A federal government with fewer employees, fewer departments, and smaller budgets can still have a steering role in Canadian society. There would still be a policy framework setting functions in certain areas, even if it delivered no services. These would include policy areas that transcend the capacities of state and local governments such as international trade, macroeconomic policy and much environmental and regulatory policy; social insurance programs like employment compensation, where paying equal benefits to all citizens requires that rich and poor share differentiated burdens; and investments that are so costly that they require tax increases which might discourage business from locating or staying in a city or province.

Even in these cases Reform believes that programs can be designed to allow for significant flexibility at a provincial or municipal level. The federal government can and must work with provincial governments to define jointly the missions and the outcome. But in so doing it must free lower government to achieve those outcomes as they see fit.

What has been the Liberal response to decentralization? The government has resisted the natural ebb and flow of this federation by operating completely oblivious to its surroundings. We saw this in the recent referendum. The government grossly miscalculated by adhering to a status quo position. Only when it became obvious to the government that its policy was indeed a complete failure did it move to make insincere promises of change. Where is this change now, this vision of a new federalism? Where is its blueprint for a renewed Canada? Where is the leadership to bring forward such a plan?

Given the government's previous attempts at major change, I suggest that we will be waiting a long time before we see substantive and meaningful change.

Let me give one example of how the government is failing to deliver on its promise to reform and decentralize social programs. Consider the current welfare issue in British Columbia. When the province made changes to its own programs by stipulating a residency requirement for welfare qualifications, the federal government stepped in and threatened the province with punitive actions. That is certainly no stranger to Albertans.

There is no question that the B.C. government should be permitted to administer its affairs without federal interference. The minister, rather than threatening the province, should back off and leave it free to run its own programs. It is absurd for this minister, who has radically reduced transfers to the provinces, to turn around and intervene in provincial jurisdiction.

The minister continues to refuse to meet with the provinces over the Canada health and social transfer. Now when the provinces try to move forward he stands in their way. This, it would seem, is the Liberal position on co–operative federalism. How terribly predictable and how truly unfortunate.

I want to discuss accountability for a moment. Bill C–96 reminds us once again that the government has embraced a policy that will bring an end to departments submitting annual reports to Parliament. This ignoble policy speaks volumes of the government's attitude toward accountability, despite the sniping from the other side of the House.

Most observers who study Parliament lament the gap that exists between the relatively rudimentary theory of parliamentary accountability and its practice. The theory suggests that there are strong linkages between the representative system that created the elected House of Commons and the executive system of departments headed and controlled by ministers.

Parliamentary control is considered in two key phases, the assigning of responsibility and authority through statutes and appropriations, and accountability through scrutiny in the House and in its committees. I can accept that the reality of modern government is not as neatly ordained as this theory might suggest. But I cannot accept any actions such as those provided for in Bill C–96, which weaken accountability through scrutiny in the House.

Reform supports in principle the current attempt to improve the accessibility of information in the budget estimates. However, by moving to end the annual reporting function before the estimates reform is in place, we are left with an incomplete picture regarding annual departmental activities and expenditures. How can this be? When the bill and others like it are enacted we will have poor estimates and no annual report. This is a disgrace.

At a conference hosted by the Canadian study of parliament group this past weekend the Auditor General of Canada stated that it was time for the government to go beyond rhetoric and embrace true accountability. The government would do well to listen to its own auditor general, because Canadians want information about their government. Canadians deserve to have access to good quality information about their government. For a department that spends some $70 billion annually, I think the relatively minor investment that an annual report could engender is a worthwhile expenditure.

In broader accountability terms the government does not have a solid track record. It is for this reason that I make specific reference to accountability in my remarks today. The red book outlined the seemingly ambitious agenda to restore integrity to the institution of Parliament. What has been accomplished since 1993? Not very much. Where are those free votes? Where is the independent ethics counsellor who was supposedly reporting to Parliament directly? Where is our code of conduct? Where is our real MP pension reform? Where is the promise of increasing the role of committees in drafting legislation? How can there be so many unanswered questions?

The Liberal government has made a mockery of parliamentary accountability by showing such brazen disdain and contempt toward its election commitments. It has talked incessantly about transparency, about integrity and about commitment to the Canadian people. In truth, the question is not really how many commitments have already been broken, but when next will the government break another one.

Because of this shameful lack of action the institution of Parliament has suffered. Members from all parties have suffered. Most significantly, the Canadian people have suffered.

Mr. Richardson: The only party that suffers in the House is the Reform Party.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): The government has articulated the precepts of integrity but has failed to deliver the substance of its bravado. Canadians are right to be disappointed.

We were promised a new approach to accountability and ethics. Instead, we have received well rehearsed rhetoric and woeful policy from that side of the House.

I turn my attention now to the issue of pensions. Bill C–96 will create the department responsible for administering the Canada pension plan. Given the importance of the program to all Canadians, it is only fair that we spend some time reviewing what the department has been doing. My review will be brief because in truth the department has done virtually nothing to address what the government has deemed unsustainable.

The government, in refusing to confront the issue, has said to Canadians that it is not concerned about their futures. There is widespread consensus that the Canada pension plan is in trouble. In October of this year the chief actuary for the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions stated: "The CPP's projected costs are considerably higher than previously expected. If the existing schedule of contribution rates is not increased and benefits continue as now legislated, the CPP fund is expected to be exhausted by the year 2015".

Other evidence suggests that prevalent fear and concern exists among Canadians regarding CPP. A Bank of Nova Scotia poll released last month stated that 75 per cent of Canadians distrust the security and sustainability of the Canada pension plan. The survey also showed that of those people aged 30 to 49, fully 81 per cent reported that they are not confident about the ability of CPP to provide them with income when they retire. When so many are in agreement that changes are overdue it is incomprehensible why the government has failed to make changes in its promise in 1993 to do just that.

Not long ago the Minister of Human Resources Development responded to my question in the House of Commons by stating: "The best way in which the hon. member can make a contribution is to start putting forward her own proposals on behalf of her party". If the department that Bill C–96 creates will not put forward its ideas to address our enfeebled Canada pension plan, it is only fair that I present Reform's vision for renewing CPP.

Reform believes that the Canada pension plan is under considerable financial strain, a strain which if not addressed will jeopardize the pension benefits of today's seniors, those baby boomers edging toward retirement and our children who are beginning or who will soon enter the workforce. This evaluation of the Canada pension plan is not fearmongering or partisan politicking. It represents the opinions of the governments and of ordinary Canadians.

Through access to information I obtained a briefing note prepared for the Minister of Human Resources Development written by one of his senior policy analysts. She writes of CPP that "the costs of the Canada pension plan are rising faster than the actuarial assumptions predicted". She continued in the note to say that "amendments may be required to Canada pension plan benefits or to restrict the cost of the benefits". The senior policy analyst recommends therefore that the government increase contribution rates for CPP or implement cost cutting measures in the Canada pension plan.

The only proposals for changing CPP the government is considering are cutting seniors' pensions or raising taxes for CPP contributions. We already have evidence that the government prefers the easy yet reckless tax grab option. On November 2 the government announced a payroll tax increase to support a faltering pension system. The Liberal penchant for tax increases, which is already legendary, once again rears its ugly head.

Unlike the government, Reform believes we can renew the Canada pension plan without cutting seniors' pensions and without relying on contribution rate increases. Our plan would gradually convert CPP into individualized, privately invested accounts similar to RRSPs. The total investment income in these millions of accounts will greatly exceed the total income that is possible under CPP's current restrictive investment parameters. This increase in total investment wealth is key to our plan for making possible a renewed CPP that is generous to all age and income groups.

The first point of our four–point plan to renew the Canada pension plan is a guarantee to seniors. The first step in CPP reform must be to provide a protected status for all benefits being paid to the current generation of seniors. Reform believes that when there are any changes to CPP, no matter what they may be, no matter who proposes them, those changes must never touch any benefits that we as a society have promised our seniors.

If the Liberals implement cuts to seniors' pensions, as suggested in the briefing note to which I referred earlier, we can expect a seniors' uprising like no one has ever seen. Reform will help in every way possible to take that uprising to the House of Commons and even to the front doors of 24 Sussex Drive. We will not allow anyone to tamper with promises we have made to our seniors.

The second point provides for recognition bonds. Because people over a certain age, say around 40, will not be able to build up enough savings in their super RRSPs to compensate fully for the loss of their Canada pension plan benefits, special bonds will be issued guaranteeing the redemption upon retirement of all previously made contributions to CPP. Once we have guaranteed seniors' benefits in point one, this point guarantees benefits for those who are quickly edging toward their retirement but will not be able to fully benefit from their new super RRSPs.

This brings me to my third point, the creation of super RRSPs. Who should Canadians trust to manage their retirement savings, themselves or a government saddled with a $560 billion debt? Instead of contributing to the Canada pension plan to provide for their retirement, individuals would contribute into what we call super RRSPs. The conversion process from CPP to super RRSPs would gradually reduce the financial demands on the CPP system while keeping payroll deductions at reasonable levels. The excess revenues would be diverted into each worker's RRSP.

• (1315)

The fourth point of our plan for renewing the Canada pension plan is to improve benefits for elderly widows. The avaricious benefits given to elderly widows of deceased CPP contributors would gradually be replaced by a system under which full ownership of the spouse's super RRSP would be transferred to the widow without tax implications.

Here are constructive ideas for addressing an issue about which most Canadians feel deeply. We have initiated the debate. Reform is prepared to discuss real options and is open to innovative ideas.

Reform has a vision. Where is the Liberal vision? Where are the Liberals as we navigate the rough waters of complex policy?

An hon. member: Right in front of you.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): It is clear they have missed the boat. They have no ideas, no vision and no stomach for white water. At a time when Canadians need leadership the most, the government has failed to deliver. How truly sad. We should give the hon. member on the other side of the House a bull horn.

I have spoken at length about my concerns regarding Bill C–96. In light of what I have said my conclusions are self–evident. I cannot and will not support the bill.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Madam Speaker, there is considerable mischievousness going on here today. I want to correct a couple of flagrant errors.

The Prime Minister said in the House on a number of occasions that the pensions of seniors, those who have them now, would not be cut. He did indicate it may be necessary to look at the amount being contributed at this time for future pensioners.

For the Reform to suggest that is what the Liberals are doing, that is what the Prime Minister is doing, shows it has not been listening. It is unfortunate it would stoop to that. Reform members are trying to put their party and their leader in front of Canadians. That is what that kind of remark does. That is what it suggests.

It is not unlike the remarks made during the referendum campaign. I have here over 30 some quotes from newspapers throughout the country condemning their behaviour, indicating quite clearly they were playing politics. They were putting their party, their leader in front of Canada. I would be delighted to share those comments with them if necessary.

For that member to suggest pensioners will trust Reformers, Reform policy to protect them is really dreaming in technicolour. I doubt it very much.

With respect to the official opposition I shall try to prove the bill is an administrative bill. It is putting the pieces together so that the job can be done. It is the kind of bill that will still require co–operation and partnership, those very elements required in order to make Canada work.

There are no new powers in the bill. My colleagues in the official opposition know it.

[Translation]

Clause 20 of Bill C–96 raises concerns for the Government of Quebec as well as for certain members of this House. It is the one authorizing the minister to enter into agreements with provinces and financial or other institutions.

Some members are concerned more specifically that this clause gives the minister too broad a discretionary power for entering into agreements with local organizations, which might lead to encroachment on provincial areas of jurisdiction.

To clarify the situation, it might be worthwhile to examine the exact wording of clause 20. This clause states very clearly that these agreements are expressly intended to facilitate the carrying out of programs, and I quote, "—relating to the powers, duties and functions referred to in section 6—"

This clause sets out the mandate of the department and, let me repeat, without introducing new elements and without creating new powers. This is, obviously, what limits the discretionary powers which could be conferred upon the minister.

These powers are restricted by the very mandate of the department, which the bill clearly defines as restricted to all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction. Moreover, it has been repeated on numerous occasions in this House that Bill C–96 assigns no new powers to the minister. The bill makes no change in federal areas of jurisdiction, no change whatsoever, nor in those of provincial governments. In this connection, the bill makes no change whatsoever in the present situation. Clause 20 does not, therefore, in any way authorize the minister to encroach upon areas of provincial jurisdiction. Is that clear, now?

The purpose of clause 20 is very simple. It allows the department to sign contracts with other organizations, which is normal. The department could not continue to function without that power. HRDC has signed hundreds of contracts and agreements with a broad range of Quebec groups, I might add, including agreements with the Government of Quebec, which are important to Quebec workers seeking to obtain training and get back into the work force.

The existing legislation already allows this, the bill merely picks these agreements up again. Nothing is changed. In 1994–95 alone, HRDC signed more than 50,000 contracts relating to manpower in Quebec, representing in all $695 million in program financing and income support.

These contracts break down as follows: 9,600 contracts with non–profit organizations; 9,300 contracts with businesses in the private sector; 2,800 contracts with public sector institutions such as municipalities; 3,200 contracts with the Government of Quebec and 25,000 contracts under the program for independent students, which provides income support for unemployed workers while they are receiving training.

I am sure that, all things considered, no one would suggest cancelling the agreements made possible under clause 20. Think of the consequences. It would mean the end of shared–cost agreements to help welfare recipients back on their feet. It would mean the end of funding for groups like the world famous Cirque du Soleil in Quebec City, which has carried out HRDC training and job creation programs since 1987, programs that really make a difference in the lives of people who need help.

It would mean the end of our partnership with two Quebec government departments which support youth training and job search programs through the Relais des jeunes adultes du sud–ouest de Montréal. It would mean the end of our partnership with the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre, which helps new businesses get established through the Société d'aide au développement des collectivités de Sorel–Tracy Inc.

It would mean the end of our agreement with the SQDM to help workers affected by the closing of the Hyundai Plant in Bromont, last March. It would mean the end of our agreement with the local Human Resources Canada Centre and the Société de développement économique in Jonquière on the collection and exchange of labour market information. It would mean the end of agreements on one–stop services, like the agreement involving HRDC, the industrial commissioner and the Office de tourisme de Témiscamingue on providing services to promote industrial, rural and tourism development.

It would mean the end of the partnership in Gaspé between HRDC, the SQDM, the Fédération québécoise des rivières à saumon du Québec and other groups that are working on upgrading the skills of salmon fishing guides. It would mean the end of the Older Workers Adjustment Program, a federal–provincial agreement that provides $54 million in assistance to displaced workers in Quebec.

In fact, the Older Workers Adjustment Program is a prime example of why it is so important for the minister to be able to enter into agreements, not just with other governments but also with financial institutions, for instance.

• (1325)

Thanks to the Older Workers Adjustment Program, the federal government purchases annuities on behalf of older workers. During the past three years and up to now, we have spent more than $111 million on purchasing these annuities and have helped nearly 5,000 older workers to face the future with a measure of security.

We would not be able to continue this practice without clause 20, which simply gives us the power to keep helping these workers.

These agreements and thousands like them in communities in all Canadian provinces are what clause 20 is all about. We have no intention of using clause 20 to bypass the provinces or get involved in areas of provincial jurisdiction. No intention at all.

For example, clause 20 gives us the power to enter into agreements with financial institutions providing student loans under the Canada student loans program, which is bigger and more flexible. As it is clearly entitled to, the Quebec government chose to withdraw from this program in favour of block funding.

Clause 20 will preserve this kind of flexibility, which fully respects each province's powers and priorities.

The department's ability to conclude this kind of agreement will become even more important as the department continues to streamline operations and decentralize programs.

For example, the minister is testing various ways of ensuring local integration by establishing decision making and service development at the local level. We must move away from the highly centralized and compartmentalized programs imposed by the central administration and give local authorities a much greater latitude in making decisions. It is then easier to develop an integrated range of programs and services meeting the needs of the various communities.

This will be impossible if we cannot enter into agreements with the people and organizations with whom we must work. Impossible.

It would be impossible to build on the real progress we are making in integrating more effectively the federal government's resources with those of our partners. Local CRHCs are already learning to form more effective partnerships with schools, colleges, businesses, unions, and community organizations.

In fact, many programs are now designed to integrate public and private sector resources. For example, the department has created 16 sectoral councils to co–ordinate the management of human resources needs in the private sector. These councils now affect nearly 36 per cent of Canada's labour force, and many other councils are being created.

In each of these councils, both labour and management in a given industrial sector work together to develop a master plan with respect to their human resources needs. This co–operation constitutes the basis for some truly innovative partnerships. Under the internship program for example, sectorial councils developed training courses to allow young people to gain experience in areas as varied as electronics, horticulture, tourism and knowledge based industries.

In this partnership, businesses and unions set criteria and develop curricula together. Then, they make arrangements with local high school, community colleges and cégeps. In fact, they themselves give the hands–on portion so that the young people get an adequate mix of academic and practical training.

By integrating governmental and private sector resources this way, we end up with a more effective and efficient program. In fact, not only do our private sector partners manage the program, they also invest in it.

This kind of forward–looking initiative attracts a great deal of interest. Other countries are looking into possible scenarios to involve the private sector and local communities in developing internship programs.

Without clause 20 of Bill C–96, all these innovative initiatives would simply boil down to nothing because there would be no mechanism to govern all the administrative arrangements involved.

• (1330)

There is nothing catastrophic about clause 20. There is no need to read between the lines. Clause 20 is straightforward.

I know that some believe that it goes further, that it will give the minister the power to dismiss concerns expressed by provincial governments. The minister has already given these people the assurance that provincial governments will continue to be consulted, as they were in the past, about the kinds of agreements that HRDC will be making.

He even went as far as stating that he would not enter into any agreement without the prior consent of the appropriate provincial government, if that is what the province wants.

I do not know what more those who oppose clause 20 could ask for. Instead of trying to find in Bill C–96 examples of usurpation of power which simply do not exist, we should get on with the real tasks of creating partnerships, co–operating, and providing jobs to Canadians. This is indeed the purpose of Bill C–96 and clause 20.

We all know that co–operation between the federal and provincial governments could be improved in matters of labour, as well as in any other sector.

Federal–provincial agreements and partnerships would help find better ways to fulfil our respective mandates. There is no doubt about that. The issue must be carefully examined, and this is why the minister sent a direct invitation to the provinces to start discussing it.

However, if we really want these discussions to be productive, we must pass this bill now, in order to continue shaping a new department and a new era of flexible federalism.

We must pass Bill C–96 to continue providing effective services to all Canadians.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the remarks by the hon. member for St. Boniface, and note that sometimes the more we talk, the less we understand each other.

The hon. member suggests that this clause 20 will lend much more flexibility and better harmony between levels of government. The clause must be read; it states "—the Minister may enter into agreements with a province"—may, not must—"or group of provinces, agencies of provinces, financial institutions and such other persons or bodies as the Minister considers appropriate".

In order to keep it short, I would just like to ask my hon. colleague from St. Boniface if he recalls that post–secondary education, for example, as well as social assistance, are exclusively provincial jurisdictions? If he does recall that, is he aware of everything the federal government has done to date, not just this one, but all those before it over the past twenty years, to intervene via their financial powers in these two areas, in areas over which provinces have exclusive jurisdiction? Is he aware of this?

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question.

Yes, I am very much aware. I understand that, in the past, the situation was less than perfect, and I believe that we have tried to improve the situation, and have improved it. I believe that this bill is exactly what it claims to be, that is to say an administrative bill, one which confers no additional powers upon the minister or the department or the provinces or anyone else.

I believe that there is a guarantee, not only in the bill but also by the minister himself, that he has no intention whatsoever of encroaching upon provincial responsibilities or trying to interfere in their areas of jurisdiction. I believe that this is a firm commitment, an honest one, an honourable one, and one that will be respected.

I understand that there may be differences of opinion, but I would like to start by inviting my colleagues to make concrete proposals so that we may work together better to improve the condition of all Canadians, including of course the men and women of Quebec, where employment is concerned.

We all know what human beings want above all is a job, a challenging job, one that pays enough to keep them and their families. The challenge is to make concrete suggestions; we could sit down together. Let us make sure that the government of Quebec comes to meet with us, or we could go to meet with them if that suited better, if it were easier, in order to reach agreement.

Secondly, apart from what I have just proposed, if there are questions—and obviously there are—which are bothering us, raising doubts about certain possibilities, if you like, if we might just put them aside and discuss them in the appropriate forum. For example, there are issues on federal–provincial affairs, links, reports, agreements between the two levels of government. There are mechanisms for discussion. I would invite my colleague to encourage his colleagues to do everything possible to allow us to work for the people, whether they live in Quebec or elsewhere. That is my wish.

Mr. Dubé: Madam Speaker, I could not resist asking the hon. member for St. Boniface whether, considering his comments and the tone of his reply, he himself would support the resolution adopted unanimously by the Quebec National Assembly under Liberal Premier Daniel Johnson, who this year was the president of the No committee during the referendum campaign?

This resolution is similar in every respect to another resolution adopted by the Société québécoise de la main–d'oeuvre, whose membership includes the Conseil du patronat du Québec and various institutions and labour federations. The Conseil du patronat is headed by Mr. Dufour, another supporter of the no side, who demanded the patriation of tax points for occupational training. The resolution asked the federal government to agree to relinquish these tax points and let Quebec act as it saw fit, as the people—he used the word people—as the vast majority of the people of Quebec want. Would the hon. member support this demand?

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, personally I am prepared to consider any option. I am not the minister responsible for this particular matter or for the department, so I will not get into an area with which I am not sufficiently familiar. I think the hon. member will understand my position.

However, I do feel it is essential to put these matters on the table, to discuss them and to come up with flexible solutions that respond to the needs of the people, not only those of Quebec but of all the other provinces and territories of Canada. That would be my approach.

Theoretically, there is nothing that cannot be put on the table or discussed in a frank and forthright way. We should look for flexible solutions that respond to the needs of all Canadians. That is about all I have to say. It would hardly be fair to expect us to do otherwise, and I am not particularly keen on taking a position on certain issues when I am not sufficiently familiar with the subject to suggest a solution.

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would have a question for the hon. member for St. Boniface.

During the recent referendum in Quebec, a certain regional party at the federal level did not get involved. Yet, it did not lose any chance to try to score political points. What does the hon. member think of that?

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I can understand. I am a federalist obviously and I was on the no side. Naturally, I would have done my very best to keep Quebec within Canada.

• (1340)

I have great respect for Quebec and Quebecers. Of course, as a representative of a francophone minority outside Quebec, I am biased, I am prejudiced, so to speak. Quebec is an important reference point. As far as I am concerned, Quebec is an inspiration for francophones outside Quebec. It provides a certain infrastructure that is very useful.

I wanted my colleagues to know that. I have a deep–rooted attachment to Quebec.

Regarding the involvement of political parties, I appreciated what mine did, but I did not like at all what the Reform Party did. I found this form of involvement to be dishonest and excessive. It seemed to me that what came first for the Reformers was their party and their leader, and not the country. This observation is not mine alone; thirty or so editorial writers said so.

On the other hand, I appreciated Mr. Charest's involvement. Pardon me, I should not mention members by name. I should say the involvement of the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party.

As for the other parties, all I have to say is that many people were playing politics with our country. I often wondered if the public interest, that of our fellow citizens, really came first for them. I came to the conclusion that it did not always come first.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Madam Speaker, as the official opposition's critic on training and youth, I am pleased to take part in the debate at second reading on Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts.

This is an extremely important bill because it amends several acts, codes and regulations, in addition to repealing four important acts, namely the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, the Department of Labour Act, the Department of National Health and Welfare Act, and the Department of State Act.

If its only purpose was to make these changes, which, according to the Minister of Human Resources Development, simply make official the structures in place since the Liberals returned to power in 1993, we would be entitled to ask why it took so long to make official something that is already in place. It took two years, Madam Speaker.

Later we will see that the impact of Bill C–96 is more significant than what the minister and even the hon. member for St. Boniface who just spoke first suggested. In fact, it changes the balance of power between the provinces and the federal government in favour of the latter, as this government is wont to do.

The most surprising thing in all this is that the government waited until after the referendum to move for second reading of this bill in the House, which involves a debate. As we know, there is no real debate at the first reading stage when a minister introduces a bill in the House.

Why did they wait two years and why was there no debate in the House between June and now? If it was good for both Canada and Quebec, I think it would have been in the government's political interest to debate this bill even during the referendum campaign. This could have helped Quebecers better understand the government's intentions in some important areas.

I simply want to remind you that, if we forget about debt servicing, the Department of Human Resources Development will manage over 40 per cent of federal budget spending. This is considerable; it is by far the most important federal department.

Under these circumstances, one wonders why this is the case. I happen to think, and so do many Quebecers, that it is because there was a lot at stake, including the cuts affecting social programs. But the issue is not merely related to cuts: there is also a question of power involved.

• (1345)

Contrary to what the member for St. Boniface just said, our understanding of Bill C–96 is that, with this measure, the Minister of Human Resources Development is giving himself new powers which he did not have before. These are powers which he tried to exercise in an illegal context, through the spending power of the federal government.

We must constantly remind some people of that, because they do not always understand what we mean. This spending power is provided in the constitution and, surely, the federal government can use it on certain occasions, such as during a major conflict or crisis. However, it is contrary to the constitution to use that spending power on a permanent basis. It should only be used on an ad hoc basis. The bill before us is an attempt by the government to legalize its action, by using the spending power as a model.

Let me read the press release of the Quebec minister of state for joint action and employment minister. This will give you an idea of the Quebec government's reaction when it found out about this morning's debate.

It reads as follows: "While Quebec accepted the invitation sent by the Minister of Human Resources Development to participate in a meeting on human resources management, the federal Minister of Human Resources Development nevertheless intends to proceed, this very day, with second reading of Bill C–96. That decision sends quite a message to Quebec, considering the unanimous opposition to a bill which confirms the federal government's intentions to systematically bypass Quebec's jurisdiction and institutions to maintain, and even increase, duplication regarding manpower related measures in our province". This is the reaction of Mrs. Louise Harel, Quebec minister of state for joint action, Minister of Employment, and Minister of Immigration and Cultural Communities.

"Bill C–96 amounts to a flat rejection of the unanimous Quebec consensus to the effect that the federal government must completely withdraw from the manpower sector and give related budgets back to the province". The minister added that "Ottawa's tactic was formally denounced by all labour market partners represented on the board of directors of the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre by way of a resolution passed on October 2.

"By initiating second reading of Bill C–96, Ottawa has confirmed that it intends to pursue its centralist manpower policy and ignore the specific needs of the Quebec labour market, thus dismissing the consensus in Quebec on manpower issues which stresses the need to fight unemployment effectively by allowing for the differences in the various labour markets across Quebec and promoting the involvement of the socio–economic players in every region and community.

"Only a proactive labour market policy that is consistent, integrated and adapted to our situation can help us fight unemployment effectively, with durable results.

"Ottawa wields Bill C–96 like a sword of Damocles. Opportunities to implement such a policy are essential to the development of employment in Quebec", concluded Ms. Harel.

Since I am reading, I might as well quote the attached document. This document was not drafted by the Parti Quebecois government but by the board of directors of the Société québécoise de la main–d'oeuvre. It reads as follows:

"Whereas Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development, which in clauses 6 and 20 gives the Minister of Human Resources Development the power to enter into agreements with a province or group of provinces, agencies of provinces, financial institutions and such other persons or bodies as the minister considers appropriate, with the objective of enhancing employment, encouraging equality and promoting social security, moved by Gérald Larose, seconded by Claude Béland, president of the Mouvement Desjardins, and resolved unanimously: That the board of directors of the Société québécoise du développement de la main–d'oeuvre take the position adopted at the Conférence permanente sur l'adaptation de la main–d'oeuvre in November 1990;

"That Quebec must have sole responsibility for manpower adjustment and manpower training policies within its territory and patriate, as appropriate, the moneys allocated by the federal government to these programs in Quebec".

• (1350)

"Under the Constitution as it stands today and to improve client services, Quebec will control and administer all services connected with employment and manpower development and all related programs funded by unemployment insurance contributions within Quebec's territory and will consequently receive the budgets commensurate with this responsibility.

"The board of directors asks the federal government, pending finalization of negotiations on the patriation of budgets, to refrain from setting up parallel partnership structures or taking steps to encroach on areas under Quebec's jurisdiction, since the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre is the dedicated structure for joint manpower programs in Quebec".

Nevertheless—and I could also quote a resolution adopted unanimously under Daniel Johnson's Liberal government which was along the same lines, in other words, patriation of tax points for manpower training in Quebec—nevertheless, in spite of a very close vote in the referendum and following promises for change, not by just anyone, by the Prime Minister of Canada, they said: "We will consider your desire for change". Nevertheless, ten days later, the Minister of Human Resources Development is embarking on phase two, namely the second reading of Bill C–96, which, according to Quebec political observers, is the most centralizing ever.

This morning, we listened to the minister and the member for St. Boniface talking about decentralization; they said that decentralization no longer necessarily meant cooperating with provinces in areas which are nonetheless under exclusive provincial jurisdiction; it no longer means this, it means that the federal minister has the authority to negotiate agreements with any organization, even municipal governments, and individual stakeholders. Does this take into account a people's desire for change as expressed to the federal government? Does this heed the results of the referendum? To the contrary. Nothing has changed.

The government keeps on going as if nothing had happened, following the same logic, using the same rhetoric, the same words as the green book—I am not allowed to show it—the same green book the minister tabled a year and a half ago after extensive consultations. Wherever he went in Quebec, he was told, not only by the Société québécoise de la main–d'oeuvre, but also by a multitude of stakeholders, and this is the consensus in Quebec: "Mister Minister of Human Resources Development, listen to us, please". In Quebec, we want to control education. We want our government, the Quebec government, to be in charge of manpower training, as provided by the constitution, by the way.

We want to run our own affairs. What is the minister doing? Like a steamroller, he keeps on going, making a mockery of decentralization, saying that there will be further decentralization. The federal government will deal directly with local communities, individuals and local stakeholders. He mentioned a club in his parish, in his Winnipeg riding, and said that the federal government will be able to help.

I have no problem with that. It may work for the other provinces, the member for St. Boniface may not see anything wrong with it, but all Quebec stakeholders are against it. They want no part of it. We have said it time and time again, especially since the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, in 1990. Nevertheless, the minister is sticking to his gun. For him, decentralization means keeping all the powers for himself, and hogging 40 per cent of the federal budget, excluding the debt, to deal with unemployment problems. Of course, people who hear that and are not familiar with government operation, may say: "Here is a man who is genuinely interested in creating jobs, here is a man who wants to train individuals". Of course, these are good intentions, but this is not his jurisdiction. This is not his field.

This government keeps repeating that we must cut spending, but continues to spend in areas outside of its jurisdiction and cuts transfer payments to provinces, so much so that they, in turn, have to cut services such as hospital care. We know about that in Quebec. We have to cut because the federal government reduced transfer payments.

It seems like the Minister of Human Resources Development and government members have not grasped the meaning of the referendum results.

I was listening this morning as the minister boasted about a youth program he implemented as a pilot project in Newfoundland. He was explaining that finally, after quitting school to go looking for work, 97 per cent of the young people had decided to come back to school. According to him that was quite an accomplishment. It is easy to understand that if young people cannot find jobs, they will go back to school but in fact, what they wanted was to find jobs.

They maintain the training programs, but they are carried out directly from Ottawa and entrusted to civil servants. I have some experience in that area; let me tell you about a specific incident.

In my riding, two or three organizations asked me to help them get some federal funds, since we are still part of that system, by finding or creating some employment programs. The minister said that if we supported the no, he would be happy to give a positive reply to those requests. He said it and then the parliamentary secretary had to come to his rescue.

When I saw, on Tuesday this week, only one week after the referendum, that the independent member for Beauce had announced in his riding a special project for an employment center, so that training could be provided directly by businesses, and that he was boasting to have been successful at that, I remind the House that the independent member for Beauce was the chairman of the no committee in that riding. Is this the federal government's new way of decentralizing management: giving things to people who are on the right side or support federalists? Is this the way of governing that they want to show Quebecers? If Quebecers had known this is how things work, a lot more would have said yes.

In the end, when you hear so much double talk— That reminds me, for instance, of the Minister of Human Development Resources, a disciple of Mr. Trudeau, who was saying this morning that he was flexible. That reminds me of Prime Minister Trudeau who said in a message that he sent recently: "Considering my legendary flexibility". If this kind of bill, of attitude had been debated before the referendum, the result—

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are inviting me to sit down because question period is coming soon, so I will conclude, and if I have a few minutes left, I will complete my statement later.

I am simply saying that if Quebecers had known that, perhaps we would be talking about something else today.

FLORENCE CHRISTIE

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Florence Christie of Vancouver has just been given the Canada Volunteer Award Certificate of Merit for her work for Canadians suffering from lupus.

She was diagnosed with the disease in 1980. Despite great sacrifice to her own health she has maintained constant contact and support with 50 support groups in British Columbia. In the past year she has answered over 600 telephone calls from lupus patients and has compiled and mailed some 1,300 information packages for the B.C. Lupus Society.

Her message is one of hope and inspiration that despite a severe debilitating illness one can continue to work effectively and live in dignity. The award to Mrs. Christie is one in which British Columbians and all Canadians can take pride.

HOUSEHOLDERS

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, one of the cornerstones of renewed federalism must be giving the people of Canada a greater say in the running of the country. Although the Liberals are not too interested in this concept, we in the Reform Party have been trying on our own to truly represent our constituents.

The best means we have available at this time are our householders. In each of my first six householders I have asked 10 questions covering a wide variety of subjects. For the past two weeks I have been collecting results from my latest survey. To date I have over 3,800 responses with hundreds coming in daily.

Liberal members might be interested to learn that their employment equity bill did not fair too well. Only 16 per cent of respondents are in favour of Bill C–64. By comparison, 31 per cent favour the legalization of marijuana and 54 per cent favour the legalization of prostitution.

It is amazing what MPs can learn when they actually listen to their constituents.

CANADA POST

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, over the past several days, mailboxes in my city of Saint John have received a flyer from a Quebec company which was distributed by Canada Post.

The flyer is a mail order form advertising explicit pornographic videos. Included in the flyer is a detailed description and name of each of the 20 films. I will not repeat these words and descriptions as they are very explicit and deeply offensive.

I have had many calls to my riding office from people who are totally outraged by having this kind of filth arrive at their front door by Canada Post. People feel that it is an invasion of their privacy and they want something done about it.

What is the government's policy on delivering such material? Whatever the policy is, it should be revisited. I strongly urge the minister responsible for Canada Post to put an end to delivering pornography.

VERY REVEREND LASZLO TOKES

Mr. John English (Kitchener, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Very Reverend Laszlo Tokes, moderator of the Hungarian Presbyterian Church in Transylvania, is visiting Canada from November 7 to 15.

The Romanian revolution in December 1989 was sparked by Reverend Tokes. He is a champion of human rights for minorities. He will address in general the human rights problems facing all Romanian minorities, especially those of the nearly three million Hungarians in Transylvania: the loss of Hungarian language schools and universities, the prohibition of the use of the language itself and the eradication of fundamental Hungarian culture.

The Very Reverend Laszlo Tokes is a man of God. He is a man of peace who stood unarmed against the brutal Ceausescu regime and sparked a revolution. His continued battle in fighting for human rights and minority rights is one which we all encourage and support.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it has been 25 years since the Royal Commission on the Status of Women tabled its report in this House, making numerous recommendations to improve the educational levels for women.

Since then we have made significant progress. For example, 25 years ago less than 3 per cent of women held university degrees. Today 10 per cent of Canadian women are university graduates and 52 per cent of full time university students are women.

The need for education is gender neutral. Education for women and for men is fundamental to economic advancement, to personal fulfilment and to the opportunity to participate to their full potential in Canadian society.

Federal and provincial initiatives have improved the educational status of women. Our goal is to ensure equality in education and training for Canadian women and girls, thus paving the road to a truly equitable society.

DRAYTON FESTIVAL

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to speak about a little known area called Drayton.

Terms such as sold out season and financial success are not usually used when referring to a relatively new performing arts theatre. However, after five successful seasons the Drayton festival is accustomed to breaking the rules.

Nestled in the picturesque village of Drayton, Ontario, the festival has fast become a Canadian success story. During the 1993–94 season the festival made Canadian theatrical history by selling out every available seat before opening night. This year some 60,000 theatre goers enjoyed an evening at this fine theatre.

Under the direction and guidance of artistic director Alex Mustakas, the talented cast and crew create a theatrical experience which is second to none.

I invite all Canadians to visit Drayton and take in a performance. However, I warn them to be prepared to be dazzled by an evening of music and laughter.

S. O. 31

FEDERAL TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the federal Liberal government claims that it wants standards for health care, education and social programs, but federal standards are meaningless without adequate core funding. The federal Liberals have cut back over $7 billion or 25 per cent of the budgets for health care, education and social services, yet they have cut back only 8 per cent on other government programs.

• (1405)

The implications on provincial governments are devastating, particularly Saskatchewan. The province of Saskatchewan will lose $200 million in federal transfer payments in 1996.

The impact of these cutbacks means savage reductions in social programs in some provinces, forcing Canadians to relocate. They go to where better jobs and better social programs exist, putting extreme pressure on those very provinces.

Weak national standards and the absence of adequate core funding means that provinces like Ontario and Alberta can punish those that need the help most. Pitting one province against another is wrong. So is a lack of funding for national standards.

PRISONERS WEEK

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, prisoners week is an affront to all victims of crime. Yesterday I received by mail a pamphlet produced and paid for by Correctional Services Canada. The pamphlet urges us all to celebrate and pray for the plight of prisoners, to give them special recognition between November 19 and 26.

Talk about your priorities. Why should I recognize a rapist and a murderer? The solicitor general should be appalled that Canadian taxpayers are asked to pay for this glorification of murderers, thieves and rapists. The solicitor general should think about the security of Canadians as he sets aside a whole week glorifying those who would go so far as even to threaten the life of our Prime Minister.

Maybe the solicitor general has forgotten just who we have in our prisons. He is asking us to dedicate a week to people like Robert Paul Thompson, a killer of his wife; Clifford Olson, a killer of our children; and Paul Bernardo, a killer and rapist of our daughters.

This is outrageous, unacceptable and disgraceful. I challenge this government to scrap this week and let us get our priorities right for a change.

UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the members of the Bloc Quebecois wish to point out that today is the 50th anniversary of the ratification of the UN Charter.

Fifty years ago, delegates from many countries gathered in San Francisco to rebuild international relations on a new foundation. This was no easy task, as all the countries involved had to redefine their approach to issues such as health, the environment, human rights, refugee assistance, and peacekeeping.

On this anniversary, we all feel honoured by the presence in our gallery of peacekeepers who, in recent years, have acted with courage, selflessness and compassion to promote human rights and democracy around the world. Today more than ever, they are playing a crucial role in dealing with the social and political tension and upheaval that prevail in several countries.

On behalf of all members of the Bloc Quebecois, I thank them for their outstanding commitment, that all the people in Quebec and Canada can be proud of.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Mr. Ian Murray (Lanark—Carleton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this Saturday, in the 11th month, on the 11th day, at the 11th hour, Canadians will pay tribute to the million and a half men and women who went to war to fight for this great country we live in. We come together on November 11 to pay a special tribute to those who courageously lost their lives in the first world war, the second world war and the Korean war.

This year we mark the 50th anniversary of the end of the second world war and the return of peace.

We should also recognize the new challenges faced by the Canadian Armed Forces in the post war period as peacekeepers and pay a special tribute to those who have lost their lives in this role.

We are what we are today, we have what we have because of the people we honour on Remembrance Day. November 11 must be for Canadians a day not only of remembrance and recognition, but of dedication to the hard and patient work of keeping peace.

I thank all veterans and peacekeepers for protecting Canada and its citizens and for allowing us to live in a country of peace and prosperity.

ASTRONAUT CHRIS HADFIELD

Ms. Bonnie Brown (Oakville—Milton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday morning our Canadian astronaut, Major Chris Hadfield, who is a crew member of the space shuttle Atlantis, will launch into space for an eight day mission. This graduate of White Oaks Secondary School in Oakville will become the fourth Canadian to go into space.

Watching him there will be 13 excited White Oaks Secondary School students, six students from the Milton District High School and 28 air cadets from the Blue Thunder Squadron in Milton. They are travelling to NASA to witness in person this special shuttle launch.

Major Hadfield will be the first Canadian to fly aboard the shuttle and will be the first Canadian to use the Canadarm.

On behalf of all Canadians, please join me in wishing Major Hadfield a safe and successful mission.

THE ECONOMIST

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in its latest issue, the prestigious magazine The Economist gives its interpretation of the results of the October 30 referendum in Quebec. Looking at the sociopolitical situation and the relations between Quebec and the rest of Canada, The Economist readily predicts a victory for the independentists next time.

Even foreign observers are not fooled by the stalling tactics tearing English Canada apart. The Economist also said that the referendum, far from representing an affirmation of Canadian unity, does not resolve anything. The real issues undermining the current federal system remain unanswered. That is why The Economist, like the members of the Bloc, predict that English Canada will be unable to accommodate Quebec's aspirations.

TELEVOTING

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, voters of Nanaimo—Cowichan will have a more meaningful say in how they are governed thanks to a recently installed televoting system in my riding.

Rather than insult my voters by only asking them what they think once every four or five years, this ongoing project in participatory democracy will register voters in my riding enabling them to vote electronically on various issues.

From November 27 to December 10, voters in my riding will be asked whether a binding national referendum on capital punishment should be held.

Members opposite appear to shun direct democracy in favour of top down party directed policy. We in Reform want to listen to what the public has to say.

We believe that the average voter wants to have a say more often than every four or five years. With the televoting system, the people of Nanaimo—Cowichan will be helping to lead the way into the future.

VETERANS WEEK

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this week, Veterans Week, we stop to remember our fellow Canadians who so bravely fought and those who died to protect our freedom.

I participated in a remembrance ceremony a few Sundays ago, a day before the Quebec referendum. I thought of those Canadians who fought and died for our freedom and of what they might be thinking of Canada today, how they would still be very proud to be Canadians and how distressed they would feel at the plight of our unity given all that they had fought and died for.

Our contributions around the world have been highly commended, yet the cost of protecting democracy and peace has been very high.

Each of us has our own reasons for remembering. Only by remembering can we give meaning to the sacrifices that have been made. Only by remembering can we strive to maintain peace. Only by working together as a nation can we preserve the Canada that so many have fought and died to protect, a Canada that is envied the world over.

Let us not forget.

VETERANS WEEK

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, 77 years ago this weekend the first world war came to an end and Canadian veterans were able to come home.

Fifty years ago this summer, the second world war ended. Forty–one years ago, Canadians began to return from the Korean war. For the past 38 years, Canadians have served in UN peacekeeping missions from which they have returned to a grateful nation.

The week of November 4 to 12 has been proclaimed Veterans Week. This is an occasion for all Canadians to pay tribute to the courage and sacrifice of those who served their country.

It is time for us to listen to the stories of our veterans which they have to tell and to learn from their experiences. It is time for us to rededicate ourselves to the values of freedom and democracy our veterans fought to preserve.

Above all, it is an occasion to honour some very remarkable Canadians.

POVERTY

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Quebec and Canada are living through hard times and face a growing problem of poverty. When the number of people on welfare is increasing to record highs, the population is entitled to expect energetic employment measures from the government.

The Canadian economy is faced with a major structural problem, one which requires immediate action from the government. Elected as it was on promises of job creation—job, jobs, jobs—this government has not shown any imaginative solutions except to centralize power in Ottawa and attack those who are already the worst off. The sole response the government offers is an empty legislative menu. Nothing for employment, nothing for social problems, nothing for the economy. Enough of this. The population demands that the government finally start governing.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs referred to the cabinet's phoney committee as being essential to the survival of Canada. Yesterday, he was corrected by his colleague at the Department of Justice, who said: "We do not expect to find a formula to save the country".

Would the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs agree that what his colleague at the Department of Justice said confirms that the sole purpose of the government's phoney committee is to play for time and that Quebecers, and Canadians as well, for that matter, have nothing to gain from this committee?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may start by correcting the hon. member for Roberval. A phoney committee is like the regional political commissions set up by the Parti Quebecois, where the members all belonged to the same party and the money of Quebecers was used to make partisan propaganda. They were definitely phoney.

We have set up a committee that will try to deal or suggest how to deal with the problems that exist in our country today. We all need this kind of committee.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs just scored in his own goal, as they say. A committee whose members all belong to the same political party, funded with taxpayers money and likely to accomplish nothing. That is the kind of committee he chairs.

But seriously, this morning in New Zealand, the Prime Minister said that his government's first priority was not to make changes for Quebecers but to create jobs. At the same time he said the cabinet committee did not intend to reopen the debate on the constitution.

Would the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, who yesterday said repeatedly during Question Period that the committee's mission was to save the country, agree that in the light of the correction made by his Prime Minister, Quebecers and Canadians should expect nothing either from him or his committee?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition is spouting nonsense about a committee that was set up to deal with the problems we have now in this country.

Prime Minister Chrétien made it quite clear that the important problems in this country today are economic problems, and he also said that the Parti Quebecois was wasting its time, after it lost the referendum, on reopening constitutional issues and refused to deal with the real problems, which are job creation and unemployment.

More than 60 per cent of Quebecers said in a recent poll that they wanted the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois to take care of the economy and job creation and stop wasting their time, their money and their future on discussing a problem that has already been settled.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in addition to being a poor hockey player, the minister does not know how to skate. Let me explain.

Yesterday, the minister said that the committee would be used to save the country from the separatists who wanted to break it up. That is what he said yesterday. Today, after the Prime Minister's correction, he tells us that his committee will look into creating jobs and promoting economic development.

Is the minister telling us that this government, which for more than two years has said it will deal with the country's real problems, is he telling us that they have no recipe and that it takes a committee to suggest how the Prime Minister can get the country out of this mess?

• (1420)

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to continue in hockey parlance, the hon. member for Roberval lost by default because they decided to leave the game. They lost the referendum and, instead of tackling the real problems, they decided their only objective is to destroy Canada. All their energy is spent not on dealing with the economic and other problems of this country but on destroying the country. That is why they have nothing to offer in the way of real solutions we should be developing for the future of Quebec and Canada.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

You will notice that it is after the Liberals were called to order by Pierre Elliott Trudeau that this panic–stricken government began to dilute its already vague promises of change to Quebecers and quickly set up a phoney committee which will prove useless.

Considering that the Minister of Justice said yesterday that the cabinet committee would not save Canada, and given that the Prime Minister said this morning that the committee does not intend to reopen the 1982 constitution, does the minister not realize that he will preside a phoney committee which will be useless in terms fulfilling the promises made by the Prime Minister regarding the constitution?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat for the tenth time that the Prime Minister clearly indicated in his speeches that he was going to look after the issues of distinct society and right of veto. He asked a number of ministers to develop strategies, get a better understanding of the referendum results, and make appropriate changes for Quebec and Canada. This is what we are doing.

As regards Mr. Trudeau's comments, the hon. member should also remember that he clearly said that the Leader of the Opposition had make a mockery of the truth, to use a diplomatic expression. This is exactly what he said in his press conference.

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, we are now on thin ice. Therefore, I would ask hon. members to choose their words carefully.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given that his phoney committee was set up in a mad rush, that the names of its members were released only 24 hours later, and that each of its members seems to have a different opinion as to its mandate, will the minister admit that his phoney committee was only set up to buy time until Christmas, when the House will recess and the Prime Minister will no longer have to answer embarrassing questions on the commitments he made during the referendum campaign?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I see that the official opposition has now adopted the term "phoney". Its members are asking phoney questions.

They are obviously much more concerned about what goes on outside, than about the important issues discussed in this House. The important issue now is clearly to try to solve the problems as they exist. We are trying to do that by constitutional and others means.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet's national unity dream team is becoming a nightmare. Nobody knows who they are going to consult with, nobody knows when they are supposed to report, and worst of all, nobody has a clue what the committee is supposed to be doing.

The labour minister thinks they are going to be discussing constitutional change. The justice minister says they will be looking at Mulroney type constitutional talks, and the Prime Minister said the cabinet committee will not be delving into constitutional matters.

I ask the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, if he can hear me, does this committee have clear terms of reference from the Prime Minister and, if it does, will he table them in this House?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this committee has clear terms of reference. They will not be produced in the House because this is a task force which consists of ministers. Ad hoc committees normally have mandates and memberships that are kept confidential. They are kept confidential for one good reason: they are the means by which advice and recommendations are given to the Prime Minister. That has been the custom of cabinets throughout history.

The mandate of this committee is clear. We are going to look at the promises of the Prime Minister and how they can be implemented. That is clear. They were in the speech given by the Prime Minister. We know what they are. We are looking at non–constitutional means of improving the way in which the government operates. We have already done it through program review last year. A lot of measures were indicated in the budget.

The leader of the third party should acknowledge that the terms of reference and objectives are clear. The membership is known. We are trying at present to establish a proper diagnostic and to find the right means of solving the problems.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Speaker: We seem to be having a small problem with the sound. We are going to interrupt question period. We will return after we find out what the problem is. We will still have 35 minutes of this question period.

(The sitting of the House was suspended at 2.27 p.m.)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 2.45 p.m.

The Speaker: Question period will continue until 3.21 p.m.

Because of the noise we could not hear too well, so I am going to permit the leader of the Reform Party to restate the question, hopefully without too much of a preamble, and we will take up from there.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, before we were so rudely interrupted we were asking the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs for the terms of reference of this cabinet unity committee.

It is simply unacceptable for the minister to plead cabinet secrecy or solidarity on releasing the terms of reference of a committee that is dealing with the whole subject of national unity.

I ask him again. Does this committee have clear terms of reference, and could he table those terms of reference in the House?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes and to the second question is no.

The Speaker: We ought to have this kind of break every day.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I need to warm up.

Maybe we could look at the membership of this committee. The intergovernmental affairs minister has said that this committee has regional balance to ensure the views of all Canadians will be represented. How is that possible when seven out of the nine committee members are from central Canada, when the west's only representative is a junior minister who won her seat by 11 votes and when British Columbia, the third most populous province in the country, is not even represented on the committee?

About the only positive thing that can be said about this committee is that the Deputy Prime Minister is not a member.

If this committee is supposed to effectively represent every region of the country, why does the west have only one seat and British Columbia no seat at all?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not the custom to comment on the membership of committees. In this case there is clearly a regional balance. Unless we split people in two we unfortunately cannot have a balance that corresponds exactly to the percentage of the population.

Also, when the member unfairly talks about the number of votes, we should all remember the Parti Quebecois was elected by barely three–quarters of one per cent of the popular vote. That means nothing. To repeat, in a democracy the people who have the most votes get the prize.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, could I put one simple question.

British Columbia is the most populous province in western Canada and the third most populous province in the country. It has a crucial role to play on this issue of national unity and it has a different perspective from many other provinces in the country.

Will the minister tell us why the province of British Columbia does not have representation on the cabinet national unity committee?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the question reveals a wrong understanding of the country and a wrong understanding of the parliamentary system.

• (1450)

In our parliamentary system, with representative democracy, people are elected to express their views and their feelings about national interests in the federal Parliament. This is exactly what exists.

The country is not homogeneous. People who come from Alberta are quite able to represent people who come from other areas of the country. They are not tied down to their part of the country.

It is quite improper for the leader of the third party to assume that members of the House are only representative of a small part of the country. No. They represent national interests.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Justice candidly admitted that constitutional problems and Quebec's place in Canada constituted new concerns for the government, after the Prime Minister had promised changes to Quebecers just days before the referendum.

In light of the Minister of Justice's statement yesterday, will the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs admit that the federal strategy, which has consisted for two years now in denying the existence of a constitutional problem in the country, has failed miserably?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if in fact one looks at the past two years, it will be seen that the amount of popular support for the Liberal government in the first two years of our mandate has been higher than for any government since confederation.

So, clearly, we have had a level of popular support based on our accomplishments, because we have begun to address Canada's economic problems, while the Parti Quebecois and its little brother the Bloc Quebecois have not focussed their concerns on this in the least. That is what must be done.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as usual, the Minister selects his examples and neglects to mention that if there is one place where the government has a fairly high unpopularity rating it is Quebec, totally the opposite of the other provinces.

By choosing the present member for St. Maurice as leader of their party in 1990, the Liberals thought they had solved the Quebec situation for once and for all.

Is the fact that this government convinced Canadians that there was no longer any constitutional problem not obvious proof that the Liberal government, before deceiving Quebec, deceived the rest of Canada?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what Canadians, Quebecers included, want and what they have reaffirmed for Quebec in a recent survey, is that government focus on their economic problems.

The Liberal government, the government of Canada, has addressed these problems and cleaned its house in the last budget. I would strongly suggest to the opposition that it ensure that its big brother, the Parti Quebecois, does the same in Quebec because, like Canadians, Quebecers want their economic problems to be addressed, and the unemployment and employment problems in their province solved.

RWANDA

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to learn that the Belgian government wants to interview Canadian peacekeeping hero, Romeo D'Allaire, for his involvement in the death of 10 Belgian peacekeepers he was in charge of during the UN mission in Rwanda. UN Ambassador Bob Fowler has known about this for a week, yet Canadians have heard nothing.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Why has the Canadian government not said something about this and told the Canadian public about this very serious event?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think everyone in the House will agree with me when I say that Major General D'Allaire served the country with great distinction at a very difficult time in Rwanda.

