, are not fooled; we clearly see what the federal government is trying to hide from us.

I fully agree with my colleague from Drummond that this House should refuse to proceed with Bill C–95 and send the government back to the drawing board.

• (1350)

The time has come for Ottawa to withdraw completely from this area and give Quebec the tax points corresponding to its current transfer payments in all fairness.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on Bill C–95, under which the new Department of Health will be established.

I listened carefully to the member for Calgary Centre. It was very clear he had not read the bill. He did not know what he was talking about. He was looking at the old bill instead of the new one. This is why a new bill was brought in, to save taxpayers' money and to have a health system to which all Canadians have access.

The Reform Party boasts about its great plan. The United States has that great plan, the two tier system that Reform advocates. What is happening in the United States system right now? According to figures released yesterday, 40 million Americans are not covered by any kind of health insurance and 29 million are underinsured. Sixty–nine million people do not have proper health care coverage. That is what Reform Party members want to give Canadians. Canadians do not want that system. They can shove it and they know where. Enough is enough.

Reform members want to give everything to the provinces so they can throw more money at it. We do not think throwing more money at the problem is the answer. It is using the money we have more efficiently for the modern technology that has come into our hospitals and our clinics.

When I lived in Saskatchewan I had an operation. Because of complications I was a whole month in hospital. Now an appendix can be removed and the patient is sent home. How many people have triple bypasses? Before they were told to lie in bed and not to move for weeks on end. Now they get them up walking the next day and they soon send them home. Look at the savings. If we send a patient home, we have to send proper care to the home with them. However it is a heck of a lot cheaper than having the patient lie in a hospital bed for weeks on end.

Canada spends 9.4 per cent of its GDP on health care, far less than the U.S., yet every Canadian is covered well by health care. Japan spends only 6 per cent of GDP on health care. How can that country do it so cheaply? I think it is good management. It is done efficiently but Japan also harnesses the modern technology that has crept into the health system.

We do not need any lessons from the Reform Party. Polls show that Canadians are very pleased with our health system. The polls also show that the Reform Party is going down and this is why it is going down.

Yesterday I intervened on the bill briefly when the Bloc Quebecois complained that the federal government has no jurisdiction in the area of health care. I hope to assure the Bloc Quebecois that the government fully appreciates that provinces are responsible for all aspects of health care delivery, generally defined as hospital and medical services. However, the opinion poll indicates that Canadians recognize there remains a need for a federal presence in health, just as we have a federal presence in other jurisdictions. If changes are made to the Criminal Code, the provinces then implement the legislation and the laws that we change.

This morning the foreign affairs standing committee met and the CCC was before us. That is the Canadian corporation which does trade with countries. These countries want a federal government presence in a deal, otherwise we would not get a deal for a lot of these things. So let us not throw the federal government out completely.

I was very interested in the media conference the former Prime Minister of Canada, Pierre Elliott Trudeau had yesterday. He cautioned not to decentralize all of the powers because that is when this country will fall apart. He advocated a strong central government. Here is someone from Quebec who is giving us advice that we should heed.

• (1355)

Public opinion, the media, the members of this House have one thing in common: They have a legitimate concern about the future health system and the need for continued access to high quality services. By defending the Canada Health Act from attack by those who advocate user fees and private clinics, as the Reform does, the Department of Health protects this country's publicly funded universal medicare system.

Health care is only one of many factors contributing to health. There are also those factors that make and keep people healthy, known as the determinants of health. These include the social and physical environment, human biology, genetic endowment, economic status and individual behaviour.

In a recent discussion paper entitled "Strategies for Population Health: Investing in the Health of Canadians" federal, provincial and territorial health ministers provided a framework for action on the major determinants of health. It offers a solid basis for setting priorities to continue to improve the health of Canadians.

The paper recommends three strategic directions. First, it recommends strengthening public and government understanding of the determinants of health by demonstrating the links between social status, economic development, income distribution, education and health. Second, it recommends building understanding and support among government partners in sectors outside of health. Third, it suggests priority initiatives which will have a significant impact on population health.

I urge all members to put their party politics aside. When we have something good, something Canadian, something that will keep this country together, something that will provide health care service to every Canadian, rich or poor, regardless of where he or she lives, let us all get behind it and pass it today.

The Speaker: Colleagues, it being 2 p.m., we will now proceed to Statements by Members.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last December the government amended the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act and recognized the value of participant funding in the environmental assessment process. MPs from all sides of the House supported this effort to give the public greater access to government decision making.

Higher levels of public access and consultation allow the environmental assessment process to be more representative of the Canadian people. As the Minister of the Environment said during debate on the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, it is one thing to say that people have a say, it is another to give them the tools to exercise their right.

I agree wholeheartedly with the minister and believe that my Bill C–339 will extend this level of access and participation in the decision making process without increasing government expenditures.

I would ask all members of the House to support Bill C–339 when it comes to the House for a vote in the near future.

THE CANADA COUNCIL

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, David Craven, New York, New York, $39,500; Jennifer Weeks, Cleveland, Ohio, $18,000; Nathan Berg, London, England, $18,000. No, these are not winners from the Publisher's Clearing House sweepstakes. These are the lucky recipients of tax dollars wrenched from the pockets of hard working Canadians and distributed through the Canada Council.

That is right. You do not even have to live in Canada to receive a grant from the Canada Council. No, sir, if you do not like the winners here, no problem. You too can receive $18,000 to live in sunny Los Angeles, California, just like John Friesen, or $18,000 to live in gay Paree just like Shonagh Adelman.

If you want to write a book, ponder poetry or paint pictures, come on down because the price is right in the Canada Council $87 million grant giveaway. Remember, you cannot win if you do not enter.

GURU NANAK DEV JI

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is the 526th birthday of Guru Nanak Dev Ji, the first Guru of the Sikh religion.

Guru Nanak evolved a completely new faith. He presented to the people his vision of an ideal faith of spiritual deliverance, human equality and justice.

The basic ethical beliefs that Sikhism holds dearly are democracy, non–violence, peace, religious identity, family life, hard work, advancement and human rights. Sikhism teaches truthful living with emphasis on selfless service, tolerance, compassion, love, contentment, humility, equality, humbleness and well–being for all.

The goal of a Sikh is not only a spiritual uplift of the individual through selfless service but the advancement of all humanity.

MISSING CHILDREN

Mr. Gary Pillitteri (Niagara Falls, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the city of Niagara Falls has proclaimed November 6 as a day celebrating the recovery of missing children.

In a ceremony on the Rainbow Bridge I accepted a plaque on behalf of the Minister of National Revenue and his staff at Canada Customs by the Independent Order of Foresters child print program. The non–profit organization accounts for over one million members in Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom. Its involvement comprises a great number of projects geared to help families.

I congratulate publicly the IOF and the revenue department for their devotion to the protection of children. As parents, as community leaders and as concerned citizens, we understand that nothing causes more pain and anguish than a missing child.

The minister of revenue has committed his department to the cause, but when it comes to missing children, one is too many.

THE LATE YITZHAK RABIN

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my leader, the member for Sherbrooke, and Progressive Conservative Party colleagues I wish to pay tribute to Yitzhak Rabin, the late Prime Minister of Israel.

Mr. Rabin's life mirrored the history of his country. He fought for its creation, its survival and its peace. It has been said that only soldiers can make peace for they know all too well the price of war.

Mr. Rabin recognized the only guarantee of Israel's survival was to make peace with those who had once vowed to destroy it. For the next generation of Israelis and all generations after them he wanted to ensure a future free of bloodshed. He made peace with the enemies of Israel, he said to save lives. Now that he has given his life for that worthiest of causes, let us honour him by embracing and supporting his courageous work.

My colleagues and I extend our condolences to Mr. Rabin's family and the people of Israel. The world has lost a great leader and one of its noblest spirits.

THE LATE YITZHAK RABIN

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last night I attended a memorial service in Toronto to honour the life of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. It was an emotional evening. Over 6,000 members of our community joined together to recognize the gifts Mr. Rabin had bestowed upon the people of Israel and upon all of us through his endless pursuit of peace.

Mr. Rabin dedicated his life to his country. As a soldier he fought for Israel's survival. As a prime minister he fought for peace.

Saturday, November 3, perhaps marked the pinnacle of Mr. Rabin's quest when he spoke and sang of peace in front of more than 100,000 people in Tel Aviv. How tragic for this to be the end. How tragic for him not to be able to see the results of his life's work. How tragic for the murderer to have been in the crowd, to have heard Rabin's words of peace and not to have heeded them.

As members of the global community we must all join together to ensure that Mr. Rabin's dream of lasting peace will never die.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as we approach another Remembrance Day when all Canadians celebrate the courageous sacrifice of our war veterans, we should be focusing on the way that our troops from coast to coast fought for democracy and freedom in a united Canada.

• (1405)

Unfortunately on October 26 the Bloc member for Charlesbourg issued a press release calling for Quebec members of the military to desert their posts and join a new Quebec army the day after a yes vote. This has infuriated many veterans as well as other Canadians, including many constituents in my riding of Red Deer.

The action is so reprehensible that the government must take immediate corrective action. Inciting mutiny in the Canadian forces cannot be tolerated and the government's response to this outrage should make it perfectly clear.

NATIONAL CITIZENS COALITION

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, just ten days after our Canadian neighbours rallied in Montreal on the eve of the Quebec referendum, the true face of English Canada is already emerging. The National Citizens Coalition is launching an ad campaign to express its deep–seated opposition to the concept of distinct society status for Quebec.

After the provincial premiers backed off last week, the NCC's 40,000 members are now clearly opposed to what they consider as unfair preferential treatment for Quebec. This is a bitter disappointment for Quebecers, who were deeply touched by English Canada's show of affection at Canada Place, three days before the referendum. Where have all our friends gone?

MERCHANT NAVY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, veterans of the merchant navy who served during wartime provided a vital function in situations where the death rate was as high or higher than in the armed services and where like other veterans they were captured and imprisoned as prisoners of war. Yet for many decades they were treated as second class veterans deprived of many benefits.

Even with the belated passage of the Merchant Navy Veterans Act in 1992, merchant navy veterans were not granted fully equal status with other veterans. The act contains definitions of service in the merchant navy that are more restrictive than for veterans in the other services and therefore denies benefits to some veterans who are clearly entitled to them.

As we approach November 11, the NDP calls on the government to treat veterans of the merchant navy in exactly the same way as it treats other veterans by including them in the War Veterans Allowances Act.

YITZHAK RABIN

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was cut down by an assassin's bullets minutes after making a speech at a huge peace rally. Mr. Rabin's assassination is first and foremost an attempt to derail the peace process in the Middle East. His murderer thought that, by killing the messenger, he would quash all the efforts made in the past several years to find a peaceful solution to the problems in this troubled area.

However, the demise of this great man will not succeed in crushing the hope for peace that inspires the people of Israel. There is no doubt that peace will come to the Middle East, and no crime, however repugnant, will prevent this. At this time of great sorrow, Israelis can count on the support and sympathy of Canadians. We, too, are resolutely committed to peace.

VETERANS

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has declared the week of November 4 to 12 national veteran's week. As you know, traditionally, since the end of the first world war, Canadians from all over the country gather at their local war memorial on the morning of November 11 to pay tribute, in various ceremonies, to their fellow Canadians who died in combat.

This year, as we celebrate the 50th anniversary of the end of the second world war, Canadians have planned special commemorative activities for the entire week leading up to Remembrance Day. We will be paying tribute to the veterans of both world wars, the Korean War and UN peacekeeping operations. These veterans served their country with courage and distinction. We are proud of them and pleased that the government designated a week in their honour.

JOB CREATION

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after two years in office, the Liberal government, for all intents and purposes, still has not done anything about unemployment. A series of nice documents on employment and growth were released, but Canadians are still waiting for the concrete actions and results expected from a government.

Unable to make the necessary budget decisions, the Liberal government's only job creation initiative was to force the unemployed to join the welfare rolls, thus triggering an increase in provincial deficits.

We all know the consequences of that lack of vision. Hardly any new jobs were created in the past year, and economic growth has suddenly come to a halt this year, with no reaction from the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance.

This government must fulfil the promises it made to Canadians two years ago. Its laissez faire attitude can definitely not be considered an effective job creation policy.

VETERANS WEEK

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to make mention of the fact that the Prime Minister has declared a special period of commemoration which will run from November 4 to 12 to be known throughout Canada as Veterans Week.

Veterans Week will increase awareness among Canadians of the contribution of those who served during wartime and in peacekeeping activities throughout the world.

One of the activities designated for Veterans Week was the national spirit of peace run that took place in St. John's, Newfoundland on November 5. The run was arranged to create a link between the 50th anniversary of the end of the second world war and that of the founding of the United Nations. It took place in designated cities across the country and represented a nationwide gesture of commemoration and support of Canada's ongoing peace efforts.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, 19-year old Allen Wayne from Langley, British Columbia in my riding was seriously injured on August 26 by a stolen vehicle driven by a repeat young offender.

The young offender faced eight charges. Five of the serious ones were plea bargained out, including breach of probation, possession of stolen property and criminal negligence causing bodily harm.

Allen's parents, Allen and Debbie Wayne, did not even know plea bargaining happened. Further, Allen's parents asked crown counsel to raise the case to adult court but that was not done. So much for the Young Offenders Act.

Today Allen is fighting for his life with two broken legs, a broken left hip, a broken pelvis, a broken arm and his face crushed to pieces.

What of the poor young offender? He got 15 months in open custody, a three-year driving prohibition and one day concurrent for driving while prohibited.

The Young Offenders Act is an embarrassment and the government is a disgrace to Canadian victims.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are is still in shock following new revelations concerning the despicable actions of Petawawa's airborne regiment. The parties organized by Canadian army soldiers in honour of the Polytechnique tragedy are absolutely shameful. One wonders about the army's ability to recruit people who are trustworthy and who can protect the values of our society.

These accounts revive the terrible pain and grief suffered by the families and friends of the victims of the Polytechnique massacre. The parents of Geneviève Bergeron, one of the 14 victims who died on December 6, 1989, wrote me a letter in which they say they are still mourning the loss of their daughter. On their behalf, I urge the government to make sure that those who organized such parties for the Petawawa regiment, and those who participated in them, be court martialled and discharged from the armed forces.

We must take action to put an end to the violence against women, and all those responsible for these incidents must be held accountable for their actions.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Denis Paradis (Brome—Missisquoi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the day after the referendum, 23 spokespersons for the federalist side in the region around Saint-Hyacinthe had a meeting to analyse their contribution to the campaign and decide what their future action should be.

They decided unanimously that it was advisable to continue their action within a group without any political affiliation and that they would concentrate for the time being on two main objectives.

This group wants to foster the message for change that was apparent from the results of the referendum; it also wants to promote the national pride of Canadians, as its members did throughout the referendum campaign.

Tomorrow, they expect to introduce their group at the national level to create a snowball effect across Quebec, and perhaps across Canada. There is a very clear demand for profound and rapid change today in this country.

To Jacques Sylvestre from Saint–Hyacinthe, André Gauthier from Sept–Îles, Yves Mailhot from Saint–Lambert, to my friends in the Bloc who believe in sweeping changes and in the Canada of the future, I say: "Do not give up, things are starting to move".

CANADIAN FEDERATION

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, all Quebecers who voted no and more than 35 per cent who voted yes in the last referendum are looking for change within the Canadian federation.

The people have decided. Canadians from coast to coast have massively demonstrated their affection and their support for Quebec's aspirations. It is now up to the politicians to deliver the goods and work on implementing these changes. However, when Quebecers hear what the Bloc leader said about these changes, and I quote: "Sterile debate, nonsense, misleading verbal overkill—", they are not amused.

In Quebec, the people are sovereign, and they have spoken. If the leader of the Bloc Quebecois cannot accept the people's verdict and refuses to help improve Canada, he should have the decency to resign.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers are beginning to get used to playing cat and mouse with the federal government. I will explain. Initially, the Prime Minister told everyone very clearly that there was no question of discussing the constitution, even during the Quebec referendum. Then he changed his mind and talked of possible administrative changes in order to decentralize Canadian confederation. Then he spoke of legislative changes for doing so, and, most recently, he has said nothing more about it at all.

The government is not responding any more. We did, however, learn today at about 12.30 p.m. that a ministerial committee on national unity had been set up with a mandate to consider possible changes to confederation.

My question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs or for the Deputy Prime Minister, whoever wants to respond. What is the mandate of this committee, exactly? Is it preparing to propose constitutional changes or just administrative ones, or both?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the committee in question is a group of ministers in the federal cabinet, who are going to look at all options for change—both administratively and constitutionally.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs be heading the new committee that follows in a long series of committees, including the Charest, Beaudoin, Dobbie, Castonguay, Edwards and other committees? Can the minister tell us whether this is not a simply a strategy on the part of the government to play for time, because it is unable to reach a consensus with its other partners in Canada? Is this not simply a snow job?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when we set up the program review committee last year, the opposition thought it was not going to produce results either. The result was the best budget in 50 years, which changed the structure of the federal budget and enabled us to recover our fiscal responsibility.

Why should we not hope for as much from a committee that is vital to the survival of the federation?

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given the government's unenviable record in constitutional matters, the many changes in its position toward Quebecers in the past month and a half and its inability to reach a consensus with its partners in order to meet Quebec's demands, should the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, rather than bust his suspenders over some vague committee that has yet to produce any results, not reassure people and explain the exact mandate and the reporting procedures of the committee?

• (1420)

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member for Roberval is clearly not weighing his words. How could a committee only mentioned today have produced results?

So, it is clear. In the past two years, we have succeeded in creating nearly 500,000 new jobs. This is what Canadians wanted, and we have maintained industrial harmony, while improving our budget. These are perfectly respectable results. I would have preferred the official opposition to have done a much better job of defending the rights of Quebecers—something we have done.

JOB CREATION

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, recently, very recently, we heard about the real problem that all Canadians are facing and that—we can say it—more than 49 per cent of Quebecers have identified as one of their major problems and one that they wanted to resolve through sovereignty. I am talking about employment. According to the Canadian Labour Congress, the government has abandoned the job creation strategy that got it elected, in favour of right wing policies that will contribute to making the middle class grow poorer and poorer and create disparities across Canada.

Will the government recognize that, apart from its infrastructure program, whose benefits are now coming to an end, no concrete steps have been taken for more than two years with regard to job creation?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit to the hon. member that she should look at the facts. That may be an unusual experience for her but it would be very helpful under the circumstances.

The reality is that last week a Statistics Canada report indicated that since the election of the government in the fall of 1993 over half a billion full time permanent jobs have been created.

That is not something to be ignored. It shows there is a growing strength in the economy. In Quebec a substantial reduction by almost 2 percentage points in the unemployment rate has taken place.

Rather than relying on the somewhat dubious claims of the Canadian Labour Congress, the member should look at the hard reality of facts as presented by Statistics Canada.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the truth of the matter is that the minister does not take into account population growth when he boasts about such things. The Quebec government, on the other hand, has every reason to be proud of its performance because, despite this government's failure to act, it has managed, through Minister Paillé's plan, to promote job creation.

How can this government boast about its performance, when we have 20,000 more people on welfare in Quebec this year, when the unemployment rate is 11.2 per cent, and when the number of people who are out of work exceeds 400,000? How can this government be proud of its performance, when it has nothing to offer and when everyone can see—as more than 49 per cent of Quebecers did on October 30—that deep changes are urgently needed?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member recognizes that one of the major difficulties with helping to create jobs has been the uncertainty that has come about as a result of efforts to separate Canada. It is very difficult to attract investments, to provide for new job development when employers are not sure what the economic circumstances will be.

In spite of the real problems created by that uncertainty which the hon. member and her colleagues have caused over the past year, in the past three months 33,000 new jobs have been created in the province of Quebec.

In the hon. member's riding alone the unemployment rate has dropped from 12.8 per cent when we came into office to 8.6 per cent. The hon. member should take pride in this.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there are competing visions in the country of where Canada should be headed after the Quebec referendum.

One side represented by the government wants to go back to elements of the failed Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords. The other side represented by Reform and some provincial governments wants to move forward to decentralize certain key social functions of the federal government while strengthening the economic union at the same time.

Now a special committee of cabinet has been set up to design a post–referendum strategy. My question for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs is: What is the national unity committee of cabinet doing to ensure this alternative federalist vision is being considered, and what minister in the cabinet represents that position?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the second question, the solidarity of cabinet prevents me from answering. The leader of the third party should know that.

On the first question, we have been able to put together a package of measures that so far has united the country because we have tried to create jobs, we have tried to increase economic growth and we have tried to increase investment.

In terms of decentralization, we must recognize that decentralization is not a panacea to all the ills of the federation. Decentralization is justified only when it means that services are given by the levels of government best equipped to give them.

In terms of decentralization we want to serve Canadians, and Canadians once again are not served by applying an ideology of decentralization. They are served by levels of government that decide on the powers that each level should exercise according to how efficiently it can deliver services to Canadians.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, despite the polls and the lessons of Meech and Charlottetown the government is still favouring a distinct society clause and constitutional veto for Quebec. Both of these concepts are the products of a top down, legalistic approach to national unity which has not worked for 30 years.

Recognizing distinctiveness in Canada is not the problem; it is how to do it. The alternative bottom up approach would be to give each province the practical tools to protect and nurture its own distinctiveness, and real control over resources, social services, language and culture.

Is the national unity committee of cabinet giving serious consideration to this alternative approach to achieve provincial distinctiveness? If so, who is the spokesperson on that committee for that alternative approach?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, all the ministers in cabinet, including those on the cabinet committee, want Canada to continue as the country with the best quality of life in the world. Therefore none of them will be the advocate of one side or another. All together we will try to create a consensus on the package of measures that will solve the present constitutional problems.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the biggest mistake the federal politicians made with respect to Charlottetown and Meech was that they tried to draft unity proposals themselves behind closed doors, by ministerial committees and by ministerial conferences. The Canadian people were shut out of the building process.

If we have learned anything from this referendum campaign it is that the federal government does not have a monopoly on brains or on patriotism. The Canadian people saved the referendum campaign and their voices should be heard in this post–referendum strategy.

Instead of following the traditional closed door approach to developing unity proposals, what is the government doing to bring the Canadian people into the development of its post–referendum strategy?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I said, that group of ministers will get together and look at all the ways, all the possibilities for change in the federation.

I am not going to pre–judge the results by indicating what they could be before we start working.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Governor of the Bank of Canada candidly said that the lack of economic growth during the first six months of 1995 was largely due to the fact that interest rates rose too sharply last winter, a situation created by the governor himself.

My question is for the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Loubier: Mr. Speaker, could you please ask hon. members to keep quiet?

The Speaker: Put your question, please.

Mr. Loubier: Will the Minister of Finance recognize that the Bank of Canada misjudged the situation of the Canadian economy and should have started lowering interest rates much sooner than it did, so as to help create, not eliminate, jobs?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Governor of the Bank of Canada said there were several reasons explaining high real interest rates, and he mentioned two of them. One is the need to put our fiscal house in order. In that regard, he said that the federal government and the provinces, except for one, had already started that process.

Second, the governor clearly mentioned the political uncertainty for which the BQ and the PQ are responsible.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister was careful not to mention that the governor gave, as the primary and most important factor, the situation of the Canadian debt, which is the responsibility of the finance minister.

Earlier, I listened to the minister when he was discussing what he had accomplished so far. Do you know what the Liberals have accomplished in the last two years? They have managed to maintain the number of unemployed and to increase the number of welfare recipients. This is what they have actually managed to do.

Considering that, throughout the referendum campaign, the Minister of Finance kept repeating that he had a real influence on Canadian monetary policy, are we to understand that he wilfully let interest rates go up, so as to eliminate thousands of jobs for Canadians?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think that Quebecers made a decision that will result in lower interest rates. Indeed, the day after the referendum, interest rates fell by 147 basis points, which is almost a record.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party has a new Canadian agenda for change which would give more powers to the provinces for social programs. Incredibly, the Minister of Human Resources Development has threatened to cut transfer payments to British Columbia for its changes to welfare.

After having already cut transfer payments, why is the minister breaking the Liberal promise for change given at Verdun by the Prime Minister by threatening British Columbia?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not so incredible that a minister of the crown upholds the laws of Canada. The laws of Canada under the Canada assistance plan state very clearly that individual provinces should not cut transfer payments for those from out of province. That protects a basic right enshrined in the Constitution, the right of mobility. All Canadians should be treated equally. Even though they may be poor Canadians, they should still get equal treatment.

I would like to clarify one important point for the hon. member. I have not been threatening British Columbia. I have said very clearly that there are many opportunities for us to try to resolve these problems. Some very serious conditions should be addressed. The provinces have set up a forum called the Council of Social Ministers. They are supposed to be meeting to arrive at a common approach to these issues.

It would be unfortunate for one province to take unilateral action when all the provinces have tried to come together to find a co–operative approach. I am quite prepared to meet with them and deal with it.

It would be much more important for the hon. member to be directing her concerns to the ministers of the B.C. government who seem to be thwarting or short circuiting a very effective and co–operative federal–provincial process.

• (1435)

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the welfare reforms in B.C. are not illegal. In fact, if the minister was familiar with the charter he would know that section 6(4) clearly demonstrates that B.C.'s changes are legal.

Canadians are demanding fundamental change to government. The provinces are demanding more freedom. The minister is jeopardizing national unity by threatening the provinces, especially when his legal facts are wrong.

The minister is meddling in provincial jurisdiction where he has no legal right. Why will the minister not admit that his empty grandstanding is nothing more than another federal government power grab?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is a time in the history of the country when all regions should be building bridges, not walls and barriers.

The hon. member, as a federal member of Parliament, is endorsing actions which are clearly contrary to the law under the Canada assistance plan. All of a sudden the hon. member seems to have acquired great powers of legal judgment.

I would simply refer the hon. member to the Finlay case in the federal court, which clearly substantiates the responsibility of the federal government to uphold the basic conditions under the Canada assistance plan. I would recommend that before the hon. member starts to lecture people on the law that she should first read the law.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Last week, we learned that, in addition to the racist and degrading behaviour of members of the former airborne regiment in Petawawa, some of them even organized, on two occasions, parties to celebrate the anniversary of the tragedy which occurred at Montreal's École polytechnique, in which 14 innocent victims lost their lives.

Given the behaviour of these soldiers, will the Minister of National Defence admit that, at this point in time, the least he can do is to immediately suspend the promotions granted to those involved?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to welcome the hon. member, as she has obviously been appointed as the new defence critic. That is quite appropriate, given the inflammatory remarks of the hon. member for Charlesbourg in a press release two days before the referendum.

With respect to the question, it was posed yesterday and it was answered yesterday.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely appalling to make light of such an important issue.

I would like to know why the government disbanded Petawawa's airborne regiment before the inquiry had even begun, but must now wait until the end of the inquiry before suspending the promotions granted to some who were directly involved in such despicable acts?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, these matters were dealt with earlier this year with the disbanding of the airborne regiment and some comments which I made in the House some weeks ago about various promotions.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry has been aware of the abuse of his department's aboriginal business development programs and specifically the role played by Mr. Henry Wetelainen, president of the Ontario Metis and Aboriginal Association, based in Sault Ste. Marie.

This individual has misappropriated millions of dollars of taxpayers' money, most of it on companies which are now bankrupt or inactive.

In June the minister promised to investigate and act. Why has he failed to clear up this misappropriation of funds?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member makes very serious allegations of a criminal nature. He knows that these matters, if they are true, will be dealt with by the appropriate law enforcement agencies.

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like a commitment from the minister that he has indeed launched an investigation.

The Ontario Metis and Aboriginal Association has been a haven for patronage, cronyism and grossly irresponsible spending. The real losers in this scenario are the aboriginal people who have lost access to capital for improving their quality of life.

• (1440)

Can the aboriginal people of Canada expect anything more than platitudes from the red book when it comes to righting wrongs of the type perpetrated on them by the Henry Wetelainens of this country?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer to the first question stands.

I would say this to the hon. member. I do not think we need lessons from the Reform Party on how to help the aboriginal people establish themselves in ways that are going to promote their self–sufficiency and their entry into the real markets of the world.

That is what the aboriginal business program has been doing. We have been providing opportunity to entrepreneurs in aboriginal communities to build businesses that are enabling them to be part of the real economy.

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Despite the totally unacceptable behaviour of a number of soldiers and officers of the former airborne regiment from Petawawa, the Minister of National Defence is still refusing to review or suspend the promotions given those involved in this matter.

Is it not shameful that the Minister of National Defence allows the Canadian army to promote individuals involved in the events at Petawawa, that the army even decorated the commander of the former regiment and that the minister himself is today refusing to suspend the promotions?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I have already answered this question.

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how dare the minister respond in this way? I asked him a question through you and I think I am entitled to an answer.

Here is my supplementary. Is the minister not behaving totally unacceptably by refusing to suspend the promotions of the soldiers involved in the events in Petawawa? How would he react if the Solicitor General suddenly decided to promote those responsible for security at 24 Sussex?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that he is entitled to an answer.

I would say so are the thousands of Quebecers who were maligned by the sovereignists on the night of the referendum because of their ethnic origin and their participation in the vote entitled to an answer.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the national infrastructure program.

In Mississauga South we have benefited from the Canada–Ontario infrastructure program. As a number of infrastructure projects are nearing completion, Peel region municipalities want to know if further funds are available for additional work?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have good news for the House.

In the less than two years since we launched this program we have already allocated 95 per cent of the original $6 billion that the three levels of government put into this program. These over 11,000 projects have put more than 100,000 Canadians back to work. In the member's constituency, some 22 projects have put some 1,000 people back to work.

To answer specifically the question of the member, we are currently evaluating the program to determine where we go from here. This program has been very successful. It has been successful also in bringing three levels of government together which proves that governments can work in partnership quite successfully.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. He just finished speaking about the episode with the OMAA and said if these matters are true they will be investigated.

• (1445)

The House should know that the minister made a commitment on June 22 in public on Goldhawk that he was going to be investigating this issue. Has he investigated the issue, and what are the present results?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I explained earlier, if there is evidence of the allegations that were made by the member posing the question previously, the action will be taken by the appropriate law enforcement officers. I am not going to comment on the status of investigations bearing on criminal matters.

With respect to the program itself, the hon. member will know that the incident arose under the aboriginal capital corporations part of the aboriginal business program, an area which has not received additional funding since the 1994 budget.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister may know that Mr. Wetelainen's father received $100,000 as part of this program. It is alleged that it came back to Mr. Wetelainen. This is a very serious matter.

I ask the minister one more time: Is he going to make a commitment today or can he inform the House that in fact there has been a criminal investigation of this matter commenced? If not, why not?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member describes this as a serious matter and he is right. He should treat it as such and let the police do their work.

THE CRTC

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. After reviewing its decision at the government's request, last week, the CRTC approved again a $2 per month increase in local phone rates. This increase will come into effect on January 1, 1996, and will be followed by another $2 per month increase on January 1, 1997. A third increase is scheduled for sometime in 1998.

Could the minister tell us if he endorses the CRTC's latest decision, after having rejected its September 1994 decision?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it would be premature to give a substantive response to the hon. member's question. She will know that there is a period for petitions to be received by the governor in council in response to the CRTC decision. Those may be made by any interested citizen, including the hon. member, if she has specific views on what should be the response to the decision of the CRTC.

We will take all these petitions into consideration before cabinet makes any determination, if one in fact is called for by petition.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what I would like the minister to tell us if he personally justify an increase of up to 50 per cent in some cases. Can he tell us if he really intends to intercede with the CRTC as he did in September 1994?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my personal opinion is not of importance in this matter. What will be important is that we will review the decision of the CRTC that was taken after the receipt of considerable evidence, as well as argument made by counsel. We will consider any petitions that may be received by the governor in council in response to the CRTC's decision. With that information before us, we will endeavour to make a decision that is in the best interests of the people of Canada.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

There appears to be yet another scandal growing in his department, namely, foreign service officers who believe that their shipping privileges entitle them to practise fraud and tax evasion. Over at Canada Customs it is well known that returning foreign service personnel often attempt to smuggle wine and spirits into Canada, not only tax free but with shipping costs paid for by the Canadian taxpayer.

• (1450)

Is the minister aware of this practice? If so, what does he propose to do about it?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the hon. member that if he has evidence in this regard and if he is serious with his allegation, he should go outside, make that accusation, stand for it, explain it, and give all the details.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest the hon. minister request a briefing from his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue.

Foreign service officers have been nailed for declaring 200 to 300 bottles of wine when customs officers have found from 600 to 800 bottles, whole wine cellars. Unfortunately, there is no little form for customs officers to fill out to let DFAIT know what its employees have been up to. Other than having their shipments confiscated, these civil servants are not penalized in any way.

I ask the minister: Is a diplomatic passport a membership card to the elite so they can put themselves above the laws of Canada?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, foreign service officers returning from overseas are treated just like any other Canadian when it comes to customs examination of their possessions. Any infractions that are found will be prosecuted or treated as appropriate, just as other Canadians are treated.

If the hon. member has any evidence of any particular individual or indeed any organization that is evading the law, I would appreciate that information. Until such time, to come into this House and insult a group of dedicated public servants who work for Canada overseas in our trade and diplomatic missions appears to me to be totally irresponsible and quite uncalled for.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The health minister of British Columbia is quoted as saying that until the hon. minister accepts his constitutional responsibility for protecting salmon there cannot be a workable responsible public consultation process on the cancellation of the Kemano project.

Is the minister aware of what the province has done concerning the cancellation of Kemano? How is the minister fulfilling his constitutional obligations?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for giving notice of this question, important as it is to the people of British Columbia.

The suggestion of the minister of health in British Columbia to the Government of Canada that it is holding up or is stopping a public consultation process is absolutely false. It is an absolute red herring.

The people of British Columbia should know that the Government of British Columbia and Alcan have engaged in secret negotiations. They have prepared a secret report on the outcome of these negotiations. They have refused to give that report to the Government of Canada or to any other interested stakeholder.

I would say to the Government of British Columbia that managing the salmon resource is not a bingo game, it is not a game of chance. It has to be done properly and it should be done openly.

SOCIAL HOUSING

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Quebec accounts for 25 per cent of the total population of Canada and is home to 29 per cent of those living in inadequate housing in Canada. Yet, in the past five years, it has been allocated only 19 per cent of the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation's budget.

My question is for the minister of public works. How can the minister justify the fact that less money is available to the poor in Quebec than in the other provinces and what new way does he have to meet the glaring need for social housing in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises an important question, but I think the record ought to be cleared.

The Government of Quebec chose not to participate in various housing programs over a period of a number of years. For the benefit of the House, it should be noted that the first public housing program was available across the country from 1950 to 1985. Quebec chose not to participate. The second public housing program was available from 1964 to 1985. Quebec chose not to participate until 1968. Despite four lost years, the province still secured almost 25 per cent of the national units. The first rent supplement program was available from 1971 to 1985. Quebec chose not to participate until 1978.

• (1455)

The facts are very clear. The Government of Quebec chose not to participate in these national programs. As a result, the figures to which the hon. member refers are somewhat bogus in view of those facts.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister's remarks are very hypocritical because, in the last federal budget, there was a $300 million cut in social housing. This department and its minister are heartless. Quebec has lost $950 million over the past five years, yet they have nothing to offer, nothing new to offer in terms of social housing, except for—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: And they call themselves Liberals?

Mr. Marchand: Exactly, the Liberal government is responsible for these misunderstandings with respect to social housing in Quebec.

In light of the minister's comments and of repeated cuts in social housing, are we to understand that the federal government is officially withdrawing from this area and planning to shift to the provinces and municipalities the responsibility for meeting ever increasing social housing needs?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. It seems that the facts have struck a rather sensitive nerve in the hon. member.

The House should also be aware that since we have come to office, this terrible minister of housing and the Minister of Finance, it should be clearly stated: $4 million was provided for the Creeson initiative in Montreal; $5 million was paid out for Réparaction programs for 950 households; $5 million for rooming house RRAP; $15 million cost shared for households under Maisons lézardées; private–public partnerships, 13 projects in Quebec. We extended the first home loan insurance program; almost 24 per cent of the take up is in Quebec.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have been told by CAVEAT of the details surrounding the brutal murder and rape of Ann Marie Bloskie. Her murderer was six weeks from his 18th birthday when he beat Ann Marie to death with a rock, sexually assaulted her corpse, left her, returned the next day and sexually assaulted her again.

Why did the justice system not demand that this murderer be tried in adult court, since his actions are not actions of a young offender?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Young Offenders Act provided at the time of that offence and since then that young people, age 16 and 17, can be transferred to adult court for a trial on such charges. If transferred to adult court they face adult sentences.

The fact is that the Young Offenders Act contains those provisions. As the hon. member well knows, it is the provinces' responsibility to administer them. It is up to the courts and the prosecutors to apply them.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if he is referring to Bill C–37, the social engineering that has been done on that Young Offenders Act will change nothing.

At the trial in youth court, learned professionals stated that the murderer's favourite form of entertainment was watching violent non-consensual sex videos and he would require lifelong treatment and counselling. In our new Canada, this murderer would get lifelong treatment while he is in prison.

Since the solicitor general has allowed this murderer to be released, what assurances can he give Canadians that this killer will not jeopardize more Canadian women? Why has the solicitor general not allowed publication of his name so that Canadian women can be protected?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, steps were taken pursuant to the law, which provides for the names of potentially violent people being released to be provided to police authorities.

• (1500)

It is up to the local police authorities, in light of local privacy laws, to make decisions with respect to the releasing of names. We are encouraging provinces to work out protocols for the releasing of that information. We hope there will be a national system across the country before too long.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Over 20 months ago the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice promised that there would be a free vote in the House on the issue of physician assisted suicide and changes to the inhumane provisions of section 241 of the Criminal Code.

Will the minister now tell the House and Canadians, since the Senate has ended its study of the issue, what action he will take to keep his promise and to ensure that this elected House will have an opportunity to fully review and to vote on this profoundly important issue?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge the hon. member's interest in the subject and I am grateful for the question.

As the hon. member has pointed out, some months have now passed since we have received the report of the Senate committee which discloses how difficult members of that committee found the issues. There was difficulty achieving consensus on some of the most fundamental questions that arose. It is now up to the government to determine where we go from here and how. It is also up to this caucus to discuss how the issue should be approached.

That having been said, I have long since expressed my preference for providing a process within which elected members of Parliament can bring their judgment to bear, as the Prime Minister has said, in a free vote on these questions.

My response to the hon. member is that this caucus in due course will consider how best to proceed from here so that these important issues can be brought forward for consideration.

DEVELOPMENT AID

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Last night CBC Newsworld aired a program entitled "The Sceptics Journey". It showed four Canadians who began opposed to foreign development aid but after visiting a number of projects in less developed countries changed their minds.

What is the government doing to make more Canadians aware of the value and success stories of Canadian development aid?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I hope a lot of Canadians will see the film. I certainly appreciate the question of the hon. member that highlighted one aspect of the foreign aid program, the development assistance program that helps tremendously to resolve the problem of poverty in the world.

PRIVILEGE

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

The Speaker: I would ask the hon. member for Roberval if his question of privilege relates to question period.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, during question period, when we asked the Minister of National Defence about his complicity with and tolerance for those who celebrated Marc Lépine, the École polytechnique killer, the minister accused the whole Bloc Quebecois political formation and all Quebec sovereignists of being racist.

I would respectfully point out to you that this term is totally unparliamentary, unjustified and unacceptable, and I demand an apology.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: My dear colleagues, if you want, I will check what was said in Hansard, but at this time I do not see this as a question of privilege. I will review what was said and reported in Hansard, and I will get back to the House if necessary.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–95, an act to establish the Department of Health and to amend and repeal certain other acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am glad to have a few more minutes. Before being cut off I was responding to Bloc Quebecois members yesterday when they stated that the federal government had no right dabbling in health care. They failed to realize that a country must have certain standards. Hopefully the act will provide the standards.

I had experience with the health services of the province many years ago when it brought in a universal health care system. Line ups were so long that patients started paying doctors under the table to jump the queue. We do not want that. It demonstrates that people who have money get the care prior to the ones who do not have money. That is not the Liberal way of doing things and it is not the Canadian way of doing things.

We have heard the Prime Minister and the Minister of Health repeat over and over in the House that whether we are rich or poor we get the same health care, the same health services.

The bill hopes to save taxpayers money by doing things more efficiently, by co–operating with the provinces, the municipalities and the federal government. How can we best deliver health services taking into account today's technologies? People are sent home almost the same day they are operated on or the next day. By using these technologies hopefully we will be able to do things more efficiently.

This morning the Reform Party was jumping up, shouting and saying that there was nothing new in the bill. Its members offered their proposal. Their proposal is the American proposal where over 69 million Americans do not have proper health care. The polls show very clearly that Canadians do not want that.

My daughter just graduated from university and is now working. In the time of budget cuts when we had to reduce our deficit and our public debt I asked her as a young Canadian going out into the workforce who could pay for her health care, et cetera, what she would like the federal government to protect. Her answer was very interesting. Of all things the federal government is involved in she chose health care. She asked us not to touch health care. This is a Canadian starting out in the workforce, having graduated from university.

We are not building Canada for ourselves. We are building Canada for future generations, for our children and for their children. This is why the federal government has to take leadership. We cannot turn it over to jurisdictions where there will be no national standards. We cannot turn it over to a system where in one province we have to pay a lot more for an operation than in another province. Then people start flocking to the province where services are more available.

A personal friend of mine flew in from Florida for an operation in a Toronto hospital. He was a Canadian on vacation in Florida. Unfortunately there was not a bed for him. He had to fly to a Saskatoon hospital but did not make it. Is that the kind of health care we want, or do we want the kind of health care that when I need a triple bypass I get it right away because otherwise it may be too late?

Let us build a country wherein it will not be too late to have an operation. Let us build a country where everyone has equal access when they need it.

[Translation]

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Madam Speaker, I will start with some general comments on Bill C–95 before the House today. I quite agree with the Reform Party's concern about the meagreness of our legislative menu, but our positions converge so far and no further.

This government has made a habit of using ostensibly harmless bills to introduce provisions in which it assumes more and more powers. That is the case with Bill C–95. This bill establishes the Department of Health and amends and repeals certain acts. The purpose of this legislation is first of all to change the name of the department. What could be more ordinary?

After a closer look, however, we see that this bill contains provisions that are quite the opposite of the changes we were promised during the referendum campaign. It is this aspect of the bill, these new measures that are supposed to clarify the mandate of the federal Department of Health and will in fact increase its importance, which are revealing. Clause 4(2)(a) and(b) is particularly disturbing.

This clause provides, and I quote:

> —the minister's powers, duties and functions relating to health include the following matters:
>
> (a) the promotion and preservation of the physical, mental and social well–being of the people of Canada;
> (b) the protection of the people of Canada against risks to health and the spreading of diseases;

On the pretext of intervening on behalf of the well–being of the people of Canada, Ottawa could outflank the provinces in an area that is a provincial responsibility. These two clauses in Bill

C–95 give an indication of the very broad application this bill might have. It may have serious repercussions.