As we saw with the events in Somalia a few years ago, it is quite possible for certain allegations to be made about an individual's conduct from time to time. In this case, as with that case, I think it is best that we look at the facts and see exactly what those charges are before we jump to any conclusions.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that is a very difficult answer to accept, considering the seriousness of the event.

Let us remember that former prime minister Kim Campbell has said that Mr. Fowler tended to downplay events during the Somalia affair. Is it possible that the government was not fully briefed by the UN ambassador about the seriousness of these charges?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about charges as if these were matters that were laid in some court.

I understand there were certain allegations made in some quarters by one of our allies as a result of certain activities in Rwanda. We are looking into those allegations.

PURCHASE OF HELICOPTERS

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the defence minister.

Yesterday, the Liberal government announced that a new contract for the purchase of new search and rescue helicopters will soon be awarded, to replace part of the previous EH–101 contract that the Liberal Party cancelled as soon as it took office.

Since the government has yet to reach an agreement over the penalties following the cancellation of the EH–101 helicopters contract with the Agusta, why has it not excluded this company from the bidding process?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the discussions with respect to compensation are being conducted by my colleague, the minister of government services. He may wish to comment further if the hon. gentleman wishes any information on that score.

I announced yesterday that we were to send out a solicitation of interest and then call for proposals from private industry to acquire up to 15 search and rescue helicopters. That process is not incompatible with the process now being conducted by my colleague, the minister of government services.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the Liberals condemned Agusta when the first contract was signed and requested an inquiry into this whole matter, how can the minister of defence explain that he has not deemed it appropriate to completely exclude Agusta from the new bidding process?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is another attempt at revisionism in history.

In the 1993 election campaign the Liberal Party campaigned against the acquisition of the EH–101 helicopter because we felt that deal was too rich for the pocketbooks of Canadian taxpayers. Upon a subsequent examination once we came into office we had those original feelings confirmed. It is for that reason that we have decided to proceed with the search and rescue helicopters.

We have decided to have an open competition, which will allow any bidder who has the particular equipment and can meet the specifications to have an opportunity to take part in this initiative.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I raised two incidents of alleged misconduct and cover–up by the senior management team surrounding the Minister of National Defence.

Today I want to ask the minister about his policy on significant incident reports. I have learned from the information commissioner that these reports are now only retained for six months and then they are destroyed. Significant incident reports are the documents the Somalia inquiry is based on.

Why has the minister changed the policy in order to have these reports destroyed after only six months?

We have been working with the information commissioner with respect to providing the documents that have been requested under access to information. It is very onerous for us right now because of the Somalia inquiry and all the attendant curiosity that has gone on. We are working with the information commissioner. I believe the information commissioner will agree that we are certainly trying to meet the expectations he has and conform to the law.

With respect to the matter the hon. member raised referring to allegations he made yesterday against two top general officers, I wish to tell him that Lieutenant–General Boyle, who he named on the floor of the House, has served notice in writing to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of his intent to seek legal opinion and perhaps proceed in action against the CBC if there is no retraction on that story.

• (1500)

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, again the minister did not answer the question I posed.

Does the minister realize the destruction of significant incident reports after six months could prevent situations like the Somali affair from ever becoming public?

What will the minister do to the correct the problem?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again the hon. member is attacking procedures in the Department of National Defence. In many cases the attacks are without much information. He attacks members of the armed forces of various ranks. He attacks the military police and their ability to do their jobs. He attacks general officers as he did in the House yesterday.

I would like to know from his leader, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest, how the member from the Reform Party, the opposition critic, can go outside the House and malign 87 general officers by calling them bandits, which means they have committed criminal offences, and sit in the House as a critic for the Reform Party.

PURCHASE OF HELICOPTERS

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the defence minister.

Despite serious accusations of corruption made against the Agusta company in Europe and despite several requests for an inquiry made by the Minister of Human Resources Development when he was in opposition, the government continues to negotiate with the Italian firm the settlement of penalties totalling hundreds of millions of dollars for breach of contract with respect to the EH–101.

Could the fact that the government refuses to dismiss Agusta mean that it intends to award the contract for 15 new helicopters to this company instead of paying these penalties totalling hundreds of millions of dollars? Is the defence minister preparing a sweet deal?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is making reference to a contract the Government of Canada cancelled shortly after taking office.

I remind the hon. member as well as others that we successfully concluded the termination costs with Loral, thereby resolving that matter with that contractor.

Negotiations have proceeded with the EH–101. I am happy to report that after some very diligent, vigorous work by my deputy minister and senior assistant deputy minister an agreement in principle has been reached. I would like to provide all details to the House, which I will in several months. At that time members of the House, in particular the critics, will then have an opportunity to see whether the Government of Canada has done its job effectively in meeting the termination costs with that company.

[Translation]

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary, I would like to ask the minister if he intends to make public this agreement in principle as soon as possible.

Knowing that the former NATO secretary general, Willy Claes, was forced to resign from his position after being accused of accepting bribes from the Italian firm Agusta when Belgium purchased EH–101s, how can the government insist on dealing with a company whose selling methods are suspicious to say the least? In talking to the media yesterday, the minister himself mentioned Boeing, Bell, Sikorsky, Eurocopter and Agusta–Westland as possible suppliers for this contract.

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the similarities between the Minister of National Defence and me are rather apparent.

The hon. member must realize there is such a thing as confidentiality between the contractor, who has a variety of subcontractors, and the government of Canada.

Negotiations have been ongoing for close to two years. They have been vigorous, they have been enthusiastic and at times they have been extremely difficult. We have now reached an agreement in principle. I will be happy to provide all of the details to the House at the most opportune time.

On the grounds of confidentiality, until certain matters have come to a final conclusion, I am precluded by law, by the contract and the agreement in principle to provide that information today. However, I hope I can provide it as soon as humanly possible.

DISASTER ASSISTANCE

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last spring many communities in western Manitoba received a significant amount of damage due to flooding. People are concerned about receiving and recovering the appropriate costs resulting from the damage.

Could the minister responsible for emergency preparedness please explain how the disaster assistance agreement between the federal and provincial governments will help these people?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the disaster and financial assistance agreements were established so that provincial and territorial governments could receive assistance in the case of natural disasters.

In the case of the Manitoba flooding this spring, the normal rules were put in place and the procedures followed. Similar things have happened in Saskatchewan recently.

I understand the minister responsible in the Manitoba government has been saying that for some reason the federal government has been changing the rules and regulations and that somehow the people of Manitoba have been deprived of their rightful share under these programs. That is totally and absolutely false.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec health minister today made an ominous announcement: seven hospitals in Montreal will be closing.

While our Minister of Health fools around with her pet national forum on health, thousands of Canadians will suffer. Will the minister admit health care reform in Canada is long overdue?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is acknowledged the health care system must change. All provinces are bringing about a number of changes because the way we practise health care has changed. There are new technologies. The hon. member knows that.

The minister of health for Quebec is doing the same things others have done across the country; that is, ensuring that the dollars spent on health care go to the new technologies, to the new ways of doing things.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the federal minister has solutions. There is a very innovative neuromuscular clinic in the riding of York Centre, the Magee clinic. The minister will shut it down. Has she warned her colleagues from the Toronto area to expect the irate phone calls from their constituents?

As she penalizes, punishes and pushes out innovation, will she explain that to her colleagues?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would think that after two years in the House the hon. member would understand the jurisdictions within health and that the actual management of the health care system is at the provincial level. That is part of the flexibility of the Canada Health Act. The provinces manage the health care system.

The federal government has the Canada Health Act, which imposes the five principles which are tied to the transfer of moneys. That is what is happening.

HELICOPTER PURCHASE

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

The persistent refusal of the minister to exclude Agusta from the bidding process for new helicopters is particularly hard to understand, because the man sitting on the minister's left, the current Minister of Human Resources Development, asked for a judicial inquiry when the Conservative government signed the first contract with that firm.

• (1510)

Can the minister tell the House whether his unacceptable refusal to exclude Agusta from the bidding process is linked to pressures brought to bear on the government by Agusta's lobbyists, namely Daniel Despins, a former director of communications for the Liberal Party of Canada, and James Pacey, a former special adviser to Pierre Elliott Trudeau?

The Speaker: Colleagues, sometimes, questions as worded are not too—I would like to ask you, when you put questions like that——you cannot impute motive in any way. I caution the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm. I will permit the hon. minister of public works to answer the question.

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the preamble of the hon. member's questions. His allegations contained in the body of his questions are absolutely false.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): I did not think mentioning Pierre Elliott Trudeau was a crime, Mr. Speaker.

Here is my supplementary. In view of the cloud of suspicion hanging over Agusta and the charges of bribery that have been laid against that firm in Belgium, would it not be wise for the minister, before going any further, to set up the inquiry requested by his colleague the Minister of Human Resources Development on April 13, 1993?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just does not get it. The contract he refers to was cancelled by the government upon coming into office.

As a result, we have entered negotiations with the two main contractors for termination costs. We have been successful with the first one. We have come to an agreement in principle with regard to the second one. I hope to be able to provide all of the details so the hon. member once and for all will be able to understand that these kinds of allegations and this kind of mud he has been playing in for quite some time are utterly false, just like the allegations he makes here again today.

SYDNEY TAR PONDS

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the worst environmental disaster in Canada still festers in the backyard of the minister of public works in Sydney, Nova Scotia.

In February the environment minister mimicked her boss by saying don't worry, be happy, the Sydney tar ponds PCB clean–up is proceeding. It is not; it is broke.

Will the environment minister commit to a federal inquiry to determine why $55 million was wasted over 10 years with no results, who was responsible, how long the people of Sydney have to live near this sewer and who got rich during the deal?

The Speaker: Usually we have a question and we may tack on a partial question, but four is going a bit out of the way. Would the hon. minister address the first two questions.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept in any way the premises, insinuations or innuendoes of any part of the hon. member's questions.

On behalf of the Minister of the Environment, I will take those parts of the question that are in order as notice and endeavour to get the hon. member an answer as quickly as possible.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that is sort of what we heard last February. They are not misleading premises, they are fact.

The environment minister has done absolutely nothing for the environment in the two years since she has been in the portfolio. What we have here is yet another dredging scandal, only this time it is in Sydney, Nova Scotia, not in Hamilton harbour, and we have a city with the highest cancer rate in the North America.

I would like to ask the Minister of the Environment will there be any further federal involvement into this disaster, or will the people of Sydney, Nova Scotia be involved in future discussions related to the clean–up of the tar ponds?

This is not about patronage, so I ask the Minister of the Environment, not the minister of public works.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from time to time has shown that the link between himself and facts is sometimes tenuous.

• (1515)

Having said that, I realize the concerns of people in that community about a safe environment are important. They are important to the government and to the members of Parliament from that area. Therefore, I will take the question as notice and provide a full answer as quickly as possible.

MEDICARE

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

Albertans are increasingly anxious about the erosion of medicare, resulting from the proliferation of private clinics in Alberta charging facility fees for medically insured services.

Can the minister assure Albertans that medicare will be protected from attempts to create a two–tier system where access and quality of service are based on the amount of cash in one's wallet?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure members of the House, on both sides, will be happy to know that I met with the minister of health for Alberta on Monday in Winnipeg in order to discuss ways to eliminate facility fees that were being charged for medically necessary services in private clinics.

The minister of health for Alberta gave me her personal assurances that Alberta would be eliminating facility fees in private clinics. I applaud the minister of health for her initiative.

Until that time, we will be deducting approximately $420,000 a month from transfers to the province of Alberta.

PURCHASE OF HELICOPTERS

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of defence.

Yesterday, the federal government announced a competition for the acquisition of 15 rescue helicopters, with no Canadian content requirement in the specifications. Considering that the Canadian aerospace industry is concentrated in the Montreal area, how can the minister justify this change of heart on the part of the federal government, given that, two months ago, he awarded without tender a $2 billion contract for armoured personnel carriers to Ontario but that he is now taking a different approach for the helicopter contract?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it quite interesting that Bloc members condemn the government for yesterday's announcement to buy search and rescue helicopters, while many critics, analysts and others in Quebec actually congratulated us for it.

Just this morning, I read the following in Le Devoir: "Yesterday's announcement is good news. As for the price of the helicopters, it should not exceed $40 million per aircraft, three times less than the EH–101".

[English]

That is on the one hand. On the second point that the hon. member raised with respect to why there was a sole source contract for the armoured personnel carriers and a competition on this equipment, we have in Canada, with General Motors' diesel division in London, the only Canadian manufacturer. It is well known. It has a worldwide product mandate for the making of armoured vehicles. It was quite logical to have the contract awarded and negotiated with that company. Many companies in Quebec will benefit because many of the suppliers are located in the province of Quebec.

When it comes to the helicopters, we do not have that same kind of capability, although there may be some offshoots for various companies that may compete. Therefore, it makes sense to get the best deal by having an open competition and invite people from around the world to bid.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the recent welfare war between British Columbia and the federal government suggests that the minister and the government have no vision for federalism, certainly not a new one.

The issue is not whether B.C. or the government is right but that provinces should have the authority to make their own decisions in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

When will the government get off B.C.'s back and begin co–operative work with all provinces to give them exclusive powers in jurisdictions that are constitutionally theirs?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is evident that the hon. member has not been following in a careful way what has been developing over the last several months.

As a consequence of the announcement of a new transfer program to the provinces, which will give them far more flexibility, the provincial premiers last summer set up the Council of Social Service Ministers to begin developing a common provincial approach. Once that was completed they would then sit down with us and undertake the negotiations. We welcomed that initiative. We thought it was a very positive way to proceed.

Unfortunately the British Columbia government sort of skipped out on that process, short–circuited it and decided unilaterally to do something different without consulting their provincial colleagues, without staying within the process and therefore has created a problem.

As I said before, the law is the law. I find it exceedingly strange that when members of the Reform Party are constantly demanding in this House that we ensure that individuals live up to the spirit and the letter of the law, they do not want a province to live up to the spirit and letter of the law.

EDUCATION

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

StatsCanada has recently confirmed that young Canadians with lower educational qualifications have suffered very badly in the job market over the last five years. The statistics confirm that without a post–secondary education the doors for employment have been slammed shut for young Canadians. We know that education is the pathway to the future for young people, yet the government has been cutting billions of dollars from transfers to post–secondary education to the provinces.

How can the minister justify these cuts to the tens of thousands of young Canadians who are seeing their opportunities choked off by the government's actions?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer in two specific ways.

First, this summer we introduced a brand new student financial assistance program that substantially refinanced the ability of young people to go back to school. For the first time ever we introduced a major grant program that would allow young people with high income needs, such as disabled students and women going to graduate school, to get specific direct grants. It is the first time the federal government has ever offered that kind of assistance.

Second, this year we introduced a youth internship program. By working with the private sector, it allows young people to work half time in the business workplace environment and half time to go to school. We have signed agreements with a number of human resource sector councils in the private sector.

This year alone up to 25,000 young people will be enrolled in that program, showing how successful it is to be able to get the private sector to work with us in partnership in helping young people.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

The Speaker: My colleagues, this is a rather special day for the House because we have special guests in not only the Speaker's gallery but also in the opposition gallery.

Fifty years ago today, Canada became a member of the United Nations. On this occasion, I would like to salute the Canadian men and women who personify our commitment to the UN.

[English]

Seated in the gallery today are peacekeepers of the Canadian Armed Forces and Mounted Police who have served in Cyprus, Egypt, El Salvador, Haiti, the Golan Heights, Kuwait, Mozambique, Namibia, Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia.

These men and women represent the 100,000 Canadians who have served in peacekeeping missions since Parliament ratified the United Nations charter. They are in our galleries to my left and they are joined today with their spouses.

Today this House, the representatives of the people of Canada, salute our peacekeepers, nos Casques bleus, past and present on behalf of all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: My colleagues, I hope you will take a few minutes to receive the members of our peacekeeping forces, all three forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, at a very small reception which will be held in room 216–N immediately after question period.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): As you might suspect, Mr. Speaker, as we usually do on Thursday, I want to ask my hon. colleague, the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, to give us the agenda for the next few days.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to provide the weekly business statement.

We will continue today, tomorrow and on November 20 with the second reading debate of Bill C–96, on the human resources development departmental reorganization. This will be followed by report stage and third reading of Bill C–83, respecting the environmental auditor general.

The business of the House would then be called in the following order: Bill C–78, Bill C–52 and Bill C–58.

Finally, I would like to designate November 21 and November 22 as opposition days.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the House leader of the government.

First, could the hon. House leader indicate whether the government intends to introduce any substantial legislation into the House between now and December 15, if the House continues in operation?

Second, could the hon. House leader indicate whether the very important reports that have been promised regarding old age assistance, Canada pension plan, unemployment insurance are going to be tabled in the House? Will the paper on aging come to the House? Will a position be presented on the GST? That was promised at least two years ago.

Finally, would the hon.—

Mr. Robichaud: Order.

The Speaker: We allow these interventions if they are short questions. I would appeal to all hon. members, should there be any more interventions like this, that the questions be very precise and as short as possible.

I will permit the hon. House leader to answer.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the second part of the hon. member's question, the material on the subjects he has mentioned will be brought forward in due course in a way that is consistent with the red book, the throne speech and the budgets of the government.

With respect to the first part of the hon. member's question, the answer is definitely yes.

The Speaker: I would encourage the hon. House leader of the Reform Party to perhaps have a meeting with the hon. House leader of the government.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It was our understanding there was to be a statement made at this time in reference to Armistice Day. I believe if you were to seek it you would find that was the agreement of the House.

If such is the case perhaps we could proceed with that prior to going to Government Orders.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): As I understand it, the chief government whip is correct. We will proceed beginning with the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Remembrance Day

Hon. Lawrence MacAulay (Secretary of State (Veterans), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to those Canadians who gave their lives for freedom and democracy in serving their country in two world wars, the Korean war and in peacekeeping missions.

On Saturday in ceremonies across the country and in cemeteries around the world where soldiers rest in peace, Canadians will pay tribute to our war dead. This has been a cherished tradition on November 11 ever since the end of the first world war on that date in 1918.

Through the course of this century Canadians have responded to the call of duty again and again. They have shown their strength, courage and conviction in defence of democracy and in the interest of peace. As the years pass and the veterans of these earlier wars age and pass away, it is up to each new generation of Canadians to continue the memory of their sacrifice and courage.

It is up to each new generation of young Canadians to reflect that the men and women who gave their lives were young themselves. They fought for liberty with the strength and idealism of their youth. Many others sacrificed their youth in the terrible ordeal of war.

The Prime Minister has declared November 4 to 12 veterans week. We have used this week as an occasion to honour those who made the ultimate sacrifice and those men and women who came back from the war and kept on contributing to Canada.

These veterans come from all regions of Canada. They serve their country with pride and distinction. They left behind in the cemeteries of Europe, Southeast Asia, North Africa and the Pacific comrades who died for their country without a thought of whether they come from the east or the west or whether they fought for this province or that. They fought and died for Canadians. All Canadians in every province share the legacy of peace and freedom they left for us.

On Saturday the country will unite to remember her war dead. Let every Canadian remember and cherish the memories of those who have sacrificed so much. Let us put aside our partisan differences and our conflicting visions of tomorrow. Let us pay tribute to those who gave us the freedom we have to choose our destiny, the freedom we share with Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois, which forms the official opposition in this House, I am pleased to rise this afternoon in honour of Remembrance Day. Tradition dictates that, every November 11, we take a few moments to remember those who have served in the two world wars and in the Korean war.

Of course, we must also remember those who served in the numerous UN peacekeeping missions. Remembrance Day is especially significant this year since last spring marked the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II. Today, we want to thank all those who served at the front, the sailors and airmen and women from all regions of Canada, the members of the merchant navy, the nurses, and all the men and women who risked or gave their lives to overcome tyranny.

We must never forget that over 100,000 young Canadians and Quebecers lost their lives in the two major global conflicts, while hundreds of others died in Korea and in various peacekeeping missions. Unfortunately, many bloody conflicts are still raging throughout the world. Let us think about all those who are responsible for keeping the peace in the world, in particular the Canadian peacekeepers.

• (1535)

One of the main roles of the Canadian Forces at the international level is to participate in peacekeeping operations. This is an invaluable asset and international achievement for Canada.

On behalf of all Bloc members, I wish to congratulate all members of the various Legion branches. We sincerely thank them for honouring the memory of the young Canadians and Quebecers who left everything behind and went overseas to fight for peace and freedom.

Today we remember the selfless sacrifices made by those to whom we owe this legacy of freedom and democracy.

The heavy human casualties and the great suffering of all those affected by these endless wars are beyond comprehension.

As the Leader of the Official Opposition said in marking the 50th anniversary of the end of the second world war, who can describe the terrible pain of the mothers and fathers whose son was killed in the prime of his life? And what about the widows and orphans, the brothers and sisters forever deprived of a loved one who left one day for a faraway country to meet his destiny as a sacrificed hero?

Like those who gave their lives, all these brave people also fought so that there would be no more wars and that future generations would be spared the attendant atrocities, suffering and upheaval.

This was, however, the price we had to pay for our commitment to peace and democracy. It is precisely because our young soldiers shared these values that they felt compelled to defend them overseas.

We must therefore sincerely thank again all those who died and, of course, all those who survived these tragedies.

Let us pay them a vibrant tribute and honour their memory.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to remember and pay tribute to those brave Canadians who served their country and those who lost their lives or suffered injuries or loss in the terrible wars of this century. On behalf of our party, our constituencies, our constituents and all Canadians who remember, we offer our profound respect and deepest thanks.

[Translation]

That reminds me that there are no French Canadians or English Canadians in cemeteries in Europe, only Canadians. I pray that this fact unites us in peacetime as in wartime.

[English]

At the same time we remember and pay tribute to the current members of our armed forces, many of whom have served or are serving as peacekeepers in the troubled places of the world. Again on behalf of our constituents and on behalf of all Canadians who cherish peace, we offer our profound respect and our deepest thanks.

November 11 is called Remembrance Day. Our children rightly ask what precisely it is we are asked to remember. If we ask the living, the loved ones and friends of those who served and fell in the wars, they will say we remember our loved ones and friends who gave their lives for freedom and democracy, and they will be right. However, if we could ask those who served and fell what they would like us to remember, I believe they would tell us to remember the great lesson their loss teaches us: that freedom and democracy cannot be preserved without self–sacrifice.

If each of us every day, year after year, makes the small sacrifices of time, energy and self–interest necessary to preserve our freedoms, that is enough. But if we neglect to make those small daily sacrifices then someday, somewhere down the road, a vast multitude of people like those we honour on Remembrance Day must make the ultimate sacrifice on our behalf.

Today I say let us make our tributes and on November 11 let us lay our wreaths. But, above all, each day after that let us practise the great lesson that freedom and democracy cannot be preserved without self–sacrifice on our part. Such practice would be the highest tribute we could pay to those who fought and fell as well as to those who stand on guard for Canada today.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to join my colleagues on behalf of the New Democratic Party in remembering those who died and suffered during the past great wars. This year marks the 50th anniversary of the end of the last great war, both in Europe and Southeast Asia.

It is also a personal gratitude that I have the great honour to express today in the House to the Parliament of Canada. Coming from Holland, where many of my relatives had part in the resistance against the fascism that swept through Europe, on their behalf and on behalf of my former countrymen in the Netherlands I wish to express our great gratitude and appreciation to those young Canadian men and women who liberated us from the shadow of fascism.

Having been born in the Dutch East Indies and a few months after my birth being incarcerated in a Japanese prisoner of war camp with my mother and my older brother, and my father eventually being taken a prisoner of war and incarcerated in a prisoner of war camp in Japan, I wish to express my personal gratitude to those men and women of the allied forces who liberated us. If it were not for them I would not be alive today. It is a very personal matter for me to stand in the House and express our deepest gratitude to those men and women who sacrificed their lives to save others.

As we remember them, let us also remember why the young Canadian men and women went forward in their great act of sacrifice. It was to preserve democracy and freedom as we know them. It was to fight against the intolerance that had swept through Europe and Asia at the time. As we remember their deeds, it is important for us to also reaffirm ourselves to the ideals of democracy, freedom and tolerance. Without tolerance, democracy and freedom cannot exist.

As we live through today's age of rapid social and technological changes, which create psychological insecurities, the ugly head of intolerance rises now and then. As we remember the dead, let us also remember the great purpose of freedom, democracy and tolerance.

On behalf of my colleagues, myself, my family and the people of the Netherlands, I thank those great Canadian men and women who did so much.

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the many Canadians who sacrificed so much for the peace and freedom we all enjoy today.

The first world war ended at 11 a.m. on November 11, 1918. We reflect each Remembrance Day on that time and on that date. World War I left close to 70,000 Canadians dead and almost twice as many wounded. The second world war took the lives of 45,000 Canadians. Canadians also gave their lives during the Korean war and our armed forces answered when the United Nations called for action to put an end to Iraq's aggression against Kuwait. Canadians have never backed down or run away in the face of such aggression. Our troops have put their lives on the line when international peace and security has been at risk.

I, like my colleague of the New Democratic Party, am personally aware of World War II because I had two brothers who served in Holland.

As a child at that time I remember how we used to work and save our pennies to buy Canadian stamps, how we used to take our toothpaste tubes to school. Some of the boys used to bring their little metal toys and turn them in. All of us have memories, but I have happy memories because my brothers returned home safe and sound.

Canadians know that to ensure world peace the laws that govern relationships among nations must be respected and enforced. That is why we have almost 2,000 members of the Canadian military serving throughout the world in peace and humanitarian operations.

This year we commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the end of the second world war and on Remembrance Day and this Veterans' Week let us commit, each and every one of us, to honouring those who risked so much on our behalf through concrete action. In Holland during VE Day celebrations Canadian veterans were treated like royalty for their role in the liberation of that country.

Here at home we must continue to remember and show our gratitude to those who risked everything so that we would have the country we have today with our rights and freedoms. That is why we have to protect the programs vital to the well–being of so many veterans.

Today I say thank you to those who fought for the freedoms we enjoy. I say thank you to those who continue to wear the uniform of Canada for their extraordinary service to all of us.

Let us not forget the price that has been paid so that we could live in peace, individually and collectively. Let us be vigilant about maintaining that peace.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We now resume debate on Bill C–96. The hon. member for Lévis still has four minutes in his statement, which will be followed by a period of questions and comments.

Mr. Boudria: Once again, Mr. Speaker, I thought there had been discussions among the parties so that this period of comments would be followed by a moment of silence. I am informed, at least, that it was the case in past years, and I had thought that these discussions had taken place today as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I must admit that I am not aware of the discussions, but I still believe that since Remembrance Day is coming soon, on Saturday, November 11, it would be quite appropriate to stand up and have a moment of silence.

[English]

I ask you all to rise for a minute of silence.

DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as you indicated earlier, I was not completely done with my remarks on Bill C–96. I would like to use the three or four minutes remaining to raise two major points.

I heard comments the minister and the hon. member for St. Boniface made to the effect that the official opposition was worrying for nothing, that it need not worry about clause 20 because, even though the minister was giving himself greater powers—these are certainly not duties or functions; we are talking mostly about powers here—he did not intend to encroach on provincial powers or responsibilities.

My father used to say: "To predict the future or to know how someone will perform in the future, just look at their performance for the past few months or years".

The Minister of Human Resources Development has been in office for two years now and we can clearly see two things. There are many things, but I will focus on these two. First, we will recall that among the many budgetary provisions contained in Bill C–17, there was one concerning cuts to the unemployment insurance program, which I would briefly summarize as follows: longer qualifying period, lower amounts and shorter benefit period. Let us bear this in mind.

The impact of these provisions was felt throughout Canada, but since I am from Quebec, let me point out that the labour minister mentioned again just recently how many more Quebecers were forced on welfare as a result.

The minister, in his speech this morning, spoke about young people, and said that, all things considered, there were not that many more unemployed young people. That is true, but in Quebec, at least, there are many more people on welfare, including young people. It think that has to be pointed out.

Furthermore, as the training and youth critic for my party, I would like to remind the House of what we heard in committee, which was that, in Bill C–28, the minister and the parliamentary secretary were giving themselves the right to designate the appropriate authority, when the previous act gave that right to the governor in council, meaning the provincial governments. Why? Because, in the Constitution, this is an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

Moreover, in section 14(7), the minister dealt with the opting–out privilege which the government of Quebec has always requested and which it was able to use, but now there were some new conditions. Now, each element of the student financial assistance program had to meet the requirements of the federal government's financial assistance program. The minister was giving himself the right to determine how similar the two programs were. I just wanted to remind the House of all of this before concluding my remarks.

And finally, I want to thank the hon. member for Mercier, who is sitting right behind me, for her excellent work as deputy chairperson of the human resources development committee. As the official opposition critic, she spoke today more specifically to the people of Quebec, asking them to watch out, because Prime Minister Jean Chrétien was about to make them face the music, as he promised to do in answer to a question put to him in the House not so long ago.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before the question and comment period, I would like to remind all members that they cannot refer to hon. members by their names, but that they have to use the name of their ridings or their title. I know it is sometimes easy to forget, but I wanted to remind the House because this is an important point within our parliamentary rules.

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as always when the hon. member speaks I pay a great deal of attention.

• (1555)

I have had the pleasure to work with the hon. member on the human resources committee and so I clearly understand the philosophical disposition he has toward matters related to human resources development.

I find it quite ironic that the Bloc Quebecois would accuse the federal government of engaging in an exercise of political power grabbing when in this piece of legislation we are trying to empower not only the federal government but provincial partners and local stakeholders to give us an opportunity to better serve the people of Canada, whether they are in la belle province de Québec or outside.

I also bring to the hon. member's attention that we as a federal government have a role to play in matters he outlined during his speech. One is the Unemployment Insurance Act which dates back to 1941 and gives a role to the federal government to engage in a process whereby we will give income support to the people of Canada and also a set of tools so they can re–enter the workforce.

I have a different view of what is going on in the relationship between the federal government, provincial governments and local communities. Over the years we have demonstrated that as a federal government we engage very much in co–operative, flexible federalism—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bevilacqua: I hear some rumbling on the Reform Party side which is quite obvious. It has nothing to say and so it just moans and groans.

Despite the differences that exist, some of them political in nature, some philosophical, we have engaged in many innovative partnerships between Human Resources Development Canada and Quebec agencies. HRDC, Human Resources Development Canada—I am talking to the Reform Party so it gets its acronyms right—in partnerships with two Quebec government departments is supporting job search training for youth through le Relais des jeunes adultes du Sud–Ouest de Montréal; 65 per cent of the participants so far have found work.

In partnership with the Societé québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre HRDC provides financial assistance to help new entrepreneurs to get into business through la Société d'aide au développement des collectivités de Sorel–Tracy Inc.

In partnership with SQDM, HRDC helped workers affected by a Hyundai plant closing in Bromont last March; 80 per cent of those workers found work or took further vocational training.

The CEC and la Société du développement économique de Jonquière have established a partnership to compile and share labour market information.

There is a single window service joining HRDC, le commissaire industriel and l'Office de tourisme in Témiscamingue to deliver services in industrial, rural and tourism development. The list is absolutely endless.

I tell the hon. member in a very clear and concise manner that Canada works. Does it work perfectly? No. Can it use some improvements? Of course. We can achieve positive change in federal, provincial and community relationships as we redefine. This is a very important exercise in the redefinition of the relationship between the individual, the community and the state.

It is within this framework that we must continue to work together to achieve those positive ends that will facilitate the process of getting people off unemployment rolls and on to payrolls.

I know the hon. member shares this vision because he, like me, wants to get people off welfare, off unemployment and into safe, secure jobs.

• (1600)

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, I can see the hon. parliamentary secretary is more skilful with comments than with questions. But he did ask a question, and he said in his preamble that we seem to have a different perception of the facts, and I agree.

He is quite right, his point of view and mine are quite different. In my opinion, decentralization means that, in areas under provincial jurisdiction, the federal government should enter into agreements with the provinces. But they think decentralization means that Ottawa rakes in the money through the UI plan. Incidentally, the federal government has not put any money into the UI fund since 1991, but it is keeping control of the fund and goes so far as to imply that it is being generous, when in fact that money comes from the employees and the employers of Canada, including Quebec.

The parliamentary secretary should know that the federal government got involved in the UI fund through a constitutional agreement and then with the approval of the provinces. It was aware at the time that this is an area under provincial jurisdiction. That agreement allowed the federal government to establish the unemployment insurance commission.

Now, because the federal government manages the UI fund, it is using the power of money to do things, and it made a string of announcements. There may be one he does not know. One week after the referendum, the hon. member for Beauce made an announcement concerning the Minister of Human Resources Development. As you know, cuts in the employment centres had been announced right and left. The employment centre located in the riding of the hon. member for Beauce was going to be transferred to the neighbouring Frontenac riding.

The hon. member for Beauce made representations, obviously accepted to chair the no committee and announced, one week after the referendum, that the Minister of Human Resources Development had agreed to keep a number of employees in the Beauce constituency rather than transferring them all as previously expected. Furthermore, there would be a special project in this constituency. Within this kind of decentralization, an independent member—instead of a province—would be able to create a consultation or support centre to help industries train their own employees. We, the official opposition, are against this kind of decentralization.

[English]

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated my hon. colleague's comments on this very important topic.

I note with interest the comments of the parliamentary secretary that Canada works, that his government has been bringing forward a flexible and co–operative approach and therefore he does not understand what the problem would be. I can tell him the problem is that his government is not flexible and has not been very co–operative with the provinces. That is the big reason we have the problems in Canada today.

It is interesting to note that this afternoon during question period, the hon. Minister of Health indicated how co–operative she is. She got up and bragged that she is going to be penalizing Alberta to the extent of over $400,000 a month in cutbacks in the transfer payments. That is how co–operative the government is with the provinces. Is it any wonder we have problems with the province of Quebec as well.

It is very interesting to note that the Reform Party on the other hand has put forward a positive agenda for change and has devolved manpower training to the provinces. That is what we look to for innovative ways to make Confederation work.

Perhaps the hon. member would care to comment on what his experience has been in how co–operative the Liberal government has been over the past two years. Is there further merit in the devolution of powers to the provinces if we are going to make Confederation work?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Let me remind everyone that the 10–minute question and comment period has almost lapsed. The response should be in 60 seconds or less.

• (1605)

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to say that I listened with great interest to the remarks made by my colleague from the Reform Party. It makes me realize that, even though the members opposite, on the government side, would have us believe that they only have problems with Quebec, they do have problems elsewhere as well.

Now, regarding Quebec's position, it is quite clear. In a resolution adopted unanimously by the National Assembly under the Liberal government of Mr. Daniel Johnson, chairman of the no committee, Quebec has stated that it wants to be given exclusive jurisdiction over manpower, for example, as well as tax points equivalent to what the federal government is spending in this area at the present time in this province.

Quebec has been asking for that for a long time.

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House has a straightforward goal. It provides the legal mandate and structure for Human Resources Development Canada.

As the debate has already shown, we are not simply discussing technical legislation; we are in fact talking about a vision. That vision is one of Canadians and communities meeting the challenges of a new economy. It is a vision of a federal government that works as a partner within Canadian communities. It is a vision based on jobs, growth and results.

This is not a vision of the future; it is a reality today. At a time when people ask how governments can get closer to the people they serve, HRDC is showing the way. This is true in every province and every territory. I know it is certainly true in the riding I represent in the House of Commons, York North.

York North is one of the most dynamic areas in Canada. There are new families, new businesses and new opportunities everywhere in the riding. However, growth does not simply happen. We have to build for success. This is what we are achieving in York North.

We are doing it through the York North technology strategy. This strategy was developed by working together with municipal governments, businesses, community organizations and area residents. It will prepare the people and communities in my riding for the 21st century. It will help them make the most of today's technology and will allow them to turn change into opportunity. It will equip people with tools which will help them compete in the economy we see emerging all around us.

The government has been there to help. We have been able to use the department's flexible and effective programs to translate this strategy into concrete, innovative projects. We have been able to match the energy of community leaders in the York region with the tools of Human Resources Development Canada.

One example is our new York region strategic alliance. The Regional Municipality of York, Seneca College and local employers have joined with the federal government to foster jobs and growth in this region. We are pooling resources and skills. We are sharing overhead and information. We are finding projects which will offer a real bang for the buck in terms of job creation.

Strategic alliance's first project is taking place in the city of Vaughan. It is a pilot survey which will develop a database on local business opportunities and resources. This information will be available to employers around the world via the Internet. It will help employers who are considering Vaughan as a place to do business. It will help those already there who are considering expansion.

Human Resources Development Canada was approached to help out with this initiative. Recognizing the importance of upgrading skills and modernizing the economy, our government supported this initiative.

Today, current unemployment insurance recipients are acquiring new skills that will help them return to the workforce on a more permanent basis. They are creating the database. They are doing the research. They are entering data and writing reports. They are learning and acquiring marketable skills. They are achieving and contributing to the well–being of the Canadian economy.

We see strategic alliance as a solid investment in the future of our economy. I use the word investment with good reason. We expect two results from this project that will continue long after the Human Resources Development Canada funding is over.

The first is that each of these employees will have better skills to bring to new employers. They will have received active help from unemployment insurance, not just temporary income. They will be back on the job, not back on the UI treadmill. The second is that the city of Vaughan and then all of York region will have an effective pool of resources and tools to create and attract jobs. That is only one of the many excellent examples of how HRDC works with communities.

Just over a month ago I announced the establishment of the technology enterprise centre in the city of Vaughan. It was a very important day for the city. Vaughan is a young community in many ways. Many of my constituents are young people and parents who are concerned about the future. They know the economy demands more from all of us. They are prepared to meet that challenge. They need a government that will help them and their children acquire the skills the new economy demands.

The technology enterprise centre is one way to provide essential skills. The project is sponsored by the Vaughan economic and technology development department. When the project is in full swing, 60 participants will have learned entrepreneurial skills, skills that are important in creating jobs for themselves and also creating jobs for other Canadians.

Those entrepreneurial skills will have a particular focus: the high technology sector. The centre will work with unemployed residents between the ages of 19 and 34 who have a background in technology or research. It will help them gain the skills to start their own high tech businesses, or work for one of the many enterprises already established in Vaughan. This promises to be an intensive program with a realistic basis. After all, we know that companies such as Microsoft started in garages. Who knows where the next leaders of this innovative technology based revolution will come from?

Community leaders in the private sector and at the city of Vaughan knew we have people who want to create opportunities. They were willing to contribute computer equipment to support this idea. They were willing to secure corporate sponsors to keep this idea going. They needed a partner to help get this off the ground. Once again our government was there to help.

We are deeply committed to the employment needs of youth. We recognize the importance of entrepreneurship in our high technology industries. Thanks to the support of our government based targeted labour market initiative, this is a chance to test a great idea with a great deal of potential.

The federal government earmarked funding for the technology enterprise centre. This is one more example of this government's commitment to listen to communities. We work with their priorities; we focus on creating results. This is fundamental to the new way of governing and governance in this country.

It is extremely important for us to reach out to the communities, to reach out to individuals and to help them along. More important, it is really about people investing in people, helping people help themselves, creating the entrepreneurial environment where jobs are created and to give young people the opportunity to acquire the skills required to meet the challenges of the new economy.

Statistics show us that 45 per cent of all new jobs created between 1990 and the year 2000 will require more than 16 years of training and education. Never before have education and training played such a vital role in our children's future. In order to face this challenge head on, the public, private and educational sectors must band together to give our children the tools they need to succeed.

Last fall, together with Mr. Colin Morrison of the Career Foundation and Philipp Tafelmacher, president of Tetra–Pak, I introduced the York Region Compact, a partnership for learning. This unique co–operative education program focuses on matching students with local companies based on the student's career goals, skills, and the requirements of the organizations.

This spring I announced federal support for training young people in the automotive repair and service sector. As a result of an internship partnership forged between the Canadian Automotive Repair Service Knowledge Network, CARS, whose head office is located in Richmond Hill, and Human Resources Development Canada, labour and the private sector working together, over 1,000 young people will receive hands on experience in this expanding industry with one of the major automakers, whether it be Chrysler, Ford or General Motors.

What is important is that we are in fact training young people for jobs with a future. Why are we focusing on CARS? Why are we focusing on environmental technology, computers and tourism? It is because these are jobs with a future. We want to give young people the skills required to obtain a job in a very competitive marketplace where jobs are long lasting and high paying.

This government has created over 500,000 jobs so far, and the majority are full time, high paying jobs. It is a highly paid, highly skilled, high value added society that we want to create so that the quality of life for Canadians can be maintained.

I am very proud to be a partner in initiatives such as the ones I have outlined. However, we could never have set these projects in motion without first being a community with the foresight to develop such a plan for the future.

The North York technology strategy is about a community that is committed to working together. It is about people, employers, community organizations, and governments that are prepared to combine their efforts and work together for results that will benefit us for a long time to come.

If I had the time I could discuss so many other examples of similar kinds of human resource development co–operation programs I have seen. One excellent example is the self–employment assistance program that has helped 34,000 people across Canada start businesses. Those businesses have created 68,000 jobs. In North York literally hundreds of people have benefited from this program.

The same is true about our support of young people. In April 1994 our government unveiled the youth employment and learning strategy. This strategy is a cumulative result of many years of consultation, policy development, symposia, and town hall meetings with Canadians from coast to coast to coast.

This Liberal government recognizes that our youth is a very important resource, and as such should be treated with a great deal of dignity and priority. That is why this year, during a time of fiscal restraint, the overall budget for youth employment services was increased by $43 million, to $236 million. We understand that investing in young people is an excellent investment for the future of this country.

An important element of the youth employment and learning strategy is the national summer job action plan, which I announced in the city of Vaughan this spring. This year the student summer job action program created 44,500 jobs nationwide. When we include the spinoffs from the Canada Employment Centres for students, we created almost 250,000 jobs for our young people.

Youth Service Canada and the youth internship program are viable, very interesting, and positive measures for young people. Youth Service Canada gives young people a chance to develop skills and confidence while serving their community. Participants receive a $2,000 voucher to be used for tuition or to start a business. To date, Youth Service Canada has given more than 3,500 young Canadians a head start on their career path.

The youth internship program provides a combination of training on the job and in class, with a balance of both specific and basic employment. Some 27,000 young people have benefited from this program since its inception.

The government invests in results. We are committed to innovation, co–operation and flexibility. We know that people and communities understand their priorities. We know they are willing to make a real commitment to meeting these priorities, and we are willing to work with them in a way that meets their needs.

At the same time we are adapting more than the services we provide. We are improving the way in which these services are delivered. In order to serve our clients better we have developed an integrated, affordable, highly flexible and decentralized service delivery network. This network incorporates new strategies and new tools for getting employment services and programs into the hands of the people who need them. While it maintains a face to face service that clients need it adds new technology features which enhance and expand service delivery.

The use of new technology will be a key feature of the new service delivery network. Through electronic information kiosks, on line database and telephone access systems, the department hopes to extend its reach to clients and all Canadians. New technology will enhance the capacity of our staff to deliver information and services. Through built in flexibility, our staff is responding to what Canadians want and keeping pace with rapid changes in the job market. These initiatives and improvements are really the point of Bill C–96, which creates a department that will work with Canadians.

Everywhere I go throughout the country, whether it is in the Atlantic provinces, British Columbia, Alberta or the province of Ontario, I find that people are responding positively to the new way of delivering services. They are responding positively to the new way of bringing people together. I am quite excited by the revolution that is occurring in every single province, in every city, in every community of this great land. People are coming together, finding out what their priorities are. They have a federal government that facilitates this meeting of people and bringing an idea to fruition, facilitates the ability to be accountable and to deliver services that make sense.

The federal government is reclaiming relevance at the community level. Any hard working member of Parliament who has the ability to lead their community, the ability to facilitate the meeting of people, and who has the deep desire to bring about positive change in their community can do so, because we have built into this legislation the type of flexibility that will bring their dreams and the dreams of Canadians from coast to coast to reality.

• (1625)

It is not now the time to throw up your hands and say that Canada is not worth it. It is time to roll up your sleeves and make your community work.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is rather surprising to hear such a statement only two weeks after the referendum results.

It is true that the yes side got 49,4 p. 100 of the vote, but if there is one issue on which a referendum today would lead to a landslide victory, it is the return of powers to Quebec regarding manpower training.

Again this week, Mr. Gérald A. Ponton, chairman of the Association des manufacturiers du Québec—not a member of the Parti Quebecois, not a member of the Bloc Quebecois, but the chairman of the Association des manufacturiers du Québec—clearly stated that there is a consensus in Quebec, that it was reiterated during the referendum campaign, that if the federal government wants to give us clear evidence of the will for reform it expressed during the week prior to the referendum, it should give the Government of Quebec the responsibility for all manpower training.

It is very surprising to hear the member state that the present government wants to have concrete results to show how effective it is. From September 1994 to September 1995, the number of welfare recipients increased by 20,000, mostly because the unemployment insurance rules were tightened up by this government that wanted to create, in the unemployment fund, an artificial surplus that will amount to about $5 billion for this year. When the government makes decisions like this one that leads people to apply for welfare, I think we see very concrete results that do not reflect very well on the present government.

In his speech, the member used the term "decentralize". That must be one of these words that does not mean the same thing in Canada and in Quebec. In every management book I studied, decentralization means mandating somebody to assume the whole responsibility of some undertaking. Everything there is in the bill presented by the Minister of Human Resources Development is to be found in clause 6 which reads as follows:

> The powers, duties and functions of the Minister extend to and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction relating to the development of the human resources of Canada not by law assigned to any other Minister, department, board or agency of the Government of Canada—

This bill does not mention provincial responsibilities, contrary to Bill C–95 which at least, in the health area, contained clauses ensuring that the federal government would not encroach upon provincial jurisdiction. In this bill, nothing is said about that.

When you look at all those elements, it seems fair to ask the government if this bill, tabled before the outcome of the referendum, should not have died on the Order Paper, because it shows clearly that the federal government has no intention whatsoever of making real changes. It wants to make cosmetic changes only. The way to show they want change would be to amend the bill so that manpower training can become an exclusive jurisdiction for Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I am often quite puzzled by some of the questions the Bloc Quebecois asks in the House of Commons.

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): It does not take much to puzzle you.

Mr. Bevilacqua: I wonder if a member from British Columbia who came to a neighbouring riding and was able to draw only six people has the right to even express an opinion.

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Nobody has the right except you. You are the only one with rights here.

Mr. Bevilacqua: I want to tell the hon. member that there was no question, as he may recall, on the June offer the Minister of Human Resources Development made to the provincial minister of employment, basically asking to sit down and perhaps come up with some different arrangements for a local economic development strategy for the province of Quebec and indeed any other province that would like to participate.

I find that quite ironic, considering that the government, in co–operation with the people of Canada, has been able to create a climate where there have been over 500,000 full time, high paying jobs created since the October 1993 election.

We have made offers to the provinces on the issue of the labour market. The hon. member knows that. As a matter of fact, we have continually made offers and it has taken a long time for the minister from Quebec responsible for employment to even have the decency to respond to the offers made by the Minister of Human Resources Development.

If the hon. member is asking if can we make some changes to the way the federal government and the provinces relate, I submit that changes should be made not only with the provinces but with the way in which we deal with communities and individuals. The hon. member knows that governing and governance is an evolving process. Changes have occurred throughout the past two years. I cited earlier in my comments, in response to the member for Lévis, a number of initiatives that are working quite well.

When I was in Pierrefonds, Quebec, avec ton cher collègue du Parti québécois, le ministre de l'Éducation, Mr. Garon, we were there working together, ensemble, to make sure that by pooling the resources available, 1,000 young people, in co–operation with the Sectoral Council of Cars and Chrysler Canada, would get jobs.

When you speak to young Quebecers, when you speak to young Albertans, when you speak to young British Columbians, their dream is to get a job, to have the type of security that the government is providing.

Are we open to leading the way in these consultations toward change? Of course we are. It is unfair for any member of the opposition to say that no progress has been made because the numbers speak for themselves.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was interested that the parliamentary secretary in his vision of the new Canada said that the federal government works as a partner. Some partner. This is a partner that just finished removing $7 billion from the social spending envelope. What kind of a partner is that?

All the words that the government keeps coming up with are nothing more than the platitudes of speech writers. Would he care to enlighten us as to who wrote his speech?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I want to remind my colleagues on all sides of the House to please make their interventions through the Chair.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, you can rest assured it was not a member of the Reform Party. Speeches have to make sense and I would never go to them for any advice on that.

The hon. member knows because he has visited my community that it is working quite well. It is doing that with a Liberal member on the government side.

This is what Reform Party members do a lot. They sit here and complain about cuts. When they ran in the 1993 election, they were going to cut approximately $15 billion from social spending. Since then, they have come up with a super RRSP for seniors that would actually reduce benefits for our seniors.

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Baloney.

Mr. Bevilacqua: There you are, Reform. It takes away maternity benefits. This is the type of cave age Reformers we have in this House. They seem to throw numbers and figures around. You should even check your super RSP—

• (1635)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order, please. I know that there are strongly held views in most debates, if not all of them, but there is a proper way to conduct debates and going through the Chair is most helpful.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I will do that. There are correct views and there are wrong views. I believe that the hon. member is expressing wrong views.

When we look at the budget which Reformers proposed, in relation to the super RSP, they have something called recognition bonds within that framework. The unfortunate thing is that they are reinventing the Canada pension plan, the OAS and the GIS. The only thing they do not know about the bonds is how they are going to pay for them. Everything else works quite well, according to them.

I ask for a very simple thing from them. When Reform Party members speak in the House of Commons they really should take a bit more care, a bit more time, to analyse clearly and study the issues and not to present to Canadians plans which simply do not make sense. Canadians want plans that work. Canadians want plans that result in job creation. Canadians want plans that create jobs and economic growth. That is what the government has been able to do in the past two years. I know that members of the Reform Party are really not happy with that.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is getting more interesting as we go. I find it enlightening when we are told our plans do not work. I have been here for over two years and I have yet to hear of a plan coming from the government.

The bill we are speaking about is Bill C–96, which we oppose. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I am sharing my time with my colleague from Kootenay East.

I would like to comment on the presentations which have been made this afternoon. One of our Liberal colleagues called on us to work together. Perhaps we could work together, reasonably closely, if the goal that the Liberal government has and the goal which the Reform Party has were at least close. I am going to demonstrate why we have these emotional debates. What we hear is rhetoric. We do not see concrete examples. We do not see anything substantive coming from the government which fits into Canadian society today.

I hear that the bill will empower the government—

Mr. Bevilacqua: People.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): No, it was government. That was the word.

Since October 1993 the government has had a majority. We are now, over two years later, talking about Bill C–96 which will empower the government. I have to wonder what has happened in the last two years. Has the government been thinking that maybe it should be empowered? It already is empowered. Has it been thinking about what it will do now that it has been elected by surprise? Exactly what has the government been thinking for the last two years?

This legislation will only go into that place over there, it will sit and go through committee, and it will be into year three if not year four before the government will say it is empowered. We have to wonder what the logic is.

Mr. Abbott: Elect them again.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): I guess that is what they are looking for. They can go into the next election and say: "This is what we wanted to do for those first five years and we are really going to do it in the second five years". That is unacceptable.

Well done is better than well said. The government should think about that. All it is doing is talking. Meanwhile people are waiting. Maybe it is just not all talk. Maybe there are some things the government has done.

Since being elected it has overspent in the last two years $80 billion plus. Congratulations. Add the interest on top and the figure is close to putting $100 billion more debt on the backs of our children. The Liberal members sit there sanctimoniously talking about how well they are doing.

People listening to this have to be really disgusted with this kind of talk about how they are empowered, how they have done things, how they are doing things. What they have done is put us deeper in debt.

When I talk about the social programs, the question has to be asked: How is the government going to address social programs when it is blowing the budget every year and adding more debt? The fact is that the premiums have to go up and the benefits have to come down. If the government keeps spending and spending into oblivion it is going to cost big time. Government members sit there spouting this rhetoric, like they are going to do something. They have done something all right.

Let us talk about the member who has just finished speaking. "Canada works. Canadians feel that Canada works". As I recall, during the last election campaign, I said that Canada was not working very well. The people said: "Yes, we agree with you. Canada is not working very well". Where does Canada work? Where Liberals sit, where their Liberal ridings are, is that where Canada works? It does not work in my riding.

The Liberals have a straightforward goal. They are talking about a vision and a new economy. Yes, they are creating a new economy. Congratulations. We are back to the $80 billion over two years again. They are creating a new economy all right. We are going down hill fast. If they had anything serious to do with the economy they would not set ridiculous financial targets like having a deficit which is 3 per cent of the gross domestic product after three years.

What the Liberals are really saying is after three years we will be overspending every year by $26 billion. What kind of logic is that in a day and age when we have $565 billion of debt? What kind of responsibility is that of a majority government to the young kids in this country? I have to address these things sometimes.

The comment was made that 500,000 jobs have been created. Where do we get this figure of 500,000 jobs from? Where does this number come from? I followed up on one of these comments that was made in Atlantic Canada where the government had said it had created 40,000 jobs in ACOA. As it happens the challenge was put out to prove it.

The government backed off and said: "We say it is 40,000 jobs, we know". Show us how. How did the government figure that out. With a survey of a half dozen or so companies extrapolated came out to 40,000 people if this and this and this happened. It is hogwash. When the government throws out numbers like 500,000 new jobs it is hogwash. It cannot prove it.

The government talked about 100,000 jobs in infrastructure. It only cost us $6 billion, and if there are 100,000 jobs, most of them are temporary. Who will pick up the bill for $6 billion? Congratulations. To get their names on the stats for the unemployed they have spent $6 billion of the taxpayers' money. I would not pat myself on the back if I were a Liberal. I would be ashamed.

This bill transfers powers from the former ministry of employment and immigration. I guess it is necessary to transfer the powers. The Liberals took over from the Conservatives. There is going to be a name change, move people around and that sort of thing. However, let us look at the job they have done.

After 30 years of big government, both Liberal and Conservative, we have ended up with less security instead of more because they mortgaged our future. There is less security today than there was before in the social programs. Now the Liberals come into the House and say they have a real novel idea. They are going to fix it. That is novel, after 30 years of being at the trough.

Pensions by and large are unfunded today.

An hon. member: Not theirs.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Except the MPs pension. They are all on that. If they will protect and pension it is that one. Fully 1 per cent of our population is waiting for significant surgery. Tuition is rising and literacy is falling. These are not negative comments; this is reality. I caution Liberal members to stop coming into this House and putting platitudes to the Speaker expecting people to buy them. They do not.

Is my time running out? I knew this would happen. I cannot even give a good lesson to these people without running out of time.

Mr. Abbott: They would not learn anyway.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Have I got a minute? Rats. I am out of time.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my Reform colleagues and I were elected on a platform of real change. It was change that would revolutionize the power and prosperity of Confederation, change that would put an end to the burden of constitutional wrangling which has plagued this land for generations, change that would release Canadians from the oppressive weight of deficit spending. These sentiments were echoed all across the country, particularly as we led up to the referendum on October 30. Canadians are not happy with the way their government operates and they want it fixed no matter where they are in Canada.

Today we are addressing Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development. One would hope that a responsible government would listen to the wants of the electorate and do everything in its power to accommodate them. However, this bill perpetuates the centralized grip that Ottawa maintains on programs which would be administered much more effectively at the local level.

Each province and region in Canada is distinctly different from the other. Demographically speaking, there are more differences between the provinces than there are similarities. Each province has identifiable characteristics which are unique to its own situation. These differences supersede language, culture and self–determination demanding economic prosperity through natural resources, employment, education, training, social services and housing. The Ottawa bureaucracy has historically implemented a unilateral blanket of policies which falls short of fulfilling the individual needs of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, if you were going to purchase a helmet, would you purchase a generic helmet or would you purchase a helmet that was customized to your size and function? You would not purchase a cycling helmet to play hockey. Why? Because it is not suitable. While a cycling helmet is quite effective for cycling, it is not effective in protecting your health and livelihood even if you are a referee in a hockey game.

The same can be said for human resources development programs. It is imperative that social programs meet the specialized needs of a given province or municipality. Who better to determine that criterion than the province itself or the people in the communities?

This bill pays lip service to decentralization. For example, clause 20 of the bill gives the minister the power to enter into negotiations with groups, including provinces and municipalities, for the administration of services under the Department of Human Resources Development. Although in theory this practice can be seen as a movement toward privatization, in reality it continues to exist unchanged as a centralized body subject to the exclusive decision making practices of the minister. It is lip service.

The parliamentary secretary for HRD earlier in debate said that the federal government works as a partner. The minister is the decision maker for that partner. It is that partner which has removed $7 billion from this social envelope to which I say, with friends like this, who needs enemies?

Since the time of Confederation the federal government scribed, debated and implemented laws which were perceived to be in the best interests of the nation. Over the past 128 years Canada has emerged as a nation comprised of diverse communities to which the archaic macro political practices of the past no longer apply.

Canada needs legislation which is flexible enough to accommodate Canadians from Corner Brook to Cranbrook and everywhere in between. It is time to end the centralized purse string control which Ottawa has over the Canadian taxpayer and over the functions that are covered by this act.

Tax dollars are squandered in order to sustain the massive national central bureaucracy which is not in touch with the needs and wants of Canadians in Corner Brook and Cranbrook. The constituents in my riding, like all other ridings across this great land, pay taxes for essential services. Let us look at this sum as though it were just one dollar.

That dollar is sent to Ottawa where the cost of the massive bureaucracy does little more than deplete the amount of that tax dollar. By the time it is sent to the province through transfer payments, that dollar probably is worth about 80 cents. A similar vacuous process takes place at the provincial level where duplication of bureaucratic intervention does little else than spend tax dollars without cause or consequence, the resulting factor being that the original tax dollar collected from Joe Public is returned to the community as only 60 cents. This is one of the many reasons our country is in such a sorry financial state.

There are considerable benefits to downloading the collection and implementation of essential service taxes from the federal level to the local level. Look at the simplification of collecting, administering and dispensing benefits and essential services at the level at which the services are received rather than meddling at the federal level.

The most obvious advantage is the omission of expensive and extraneous bureaucratic intervention. The administration of taxes at a local level would ensure the transparency and accountability that Canadians have come to demand from their public institutions. Closed door deals and political patronage are not welcome.

This bill proposes there is room for the commercialization or privatization of these services by allowing the minister or his appointed representatives to enter into negotiations with the provinces and other parties. But surprise, surprise, the final decision will be at the discretion of the minister, not the public. This is a problem because the minister receives advice from the federal bureaucracy interested in its own self–preservation.

Reform is calling for the decentralization of federal powers in these areas. Decentralization means that the provinces, regions and municipalities decide based on their own needs when, why and especially how the funds are to be administered. Downloading gives Canadians a higher return on their tax investment while empowering them to be able to decide how their tax dollars are going to be spent.

This concept is obviously scary to the establishment. Traditional federal institutions will be quite opposed to relinquishing any power. So too is the federal Liberal government whose mandate is based on the inflexible centralized power which has existed since Confederation.

Bill C–96 does nothing to remedy the problems which are evident to everyone except this Liberal government. Canadians are calling for real change, not minuscule housekeeping activities.

Bill C–96 as I have stated, continues centralization in spite of the cosmetics. There is a lot of lip service in the bill to the idea of decentralization and changing where the decisions are going to be made.

Reform by contrast offers protection to pensioners for OAS and for CPP which is completely unfunded and which will run out of funds within a very specified period of time. Reform looks to decentralization and the efficiencies that would occur from that decentralization putting power back in the hands of Canadians where it should be. This government continues to tell the lie that the government will do it. Its spending habits are such that the government can no longer be counted on to do it.

The country at this point is in a unique position to make changes. Canadians are demanding change, but more important, Canadians are demanding change now. Vacuous housekeeping bills like this one do absolutely nothing to give the change Canadians are asking for.

Canadians want a decentralized power structure which empowers citizens, not politicians. Canadians do not want Bill C–96 and neither does the Reform Party. We saw Canadians come together in strength in Montreal. We saw an outpouring of healthy Canadian nationalism. What they did not want was status quo legislation like Bill C–96.

Canadians are looking for leadership. I say to the Liberals: You can lead or you can follow, but if you are not going to lead, get out of the way.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the member's speech.

With respect, I must say his message is somewhat convoluted. On one hand he says that this is a housekeeping bill. He referred to it as status quo legislation and then talked about the Liberals trying to centralize power with the bill. Now, if the bill does not do anything, as the member suggested, how could it further centralize power? There is something there that whoever wrote that speech should try to straighten out. There is an obvious contradiction.

Let us assume for one minute that the member was confused about the bill being housekeeping and status quo legislation and it is about centralizing power which he talked about initially. The member is going to have to answer another question. If the Liberals want to centralize power, as they have traditionally wanted to do according to the member—which of course is factually incorrect as we all know, those of us who are objective like you, Mr. Speaker, being the independent person you are in the House you will understand this—then surely we have not done a very good job of centralizing.

We live in what is either the most decentralized federation or second most, depending on those who consider Switzerland to be more decentralized than Canada or Canada more decentralized than Switzerland. If we have centralized all that much and it is still the least centralized country in the world, it seems to me we have not done a very good job of centralizing.

Would the member explain these contradictions in his speech because with respect, I believe they do not make a heck of a lot of sense. We cannot have centralized all these things and still end up with a country that is very decentralized.

The member also talked about the finances of the nation which he says we have not sufficiently addressed. Perhaps the member is reading from material that was prepared some time ago. Surely, he would know that no less than the people at Fortune magazine, which is a rather prestigious publication, recently said that Canada was now a good place to invest because it had finally addressed the issue of the deficit and was progressing to clean its fiscal house and put things in order. That is another contradiction. Maybe the member can explain to us why he believes all these things that are different from reality.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to answer those questions. As the member will probably recall, today we will be going to the world money markets to borrow $100 million. What is it for? Is it for human resource development or medicare? No, we are going to the world markets today to borrow $100 million to pay the interest on the money we have already borrowed. If that is not bogus I do not know what in the world is.

The reality is that while the member may be correct, and I am prepared to accept what he has said about Fortune magazine's saying this is a good place to invest, and truly in Canada with the resources and the people we have it is a good place to invest, but I remind him the bond rating agencies have downgraded the Canadian/U.S. denominated debt and we have been put on watch on our Canada bonds.

If we are in such good shape, I wonder if they too are concerned, as we are, about the fact that today we will borrow $100 million to pay interest on money we have already borrowed.

Dealing with the issues the member raised I find, as my leader has from time to time, that perhaps if we speak a little slower and perhaps get to smaller words sometimes we can manage to get our message to the people on the other side.

I was talking about the fact that this bill is a continuation of the process of the centralization we have had in Ottawa since 1968, since the time of Trudeau, when the giant sucking noise Canadians heard was all of the money, all of the power, all of the decision making being drawn into Ottawa. This bill does absolutely nothing to change that situation. It is the continuation of the centralized decision making process.

I say to the member who, after all, has a responsibility to the affairs of the House, the House has continued since we reconvened in the middle of September to do nothing but housekeeping things. Rather than coming forward with this kind of a bill, why are we not getting the reports that have been promised from HRD on UI, on pension? Why are we not getting those things? I suggest it is because the government is devoid of any ability to bring us those things.

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very proud today to have this opportunity to speak in the House of Commons, this impressive forum of democracy, to support the Minister of Human Resources Development and his parliamentary secretary here on my left, on Bill C–96.

The purpose of this bill is basically to establish and give a clear mandate to a department that, as we know, is fundamentally important to Canadian society and plays an equally important role in the daily lives of our citizens, not only in Quebec but in Canada as well.

In fact, Bill C–96 ensures that the minister and his team can continue to help people in need, both in Quebec and the rest of Canada, and in all the regions, whether we are talking about the Gaspé or Abitibi–Témiscamingue. In fact, it is a tool that allows the federal government to intervene in an intelligent way to provide assistance where needed.

It makes me really sad to see that, even when we are discussing an issue as important as the reform of the human resources department, the official opposition cannot refrain from playing pure party politics.

During the referendum campaign just concluded, we heard all sorts of statements which completely distorted the facts and which, in my opinion, were nothing but an insult to people's intelligence.

Earlier, the member for Lévis concluded his speech by saying something which the official opposition keeps repeating all the time. Alluding to comments presumably made in this House, he said something about facing the music. It is unfortunate for Canadians that the official opposition cannot set aside its partisan attitude and stop trying to distort the facts and the statements made in this democratic place.

I am not surprised to hear members of the official opposition say that the ultimate purpose of Bill C–96 is to make sure that the federal government continues to interfere in fields of provincial jurisdiction. I am not surprised because this is yet another tactic to avoid debating the real issue, as well as an attempt to fool the public.

This is unfortunate, because today, what we are saying on the Liberal side is that the referendum was democratically held, that people voted no, but also voted for change.

In today's context, changes must involve the federal government and all the provinces working hand in hand. Essentially, we are talking about multilateral relations. It is in working together that we will be able to respond to the desire for change expressed by the people in Quebec, a desire which is felt not only in Quebec, but across Canada.

Unfortunately, with the government we have now in Quebec, and with the official opposition we have in Ottawa, it is very difficult to see how we can work towards a common goal, an ultimate goal, which, in the end, is in the best interests of the people, because they do not want the Canadian federation to work.

Indeed, it is not by withdrawing from multilateral discussions, as the Parti Quebecois government did in Quebec, that advances will be made in improving Canadian federalism. It is not by withdrawing from multilateral discussions on the environment that it will be able to better defend Quebecers' interests so that Quebec can continue to be part of the federation, and continue to be an extremely strong province in a prosperous and united Canada.

It is not by refusing to sit down at a conference table with the other provincial premiers that the system will be changed. In the end, it is the people in Quebec who are suffering from this refusal to co–operate.

There is nothing complicated in this bill. It is aimed at giving tools to the federal government, at reorganizing a department, and yet, the official opposition is acting prematurely. The opposition is talking about interference. It is a bit early to start talking about interference. Before talking about interference, one must wait to see the kind of reforms the minister and his team will be able to bring about.

• (1710)

Judging on past experiences, if the past is any indication of the future, I think the minister has every reason to be proud of the changes he is proposing, and I think people in Quebec and Canada have a right to expect promising and positive changes which meet the expectations not only of Quebecers but of all Canadians.

When I speak about changes the minister should be proud of, members will recall that, at the beginning of the year, before the finance minister's budget was tabled, the official opposition said loud and clear that they wanted the Canada Assistance Plan to be eliminated and transformed into a much more flexible plan, giving more leeway to provinces.

Responding to that reality, that legitimate request, the human resources development minister, in co–operation with the finance minister, replaced the Canada Assistance Plan with the Canada social transfer.

What is the Canada social transfer? It is a tool which will allow the federal government to transfer funds to the provinces so that they can operate in the social field and do so with much more flexibility.

Let me read a few lines. It says that the social transfer is mainly designed to help the provinces provide the level of benefits and social assistance that they wanted to provide but could not because of inflexible rules. That is done.

Someone mentioned earlier that the past is an indication of what the future holds. It is clear that the Canada social transfer is far from being the monster that the official opposition has made it out to be. It is essentially a structure in which all the provinces have more leeway.

What is the Canada social transfer about? It makes it possible for instance to fund parental wage assistance programs such as the one known as APPORT in Quebec. This is an exclusively provincial program. So, with the Canada social transfer, the funding of programs like APPORT, a program developed by the Government of Quebec and appreciated by everyone, is made possible, while, under the old system, the Canada Assistance Plan, it could not be funded.

The Canada social transfer, or CST for short, also provides for the provincial sales tax to be refunded to welfare recipients, a measure which could not have been implemented under the Canada Assistance Plan. I read further that it also includes a program to provide food to disadvantaged children, which would not have been possible either under the old system because it was too inflexible.

The Canada social transfer also includes the provision of transportation services to people with disabilities, services that can be provided without having to assessment needs, contrary to the prescribed procedure for qualifying for funding under the old system.

The steps taken by the minister and his department are clearly a reflection of the federal administration's good faith and commitment to keep up with the trends towards change, as requested by the public.

As for trends toward change, as for the Canada Assistance Plan, we keep hearing: "Yes, but that mean beast, the federal machinery, is the only one setting national standards". I have said it in this House and I repeat that we are a country. I think that, whether we are from Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia or Newfoundland, we agree that we, together, as a big family, must have standards that allow for a similar quality of life throughout the country.

But as far as the system is concerned, we kept hearing that national standards were set unilaterally by the federal machinery. Again, in trying to respond to the needs for change, to the demands of the provinces, the Minister of Human Resources Development has ensured that national standards will now be set in co–operation with the provinces, through the Canada social transfer. So, we are not imposing any more; quite the contrary, we are responding to current federalism, evolutionary federalism. We are responding once again to the winds of change and, once again, in a spirit of good faith that demonstrates a will to work in partnership and in co–operation with the provinces.

When talking about a will to change on the part of the federal government and a will to respect the wishes of the people, we can consider the strategic initiatives put forward by the minister to implement a number of programs based on the priorities and needs of the provinces.

Can we still talk about interference by the federal machinery? I think that the action taken by the minister clearly demonstrates that we are following this trend of open federalism, of modern federalism that increasingly respects the objectives and wishes of the provinces as a whole. Furthermore, with respect to reform, we must bear in mind that the people as a whole asked that reform take place not only to decentralize but also to ensure that programs established in the 1960s can be brought into line with the new needs of Canadians in terms of social and labour market programs. That is why the minister and his officials are busy implementing programs that meet the expectations of the members of the Canadian society of the 1990s by making sure that the department can make the leap into the next millennium.

In fact, our goal is to better serve the public and provide it with tools. At this stage, on the basis of Bill C–96, whose purpose is to set out the department's mandate, I think that in the general, public interest, we must try to see our basic role, our ultimate goal and purpose, at the provincial and federal levels, as working together, hand in hand, towards change in the federal system.

The department this bill deals with is an important department because of both the role it plays in the field and of what it can achieve with the funds at its disposal.

To show how important this department is, this is the department responsible for unemployment insurance. Changes will soon be made to the UI program. Again, the minister's clear commitment to respecting all the provinces and meeting the needs of the public will show.

This is an important department, whose role in Quebec and Canada cannot be underestimated, a department which people rely on and which has an impact on everyday life, a department which, last year, spent $13.3 billion in the province of Quebec alone.

How does this affect us? This amount of $13.3 billion was used to help more than 164,000 Quebecers find jobs and 44,789 students find summers jobs, to pump $1.5 billion into the Quebec post–secondary education system, to ensure that more than 80,000 Quebecers receive adequate training, while $3 billion went to subsidizing Quebec social assistance programs, which benefited approximately 700,000 people.

We are talking about a department that, on the average, allowed UI benefits to be paid to some 528 unemployed people every month. That is not all. I have a long list in front of me, but unfortunately it would take too long to enumerate all the concrete actions that were taken.

The department also helped develop youth employment. So, we are talking about a department that is having a real effect, that is undergoing changes. Given that reality, instead of always playing politics, the official opposition should rise above partisanship and, just this once, think about the people's interest, try to serve them better and, finally, work in partnership.

We know what can be achieved through partnership and, again in this case, the past gives us an indication of what the future holds. Take for example the Canada social transfer set up because people asked for it. There are also the agreements to improve job opportunities for welfare recipients, which allow us to join forces in order to help them find jobs. There is also the block funding agreement which was concluded with Quebec under the Canada Student Loans Program.

There are many examples showing that if we are ready to co–operate, as Quebecers want, and work hand in hand toward the common goal of helping all the people, so that Quebec can still have its place, we will grow together and allow federalism to grow in the best interests of the people and the provinces.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the member for Outremont and I am torn between disbelief and admiration. I say disbelief because, in spite of what the situation in Canada's manpower and employment sector, the member for Outremont keeps referring to a slew of federal and Liberal policies which, in the last two years, have obviously not given any results.

He told us about the role of the federal government regarding employment development in Quebec and in Canada. He said that this is important, that great things are happening. However, when we look at the statistics on unemployment, we see a situation quite different from the picture painted by the hon. member.

I say disbelief because I cannot understand how a member, who claims to be well aware of the situation of workers and of the plight of the unemployed and the welfare recipients in Quebec and in Canada, can seriously discuss federal policies and try to convince us that everything is fine, that there are no problems, that we simply must let the Minister of Human Resources Development go on with his good work. This is why I used the word disbelief.

My disbelief is also mixed with admiration. The hon. member talked about great principles. He told us about how we must work together, grow together, co–operate, be partners, and do our share to promote Canada's development.

• (1725)

In a way, I admire the hon. member, who may well become a minister some day. Indeed, his speech was an almost flawless performance in that it reflected the Liberal philosophy heard for at least 20 or 25 years, a philosophy which expresses something that no one recognizes in Canada. We are presented with a picture of Canada that no one recognizes. And no one recognizes it because it obviously has nothing to do with reality.

Regarding the bill's provision on manpower training, we note that, for the last four or five years, since 1991 or so, everyone in Quebec has been asking that manpower adjustment and manpower training become the responsibility of the province. I say everyone, but I should be a little more specific and provide some names, since the hon. member may not have followed the developments in the newspapers and may not have heard the views expressed.

First, there was Mr. Bourbeau, then Quebec's Liberal minister of Labour; he was followed by Mr. Johnson and Mr. Ryan. Now, it is the PQ government. All of them asked that Quebec be given full responsibility for manpower. Mr. Dufour, president of Quebec's Conseil du patronat, made the same request. And so did, just this week, Mr. Gérald Ponton, president of Quebec's Association des manufacturiers.

I ask the hon. member: How does he explain the fact that everyone in Quebec, except for the provincial caucus of the Liberal Party of Canada, is asking that manpower training be made Quebec's responsibility? Why is it that he and the minister do not see that this is what Quebecers are asking for? Why is it that his government will not comply with that request in the bill before us today?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before giving the floor to the hon. member, I must say that I failed earlier to carry out a duty with regard to the adjournment proceedings.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce—International Criminal Court.

Mr. Cauchon: Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague's remarks. First, as regards admiration, I would ask my colleague not to waste any energy in admiring me but rather to use his energy in helping the federal system change, in working to represent objectively and constructively the interests of the whole population of Quebec so that we can continue to make Canadian federalism change.

I talked earlier about remarks that are an insult to people's intelligence. We have to listen. There are people watching us today. Some members said the bill deals with manpower. The bill before the House, Bill C–96, deals—and I point this out to people watching us—essentially with structuring the department, providing the minister and his department with a mandate and the tools needed to be able to work. It is a bill of a general nature that has nothing to do with manpower per se.

As concerns manpower, and again I said it in my main speech, we ought to wait. We are now dealing with a bill of a general nature. I said in my main speech that the minister and his officials did an outstanding job in order to serve and to respond to demands for change made by the population. There are more things to come. What I ask the official opposition to do is to work in co–operation with us, to accept the referendum results and to help bring about changes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

MINING EXPLORATION AND DEVELOPMENT

The House resumed from October 4, 1995, consideration of the motion that, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider implementing a new program of mining incentives which would encourage exploration and development in Canada.

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would find Motion M–292 put forward by my colleague from Timiskaming—French River quite acceptable if it would take into account the history of this country and particularly of the province of Quebec.

I am in favour of implementing a new financial incentives program to encourage mining exploration and development in Canada and in Quebec, but not at any price or under any condition.

I do believe that natural resources play a crucial part in the economy of any country. A country without natural resources is a country that depends on international markets. It is very hard for a country with no natural resources to properly develop a processing industry. This industry would always rely on major markets and bear the brunt of a supply and demand system.

It would also be subject to the whims of the money markets which always seek to get the most out of our natural resources. We had a striking example of that situation in 1929, during the Great Depression.

When the automotive industry was in full expansion, the rubber producing countries, especially in Southeast Asia, could not get a reasonable price for their products although demand was very strong.

World financial markets were pulling the strings and, unfortunately, were getting richer at the expense of the producers. Government had to intervene so that this industry would not go bankrupt.

We still have the same market system and the government must act at the natural resources level. To yield all possible benefits, the development of natural resources must be planned coherently and consistently, and I would not say this is the case in Canada.

The competition between the federal government and Quebec and the other provinces is counterproductive and above all very costly. It generates very expensive duplication and this waste of energy and money only benefits our competitors on the world markets.

While we, in Canada, are fighting each other and while the federal government is trying to oust the provinces from a jurisdiction which is rightly theirs, our competitors get the opportunity to capture our own markets. A country which fails to invest in the development of its natural resources shows a lack of foresight which makes it very vulnerable.

Motion M–292 by my colleague tends to maintain a minimum investment in the Canadian mining industry and this is very good.

Moreover, a country whose national government violates the jurisdictions of other levels of government cannot expect an exceptional performance from its industry. In Canada, we have had huge difficulties in this area for some years.

If you are a producer and if, every time you want to go ahead, you are faced with two levels of government that disagree and with two sets of standards, you will waste valuable time and energy that would be better spent elsewhere.

As everyone knows, a country's natural resources belong to the community. If they are available for the well–being of the population, they are at the heart of our own development. In addition to creating jobs, they play an active part in our economic growth and collective wealth.

As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, sections 109 and 117 of the 1867 Constitution Act gave the provinces ownership of the lands, mines, minerals, and attendant royalties; several provinces, including Quebec, used these provisions to promote local industrial development and economic diversification.

I was elected in a rural riding and a relatively poor region. Our natural resources are the key to the survival and development of small communities in our regions. The involvement of the government in this crucial economic sector is essential, and this is why I congratulate my colleague for presenting this amendment.

But I firmly believe that the federal government should stick to the Constitution and let the provinces and Quebec take care of this sector. The federal government should give back to the provinces the sums it has collected and continues to collect for natural resources, and tell them: "Administer them the best you can".

The federal government profited from the revenues yielded by the development of natural resources, and it would only be right, as is requested in Motion M–292 proposed by my colleague, that that money be used for further developing these resources. The interference of the federal government in natural resources is serious. For example, the federal government has heavily taxed petroleum, which is outright interference in interprovincial and international trade.

It unilaterally fixed the sale price of oil and gas, wading into the market beyond provincial boundaries, thus forcing certain producing provinces to reduce their royalties and, in certain cases, even causing them to lose certain foreign markets.

Moreover, one must not forget that the federal government has jurisdiction over interprovincial pipelines, interprovincial hydro lines and other methods of transportation between two or more provinces. Finally, in case of conflict leading to political stiffness like we experienced under the Trudeau government, the federal government could in a twisted manner use the declaratory power included in section 91(10)c) of the Constitution Act of 1867 to unilaterally declare, as we have often seen the Liberals do, that projects like power dams, mines and oil wells fall under exclusive federal jurisdiction. Furthermore, it could use the incidental power to regulate working conditions and product quality in those projects, thus encroaching once more on provincial jurisdiction.

The present government already did that through its environmental legislation which declared its authority on such projects. Many people, particularly now, ask themselves why Canadian federalism does not work. Yet, the answer is obvious. There is in Canada a level of government that does not respect the jurisdiction of other levels of government. There is a government which wants to grab all power for itself.

There is a government which does not have for objective the well–being of Canadians, but the appropriation of all power. I conclude by saying that the Bloc Quebecois will support the motion, but not without certain reservations.

[English]

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak today in support of Motion No. 292, especially after the fairy tales I have been hearing from the member of the Bloc.

During my seven years as a member I have had an opportunity to meet various sectors of the mining industry, people involved in the mining industry on a daily basis. The main message they have been giving governments over these years is that governments must make a solid commitment not only to keeping the mining industry in Canada but also to making it prosper.

The motion before us today proposes the government consider implementing a new program of mining incentives which would encourage exploration and development in Canada. Although most people equate these incentives with taxes and grants, this is not necessarily the case.

• (1740)

I commend the hon. member for Timiskaming—French River for putting this motion forward. He has been very supportive of the mining industry. As he previously stated in the House, all the mining industry wants is a level playing field and a tax system competitive with the rest of the world and competitive internationally. In order to do this it is essential to streamline government procedures and to provide the mining industry with a single window approach to approvals.

The parliamentary secretary will be speaking after I finish. I am sure he will bring us up to date on how the minister is moving in these areas.

Why is this motion so important to Canadians? It is important because we are being asked to consider new initiatives, initiatives which previous governments did not feel were necessary.

When driving through Hagersville or Caledonia in my riding the first things we see as we approach these communities are the shafts of the gypsum mines. They support the gypsum plants which produce gypsum board which is shipped throughout North America. These communities rely on the mines, as do small communities in remote and rural areas all across the country. For visitors these mines show the importance of mining to the economic and social well–being of the country.

There has been a progressive decline in investment, employment and mining exploration in Canada over the last ten years. Between 1990 and 1993, 20,000 jobs were lost in the Canadian mining industry. Taking into consideration that mining provides 400,000 direct and indirect jobs in Canada, that number is quite substantial.

There are approximately 150 communities across Canada which depend on mining for their livelihood. When we factor in the number of businesses and the family members who buy goods from the stores and businesses, we are talking close to one million Canadians depending on this industry, a big industry in Canada.

We are also talking about an industry which pays some of the highest industrial wages in Canada: $847 per week. Most of these wages are earned in rural and isolated communities across the country. They provide the infrastructure in many places which keeps rural Canada together.

Between 1986 and 1991 Canada failed to attract a single new mining project with capital of more than $250 million. By comparison, Latin America acquired five such contracts. Likewise, from 1991 to 1992 more than 150 companies worldwide reduced expenditures in Canadian mining projects by 30 per cent, from $430 million to $302 million.

We need to look at why these investors are no longer selecting Canada and we must move to provide solutions to the problem. Why are they going to South America? Why are they going to Southeast Asia? The common feeling is it must be because of the environmental differences. I do not think that is the case. That may be a small component of it but more and more it is a direct result of government red tape.

We have three and in some areas four different levels of government. These companies have to go through an enormous amount of red tape to get anything done. It should be a primary role of anybody looking at solutions to the problem to deal with the whole question of red tape.

In 1994 the total contribution to the Canadian economy from mining equalled $19.1 billion. We must also remember this is a cyclical industry; it has ups and downs. In 1992 and 1993 alone 44 Canadian mines closed while 22 opened. We can see the trend is not in the right direction.

• (1745)

The requests that have been put forward by Keep Mining in Canada are not only logical but they are very plausible and workable. The Keep Mining in Canada campaign, supported by the industry, has laid out 10 reasonable points that it feels, if achieved, would help its industry.

The Standing Committee on Natural Resources when chaired by the member for Kenora—Rainy River conducted extensive hearings with all the stakeholders which resulted in the setting out of nine key recommendations committee members felt that if followed through on would help the industry.

They talked about streamlining the federal–provincial environmental regulations, which only makes sense and I know the Minister of the Environment is working in that area now; implementing an appropriate incentive to stimulate grassroots mineral exploration, and I know some hon. members do that sometimes as well; changing the tax laws on mine reclamation funding; establishing processes for land use planning that respect mineral tenure and ensure both the protection of Canada's heritage and access to the mineral resource development. We have to be able to balance those two. I know the parliamentary secretary will be happy to tell us following my speech how the minister is working in that area.

Overlapping jurisdictions also have a negative impact on investors. Much time and money is spent by companies filling out separate forms for either municipal, provincial or federal levels of government. They always seem to have different guidelines. These companies have to jump through a number of hoops. Surely our governments can work together and come up with a single window and a single set of regulations which these companies can follow.

Canada also must implement an appropriate incentive to stimulate grassroots mineral exploration. By improving the tax laws and reclamation funding we would be promoting good environmental management. I know the member for Davenport wants to talk about that a little later.

The taxation of money put into trust by a company to meet future demands for mine reclamation should definitely be one of the items the government should look at. I am sure the member for Davenport will have something to say about that.

The last item I want to consider today in my last few minutes is the topic of establishing a process for land use planning that respect mineral tenure to ensure both the protection of Canada's natural heritage and access to mineral resource development. Mining is part of our heritage and we must ensure that it is accessible and that its terms can be met.

A commitment to supporting the mining industry does not translate into excess money being spent. Many incentives can be implemented that are not costly but which would encourage exploration and development. I talked about a few of these incentives in my speech. I urge anyone who seriously considers what is being voted on today to take a look at this. This is a votable item. It is a serious item. It is serious in the sense that it helps our program to develop and create jobs in this country.

We are voting today on the very survival of the mining industry and the demise of the communities that mining supports. Mining has always been a very important part of our heritage and I hope we will keep it.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the motion we are debating today says that the government should consider implementing a new program of mining incentives which would encourage exploration and development in Canada.

Mining is one of the most important industries in Canada. It deserves the government's attention. It pays the highest average wage of any industry in the country which is over $200 a week higher than its next highest wage category of transportation and communication. Mining products total 15 per cent of our exports. It is a very important industry.

Investment in the exploration of new mines is less than half of what it once was in the early 1990s. In real dollars investment in the early 1990s was around $800 million annually. This year it is expected to be $300 million or maybe less. Exploration and development have fallen drastically because Canada has failed to provide a favourable investment climate.

Canada used to be a world leader in mining activity, but that leadership is in jeopardy. Other nations now offer a more favourable environment for mining companies. Canada has fallen from first to fourth place in attracting new investment. We have not opened a major new mine in the last five years. We need to address the problem quickly, not by the year 2000, not within the term of the government's mandate. We need to start now to turn the situation around.

The motion before us speaks about incentives for the mining industry to stimulate exploration and development. What kind of incentives are being talked about? Is it some huge program of cash rebates? Are costly tax breaks needed so that the industry can flourish once again?

I intend to support this motion but I want to make sure to let members know what we mean by incentives. For the Liberal or the socialist, an incentive is some kind of government assistance. It is a handout. It is a grant, a transfer or a tax shelter that is big enough to overcome the disincentives that are found in the industry. If there is over–regulation, for example, the government handout will be enough to induce companies to overlook inefficiencies in the system.

These types of government programs are like giving an oxygen mask to someone who is choking instead of just loosening the rope that is hanging around the neck.

For the free enterpriser, the entrepreneur who is a self–starter, an incentive is not a grant from the government where it picks some winners and losers in the industry. An incentive is merely an opportunity.

If I know miners at all, they are free enterprisers. They are risk takers. They are self–starters. They do not want special help. They want a level playing field and an opportunity to show their skills, develop the resources for the good of the country and for their companies.

We were talking with someone from a major mining association who represents mining companies yesterday. He told us that the industry is not looking for handouts. That is not what it needs. The industry is looking for the government to get out of its way so that it can get on with doing what it does best.

I am supporting this motion today because that is what I mean by incentives. I mean deregulation, not in a way that harms the environment, but in a way that makes government approval processes more efficient.

Government departments and different levels of government should communicate with one another to harmonize contradictory or overlapping legislation. Right now this is Canada's problem. The government strangles the industry with red tape, then someone wants to come along and give the industry an oxygen mask of government incentives. We say, take off the red tape and the industry will be healthy again on its own.

Today we had a representative from the Mining Association of Canada appear before the standing committee. He said: "The current regulatory system is choked with red tape. Regulations, guidelines and decision making processes duplicate and contradict each other from one department to another and between the two levels of government". We have to solve this problem.

The industry also needs security of land tenure and security in Canada's legal regime. Mining companies have to know that when they start a project they are going to have an opportunity to finish it.

Security is also necessary in the new environmental assessment process. The government has made wonderful noises about this problem. I am sure the hon. parliamentary secretary is going to try to sum this up.

The Minister of Natural Resources has said many of the right words to the industry and made many good promises. The red book, the Liberal mining platform and the White House mining initiative are all full of great words.

The industry minister promised action on streamlining regulations this year, 1995. However, to quote Greg Waller, an executive with Cominco, obviously exasperated with the government's lack of action to date, says: "The mining industry is getting impatient with the empty words".

An example happened this last week. I received copies of two separate letters from the provinces addressed to the Minister of Natural Resources, one in September and one in October, requesting, almost pleading for a meeting between the minister, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and their provincial counterparts. They did not even get the courtesy of a reply from the Minister of Natural Resources until a provincial minister talked to me late last week.

I raised the issue in the House last week. I find out now the minister had a conference call with the intergovernmental affairs minister and the provincial minister. That is a start. It is a shame it takes two and half or three months to arrange a simple teleconference call among three parties who say they are interested in getting to the bottom of this regulatory problem.

There was a good presentation on regulatory reform in committee today. There were some specific recommendations and reforms that would help the industry. Many of those ideas were adopted by an all–party committee in last year's report "Lifting Canadian Mining Off the Rocks". These all–party resolutions were brought to the government. They were recommendations from all sides. Not a single one of those recommendations has been adopted to date.

Again, they are good words, nice words, but we do not need more words. We do not need more committees. We do not need more studies. We do not need more talk. We do not need more task forces. We do not need government inquiries. We do not need empty promises. We know the problems. We know what to do to fix them. What is needed right now is not knowledge, more ideas. We need the political will to get the job done.

Here is part of the conclusion from today's presentation by the mining association: "Real progress requires the removal of costly regulatory systems that are process based rather than performance or results oriented. This implies a willingness by the federal government to let go of outdated and expensive centralist systems. It is a willingness which has not been expressed in concrete action to date".

We need to get away from an expanded role for the federal government in the mining industry. The federal government must get off the industry's back and out of its pockets and allow the industry to rise to the prominence it should have. That should be left primarily with the provinces and the federal government should remember that.

We are dealing with two philosophies of government. Is the role of the federal government an ever increasing one or should it take heed from what the industry, the provinces and many Canadians are saying? They are saying the role of the federal government is not to continually expand into areas of provincial jurisdiction; the role is to see where there is overlap and then to withdraw and allow the provinces to get the job done.

The Minister of Natural Resources has been politely applauded for saying the right words to the natural resources community. She talks the talk, but can she walk the walk? Her political honeymoon with the industry will soon be over unless she produces results to act on the good intentions she has expressed.

The problems with regulatory reform are the first test of this minister's real political will. Will she be able to overcome her colleagues around the cabinet table who are calling for natural resource industries to sit on their hands watching as sustainable development slowly devolves into sustainable preservation? I hope she has that will. I hope she will be able to stand up to her colleagues, stand up for a more rational approach to environmental assessment, stand up for Canadian jobs and expertise and development.

I call on the minister to back up her words with some action starting today. Provide the only real incentive the Canadian mining industry wants and needs which is substantial, positive regulatory reform. She knows what has to happen. Let us see it happen. Let it happen now.

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the member for Timiskaming—French River for his forceful introduction of this motion and for his keen interest in the importance of the mining industry.

The motion before us urges the government to adopt the recommendations of the report of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources entitled "Lifting Canadian Mining Off The Rocks" and urges the adoption of a new program of incentives.

It seems to me that at a time of budget austerity and restraint it would be wiser not to seek new tax incentives and subsidies. It is true that the mining industry is an important part of the Canadian economy. It is true that the past recession has proven difficult for the mining industry, but the resource sector has returned to profitability. For example, Barrick Gold Corporation of Toronto posted record profits of $250 million in 1994, up 17 per cent from 1993.

In addition, as the member for Timiskaming—French River pointed out at the beginning of this debate, there was a substantial increase in exploration activities throughout Canada in 1994, 9.1 per cent or $3.3 billion above 1993 according to the Minister of Natural Resources and the press release which she issued on February 9, 1995.

On page two of the report I mentioned earlier we find the following statement: "An application to build a mine in Canada, for example, can take up to four years to make its way through environmental assessments, in contrast to a mere six months in Chile". Are we to conclude that Chile has a more advanced environmental assessment process than Canada, or that Chile is providing greater environmental protection than Canada?

Environmental assessment regulations and legislation and the cumulative impact assessment are essential parts of sustainable development. They are here to stay. They are safeguards on human and environmental health.

The report goes on into great detail on issues of tax reform. It is silent on the cost of tax incentives not only in terms of forgone revenue but in terms of potential damage to water, soil, and air. This, I submit, requires attention.

The concluding paragraph of the report on page 11 is also important because it reveals a big gap between the position of the mining industry and that of the government. The paragraph states: "Governments must strike a much more realistic balance between environmental considerations and the economic viability of the industry".

This idea of balancing environmental and economic considerations runs counter to the Brundtland definition of sustainable development and the position of the government in the red book and also paragraph 6(a) of the Department of Natural Resources Act, which calls for the sustainable development of Canada's natural resources.

Balancing environment and economy is not sustainable development because it separates the two, running the risk of making policy decisions that give precedence to the economy over the environment. The mining association must realize that the Department of Natural Resources has a mandate to integrate the environment and the economy, as defined in the red book.

Regarding federal and provincial overlap and duplication, it is important to act on what is known. In the late 1980s the federal government delegated authority for the monitoring and enforcement of mining regulations to the provinces. In his 1990 report the then auditor general Kenneth Dye stated: "In the one area where the federal government has already delegated monitoring and enforcement authority to the provinces, there has been a serious deterioration in compliance. A review of the metal mining liquid effluent regulations issued under the Fisheries Act indicates that compliance fell from 85 per cent in 1982 to 48 per cent in 1988". This conclusion seems to be important and should be kept in mind when we hear calls for voluntary programs to reduce emissions.

Voluntary programs such as the accelerated reduction and elimination of toxics, ARET program, are not substitutes for regulations. This conclusion is substantiated by a 1994 Kellogg Peat Marwick management survey, which found that 95 per cent of respondents from Canadian organizations cited compliance to regulations as the principal motivator on environmental issues, while only 16 per cent cited voluntary government programs as a principal motivator.

The suggestion that greater investment incentives to the mining industry should be offered at a time when governments are desperate for revenues is not synchronized with a government agenda attempting to reduce deficit and debt. Instead, it would be preferable to ensure sustainable development in a variety of ways, including an efficient management of minerals, for example, by ensuring that recycled materials and virgin materials are treated equally under the tax system.

It is important to note that a 1994 study entitled "A Comparison of Tax Incentives for Extraction and Recycling of Basic Materials in Canada" concludes that there is a potential bias in the tax system toward the use of virgin materials relative to recycled materials. This bias ought to be addressed and corrected.

In addition, to ensure sustainable development we could consider programs aimed at new technologies for mineral extraction and environmentally sensitive exploration methods and equipment. We could ensure that regulations aim at environmentally responsible exploration methods and that the regulations are enforced. We could ensure that exploration, mining operations, and reclamation projects are conducted in an environmentally sound manner and do not compromise vital land uses such as ecologically sensitive areas and parks.

Mining and sustainable development can be integrated for the long term benefit of Canadians and the economy.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the House today on Motion 292, which would require the government to consider a new program of incentives to encourage exploration and development in Canada. In part the question is the definition of incentives and what that actually means.

[Translation]

I would like to thank my colleague, the hon. member for Timaskaming—French River, for having brought these important matters to the attention of the House.

[English]

Mining makes an enormous contribution to the Canadian economy and way of life, representing a vital source of employment in more than 115 communities throughout the country. It provides direct jobs for more than 300,000 Canadians and contributes more than $20 billion to the economy every year.

Moreover, mining activities have a significant indirect effect on the Canadian economy, from the small local supplier to the specialized financial institution in Toronto, Montreal, or Vancouver. For every job created in the mining industry an additional job is indirectly created in other sectors of the Canadian economy.

The Canadian mining industry is known throughout the world for its leadership in developing and applying state of the art exploration and mining techniques and technologies. We are very proud of the expertise that was developed here in Canada to take full advantage of our rich mineral endowment.

The government appreciates the key role of mining to our economic well–being. However, we are also aware of the challenges the industry has been facing, especially from increased global competition and mineral investment. We must meet these challenges by working with all the mining stakeholders to sustain the vitality of the industry and provide conditions that will foster its growth.

In our opinion, the best way to support and encourage the mining sector is to reduce the level of long term structural impediments to mineral investment. Many of these impediments were identified by the Whitehorse mining initiative, which saw the federal government, along with the representatives of industry, provincial governments, environmental groups, labour unions, and aboriginal organizations, come to the table to work together. A consensus was reached and the WMI leadership council accord was signed in September 1994, which outlines agreed upon principles and goals to guide the development of mining in this country.

To help develop an action plan to address the WMI issues that fall within the jurisdiction of the federal government, the Minister of Natural Resources established a private sector ministerial advisory committee. One of its first tasks is to provide commentary and advice on the sustainable development of mineral, mines, and metals issues paper the minister released in September in Vancouver. This release fulfils a promise the minister made. After discussion on the paper, the minister will work with the stakeholders to develop a mineral and metal policy for consideration by cabinet.

To address the most fundamental industry concerns we introduced a measure in the 1994 budget allowing a deduction for mine reclamation trust fund contributions. Our commitment to mineral development was also reaffirmed when the mining sector was identified as one of the six key sectors where the government wants to see significant improvement to the regulatory regime. Furthermore, our natural resources standing committee is currently examining this very issue.

Some specific areas where we are working to make tangible long term improvements include administration of the Fisheries Act, land use and related decision making, the definition of waste, regulatory regimes north of 60, regulatory impact analysis, and toxic management policy and practices. Important improvements on issues of overlap and duplication could also be achieved through various initiatives to harmonize federal and provincial regulatory regimes.

On October 19 Natural Resources Canada and the Mining Association of Canada co–sponsored a seminar on regulatory streamlining in order to help identify concrete ways of accelerating progress on these issues. In support of the same objectives for jobs and new investments, NR Canada has been marketing Canada's mineral opportunities in Canada and abroad in an effort to attract much needed capital investment for our mineral industry.

• (1810)

The Minister of Natural Resources is a strong champion of the Canadian mining industry. Earlier this year she participated in the international "Investing in the Americas" conference where she vigorously promoted Canada as an attractive country for mineral investment.

These efforts are very important, because investments are essential to ensure the industry's future.

[English]

We know that Canada's geography and geology are attractive. Exploration levels have recently started to recover, thus reflecting increased confidence in Canada as a mining country.

The 1995 budget must be counted among our efforts to help solve the problems of the mining industry. By forcefully proceeding to put our economic house in order, we are sending a clear signal that we want to regain control of our country's finances. The measures implemented in the last budget will result in more favourable investment conditions in Canada, which will certainly benefit the mining industry.

The government remains committed to a prosperous mining sector in Canada and promotes actions that are consistent with our budgetary objectives and the efficiency of the federation. Mining, more than most industries, is global. The influence that Natural Resources Canada exercises in national and international fora makes a significant difference to the sustainable development and competitiveness of the industry. Our science and technology and our policy investments are cost effective and bring benefits to Canada in all regions.

The initiatives I have discussed are fundamental critical steps that will result in greater levels of certainty for the mining investor. This government understands that reality. We will continue to work in partnership with provinces and territories to ensure that our geological potential is fully realized and Canadians have an opportunity to benefit from a strong mining industry.

The government appreciates the important contribution the mining industry makes to our country's job creation and economic growth. We understand the challenges that face the industry today. This government is following a policy agenda to put in place an attractive investment climate that encourages and supports a prosperous mining industry committed to sustainable development.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The hon. member for Timiskaming—French River, under whose name Motion 292 stands, has asked the Chair if he could close the debate on this motion under his name, with the understanding that he would only take two minutes and at 6.15 p.m. the Chair will put the question. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. First of all, I would like to thank all of my colleagues in the Bloc and the Reform Party, and all my colleagues in the government, who have spoken so eloquently on this motion and particularly on the importance of the mining industry in Canada.

I think that we all, as parliamentarians and as federal politicians, acknowledge the importance of this industry to Canada. It is wonderful to see all parties supporting this motion and I thank you for doing so.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 6.15 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 93, the time provided for debate has expired.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

(Motion agreed to)

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if you were to seek it I think you would find unanimous consent to call it 6.30 p.m. and proceed with the adjournment debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Does the House agree that we proceed with the adjournment debate?

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on September 29, 1995, I asked the Minister of Justice whether he and the Canadian government supported the proposal for an international criminal court and, if so, what they were doing to advance this proposal. While the minister gave me a very positive response on that date, I want to pursue this further in order to put more details on the record of the House with respect to the proposed international criminal court.

Right away I should clarify the difference between the International Court of Justice, that is, the world court presently sitting in The Hague, and the proposed international criminal court.

The existing International Court of Justice, the world court, deals with disputes between the states; in other words, a dispute between the United States and Nicaragua or a dispute between Canada and Spain. If a country breaks its obligations under an international treaty a group of countries or another country may sue the accused country, the state, in the International Court of Justice. However, the International Court of Justice does not deal with international offences committed by individuals which are in violation of the same human rights treaties passed by the United Nations.

For example, although it has been 50 years since the Nuremberg trials following the second world war, nothing has been done to set up courts which can do what the Nuremberg trials did. The Nuremberg trials tried individuals who had committed war crimes during the second world war and held them responsible for their acts before the international community.

While there was a lot of talk following those trials that we should set up a permanent international criminal court, nothing was done until 1953. In 1953 a draft statute was prepared to establish such an international criminal court but it fell victim to the disputes of the cold war and never went anywhere.

However, times have changed and there has been a new initiative in recent years to once again establish an international criminal court which would hold individuals responsible when they commit crimes against humanity, crimes of genocide, crimes of international terrorism and crimes of international drug trafficking. Although such individuals might be charged before their own domestic court or before the court of the country in which the victims were found, there is more credibility if there is a standing international criminal court in which such individuals can be tried.

We can recall a few years ago when certain Libyans were accused of putting a bomb in a plane which blew up over Scotland, killing many people. There was an attempt to bring the Libyans to trial in Scotland but there was a credibility question because many individuals doubted whether the Libyans would get a fair trial in a Scottish court when the passengers were killed in Scotland. It is much better that we have an international criminal court for those kinds of offences in which the judges are from many countries, not necessarily from the country of the victims, and therefore there is a semblance of credibility and fairness.

This matter has advanced quite far. In 1994 the United Nations set up a special ad hoc committee on the establishment of an international criminal court. The ad hoc committee has met twice since last December and the whole matter seems to be well on its way.

My purpose tonight is to ask the parliamentary secretary, since the very positive response of the minister in September, whether the ad hoc committee has completed its work and has reported to the sixth committee of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

When does he expect we will see agreement to a statute setting up such an international criminal court? It will be a great step forward when this is done. I congratulate the Canadian government on the work it has done so far. I hope this whole project will soon see the light of day.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice after question period today asked me if I would respond to the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce on his initiative and his perseverance to establish a permanent international court.

Events such as those in Rwanda and in the former Yugoslavia have amply demonstrated the need for a permanent international court to try individuals responsible for those most atrocious crimes of all: genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity.

The end of the cold war and a new found political will permit the international community to consider the establishment of such a court as a worthwhile and serious idea.

The permanent international criminal court would serve two crucial purposes. First, an important deterrent to criminal acts is the knowledge that perpetrators will be persecuted either by national authorities or by an international court.

Second, the establishment of such a court responds to desire for justice on the part of victims of these offences, thus permitting the international community to contribute meaningfully to the maintenance of peace and security by discouraging reprisals or other acts of vengeance.

Canada is at the forefront of efforts to create this court. The Department of Justice together with the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade and the Department of National Defence have been participating this year in two meetings of an ad hoc committee created by the General Assembly of the United Nations to review the major substantive and administrative issues arising out of the draft statute for the court.

In accordance with the recommendations the ad hoc committee will be presenting this fall to the general assembly, Canada is now pushing for the convening of an international conference to negotiate the creation of the court.

We are very proud of the contribution Canada is making toward the establishment of the court as well as our current work on cases to be tried by the ad hoc courts for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda. I hope this satisfies the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce who, I say again, has shown leadership on this issue.

DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT

The House resumed from November 9 consideration of the motion that Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak this morning to this bill to establish the Department of Human Resources Development. However, I am also somewhat frustrated and astonished that the government could introduce this bill for second reading after the clear message sent in the referendum that significant changes were necessary in Canada.

Although Quebecers decided to vote no and give federalism a last chance, they certainly did not have in mind the kind of action proposed in Bill C–96.

This bill illustrates the fundamental difference in perception between the federal government and Quebec. Mr. Axworthy said yesterday in his speech, and I quote—

Mr. Boudria: Order.

Mr. Crête: I apologize. I should have said the Minister of Human Resources Development instead of referring to a member by name.

The minister said yesterday in his speech: "It is decentralization of a very different kind. There has been a lot of talk about decentralization, but so far it has been a somewhat restricted debate as it talks only about decentralization in terms of transferring from the federal government to the provincial governments. Should we not also be talking about how to empower communities and individuals to make more choices? Is that not what we should be looking at in terms of decentralization? Partnership: government with the private sector, government with school boards, government with the provinces. That is the kind of philosophy we have to continually talk about because that is what works".

That is what Mr. Axworthy claims, or should I say the Minister of Human Resources Development.

In fact, this statement by the minister runs completely counter to the existing consensus in Quebec on manpower management. For example, I would like to quote from a 1991 letter written to the Minister of Employment and Immigration of the time by the Quebec Minister of Income Security which states: "Quebec does indeed recognize the crying need to define its own manpower policies, to establish its priorities with respect to manpower development in close conjunction with its partners in the labour market, and then to design and administer programs tailored to the needs it has set as priorities".

Further on in the letter he goes on to say "Even if the greatest constitutional harmony reigned in the country, which is not exactly the case, Quebec would make the same demands with respect to manpower, since it is so urgently necessary for Quebec's economic development that manpower programs be made efficient and tailored to Quebec's specific labour market priorities". The person saying this in 1991 was a federalist Liberal Quebec minister.

Today the federal government is tabling Bill C–96, and what is Quebec's reception to it? The Quebec Minister of Employment describes it as the final rejection of the unanimous consensus in Quebec that the federal government must withdraw completely from active manpower measures and hand back to Quebec the relevant budgets.

So far, one could qualify this as a squabble between politicians, with each one wanting to hang on to his powers; the people will be the final judges of this. But there is something peculiar to this issue of manpower: the Quebec government position is also the position of all those in Quebec involved in this field.

For instance, to quote someone who has never been identified as a sovereignist or as a backer of the present Quebec government, Ghislain Dufour, the spokesperson for the Conseil du Patronat du Québec, was still saying as recently as yesterday "It is essential that the manpower issue be handed over to Quebec, so that there may at last be a proper policy".

He went on to say: "This is one of the cards the federal government ought to lay on the table to indicate that it has indeed heard Quebec's message calling for change".

Despite Mr. Dufour's position in support of federalism, his heartfelt cry in his apparently unflagging hope that federalism might change went completely unheeded by the federal government, which, as if it were a matter of daily routine, is presenting Bill C-96 for second reading. The aim of the bill is simply to give the federal government the equivalent of a federal minister of education.

I quote clause 6 of the bill as proof. It provides as follows.