Need we recall that the Canadian Constitution of 1867 specifically recognizes health as an exclusive responsibility of the provinces? I know this government would rather not hear about the Constitution. That is just too bad. As long as this government keeps violating the Constitution, it will hear about it from Quebec, at any rate.

The federal government's intrusion in this provincial jurisdiction flies in the face of the very principles of Canadian federalism. And then they wonder why it does not work. They are trying to use the power of disallowance, based on considerations such as national interest, peace and good government, and of course the government's spending powers, to again restrict the prerogatives of the provinces.

However, as the federal government tries to encroach on jurisdictions that are exclusive to the provinces, its financial contribution decreases steadily.

• (1515)

In less than 20 years, the federal government's contribution to health care funding dropped from 45.9 per cent in 1977 to an expected 28 per cent in 1997. Finally, to divert attention from its financial withdrawal, the federal government proposed in its last budget a more flexible transfer payment formula under which all the money goes into a single envelope called the Canada social transfer. The federal government announced in the same breath that it would withdraw unilaterally and cut payments to Quebec by $308 million in 1995–96 and by more than $587 million in 1997–98.

The provinces were given the choice of cutting in either education, health or welfare. What a great example of decentralization and co–operation. Talk about flexible federalism. When a government can no longer afford to pay, it must have the basic decency not to try to impose its national standards and objectives more vigorously at the same time.

Since coming to power, the Liberal government has chosen to keep its deficit from growing by attacking social programs and going after the most vulnerable in our society. Yet, it is still trying to pursue Trudeau's old dream of controlling the provincial health care systems through national standards.

The federal government is now getting ready to invade the provinces' jurisdiction through the back door. For example, subclause 4(2)(c) of the bill gives the federal Department of Health the power to conduct investigations and research into public health. You may think that this is a noble objective. But how will the federal government conduct these investigations and this research?

Even though it is not mentioned in the bill, should the federal government have access to all the information needed to carry out its mission? Most of this information is often held by health organizations subject to provincial legislation.

This whole debate may appear pretty technical, but it may lead to many futile squabbles and discussions simply because the federal government does not respect its own fundamental law.

Of course, Bill C–95 shows our federal big brother's commitment to look after the health of all Canadians. It does not, however, tell us what steps the federal Department of Health will take to fulfil these noble ambitions. This is no accident. It is not in the federal government's interests to remind us once again that it is continuing its attempt to encroach on our jurisdiction over health matters.

In fact, on November 2, in the debate on second reading of bill C–95, the hon. parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Health plainly admitted that "its renewed commitment to a long and glorious tradition has inspired Liberal governments, politicians of every party and Canadian people over many years, indeed over many decades". Later, her Liberal colleague, the hon. member for Pierrefonds—Dollard, added that the Minister of Health had, and I quote: "strongly and successfully defended the principles championed for half a century by the Liberal Party, while developing Canada's health care system".

It is obvious that, through Bill C–95 in particular, the Minister of Health is carrying on the work that Marc Lalonde and Monique Bégin started. And after that, we wonder what is wrong with the federal system. Upholding a long and glorious tradition of duplication, overlap and encroachment, now I have seen it all. Just days ago, the Prime Minister promised major changes to accommodate the provinces, and Quebec in particular.

But today, we have before us yet another bill put forward by the federal government, which is doing everything it can to centralize and once again intrude on provincial areas of jurisdiction.

• (1520)

To paraphrase no committee chairman Michel Bélanger, this is the beauty of it. If the government is really committed to reducing the deficit, it should start by eliminating duplication and overlap with respect to health matters. But, on the contrary, Trudeau's followers are carrying on his work. I could mention, among others things, the fact that the department allocates important budgets for programs and projects that already exist in Quebec. Here are some examples: the strategy for the integration of handicapped people, the fight against family violence, the new horizons program, the seniors secretariat, the fight against tobacco, the anti–drug strategy, the strategy against AIDS, the program on pregnancy and child development, the forum on health, and so on.

What happened to the commitment made barely fifteen days ago by the Prime Minister, who promised that changes would be made?

You will understand that, as an elected member representing Quebec, I simply cannot support Bill C–95.

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to express my support for Bill C–95.

In this connection, I would like to discuss what Health Canada has accomplished and recall that our country is very proud, and rightly so, of its health care system.

In fact, there is no other system like it in the world. We also have the Canada Health Act, which contains the five basic principles of our system: universality, accessibility, comprehensiveness, portability, and public administration.

Our health system has contributed enormously to our excellent quality of life. Furthermore, co–operation at the international level helps us stay abreast of new advances in health care in many other countries. Thanks to this co–operation, users and providers are informed of what is being done in the rest of the world. All industrialized countries exchange information and, as a result, are able to act efficiently and effectively.

Canada has already introduced a number of measures to help achieve its goal of renewing the health care system. We are reinforcing the community aspect of health care, improving the role of consumers with respect to health care and seeking a more integrated approach to health which goes beyond health care. A large proportion of our present and future interventions is focused on the principal factors that determine our health. A fundamental truth has transpired, and it is that health is more than just care. This is an incentive to understand the complex set of factors that create a society whose members are all in the best possible health.

Governments and communities are examining social, economic, physical and psychological aspects as well as other factors. The work being done in these areas supports and complements the services provided by the regular health care system.

We are beginning to understand the close and complex connections between factors that determine our health, and our decision–making is aimed at improving the quality of health care services. The national forum on health plays an important role in this respect.

In fact, the forum's role is to project a model of health care for the twenty–first century. The forum's team consists of 24 Canadian men and women: health professionals, volunteers and consumers who have come from across the country.

[English]

While our appreciation of the complexity of the interrelated factors that contribute to overall health has grown, so too have the challenges in making effective choices about how to allocate increasingly limited resources.

The federal government has taken a leadership role in communicating with all stakeholders, including the public, in terms of the kind of future systems we want and can afford. The national forum on health will play an important role in this regard.

If we are to preserve and improve our health care system we must first decide what is essential. In this regard the national forum on health and other bodies will provide important advice to the government.

• (1525)

[Translation]

One of the jobs of the members of the forum is to engage in honest and open discussions with Canadians about influences on our health and on our health care system in the coming years.

Four working groups have already been set up and are responsible for various aspects: decisions based on convincing evidence, health determiners, values and achieving a balance.

The forum was set up in response to Canadians' concerns, and Canadians are justifiably proud of their health system.

The forum is trying to find ways to improve both the health of Canadians and the effectiveness and efficiency of health care services, and public participation is vital to the fulfilment of its mandate.

Through a range of activities, the members of the forum are informing the public about the problems and the options for improvement of health and health care services in Canada.

The forum's broad public consultation will enable all Canadians to help develop recommendations.

Every Canadian will have an opportunity to express his or her values and convictions.

[English]

The federal government is also working in concert with its provincial and territorial counterparts through the conference of ministers of health. One of our common priorities in order to enhance the appropriateness and quality of health care has been to promote and strengthen the use of clinical practise guidelines. We want to orient health care on which practices work best for different groups at risk.

[Translation]

I would also like to point out that Canada is renowned worldwide as a centre for research, treatment and pharmaceutical developments.

Specifically, our country is a leader in the area of chemotherapy. Throughout the world, researchers and practitioners are investing in work of great significance to the millions of Canadians suffering from cancer or an infectious disease, and to those who are at their side in their struggle. The work done so far has had tangible results.

[English]

In 1990 approximately 413,000 Canadians who had been diagnosed with cancer within the previous decade were still alive. More than one–third of these people had lived more than five years since their initial diagnosis. Many of them had chemotherapy to thank for their success in fighting cancer. This year alone a further 125,000 Canadians will be diagnosed with cancer. They will look to advances in treatment such as chemotherapy for answers and hope.

In addition to chemotherapy, vaccines play another important role in our public health efforts. For example, while the hepatitis B vaccine is used successfully in the prevention of infection it also prevents the development of cancer of the liver. Another example is the BCG vaccine which is accepted as a therapeutic agent for treating cancer of the bladder and is also known to be used in the prevention of tuberculosis especially in countries where the incidence of tuberculosis is high.

[Translation]

We also know that the appearance of resistant strains in the case of tuberculosis, for instance, is a cause of grave concern among public health authorities.

In a world in which international travel has become commonplace, experience has shown that the progress we have made in fighting infectious diseases within our borders is no longer enough.

These factors are so many reasons why Canada puts such emphasis on health issues. Many of our health care priorities centre on the use of chemotherapy.

Health Canada is both a partner and a facilitator in medical research and efforts deployed in the public health sector in Canada.

This is an indication of the importance of progress achieved thanks to research and the government's resolve to continue this work.

[English]

The federal role in research has been generally well accepted in this country. Provincial research programs have frequently developed their own provincial research councils around the federal council to avoid overlap while ensuring their own research goals are met.

• (1530)

One of the best examples of the provincial research model is that of Quebec. Some hon. members may not be aware that one of the chief architects of the conseil de recherches, now the fonds de recherches, is the present Quebec minister of health, Jean Rochon. Mr. Rochon is a former dean of medicine at the University of Laval as well as the chair of the external advisory committee for Health Canada's national health research development program. He is also the author of the Rochon report and has worked for the World Health Organization. I suppose it is not surprising that research in Mr. Rochon's province is so well organized.

[Translation]

Contacts at the international level play a key role in the process. These contacts are long established, and we now have many mechanisms to help us overcome the barriers of time and space and work as a team to conquer disease.

Madam Speaker, just think what Pasteur would have accomplished with the help of Internet! Whether we are talking about cancer or infectious diseases, the entire population of this planet benefits from the co–operation of Health Canada with all concerned. I believe that together we will be able to make the requisite changes in our cherished health care system and bring it into the next century. I think we are on the right track.

I would now like to quote an old Arab saying: "He who has health has hope; he who has hope lacks nothing". With the help of all concerned, Canadians will keep both health and hope.

[English]

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I was particularly touched by the comments of the member for Parkdale—High Park about his friend who on coming back from Florida was not able to find suitable medical treatment in Toronto. He had to go to Saskatoon and unfortunately it was too late.

Few issues treat all of us the same but the issue of health is one of them. All of us are concerned about health not only for ourselves but also for our families, friends and neighbours.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt, who just spoke, said that our country is very proud of its health system. I agree with that. He also said our health service has greatly contributed to our wonderful quality of life. I also agree with that.

The problem, I suggest, is the fact that the Liberals seem to think that they have a corner on wisdom when it comes to health care, that only they have the answers. This is really unfortunate.

I have also listened to the postering of the Bloc Quebecois during this debate. This is the official opposition that the Liberals choose to have in this House of Commons, contrary to anything else they may say. All the Bloc can do is posture about the whole situation with respect to Quebec in this country. It seems to me a shame when we are actually dealing with an issue that has something to do with all of us.

The member for Parkdale—High Park said we must build a health care system before it is too late. Unfortunately, with the greatest respect to that member and to the Liberals, I say that the status quo as it pertains to medicare as it is presently constructed is not an option and that is the whole problem. The status quo is not an option.

Someone earlier in the debate today said that the Liberals were committed to medicare and to seeing that there are no barriers to access. I suggest that one of the greatest barriers to access is the $7 billion that the Liberals are pulling out of this part of the program.

Let us take a look at health care. The health minister threatens the provincial governments if they choose to try and come up with some new solutions or some different ways of looking at things in the same envelope from which they are taking $7 billion over two years.

• (1535)

The province of British Columbia has decided that it has to take some action because it is being cut back so drastically by the federal government that it again is responded to by the HRD minister with threats.

All of us in the House have times when we have to sit in front of students who are saying, what about the funding for education? We have to say we are sorry but that is part of the $7 billion package that is being cut back.

I suggest that this is not an honest policy. The Liberals are saying they are committed to medicare and yet at the same time they are taking $7 billion out of health, CAP and education. It is just not honest.

The member for Nickel Belt brought up the issue of the forum. He speaks about having a frank and open dialogue with Canadians. What I am speaking to here specifically is that words can become walls because they can create a caricature.

It is the desire of the majority of the Liberal members to create a caricature. They are saying the Reform Party is opposed to medicare, is opposed to saving what the member for Nickel Belt has already said, that our health service has greatly contributed our wonderful quality of life. The status quo cannot be maintained and we are the only party in this House prepared to say that. Let us take a look at what the options are, as opposed to simply rolling back and pulling in the amount of money that is presently available.

The member for Nickel Belt asked the question, let us determine what is essential. What is essential? Are all medical services essential? In what situation is cosmetic surgery essential? In what situation is liposuction essential? In what situation is sex change surgery essential? There has to be a list saying what medical procedures are essential. What is going to be covered by the contributions of people paying taxes in Canada?

I would suggest with the greatest respect and honestly in honour of what the member for Parkdale—High Park had to say about his friend, we must bill before it is too late. I ask him and I ask all Liberals in the House to realize that they do not have a corner on wisdom. They do not have a corner on a desire to see health care maintained and enhanced. In fact, the Reform Party has a plan called medicare plus which opens up a whole new way of being able to get to the root problem. The status quo cannot be maintained. We must make changes and we are prepared to make suggestions for changes.

In summary, I respectfully request that the Liberals within the hearing of my voice today reconsider and realize that they do not have a corner on wisdom. Perhaps we, in the Reform Party, have a couple of ideas that are at least worthwhile considering.

Why will they not co–operate with us in getting into an open dialogue so that Canadians can have an opportunity to have input into this process so that truly we can build a sustainable health care system in Canada.

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in support of Bill C–95.

In creating the Department of Health, this bill not only makes good administrative sense, it also makes good economic sense. The concepts of health and economics are intertwined. The health of the Canadian people is vital to the health of the Canadian economy and the health of the Canadian economy is vital to the health of Canadian people.

Our medicare system is based on sound economic principles, the same kind investors look for in evaluating a private sector enterprise. There are four main reasons for the success of this system.

First, our publicly funded system has enormous economies of scale. We have only one insurer in each province that provides standard health insurance coverage to all residents. No risk rating is needed. Payments to providers are simple. Financing the system is streamlined.

Second, our system results in lower overhead costs. Researchers at Harvard have found that Canada spends only 1.1 per cent of gross domestic product on health care administration. The United States with its private health insurance scheme spends about two and a half times that much. If we spent as much as the Americans do on administration, health care expenditures in Canada would increase by $18.5 billion a year. That is more than the entire health care budget for the province of Ontario.

Third, a publicly financed system can ensure universal coverage. That is an important element to a healthy workforce which contributes to a more competitive economy and economic growth. When there are fewer work days lost to illness productivity increases. Healthier people make fewer demands on the system. They live longer and they contribute more to the overall wealth of the nation.

The fourth factor that makes public health insurance more efficient is government's tremendous bargaining power in negotiating the cost of service by setting and enforcing global budgets for hospitals and physicians' fees. This gives government powerful levers to keep health care costs under control. In fact real per capita public health expenditures in this country have been declining since 1993. Estimates for 1994 suggest public spending on health declined in real terms by about 3.4 per cent.

Economic analysis makes it clear that Canada's health system provides major economic benefits. These benefits stem from efficiencies and cost savings associated with public funding.

Our health system attracts investment to Canada and it helps business to compete from Canada. Enormous economies of scale, lower overhead costs, improved worker productivity, tremendous bargaining power and proven results; if you heard, Madam Speaker, of a private company that could point to those attributes you would be rushing off to call your broker.

Our public health insurance system is a major asset to business. It is not a subsidy. It is an efficiency. We have entered an era when the public sector's role is quite appropriately being re–examined. Valid questions are being asked about government's place and the values of public funding versus private funding.

Health care is one area where government is not just as efficient, it is more efficient. It is not by accident that the United Nations rates Canada number one in the human development index. It has taken effort, and the development of the medicare system has been an important part of that.

It is also not surprising that an Environics survey in late 1993 concluded that 79 per cent of Canadians believe it is very important for the federal government to sustain the health system. Medicare, as we know, is an insurance program. In effect we have used our ingenuity, our foresight and tax dollars to create a giant insurance pool covering all Canadians. Health care needs and the related costs that medicare covers would generally exist no matter what system we have in place to pay and as we know health services are never free. Public or private, somebody must pay.

All we have to do is look at the auto industry. For every car that rolls off the assembly lines of Detroit the cost includes an average of more than $700 U.S. for privately funded health insurance. Is it any wonder that the big three automakers have consistently been among the strongest voices for a comprehensive public health insurance plan in the United States? Universal coverage is much more difficult, if not impossible, in a system based on private insurance schemes. We have evidence of that in the United States where fully 15 per cent of Americans are without any health insurance at all.

One fact will put this in perspective. We spend only 1.1 per cent of our GDP on health care administration. That is about $272 per person. The U.S. spends about two and a half times that much, about $615 U.S. per person and not one of those billions of additional dollars goes to patient services.

There is no direct relationship between increased health care spending and health outcomes. Health is determined by a number of factors of which health care is only one. The environment within which we are raised and live in is another. We do not necessarily gain better health from extra health care spending.

With those two facts it is clear that controlling health costs makes sense for both the public and the private sector. The need is to spend money wisely. Our medicare system, through federal–provincial funding, covers 72 per cent of total health spending in Canada, but some costs add nothing to positive outcomes.

• (1545)

The first economic benefit of our medicare system is that we have administrative overhead costs under control. We have one organization in each province that provides insurance coverage, not dozens or hundreds, as in an American state. We do not have the elaborate and costly processes that private insurers need to rate the risk of people or groups.

Think for a moment about private car insurance and the different premium structures for young, old, men, women, experienced and accident–prone drivers. We do not require the intensive control systems private insurers use to monitor premiums and set payment schedules. Simply put, we do not spend as much on overhead.

The relative difference in spending between us and our neighbour to the south saves our economy $30 billion a year. That is why we have large employers, seniors, working people, and health activists warning against the erosion of medicare. They know that costs will increase significantly with a two–tier system. They know another thing: we will all foot the bill.

Hon. members might be interested in another related economic benefit of Canada's medicare system; that is, a better record of controlling costs. Each provincial and territorial government is the predominant buyer of health care in their jurisdiction. This gives them enormous leverage to give the most service at the best price to taxpayers. They can negotiate fee structures and service costs in a way no private insurer could ever hope to.

They can shift spending to achieve more cost–effective outcomes.

In comparison with the public sector record, the private health sector has had little success in cost control. It accounts for more than a quarter of all health spending, and its costs have been growing at more than 6 per cent per year since 1990. Individuals and insurers in the private sector have found little leverage to bring these costs under control.

Canadians understand this difference. We have agreed as a country to pool our risk across society. We have agreed to let governments work out fair prices as the buyer on our behalf. The economic benefits of our medicare system are something all Canadians can share. We win in the quality of our health care system, which is second to none in the world. We also win in economic terms.

I am proud to support the passage of Bill C–95, which gives a new name to a department that has been working hard and well for all Canadians.

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Madam Speaker, today I rise to speak in support of Bill C–95. It is with great pleasure that I do so.

To me the bill symbolizes a fundamental feature of our federation: the ability to achieve an appropriate level of the decentralization of powers between the federal government and the provinces. This is illustrated by our system of federal–provincial transfer payments for health. The system embodies a balance between the powers of the federal government and the powers of provincial governments, which is serving our country well. It provides for the national character of our health system while at the same time recognizing the constitutional jurisdiction of the provinces and territories over health care.

Our system of transfer payments for health has gone through an evolution over the last 30 years, an evolution that parallels the evolution of our health system as overseen by the Department of Health and the evolution of our federation.

In the 1950s, in an effort to foster the development of a national hospital insurance plan, the government passed legislation enabling it to cost share health programs. The passage of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Act in 1957 encouraged the development of hospital insurance programs in all provinces and territories. Through the offer to cost–share hospital and diagnostic services on roughly a 50–50 basis, the HID legislation allowed the government to share in the cost of provincial hospital insurance plans that met a minimum eligibility and coverage standard.

By 1961 all 10 provinces and two territories had public insurance plans that provided comprehensive coverage for in–hospital care for all residents. Then in the 1960s came legislation enabling the federal government to cost share medical care insurance programs. In 1966 a federal offer to pay about one half of the cost of physician services insurance programs operated by the provinces became law in the medical care act. The act was actually implemented in 1968.

At this point I would like to digress and perhaps bring a more human and local tone to the piece of legislation we are dealing with today. I would like to inject just how important this piece of legislation is to the territory I come from. I could probably exemplify that by using the particular issue of tuberculosis.

In the Northwest Territories tuberculosis is still a major problem, as it is among the aboriginal population throughout Canada. In fact, I am an individual of the aboriginal population who spent 14 months in a sanatorium for tuberculosis, which was the treatment in the early 1960s. There were many other people who also did. It became almost routine that families had members who were afflicted or died from tuberculosis or were treated for an extended period of time.

The rate of tuberculosis among Canadian natives is 43 times higher than among non–natives. According to Statistics Canada, the rate of TB among status natives was 47 per 100,000 in 1993. By contrast, Bangladesh has a TB rate of 43.6 per 100,000. The rate for non–native Canadians across the country was 6.9 per 100,000.

One big problem that has an effect on these numbers is the accessibility to the health system and proper testing facilities. The availability in the north is difficult, often as the result of a lack of proper equipment. Many of the communities where people are afflicted are very remote and very hard to reach.

Lack of accessibility is also a problem for other communicable diseases, such as sexually transmitted diseases. In the north the STD rates are estimated by the Government of the Northwest Territories Department of Health and Social Services at 10 to 12 times higher than the national average.

Life expectancy numbers are another indicator of the general health levels of a population. Earlier this year the National Advisory Council on Aging, NACA, released its report, which contained more distressing numbers for the aboriginal population. A highlight of the report is that life expectancy for native women and men is 47 and 46 years, respectively, compared to 75 and 68 for the non–native population. The median age of the native population is 10 years younger than that of the Canadian population. The native elderly often experience premature aging, leading to death due to high rates of degenerative diseases.

Native people use much more informal care, family and friends, for certain dimensions of life—meals, shopping, et cetera—than non–native people.

The needs of older native persons for core services, for example adult care services, exceed the needs of the comparable non–native population. Aboriginal seniors residing off reserves are frequently excluded from the communities in which they live and the native communities from which they come.

It is also important to note that the Northwest Territories has the second highest alcohol consumption rate in Canada; five to six times the national average in reported violent assaults; and a suicide rate that is two to three times the national average. These are all symptoms, perhaps not directly related to health, but they have a huge impact on the wellness of a community and as a result have a huge impact on the health care system, either directly or indirectly.

• (1555)

The approach in relating this to the whole health care system is to look at preventive health measures. That is the innovation all levels of government are looking at. Organizations, aboriginal, non–aboriginal, those who live in the north are looking at ways of cutting costs, looking at ways of taking preventive measures and innovative measures that are going to help provide a more efficient and effective system that will serve their people.

One difficulty in the north that is taken for granted in southern Canada is interpreters. In many cases, without them a proper diagnosis cannot be made. Follow–up for major surgery is often difficult because patients have long distances to travel, often to the south. Often the follow–up does not take place for three to six months.

Accessibility is often difficult. As mentioned earlier, people often have to travel long distances away from their families, their primary support system, to receive care. Also, accessibility to medicine and prescription drugs is a problem.

We also have another important issue that aboriginal people and non–aboriginal people in the remote regions really take seriously, and that is nutrition. Nutrition and sustenance for those people are very important. The principal objective, for instance, of the food mail subsidy program is to improve nutrition and health in northern communities, which do not have year–round surface transportation. They are mostly isolated. There is usually air service and prices are from 30 per cent to 60 per cent higher.

Thank God for the country food chain that the aboriginal people have sustained for themselves. This is very important. Last year the government extended the program for one year with a budget of $17.1 million pending a review of the program. The north experiences the highest levels of unemployment, poverty, and child malnutrition. This subsidy only applies to nutritious foods that require refrigeration or have a short shelf life, as well as infant formula, infant foods, and non–carbonated water. The cost of living in the north is currently 30 per cent to 40 per cent higher than anywhere else in Canada, and in some areas it is even higher.

We have a great health system in Canada, and we would like to support it and continue it and make it even better, especially for me in my riding in the Northwest Territories as part of Canada.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to commend the hon. member from across the way for so eloquently describing the plight of the people in her land. Truly, one of the profound tragedies in this country is to see the plight of the aboriginal people, a society that has been wracked in many cases by terrible levels of substance abuse, sexual abuse, interpersonal violence. Health care parameters, whichever way you wish to measure them, are some of the worst in our country.

If we look at the reasons behind this, one of the things one cannot help but look at is employment and being gainfully employed and being able to provide for yourself and your family. The ability to have gainful employment is integral to an individual's self–respect and self–pride. In turn, that imparts a pride and self–respect on the community at large.

A community and an individual cannot have self–pride and self–respect if it is given from somewhere else. They have to take it themselves. It cannot be given by a plethora of social programs from the federal government. These programs, while necessary, are not the answer.

The reason I say that is if you look at the terrible statistics the hon. member from the Northwest Territories has mentioned, you will find that these are mere symptoms of programs and an approach to the aboriginal people in this country that has failed and failed dismally.

• (1600)

We have to work with aboriginal people to enable them to take care of themselves, to provide them with skills training and skills programs that will enable them to be gainfully employed. If we are able to do that, aboriginal people can stand on their own two feet and provide for themselves and their communities. Then, as we just mentioned, the incidence of sexual abuse, violence, STDs and infant mortality would come down.

We have to change our approach, change the direction in which we are looking. This would not be a replacement of essential social programs. Usually we do not have gainful employment in areas that are far removed and very desolate. Sometimes it is possible through the forestry and fishing industries but usually it is not the case.

It is important that aboriginal people be allowed to develop infrastructures and industries that can be self–sustaining in areas appropriate for them. Many northern and remote areas cannot develop sustainable industries that will provide for the needs and demands of people whether they are aboriginal or non–aboriginal.

We are pouring in money to provide for people to live in areas far removed from where they can take care of themselves and their families. This approach must stop because it simply cannot work. Again the duty of the federal government will be to provide aboriginal people with the skills training necessary for them to stand on their own two feet. It is absolutely integral to anybody's ability to have pride and self–respect and to society's ability to have pride and self–respect.

I hope the government does not pursue the same course it and previous governments have been taking for decades. The politically correct thing to say is that we will merely pour more money into social programs and social schemes for aboriginal people, but this will simply not work because it does not address the root causes of why the individuals were there in the first place.

I hope the government takes a very careful look at its programs in the future to try to bring down the terrible parameters among aboriginal people and provide them with the ability to stand on their own two feet in the future.

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak in support of Bill C–95, an act to create the Department of Health, because it is through the Department of Health that Canadians express the values that underlie the Canadian health system. I speak of the values embodied in the Canada Health Act, an act which is the responsibility of the Minister of Health and through her the Department of Health.

The Department of Health is instrumental in protecting and preserving the Canada Health Act and with it the values that underlie Canadian society. The principles of the Canada Health Act, universality, accessibility, comprehensiveness, portability and public administration, are rooted in our common values. These Canadian values are equity, fairness, compassion and respect for the fundamental dignity of all. Canadian society has cherished these values for many years and the concern shown recently by those who feel the health system is threatened clearly indicates those values remain strong.

The Canadian concern for the preservation of our health system is heightened when we hear the Reform Party's position on medicare throughout this debate. The Reform Party's position is simplistic and in reality is an attempt to undermine and destroy the five fundamental principles of the Canada Health Act.

The Reform Party's promotion of user fees will not be tolerated by Canadians. The user fee system advanced by the Reform Party will lead to a United States health care system. This is unacceptable for Canadians. User fees will affect accessibility and universality. Universality is not based on insurability criteria or the number of pre–existing medical conditions that exist in a person. All Canadians are entitled to medically required health services.

• (1605)

The first and fundamental principle in our Canada Health Act is universality. All Canadians should benefit on uniform terms and conditions from medicare. Universality really means that we as Canadians believe we are all the same when it comes to health care needs. It does not matter what our health status is or how big our wallet is or where we happen to live in the country. Everyone who needs health care will be treated the same. This is equity. It recognizes our dignity as human beings and shows we are fair and compassionate people.

Accessibility is the second principle. What does it mean? It means that we should not face any barriers in receiving health care, no point of service charges such as extra billing or user charges. Underneath it means that we practise in Canada what we preach. We say that all Canadians are to be treated equitably and we ensure that they will be. The accessibility principle makes sure that no discriminatory measures can be put in place that would result in Canadians being treated differently. All are to have reasonable access to necessary health care services based solely on need.

I call upon the Minister of Health to enforce vigorously the provisions of the Canada Health Act, to ensure that user fees or service charges are not implemented in any riding in any province in Canada. I wish to go on record today as supporting the Minister of Health in her initiatives to protect and defend the principles set forth in the Canada Health Act.

The principle of comprehensiveness recognizes that Canadians have a range of health care needs and those needs should be met. Delve deeper, however, and we see that comprehensiveness means we practise fairness. It would not be fair to ensure only some medically necessary services and not others. For example, it would not be fair to cover only services that cost catastrophic amounts, while leaving other just as necessary services uninsured. Immunization of a child against measles is just as necessary as a coronary bypass operation. Indeed immunization has society–wide benefits.

Throughout the debate the Bloc Quebecois continuously refers to the intrusiveness of the bill into provincial jurisdiction and reminds us of the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces regarding administration and management of the health care system. The Bloc Quebecois has failed to advise the House of the flexibility that the Canada Health Act provides. Eighty–nine per cent of Canadians including the Quebecois support the Canada Health Act and the medicare system.

The delivery of health care is a provincial responsibility. Canadians respect this and the diversity that it brings. In the end we will all benefit from diversity because a successful innovation developed in one province can be borrowed and adapted by others. For example, let us look at the CLSCs developed in Quebec, the extra–mural hospital in New Brunswick and the quick response teams in British Columbia.

Innovation has never been as important as it is today. During these difficult fiscal times the health system must adapt and change. It must do this at a faster rate than ever before. Innovation is needed to make sure that the health system continues to adapt to changing circumstances. Pressures on the health system are always changing: changing demographics, changing technologies, changing fiscal situations. The comprehensiveness principle recognizes that health systems must be adaptable and allows for innovation.

The Reformers' approach to medicare simply implies that there is not enough money in the system to afford health care in Canada. They address the issue by compromising fundamental and basic values and principles set forth in the Canada Health Act. This is unacceptable. The user fee approach will lead to a United States health care system that is not to be supported in Canada.

Money cannot be the determining factor of success in a health care system. If money were the major criteria the United States would have the best health care system in the world as it spends 14 per cent of its GDP on health.

• (1610)

Based on OECD statistics United States ranks 14th in the world among developing countries. Japan spends the least amount of money in the world on its health care system and Canada spends 9.4 per cent of its gross domestic product on health care. Managing the system, protecting our values and fundamental principles will allow us to save money and to administer health care more efficiently and effectively.

The fifth and final principle is that of public administration. Our health insurance plans must be operated by provincial governments on a non–profit basis. Public administration is the means by which we ensure all other principles. When health insurance is operated and funded through governments we can easily make sure that health care is universal, accessible, comprehensive and portable because we have direct control over it.

After having heard the debate and comments of the member for Calgary Centre I urge him to read carefully Bill C–95. I draw to the hon. member's attention the words health and welfare. For the information of the House, welfare is now to be correctly directed to the jurisdiction of the department of human resources. Human resources is responsible for employment, training and creating opportunity for unemployed Canadians.

On the other hand, health is to remain within the Department of Health. Through Bill C–95, the creation of the Department of Health, the department responsible for the Canada Health Act, we are affirming the principles and values that we hold dear as Canadians. I urge all members of the House to do the same.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The question is on the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

[Translation]

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5), the recorded division on the question stands deferred until tomorrow at 5 p.m., at which time the bells to call in the members will sound for not more than 15 minutes.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Québec—child poverty; the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup—manpower training.

MANGANESE BASED FUEL ADDITIVES ACT

The House resumed from November 6 consideration of the motion that Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): When Bill C–94 was last before the House, the hon. member for Athabasca had 34 minutes remaining in debate.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, in resuming my presentation on this topic I should like to briefly review where I was yesterday when I was interrupted by the vote. As I was saying, when thanking the witnesses who appeared before the committee to discuss in all sincerity and earnestness the topic before us, trying to influence the government's position on Bill C–94, it was very apparent the members of the committee and the government were not prepared or interested in listening to anything the witnesses had to say simply because their minds had long since been made up to support the minister's political commitment which had long since been bought and paid for.

• (1615)

We went on to talk about the issues the minister had raised in support of her bill. Yesterday the member for York—Simcoe had been babbling on about the Reform Party's being in the pockets of Ethyl Corporation, this evil corporation with its head offices in the U.S. That was absolute rubbish.

Right from the beginning as I met with both sides on this issue and discussed their positions, which was more than the minister was willing to do, it became very clear someone was distorting the facts on the issue. Over the summer months I spent a tremendous amount of time researching the information available and judging the information before us. The more I did that the more I came to believe that the positions of the Canadian Petroleum Producers Institute and Ethyl Corporation were correct and that the motor vehicle manufacturers' position was very flawed.

That was brought to my attention through endless studies done in Canada and the U.S. on the subject. It certainly was the judgment of the Environmental Protection Agency, two courts in the U.S., and a lot of independent testing done on the subject.

I went on yesterday to talk about some of the positions and the flaws in those positions put forward by the government, one of which is that MMT causes damage to the OBD II technology in 1996 cars. The evidence brought forward in the U.S. and Canada in the most extensive series of tests ever done on a fuel additive in the world failed to verify the motor vehicle manufacturers' position on that interference of the OBD II systems.

The issue of sparkplug failure was a favourite issue of the minister in that sparkplugs were failing up to 17 times higher in fuel with MMT than in fuel without MMT. We referred to very extensive testing in the U.S. on the subject, independent testing that failed to find any connection whatsoever between MMT in gasoline and the failure of those sparkplugs. The failure of the sparkplugs was an inherent flaw in that particular brand of sparkplug and had little to do with MMT.

When we were in committee and we asked for evidence to be brought forward from the MVMA to show us where this failure of the sparkplugs was proven, it brought forward a number of pictures of sparkplugs. The first was a picture of a sparkplug that looked almost brand new, which aroused some suspicion. Any sparkplug that has ran 50,000 kilometres or more has some discolouring on the porcelain section and does not look like the sparkplug in the picture.

The other picture was of a sparkplug that was very fouled and in terrible condition. The representative from the MVMA pointed out these two sparkplugs were identical sparkplugs used in identical vehicles, one run with MMT fuel and one without. When we took a closer look at the pictures clearly they were not even the same type of sparkplug. They were different sparkplugs.

Immediately we began to doubt the validity of the evidence being presented when presented as one thing when even laymen like ourselves on the committee could very easily see the evidence was flawed, manipulated and not correct. I do not think the claim of the sparkplug failure had much validity, which raises doubts about the entire evidence.

• (1620)

Then we went on to the issue of tailpipe emissions from the vehicles and how they would affect our environment. In the process of the Environmental Protection Agency study and to satisfy the U.S. clean air act requirements for the reintroduction of MMT in unleaded gasoline in the United States, Ethyl Corporation conducted the most extensive series of tests ever undertaken on a gasoline additive. The testing program was designed with the assistance of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and U.S. automakers to evaluate and document the effects of MMT performance additives on automobile tailpipe emissions and to determine the implications for air quality if the MMT additives were used in gasoline.

The initial MMT emission test program involved 48 cars, representing a broad cross–section of automobiles driven in North America, operated for a total of more than three million miles. Half of the 1988 cars used a test fuel with additives and the other half used the same fuel without additives. Tailpipe emissions were checked every 5,000 miles.

In committee various witnesses put forward a lot of very technical evidence. I pointed out earlier that the validity of the evidence concerning sparkplug misfiring was suspect and there was also that same suspicion regarding the data concerning tailpipe emissions. I will give the House another example of that suspect evidence.

In committee the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth, a member of the government, raised these concerns regarding the data presented concerning tailpipe emissions. From the blues of the Standing Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development of October 24, 1995 he said: "What interests me is that this chart shows very clearly that Canadian cars using MMT have a significantly lower NOx emission than those used in the United States not using MMT. Am I not seeing improvements with MMT as opposed to the opposite?"

The witness responded by saying: "I think you are seeing a false improvement as a result of MMT".

The hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth responded by saying: "It is your chart. If that data is false then surely the other data that shows improvements in the emissions of hydrocarbons and CO2s and carbon dioxide, then these other two charts are also suspect. What I am trying to get at is what does any of this data mean? If you say that one is false, are these two therefore right or are they all false?"

In spite of his serious suspicions of the evidence before him this member failed to raise any concerns with the content or validity of the bill in the clause by clause review or at report stage and here we are at third reading. Will the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth now vote to hold the bill until further independent research is done to verify that suspect evidence?

We studied this matter over the summer. The Environmental Protection Agency participated in this test program in determining the test protocols and the definitions involved. Also many independent testing facilities were used to analyse the data using similar protocols and procedures to those laid out by the EPA.

The data were subjected to rigorous, independent statistical analyses to evaluate the impact of the additive over 75,000 miles of vehicle operation.

An additional test fleet of 44 cars of 1992 and 1993 models were tested and yielded similar results to the 1988 fleet. Four models of the 1992–93 test fleet were driven 100,000 miles without any catalytic system problems due to MMT. All the MMT cars met exhaust emission standards at 100,000 miles. Two other 1988 models were also run to 100,000 miles without exhaust failure due to MMT.

These programs took nearly five years and cost millions of dollars. It is the most extensive series of tests ever performed in support of a fuel additive waiver. The evidence is pretty strong as to the effect on tailpipe emissions of MMT.

• (1625)

The next issue in question which has been raised by the minister in the House is health. In committee we heard experts from Health Canada's monitoring and criteria division who presented their conclusions from a December 6, 1994 risk assessment which focused on new epidemiological studies and a Canadian exposure data entitled "Risk Assessment for the Combustion Products of MMT in Gasoline". The study concluded that the use of MMT in gasoline does not represent a health risk to any segment of the Canadian population.

Specifically the report states: "Airborne manganese resulting from the combustion of MMT in gasoline powered vehicles is not entering the Canadian environment in quantities or under conditions that may constitute a health risk". The study also concludes there is no connection between levels of ambient respirable manganese and MMT sales or use in unleaded gasoline, whether examined by geographic area or by season.

The last and probably most important issue in the whole debate in the House and in committee was based on the uniformity of gasoline in the North American market. On April 25 of this year the hon. Minister of Industry stated: "It is crucial that we have uniformity standards". The hon. minister is referring to the fact that at the time MMT was not used in the U.S.A. but was in Canada, and for that reason it was important to have the same gasoline in the North American market.

I would like to know now if the minister still agrees with this statement because the U.S. court of appeals has now ordered the U.S. EPA to grant Ethyl Corporation's application for a waiver, paving the way for the use of MMT in unleaded gasoline in the United States. The EPA has until early December to appeal. Our sources say that is unlikely.

Several U.S. refiners have provided written notice of their intention to use MMT. Ethyl has received orders pending the appeal date from not only the U.S.A. but from Mexico, Argentina, Russia, Bulgaria, Indonesia and Peru. Most of the rest of the countries of the world are still using leaded gasoline, which makes the issue irrelevant for them.

The uniformity of gasoline additives within North America would now require Canada to maintain rather than restrict the use of MMT. If the Minister of Industry still stands by his statement, I hope to see him vote against the bill in the House on third reading. If he no longer stands by his statement, the House would really like to know why he now believes that uniformity in the North American market is no longer crucial.

With this question of uniformity in mind, why do we not hold the bill on the Order Paper until after the appeal period has expired, particularly now since the American automakers have approached Ethyl to do independent testing in the U.S.? Does the government believe the uniformity of gasoline is no longer crucial in North American markets?

The refineries were among the groups that appeared before the committee to discuss this bill and to lobby in opposition to the bill simply because of the increased costs to the refineries in the event of banning MMT. For the benefit of members opposite who seem to be in a great frenzy to promote the use of ethanol in gasolines, the refineries clearly stated that should MMT be banned in Canada, ethanol would not be used as a substitute for MMT. Economics would simply dictate that instead of using MMT a much enhanced refining process would be required which would cause greater volumes of crude oil and greater emissions from the refining process of a number of undesirable elements, including carbon monoxide and sulphur dioxide.

Also concerning environmental pollution, there were a number of studies by Calgary based T.J. McCann and Associates Limited and Environ International Limited of California—MMT is banned by name in California—showing that the likely range of increase in nitrous oxide emissions if MMT were to be banned would be equivalent of adding 32,000 to 50,000 tonnes per year to the environment, the equivalent of putting over a million additional cars on the road by the year 2000.

• (1630)

Last May Environ of California concluded that Environment Canada in the McCann study underestimated the annual increase in tonnes of nitrous oxide emissions that would result from the removal of MMT, saying it would result in between 49,000 and 62,000 tonnes more nitrous oxide into the environment.

Putting these studies into a non–technical format, removing MMT would increase nitrous oxide levels from automobiles by up to 20 per cent, an action which contradicts Environment Canada's environmental management plan and Canada's signing of a 1998 international treaty promising to freeze nitrous oxide emissions at 1988 levels.

Canada's major cities are faced with increased pollution levels. I find it hard to believe the Minister of the Environment is pushing legislation that would increase pollution. She knows nitrous oxide emissions are the cause of urban smog. Therefore she should be supporting any means to reduce nitrous oxide. Now she will probably tell the House that the new OBDs will reduce pollution and therefore will counteract the increased levels of nitrous oxide.

I remind the minister the OBD systems in no way affect the emission or pollution levels. They are simply a monitoring system and will not therefore affect the emission control systems in the amount of pollution they allow into the environment.

I note there is no support for this bill from the provinces, specifically my province of Alberta as well as Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Manitoba. I have also in my possession a copy of a letter from the minister of natural resources from Quebec urging the government to reconsider its position on MMT considering recent events in the U.S.A.

Also, what is truly amazing is the complete turnaround of the official opposition, which supported the government's initiative on second reading. Despite the fact that its members were a rare sight at the committee hearings, on third reading they appear to be supporting our position on the bill and opposing the government.

I and other members of the committee who studied the bill, if open minded, would have to come to these conclusions. The evidence presented as to the effects of MMT on OBD II is at best inconclusive. The use of MMT in gasoline has no detrimental health effect on Canadians, as confirmed by Health Canada. If the use of MMT has any measurable impact on the environment, it would be a positive impact due to the reduction of the smog producing nitrous oxide.

If fuel harmonization in the North American market is crucial, as the Ministry of Industry stated in the House on April 25, in view of recent events in the U.S.A. the bill will not aid in the harmonization but will provide the opposite result.

The bill sets a dangerous precedent for the future of the Canadian environment. If we are to continue the great progress in the reduction of automobile emissions we have seen in the last number of years, we must have a harmonization or a co–operative effort between the auto manufacturing industry and the manufacturers of automobile fuels. If the bill is any indication of the way the auto manufacturers plan to co–operate with the fuel manufacturers, it certainly does not bode well for the future progress in the technology of automobile emissions.