> The powers, duties and functions of the Minister extend to and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction relating to the development of the human resources of Canada not by law assigned to any other Minister, department, board or agency of the Government of Canada, and are to be exercised with the objective of enhancing employment, encouraging equality and promoting social security.

The clause contains no reference to provincial jurisdictions or to the fact that Quebec already has a network set up to take action in the manpower sector or to the whole problem that has existed in this sector for the past five years. The government's position should be an obvious sign to Quebecers of the sort of change hinted at during the week before the referendum, without any basis or forethought, which today has been lost in the federal government's return to its old habits.

What is Quebec's claim based on? It is based on the fact that an integrated policy on economic, social and political action, means that the government assuming responsibility, for instance for education, for the Quebec labour code which covers 90 per cent of workers in Quebec, for occupational health and safety, for labour standards, for regulating professional qualifications, professional conduct and mass layoffs—all having a direct impact on jobs—should control the other aspects, as well, such as training, the way we prepare our workforce for the challenges of the globalization of the marketplace and of new technology.

It is rather like taking away half its tool box and thus preventing it from doing its job in a area that is critical for the future.

I would like to give you more examples. I mentioned Mr. Dufour, from the Conseil du patronat, but a similar plea was voiced, last week, by Gérald Ponton, the president of the Quebec manufacturers' association, who cannot be accused either of being a sovereignist or a proponent of Quebec's independence. Mr. Ponton made the same kind of remark as Mr. Dufour. He even said that, during the referendum campaign, people everywhere in the field were saying: "If they give us control over manpower or such and such an area, that might make it worth our while to listen to what is being said". This man speaks on behalf of manufacturers, people who must adapt to changes on a daily basis. They never said that the federal government was the best level of government to deal with this. They are saying the same thing as the people from the job forum and the Société québécoise de développement de la main-d'oeuvre. They are telling us that it is imperative for Quebec to have control over manpower management in the province.

I suggest that bringing Bill C-96 forward at second reading stage, as the federal government did, is somewhat of an affront not only to the Government of Quebec, but also to the people of Quebec as a whole, because, while they want changes, they want the assurance that Quebec will be able to control these major aspects of its development. We notice the same kind of attitude at the Canadian Institute of Adult Education, another group seriously involved with training, which asked the federal government to withdraw Bill C-96.

How did this kind of approach come about in Quebec? Because Canada—and this fact was recognized by the OECD—is considered as some sort of testing ground, given its dismal track record in manpower training. It is characterized by the fact that we have hundreds of thousands of jobs available in Canada but at the same time more than one million people are out of work. The system is responsible for this mismatch between the number of jobs available and unemployed workers, because it should be possible to have only structural unemployment, caused for example by individuals quitting one job for another or by temporary situations arising from layoffs or other changes in the industry.

But that is not the situation at present. We have a large workforce that has never been trained properly. And this cannot be blamed on Quebec achieving sovereignty, since it has not taken place yet. The present situation is the result, the doing of the current system. It was produced by this system. One of the most striking realities is how differently UI recipients are treated compared with welfare recipients or, even worse, with those who fall between the cracks.

Canada has no integrated policy on how people looking for jobs should be treated. Our very sectoral approaches have led to results such as the last UI reform. The federal government has found two ways of dealing with its budget responsibilities and very tight fiscal constraints. To reduce its UI costs, it increased the number of weeks required to qualify for UI benefits and reduced the number of weeks of benefits.

It then ended up with a UI fund surplus of $5 billion this year. At a time when our unemployment rate exceeds 11 per cent, is a UI fund surplus the best option? Is generating a surplus to be used by a bureaucracy that has already proven its ineffectiveness the best way to create jobs?

At the same time, the provincial governments, which are also struggling with budget constraints, are responsible for welfare and systematically trying to keep social assistance costs as low as possible. Employment programs are therefore created so that people can go on unemployment insurance. But these jobs are not permanent. They are just a temporary measure.

We are caught in a vicious circle. If we had a single level of government responsible for the whole manpower issue, including welfare recipients in the labour force who are able to work, UI recipients and those falling between the cracks, its sole objective would be to make the best possible use of human resources and not to reduce welfare and UI costs by offloading its deficits and responsibilities onto the other level of government. Only one government would then be judged in terms of the effectiveness of its manpower policy.

Why is it necessary that Quebec be responsible for that sector? Realities vary widely in the Canadian economic space. For policies in the social, regional development, manpower, health, housing and employment training sectors to be adequate, they must be geared to the environment in which they are apply. They must also be effective.

It is not true that a single policy for the whole country can be effective, given the differences between regional economies. For example, the Maritimes and Quebec's eastern region have an economy which is largely dependent on natural resources and which, therefore, has fostered the development of a large number of seasonal industries. If you apply a national policy to these regions, you only generate disillusion, as is now the case. Moreover, many investments have been made year after year in these regions, but they simply did not produce any result. This can be explained by a number of reasons, including the fact that responsibility for the manpower sector was not delegated to the appropriate level of government.

When you think of it, the accumulated surplus in the UI fund, which will be the primary funding source for the new human resources investment fund, is a new hidden tax. Once it realized that it could no longer borrow on foreign markets to keep trying to control everything—because international lenders were no longer willing to provide funding for that—the federal government found a new trick. It makes Canadians themselves lend money, through UI contributions.

The government is trying to use a new artificial instrument based on a mismanagement of money. If, instead of generating this $5 billion surplus, the government had left that money in the economy, do you not think that it would have helped create a lot more jobs, that it would have given much more concrete results? So today the least trained categories of workers would have the possibility of getting jobs more easily and we would not be trying to give them training for which they are not necessarily prepared.

The other element I would like to draw to the government's attention is that Bill C–96 will lead to open warfare between the Quebec educational system and others who might want to get involved in training. In fact, this may be the hidden agenda of the federal government, to demolish all of the educational tools Quebec has developed, but I believe that such educational bodies as la Fédération des commissions scolaires du Québec and la Fédération des cegeps du Québec have, nevertheless, developed original approaches that make Quebec very competitive in the world market.

The deliberate choice by the federal government to sign agreements with organizations outside these systems, with criteria that differ from those of these systems will lead, within a few years, to an incredible mess with equivalencies. Who will have trained whom? How? To what standard? And this outcome will be just one more example of federal government waste and inefficiency, at a time when we no longer have any money to waste.

This may have been done in the seventies in an attempt to put a Canadian model in place, some artificial concept of what Canada could be, but nowadays this is no longer possible, because of financial constraints and pressure from international lenders, as well as the future demands of each taxpayer in Quebec and in Canada.

There is still time for the federal government to decide either to withdraw Bill C–96 or, at the very least, to heed the clear call from all those involved in this field in Quebec for the responsibility for manpower training to be handed over to the Government of Quebec.

This consensus has existed in Quebec for five years, during which all players have asked for manpower to be transferred to the Government of Quebec, while the federal government—Conservative or Liberal—turns a deaf ear. We must try to find the reason for this lack of openness, this failure to listen. What is happening at the federal level that they will not respond to the demands of all those people who earnestly want to reshape federalism?

In any case, there is an aspect to decentralization that is very obvious and which the federal government refuses to recognize. Why? Because any decision to give Quebec responsibility for manpower or to give any other province the same kind of responsibility in this or other sectors would have the effect of taking power away from the federal mandarins.

The people who were appointed during the Trudeau era and who since then have generated a lot of activities and believe that solutions in Canada will come from the top down instead of from the grass roots, all these people cannot bear the thought of a policy that would turn the decision making pyramid upside down, so that not their views but only the views of the citizens of Quebec and Canada would prevail.

This government will be judged by the way it manages to shake up its senior public servants. After four years in power, the government will no longer have an excuse. It can no longer say: "The Conservatives were like that, and this is our first year and that is why nothing is happening, we have not had time to adjust". They are now starting their third year, and if the federal government does not make any changes, the record will be there for Canadian to judge.

There is another reason why C–96 is unacceptable: it perpetuates two levels of intervention in education. Today, no business in any industrial sector can afford this kind of duplication. There is a lot of unnecessary spending here.

The minister of income security in the Liberal government preceding the Parti Quebecois government calculated the cost of this overlap between Quebec and Canada at between $250 and $275 million a year. Can we afford such overlap in the future? Two hundred fifty million dollars, when, with the prebudget consultations underway, we are being told everywhere that the government has to make choices. It has to decide to be efficient where it can. It has to decide to withdraw from areas where it is not.

Here we have concrete examples with obvious results that the government's involvement in labour matters over the past 10, 15 or 20 years has been totally ineffective and has not permitted any sort of matching of available jobs and manpower. It is also an example of decentralization being a solution when you have faith in the government that is on the receiving end, that will have to take it on and that will be judged by the voters.

Bill C–96 is being criticized by the Société québécoise de la main–d'oeuvre, the Quebec department of employment, the Institut canadien des adultes, the Forum sur l'emploi, the Association des manufacturiers du Québec and the Conseil du patronat du Québec. Here are enough reasons for the federal government to withdraw it or amend it so that Quebec could have control over the management of its manpower.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the words of the member for Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup. He was very clear in his presentation.

• (1025)

The member began by stating that the referendum gave a clear message to the federal government. Yes, it did send a very clear message. The clear message is that the majority of Canadians in Quebec do not want to separate from Canada. That is the clear message and that is what we should be working toward.

However, the Bloc Quebecois keeps pushing its hidden agenda, which it tried to hide during the referendum. The agenda was complete separation. The sooner the Bloc Quebecois accepts this, the sooner all three parties and the independent members in this House can start working together and continue building the strong, beautiful country we have.

Yesterday we heard about the hospital closings in Quebec. That is going to hurt my family in Quebec. Why did that come out only after and not during the referendum? It would have hurt the hidden agenda of separation.

We are bringing in a bill which deals with administration rather than any substantive reform. It does not entail new organizational changes as the Bloc Quebecois tries to make us believe. It does not introduce new statutory powers or affect federal–provincial jurisdiction. I do not know why that would concern the Bloc. The bill draws together portions of the former departments of employment and immigration, health and welfare, secretary of state and all the former department of labour. Think of the savings this will bring to Canadian taxpayers. Why not pass those savings on to the people who are looking for jobs and the people who have to be re–educated?

I was an educator for 27 years. I have learned and am learning more so that education does not stop at the end of grade 8, at the end of grade 12 or at the end of university. Education is becoming a lifetime process. We are also learning that people with good professional jobs are not going to keep them for a lifetime. They are going to go through two, three, four jobs in a lifetime. Therefore they have to be retrained.

Because of the kind of environment we are in, we have to give workers the freedom to move from province to province. If they are forced to move from one province to another or they do it of their own free will, why should they be hampered because one province has a program different from another province? Why should they not be able to move from one program to another from province to province? I cannot understand why speaker after speaker from the Bloc are against this federal–provincial operation of working together to save taxpayers money, to keep building this beautiful country.

I have talked to many diplomats. I will not mention any names or countries but they are shocked at what has happened to our country. Canada is always used as a model and an example when countries move to more democratic forms of government. Now they are so let down. We are letting them down because the model they worshipped, the country to which immigrants from all over the world want to come, is quarrelling within instead of working together.

I do not want a response, although I probably will get one. I want to leave a very clear message. The referendum did affect everyone in this House. We were elected by the people and the kind of comments I am hearing do not represent the majority of the people living in the province of Quebec. They showed that in the referendum.

Bill C–96 is not changing any statutory powers. It is not taking any powers away from Quebec or from any other province. This bill is an attempt to work together, to give programs and services more efficiently at less cost to the taxpayers.

I hope I have made my message clear. The Bloc is trying to resurface its hidden agenda and we are not going to accept it.

• (1030)

Mr. Crête: Mr. Speaker, it is easy to see the lack of understanding in this country. I would like to remind the hon. member who just spoke of a little historical fact. The sovereignist movement captured 40 per cent of the vote in 1980 and 49.4 per cent in 1995. This represents a 20 per cent increase for the sovereignists, while the federalist vote fell from 60 to 50 per cent.

If you do not see this as a very significant warning to Canada, if you do not understand the message, you will bear the consequences of this political choice for the rest of Canada, which is accusing the federal government of misleading them for two years by pretending that there was no problem to be resolved with Quebec. But there is a problem. Canadian citizens felt compelled to travel to Montreal, to make long–distance calls, because the Canadian government misled them for two years by claiming that everything was fine. If you ever go back to your old haunts, you will pay the political price.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order, please. I simply want to remind the House that all comments must be made through the Chair, so that our debates can take place according to the best parliamentary tradition.

Mr. Crête: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would like to say that, in my speech, I presented the arguments put forward by Quebec federalists. I talked about the chief executive of the Quebec manufacturers' association, Gérald Ponton, former chief of staff to a Quebec Liberal minister. I also mentioned the spokesperson for the Conseil du patronat du Québec, Ghislain Dufour, who is not known for his sovereignist views. They both agree that it is important that the federal government withdraw from manpower management. This is not mean separatists speaking, but Quebec federalists telling the federal government: "Unless you get out of there, the next time will be right one for Quebec sovereignty". That is the bottom line, and I think that the people of Quebec and Canada will be the judges of that.

The hon. member said that the bill contained no major changes, that it was a technical bill. Let me read you clause 6 of this bill.

> The powers, duties and functions of the Minister extend to and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction relating to development of the human resources of Canada—

Is that not a substantive change. Never before had the federal government dared lay down in an act that it had the power to interfere to such an extent with education, in spite of the fact that the Constitution clearly states that education falls under provincial jurisdiction. I will leave it up to the people to decide whehther this bill is a technical or a substantive bill.

The hon. member also indicated in his remarks that manpower adjustment has become important, given that people now have to change jobs often. We could not agree more on that. This is the basis for the whole argument put forward by the Quebec government, which maintains that education does not include only primary and secondary school, as it did at the end of the 19th century, but encompasses all training. That is what Quebec's position is premised on.

To conclude, I would like to say that the fact that Canada is considered as some sort of democratic model does not mean that, because there is, within this democracy, a major movement for the sovereignty of one part of the country and because this movement has a voice, we are any less democratic. People are supposed to be able to express themselves in a democracy. And that is what the people of Quebec have done and will do again, especially if the present government in Ottawa keeps ignoring the demands made not by sovereignists alone, but by sovereignists and federalists who are looking for profound changes. That is what the federal government will soon be judged on.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak on Bill C–96. I am sure members know the bill establishes the Department of Human Resources Development and amends or repeals certain related legislation.

In the time I have I will focus on the labour side of the bill and the duties the Prime Minister has entrusted with the Minister of Labour. Included in the bill are clear definitions of the direction and structures of the minister and the minister's duties. Clause 107 of the bill repeals the Department of Labour Act. Clause 4, though, authorizes the appointment of the Minister of Labour.

According to subclause 4(2), the powers, duties and functions of the Minister of Labour extend to and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction relating to labour not by law assigned to any other department, board or agency of the Government of Canada.

In other words, the Minister of Labour has all the powers, duties and functions related to labour matters under federal jurisdiction, except for staff relations and the federal public service.

So that my hon. colleagues in the House understand the extent of this jurisdiction, I will sketch a broad outline for them. The areas covered by the Canada Labour Code fall within the labour minister's jurisdiction. The code governs industrial relations, occupational safety and health, and labour standards in the federal sphere. The code applies to Canadians working in major industrial sectors such as interprovincial and international rail, road and pipeline transportation, shipping, longshoring, air transportation, grain handling, international and interprovincial telecommunications, broadcasting, banks and certain crown corporations. These are critical sectors of the economy.

Parts I and III of the code dealing with industrial relations and labour standards apply to over 700,000 Canadian workers. Part II also applies to the federal public sector so it affects over 1 million Canadians.

Through the Canada Labour Code and other initiatives of the labour branch of HRD Canada, stable industrial relations are facilitated and safe, healthy, fair and productive workplaces are promoted. In the industrial relations sphere the Canada Labour Code has long been recognized as a model that successfully balances the rights and responsibilities of both labour and management.

Application of the Canada Labour Code is the minister's major responsibility, but several other acts and policies fall under her jurisdiction. Among these is the Canada Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. The centre disseminates occupational health and safety information across the country and plays a key role in protecting the lives and health of workers in Canada.

Other statutes that fall in whole or in part under the labour minister's jurisdiction are the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, the Government Employees Compensation Act, the act respecting the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company, the Hazardous Materials Information Review Act, the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act, part II of the Status of the Artist Act, the Wages Liability Act, the Non–Smokers' Health Act and the Corporations and Labour Unions Liabilities Act. All these deal with matters of security, justice and equity, basic entitlements of all Canadian workers.

The only function not carried over from the old Department of Labour is the program for older worker adjustment. This is the only responsibility that will be carried out elsewhere. On the other hand, the Minister of Labour could have added responsibilities under the Employment Equity Act once Bill C–64 has received royal assent.

Given the broad scope of the labour branch, members may wonder why we want to merge into Human Resources Development. It is a logical way for the federal government to meet the challenges facing us as we enter the next century. By merging the two departments into one we want to give concrete form within a single structure to an integrated vision of all various issues relating to the work world and social security.

If the development of our human potential is to be successful it has to be seen as a continuous whole. Society has undergone great changes and we have to adapt. An integrated and unified structure will obviously allow us to do that.

We can no longer succeed in helping Canadians achieve their full potential by creating artificial bureaucratic categories for each of their needs. Nor can we respond to people's needs by losing them in the red tape of poorly co–ordinated government programs. Intelligent and careful integration is necessary but it does not preclude flexibility in procedures, enforcement or service to the Canadian public.

We need an administrative structure that allows us to deliver services in an efficient manner and at a reasonable cost, taking into account both the financial restrictions facing us and our moral obligations toward the Canadian public. By rationalizing resources under the Human Resources Development banner we can and will achieve this goal.

As well, we need a structure that fosters partnerships with the provinces, the industrial sector, the labour movement, the academic community and community groups. We have made great progress toward this and we will go even further under the new act.

The model proposed here is similar to that in several provinces. Integration has already taken place in Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland. Since we are integrating departments some members might wonder why we need a labour minister at all. I will explain that rationale.

We have had labour ministers throughout most of our history. It was the previous Tory government, which did not care much for the views of working Canadians, that eliminated the post. I am concerned the Reform will get the opportunity. The government believes that labour matters deserve special attention, and rightfully so.

The labour movement, labour–management relations, workplace conditions and equity for all workers are probably more important today than they have ever been in the past. For these reasons Bill C–96 provides for the appointment of a Minister of Labour. There is no separate bureaucracy or infrastructure, just a minister who can devote her time to the concerns of working Canadians.

The minister uses the services and facilities of the human resources department. This keeps costs and duplication down without depriving the ministers of the tools needed to deal with their responsibilities.

Last February the Prime Minister appointed the current Minister of Labour. Without waiting for the bill before us to pass he wanted to assure working Canadians that we were ready to deal with urgent and pressing matters affecting Canada's labour situation.

I will outline some initiatives already undertaken by the minister since last February. In the area of industrial relations the minister continues to firmly believe in a free and open collective bargaining system which places the onus on labour and management to be responsible for resolving their own disputes.

Where they are unable to do so, assistance is provided by the federal mediation and conciliation services of the labour branch at Labour Canada. The FMCS has had an astonishing track record, one that most people probably do not realize. Over 90 per cent of disputes referred to it are resolved without work stoppage.

Throughout the world our federal system is seen as a model of balance and effective labour legislation. To have competitive and productive workplaces we need effective labour–management relations. To assist employers and unions to build effective communication channels the FMCS has developed a preventive mediation program which has been well received by its clients.

The minister has undertaken two significant initiatives to ensure that our industrial relations system continues to set standards for the rest of the world. In recent years a number of labour disputes on the west coast have required the intervention of Parliament. In May the minister appointed an industrial inquiry commission to study industrial relations in longshoring, grain handling and other federally regulated industries at west coast ports. We expect to receive the commission's report later this month.

In June the minister established the Sims task force to conduct an independent review and recommend improvements to part I of the Canada Labour Code. The task force will identify options and make recommendations for legislative change with the view to improving collective bargaining, reducing conflict and facilitating labour–management co–operation, ensuring effective and efficient administration of the code and addressing the changing workplace and employment relationships.

The task force is consulting at this moment with labour and management groups that are subject to the code and is scheduled to report to the minister by December 15 of this year.

In the area of occupational health and safety, we are working to better harmonize our legislation and regulations with the provinces and the territories. In co–operation with them, we are trying to achieve greater uniformity throughout the country with regard to this issue. This is a win–win scenario for workers and employers. We all stand to gain through increased efficiency and savings resulting from a reduction in overlap.

To further this initiative we are conducting two pilot projects. One is aimed at harmonizing the provisions of the Canada occupational safety and health regulations dealing with diving and confined spaces, while the other involves the field of ergonomics.

I have already mentioned the review of part I of the Canada Labour Code, but we also are planning to revise parts II and III. In co–operation with our various partners we are seeking to modernize the code to better reflect the requirements of today's labour environment. Consultations are under way and labour and management have approached the revision process with energy and enthusiasm.

Like all government organizations, the labour branch is reviewing all of its activities and methods. This review will help us to pinpoint more ways to increase both the quality and cost effectiveness of the programs and services we deliver to Canadians.

The labour program also has international obligations. The adoption of the North American agreement on labour co–operation led to the establishment of a relatively new component within the program. The agreement is aimed at promoting co–operation and guaranteeing effective enforcement of labour legislation by Canada, the United States and Mexico. The labour branch opened a national office to implement the agreement in Canada not too long ago. This is welcome news.

I am providing members with a sampling of the many activities currently carried out by the labour branch. These examples show that restructuring has in no way impeded the work of the branch. In fact, it has energized it. Since integration, the labour branch is vital, invigorated, and better able than ever before to make a strong contribution to the lives of working Canadians. Its integration within the Department of Human Resources Development ensures a healthy continuity and an integrated use of the resources available to promote the economic and social well–being of Canadians. In my mind, integration makes a lot of sense. It is not just some arbitrary measure, but a decision made necessary by the times in which we live.

The work of the labour branch cannot be done in isolation from considerations involving Canadians who are on unemployment insurance and employment programs. The challenge is to harmonize and co–ordinate all of our federal programs dealing with human resources. To meet that challenge we are guided by a logical and coherent vision.

The bill before us offers the best of both worlds. It entrenches the powers and responsibilities of a full fledged Minister of Labour while at the same time placing the labour branch within a broader context, producing definite benefits for the government and for all Canadians.

Without hesitation I ask my hon. colleagues to support this important piece of legislation, which confirms what already exists: a very good and solid labour department in this country, which has done an exceptionally good job up to now as far as the rest of the world and Canada are concerned.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the hon. member, who is an expert in labour relations and who knows a great deal about the human resources issue. We all acknowledge the great expertise of the member in these sectors.

• (1050)

Earlier today, we heard a Bloc member claim that this bill would give new powers to the federal government, that it was a centralizing instrument used by the government, or some nonsense to that effect.

Could the hon. member tell us if it is true that the bill gives new powers to the federal government? Is it not a consolidation of existing laws on the sharing of powers between the two ministers responsible for human resources, namely the Minister of Human Resources Development and the Minister of Labour? Is it not true that the bill does not give any new power, does not centralize anything, and that, once again, the Bloc Quebecois' claims have little to do with reality?

[English]

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question.

In the last couple of days I have had the opportunity to listen to the Bloc on this bill. I have to admit I am saddened that members opposite have continued to make suggestions to their constituents that are factually incorrect.

If we look at what the Department of Labour is doing, it is just the opposite of what is being said by the members of the Bloc Quebecois. Let me give an example. As I mentioned in my speech, under health and safety we are going to be devolving powers and co–operating with the provinces. We have already entered into an agreement with Quebec to harmonize the way we deal with health and safety as it relates to federal and provincial jurisdictions. In essence, we have done what the Bloc is arguing we have not done, which is to decentralize to a certain extent the powers of the federal government under labour to the provinces to deal with certain areas like health and safety.

I do not know why the members opposite continue to do this. Sooner or later someone in Quebec will start paying closer attention to what is going on in the House and start picking up the bills and reading them, only to find out that they are being misrepresented by these individual members across the way.

Anyone who has been around as long as you and I have been, Mr. Speaker, will know that most people pay very close attention to what takes place in their country as it relates to the laws. These laws we are passing, which the opposition continues to suggest go in a totally opposite direction—that they are new powers and we are going to be stepping all over the provinces—sooner or later will show that we are working very hard to co–operate and do just the opposite.

I want to give the Bloc a challenge in my final comments. I would like the members to change their approach of trying to get Quebecers not to like Canada. If Quebecers are to leave they should leave for other reasons than the fact that the federal government is not trying to do a good job. Quite frankly, that is the furthest from the truth I have ever seen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It certainly would not be for me to debate with the hon. parliamentary secretary as to how long we have been here, but in light of the fact that a few days ago we marked the 30th anniversary of the members for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke and Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, I submit that we have not been here all that long.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to this debate now for a couple of days. I have heard how much things are going to change for the better in our social programs and so on. After almost three decades of overspending by Liberal and Conservative governments, we have amassed $565 billion in debt; that is 565 thousand million dollars. In the last two years this government has overspent its income by approximately $80 billion, adding to that debt.

The Canada pension plan has in it about two years' worth of payouts, about $40 billion, all invested in low yield provincial bonds. The fund, if pensioners were to be fully paid out, would have to have about $550 billion in it, which it does not. It is another liability over and above the $565 billion we owe in operating costs.

If the government is to look at social programming and improve the Canada pension plan, for instance, how will it do that with the burden of a $565 billion debt, a liability in the Canada pension plan and a deliberate plan of overspending? How will it happen without the government coming to the conclusion that something must change, perhaps even looking at premium increases and benefit reductions? Is that what the government will do? How will it get around being held accountable, like the last group that was over there?

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, since I know Reform Party members a little better than I know Bloc members, because I have to deal with them on a regular basis in my neighbourhood, I will tell the House what impresses and intrigues me the most about them. They came to the House with a particular focus and a promise they made to their constituents. I was in one of those ridings where they made that promise. They were going to be different. I frankly found that they were quite different. They were the most partisan group I have ever met in my life.

One of the questions posed to us during the last election campaign was why not become more like those Reformers, who are non–politicians, who will ask questions of substance. I will see if I can answer the question.

The member and his party have been spinning this scenario that the world is coming to an end in Canada and it is all going to fall apart unless we go as far to the right as we can, that everybody in Canada has to start paying massive user fees, including the seniors and the poor, because we cannot afford to tax anybody any more and our debt is so bad that we are going to sink under this big huge debt and some other country will have to bail us out.

We all know that is not true. I will try to explain this to the members across the way. I had the opportunity to sit on the committee that reviewed the pension plan with actuaries. Under the legislation we have to review this every five years. I spent some time looking at how we were to restructure it. During that time, with all the experts in front of us, never did one of them say this program would collapse under a particular problem of liability and having no money.

The problem with the individual across the way is he does not want to hear the truth about how the program works. These individuals across the way have no program or suggestions on how to run Canada. Their doom and gloom scenario, as with Klein and others, is to cut the government adrift, get rid of the government and let some right–wing business corporate elite look after it so they will not have to.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): It is okay, be happy, you have your pension.

Mr. Nault: Yes, I have my pension. Quite frankly, I am proud that I have earned it. I will be here for a long time before I get to collect it. At least I pay tax. A lot of the boys across the way do not pay any tax. There is an individual there from Ontario, our multi–millionaire friend, who does not pay any tax.

If this regional fringe party can articulate its vision of Canada and get higher than 10 per cent in the polls, then maybe we will start to look at some of its ideas. To date it is so far down that no one in the country is taking it seriously, including the people in my riding.

The Speaker: It being 11 a.m., we will now proceed to Statements by Members.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

WOODSTOCK MEMORIAL FOREST

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, recently I attended a special event in my riding, the second annual memorial service held outdoors at the Woodstock Memorial Forest. Over 300 people attended.

This memorial forest was established by the city of Woodstock, the Upper Thames River Conservation Authority and a local funeral home. Twenty–three acres of conservation authority land has been set aside for the forest. The trees planted are chosen from original Carolinian species indigenous to our region. Each tree commemorates the life of a citizen who has died.

The Woodstock Memorial Forest was started in recognition of the depletion of the earth's forests. Trees provide shelter for wildlife, control soil erosion, provide shade, remove carbon dioxide and provide oxygen. The beauty and grace of these trees enhance our environment and stand as living memorials to the memory of our loved ones.

I suggest my colleagues encourage such forests in their ridings.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux–Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will celebrate Remembrance Day. Over 100,000 young Canadians and Quebecers gave their lives during the two world conflicts, and hundreds more died in Korea and in various peacekeeping missions.

Such is the price that we have had to pay for of our strong belief in the values of democracy and peace. And it is because they also shared these values that our young soldiers fought all over the world.

We remember the sacrifices and the self–abnegation of those to whom we owe this legacy of freedom and democracy. Again, we want to pay tribute and express our gratitude to those who gave their lives, as well as to those who were prepared to do so for such a noble cause.

Let us honour their memory.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow Canadians will stop to remember those who served and those who died in the world wars and the Korean war as well as the peacekeepers who have served on United Nations missions since 1947 and the many Canadian forces' members who over the years have given their lives in service to our country.

The spirit and sacrifice of these men and women have been dedicated to preserve the freedom and peace we cherish today. None gave their lives willingly yet all voluntarily put themselves in danger.

In remembering, let us be mindful of the political turmoil and circumstances which led to conflict and be attentive to our responsibility to learn and profit from that history. The wreathes laid at the National War Memorial and others across our nation must cause us to remember so that those lives were not given in vain.

As we pay tribute to the men and women of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army, the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Merchant Marine, let us remember that without freedom there can be no enduring peace and without peace no enduring freedom.

MRS. HILDA SIMANAVICIUS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise today in the House of Commons to pay tribute to an outstanding member of my constituency of Parkdale—High Park.

Mrs. Hilda Simanavicius has recently returned from Lithuania where she was involved in a program to improve the management and administration facilities of a consulting service within this eastern European country. Mrs. Simanavicius' initiatives were in conjunction with the Canadian Executive Services Organization known as CESO and the Canadian Volunteer Advisers to Business.

This organization provides advisers to businesses in emerging economies in central and eastern Europe, often with the help of volunteer Canadian men and women who are enthusiastic about sharing their knowledge with others who are in need.

I would like to thank Mrs. Simanavicius and other Canadian volunteers from CESO who are working to improve economic markets and the quality of life of others around the world. Hers is a shining example of the goodwill and benevolence for which Canadians have come to be recognized.

MR. PHILIP MCKENZIE

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate Mr. Philip McKenzie, a constituent from my riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury who was one of three young Canadians selected to attend the World Energy Congress in Tokyo a few weeks ago.

His paper entitled "Nuclear Energy: A Green Option" was selected to be presented at the Youth Energy Symposium. Philip is a student of the department of chemical engineering at the University of New Brunswick. It is heartening to see his hard work and commitment being internationally recognized.

The work of talented young individuals such as Philip McKenzie is leading Canada into the 21st century.

• (1105)

Once again I want to congratulate him on an outstanding accomplishment.

ALCAN CABLE LAPOINTE PLANT

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to bring to the attention of the House that Alcan Cable's Lapointe plant in Jonquière, Quebec earned this year's Canada award for business excellence in the category manufacturing—quality, small business. The Lapointe plant, constructed in the 1970s, is one of seven Alcan Cable plants in North America.

In 1990, Alcan Cable made a commitment to quality by defining a new business mission, with the objective of becoming a world class manufacturer within four years. In their determination to meet that objective, the management and employees of the Lapointe plant spared no effort to indeed become an international class company. Alcan Cable's Lapointe plant in Jonquière is a shining example of the success any business can have if it sets its path resolutely toward quality.

HEALTH CARE

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canada's blood supply system is in a state of crisis.

Day after day, testimony before the Krever commission reveals a tale of bureaucratic bungling and government inaction that has compromised Canadians' health by exposing them to such diseases as HIV, AIDS and hepatitis–C. Credibility and trust in our health care system has been severely compromised.

What has the government done to restore credibility to our blood system? The minister recently declared that our blood system is as safe as any other in the world, yet Canadians know it is not good enough.

Handing over another $3.3 million to the commission is not the answer. Doubling the budget of the Bureau of Biologics is not the answer. It was this bureau that originally was part of the tragic bungling.

The answer Canadians want is not more study, but decisive action and leadership now.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq, Lib.):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, in late October the original voices of Canada spoke resoundingly: the Cree, the Inuit and the Montagnais. We are proud of who we are, what we have accomplished and what we can become.

At the unity rally in Montreal, northerners were there in support of the no forces. Aboriginal and non–aboriginal, we live in many different languages and cultures in the north, but we share many values and strengths. Our experience tells us this land is big and great enough for us all.

I urge the nation to acknowledge that the aboriginal people delivered when called on to support the country. We can and must be included in the changes that need to be made.

Together with open hearts, let us build an even greater nation from sea to sea to sea.

INTERCULTURAL WEEK

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today marks the start in Quebec of intercultural week, this year organized around the theme of "Living together". This will afford us a new opportunity to forge solid links between Quebecers of all origins, and to encourage understanding, dialogue and rapprochement. This year, the emphasis of intercultural week will be on Quebecers' belonging to a common culture, and on making Quebec, its history and its culture better known, as well as the important contribution the cultural communities have made to its development.

Numerous community groups, schools, businesses, private and public organizations and agencies are involved in organizing hundreds of big and small events throughout Quebec. On behalf of the Bloc Quebecois, I would like to wish all of them an enriching intercultural week of exchanges and discoveries.

LEADER OF THE BLOC QUEBECOIS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, who said he had not concluded that so many hospitals would inevitably be closed and that the decision to close them had to be based on the assurance of better health care? Who said that proof of this had to be provided and that he had his own ideas, which he would express at some point? It was the leader of the Bloc Quebecois, offering advice to his provincial counterpart.

However, the Quebec health minister did not wait to find out the Bloc leader's personal opinion on the matter. He closed five hospitals in Montreal alone. The fine social democrat promises of the PQ and the BQ did not survive the referendum. People have just discovered that the PQ government and the separatists do not want to invest in hospitals. They prefer investing in referendums. Yes, separatists can indeed close hospitals.

THE LATE HANS DAIGELER

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Ottawa–Carleton suffered a terrible loss with the death of Mr. Hans Daigeler who died at the age of 50.

I had the opportunity of meeting Hans on several occasions and found him to be a caring, compassionate man. During his seven years as MPP for Nepean he brought integrity and dedication to his role. Hans was well known in Queen's Park and within the Liberal caucus. He brought a refreshing honesty to politics, was never afraid to speak the truth and was an unabashed supporter of the city of Nepean and its people.

On behalf of my colleague, the federal member for Nepean, who is stricken with grief this morning, and on behalf of the national capital region, may I offer my condolences to Hans' family, friends, relatives and neighbours. He will be missed.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers and Canadians continue to believe profoundly in promoting democratic values and in protecting fundamental rights. We all deplore the violation of these rights by the Nigerian military junta, and were shocked by last week's announcement of the impending execution of nine dissidents.

The official opposition calls on the Government of Canada to put pressure on the Nigerian authorities to stop all violation of fundamental rights. Canada must take the lead and use the occasion of the meeting of the Commonwealth countries to raise this matter and promote respect for human rights, as it did in the 1980s in the case of South Africa.

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Ontario's highest court ordered the release of Robert Owen Ross Currie. Mr. Currie had been jailed indefinitely as a dangerous offender. Mr. Currie has a long history of sexual assault. He was convicted of rape, possession of a dangerous weapon and two counts of indecent assault. The court declared Mr. Currie's indefinite sentence a form of unjust punishment.

Canadians have lost faith. They have lost faith in the justice system because it is releasing dangerous offenders into society. Canadians are frightened. They are frightened because the bleeding heart mentality that prevails within our courts and our parole systems are turning dangerous sexual offenders free to prey on more innocent people.

For the first time in Canadian history, a dangerous offender status was revoked. The courts have just fallen over the edge of a slippery slope. Who will be next, Clifford Olson or Paul Bernardo? And what is the Minister of Justice doing about it?

TRIBUTE TO SERGEANT ARTHUR BOUCHER

Mr. Denis Paradis (Brome—Missisquoi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, all across Canada, we will be celebrating Remembrance Day. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to sergeant Arthur Boucher, who lived in the village of Magog until his death.

Heroism, courage, dedication, honour, such are the words which come to mind when thinking of sergeant Arthur Boucher. His sacrifice must not have been in vain.

Similarly, the referendum which took place in Quebec 10 days ago will not be in vain. We can draw three main lessons from it, as stated by the MLA for Brome—Missisquoi who said: "that, first, we can never take our country for granted; second, patriotism must be practised and taught daily; third, Quebecers want the federal system to change, and fast".

Together, we can do it.

EDUCATION

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this year marks the 10th anniversary of International Year of the Youth.

We are in the midst of dramatic change. Statistics show us that 45 per cent of all new jobs created between 1990 and the year 2000 will require more than 16 years of training and education. Never before have education and training played such a vital role in the future of our youth.

In order to face this challenge head on, the government introduced the youth employment and learning strategy. This strategy is the cumulative result of many years of consultation, policy development and town hall meetings with Canadians from coast to coast to cast.

Key elements of this strategy include youth service Canada and youth internship program. Youth service Canada gives young people an opportunity to develop skills and confidence while serving their community. The youth internship program provides a combination of on the job and in class training.

• (1115)

To date these programs have given over 30,000 young Canadians a head start on their career path. This Liberal government recognizes that our youth is a very important resource and as such should be treated as a top priority. That is why this year during a time of fiscal restraint, the overall budget for youth employment services was increased by—

GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it has been two years since Canada elected a majority government. Let us take a reality check and see how well it has done.

The government has borrowed over $80 billion by overspending and has increased the debt to $560 billion. Crime has expanded, is unchecked and even encouraged by useless federal legislation. Liberal friends and party hacks have been given federal jobs and Senate positions for life. Liberals gorge themselves on the MP pension plan gravy train. Immigration and Refugee Boards dominate the ministry. Ministers are not held accountable.

Sick yet? Most of us are. Add on an ethics counsellor whose job is a joke, inept ministers and prisoners who run the prisons. That is enough to make me sick.

I ask you: Are we well served by this government? No. No. No.

The Speaker: We are going to put that member down as a doubtful admirer.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

COMMITTEE CHAIRED BY AGRICULTURE MINISTER

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since it was unable to deliver the changes it promised Quebecers during the referendum campaign, the government has resorted to an old federal standby: creating committees.

Ottawa has made a big thing of the phoney committee chaired by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, but kept quiet about another committee which will be chaired by the minister of agriculture. Discreet though it may be, this shadow committee is supposed to prompt the federal government on basic directions for change in Canada.

My question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. By establishing two committees, one supposedly to respond to Quebecers' desire for change and one to discuss the division of powers, does the government intend to keep sending two messages on the constitution, one to Quebec and one to the rest of Canada, as it has done for more than two years?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is high time the official opposition realized we are in the business of governing Canada and that when problems arise with respect to unity and economic issues, we will appoint groups of ministers to make a thorough analysis of the options for dealing with these problems.

This should come as no surprise. It is what any good government would do, and that being the case, I am not surprised the official opposition fails to understand what we are doing.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, at least there is more of an inclination to be frank this morning. We are told there are problems with unity. There was no problem for the past two years. The constitution was not an issue. We had some flamboyant speeches in this House, which was not the case before. The economy used to be fine, but this morning it is a real problem. They are aware of that.

When we realize that the shadow committee of the minister of agriculture will consider the division of powers and that, unlike the other committee, the most influential ministers from Quebec will sit on this committee, will the Prime Minister finally admit that the phoney committee of the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, which is supposed to respond to Quebecers' desire for change, is just a lot of window dressing?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again, your typical example of a phoney committee is the regional commissions that were set up in Quebec by the Parti Quebecois, with the co–operation of the Bloc Quebecois. They were phoney committees that never accomplished a thing.

In this case, it is entirely normal and appropriate that we should examine and try to solve the problems that exist in Canada today. At least we are trying to provide good government. In fact, all the players in Quebec, including Mario Dumont and the Conseil du patronat du Québec, have told the Quebec government it is time to deal with the real problems: jobs, unemployment and investment. That is what we are doing through the committee chaired by the minister of agriculture.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, actually, I want to thank the minister because the more he talks, the more he strengthens the sovereignist cause in Quebec.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister, although he was halfway around the world, managed to set the record straight. We know the phoney committee chaired by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs will accomplish very little since, as the Prime Minister said, they do not intend to tinker with the constitution to satisfy Quebec.

That being said, and since we cannot expect to deal with Canada's problems without dealing with Quebec, does the Acting Prime Minister not realize that the shadow committee of the minister of agriculture is also doomed to fail?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that is a good example of a phoney question, one that has no substance and does not make sense.

First of all, in the Outaouais, in the five Outaouais ridings, the no side received 72.6 per cent of the votes, more than in any region in Quebec. This was more than in 1980.

So obviously, the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie does not know what he is talking about when he indicates the influence we can have on what Quebecers have decided, which is to stay in Canada.

Furthermore, if the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie thinks economic issues are not important enough to warrant consideration, he is abdicating the basic responsibility of the official opposition, which is to protect the interests of Canadians and Quebecers at a time when the majority of Canadians and Quebecers want to see a solution to these economic problems.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

While travelling in New Zealand yesterday, the Prime Minister claimed that his government's main concern is to deal with what he calls "the real problems of Canadians". Yet, federal ministers are unable to name a single major legislative measure taken by their government, simply because there has not been any. Instead of taking action, they are creating yet another committee.

Here is my question. While Canadians are faced with a growing poverty problem as the federal government keeps postponing reforms that will supposedly put the unemployed back to work, how can the government claim that setting up another ministerial committee will meet the real economic needs of Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, jobs and growth have always been central to this government's agenda.

It is very important to note that in the first two years of our administration, from the fall of 1993 until the fall of 1995, economic circumstances have been created in Canada whereby 500,000 new jobs have been created for Canadians. At the same time, the unemployment rate in the country has dropped below 10 per cent, the lowest level in a long time.

That is good progress in the first two years of our administration. It is still not enough progress from our point of view. We want to work very hard to accelerate job growth and to reduce unemployment. All members of the government, in cabinet and in caucus, will be sparing absolutely no effort to achieve that larger objective.

[Translation]

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what the minister is saying is that while they were creating jobs in the rest of Canada, Quebec was becoming the poorest province in Canada with its unemployed workers and its people living below the poverty line.

Can the Acting Prime Minister tell us—

Mr. Massé: It is because of the Parti Quebecois.

Mr. Robichaud: Stop talking about separation.

The Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Joliette.

• (1125)

Mr. Laurin: Mr. Speaker, I realize it is not important for the party in power to listen to the question because their answers never make sense.

Can the Acting Prime Minister tell us what concrete and substantial legislative measures his government has taken since the referendum to tackle what he calls the real problems of Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that the intervening period from the date of the referendum to now has only been a matter of a few days. The member should take into account the record of performance prior to the referendum date. It includes a broad range of initiatives, probably longer than you would allow me to answer during the course of question period, Mr. Speaker.

I can think of such things as the Canada infrastructure works program which has been an enormous success from coast to coast to coast. There are the internship programs for Canadian youth, the Canadian Youth Service Corps. There is also the successful battle against the deficit. Not only have we met but we have exceeded every single one of our deficit targets which builds confidence in the Canadian economy. There is also a large list of measures for small business where 85 per cent of Canadian new jobs come from.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it has been a heck of a week. We have had the official disloyal opposition acting—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the word disloyal.

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the word disloyal. It has been a heck of a week. We have had members of the official opposition acting like spoiled brats in not recognizing the results of the referendum which they lost. Now we have the government members who do not know why they won striking up the divine nine committee. We have a Prime Minister who wants Copps out of the House.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Silye: In the meantime, this week we have been busy meeting with the governor of the Bank of Canada and with 10 of this country's leading economists which prompts my first question.

I believe that the size of our federal debt is $567,902,132,500.57. Would the finance minister please confirm to this House what the size of our federal debt is?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the member's estimate of our national debt is within a couple of pennies.

The problem is not only the size of the national debt, but that as a nation over the course of the last decade we did not face up to the fundamental problems of job creation, the preservation of our social programs and the preservation of the social fabric of this country. What is crucial is that we continue the course that has been set by this government. We must deal with the fundamental problems so that a subsequent government does not have to stand up and admit to the kind of heritage the member just described.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the problem is the debt. That is this country's major problem. The soft targets this finance minister has set are not solving the problem. He should get serious and set some targets that really mean something, such as a zero deficit within the time frame of his mandate.

I know the finance minister has heard what many of the economists said yesterday when they were looking at forecasts into the future. If the minister were to listen to the advice of these leading economists he would recognize that the track he is taking this country down is not good enough. There is a demand by taxpayers to solve our problem quicker. It is better to err on the side of quickness than to err on the side of slowness.

Why does this finance minister not commit his department and his government to a clearly defined program of when we will get to see a zero deficit?

• (1130)

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there has never been a better expression of the difference that exists between the Reform Party and the government than the one just expressed by the member.

He said that the end of government was to reduce the deficit, that the purpose of government was to make itself smaller. That is not true. The purpose of government is to make itself smarter. The purpose in reducing the deficit is to help in job creation. The fundamental role of the country is to give its citizens a better future.

Yes, we have done a great deal to reduce the deficit. We will continue to reduce the deficit and we will balance the budget, but that is not the end of this society. The purpose of society is to give citizens a better standard of living, to give children a better chance and to make sure we take children out of poverty. That is what we will do.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the finance minister talks about making things better for Canada. He talks about how he will improve things for Canada. From when he came into power until when he leaves power overall spending will be the same, if not higher. He is not solving the problem. He is adding to the problem.

The problem is the debt. The solution is to get to a zero deficit so that we do not add to it. Whether it is over three years, two years or whatever, that is the objective.

The Speaker: I know the member will ask his question right now.

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, for the good of the country and for the good of the financial community, will the finance minister quit playing politics with the deficit, come clean with Canadians and present a balanced budget before he goes to the electorate in the next election?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as set out in the last budget, program spending by the government by 1996–97 will be at its lowest level as a percentage of our gross domestic product since 1951. We will be the only government of the G–7 that will have put into place an absolute reduction in its expenditures.

The minister of agriculture has just listed what we have done in terms of job creation which is fundamental. If our only objective is to reduce the deficit, the fastest way to do it is to put Canadians back to work. The minister of agriculture has just set out what we have done.

We will reduce the deficit. Let there be no doubt about that. However we will do it in a balanced way, one that does not harm the Canadian economy, one that gives our children a chance.

If we want anything different, we can take a look at the budget set out by members of the Reform Party this year: scorch and burn, demolish the country. They are so ashamed of it that ever since it came out they have refused to bring it forth and talk about it because they know it was a dud.

PURCHASE OF HELICOPTERS

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the defence minister. Yesterday, the minister quoted, in support of his decision to buy new search and rescue helicopters, an analysis published in Le Devoir. Had he read it through, he would have learned that Quebec was the biggest loser in the cancellation of the EH–101 contract.

Given that the Canadian aerospace industry is mainly based in the Montreal area, that Quebec is far from getting its fair share of defence spending and that the minister did not hesitate to award without tender to Ontario a $2 billion contract for armoured personnel carriers, how can he explain the fact that there is no Canadian content requirement in the new contract? How can he justify that?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member forgets that, a few years ago, the previous government awarded a contract worth more than $1 billion to Bell Helicopter, in Mirabel, to build helicopters for the Canadian army. This was a major contract for 100 helicopters. But that is something he failed to mention in the House.

[English]

Quebec has a large part of the aerospace industry. Bell Helicopter has received the world product mandate for the construction of certain types of helicopters it is now delivering to the Canadian army. It was because of the government's decision—perhaps this is one of the few things the previous government did correctly—that Bell Helicopter company was able to get the world product mandate and bring jobs to Canada, to Quebec, for the making of these helicopters to serve Bell's worldwide market.

• (1135)

The hon. member conveniently forgets that, when he criticizes the announcement I made on Wednesday.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister is like a propeller, we never know which way he will turn. Does he not realize that, by refusing to include a Canadian content requirement in this contract, he is not only compromising our businesses' chances of securing the contract but also completely ignoring the policy on managing major crown projects, namely projects in excess of $100 million, which clearly requires him to give top priority to industrial and regional development?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have stated as government policy that we will get the best deal for Canadian taxpayers. Where possible, we will buy off the shelf, and we have done that.

As I said the other day, the hon. member and his party do not have much confidence in Quebec companies, many of them world class, that will easily be able to compete and offer their services to provide components for these helicopters. He does not have faith in their own industries in Quebec. That is shameful.

FINANCE

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance basically released his annual financial report. On page 2 of that report the minister acknowledged that he massaged the personal income tax collection figures for the previous year to take $3 billion out of revenue in 1994.

Using the real figures, will the Minister of Finance acknowledge that the 1994 deficit was only $39 billion and that the 1995 deficit is exactly $38.7 billion, which means that the deficit has not come down hardly at all?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the accounting principles we followed in reporting the state of the government's finances have been consistent and are ones determined by the auditor general.

If the hon. member is accusing the auditor general of massaging the numbers, I would suspect he should do so in another forum. Even if one accepts the premise of the member's question, which is obviously false, one would have to ask him to apply the same principles from one year to the next and he would find that his question does not stand up.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was quoting from the report of the Minister of Finance that there were some changes and some fixing of the numbers in 1994.

While we listen to the daily drivel of the government of how it cuts costs and is trying to create jobs, using his actual numbers tax collections were up $7.3 billion and the deficit has only come down by $4.5 billion.

Therefore would he acknowledge that he is reducing the deficit on the backs of taxpayers, not by cutting spending, and that increased taxation kills jobs? It does not create jobs as he talked about earlier today.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member did not quote my words. He quoted his own words. He would have been better off to have quoted mine.

First, we follow the accounting principles established by the auditor general. Second, the member will understand the basic problem of the country is compound interest. While our spending may well go down in terms of programs, our interest costs continue to rise. That is the basic nut we have to deal with.

Over the course of the last two years we have engaged in more deficit reduction than any government, certainly over the course of the last decade. We have hit our targets and we will continue to hit our targets.

It may reflect Reform Party policy but he should not say that paying attention to job creation and job creation policies are drivel, because that is what Canadians want their government to do.

AGUSTA

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the government announced that it had reached a settlement to compensate the Italian company Agusta, following the cancellation of the contract for the EH–101 helicopters. No details will be made public until several months, but we know that this settlement will cost several hundred million dollars. Agusta, it must be remembered, is currently facing bribe and corruption charges in Europe.

• (1140)

My question is for the Minister of National Defence. While the terms of the settlement reached between the government and Agusta are not yet known, and given that the inquiry called for by the Liberals when they formed the opposition never took place, how can the government explain that Agusta is still being considered for the new helicopter contract?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was quite right in saying that an agreement in principle had been reached between the Government of Canada and the company to which she referred. Unfortunately the hon. member went on to make an assumption which has yet to be realized. The Minister of National Defence has yet to give to the Department of Public Works and Government Services a request for a proposal.

We do not know who in the world might be submitting bids for various procurement initiatives of the Government of Canada. How the hon. member could stretch an agreement on termination costs with a particular company into saying that it will now be somehow successful in some subsequent bid is beyond the realm of reality.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, that answer has nothing to do with the question. My question was on the second contract, but the minister keeps referring to the first one. Will we have to make a video for the minister to understand the question?

Let me put it again. Since Agusta is at the centre of a huge scandal in Belgium, how can the minister justify that, without any inquiry on the circumstances surrounding the signing of the EH–101 contract, he will pay Agusta hundreds of millions in compensation, without telling us whether he intends to exclude that company as a bidder for the new helicopter contract? That is my question to the minister.

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to receive the video at any time. Perhaps she might want to have Canada Post deliver it.

The Government of Canada, as I am sure any reasonable individual would understand, had a binding contract with the company in question. We made a decision upon coming to office about the termination of the contract. There are termination costs the Government of Canada will have to provide in accordance with the contract. We will live up to the contract obligations and we hope to be able to provide that information in due course.

However the hon. member cannot jump from that resolution into thinking that automatically the company to which she refers may have some upper hand with regard to possible procurements of the Government of Canada.

CANADA POST

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Minister of Finance that job creation and putting Canadians back to work are not drivel. The brother–in–law of the head of Canada Post is about to be awarded an untendered $300 million contract and get an extension on another to the year 2002, and the minister responsible does nothing about it.

If the minister of public works again alleges there is nothing wrong here, would he assure the House that the contract will be investigated as part of the much anticipated review of Canada Post?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member once again likes to roll around in the mud. It is pretty sad when we informed his colleague who raised the issue at a previous time that the suggestion the hon. member was making was incorrect.

A letter I have, which I would be pleased to table for the benefit of the House, says:

> Canada Post has completed their evaluation of your proposal dated July 28, 1995 for the sale and leaseback of community mailboxes. Our evaluation has concluded that the financing cost does not meet Canada Post Corporation's requirements.

I do not know what the hon. member is talking about.

• (1145)

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister seldom does know what I am talking about.

I talked a lot about patronage and about rolling around in the mud and the slime. We only have to go as far as Sydney, Nova Scotia, to see what is going on at the tar ponds in the middle of the member's riding.

The federal conflict of interest code is being blatantly ignored over and over and this minister does nothing about it. Two senior executives in public works dole out federal money to their relatives, get caught in the act, and again the minister does nothing.