We must postpone passage of the bill while independent testing is conducted on the effects of MMT on OBD II and also to give us time to assess the situation in the U.S.A. after the time expires of the appeal court decision.

Therefore I will be voting against the bill at third reading. I certainly will be watching to see how Alberta's only representative in cabinet and the representative for Alberta's resource industries will be voting, as well as the member for Sarnia—Lambton, who has been amazingly silent on this whole issue, considering he represents the constituency where the Ethyl plant is located and where the resulting layoffs from the government's decision will no doubt occur. I will be watching this very closely.

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise again to speak to Bill C–94, the manganese based fuel additives act.

We have heard all kinds of arguments for and against the legislation now before the House but it is clear there are still misconceptions on the other side.

• (1635)

I will focus on the crucial reasons we seek to ban the use of manganese based fuel additives in Canada. We are doing this because it is good for the environment, good for Canadian consumers and good for Canadian business and workers.

The ban benefits the environment by supporting the latest development in technology for reducing emissions from motor vehicles. That is significant because vehicles are still the largest single factor contributing to air pollution. In recent decades we have seen major improvements made by vehicle manufacturers and fuel producers. These have certainly lowered the amounts of pollutants released by individual vehicles.

During the same time the number of cars and trucks on the road has grown considerably. As a result, gasoline and diesel powered vehicles are still responsible for 60 per cent of the carbon monoxide emissions in Canada. They are responsible for 35 per cent of the nitrogen oxide emissions. They are responsible for 25 per cent of the hydrocarbon emissions and they are responsible for 20 per cent of the carbon dioxide emissions. Given those numbers we must make every effort to lower vehicle emissions for the sake of air quality in Canada.

Certainly we have seen progress since the 1970s. One decisive step was the phase out of lead from Canadian gasoline starting in 1977. Another has been the improvement in fuel efficiency of cars and trucks. Still another has been the introduction of emissions control equipment.

Now we are in the midst of taking another major step, the introduction into our cars and trucks of onboard diagnostic systems. These systems are designed to monitor the performance of pollution control systems in our cars, in particular to monitor the catalyst, and to alert the driver to malfunctions in those emission control systems.

In essence a properly functioning onboard diagnostic system is a built in inspection and maintenance tool. As we know, inspection and maintenance of a vehicle can greatly reduce vehicle emissions. For proof of this we need only look at programs that require vehicles to be emissions tested from time to time.

For example, the Vancouver area has the air care inspection and maintenance program which is conducted on an annual basis. In the tested fleet of cars the programmers reduced hydrocarbon emissions by 20 per cent, carbon monoxide emissions by 24 per cent, nitrogen oxide emissions by 2.7 per cent and fuel consumption by 5 per cent. That is a municipal, metropolitan emissions monitoring system.

The new onboard diagnostic systems which we will have in our vehicles could allow all Canadians to benefit from such emissions reductions. As I said, they are built in emissions monitoring systems. However, there is one obstacle to this: the continued presence of MMT, an octane enhancer currently used in unleaded gasoline.

The automotive industry is convinced that MMT adversely affects the sophisticated new onboard diagnostic systems. It affects the effectiveness with which those systems can monitor the emissions and warn us when emissions are increasing.

This is not an isolated statement or an assertion on my part but the conclusion of Ford, Chrysler, General Motors, Toyota, Honda, Subaru, Nissan, Mazda, Mercedes, BMW, Volkswagen, Volvo, Saab, Lada, Jaguar, Land Rover and Hyundai.

General Motors is a major employer in my riding of Peterborough, employing approximately 8,000 people. General Motors employees are concerned that the investment in the new modern onboard diagnostic systems in the 1996 models not be wasted.

• (1640)

The list of supporters I have just cited includes virtually all of Canada's automakers and importers and all of their workers. When they speak with such unanimity, we need to listen to their message carefully. Their opinion is based on hundreds of thousands of vehicles running millions and millions of kilometres on MMT gasoline in Canada, not on 48 vehicles running a few million kilometres in the United States. This opinion is based on the experience of the producers and users of the vehicles of an entire nation, not of a few cars selected by the EPA in the United States.

Suppose the efficiency of the catalyst in our vehicles' pollution control system is reduced by 50 per cent due to abnormal wear or a manufacturing deficiency. The catalyst is one of the key controls of emissions by our vehicles. The result of this reduction of 50 per cent in its efficiency would be a twofold increase in emissions compared with a properly functioning vehicle.

However, at the present time drivers would be unaware of the increase in pollutants as a result of the decline in efficiency of the catalyst in their cars. They would be unaware of the increase of pollutants if MMT interferes with the proper functioning of onboard diagnostic systems, the systems which monitor emissions from vehicle.

The member opposite mentioned the case of sparkplugs. There are real indications that the use of fuel containing MMT causes sparkplug failures. GM Canada, the automotive corporation which is closest to my riding, reports that sparkplug failures for one particular Canadian model are 17 times higher than a comparable U.S. model. Again this is not some laboratory experiment, not some engines running on a bench in a factory or a few vehicles driving around California being monitored by technicians. This is the opinion of one of the major Canadian automobile producers. It is one of the largest employers in the country.

As I mentioned in my previous speech on this legislation, the federal government gave the petroleum and automotive industries a considerable period of time to get together to sort out this problem. I suggest the federal government has now waited long enough for the fuel producers and the automakers to resolve this dispute between themselves. If we do not act now the federal government's vehicle emissions reduction program will be in jeopardy. We risk missing out on major reductions in smog, carbon monoxide and hydrocarbons.

The time has come to make a decision. Bill C–94 is a decision in favour of Canada's environment.

Members will note the bill helps the environment by improving onboard diagnostic systems and the efficiency of our vehicles. We do not base our argument on environmental improvements simply on the reduction in emissions of MMT. We base them on the effect of MMT on the emission monitoring systems in new models of cars and trucks.

Therefore Bill C–94 is the decision in favour of the environment. It is also a decision in favour of Canadian consumers because it ensures they will have access to state of the art emission reduction technologies. Unless we act now we could face a situation in which automakers will be forced to turn off the onboard diagnostic systems in new models because of the damage MMT causes.

In fact, one manufacturer is already bringing models off the assembly line with the onboard diagnostic systems partially disconnected. Some manufacturers are no longer prepared to pay the substantial warranty costs for damage caused to pollution control equipment. In the end, it is we, the Canadian motorists, who have to pay more to have our cars maintained because of this kind of industry action. The government will not allow the buck to be passed to Canadian consumers. For their sake we need to move now and pass Bill C–94.

• (1645)

Solving the MMT issue signals the government's desire to ensure that Canadians have access to fuel formulations that will not impede the performance of the vehicle emission control systems. We know that this is only a small step in the process of reducing vehicle pollution.

The petroleum industry needs to keep making improvements in the composition and properties of the fuels that automobile engines burn. The auto industry needs to keep making improvements in vehicle emissions control technologies such as those offered through the onboard diagnostic systems that I have just been discussing.

The government, for its share, must act now to reduce pollution by vehicles. Very recently in Whitehorse the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment which includes our own minister of the environment and sustainable development endorsed a report on cleaner vehicles and fuels. The report calls for reducing pollution from automobiles by means of tougher national for vehicle emissions and fuels.

It also calls for actions to improve fuel efficiency and to promote advanced technology as well as vehicles running on alternative fuels. Further, the CCM report recognizes the importance of inspection and maintenance programs to ensure that emission control systems are in good working order. I have addressed that matter and the way MMT relates to it.

By acting on the report Canada will have a new program for low emission vehicles no later than the year 2001 with an earlier phase–in, in harmony with the United States if feasible. There will be new standards for cleaner gasoline and diesel fuel. The result should be significant health benefits.

This Whitehorse report was prepared through a consultation process involving representatives from industry, environmental groups and other stakeholders. What we are doing here today will help achieve the aims of that report. We need to act now. We cannot, as the member opposite keeps suggesting, afford to wait or delay.

In the past year we have heard a great deal about a much wider atmospheric issue, that of global warning triggered by the greenhouse effect. Scientists have concluded we cannot wait for hard and fast proof that human activities are causing an unprecedented climb in global temperatures because by the time we have the proof, we will be overtaken by climate change of possibly catastrophic dimensions. Instead we need to act now on the precautionary principle. There is sufficient evidence to indicate a danger and action now will be beneficial in any case.

The actions we should take to avoid possible climate changes are actions which we should be taking anyway to make this planet a healthier place to live.

Of course, and I accept the member's arguments on this point, MMT use in gasoline is not specifically a global warming issue but the same principle applies. There is plenty of evidence to show the danger MMT presents and if we eliminate its use now there are sure to be benefits to Canada's environment, Canadian consumers, Canadian industry and workers.

That is why Bill C–94 makes such eminent sense. That is why I am going to support this legislation and why I urge all members of the House to support it.

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Madam Speaker, in congratulating the member for Peterborough for his lucid intervention I would like to ask him the following question.

• (1650)

In his view are the interests of consumers, car users and car buyers, in the riding of Athabasca, in the riding of Laurentides or in any other riding of members of Parliament who have expressed opposition or doubts about the necessity of removing manganese from gasoline, well served by those who oppose this bill?

Mr. Adams: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. He draws attention to the fact that this legislation affects virtually every Canadian. In addition to its improvement of the environment, it affects the health of us all.

Every person who has a car or a truck is affected by this legislation. These onboard diagnostic systems which we are discussing and which manufacturers tell us are directly affected by MMT in gasoline add a great deal to the cost of a car.

If the manufacturers fail to hook up the systems, the cost of the car will be the same but Canadian drivers will not have the benefit of those expensive systems although they have paid for them. Even more, they will not have the benefits of the improvement in the environment which will result from proper monitoring throughout the year, day in, day out, every driving hour, the emissions from their vehicle.

I find it unfortunate, given that the federal government allowed the petroleum industry and the automobile industry a very considerable time to come together and discuss this matter. It is very unfortunate that the member opposite reduces this argument to a battle between the petroleum industry which this government supports and Canadians. This is simply not the case.

The petroleum industry in the United States adapted to the ban on MMT very quickly. It has the technology to do that. The larger part of the petroleum industry on this continent has been producing gasoline without MMT in it.

It is extremely unfortunate that the member opposite makes this argument on the basis of these large petroleum corporations that already have the technology to take the MMT out and simply bring Canada in line with what has been the norm on this continent for many years.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of questions for the speaker.

He mentioned that one of the rationales behind banning MMT in Canada is that the North American market, which is much bigger than the Canadian market alone, has been MMT free. The Americans have been MMT free for some time, based on a decision in the United States that prohibited the use of the product.

Now the court decision appears to be allowing MMT to be used in the greater North American market and by far the bigger market will be having MMT starting almost immediately. The EPA has decided not to appeal the decision to allow MMT. Therefore it looks as if the Americans are going to have MMT soon.

None of the quotes from Saab, Honda, GM or other car maker has been tabled in this House. The government will not table them. Rather than forcing this bill, which has no scientific backing, through, would it not be wiser, based on that uncertainty about this greater gasoline market, to hold off on banning MMT in Canada if it is going to be allowed in the United States? I would like the member's opinion on that.

Mr. Adams: Madam Speaker, I thank the member for his question. I know he has been following this debate very seriously.

First I want to pick up his remark about lack of scientific evidence. His colleague, in the speech which preceded mine, referred to rigorous statistical analysis and phrases of that sort.

• (1655)

Members opposite know that an experiment based on the opinion of 27 million automobile owners is based on a very solid scientific foundation. How much better a foundation scientifically than 48 vehicles that have driven three million miles, which is approximately five million kilometres. On the scientific evidence side, I urge the member to bear in that mind. We are talking here about manufacturers who have been monitoring hundreds of thousands of vehicles.

Going back to the member's remark and the Reform Party's point that the decision has been made in the United States, we know that the United States has a very legalistic system. All sorts of groups, particularly large corporations, can take advantage of the system to fight decisions they do not like.

I would remind members opposite that MMT is banned in the United States at present. We will see if it is going to come in. The great state of California, which is comparable in population and has more vehicles than our whole country, has enormous automobile problems. It has been trying to tackle them with many of the most stringent regulations in the world. The state of California has banned MMT.

If and when we see the state of California, which is progressive in this regard, acting the way the Reform Party expects then I think the member will have a stronger base to stand on.

In general, I do not think that Canadians should follow the lowest common denominator. We should aim for the highest standards and try to achieve them where we can. That is what we are doing in this case.

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened very intently to the excellent presentation by hon. member. I have just a quick question.

He mentioned a number of varieties of automobiles. I believe he stated that all automakers in Canada and many of the foreign automakers were supporting this initiative.

Is this something that just evolved in the last month, or two or three months? Or have these studies been ongoing for several months or perhaps years, as the automakers make their plans and directives for new equipment and machinery that will go into their automobiles for future generations?

I wonder if the member could perhaps address that.

Mr. Adams: Madam Speaker, I have to compliment my colleague for the best question I have received.

First, this is based on the many years of experience of our auto manufacturers and importers running vehicles on Canadian gasoline with MMT in it. The sparkplug point is based on experience over that period of time. However they have been forced to do this by the development of the new onboard diagnostic systems. In the same way we monitor the speed of the vehicle or how much gasoline there is in the tank, we can now monitor what emissions are going from the exhaust pipe. Those onboard diagnostic systems are a new, very expensive, exciting innovation in the automobile industry. They have been coming along for some years but in the 1996 models they are particularly sophisticated and expensive and that is what is forcing the issue at the present time.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, a point of order.

The hon. member referred to some studies that included all vehicles in Canada. I wonder if he is willing to table those studies so we can all take a look at them. I am not aware of them and it is very important for the House to have that material available so we can examine the evidence.

• (1700)

Mr. Adams: Madam Speaker, I suspect technically the question is out of order, but I am glad to reply.

I was referring to the experience of Canadian manufacturers over many years and to their monitoring of vehicles. That information is readily available from manufacturers.

Mr. Chatters: You said scientific tests.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): For a member to deposit papers with the Chair there must be unanimous consent.

Mr. Strahl: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The member for Peterborough mentioned prior to the last intervention that he thought the previous question was the best one of the day. I thought mine was the best one of the day.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry but that is not a point of order and the time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Madam Speaker, I welcome this second opportunity to speak to Bill C-94, a bill that as you can see is extremely technical and extremely controversial.

Perhaps I may remind our listeners that the purpose of this bill is to prohibit the use of the product MMT in the production of gasoline. Technically, MMT is currently used to shorten the refining process and the time it takes to reach the octane level the oil companies want. Removing MMT will mean the oil companies will have to use a longer refining cycle. The product is a manganese-based additive that has been used in practically all unleaded gasoline in Canada since 1977.

There are a number of issues at stake here which we should examine very closely. First of all, we have the automobile manufacturers' lobby which, as was pointed out earlier—and most of our colleagues did so—supports the minister's bill. They claim that the MMT in gasoline will clog and cause malfunctions in the so-called OBD II anti-pollution devices that will be installed in cars very shortly, and this is already the case for 1996 models. MMT would be indirectly harmful to the environment, because if the OBD II anti-pollution device does not work properly, cars will pollute more than they should, since with this device they would otherwise run very efficiently.

So MMT is not in itself harmful but, according to automobile manufacturers, it would indirectly harm the environment by impeding the effectiveness of a device installed in automobiles to control pollution.

According to a press release issued by the Canadian Automobile Association on June 12 this year, in 1996 all cars sold in the United States will have to be fitted with a new kind of detection device. This "green" mechanism will ensure that the vehicle's anti-pollution devices remain fully effective over the years. However, if gasoline sold in Canada still contains MMT, these new devices will not function properly, as tests have proven.

I will continue this text later on, but I just want to say that like my Reform Party friends, I also more or less joined in the demonstration given by automobile manufacturers of the tests they had done. I thought it was rather inconclusive, and I have the same reservations as the Reform member for Athabasca who referred to the spark plugs he had examined. I was not convinced by this demonstration.

Second, we asked, and my Reform colleagues are now asking for more serious tests to be tabled in the House, and they have a very good reason for doing so, because we have seen no serious tests to prove these allegations, and I do not think we will.

According to the text provided by the automobile manufacturers, they have decided not to make this new equipment available to Canadians if we continue to add MMT to gasoline. In the final analysis, Canadians will be the ones to suffer, both economically and environmentally, because their vehicles will pollute more than anyone else's.

• (1705)

On the other hand, last spring, I demonstrated to this House that it would be in the interest of the major oil companies primarily if this bill were not passed. They in fact allege that MMT permits gasoline to be produced with a significant reduction in environmental costs at the refining stage. We can readily imagine this: longer refining without the MMT additive means more pollution from the process.

If we believe the figures given my office by the Canadian Petroleum Products Institute, these environmental costs should go up by at least $50 million at the refining stage for these companies.

According to representatives from the oil industry as well, MMT requires less intensive treatment, which means less carbon dioxide, nitrous oxide, carbon monoxide and sulphur dioxide from the stacks of plants producing gasoline. Furthermore, MMT allows refineries to reduce the aromatic cycles of gasolines and thus benzene emissions.

The Canadian Petroleum Products Institute also mentioned that, according to its members, the decision to prohibit the addition of MMT to gasoline must be made on a sound scientific basis, and this is the request being made. They therefore examined MMT from three standpoints: the environment, health and its actual effect on car emission systems.

From an environmental standpoint, according to the companies, the addition of MMT clearly protects the environment. It cuts nitrous oxide emissions by between 15 and 20 per cent, thus cutting smog in cities. There is complete agreement on this point in both Canada and the United States.

From a health standpoint, here in Canada, Health and Welfare Canada has published two reports indicating that MMT in gasoline represents no health risk for Canadians. In the United States, a very decisive decision by the court of appeal confirms it.

Thirdly, from a vehicle emission control standpoint, the United States environmental protection agency has always maintained there was not the slightest evidence that MMT had any damaging effect on the equipment.

So we can understand, when we contemplate the issue before us, in connection with Bill C–94, that, regardless of the fate of the bill, Canada's pollution levels will inevitably increase. We are therefore not faced with a choice between good and evil, we really have to choose between two evils, if I may put it that way. If we remove MMT, the production of gasoline will cause more pollution; if we keep MMT, and if indeed it does inhibit the functioning of vehicle anti pollution devices, we will also increase pollution.

So we are faced with two cases of increased pollution. The question is to decide logically and scientifically which is the better choice. It seems to me that the Minister of the Environment is not usually supposed to choose solutions that increase pollution; it should be the other way around.

Under the circumstances, what is leading the Minister of the Environment to actually decide which of the two solutions is less polluting? The answer to that is: nothing. When you really look at the issue, it does not matter whether you are the petroleum industry, the members of the Reform Party or the Bloc, it is clear that there are no basically independent and scientific data to provide the proof.

We only have to look at what happened with this in the United States to be convinced. On October 20, the United States appeal court for the District of Columbia—we quoted from the text in second reading, I think—decided to oblige the United States environmental protection agency to register MMT as an additive for unleaded gasoline. To date, the EPA has refused. In its decision, the court stated:

[English]

"On November 30, 1993 the EPA found that MMT had no adverse effects on automobile emission control systems".

[Translation]

Of course, we looked at what we had before us at the time. It does not mean that more detailed studies would not prove the opposite, but studies showed that MMT had no real effect. The EPA recognized de facto that MMT did not have a harmful effect on antipollution systems according to the tests which were done before them at the time.

• (1710)

I submit to this House that the Minister of the Environment is supposed to be aware of these facts since—as her Quebec counterpart and our friends from the Reform Party pointed out earlier—several provinces, including Quebec, are now moving in the direction advocated by Reform members. As my colleague from the Reform Party mentioned, the Government of Quebec did send the minister a letter clearly explaining in detail its position on this matter.

The ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeal I just referred to goes on to say, and I quote:

[English]

"For purposes of the resubmitted application EPA determined Ethyl had demonstrated that use of MMT at the specified concentration will not cause or contribute to a failure of any emission control device or system to achieve compliance with the emission standards".

[Translation]

The few tests that were done and submitted to the court show no effects. And we have not heard of any tests that would point to a different conclusion.

It is therefore increasingly evident that MMT will be reintroduced in the making of gas in the U.S.; in any case, there is a chance that it will be. Yet, the Minister of the Environment spends her time in this House talking about harmonizing Canada's environmental decisions with those made in the U.S. and elsewhere in the world. Under the circumstances, by proposing and defending Bill C–94, the Minister of the Environment is contradicting herself somewhat because if we ban MMT and if the U.S. approves this additive within a year, we will then have to reharmonize all these decisions.

The bottom line is that if independent scientific tests showed conclusively that MMT is harmful, I think the House would vote unanimously to ban MMT. But not enough tests have been done.

Given these facts, we have a right to question the environment minister's real motives in introducing this bill and trying to ram it through.

On the one hand, it is obvious that the minister is trying to accommodate the interests of the powerful Canadian automobile manufacturers' lobby which happen to be located for the most part in her riding. On the other hand, the hike in gasoline prices resulting from this legislation, if passed, might prompt many consumers to try alternative fuels, such as ethanol, whose major producers also happen to be in the Hamilton area.

If this interpretation is not accurate, then there is only one explanation. Quite simply, the minister is doing, with respect to the MMT issue, the same thing she did about the Irving Whale: she is improvising. Members will recall that, on many occasions in dealing with the latter issue—and I will not dwell on this either—the minister has shown that she was not qualified to deal with the situation.

I suggest that, then too, the minister claimed to have at hand a load of studies which enabled her to send all other stakeholders about their business, at the risk of causing an environmental disaster. We know what this lead to: $12 million were spent for absolutely nothing, to refloat a ship that is still sitting on the bottom of the river. And these $12 million are coming out of the taxpayers' pockets, and not the Irving's pockets. The problem still remains unsolved as we speak. This ship is leaking and Greenpeace is about to get involved. Nothing has been settled. The whole thing will have to be done all over again. What we are requesting are studies to tell us what is the best way of going about this.

We are confronted with a similar situation in Bill C–94. In order to avoid an environmental disaster, you have to do a minimum of scientific studies to assess the environmental impact of the contemplated measures. Otherwise, you are merely improvising.

As regards the environmental impact studies on MMT, it is increasingly obvious that the rigour of these studies leaves something to be desired. Under the circumstances, I agree with the hon. member for Laurentides, who spoke on this issue yesterday and asked that the bill be deferred to a later date, when more comprehensive studies can establish beyond a reasonable doubt whether or not the addition of MMT to gas creates a dangerous source of pollution.

• (1715)

The provinces pretty well agree that we should wait a little and do the required studies before making a final decision. I am talking here about independent scientific studies which would be public in nature.

Oil companies also support that position. They have been telling us from the beginning: "If there is conclusive evidence that the use of MMT in automobiles is harmful, we will change our whole system". We should wait, as pointed out by our Reform Party colleagues, for the results of the tests being conducted in the United States, before making a decision.

For all these reasons, we feel that we do not have all the required information to make an informed decision. Consequently, we will not support this bill.

[English]

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my good friend from the Bloc made some good points. The jury is still out and the evolution of fuels will continue. We have taken lead out of fuels. We can look at the MMT situation. We have to look at our colleagues in California. The member for Peterborough was right. They are leaders in this field.

I will be speaking to this bill and directly concerning the onboard diagnostic equipment. Vehicles have new onboard diagnostic equipment systems. They are monitoring devices which feed back to the engine to make the engine control the emissions. Coming out of the tailpipe are oxides of nitrogen, unburned hydrocarbons, oil, carbon and water. Every time one gallon of gasoline is burned it produces one gallon of water. If we look at the tailpipe of any vehicle we will see water coming out of it. The use of a three way catalytic converter can control a lot of these things.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is the next speaker. He is certainly entitled to use up the time for questions or comments if he wishes, but he is the next speaker on debate.

Mr. Jackson: Mr. Speaker, I have more of a comment than a question. I understand what the hon. member is saying but there is a point to be made about the onboard diagnostic equipment systems in cars because they could counteract the effects of what comes out of the tailpipe.

Mr. Pomerleau: Mr. Speaker, how appropriate. I went to California during the summer break and I was able to see, as the Liberal member pointed out, how terrible the smog situation is in that state, whose population is as large as the whole population of Canada.

What we are saying is that, to the best of our knowledge, there is no scientific evidence to back up what is implied in this bill, which is that MMT will in fact damage the pollution control system. If indeed California has made its choices a long time ago, it must have relied on some kind of test, and not only on vague ideas. If we could have access to these tests, we would readily admit that we have to ban the use of MMT in gasoline. Passing this bill is not a matter of principle, but a matter of pollution.

If the use of MMT is banned, I know some people believe that it will be replaced by ethanol, but the oil companies have clearly stated that they would not use ethanol as a substitute for MMT. Instead of using MMT, they would require a more enhanced and a longer refining process.

This would automatically lead to an increase in pollution. We are faced with two options: if we ban the use of MMT, we increase pollution due to the gasoline refining process, but, according to the auto industry, if we do not ban the use of MMT, we will damage the pollution control equipment, which will also lead to an increase in pollution.

If we could have some concrete evidence, we would be in a better position to make up our minds and vote immediately on this issue. But we do not have any scientific data, which is why we stand by the position we have taken.

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak about the environment. In the natural environment everything is related to everything else. Looking at the hydrostatic cycle for instance, when water evaporates and goes up in the atmosphere, it mixes with all kinds of contaminants and then comes back to earth.

● (1720)

Photochemical smog is caused by the reaction of sunlight with nitrogen oxide, particularly in Los Angeles which is in a valley. Los Angeles is a good example because it has more cars than any other place. I am not sure exactly why it does not have any mass transit systems. I have visited Los Angeles quite often and I know the damage to the environment is bad. It is broadcast over the radio every day that there is eye irritation from smog, or that people with respiratory problems should stay off the streets.

I am going to address the onboard diagnostic equipment. Most members probably do not have the technical knowledge I have. I understand what they are saying about MMT, that an infinitesimal amount of nitrogen oxide will be emitted. However, I make the case that it could be controlled by installing devices on the vehicles.

I will begin by speaking about what happens in a car. A person gets in a car which uses gasoline and turns it on. Gasoline has potential energy of 19,000 British thermal units per pound or per pint, depending on the kind it is. The gasoline is control burned in a vehicle resulting in pressure, forcing a piston down, turning the crankshaft, making a circular motion to the power take–off to drive the wheels which propel the vehicle along the road.

In a four stroke cycle engine the air comes into the engine through an intake manifold with the intake valve and opens the piston moving down to the bottom of the cylinder, causing a vacuum in the cylinder. Injectors in this case, or if it is a carburetted engine a venturi effect would cause aspirated air in a stoichiometric ratio, which is about 14 parts of air to one part of gasoline by weight, or 9,000 parts of air to one part of gasoline by volume. That is what the computer will try to monitor by what is called a map sensor. Placed somewhere in the intake system of the vehicle is a piece of foil which takes a certain amount of temperature. That foil knows exactly the volume of air which is going into the engine. The injectors are monitored by a computer which says: "I have this amount of cubic feet of air. Give me this amount of gasoline".

During deceleration periods, for instance on old carburetted engines coming down the hill with the throttle closed, a very large vacuum is created and the gasoline gets very rich. Those kinds of cars create a lot of pollution. On a modern car the system shuts off completely because of the onboard diagnostic system. There is absolutely no gasoline getting in, so it works quite well.

On the intake stroke, the piston moves down and the cylinder is charged. The next stroke is the compression stroke. Both valves are closed, the piston moves up and it compresses the thing to about a tenth of its value. Because we are trying to get rid of nitrogen oxide, we have had to lower the compression ratio of engines. By lowering the compression ratio and bringing the temperature up, we can control nitrogen oxide as well.

The piston comes up and compresses the gas to 10 per cent of its original volume. A sparkplug triggers it at a particular time. The timing is changed depending on the rate of speed in order to ensure that when the actual expansion of the gasoline occurs, when the pressure builds up, it reaches a certain angle on the crank. If it happens before or after, the engine fights against itself and it actually loses its power. The sparkplug is triggered to fire at a precise time, again by a computer.

The process takes place very quickly. An engine running at 4,000 RPM has 2,000 power strokes per RPM. If we divide that by 60, we will get about 33 sparks per second. The process would last for maybe one–thirtieth of a second. We can see the process happening very quickly. What happens is that all of that stuff escapes and goes into the exhaust system. It has to be monitored by a three-way muffler, which I will talk about in a minute.

The last stroke is the exhaust stroke. The piston moves from the bottom to the centre, coming up with the intake valve closed and the exhaust valve open. The piston pushes the exhaust gases out of the tailpipe.

In the tailpipe there is a catalytic converter. In that catalytic converter is rhodium. Rhodium actually removes oxygen. There is platinum and palladium. Palladium actually adds oxygen. If we had H_2 coming out and we wanted to change it to something else, we would add O. We could add O by using an air pump, which is seen on some cars, or we could add O by using a computer triggered diverter to pass the exhaust gases over the platinum, adding oxygen, and now we would have H_2O. We have two sets of oxygen instead of one, which changes it into water. If we have CO, for instance, which is carbon monoxide and we want to change it to harmless carbon dioxide, we add O and get CO_2. We have two Os.

This is what the diagnostic pieces of equipment are doing. These speak in hertz. They go back and forth and report to the computer exactly what is happening. If there is a knock in the engine, then the computer knows and it will trigger the spark and retard or advance the spark.

If the contaminants coming from the tailpipe are one thing or another, the oxygen sensor in this particular case will pick it up, tell the computer it is getting too many hydrocarbons and the computer will tell the injector to shut off. That is what we are talking about when we talk about onboard diagnostics.

In the onboard diagnostics, there are things like an EGR valve. An EGR valve is used particularly to control nitrogen oxide. As I have said before, nitrogen oxide is the thing we talk about a lot. We say it is the main smog producer.

One of the ways manufacturers get rid of nitrogen oxide is by using exhaust gas recirculation. The unburned gas out of the engine is recycled back through some mechanisms inside the engine and is burned again. The effect of burning it with the rest of the fuel that is in the engine drops the combustion chamber temperature. By dropping the combustion chamber temperature, it reduces the oxides of nitrogen.

The NOx is also reduced from earlier emissions by using a heat stove. You might have seen on cars where there is an intake manifold and there is actually a heat stove. The heat stove allows either hot air to come off the exhaust pipe directly into the engine or it may mix. At some point in time hot air comes up past the exhaust pipe because it gets some heat off of it and some of it comes in through the snorkel. The two are mixed before the air gets into the engine. On a cold engine it makes the engine warm up very quickly.

On modern cars, the onboard diagnostics trigger what is called an open loop system. Most everyone knows that when you get in a car, you do not pump the gas and do all those kinds of things we did with older cars which had carburettors on them. The reason we do not do that is that the computer and the onboard diagnostics monitor everything. It monitors the temperature. It knows if the engine is cold. If you come out and it is minus 20 degrees, it knows that the crankshaft is not turning because it is not picking up any RPM due to a magnetic device which is triggering it.

The oxygen sensor indicates it has oxygen and the computer reports back in hertz very quickly, the same as brand new computers here, where the speed gets quicker. On these cars the onboard diagnostics are getting very, very quick in corresponding with one another. That is why there is talk about the effects of this onboard diagnostics system.

Imagine an exhaust sensor for instance in the exhaust system. If certain kinds of additives are used in the gasoline and it catches and interferes with the way it records or sends the information back to the computer, it would affect the way the car works. Of course, if it affects it then it triggers other things. What would happen is we would actually get more pollution than if we were using MMT because the thing is not working right.

The onboard diagnostic equipment is very important to us. Onboard diagnostic equipment must be added to cars.

I recently purchased a new car and I have a book here to monitor it. We have to closely monitor the new equipment. Instead of miles per gallon we are getting litres per kilometre. We have to get the amount of kilometres and divide it by 100. For instance, on my new car I am getting about 10.5 litres per 100 kilometres, which is about 27 miles to the gallon. If I am getting 8.5 litres per 100 kilometres, I am getting something like 33 miles per gallon.

We will find that the new vehicles are more fuel efficient than the old ones. The consumer will benefit with onboard diagnostic equipment. Canadians need to have the onboard diagnostic equipment. We do have this argument with fuels, but that argument should be between the automotive manufacturers and the fuel companies, and not this House.

INTERVENOR FUNDING ACT

The House resumed consideration from November 1 of the motion that Bill C–339, an act to provide for funding of intervenors in hearings before certain boards and agencies, be now read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on second reading of Bill C–339, standing in the name of the hon. member for Oxford.

This bill, which is quite straightforward, establishes the principle that a proponent of a project that requires review and approval should assist with funding for interveners who would like to be heard. The hon. member for Oxford suggests adopting the principle that the proponent pays.

On the face of it, we would support the principle of funding groups that want to participate in public hearings, because often, groups that represent less advantaged people in our society cannot afford to go and put forward their views and their interests or pay for scientific studies or even for the transportation to get to the hearings.

Consider the studies required in the far North, for instance, where interveners lack the financial resources to travel, pay for accommodations, and so forth, when defending the interests of the people they represent.

We have seen in the past citizens who were at a distinct disadvantage because they did not have the same resources as large businesses or developers to defend their interests. In fact, these businesses and developers can afford to pay lobbyists on a regular basis to push their projects ahead, while small groups that are not as organized and are not supported by the big guys are always looking for financial support.

In other words, we do support the principle that proponents pay for the administrative costs related to the reviews. However, after examining this bill more thoroughly, we realize it has a much broader scope than it purports and offers few guarantees for the arm's length nature of the process it proposes.

First of all, we should realize that this bill will create funding committees. Some public organizations already have a funding option. One example is the Environmental Assessment Agency established by Bill C–56, which provides for a sort of funding from the government.

How will the new funding panel work with the assessment agency? Naturally the government could save money by having the proponents pay, but why not simply amend Bill C–56 to include the concept of "funding proponent"?

We have to ask ourselves whether the panels proposed in Bill C–339 are not another layer of administrative structures and duplication within the federal system. We can also see in this bill the danger of federal interference in provincial jurisdiction. For example, in Bill C–56, the Environmental Assessment Act, the federal government is clearly meddling in provincial affairs. We could therefore end up with projects assessed by both levels of government with proponents having to pay twice to fund various interveners.

I do not suppose proponents are interested in this costly duplication, which, moreover, delays the whole process of project approval. It is an obvious hinderance and has an impact on our economy and on job creation.

I would now like to consider the independence of the funding panels. According to subclause 4(2), a review authority that receives an application from an intervener for intervener funding shall appoint a funding panel from its membership.

To my mind, this provision reveals that the funding panel is clearly not independent of the review authority. Indeed, what happens when the authority assigned to review a project comes under the authority of a department that is the project promoter?

The best example is doubtless the case of the refloating of the Irving Whale. Do you think that SVP, the Société pour vaincre la pollution and RMPG, the Regroupement madelinot pour la protection du golfe, could get funding through this bill? I have very strong doubts.

• (1735)

People who will be appointed to the funding panel under the authority of the Minister of the Environment will certainly be under pressure from that same minister not to give groups such as the SVP and the RMPG, which are strongly opposed to her project, an opportunity to be heard.

In other words, I believe that the government will have the power to choose which groups it is willing to listen to, and it will be able to reject those groups that do not share its views.

Transparency and independence are lacking in this bill. The concept of funding proponent is good, but the process proposed in this bill is flawed. Therefore, the bill does not achieve its ultimate goal.

About this process, it is worth noting that it appears to be rather cumbersome and complicated. For one thing, the funding panel will have to determine if the intervener is eligible for funding, and from what we can read in clause 4, the least we can say is that interveners will be scrutinized. Also, the bill provides for an appeal process to the review authority and ultimately to the Federal Court of Canada if the proponents and the interveners are not satisfied with the funding panel's decisions.

Knowing full well how slow bureaucracy can be, I am sure that some interveners will be left high and dry. Projects will be completed and interveners will still be waiting for the outcome of the appeal process. The same goes for the proponent. In fact, I wonder if projects will be allowed to proceed during the appeal process. I would like the member for Oxford to answer this question.

Finally, we think that this bill contains good ideas and that the principle on which it is based is innovative, but it has serious flaws.

Bill C–339 is off the mark.

[English]

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today in support of Bill C–339, an act to provide for funding for intervenors in hearings before certain boards and agencies.

I think we all know that politicians at all levels of government are suffering from a serious lack of credibility right now. People feel politicians are not listening to what they have to say and are refusing to tackle the very real concerns that touch their daily lives. They have the perception that government is selling out to the interests of big business. It may well be they are right, but for the wrong reasons. It may well be that the voices of the people are not being heard in many instances because they just do not have the funds to travel across the country to make their views known. They just do not have the money to hire lawyers, experts, researchers, and writers to present their point of view. The interests of the little guy are in fact getting lost in the shuffle.

Over and over people have been saying that they want to have an input into government decision making. We, as a government, have told them that we agree. However, as the Minister of the Environment said during the debate on the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, "It is one thing to say that people have a say; it is another thing to give them the tools to exercise their right."

Bill C–339 addresses this problem in a concrete way. By ensuring funding, it provides the tools necessary for the average citizen, regardless of his or her financial assets, to be heard in the decision–making process. Intervenor funding will assure the public that those with a valid interest will be heard at future hearings and that the public will have input into government decisions.

It is important to note that in drafting this excellent piece of legislation the member for Oxford was able to draw upon legislation that already exists in the province of Ontario. He was not reinventing the wheel. The Ontario government proclaimed the Intervenor Funding Project Act in 1989 as a three–year pilot project. In 1992 the province of Ontario conducted a review of the Intervenor Funding Project Act. This review, entitled "Access and Impact: An Evaluation of the Intervenor Funding Project Act, 1988", showed broad support for the objectives of the legislation. The project was extended to the spring of 1996. I would like to quote from this report, as I think the experience in the province of Ontario is very close to that in the entire country:

> The manner in which many administrative decisions were made in the 1960s and 1970s excluded members of the public, even though many decisions were required to be made in the public interest.

• (1740)

Too often, agencies and tribunals were only presented with the view of the regulated industry or the applicant for an approval. As agencies are now faced with a bewildering array of social, economic and moral questions, a critical view is that excluding diverse interests is no longer appropriate.

Increasing public access to administrative decision making is important for several reasons, first of which is fairness. Decisions regulating the conduct of businesses affect small or large segments of the public. Sometimes individuals are financially affected, each to a small degree, as with telephone or utility rates. Sometimes an individual's health and well–being are affected, as with environmental and food and drug regulation. In principle, if people are affected by decisions they should have the right to be heard.

Second is quality of decisions. Where regulatory decisions affect the public and are required to be made in the public interest the quality of those decisions is improved when members of the affected public participate. They apprise the tribunal of facts that might not otherwise come to its attention. They assert different perspectives and opinions about the consequences of the decision to counter the assertions of the regulated industry. In this way the tribunal gains a better understanding of the range of dimensions of the public interest it is charged with serving. Better decisions result.

Third is accountability. When members of the public participate in administrative decisions they gain an understanding of the balance that is struck between competing interests in reaching a decision. This process improves the accountability of the decision–maker and legitimizes the decisions for those who participate.

I believe these statements fairly sum up the reasons in favour of the bill.

During earlier debate there was some question of the fairness of requiring a private company to finance the group that may kill its application as well as some question of what would happen if the company were financially unable to fund the interveners. Again I would like to quote from the access and impact study:

> We believe that more effective monitoring of the costs and benefits of the process will be achieved if those who are the focus of these decisions, the proponents, are made to bear the costs. It is they who are the centrepiece of the regulated activity. A critical aspect of that role requires effective participation by other interests while ensuring that participation is responsible.

I think it is obvious that a proponent who has to pay for this intervention will suddenly realize that consultation and co–operation and compromise are in his or her best interest, thus reducing or even eliminating the need for the intervention and confrontation.

I urge all members to support this legislation.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to speak today on Bill C–339, an act to provide for the funding of interveners in hearings before certain boards and agencies.

The bill introduced by the member for Oxford raises an issue of extreme importance to the House. The issue of intervenor funding is of great interest to all elected officials. Parliamentarians are the first to recognize that public participation is fundamental to any meaningful consultative process. I believe that organizations that represent a relevant public interest should be able to participate in review processes.

The question that does need to be answered is how do we fund citizens whose views should be brought forth.

• (1745)

It would be useful to the debate to look at an intervenor funding program at work today. I will take a slightly different approach from other speakers on this subject and refer to the federal environmental assessment process which has included a participant funding program since 1991. The need for such a program was identified many years before.

The 1987 white paper on the reform of the federal environmental review process addressed the need and proposed the establishment of a participant funding program. In national consultations carried out as part of the above reform some funding was made available by the previous government. The funds were administered by the federal environmental assessment review office and were provided to participants in the activities of federal or joint panels reviewing such projects as the Sainte–Marguerite hydroelectric development project and the Vancouver airport.

The environmental assessment of large projects subject to public hearings is very complex and often results in several volumes of technical information. We therefore cannot expect informed public participation unless the groups representing the citizens directly affected by the projects have access to funding. Participation in the environmental assessment process requires staff and technical resources for analysing reports, drafting the response, preparing briefs and presenting these views at public hearings.

The participant funding program established in 1991 did not guarantee intervenor funding for all environmental assessments. This was not considered to be fair so the government recognized the flaw and created a statutory obligation to do so as promised in the Liberal Party's red book. Our government listened carefully to many Canadians who indicated that intervenor funding if carefully administered adds value to the environmental assessment process.

Accordingly the Minister of the Environment in Bill C–56, an act to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, put forward as a key amendment a legally entrenched participant funding program that ensures interested individuals and groups have the resources they require to participate effectively in the process. As a result the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act now recognizes intervenor funding as an integral component of the assessment process and creates a statutory obligation to establish a funding program for that purpose.

The Minister of the Environment deserves much credit for making this amendment among others to the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. The legal provision for intervenor funding goes hand in hand with other elements of the environmental assessment process which recognize the importance of public participation. These include the provision of numerous opportunities for public involvement at various stages of the assessment process and the creation of a public registry through which interested persons can have access to documents relating to all current assessments of the environment, both federal and joint federal–provincial.

The participant funding program presently administered by the Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency has many different uses and criteria because public input is crucial and should not be frivolous. The present program makes funds available for different stages of the environmental assessment process. It outlines exactly who is eligible and it describes what kind of activities will be funded. The program is funded over a six–year period and is made up of funds allocated by the federal government.

Bill C–339 brings forward an aspect of intervenor funding that is of increasing importance: who should pay for public participation in environmental assessment. The debate on the issue is diverse in its opinions. There are those who support the proponent pays principle. Others suggest that any more cost to development would be the straw that breaks the camel's back. Others point to the ability to pay based on small versus large size businesses. Many will point out it is unthinkable that taxpayers foot the bill for those who will reap profits. There are diverse opinions in the harmonization of federal–provincial environmental assessment processes. It is certain there is no simple answer or easy direction.