How does the minister of public works expect to clean up nepotism at Canada Post when he continues to allow his public works employees to give out money to their wives and nephews without even going through the pretence of tendering?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows a lot about stench. He knows a heck of a lot about it. He makes allegations continuously in the House.

He refers to the tar ponds, which are not even in my constituency. I hope he will get his facts correct.

With regard to the specific allegations he raises, I hope the hon. member would clearly understand that ministers of the crown do not have the authority to deal with public servants within their own departments. That is a responsibility of the respective deputy ministers of each of our departments. That is codified by law.

My deputy minister responsible for public works and government services has this particular issue in hand and he is dealing with it in the most appropriate way.

FOREST INDUSTRY

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for regional development in Quebec.

The minister responsible for regional development in Quebec is now contributing to the loss of jobs in the forest industry in Quebec since Ottawa decided unilaterally to withdraw from that sector and he refuses to grant the $80 million requested by the industry.

By refusing that compensation to forest workers in Quebec, as he did recently in the case of farm producers in Western Canada where the federal government withdrew from the grain transportation sector, is the minister not applying double standards and being unfair to Quebec?

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this issue has been discussed over a number of years. The previous government is the one that cancelled those programs for forestry agreements. We have continued to try to extend that to give the woodlot owners an opportunity to adjust to the change. Last year the plan was extended for a further year and it does not expire until March 1996. The woodlot owners have been given lots of notice and lots of compensation in order to adjust.

[Translation]

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister recognize that when he refuses to react positively to the claims of 170,000 stakeholders of the forest industry, he simply confirms the fears of Quebecers who thought that after a no to the referendum, the federal government would also say no to all of their requests?

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it passing strange that the member would be asking for compensation on the one hand and at the same time saying that it is a responsibility of the provincial government. So let the provincial government do its job.

CANADA POST

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it very disturbing that pornographic and sexually explicit advertisements were delivered to several thousand households in western Atlantic Canada. This unsolicited and unaddressed material could easily be opened by children.

How does the minister responsible for Canada Post intend to prevent this disgusting material from reaching people in my constituency of York—Simcoe and other Canadians?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question.

I too find the material in question very objectionable. The president of Canada Post Corporation has issued a directive that it will not be delivering in the future any of this unaddressed material. Yesterday we were able to preclude the forwarding through the mails of some 40,000 pieces in St. John's, Newfoundland.

There is another issue, however, the addressed pornographic mail. I have conferred with my colleague, the Minister of Justice, and we are hoping to combine our forces with a task force to look at ways we can address that issue in terms of either amendments to various statutes or other remedies. We want to get a remedy that will be effective and will not be challenged by the courts or by any of those companies that wish to distribute that pornographic material.

BLOOD SUPPLY

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Krever inquiry has done a pretty good job of pointing out flaws in our blood system. Our health minister's reaction is like a deer in the headlights. The time for dithering is over.

Can the parliamentary secretary maybe give the health minister a little nudge so we can have a little more accountability in our blood system?

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer that question, but it is really rather sad that such an important subject as blood should be dealt with in such a flippant manner.

The Krever inquiry has been set up to look at the safety of blood in the 1980s. That report has not yet come down. Mr. Krever has had an audit done on safety so far, which has shown that the blood system in Canada is as safe as any system of blood can be in any other part of the world. The hon. member, as a physician, should know that there is not 100 per cent safety in any issue that has to do with pathogens or biotechnology.

We in health are not waiting for the Krever inquiry to come out with its recommendations. We have already begun. We have doubled the number of inspectors for blood in this country. We have started annual inspections, which was never done before. We have implemented at least 10 measures, which are too long for me to respond to right now, that will enhance safety before the Krever inquiry even comes out with its recommendations.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister simply says that our blood system is fine. The report says the system is confusing, has poor accountability, is frozen in the past. If hers is not a flippant response, I do not know what is.

Maybe it takes a hip check for the health minister. Will the parliamentary secretary ask the minister to at least clarify the lines of authority so that we do not have confusion in our blood system?

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not only the Minister of Health who said the system is safe; it actually came out of Mr. Krever himself. Those are his words on his safety audit.

I believe the hon. member is speaking about another audit. All these audits are tools the Krever commission is using to come up with its final report.

At the moment the Krever commission is looking at management issues, which is appropriate to do. We are waiting for that report to come out. When it does, we will look at it and take the appropriate steps, as we always do.

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The Minister of Health said last Wednesday in the House, and I quote: "—we have not waited for Justice Krever's report before taking steps to make the system safer".

How, then, can the minister explain that the report prepared recently for commissioner Krever deplored the same major deficiencies as those identified by the expert committee report a year ago?

• (1155)

[English]

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the safety of blood and with regard to what the Krever inquiry has suggested so far, we have responded to Justice Krever's interim report and have acted on every recommendation within our jurisdiction. Unfortunately we cannot react on recommendations that have nothing to do with our jurisdiction. I will list these. I spoke to them earlier, but maybe what I need to do is list them.

We have increased resources in the area of blood regulation. We have increased the frequency of inspections and improved the way we do them, making them on a yearly basis. We have enhanced the way we do inspections, requiring now a written report at the end of the inspection. We have introduced an exit notice that clearly sets out our observations and requirements for corrective action. We have established an independent advisory committee on blood regulation to provide us with advice on a range of issues, and so on.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Can the minister then explain how it is that a recent study by Dr. Robert Rémis, who was an important witness before the Commission, shows that Canada has one of the worst records among industrialized countries for the safety of blood products?

[English]

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is up to the Ministry of Health to respond to the witnesses who present to the Krever commission. It is up to us to respond to what the Krever commission itself says.

The Krever commission has, I repeat, said that the safety of the blood system in Canada is as safe as any blood system in the world can ever hope to be.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Senate committee studying Bill C–68 has passed a motion asking the Minister of Justice to "document or conduct such consultations as contemplated in section 35 of the Constitution and laid out in the Sparrow case, and various agreements such as those with the Yukon First Nations and the Cree, and inform the Senate committee that the Constitutional requirements are not violated".

I ask the Minister of Justice, will he comply with the senators' request?

The Speaker: Order. This question is before the other house. However, because it deals with the hon. minister, if he wishes I will permit him to answer the question.

The hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that is a first for this minister.

During the hearings of the other place on this bill a question was raised. I will ask the minister if he wishes to respond to this question. The question was why is the House passing legislation that is not constitutionally sound.

I ask the minister, why was Bill C–68 rammed through without the constitutionality of the bill being assured?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and his party are not in a position to say they are the champions of aboriginal rights in this country. When they see in this issue an opportunity to attack Bill C–68 they take it.

For the many months the bill was before the House committee, of which the hon. member formed a part, it was examined in great detail. There were both legal and constitutional witnesses before the committee. It was established there, as it has been established before the Senate, that this bill is completely constitutional.

GRAIN EXPORTS

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food.

In recent weeks a small group of farmers have blatantly defied federal law by trucking their wheat and barley across the U.S. border without an export permit. Can the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food tell the House what impact this illegal action will have on prairie farmers who are not breaking the law?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, illegal action or illegal protest is no way to have an effective influence on the shaping of government policy. In fact that conduct sets back the case of those who would legitimately argue for some changes.

It is a fundamental precept of democracy that we must all respect the law, even those laws with which we may disagree. If we do not have that fundamental respect for the law, soon we all descend to the law of the jungle.

• (1200)

This kind of illegal conduct with respect to the United States border is tremendously dangerous. It could trigger that very political firestorm on the American side of the border which could lead to increased pressures in the United States to shut the border in some way for the access of Canadian grain into the U.S. market. The conduct is dangerous in terms of trade.

The law is there. It is clear and it is valid. I want to make it very clear the law will be enforced.

POINTS OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During question period the Minister of Finance said that I should quote my own figures rather than quote his. At the same time the Minister of Finance said that my accusations called into question the integrity of the auditor general.

If I may quote from the annual financial report—

The Speaker: What the hon. member has is an interesting point but it is not a point of order. I rule it would be a point of debate.

GOVERNMENT REVIEW

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I am pleased to table in both official languages the first ever annual report to Parliament entitled "Strengthening Government Review". This is in keeping with the commitment made by the government in its response to the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

I am pleased to present my report on strengthening government review.

[Translation]

This document is our way of delivering on a promise.

[English]

Specifically, it is delivering on our promise to address some of the concerns expressed about review in the sixth report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

In a larger sense this document is also part of our effort to fulfil the government's election promise to Canadians. We told them that we would make government more efficient, that we would make it more affordable. We also promised we would make it more accountable.

To get government right, we need to know what works and what does not work. Feedback in the form of reviews, evaluations and audits is the best way for the government to learn and to improve. As well, regular reviews are an excellent opportunity to remind our employees of what the public service is all about: delivering quality service to the public and doing our best with the resources that are available.

Canadians want to know how their tax money is spent. They want to be assured they are getting value for those tax dollars. As the people's elected representatives, we have a right to an accounting on those expenditures. Through the public accounts committee we have been told we need timely, relevant and useful feedback on the effects of government policies and programs.

As the auditor general pointed out in his 1993 report, the government's feedback system does not always work as it should. This is why we are implementing many initiatives for things like quality management, a better expenditure management system, a modernized financial information system, a smarter use of modern information technology and of course with this report today, a strengthening of government review of its programs and services.

The government–wide program review process is bringing many significant changes to the way we govern. It is more than just a short term tune–up. Our research shows that those changes are making a real difference to the way we manage the public service. We are working to create a new management culture, one that is results oriented and one that is client focused.

Results oriented management means defining the results the government seeks to achieve in its programs. It means giving managers the resources and guidance they need to achieve those results. It means performance measurements, measuring and demonstrating actual achievements. It means ultimately finding a way to share what we learn with each other in the government and also with the public.

This report is our way of documenting these changes. It is the product of a thorough investigation. We consulted many different groups, both internally and externally. Our valued professional auditors, our evaluators and others in the review community played a key role in the evolution of this report.

What did we learn from these consultations? Our research showed that public service employees really do understand the importance of review.

[Translation]

This is apparent in the extensive amount of review activity carried out in the departments.

[English]

The Treasury Board is leading the evolution of review in three key ways. First, we are linking results information with our business plan process and other forms of decision making. Second, we are improving our ability to co–ordinate government–wide reviews. Third, we are enhancing our review and performance database so that it will be a convenient source of information on key reviews as well as lessons learned and best practices.

There is still room for improvement. We are committed to do what it takes to continue down the road this report puts us on. Administrative structures will be reinforced and results commitments will be more visible. In helping to provide the information for evaluation, we also need a better financial information system. We will continue to find better ways of measuring and making performance information available to Parliament.

Finally, we are going to help departments develop better accountability or control frameworks giving the kind of training and expertise that is needed. We are going to analyse the information gaps for issues where more than one department is involved.

Review is a powerful tool for change. It is integral to delivering quality services to Canadians. It is vital to the changes under way to improve our expenditure management system. We intend to continue our actions to strengthen government review and evaluation on government programs and services.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the efficiency of the civil service depends on a close and frequent assessment of all of the government programs. Departments must ensure that their programs meet their original objectives. Also, they must ensure that the various departmental programs produce very good results, in the best possible way, and that they do no waste the taxpayers' money.

In his 1993 annual report, the auditor general made an assessment of the federal government programs which was very negative. He concluded that not only was the program assessment process seriously flawed, but also that only a quarter of federal expenditures had been reviewed between 1985–86 and 1991–92.

For over two years now, the official opposition has been calling for a comprehensive assessment of all federal programs. Also, for this assessment to be efficient, it must be transparent, which means that members of Parliament should be able to take part in it. As you know, only elected representatives are accountable to the people. The President of the Treasury Board told us today that, as elected representatives of the people, we have the right to be well informed on how the money is spent. But what have we seen since this government took office?

For example, the so–called program assessment undertaken by his colleague from Intergovernmental Affairs was done behind closed doors. At a finance committee hearing, the official opposition even asked the President of the Treasury Board to release the studies, especially those on duplication, made in connection with the program review.

At the time, the President of the Treasury Board referred us to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs who refused to release them on the grounds that they were useful only to the policy makers. So much for transparency. We have to judge a government by its actions and results rather than by its rethoric.

I am afraid this new management culture that the President of the Treasury Board says he wants to put in place clashes with the policies the present government has been practising since it took office.

It is all fine and well for the President of the Treasury Board to preach and to say he wants to improve the federal program review, but the results will be disappointing as long as parliamentarians are denied access to the necessary information.

I mentioned duplication of services earlier. To be effective, every program review process must answer this very simple question: Who is doing what? Which level of government is best able to deal with various areas? The federal government said and still says that jurisdiction must be given to the level of government which is best able to deal with it. Again, we must ensure this is not only rethoric.

What is the every day reality since the present government took office? The reality is that the federal government is interfering increasingly in areas where the jurisdiction and legitimacy of Quebec and the provinces are absolutely clear. I will give you examples, passage of Bill C–76 and the issue of manpower training.

With Bill C–76, the federal government has given itself the powers to unilaterally impose national standards, particularly in the areas of post–secondary education and welfare, thus increasing useless duplication.

Even though all of Quebec's social and economic stakeholders agree that the Government of Quebec is the level of government which is in the best position and which is the most effective to deal with manpower training, the federal government refuses to withdraw from this sector with compensation.

A government is judged by its actions. The federal government's profoundly centralist philosophy prevents it from improving effectiveness in the public service. Instead of eliminating duplication and the waste by making a strict assessment—through an open and transparent process—of all of the federal programs, the federal government has once again decided to send the bill to the provinces and limits its action to tabling yet another report.

[English]

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond on behalf of the Reform Party to the minister's first report on strengthening government review.

It is interesting to note that the first review, which the minister has said he takes great pride in tabling, is the result of the work done by the public accounts committee. It tabled a report last year calling for this review. There were eight specific, strong recommendations to help the government do its job better. We know the government is trying. Quite often we give them a failing grade but at least we see that they are trying.

Looking at the report I noted he said: "What did we learn? First of all our research showed that public service employees really do understand the importance of review". I hope so because it meant that 30,000 of them were out the door.

During the last election the Liberals said they would create jobs, that they would create an infrastructure program and spend $6 billion of borrowed money.

The President of the Treasury Board admitted before the committee that $6 billion only created 8,000 full time jobs. We have now found that the government is spending another several billion dollars to move 30,000 civil servants on to the street and on to the rolls of UI.

Canadians are going to be out $10 billion and we are also down about 20,000 jobs at the same time. We need program evaluation to do things properly. Unfortunately, by looking at the report that was just tabled—we have not had the opportunity to examine it in detail—it seems this is the same old review rather than a proper evaluation of the programs of government, reviews that the auditor general has said focus primarily on efficiency and tinkering with the system rather than a full blown evaluation to save money.

Take an example. I am not going to give the government the credit because it was actually started under the previous government, when the department of transportation decided to do a review of the Atlantic freight rates assistance program. This program had been started around the turn of the century and codified around the 1920s. This was to subsidize freight being moved from Atlantic Canada westward into Quebec and Ontario.

By 1993 it was costing us $100 million a year in subsidies. When an evaluation was done it was found the subsidy was going into the hands of these poor people called Irvings and McCains and so on in Atlantic Canada. It was all set up by trucking firms owned by these large companies inflating the cost and the subsidy they were collecting. We found out the subsidy was providing no public policy benefits to the people of Canada, yet we were paying $100 million.

Program evaluation reviews can do the job properly if they are focused and done well. However, the auditor general tells us that the government is cutting back on its commitment to reduce $11.8 million, in I think it was in the 1992–93 contracting to look at evaluation of programs. It cut back $8.5 million, a decline of 28 per cent while we listened to these wonderful words of the President of the Treasury Board telling us how reviews are doing a great job.

• (1220)

Page 26 of the report is about UI. The minister says: "Studies include over 20 projects, assessing many aspects of the UI program", which continues to keep people unemployed while we wait for the Minister of Human Resources Development to bring down the big review to find out how we can save billions in the program.

An hon. member: And it is coming in this lifetime.

Mr. Williams: Program evaluation can do very great wonders to the deficits of the country if it looks at four fundamental elements. First, is the program still relevant? Has the focus changed over the years or should the focus be changed? Second, does the program meet the relevant need which has been identified in society? Third, is it being delivered efficiently? The fourth element is as important as any of them. Is there a better way of spending our money to achieve the same results more efficiently and ensuring that the need is served?

I am glad to see that the President of the Treasury Board has tabled his first report. Perhaps it is a new beginning. It is certainly a small beginning. I have to compliment him on starting down the road. I only hope he is going to move aggressively and sincerely to save taxpayers a great deal of money.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 98th Report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, which will allow our national anthem to be heard every Wednesday in the House. If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in this report later this day.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 99th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding the selection of votable items in accordance with Standing Order 92. This report is deemed adopted on presentation.

Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour to present the 100th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, regarding Standing Order 107, which permits associate members for the liaison committee.

If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in this 100th report later this day.

Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent that the following motion be put to the House without debate or amendment. I move that the 98th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion agreed to.)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the House, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St.Paul's, that the 100th report of the Standing Committe on Procedure and House Affairs, tabled in the House earlier today, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

TOBACCO PRODUCTS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition signed by a group of Canadians with respect to the harmful effects of tobacco.

The petitioners point out that tobacco use is clearly linked to many illnesses and should therefore, according to them, rightly be termed a hazardous product.

MINING

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present some 600 signatures on a number of petitions dealing with the Keep Mining in Canada campaign. One of the most important issues in Canada is the one of mining. It is a cornerstone for the betterment of Canada.

The petitioners ask the government to look at overlapping regulations and the investment climate. They hope that in reducing the overlap they can get the mining industry back to the number one position it held in the past.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Questions Nos 210 and 230.

[Text]

Question No. 210—Mr. Riis:

In 1994 and 1995, did the government provide any funding or financial support for any festivals or events which included the names "Du Maurier", "Players", "Craven A", "Export", "Matinee", "Benson and Hedges", "Rothmans", and if so, what was the location and amount of funding or support for each such event?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): To the best knowledge of the government, the following departments and agency have provided funding to events which included the name of a cigarette company:

Canada Council:
Du Maurier Limited Atlantic Jazz Festival	Halifax	1994/95	$875.26
Canadian Heritage:
Craven A Just For Laughs Festival	Montreal	1994/95	$250,000
		1995/96	$200,000
Du Maurier Limited World Stage Festival (Under the umbrella of Harbourfront Centre Corp.)	Toronto	1994/95	$70,000
		1995/96	$80,000
Du Maurier Arts Limited New Music Festival	Winnipeg	January 1994	$70,000
		January 1995	$46,500
Foreign Affairs Canada:
Du Maurier Limited World Stage Festival	Toronto	1994/95	$25,000

To the best of their knowledge, seventeen other departments, agencies and crown corporations had no information on this subject.

Question No. 230—Mr. Blaikie:

What has been the total cost of developing, operating and marketing AECL's slowpoke energy system project from its inception until the present time?

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): The total cost of developing, operating and marketing AECL's slowpoke energy system project from its inception until the present time is $45.1 million.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if Question No 101 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

[Text]

Question No. 101—Mr. Breitkreuz:

For each federal riding, what has been the total amount of financial assistance provided by the department of Western Economic Diversification from October 25, 1993, to date?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: I ask that the remaining questions stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 33, because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 18 minutes.

POINTS OF ORDER

TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, earlier today in question period the Minister of Public Works and Government Services indicated he would be pleased to table a document. I request he do that for our information.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. The minister obviously was called away following question period and forgot to table the document.

He indicated his willingness to do so. I would be happy, on behalf of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, to raise the matter with the minister and see if the document cannot be tabled either later this day or on Monday. I hope that is satisfactory with him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank the parliamentary secretary for his co-operation in this matter and I am sure the matter will be resolved in due course.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C-96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C-96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts.

Last week in my office I received a status of women document that prompts me to speak to this bill today. That document was a prepared camera ready piece to be used as an insert in householders from members of Parliament across Canada.

It describes Canada's role at the fourth UN conference on women to an unsuspecting public. It described the government as recognizing the importance of strengthening the family. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The Department of Human Resources Development is one of 24 federal departments included in the status of women plans. I will read from the document:

In preparing for the Conference—

—that is the fourth UN conference on women—

—Canada developed its own national action plan for gender equality "Setting the Stage for the Next Century: the Federal Plan for Gender Equality," published in August, is a framework for federal action to advance women's equality in Canada to the year 2000".

This federal plan for gender equality outlines eight lofty sounding objectives. Today I will touch on five of the eight objectives to which the Department of Human Resources Development has committed.

The first is to implement gender based analysis throughout federal departments and agencies. The second is to improve women's economic autonomy and well-being. Sixth, incorporate women's perspective in governance. Seventh, promote and support global gender equality and, eighth, advance gender equality for employees of federal departments and agencies.

Human Resources Development before and after the reorganization this formalizes agreed along with other federal departments to implement this gender based analysis. What is gender based analysis? What is the definition offered by the government in its own publication? According to the federal plan:

> A gender based approach ensures that the development, analysis and implementation of legislation and policies are undertaken with an appreciation of gender differences. It also acknowledges that some women may be disadvantaged even further because of their race, colour, sexual orientation, social economic position, region, ability level or age.

Notice the subtle reference to sexual orientation in this list. This word, until recently with the passage of Bill C–41, did not exist in federal legislation. Even now the recognition of sexual orientation is not yet in our Canadian Human Rights Act. With this government document, however, it is now official policy in every government department, courtesy of the Status of Women and not of Parliament.

It is the ambiguous concept of gender I should like to give close attention to today. The dictionary definition of gender refers to a person's sex. In contrast to this, according to the federal plan:

> Gender refers not to men or women, but to the relationship between them and to the ways in which the roles of women and men, girls and boys, are socially constructed.

The document goes on to expand on the concept of gender equality. To achieve gender equality, the social arrangements that govern the relationship between men and women will have to change to give equal value to the different roles they play as parents, as workers, and so on and so forth.

The word parent does occur here. Does this mean that the importance of parent and family is being recognized? Has the traditional family or family been deemed to be worthy of the government's attention? If we go further in the document we realize that this is not the case. It goes on to say such statements as:

> Equality for all women will come about only as these attitudes embedded in the workplace, education institutes and family are challenged and begin to change.

Another example of this policy duplicity is the following:

> Unequal participation and progress in paid work further undermines a woman's ability to achieve and sustain personal autonomy throughout her life.

This statement reflects the bias that it is only paid work that defines a woman's ability, value and worth in society. This illustrates the government's contempt for home and family relationships.

Participation in the workplace defines ability, value and worth according to this Liberal government document. With this bias it is not only family structures that become criticized under the microscope of their gender equality, but such things as religion, customs and traditional practices. The free choice or preference of individuals is replaced by this government imposed priority of workforce participation.

Gender equality is also based upon the assumption of attaining equal outcomes, as noted in the federal plan:

> Attaining gender equality is predicated on the achievement of equal outcomes for both men and women.

That is brought about not only by equal treatment but by "positive actions". Positive actions imply government intervention. This document blatantly states that treating women and men identically will not ensure equal outcomes. Thus the philosophy of gender equality leads to the policy of employment equity and affirmative action from the workplace right through to the kitchens of our national homes. This policy has been rejected outright by Canadians and certainly by my constituents in Port Moody—Coquitlam.

A recent survey I conducted of my constituents indicated that some 87 per cent believe that merit and merit alone should be the sole criteria for hiring and promotion. They have rejected employment equity and affirmative action, certainly in the workplace and most certainly in the home.

The policy or practice of employment equity is a fundamental insult to the abilities of women. It is a fundamental insult to me. The government cannot and should not mandate equal outcome in workplace participation between the sexes, between men and women. That should not be its role. Rather, the government should seek to encourage equality of opportunity and freedom of choice. Individuals should be free to decide how they wish to participate, both inside and outside the home.

The government obviously has no respect for the value of nurturing or sustaining families. The government does not take into account nor does it respect that women may have other alternatives and priorities in life, may wish to make choices other than government choices, and may wish to invest their time and efforts in their families. Therefore it was to my great surprise to read the status of women document which states that they recognize the importance of the family and the importance of strengthening it.

The minister pays only lip service to the needs and priorities of Canadian families while giving full service to radical feminists through such documents as the gender equality plan and the Beijing platform for action. It should be noted that neither the platform for action nor the federal plan for gender equality has been presented to the House. We have not seen a shred of those documents in this place for discussion. We have not been able to scrutinize what is in them, as we deserve to do. The government has legislated in 24 federal departments, including human resources, without this legislature.

Where is the accountability in our system of government? The government, according to its notorious red book, stated that "open government would be the watchword of the Liberal government program". Why has not the government brought this agenda to the public's attention? Yet the two documents to which I referred, one being domestic and the other an international UN agreement, will have wide–ranging impact upon our legislation, our public policy, our society and our families.

We will recall last month the passage of Bill C–64, a monument to employment equity in all federal departments. It is no coincidence that this is in the Beijing document.

Human resources development is a main player in the realization of the Liberal government's gender based analysis agenda. It intends at any moment to interfere in the free choice of Canadian families by introducing a national day care program. It intends to add a further tax burden to all Canadians with this program in its desire to become a nanny state.

We thought last year that the power of the radical women's lobby was defunded and disempowered with the removal of the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women. The Human Resources Development Department has committed to continued and added support for and influence from gender equity activists through the platform for action. This department among many others has committed to the funding and advice of gender feminist NGO groups to implement their gender equality objectives.

We find that even the promotion and support of global gender equality is one of the mandates of the new human resources development. It applied to the department's funding radical feminists going to Beijing. It will apply to ongoing NAFTA labour agreements. Its mandate even applies to other international activities.

Nothing is free or even cheap in federal government. What will the new priority cost this department or other departments? In lean economic times should the limited resources and sadly needed resources of a human resources development department be used to realize the unwanted agenda of a powerful special interest group, or should its limited resources apply to the needs of real Canadians?

Instead of debating substantive and controversial policy issues such as the gender based employment equity contained in the platform for action and the federal plan for gender equality, we are debating a pro forma bill, Bill C–96, which actually offers nothing new, nothing fresh, nothing bold enough to reform this department or, more important, to reform federal–provincial relations. While RD is enacting fundamental, costly, revolutionizing social policy behind the scenes, Bill C–96 does not even have a royal recommendation attached to it.

I am sure however that the cost of implementing the plan for gender equality and the platform for action will be considerable not only in this department but in every department across government. This is an issue I intend to pursue. This cost will not only be in dollars but it will be in the weakened viability of our most precious societal institutions, and one such institution is our families.

The government's non–legislative agenda is of great concern to me. This non–legislative agenda permeates every nook and cranny of every federal department at this point in time.

Earlier the minister was saying that their policies affect the social fabric of the country. They certainly do. This one in particular strikes the very centre of our social fabric. The general secretary to the Beijing conference, Gertrude Mongella, declared at the opening ceremony of that conference that "all evidence points to a social revolution in the making".

The two documents I have mentioned, the ones going into this department and others, will have a profound effect on our governments, our laws, our society and our families. What Bill C–96 shuffles around on the surface and what we are talking about today actually belie a whirlpool of change underneath.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy listening to the hon. member's speech, but sometimes I find that members of the Reform Party miss some major points in legislation. I will quickly review for the hon. member the major objectives of the legislation and what the legislation allows the federal government to continue doing.

Essentially it does a few things. It draws together portions of the former departments of employment and immigration, health and welfare, the secretary of state, and labour. The legislation will also allow the Government of Canada to continue improving employment programs and services for Canadians and building on what I consider to be significant achievements over the past two years.

We enacted some major changes to make student loans more accessible, flexible and sustainable, helping more than 300,000 students this year alone. The hon. member from the Bloc will know that because of the flexible federalism that exists in the country there is an opting out provision for the province of Quebec which allows the province of Quebec to administer its own Canada student loans program.

For the very first time the federal government moved to establish a special opportunities grant for individuals, like high need, part time students, women pursuing doctoral studies and disabled students. Through this department we have also created youth internship programs that have led to real jobs for some 27,000 young Canadians, which is 20 per cent more than the red book commitment.

We have approximately 130 Youth Service Canada projects across the country that give young people the opportunity to serve their community and to obtain valuable work experience.

• (1245)

Through effective partnerships with major industries and through the establishment of sectoral councils the government has been able to generate, for every federal dollar, $1.50 from the private sector because it believes the way to go in the new economy is through effective partnerships. We also have joint federal–provincial initiatives helping some 60,000 single mothers, older workers, aboriginals, young people get the new skills and new jobs.

Approximately $111 million has been spent on older workers. The government has invested in a program for older workers over the past three years to help displaced workers deal with the new dynamic configuration occurring in the Canadian economy.

The government has also done something that I believe is extremely important. In order to modernize the economy you must modernize the way government delivers its services. Services have been integrated and decentralized, moving from 450 to 750 points of service reaching smaller communities 24 hours a day.

We talk about family. We talk about our seniors. We talk about young people. We talk about providing all Canadians—we are part of the Canadian family—with better services. There are four times as many offices where seniors can get in–person service. That is a fantastic accomplishment.

The best technology is used to speed up service for UI. Processing time has been cut by two days. OAS claims have been cut from eight days to one–half day. We are focusing on employment programs that work like the self–employment assistance program from which 34,000 Canadians have benefited. They have created a job for themselves but more important, they have also created jobs for others. On its own this program has created 68,000 jobs.

The point I am making to the hon. member is if we are talking about the Canadian family, i.e. everyone who resides within this country, it is crystal clear the government has moved in a positive direction. I hope that once in a while members of the opposition would get up on their feet and applaud these excellent initiatives by the Liberal government.

Mrs. Hayes: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if that was a question or a comment.

I enjoy the opportunity to answer my colleague's presentation. He talks about the Canadian family. I am talking about Canadian families, the root of our society.

I would like to reflect on what has happened in the last 20 years to Canadian families. In that time, especially in the last five years, youth violence has more than doubled. Real income, the amount of money a family has to support itself with, has dropped by some 6.5 per cent in the last five or six years because of taxation, because of government overspending and because of fiscal policies that are putting tremendous pressures on the people that are trying to hold this nation together.

Consider suicide rates. We have the third highest suicide rate among male youth in the world. The divorce rate has increased 10 times in the last 35 years and we are shuffling the chairs around on the deck saying: "We will spend more money".

What are the priorities of Canadians? Is it their priority to find out what government can do or what they can do in job creation? We want to put the tools in the hands of Canadians so they can create the jobs. It is not what government can do, it is what Canadians can do. Government priorities should not be prompted by special interest groups, but what Canadian priorities are.

The Canadian priorities are that their families be strengthened and that they be given the instruments to create their own future. That is exactly what the government's fiscal policies, justice policies and social policies are stripping away from those families. I put that to the hon. member who made the comments.

• (1250)

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief comment to make. I want to congratulate the member for the relevance of the example she gave with regard to the family. Indeed we can see how the government is giving itself a lot of leeway in connection with policies that it is presenting abroad as being Canadian without having them validated in the House or even commented on.

Based on this example, we have good reason to question the appropriateness of giving the federal government the responsibility it wants to give itself in clause 20 of the bill, for example, which says: "—the Minister may enter into agreements with a province or group of provinces, agencies of provinces, financial institutions and such other persons or bodies as the Minister considers appropriate".

If this clause is left unchanged, and this is the question I will put the member, it means that the federal government can go against policies put in place by the provinces. Family policy is an interesting example because choices in this regard may differ across Canada.

If clause 20 is left unchanged, it allows the federal government to interfere in areas under provincial jurisdiction, in areas where policies already exist. Does the member not agree that we should at least amend this clause by adding to it that, when agreements are signed with public bodies, financial institutions or any other person, it be done in accordance with priorities established by the provinces? I would like to hear the member's opinion on this subject.

[English]

Mrs. Hayes: Mr. Speaker, certainly as a Reformer and as a supporter of the accountability of programs being in the hands of those closest to the people who have to put the programs in place, I support the premise that the control of programs and decisions that are made be as close to the people as possible.

Every part of our nation should have the same input into what those decisions are. Certainly provinces can be deemed equal in the administration of the programs. The federal government's participation in those programs should be minimized as much as possible while maintaining the integrity and protection of Canadians across the system. The actual delivery of programs should be in provincial hands in an equal fashion from coast to coast.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to Bill C–96, the act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development.

The main object of this bill is to lend unified legal status to the department, enabling it to continue to assist Canadians in getting back to work. This is a housekeeping bill and is not intended to implement any major reforms. It does not call for any new organizational changes or new expenditures, and does not affect federal–provincial relations.

[English]

Bill C–96 draws together and consolidates the legislative foundation of the new Department of Human Resources Development. It does not add anything new or subtract from the foundation. It merely puts everything in one place. That in itself is important. It is plain common sense. For administrative reasons alone, it is far more efficient to have a single legislative basis for the department. However, there is more to this than mere administrative convenience.

When the government launched the department under the name of human resources development, it set the stage for a real change not just in name but in direction, in the way Human Resources Development Canada serves Canadians.

Over the past two years, HRDC has been changing, innovating and adapting to the realities of today's economy and today's labour market. It is modernizing the way it does business, the way it delivers the services Canadians need, the way it works for Canadians in the changing world. For the nine million Canadians who come to HRDC for help this is why Bill C–96 is so important. The bill provides the solid foundation the department needs to keep moving forward.

It is important to Canada's seniors. Last year the department completed the first year in a three–year income security program redesign project. Phase 2 is already well under way. The department is streamlining rules and procedures, developing the best technology available. The end result will be a fully modernized, efficient network for delivering services to clients of the old age security and Canada pension plan programs.

[Translation]

Once fully implemented, the new system will save taxpayers up to $100 million yearly in operating costs. Moreover, it will also provide faster service to seniors, the people who really depend on these programs for their security. For their sakes, let us ensure that the bill stays on track and is passed as quickly as possible.

Income security program redesign is only the start. As the minister has already announced in the House, Human Resources Development Canada has undertaken a complete review of its service delivery network, with a view to making it decentralized, integrated, user friendly and flexible. It will serve a greater number of Canadians everywhere in the country better than before. In reality, because of the new network, the number of departmental service points will be increased from 450 to 700 within three years.

These will include 300 Human Resources Development Canada centres, which will provide quality one–on–one counselling to clients; self–serve mechanisms such as telephone, interactive television and computer services, which will broaden access to HRDC services; up to 400 electronic kiosks, which means self–serve terminals will be available in communities throughout the country.

[English]

The department is already creating the most advanced, efficient service delivery network in the federal government. Work on developing new technologies for this new network is well advanced, with things like a national on–line labour market information system incorporating an electronic job search bulletin board. The system will help people do their own matching between their skills and the jobs available anywhere in Canada.

Pilot testing a new system called TELEDEC lets unemployment insurance claimants submit their bi–weekly report over a touchtone telephone instead of by mail or in person. TELEDEC allows people to get their cheques two days faster.

TELE–APP, a new system being tested in partnership with NBTel allows people who have collected UI in the last 52 weeks to reapply using a touchtone phone.

APPLI–SYS, a touch screen computer program helps people apply for UI benefits more quickly.

Pilot testing document imaging begins the movement toward paperless claim processing.

Early results from these new systems are promising. They are just the first of a range of technologies from the Internet application to software training packages that HRDC will explore to provide faster, more efficient service.

We are bringing service delivery into the 21st century. In the process we are empowering more Canadians to help themselves.

[Translation]

One of the main objectives of the new service delivery network is to facilitate decentralization of the entire structure of departmental operations, to put into place programs and services within the community, to move decision making centres as close to the client as possible, and to get those most affected by programs and services actively involved in them.

• (1300)

For instance, the network will include community–based mechanisms which will involve input from provincial governments and business, municipalities and community groups, working as partners with Human Resources Development Canada.

With the human resources investment fund, we integrate these partnerships with our programs and services. Partnerships work, as seen from what has been achieved by sector councils that bring together entire industries and promote strategic initiatives with the provinces and co–operation with community groups across the country.

Take one of the youth internship projects, in Winnipeg, where 45 young people go to work every morning and go to school every afternoon. They acquire practical experience while taking courses that are relevant to that experience, and they are guaranteed a job when they finish the course.

[English]

What is really interesting about this project is that five major private sector firms in Winnipeg, for example, are not only taking part, they are taking the lead enthusiastically. It is not a case of government and business working on separate tracks; it is a case of partnership in action. This year alone there will be 25,000 young interns in similar projects across the country.

That is where the department is headed. It is a new direction for Human Resources Development Canada and it is getting real concrete results for Canadians, for seniors, for young men and women, for people working hard to develop new skills for a new economy. It is getting results for the single mother, who for the first time can now get a grant to help care for her children while she goes to school. It is getting results for the older worker who finds a lifetime job taken over by technology but now has a real opportunity to prepare for new work and find a new job. That is why this bill is important.

Over the past few years the transitional arrangements put in place to create the new Department of Human Resources Development have worked well. They have helped to put HRDC and our labour market and social programs on a new course. It is up to us to make sure the department can continue on that course. It is up to us to ensure the department moves forward and does so with a solid foundation. Bill C–96 provides that foundation. We need to pass the bill and get on with the work of serving Canadians.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I was particularly surprised by the hon. member's remarks at the start of his speech, when he said the bill served to consolidate legislation and that it had no effect on federal provincial relations.

I would like to ask the member why, then, the Quebec minister of employment made the following statement: "Bill C–96 flies in the face of the consensus in Quebec that the federal government should get completely out of labour matters and give the budgets involved back to Quebec".

I would also like the minister to tell us why the Société québécoise de la main–d'oeuvre passed a unanimous resolution in favour of the bill's withdrawal, stating that Quebec should have sole responsibility for workforce adaptation policies and occupational training within its borders and should therefore have the funds the federal government allocates to these programs in Quebec.

I would also like the member to tell us why Ghislain Dufour, the spokesperson for the Conseil du patronat du Québec, known in Quebec for his federalist stance, said the same thing in the papers yesterday. According to him, if the federal government really wants to show its good faith in wanting the sort of change Quebec was seeking in the referendum, could it not, in this sector, at least have the decency as a federal government to correct its bill so the provinces could withdraw from its application, should they consider it relevant to do so, so that, in the end, the consensus in Quebec echoed by union federations, the Conseil du patronat, the party in power and the opposition may extend to all Quebecers? Why does the government not decide to give Quebec an opportunity to exercise its jurisdiction over manpower? Have the promises of change made prior to October 30 already disappeared in a puff of smoke?

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, here again we have a Bloc member, a separatist member, who is babbling away in true separatist fashion, in a parochial manner, focusing exclusively and constantly on Quebec.

He should be talking about Canada as a whole, and considering how we can advance the cause of young people, single mothers, single parent families, and senior citizens. We are debating a bill providing the federal government with a structure to maintain and develop partnerships with the provinces and territories, management, labour, community groups and those involved in education, in order to reach common social and economic goals.

We are talking about giving young Quebecers, since he is only interested in Quebec, the opportunity to find out, via computers in their own area or community, if there are jobs outside their own parish, town, or province. They are given access to the labour market anywhere in Canada, and mobility throughout the country.

Mr. Crête: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member does not want to answer the question from a bad separatist member, could he answer Ghislain Dufour, spokesperson for the Conseil du patronat du Québec, a recognized federalist, and Gérald Ponton, president of the Association des manufacturiers du Québec, who is not identified with the sovereignist camp either? Let the member reply to those people if he will not give an answer here, to the Bloc Quebecois, or to the Quebec government. Let him reply to the federalist Quebecers who unanimously support Quebec's consensus on the repatriation of jurisdiction in the manpower sector.

What is the member's answer to those people concerning Quebec's request that has been there on the table for five years?

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I find it funny that the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup has finally admitted that he is a no-good separatist.

Mr. Crête: I did not say "no-good".

Mr. Bellemare: I editorialized a bit; he is a separatist. I do not know if separatist is synonymous with no-good, but many in this country would say that the separatists are no good as a group but not necessarily as individuals.

Do you think for a minute that I will answer questions from Bloc members, from people who have led the province of Quebec in all kinds of directions, into a muddle, who drafted a referendum question that got everyone confused? Thirty per cent of those who voted yes thought they were voting for some kind of association and not for separation.

Bloc members, Quebec separatists and PQ members manipulated referendum scrutineers, telling them to reject ballots marked with an X that was too dark or not dark enough. There is an appalling number—this is unprecedented in Canadian history—except perhaps when Maurice Duplessis was in power. Maurice Duplessis may have come back as a Bloc member. During the referendum, these blockheads blocked some people's access to the polling stations.

If they did not like someone's face, colour or language, they stopped and harassed them to prevent them from voting. Then, after those Canadians living in Quebec managed to cast their votes, they would check to see if their X was a little crooked. Those with shaking hands were unfortunate because their votes did not count. I have never seen something as outrageous as the counting of the votes on the night of the referendum.

If you think I will answer quotes from a separatist—First of all, I would question the accuracy of his quotes and, second, I will not waste my time answering Bloc members.

• (1310)

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-96, to restructure the Department of Human Resources Development. I have been following the debate with interest ever since the minister made his presentation yesterday. I listened to the minister and his parliamentary secretary. I also listened to some speeches made by government members and the various questions that were asked, including the one put by our colleague from Parkdale—High Park.

I draw from all of this a vision of Canada. I am not one to impugn motives right off the bat. I noticed that speeches were high quality, and a number of general principles have emerged. Of course, other remarks, and those made by the previous speaker are perhaps an example of this, remind us that mediocrity is to be found everywhere, even in the House of Commons.

I would like to look back over the debate, because, as I listened, I could perceive two visions: the standard Liberal vision and the Bloc Quebecois vision. I will not deal with what my hon. colleagues from the Reform Party said, but I think that basic issues were raised by the Liberals that need to be pointed out and set in the context of this debate.

Basically, we are looking at the same mountain, except from different points of view. I think that the Minister of Human Resources Development was sincere in his presentation. What did this presentation contain? First, he described a vision of Canada, along with the federal government's responsibilities according to that vision.

I understood the minister to say that the federal government feels it has responsibilities regarding the development of human resources everywhere in Canada. That sector includes issues related to manpower, employment, education, daycare and, in fact, anything that directly concerns individuals, such as their families, their training, their education and their children.

The minister told us that this bill merely seeks to provide a legislative framework for what is already being done in Canada, partly through the federal government's spending power, but also under the laws passed by this Parliament. I have seen, in my riding, some initiatives taken by the Department of Human Resources Development. I must say that, before coming here, I was not very familiar with the Canadian realities related to that department. I knew that there was an employment centre. I also knew that the federal government was involved in various ways, and I saw it take action.

I have no criticism of the way department officials take action. They implement the programs. They do so with the best of intentions and they also try to do it efficiently. Just think of programs such as Article 25, the employability development program, and also programs such as the youth service, or the access to work program for women, which is designed to help women who do not get UI or welfare benefits find work.

These programs reflect good intentions, as well as a clear desire to do the utmost. Through its initiatives, the department seeks to reach out to people in their everyday lives. It reaches out to individuals and community groups, and it signs agreements with municipalities. All this is currently taking place. It is being done and the bill before us seeks to provide a legislative framework for all these initiatives.

Clause 6 clearly states that the minister's powers apply anywhere in Canada. It says:

> The powers, duties and functions of the Minister extend to and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction relating to the development of the human resources of Canada—

That provision is extremely wide in scope. As for clause 20, it provides that:

> —the Minister may enter into agreements with a province or group of provinces, agencies of provinces, financial institutions and such other persons or bodies as the Minister considers appropriate.

In other words, given the provisions of this bill, the minister may enter into agreements with anyone, so as to get involved in the education, manpower and employment sectors.

If we lived in a unitarian state, that might be a solution. Although Canada is a very big country, it has a rather large population and it could be said that, because of regional characteristics, it may be good to have some degree of decentralization so that local needs are taken into account by the minister.

But we are not in a unitarian country although a number of constitutional experts, considering the evolution of Canada, are not willing to say that we are in a federation, let alone in a confederation. But, in a federation, there are various levels of government and, ordinarily, these levels of government are sovereign in their jurisdiction. Canada is made up of provinces which, if we take a look at the Constitution, are supposed to have jurisdiction over education, training, over all the areas that have to do with Canadians as individuals, the federal government having kept, in 1867, jurisdiction over external trade, defence and the economy in general.

If we examine the bill and its objectives, we realize that this legislation which is now before Parliament will give a federal minister the right to interfere in areas under provincial jurisdiction. It is shocking. People of my race have found this shocking for years—and I use the word race in the sense of nation, as Mr. Duplessis did, since, moments ago, the member for Carleton—Gloucester reminded us of Maurice Duplessis. My people have always been shocked by these ways of doing things.

For us, it is not only a question of what we could call a constitutional orthodoxy, according to which the federal government should have no say in provincial jurisdictions, but there is also an element of efficiency because in Quebec—other provinces may do what they want in this regard—there has been a large consensus for years now. My colleagues talked about it, especially the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, who raises the issue every time he has the floor. That consensus is that, for reason of efficiency, all the issues of professional training, manpower and employment must be Quebec's exclusive jurisdiction.

I think that is self evident. I do not want to repeat what has already been said by other Bloc speakers, but nonetheless, I want to relate a personal experience. A few years ago, I was a career counsellor in the professional training centre in Jonquière, which is the biggest training centre in the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean region. At the time, we provided training in many areas: mechanics, plumbing, electricity, and so on. Every year we trained a group of students in industrial mechanics.

At one point, a study had concluded that industrial mechanics was a trade with a future.

What happened? Our school board kept offering a course in industrial mechanics to a group of about 20 students. The Government of Quebec, willing to provide training to social assistance recipients, commissioned the school board to train people in industrial mechanics—which made two groups—and the federal government also commissioned the school board to train two other groups in industrial mechanics.

Whereas every year we used to have one group of students in industrial mechanics, that year we had four groups. The school board, the Government of Quebec and the federal government did not consult with each other, everybody being busy with their own little policies.

What happened? At the end of the year, instead of 20 people applying for a job, they were about 80. As a result, most of them did not find a job, which killed the industrial mechanics option in the area for several years.

It is sad to see that people genuinely wanting to go back to the labour market were offered training for what was basically a dead end trade, not because studies promising jobs in that field were badly done, but because there had not been any consultation between the federal and provincial governments and the school board. That is what we want to avoid in Quebec.

In Quebec, we want to have a full employment policy, the same type of policy they have in Austria, in some Scandinavian countries or even in Germany. Those full employment policies usually produce unemployment rates of about 6 or 7 per cent, instead of the 12 or 13 per cent rates we have in Quebec and instead of the 15 or 16 per cent rates we have in my area, Jonquière, or in the Saguenay—Lac–Saint–Jean area.

That is what we want to do, but to do so, we need tools. We need co–ordination, but with the present practices in Canada, there is no co–ordination.

This is why everyone in Quebec, whether the Quebec Liberal Party, the Conseil du patronat du Québec, or central labour bodies—with the exception of the provincial wing of the Liberal Party of Canada—is calling for the return of powers regarding manpower training and employment policies to Quebec so that the province can set policies to ensure that people will get useful training, taking the present job market into consideration, and will not be the victims of jurisdictional disputes or arguments between public servants.

For four or five years now, the Government of Quebec, whether Liberal or Parti Quebecois, all governments of Quebec have been calling for training to be made the responsibility of the government of Quebec.

And what do we see this morning in the House? Bill C–96, which says exactly the opposite, which says that the co–ordination will not be done by the Government of Quebec. This bill tells us that the minister will be entitled, for each community, municipality or province, as he wishes, to present programs, to suggest actions to community groups in order for them to create jobs or to propose the hiring of trainees to employers.

This maintains the present policy, which is not effective. Despite all the good will, despite the relative success of some federal or provincial programs, we realize that we do not have the expected results when we take into account all the money invested and all the skills called up in both the federal and provincial public services.

Why is that? It is not due to ill will or lack of skill; it is simply a matter of organization. Things are poorly organized, and in order to properly organize manpower training, to properly organize employment policies, there must be only one decision maker.

In Quebec, past and present governments, Liberal and PQ alike, unions and business owners' associations, everybody says unanimously that, considering the circumstances, considering the history, considering the needs, considering what is in place right now, it is the Government of Quebec that should have the responsibility for co–ordinating all these policies so that we can one day train our people properly and have a full employment policy that makes sense.

The bill before us means exactly the opposite. This bill says no. The consensus in Quebec is totally useless because a minister in Ottawa, the Minister of Human Resources Development, will have the power to develop programs and enter into agreements with provinces, municipalities, community groups, and individuals, implementing these programs in order to help Canadians get better training and better jobs.

By saying "to develop programs", we are referring to money, because, in the end, it is always a matter of money. In fact, there is always a relation between any given program and the funds allocated to it by the Minister of Finance. So, a proposal is being made to Canadians, even in my riding, where people voted—one mentioned that the sovereignists were defeated in the referendum, but it fact they received almost 50 per cent, or 49.4 per cent. In my riding, however, it was 71 per cent for Quebec's sovereignty. You cannot ignore 71 per cent of the population. My riding came third in Quebec, after the riding of my colleague for Charlevoix and the riding of my leader, the Leader of the Opposition. This is no mean feat.

In a sovereignist region like ours, people are still getting involved in the process, so they keep asking Quebec to fund certain programs and they request funding under some federal government programs. People know perfectly well that something must be done, in Quebec and Canada, as far as training and employment are concerned.

People are not as partisan as some others, and in any case—I am not sure this is parliamentary—people are not against the federal government's involvement, even though they may have very deep–rooted sovereignist convictions. People are concerned and ask themselves: Will there be someone, one day, to make a decision and give us employment policies which are worthwhile?

We do not see any hopeful sign coming from the government side. We do not see any in the area of manpower and, as we have seen this week during Question Period, we do not see any hopeful sign either in the area of constitutional reform.

I have the distinct impression that eventually, when the question is asked next time, people are going to give the answer that the Quebec sovereignist movement has been waiting for for so long. Why? In order to have effective policies and a state which is efficiently managed, so that its citizens get their money's worth. Taxpayers want effective programs. It is not by stepping on each others toes, as we are doing now, that we will get valid manpower and employment policies.

I hope that the House will support the motion from my colleague from Mercier and that this bill will be sent into oblivion as quickly as possible.

[English]

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak on debate, but I also want to embellish my fan club member from Simcoe Centre. He does well to applaud before because he may not applaud after he hears what I have to say.

After reading the title of the bill, we realize it is just another piece of legislation, typically dry, typically complicated. It is easy in that context to lose sight of what the bill is about. Bill C–96, which I am happy to address for a few minutes, does just one single thing. It has a very simple and single purpose, and that purpose is integration.

My friend from Crowfoot would understand all about integration. Any party that can get the member for Simcoe Centre and the member for Crowfoot at the same caucus table understands integration, I submit.

[Translation]

I would also like to emphasize to my colleagues in the Bloc that this bill is about integration, and just that. It will consolidate the legal powers of the original departments in a single piece of legislation that is clear and coherent.

This is the only goal of this bill. It does not provide new powers or establish new programs. It does not add anything to or take anything away from the powers of the human resources development department.

This bill is merely an official document that puts the integration of social programs and labour market programs in Canada on a sound footing. That is important. But the underlying principle of this bill is even more important, that is the implementation of an integrated approach to human resources development in the new department.

[English]

I recognize that my friend from Mercier has an amendment to which technically we are speaking right now. That is another debate. This is really about bringing together a number of functions that heretofore had been under the umbrella of several departments of government.

I say to my friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam we have to make up our minds about what we want. I heard critics of the government at one point talk about duplication of effort, doing several things, the left hand not knowing what the right hand is doing. Then when we come up with what I believe is an absolutely laudable effort under Bill C–96 to bring together some functions, so we do not have that kind of duplication, we are accused of just shuffling the chairs.

It is difficult to do the right thing? No, it is not difficult to do the right thing, but it is difficult to be seen to be doing the right thing if somebody has a cliché to cover every situation, even if some of the clichés are mutually exclusive. Which are we doing, unnecessarily duplicating effort or just shuffling the chairs?

I listened with interest to her speech, as I did to the speech of my friend from Jonquière, whom I always enjoy. We do not always agree, but he has a real ability to state his argument in a very reasoned way. I have always admired his ability to do so.

I want to come back to my friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam. In her speech she said something that was rather curious, about the bill's not having a royal recommendation. I wanted for the record to come back on that one. If she looked at the bill, she would realize that what she says is not true. It does have a royal recommendation. There are several proofs of that in the documentation she has in front of her. If she looked at the Order Paper for today, where Bill C–96 is listed, she will find a little "R" beside it. That means that this bill has a royal recommendation. If she does not believe my word, she should look at the bottom of the page, because it says at the bottom of the page "Recommended by the Governor General".

If she wanted to actually look at the bill, and far be it from me to suggest she did not look at the bill, her own words almost condemn her on this point. If she had taken the time to open the cover to page 1A, the very first page inside, the very first thing she would have seen would have been "Recommendation. His Excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons", et cetera. That is the royal recommendation she says the bill does not have. I can only hope that the rest of her input was more informed, because that one was dead wrong.

With this bill the Department of Human Resources Development brings under one roof all of our efforts to help Canadians achieve their full potential in our society and in our economy. Within a single department we are going to have programs and services under this bill that will help people who are looking for work find and hopefully keep jobs. It will help the employers find the people they need. It will provide services that will help both workers and employers under federal jurisdiction to maintain fair labour standards and a safe work environment.