• (1750)

The government has recognized the need to look carefully at process efficiency as well as at all related expenditures. The Minister of the Environment is responding to this need. In last year's budget the Minister of Finance announced a special initiative:

> The Minister of the Environment will develop, in consultation with concerned ministers, provinces and stakeholders, proposals for recovering costs attributable to environmental assessment as well as options for streamlining procedures and time lines for the environmental assessment process.

That is very clear. Since then the Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency has been developing the options in consultation with stakeholders.

What I have just said is a fair mouthful with respect to an environmental assessment process. It has brought in some of the factors that have to be considered in looking at a bill of this import, of this initiative and of this way of looking at how we do things with respect to public intervention, public interest and public hearings.

It has always been a policy of the Liberal government to involve the public. The best example I could give of that is the recent special standing committee on Canada's defence policy where policy was formed from the bottom up. Previously, to my knowledge, it was always done from the top down. The public process in formulating the white paper on defence was very important to this party and is why we did it that way.

Returning to the subject at hand in Bill C–339, if we are looking at cost recovery with respect to public participation, it is obvious that any successful initiative will have to contain certain process efficiency elements. If we are to ask proponents to assume certain costs we must be able to commit to efficiency of process. If individuals or organizations are to pay the cost of public participation surely they must receive some guarantee that there will be a certainty of process.

I have spoken long enough to make the point I wanted to make on the bill. I have used the example of a recent system that is in operation. There are still some questions to be answered. However in looking at Bill C–339 some of the proposals put forward and some of the examples used could be used in the model. The concerns are being addressed and we look forward to the options that will be presented.

Bill C–339 contributes very positively to the debate on public participation by recognizing these concerns. However I caution that we should wait for the completion of the government process I have just described before we proceed, as we say in the navy, at full speed ahead.

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in the House in support of Bill C–339 sponsored by the hon. member for Oxford.

In so doing I need to address the question of exactly what is meant by intervenor funding. I would characterize intervenor funding as up front funding to assist Canadians before they participate in a process to assist Canadians who have real interests in matters of public concern before a board, commission or an agency.

One needs to reflect on the question of who should receive such intervenor funding. The strongest argument can be made that such funds should be available to landowners first and foremost, to people whose properties are impacted by a decision of government and who have every right and responsibility on behalf of their families to participate in a decision by this government or by any government. They have the right to participate to make sure the best possible decision is made and that their rights as property owners and as Canadians are respected.

• (1755)

My colleague has previously spoken about making sure we do not fund frivolous objections. I would certainly support that. All too often people are quick to make frivolous objections and want to intervene in the process. I would not support funding for those kinds of objectors, but certainly there are many legitimate concerns that need to be raised by Canadians and we ought to fund such individuals.

The funding needs to be up front. People need to know they will have an opportunity to hire counsel and various other experts to assist them in their presentations. They need to know that before the fact and not after the fact. To me it really is not legitimate intervenor funding and proper if it is not guaranteed to people up front.

In supporting the bill I do so with some firsthand involvement in the process. As the member of Parliament for London—Middlesex and as the chair of the southwestern Ontario Liberal caucus, and as my colleague for Oxford well knows, I have been directly involved along with him and other members in our region in issues of this type in southwestern Ontario.

We have had several instances of the building of interprovincial pipelines through our region which have involved the public in protracted disputes, the most recent one before the National Energy Board. Landowners are laying out thousands of dollars of their own money having to organize themselves without the help of counsel unless they pay for such counsel. Why? It is because a company wishes to use their lands supposedly for the public good but certainly for the good of the company. Yet the people involved have to make sure their rights are respected.

In the latest example the people went before the National Energy Board some months ago and won the argument they put forward. They made a very good case. Yet the whole question of funding is up in the air for these people and we need to address that.

Perhaps the biggest inequity is that in Ontario there are two sets of rules where landowners are concerned. The first set of rules comes under the provincial government. If a pipeline comes under provincial jurisdiction such landowners are guaranteed that they will have funding provided to them under the provincial rules. However, if the pipeline involved comes under federal jurisdiction there is no such guarantee. It is a very clear and obvious inequity.

In the case of some of my constituents, farmers have two pipelines on their land barely feet apart, one coming under provincial jurisdiction and one coming under federal jurisdiction. When they are involved in hearings before the National Energy Board or other agencies or commissions, they are funded when they go to provincial hearings but are not funded when they go to federal hearings. This seems patently unfair and certainly an inequitable situation that our government needs to address.

I fully support my colleague from Oxford and his Bill C–339. As a Liberal I believe it is the role of government to ensure the little guy has full opportunity to participate on a level playing field with big corporations in society. We have to do everything possible to facilitate that.

It is not enough to say to people that they can appear before the National Energy Board and argue for their rights as citizens. It is simply not enough to do that if they do not have the means to do so, if they do not have the wherewithal to make that presentation. That means funding and that is why I fully support the bill. I think the member is on the right track. The government needs to make sure the playing field is level, that this inequity is addressed and that a landowner, particularly in the province of Ontario, does not have to play under two different sets of rules. The only way we can ensure that is to have meaningful, up front, intervenor funding available to serious Canadians, certainly landowners, who have a legitimate concern and who want to argue that concern before whatever board, commission or agency.

I fully support the bill and applaud my colleague for bringing it forward. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. Gar Knutson (Elgin—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to speak on Bill C–339 as introduced by my colleague representing the riding of Oxford. I take this opportunity to congratulate and thank my colleague for the great amount of work and research he has put into Bill C–339. He truly has done a marvellous job.

The primary objective of this legislation is to give all of those who speak in the public interest the opportunity to be heard before federal boards and agencies. Federal boards and agencies will make better decisions with a higher level of public input, consultation and participation. Bill C–339 is designed to assist those with bona fide concerns. It is not meant to provide funding for special interest groups. It is in the interest of each of us for the public interest to be heard. Bill C–339 will ensure the public interest is heard.

Bill C–339 is modelled after the intervenor funding act in the province of Ontario. The bill establishes the principle that a proponent of a project that requires approval by a federal board or agency should financially assist those who are intervening in the public interest before the board. The bill allows intervenors to put forward their perspective in a way which would allow the board to make a decision having the best information available.

This intervenor funding act will be a significant step forward for groups speaking in the public interest that do not have funds available to make an adequate representation in a highly technical age.

Before receiving funding, intervenors will need to meet the following criteria. First, that the intervenor represents a clearly ascertainable interest that is relevant to the issue before the review authority and that should be represented at the hearing. Second, that the intervenor does not have sufficient financial resources to make a representation without funding. Third, that the intervenor has made reasonable efforts to obtain funding from other sources.

Fourth, that the intervenor has established a record of concern for a commitment to the interest. Fifth, that the intervenor has made reasonable efforts to co–operate with other intervenors who represent similar interests. Sixth, the absence of funding would adversely affect the representation of that interest.

Seventh, the intervenor has a proposal that specifies the use to which funding would be put, has the ability to record the expenditure of the funding and has agreed to submit an accounting to the panel for the expenditure and allow the panel to examine its records to verify the accounting. In other words, the funding would be used to help balance the playing field between those with money, with resources, and those without. It would add an element of accountability for government funds.

Intervenor funding is not a new concept in our country. The province of Ontario currently has an intervenor funding project act which has served as the model for this legislation. The Ontario act was in turn modelled on the funding provided for the intervenors before the Mackenzie Valley pipeline inquiry, known as the Berger commission, in the mid–1970s.

This commission, charged with the duty of investigating the appropriateness of a pipeline through the Mackenzie valley in the Northwest Territories, determined that many diverse interests in the region should be represented at the hearing. In order to compete with the finances available to the proponents of the pipeline, money had to be provided to the citizens groups.

Environmental groups and native representatives obtained funding in order to present their views on how the pipeline would affect their interests. Without funding it would have been difficult for the intervenors to retain technical and legal experts for the purposes of putting forward testimony on how the public would affect environmental and native interests in the north.

The commission made clear that intervenors would have to show that absence of funding would adversely affect the quality of their presentations. This burden is placed on intervenors in this legislation who must appear before a funding panel for approval.

While funding from the Berger commission was provided by the federal government, Bill C–339 does not call on the Canadian taxpayer to provide funding for intervenors. Instead, the proponent of the project will provide the funding. Clearly if the proponent is required to bear the cost of interventions they are more likely to work with potential intervenors to find a solution before going before the board or agency. The Ontario experience has shown the effectiveness of this method of funding.

• (1805)

This bill is important because it is in the interest of all of us that the public interest be heard. Federal boards and agencies will be able to make better decisions based on a higher level of public access and consultation.

Bill C–339 is designed to assist those bona fide concerns. It is not meant to provide funding for special interest groups. I urge all members to support Bill C–339.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this motion refers to a question I put to the Minister of Human Resources Development on Bill C–96, which seeks to give the federal government full control over manpower training.

My question was asked before the referendum. Now that the results are known, I can say that bringing up that question again at this time will give us rather clear indications as to the real desire for change that exists in the federal government, if it agrees to withdraw Bill C–96 or to amend it in such a way that the provinces will have full jurisdiction over manpower training.

This is an opportunity for the federal government to proceed with a meaningful decentralization and to delegate jurisdiction over manpower training. We are frequently asked why both levels of government are so stubbornly determined to keep their involvement in that area. The answer is that one of the two governments, the Government of Quebec, and the governments of all other provinces for that matter, has jurisdiction over education, and that education has a direct impact on manpower, because it includes not only primary, high school and college level education, but also the training of people who are coming back or want to come back on the labour market and want to get better training.

The other level of government got involved in the area of education by using its spending power and misusing, I would say, the unemployment insurance fund. This year, for example, a $5 billion surplus was created in the fund, and the department wants to use that money to meddle in manpower training.

This is a real life situation where useless duplication between governments is very expensive for Quebecers and Canadians and programs that are set up are not always effective. The purpose of our representations is to ask the minister if he could withdraw Bill C–96 or find a way to give to those provinces who want it complete control over manpower.

This is not only a matter of administrative agreements. Such agreements were offered in the past, notably to the previous Quebec Liberal government which, although a federalist government, turned them down, since, without full delegation, it would be difficult for the Quebec government to take on such a responsibility.

• (1810)

This will have an impact on several areas of activity. In taking action, the Quebec government must be able to take into account the impact on social assistance and on other aspects of training, for instance, and, thus, draw up an action plan for several years to come.

If the delegation is only good for three or five years or is not complete, the Quebec government will not be able to ensure the success of its actions. This is why it is hoped that the federal government will agree to delegate the whole area of manpower to Quebec, in compliance with the request made as a result of the consensus reached by the unions, the Conseil du patronat, as well as by all of the political parties in Quebec. Therefore, in these times when the federal government is again promising us change, will it show at last a real willingness to do so?

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is obviously confused as to the intent and scope of Bill C–96.

For example, clause 6 of the bill does not provide the Minister of Human Resources Development with any new powers. These already existed within the predecessor's departments and are simply consolidated to provide a more efficient response to the needs of Canadians.

Clause 20 allows the minister to enter into agreements. Again this is nothing new, as the minister already has similar authority under existing legislation. As the member should know, this authority is very important to serving the needs of Canadians. For example, under the program for older worker adjustment, the minister signs agreements with provinces to set up the program and with financial institutions to buy annuities on behalf of designated unemployed older workers.

This program has been of particular importance to Quebec where in 1994–95, the federal government spent $35.4 million, representing 66 per cent of total expenditures nation–wide to buy annuities on behalf of 1,255 older Quebec men and women. By the end of 1994–95, 4,260 Quebecers were benefiting from annuities purchased under the authority of POWA.

Of course, the federal government will continue to seek out the co–operation of its partners in establishing flexible programs and efficient arrangements. The government has continuously acted in this spirit since its election in October 1993.

For example, the Canada student loans program provides grants to women and persons with disabilities. Quebec has chosen to opt out and runs its own student loans program. In 1994–95, Quebec received a federal payment of over $92 million to do so.

The new Canada health and social transfer will provide block funding to provinces for post–secondary education, health and social assistance. The CHST will enhance provincial flexibility in allocating federal resources according to each province's priorities.

The strategic initiatives program funds innovative projects based on provincial priorities. We were all pleased when the minister announced on August 29 that he had come to an agreement on this important initiative with his Quebec colleague. As a result, an estimated 29,000 additional Quebecers will be receiving assistance over the next three years under the APPORT and Formation professionelle au secondaire programs.

It is clear that the hon. member is more interested in ideology than ideas. This bill is another step forward in the reform process leading to a more efficient and effective government. I urge him to support Bill C–96.

CHILD POVERTY

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I wish to respond to the remarks made by the Minister of Human Resources Development in answering a question on child poverty. Today, I would like to get a better answer than the one the minister then gave me.

When I asked him if he would agree that cuts to the unemployment insurance program and the transfers to provinces would force more women and children to join the ranks of the poorest citizens, the minister simply answered this, and I quote: "One of the real purposes for undertaking a major modernization of our social programs is to tackle the whole problem of poverty faced by women and children".

Those are fine principles. But reality is another matter altogether. Moreover, in conclusion, the minister even had the nerve to recall that the fight against poverty requires efforts by all levels of government, employers, unions, social groups and women's associations.

• (1815)

That is really showing a lack of responsibility. How can we not be totally disconcerted by a government that casually offloads its burden onto all the others, while pretending that it has good intentions?

I want to remind the government, and especially the Minister of Human Resources Development, to whom history will attribute the indecent increase in the number of poor women and children in Canada and in Quebec, that the massive cuts and the shameless manipulation of the unemployment insurance fund have a direct and unavoidable consequence: they increase the number of welfare recipients.

It is not hard to understand. In Quebec alone, last July, 477,771 households were on welfare. In Quebec alone, as a direct consequence of the current government's ineptitude, there are almost 50,000 new social welfare recipients since it came to power. In Quebec alone, 249,567 children count on welfare benefits for their very survival and are suffering the consequences. That is more than a quarter of a million children. And the minister has the gall to tell us that women's associations must do their share. He has the gall to tell us that social groups must also do their share.

This government must review all the cuts it wants to make. It must look at them through its gender analysis prism it has been boasting so much about on the international scene. The social program reform so dear to the minister would not stand up to such an analysis very long, and that is why his government is waiting so long to implement it. The conclusion is obvious: the reform will clearly penalize women and children the most.

This government must work to reduce poverty among women and children, and not to increase it, as is currently the case.

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is very concerned with poverty among Canadian children. Of particular concern are the six out of ten lone parent families headed by women who live in low income situations.

The best security for children is for their parents to have jobs. Consequently, the government is working diligently to establish conditions that create full time employment. As a result of these efforts, women now occupy more than half of the 505,000 new full time jobs that have been created across Canada since October 1993, as well as the 142,000 jobs created in Quebec.

For those who have not yet found employment we have introduced a higher benefit rate for unemployed poor families. This benefit rate is now providing up to $1,000 more in benefits for these UI claims. As of July 1995 over 383,000 Canadians have benefited from the 60 per cent benefit rate, including nearly 300,000 women. In Quebec over 110,000 claimants have received the 60 per cent benefit rate, including over 85,000 women.

The government intends to present shortly a new program of employment insurance, which will better help unemployed Canadians find jobs. As the Prime Minister stated in a speech on November 1, "We have to change the focus because we want to give a dependable security for the people who are raising families on low incomes".

Beyond these changes the Department of Human Resources Development has launched a series of strategic initiatives with provincial and territorial governments. In Quebec the federal government is supporting a major initiative to help over 25,000 parents make the transition from social assistance to work. Federal support of up to $54 million will be provided for the wage supplementation program in the next four years.

In the member's own riding of Quebec there are several human resources development projects under way involving approximately 400 women, which are aimed at helping them overcome the difficulties in order to enter the labour force.

The federal government continues to take serious and concrete actions to improve the well–being of Canada's children. Through reform of social programs at both the federal and provincial levels more can be done to tackle the serious issue of child poverty.

TAKE OUR KIDS TO WORK DAY

Ms. Jean Augustine (Etobicoke—Lakeshore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to recognize Wednesday, November 8, 1995 as Take Our Kids to Work Day.

Today over 153,000 Ontario students will accompany a friend, parent or volunteer sponsor to their workplace in an effort to learn about the demands and opportunities of the working world. The program is an initiative of The Learning Partnership which provides students with an interactive hands on work experience in a field of interest to them while emphasizing community responsibility for the future of our young people.

I would like to welcome Anne McGuire, a grade nine student from Bishop Allen Academy in my riding of Etobicoke—Lakeshore. Anne is spending the day here in my office on Parliament Hill to further her interest in politics. Perhaps at some time in the future she will join us here as a colleague in the House of Commons.

VETERANS

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the week of November 4 to 12 has been set aside to honour those Canadians who fought and those who died in two world wars, in Korea and in peacekeeping missions.

When veterans returned home from Europe 50 years ago they were filled with hope, pride and optimism. They were ready to build a strong Canada. How disappointed these veterans must be today. The country they were willing to give their lives for is $567 billion in debt and is in danger of breaking apart.

If action is not taken immediately to solve the debt crisis, to build a new Canada within a new federalism, to reform health care, the Canada pension plan and unemployment insurance, if we do not put justice back in the justice system and make Canadians feel safe on their streets and in their homes again, the efforts of those valiant Canadians will have been in vain.

REFORM OF FEDERALISM

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce, Ind.): Mr. Speaker, if our political leaders in Canada have not grasped the very clear message sent by Quebecers on October 30, they will have to live with the consequences. Quebec wishes to regain its proper place within the Canadian context. Rather than being purely symbolic, the proposed changes should respond to the legitimate and traditional demands of Quebec.

People of Canada, the steps that are taken must be in harmony with what has been said in recent weeks. Let us put an end to double talk. Federalism as we know it must be reshaped; moreover, Quebec is not the only one calling for federal withdrawal from areas of provincial jurisdiction. More than ever, we must demonstrate a desire to make the changes necessary for national unity, while respecting our differences.

TAKE OUR KIDS TO WORK DAY

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to announce the addition of a high powered office consultant to my constituency staff for one day, Mr. Travis Dolinski, who is participating in the program called Take Our Kids to Work.

Today in Ontario over 153,000 grade nine students are at work with a parent, guardian, relative, friend or volunteer host. They are all experiencing possibly for the first time the challenges of the workplace. They will spend a day on farms, in hospitals, factories, offices, retail stores and many other places of work.

Often students do not fully understand the links between education and work and how important successful work is to their future. Through this exposure they will see the value of a good education in our rapidly changing workplace. They will begin to think about the choices they will have to make and the paths they must follow to meet their career goals. They will also better appreciate what their parents do to provide them with the necessities of life.

With the co–operation of Erie riding's business and industry, our youth will have an informative, fascinating and stimulating experience. I encourage my colleagues to support this program or similar ones in their ridings.

HEART RESEARCH

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to remind colleagues of the leading role Canadian doctors play in the advancement of heart research.

In a report to be published in the European Heart Journal this November, Canada is cited as one of the top three research leaders in the field of cardiology despite ranking 13th in expenditure on research and development per capita.

[Translation]

This year, Canadian physicians again made an enormous contribution at the congress of the International Society for Heart Research, held in Prague.

[English]

I was especially delighted to note the achievement of Dr. Naranjan Dhalla of Winnipeg who has served as president of that body for the past 25 years. Dr. Dhalla was identified at the congress as "the person primarily responsible for the remarkable development of the International Society for Heart Research". In fact, with the assistance of others he was also able to bring the 17th congress of this prestigious association to Winnipeg for the year 2001.

CANADA REMEMBERS

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this Saturday, November 11, communities across Canada will be holding special commemorative ceremonies in honour of Canadian veterans to let them know Canada remembers their valiant deeds.

In this century alone, over 100,000 Canadians have given their lives in the service of their country. Some remember these Canadians as friends of their youth, as comrades in arms in the service, some as mothers and fathers, or brothers and sisters, or spouses.

It is also a time for all Canadians to remember and pay tribute to those who purchased peace and freedom for us through their sacrifices, their suffering and with their lives.

We are what we are today, we have what we have today because of the people we honour on Remembrance Day. Throughout Carleton—Charlotte and indeed across Canada we will always remember them and their deeds.

MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in response to a question on the unacceptable actions of certain soldiers at Petawawa in celebrating, on at least two occasions, the terrible events at the Ecole Polytechnique, the minister of defence made remarks that were insulting, degrading and unworthy of his position.

Rather than condemning his soldiers' actions unequivocally, the minister unleashed his full contempt upon the Bloc, accusing its members and all sovereignists of racism.

• (1405)

In so doing the minister is insulting the half of the population of Quebec which voted yes in the referendum, continuing the mudslinging campaign begun by the Deputy Prime Minister last week. These statements are disgusting and demonstrate the minister's insensitivity toward the murder of young women in an incident which outraged all Canadians.

The minister must stop making statements which are unacceptable from a representative of the people, and must provide serious responses to the legitimate questions asked by the official opposition.

JUSTICE

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have continually asked how bad can it get. Now they are asking how much worse will it get. They are talking about violence and the fact this justice minister fiddles while Canadians burn.

Two teens club to death a retired senior couple. The justice minister cancels a meeting in their riding and continues to fiddle. A 10–year old girl is kidnapped and murdered by a known dangerous offender. The justice minister plays the same tune. Now in our nation's capital youth gangs with adult leaders are gathering. They use torture chambers to kill and maim our youth. Obviously the justice minister has not the will nor the courage to get with it and do his job.

Here are some suggestions. Scrap the Young Offenders Act. The act does not provide for proper correction for young offenders. Publish the names and pictures of violent youth, especially violent gang members. Let Canadians know whom they should protect themselves from. Scrap the politically appointed parole board. Let the frontline workers decide who is ready to return to society.

This Liberal minister and his justice system have failed. Now is the time for a new Canada with new—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine.

DENISE MEEHAN

Ms. Maria Minna (Beaches—Woodbine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to acknowledge the dedication and hard work of a constituent from the riding of Beaches—Woodbine.

In mid October Ms. Denise Meehan, the founder, president and sole shareholder of Lick's Ice Cream and Burger Shops won the quality plus award in the 1995 Canadian Woman Entrepreneur of the Year awards. In winning the quality plus award Ms. Meehan has demonstrated the ability to develop and maintain excellence in every aspect of her company's offering to her customers, employees, the community and the environment.

Ms. Meehan has six Lick's locations in the Toronto area as well as six franchises in the cities of Sudbury, Ottawa and Fort Lauderdale, Florida.

Ms. Meehan constantly pays attention to staff development and customer concerns. She believes that instilling good work habits, life skills and a caring attitude toward customers and the community fosters creativity and self–confidence.

I commend Ms. Meehan for her outstanding contribution to small business development in Canada.

THE LATE BERNIE NEWMAN

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Bernie Newman, a former Liberal MPP for Windsor—Walkerville, passed away on Monday night.

Bernie was a teacher, an Olympic gymnastics coach of some renown, a great family man as well as a tremendous advocate for the city of Windsor.

Bernie believed in what he called positive representation which he defined as follows: "Positive representation is standing up on the floor of the legislature and hammering at problems others would like to ignore. It is overcoming indifference and getting action. It is the proper combination of the enterprise and energy of youth together with the weapons of experience".

Throughout eight successive victories and 28 years at Queen's Park, Bernie is best known for his commitment to and his love of his constituents. They kept sending him back to represent him over all those years. I do not know very many people living in Windsor—St. Clair during the years of Bernie's tenure at Queen's Park who did not receive cards or letters from him for anniversaries, birthdays and in sympathy.

I know all members of the House will join me in offering condolences to the Newman family and in honouring the memory of Bernie Newman.

NATIONAL SPIRIT OF PEACE RUN

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to draw attention to the National Spirit of Peace Run which has been happening in cities across Canada and which will be concluded tomorrow by a commemorative ceremony here on Parliament Hill and at the peacekeeping memorial.

The peace run is an activity organized by the Canada Remembers program as part of veterans week. I am pleased to say that in every city the run has brought together Canadians of all ages in a tribute to those who served our country during wartime.

Peace torches were carried in each city. These torches have been transported to Ottawa where they will be carried by second world war veterans to the centennial flame during a very special ceremony tomorrow that will celebrate Canada's continuing commitment to peace.

The ceremony will represent the passing of responsibility for peace from the young men and women of 50 years ago who defended it to the young men and women of today who will continue to protect it in peacekeeping missions around the world.

HELICOPTER PURCHASE

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today the Minister of National Defence announced his plans to rent or purchase 15 new search and rescue helicopters at a cost of approximately $600 million.

The minister was unable to give any guarantees this morning that the new helicopters would be less expensive than those the Conservatives planned to buy.

Even worse, there will be no Canadian content requirement for bidders. When we know that the aerospace industry is based mainly in the Montreal region and that barely two months ago, the same minister awarded, without tender, a $2 billion contract for armoured personnel carriers to Ontario, this is simply outrageous.

The minister announces his expenditures on military equipment in dribs and drabs. How much will the final bill be, including on board helicopters and submarines, the next items on his shopping list?

While this government slashes social programs and unemployment insurance, the army gets the royal treatment. This says a lot about the priorities of this government.

GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last week in Vancouver the Deputy Prime Minister attacked my suggestion that the prompt and unconditional devolution of some government functions to provincial governments would meet the aspirations of Quebec and other provinces and therefore would keep the country together.

My constituents have been irate over this attack. They feel the minister's objections reflect her party's elitist attitudes and callous disregard for the wisdom of ordinary Canadians, which have led to a near break-up of the country.

What exactly does the federal government know that the provincial governments do not know better about manpower training, cultural, medical, language and other policies for the benefit of their citizens who hold them accountable at every election?

My constituents are happy to be Canadian and have Ottawa remain responsible for the policies it can carry out best, but they are tired of having distant politicians and bureaucrats run their affairs. Pay attention, Liberals, before it is too late.

CREATION OF A COMMITTEE ON CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis-Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the creation yesterday of a committee on Canadian unity is typical of the makeshift policies that are bogging down the government.

During the final days of the referendum campaign, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans invited Canadians and big business to violate Quebec's referendum act by spending millions of dollars in a last ditch effort to win a victory for the no side. He is a member of this new committee.

The Minister of Indian Affairs has on several times mentioned the possibility of dividing Quebec's territory. He is on this committee.

And last week, the Minister of Justice wanted to resort to some outdated legal tricks to prevent Quebecers from voting again on their future. He is on the committee as well.

Because the government cannot keep the Prime Minister's referendum promises, it creates a committee of ministers who openly took positions that were hostile to the aspirations of Quebecers. As a result, the committee's credibility will be almost nil.

1995 GREY CUP

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, November 6 the leader of the NDP, Alexa McDonough, and I had the honour of touring the site of the 1995 Grey Cup, Canada's national football championship. The Grey Cup is being held at Taylor Field in my constituency of Regina—Lumsden on November 19. It is already a huge success with over 52,000 tickets sold.

From November 15 to November 19 the citizens of Regina welcome all Canadians to the best Grey Cup celebration the country has ever seen. Thanks to thousands of volunteers, Grey Cup 1995 is expected to be a tremendous success. Special thanks go to the Saskatchewan Roughriders football club, the Grey Cup committee and its executive director, Ken Thomas, along with the Grey Cup board of directors and executive committee members.

The theme of this year's Grey Cup is "Huddle up in Saskatchewan". I invite all members of Parliament and all Canadians to catch the spirit of Saskatchewan and experience our famous western prairie hospitality. Join us in the huddle for one terrific celebration in Regina. If they cannot make it to the celebrations—

THE MEMBER FOR FRONTENAC

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, my friend the Bloc member for Frontenac again demonstrated his complete ignorance of Canada and its people.

The hon. member implied that the National Citizens Coalition speaks for the real English Canada that came to demonstrate at a rally in Montreal a few days before the referendum.

This statement shows how far removed separatists are from the real Canada. First of all, he ought to know that the vast majority of the 150,000 participants in this rally were from Quebec.

• (1415)

Second, unlike the separatists, the participants in this rally will not renege on their commitment to recognize Quebec as a distinct society.

There was no Jacques Parizeau in the crowd to say: "I could not care less about your distinct society".

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, whereas many people, strangely enough, joined together prior to October 30 to promise Quebec constitutional changes that would satisfy it, all attempts to fulfill these promises have failed one after the other, in the days following the referendum. In desperation, the government yesterday announced the creation of a mysterious committee, but nobody yesterday knew its make–up, its mandate or the deadline it must meet.

My question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. Was the hasty set up of a committee to study the question of constitutional and administrative changes to the federation not the result of the government's inability to find a way out of the dead end it found itself in because of the commitments made by the Prime Minister and the fierce opposition by the provinces, certain ministers and certain members?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the promises the Prime Minister made regarding changes in connection with the distinct society, in particular, are promises the Prime Minister will keep.

Obviously, the Bloc Quebecois has no interest in these promises being kept, since their aim is to destroy the country. However, if we look objectively at events in recent years, we will see there have been significant changes in the federal government. We also know that the Leader of the Opposition has said he is not interested in discussing change of any sort until after a yes vote in the referendum.

Therefore, the opponents of change benefitting Quebecers are the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we do not need to look too far back in the course of events to discover that those who oppose the Prime Minister's commitments are those sitting on that side—in the caucus and in cabinet—and the provincial premiers.

Should I also remind the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs that the job of the Bloc Quebecois at the moment is to ensure that Quebec is not cheated again, as it has so often been in the past?

The Deputy Prime Minister said yesterday that the federal government could move without necessarily seeking provincial approval, because, in any case, Quebec could block any initiative. Are we to understand from her remarks that the federal government has once again decided to work secretly to come up with a proposal it will then try to impose on Quebec?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the allegations by the member for Roberval are clearly in error.

With regard to the distinct society, it was the leader of the Parti Quebecois himself who said: "Stop bothering me with this idea of a distinct society". This is a matter of public record and contradicts what the member for Roberval has just said. So, he is the one opposed to a distinct society and not our Prime Minister.

Furthermore, in talking about negotiating the best for Quebec, let me read you, Mr. Speaker, what Lucien Bouchard himself said—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1420)

The Speaker: My dear minister, I would ask you to give this man's title.

Mr. Massé: Mr. Speaker, on the subject of negotiations, the Leader of the Opposition said the day they would be at a table would be the day after Quebec had voted yes in a referendum, which he hoped would be held in the very near future. This reveals very clearly that the Leader of the Opposition does not agree with 73 per cent of Quebecers, who indicated they wanted negotiations on Canada's future.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, are the accusations by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and the government's phoney committee whose establishment was announced yesterday not simply delaying tactics aimed at keeping a lid on the profound division not only in the Liberal caucus, but in cabinet, where a number of members are still under the influence of Pierre Elliott Trudeau?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I made no accusations and I based each of my statements on remarks made by the leader of the Parti Quebecois and the leader of the Bloc Quebecois.

Furthermore, in the committee that was struck, we are going to try to find a solution to the problems the country is facing, one that will help Canadians, including Quebecers. And the Bloc Quebecois is opposing our efforts at finding a solution to the present problems and is opposing the resolution of difficulties in jurisdictional matters, despite the fact that the majority of Quebecers indicated in a democratic decision that they did not want to leave Canada.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. All observers are still wondering what kind of logic prompted the federal government to think it might be helpful to set up a committee of ministers in charge of reviewing the possibility of making constitutional and administrative changes to the Canadian federation. Many people have questions, but few ministers can answer them.

How can we believe that this phoney committee can propose acceptable changes to Quebecers, when the real decision makers, that is, the provincial premiers, are not even on it?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, those who want to find a real solution to the problems met to set up a working group whose mandate is to look at possible changes.

It is clear that the official opposition—whose goal, as its leader indicated, is to break up the country—has no interest whatsoever in co–operating or in finding something positive to say about the working group we have set up. Yet, this working group is clearly needed to make a list of the changes required to reconcile all Canadians.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, on Radio–Canada's Téléjournal, the Deputy Prime Minister made this short statement: "We are now trying to make it possible to fulfil the promises made by the Prime Minister". Let us be frank.

Is the creation of this phoney committee not simply a federal trick to allow the Prime Minister to save face, since he is unable to deliver the goods and to meet his commitments?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during the campaign, the Prime Minister made promises with respect to distinct society and the right of veto. The Prime Minister said he would keep these promises. Our Prime Minister is a man who has kept his promises in the past, and people believe in his integrity.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, for months before the Quebec referendum the government went to sleep on the national unity issue, failing to provide a strong federalist vision of strategy to counter the separatist dreams and strategy. Then the government got the mother of all wake up calls on October 30 and the Prime Minister belatedly decided to act on the demand for change inside and outside Quebec.

• (1425)

Now, a week later, we find the government going back to sleep. Instead of offering leadership it falls back on a tired, old precedent of appointing a top down, closed door committee to come up with some post–referendum strategy.

My question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. What on earth happened to the sense of urgency that the Prime Minister expressed on October 30? By what date will this cabinet committee have something intelligent to report to the House?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is curious to hear the Reform Party complain about the unity task force.

Who wrote the 20 points in the Reform constitutional plan? Was it the committee or was it a submission by one of the Reform members? Did their leader agree without consultation with the party and without consultation with the people?

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the constitutional proposals in Reform's new confederation package have been under discussion with the Canadian public for five years. It came from the bottom up, not the bottom down.

The fact remains that the only government response to the Quebec referendum thus far has been to start down the same rocky road that led to the failures of the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords by establishing a top down, closed door committee of cabinet to develop unity proposals without the involvement of Canadian people. This is the process that doomed Meech, doomed Charlottetown and will doom this post–referendum strategy unless the public is involved.

What specifically does the government intend to do to bring the Canadian people, the ones who pulled the no vote out of the fire, into the development of its post–referendum strategy?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when we talk about the will of the people I think the leader of the third party should remember that the Charlottetown accord passed in his riding. If he were expressing the will of the people he represents he would be in favour of these negotiations.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Chamber and the National Press Gallery have become dangerously complacent about the failure of government ministers, including this minister, to give direct answers to straight questions. Maybe he can do that on a thousand different subjects and it is considered clever in the Chamber although it is not considered clever outside. If the government fails to directly answer straight questions on the issue of the unity of the country, it is playing with the life of the country and it will earn the just contempt of every Canadian who cares about the unity of the country.

I will ask my question of the minister once again and I will go slowly. What specifically does the government intend to do to bring the Canadian people into the discussion of its national unity proposal?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if we ask straight questions we get straight answers. If we ask contorted questions unfortunately we get contorted answers.

In this case if the question is what is the mandate of the committee, the mandate of the committee is very clear. The promises the Prime Minister mentioned during the campaign will be kept. At present we are looking at various ways in which governments could be made more effective. This is part of the changes we have carried through with the government in the last two years and this will continue.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. On the government's phoney committee, we have the Minister of Justice, who, last week, was looking for legal means to prevent Quebecers from voting again on their future, the minister of fisheries, who urged thousands of Canadians to act in violation of the Quebec referendum act, the minister of Indian affairs, who raised the possibility of dividing Quebec's territory, and the Minister of Canadian Heritage, who will not recognize that Quebecers are a people.

• (1430)

Under these circumstances, how can this committee come up with anything that would be acceptable to Quebecers?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when official opposition members refer to a phoney committee, it is clear that they are choosing words that have no connection with reality, just to discredit a tool used by the government to try to improve the situation.

Again, this comes as no surprise to me, since the self–appointed role of the official opposition is to destroy this country, which strips it of any credibility when it comes to looking after the interests of Quebecers. We are the ones looking after the interests of Quebecers by respecting the wish of the majority, which is to find, within Canada, ways of making the federation work better.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): This is the whole point, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister admit that, in this committee, the interests of Quebecers will be looked after only by ministers who said repeatedly over the past two years that Quebecers did not want to hear about the Constitution?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again, I think it is pointless to keep answering questions from the opposition, whose sole goal is to promote the destruction of this country, and not to help Quebecers.

We, on the other hand, have established a commission which has been mandated, in accordance with the wish clearly and democratically expressed by Quebecers in the referendum, to find solutions within the Canadian federation.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is an understatement to say that there was a massive breakdown in security at 24 Sussex over the weekend. With every passing day the revelations get more bizarre and Canadians are rightly concerned and angered.

We have just learned that the Mounties guarding 24 Sussex that night were inexperienced, having received only a couple of months' training. At least one of them had been called from the RCMP musical ride.

I ask the Solicitor General of Canada this. What sort of training did these officers receive and who was responsible for putting these people in the position of gatekeepers at 24 Sussex?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Mr. Speaker, I have already reported to the House that a full investigation into the circumstances of the incident and what steps should be taken to make sure it is never repeated is under way.

I expect this investigation will be completed and a report available to me by the end of the week. In light of that I will have a lot more to say about this incident which is certainly something that should never have happened and something I never want to see happen again.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on the same night this tragedy happened, in Israel the security force resigned; its members have either been thrown out or they have resigned.

Why can that not happen here when our Prime Minister's life was in great danger that night? Why was the intruder not spotted? Why did it take seven minutes for the RCMP to respond? Why did the RCMP secure the perimeter of the place without securing the Prime Minister?

More amazingly, none of the three senior officers who are on emergency standby duty 24 hours a day with cell telephones answered when Mrs. Chrétien made the emergency call. They were not available. They did not answer their phones even though they were on 24–hour standby emergency duty.

Will these senior officers be held accountable? Can the solicitor general assure the House, without the report having even been tabled, that junior officers will not take the fall for their superiors?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the important thing is to determine in a factual way all the circumstances and then to put steps in place to make sure the incident is never repeated.

This is what we are doing. This is what is going to happen. I hope to have the support of my hon. friend if she is serious about this.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Yesterday, when asked about the mandate of the cabinet committee, the minister could only say that the committee was going to look at all the possibilities for constitutional and administrative changes in the Canadian federation.

I put my question to the minister in the hope that he will provide an answer. Can the minister tell us if the proposed resolution to recognize Quebec's distinct character, as well as the bill on regional referendums, are among the options which his committee will look at?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again, the commitments made by the Prime Minister during the campaign concerning a distinct society clause and a constitutional veto for Quebec will be fulfilled. Our committee will also look at non constitutional measures, so as to not overlook any means to make our federation more effective.

This is what we will do in the coming months. We should not pre–judge the results. We, at least, are working in the best interests of Canadians and Quebecers.

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the minister admit that, if the government gave such a wide and vague mandate to its committee, it is because it wants to keep all the doors open? The government obviously does not know how to fulfill the commitments made to Quebecers by the Prime Minister during the referendum campaign?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. The commitments made by the Prime Minister during the campaign will be fulfilled and we will review, with dedication, the changes that could be made to improve the way Canada works.

Again, in establishing this committee, the government shows that it cares for the well–being of Canadians and Quebecers. As for the opposition, it has clearly indicated, through its leader, that it is not interested in negotiating, and that its only goal is to destroy our country.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as usual I am asking questions concerning the Minister of National Defence's mismanagement of his portfolio.

This morning the military police revealed documents alleging fraud by the chief of the defence staff. Access to information documents show the CDS has misused public funds.

Canadians have serious problems with the defence department's continually having to investigate itself because of the minister's mismanagement.

Has the CDS offered his resignation or has the minister demanded the resignation of the CDS?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member goes on so many fishing expeditions that it is very difficult to keep up with him most of the time.

As everyone knows, the chief of the defence staff is a distinguished individual who has served the country well. He will be leaving at the end of December. If the hon. member has any charges to level, I hope he will do it in the appropriate place.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today we have strong evidence against at least two of the minister's senior officials, the chief of the defence staff and Lieutenant–General Boyle, who has denied the existence of documents which have surfaced with his signature on them.

Was the minister's helicopter press conference today a feeble attempt to divert the attention of Canadians away from yet more reports of corruption, deception and misconduct by officials surrounding the minister?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe my ears when I hear the hon. member from the Reform Party. He has been urging the government to re–equip the forces yet criticizes the making of this very key announcement of providing new search and rescue helicopters to the armed forces.

On the matter of the access to information inquiry, the hon. member knows the department came to the person who requested the information and stated there were some irregularities. An investigation was launched by the deputy minister and subsequently the military police were brought in. The information commissioner was apprised and fully concurs with the way we are handling the situation.

Here we have yet another attempt by members of the Reform Party to malign public officials who are unable to defend themselves on the floor of the House.

BLOOD SUPPLY SYSTEM

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

A study prepared for the Krever inquiry once again indicates significant shortcomings in Canada's blood supply system. According to this report, we are apparently not yet protected from another contamination like the one experienced in the early 1980s.

Is the minister aware that, still today, as a result of her inaction, another tragedy such as was experienced in the early 1980s remains possible?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly why the Government of Canada struck the Krever commission to study the 1980s tragedy and to try to ensure it does not recur.

Mr. Justice Krever has commissioned all sorts of studies to help him decide what ought to be done. We continue to await his report and in the meantime we are taking all the steps we can to ensure the safety of the blood supply.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister still be hiding behind evasions, behind the skirts of the Krever commission, when it is in her power to act now and prevent another tragedy? What we expect from her is not excuses, but action.

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have not waited for Justice Krever's report before taking steps to make the system safer. We have begun by stepping up, doubling even, the resources allocated to the Bureau of Biologics. We have begun to inspect blood donor centres on an annual basis. We also have a system for making inspection findings public.

Among other things, we have set up an advisory committee to help us continue to look at what is going on in other areas, in other countries, so that we may continue to be in the forefront with all new methods for increasing the safety of the system. We shall continue to take all of the steps necessary.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs or for the parliamentary secretary.

Yesterday it was reported that Canada is withdrawing its co–sponsorship of a United Nations resolution seeking a stop to nuclear weapon tests.

Why is Canada withdrawing its sponsorship over the wording of the preamble when at the same time the Canadian delegation plans to vote for the resolution?

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the government has repeatedly stated in the House and internationally, Canada is deeply committed to early conclusion of the comprehensive test treaty which will prohibit all nuclear testing for all time.

A draft resolution dealing with the nuclear testing issue is currently being negotiated at the first committee of the United Nations. As the text now stands, Canada intends to vote in favour of the resolution.

While Canada had initially co–sponsored a draft resolution, we had made very clear that we had reservations about one of the paragraphs in the resolution that could have brought into question the commitments made by nuclear weapon states at the 1995 NPT review and expansion conference.

Canada intends to vote in favour of the resolution, but it will not be co–sponsoring it.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of Industry about the misappropriation of funds at the Ontario Metis and Aboriginal Association.

In 1993 the minister's department was aware that its guidelines were being seriously broken and the association was declared insolvent by BDO Dunwoody.

How can the minister continue to leave President Henry Wetelainen in charge under these circumstances, especially since the minister said, on Goldhawk in June, that he would investigate and act?

• (1445)

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member implies that I run the aboriginal capital corporation in question, which is not the case.

Mr. Morrison: You fund it.

Mr. Manley: Another member suggests that I fund it. The fact is that no funds have been advanced to that organization since 1991. The facts that are alleged to be improper on the part of the hon. member have been given to the RCMP for investigation.

Mr. Abbott: Why did you not say that yesterday?

Mr. Manley: I did say that yesterday. I am sorry you were not listening.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that due process is sometimes seen by the Reform Party to be a bit of an inconvenience, but in this case I suggest it let the police do their work.

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I point out to the minister that this organization has had a cash flow constantly throughout the years, despite the cutting off of federal funds. There are still moneys coming in from the previous loans portfolio and they are being mismanaged, poorly managed.

I ask the minister again if he will not cease and desist with this president running this organization to the detriment of the Métis aboriginal people they are meant to benefit.

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the efficiency of the administration and the appropriateness of the conduct of the organization, the member is right that we have concerns about it. That is why I indicated to interviewers that we would be investigating it.

Not only has there been no additional federal money given to the organization, not only has the agreement with the organization terminated, but we are continuing to work with them to correct the administrative conduct if necessary. If necessary we will take whatever action is required to recover funds that were previously given to the organization.

There are two files at issue here. One is the allegation the member referred to earlier, which could lead to criminal charges. The other issue is with respect to the administration of the organization. He imputes to me powers I do not have, that of appointing the president of the organization.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence.

After making a big production of cancelling the huge EH–101 deal two years ago, the Minister of National Defence now goes ahead and buys 15 search and rescue helicopters, the same number the Conservatives planned to buy, without any guarantees they will be less expensive.

Since the minister refuses to say anything about purchasing combat helicopters, does this mean that, to make its policies more palatable to the taxpayers, the government is making these announcements piecemeal and plans to invest in a program as ambitious as the EH–101 deal?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there were four major crown purchases that were called for in the white paper that resulted from the special joint committee's deliberations. The hon. member's party took part in that.

We announced the contract for the APCs some weeks ago, and now we have made the announcement of a competition for the replacement of the Labrador search and rescue helicopters, which are over 30 years of age and nearing the end of their life. This will be an open competition. We hope to examine new ways of financing that particular purchase, perhaps by leasing. The bottom line will be to save the taxpayers money.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister is right when he says we were part of that committee, but the Bloc Quebecois proposed far more substantial cuts.

When we realize that the aerospace industry is mainly based in the Montreal region, what explanation does the minister have for the fact that, in the case of the 15 helicopters, there is no

Canadian content requirement and that two months ago, the same minister awarded, without tender, a $2 billion contract, for armoured personnel carriers to Ontario?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the things called for in the white paper was to move to off the shelf procurements, and that means to get the best deal for Canadian taxpayers.

• (1450)

Unlike the hon. members opposite, I happen to know that Canadian industry is very competitive, especially in the areas of integrated systems and electronics. Many of those industries are in Quebec. I am sure many of those industries will have a chance to show to bidders that they are competitive and can be part of this particular contract.

With respect to the question of the absolute price, we cannot talk about an absolute price if we are to have a competition in which price is to be one of the principal determinants. However, I will guarantee that on the search and rescue helicopters it will be much cheaper than the price that was to be paid for the EH–101 for the same job. We have reviewed the specifications and have found out that what the previous government ordered was really too rich for even the application of search and rescue standards in the country.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last summer the CBC was ripped by the auditor general for being bureaucratic, wasteful and inefficient. Today a leaked document suggests that the CBC will soon be put in charge of the administration of Telefilm.

Will the minister promise the House that he will not send the arsonist to put out the fire?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at the time of the last budget it was announced that there would be a review of the mandates of the CBC, Telefilm Canada, and the National Film Board. We are on course. There will be a report and recommendations put on my desk at the end of this month. Only at that time will decisions be made. In the meantime, I am waiting for that report.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, to further make the point, in the recently released supplementary estimates the CBC helped itself to another $56 million over and above what it was budgeted for this year. It seems it is having a little trouble with this restraint thing.

How can the minister justify giving the CBC another $56 million when it has proven so wasteful in the past?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our colleague does not seem to understand how downsizing works. This surprises me, coming from his party.

The CBC is downsizing and there is a cost to downsizing. The economies will show this in the next few years. That is the way it works.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is fully aware, women are making a significant contribution to the work carried out by his department. DFO is currently integrating the fleets of scientific research, fisheries patrol and coast guard vessels.

Can the minister tell us what steps he is taking to promote a safe and healthy working environment on board DFO vessels?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for her very thoughtful question, which I know my colleagues in the Reform Party are interested in. Her question acknowledged the contribution of women in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the contribution of women on shipboard platforms in both DFO and the coast guard.

In response to the question about a safe and healthy working environment for women within the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, we have recently taken steps to improve the environment, including the removal of alcohol from research vessels in the maritime region, sensitivity training for DFO vessel crew members, and leadership training for senior officials, promoting a safe and healthy working environment for all our employees. Harassment will not be tolerated in 1995. We are taking steps to ensure that the full contribution of women can be made in a safe, healthy and secure environment.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Members of the former airborne regiment held celebrations in honour of Marc Lépine, who killed 14 young women at the École polytechnique in Montreal. Members of this group were even promoted by the Canadian Forces but, despite our questions on this matter, the minister of defence still refuses to suspend these promotions.

Does the minister not agree that common decency requires him to suspend immediately the promotions given to those involved in the dinners honouring Marc Lépine?

• (1455)

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I answered those questions two days ago. This incident has not been confirmed but if it did occur, it is, of course, deplorable and unacceptable. Canadian Forces do not condone such activities. An investigation is under way and I hope that Lieutenant–General Baril, the commander of the army, will submit his report in the near future.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the minister stubbornly refuses to suspend the promotions given to the soldiers involved in the dinners honouring Marc Lépine and shows little sensitivity in this matter, I will put my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

How can the government tolerate the fact that soldiers who took part in celebrations in honour of someone who killed 14 young women were promoted by the Canadian Forces and that these promotions were not suspended, even after these events were brought to the defence minister's attention?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it offensive that people would make judgment on people and convict them without the evidence. Let us wait for General Baril's report before we make any judgment.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a federal court judge struck down a section of the Immigration Act that was used to keep members of terrorist groups and criminal organizations out of the country. In the court's questionable wisdom, the judge felt that to deny entry to members of terrorist organizations is a violation of their charter of rights and freedoms guarantee to freedom of association.

I ask the minister of immigration to confirm that it is the intention of the government to appeal this decision and to advise the House on what steps it plans on taking in the meantime to keep members of criminal organizations and terrorist groups out of the country.

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question.

First, it would be advisable to understand this is one section in the Immigration Act, which has probably been used twice in the last 10 years.

Second, the judgment just came down yesterday. It is some 70 pages. Our officials and officials from the justice department and the solicitor general's department are considering an appeal.

Third, it would be unfair to give the impression to Canadians that because there may be a question on section 39 of the act the department and the act are powerless with respect to those who come to this country and are deemed to be undesirable. The power of certificates in section 40 is still there. The power to detain is still there. The power to deport and move to inquiry is still there. The powers obtained under Bill C–44 that allow inquiries to stop refugee claims if there is a threat to Canada are still there.

We are discussing one tool in a toolbox that gives plenty of options to the Government of Canada.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, what we are talking about is a court of Canada saying it is okay for criminals and terrorists to enter our country.

Canadians want to know if the government is prepared to use the notwithstanding clause in the charter of rights and freedoms to keep terrorists and criminals out of the country.

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member should stop fear-mongering and begin to deal with decisions in a calm, fair, and rational manner. I realize that is a bit much to ask of the Reform Party.

The federal court said no such thing. The federal court made a decision based on section 39 with respect to simple association with various memberships of organizations. It did not say it was okay for terrorists or others to come into the country.

• (1500)

We are saying that this is one section of the Immigration Act. We may indeed appeal this decision. It was only handed down yesterday. Let us reflect on what the court took months to deliberate on and let us do the right thing rather than jump into scare mongering that does no one any good anywhere.

INCOME TAX

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we approach the end of the calendar year many Canadians focus their attention on the dreaded task of filing their income tax returns. The Department of National Revenue sends out millions of tax packages to individual Canadians each year.

Given the budget restraints this year, could the Minister of National Revenue tell the House what his department has done to streamline the tax filing operation and to save money?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her continuing interest in government efficiency and saving taxpayers' money. We appreciate it very much.

The department introduced a number of changes to the 1995 income tax packages for individuals. This will save approximately $3 million annually. It translates into an environmental saving of some 320 million pages or, if we want to look at it somewhat differently, 13,600 trees.

This is part of a continuing process in the department on which we have embarked over the last few years and which will with the $3 million save a total $9 million. It has been done through cost efficiencies and savings rather than any cut in service. It is eliminating duplication of information. It is simplifying the tax filing of individuals and, as I mentioned, it is substantially helping the environment.

NUCLEAR TESTING

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Foreign Affairs and follows up on the question of the member for Davenport.

Every party in the House except the Bloc Quebecois has condemned French nuclear tests in the South Pacific. Does the parliamentary secretary not recognize that French nuclear tests in the South Pacific clearly violate the undertaking that France gave at the special conference in May of this year?

Will the parliamentary secretary make it very clear to the House that Canada accepts the undertaking made by France was violated, and will Canada do the right thing and restore its co–sponsorship of this important resolution?

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the international community and the hon. member should know Canada's position on extending indefinitely the ban on nuclear testing. He heard the explanation of why Canada is supporting the resolution while withdrawing its co–sponsorship.

Canada felt the wording was not strong enough. Canada registered its objections at the time when France was intending to set off another nuclear test. That is well known. The hon. member is trying to score political points over nothing.

CLASS OF 1965

The Speaker: It is not often we in the House of Commons celebrate a day such as today. However it is very special for two members of the House.

The member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce and the member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke belong to the class of 1965. They were first elected to this place in a general election held on this day 30 years ago. I should like to salute them in the name of the Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: Some members want to make interventions and I recognize the hon. House leader of the government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to associate myself as do all members of the House with your words of congratulation.

I believe it is time that I personally stopped thinking of the hon. members for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce and Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke as those two new guys around here. Not many members have had the privilege of serving 30 consecutive years in the House. I am happy to note that the active membership in this special club has just tripled. I assure new members and the House that I could not have chosen any better company.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray: The hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce came here as a passionately committed champion of the less fortunate and the dispossessed, a relentless crusader for justice and equity, and a forceful advocate of international understanding. He has served in many capacities, including as a minister of the crown. He has taken on every challenge with energy and persistence.

If there are some newer members who marvel at his vigour, they should take note that there are even hockey players only one third his age who have trouble skating with him for an entire game.

The hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke has distinguished himself as a real tribune of his people. An educator by profession, he has continually demonstrated the effectiveness of speaking sometimes in soft tones but always in very plain language.

He too has served in many capacities, earning a well justified reputation in matters concerning defence and public administration. When he speaks we all recognize that he is accurately reflecting what his people are saying. He has often proven the value of persistence and honest hard work.

A decade ago he had a close electoral call, being returned by only 38 votes. This earned him the nickname of Landslide Len. He rolled up his sleeves and in the next election proved his nickname well earned. He won the next time by more than 10,000 votes.

To conclude, anyone who has been to the district of Notre–Dame–de–Grâce in Montreal or who has visited the upper Ottawa valley can soon learn how it came about that these areas have returned the same members in nine consecutive elections. In both cases one finds that almost everyone knows their member of Parliament, and even if not a partisan supporter everyone can tell about the personal service that each of these members has provided. Of course these members probably do so as Liberals, as members of our Liberal caucus.

These are two honourable and decent people who have served Canada well for 30 years. May they both serve for many more.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, allow me to join my hon. colleague to convey, on behalf of my caucus, our heartfelt congratulations to our two colleagues, the hon. members for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce and Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, on 30 years of parliamentary activity. That is unusual and, party politics aside, we all have to respect such tenacity and commitment to serving one's fellow citizens.

• (1510)

All too often, the members of this House have to sacrifice their health or families to uphold democracy, which makes those being honoured today all the more deserving. I would therefore ask them, on behalf of the members of the Bloc Quebecois, to accept our sincerest congratulations.

[English]

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to pay tribute to these two long serving members. I think after having won two elections I am a veteran at this but in fact I am just a kid. The hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke and the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce have had incredible careers here.

With respect to the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, in the 30 years he has served there has often been a cold and cynical environment in this place, sad to say, but he has contributed immeasurably to making members of the House remember that their purpose in Ottawa is to serve those who elected them back home. There are no votes to gain in the Chamber.

While in government he served as acting speaker of the House and parliamentary secretary to the ministers of national defence and energy, mines and resources. In opposition he served as official opposition critic for national defence, financial management and regional development. Yet, when asked about his great achievements as a member of this place, the hon. member often mentions funding for the Ottawa Heart Institute.

He has found an enviable role in Parliament that does not include the high and mighty stature of being a minister. Funding for the Ottawa Heart Institute was very important to him. I remember the time he went in for heart surgery. We were grateful that our prayers were answered and he was able to return here. We are glad he is in good health and feeling well enough to keep up a rigorous schedule.

Regarding the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, again he is somebody who has served here for 30 years. I was 13 years old when these two men were elected. It gives me a sense of history. The hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce has also had a wide and varied career. He has served in a variety of capacities as Solicitor General, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The titles go on and on. They show the wide diversity of knowledge he has gained from this place.

He has worked in many areas, but it is amazing that he has demonstrated his tenacious commitment to the convictions and principles on which he has staked his political career, I am sure more than once. In a firm commitment to the principles in which he believes and on which he has been re–elected on eight successive occasions, which truly distinguishes the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, his unwavering belief in the principles in which he believes so firmly and for which he stands has seen him stand to be counted many times, including a recent personal and difficult decision for him to oppose his own party.

The hallmark of that successful politician, someone who is willing to stand to be counted, is that he is able to balance the realities of the party system with the wishes of his constituents while remaining true to his own beliefs. The hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce retains the respect and support of his constituents. I know my party especially has appreciated him as chairman of the justice committee on which he served.

I wish both gentlemen well and a happy anniversary. I wish God's richest blessing on them as they continue in this place.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I very sincerely thank the government House leader and all my colleagues, the House leader for the official opposition and its members, and the House leader of the Reform Party and its members for their good wishes. If it were 30 years ago today I would do it all over again.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hopkins: There is no greater calling in Canada than that of a member of Parliament representing constituents and the nation and participating with the nation in international affairs. Some of the great things done by people in this place are the small things they do for their constituents. It has always been rewarding for me to travel through villages, towns, cities and communities and be called by my first name and taken into confidence. The people of Canada respect those who treat them with decency; I would say today that a sense of decency toward our fellow citizens and to be credible in their presence is one thing MPs should always bear in mind.

• (1515)

I have seen, met and befriended some wonderful people who have passed through this great institution, people who have made a fantastic contribution to Canada. Quite frankly, I can say at this stage in my life on behalf of those people whom I have known and many who are in the House today, I do not think that this country's elected people get half the credit they deserve for the wonderful job they are doing.

I say to all members, good luck and all the best to you as you go on in your careers. Thank you very much for your friendship.

There is one thing that cannot go unmentioned here today. Whenever there is a party for Len Hopkins, I do not want it to be a party for Len Hopkins; I want it to be a party for my good wife Lois who is in the gallery today—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hopkins: —and for the members of my family, Doug and Sherri, who have tolerated me over these 30 years. There are many in the House who know what it is all about.

The best thing for people in public life today is to be decent to people, respect them and listen to them. Enjoy your career here by doing useful things for those people and for the country. Remember that this is a great institution through which many wonderful people have passed in bygone years. It is up to those of us here today to make certain that people in the years to come look back and say that we respected the system and looked up to the Canadian people and did the best we could for this great nation of ours.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: My colleagues, the last word always falls to the Speaker. Len and Warren, my words are also meant for you.

In the name of your colleagues here in the House and for those of us who have served by your side over the decades, it is good to know there are people like the two of you, fighters fighting quietly at times and at other times more vociferously.

This House is an honourable place. The two of you, Warren and Len, have brought greater honour to the House by being part of it. Thank you for serving Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ENVIRONMENTAL PERFORMANCE REVIEW

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Today, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table before the House the OECD's Environmental Performance Review of Canada. The review was conducted over the last 18 months by a team of international environmental policy experts. It looks at how Canada is doing in meeting the goals we have set domestically and internationally.

• (1520)

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, having tabled the document, how did Canada do?

Overall the OECD report is positive for Canada. It points to areas where we are doing well. Equally important, it points to areas where we must do better. The report credits co–operation among various levels of government as a key reason for effective environmental protection in Canada. It recognizes that Canadian governments have embraced the concept of sustainable development.

[Translation]

But Canada—like most OECD countries—continues to struggle with turning the concept of sustainable development in reality. The report says we have to do better—and we are. Over the past year, we have taken significant steps to address this problem. Bill C–83, which amends the Auditor General Act, is an example.

It requires that government departments prepare sustainable development strategies and integrate sustainable development into departmental policies, programs and operations. This means giving the federal government the tools to start making the shift to sustainable development.

[English]

The OECD report also has a lot to say about the way we are bringing environmental policy to life in Canada. While the report compliments the way we use voluntary agreements, it says that we need to increase the use of economic instruments. The report is right. We should use economic instruments in more cases to achieve our environmental goals. However, the government also believes there is a definite role for good legislation and good regulation and a definite need for legislation to be vigorously enforced.

The federal government's flagship environmental legislation is the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. It is here that good regulation can shift society and industry to cleaner commercial practices. As members of the House know, this legislation is currently under the mandatory five year review. The government will be tabling its response to the standing committee report very soon.

[Translation]

In terms of wildlife and species protection, the OECD report makes it clear that we still have a lot of work ahead. While we can be pleased that population levels for many vulnerable species are going up, the report points to many cases where the laws are weak. It suggests that Canada give special consideration to protecting wildlife in areas where there are severe pressures from human activities.

The government recognizes this need. Last May, I released a proposal for a new Canadian Endangered Species Protection Act. This is the first time a federal government has moved to create a co–ordinated and co–operative national approach to protect the 244 species of wild plants and animals that are endangered, threatened or vulnerable.

[English]

On air pollution, the OECD report is positive about the effectiveness of Canada's federal–provincial partnership in reducing air pollution. We have met our goals for emissions of many air pollutants, including sulphur dioxide, lead and carbon monoxide causing acid rain. It also points to areas where air quality is inadequate for human health and ecosystems.

In parts of Canada there are consistent breaches of national and provincial ambient air quality standards for ground level ozone, what we call smog. Environment ministers across Canada are strongly aware of the need to take action to reduce pollution from cars and from industry. We have begun to take action in concert to address this problem.

Last month in Whitehorse, Yukon my provincial colleagues and I endorsed a report calling for the tightening of regulations under the federal Motor Vehicle Safety Act. Our report also calls for actions to improve fuel efficiency and to promote advanced technology and alternatively fuelled vehicles.

There will be new standards for cleaner gasoline and diesel fuel. All in all, we believe these changes will significantly reduce the level of smog in Canada. That means cleaner air and healthier Canadians, which means Canadians will live longer.

The most sobering element of the OECD environmental performance review report is that we are told we need to do more to meet our climate change goals. The report says that Canada will have a tough time meeting its climate change goals with our current plans. Nor does it believe that our national action program will allow Canada to meet its international commitment to stabilize carbon dioxide emissions by the year 2000 at 1990 levels. Clearly, tougher measures must be taken.

• (1525)

The report encourages us to be more aggressive and to consider the use of all instruments available to reduce our emissions of carbon dioxide, instruments including charges, regulations and indeed taxes. The world's leading scientists have confirmed that if human beings do not reduce and eliminate their impact on the world's climate, the repercussions for Canada and the planet earth will be severe, crippling and irreversible. Aggressive actions must be taken now. They must be taken if we are to fulfil our responsibility to protect the health and future of our children and grandchildren.

[Translation]

And so, what messages can we take from the OECD Environmental Performance Review of Canada? Yes, our efforts to protect the environment are bearing fruit. But we cannot be complacent. There are important environmental issues that we have not resolved. And there are goals and commitments that we have not successfully met.

In Canada, we have a record of working together to solve problems. This is something we can be proud of. The OECD has recognized this, but we must continue.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today, the Minister of the Environment is tabling the OECD's report on Canada's environmental performance.

This report also recognizes the efforts made by the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment, which proved itself to be a useful instrument in several respects. The report highlights the environmental strengths and weaknesses of the federal and provincial governments, which made sustainable development a central theoretical concept but with few concrete applications.

The minister states that, contrary to what the report says, her government was able to translate the concept of sustainable development into a reality. To prove her assertion, she used the example of Bill C–83, which creates the position of commissioner of the environment.

I simply want to point out to her that creating the position of commissioner of the environment is no guarantee of sustainable development for the federal government, let alone for Canadian and Quebec society. On October 3, the auditor general admitted before the Standing Committee on the Environment and Sustainable Development that he would have no control over the scope of departmental action plans. The departments themselves will be responsible for setting objectives, which cannot be questioned by anyone. In simple terms, nothing can prevent a minister from setting meaningless or superficial objectives.

More importantly, the auditor general questioned the departments' ability and willingness to find ways to assess the effectiveness of their action plans. On this subject, he said, and I quote: "In an era of downsizing and restructuring, I fear that the challenge will not be taken up. In our experience, in order to take positive action, departments need leadership, support and direction", something that is obviously lacking.

How can the minister come here to brag, when she knows full well that her government was unable to force her colleagues to develop meaningful action plans that could set an example for the private sector?

At report stage and third reading of Bill C–83, I will be pleased to analyze more thoroughly the amendments put forward by the committee, which open the door once again to federal meddling in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

The minister admitted today that there is a real need for environmental legislation to be vigorously enforced. I fully agree with her. In this regard, she should be reminded again that Canada is still acting illegally by exporting toxic waste to the third world and that her officials simply cannot afford to put an end to this practice.

• (1530)

The minister is quite right. It is not enough to sign international arrangements such as the Basel convention; we must also enforce them. In that sense, instead of interfering in areas that are no concern of hers, as she keeps doing, the minister should ensure that those acts which are clearly under her responsibility are properly enforced.

Moreover, the minister should also be reminded that, since her government came to office, the number of proceedings under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act has clearly dropped compared to previous years.

Similarly, the minister mentioned the CEPA regulations. The report in which the standing committee criticized the fact that there are hardly any regulations respecting the CEPA must have escaped the minister's attention.

The minister also announced that the government's response to the standing committee's report on the CEPA would follow shortly. The minister might be tempted to table a bill reflecting the centralizing designs of the Liberal members of the committee, but I would caution her against it.

In the last referendum, the people of Quebec have clearly indicated that they will no longer tolerate the federal government's highhanded and centralizing approach. The Bloc Quebecois and myself are anxious to see if the minister got the message and acted on it.

I wish to stress the fact that this government's attitude since coming to office and the episode of the Environmental Assessment Act, which raised an outcry, have left a bad taste in the mouth of provincial governments. Co–operation between the various levels of government must not be taken for granted, and the minister has already gone beyond the limit of what can be tolerated in many respects.

As far as air pollution is concerned, it is obvious that the minister is walking on eggs. According to the OECD, Canada's performance is far from enviable. While, clearly, some provinces have simply not taken their responsibilities, the minister can hardly brag about her own performance.

The minister's proposal at the recent summit in Berlin to literally deliver permits to pollute, as well as her bill on MMT, which could result in a significant increase in greenhouse gas emissions, are evidence of her poor performance.

I also note that Bill S–7, which seeks to introduce the use of more environment friendly fuels for the federal fleet of vehicles, is not an initiative of this government, but of Senator Colin Kenney.

Finally, I want to point out that the OECD report presented to us today concerns the provincial governments just as much, if not more. Indeed, in its report, the OECD recognizes that the provinces assume most of the responsibilities related to management of the environment. Canada still has a long way to go before it can claim to be a leader in environmental issues.

The OECD's criticisms primarily concern provincial governments. It is up to them to take the initiative and to reduce pollution, improve management of our natural resources, and improve integration of the economy and the environment.

I also think that it would be in the best interests of the provinces to take a direct part in signing international agreements. That way, they would have no excuse for not reaching objectives they themselves have set.

[English]

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the OECD report shows that we are doing fairly well, but there is more that we can do. We have embraced the concept of sustainable development, but like many countries we have had trouble in translating this into reality. Encouragingly the minister agreed with this.

In the face of this admission the government has produced a pea soup agenda with respect to the environment, this even after a superb report by the committee on the environment that was completed earlier this year and was lauded in many quarters.

I ask the Minister of the Environment why is she putting bills such as the environmental auditor general forward when the functions of the environmental auditor general can be co–opted by existing structures?

• (1535)

Why are we talking in the House about banning MMT and spending enormous amounts of money and time on this issue when there is no reason to ban it for reasons of health? There is a lot of evidence to show that MMT does not damage onboard devices, the basis on which the Deputy Prime Minister is trying to ban it.

The government is taking up these issues when there are other larger, pressing, persistent and dangerous issues affecting Canada's environment as we speak.

First, the OECD report states that Canada has not been exporting toxic materials to other countries since we signed the Basel convention in 1992. The investigative unit of the minister's department shows that Canada is exporting highly toxic materials to non–OECD developing nations such as Hong Kong, China, India, Thailand and South Korea. The toxic substances being exported to these countries cannot meet the environmental standards we have in our country. These countries are taking toxic materials, stripping parts away, and burning them or dumping them in a fashion that is highly damaging to the environment.

Second, there are 26 sites in this country that pose a high degree of hazard to people, flora and fauna. There is absolutely no plan to address these toxic sites within our own border.

Third, the OECD analysis also showed that on a per capita basis we emit the highest levels of such damaging agents as nitrous oxide, carbon dioxide and sulphur dioxide. Yet in the face of this the minister wants to ban MMT which will greatly increase nitrous oxide emissions, which is a very important component of the smog that exacerbates respiratory problems.

Fourth, Canada refused to agree to be a signatory of an important section of the UN convention on the prevention of pollution from ships. As a result, one–third of the garbage on some of the most pristine and protected beaches in the British Isles comes from Canada. I would ask the hon. minister to please look at that.

I agree with the minister's statement about working with industry to try and develop economic ways to help them become more sensitive to the environment, and in developing ways to use industry in a sustainable fashion. We would be happy to work with the minister on that.

I also applaud her statement on trying to protect our flora and fauna. It is a heritage that the people of the country have been given and in turn, we are obligated to give to future generations.

Our problems demand immediate action, not only for the benefit of all Canadians but for the benefit of people around the world. Our environment is not only shared with those within our country, it is shared by all people on the planet. We have only one planet, only one environment and only one opportunity to make sure our environment will be sustainable and sound for coming generations.

We are at a watershed on the planet right now. If we choose to put forward sound plans for sustainable utilization of the environment, then we will have a world worth living in. But if we choose not to take this course of action, then the planet we know will not be what we were born into. It will be a very sorry place to live.

In southeast Asia a number of countries have gone full bore into developing their nations with very little respect for the environment. As a result great numbers of children are being born with genetic defects which are directly due to the polluted environment into which they are born. We must take heed of this and develop our country for the future in a way that we will not fall into this trap, for us and for the coming generations.

PETITIONS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to rise in the House today and present a petition on behalf of 2,500 constituents of my riding of Simcoe Centre. The signatures were collected after the beating of a young girl by a gang of girls in the city of Barrie.

The petitioners request that Parliament pass legislation to strengthen the Young Offenders Act, including publishing the names of young offenders, lowering the age of application and transferring serious offenders to adult court. I support these petitioners.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present two petitions under Standing Order 36. The first petition is from residents in the communities of Athabasca and Smith in my riding.

The petitioners request that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including the amending of the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from residents from the High Prairie area of my constituency.

The petitioners request that Parliament support the laws which would severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime; to support new Criminal Code firearms control provisions which recognize and protect the right of law-abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms; and to support legislation which will repeal and modify existing gun control laws which have not improved public safety or have proven not to be cost effective or have proven to be overly complex as to be inefficient and/or unenforceable.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers also be allowed to stand.

MANGANESE BASED FUEL ADDITIVES ACT

The House resumed from November 7 consideration of the motion that Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances, be read the third time and passed.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bruce—Grey has the floor. Our hon. colleague still has 11 minutes remaining in his intervention.

• (1545)

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be here today to speak to Bill C–94, the manganese based fuel additives act.

Yesterday I made the case for the onboard diagnostic equipment. I spoke of the process in an engine during the four–stroke cycle and the fact that when the fuel is burned in such a rapid sequence it exits the tailpipe and how it affects the onboard diagnostic equipment.

I will conclude my remarks by talking about the fuel as it comes out of the exhaust pipe and enters into the catalytic converter. A catalyst is a device that causes something to happen that would not have happened without this device. It basically changes the substance without changing itself.

I talked about what happens with regard to rhodium and platinum and palladium used in this device and how it affects adding or subtracting oxygen and the fact that we added or subtracted oxygen by triggering certain devices by computer controlled mechanisms.

In the House we talk about problems in Canada. We have interprovincial problems. Sometimes because we do not have natural enemies we spend a lot of time navel gazing or talking about other things. It is important, particularly when it comes to the environment, that we act collaboratively and work hard to try to do the best for our country.

The environment is quite fragile. It is quite integrated. As we get more and more knowledgable about it, we understand how important it is and how important it is to interact with it and when we do the right things what the environment can do for us in terms of giving us healthy lifestyles. Given the fact that air will migrate across states and across provinces, it is very important that we have collaborative action to look after that. It does not matter how small those applications are in terms of looking after the environment. We have to act.

I am reminded of the fellow who said if you think cleaning up the environment is hard, trying cleaning out your garage.

As the House gives final consideration to Bill C–94, I would like to explain the background to this legislation and what it seeks to accomplish.

MMT is the commonly used acronym for a more tongue twisting name: methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl. This is a manganese based fuel additive used to increase the octane rating of gasoline.

MMT was first viewed as a replacement for lead in gasoline. In Canada it has been used since 1977. As all members are aware, lead was phased out of virtually all Canadian gasoline by 1990. The phase–out has brought considerable improvement to urban air quality.

If I may compare MMT to lead, heaven forbid—I think lead was probably more dastardly and more harmful—we would notice that when we try to fill our car up the nozzles for the new gasolines are smaller and the hole is smaller so we cannot use the old nozzles in cases where they have lead.

Lead had its positive points. It was an octane additive. It was used to increase the combustion chamber pressures. If you increase the compression ratio you get higher initial pressure, higher final pressure, and more power. Older cars went up to something like 11:1 compression ratio.

The lead itself actually stops the gasoline from blowing up. Gasoline becomes unpredictable. For those who drive their vehicles very hard, especially some of the older model cars, and turn the ignition switch off with their foot on the accelerator pedal and the car runs on, it is called dieseling or after–running. It is sometimes caused by a hot carbon particle setting the gasoline on fire, although it is not electronically triggered by the sparkplug. It is just the heat that is left in the residual amount of carbon left in the combustion chamber that actually sets the gasoline on fire.

These octane enhancers try to predict or control this explosiveness or the volatility of the gasoline so that it works under controlled processes. When it is controlled it burns a little better and you get better reaction from it and you can control the work it is doing. You are changing heat energy to mechanical work in an engine.

• (1550)

Today almost every Canadian motorist uses MMT, simply because Canadian refineries use it. The exact amount of MMT may vary from one batch of gasoline to another. In general, premium grade gasoline contains a higher MMT level than regular grade gasoline.

MMT has always been controversial. In 1978 it was prohibited for use in unleaded gasoline in the United States because it was suspected that the substance could damage emission control equipment. Despite recent moves to reverse the U.S. prohibition, MMT is certain to have no place in the high tech cleaner fuels for the future.

Hon. members from the opposition party and the Reform Party have made the case that there is not enough evidence. I have seen films from the automotive manufacturers, and they have said categorically and have shown that the catalysts in the converters are coated at a faster rate. The person who will lose in this case is the consumer.

If Ethyl Corporation and the automotive manufacturers want to work something out, we do not want to be the referee. The federal government has spent a lot of money because members of the opposition and sometimes our own members have asked the government to do certain things. We end up spending a lot of money and sometimes the resultant solutions are not that good.

Look at the Krever report on blood contaminants concerning things that have happened in the past. Those proceedings are going on and on; it is going to cost us millions of dollars and will probably result in a lot of lawsuits from people about things that have happened in the past. It seems the only people who get a lot of jobs are lawyers. I am sure my lawyer friends are going to be mad at me, but that is a problem with some of the things that happen here.

In this case, the federal government should not intervene in a dispute between the Ethyl Corporation and the automotive manufacturers. It has to make a decision on behalf of Canadians and the environment. That is what this decision is all about.

Canada is being forced to confront the downside of MMT not because a new environmental threat has emerged but because we are getting better at countering those threats.

Cleaner air involves using cleaner fuels as well as cleaner cars and trucks. While research has continued on the product we put into our gas tanks, it has also continued on our hardware, the engine that burns the fuel and the control equipment that lowers emissions. Technological advances have steadily cut the harmful emissions coming out of tailpipes.

Now we have taken another major step toward the introduction of sophisticated onboard diagnostic systems, which are known as OBDs. These systems are extremely valuable for the environment. They are responsible for the monitoring of the vehicle's emission controls and alerting the driver to malfunctions. They ensure the cleaner burning engines of today and tomorrow operate as designed. They ensure automobiles are properly maintained, resulting in decreased tailpipe emissions and improved fuel economy.

This is a very important technology, but it is even more important that it works, that it does the job properly on the new cars. This is where the problem arises.

The automobile manufacturers are convinced that gasoline containing MMT adversely affects the operation of sophisticated onboard diagnostic pieces of equipment. Accordingly, the industry has made the decision that it will not accept the risk of increased warranty repair costs caused by MMT related damage. Some companies have even indicated they will disconnect the OBD systems in whole or in part if MMT continues to be used in Canadian gasoline. That means the cost of maintaining these systems could be passed on directly to Canadian consumers and Canadian consumers would pay more to operate these new cars.

What we have here is a conflict between two key industrial sectors, the automotive manufacturers and the oil industry. The car makers insist that MMT harms their product, forcing them to adopt practices that may raise prices for consumers.

• (1555)

The oil industry claims that MMT reduces nitrogen oxide emissions by up to 20 per cent, but the figure is subject to dispute. In any case, alternatives to MMT are available. By the industry's own estimates, the cost of MMT removal translates into an increase of 0.1 to 0.24 cents per litre at the pump, which is a negligible amount, given that gasoline prices regularly fluctuate by a few cents per litre.

The Minister of the Environment urged both industries to find a voluntary resolution to the issue of MMT in Canada by the end of 1994. She said that if they did not do so the government would take action. The deadline was subsequently extended into February of this year to review automotive and petroleum industry proposals. Unfortunately, the matter was not resolved, so the federal government proceeded with Bill C–94.

Allow me briefly to explain the key provisions of the bill. The legislation will prohibit the import or interprovincial trade for a commercial purpose of MMT or unleaded gasoline containing MMT. It will give the Minister of the Environment the power to authorize exceptions for MMT, which will not be used in unleaded gasoline, subject to a monitoring requirement. Coverage of the act can be expanded by order in council to cover other manganese based substances. The act is binding on all persons and entities, including federal and provincial governments.

I believe that the initiative taken by the government is correct. I feel that the onboard diagnostic equipment malfunctions outweigh the gains we can achieve with respect to nitrous oxides. We could control the nitrous oxides. The OBD systems will give us better fuel economy and better burning engines, resulting in fewer emissions to the environment.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak today to third reading of Bill C–94. I am pleased to speak for two reasons. First, it will give me the opportunity to show Canadians a sad example of bad legislation. Second, speaking today allows me to reveal again how the government's inability to display good judgment will cause Canadian industry, the consumer, and the overall environment to suffer.

On May 19, 1995 Bill C–94 was introduced in the House of Commons by the Minister of the Environment. After introduction the minister proceeded to hold a press conference, where she informed reporters that the reason for banning MMT was because it caused problems with onboard diagnostic systems in new automobiles. That was not the only reason the minister proceeded to ban MMT. She stated that Canada was one of the few countries in the world using MMT in unleaded gasoline and that this should change.

The minister knows very well what the best solution to the entire debate would be. She knows that a series of independent third party tests are needed, but she will not initiate this or facilitate it.

As members of the House and, more important, as representatives of all Canadians it is important we weigh and pursue every available option to come up with an appropriate conclusion before we create legislation. We should be asking ourselves: What indeed is the best science can tell us?

The Liberal government calls itself responsible. What is really meant by the term responsibility, in view of Bill C–94? On these technical matters it certainly does not hurt to demonstrate and then legislate. That is not too much to ask.

We know that at the time the bill was introduced MMT was not yet approved for use in unleaded gasoline in the United States. Since 1978 MMT has not been in U.S. fuel. In 1978 the Environmental Protection Agency did not approve MMT because it felt it might be detrimental to the health of Americans. Understanding what the Americans did with respect to MMT is very significant to what this government is trying to do with Bill C–94.

In the U.S. there was an air quality act brought forward by Congress in 1967. The act established a registration program for fuel additives. The regulations made registration a condition of sale and required that manufacturers provide information on the recommended range of concentration and use and chemical composition and structure.

• (1600)

In 1970 Congress amended the act to transfer authorization of the registration program over to the EPA. Congress required that the EPA designate fuels and fuel additives for registration. The clean air act required that manufacturers provide information on the chemical composition to the EPA. The EPA also had the authority to judge the effects of additives on emission control performance and public health.

In 1977 Congress made more amendments to the clean air act. One amendment dealt with the emergence of catalytic converters in automobiles. I will read what the courts had to say about the new amendment and the effect it would have on MMT:

> As catalytic converters could not be used with leaded fuel, their adoption had led to a sharp rise in the use of MMT as an octane booster, and Congress responded to concerns that it and other fuel additives might harm the effectiveness of these converters. Section 211(f)(3) required that manufacturers of certain existing additives, those that were "not substantially similar" to constituents of fuel used in the certification of vehicles for emission purposes for 1975 or later model years, stop distributing such additives effective September 15, 1978.

Congress directed the EPA to grant a waiver once it determined that the additive would not cause or contribute to the failure of an emission control device system. The EPA deliberately stalled on making a decision until the courts instructed it to do the testing.

On November 30, 1993 the EPA found that MMT did not cause or contribute to the failure of emission control systems. However, not wanting to be outdone by the courts, the EPA denied the waiver on the grounds that the manufacturer, Ethyl, had not yet established the absence of health effects.

The court wrangling continued until October 20, 1995 when the United States Court of Appeals, in the case of Ethyl Corporation v. Carol M. Browner, administrator of the United States Environmental Protection Agency, ruled:

> We order the EPA to register MMT for use as an additive in unleaded gasoline, as of November 30, 1993.

What is significant with this ruling is not that Ethyl won and that MMT could be sold in U.S. unleaded gasoline by the end of the year, but rather it is the process that was undertaken by Congress and then the EPA not to approve MMT in unleaded fuels. Back in 1978 the EPA said that MMT might pose a health problem and cause adverse effects to catalytic converters, but through the examination of all evidence by the courts these negative concerns were put aside.

The EPA has until December 4, 1995 to appeal the decision made by the court. Considering that it did not appeal an earlier decision this year it is doubtful it will appeal the October 20 ruling. The implications of this are rather ironic. When the bill was introduced in May both the environment minister and the industry minister said that eliminating MMT from our gasoline was essential to achieve a North American harmonization of fuel. They said we should copy the Americans.

sBoth ministers were confident that the ban on MMT would remain in the United States. On May 5 I asked the environment minister during question period about the fact that the courts would probably rule in Ethyl's favour. In response he stated:

I advise the hon. member that last week when I had the opportunity of speaking with Carol Browner, head of the EPA, she reaffirmed the U.S. commitment not to allow MMT. She decried the fact that there is only one country, Canada, that still allows MMT. We intend to change that.

The Minister of Industry has gone further than his colleague, the Minister of the Environment. On April 25 in a question period response he told me:

Key to that is uniformity of standards between the U.S. and Canada. The member will know that MMT is not permitted in the United States by legislation. It is crucial that we have uniformity of standards. The effort we put into trying to ensure there was a voluntary agreement between the two sectors has been well placed, but finally governments have to decide.

The Ministry of Industry has clearly stated on the record that it is important U.S. and Canadian gasoline need to have the same composition harmonization. That is his position and he will no doubt vote in favour of Bill C–94. The government is confused. I thought the definition of harmonization was two sides being in harmony with each other. I guess the minister has a different definition as MMT is now going to be used in the U.S.A.

The industry minister is not the only one who has different ideas of harmonization. During the clause by clause consideration of the bill I moved the motion that we hold off on the bill until December 5, 1995, one day after the EPA's 45 allotted days to appeal the court ruling. The U.S. ruling was not only significant for Ethyl Corporation but was equally important for the Canadian consumer. I point out a statement by the member for York—Simcoe in rebuttal to my motion:

I think in terms of what's going on in the United States. The decision that was encountered recently regarding MMT was based on some technicality. We also have to give consideration to the fact that MMT is banned in California and some of the high ozone states.

• (1605)

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. He may continue his intervention after we return from the Senate.

MANGANESE BASED FUEL ADDITIVES ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances, be read the third time and passed.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby has the floor for his remaining 10 minutes.

• (1615)

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, before we left for the Senate I was quoting the member for York—Simcoe. She had said:

I think in terms of what's going on in the United States. The decision that was encountered recently regarding MMT was based on some technicality. We also have to give consideration to the fact that MMT is banned in California and some of the high–ozone states— So any kind of justification for the fact that 100 per cent of the United States is not going to be using MMT is simply just not acceptable because that's not true. At least 30 per cent of the country will not be having MMT usage at all.

When I was a youngster in elementary school and I thought I might be embarrassed, I would perhaps dissemble to get out of trouble. The comments made by the member for York—Simcoe in the environment committee show that the government's back is up against the wall and it is now saying anything it can to save face. The policy of the government is clear: legislate how the minister feels, or wants to favour someone, rather than by what is right in view of legitimate evidence.

When MMT is reintroduced into the United States later this year probably 70 per cent of the gasoline will have MMT in it, if we use the numbers from the member for York—Simcoe. Let me also point out that the environmental restrictions in California are different from any of those used in other states. I have often heard the description that California is a country all of its own. If California lifted the ban on MMT I am certain the members of the Liberal caucus would find some other reason it is important to ban MMT.

When the EPA attempted to ban MMT it mistakenly believed it was harmful. The Liberal government wants to ban not the substance but rather the importation and interprovincial trade in the substance. This is clearly an anti–free trade bill. Some would ask the reason for doing it this way. The government has no other choice. When it is unable to do something through the proper channels, old style Liberals find other ways.

This is the government that told the Canadian electorate following the last election that it would show credibility and responsibility and be forthright with the public. Here is another example that can be added to a long list of old style governance and politics.

Every Canadian should ask the Minister of the Environment why she did not go through the proper channels and ban MMT under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. She is the sponsor of this legislation so why did she not use her department's act, an act that was designed specifically for banning harmful substances. The answer is simple. She could not. There is not a scientific basis for it. MMT appears to be no more harmful than household dust on the furniture.