It will provide services that will help people between jobs, Canadian seniors, families with low incomes, and people with disabilities to get the income support they need. We will have under this umbrella department services to help people get training and to develop new skills for an economy that is always changing. It will provide services that will help local businesses and communities and entire industries to target the skills of the future and build a skilled workforce to keep Canada competitive and prosperous in a changing world.

I think this integrated approach makes sense. It recognizes that in reality people do not neatly fall into tidy little categories. A young person looking for work may really need to get back to school first. She may also be a single mother and the lack of good child care support may prevent her from taking a course she needs. The person with a disability may be quite capable, willing and eager to work, but also needs help meeting special medical costs. The older worker displaced by technology may need income support, but in the long run he or she needs help retooling and adapting to a new labour market.

By bringing all the different programs these people need into one department we have taken the first step toward making sure the programs work together to provide meaningful co–ordinated solutions for the real world. By taking that first step we set the stage for real integration in the way programs and services are delivered to Canadians. For example, employment and UI services used to be delivered through Canada Employment Centres. Canada pension plan and old age security and guaranteed income supplement services, which used to come from a separate department, were delivered through separate client service centres. Now we are bringing all these together in new human resources centres across the country.

Let us face it, when someone comes looking for a service they could not care less which particular program, branch, or department delivers that service. The last thing they need is to be sent running from one office to another to obtain those particular services. Combining those services in one location means reduced overhead, reduced administrative costs, and more importantly it means people getting better access, with one–stop shopping for all federal social security and labour market services. The ability to access those services under one roof on the part of the client is the real immediate benefit of the integration this bill provides for.

The new service delivery network the Department of Human Resources Development is developing goes a bit beyond that. It goes well beyond that. The new network will make a new kind of integrated service possible, one that is more flexible and responsive to changing needs and circumstances. A fundamental goal of this approach is to ensure that integration takes place at the local level by locating the decision making and even the design of services at the local level instead of highly centralized and compartmentalized programs dictated from a headquarters somewhere.

Ultimately each human resource centre would become an integral part of the community it serves. Decisions about what kinds of programs make sense in that community will be made in that community by the community. To make this work we have to completely rethink the way we define programs and services. We cannot say to communities across Canada here is a program and here are all the rules you have to follow, do it our way or not at all.

[Translation]

We cannot tell people: "We will enrol you in this program even if you do not need it because it is the only one we can afford".

We want to be able to tell communities and individuals: "Here are the basic tools that have proved useful. Here is the money and the resources that are available. It is up to you to decide which tools you want to use and how you can use those resources most effectively. You should not worry about the restrictions of the various programs. The only thing that matters is the task at hand".

[English]

We have developed an increasingly sophisticated and effective set of employment programs, a set of tools to help people develop new skills, gain work experience and find jobs. Our challenge is to integrate these two components to build a single integrated employment system that people can turn to not just for a cheque but for help to get back into the workforce. This means finding a way to combine that essential system of income protection provided by UI with an effective active system of empowerment, a system that gives people the resources and the opportunity to make choices about the kinds of jobs they need, the kinds of skills that are required, the kind of future they want to build for themselves.

For example, we are experimenting with a form of internship with small businesses. These are companies that desperately want to hire new workers but cannot afford the training new workers require. With this program, we help them hire young people, older workers, women coming back into the workforce, and we provide some support to pay for the learning curve, the time it takes the workers to become fully productive in their new jobs. That experiment is already beginning to show some good results. Small businesses are creating permanent jobs for unemployed Canadians. That simply would not exist otherwise.

Let us look at another example. Over the past year we developed a program for self-employment under unemployment insurance so that people have a choice: rather than simply collecting benefits and waiting for a job to come around, they can create their own jobs. The department provides some financial support, mentoring and counselling to help participants get their businesses started. Over the past year 30,000 individuals have started up their own businesses through the unemployment insurance program. They have created not just 30,000 jobs, but 60,000. Not only are they helping themselves, they are helping other unemployed Canadians to get back to work.

• (1345)

That is the kind of thing that can happen when we stop thinking in terms of separate compartments and start thinking in terms of integration. By bringing together the full range of Canada's social and labour market programs, we are setting a new course and making a real difference in the lives of Canadians.

Bill C-96 provides the basis for this new direction. It ensures that the structure is in place for the federal government to continue bringing programs and services together, working with our partners in the provinces and communities across Canada.

As we debate all of the detailed clauses of the bill, let us not forget what the bill is about. It is about making this kind of integration possible. It provides Canadians with a future which is full of new possibilities. That is what the bill is about.

Implicitly the bill is not about several things. It is not about shuffling the chairs, as someone has said. It is about trying to eliminate the unnecessary duplication, unnecessary inconvenience for clients, Canadians across the country who demand and have a right to certain services from government. They demand and have a right to services which are provided at the least possible cost, in the most efficient manner and at the least inconvenience to the taxpayers.

The bill brings together various functions of other departments, including the Department of Health, the Secretary of State, the former department of labour, as well as the Department of Human Resources Development. The bill seeks to consolidate in a manner which gets a bigger bang for our buck. At the same time, it is not meant to underline the role of the provinces, as has been suggested. That is another debate for another time. This is simply a bringing together of several functions which have always pertained to the federal government and will continue to do so until some level of government decides otherwise.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

The House resumed from October 17 consideration of the motion that Bill C-317, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act (scabs and essential services), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks with a quote by the present Minister for Human Resources Development who said, on November 23, 1994, in a letter he sent me: "I wish to inform you that I am presently examining all aspects of the Canada Labour Code, including the issue of limiting the use of replacement workers, with the view to updating and improving the code to bring it more into line with today's realities". We are now in November 1995, and we still have not been given any notice that this overhaul of the Canada Labour Code would take place.

In the meantime, a member of the Bloc proposed a private bill, which is before us today and which, in my opinion, makes good horse sense. There has been anti-scab legislation in Quebec since 1979. We have witnessed a 35 per cent decrease in labour disputes in Quebec since that date. This has led to decreased tension in labour relations, and has avoided very awkward situations that would have ended in unacceptable assaults.

To find out what occurred in Quebec before the adoption of anti–scab legislation, one need only remember the Ogilvie conflict. Unfortunately, this company came under the Canada Labour Code which contains no anti–scab provision, and that poisoned labour relations.

Learning from this experience, learning from what has been done in Quebec in this area, it would be very important for Parliament as a whole to pass this anti–scab legislation at second reading.

On October 17, 1995, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said that it was not appropriate to amend only one aspect of the Labour Code, that it was not the best way to proceed, and that the whole code should be revised. I recall last year's statement by the minister who said that we cannot wait forever for the government to act, if it does not take action. I believe that when a member chooses as a vehicle a private member's bill, and proposes an amendment which could improve Canadian legislation, it should be taken advantage of and that he should be given as much leeway as possible.

This kind of legislation, which will make it possible for all Canadian workers to be covered by anti–scab legislation, is something of a sign of respect for workers. In the past, gains were made by labour unions, and also by the population, in Quebec, for instance, where minimum working conditions are set out under legislation which is a bit like the collective agreement of non unionized workers. This is why, if we passed anti–scab legislation which covered federal civil servants as a whole, it would somewhat remedy an unacceptable situation. I think this could be compared to the minimum wage issue.

A few months ago, it was because the Bloc questioned the fact that the minimum hourly wage within the federal government was still four dollars that the government reacted, a few weeks later and rectified the situation by order in council. This is completely unacceptable.

Now we are faced with another situation in which the inaction of the present government and of preceding governments as well is perhaps more of an ideological choice. We have to remember that some of the members of this government voted in favour of the recent anti–scab legislation tabled in the House. A number of these people are now in cabinet, and it would be most inappropriate for them to vote against the present bill.

The advantage of such a private member's bill is that it does not necessarily require party solidarity. It will be a recorded division. So we will have an opportunity to see whether those in favour of anti–strikebreaking legislation a few years ago, who are now members of Parliament, will be consistent and let Canada give itself legislation that—I would like to say, will set the record straight—will give workers governed by the Canada Labour Code the same rights as Quebecers.

This is all the more important given the example we have just seen in Ontario.

The Government of Ontario decided to abolish this right. I believe that in the coming years we will witness disgraceful acts, bodily assaults; relations between employers and employees will grow more bitter and create all kinds of problems that the antiscab bill prevents.

To give a concrete example of this, one or two years ago in Quebec, the Conseil du Patronat du Québec had a favourable judgement from the Superior Court which would have allowed it to have the antiscab legislation quashed by the Supreme Court. We are not talking of a union here but of the Conseil du Patronat du Québec. They thought preferable not to take their case to the Supreme Court, even if they could have won in that instance, because they realised, in the time it took to get that judgment, that, in a majority of cases, antiscab legislation contributes to better labour relations.

Let us remember what happened as regards the definition of essential services. During the first few years, there were a few problems: what should be considered an essential service and who should define them? We used the experience we had gained so far to come up with the most adequate bill possible, in order to give the workers who come under the Canada Labour Code the opportunity to be properly covered and also to give the employers who are subject to this code the chance to enjoy better labour relations.

With an antiscab legislation, we will not have to deal in the future with so many situations as the one we had with the Ogilvie workers.

This is why I would ask members of this House to put their partisanship aside for the second reading of this bill and to determine if, given the way they perceive quality labour relations in the future, in the 20th century, it would not be better to pass this piece of legislation, to promote it internationally and to gain from Quebec's experience in that field?

[English]

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I too rise today to speak on Bill C–317, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act to prohibit the use of replacement employees during a legal strike and to maintain essential services during a work stoppage at a crown corporation or in the public service.

I shall confine my remarks to those matters pertinent to the Canada Labour Code but I would like to say a few words about the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

As members opposite may know, it was under a Liberal government that federal government workers gained the right to strike. However, it was also recognized at that time, 1967, that the rights of federal government employees to strike could not be absolute. There are health, safety and security considerations that come before the employees' rights to engage in job action.

As a result, the Public Service Staff Relations Act provides for the right to strike but it ensures that services which are essential to the health, safety and security of Canadians are maintained during a legal work stoppage. The act does this by permitting the employer to designate three months prior to the notice to bargain the positions that cannot go on strike because they are essential to the health, safety and security of the Canadian public.

In addition, the employer has no right to lock out employees under the provisions of the act. This approach is a reasonable one and it is not clear to me why the member across the way would want to change this.

I read very carefully the member's speech of June 15 when he discussed the intent and provisions of his bill. I really must question some of his exaggerated comments. For instance he says:

> A strike broken by scabs is no strike but a right to strike hypocritically denied. Either we are for the right to strike, a basic right won by workers after many years of fighting, or we are against. If we are in favour, we will not undermine, either directly or indirectly, the workers' sacred right to strike—

• (1400)

Surely the member would agree with me that no right is absolute, let alone sacred. The Canadian citizenry, employers, managers, entrepreneurs and employees, all know there are limits to every right, including the right to strike. That is only common sense. Even the right to free speech is not absolute. To use a famous example, we do not have the right to scream "fire" in a crowded theatre. So it is with the right to strike. It too must have some limits.

I also note that in his speech the member referred a number of times to the three provinces, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, that have anti–replacement worker legislation. The member must be aware that as of last week only two provinces currently have such legislation.

I want to draw attention to the views of a distinguished authority on labour relations, Mr. Paul C. Weiler. For those who do not know this gentleman, he is a Canadian labour lawyer who at one time chaired the British Columbia Labour Relations Board. Under his guidance the British Columbia board was responsible for introducing a number of progressive innovations in labour relations. His work has been praised by neutral observers and union leaders alike.

Mr. Weiler is now teaching labour law at Harvard University. Recently he served as chief counsel to the U.S. Commission on the Future of Worker–Management Relations. I am saying all this because I want to quote Mr. Weiler who wrote:

> For employees who may have spent 20 years with a company building up a wealth of experience and seniority that can rarely be duplicated elsewhere, the stark reality is that if they do go on strike, they can be replaced by the company with people who, in less than 20 minutes on the job, gain permanent priority over the striking veterans.

Clearly the American practice is unacceptable, but while Mr. Weiler is strongly against the hiring of permanent replacement workers, he does not favour the Quebec solution. He speaks about this:

> The type of alternative rule that I favour exists already in Ontario labour law, which grants lawful strikers a right to return to their jobs for a period of up to six months after the beginning of the work stoppage, even if their return will dislodge newly hired replacements.

He states unequivocally that he does not "favour adoption of the recent response of Quebec labour law to this problem" whereby the government "effectively requires employers to shut down at least the bulk of their operations because they are legally prohibited from using any non–managerial personnel to replace strikers".

I am not saying that I agree with everything Mr. Weiler has said, but I do think that the issue is not clear. If this highly regarded expert in industrial relations, as strong a supporter of the collective bargaining process as we will find anywhere, does not favour a ban on the use of replacements, then I as a federal member concerned with the interests of the country as a whole must proceed cautiously and thoughtfully on this question and be open to the arguments and concerns of both sides.

Labour law is about balance among other things. We need to balance the rights of workers with the rights of employers. We need to balance equity concerns with growth concerns. As national legislators we must be interested in policies that increase democracy at work and give greater protection to workers and in policies that encourage the efficient management of enterprises. We must also be sure that we know the priorities of the workers.

There are a number of issues of concern to workers on matters related to labour standards, occupational safety and health, employment equity and industrial relations. These issues are best dealt with through the consultation process involved in a comprehensive and careful review of the federal labour code.

The member across the way I am sure knows that such a review is presently under way in the House. It is a timely undertaking since a complete review of part I of the Canada Labour Code has not been done in over two decades.

• (1405)

Since last winter federal government officials have been having discussions with labour, management, academics and others. The review is now in the capable hands of a task force headed by Andrew Sims, former chair of the Alberta Labour Relations Board, a man well qualified to lead the task force. Rodrigue Blouin from Laval University, and Paula Knopf, a

Toronto based mediator, are the other members of this task force.

The task force is mandated to look into a number of critical labour relations issues including those raised by the member in his bill. I have considerable confidence in the task force and I might add in the Commission of Inquiry on Labour Relations at West Coast Ports. Both are comprised of very knowledgeable, dedicated and highly regarded experts who I am sure will have important things to say on labour relations.

I agree with those who argue that once we have had a chance to study and discuss the findings and analyses and the recommendations of these two groups, we will be in a much better position to decide on the questions that concern the member and indeed all of us in the House.

The review of the Canada Labour Code is taking place while the Canadian workforce is in the midst of profound transformation. We need to take account of new computer technology among other factors transforming our workplace. The emphasis is now on flattened hierarchies, decentralized decision making, flexible production systems, work teams, high quality products and services and continuous learning.

Labour has generally not shown opposition to technological change. However, with the pressures which come to bear on us as Canadian legislators it is important and fortunate for us to have this discussion in the House.

It seems to me that because this change is occurring, reform to the federal law should be studied very carefully. We would not be doing anyone any favours by acting in an imprudent and precipitous manner.

Whatever the merits of the member's bill, those who have been telling the member to wait until the court review is completed are right. It seems to me to be common sense that we wait on those results.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a delight to enter into the debate on Bill C–317, a bill that would cause certain amendments to be made to the Canada Labour Code.

The hon. member who has proposed this bill and its amendments to the code has a very good motivation in standing up to try to defend the workers. The country is very dependent on its labour force in order to continue to enjoy our high standard of living. The bill is certainly in the best interests not only of the workers but also of the companies involved, the organizations, the rest of Canadians and customers both in Canada and around the world. They benefit from Canadian products if the workforce is very well organized and works efficiently and smoothly.

What is being addressed here is the problem of a dispute. What happens when the firm that employs the labourers and the labourers cannot reach an agreement? Sometimes these disputes are over wages. Members will agree that there have been occasions where employers have been unfair to workers with respect to wages. Even more important, there have been a number of occasions where the workers' safety is at risk and the employer is unwilling to spend the money or to take the necessary measures to protect the safety of the workers.

Bill C–317 proposes that if any of these disputes regardless of their origin result in a strike, then as that strike is a hard won right of the workers, it should not be reduced or eliminated by the hiring of replacement workers. To me that is one of the solutions. If we are to provide that workers cannot be replaced, that considerably strengthens the bargaining position of the workers in areas of dispute.

However, we need to ask whether this is the best way of solving the problem. I propose that it is not. While we are saying the worker is having his hamburger taken away from him, what this bill proposes is to simply give him ketchup on the hamburger. What I would like to propose is that we offer that worker a good Alberta steak instead.

What am I talking about? I am talking about ways of dispute resolution. Having worked in this area for a number of years as a representative of people who were employees in a professional association, which to a degree is a euphemism for a union, because we did collective bargaining, I believe very strongly that the very worst way of dispute resolution is that of the strike, because no one wins in a strike. When there is a strike and business is shut down, or in my case the educational institution is shut down, the students, the employees, the instructors, and all of the other employees in the work suffer because of a loss of wages during the time of the strike.

In the case of industry across the country, not only our own domestic customers suffer but our customers around the world suffer when our businesses are put on strike or when our transportation systems fail because of strike or our communications systems are brought down to their knees because the employees refuse to work and no one else is ready and permitted to work in this area.

What then is the solution? If it is not a strike, what can be done? There are many, many other areas of disputes in which we do not resort to strike. For example, if there is a dispute between one of us and our neighbour as to where the boundary should be, we do not proceed to put something in front of their driveway so they cannot get out of the house in the morning. That would not be an acceptable way of solving that problem. Instead, we go to the authorities. We may get surveyors in to make sure the boundaries are clearly marked. When that is done and if your neighbour still does not agree to it, then we may go to a court of law.

I propose, and I have experience in this and it works very well, that what we need to do in the case of a dispute between employees and employers is to have an orderly mechanism that works to solve this problem, so that the workers, the employers, all of the customers, all of the citizens, and indeed our reputation around the world for timely delivery of goods and services can be maintained. It would help us in the long run because of the reliability that would be automatically assumed when people around the world place customer orders with Canadian firms.

I am proposing that we should be using a dispute mechanism that involves some sort of a hearing, a court, an arbitrator, something that is final and binding.

I have had firsthand experience with this. I had the honour of being chosen by my fellow instructors, way back in 1982, to be the founding president of our staff association. I had considerable input. It was not a one–man show by any means, but I had considerable input into the formulation of our first collective agreement, which then became the pattern for all subsequent agreements at the Northern Alberta Institute of Technology, where I worked. Many of the items in that contract persist to this day. One of the things I pressed for very strongly was that we would immediately bargain away our right to strike.

We built into our contract and the constitution of our association a mechanism that provided for a dispute resolution with time lines. So many days prior to the expiration of the contract we had to give notice of our desire to enter into negotiations, and if we did not the employer might. If neither of us did, that was a tacit understanding that we would carry on with the current agreement. After so many days of that happening we had to have negotiators in place. After so many days we had to lay our opening positions on the table. After so many days if an agreement had not been reached we had to name an arbitrator. And so it went. It was all set up in such a way that prior to the expiry of a contract the new contract would be in place by one means or another.

A very important problem developed. With that contract we had an excellent mechanism and did not have any strikes or work stoppages. Unfortunately the Government of Alberta played its hand. I need to say this because there are dangers in this type of a system. When we went to the arbitration system the government passed a law that stated that in the case of an arbitration the arbitrator must take into account the policy of the government. Unfortunately the government was our employer. We were in the situation of being in the boxing ring and our opponent happened to also be the referee, which made it very difficult to get fair settlements from then on.

If the mechanism is truly independent of any pressure from either party so that there can be a really justified way of reducing the problem and dispute to a resolution, that is by far the best way.

If we are not going to go for things like final position bargaining or arbitration as the method of solving labour disputes, we will continue with these very wasteful and hurtful strikes. Instead of supporting this bill, which would only strengthen the dispute mechanism of striking and fighting with each other, I would like to propose the opposite: that we move toward a more rational system of dispute resolution, which would benefit us all.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am highly tempted to dedicate this speech to the government whip, but I will resist the urge.

It might a good idea to remind everyone of what this bill is all about. Thanks are due to the member for Manicouagan for having introduced this private member's bill, the purpose of which is to prohibit the hiring of persons to replace employees of an employer under the Canada Labour Code or of the Public Service who are on strike or locked out.

Why did I insist on reading the purpose of this bill word for word? Because the bill under consideration is a logical follow–up to rights workers presently have, the right to unionize, the right to strike. What surprises me, in the statements I heard from the government majority as well as from the Reform Party, is that they claimed that providing anti–scab mechanisms would hinder any attempt at mediation prior to a strike.

Members will agree that, in a labour organisation, a strike is a final step and it is defined as such by the legislator. No parliamentarian wishes to see strikes become a spontaneous solution in the workplace. Everybody agrees on the fact that any group that goes on strike was forced to do so by circumstances. Adopting antiscab legislation does not spare us the previous steps.

I cannot see why government members as well as our Reform Party colleagues have presented this bill as a rather sorry mess without going into this kind of nuance that we feel is very significant. Worse still, the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister—whom I usually respect and will continue to respect as long as you are in the Chair—argued that this measure was put forward by the Conservatives in Ontario.

First, you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to ask the parliamentary secretary not to quote that government too often. I do not think that government should serve as reference to the government majority unless, as we suspected, blue or red in Ottawa amounts exactly to the same thing and that no distinction has to be established.

Until very recently, three provinces making up 70 per cent of the labour force were protected by antiscab provisions. What did this have as a concrete effect? Two things. As we have said on several occasions an antiscab legislation brings an element of civility, of courtesy to a power relationship that could be tempted to break negotiations. That is the first thing.

What very concrete effect does this have? When we look at the specialized literature on the subject, we learn, and that has been a powerful argument raised by the member for Manicouagan, that in provinces where there are laws such as this one, labour disputes do not last as long. I think this is an objective which must be supported.

It is not the first time that we have a legislation such as this one. In its time, the NDP suggested a similar provision. The member for Richelieu did so in a more recent past. Yet, no agreement was achieved, they were not successful in ensuring that a provision, without being insignificant, would be a tool for the legislator, a tool for those who are concerned with labour relations and a tool for the management of human resources.

What do we say when we are in favour of a provision such as this one? We say that, a few years ago, as a society, the people of Quebec and Canada democratically voted for a recourse, and that is the right to strike. Admittedly, this is a last resort. A strike is never fun for the union, the workers or the employer, because this has to do with carrying out work.

When there is a work stoppage, we can all agree that, unavoidably, the economy in general is affected. This kind of situation is not desirable. Once it has been democratically recognized by a society—and you will recall that, around the time when discussions started, people used to say, even in the public service, before there was a legal right to strike: "The Queen does not negotiate with her subjects". I am sure that those of us who are older will remember. For me, this is history, but some were there when all this was happening.

Once the choice has been democratically made to give workers the right to strike, we, as legislators, have the duty and responsibility to ensure that strikes are carried out with civility and without violence.

When you have workers who get up every morning to earn a living, who must go on strike for various reasons including improved standards and better salaries, and who see their jobs threatened by scabs doing their work, you end up with a potentially explosive situation.

As even the political neophytes among us know, without antiscab legislation all long term strikes involved violence.

We as legislators—and I am sure my colleagues across the way will agree—have a responsibility to ensure that the people who exercice their right to strike, a right that is recognized and well defined, can do so in the right conditions.

I did not quite understand the comments made by the previous speaker, who, as we know, is rather easy to get along with. He seemed to be saying that they would rather try to use existing mechanisms. That goes without saying.

• (1425)

Furthermore, the hon. member for Manicouagan, wise man and experienced parliamentarian that he is, provided in the legislation a sound instrument known as an essential services board. This is to say that, even in cases where the final step, a strike, is taken, it will be recognized that nobody can be taken hostage because a democratic right is used, and that certain conditions have to be met, a notice has to be given and essential services have to be maintained.

Where have all the true Liberals gone? People on the other side—the government whip among them—tell us that they are Liberal in the noble, true and historical sense of the word. They tell us they are Liberals. To be a Liberal, to be a liberal, is to recognize a number of rights in a very clear context.

What are they afraid of? I would like to ask them, through you, why they are afraid of such a bill. Is it because workers will be able to exercise their democratic right to go out on strike? If this legislation is not passed on the pretext that it is incomplete, this will bring us back to a dramatic truth about this Parliament, which is that our labour minister is a time shared minister, a part time minister. A full time minister would have had taken her responsibilities. Since it came into office two years ago, this government has had ample time and opportunity to introduce a major revision of the Labour Code.

We have a part time minister, and the government whip will agree that this is why we are in a deplorable situation where the Labour Code has not undergone a major overhaul.

This is a balanced and democratic bill. It reflects values that are widely recognized in our society.

If the government majority went so far as to oppose this bill, I am sure that the price it would have to pay would be extremely high, both in Quebec and elsewhere, because workers under federal jurisdiction have the right to be legally protected against the possible use of scabs.

You are indicating to me that my time is up. My colleagues will be disappointed, but I will use this last opportunity to urge them to adopt such a bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The hon. member for Manicouagan, who presented this motion to the House, has indicated to the Chair that he would like, if possible, with consent of the House, to take two minutes to close the debate. But I want it to be clearly understood that after the House gives its consent, the member will speak to close the debate, which means that nobody else will be able to speak after that even if there is some time left.

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank, naturally, all those from each party, who made the effort to speak, to express their personal opinions and that of their party.

I am sure we have made progress, ideologically speaking, in many areas. We have also had the opportunity to understand somewhat better the more radical positions of certain other individuals and certain other parties.

I heard certain key words, like "wait". This bill is a bit too early, we have to wait for the upcoming reform. I say that, if we have to wait, why not wait for third reading on this? It might perhaps provide an opportunity for the Code to get out in the meantime. This business about waiting, you know, it is not our fault if we are ahead. We are what we are in the Bloc.

Bill C–317 provides a good opportunity for social advancement and for respect of those who keep the economy moving, that is, the workers, and the employers too, because Bill C–317 has the highest regard for employers, as it indicates.

I would simply like, at this point, to repeat my thanks to all those who felt it was worthwhile taking part.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank all the hon. members for their co–operation. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to the order made earlier today, a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred until Tuesday, November 21, 1995, after Government Orders.

It being after 2.30 p.m. the House stands adjourned until Monday, November 20, at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Orders 28 and 24.

ENDANGERED AND THREATENED SPECIES ACT

The House resumed from June 20 consideration of the motion that Bill C–275, an act respecting the protection and rehabilitation of endangered and threatened species, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, not long ago Bill S–7 was introduced through the back door by the government and passed into law without serious thought about its long term consequences.

With Bill C–275 we again see Liberal environmental policy being brought to the House surreptitiously. Why do I say this? By a curious coincidence, a discussion document issued by Environment Canada last winter contains, almost verbatim, material now incorporated into Bill C–275.

For example, section 9 provides for the prohibition or restriction of any activity deemed threatening to an endangered species on privately occupied land under federal jurisdiction or, with provincial consent, on any provincial lands.

That clearly threatens grazing and timber leases in western Canada. Also, according to the definition in the bill of provincial lands it threatens any private lands registered under provincial law. So much for property rights.

What evidence would the environmental bureaucrats need to designate a species as endangered and its habitat as protected? Pursuant to section 4 the minister would have the arbitrary authority to declare a species endangered. Page 26 of the discussion paper recommends that scientific uncertainty should not be used as a reason not to act.

I will read briefly from this document:

> In cases when high quality scientific data are not available for a candidate species, methods involving estimation, inference and projection are acceptable. The effect of current or potential threats may be extrapolated into the future as long as it can be reasonably supported. If estimates about the status of a species vary, it is appropriate to choose the one that leads the listing in the highest risk category as a precaution.

The sorry state of science in 1995 is that witch hunting bureaucrats are forthrightly recommending that the scientific method be discarded. I think the envirocrats are smoking something and it is not environmentally friendly.

That pamphlet refers to public consultation work shops to be held in cities across Canada. Consultation with whom? Certainly not with the people most likely to be affected, Canada's farmers and ranchers and their municipal councils which brought this matter to my attention.

This document and the bill spawned by it illustrate the typical attitude of Canadian urbanites that rural Canada is their playground, unfortunately cluttered by all those quaint rustics who do nasty things like cultivating land and producing cheap, wholesome food for Canada and for the world.

Much of rural Canada is lawfully owned by those who live there. Urbanite nature lovers looking for pleasant places to have picnics, build fires, ride dirt bikes and dump their beer cans should consider the convenience of doing these things on the lawns of the hon. member for Davenport or the hon. member for Hamilton East. Perhaps then those members would have a more sympathetic attitude toward our much put upon farmers.

Farmers do not have much clout in today's Canada. They made up 30 per cent of the population in 1931 but account for only 3.2 per cent today. They are the real endangered species because in the eyes of Liberal politicians and bureaucratic whiz kids they are irrelevant.

Rural people are as powerless to stop this bill as they were to stop gun control Bill C–68 which the House shoved down their protesting throats last June with no significant input from them. With their feeble numbers they do not matter to a government preoccupied with the electoral map. Like Napoleon, Liberals measure the importance of a group by the size of its battalions.

Legislation of this nature can be counterproductive because it casts Environment Canada in an adversarial role. For example, any farmer with burrowing owls in the pasture would have to be demented to report their presence to anyone. I do not think that we in Canada will ever reach the point that has been reported in Oregon where it is claimed that some woodlot owners shoot spotted owls on sight. When someone's livelihood is threatened, who knows?

Most rural Canadians, especially ranchers in the west, have been very good stewards of the land and most are appreciative of the wildlife which sometimes grazes on their crops and competes with them for native forage. As a result, wildlife populations in the rural west, especially in my riding, are immeasurably larger than they were 50 or even 20 years ago.

• (1110)

Canadians like to poke fun at the endangered species lunacies of our friends south of the border. It has been 17 years since the Tellico dam project in Tennessee was stopped to protect the habitat of the snail darter, a species remarkably similar to scores of others which, in the fullness of geological time, has become extinct. The silliness took place because under the stringent conditions of the U.S. endangered species act the regulators had no choice.

If that act had been literally applied the deliberate international extinction of the smallpox virus could have led to fines or jail sentences for the public health officials who so wantonly and cruelly destroyed the species.

Tens of millions of dollars have been spent down there to preserve the habitat of various rodents, including the Choctawahatchee beach mouse in Florida and the kangaroo rat in California.

When the U.S. fish and wildlife service learned of the presence of kangaroo rats on 800 acres of Cindy Domenigonis' California farm it would not allow her to work her land for three years. That is the direction in which Canada will be heading if this so–called private member's bill becomes law.

Bill C–275 epitomizes the Liberal propensity to regulate, control and run roughshod over individuals who do not have big battalions at their command. I oppose it and I urge anyone who believes in sound science, effective conservationism and the rights of rural people to oppose it as well.

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if there is doubt whether a species is going to be extinct then we want to make sure we make the right decisions and err on the side of caution. I am pleased to speak on Bill C–275, sponsored by the member for Davenport, the chair of the environment committee.

The paddlefish, the swift fox and the blackfooted ferret have one thing in common: they no longer exist in the wild in Canada. The Labrador duck, the sea mink and the blue walleye have one thing in common: they no longer exist at all.

The eastern cougar, the salish sucker, the right whale, the white prairie gentian and the spotted owl are all endangered in Canada. The white–headed woodpecker, the blue ash, the western Atlantic harbour porpoise and the spiny softshell turtle are threatened. The polar bear, the eastern bluebird, the orange spotted sunfish, the pugnose minnow, the prairie rose, the blue whale and the trumpeter swan are vulnerable.

Two hundred and forty–four species of wild fauna and flora are at risk in our country. They suffer from loss of critical habitat, overharvesting, the introduction of foreign species, climate change and contamination from toxic substances.

The time has clearly come for the federal government to set legislation to protect endangered species. The protection of endangered species is the responsibility of all sectors of our society and all citizens in our country. We need legislation in which all Canadians feel a vested interest.

Legislation would call for regulations on the killing, wounding, capturing, collecting or distributing of endangered plants, fish, mammals and embryos. Legislation would also call for Canadian controls on the buying, selling and international trafficking of endangered species.

Canadians want us to throw the book at anyone who tries to make a fast buck from illegally importing or exporting endangered species.

The committee on the status of endangered wildlife in Canada, an arm's length scientific body, would assess species at risk on an annual basis. The Minister of the Environment would be required to establish a list of the species at risk in areas of federal jurisdiction. Response statements outlining planned actions would be mandatory. Recovery plans if required would be prepared within two weeks for endangered species and within three years for threatened species.

• (1115)

Legislation would also permit emergency measures to be taken to conserve and protect species requiring the equivalent to emergency ward treatment. Legislation would authorize the Minister of the Environment to establish funding for conservation agreements with other governments, organizations and private landlords in partnership efforts to preserve endangered species. Legislation would also authorize tough enforcement and severe penalties.

The federal government has a responsibility to set a benchmark for effective endangered species legislation in all of Canada's jurisdictions. That is not enough. We have a responsibility to work with the provinces, the territories and aboriginal people to ensure a comprehensive national approach to the protection of endangered species in all parts of Canada. The federal government is committed to doing its part in this shared enterprise.

Acting alone, the federal government cannot come close to solving all the problems. I want to congratulate Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick for already passing legislation on behalf of endangered species. I also want to congratulate Alberta which has committed to introduce legislation. I particularly want to congratulate wildlife experts, environmentalists, farmers, fishermen, foresters and the mining, pulp and paper and petroleum industries. They are the people on the front lines. They have acted in good faith despite their often divergent interests.

Farmers and aboriginal people, the stewards of the land, must be treated fairly by the new legislation. The maximum number of Canadians must participate in protecting endangered species. We must have a national safety net for species at risk.

As we move toward new endangered species legislation, a very large part of the credit must go to young Canadians. Students from throughout the country have kept the pressure on the government. They have collected petition after petition and they have sent to the Minister of the Environment thousands and thousands of carefully considered individual letters and drawings. We want the continued help and support of Canada's young people in preparing a final bill.

The government's proposed legislation is already on Environment Canada's green lane on the Internet. We look forward to receiving feedback. We want the best possible law to achieve economic growth while preserving the diversity of genes, species and ecosystems that are the biological foundation of the world. We owe that to the endangered species. We owe that to future generations of Canadians.

Ms. Maria Minna (Beaches—Woodbine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to support this bill today.

Canada has a strong reputation in the world in matters of the environment. Indeed, Canada is involved in many international projects to help save the environment, the ecosystems and the species which allow people in the rest of the world to live decent lives in a rich environment.

[Translation]

People in other countries are convinced that our actions show leadership in protecting the planet's biodiversity and species.

The fact is that the human beings with whom we share this earth are counting on Canada to show them the way. We must ensure that our actions are up to our reputation.

[English]

People in the rest of the world have faith in Canada's fundamental decency and commitment to protecting planetary biodiversity. The world believes that we care and that we are acting. Quite frankly the world does not know that Canada is one of the few countries in the world without federal legislation on endangered species.

We have also been moved by Canada's kids. They know we do not have federal legislation and our children through their program "There Otter Be a Law", have been a driving force in pushing Canada to do what it needs to do to protect endangered species.

In my riding I have a classroom of kids who have worked very hard in the last year to protect the bowhead whale. They have sent petitions. They have written letters to the Minister of the Environment and to myself. I have made statements in the House. Today we have a sanctuary for the bowhead whale which is absolutely wonderful. These children have been extremely gratified. When I met with them this week in my riding to tell them what had happened, they felt they had had a wonderful impact on the issue. This is great because they learn a little about democracy. They also felt that it is possible to fight with facts and they felt very gratified. It was very worthwhile.

Since we began looking at protecting endangered species in federal legislation, we have received more than 5,000 individually written and carefully thought out letters from students calling for swift action to protect endangered species.

The classes are in every riding. There is a class also in Iqaluit working on the issue of the bowhead whale. The class in my riding is hooked up to the Internet to work with the class in Iqaluit to discuss the issue of endangered species.

This is a wonderful way to connect Canadians across the country. These children are working for the future of their environment and their space. They have started now connecting and talking to one another in parts of the country. That is one of the most worthwhile things that we can encourage.

Therefore we, as the adults of this country, can only but follow the example. We can no longer leave it up to the children.

In every province and territory and in communities big and small, when we meet with public and high school students, they want to know what governments, businesses, environmentalists, farmers and scientists are doing to ensure a bright future for the beluga whale, the prairie rose, the porpoise, the whooping crane, the leatherback turtle and the polar bear.

[Translation]

We all know, I think, that the future of endangered species has become a major concern not only for young people but also for the whole Canadian population. Canadians clearly understand federal responsibilities with respect to cod and halibut, as well as the economic consequences of the extinction of marine species.

[English]

In the last few weeks every Canadian watched as our skies filled with migratory birds leaving Canada. That rite of fall is part of Canada's psyche. Canadians love those species and regard them as part of what makes us a country.

Canadians understand that when a species disappears, it disappears forever. They do not want Canada to be responsible for making that happen. Canadians understand that when a species disappears, the world loses and when the world loses, humanity loses.

When we deal with the world's environment, we speak of common but differentiated responsibilities. We need to find a means to fulfil both our common responsibilities and our differentiated responsibilities.

For our part, that means we must push for a solid, co–ordinated and co–operative national approach to ensure the survival of species. That is our common responsibility. It also means that the federal government must fulfil its differentiated responsibilities by showing legislative leadership in areas of federal jurisdiction.

Every jurisdiction and every landowner have common but differentiated responsibilities. Each of us must show the maximum leadership possible in our own sphere. We do not need to point fingers at each other. We need to point ahead.

The Deputy Speaker: There being no other members wishing to speak, the hon. member for Davenport is entitled under our rules to briefly sum up.

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make two points. It is customary to thank colleagues on all sides of the House for their intervention, particularly the member for Bourassa, the member for Madawaska—Victoria, the member for Kindersley—Lloydminister, the member for Simcoe North, the member for Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, the member for London—Middlesex, the member for Comox—Alberni, the member for Laurentides, the member for Brandon—Souris, the member for Bramalea—Gore—Malton, the member for Brant, the member for Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington, the member for Beaches—Woodbine and the member for Waterloo.

The intent of this bill is to protect biodiversity. That has been repeatedly indicated by those who want to accept what is its real intent. It aims as well as we can through words and proposed legislation to identify, protect and rehabilitate threatened and endangered species of flora and fauna.

We cover the Canadian territory as we know it. We are well aware that nature does not respect political boundaries. There is a distinct responsibility for any government that flows mainly, as some members have recognized, from the fact that Canada was the first nation to ratify the biodiversity convention in Rio de Janeiro in 1992. As many members have quite rightly pointed out there is a responsibility at the provincial level, at the municipal level and at the federal level because of federal lands, interprovincial movements and international commitments.

Therefore the three levels of government together could do something useful for the benefit of future generations and for the benefit of nature, wealth, for the benefit of le patrimoine, as they call it in French, in terms of protecting threatened and endangered species of flora and fauna.

We know that species when severely threatened disappear from the face of the earth. There is a tremendous concern about the rapidity of this trend. This bill cannot go beyond the scope and the jurisdiction of the federal government. I would like to allay the fears of some members who had spoken earlier about this aspect.

It must be stressed that the bill is being examined by Parliament at a time when the member for Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis and the delegation he led to Indonesia has managed to bring Canada to the forefront of global efforts to protect biological diversity. As we all know, last week Canada won a competition in Jakarta. Montreal will be housing the United Nations secretariat on biological diversity. It is a tremendous development for which we are all proud and for which we would like to congratulate our colleague for Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis.

The secretariat will monitor the 1992 biological diversity convention. It should be remembered and stressed that it has been signed and even ratified by some 150 nations. We are moving ahead with other nations, as well we should. The goal of the protection of the earth's plant and animal species is becoming an urgent item on the agenda.

To conclude, I would like to again thank the members of the House who have participated in the debate and have endorsed the initiative which aims to ensure strong federal legislation on endangered species and preserve biological diversity as it is prescribed by the convention ratified in 1992. It aims at showing respect for other living organisms and ensures that we maintain a rich and diverse ecosystem for the benefit of present and future generations.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Prior to you putting the question, I believe you will find unanimous consent for the following. I seek the unanimous consent of the House that any recorded division that may be asked for later this day, in other words in very short order, on Bill C–275, be deferred until the end of Government Orders on Tuesday, November 21.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

• (1130)

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the unanimous order made a moment or so ago, the division is deferred until Tuesday, November 21, at the expiry of the time provided for Government Orders, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find consent to suspend until twelve o'clock noon, at which time we will commence Government Orders.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to suspend the sitting until noon?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(The sitting of the House was suspended at 11.35 a.m.)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 12.03 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT

The House resumed from November 10 consideration of the motion that Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to put before the people of Canada what I consider to be one of the most disconcerting aspects of the financial situation our country finds itself in today.

Make no mistake that what is happening in Canada today is a result of circumstance. It has far more to do with circumstance than it has to do with ideology. We are talking about how to go about getting the country out of the financial mess it is in. As everyone knows, we are in a financial mess federally and provincially.

As was so clearly illustrated in the Globe and Mail on Saturday in an excellent article on individual and family debt, Canadians by and large are in a financial mess personally. The Globe and Mail article stated that the average family consumer debt in Canada equals 88 per cent of disposable income. This is up from approximately 60 per cent 10 years ago.

The net result is that our federal debt is up, our provincial debt is up, the debt in most municipalities is up and individual credit card debt is up. We find ourselves paying more and more for less and less. All we have to do is add zeros to see that the financial situations of the country and the provinces really are no different from the financial mess most citizens are in.

I can speak with some assurance in saying that most Canadians and certainly those Canadians with whom I am familiar find themselves in an increasingly difficult financial situation. Our incomes have remained fairly stagnant but the cost of living has continued to escalate, even though it is escalating more slowly. We find ourselves being pinched and businesses are being pinched for profit.

What do we do? How do we go about extricating ourselves from this horrid mess? One way the federal government is doing it is definitely a step in the right direction. It is amalgamating the various cash transfers from the federal government to the provinces which are paid in support of people. The transfers used to be separate under education, health, welfare, et cetera and were sent to the provinces with strings attached. These moneys which were transferred to the provinces had to go to individuals specifically and we could track where the money was going.

That was changed in the last budget. Under the Canada health and social transfer act, this money was pooled and is being transferred to the provinces with strings attached. The strings are rather tenuous and not direct. It is pretty difficult for the federal government to tell the provinces: "We gave you the money. These are the national standards to which you must adhere in order to get the money". I do not think the federal government has any right, responsibility or place to send this money to the provinces with strings attached. Who does it think it is kidding? It is our money anyway and it is just being recycled by the federal government.

At any rate, the Liberal government opposite finds itself in the situation where it will be transferring to the provincial governments and then to the people, $7 billion less this year than it did last year. If we think that is tough, wait until the next budget. We still have at least $20 billion to go in the reduction of transfers before we get to a neutral position and we stop going further into the hole. This is the first scratch, the first attempt at fiscal responsibility in the country.

Some provinces in Canada, most notably Quebec, have yet to cross that rubicon. Quebec is still going along blissfully without considering its provincial debt which is $5.7 billion in deficit this year. Just wait until Quebec begins to address that problem.

We recognize the necessity of addressing the debt problem responsibly on federal, provincial and personal levels. How do we go about making sure that the most vulnerable people in our society are protected? That is what I would like to speak to. There has been built in this foundation the necessity for objectively and realistically looking at what we can do to ensure that those who are the weakest and the most vulnerable are protected and looked after in the true Canadian spirit. This is one of the values which is pan–Canadian, a value we all share regardless of our political persuasion.

We share the value that the weakest and most vulnerable in our society should be and will be protected. We are also very much of the understanding that the most privileged in our society are going to have to pay a premium to ensure that those who are the weakest are protected. That is the way it works and that is how we get social order. The only way we are going to have a society that works is if we are prepared to share. I do not think anybody seriously questions that.

What is being seriously questioned is whether or not people have a right to say: "We have always done it this way and therefore, we are always going to continue to get it this way". We are going to have to change things dramatically in order to make sure we are able to live within our means nationally. Recognizing and understanding this and accepting that we are going to accept change, that we are going to have to work with it, how do we go about making sure that those who are least capable of looking to this change and the most vulnerable are protected?

I have looked at this very carefully over the last few months as a member of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. The government has seriously fallen down in its fiduciary responsibility to make sure that the most vulnerable people are at least to a modicum consulted before change happens and that they feel some sense of confidence that when this necessary change takes place they will be protected.

To my knowledge, the government has not convened one single solitary meeting with the provincial governments responsible for delivering the programs to those persons with disabilities; people in wheelchairs, people confined to their beds, people who cannot get around, people with learning disabilities, people with mental or physical disabilities, motion disabilities. These people who are the most vulnerable have not been consulted through the provinces which are responsible for delivering the care and the services.

The national Parliament has said that in the total basket under the Canada health and social transfer $7 billion less is being transferred to the provinces than was transferred last year. That money has to go to education, welfare, a whole myriad of purposes. One of the purposes is persons with disabilities.

People with disabilities already feel vulnerable. Imagine how people with disabilities feel when they see that funding is going to be reduced by such a substantial amount. They are the most vulnerable of the people in the categories to which the funding is going to be reduced.

The federal government has not done a thing. There has not been one meeting with the provinces to say that it recognizes the relationship between the federal government, which is responsible for funding, and the provincial governments, which also fund, but in addition to delivering the programs deliver the bulk of the money necessary to support these programs. How does the member suppose vulnerable people feel if the federal government has not convened one meeting with the provinces to say: "We recognize there are changes coming in the way we fund these programs. Things of necessity are going to change, but let us work together with the consumer groups in the disabled community to make sure the people are protected".

Over the last couple of months witness after witness after witness have come to the committee. They said that because of funding cuts there are people in our country today who are mobility impaired, who cannot get out of bed by themselves, and have been lying in bed in their own waste for hours and hours and hours. There is no funding for people to come in and help them change their linen or even get to the bathroom. This is happening in our country.

We as parliamentarians have a fiduciary responsibility. How we treat the least among us is a measure of the worth of society, the greatness of society. We must look to the most vulnerable people in society and ask how we are treating them and, if we were in that position, how we would want to be treated.

When speaking to people in wheelchairs in the disabled community we realize that any one of us as Canadians could be in a wheelchair tomorrow morning. We need to think about how it would be for us if we were in that position. We must give some extra thought to the absolute necessity of reducing funding to people and transfers to people from all orders of government so that we protect the weakest and the most vulnerable among us.

I appreciate the opportunity to put these comments on the record.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development.

I was quite taken by the member's remarks about looking out for the most disadvantaged. I have stated repeatedly in the House the essence of government. We in the Chamber should not be spending most of our time ignoring the advantaged because they form a very important part of the economic equation of the country. However, we in the House are supposed to be the people who speak for the most disadvantaged. That is the essence of why we are in the Chamber.

I was touched when I heard the member for Edmonton Southwest talk with caring, sensitivity and compassion about the most disadvantaged in the country. I should like to put a question to him and expand my thoughts that are driven by the set of core values of caring, compassion and approachability. I am sure the member believes the same set of principles should apply to young people who are out of work or anyone who is out of work in the country.

Could the hon. member consider building on that same traditional value system by saying that maybe as a government at this moment in time our focus has been too much on the right wing agenda, too much on the cutting, the slashing and the tight fiscal framework to a point where we have basically lost sight of the most disadvantaged? In this case I focus on people who do not have the dignity of getting up in the morning and going to a job, of having enough money in their pockets to pay for their kid's hockey stick or their daughter's clothes or food. Perhaps as a Chamber we should review our right wing agenda and go back to looking after the disadvantaged in a more aggressive way.

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member opposite for the question. I assure everyone here that it was not a set up question. I appreciate the question because it strikes at the heart of what is the difference between members on this side and members opposite. We virtually share all the same values but we do not share how we go about achieving them.

From discussions with members opposite I know the vast majority of representatives in the House share common values. How do we go about providing the kind of society the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood is talking about? How do we get young people working? Why is it that kids cannot play hockey? Why can their parents not afford it even if both parents are working? Why is it so expensive? How do we go about ensuring that everyone can participate in our wonderful nation?

The root cause of the problem can be found in The Canadian Global Almanac for 1996. It shows the per capita accumulated federal debt. In 1975 it was $849 and the interest per capita was $139. Today, 20 years later, the debt per capita is $17,381 and the interest per capita is $1,299. If we multiply that by four members of the family, it does not take very long to realize that we do not have any money.

We could then consider provincial debts and at our credit card debts as families. It costs 15 per cent, 16 per cent or 17 per cent to service credit card debt. We have the situation where most of us as a country, as provinces and as individuals are using today's income to pay for what we have already consumed in the past. Therefore instead of the money being used to purchase goods and services it is being used to service debts.

It makes us wonder when we read the paper today and see that all five of our national banks have record profits. They have $5 billion worth of profit. How do they get that money? They get it from the interest on the debt. The debt goes up and the interest goes up. The amount of interest goes up in real terms even if the rates do not increase. The banks get richer. The rich get richer and the poor get poorer.

People who are able to make financial investments get more money through investing in passive capital investments where there is no risk than people who risk everything they have to start a new business. They put every nickel they have including their homes and everything else into a business to get it going. And what happens? They pay tax after tax after tax.

I sat next to a person travelling from Vancouver to Ottawa yesterday in an aeroplane. He is in the garment business. He is also in the sports and recreation business. He has a fitness business. He is getting out of the fitness business. He said the problem was that it costs $33 a month for people to come to work out. People do not even have $33 a month that they can spend. It has to be dragged out of them. People just do not have any money any more.

Why do we not have the ability to create employment, especially entrance employment for young people, generation X? If they are not gainfully employed they will waste their time, get involved in crime and all other social ills. It is that people do not have enough money to invest in anything other than necessities. Therefore businesses cannot sell, manufacturers cannot manufacture and shippers cannot ship.

Until we deal with the root cause of the problem, which is that we are all broke because we are paying interest on money we have already spent for goods and services, we will not get ourselves out of this mess. We cannot borrow our way out of this mess. If spending money we do not have worked, everybody would have five jobs.

• (1225)

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pursue this thought with the member because I obviously do not see it the way he does.

I have a difficult time understanding the derivatives section of the Royal Bank of Canada. I use the expression its private casino where they play with derivatives and sometimes even bet against the Canadian dollar. I have a difficult time understanding how the derivatives section of a bank can find an average of $30 billion a day to play with and make money. That is one bank. It is said that the derivatives game in the world now involves a trillion dollars a day. This money is being pushed. It is paper pushing all over the world. There is no production related to that trillion dollars a day.

I find it difficult to accept that our largest bank can find $30 billion a day to gamble in pushing paper alone. Yet the small business float for a whole year for the entire small business sector is only $28 billion. I am only talking about one bank.

The issue is not that we must eliminate waste and watch our spending. When we talk about debt we should not avoid talking about the tremendous assets in the country: our resources, our water, our infrastructure and our educated people. We are talking about human resources. Our human resources are recognized as the best on the planet. We have to measure that into the economic equation.

Would the member not agree that when we talk about getting at root causes we must talk about who is controlling all the capital, who is pushing all this capital around the world and preventing a sufficient amount of it from being distributed into the economy where there is true production in the manufacture of goods and services? Does the member not think that is a debate we should have in the House?

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend to know enough about the derivatives market or international finance to be able to respond thoughtfully to the question.

I have a general sense of unease and malaise about the lifeblood of our economy. I do not know it well enough to speak to it therefore I will not. However I know what makes business work, particularly small business, entrepreneurial business, because that is my background. What makes people start a business, what makes people risk a business, what makes people get up in the morning and provide employment, is a chance to make some money, a chance to be one's own boss.

I was out with one of my sons on the weekend. I said: "Always do the best job you can when you are working. You owe that to your employer. But you will never get rich working for somebody else. If you want to get rich you have to work for yourself". Not everybody will do that, but one will never get rich working for somebody else or being a member of Parliament, for that matter.

What makes people get up in the morning, risk everything they have in life and start a new business is the expectation that they will make some money at it. The problem is that it is getting more and more difficult to make money at business or even to do it. Once one has established a business and sells it what happens? How much of the money does one get to keep after paying all the taxes? It is relatively little.

We can look at the difference between passive investment, for instance investing in bank stock or investing finances with no risk, and investing in an entrepreneur with a lot of risk. What do most people do? In my case I could make a decision to invest in stocks, bonds or mutual funds at virtually no risk or I could make a decision to invest in people, which is high risk. I can invest in the people. Because of my tax situation I get virtually no return on it. I can invest in stocks and bonds and get essentially the same return but I have no risk.

Investing in people is by far the best way to go. It is what we need to do for our country. It is what I am going to do as well. I have a situation right here in Ottawa. A person who works with me in my office is from Edmonton. She is unilingual. She has moved to Hull. She lives and is working in Chelsea. She has taken over as a unilingual anglophone a little café, the Café Meech, in Hull near the Gatineau Park.

She has to raise the capital independently because it is not a very bankable deal. She has the fire in her belly that she is definitely going to make it work.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Derivatives.

Mr. McClelland: The point the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood raised is so important to what we are to do as a country to get people back to work, that for first time employment for all our young people have something to look forward to, so that they feel part of the community, so that they have something rather than standing on the sidelines looking in.

The debate the hon. member opposite has suggested is a good one. It is timely. How do we go about doing that? How do we go about getting someone to risk their capital, to get their idea in gear, to get that sense of drive and ambition so that they will start a little widget manufacturing business or a service and will hire one or two people?