In order to add a substance to the schedule of banned substances under CEPA it must be proven by Health Canada that the substance is hazardous to the health of Canadians. Anyone who has listened to any of the debates on this bill is well aware of the December 6, 1994 Health Canada report called "Risk Assessment for the Combustion Products of MMT". It states that "all analyses indicate that the combustion products of MMT in gasoline do not represent an added health risk to the Canadian population".

On October 18 a Health Canada official appeared before the Standing Committee on the Environment and Sustainable Development and concurred that the 1994 report remains the position of the department. Therefore I urge all members of the House not to include in their speeches during this third reading stage any reference that the removal of MMT will improve health quality. I heard several government members make a mention of this during second reading. It is a false and inaccurate assertion. A member may make an unforeseen mistake, however in this case, the evidence gives clear direction concerning what can be claimed.

From the outset Reformers have unequivocally stated that we would support the banning of MMT if the government could prove through an independent scientific test that MMT was harmful to the automakers onboard diagnostic systems or OBD–IIs as they are called in the industry. However the minister has only scoffed at Reform for even suggesting independent testing. The Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Association has provided her with their test data and that is all the data she apparently needs or wants to see.

When the petroleum companies appeared before the committee they suggested they would have a tremendous amount to lose should MMT be removed from Canadian fuels. In their testimony it was suggested that the removal of MMT could result in an increase of manufacturing costs by as much as $69 million per year.

• (1620)

According to the Canadian Petroleum Products Institute, the $69 million increase would be due to the fact that refiners would have to burn more crude in order to achieve the high octane levels needed for today's automobiles. They would also have to retrofit refineries. Other expensive additives would have to be used which might eventually be revealed to be very harmful.

This bill has been through the various stages. I want to make it clear that at every stage Reform has made every attempt to put the bill on hold until conclusive proof is found. We have not been obstructionist. We have called for common sense, not unreasonably siding with any group, unlike the government.

I want to read into the record parts of three letters I have come across, all from provincial ministers of the environment and all concerning MMT. First, from the Hon. Vaughn Blaney, Minister of the Environment for the province of New Brunswick:

> Given that neither the federal government nor the motor vehicle manufacturing industry have provided the information and assurances that this province and the refining industry have requested regarding the economic and environmental impacts of this bill, and given the current discussions on use of this compound in the United States, I would hereby request that this bill be set aside until the questions raised have been clearly responded to by Canada and a decision on the continued use of this additive is taken in the United States.

From the Hon. Wayne Adams, Minister of the Environment for the province of Nova Scotia:

> I realize that there are conflicting reports respecting pros and cons of MMT use. However, the task force should consider the potential increase in NOx emissions, higher production costs, and higher energy demands associated with the manufacture and use of a non–MMT gasoline. I believe that it would be prudent to withhold a final decision with respect to fuel reformulation and MMT until such time as all stakeholders have had sufficient opportunity to assess the available information and the question of MMT is settled in the U.S.

From the Hon. Bernard H. Wiens, Minister of the Environment and Resource Management for the province of Saskatchewan:

> The province understands the importance of the automobile manufacturing industry in Canada, however, our petroleum refining industry continues to be concerned that the removal of MMT would cause substantial cost increases for their industry. In addition to the cost implications, increased greenhouse gas emissions as a result of intensified refinery processes required to replace MMT, and increased vehicle tail–pipe emissions of smog forming Oxides of Nitrogen (NOx) would also occur. The data supplied to date by the automative industry does not identify a net air quality benefit and as such, we have difficulty rationalizing the cost to the refining industry or consumers.

The issue of NOx benefit is a serious one. NOx emissions are major contributors to urban smog. As well, there is no disputing that the presence of MMT in unleaded gasoline actually reduces smog as it complements complete combustion. All of the experts agree, including those from Environment Canada. The only dispute is about the appropriate amount.

Environment Canada officials claim that the amount is 5 per cent whereas Ethyl and the petroleum companies claim it is closer to 20 per cent. Whatever the number, the result is that MMT reduces NOx emissions, it certainly does not increase it.

One of the most interesting aspects of this entire debate is the absence of the Minister of Natural Resources. Within the minister's purview are the many refineries and coming from the capital of the oil industry one has to wonder what her opinions are. When asked whether or not the natural resources minister is in agreement with Bill C–94 the environment minister stood up and stated: "I would point out that any cabinet decision to move on MMT is supported by all ministers of government".

However, in the final outcome, the Minister of Natural Resources will have to explain her actions to her constituents. I doubt the scientists and technicians of her department support the bill. They have been muzzled and disallowed from expressing their own personal and professional views.

Can the Minister of Natural Resources really stand in the House and vote for such changes as proposed in Bill C–94? May I remind her that she won by one of the smallest margins in the last federal election. If I remember correctly there were several recounts. I suggest the minister make her voice known around the cabinet table instead of succumbing to the unreasonable pressure of the Minister of the Environment.

Since the very beginning Reform has pushed the environment minister to do independent testing and let the auto manufacturers and Ethyl Corporation work things out themselves. The minister could not believe that I would suggest such a thing. She was adamant that the auto manufacturers were correct and that was that.

I have some new information about a recent development. I hope each of my hon. friends across the floor, including the Minister of the Environment, will be listening very closely. The American Automobile Manufacturers Association and its members are continuing to develop an MMT vehicle test program. They expect to co–operate with the makers of MMT. The industry is talking about the pursuing a sharing of data about the effects of MMT on OBD systems. It looks like the industry can solve the problem itself without government interference.

It is time for the environment minister to change her headstrong approach. When industries are willing to work together to find common ground, the government should stay clear. If the Minister of the Environment is too willing to interfere, I can only ask the question, why? If the minister wants to have a credible legacy in the environment portfolio I would suggest that she put aside this bill and let it gather some household dust.

The government's lack of a meaningful legislative agenda for the country is now noticed by the political observers. The country is falling apart on the tenets of the fundamental agreements that made the Confederation of Canada, yet we are dithering over MMT in car gas. The sense of proportion for government is missing at this critical point in our history.

If we must regulate gasoline additives for the country, then let the minister come forward with a bill that deals with rules and an open process for any substance that does not come under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. This anti–free trade bill before us today will likely be challenged on the reasonable basis under the NAFTA provisions. I think the intervenor should win on the merits against the government as everything our party has said on this matter would support such a challenge. It is my assessment that the government is in a very weak, unjustifiable position on that count but is hoping that it will slip by.

Reformers say to the Minister of the Environment give up on this misguided track and get on with saving the country.

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, seldom in recent times have I witnessed a debate into which so much misinformation has been injected and so much confusion has been put on the record in order to create a lack of confidence in the actions of the government.

With all due respect to the member for New Westminster—Burnaby, this matter is not a new one. It is not one that has prompted the Minister of the Environment and the government to make a rash decision. It has been around for some time.

If I remember correctly, in October 1993 the Minister of the Environment announced that if the petroleum industry would not take voluntary action to resolve the issue of MMT in gasoline by the end of 1994, she would have to take action to prohibit its use. This deadline was extended to February 1995.

This decision has a long history. The government has carefully watched a dispute between two industrial sectors and despite the prompting and the time extension, a solution was not found and it was found necessary to intervene. In the face of the inability of the two major stakeholders and one proponent to meet and come to an agreement on MMT, the onus must fall on the government to determine what needs to be done in the public interest.

The most informed judgment available at the time in this case was the judgment that MMT as a fuel additive had to go. So much for the accusation that the government has not thought it over and has not given the parties sufficient time to come to a solution on their own. This matter was also pointed out when we had our hearings in committee.

A number of issues are at stake. One issue is the question that emission systems would fail prematurely because of the presence of MMT in gasoline. There is the issue of unnecessary repair costs when these emission systems are not plugged in. Millions of motorists would be affected by the presence of MMT in the new model cars. Data and analyses only come from companies that make MMT or from automakers and the government as an independent agency has to judge both and decide which way to go. There is the risk of increased warranty repair costs to the consumer and the possible reduction of the warranty coverage for Canadian motorists.

An overall encompassing issue and a matter I would like to bring to the attention of those who oppose this bill is that technological progress is pushing legislative changes. That is what it boils down to. This is technology which is moving ahead and is impossible to ignore. We must take that fact into account and find ways of protecting the consumer. I am sure the constituents in Athabasca, the constituents in New Westminster—Burnaby and the constituents of that great Canadian patriot from Laurentides will all benefit from this measure.

Cars coming onstream into the marketplace have OBDs, the onboard diagnostic systems, which will ensure that the mix of emissions produced are under control in the most advanced levels that technology has reached. If we do not remove MMT from gasoline, this technology cannot be utilized by the consumer. The manufacturer of the car, as we were told in committee, will simply disconnect the diagnostic system from the engine.

Initially I had some difficulty understanding what manganese does. I found it very helpful to hear the explanation given to us by people in the know who made two points.

The exhaust of an engine passes over the specially coated surface of a catalytic converter, which we all know is that little box under the car which was installed some time ago in order to reduce car emissions. When the exhaust gas passes over it, certain pollutants are removed. Manganese is produced by virtue of the consumption of gasoline in the engine. If the manganese covers the surface of the catalytic converter, then this type of catalytic converter cannot function properly. As a result, vehicles will pollute more over time. Here is the link between the effect of manganese and the catalytic converter in a very linear form.

Engines in recent times have adopted the technology of oxygen sensors. They determine how much oxygen goes into the air and fuel mixture in the engine. If manganese is used in gasoline, over time the manganese will coat the sensors. When it coats the sensors, the sensors give a false signal that air must be injected into the mixture. As a result the engine consumes more fuel because the air–fuel mixture becomes too rich.

• (1635)

The cars built for the North American market are equipped with onboard diagnostic systems. The system tells the motorist when the emission equipment must be looked at. Unlike the emission inspection systems of the past, the onboard diagnostic system identifies the first moment the vehicle begins to pollute excessively. That is important to remember because unlike what we were told by the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby, there are health implications. There is no need, thanks to the onboard diagnostic system, to have inspection stations, to wait in line ups, to pay inspection fees, and the like.

The majority of motorists whose vehicles are not polluting excessively need not be inconvenienced. All they need is the onboard diagnostic system. It helps the motorist and the environment. It improves the control of the emission of various gases produced in the combustion engine.

The oxygen sensors are important. We must keep that in mind. The catalytic converter is important. The removal of manganese is a function of the performance of these two items, the catalytic converter and the sensors.

We want to achieve something which is good for the consumer and which is also good for the quality of the air we breathe, particularly in densely populated urban centres from Vancouver to Halifax.

A number of red herrings have been brought forward during the debate. I will not spend too much time speaking on the comments which were made the other day by the great patriot from Laurentides when she had to drag in and quote Terence Corcoran of the Globe and Mail who was criticizing the Minister of the Environment in a rather pathetic way. If it were up to Mr. Corcoran, our environmental standards would quickly return to the middle ages. The criticism was that the removal of MMT would produce more pollution. The theme of the hon. member for Laurentides was also picked up quite extensively by the hon. member for Athabasca. He was very strong in committee on that.

In committee we heard the views of Ethyl Corporation, which is opposed to the bill, as it was opposed to the removal of lead in gasoline 10 years ago, and quite adamantly so. We also heard views from the car manufacturing industry. We had to conclude that the claims about increased pollution as advanced by Ethyl Corporation were seriously exaggerated. They were based on data collected by Ethyl from test cars and not on data from a Canadian fleet. I am told there is a big difference between the two.

The Canadian fleet tests took into account world operating conditions and concluded that the NOx reduction was more in the order of 5 per cent than the 20 per cent claimed by Ethyl. The claim that removing MMT will lead to a higher production of NOx is one that has not been sufficiently and clearly substantiated in our committee hearings. Actually, the matter was put to rest quite effectively when we heard that the operation of the diagnostic system permits a control of all polluting gases produced during the combustion process. This is important. The overall impact of the diagnostic controlling system is that it will reduce the overall engine pollution in all of its components, namely carbon monoxides, NOx and hydrocarbons.

• (1640)

With respect to the lack of provincial support, a letter was read from the New Brunswick minister of the environment. I believe we also received a letter from the Saskatchewan minister, but we certainly have not received a letter from the minister of the environment for British Columbia. We understand that British Columbia is very much in favour of this legislation. We have not heard from the province of Ontario, which I suspect is also very much in favour. I suspect the same for the province of Quebec. I believe that the provinces, by and large, have expressed either directly or indirectly considerable support.

I submit with all due respect to my knowledgeable and esteemed colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby, it is hard to believe that this matter could be put into the category of being an anti–free trade measure. This measure really does not have to do with free trade.

The NAFTA agreement gives much relevance to matters related to labour and the environment. This comes clearly under the environmental heading. It is a very legitimate initiative and it is certainly not motivated by anti–free trade reasons.

I dealt with interference by the minister earlier. This is an intervention by the government by two ministers who, after having exhausted all alternative avenues, had to conclude there was no other course of action relevant than to proceed and provide the necessary protection for the consumer.

The technology is inexorably moving ahead. We have reached a new plateau in the knowledge of how to control and reduce pollution emitted by motor cars. We have to move with the technology. We have very little alternative other than to allow the disconnecting of the onboard diagnostic system by the car manufacturer if manganese is not removed. Surely that measure would be reminiscent of another era when we pretended that certain evidence was not staring at us and we looked the other way because we did not like the evidence.

We have to take the evidence into account. We would be seriously criticized and quite rightly so by members of the opposition if we were inactive on this matter. In the end this measure will lead to a reduction in air pollution in highly populated areas. The performance of the engines will be improved. There will be an improvement in mileage with the same consumption of fuel, and there will be an improvement in terms of reduced emissions.

• (1645)

We all know from studies conducted by a number of esteemed medical doctors that there is a connection between air pollution and hospital admissions, particularly in connection with asthmatics. These have been measured in the past. They have been scientifically supported by way of printouts of admissions to various hospitals in the province of Ontario. This fact cannot be denied.

It seems to me that for all these reasons we are moving on the right track. If we did not do that we would be in the same league as countries like Bulgaria, Argentina or perhaps Taiwan. Let me see what other countries are still using manganese in gasoline: Russia, the Ukraine. I am sure that sooner or later, if their automotive technology will allow, they will be glad to also move away from the use of MMT.

We are moving from one stage of improvement in technology to the next. In the 1980s we were concerned with lead. In the 1990s we are concerned with MMT. In another decade we will be concerned with some other aspect of this technology. But it is quite clear that as the number of vehicles on the roads increases and as the population increases and as the number of people who want the freedom of movement a car allows increases, we will have to tighten up the system and find ways to reduce the pollution that accompanies the operation of a car.

In that context, this measure makes sense and fits into the progression. It is not the first step of this nature, because we already took an important step in the 1980s by removing lead from gasoline, and it will not be the last. There will be other measures following in the years to come.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions concerning the member's presentation.

He stated that this issue has gone on for some time. I would accept that. I heard the suggestion that the two sides were unable to reach a conclusion. I would ask him how he could realistically expect the two sides to ever come to any agreement after the minister made this statement, prior to October 1993, that she was prepared to ban the use of MMT. How can he realistically expect the Motor Vehicle Manufacturing Association to continue to bargain in good faith after that statement was made and it was clear what would happen if no agreement was achieved?

This member in committee clearly stated that he was no expert in these matters. We heard evidence presented before the EPA and two court challenges in the U.S. that there has been significant failure of OBD technology in the U.S. There is just as high a failure rate there without MMT as there is in Canada. This evidence was presented by experts in the court as well as before the EPA. Even his own members on the committee expressed serious doubts as to the validity of the evidence. Why does he then as a layman accept unquestionably the evidence provided by MMT as to catalytic converter problems and all the rest of it?

• (1650)

Why does the member insist that this has no implications on trade or that it is not a trade matter when clearly section 1209 of the energy chapter of the draft agreement on internal trade reached with the provinces states that no party shall prohibit or hinder access to its petroleum markets or its petroleum product markets? How then can this bill not affect trade?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment became a minister after the election in 1993. She made the statement after being appointed in October. I am not aware of any other statement she made before that.

In the red book there was a commitment to sustainable development. There was a commitment to a number of pollution prevention measures. This fits perfectly within the general principle of pollution prevention, I submit to the hon. member.

There was a valid question on how can the two parties come to a realistic agreement. They can if they are given the time. Since a year and a half as of last June has elapsed, one can conclude that the two parties are unable to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. There is a point when that institution called government, to which the public entrusts its interests, has to move. One could argue that it should have been done sooner. Some people would argue that it should have been done at a later date. That is question of judgment and a question of policy.

The other question had to do with trade and section 1209. The NAFTA agreement states that matters that are related to environmental policies would have to be taken into account before this particular section 1209 is invoked and put into effect. In other words, when Canada signed the NAFTA agreement in December 1993 it was done with a mutual understanding, and I think reinforced by the Americans as well, that there would always have to be consideration given to modifying the agreement either in the field of labour or in the field of the environment. This is a classic example that has been invoked.

As to the OBD systems in the U.S., I have been told that waivers have been provided to automotive manufacturers because of the complexity of the systems and not because they have failed in the field. This is in answer to the third question.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the member for Davenport began his speech by talking about red herrings. I think it is appropriate, because he seems to be a master at this.

The first red herring is the bill itself. At a time when our nation is facing a debt increasing by $100 million a day, at a time when we have a stalker who has killed and is taunting the police and our justice system needs repair, at a time when we have a gaggle of cabinet ministers huddling about what the meaning of national unity is, we are here debating Bill C–94 about manganese additives.

The member has some of his own red herrings, like the red herring of comparing manganese additives to lead based additives. The health officials say that this additive has no bearing on health and that it is not a harmful emission.

• (1655)

I would like to ask the member for Davenport why he would compare in such a way the manganese additives with lead based additives when the government itself has said there is no comparison.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I should be flattered or offended by being called a master of red herrings. I will leave it to my colleagues to judge me in that respect. Maybe I am more effective on that front than I ever thought.

The member from Chilcotin is very kind in drawing to my attention that manganese has no health effects, according to health authorities. He is correct. We were told that in committee. It is the effect on the diagnostic system on board that reduces the totality of the gas emissions that is the important factor. If that diagnostic system is not functioning properly, you have poor performance and more pollution. You do not want to have more pollution because that has an effect on health. It is in that context that I made that statement.

Why compare manganese to lead? It is not a question of comparing it. All I am saying is there is a progression. First we fought the battle of removing lead in gasoline, which today everybody accepts, but boy was it ever controversial 10 years ago: the sky would fall, jobs would be lost, refineries would go out of business—all things we were told in 1983. Perhaps I should also offer the information that at that time I was environment minister and this was part of my task. It was pretty dramatic as to the consequences of removing lead in gasoline, believe me.

In any event, it was done gradually. Today we consider that as a normal fact of life. There are positive effects in the health of children, the ones who suffer from exposure to lead when it is contained in gasoline. It is one of the reasons it was done.

It is part of a progression. First it was lead, now it is manganese. Ten years from now perhaps it will be another substance, because technology is moving ahead and legislators have to move as well. If we do not move with technology we will lose relevance. The public will justly think that the political institutions are no longer performing the job they are supposed to. I think that is the last thing we collectively would like to see.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Davenport why we even have this bill, when MMT is proven by the Department of Health not to be a health hazard to Canadians and there is ample evidence demonstrating that MMT does not affect on-board devices at all. I wonder why we are trying to ban this substance.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, we have discussed this a few times. The Department of Health is saying that there is no proof that manganese is damaging to health. That is how it is being put. Nobody has said that manganese is a healthy thing. Nobody is saying that manganese is good for the environment.

Manganese is a heavy metal. Anyone who knows about heavy metals knows what that means and the importance of dealing with this substance in a proper manner.

AUDITOR GENERAL FOR THE FAMILY ACT

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.) moved that Bill C–322, an act to respecting the office of the auditor general for the family, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I count it a real privilege to rise this afternoon to lend my support to the Canadian family. I can think of few things in our country as important as the topic I am addressing this afternoon. In fact, if I raise my sights just a little higher, it is fair to say that worldwide few topics are as unifying as people's desire to look after their families.

The UN declaration that 1994 be the year of the family means that all of us, worldwide, need to care to preserve the family each and every year.

We have just gone through a distressing period in our nation and there may be more difficult times ahead before we are through. However, if strong families make a strong nation then today, more than ever before, we need strong families in Canada. I am proud to say that strengthening the family is the purpose of Bill C–322. Allow me to describe how this will happen by first describing the role of a familiar Canadian institution, the Auditor General of Canada.

As members know, Canada's auditor general does his excellent work by choosing perhaps a dozen government programs and departments every year and investigates them. He then reports any waste or inefficiency to Parliament. That is all he does. However, it seems to generate action in government. That is all the auditor general for the family would do too, except that it would investigate and report on behalf of the nuclear family in Canada.

The auditor general for the family would be a small, inexpensive office set up by Parliament. The legislation restricts it to just 20 people. By contrast, the current auditor general employs 600 people. Even the Status of Women Canada has 93 employees.

Many positive and important legislative changes over the years have been brought about by policy groups funded by the federal government to examine government programs as they affect that group. The government creates them when it perceives that a group is at risk in society and needs some help.

I mentioned the Status of Women Canada a moment ago because the secretaries of state also perform much the same function as would the auditor general for the family. We have secretaries of state for women, for youth, for veterans, for multiculturalism and science, among others. We have an auditor general for the environment. We have the National Council on Aging and the National Council on Welfare. We have advisory councils on forestry, on business, on libraries, on gender integration in the Canadian Armed Forces, on native peoples, on racial equality in the arts. I could go on and on.

What is there for the family? Precious little in the way of recognition by governments.

The kinds of advisory groups, or think tanks, I just mentioned are established when there is a broad public perception that a group is at risk. They have a definite policy focus and have a real effect on public policy.

Let us take the last annual report for the Canadian Council on the Status of Women as an example. That report is now two years old but it contains recommendations that sound very much like the government's agenda today. There were recommendations on a stalking bill, on female genital mutilation and on child custody, all issues that are understandably high on the government's list of priorities. In other words, by bringing these to the attention of the government they eventually became government policy and a government priority. I would like to see the family take a higher priority too.

If we wanted to create a group that would speak for the family, it begs an important question: Is the nuclear family in Canada really at risk? Polls reveal a broad public perception that the family is in trouble, but the federal government has not reacted to it. Perhaps it is because the Canadian family, at least in times past, has not been as politically correct an issue as hundreds of others that I could name.

A poll done by the Angus Reid Group for the International Year of the Family in 1994 told us that the public perceives the family as a group in crisis. Sixty–three per cent of all respondents to the survey agreed that the family is in crisis and 40 per cent agreed strongly. The poll told us more. Even more Canadians, 68 per cent, including single parents, agreed that the traditional two–parent family is the best type of family in which to raise children. There is certainly a clear, broad public consensus in Canada on the need to help the family, even the so–called traditional family.

• (1735)

There might be a broad public perception of need but are there other more objective indicators of need to which we can point? You bet there are. This year the Department of Human Resources Development, a government department, wrote a report called "A Social Outlook" that paints a picture of the family in crisis.

Family incomes are dropping. The poverty rate among two–parent families has risen from 9 per cent to 12 per cent in the last two decades. Families that would prefer the option to choose whether parents work outside the home find that they are forced into the workplace whether they like it or not. Those that would like to choose to stay at home to look after the kids find that they cannot.

The study also shows that between 1960 and 1986 the time parents had to spend with their kids, that important bonding time with their own family, has fallen by 10 hours a week.

Families also suffer a discriminatory tax regime in Canada. Often it is cheaper to live together than it is to get married. The tax system also discriminates against homemakers.

A chartered accountant from New Brunswick has calculated that a single income family in which one parent chooses to stay at home will pay 36.2 per cent more in tax than a dual income family earning the same gross amount. The tax system clearly discriminates against those who choose to live in a more traditional arrangement, the kind of arrangement that most people in Canada, according to the Angus Reid poll, think is the best one to raise their children, especially at a young age.

Without tax reform, at the very least, we risk losing that vital middle class which forms the backbone of our nation. Unfair tax policy harming the family is the kind of policy that the auditor general for the family could investigate and expose, bring into the light so the government could deal with it.

There is much more evidence. A U.S.–wide study called the National Longitudinal Survey of Youth followed 14,000 people since 1979 and found that the children of single parents are almost three times as likely to be single moms and drop out of high school. They are less likely to graduate from college or university. One out of four babies in the States are born to single moms and this adds up to a cycle of continuing poverty, continuing lack of opportunity and obviously something that we would not hope for those families and those children.

The U.S. News and World Report ran its cover story on the family in February this year. This is how its story began: "Dad is destiny. More than virtually any other factor, a biological father's presence in the family will determine a child's success and happiness, rich or poor, white or black. The children of divorce and those born outside of marriage struggle through life at a measurable disadvantage, according to a growing chorus of social thinkers".

The article goes on to describe the various attempts in the States to reconnect fathers to their families. Fortunately we are not yet as bad off in Canada, but the operative word there is yet. We may trail behind the States in our social trends, but we are on the same road.

For instance, the Vanier Institute for the Family tells us that Canada's divorce rate has jumped from being one of the lowest in the world in 1965 to being one of the highest in the world in 1988. It is about one–third higher than in Sweden and France. We are second only to the United States of America. The problem of family break–up will have and is having measurable negative effects on our economy, on our justice system and on government spending.

If the family is under threat in Canada, then our future is also threatened. This bill recognizes that the family is important, that it is suffering, that children are suffering because families are suffering. Families deserve a voice, a place of priority in the House of Commons and in the legislation dealt with.

Some may think this bill is a fringe idea coming from a Reformer. This is far from the case. The Canada Committee for the International Year of the Family was struck by the federal government to examine federal family policy during that year, 1994. In January 1995 it presented its recommendations. The Canada committee recommended the creation of a permanent federal secretariat for the family within the Government of Canada. Its mandate would almost be the same as that in my bill: "To serve as a catalyst, to initiate research and education on the changing structure and status of the Canadian family and the impact of federal policies and programs on the Canadian family; secondly, to work as a broker to develop tools and resources to aid in the development of harmonized policies and programs which support and strengthen families; and third, to prepare a family impact assessment statement on all significant new federal laws, policies and program initiatives".

These three functions correspond directly to the auditor general for the family's three main functions that I have in my bill: "To examine government programs, to propose changes to them if necessary, and to report to Parliament on all of its deliberations". This is a mainstream idea whose time has come. The government needs to act now to preserve, enhance and support the nuclear family in Canada.

I want to answer those who might say that the focus of this bill is too narrow, that it touches on the nuclear family as opposed to another more inclusive definition of the family. I have used the term nuclear family in the bill to designate what is commonly understood as a family in Canada.

This is in no way meant to be a pejorative statement or a condemnation of the numerous social arrangements which society accepts. There are many other acts of Parliament, for instance, that target particular groups for assistance and help without any pejorative connotation. For example, we have an act of Parliament granting benefits for unemployed workers, but this is not a jab at those who have jobs. It simply targets one of the many groups in society with which Parliament needs to concern itself.

It is the same for the auditor general for the family. Society accepts many diverse living arrangements, as it should, but those arrangements are simply not the focus of this particular bill. The bill merely recognizes the importance of one needy group in our society, the nuclear family, and it attempts to enhance its well–being.

I have chosen the definition for the family found in the Dictionary of Canadian Law: "The family includes a man and a woman living together as husband and wife, whether or not married, in a permanent relationship, or the survivor of either, and includes the children of both or either, natural or adopted, and any person lawfully related to any of the aforementioned persons".

This is similar to the definition used by other dictionaries and also the federal government and the governments of all 10 provinces. I realize that it is never a perfect definition but we do have to try to do something and certainly this is the standard definition found in the dictionary.

The nuclear family is hardly a narrow or isolated group. In the enormous study done by Murdock some years ago in which he studied 250 societies around the world, he found that "the nuclear family is a universal human social grouping. It exists as a distinct and strongly functional group in every known society".

Does this mean that all government programs must be focused only on the family or only on married folk or only on their children? Of course not. This bill merely recognizes the importance of the family in our society and it attempts to enhance its well–being.

I was reminded of the centrality of the family in Canada when I attended a wedding just a few weeks ago. The bride was beautiful. The husband to be was very nervous. He was determined to go through with his decision and his promise to stick to his wife for life. The father of the bride was pretty close to tears giving away his little girl, but he was also pretty close to shedding a few tears of joy as well. I should know because the father was myself and Karina is and always will be my not so little girl anymore.

Even though there were a couple of hundred people there, there was something very private, something very personal about that ceremony, and that was the transmission of values from me to my child, from the parents of the groom to him and the fusion of those values into what was really a new family. We watched the creation in a sense of another new family unit.

It is almost like running a race in which one runner passes the torch on to the next one and together each runner helps run the race for the whole team. If the torch is dropped, the race can still be finished but it is not the same. In fact, the race cannot be won.

• (1745)

The torch in this analogy is the invaluable inheritance of secure, committed families. The race is the life of every Canadian. Canadian families are too often too easily dropping the torch during the race. As a result, individuals within families are suffering and the whole country is suffering because our families are suffering.

In Canada 13 per cent of all families are single parent families. That is one million families. Nearly 30 per cent of all Canadian marriages end in divorce. Even if we lay aside the arguments for the family that are based on the emotional hardships suffered by broken families, we can point to strong economic arguments of why we want to promote and encourage the family.

Surely it is in the interests of all political parties, our government, our nation, to find ways to promote the family unit, where a loving, committed husband and wife nurture healthy, happy children. Within that unit they pass on the values of commitment and faithfulness and stability and responsibility to their own children, who will in turn carry the torch in their generation and will pass it on to the next.

Families are the root of a prosperous and peaceful nation. If Parliament is to cultivate the ground from which strong families grow, it must now begin to study the social environment for the family and begin to change its policies to provide a more favourable environment for families.

If the government for whatever reason finds that this auditor general for the family is unacceptable, that this idea just does not carry the day, I appeal to government members to create their own body that would perform a similar function. Listen perhaps to the recommendations of the commission which asked for a permanent secretariat on behalf of the family, but find some ways to encourage and enhance that important institution.

The family in Canada is in crisis. The time to act on its behalf is now. I hope all members will lend their support to the principle of an auditor general for the family.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Madam Speaker, if there is one thing we have in common as members of the House, it is our shared belief in the value of family life and the central role the family unit has within our society. Families are at the very core of our social fabric.

[Translation]

That is why I congratulate my hon. colleague across the way for introducing this bill for the creation of an auditor general for the family.

[English]

I congratulate the hon. member. By bringing the bill forward he provides those of us on this side with an opportunity to comment constructively on this area of social policy. It also allows us to review the many ways this government is already working to support individual Canadians in the pursuit of their social and economic objectives, including in meeting the commitments to their families.

[Translation]

Right at the start, I must express my disagreement with the importance attached to the nuclear family in Bill C–322. This term seems to define what constitutes today's Canadian family in too narrow terms.

[English]

It may be that a generation or two ago the traditional family structure was that of a male breadwinner and a stay at home mother who looked after the house and their children and all lived under the same roof. That may have represented a typical Canadian family but that situation has changed dramatically.

[Translation]

The nuclear family is no longer the dominant model in Canadian society. Now we have many different models: single parent families, blended families, extended families and so on.

[English]

The two parent with children household now comprises less than half the families in Canada. Our lifestyles have changed over the years since the nuclear family defined society and the direction of our social policy and any related legislation must reflect those changes.

• (1750)

[Translation]

It is our duty as legislators to base ourselves on today's realities and not yesterday's ideals. Deciding a certain model merits our attention more than another is tantamount to thumbing our noses at all those Canadians whose family structure does not fit within the model of the typical nuclear family.

[English]

I emphasize that our government is not against the nuclear family. We agree with the preamble of the bill which says that the nuclear family is one of the foundations of Canadian society.

[Translation]

It is true that the nuclear family is one of the foundations of our society, but it is our opinion that the foundation of society is the family unit, and family units may take different forms. We agree that the nuclear family constitutes an important element in Canadian society, but we contest the fact that it is the only family structure that counts.

[English]

To this government all Canadians are important, whether they are members of a nuclear family or not.

[Translation]

Finally, as we have stated in the red book, the Liberal government's policy is to aim at greater equality of social conditions for all Canadians. We wish to broaden the outlook, not make it narrower.

[English]

As hon. members know, it is the Liberal Party which has been responsible for the major social policy initiatives of this country over the years. It is Liberal governments, including this government, which have confirmed time and time again our belief in the value of the family as the basic unit of society. We have signalled the commitment through many of our programs in support of family members.

This is an important concept. Whereas my hon. colleagues opposite would single out members of only one type of family unit for attention, our government believes in looking at the needs of all Canadians and all types of family structures and in doing that, looking within a broad economic and social context and not within a narrowly cast definition of family.

It is our belief that if we want to assist Canadians to meet their family obligations, we must look at the overall environment within which people live and work. We must look at and respond to needs within the social, economic, technological and cultural environments in which individual Canadians as family members find themselves.

[Translation]

We do not feel that we must evaluate Canadians, or the effect of federal programs and institutions, in terms of the needs of this or that family model. If our goal is to improve the quality of life of all Canadians, we shall improve the quality of life of the members of all Canadian families.

[English]

Thus, we have programs designed to provide income assistance to families with children. That means all families with children are eligible, not just one kind of family. Income assistance to families with children is one of the oldest parts of Canada's social security system, dating back to 1918.

[Translation]

One of the most important elements is the child tax benefit, a non taxable income–related benefit for those with children under the age of eighteen years. It comprises a basic benefit, a supplemental benefit for children under the age of seven years, and a work income supplement.

[English]

One of the best ways we can help Canadian families is to enhance the ability of individual Canadians to find a job and keep that job. This is a central objective of our economic and social policy.

[Translation]

The objective is to help not only those Canadians who are part of one type of family or another, but all Canadians.

• (1755)

Very often, helping a Canadian to find and keep a job also means helping him or her balance work and family responsibilities. In today's world, increasing numbers of Canadians have to strike a balance between responsibilities toward their employers and family responsibilities. This is also a reflection of the changing structure of the Canadian family.

[English]

For example, over the past few decades an increasing percentage of women have remained in or re–entered the workforce while raising young children. At the same time there have been increasing demands for support for older relatives and friends leading to the creation of the so–called sandwich generation.

[Translation]

Under these circumstances, a good child care system becomes a vital necessity, and the possibility of assistance may have a considerable impact on the family.

[English]

Nuclear family or not, many Canadians are feeling these pressures. Governments need to be responsive to these developments in the workplace and their impact on families as well.

[Translation]

One of the ways our government is responding to those needs is the "child care visions" research and development program announced earlier this year by the Minister of Human Resources Development.

[English]

The child care visions program will lead to a better understanding of emerging child care issues as well as increased knowledge about the needs of Canadian families. One of the objectives of this program is to encourage greater involvement by all sectors of society in meeting child care needs.

Once again, we view these issues in the broad context of economic and social policy needs and not in the narrower context of a family definition. There are other programs in place and under development to support workers to meet their family responsibilities.

In the very near future, the Minister of Human Resources Development will be meeting with his provincial counterparts to discuss the best possible ways to take care of our children. This will be a very important initiative for this government to help the family.

[Translation]

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East and entitled, an act respecting the office of the Auditor General for the Family. The hon. member made an excellent presentation and explained very clearly his reasons for proposing this legislation.

The purpose of this bill, after a preamble that stresses the importance of the nuclear family and states that Canada should encourage, support and protect it, is basically to appoint an Auditor General for the Family who would examine federal policies and make recommendations to ensure that the federal government encourages the development of the nuclear family.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Human Resources Development made it very clear that this bill is well intentioned. No one in this House wants to diminish the role of the family in our society, and everyone wants children to have a family in which they can develop their potential. The bill would, however, create a number of problems.

First, there is the definition of family. The bill refers to the nuclear family, the traditional family that is still very important. This is the family where there is a father, mother and children. However, for the past 20 or 30 years at least, we have seen changes in the family structure in Canada and Quebec.

We see families with only a father, or only a mother. We see families made up of individuals who previously belonged to other families. If we adopt the bill as presented by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East, this would mean ignoring a number of families that play just as important a role in bringing up their children as the nuclear family. These families would, to a certain extent, be discriminated against or overlooked.

My colleague, the member for Fraser Valley East, said this would not preclude steps being taken to foster the development of other kinds of families, but the fact remains that if we take the trouble to appoint an Auditor General for the Family who will be dedicated to the well–being of nuclear families, as it says in the bill, we are excluding a certain number of families. As many as 20 per cent of the families in this country do not correspond to the description of a nuclear family.

Yet it is in these families that children are often likely to need special programs. Not because their families are less competent than other families, but because the responsibilities of a single father or a single mother are tremendous. I think there is a case here for government support. We see no indication in the bill of how these families would be helped by adopting this legislation.

The real problem, and the hon. member made this very clear, is the children. We want children to develop in a satisfactory family environment. I think that a satisfactory family environment, at least for many people like me, in the Bloc Quebecois, is first of all an environment in which there are sufficient resources to provide for the children's development, to clothe them, feed them and educate them. That is the kind of family environment in which a child has a chance to develop its potential.

I think that any steps we would want the Canadian government to take should be based on fighting poverty and maintaining social programs, if we want to support children who live in a family environment. It is vital to be clear on the problem: child poverty and family poverty cause young people to have health, social development and education problems. Therefore, I do not think the bill before us, despite the hon. member's good intentions, will contribute to improving the quality of children's lives in Canadian families.

Another problem I notice in reading the bill—and I apologize, Madam Speaker, perhaps many members in this House have heard this argument, these remarks, too often for their liking—is that we are again looking at a jurisdictional conflict between the provincial and federal governments.

In my opinion and in the opinion of many of the Bloc members, matters to do with family, marriage and families' private lives are more matters of provincial jurisdiction. So, once again, there would be a degree of conflict between an organization, an office of the auditor general, at the federal level and provincial institutions. Some provinces have family secretariats.

So again, we have not progressed from the stage where the federal and provincial governments often take contradictory or parallel measures, to the detriment of families and children needing care and support.

• (1805)

Even my colleague from the government said in his speech that daycare services should be set up. This would perhaps be more important at that point for the well–being of children living in a family setting. Daycare services, however, come under provincial jurisdiction. So we face the same dilemma, we are in stuck in this situation. I think there comes a time to put a stop to it.

Finally, and my colleague for Fraser Valley East mentioned it as well, there is the matter of taxation, a problem that can be detrimental to family life. Every year, in Quebec, as in Canada, there are reports and studies which tend to demonstrate that people with families are disadvantaged from the taxation point of view.

This leads us to again bring up the question of tax reform in Canada. Every year we hear the Minister of Finance, people from the health department and human resources development, government members saying that, yes, we will have to address the taxation issue in order to help families and to ensure greater equity, greater fiscal justice, in Canada. Good intentions still and again, but we have seen nothing concrete in the two years that we in the Bloc have been here.

We will vote against a measure such as this. The first reason, as I said at the start, is that it is aimed at the nuclear family and we believe, in light of recent changes—in the past ten, fifteen, twenty years in Canada we have seen major changes—we must not give preference to the nuclear family, despite all of its merits over the centuries, which it continues to have.

Second, this is an area where overlap with provincial jurisdictions is such that, in the long run, it would only fuel further argumentation and might cancel out certain pro–family clauses in provincial legislation.

Let me state once again that I am very much aware of the good intentions of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East. However, for the reasons I have just set out in my address, I personally, and the members of the Bloc Quebecois, will oppose such a measure.

[English]

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to rise today in the House in support of private member's Bill C–322, an act respecting the auditor general for the family.

The bill would establish the position of the auditor general for the family, tasked with identifying and examining federal programs, exposing programs and policies detrimental to the well–being of the nuclear family in Canada, and recommending changes through an annual report to Parliament. The office would be analogous to the auditor general's office, serving the same function on behalf of the nuclear family in Canada. Unfortunately, this bill is non–votable.

I congratulate the hon. member for Fraser Valley East for taking the initiative to advance this private member's bill in defence of the rights of the traditional family.

On many occasions I have spoken both in the House and in public forums across the nation in defence of the rights of the traditional family. Unfortunately, it is not enough to just speak about family, family life, and family values issues. It is time the House gave formal recognition to the rights of the traditional family.

The family unit is the basic institution in life and the solid foundation upon which our forefathers have built this great nation. The protection of families, family life, and family values must be a priority with the government.

The conventional terms of debate in matters of political, social, economic, and legal issues tend to focus on individual rights and the rights of the state and not the rights of the family. This is unfortunate and must change, for the family is the most important reality in our lives.

• (1810)

The rights of the family are being seriously undermined and eroded. Families have inherent rights. Families have inviolable rights. Families existed before the church. Families existed before the state.

Parliament has no jurisdiction to redefine traditional family or to enter into the realm of sanctity of marriage or sanctity of life. It is important to be reminded that family is the basic institution of life. Life begins from the moment of conception and continues until natural death. The inherent and inviolable rights of family must be protected, defended and safeguarded by Parliament.

Bill C–322 is offering the government a mechanism to identify, examine, expose, and amend policies and legislation that encroach on the rights of the traditional family.

Parents are the primary educators of their children and are solely and fundamentally responsible for the emotional, psychological, physical, social, spiritual and moral development of their children. It is time the government funded the family and stopped funding agendas designed to undermine and destroy traditional family values.

For the government to promote and encourage institutionalized child care by providing tax benefits is both inequitable and unjust. It is removing the economic freedom and flexibility of families to make a conscious choice of what is in the best interest of their children and their family by imposing an economic hardship on single income families.

The traditional two parent family is under relentless attack from special interest groups and others who regard the traditional family as an impediment to their goals. For example, the feminist agenda requires careful scrutiny, as the continuous quest to conquer the alleged male oppression of women has placed pressure on society to move the focus from family rights to individual rights and rights of special interest groups. The advancement of the feminist agenda in government policies has advanced an ideology predicated upon equality of women that is more concerned with achieving formal equity and has forsaken substantive equity. By doing so, the feminist movement has done a great disservice to women, motherhood, to our children, and to the traditional family.

The Canadian position advanced at the Beijing conference appeared to be advancing and protecting the equality of women. However, the Canadian position that was advanced called for gender, not the family, to be the most important criterion for determining government policies.

It is the feminist position that family is the initiator and cause of the inequity between men and women, together with their failure to recognize the importance of the role of women and motherhood within the traditional family unit. It is against this relentless attack upon the traditional family that government must protect and safeguard.

In conclusion, the family is the basic institution of life and the solid foundation upon which our forefathers built this great nation. The protection of family, family life, and family values must be a priority with the government.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak to Bill C–322, an act respecting the office of the auditor general for the family, developed and sponsored by my colleague from Fraser Valley East.

The Reform Party has long recognized the importance and value of the Canadian family through our policies and actions, such as we see here today in Bill C–322. As my colleague earlier so well stated, few topics are as important to this nation at this time.

This bill seeks to establish the office of the auditor general for the family. The mandate of the auditor general is based on the premise of evaluating and assessing the impact, performance, and effectiveness of government policy, programs and administration.

Clause 4 of this bill outlines this proposed auditor general's duties. The auditor general for the family shall examine federal programs and institutions to determine their impact on the nuclear family in Canada; expose programs and policies that are detrimental to the well–being of the nuclear family; and recommend through his annual report to Parliament changes to federal government programs and policies that would enhance the well–being of the Canadian nuclear family.

• (1815)

Like the Auditor General of Canada, the auditor general of the family would be an official officer of Parliament and would report to the House on an annual basis. The auditor general of the family would also be empowered to make special reports to Parliament on "any matter of pressing importance or urgency" as outlined in clause 5 of the bill.

As I alluded to in my opening remarks, the family is the most fundamental institution in society. The family nurtures its members and provides for the security and needs of its members. The family provides for the transfer and protection of our values, our heritage and our culture. The family provides the stability and the prosperity of society. It is most appropriate to think in terms of an auditor general in assessing the well–being of Canadian families.

Over the past decade the Canadian family has been under increasing social, political and economic pressures. These pressures originate from many facets of government policy direction. For example, the mismanagement of our nation's finances has created tremendous pressure both on the earning power and even the job availability of Canadians and their families.

The average family income in 1984 was $43,204. In 1993 it was $43,225. After tax income has actually fallen 6.5 per cent from 1989 to today. The tax bite out of money earned is over 30 cents on the dollar. The facts indicate that it requires almost double the paid working hours to support a family as it did 20 years ago. Translated into action that means two income earners in a family as opposed to one simply to survive.

Sixty–two per cent of mothers with children below the age of three are now in the workforce compared to thirty–nine per cent in 1981. Economic pressures can be devastating to family stability.

A recent study has found that two–thirds of parents presently experience moderate to severe levels of tension in balancing work and family commitments. According to a recent study teen suicide rates for young men has quadrupled since 1960. According to UNICEF in 1995 we now have one of the highest rates of teen suicide in the world after New Zealand and Finland.

Violent youth crime has been shown to have doubled since 1986. Meanwhile our divorce rates have risen tenfold to where Canada is second only to the United States with one divorce for every 2.4 marriages. Statistics such as these reveal what can only be described as a social revolution taking place in the heart of our homes. We as legislators in the House must do what we can to strengthen and improve the condition of Canadian families.

What concrete measures has the government taken to improve the state of families in Canada? Where are the legislation, the tax relief, constructive and effective programs? Where is the sincere commitment or are mere platitudes enough?

The Liberal government has been tragically absent and worse yet in some cases culpable in this crisis. Citing facts as we heard a few minutes ago that less than half of Canadian families are dual parent with children is grossly misleading, or saying that we must face reality and do nothing about ailing families.

Ms. Clancy: Why is it misleading? Finish the clause. Why is it misleading?

Mrs. Hayes: To answer my colleague's question, two parent families with children now compose approximately 80 per cent of families in Canada. That will answer my colleague's question.

Ms. Clancy: According to whose statistics?

Mrs. Hayes: I ask my Liberal colleagues if they walk into a village that has been ravaged by some disease whether they would simply walk away from those who are suffering while muttering something like reality must be faced.

I shall highlight two specific and current examples of some issues that the auditor general of the family could examine.

• (1820)

I recently attended the world conference in Beijing. I was there to ensure that the views of the family and of family life were represented within the Canadian delegation and the conference itself. At the conference our government committed to the Beijing platform for action which requires that the government implement over 500 actions in the next five years. Although the conference was supposedly about women, the document introduced barely mentions family and when it does it is often depicted as a place of oppression and violence.

One of the actions discussed deals with children's rights. The document elevates children's rights above those of parents, including unrestricted access to "reproductive health services and education" and confers upon our children so–called sexual rights. Parental prerogatives and authority are replaced routinely with government and bureaucratic intrusion. The document ignores the value of family relationships, seeking to use words such as caretaker or girl child in place of beautiful words like mother and daughter.

This platform for action has not been tabled in the House. It has not been debated and it has not been examined by members of the House. In short, it has simply not received the scrutiny that it deserves. It is a Liberal government endorsed product without any reference to the Canadian people that will have and has a profound effect and impact on the Canadian family in society.

A second example is also related to the Beijing conference. Before the conference started the Secretary of State for the Status of Women publicly released a document entitled "Setting the stage for the next century, the federal plan for gender equality". The plan was released as the government's position on the objective of the conference while it simultaneously instituted gender equality and gender based analysis throughout the 24 departments and agencies of the government. I quote the plan from page 17:

A gender based approach ensures the development, analysis and implementation of legislation and policies with an appreciation of gender differences.

It makes gender, not family, a priority in all policy development and seeks to deconstruct "stereotypical roles" and replace them with a social revolution that shakes the very foundation of the traditional family. In dismantling barriers that supposedly impede the progress and equality of women, it denies the value of women and families anywhere outside the workplace.

The plan and its implementation would have far reaching consequences for families and society. That is what the minister intended when she wrote that "every aspect of our lives is being reshaped" by the plan. It is sad but true.

If there were an auditor general of the family he would be able to assess the impact of programs like the platform for action, report his or her findings to the House, make recommendations to the government and the House, and raise the profile of these issues. This Reform bill would do much toward attaining that goal in terms of providing information about the family and introducing greater accountability to the system.

Reports on the family would generate interest in family issues. They would cultivate a culture of respect for the Canadian family that is sorely lacking in federal legislation and throughout the federal government.

These are basic, fundamental and significant accountability measures that I believe will expose an anti–family agenda endorsed by the Liberal government. An auditor general would strengthen and improve the condition of the Canadian family.

Let me conclude by stating that Bill C–322 will do much to establish a family first philosophy that will establish a culture of recognition and respect for the Canadian family within government and here in Ottawa.

Moreover, by establishing an auditor general of the family it will do much to ensure that family friendly policies are developed and implemented. Current policies and programs would be examined from the perspective of benefit or harm to the family and not for special interest groups.

It is with these considerations that I urge the House to support the bill developed wisely by my colleague from Fraser Valley East.

• (1825)

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak however briefly on the bill which I do not support.

I am a feminist. I am a very proud feminist. I am very proud of the government's record, particularly at the recent Beijing conference, particularly on supporting the plan of action, and most particularly on the matters mentioned by my hon. colleague with respect to setting the stage for Beijing and gender analysis, a policy which is long overdue.

I do not say that just to be combative. I do not say it just to disagree with my hon. colleague over there, or indeed with my hon. colleague from Central Nova. I say it because I think there is a deep misunderstanding in certain segments of society.

Before I became a feminist and before I became a parliamentarian I was a woman, a daughter and a granddaughter. I am still all those things. I come from an amazingly wonderful family. I was brought up by a single parent. My father died at the age of 39, leaving mother with heavy burdens because there was no medicare. My mother educated herself and she educated me. She brought me up to believe in tolerance and equality for all. She also brought me up within the context of a larger extended family, those aforementioned grandparents, aunts, uncles and cousins to the third and fourth degree. It was a typical Nova Scotia and Cape Breton family.

On behalf of feminists across the country I resent the insinuation that we are not family oriented. Because we believe in gender equality, because we believe in freedom from fear and freedom from violence, because we believe in pay equity and employment equity, because we believe women hold up half the sky, I resent the theory that we should be told we are anti–family. We are not anti–family. We are the people who hold the flame every bit as much as my hon. colleague across the floor or my hon. colleague from Central Nova.

On this side of the House there are mothers, grandmothers, married women, single women and divorced women who have children of their own or who are loving godparents, aunts or whatever to many children. We care and we care deeply. No one has the right to equate feminism with an anti–family stand. No one has the right to question the way we feel about our families.

I love my family as much as I love my country and the two are interchangeable. It is shameful for anyone to suggest otherwise.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am very proud to be part of a political party, an organization which stands unashamedly for the family.

As the hon. member opposite just said, family is very important. There is no doubt in anyone's mind in the event a father is taken away by death or even by divorce that there are many additional hardships on the mother who is left to raise the family as a single parent. I cannot help but say that we are not in any way desirous of adding any more hardships to the person who already has so many.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being 6.30 p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am pleased to present two petitions signed by over 100 residents of Hamilton and nearby towns on the subject of euthanasia and assisted suicide.

The petitioners request Parliament to ensure the present provisions of the Criminal Code prohibiting assisted suicide be retained without changes and enforced in order that Parliament not sanction or allow the aiding of suicide or euthanasia.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I also have thousands of signatures from across Canada on the subject of crimes of violence. The petitions are part of a petition, begun by Mrs. Priscilla de Villiers, which has already collected over three million signatures.

The petitioners ask Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against a person are abhorrent to society and ask the government to continue to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972 and the Parole Act of Canada accordingly.

EMPLOYMENT CENTRES

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition signed by 356 persons in my riding of Bourassa and the Montreal region, concerning closure of the Canada Employment Centre on Papineau Street, which services my riding of Bourassa North as well as neighbouring ridings.

MANGANESE BASED FUEL ADDITIVES ACT

The House resumed from November 8 consideration of the motion that Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure once again to speak to Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances.

The purpose of the bill is to ban the import and interprovincial trade of MMT, an octane enhancer. Essentially MMT reduces emissions from motor vehicles. The government claims that MMT damages the onboard devices in new 1996 cars. It is going to be obligatory for cars used in Canada not to use MMT. This was at the prompting of the Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Association.

The Ethyl corporation that makes MMT and the petroleum products group claim that first, MMT is not a health hazard to Canadians and second, does not damage onboard devices.

If the minister wishes to ban MMT, then she has to prove that MMT is a health hazard to Canadians. The contrary has been proven by the Ministry of Health which has shown that MMT does not damage the health of Canadians. I have heard some spurious allegations by members across the way who have actually claimed that since the health department said what it did, maybe MMT really does harm Canadians. Those are statements made off the top of their heads without any factual basis. If we look at the facts, MMT does not harm the health of Canadians.

Central to the bill is the question, does or does not MMT damage onboard devices? There is ample evidence showing that onboard devices are not damaged by MMT. It is wise to look at the situation in the United States. We say we want a common gasoline for our vehicles, but the United States is bringing back MMT. It is bringing MMT back for a couple of very important reasons: First, it is not a health hazard to people; second, it does not damage onboard devices; and, third, if it is removed from gasoline nitrous oxide emissions will be increased by more that 20 per cent. Nitrous oxide is a very important component of smog. Smog exacerbates respiratory problems in people who suffer from asthma or chronic obstructive pulmonary diseases.

• (1020)

If MMT is to be banned another substance will have to take its place. That will make gasoline more expensive. It will translate into more expense at the pump and in turn will cost the industry more. It would act as a depressant on the economy, which means fewer jobs.

The minister cannot ban MMT on the basis of health reasons so she is going to try to ban its movement in interprovincial trade and in import and export which, in effect, is a ban on the substance. That is how the minister has managed to get around that.

The real truth behind this is that the Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Association is looking for a scapegoat because its members know their onboard devices malfunction. They want to find some other reason for this and have found a handy peg to hang their hat on by claiming that MMT damages the onboard devices. However the facts prove otherwise.

When looking at the situation in the United States which does not use MMT, we find that onboard devices malfunction at exactly the same rate as they do in cars using MMT. This is very conclusive, suggestive and strong evidence that MMT as a reason for the damage of onboard devices simply does not hold water.

I ask the minister to look at new ways and new energy sources. The transport sector has a 90 per cent plus dependency on fossil fuels. As we all know in the House, fossil fuels are finite and one day they will come to an end.

We must also look globally. By the year 2025, 11 billion plus people will be living on this planet or twice as many that live on it today. Therefore, energy consumption will double or, as many people believe, will increase even more than that.

Another reason is that in developing nations people are actually consuming energy at a far greater rate than they have in previous years. Through industrialization and manufacturing the demands for energy and fossil fuels are increasing.

I ask the minister to work with the minister of science and technology and the Minister of Transport to look at different ways we can work on new and more environmentally sound alternatives to fossil fuels in the future. One alternative is electrically powered cars. We cannot provide energy now at the low cost that we have with fossil fuels but in the future this will be an important alternative for powering vehicles. While we cannot do it now, we must look to the future and develop the research and technology so that we can do that.

Another interesting concept is the hydrogen fuel cell which works on the electrolysis of hydrogen sulphide or water. Although these systems are too bulky right now to use this might be an alternative form of power for vehicles in the future. Another is photovoltaic cells which take energy from the sun. The Holy Grail of all energy sources is the concept of fusion.

As a country we do not have the finances to engage in extensive projects in this area. By working with our neighbours to the south and some Europeans that are doing some fascinating work on fusion technology, we can provide our scientific expertise to them to try to make this into a reality in the future. While it may not be practical for the transport sector, there are many other energy sectors for which this technology will have to be used.

Although these alternatives cannot replace fossil fuels right now, we do not see enough of working together between ministries. In this instance the Ministry of the Environment has logical partners in the ministry of science and technology and the Ministry of Transport. They are intimately entwined. It would serve Canada well if these ministers got together with their staffs and determined areas where they could work together in an efficient fashion.

I suggest the minister look at some other areas in the transportation sector and work with the Minister of Transport, as I said before. It costs about $7,000 a year to operate a car, with high social and environmental costs. It is very expensive. Canadians should look at the European model and extract from that more environmentally sound measures on the transportation of people, paying particular attention to bicycles and rail travel.

There is a very important issue in my riding. The E & N railway runs north–south on Vancouver Island. It can be a very potent and environmentally sound mover of goods, services and people. This railway has been lying idle for many years and is highly unproductive. I hope the Minister of the Environment will work with the Minister of Transport to try to make this railway a reality, not in the public domain but in the private domain; ownership being retained in the public domain but management and functioning in the private sector.

Vancouver Island is an area where the population is growing at perhaps the fastest rate in all of Canada. Unfortunately we are seeing the southern California syndrome where we have urban sprawl at its worst. We can look at Vancouver to see what happened there.

With that growth in population will come transport and energy demands. These must be met by looking toward the future by determining ways in which we can provide this transportation without damaging and destroying the pristine environment the island affords.

In conclusion, with respect to MMT our role in the House is to determine the truth. The minister acknowledges the conclusive evidence that first, MMT does not damage people's health. Second, there is conclusive evidence within our own country and even south of the border to show that MMT does not damage onboard devices.

We need to determine the truth. I ask the minister to review the relevant data and rethink this issue. Clearly there is no reason to ban MMT in Canada now. If the minister has to have an independent study to determine once and for all whether MMT actually does damage onboard devices then she ought to do that.

Again I hope the minister would work with the minister of science and technology and the Minister of Transport to look at new and improved ways of meeting the energy needs of Canadians in the future.

I wish to move the following motion to Bill C–94. I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:

"This House declines to give third reading to Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances, since among other things the bill does not take measures to compensate for the fact that MMT free gasoline would cause the fuel industry to burn more crude oil, causing greater emissions into the atmosphere while at the same time increasing tailpipe nitrous oxide emissions".

• (1030)

The Speaker: The motion is in order. Is the hon. member rising on debate?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, we are still in the 10–minute phase which would permit a question or a comment.

The Speaker: Because the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca moved an amendment we now move to debate on the amendment. There will be no questions or comments. That is how we will proceed.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, many questions have been raised about the legislation now before the House. In some cases the debate has obscured what really is at stake. I would like therefore to try to answer some of the questions to give members a clear picture of the issue.

First, we have heard about the harm MMT causes to pollution control equipment in vehicles. Does this not have a plus side? Ethyl corporation is the producer of MMT. According to this company the use of MMT allows less intensive refining, thereby reducing emissions from the refineries. Ethyl corporation also maintains that MMT reduces tailpipe emissions of nitrogen oxide by up to 20 per cent and lowers toxic benzene emissions. If so, what is the point of banning such a useful additive?

Let us take the question of refining. It is true that MMT allows less intensive refining. In 1992 a report was prepared for Ethyl Canada. It indicated that if the additive were banned Canadian refineries would emit 40 to 50 tonnes more of nitrogen oxide per annum and 34 to 43 more kilotonnes of carbon dioxide. Those amounts represent 0.0025 per cent of our yearly emissions of nitrogen oxide and 0.01 per cent of our carbon dioxide emissions. Such slight increases are clearly minuscule.

What then about emissions from vehicle tailpipes? The data collected by Ethyl corporation showed an average reduction in nitrogen oxide emissions with MMT of up to 20 per cent. But the figures were for a test fleet of well maintained vehicles, whereas the actual Canadian cars are not on average as well maintained. If we put the findings into the context of the current Canadian cars, another analysis indicates that MMT causes a much smaller reduction in nitrogen oxide emissions, no more than about 5 per cent.

As for toxic benzene emissions, these should not increase as a result of the banning of MMT. Gasoline can be refined to limit its benzene content. This past July the Minister of the Environment announced that she intended to regulate benzene levels in gasoline to a maximum of one per cent per volume. The regulations would also limit any increase in the amount of aromatics in gasoline.

MMT has been used as an octane enhancer in gasoline, but the oil refining industry has various options for replacing it. These options should still limit the benzene content. For example, the refining process could be changed to produce higher octane gasoline constituents. Along with or instead of that, other octane enhancers are available such as ethyl and MTBE.

This raises another question: Are we banning MMT to promote the use of ethanol? The answer to that is no. Ethanol is only one option for replacing the octane now provided by MMT. There are other options available and it is up to the petroleum industry to make that choice.

What about the financial costs? Some wonder whether MMT removal would place a heavy financial burden on the oil industry or consumers. According to the industry's own estimates, the cost would translate to an increase of approximately 0.1 cents to 0.24 cents per litre, a minor amount, especially considering the normal day to day price fluctuations we see at the fuel pump in the order of a few cents per litre.

Other questions have been raised about the studies that provide the basis for the legislation. Why, it is asked, are we accepting the word of the auto industry, which is surely an interested party in the dispute. Why do we not make use of independent studies? The fact is there have been no independent studies to determine the effect of MMT on emissions control systems. The research has been sponsored either by the auto makers or by Ethyl for the oil producers.

Some would ask why Environment Canada has not sponsored or conducted its own research. The department has sought technical opinions from two outside experts, one of whom was called on by both industries to participate in joint discussions. Both experts agreed that we do not have conclusive data but that MMT tends to affect emissions performance and increase costs.

To go further and conduct a government study of the issue would simply use up taxpayers' dollars and delay the introduction of new pollution control technology into Canada. We cannot afford to do that. Both industries have done their work and studied the issue. It is now time for a decision. Some might ask why that must be a government decision; why not leave it to the industries concerned to arrive at their solution? That is exactly what we have been trying to do for more than two years, but so far that approach has not succeeded.

Senior officials from four federal departments have met with representatives of the oil and auto industries. I would stress this about four federal departments because the previous speaker suggested we should be talking among the different departments and getting answers. This minister has spoken to and worked with four federal departments. More recently the Minister of the Environment attempted personally to negotiate an agreement. All these efforts have failed. We have no alternative but to legislate the necessary changes.

Still another question concerns actions on MMT in the United States. In the last months we have seen moves to reintroduce its use there. Most recently, this past October 20, a United States Court of Appeal decision ordered the Environmental Protection Agency to grant Ethyl corporation registration for the use of its MMT additive in unleaded gasoline.

Why are we banning MMT in Canada when the United States seems to be lifting its almost 20–year old ban on MMT? After all, part of the argument made against MMT is that we must harmonize our emissions control approach with that of the Americans. Are we not in danger of remaining out of step if we pass the legislation?

• (1040)

MMT prospects in the United States remain cloudy. The EPA could appeal the October 20 ruling or attempt other legal action. Major refineries might be reluctant to adopt MMT until uncertainties are resolved about the health effects associated with widespread use of the additive. Furthermore, the auto industry could launch its own challenge.

Even if none of that happens, about one–third of the U.S. gasoline market including California requires reformulated gasoline to meet more stringent air quality requirements. MMT is still not allowed in reformulated gasoline, which can be expected to claim a growing share of the U.S. market in the coming years as the country moves toward cleaner fuel.

California has gone so far as to expressly prohibit the use of MMT as a gasoline additive. This U.S. state is a world leader in emission control strategies. The example it sets is widely followed throughout North America and beyond. We should carefully consider the approach of California. It could well become the benchmark for tomorrow.

Another question asked is what is the rush. Why do we not wait for the doubts to resolve themselves? Why should we intervene now when the issue is still unclear and evolving? The answer is that the issue will never be settled to the entire satisfaction of both the auto and oil industries. Doubts are bound to persist, but there is sufficient evidence now to make an informed decision. The two industries have been unable to do this themselves, even though we gave them plenty of time in which to do it. The voluntary approach has failed so we must be prepared to turn to legislation to achieve a solution.

For those who have raised doubts and questions, I have some questions myself. In a time of budgetary constraints can we justify spending government money to duplicate studies already carried out by the private sector? Can we justify a delay in introducing state of the art emission control technology in Canada? Can we justify the extra expense consumers will bear if MMT continues to be used as an additive in Canada? Would there be considerable cost for industry or consumers if MMT is banned? Would there be a notable harmful environmental impact? Is MMT likely to have a place in the cleaner fuels of the future? After more than two years of discussion is there any likelihood that the industries concerned could reach agreement in the near future on MMT use? Is there any real alternative left except legislation?

I believe the answer to all these questions is self–evident. Equally obvious is that the time has come for Parliament to exercise its obligation and legislate an end to the use of manganese based additives in gasoline. That is what Bill C–94 does. The measure is pro–environmental, pro–consumer, pro–investment and pro–business. It is time for the House to face the facts and pass the legislation.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C–94.

We introduced the amendment simply to allow time for the topic to be studied and assessed in light of what has happened in the U.S. and to avoid embarrassment for the government and the country.

• (1045)

The move to ban MMT at this time clearly has little support in evidence. Everyone on the committee, including the government members, raised substantive doubts on the validity of the evidence.

The presentation of the previous speech we heard was very well done. Nevertheless it was a presentation that again accepted unquestionably the evidence provided by the auto manufacturers in spite of the fact that they refused to table any of those studies for us to look at.

We are told that the minister intervened personally to try to bring about a settlement on this issue. I would question how the minister could intervene personally to negotiate a settlement on this issue when she refused to meet with one of the parties involved. In spite of several attempts by that side, the party in the dispute, the minister refused to meet with them.

The member says she personally intervened to try to bring about a settlement. What hogwash. A settlement cannot be brought about by only meeting with one side. Again she says they have had plenty of time to settle the dispute, that the government has given ample time to do that.

In the 1993 campaign the Liberal party, before it became the government, committed in its red book to ban MMT if an agreement was not reached. In the dispute the motor vehicle manufacturers lost all will to negotiate any kind of agreement because it was there in writing: If an agreement was not reached, the government was prepared to ban MMT.

We again hear how there is no time to let the National Research Council or the Department of the Environment conduct independent tests. There is this urgency because of the technology on the 1996 cars. The 1996 cars are here. They are on the market. They are being sold. The OBD II system is onboard. It is functioning and has not been disconnected. Why are we in such a terrible rush?

Yesterday we heard from the member for Davenport that if these OBD II warning lights were disconnected and the system was malfunctioning, it would somehow contribute greatly to more pollution and would be a health hazard for Canadians. My response to that is: What about the millions and millions of cars on our roads that are pre–1996 and do not have OBD II systems and seem to be functioning quite well? This OBD II technology is not vital to the operation of a car. Whether or not it functions is not how we judge the pollution that is coming from the car. They are simply warning devices. They have no effect on the pollution produced from the tailpipe of that car.

There is not such a great rush and we do have time to do that testing. It is important in the interests of this country to wait. Certainly if MMT is allowed to be used again in the United States in the coming year, this bill and this movement by our government will truly be embarrassing. Certainly it will be embarrassing to the country to have the Minister of the Environment go down in history as the minister who passed a bill to increase ground level ozone and smog. It is truly ludicrous.

We have introduced the amendment to appeal to the common sense of the House to let the bill rest somewhere at least for a couple of months or a year. Let us do some independent testing to verify the evidence. Let us wait and see what happens in the U.S. so we can truly move toward harmonization of fuel, an objective the Minister of Industry clearly stated in the House as being crucial.

Whatever happens in the U.S. and however small an amount of MMT is or is not allowed in, to ban MMT in Canada is to move away from the goal of harmonization and not toward it. It only makes good common sense to wait until we see what happens and to do independent testing so that we have concrete evidence one way or the other.

• (1050)

Certainly this party supports the banning of MMT if it can be shown in independent testing that it is a problem. Ethyl corporation and the petroleum refining industry stated in committee that they are perfectly willing to withdraw the product from the market if independent evidence shows that it is detrimental. That is certainly a more reasonable position than the one presented by the government.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments about the auto industry in Canada and point out some facts about it.

In 1994, $44 billion worth of vehicles and $20 billion worth of parts were produced in Canada. Producing $44 billion worth of vehicles in Canada employed 58,000 Canadians. Canadians across the country are involved in the industry. There is a Volvo plant in Halifax, many plants in Quebec and Ontario, and truck manufacturers in British Columbia. The vehicle parts manufacturing industry involves over 750 companies employing 82,000 Canadians.

I am sure that Canadians employed in these companies would like to know the hon. member and his party are supporting their jobs. I get the feeling from what I have heard in the House that their support is only for the oil refining industry and not for the workers of Canada and the Canadian industry. I wonder if the hon. member has any comments.

Mr. Chatters: Mr. Speaker, I would love to comment on that because truly we are beginning to see the real motivation for the legislation. It is a political motivation.

I am not responding to any lobby. I met with both sides on the issue. I listened to the evidence from both sides. We did extensive research into that evidence. The evidence is not there to support banning MMT. It simply is not there.

Certainly to suggest that by not banning MMT it will create a loss of jobs in the auto industry is a red herring. Cars will certainly continue to be built where they are being made today.

I will say one thing. If there are job losses to be incurred because of the issue, they will not be in the auto industry; they will be in the manufacture of MMT. That plant will close down and those jobs will be lost in Canada. They will be gone.

The member has the facts just a little mixed up. We are accused of being overcome by the lobby of Ethyl corporation and that there is some kind of evil corporation from the U.S. which is not even Canadian. Where are the head offices of every member of the Motor Vehicles Manufacturers Association? They are no more Canadian than Ethyl is, quite frankly. If the member is concerned about job losses, let us be realistic and fair. They will not be in the auto industry.

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Madam Speaker, again the member for Athabasca is deviating from the information we received in committee.

It was amply discussed there from the information provided by the auto industry that the presence of manganese has a negative effect on the functioning capacity of the oxygen sensors and catalytic converters. The results are clearly identified. The committee was quite keen in investigating the matter. It went into investigating the question of the effect of manganese on sparkplugs. The hon. member saw the pictures that when sparkplugs operate with gasoline containing manganese, the coating of manganese is visible on the sparkplugs.

• (1055)

In addition the MMT manufacturers are in the U.S.A. They are keen to maintain the Canadian market as they have already in Bulgaria, Russia, Taiwan and Argentina. We have now reached a stage in Canada where we have to move away from MMT as the Americans already did in 1978. The American motorist has been using gasoline without MMT since 1978. There is no deviation from that fact and the Reform Party must accept that fact.

The entire North American automotive technology is moving toward an onboard diagnostic system which is intended to improve the emission controls of the engine.

Is this a political decision? Yes, it is a political decision because politicians have to make policy decisions. We have to keep up with rapidly advancing technology. We cannot turn the clocks back to before 1978 and go back to how it was in the United States before the U.S. banned MMT.

We must apply the latest technology for the sake of the consumer. That is why we have the issue of onboard diagnostics which, contrary to what the hon. member for Athabasca said, would have to be disconnected in Canada if MMT was not removed. The disconnection would be to the disadvantage of the warranty holder, namely the car owner.

These facts emerged from committee. Does the member for Athabasca agree with those observations?

Mr. Chatters: Madam Speaker, for some reason the member for Davenport does not seem to remember what went on in committee.

The evidence was very suspect. The pictures of the sparkplugs which he referred to were two different types of sparkplugs. The witnesses told us they were exactly the same sparkplugs run in the same engine and all the rest of it. On the tailpipe emission issue, a government member was clearly confused and had some real doubt as to the authenticity of the data before him and what they were suggested to mean.

Without any question, the evidence is suspect at best and certainly is not enough on which to base the decision to ban MMT. The evidence simply is not there. The bill is an embarrassment to the country and the minister.

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am especially pleased to have the opportunity to take part in the third reading debate on Bill C-94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances.

The primary purpose of the bill which is to be known as the manganese based fuel additives act is to ban the use of MMT, a manganese based compound used as an octane enhancer in Canadian gasolines.

MMT is widely recognized as having an adverse effect on the operation of vehicle emission control components, including sophisticated onboard diagnostic systems, commonly known as OBDS. OBDS are slated to be introduced in virtually all 1996 vehicle models. They will help to control vehicle pollution by monitoring emission system performance and alerting drivers to a malfunction. Several car manufacturers around the world including Ford, Chrysler, General Motors and Toyota have all come to the conclusion after extensive scientific testing that MMT adversely affects onboard diagnostic systems. Many of these corporations have billions of dollars invested in Canada and directly employ tens of thousands of Canadians in manufacturing plants.

• (1100)

To continue using MMT in Canadian gasoline would compromise the ability of Canada's auto industry to design cars that achieve important pollution reductions. Surely it goes without saying that Canada's environment and Canadian consumers have the right to the best emission control technology available. Presently Canada is one of the last countries in the world in which MMT is used in unleaded gasoline. That is a distinction we should not be particularly proud of.

While MMT has been in use in Canada since 1977 as a replacement for lead in unleaded gasoline, it has been banned in the United States since 1977 because of concerns over health effects. I find it ironical that one country, ours, adopted a product at the precisely the same time its neighbour banned it.

Environment Canada, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and virtually every single automobile company around the world all agree that MMT impairs the performance of pollution control equipment found in today's cars and trucks. Study after study shows that MMT adversely affects the onboard diagnostic systems where the pollution control equipment is found. These systems are extremely important for the environment because they ensure the cleaner burning engines of today and tomorrow operate as designed.

Understandably the vehicle industry has indicated it will not accept the risk of increased warranty repair costs associated with MMT in gasoline and would take preventive actions, including disconnecting the OBD systems in whole or in part and possibly reducing vehicle warranty coverage with 1996 vehicles if MMT continues to be used.

The passage of Bill C–94 into law will bring about a successful resolution of the MMT issue in Canada and will ensure that vehicle emission standards remain harmonized in the North American automotive market.

I will now speak on the health hazards associated with manganese based compounds like MMT. AT 1990 hearings of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency into a waiver application submitted by Ethyl Corporation to reallow MMT in unleaded gasoline, a number of experts testified on the toxic effects of manganese compounds.

Ms. Ellen Silbergeld of the environmental defense fund testified at the EPA hearings: "Manganese, like lead, is a toxin in that both its absorption and retention as well as its toxicity increase with time. At present there is insufficient data on the low level chronic effects of the manganese exposure similar to the case that was made for lead in 1925".

The environmental defense fund in its written submission to the EPA states: "We know that manganese at high dose is a demonstrated human neurotoxin with persistent and irreversible pathological effects on brain structure and resulting severe impairments in movement and mental state. We do not know what the long term chronic low dose consequences of human exposure to manganese are. We do not know a safe level of manganese exposure, particularly for those subgroups that may be at increased risk for neurotoxity, the young and the aged".

Dr. John Donaldson is one of Canada's top neurotoxologists. He has conducted ground breaking research in this area. Dr. Donaldson told the EPA in Washington: "One of the major theories in leading edge neuroscience which relate to the environment today is that there are agents, neurotoxins, insidious neurotoxins like manganese, which are age accelerating neurotoxins. I believe that manganese is such an age accelerating neurotoxin and I believe this is the answer to manganese's ability to produce biochemically, pathologically and clinically the picture which is very similar, very similar but not identical, to Parkinson's disease".

On May 1, 1994 Dr. Donaldson wrote to me with an overview of more recent scientific studies that should give us all pause. I put on the record the following examples of recent research provided to me by Dr. Donaldson:

> An increasing body of evidence from Sweden, the centre of excellence and occupational health and safety, has demonstrated that chronic exposure to manganese at very low levels can produce impairment of mental function. The evidence suggesting that low levels over a prolonged period can impair memory has strong implications not only for occupational health but perhaps more especially to child mental health, and firmly places manganese in the category of behavioural psychotoxin as well as neurotoxin.
> This newly emerging recognition of the low dose effects of manganese is a most effective club with which to stifle industrial critics which argue that manganese is only toxic at enormous levels rarely attained.
> Recent evidence by Dr. Donald Calne of the University of British Columbia, a distinguished and internationally acclaimed researcher in Parkinson's disease, considers that manganese in humans is progressive and even a short exposure can lead ultimately to brain damage. Of especial importance was his observations that even a short exposure was as effective as a prolonged one in causing irreparable brain damage. This should dispel claims by critics that at moderate doses manganese has no health risk.
> Dr. Calne has also noted that the initial toxicity of manganese can remain masked for several decades following exposure although causing brain cell death at an increased rate which is only detectable by brain imaging techniques. The disease may not appear for periods as long as four decades. A silent killer indeed.

• (1105)

There are a number of options to replace the octane provided by MMT. Available substances include MTBE, ETBE, methanol and ethanol. Ethanol, which is produced from Canadian grains, is an ideal octane enhancer for unleaded gasoline. Since it is manufactured from renewal feedstock it is especially valuable as a non–petroleum fuel component in times of restricted supply. Ethanol and its derivative, ETBE, are the only gasoline additives which are renewable and offer the further security of reducing dependence on foreign energy supplies.

The primary environmental benefit of ethanol is its high content of oxygen. Gasoline contains no oxygen. Adding oxygen has the effect of creating a more favourable air–fuel ratio, which results in a cleaner combustion of the fuel, thereby reducing such harmful emissions as carbon dioxide.

On December 21, 1994 the government announced a new program to encourage the development of biomass derived fuels. It is obvious that the banning of MMT as contained in Bill C–94 dovetails perfectly with this program. In addition to helping improve the environment, the government's support of ethanol investment will benefit agricultural producers and create industrial development. There is no doubt in my mind that the banning of MMT will boost demand for ethanol and help to create new long term markets for corn and grain as feedstock to the ethanol process.

I heartily support Bill C–94 and I strongly encourage all members to do likewise.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have a number of questions.

I cannot remember when I have heard such a gross distortion of facts as we have just heard. Perhaps it is as a result of overexposure to manganese.

Does the member not believe that officials and experts in the Department of Health are competent and reliable? Has she read the blues from when Health Canada appeared as a witness before the committee and on several different occasions clearly stated manganese in fuels does not present any health hazard to Canadians? That is clear. It is written down and there for her to see.

• (1110)

The other comment I have is a return to the red herring of ethanol. The member should check the evidence presented by witnesses. Every manufacturing and refining witness that appeared before us said ethanol is not an alternative, that it will not replace MMT.

Mrs. Ur: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. Perhaps his judgment is that ethanol is not the only alternative. In my speech I offered other alternatives. It is one of the alternatives that can be offered to this program.

Health is not the issue at the present time. We are looking at the air pollution issue as well. He says we do not take studies into consideration. In the United States they filed with the EPA four times as to qualifications for MMT. Three times they filed under section 211(c) and were denied. This section deals with matters concerning public health in relation to MMT as well the effect of MMT on the performance of emission control devices. They were turned down.

In their good wisdom they looked at section 211(f)(1) within the clean air act. The application was denied because it only related to the health aspects. We must consider what section they applied and when it was accepted or turned down.

There have been other studies conducted. I believe some Reform Party members said NOx emissions would be reduced by 20 per cent. However, these data were collected by Ethyl corporation. Environment Canada has said NOx would be reduced by 5 per cent. We must get our data straight on the issue.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's comments quite closely. I am a little concerned she is still putting forth the idea that ethanol is an alternative to MMT. As my hon. colleague from Athabasca stated, clear evidence was presented to the committee which contradicts what she is trying to say.

Once again in her comments she has said ethanol is one of the alternatives, which is simply not correct. I would like her to retract that statement because ethanol is not an alternative to MMT.

Mrs. Ur: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague. In the past few days or weeks General Motors acknowledged that its cars would be able to use ethanol gas.

In addition I am very proud to say that gas stations have included ethanol pumps in London, Ontario, within the last week or two. They have been in touch with the car manufacturers. Obviously they know there is a requirement for such an option. I am very pleased to say ethanol is making strides in southwestern Ontario, my area.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, as I have listened to the debate over the past few days one thing has become abundantly obvious. We need to do more research. The evidence, as the hon. member said, reflects people on one side saying one thing and people on the other side saying another thing.

I appeal to the government to support the amendment my colleague from Athabasca has made. We should give some time to it. The Americans are studying it. We need to look at it some more. It would be a great disservice to Canadians to quickly rush the bill through the House. There is nothing wrong with accepting the amendment and looking at this matter a little more.

If we look at the evidence presented in committee it becomes quite clear we need to look at this a lot more. I hope the government will listen to reason and support the amendment.

• (1115)

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

I reassure the member the government is not rushing through this issue. The minister gave notice in 1993, two years ago. In my view that is not rushing.

Further, I believe the House has been working on it since 1985 to broker a solution. Senior departmental officials from environment, transport, industry and natural resources have all been working with senior representatives from the petroleum companies and the automotive industry. This has not come by night; it has been looked at for several years with one option or another.

With all due respect, I believe there has been sufficient data put together and we have to move forward. We cannot constantly be looking and looking and looking. We have a party in the House that tells us we are wasting money continually. This costs money. I do not say it is wasting money when we do studies, but it costs money. We have adequate information. Let us move forward on the issue. It is time to move. We have to respect the information we have collected.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(7), a division on the question now before the House stands deferred until Monday, November 20, at 6 p.m., at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.) moved that Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased, along with my colleague from Portage—Interlake, to move second reading of the bill that provides for the formal foundation of the Department of Human Resources. This is the last of the 10 reorganization bills and with its passage the major reorganization of departments that began in 1993 will be complete.

• (1120)

The bill primarily deals with administrative reorganization. As members know, the new department brought together portions of several other departments: the former departments of employment and immigration, health and welfare, secretary of state, and Labour.

At the outset I say the bill makes no significant changes to the statutory elements of the legislation that established these founding departments.

[Translation]

The bill does not change the powers of the federal government or the provinces. It gives no new powers. The mandate conferred in the bill is clearly limited to the matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction. That is literally what it says in clause 6.

In other words, the programs and structures included in existing legislation have simply been put together in this new bill.

The Bloc objects to clause 20 because it allows the minister to sign contracts with agencies and institutions other than the provinces. But this is not new. This has not changed.

For instance, the bill includes agreements on older workers with the government of Quebec and the other provinces. Under this agreement, the government purchases annuities from financial institutions.

[English]

All the legislation does is allow us to continue to provide assistance for older workers by buying a series of annuities from financial institutions in full co–operation with the provinces. Frankly, the attempt to raise fears and create the impression that this is some form of new intrusion is simply another example of blowing smoke, which we have seen so rampant over the past several weeks.

Why then is the legislation important? Why bring together four or five departments into a singular instrument of government? I think the vision that underlies the reorganization of the department is captured in the name itself, Human Resources Development. It tries to bring together all the different elements, instruments, programs and policies of the federal government into one coherent approach to the fundamental issue dealing with individual Canadians. In a sense it is a single drawer out of which a number of tools can be brought to try to tackle and focus on the concerns and issues of many Canadians as they go through difficult times of personal, family and community adjustment at a time of incredible changes in society.

This is not a defence of the status quo or what used to be. It is an attempt to try to provide a new, innovative way of doing government. One of the great singular difficulties we have, as we well know, is to get people to begin to think differently about how government can relate to individuals, communities and the country. The old ways simply are not relevant to the kinds of conditions we now face. That is one reason the government has undertaken to provide a new set of instruments, brought together with a single focus of policy. It really gives us a foundation on which the role and participation of the Canadian government can tackle the real deficit problem in the country, which is not just the fiscal deficit but also the human deficit, a deficit as corrosive and undermining to the well–being of individuals as anything we face on the fiscal side.

The singular challenge we face, regardless of political opinion or jurisdiction, is how to give Canadians the ability, the resources and the support they need to manage sometimes very painful and difficult transitions as the economy changes into a globally integrated economy, as we try to cope with the major impacts of new technology and the impacts on the workplace, where job requirements and qualifications change in an instant. This almost revolutionary transitional sweep is affecting not only Canada but every country in the world.

• (1125)

The time has come for all levels of government—federal, provincial, and municipal—not to engage in the old fashioned warfare of whose turf we own, but to find ways of working together, find ways of bringing together our combined resources. The attempts to try to stake out what one jurisdiction should do versus the other oftentimes leave out one major problem. We are still talking about the same people who are interested in their family, their job and their community and simply want government to help, not hinder or in the way but provide the resources they need.

The real fear and the real uncertainty gripping the lives of people is how to cope with unprecedented change and how to make something of it that can be positive and constructive. There are those in our society and I suppose there are people in the chamber who would like to roll back that change. Like King Canute, they would like to stop the waves from coming in. That is bound to frustration.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I did not want to interrupt my colleague, but I have just consulted with the official opposition and we have contravened one of the rules in the House.

According to Standing Order 45(6)(a), a division deferred on Thursday is not held on Friday but is instead deferred to the next sitting day at the ordinary hour of adjournment.

The government whip did not consult with or get the consent of our party. Nor did he get the consent of the official opposition in deferring the vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I will take that under advisement and get back to the member.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the fundamental purpose and rationale for reorganizing the department is to put us in a position where we can take a holistic view of this transformation, try to put a finder on it that enables us to see the linkages and the crossovers.

We know full well that the problem of child poverty stems oftentimes from relationships in the workplace. We know that poor children also end up with children who have illnesses. Therefore we have to find some way of cross–linking the responses and in so doing be more effective and more efficient both within and between governments and provide the best possible answer in that respect. This means not abandoning basic values but finding new ways of doing things.

We have to recognize, a fundamental and critical issue, is that the old top down centralized hierarchies of governmental organization, which have been really a product of the old industrial age, no longer work effectively. The kind of management that is driven from a command point of view no longer works very effectively. We now must find a much different way of working in a society with individuals and communities, much more in a lateral and horizontal way than in a vertical way. The old manuals that governed inputs and outputs and measured results according to fiscal accounts no longer apply when it comes down to values.

I would like to point out one of the interesting initiatives we were able to co–sponsor with the OECD last spring. The secretary of labor in the United States and I made a motion that rather than have the OECD issue purely economic indicators every year it should begin to also look at social indicators, the impacts on investments in education, investments in welfare and what it tells us in terms of the resulting capacity and competence of individuals to make progress in dealing with the problems.

I am really talking about getting the best use of taxpayers' dollars at a time when we face real restraint and providing a much more effective way of enabling people to respond and make choices themselves and not have choices made for them.

Let me give one small example of how a saving can be made that has an impact both for the individual and for society at large. If we could get the 400,000 people who are almost permanently unemployed through the unemployment insurance ranks and who receive benefits by changing that benefit to a form of employment benefit so they could get one more week of work, we would save the entire system $50 million, just by that one act alone, an additional week of work.