That is the way we will get the country working. That is the way we will get unemployment insurance premiums down. That is the way we will take off the dependence on government and make the country work. We have to re–establish that sense of purpose and entrepreneurialism and zeal on a personal basis. country.

The Deputy Speaker: The time has expired for questions and comments, as have the five hours of debate. We are now into 10–minute speeches.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the House that we are debating Bill C–96 but we are also debating the amendment to the bill put forward by the hon. mêmber for Mercier.

That party objects that the bill does not give full and alone jurisdiction over human resources development. That phrase frightens me. Again it shows that the official opposition is pushing its hidden agenda of separating so that it has full powers, full control over human resources and other things.

I draw the attention of the official opposition to recent post referendum polls, which state that 61 per cent of Quebecers want to remain in Canada and 78 per cent of Quebecers want to see major changes to the way the Canadian federation works. It is through bills such as this that hopefully through provincial federal co–operation we can get more people to work.

Last week I had a town hall meeting. There was a qualified veterinarian in the audience. He was from another country. Sadly, he is on social assistance. He does not have a job in Canada.

Two weeks ago I saw a switch from the official opposition to the Reform Party when the member for Calgary Southeast debated this bill and said very little about it. She talked about pensions and everything else.

I was pleased to hear the member for Edmonton Southeast at least talking about the purpose of government being able to help the most vulnerable people in society. He talked about the disabled.

The Deputy Speaker: I am sure the member meant Edmonton Southwest. The member for Edmonton Southeast is the chair occupant and does not participate in debate. This small correction will not come out of the member's time.

• (1235)

Mr. Flis: Thank you for the correction, Mr. Speaker.

I was pleased that the member talked about the disabled because it was this government in the early 1980s that set up a special task force across the country to look at how obstacles could be removed for the disabled. The work of that task force is benefiting many handicapped people today. By removing the obstacles they are no longer handicapped.

The Reform Party criticizes the bill because it does not solve any problems with the Canada pension plan, for example. We all agree there are problems with the plan. The Reform Party knows perfectly well the government takes these problems seriously. I object very strongly to the Reform Party's suggestion that the Canada pension plan is about to collapse.

The government is preparing a working paper which will set out options for reforming the CPP. We will present those options to the provinces which share responsibility in this area. With their goodwill we will negotiate a new and better plan which will meet the needs of seniors not only today but in the future.

Bill C–96 is not about pension plans. It is an administrative bill to establish a department. The Reform Party then takes advantage of this debate to decry the federal plan for gender equality. We make no apology for advancing women's equality by examining initiatives related to economics, autonomy, poverty, employment, education and training. However, this has nothing to do with Bill C–96 which is an administrative bill to establish a department.

The Reform Party members criticizes this bill because it does not radically transform post–secondary education into its strange vision of the future. However, it knows full well that Bill C–96 is not about changes to post–secondary education at all. It is an administrative bill to establish a department.

The Reform Party criticizes Bill C–96 because it does not change the Constitution and prevent the federal government from fulfilling its responsibilities for labour market programs. Even if we wanted to do that, the Reform Party knows full well that one does not amend the Constitution through an administrative bill to establish a department.

The Reform Party and Bloc Quebecois criticize the bill for intruding into provincial jurisdictions and then complain that the bill does not radically alter areas such as education where the provinces do have jurisdiction. Opposition knows full well this has nothing to do with Bill C–96.

Opposition members can try to side track the debate on this bill, throw up smoke screens and parade their own pet theories on every issue under the sun, but let us keep one thing clear. It has been said many times that Bill C–96 deals with consequential amendments to a variety of legislation related to the reorganization of government departments. That is all it does. It is not intended to change the world.

This does not mean the world does not need changing but let us keep a proper perspective on the task at hand. The task at hand is providing Canadians with a department that supplies them with essential programs and services, a department that has been remarkably successful over the past few years in bringing our labour market and social programs out of the past and into the 21st century.

Bill C–96 is about the department that launched one of the biggest grassroots consultations on social programs ever seen in this country, with more than 100,000 Canadians taking part.

It is this department that made the first major changes to the Canada student loans program, changes the Reform Party seems to have ignored. As a result of these changes over 13,000 high school students are getting special grants to pursue their education. One hundred thousand underemployed graduates, twice as many as before, are getting expanded interest relief. The program is costing taxpayers less while students are getting a better service.

It is this department that is pioneering an approach that puts programs and services into the hands of local communities with tools and resources that can be customized by communities to meet their needs.

It is this department that is building the most decentralized service delivery network in any government moving from 450 to 700 points of service, moving it to rural communities across Canada; people can get help where they live.

It is this department that is providing Canada's seniors with four times as many offices where they can get personal service. This is what Bill C–96 is about. It would be useful if the Reform Party and the Bloc Quebecois would talk about the bill and look at what is really going on in the department.

When the member for Calgary Southeast complains that the bill does not eliminate overlap and duplication between federal and provincial services, she should look at the real progress the department is making in building new partnerships with the provinces, with the private sector, with communities across the country. Look at what we are doing in the real world; the work with provinces on pilot projects that test the joint delivery of federal and provincial programs. These are designed specifically to improve efficiency and eliminate overlap and duplication.

Let us get constructive and talk about moving forward that effort. Let us encourage the provinces to join with us in the new agreements that will clarify roles and responsibilities, as we have invited them to do. Let us look at the very essence of Bill C–96, the focus on a better integration of programs and services that is so critical to this effort. By passing Bill C–96 without delay we can move on to address these concerns more efficiently.

Let us not hold up change on the pretext that change is not happening fast enough to suit the Reform Party. Let us not pretend that change is not taking place right now. Everyone in the House knows that real reform in our social and labour market programs is taking place and will continue to take place.

Bill C–96 does not do everything but it is an important step toward getting the architecture right, establishing a department that can provide the highly integrated, focused programs and services Canadians need.

Of all the comments on Bill C–96 from the Reform Party, I can find only one based on fact. Bill C–96 does not require an annual report to be tabled from the Department—alleluia.

Members of the Reform Party appear to be equivocating on this issue. For example, they praise the decision to eliminate the annual report from the department of public works as a move towards greater efficiency, and yet they condemn the elimination of annual reports from Heritage Canada. Let us hear some consistency from the Reform Party.

The government's own view is clear. We want to handle the question of annual reports in the most efficient manner. Section 157 of the Financial Administration Act calls for the elimination of annual reports when the information they provide is duplicated in public accounts or the estimates. That applies in this case. Members of the House will still have access to the information they need to monitor departmental spending through these other resources.

For a party that professes to want grassroots control over programs, the members opposite seem surprisingly tied to the old ways of doing things, or to doing nothing. Bill C–96 is not a defence of the status quo or of outmoded ways of doing things.

The government does not pretend that by passing this bill it can achieve everything it wants to achieve overnight. It is one step along the way. It would be foolish to hold back, to block this important step forward simply because it does not do everything at once. It would be equally foolish to block this step forward because we are afraid of change.

Whatever the Reform Party may think, Canadians want change. We saw that in the referendum, we see it post–referendum, and the government has addressed this. The old ways no longer work. By bringing about change, it does not mean it has to be constitutional change. The way we share services with provinces is a good place to begin.

The government is giving Canadians change, not just rhetoric. With this bill we can move forward. With this bill we can get on with the real challenge of building a more efficient, effective form of government for Canada.

I remind the official opposition and the Reform Party of the realities of today. When I was seeking a job in 1956 after I finished teacher's college, there were about a dozen boards of education that wanted my services. One board was hiring 600 teachers at a time; another, 500 teachers. Boards were recruiting teachers in England, in Australia, in New Zealand. Today teachers graduating with much higher qualifications than I had cannot get a teaching position. They can hardly get their names on the supply list.

There was a time when teachers complained because they did not pay unemployment insurance. The government of the day insisted that teachers should pay unemployment insurance. As a teacher, I supported that move because you never know when you might be unemployed and this is an insurance scheme. Teachers then started paying UI. Today many teachers are benefiting from that.

Because of the changing nature of the workforce and the competitiveness, more and more workers are going to have to move from province to province and require training and retraining. I hope we can count on the official opposition and the Reform Party to give this bill speedy passage.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–96.

As you probably know, barely one month has gone by since the Quebec referendum and already another federalist mask is dropping. Bill C–96 is one of those masks. This government waited till after the referendum to bring this bill back and try to go ahead with it.

Far from signalling the federal government's withdrawal from manpower training, this bill will allow even greater interference in a provincial area of jurisdiction. This government is going over the heads of the provinces. Quebec has been asking for many years to be given full and complete jurisdiction over manpower training. In December 1990, labour and management partners in Quebec joined in a co–operative effort and unanimously took position in favour of repatriating all federal funding for manpower training. There is a consensus in Quebec, and a rather telling one at that. Even the Liberal Quebec government in office at the time agreed with its partners. So, this is not a separatist initiative but rather an opinion shared by the public at large.

Why then does the federal government not listen? Because this government has only one thing in mind: to gain total, perfect control, up, down and sideways. It wants to have all of the powers, even in an area like this one, in which its poor performance is legendary. This is just one more stepping stone.

This government should know that all its centralizing actions ultimately affect people, of course. And it is with people in mind that consistent policies should be developed, and for people that manpower training is offered, so as to increase our manpower's performance.

Here is more good news: last Friday, the Chicoutimi–Jonquière region, in my riding of Chicoutimi, was once again declared the winner because it has the highest unemployment rate in Canada. How nice. How very nice. This shows how incapable this government is when it comes to manpower training.

People in my riding are increasingly tired of winning this dubious award month after month, year in year out. What can the government do to help our economy get out of this mess? It must provide a consistent manpower policy. When faced with unemployment, people must know where to go, and not only to claim UI benefits. I am referring to employment centres, which have now become places where people go to claim UI benefits. People are well aware of that. However, they do not know where, in the future, they will go to find jobs.

The key to the future is a good training program for people in the labour force based on the requirements of the region in which they live. It is certainly not here in Ottawa, far from my region and others, that public officials can determine the best training programs for my constituents. They are too far away, and they do not know about our specific needs. Therefore, the decision making process regarding manpower training must be closer to those concerned.

Bill C–96 will certainly not settle this issue once and for all, far from it. Given the way things are going right now, people in my riding will be even more concerned. In addition to giving powers to the minister, this bill bypasses the provinces. It will give Ottawa the required judicial and legal basis to justify interfering in and encroaching upon manpower training.

This is confirmed by clause 20, which provides that the minister may enter into agreements with a province or group of provinces, financial institutions, municipalities and such other persons or bodies as he considers appropriate. Since the minister is in charge, will financial support follow, or is this just a ploy by the federal government to shift its problems?

This bill does not make it compulsory to reach an agreement with the provinces. Again, the number of stakeholders is being increased at a time when joint action is taking place in this sector. The bill will make things even more complicated for those involved. Dividing budgets among a variety of groups, chosen, goodness knows how, by the minister, is not the way to establish any degree of cohesion in training programs.

Will these groups have the necessary expertise? And when will the single window approach materialize? This is not the first time the Bloc has brought up one–stop service. As it now stands, Bill C–96 does not guarantee it.

I believe that is what could make the difference. The single window approach is essential. It would ensure that the reform would be focussed on the individual. Making the individual the focal point of the reform cannot help but be beneficial from the job creation point of view.

It is also beneficial for our young people, who do not always know what training would be best for their future. For years Quebec has been demanding full jurisdiction over manpower. There is plenty of proof that the federal government has missed the boat in the way it has managed this.

Mr. Speaker, you are indicating to me that I have only a few seconds left, so I shall close with the following remark. Last October 5, in response to a question on this bill from the leader of the official opposition, the minister stated—and his words are recorded—that we ought to have read the bill.

Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, we have read the bill. And not only Quebecers have read it, moreover. The Minister of Human Resources Development should—and these are my closing words—redraft his bill. I shall vote in favour of my colleague's amendment.

[English]

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak this morning on Bill C–96.

Clause 3 of the bill states:

> There is hereby established a department of the Government of Canada called the Department of Human Resources Development—

Perhaps the most remarkable part of the bill is the very name of the department it creates: "Human Resources Development". Those three words stand for one of the most critical challenges and also one of the greatest opportunities facing Canadians today. They stand for one of the most basic beliefs underlying the government's commitment to Canadians.

We believe that Canada has enormous potential, economically and socially. We believe that people, our human resources, are the key to unlocking that potential. It is the talents and skills of people that have made this country one of the most prosperous nations on earth. It is those same skills and talents that will secure for Canada and Canadians a prosperous future.

By investing in people, by developing our human resources, we want to ensure that every Canadian has a chance to take part in the future. We want to ensure that every element of the social programs works toward that goal. That focus is what the new department is all about. It is about helping the people who need help the most, by giving them the tools they need the most, by giving them a chance to overcome the barriers of poverty, a chance to gain access to good training and skills and a chance to get good jobs.

Throughout the social security reform consultations we have been asking Canadians how to focus our social programs better to achieve that goal. It has been going on throughout the Department of Human Resources Development over the past year as departmental officials have worked to sharpen the focus of programs and services to make them more effective. It is going on right now as we develop the new human resources investment fund, which will lead to greater decentralization in this area. We will be working more with our partners at the local level and will be reducing the 39 current programs to a handful which can be hand tailored to local needs.

Social security reform will continue to evolve as the government prepares legislation to refocus the UI program and integrate the lessons it has learned from consultations into departmental operations.

If members want to see social security reform in action as an example of focusing resources on investing in people, they can take a look in my riding at the Bedford Professional Training Services. With this program each project consists of a mix of classroom and on the job training in modern office management. Many of the trainees are older workers who have been displaced from their former employment. In addition to learning new skills, they must deal with low self–esteem, grief, embarrassment and frustration which accompany a midlife job loss, as we all know well. A strong counselling component is built into the training package to address these issues.

The co–ordinator of the program, Fran Hill, is to be commended for her excellent work. In fact the placement rate for this program in its first two projects was 90 per cent. Ninety per cent of those people who were actually in the program were placed in jobs. That is excellent and is to be commended. One former trainee has successfully started her own business and is now employing another of Fran's graduates.

These people do not want handouts from the department. They want jobs and they want help getting the tools and skills they need to get on with their lives. That is what they are getting at places like Bedford Professional Training Services. They are getting a second chance at education and learning skills for new jobs. That is just one example of the strategic initiatives we are undertaking to refocus the department's resources away from the status quo toward real, productive and meaningful change.

I will give another example. Let us look at the communities of Lucasville and Upper Hammonds Plains which are two minority communities in my riding of Halifax West. These communities have benefited tremendously over the past two years working closely with the Bedford Canada Employment Centre.

Through a section 25 program a UI recipient prepares a strategic development plan. Right now they are arranging for community consultation on this plan but they will soon begin the initial stages of implementation. Part of that plan involves tutoring programs which have already begun and have been very successful.

Through the Youth Services Canada summer program, students, including eight from the summer program and four in the career placement program, did two activities. The first involved recreation services in the communities. The second involved renovations of homes, churches and community centres in those communities but according to priorities which were established at the local level by the people in those communities. That is a very important point.

The curriculum they used was developed with funding by the delivery of systems project of the department. The curriculum works to improve educational standards. It gives the area the capability as a remote learning centre. It will actually start in the middle of this month.

There are many examples like these across the country that reflect the new focus and direction of the department. We can see it in the assistance that thousands of Canadians receive every day in our network of CECs, Canada Employment Centres, across the country. Thousands of Canadians who need help to get the training, the jobs and income support they need are helped in these centres.

We can see it in the hard work and dedication of some 30,000 departmental employees. I want to mention one in particular with whom I worked over the past couple of years and who retired this summer. Keith Cameron was the manager of the Canada Employment Centre in Bedford. I was very impressed by his commitment to the community and his commitment to work.

In fact on Canada Day in 1994 I visited Upper Hammonds Plains. There on a day off was Keith Cameron coaching the local ball team. If that is not commitment to a community that needs assistance and needs involvement, I do not know what is. To me that shows the kind of dedication and commitment of many of the employees of the human resources development department. It is an excellent example for others to follow.

Day in and day out, people like Keith Cameron and other departmental employees are working with people who are looking for jobs. They help mediate labour disputes. They help communities with economic development. They help young people get started in the world of work and help seniors benefit from income support programs.

This new focus of the department is an integral part of the human resources investment fund established in the last budget. They work closely together. The whole point of this fund is to make the most flexible use possible of our resources to ensure that people get the support and services they need to find jobs, jobs that they want desperately.

• (1305)

For example, this fund will support the government's commitment to child care, a crucial measure to help unemployed parents find work and get training. We made a commitment to co–invest with the provinces in child care and we will live up to that commitment.

We are also working to improve the child care that is available to aboriginal peoples. Our officials are working with a team from the First Nations. Together we are making good progress. The government hopes to have a new program in place this fall.

Additionally the department has launched the child care visions fund with $5 million annually. The money will be used to help support new research and development in this area which is so very important to Canada's future human resources potential.

These are some of the ways the new focus of the department is reflected in concrete action. In the immediate future one of the government's top priorities will be to integrate this focus into the unemployment insurance program with a major overhaul of the program.

A few weeks ago the Minister of Human Resources Development spoke to the human resources standing committee about the direction this overhaul is going to take. A key objective of the overhaul is to transform the UI program to focus on re–employment not unemployment, on jobs not joblessness. This means finding ways to remove disincentives in the program that hamper job creation and discourage workers from returning to the workforce. It also means simplifying the system for both workers and employers, making it easier to work with and less costly to administer. It means integrating the UI program with a variety of tools to help people get back to work.

The government will introduce legislation to reform UI in the next few weeks but the department is already working on the basic operational changes needed to make the integrated employment program work and succeed. This means streamlining the current 39 separate programs and services that are delivered through CECs across the country and integrating them in a way that allows the communities to implement them in different ways. That seems to be very appropriate.

The objective is to ensure the department's energies are driven not by program rules but by the needs of individual Canadians in different parts of the country. There will be much more room for discretion and judgment at the local level which is important. If we want to tailor re–employment programs to fit local needs, we must have that kind of local discretion.

Bill C–96 does not in itself accomplish these changes. What it does is consolidate the administrative framework for changes that have taken place, are taking place now and will continue to take place in the future. It reflects the basic focus that underlies the government's approach to social and labour market programs. It is this focus that will help to develop Canada's human resources giving those who need help the most tools they need to work and prosper in the future.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I join the debate on Bill C–96, a bill which sets up the Department of Human Resources Development. I would certainly hope the kinds of remarks and words my hon. colleague across the way has just expressed will come to fruition, at least in part.

This bill, which is a structural kind of bill to set up a department, takes place in the environment we find ourselves in as far as Canada and the world is concerned. It deals with things such as the fact that we live in an information society. Taking place around us is a technological revolution toward a knowledge based economy. There is the globalization of politics, industry and trade. There is a move toward the devolution of power to individuals. There is a gradual recognition that the past is not a model for the future.

There is an express need now for a new federalism. We are very well aware of that having just experienced the referendum in Quebec. All of society must be involved, not just the elite. This hinges on a very major part. We need to recognize that if we are going to have real change in our country, it is going to come from the rank and file. It is not going to come from the top down. We have had enough of that. That model is not working, has not worked and will not work in the future.

What do we need? This is where the bill lacks a lot of its input for Canada's society and for the government. Canada needs the development of people. We need an innovation and technology orientation. We need to have an infrastructure in science and engineering. I will only deal with those three areas. Many more ought to be addressed but those are the three I will limit my remarks to this afternoon.

If we are going to develop people successfully, the number one requirement as we move from the old society to the new information and knowledge based society is the ability to change. Individuals will have to have the willingness and motivation inside them to learn continually and to do so in all aspects of life.

I was rather impressed with the Electrical and Electronic Manufacturers Association which has a very interesting set of requirements for people who need to be up to date in their industry. The association says that some of the best programs are those developed by the industry on the shop floor as the best learning takes place on the shop floor.

Those are the two elements: the ability and willingness to change and subsequently the willingness to learn and to do so on a continuing basis. It goes beyond that. We need to develop people who have the ability to handle the technological and social aspects of living and working. We are developing some very competent people in the technological area. We are not developing them as a balanced position in terms of handling their social and other situations.

Let me alert the House to the findings of Maclean's magazine which just did a poll ranking all the universities in Canada. It became pretty obvious on listening to various people that what individuals require today is the ability to do technical work very effectively and at a very high level. However at the same time they need to be able to balance their home life and their primary relationships with other people. We need this balance in people but we need more than that. We need technological development in areas that are not presently being developed.

It was rather interesting to listen to some of the captains of industry say that they need emphasis, willingness and ability in people who deal with computers and the skills required to do that successfully.

Today there is the breakdown of our families. If there was ever a need for the family to be strongly structured it is in this situation where constant learning is required. When there is a need to change there has to be a place where there is quiet, comfort and security. That comes from strong interpersonal relationships which are best found within the family. As we develop these other aspects, the high technical skills, we need to develop the reason and the basis for strong families and strong primary relationships.

In order to achieve that what is necessary? We need a balanced education system, one that encourages an entrepreneurial spirit which shows people how to be entrepreneurs. We live in a culture that encourages entrepreneurship and rewards the risk taking that is incumbent upon those who venture out in their own businesses. We then need to develop that skill and ability for people to blend economic and management awareness with science and technology.

It is so easy to become focused in a very narrow area of a science or technology and forget that unless we can manage people it does not matter how good we are at running machines or computer programs. We have to learn to manage people. In the new high tech industries that seems to be the area which is most in need of development.

It goes beyond that. We need to have a balance among educational institutions. There are hundreds of universities in this country. They seem to spring up all over the place. It seems to me that parents want their kids to go to university. That is the best. The summum bonum of all education aspirations is graduating from university, preferably with a Ph.D. That is not necessarily the requirement for technological development. We need to balance our institutions so we focus on the highly academic skilled people but also develop the person who can do the actual technical stuff of putting a computer together, of writing a computer program, of recognizing the interrelationships of computer networks and things of that sort.

We need more than just university institutions. We need other post–secondary institutions. We have technical institutions such as BCIT, the Northern Alberta Institute of Technology and institutions of that nature, but we need a group that goes in between those as well, which brings a level of sophistication and understanding of a Ph.D. but that is not a Ph.D. in the academic sense, but rather in the technical and science sense, as contrasted with existing university programs.

There are two specific suggestions I now draw to members' attention. The first is it is necessary for us to examine, validate and help diffuse or reject research studies prepared by other organizations and build on valid work by undertaking or commissioning research to study the linkages between education and the economy, the forecasting of skill requirements, international comparisons, quality of education and training, gender and equity policies, student learning styles and core curriculum.

The second is to facilitate linkages between all levels of the education system: business, labour, government, the community, social services, non–governmental organizations. If we move into that kind of environment we will do away, or at least certainly reduce, the town/gown conflict that exists now between the university professor on one hand who rests primarily on his seniority to maintain his position rather than on new ideas. We have some wonderful professors who have great seniority and who rest on that thing. A lot of them need to change their lifestyle and have a new orientation.

We also need to develop a receptivity among our companies, our various industries, that they will take and integrate into their operations the best practice technologies. Then we can play the leadership role that Canada is capable of in the development, commercialisation and marketing of technology. The challenge is ours. We can do that.

Another area I draw attention to is developing the science and engineering infrastructure. We need to again emphasize the excellence required in education, the excellence in skill development and a vibrant research department.

The complexity of the relationships among research, education, skills training, innovation and competitiveness is not to be denigrated. It is extremely difficult and it is the one area where we have not done a good job. This bill should have addressed those kinds of things. It did not.

Universities, community colleges and technical institutes must re–examine their missions, establish clear goals and improve the mobilization, allocation and management of their resources to achieve these goals.

Consideration should be given to the complementarity between the program offerings of colleges and universities as well as to greater differentiation between the roles and missions of each institution. Concurrently there must be a review of post–secondary funding in view of redefined missions. This review should result in a clear definition of goals, outcomes and increased accountability.

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a pleasure to be here today as the member for Portage—Interlake in Manitoba and speak about Bill C–96, the act which will formally establish the new Department of Human Resources Development, a department for which my close colleague and fellow Manitoban, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, is responsible.

Some might ask why the Secretary of State for Science, Research and Development would be particularly interested in talking on Bill C–96. There are several reasons. First and foremost, the bill brings together people and resources in a new way, a way that will position the Government of Canada to play a more effective role in human resource development.

The bill is central to a redefinition of the role of government in Canada, a role that improves the ability to form partnerships, to share resources, to enhance local and national understanding of the issues and to use national networking and research to ensure effectiveness and accountability.

• (1320)

It is a paradox perhaps of our age that governments, like computers, must cost less and do more at the same time. Sharing powers through partnerships, bringing groups and resources together at the local level is the process this bill enables, a process essential to meet the challenge of our times.

The process is now operating in many locations across Canada: at the new Learning Centre in Portage la Prairie, at the Learning and Life Centre in London, Ontario, at le Centre de resources humaine de Matagami in Québec, and in many other areas.

Sectoral partnerships like the Automotive Repair and Service Council, the Canadian Steel Employer's Council, partnerships with industry leadership, are further examples of sharing, decision making and resources through partnerships.

[Translation]

Decentralization and a sharing of powers through partnerships, a regrouping of stakeholders and resources locally, this is what the DHRC is about and this is what Bill C–96 will enable us to continue doing.

[English]

We now live in the knowledge age, a time when an understanding of science and technology is vital for the development of human resources. This has happened for several reasons. More and more of the employment and the business opportunities of today depend on a knowledge of science and technology.

Over the last five years there has been a net gain of more than a million jobs for those with a college or university education but a net loss of more than 600,000 jobs for those with only high school training or less.

Employment in some science and engineering based areas, computer science, software engineering, advanced materials, biotechnology, environmental technology, are now and continue to be among the fastest growth areas for employment. Just being able to use a computer well in one's job has been estimated to provide a 15 per cent additional income benefit compared to a similar worker without such skills.

Science and technology are important as well because they are increasingly essential for the efficient delivery of government services. In Portage—Interlake constituents have historically often had to travel long distances to get to the nearest Canada employment centre.

Constituents from Ashern, Gypsumville, Dauphin River, Peguis, Fisher River, Jackhead and many more communities have had to travel two, three, four hours one way to get to the nearest Canada employment centre.

Fortunately due to the advance in technology and the foresight of the Minister of Human Resources Development it will not be long before employment kiosks are much closer so that increasingly constituents will be able to receive effective service in their own communities, as the citizens in Stonewall in my riding already do.

We look forward to the day when such service will be provided cost efficiently over the Internet to all people in their own communities. The government's community access program is providing rural communities across Canada the opportunity to get connected and to be served effectively at home.

Science and research are also increasingly essential to the design and the implementation of programs through the human resources development department.

As the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology emphasized in its report "Health, Wealthy and Wise", all levels of government need to evaluate the effectiveness of their programs and the efficiency of their delivery. They need to begin to understand the underlying causes in order to reduce the overall demand for remedial social programs.

NABST further emphasized that social science humanities research may be the key to responding to these issues. NABST singled out the self–sufficiency project of the human resources development department as an example of the sort of critical action research needed, testing by doing.

Numerous strategic initiatives now being undertaken by the human resources development department follow in the same fashion. Examples include the taking charge initiative in Manitoba, helping single parents on social assistance, and the improved access to child care initiative in British Columbia, a four–year project to test new ways of delivering and developing child care services.

• (1325)

The Government of Canada is not taking the lead in any of these initiatives. We do not want to take the lead. It is the results of these partnerships that interest us.

[English]

It is the creation of the human resources department in its present structure and the leadership of its present minister which have allowed the effective integration of sophisticated social science and program design so that we can expect to see for the first time with the upcoming reform of the unemployment insurance system an overhaul which has effectively used science based testing to ensure a better and far more effective program.

Science and technology in the development of human resources are only effective to the extent that they are used wisely and are balanced by the ability to develop critical human elements, ethics, discipline, creativity, hope, courage, self–esteem, compassion, tolerance, diversity, co–operation and team work.

It is also these elements which are important and can be nurtured within the focus of the new department which is focused on co–operation and partnerships, sharing resources and decision making, targeting these values. Our bottom line is that we must advance in the development of human values even as we advance in science and technology for economic purposes. To make wonderful developments in science and technology for economic goals alone but to fail to make the same developments in social and human sciences would be like a see–saw with all the weight on one side.

In this context it is appropriate to mention today, national child day, the important role the newly developed human resources development department can and is playing in nurturing the children of Canada.

Let me use an example of an effort in my riding of the newly opened learning centre in Portage la Prairie. It offers technology to help provide citizens with an alternative learning mode, including self–directed computer based learning, for all levels from grade 4 through first year university. The facility is of relevance to single mothers and their children.

As noted in the statistics reported last week, some 56 per cent of single mothers in Canada live in poverty. These mothers and their children deserve and need our attention. At the Portage learning centre they are receiving it. It is coupled with a day care facility which enables single mothers to be full participants and to learn new skills and to enhance their success in the participation in the job market and to enhance their income.

This example and many others like the improved access to child care initiative I mentioned earlier are important building blocks for our society and our children tomorrow.

Let me now return briefly to the theme I began with, a new department with a new approach, decentralized in that it shares resources and decision making in the most effective ways. This approach allows the rapid emergence and development of creative local initiatives to respond to local needs, and yet at the same time provides a nationally networked department which can share experiences, best practices and test results from new initiatives from one end of Canada to the other.

Today, the government has begun an in–depth reform of our labour market and social security programs, by creating a system of employment for the 21st century.

[English]

As a government we started the process of reform from the ground up. We have engaged almost 100,000 Canadians directly in deciding how to deal with unemployment insurance, how to deal with job programs, how to deal with issues like employment equity and child care.

The result will be a job system built by Canadians for Canadians. The result will be a system preoccupied not with turf wars but with results and getting things done. The result will be a system run by partners who can get those results. The result will be a system that favours the creation of employment in the wealth creating private sector rather than enlarging the government sector.

That is what Canada needs and that is why the government is creating through Bill C–96 a new Department of Human Resources Development and ensuring its mandate.

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux–Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as soon as the all clear sounded on October 30, the government rushed to release a flood of centralist and/or antisocial bills. These bills had been ready for some time, but it would have been poor timing to table them before the referendum and in the process cause many voters in Quebec to turn away from that great and beautiful Canada of ours in the privacy of the voting booth.

It was a close call for Ottawa, but now that it has managed, just barely, to negotiate this rocky stretch, the government can at last heave a sigh of relief and calmly pursue its usual goals. Can a leopard change its spots? Of course not. So, full speed ahead, towards an even bigger and more beautiful Canada which, according to this government, means even more centralized and antisocial.

The promises to decentralize, made in a prereferendum panic, are now gone with the wind of victory, slim though the margin was, and too bad for the believers who naively voted no.

Remember the last days of the referendum campaign, when the polls made them break out in a cold sweat and federalism's big guns sang the hymn to decentralization. They understood what we wanted, they chorused, and they loved us. Time would tell. From now on, provincial jurisdictions would be respected. If we voted no, there would be no more wicked ministers trying to graze in the greener pastures of provincial jurisdictions.

After the majority voted no, the very first thing this government did, as if to make it abundantly clear to those who had not yet understood how they had been tricked, was to table the bill before the House today. A real masterpiece of centralization and leap–frogging over the heads of the provinces. The no side won, which means there is no longer any incentive for Ottawa to respect us. Here comes the first wave over the dam, Bill C–96, loaded with new powers Ottawa has the effrontery to assume in the field of manpower training, thus ignoring not only its own promises but also a general consensus in Quebec including even the Liberals.

Until now, the minister could not sidestep the provinces altogether in this area, to enter into agreements with financial institutions, persons or bodies, as the minister considered appropriate. This was of course intolerable. It was high time the referendum was over with, so the government could finally do something about this. Otherwise, people would start thinking that Ottawa respected the powers of the provinces.

Some will say that one swallow does not a summer make. One centralist bill is not necessarily a harbinger of all out centralization. It is true, but, believe me, you can trust the government, a whole flock of swallows is on the way. Bill C–96 is merely a forerunner, Bill C–95 is already peeking out from behind it. This bill not only gives birth to the Department of Health, it is giving it as a christening gift comfortably broadened ministerial powers.

Before long, we will also be seeing Bill C–98 with which the government is giving itself environmental control over the oceans and also the waters that flow into the ocean. Now, since all waters flow into the ocean—

In short, ever shrinking transfers to the provinces and ever expanding involvement in provincial jurisdictions. Pay ever less and control ever more: this is the incredible policy of our colleagues opposite. How long, we wonder, will the other provinces meekly go along with this little game.

If they accept another round of cuts to their rights without flinching, it makes little sense to me, but, after all, it is their business. However, this steam roller of a centralizing and antisocial legislation whose rumblings we hear, this campaign that they have just boldly launched against provincial prerogatives now that they have nothing more to fear, this bellicose rumour arising from the ranks of the Liberals, can you see how clearly it is revealing the intentions of the Prime Minister when he talks about unearthing old legislation that has fallen into disuse?

The aim, as everyone will see, is to prevent Quebecers from holding a third referendum when the time is right. All the Quebecers who were misled into voting no because they believed in the promises made are very likely to change sides, do you not suppose, and vote yes after the steam roller has gone by. At that point we will be able to assess the damage done to the social safety net and to provincial jurisdictions. What kind of reaction can we expect from Quebecers faced with the inflated arrogance of the federal government as it sports the new powers it has snatched from the provinces like new plumage?

One day we will be sovereign, because one day a majority of Quebecers will understand. Believe me, they will not be misled again by excessive flattery before the referendum only to be pistol whipped after. This is why those opposite want nothing to do with a new referendum. Bill C–96 will at least begin to open the eyes of the half of Quebecers who have yet to understand.

[English]

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to Bill C–96, a bill which talks of partnership, of collaboration between the federal and provincial governments, of the need to develop our greatest asset, human resources.

I know firsthand from my constituents in Saint–Denis that we must develop efficiently this important resource in order to meet the challenges facing Canada in the 21st century.

Questions have been raised about the powers granted to the minister in this bill, specifically with respect to clause 6, which sets out the mandate of the department. They suggest that somehow this clause allows the federal government to intrude on matters of provincial jurisdiction. I find myself puzzled by some of those questions. I wonder if we are all reading from the same bill or do some members opposite have their own private version that they would like to share with us.

In my copy of the bill, clause 6 has a very important and very clear phrase that puts definite limits on the minister's powers. It limits those powers to "matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction". What part of that phrase is unclear?

By some kind of hocus–pocus, members opposite read that phrase and it comes out "matters over which the provinces have jurisdiction". That is just plain nonsense. It is not what the bill says. It says just the opposite.

[Translation]

In fact, Bill C–96 does not affect federal and provincial powers in any way. It does not give the minister any extra powers or undermine those he already has. All the powers now granted to the minister under the law will remain the same.

Bill C–96 does not create any new programs or bring any substantial changes to those that already exist. All programs and services in effect the day before this bill is passed will remain the same.

There is no ambiguity in this. There is no doubt whatsoever. Whichever way you look at it, this bill does not grant any new powers. This encroachment exists only in the fertile imagination of those who would like to see such an encroachment.

[English]

Perhaps some members would be more comfortable if clause 6 spelled out in laborious detail all the specific programs offered by the government. That is certainly an option but it is an option the government decided would be ill–advised and counterproductive.

We are dealing with a very large department and with a wide range of programs and services. Enumerating all those programs point by point would take pages and in the end nothing very positive would be accomplished.

• (1340)

The whole direction of the department, of the government, of governments at all levels and indeed most business organizations is to stay flexible and ready for change. At a time when flexibility, streamlining and efficiency are so important, it makes sense to set out the responsibilities of the department in a better way. That is what clause 6 does. It sets out the basic objectives of the department: enhancing employment, encouraging equality and promoting social security. These objectives are very clear. They are very important and are within the jurisdiction of this Parliament.

The people who use our programs every day, whether they are in Newfoundland, Quebec, Manitoba or British Columbia, do not want the federal government to shirk its responsibilities. I trust that no one in the House is suggesting that we do so.

At the same time, we all recognize that there is room for more productive partnerships between all levels of government. We recognize the need to clarify roles and responsibilities in labour market development. That is why we have made it very clear that as we proceed with social security reform, as we put a new unemployment insurance program in place, as we develop a new human resource investment fund and the Canada health and social transfer, we are open to change.

We are willing to take a hard look at who is in the best position to deliver programs and services most efficiently. It may well prove that some programs managed now at the federal level can be better managed by others: the provinces, private sector partners or community groups.

The federal government wants to work with Quebec and all provinces with an open mind. We are really not interested in turf wars. We are interested in working with our partners in a constructive way to meet common goals and serve Canadians.

[Translation]

Let us consider the agreements already concluded between HRDC and Quebec: the interim Canada–Quebec agreement on certain manpower development measures; the agreement on the implementation of a deal affecting welfare recipients; the Canada–Quebec agreement on agricultural employment; the block funding granted Quebec under the Canada student loans program, to name but a few.

These umbrella agreements may not be perfect, but they work. They directly affect the lives of thousands of people in that province.

[English]

The whole thrust of HRDC activity is to strengthen those partnerships and to decentralize power away from the centre to the local level. Labour market programs and services are already among the most decentralized of all federal programs. We are decentralizing them even further with a new, modern service delivery network firmly rooted at the local level in communities across this country.

The federal government is also committed to working with the provinces to provide the most flexible services possible to Canadians.

[Translation]

For example, the Canada transfer for health and social programs will give Quebec another source of funding for measures such as the parental wage assistance program or PWA, which cannot be funded under the old system; the provincial sales tax rebate to welfare recipients, which does not come under the old system; a nutrition program for disadvantaged children, which cannot be funded under the old system either; as well as transportation services for handicapped people, without having to assess the needs as would be required under the old system.

[English]

Because clause 6 of Bill C–96 sets out the department's mandate in terms of general objectives rather than the minute details of existing programs, we will have this kind of flexibility. It provides a basis for a more efficient department and clears the way for continued evaluation and reform down the road.

[Translation]

Diverting the course of the debate on this bill by inventing jurisdictional problems—by finding in clause 6 words that are obviously not there—is doing a disservice to thousands of Canadians across the country who benefit every day from the services provided by the Department of Human Resources Development.

It is doing a disservice to the million Quebecers throughout that province who rely on and use this department's services, to the people who come to our human resources and student employment centres, who register in our employment programs, who receive unemployment insurance, who benefit every day from the $14 million that HRDC spends in Quebec on an annual basis.

• (1345)

[English]

Canadians are entitled to the best possible services. They deserve the kind of integrated, focused, practical programs that HRDC is working to deliver, and Bill C–96 is important to that effort.

Let us not sacrifice good, productive service on the altar of rhetoric. In the end all levels of government are striving for the same goal: to help people find and keep good jobs. That is what is important. That is what we promised as a party and that is what we are delivering as a government.

I have numerous examples in my riding of programs that work. Young people who had no future, who had no hope for the future, are now in programs financed by the department. I have the example of 13 young high school dropouts who are now in a program that is a collaborative effort of the federal government and the private sector. All 13 of them will have jobs the minute that program ends.

We need to consolidate the progress we have achieved in integrating social and labour market programs and sharpen the focus on developing Canada's human resources. More important, we need to clear the way for further progress as we launch the new employment insurance program, as we develop new programs and services under the human resource investment fund, as we work to improve programs for seniors, and as the department continues to re–engineer and streamline services to Canadians.

It is important to clear up the administrative tangles left over from earlier times. It is important to establish a clear identity and coherent mandate for the new organization to function properly. It is important to ensure that as the department looks to the future there is a solid foundation to build on. As I said earlier there are numerous programs by which we want to build a solid foundation for the young people of the country. For instance, the youth services program in my riding has helped a number of young people have hope for the future, as I said earlier.

Bill C–96 provides that foundation. We need to pass the bill and get on with the work of serving Canadians.

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to the government's Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development.

The bill basically does little more than transfer legal powers from the former Ministry of Employment and Immigration to the new department. In summary, the enactment establishes the Department of Human Resources Development with a presiding minister to be appointed by commission under the Great Seal of Canada, with the powers, duties and functions as therein set out, and a deputy minister to be appointed by the governor in council with provision for employees. It also provides that a minister of labour may be appointed and that a deputy minister of labour may be designated. That is it.

With all the huffing and puffing the minister of human resources did regarding his intentions for social reform, Bill C–96, all 44 pages, does very little but change the name of the department and continue as usual.

I will comment on a few clauses I take issue with before I address the need for social reform especially for our seniors. I fear clause 6 means the government will continue to interfere in the provincial areas of social programs, in other words entrench the status quo that causes overlap and duplication.

Clauses 20 and 21 enable the minister to enter into negotiation with any group including the provinces and municipalities. The provinces are waiting for less interference in social programs. Reform would support real decentralization with the provision of power going directly to the provinces to administer at their discretion.

Then there is the matter of government accountability. If there is no annual report from the department how will Canadians have full knowledge regarding its administration and cost to the taxpayers? We are also kept in the dark about staffing in the new human resources department. Will it increase or decrease?

Canadians have waited a year for the discussion paper to come out. It seems we are still waiting. Once again the government, in this case the Minister of Human Resources Development, has failed Canadians. There is no meaningful social reform in the bill, no decentralization as the provinces have been asking for.

As Reform's deputy critic for human resources I must look at seniors' concerns. I must tell the House that seniors are so concerned about the future of their pensions that Canada's usual seniors groups have joined to create a coalition of seniors for social equity. The coalition consists of five major national seniors groups concerned in a large part about the future of income security programs for the elderly. It is hoped that by giving seniors a strong voice the coalition which claims to represent 500,000 seniors across Canada will ensure that government considers the wishes of seniors. The paper was written a year ago. I must consider the remarks of one senior spokesperson who stated:

> When our coalition was formed, we set ourselves some rigid criteria. We decided that we, as seniors' organizations, have to face the hard facts. We have to recognize that the deficit and growing government debt are real. We have to recognize that the elderly population is growing faster than the population as a whole and that government expenditures on the elderly are increasing.
> We recognize that seniors, like others in society, may have to pay higher levels of taxation and receive lower levels of government services. The seniors of today have always paid their fair share to society and will continue to be willing to do so. What they object to is being singled out to pay more than their fair share. Seniors recognize that, with due consideration and consultation, some changes may be necessary to the income security system for older Canadians.

• (1350)

They stated their major concern as follows:

> When change is necessary, people who can adjust must be given enough time to plan and adjust, and those who cannot must have benefits continued.
> People have to know what to expect when they retire so they can prepare their financial affairs well in advance.

It is interesting to note that others in society, especially the financial experts, say the same thing. Most Canadians recognize that due to the country's changing demographic profile Canada's pension system is facing a cash flow crisis.

The Canadian birth rate soared after World War II, producing a baby boom generation that will start to retire around the year 2010. The number of pensioners per working Canadian will more than double by the year 2031.

This would not be a problem if Canada's government administered pensions were funded, that is if each person's contributions to the CPP were placed in an individual account and invested. Instead the CPP is funded on a pay as we go basis. For example, the funds collected from today's workers are paid out immediately to today's pensioners. Thus every time the ratio of retirees to workers increases the per capita cost of the system to workers increases in lock step.

Canadian politicians have shown little creativity in addressing the pension funding crisis and seem to believe that the rise in pension demands can be dealt with only by cutting benefits to pensioners or by raising taxes for working Canadians. If the first of these two options is chosen, pension benefits will have to be cut by over 50 per cent by the year 2031 to keep payroll deductions for CPP at their current levels.

If the second option is chosen, taxes on working Canadians will be driven to unprecedented heights. To maintain CPP benefits at their present levels payroll deductions will have to be increased from the current level of 5.4 per cent to 10.28 per cent by the year 2011 and eventually over 14 per cent. That source is from the Canada pension plan 15th statutory actuarial report of February 1995.

Health and Welfare Canada in "Charting Canada's Future", 1989, stated:

> The term "demographic aging" refers to an increase in the relative weight of the elderly in the total population. The aging of the Canadian population has come about largely because of declining fertility rates and, to a lot lesser degree, because of an increase in average life span.

By the time the post–second world war baby boomers retire roughly one in every five Canadians will be 65 years of age or more, compared to approximately one in ten today. What is more, while senior citizens will form an increasingly large proportion of the population the percentage of young people will decline.

It is wonderful news that our seniors are living longer and healthier lives. However with this fact comes the realization that our social programs must change.

Unfortunately, although the Minister of Human Resources Development promised change to our social system two years ago, we are still waiting. Why is he still compiling evidence when our government's experts have had papers written on the subject for years now? Is he hoping that through more and more consultation he can stall any meaningful change until after the next election?

I wonder when politicians will realize that Canadian voters only expect their politicians to do their best while spending the Canadian taxpayers' dollars wisely. If the government starts to show that responsibility and accountability are major considerations in any social reforms program the government initiates, the Canadian public will be supportive. If politicians do their job there is nothing to fear from voters. When politicians do not do their jobs, force unwanted legislation on Canadian voters, appoint friends and party faithful to high positions, keep Canadian citizens dependent rather than helping them to be independent and productive, Canadians lose faith in their politicians.

Our human resources minister said it in his article "Breaking Down Barriers" in The Hill Times of August 31, 1995:

> By changing nothing, we are condemning people to the same old rut, the same old cycle of dependency which has been holding people back for years. And what is worse by ignoring fiscal imperative, it won't be long before the international financial community is going to come in and dictate those changes for us.

If he thinks this way, why is he doing nothing? The Liberal government promised that by the fall of 1994 it would implement comprehensive reform of Canada's social programs. Instead, in October 1994 the Minister of Human Resources Development issued a paper "Social Security in Canada". To date no meaningful legislative changes have been introduced. The minister has also promised that a comprehensive paper on aging including pensions will be issued by the end of 1995.

The Reform Party has a proposal for seniors to look at. It is responsible social reform, taking a look at reforming the Canada pension plan to secure retirement years for all Canadians.

We recognize and listen to all the experts, including the chief actuary for Canada who states that CPP will be exhausted by 2015. He predicts that CPP will be gone in 20 years. What is to become of the millions of Canadians at that time who are currently contributing to the unsustainable black hole? What happens to the next generation with no hope of receiving its benefits?

The groundwork for the Reform Party's revision of Canada's social policies was outlined in the taxpayers' budget of February 1995, a blueprint for achieving both fiscal and social security for Canadians in the 21st century.

I wish there was time to go over Reform's four–point plan which addresses the seriousness of the upcoming pension crisis in Canada. Basically it deals with protection of seniors' benefits, recognition bonds, super RRSPs and survivors' benefits.

The Speaker: It being 2 p.m. we will now proceed to statements by members.

MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this year marked the 35th anniversary of the Medical Research Council of Canada. Over 35 years the MRC has played a key role in establishing one of the most influential and efficient biomedical research communities in the world.

Canadian medical achievements are numerous, including the discovery of a gene linked to Alzheimer's disease, progress in the understanding of muscular dystrophy, and the development of an innovative approach to reducing the side effects of aspirin.

The Medical Research Council of Canada is a vast network of people seeking better care for Canadians, a fairer distribution of health care resources, new knowledge and more effective medical and surgical interventions.

The Medical Research Council is an organization truly worthy of continued federal government support.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a short time ago I had the opportunity to visit Prince Edward Island. Aside from the beauty of the Island and the friendliness of the people I could not help but notice the political oppression of the system in Atlantic Canada.

Politicians use their positions to garner support through patronage and threats. For example, one day I met a provincial cabinet minister and informed him of a public meeting planned for later the same day. The minister appeared that night not to attend the meeting but to find out who else was attending. More than one person turned and walked out the door when they saw the minister.

If the people of the Island cannot openly express political beliefs and attend a meeting without fear of reprisal, we must challenge the system under which Islanders live.

The Reform Party is offering Atlantic Canadians a positive alternative, an alternative that will allow them to break free from the system of political oppression they are now forced to endure.

DIABETES AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. John Godfrey (Don Valley West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the statistics are staggering. One and a half million Canadians are diabetic. The disease grows at a rate of 6 per cent per year. By the year 2004 experts predict that one in four Canadians over the age of 45 will have developed the disease.

November is Diabetes Awareness Month in Canada. Most people do not realize that diabetes is the leading contributor to heart disease, stroke, kidney failure and blindness. Furthermore, most people incorrectly believe that insulin is a cure. Across Canada we spend $200 per person annually to treat diabetes and diabetes related illnesses. That totals $5 billion in government health expenses alone.

I commend the Juvenile Diabetes Foundation for its efforts in this, the 25th year since its formation, for continuing to fight for a cure to this disease.

During Diabetes Awareness Month let us all do our part to raise awareness and dollars to make sure that the slogan of the 1990s is achieved and truly make this the decade of a cure.

UNITED NATIONS

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, 1995 is the 50th anniversary of the United Nations. On Wednesday of this week the Secretary–General of the UN, His Excellency Boutros Boutros–Ghali, will be in Ottawa to commemorate this event.

It is fitting today to remember that Canada is a founding nation in this great institution. For me it is also fitting and a great honour to recall the contributions of my predecessor from Windsor—St. Clair, the Right Hon. Paul Martin, Sr., who was committed to the success of the United Nations and who was there at its inception.

I know that all members will join me in welcoming His Excellency Boutros Boutros–Ghali to Canada and in wishing continuing success to the UN.

NATIONAL CHILD DAY

Ms. Jean Augustine (Etobicoke—Lakeshore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today we commemorate the adoption of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

In 1989 Canada and other member countries of the United Nations gathered together to develop a set of formal obligations to the world's children. At that time a standard was set for nations with the best interests of the child being the primary concern in all actions relating to children.

The government takes seriously its responsibilities to better the lives of Canadian children. As Canadians we must be vigilant to ensure that the values and guarantees in the Convention on the Rights of the Child are respected.

Let us today, on National Child Day, renew our commitment to the promises we have made to the many hungry and neglected children who are depending on us to ensure their future is as bright as it can possibly be.

OKANAGAN CENTRE

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last week I spent some time knocking on the doors of constituents.

I asked people what was of concern to them now, halfway through the mandate. Three issues were stated most frequently. Several seniors said: "I'm afraid to go out on the street alone in my neighbourhood. Several years ago I felt no threat for my own safety as I walked to see my neighbour. Today I either take a cab, my car or ask someone to come with me. Can't you do something that will discourage the criminals?"

The second issue was: "When will the government get its spending under control? I am worried that when I reach retirement age there won't be any money left for me".

The third issue came from a 16–year–old. He quoted Winston Churchill: "Democracy is the worst system ever invented except for all the rest". He talked about the problems of the Quebec referendum balloting and said: "We need to tell the government to do everything it can to punish the guilty ones and to make sure that we take all possible precautions to prevent it from ever happening again".

That is what the people are saying. I challenge the Prime Minister and every MP to get on with the Canadian agenda.

LOUIS RIEL

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I had the honour to be invited by the Metis Nation of Saskatchewan to join them to commemorate the 110th anniversary of the hanging of Louis Riel, a most important date on the Metis calendar.

That the Metis community would come together to mark one of the gravest crimes ever committed by the Canadian government against one of its leaders says a lot about the determination and the patience of the Metis people.

To some degree history has put Riel's contributions to Canada into perspective. The House has pardoned him of the crime for which he was executed and now he is rightfully recognized as a Father of Confederation. While we have made some retribution to Riel's memory we have failed as a nation to properly recognize the role that the Metis have had in building this country and their rightful role in its future.

Riel was twice elected to sit as a member of this House and it is an honour to be in the same House as someone whose commitment to justice and to the west was so firm.

Last Thursday's ceremony was a reminder of the continuing struggle for justice that the Metis people are waging and the need on the part of Canada to redress the years of injustice. Each of us in this House has an important role to play in that struggle.

STRIKING COMMITTEES

Mr. Gérard Asselin (Charlevoix, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is becoming increasingly obvious to anyone listening to the conflicting remarks made by ministers of this government that they cannot honour the promises made in the final days of the referendum campaign.

• (1405)

Unable to develop a policy that meets the traditional demands of Quebecers—demands that they had been denying for years—the best that these ministers can think of is to disguise their failure to act by striking one committee after another.

First, they announced the establishment of a phoney committee on national unity, but the ministers who were to sit on this committee did not know that they were members of the committee. They did not even know what their mandate was.

Then, a shadow committee on economic growth and employment was established. Two years after taking office, the federal ministers have decided that the time has come to start tackling the problem of unemployment. More committees and still no action. This reeks of improvisation.

NATIONAL CHILD DAY

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in March 1993 the Government of Canada designated November 20 as National Child Day.

The enactment of National Child Day was a culmination of efforts by Our Kids Foundation in Ottawa which convinced the government to designate a special day for children.

The adoption of the Convention on the Rights of the Child and National Child Day reflects the growing recognition that children are important in their own right and valued members of our society. It also provides us with the opportunity to reflect on the special needs of children and the matters that concern them.

I have been collecting letters from children across the country who urge the Prime Minister to remember the promises made at the World Summit for Children in 1990 to reduce poverty and illiteracy. I have received over 100 heartfelt letters from children of all ages.

We need to work together to improve the well–being of children from all nations as they are truly the future of the planet.

NATIONAL CHILD DAY

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to recognize in the House this country's greatest asset, our children.

In March 1993 the Government of Canada designated November 20 as National Child Day. To mark this occasion, communities across Canada are hosting a variety of activities and events to celebrate children and their families.