• (1130)

Think of what it does for the individual who knows that for the first time he or she has an opportunity to springboard back into the workforce as opposed to simply planning a life which is a constant round of getting from one benefit program to another. That is the key element in trying to shift the role of government and the way government operates.

This is not critical of what was done in the past. It was a product of its time. In the 1940s, 1950s and even the 1960s there was a view about how government should work in terms of providing a form of security through welfare payments and social benefits. During those times we were not facing the kind of economic transformation which is going on today. We were not facing the disruption which is now taking place.

People now have a much higher level of skills requirements. We have seen all the reports; I do not have to repeat them. The reports show that those who have some kind of post-secondary education have an 85 per cent to 90 per cent chance of getting a job. Those who have less than high school have about a 30 per cent chance of getting a job.

One cannot simply say it is the individual who has to survive and swim in that sea. I reject that philosophy. Government after all is nothing more than the combined collective representation of all those individuals recognizing there are certain things that have to be done together and not individually. We have to combine resources across the country so that when one area is facing higher unemployment, other areas help support it. That is the fundamental concept of sharing.

The more we fragment the country, the more we divide it, separate it and turn it into a series of fiefdoms, the less capable we are of helping individuals to respond when they have needs because we no longer have the benefit of that sharing. That is why the federal government must continue to play an important role in this area. Those who are the apostles of provincialism, which is to say turn everything over and make all the decisions, will recognize what can happen.

One example is a discussion we are having with the province of British Columbia. It is feeling the pressure from people who are moving in from other provinces. Those in B.C. forget that in the 1980s people from British Columbia were moving to other provinces which were picking up the responsibility. They forget that it was a very important time for there to be a balanced wheel to make sure there was a proper adjudication and sharing of resources.

That is why it is important to help redefine, select and work out how we in the new department of human resources can play that role clearly in a system of partnership. We must also make sure there is a very active and useful delivery of service to individual Canadians nationally.

In the last year in the department of human resources in its combined form, we provided in one way or another a transaction service to one million Canadians. We are the largest service delivery organization in the country. We deal with more Canadians than McDonald's, Air Canada and Sears, Roebuck combined. That is why the question of service becomes so important.

One of the most important elements of the reforms we are introducing is trying to understand how we can provide a much better service related to where the individual is and to get away from the top down command system. I used to say that the departments we brought together had a General Motors or IBM philosophy. I wanted to turn that into a Canadian Tire philosophy where it was based in the local communities with tools and instruments customized and tailored to the needs of those communities.

We are pioneering in this approach. We have made enormous progress in the past year by being able to fundamentally rethink and redo the way in which the department of human resources works. It is an attempt to find the most relevant kind of governmental organization to fit the job system and social system we are going to need as we approach the new century.

As an example, last August we announced a fundamental change in the way in which the service delivery operation of the department would operate. We are going from 450 points of service in the country to 700 points of service. We are providing a much broader network.

• (1135)

Some of my colleagues have been very concerned about how the federal government ensures adequate and effective services in rural areas. This means a much broader extension of the services of the department into areas that did not have services before. People can now access services without having to travel 50 miles or 70 miles to visit an old CEC.

I will give the example of a person in Elgin county where I visited about a month or so ago. In terms of testing out new models, one of our young officers in St. Thomas worked out a system where through the Internet he was able to provide the same access to information and services we used to provide by having somebody come into the St. Thomas office. In a period of three months with that simple change alone he was able to provide service to 4,000 new clients.

If we had had to do it the old way, people would have been in line ups five miles long every single day at that St. Thomas office trying to find information on pensions or employment.

One of the end results is that people can access the job bank in the local grocery stores, high schools, libraries, places where people go, where they carry out their normal business. We can work partnerships at those local levels so people get that same level of service.

We are also working with the disabled community to establish a new job bank for disabled Canadians which is tied in with a large number of corporations. Again the access is provided at the local level and is designed by the users themselves working with the business community. All of a sudden a number of disabled Canadians can put their resumes on the system. Businesses can recognize what those resumes are and they can do the transaction together. It frees up our own officers to do the really important and intense work of counselling and mentoring and providing good advice as to where one can go and how to get there.

One of the major advantages as well is that what used to be the old job centres are now becoming in a sense human resource centres where there is an integration of all the services of the department. Seniors, students and workers under the unemployment insurance system can all come to the same place.

As a result, seniors will have four times as many offices in which they can be serviced than previously. The new technology means that processing UI claims can be reduced to two days when it used to take sometimes 10 days to two weeks. Claims for old age security can be processed in half a day instead of eight days. That means a lot. We can put that in cold statistical terms but for a senior who has been waiting for an application for old age security, to have it within a half a day as opposed to eight or 10 days makes a big difference when they do not have a lot of money to deal with.

We are substantially broadening that network to a variety of points of service. We are using the new technology. We are not afraid of it, like some members are saying, like the Luddites of old who say that we cannot use new information systems. There is not a business, not an organization in the country which is not asking itself questions about how to improve efficiency, productivity and access by using the new systems. That is what we are now doing and implementing. It is a fundamental part of trying to provide better service for those nine million Canadians who use our services.

Not only are we integrating within the programs we offer, we are also undertaking a wide variety of experiments and projects throughout Canada in terms of a guichet unique. We are providing ways in which all three levels of government can work together to provide a common one stop shopping service.

For example, in Alberta there are a series of youth centres. Both the federal and provincial governments now combine to provide a very direct ability to deal with long term unemployed youth in three of those centres. In early evaluations and in talking to Alberta officials, we are finding a much higher success rate because we combined services and young people can come to one place and get that same kind of service.

Another interesting example is in the province of Quebec, in Alma, the hometown of the Leader of the Opposition. My department, the SQDM, the local municipalities and local clubs are now combined in a single service delivery system.

It is exceedingly strange that we are being attacked by those who say we are intruding but in fact we have a wide variety of those co–operative projects going on in the province of Quebec with the Government of Quebec. The reason we are doing that is because they work better that way. This is at the working level. It is not at the level of the top bureaucrats or politicians who love to talk about the grand design. It is at the working community level. We are dealing directly with the service in towns like Alma, Jonquière, and other places where there are these combined services.

• (1140)

The key to success is that people find it much more effective, much more helpful and much more productive for them as individuals. Is that not what it is about? Is that not what government is about? Those are the kinds of changes we are undertaking.

It also means we will go back and look at many of the old programs which were developed 20 or 30 years ago, some of which I helped to develop when I was a minister back in the early eighties, for example the national training act. We must ask if they work any more.

During this past year we have undertaken very extensive evaluations testing what does and does not work. We have produced a series of 24 different evaluation reports which are publicly available. They provide a very good assessment as to what kind of involvement or participation makes sense in the areas of benefits, youth, et cetera. Based upon those evaluations, which we have already highlighted, we are providing a substantial distillation of our programs from 39 or 40 programs down to five programs, five basic tools.

I will take a moment to articulate this most clearly. These five tools will provide the opportunity for decisions to be made at the local employment centre level instead of having to respond to some program designed and manufactured in Ottawa or the regional office. Decisions can be made right at the community level with the local partners, the provinces, municipalities, businesses and social agencies. They can tailor how those tools can be most effectively used to deal with the unemployment problem in a specific locale.

It is decentralization of a very different kind. There has been a lot of talk and we have read much in the paper about decentralization. So far it has been a somewhat restricted debate as it talks only about decentralization in terms of transferring from the federal government to provincial governments.

Should we not also be talking about how to empower communities and individuals to make more choices? Is that not what we should be looking at in terms of decentralization? Should we not be looking at how governments become partners and facilitators in the local community context? Not only do we find a much more effective way to deal with the unemployment problem in a specific community, but we can also begin to help strengthen and enhance those communities themselves.

Social analysts have made a very good and profound contribution by recognizing that with all the pressures of the global economy and new technologies, one of the consequences has been the unravelling of what they call a civic society. Those intermediate organizations, trade unions, social agencies, community based organizations no longer have the same capacity to respond.

I will give a personal working example. When I was in school, just a few years ago—

Mr. McCormick: Very few, yes.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): You don't have to snicker.

One of my summer jobs was working on recreation programs for a boy's club, which was associated with the local United Church in inner city Winnipeg. We brought in 40 or 50 volunteers per night to provide student recreation programs at the local level in an area where children did not have much opportunity.

A month or so ago I was talking to a woman who was a contemporary of mine. She had been involved in the program and had become heavily involved in the work of the United Church in offering this program. I asked her whether she still did those programs and she replied: "No, we spend money lobbying people like you". That is an interesting change. Rather than investing their dollars in terms of providing a rooted, community based activity directly designed to meet those problems, they were mobilizing to lobby the government.

• (1145)

Is there a way we can make government a partner in that area? Is there a way government can help the local boys' club or church organization? That is why I want to decentralize the department. It will give far more discretion, far more autonomy and far more accountability at the local level so it can make decisions and work out its business plans. I believe this is a very exciting opportunity.

The other night in Winnipeg there was a major conference put on by the Institute for Advanced Research on children's problems. The institute brought together from across Canada about 20 different agencies which were pioneers in bringing together community based responses to the problems of children and youth at risk. It was a heart warming and encouraging experience. We saw how schools, agencies, local police, local municipalities, the provinces and our department all came together at the same time to provide a range of services. They could make use of the resources. Rather than having single silos or pyramids built all over town, they were now bringing them together.

Their request to us was to have an information network which would link them across Canada so they can share experiences and resources, so they can get common procurement and look at common training for their workers. That is a simple way of hooking them up to the information network.

Look at the connection. One of the reforms we are introducing in our department is the new labour market information system across Canada. Individuals can tap into that system to find jobs whether they are in Gander or in Prince Rupert. If we can provide the same information network to those child centres, all of a sudden we have substantially enhanced their resource with very little cost to us and we have made them much more effective in their local communities. That is the vision the department is trying to put forward.

How do we take this very large department, which has 27,000 employees and a budget of $60 billion, and really make it an active, involved participant at the community level along with its other partners?

At times I show some frustration at the old debate about which level of bureaucracy will control the money. I am saying the real problem is at the community level. That is where it really counts.

It gives us the opportunity to help to clarify the roles between levels of government. Contrary to the charge that there is a big intrusion, one of the direct results of the department will be to give far more space for provincial governments to begin to make decisions at their level of responsibility and jurisdiction. I firmly believe that. The time has come for us to take a much closer look at the respective roles and to build bridges to bring us together.

That is why we have formally invited the provinces to work with the Government of Canada on the decentralization of the delivery of services so we can tailor them to local labour market needs. That is the key. We cannot do it unilaterally, as some provinces want; we must do it together.

[Translation]

As the federal government simplifies its programs and further defines their scope, the roles of both levels of government will be clarified, and major sectors of the labour market will be open to the provinces.

• (1150)

[English]

That is a very major task we have set for ourselves. We have already started a number of discussions with many provinces about how we can do exactly that. One of the most important results of the new legislation we are preparing which will be introduced very shortly will give us the ability to make a much better, more effective clarification of the respective roles and to create far more space for provinces to make their decisions.

Rather than getting into the bare knuckle federalism that some people in the House have advocated, in which they seem to enjoy confrontation, it is time to start building a partnership of federalism. In that wonderful world of Judith Maxwell, one of our important social and economic confreres, said: "Is it it not time governments look at the potential of federalism, not its problems, not its disputes, but the potential of federalism?" That is what we are trying to discover and search out as we deal with the new issues, the potential of federalism, the potential we can bring together.

As I said earlier, we have already succeeded in building that in a number of new delivery systems. Let me give an example of the things in the past year we have been able to do working with the provinces in those areas.

One good example is from Newfoundland dealing with a serious problem, as my colleague from St. John's knows well. We established a collaborative approach to deal with youth unemployment. As a result of the student work and service program, 2,700 young people including 1,000 on social assistance were given an opportunity to work for a period of 16 weeks in either the private sector or community agencies. Upon completion of that work they were given a voucher and could then choose to go back to school or use it for self–employment.

A full 97 per cent of those young people on social assistance have used or intend to use those vouchers to go back to school. They worked, they earned it, they have the voucher and now they understand the importance of education. That was done with full collaboration between two levels of government working with youth agencies, schools and colleges in that area.

Does that kind of thing not indicate exactly how collaboration is better than confrontation, division and separation? That is the way to get things done, by working at that level of opportunity.

Let me give another example from British Columbia where certain ministers are claiming we do nothing. There is a major child care project going on, almost $30 million invested through our strategic initiative. Again, we sat down and worked it out. We asked how we could provide a better service in child car. The province took the lead in the design and implementation and we provided the resource through which it could establish community based child care centres that provide a series of services for 30 or 40 child care activities. They provide a common procurement, common training, respite care for parents who need it.

The evaluations I shared with a minister in British Columbia again demonstrating we have saved the child care system money because there is a common based service. Those individual child care units can provide a better range of services because there are special remedial programs for disabled children which can be shared among a number of units. That collaboration has resulted in better planning within the community level about how children can be looked after at the community level.

This makes sense, rather than getting into the bare knuckles. It is better to realize the real issue is children and how we can work together to provide that kind of service.

Another good example in Quebec is the APPORT program which the province pioneered with the previous government. It has provided a form of assistance and testing those on social assistance so they can go back to school or to work with the use of an income supplement. While the debate about separation was raging, we were negotiating with the Government of Quebec about how we could combine and collaborate jointly fund the APPORT program and extend it to new kinds of clients so that we could find a way of enabling people, rather than staying on social assistance, to find self–sufficiency and independence in their lives and find a job. This is again an example that while the great political battles are waging over here, at the community level we can do something very useful, very effective and very helpful.

• (1155)

That is one level of the kind of partnership we see as the abiding philosophy we want to put forward. Another very important problem all members of the House are concerned about, because we see it every day in our constituencies, is our young people. They have a much tougher time than our generation had. They have far fewer opportunities because of the higher demands for skill and education. They have far less certainty about what the future holds because the future is so much in turbulence and turmoil.

However there are ways we can work together in partnership. One of the areas we are exploring most actively is how to work with the private sector in this area. The most crucial area and where there have been serious problems is when young people finish their formal education. How do they open the door to new kinds of work experiences? How do they make that transition, build that bridge?

Our department has been working on the establishment of a series of human resource sector councils. We now have 19 in place. These bring together employees and employers, unions and management to work out a human resource plan for their own industry: electronics, software, tourism, horticulture, culture. They recognize, again through experience, is by bringing workers and management together they can do much better than having them separated. They also recognize they have very serious gaps in skills in those sectors and they are working to improve them.

We have just signed an agreement with the Grocery Products Manufacturers Council two weeks ago, the second largest manufacturing group in Canada with about 300,000 employees. Half its employees do not have the level of education required to meet the new kinds of technologies now coming into that business. Therefore they will start with basic on the job literacy programs. The private sector helps to support this program and the provincial governments provide support for the private sector which is taking the responsibility to manage the program.

Councils could provide very important conclusions in youth internships in which we could provide the opportunity, managed and driven by the private sector, to take responsibility for our young people to make that transition. It means that in schools in all provinces there are young people who work half days through a private sector opportunity and go to school half days. The curriculum and standards have been designed jointly by the private sector council and the local school or provincial agency.

This year 25,000 young Canadians will have the opportunity to be involved in that kind of youth internship program. Again, it is a partnership: government with the private sector; government with the local school boards; government with the provinces. That is the kind of philosophy we have to continually talk about because that is what works.

That is what the department is about, finding what works based on dealing with the real individual needs of Canadians and getting better services to them, but also developing a real set of partnerships that will enable us to reach out and cross over to find the linkages, bridges and connections throughout the country with our fellow governments, the private sector and community style agencies to combine resources and focus our efforts specifically on enabling individual Canadians to make a difference and to make a change.

Therefore I strongly recommend to the House the legislation we have before us. I hope members will see it for what it really is, not based on the old prisms and optics of the past, which is to say this is federal or that is provincial, but on the prisms and optics of the future, which is to say let us redefine government as partners with individuals, partners with communities and as partners with each other. That is the real philosophy that underlies the new Department of Human Resources Development.

• (1200)

With the accord and support of the House, we can get this legislation in place. It would give us the authority to bring together the powers of the old department and provide a coherent, concise focus on helping Canadians meet the challenges of a new century.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. A little earlier today there was a question raised in the House about whether the vote that was deferred until Monday at 6 p.m. by the deputy government whip was appropriately deferred.

I want to confirm to the House that consultations were held by the whips. Pursuant to Standing Order 45(7), the vote was properly deferred pursuant to the consultations which had taken place as early as Tuesday of this week.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In response to the point of order by the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville, since we appear to have agreement of the whips of all recognized parties, under Standing Order 45(7), the vote on the amendment for the third reading of Bill C–94 will take place at 6 p.m., Monday, November 20.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, we have no objection to the vote being held at 6 p.m. rather than 6.30 p.m. It should have been clearly stated when it was presented to the House that consent had been reached by all the whips.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, that is not a point of order.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Madam Speaker, the minister who tabled the bill implies that his bill is a model of flexibility, co–ordination, decentralization, and letting the average citizen decide. Unfortunately, that is not the case, since it all depends on whether the minister is prepared to say yes or no to a project, any project.

In the final analysis, the minister will decide what will be decentralized, who will get a grant, who may co–ordinate, because ultimately, the decision will always be his. This bill is the exact opposite of flexible. This bill is unbending, and its author did not listen to Quebec.

Coming ten days after a referendum in which the people of Quebec spoke loud and clear, while giving Canada a brief respite to shape up, this bill is an insult. It is easy for the minister to say: Let us set prerogatives and jurisdictions aside and co–operate, when in this legislation he assumes powers he never had under the constitution, powers he had the colossal nerve to extrapolate from his spending powers and which he today wants to legalize in a bill.

• (1205)

With complete disregard for efficiency in the use of shrinking resources and for the constitution, this bill for the first time clearly gives the federal Minister of Human Resources Development the power to replace the provinces in many of their jurisdictions, since, and we will see this later on, it literally allows the minister, as it says in the clause, to make decisions on all matters relating to human resources development in Canada, no less.

Far from withdrawing from provincial jurisdictions, the federal government is in fact assuming general responsibility for human resources development. The federal government is assuming the powers it needs, whether the provinces like it or not, although some do, but that is another matter and we will get back to that, but Quebec was not consulted, and when it was, it said in no uncertain terms what it wanted. The federal government is getting ready to change the social safety net, with no regard for the impact this will have on the provinces and especially on the individuals concerned.

This is a new phase, a qualitative leap in the development of Canadian federalism which tries to provide a legislative basis for this invasion by the federal government's spending power. The government has decided unilaterally to provide a legal, specific and positive basis for its spending power, which it often used to spend its way into debt. Today, the debt is being decentralized to the provinces, but the power has been recentralized to Ottawa.

This confirms our worst fears, and we discussed this during the referendum campaign. For instance, instead of announcing a withdrawal of the federal presence from manpower, this bill accentuates that presence by giving the federal government the requisite powers to negotiate and make deals directly with local agencies, without prior consent from the provinces. That is what the minister calls being flexible. Even municipalities may be approached and offered responsibilities under contracts to be concluded directly with the Department of Human Resources Development.

A good example is what happened during the so–called battle of the employment centres. We have yet to hear the epilogue to this story. Bill C–96 throws wide open the door to the delegation of the powers entrusted to the minister or the new employment and insurance commission—I will get back to this—to entities other than provincial governments and public administrations.

In other words, this bill, without any consultations, also opens the door to privatization and contracting out. Again, this is to be done on the minister's say so; if this bill is passed, he will be in a position to adopt any standards he wants and to define expected results. All those involved—including provinces, if he feels like it, organizations, people and financial institutions—will have to be totally flexible in complying with his decisions. This will remain true even though he says he wants to make employment centres responsible for some programs, since these centres will also be accountable to the minister.

• (1210)

If Bill C–96 is passed, it will also put in place the legislative framework allowing the Minister of Human Resources Development to go ahead with his UI reform according to the policy outlines revealed in the past few days. This policy is fully consistent with the bill.

I would like to stress a disturbing fact. This bill, whose only purpose, according to the minister, is to join together previously separate departments or programs, is Kim Campbell's legacy to the Liberals.

It is important to remember that, during her short–lived government, she gathered under the same roof all departments dealing with unemployment insurance, income security for both seniors and young people, literacy, student loans, employment training, and family policies. She did this as part of a major reform of social programs, as she said during the election campaign. Over 50 per cent of the federal government's budget spending is done, decided, directed, and controlled by this new Department of Human Resources Development.

The Tories did not hide the fact that they wanted to carry out a comprehensive reform. Let us not forget that, during the following election campaign, Liberal candidate Chrétien hounded the minister for saying, and we remember this, that this issue was too complex to be debated during an election campaign.

When questioned, the Liberals never suggested that they were only waiting to be elected before doing what Kim Campbell wanted to do. It is important to keep this in mind. It is important to show that when the Liberals came to power, instead of putting the departments back the way they were, they took advantage of the major upheaval ordered by senior officials who are still there. This clearly shows that the Liberal policy is the same as the old Tory policy, which is the same as that proposed in 1985 by the Macdonald Commission set up, as we know, by Mr. Trudeau's Liberal government.

Let us have a look—and I will quote the minister himself—at the new department's jurisdiction. In his budget plan tabled on February 27, 1995, he said that Human Resources Development Canada was in charge of the UI program, the income security program for children and seniors, a major part of family policy, existing federal programs of assistance to the provinces for post–secondary education and social assistance, labour market adjustment, social development and student loans. This accounts for more than 50 per cent of federal expenditures.

The federal government is playing a major role in the daily lives of Canadians without having to consult anyone, when it is literally altering the social and economic picture in Canada. But Quebec should be left to get organized to look after the people let down by the federal government.

• (1215)

Quebec is expected to live with the consequences of this government's actions, that is to say, at a time when, as we know, deficits are high, let the middle class bear the brunt of the tax load, target assistance to the most disadvantaged, eventually creating a rather difficult situation, all this without being required in any way to consult the Quebec government, which is the only government representing the people and nation of Quebec.

Must we remind members that a people that is different from others sets up its own social, economic, cultural and political structure that is not necessarily better but different, based on its priorities and its needs. Merely ten days after the October 30 vote, what Bill C–96 is saying is that the central government, through the Minister of Human Resources Development, will go ahead with its plans for reform and keep making decisions affecting the social fabric of Quebec without having to consult anyone.

No wonder it is telling us: "Forget jurisdictions. It does not matter any more". It is taking over, making an unprecedented power grab in areas of responsibility that are not its own, by misusing its spending power to provide direction, decide, take charge.

Let us take a look at some clauses. The people have the right to know. The bill reads, in part: "The powers, duties and functions of the Minister extend to—they can say that again—and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction relating to the development of the human resources of Canada—that is an even wider area than the specific ones I mentioned—not by law assigned to any other Minister, department, board or agency of the Government of Canada, and are to be exercised with the objective of enhancing employment, encouraging equality and promoting social security".

The federal government is trying to take over from the Government of Quebec a very wide and ill defined area of responsibility, human resources development.

It never had that power. True, unemployment insurance legislation was put in place, but that required a constitutional amendment. Unemployment insurance and UI benefits are one thing, but we know that the government never had the power to decide and to provide direction it is now claiming over manpower training. Quite the contrary.

And what about family policy, poverty, literacy, dropouts? The government first used its spending power to interfere, and now it is making this intrusion legal.

Let us move to clause 7.

7. In exercising the powers or performing the duties or functions assigned to the Minister under this or any other Act of Parliament, the Minister may—

(b) cooperate with provincial authorities with a view to the coordination of efforts—

There is no requirement to do so.

• (1220)

Indeed, if you look at clause 20, it reads:

For the purpose of facilitating the formulation, coordination and implementation of any program or policy—the Minister may enter into agreements with a province—agencies of provinces, financial institutions and such other persons or bodies as the Minister considers appropriate.

The minister decides whether or not he wants to hold consultations. He can delegate any power to the Minister of Labour, the commission or any other person or body he chooses.

This is important, because the desire to take over the provinces' responsibility for their own fields of jurisdiction has, as we know, a different impact on Quebec than it does on the other provinces. A debate seems to be taking place outside Quebec concerning the social program reform, or a reform of federalism. Some want to maintain centralization, while others are in favour of decentralization.

We understand that, but we want to say this: those who think that there is a will on this government's part to decentralize should open their eyes and their ears, and they should read these provisions. They will realize that what is in the making is not decentralization but, on the contrary, what one might call recentralization. Indeed, the central government is giving itself the means to directly decide what will happen at the local level.

It is easy for the minister to say: "Yes, citizen A or citizen B will be able to decide to—" That is not the case. The minister is the one who will really make the decision. He is the one who will decide and it will not be possible for a province wishing to integrate its programs to do so. We will let the debate proceed, but we had to make this point.

As for Quebec, it has been fighting Ottawa's centralizing views for a long time, because it conflicts with its own desire to have a well–adjusted or co–ordinated, as René Lévesque used to say, social and economic policy. Let me just mention that, before the Second World War, the Rowell–Sirois commission began preparing the ground—and would later complete the process—to ensure that, in Canada, major budgetary social and economic decisions would all be taken by Ottawa, with the provinces becoming mere flexible subcontractors.

The bill introduced by the human resources development minister is not new but is certainly in line with the recommendations of the Rowell–Sirois commission. However, succeeding governments in Quebec have always fought hard to maintain control over the province's social and economic development.

The war helped the central government, by allowing it to centralize all taxes. Once it had a foot in the door, Ottawa would not back out.

In Quebec, the public, co–operative organizations, as well as grass–roots movements, created a coalition, somewhat like the one which we witnessed during the referendum campaign, and told then premier Duplessis: "Quebec needs its own taxes".

• (1225)

That tax is what allowed the then exuberant Quiet Revolution to be channelled into specific projects.

At the federal–provincial conference on poverty in 1965, René Lévesque, who was to become the first sovereignist premier of Quebec and was then a federalist minister in a Liberal government, gave a very clear explanation of what the position of his federalist Liberal government was at the time.

I quoted him in relation to Bill C–95 but, if you will allow me, I shall repeat the quotes here for the benefit of our audience and for argument's sake. I do so for the simple reason that they show that Quebec has made no progress between 1965 and 1995 in controlling its own future. It has regressed. Quebecers have seen their situation worsen. Concretely—applying it to manpower—the people find themselves face to face with two levels of decision–making, to their disadvantage.

René Lévesque said that it had become imperative to establish a genuine economic and social policy. This policy needed to be integrated, flexible in its mechanisms; it needed to include a social security system centred on the family and be based on the right to assistance on the basis of need. Secondly, he said, for the sake of efficiency and on constitutional grounds, the Quebec government alone could and should, within its own territory, design and implement such a policy. I repeat, for the sake of efficiency first, and on constitutional grounds.

Thirdly, Lévesque said, the social and economic development policy they had formulated would create an integrated social policy—I would interject here that the foregoing is the key phrase—regional development policy, manpower policy, health policy, housing policy and job training policy.

Finally, he said that, as a federalist, the general policy, while he did not necessarily condemn it, did not necessarily correspond, in terms of its spirit and terms of application, to one the Government of Canada might opt for. The people of Quebec would enjoy at least as many if not more benefits than other Canadians might.

For the sake of efficiency, for the sake of determining economic and social policy as a function of needs and priorities, at a time when money is scarce, it is urgent for Quebec's economic and social policy to be integrated. Nothing, however, could be further from integration than this Bill C–96, which makes the Minister of Human Resources Development the key figure in that organization, as he has so aptly said himself.

In the manpower field in particular, there is unanimity in Quebec, and this has been expressed by another resolution by the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre, which comprises banking co–operatives, school boards, the Conseil du patronat, along with municipal institutions, co–operative businesses—just about everybody, you might say.

The Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre, on the proposal of Mr. Béland and with the support of Ghislain Dufour, made a unanimous decision to ask the government—the federal government to be precise—not to put in place a parallel partnership structure or try to interfere with Quebec's jurisdiction over manpower development.

• (1230)

The board also indicated that the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre is and must remain the favoured partnership structure regarding Quebec manpower issues. Must I remind the House that this organization is not a government organization, but one whose members represent private groups. This is the organization through which the manpower policy is implemented. It stresses, almost imploringly, that the federal government is set to put in place another network, adding an extra level of consultation, decision and assessment.

This is not a reflection of the central government's will to eliminate duplication and overlap, but of its will to take over everywhere, pushing the provinces aside and sidelining Quebec. Because it must be borne in mind that the cutbacks announced in relation to the Canada social transfer will result, in 1997–98, in a $1.9 billion shortfall on top of all the other cuts.

Quebec is going to go through some rough times. Meanwhile, the central government and its HRD minister are letting UI fund surpluses accumulate, so that they can play Santa Claus by going over the Quebec government's head and spend this money in provincial areas of jurisdiction. But contributions to the UI fund come directly from employers and workers.

The minister of employment and consultation herself vigorously denounced his bill. She says that: "Like its labour market partners, the Quebec government denounces Ottawa's intentions to set up its own parallel manpower structures in Quebec. This federal initiative amounts to a flat rejection of the unanimous Quebec consensus, repeatedly expressed, both under the previous administration and under the current one, on the need for Quebec to regain control over all labour adjustment measures, including the related budgets".

Lise Bissonnette referred, in several editorials, to this increased desire to interfere, the term is not strong enough because the federal is not simply interfering, it really wants to assume Quebec's power to make its own political and economic decisions. This is not the first attempt by the central government to bypass the Quebec government and manpower corporation.

Former minister Valcourt tried to do the same. Remember who told him off? None other than Liberal minister Bourbeau, also a federalist, who said: "Your commission does offer grants to what it calls co–ordination groups for all sorts of projects, directly or indirectly related to manpower training. These groups include all kinds of associations. Such projects seem relatively pertinent, but others are more questionable".

He then said: "Obviously, this is a new structure used by the federal government to spend money which comes primarily from the UI fund".

He also added: "What is unacceptable with this approach is that it is totally improvised, this at a time when, more than ever, government intervention in the manpower development sector must be planned according to priorities, so as to deal efficiently with issues such as manpower shortage, retraining in growing economic sectors, as well as improvement of skills, and thus benefit from market globalization".

• (1235)

Minister Bourbeau continued by saying: "I find it hard to believe that the federal government would wilfully do things which, under the pretence of initiating a rapprochement with the private sector, would result in the establishment of a network of intermediaries, given that it pledged it would not do such a thing".

I only alluded to manpower training because it is a very sensitive issue at a time when Quebec is, sadly, the champion of poverty, with an unemployment rate still at 11.2 per cent, and with Montreal in 23rd place, out of 26 Canadian cities, in terms of income level. We, Bloc Quebecois members, will do everything possible to ensure that Quebec does not remain in that situation. Less than 10 days after the referendum, instead of listening to us, they impose with an iron hand diktats that do not meet Quebec's economic and social needs and priorities.

Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for La Prairie:

> That all words following the word "That" be deleted and replaced with the following:
> "this House declines to give second reading to Bill C–96, An Act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related Acts, because the principle of the Bill includes no provision requiring the Minister, as part of that person's powers, to award full and entire financial compensation to any province wishing to exercise, fully and alone, jurisdiction over human resources development".

If the government would only give a sign that it has heard Quebecers' majority vote calling unanimously for major changes, especially with respect to manpower, it could have given a sign. By moving second reading of this utterly offensive bill, the government shows no concern for efficiency and integration, for Quebec's need to co–ordinate all its resources at a difficult time, for the Constitution, for the wishes expressed once again by 100 per cent of Quebecers.

Consideration of this bill will allow us to say that this dialogue of the deaf, which has been going on for so long and which hurts both Quebec and probably Canada, must end. Should Canada, however, end the dialogue by refusing to listen, Quebecers know which way they must go to take control of their own destiny. In the interests of the whole population of Quebec, of the whole Quebec nation, Quebecers have shown the way that they will have no choice but to follow.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The amendment is in order.

The debate is now on the amendment.

[English]

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak to Bill C–96 today.

At first glance one might think that a creation bill such as this is little reason to engage in debate, but there is indeed much we need to discuss. It is not so much what the bill says but the issues that underlie the bill that merit a resounding rejection.

I will examine a recent event that speaks to why I stand before the House to express my rejection of Bill C–96.

As members of the House know, our country is submerged in troubling times. The referendum in Quebec has paralysed the House, the Liberal government and in particular the Minister of Human Resources Development. Promises made in the red book have fallen by the wayside as the government has chosen to do nothing, fearing the consequences of decisive action.

My party stated clearly at the outset of the referendum that we favoured a strong and united Canada. To this end, we made positive contributions to the debate. We outlined a very clear position for a new confederation. Our plan would change Canada for the better and bring our country into the next century healthy, vibrant and able to cope with its new challenges. Unfortunately for Canada, the no campaign launched a strategy based on a do nothing approach. It believed the status quo would work. In short order, however, it became obvious that this strategy was a complete and utter failure.

Our Prime Minister had a 10–point lead in the polls and lost it all. In a move motivated by panic and fear he committed a huge virage. After having categorically rejected constitutional changes, after having categorically rejected administrative changes, the Prime Minister capitulated at the last minute and offered up constitutional changes and distinct society. As we all know, this tired rhetoric was soundly rejected by Canadians, not once but twice.

Let me remind the Liberals that one of their titans, Mr. Trudeau, thoroughly and publicly denounced this strategy on Monday of this week.

In light of the Prime Minister's virage, Canadians are expecting great changes from the government. However, in the week that has just passed, do we have any indication of change? I think not. Instead of change, the Minister of Human Resources Development is attempting to sell us this flawed bill, which not only grabs more powers for the federal government but also fails to introduce one single noteworthy measure of administrative change.

I will speak on a number of areas the substance of Bill C–96 eliminates. My comments will touch briefly on these areas: specific concern with some of the bill's provisions; the government's trivial attempt at post–secondary education reforms; the government's non–existent approach to decentralization; the government's brazen attempt at accountability; and the government's invisible strategy for reform of the Canada pension plan. All these issues will show beyond a reasonable doubt that the House has only one option: it must clearly and soundly reject the bill.

In the bill the minister is accorded the power to deal directly with groups and municipalities for the delivery of social programs. This power circumvents the provinces directly and attempts to keep them out of the decision making process. This is disconcerting, as it is the provinces that have constitutional authority for social program delivery. This power contained in clauses 20 and 21 of the bill further demonstrates the government's penchant for power grabbing and invasive behaviour.

The bill also allows for the appointment of a minister for labour. If the government feels the need to increase the size of its cabinet then it should admit so publicly, rather than doing it through the back door like this. The government has an obligation to be forthright in its reasoning. If I were a cynic I might suggest this change amounted to nothing more than the creation of a position at the cabinet table for the no campaign strategist, the hon. member for Saint–Henri—Westmount. I will not imply motive as I am an optimist. Instead I will leave it to Canadians to judge this for themselves.

I would like to steer the discussion toward education. There can be no doubt that education forms the bedrock of a successful nation. Bill C–96 represents the creation of a department which oversees the federal role in education policy. The bill is a stark reminder that the government has no vision for an education policy which will meet the needs of Canada's students into the 21st century. The bill also reminds us that the government has failed in its attempts to create changes to revitalize post–secondary education.

By looking at the trends of globalization and retrenchment, we see not only where the government has failed but, more important, where the Reform Party offers a substantially stronger vision in this regard.

Herman Melville once said that we are not a nation so much as a world. This statement is as incisive as it is intimidating. Unwittingly it speaks volumes of the major shifts taking place today in all aspects of our world. For just as the business world is confronting the pressures of globalization to be more productive and competitive, so too are universities encountering the necessity to provide students with better tools to help Canada remain competitive.

There is at present a growing concern among educators in Canada that students are entering the world market without the requisite education and training to help them meet the needs of their chosen vocation. The skills mismatch. The global job crisis. Reinventing education. All of these are familiar battle cries of observers writing in North American journals warning of this disturbing trend.

Schools need to be relevant to reflect the realities of the modern world and to help train present and future workers who are capable of helping their employers, in whatever field, achieve higher levels of performance and productivity. For example, the challenge facing schools is to prepare future leaders to think critically about the forces and requirements that shape business operations in global markets and in different cross–cultural contexts.

What leadership do we have from the government in the area of internationalization and education? Little to none. The Canadian Bureau of International Education has reported that Canada's performance in this area is the lowest among all G–7 countries. In fact, the bureau found that the United States spends somewhat in the order of 20 times what Canada spends in this regard. We are not talking about increasing aggregate spending, but rather reconfiguring current spending to reflect our strategic needs.

The federal government simply has to be a player in the area of international education. In the short term a Reform government would work to do the following. Strengthen the policy dialogue with provincial governments and higher education institutions through regular and systematic consultation and information exchange at all levels. Increase networking and reinforce collaborative ventures among higher education institutions in priority regions and in priority areas of research. Foster the development of stronger partnerships among higher education institutions, professional associations and public authorities, business and other organizations which have a stake in the quality of higher education and research. Facilitate and encourage key stakeholders, such as the provinces and territories, national standards bodies and associations representing the learning community, industry, business and labour to develop competency based skill tests which are matched to learning outcomes developed by learning organizations.

I want to examine a second trend, namely that of fiscal retrenchment. We are all agreed that the dismal state of public finances in Canada places a tremendous burden on the capacity of government to address any issue. This is particularly true in the case of education. Having said that, we must not let education be circumvented by, as the Smith commission noted in 1991, short term, make shift responses that have postponed temporarily the day of reckoning. I do not propose that we ignore the realities of retrenchment, but that we address our fiscal plight with a strategic mind set.

• (1250)

We must re–examine the way we fund our post–secondary institutions. Specifically we need to re–examine student loans and transfers to provinces for education.

The Department of Human Resources Development, which the bill will create, has done virtually nothing to take a lead role in promoting a new vision for education financing in Canada. Instead it has discussed, tinkered and carelessly cut.

Let us review this disappointing history. The 1994 discussion paper on reforming social security talked vaguely about life long learning. The document was long on rhetoric and short on details. It talked in generalities, as most discussion papers do. We do not need discussion. We need action. We need fresh and creative approaches to confront the plight of our education financing mechanism.

Bill C–28, passed in June 1994, made some modest improvements to the Canada student loans program. It removed financial liability from the government, which is good. However, it represents a stopgap measure for a program that requires fundamental redesign.

Some serious questions need to be answered by the government. For example, while the act made provisions to develop pilot program testing, new financing schemes, such as income contingent loans, it is not likely that anything will happen before 1997. That is four years that Canadians will have waited for the government to act, four years that the government has neglected the need to address questions of access and sustainability.

Another fundamental question that lingers is one of strategic intent. When loan eligibility is controlled by the government, loans do not provide an incentive for students to enter areas of study where there is good occupational demand. Competitiveness and productivity must be linked to education. We must determine where there is need and focus our energies to promote education in those areas.

The 1995–96 budget announced changes to the fiscal transfer regime by creating the Canada health and social transfer, known as CHST. Through the CHST the government carelessly cut transfers which support education financing and made it increasingly difficult for taxpayers to measure whether provinces are spending the appropriate amounts of money on specific programs.

The government decided that it is better to give education dollars to the provinces with no strings attached than it is to give education dollars to individuals, where it can be ensured that tax dollars are going to support their intended purpose. The logic in this is spectacularly flawed.

Bill C–96 will create a department that for two years has done nothing to make the fundamental changes required of our post–secondary education system. Why should we create a department, when we already know that it has no capacity to act on this issue?

Let us move to decentralization, an issue that has garnered significant attention of late and, in particular, when the Minister of Human Resources Development presented his remarks earlier this morning. Bill C–96 is a centralizing piece of legislation, make no mistake, despite what the hon. minister said in the House today.

Clause 6 of the bill reinforces the existing federal powers for social programs. In fact, it may even create new powers for the federal government. Even if this new power never manifests itself, the bill at a minimum entrenches the status quo of federal intervention into provincial areas of social policy jurisdiction.

I find it cathartic, though I suppose not entirely uncharacteristic, that the government should try to enact legislation which engenders and champions the notion of centralization and of status quo. To do so amidst the decentralization forces pressuring the country to change is profoundly absurd.

• (1255)

Recent events have shown to all that fundamental change is required in our federation. There is almost universal agreement that the federal government needs to rethink its current role as a provider of services and programs. In areas of social policy, we cannot continue to support a system which separates the revenue raising capacity from the expenditure function. In other areas too there is strong evidence to support devolution to the most logical level of government.

In October of this year the Reform Party released its vision for a new confederation. Reform believes that decentralization will permit future governments to respond more effectively to the needs of ordinary Canadians. It also addresses many of the historic concerns of individuals from all provinces.

Reform's plan includes the following: giving provinces exclusive control over natural resources, job training, municipal affairs, housing, tourism, sports and recreation; giving provinces control over setting their own interprovincial standards for health, welfare and education and replacing federal cash transfers with tax points, allowing provinces to raise their own taxes to finance social programs. This decentralization will lead to a more balanced federation, one in which Ottawa will play a co–operative role rather than a dominating role.

The proposals outlined in the new Confederation speak to the long term. They furnish Canada with a vision. They put flesh on the conceptual bones of a new federalism. This is the kind of leadership that has been conspicuously absent in the federal Liberals.

How can one govern without coherent direction? It is incomprehensible. I am not talking about prescience but about the courage to say, these are my ideas, this is my vision. We have seen none of that from the government. The traditional response to fiscal crisis has been centralization, consolidation and concentration. This instinct increasingly leads to failure. Centralized control and consolidated agencies create more waste, not less.

There are many reasons why Reform speaks for this vision of decentralization. Decentralization will engender greater flexibility, allowing institutions to respond more quickly to changing circumstances and client needs.

Decentralization will create more effective programs and service delivery as the deliverers and providers of government assistance are closer to those whom they serve, which is whom we serve. Decentralization will reduce wasteful overlap and duplication created by concurrent jurisdiction and poorly co–ordinated government programs and services. Decentralization will engender greater fiscal responsibility. For a government that spends the money it raises will inherently be more accountable than the one that spends the money someone else collects. Decentralization in regard to the tax system is most compatible with the tenet of federalism. The essence of a federal form of government is local autonomy. In its designated spheres each unit is free, free to exercise its policy discretion unemcumbered.

It is important to remember in this debate on Bill C–96 that decentralization is neither a celebrated buzzword nor a passing political fad. It is a policy movement that has been vigorously championed in Canada since the 1960s. It represents reconfiguring the locus of attention in the federation. Former B.C. Liberal Party leader Gordon Gibson writes in his new book: "Canadians ultimately want less control by Ottawa and more local management of their affairs—The basic concept here is 'government closer to home'. Now home is where the heart is in our private lives perhaps, but in government terms home is where the folk have the knowledge and resources to do the job. That single thought takes us a long way".

Adhering to the rule of thumb that the responsibility for addressing problems should lie with the lowest level of government possible does not require that we disavow the notion of federal leadership.