In the words of Dr. Benjamin Spock "children are made to love". Parents love children because they remember being loved so much by their own parents. And despite all the hard work, taking care of children and seeing them grow and develop into fine people gives most parents their greatest satisfaction in life. To reflect on children we see that this is creation, this is our visible immortality.

Today is National Child Day. It should serve to remind us all that every day is a good day to love our children.

THE SENATE

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, since the Liberal government took office two years ago, the Prime Minister has made 12 patronage appointments to the Senate. This is complicity in the degrading politics of an undemocratic, unaccountable institution.

The other place consumes over $40 million a year from hard pressed, taxpaying Canadians. Does it actually serve a purpose or is it just a rubber stamp for bad legislation?

In the last few days the justice minister has stated that he will not accept any amendments to Bill C–68 which might be proposed by the Senate. A few weeks ago he also said that Senators should get on with their function and pass the legislation. The government cannot have it both ways.

Either the gun control amendments will be coming back from a powerful, unelected body of partisan failures, flatterers and pleaders for special interests or it is a legitimate part of Canada's legislative process.

I ask again: Does the Senate serve a purpose or just act as a rubber stamp for bad legislation?

NATIONAL CHILD DAY

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to mention that November 20 is National Child Day. Today, and for the third consecutive year, we are taking the time to stop and recognize the rights of children from coast to coast.

To recognize that our children have rights is to recognize also that we have a responsibility to ensure that they are raised in a proper environment conducive to growth and development.

In Canada, a country that calls itself the best in the world, more than one million children live in poverty. For a child, to be born poor also means facing higher risks of emotional and physical health problems because it clearly makes them more vulnerable to the consequences of poverty.

Let us take this opportunity to reflect on the future we are preparing for our children, and particularly on the impact that the actions we take today will have on them tomorrow.

NATIONAL CHILD DAY

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, November 20 marks the third anniversary of the National Child Day. This date was chosen to recognize two historical events, namely the UN Declaration of the Rights of the Child and Convention on the Rights of the Child.

• (1410)

This convention is aimed at ensuring the survival, protection, development and participation of all children and was ratified by Canada in 1991.

[Translation]

We have a responsibility to preserve the well–being of those children who could be victims of criminal acts, abuse or neglect. By investing in child care from the early stages on, we will ensure that children do not have to go through some of the adjustment problems associated with the teenage years. This, in turn, will have the effect of reducing the financial burden associated with welfare, crime prevention and remedial education.

In conclusion, I invite all Canadians to join us in celebrating this day.

[English]

NATIONAL CHILD DAY

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is National Child Day, a day when we celebrate our children, a day of happiness, a day when every child should wear a smile.

Children are our future. As a society we must do everything we can to ensure their happiness and their ability to lead full and productive lives. Childhood is a most critical stage of life. It is during this period that we must provide proper nutrition, good health care, complete education and above all encouragement and guidance to our children.

I invite my colleagues to join with me in celebrating our kids and our future at the Cherish the Children Gala tonight at 7 p.m. in Room 200, West Block, here on Parliament Hill.

Also, join with me in wishing all those who are born on this day a very happy birthday.

DEMOCRACY

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, people in Quebec and in Canada are not surprised by recent statements from the Prime Minister, who is experiencing a severe panic attack. We now know that if the yes side had won the referendum, the Prime Minister would have rejected the democratic choice made by Quebecers.

The Prime Minister also said that he would take all necessary means to ensure that Quebecers are no longer consulted through a referendum on the issue of sovereignty. These two statements alone confirm an absolute lack of political ethics on the part of the Prime Minister and his entourage. But the Prime Minister went even further when he said that CBC's information services do not comply with their mandate, which should be to actively promote Canadian unity.

The Prime Minister's lack of respect for the public consultation process and for those who hold different views clearly confirms that he turns his back on democracy when it takes a direction with which he does not agree.

TAXES

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has not cut spending by a single penny. In fact, spending is up by $2.8 billion this year over last.

The one thing that saved the Minister of Finance and allowed him to meet his deficit reduction target was that he squeezed Canadian taxpayers for another $7.3 billion; $2.8 billion of that was applied to the ever–rising cost of servicing our debt and $4.5 billion was used to reduce the deficit.

Is it the intention of the Liberal government to balance the budget on the backs of the taxpayers? If it is, taxpayers need to know the costs. Their taxes will double in the next 10 years in order to pay for the ever–rising cost of the debt while reducing the deficit to zero.

By that time, the government will have killed the goose that laid the golden egg and the rich will have joined the ranks of the poor.

NATIONAL CHILD DAY

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today, November 20, Canadians all over the country will be celebrating National Child Day.

The Government of Canada designated this special day to pay tribute to children and everything they offer us today and in the future.

November 20 also marks the adoption by the United Nations General Assembly of the Convention on the Rights of the Child. That convention is important because it deals with every aspect of the life of children and youth. The convention provides a framework to value and respect children and youth as full–fledged human beings.

In this International Year of Tolerance, we encourage all partners to pay special attention to issues such as equality, integration, sharing and understanding, especially when these issues relate to children and youth.

Today I call on all members of the House to join in the celebration of National Child Day. We must listen to our children and youth and treat them with compassion and respect. In doing this we build stronger communities and a prosperous nation.

Remember, children are important because they are Canada's future.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government, if there is still one over there.

Having already implied that he did not intend to respect the outcome of the referendum, the Prime Minister stated a second time that he wanted to stop Quebecers from holding a second referendum on the future of Quebec if they wished to. In a repeat performance later, he criticized the CBC's lack of partisan involvement in the referendum campaign. The CBC was too impartial for the Prime Minister's taste during the referendum.

My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister or whoever might be so kind as to reply. Are we to understand that the Prime Minister wishes not only to stop Quebecers from deciding their future on another occasion they deem appropriate but also to control the information they will get from the CBC?

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe that we need to stress that the Prime Minister may perhaps be completely right in this, but with respect to the comment from my colleague, he is also aware that CBC President Perrin Beatty has set up a committee to examine our Prime Minister's comments, which I feel are clearly justified, and the response will be forthcoming in due course.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. secretary of state does me the honour of a reply to my questions, I shall ask her another.

Since Perrin Beatty, in keeping with the operating provisions of the CBC, has set up a committee to assess the professional conduct of CBC and Radio–Canada journalists and the manner in which the news was presented, does she not think that the Prime Minister would have been wiser to wait before nailing the CBC?

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague must be aware, the mission of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and Radio Canada International is, and I quote:"[—] to reflect major current events and contribute to the exercise of democracy"—something you and others need to learn about—"to the affirmation of the sovereignty of the country and to helping the various regions to come to know more about each other, and to more accurately reflect the national identity". This has not been denied by our Prime Minister, and this is our approach to every thing we do.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the hon. secretary of state is rather surprising. She tells us in the opposition that we ought to be learning what democracy is all about, while what is at issue here is the behaviour of the Prime Minister, who finds that the CBC was too impartial in the referendum. Amazing. Amazing.

Does the hon. secretary of state not consider it rather disquieting in a democracy, when a Prime Minister initially indicates his intention not to recognize the outcome of a democratic exercise, then tells us that he want to see no more democratic consultations in Quebec, and then decides that the CBC ought to stop being impartial when broadcasting information?

[English]

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when it comes to talking about democracy, when it comes to talking about how language should be understood or one's accent, when it comes to discussing who has the right to vote and the weight of that vote, I do not think there are any exercises in democracy that need to be taken by this side of the House.

• (1420)

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Last week, the Deputy Prime Minister clearly established a link between the funding received by Radio–Canada and its news coverage. She said it did not make sense for us to pay the cost of running the corporation when there was no commitment to Canadian unity.

Are we to understand that the government wants to tie Radio–Canada's budget to a partisan performance with respect to news coverage?

[English]

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it might be very helpful if my hon. colleague would recognize we are in a significantly changing environment with respect to telecommunications, broadcasting, film distribution, marketing, et cetera.

The government spends in excess of $1 billion for Radio–Canada, CBC, Telefilm Canada and the National Film Board. Perhaps that money could be spent more succinctly, more successfully and in a more focused way. It is for that reason that a committee was set up by the minister responsible for Canadian heritage. We should know its response very shortly.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would really like to know how the secretary of state can justify—since she used the word focus—the government's blackmailing Radio–Canada?

[English]

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, CBC Radio–Canada's role is to reflect our society, the people within our society. It has journalistic freedom, which is within its mandate.

I suggest the impartiality and the responsibility journalistically speaking will be determined in the report to be submitted by Mr. Perrin Beatty and that committee.

AIR CANADA

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Airbus scandal provides yet another example of what happens when a government buries its head in the sand. The most outrageous aspect of this Airbus scandal is not Brian Mulroney's $50 million lawsuit, nor is it the righteous indignation coming from his Sherbrooke sidekick.

The most outrageous aspect of this entire thing is that it took articles in a Swiss newspaper and a German magazine to convince this government to take action. None of these are new allegations. The RCMP was investigating this matter back in 1989. Paul Palango was naming names in 1994 and the CBC was uncovering new and damaging evidence as recently as this March.

My question is for the Minister of Justice. Why did it take the work of a German newspaper to get this government to act on the Airbus scandal?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP has been active for months, as it has confirmed, in looking into these allegations. It has been doing its job. I hope the hon. member in her questions will express support for the work of the RCMP rather than this unjustified scepticism.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I support the RCMP, especially in its guarding of 24 Sussex, part of its job.

Not all governments have been asleep at the switch in this scandal. According to the federal government and in contrast to it the American embassy has been hard at work, having already accumulated a fat file on this subject which includes actual names, timelines and Swiss bank account numbers.

It seems to me the Minister of Justice could save Canadian taxpayers a great deal of time and money by simply walking across Wellington Street and asking the Americans for a photocopy of their file.

In order to help get to the bottom of this matter will the Minister of Justice make a formal request to have the American government share all relevant information and material it has gathered on the Airbus deal?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the RCMP will do everything necessary to pursue its inquiries. I suggest the hon. member do more in constructing her questions than to base them on the Insider column of the Ottawa Sun.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there is more at stake here than some sort of hilarity from the solicitor general. Things have been bad enough in that department already these past couple of weeks. If anyone is being facetious here it is he.

The Canadian people deserve better from the Liberal government. What we have here are all the makings of a Stevie Cameron sequel. In writing about this Prime Minister's approach to governing, she might entitle that sequel "I am not aware of anything".

• (1425)

The members opposite were aware of the Airbus scandal for five years when they were in opposition and have been aware of it for the two years they have been in government.

Will the government commit to making public, totally public at the earliest possible date, every relevant aspect of this smelly Airbus deal?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has confirmed, the government has been, through the RCMP, properly looking into these allegations. This began after it took office.

With respect to making matters public, surely the hon. member does not want to prejudice the investigations and inquiries already under way. If she wants to have these inquiries and investigations properly carried out, she should not suggest that things be done which might prejudice the success of those inquiries.

DEFENCE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank the Minister of National Defence for his friendly comments in recent weeks.

By refusing to specify a certain percentage of Canadian content in the contract for search and rescue helicopters, the Minister of National Defence has paved the way for a procurement policy that from now on would eliminate any Canadian content requirements from purchase contracts for military equipment. In so doing, the government is directly jeopardizing the existence of the defence industry in Canada and Quebec.

What explanation does the minister have for the fact that barely two months ago, he awarded a $2 billion contract, without tender, to a company in Ontario and that now, in the case of the search and rescue helicopters, he will call for tenders without a Canadian content requirement, when the aerospace industry happens to be concentrated in the Montreal region? Another example of the double standard at work.

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is unaware of what I stated in my press conference two weeks ago.

While the government will no longer make acquisitions solely on the basis of regional industrial benefits, those benefits will be one criteria considered as part of the specifications and process in the acquisition of these helicopters. The member should get his facts straight.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I was aware of this as well in the contract for armoured personnel carriers which was awarded to Toronto without tender.

At a time when the government still refuses to put in place a genuine defence conversion program for the industry, does the minister realize that by getting rid of Canadian content requirements, he is directly jeopardizing the existence of the defence industry and in this case the aerospace industry which is concentrated in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a couple of weeks ago I was asked the same question. The hon. member obviously does not have faith in the very innovative, excellent aerospace industries in Quebec right now which I am sure will compete well in this whole contractual process.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister of agriculture has stated he will not recognize the outcome of the wheat and barley plebiscite currently taking place in the province of Alberta.

Why is the minister ignoring the democratic rights of farmers to choose how they want to market their wheat and barley for export?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what I have said is I do not regard this plebiscite in Alberta as the be all and end all on the issue of wheat and barley marketing. I say that for the obvious reason that grain marketing of this kind is under the jurisdiction of the federal government. It involves farmers in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and in some cases in portions of a corner of Ontario.

The issue by definition cannot be resolved by one partial plebiscite in one province alone.

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister during the 1993 election campaign promised a producer plebiscite on marketing barley and promised he would honour that result.

Right after the election the minister of agriculture said he favours giving farmers a voice through plebiscites which are, to quote the minister "the most appropriate vehicle by which to determine what farmers' preferences are".

Why did the Prime Minister and the agriculture minister promise producers a democratic voice when it is clear they had no intention of honouring that promise?

• (1430)

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, obviously we have not ruled out the notion of a plebiscite in due course if that turns out to be an appropriate vehicle to resolve this issue. At the same time we have observed the difficulties that flow with plebiscites which can in fact make a difficult situation even more divisive rather than resolve a problem.

With reference to the remarks made in 1993, both the Prime Minister and I indicated that the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board should not be altered in the absence of some kind of voting mechanism among producers. That is a far cry from advocating a change in the Canadian Wheat Board.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

While today, here in Ottawa, the families of the École polytechnique shooting victims are organizing a press conference promoting firearms control, the Minister of National Defence is still refusing to reconsider the promotions of soldiers who, on at least two occasions, appear to have celebrated this sad occurrence.

How can the Minister of National Defence justify his stubbornness in maintaining the promotions of soldiers who apparently took part in celebrations in honour of Marc Lépine?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unlike the hon. member, I base action on the facts.

At this point in time no evidence has been unearthed that supports the contention that this dinner occurred. In fact documents which related to the investigation were turned over to the commission on Somalia and we have not found anything documenting the dinner. Investigations are going on. Obviously if such an event happened—and I have expressed in the House how abhorrent that would be if it did happen—the fact is that matter would not have been sanctioned and therefore there would be no record. To actually confirm that it took place will require some time because it will require interviews, depositions and investigations by the military police.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of National Defence aware that his obstinate defence of these soldiers against all attack discredits not only the entire Canadian Armed Forces but also the government itself?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again the hon. member has raised a matter that has not been proven. Once we have actual proof that it took place, then we can act.

In the hypothetical, I have stated in both languages in this House that such an event, were it to have taken place, would have been totally offensive, abhorrent and contrary to Canadian forces regulations.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

In my riding the police are investigating a report of sexual assault against an eight–year old girl by two boys under twelve. Because of their ages the Young Offenders Act does not cover these crimes, nor do Bills C–41 and C–37.

On this morning's news, probably because of National Child's Day a priest in Ottawa spoke of his concern about the younger and younger ages of Canada's young offenders.

What does the minister intend to do about it, to hold children and their parents responsible for their children's criminal actions?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, just this morning I had occasion to appear before the House committee on justice and legal affairs. I was the first witness in a comprehensive review of the Young Offenders Act the committee is now undertaking. We spoke exactly to this issue, the question of the age of the children to which the Young Offenders Act applies. I invited the committee to examine how we should deal with the cases of crimes by children younger than 12 to determine how best to ensure that the interests of those children in society are taken into account.

I am not certain that the answer is simply to extend the application of the Young Offenders Act because we are dealing with children of a very young age. I have asked the committee to look at the evidence, to hear from witnesses and to make recommendations on how best to deal with this, if only by ensuring that in the provinces, between us, the levels of government have appropriate ways to respond to these situations, look after these children, deal with the families that produce them and ensure public safety.

• (1435)

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if we do not deal seriously with these young offenders, we are not helping these young offenders. It is a horrific crime. Canadians are sick about this happening in their communities. When we ignore the crimes of children, we ignore their victims. We ignore those children who are committing the crimes and we ignore helping them.

Is the minister in favour of changing the ages in the Young Offenders Act to make young offenders responsible for their criminal actions?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, two of the hon. member's colleagues are on the committee before which I appeared this morning. I have expressly asked the committee to consider the very question she has raised. I want the committee to hear the evidence, consider that evidence and make recommendations that the committee believes are in the public interest.

I must also point out in answer to the question asked that this government has already acted to strengthen the Young Offenders Act. With Bill C–37 which comes into force 10 days from now, the Young Offenders Act will be strengthened to deal more effectively with serious crimes of violence that most concern the public.

I remind the hon. member of those important changes. There are more to come.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

On April 5, the Dima family, Romanian refugees, was expelled to the United States, where it had originally filed a proper application to immigrate. Despite assurances by his department that the file would be processed quickly, this family, which was integrated into Quebec society, is still awaiting the response of federal immigration officials, seven months later. It now faces possible deportation from the United States.

How does the minister explain the governmental red tape the Dima family has had to go through, while it waits in the United States and continues to live with the Christian Brothers in Plattsburgh?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question by the hon. member which involves one specific case. I am not aware of all the last minute details surrounding the case. The member should also know that with respect to making independent applications to the province of Quebec, the province of Quebec has sole jurisdiction.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that two other Romanian families have had their case settled in a matter of days or weeks: the Malaroi and the Garda families.

The Government of Quebec issued a certificate of selection on June 14. Why is it taking the minister so long to assume his responsibilities, he who was in such a hurry to issue 15,000 new certificates of citizenship just before the referendum?

[English]

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank members for the applause. I would do it all over again the same way.

I am not sure what the immigration critic is actually advocating with respect to individuals who want to acquire citizenship to the Canadian family. Is he suggesting we should have dragged our heels in terms of processing? Is he suggesting that those individuals should not have had the right to vote? Exactly what is the hon. member advocating?

On the one hand the member is asking for an expedited processing for one family and I will look into the latest matters surrounding that family. On the other hand he is suggesting very softly somehow that he did not appreciate the fact that those 15,000 individuals voted in the last referendum.

PRISONS

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the day of the great unity rally in Montreal, I had the tremendous pleasure of officially opening the Nova Institution for federally sentenced women in Truro, Nova Scotia on behalf of the solicitor general. This institution marks a new era of federal corrections in Canada.

• (1440)

Could the solicitor general tell the House how Nova Institution, housing incarcerated women, differs from the Kingston prison?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a basic difference is that it is one of a series of prisons for women spread across the country rather than having federally sentenced women confined to one, single, outmoded facility in Kingston, Ontario.

By having this series of regional prisons women will be closer to their families. The women will also have greater access to appropriate programming. In short, we believe the result will be a better outcome in terms of women not reoffending, thereby providing greater protection to the public and a savings in money for the taxpayers who will not have to keep housing these people over and over again.

FISHERIES

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is practising for a new job: minister of taxation. His new access fees will dramatically increase licence costs, in some cases from $30 a year to $9,000 a year.

Does the minister not understand that his new access fees pose a far greater threat to fishermen than Spanish trawlers? The Spanish will go away, but these taxes will be here forever.

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly hear the view of the hon. member on what he thinks the access fees should be because the Reform Party consistently tells the House that the government has to do more to responsibly control expenditures to get the deficit under control.

There are fishermen today—

Mr. Harris: Cut the spending.

Mr. Tobin: Hon. members want to hear and I know the Reform Party is truly interested in a responsible exchange.

There are fishermen today who pay $10 for a licence and make upwards of $1 million in income. Is the hon. member suggesting that that is reasonable? Others pay $30 for a licence fee, the case in point which the hon. member mentioned, and make incomes of $500,000, $600,000, $700,000 and $800,000.

We in this party believe that if a person's income is low, the access fee should be low, and if their income is high, they should pay fair rent on the privilege of the income.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, any fishermen who are making the profits which the minister is talking about are paying income tax.

Every year the minister plans to suck another $50 million out of Canadian fishermen by these access fees. This intolerable tax increase will lead to the extermination of family owned businesses. Not just the little fish, but the little fisherman is hanging on by his fingernails. Will the "taxinator" trash the tax?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when it comes to hanging on to a shred of credibility, the hon. member has no fingernails.

When it comes to presenting a fair licensing regime to ensure that fishermen who are in difficult circumstances are not impacted, we brought that forward. We put in place a licence freeze for all of those affected by the groundfish crisis. We have already said to the fishermen in British Columbia who have been affected by the decline in salmon runs that there will be no dramatic increase in fees. We are saying to those who make very large incomes in a way which is progressive and fair that they ought to pay a little more for the privilege of those very large incomes.

If the hon. member is serious about speaking with authority for fishermen, he ought to do a little more homework on the wharf before he comes here to make a fool of himself in the House.

COMMUNICATIONS SECURITY ESTABLISHMENT

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Last week, a former employee of the Communications Security Establishment shed some light on the centre's dubious spying activities. According to Jane Shorten, the CSE targets the communications of our trading partners, including, Mexico and South Korea, and in so doing, spies on Canadian citizens.

Would the government confirm Ms. Shorten's allegations to the effect that the CSE eavesdrops on the communications of friendly countries and the telephone conversations of Canadian citizens?

• (1445)

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the government does not comment on allegations with respect to national security or intelligence.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is not the first time this has happened and the government has been questioned on the subject, but we always get the same answers.

How can we believe government statements on the subject when there is no mechanism for parliamentary oversight of CSE activities, as exists, to a minimal extent but at least it exists, in the case of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a motion put forward by the member for Scarborough—Rouge River to create a parliamentary oversight mechanism for the CSE was passed by the House.

We have been holding consultations on that with interested parties and we hope to move very quickly to implement the contents of the motion.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in addition to slapping the fishing industry with outrageous tax increases, the minister is planning to rake further millions into his department by taxing the users of Canada's ice free ports for ice–breaking services.

Will the minister today assure the people of Saint John and Halifax that he will not tax them for services they do not need?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans that has the responsibility for coast guard is currently engaged in a broad consultative process to ensure that fees for service are imposed on a fair and reasonable basis.

For the member to stand to single out one or two harbours and to ask for a response today in advance of the end of the consultation is not only not useful but not a fair way to proceed.

The Canadian Coast Guard will go on doing an excellent job for Canadians who require the services and will do so in a manner in so far as fees are concerned that is a fair and reasonable, and the member knows that.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister is hardly being fair and reasonable with Atlantic Canadians. He says he wants Atlantic Canada to prosper yet he now proposes to tax away the critical commercial advantage of ice free ports.

Will the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans deep six any proposals to rob Atlantic Canadians of this important economic advantage and axe his tax?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is a Newfoundland expression that means you have a lot of nerve: you have to have the face of a robber's horse for a Reform Party member to stand and pretend to give a whit about Atlantic Canada.

This is the party that would be overly happy if we could give everybody in Atlantic Canada what it would call a national deficit fare. It wants to give everybody a one-way ticket to somewhere else.

We are bringing in policies that generate productivity in Atlantic Canada, create new wealth, treat people fairly and are designed to ensure the population is maintained and grows. The Reform Party has no lesson to give those of us on this side of the House about the reality of Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The Reform Party appears to be protecting fishers making a huge income from paying their fair share. I am interested as well in smaller inshore fishermen.

In instances where the fee is shown to be inequitable, would the minister be prepared to make changes?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unlike members opposite who bellow from several thousand miles away, I happen to know that this member had a round table in his constituency on the future of the fishery. He took the trouble to actually listen to fishermen before coming to the House of Commons to ask questions.

I understand fishermen are saying that they are prepared to pay a fair share and pay their own way, providing the system is fair and equitable.

• (1450)

If changes can be made that make the system more fair and more equitable, and if that means rewriting portions of what we proposed based on genuine consultation with genuine fishermen who genuinely want to pay their own way, we will do it, of course.

SOCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The Quebec government has announced that it will have to cut its social assistance program by $86 million, given the major impact that the federal government's February 1994 UI reform has had on welfare rolls.

Does the minister recognize that his first UI reform has forced many unemployed people onto welfare and that he is responsible for the significant rise in the cost of social assistance programs?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member that we take very seriously the condition and state of people on social assistance.

That is one reason why in the province of Quebec we pay 50 per cent of the full cost of all social assistance recipients. If we look at the actual figures and not the made up figures, in the changeover from 1994–95 to this year there has been an increase of transfers from the federal level of $220 million to the province of Quebec under the EPF, CAP and equalization.

Therefore, when the minister from Quebec starts making the charges that somehow the federal government is responsible, I suggest the Quebec minister of social services go back and look at their own books.

We are trying to do our best to help those people. Delay and misinformation around the country do not help.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, is the minister trying to wash his hands of the whole thing? This Parliament has approved $2.4 billion in cuts to unemployment insurance for all of Canada this year, including $735 million in Quebec. Do you think this has no effect on the men, women and young people who end up on welfare?

Will the minister admit that the next UI reform, which he is getting ready to table in the coming weeks, will aggravate the Quebec government's financial problems by forcing even more unemployed people onto welfare?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it sounds to me like the beginning of a leadership speech.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Putting that aside for the moment, I point out to the hon. member again a number of very important facts. It is important to get the facts out in this case.

Under the changes we made to the Unemployment Insurance Act there is the special provision of an additional $1,000 for those on low income drawing unemployment insurance benefits. In fact 130,000 low income UI claimants were able to draw upon that additional $1,000.

Furthermore, last summer we signed a special agreement with the Government of Quebec to provide $80 million to the APPORT program to help those on social assistance get training, get education and go back to work.

One of the primary objectives in terms of the new employment insurance program mentioned by the Prime Minister two weeks ago is to make sure there is a strong guarantee of protection of income for those who are at the lowest income level.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in Edmonton the CBC French station has an audience of 300 people. In Quebec City the English CBC station has 1,700 viewers and in Regina it has an entire station dedicated to 40 viewers. That works out to about $230,000 per viewer.

Given these outrageous spending figures, why is the CBC continuing to fund these stations? When will the government end this ridiculous waste of taxpayers' dollars?

• (1455)

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I remind my hon. colleague that Canadians of both official languages have responsibilities to each other, to know each other, to see each other and to hear from each other. Whether it is in French in Alberta or English in Montreal or wherever it may be, the country has facilities for bilingual services. When one is travelling one should be able to hear one's own language and one's own culture wherever one is.

As the hon. member knows, there are more than just French speaking people who listen to Radio–Canada. There are also anglophones who listen to it. I am a very good example.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister is an excellent example, I am sure.

The point being that there are already all kinds of services provided through cable and over satellite. We do not need dedicated stations in all these communities.

The CBC, Telefilm Canada and the NFB are undergoing a mandate review and will be reporting to the minister soon. The people who should be giving this mandate are the taxpayers of the country. They already understand that the level of funding in any public enterprise should be based on how many people in this case are viewing it.

Is the government prepared to cut spending for services that taxpayers do not support? If so, will it direct the CBC to make its cuts accordingly?

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government and the minister in charge have made it eminently clear that the changing circumstances and the economic aspects of the CBC, the National Film Board and Telefilm are all to be taken into account as the mandate is reviewed. The CRTC is involved as well.

From that perspective, the hon. member might well wait for the results which should be announced shortly.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

I was looking through Hansard and found that when the budget was debated in 1991 the then member for Winnipeg South Centre criticized the cuts by the provincial government in health care, social programs and post–secondary education. He said:

> As a result, the ability to have any kind of national system of education and health care now stands in jeopardy.

He also said that these cuts cut the very fundamental institutions on which people depend and that they were being dismantled.

Since the minister was so critical of measures considerably less harsh than those his government has taken, could he say why the cuts to education, health care and social programs, much deeper than the last government's, are so good when the last government's cuts were so bad?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have made it very clear from the last budget that one way to restore the country to a form of economic health is to make sure there is more integrity and stability in federal financing.

His home province has been able to achieve a balanced budget. We are still on track to do that but it will take some time because the previous government, of which I was quite critical, did not take the measures that were necessary when it should have to ensure a proper formulation of a fiscal plan that would allow us to have good economic investment.

The proof of that is very clear. Since the two years of coming into office we have created over 500,000 full time permanent jobs. The best way to deal with the problems of low income and of social insecurity is to get people a job. That is what our last budget was all about.

NIGERIA

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Ken Saro–Wiwa and eight other civil rights activists in defence of the Ogoni people were summarily hung by the military Government of Nigeria after a surreptitious court proceeding.

Could the minister tell the House what actions are planned by the Canadian government to protest this heinous act?

Hon. Christine Stewart (Secretary of State (Latin America and Africa), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question.

Canada has spoken in the strongest language to condemn the actions of the Nigerian government in relation to the execution of Ken Saro–Wiwa.

Canada took actions beyond that at the Commonwealth heads of government meeting in Auckland, New Zealand last week. Our Prime Minister spoke out as well against this and with other heads of governments suspended Nigeria from participation in the Commonwealth for a period of two years. This will be reviewed when Nigeria shows it has improved its democracy, respect for human rights and governance.

• (1500)

Bilaterally Canada has taken actions as well. We have suspended visas to military figures in the Nigerian government. We have terminated our trade in arms with Nigeria for the past few years. We will continue to look at other possible sanctions including finance and trade.

THE LATE MR. JUSTICE EMMETT HALL

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with much sadness that we mourn the passing of a truly great Canadian, the hon. Justice Emmett Matthew Hall.

We extend our deepest condolences to his family.

[Translation]

It is with sadness that we mourn the passing of a great Canadian, Mr. Justice Emmett Matthew Hall, whose many achievements included being a founder of our health care system. He was also one of the keenest crusader for the system.

We extend our deepest condolences to his family.

[English]

Justice Hall led a long and distinguished legal career, becoming Chief Justice in Saskatchewan and later serving on the Supreme Court of Canada. He was noted for his forward thinking ideas and keen sense of equity which resulted in his being named a Companion of the Order of Canada and receiving other tributes including numerous honorary degrees, distinguished titles and select memberships.

Of his many achievements Justice Hall may best be known as a founder and lifelong crusader for our medicare system. In 1961, prior to the introduction of the first provincial plan for medical care insurance in Saskatchewan, the federal government established the Royal Commission on Health Services, chaired by Mr. Justice Hall. Its mandate was to inquire into and report on existing facilities and future needs for health services for Canadians and to assess the resources required to provide these services.

The commission report, published in 1964, recommended Canada should introduce the legislative organizational and financial frameworks necessary to ensure that health services would be available to all residents without barriers. The commission also called for universal and comprehensive coverage on uniform terms and conditions, in all provinces, regardless of age, condition or ability to pay.

These recommendations formed the basis of the federal medicare act proclaimed in 1968. This act, which established a conditional cost sharing program, empowered the federal health minister to make financial contributions to those provinces which operated medical care insurance plans that met certain minimum criteria: comprehensiveness, universality, portability and public administration.

By 1972 every province and territory had established medical care insurance plans in addition to their hospital insurance programs, and the two main features of Canada's universal health care system were in place from coast to coast.

Justice Hall summed up the need for a national publicly funded medicare system in these words: "The only thing more expensive than good health care is inadequate or no health care".

The guarding principle of health care in Canada is as meaningful now as it was when the system began. Justice Hall's support for this system never waned or wavered.

In 1979 when the federal government asked that the status of publicly financed health insurance programs in Canada be reviewed Justice Hall again accepted the call and chaired the review which also bears his name. After months of public hearings and hundreds of briefs from various consumer groups, individuals and health care organizations, Justice Hall released his report, Canada's national–provincial health program for the 1980s, "A Commitment For Renewal".

Once again reflecting a broad Canadian consensus, the report called for a renewed national commitment to the principles of medicare. Justice Hall could find no one, not any government or individual, not the medical profession nor any organization not in favour of medicare.

On extra billing by doctors, Justice Hall said it was inequitable because it not only denies access to the poor, it also taxes sick persons who, besides paying premiums, are already paying the major cost of the system through their taxes.

Canadians owe a great debt of gratitude to Justice Emmett Hall. In his report Justice Emmett Hall states: "Canadians understand the full meaning of the hospital insurance and medical care acts. They said through these two acts that we as a society are aware that the trauma of illness, the pain of surgery, the slow decline to death are burdens enough for the human being to bear without the added burden of medical or hospital bills penalizing the patient at the moment of vulnerability".

The fundamental principle of medicare is equity. All Canadians are treated the same according to medical need regardless of their ability to pay. This recognizes and fosters the compassionate nature of our people. Our universal health care system is constitutive of our identity. Clearly it is part of who we are as a nation. It is the outward manifestation of fundamental shared values, the values of justice and caring. All Canadians pay homage to this great Canadian.

[Translation]

The people of Canada are greatly indebted to the late Justice Emmett Hall.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to pay tribute to Emmett Hall, who, among other things, chaired the Royal Commission on Health Services from 1961 to 1964. Mr. Hall was one of those who inspired the debate that had already started on an issue under consideration and discussion in most Canadian provinces: the establishment of a health system accessible to all, regardless of socio–economic circumstances.

This principle, oft mentioned and presented as a basic aspect of any society that wants to be fair and equitable, was also part and parcel of the discussions that were taking place at the provincial level at the time. Based on respect for human dignity, the principle of accessibility met with the agreement of all primary stakeholders and players in the health sector.

I am therefore pleased and honoured to pay tribute to a man like Emmett Hall, who contributed to these discussions vital to the dignity of all Canadians. We must however be careful not to forget the efforts made by Mr. Hall and by the other men and women who participated in these broad discussions, which revolutionized the concept of health care and the way that services were provided, nor the message they left us.

No one, let alone the federal government, has the right to jeopardize such a system. The government certainly seems to be bent on making decisions that will have a disastrous impact on the quality of health care and services.

• (1510)

It is therefore essential that serious thought be given to the decision this government is about to make, to fully assess its real impact.

As you do so, think about the women and men who, like Mr. Hall, were in favour of the establishment of a health system accessible to all, regardless of their socio–economic circumstances.

I am joined by my colleagues of the Bloc Quebecois in extending my deepest condolences to the family of Emmett Hall.

[English]

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today I rise on behalf of the Reform Party to recognize a Canadian who was not afraid to leave his mark on the pages of our history. Emmett Hall was a man who led, a leader who asked not why, but why not. Today I join with colleagues from all parties to pay respect to his memory.

Emmett Hall had an outstanding record of personal achievement. After a successful and long career in law, at age 57 he rose to new and increasing challenges as Chief Justice of Saskatchewan, Supreme Court judge, royal commissioner and finally elder statesmen.

It was his Supreme Court judgment in 1975 that set the stage for negotiations on Indian land claims. The Ontario education system was profoundly changed with the Hall–Dennis report of 1968.

Even in retirement in 1977 he led the commission that addressed the challenging need to balance affordable rail transportation with small town survival in central Canada. Even at the age of 90 he was mediating a logging and land claims dispute between the B.C. government and two Indian bands.

Historians, however, will recognize his greatest contribution as the chairman of a royal commission whose report led to the introduction of our national medicare system through the Hall report of 1964.

Medicare to this day continues to be a federal cost shared program. It is and should be the best health care safety net in the world. It was made in Canada for Canadians, first on a provincial level and then federally through the Medical Care Act, and it is now mandated to bring comprehensive coverage for health service, publicly funded, portable across Canada and universally accessible to all Canadians regardless of ability to pay.

I would be remiss today to neglect to mention that the confidence of Canadians in medicare is severely eroding. Cutbacks have forced health care professionals, governments and the public to take time to address, analyse and protect this aspect of our life and country.

Emmett Hall was never afraid to challenge the status quo. Today we recognize a man who bravely put forward ideas to propose change, not for change itself but to bring about a better solution.

All that Canadians value in medicare is recognized today in his memory. His vision of health care reform was that it result in the highest quality health care for all Canadians. That challenge continues and needs new Canadian solutions once more in these times of increased pressures on public finances.

Our condolences go out to his family. We salute with others today a great prairie pioneer and statesman.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour for me to rise today on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party caucus to pay tribute to one of Canada's and Saskatchewan's greatest sons, Mr. Justice Emmett Hall.

It perhaps seems trivial at a time like this to simply talk about a great man's achievements and to reiterate the many honours achieved in his lifetime. As the Very Reverend Len Morand said in delivering the homily at Mr. Justice Hall's funeral service in Saskatoon, if we were to simply list the man's honours he would have more medals than a Russian general.

As important as these honours may be, there is something more important and more enduring for each of us to take from Justice Hall's life. He was a visionary and a pioneer. In his professional and personal life he created many landmarks which now serve to mark our course as a great country, as a caring and compassionate country; guide posts and landmarks which still guide us today.

He is perhaps best known for his historic and heroic Royal Commission on Health Services which paved the way for the rest of Canadians to enjoy the universal health care service that was born in Saskatchewan.

Even then, in 1964, Justice Hall was looking far into the future, talking about the second stage of medicare, about enhanced services to seniors, dental care, pharmacare and much of what we in Saskatchewan now call the wellness model.

• (1515)

He foresaw a Canada with an ongoing, permanent commitment to a universal and improving health care system. He served as an inspiration to those who continued to battle for just that.

It would be unfair to ignore some of Justice Hall's other great accomplishments. His sense of justice and his belief in our sense of community guided him to make a number of other remarkable changes to this nation and to our culture.

He was an early advocate of the equality of women. He set that concept into law with his precedent setting 1961 decision which ruled that a homemaker's contribution to the household was no less than that of the income earner. It was groundbreaking in 1961 and still is guiding us today.

A religious and spiritual person, Mr. Justice Hall also believed it was important to keep promises. His courageous Nisga'a land claim decision of the 1970s helped the nation keep its promise. It was courageous in the 1970s and still is guiding us today.

There were, of course, many political leaders in attendance at Justice Hall's funeral service in Saskatoon last week. The Premier of Saskatchewan was there. The Minister of Health and the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food were there. I hope that each of them used the occasion to commit himself or herself to the vision of a caring nation of supportive communities of which Mr. Justice Hall so ably spoke and for which he so determinedly fought.

More important than the dignitaries who were in attendance is the fact that hundreds of ordinary people joined in to pay tribute to a man whose many deeds have touched the lives of every Canadian.

One of the scriptural readings at the service was the letter from Timothy, in which he talks of fighting the good fight. Justice Emmett Hall committed his life to fighting that good fight and it is up to each of us to continue it.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to eight petitions.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in response to a question asked on November 10, 1995, by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, the minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation read an excerpt from a letter sent by a Canada Post official. I am pleased to table a copy of this letter in the House today, for the benefit of all members.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 108(3)(d), I have the honour to present the seventeenth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Pursuant to Standing Order 108(3)(d), the committee reviewed chapter five of the May 1995 auditor general's report, concerning the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, deposit–taking institutions sector.

The importance of the financial services industry in the Canadian economy, as well as the concerns expressed by the auditor general, prompted the committee to take a look at the operations of the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

Consequently, the committee held a meeting on this issue on October 3, with officials from the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and from the Office of the Auditor General of Canada.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee asks the government to table a comprehensive response to this report.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration, entitled "Economic Impact of Recent Immigration".

PETITIONS

INCOME TAXES

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has circulated all across Canada. This petition was signed by a number of Canadians from Medicine Hat, Alberta.

• (1520)

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society.

They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

OFFICIAL OPPOSITION

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present this petition from the riding of Prince George—Bulkley Valley and specifically the town of Prince George.

It reads as follows: "Whereas members of the Parliament of Canada are duty bound to represent the interests of Canadians for the good of all Canada; and whereas members of Parliament swear allegiance to the Queen in Canada; and whereas members of Parliament have a moral and legal obligation to fulfil their duties in the best interest of all of Canada; therefore we the petitioners humbly pray that the leader of the official opposition of the 35th Parliament of Canada and the caucus members of the official opposition party having breached their allegiance and moral obligations as members of Parliament of Canada be permanently ejected from the Parliament of Canada".

I support this petition.

The Speaker: Colleagues, as you know it is not in form to either support or not support a particular petition. I would ask you respectfully to please refrain from so doing.

BOVINE SOMATOTROPIN

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have yet another petition coming from dairy farmers and the users of dairy products in my riding, expressing their opposition to the use of the hormone BST in Canadian dairy cattle.

This is about the fourth petition I have presented from my constituents. It is a pleasure to present this.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on second reading of Bill C–96, a bill that deals primarily with administrative reorganization.

Canadians have made it clear that they want government and government services to operate in a more efficient and cost effective manner. The service delivery network initiative is an ambitious effort to respond to this message.

I will focus on the service delivery network because this is a key part of the government's overall plan to renew and revitalize federal programs and services. The service delivery network should be viewed in the same context as Bill C–96, the Department of Human Resources Development Act.

Does Bill C–96 contemplate new programs? No. Does it create new authorities? No. Does it alter jurisdictional arrangements? By no means. Bill C–96 is not a policy initiative aimed at new authorities or new programs. Rather it is a means to improve the delivery of programs and services while saving taxpayers' dollars.

It introduces creative and innovative delivery mechanisms. The service delivery network is a vital part of this policy initiative. It looks to the future instead of to the past. It puts people first by providing comprehensive service at the local and community level. The evolution of this service delivery network would not have been possible without a strong commitment to meet the needs of Canadians without jeopardizing the economic and social future.

We firmly believe that it is possible to enhance the quality of services to the public while delivering those services in a more cost effective manner. Indeed, this approach has been tested within the Department of Human Resources Development.

Through innovation and creativity, the Department of Human Resources Development has been able to create a network of some 700 outlets across the country. When the network is fully operational, it will ensure access to human resource development service for a full 97 per cent of working Canadians.

In concrete terms, I want to stress that these improvements will mean applications for old age security will take only a half a day instead of eight days to process. The processing of Canadian pension plan applications will take one day instead of 15 days. Canadians from all walks of life will find it easier to access services and information and some services will be available 24 hours a day.

As well, the network will deliver a broader array of programs and services. Employment counselling and other employment services, unemployment insurance, federal labour programs, income security programs such as the Canada pension plan and old age security, will be provided at the more than 300 human resource centres across the country.

In addition, up to 400 self–serve electronic kiosks will be located in strategic sites, such as Outreach offices, libraries and municipal offices. In my constituency I am now working with HRD to ensure that we have three to five kiosks in our general area. They will provide access to job information, UI programs, CPP and OAS.

Personnel assistants will be available at all but a few sites, meaning that for seniors personalized service will be available at four times as many points of service as is presently the case. There will be someone there to offer assistance to the seniors ready to use the kiosks.

That is not all. Self–serve access through mail, computers, telephones and the Internet will continue to be expanded. As well, a new electronic labour exchange system is being tested. The system will connect job seekers to employers by computer.

A system to allow unemployment insurance claimants to complete their report cards by telephone is operating on a pilot basis in Calgary and Sherbrooke.

The genius of the self–service delivery network is its capacity to adapt to local realities. Through agreements with organizations such as the YMCA or YWCA and other service groups, the network permits community based delivery of services. This grassroots approach makes tremendous sense in a country as vast as Canada, where local circumstances can vary considerably.

By tailoring programs and services to individual communities, in co–operation with Canadians, the department demonstrates wisdom and foresight. Partnership arrangements, such as co–location of offices and merging of services are being entered into with other federal agencies, provincial and municipal governments, and social service organizations outside government.

All this demonstrates the sensitivity and breadth of vision the government has brought to bear in designing this network. A great deal of thought and preparation went into its creation. The idea for this initiative did not happen overnight. It grew out of our red book commitments to improve services and opportunities for Canadians.

It began to take greater shape during the extensive social security reform consultations held with important stakeholders, business people, labour and community groups. Over and over, as we tour the country, Canadians delivered a clear and compelling message: get Canadians back to work, put more power into the hands of individuals to help themselves, remove unnecessary obstacles to Canada's social and economic prosperity.

• (1530)

The service delivery network responds directly to the demands we heard. It achieves the twin goals of improved service and reduced cost. Clearly this is the kind of government renewal Canadians have demanded: better, more personal, more efficient, responsive, flexible, innovative and creative services, aimed at the individual needs of clients where they live, and it saves taxpayers' dollars.

If there is any formula for its success it lies with the network's overriding focus on the people it serves. The network zeros in on local needs and priorities. It maintains personalized services for those who need help while increasing the number of access points. It also makes use of proven application of new technologies.

Does it attempt to create new authorities or change the power of the federal government to initiate or administer programs of any sort? No. It is simply innovative, a more creative and responsible approach to delivering services to Canadians.

Does it attempt to change existing jurisdictional provisions, as some members opposite would have us believe? Not at all. Existing agreements remain in place. Arrangements, partnerships, joint programs and so forth will continue to be negotiated as always. Our partners will be better able to achieve their own goals and objectives as a result of the service delivery network.

This new service delivery network strengthens the community of shared interest across the country. Canadians have placed their trust in us to make the best possible use of our resources, both economic and human, and I call on all members of the House to understand this new delivery service.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, once again, I welcome the opportunity to rise in the House to defend the interests of those I represent. Today we are discussing Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts. At first glance there is nothing to be worried about.

According to the minister, the bill merely brings together elements of various departments under the single name: Department of Human Resources Development. The stated purpose of this reorganization, to improve management of various services, is entirely praiseworthy, but unfortunately, we must point out that such bills are being used by the federal government to continue its attempts to encroach on the jurisdictions of Quebec and the other provinces. Unfortunately, these attempts are often successful.

Less than a week ago, I rose to condemn another bill, C–95, which also turned out to be a direct attack on the prerogatives of the Government of Quebec. I strongly condemned this approach, and I must say that the situation today calls for much the same treatment.

When we analyse Bill C–96, we see it is typical of a government that is discreetly trying to extend its powers, a government for whom provincial prerogatives are far from sacrosanct. In this respect, my colleague the hon. member for Mercier pointed out that, coming hard on the heels of a vote in which Quebecers gave Canada a brief respite to shape up, Bill C–96 is an insult. How right she was. With this bill, the government is trying to legislate powers it never had under the constitution.

For instance, in clause 6 we read that the powers of the minister are to be exercised with the objective "of enhancing employment, encouraging equality and promoting social security". Never mind the minister: encouraging equality and promoting social security were not part of the original legislation. Similarly, what about clauses 7 and 13, the former providing that the minister may "co–operate with provincial authorities with a view to the co–ordination of efforts made or proposed for preserving and improving human resources development"? Now that is a good example of the government's attitude to co–operation with the provinces.

When we see what it does with the suggestions and the consensus there, it is easy enough to believe. Clause 20 provides that the minister may, as part of his duties: "—enter into agreements with a province or group of provinces, agencies of provinces, financial institutions and such other persons or bodies as the Minister considers appropriate". This is what the government is calling decentralization, this circumventing of provincial jurisdiction and going directly to persons or bodies. This is what they call decentralization.

Once again, despite what the Minister of Human Resources Development says, this clause enables him to enter into agreements with, as I have just indicated, a number of bodies and institutions and even with individuals. With this clause, the minister is giving himself the power to go over the heads of the provinces—this cannot be said often enough—and enter into agreements with whomever he deems appropriate.

Do I need to point out that this does not appear in the original legislation? No clause in this bill provides that the government should respect provincial jurisdiction. Bill C–95, which a number of my colleagues and I strongly criticized recently, to its credit, at least attempts to respect the provincial governments by precluding the possibility of its exercising "any jurisdiction or control over any health authority operating under the laws of any province".

When we see the extent of the federal government's encroachment, even when it says it wants to respect areas of jurisdiction, we can easily imagine the situation when it does not express its desire to do so.

This bill definitely confirms the federal government's involvement in social and job programs. This fact is all the more obvious in the area of manpower training.

The minister talks of a whole other sort of decentralization. He intimates that his aim is to give communities and individuals more manoeuvring room. It is clear, however, that Bill C–96 is a way to get around what the provinces and Quebec want in order to deal directly with the groups and individuals the minister considers appropriate, who will, of course, be subject to whatever standards he may wish to impose.

The minister also talks of a single window. In this regard, the Quebec minister of employment, Louise Harel, said recently that Bill C–96 was the antithesis of the single window Quebec would like to establish by making the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre the primary intervenor in training matters. The SQDM is the embodiment of Quebec's consensus on the need for the Government of Quebec to be given full powers in manpower matters.

Despite this, according to the federal documents Le Devoir cites in its November 10 issue, the federal government is apparently preparing to end its co–operation with the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre in order to deal directly with community organizations and private institutions that it will finance and that will be subject to its eligibility criteria.

At a time when only the present Prime Minister and Pierre Trudeau still believe that further centralization is the solution to the multiple problems of federalism, it is not surprising that Bill C–96, although long ready, was not debated before the referendum.

This government has a very disappointing record with employment and social services; more than two years have passed and there is as much unemployment and even more people on welfare, and the coming unemployment insurance reform, also long ready and also kept hidden to keep Quebecers from knowing the true intentions of the government, will only make its record even worse.

Recently, in response to questions from the Leader of the Opposition on Bill C–96, the Minister of Human Resources Development replied that "obviously the Leader of the Opposition has not taken the time to read the bill". To counter this pretentious statement, I would like to refer to a number of Quebec reactions to the federal announcement of its intent.

The Société québécoise de développement de la main-d'oeuvre under Claude Béland and Ghislain Dufour has unanimously adopted a resolution calling for the federal government to transfer all of its manpower training budgets to Quebec.

• (1540)

The Quebec Minister of Employment, Louise Harel, described Bill C-96 as "the blunt rejection of the unanimous consensus in Quebec—".

We might add the reactions of the Canada Labour Congress and the Canadian Institute of Adult Education, both denouncing Bill C-96, one calling it "an attempt to bypass the provinces" and the other "a flagrant lack of respect for the aspirations of the provinces, Quebec in particular, in matters of education, training and manpower development".

For his part, the secretary general of the FTQ, the largest labour federation in Quebec, deplored the federal government's thumbing its nose at areas of provincial jurisdiction, and the Quebec consensus, in order to put into place a structure parallel to what is already there. He added "Even the Conseil du patronat sides with the unions on this. And even Robert Bourassa's Liberal government opposed a similar attempt by Ottawa in 1991. Anyone who still harbours any illusions about Canadian federalism ought to think twice before voting in the referendum".

These comments were made three weeks prior to the referendum, but they hold as true today as they did then.

For all these reasons, it is obvious that we in the Bloc Quebecois share the opinion of the majority of Quebecers and would be unable to vote in favour of such a bill.

[English]

Mr. Larry McCormick (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on Bill C-96.

A year ago our human resources development standing committee conducted public hearings in Ottawa and all across Canada. As a member of this committee I attended hearings in 25 cities in 35 days in 10 provinces, 2 territories and the East Arctic. In my own riding constituents shared their ideas and concerns with me at four town hall meetings held in Napanee, Sydenham, Bancroft and Tweed.

The bill addresses the concerns we heard from many Canadians. Recently in my riding I had the opportunity to attend the opening of an HRDC job kiosk in Northbrook, Ontario. Mr. Adrian van Asseldonk, our local HRDC manager, and his staff have provided residents from the Northbrook area, the northern part of our Lennox and Addington county, access to job market information. They no longer have to make the long trip to Napanee, Belleville or Kingston.

As we look at the legislation before us we could talk for hours on end about what this mandate clause means or that qualification entails or about what wordings should be changed; indeed we have to do this. It is our responsibility to get the legislation right but we also have to take our eyes away from the fine print, look at the thing as a whole and ask what it really means.

We can find out what it means outside these four walls in the communities because in the end this is about people; people who have hopes and dreams for the future, people who are willing to work hard for those dreams, people who are often struggling to hang on to a job or fund a new one, old people who are struggling to get by on a fixed income, young people stepping out of the school room into a world few of us could have imagined just a few short years ago. Those are the people who know about the real work this department is doing day in and day out across the country.

HRDC touches the lives of millions of Canadians every year perhaps more directly than any other government department. From survivor benefits to student loans, unemployment insurance, employment programs and services, old age security, HRDC has an impact on Canadians at each stage of their lives.

The HRDC described in the bill is working with Canadians in a new way. The government recognizes that Canada and Canadians are in the midst of a sea of change economically and socially. Our labour market and social programs have to change as well. For women, for aboriginal peoples, for people with disabilities and visible minorities this means a new Employment Equity Act, a stronger, more effective act which was tabled last year. In times of economic upheaval our commitment is to equity for all Canadians and it must be stronger than ever before.

For people looking for a chance to learn and expand their opportunities, it means a new Canada student loans program, the first major overhaul of the program in years and one that puts a good education into the reach of more Canadians than ever before.

For the first time there are specific grants to help women go to graduate schools in areas once dominated by men. For the first time students with disabilities can get support for the special facilities they need. For the first time single mothers can go back to school and get the financial help they need to pay for child care. At a time when knowledge and education are so critical, the new program is vital to many Canadians.

For older workers displaced by technology or by the decline of an industry, the bill means marshalling our resources to give them a hand, through strong partnerships with other governments like we have in Quebec through the program for older worker adjustment.

It means bold new approaches like the Atlantic groundfish strategy, helping displaced fishers and plant workers across Newfoundland and Labrador.

For young people who are unemployed and out of school it means youth services Canada. At last count, there were 200 projects across the country where they are learning new skills through community service.

There are projects like the one in Red Deer, Alberta where young people are working with the RCMP to deal with drug programs. Projects like the one in Clayoquot Sound where 20 young aboriginal men and women are working to develop a promising new eco–tourism program. Projects like the one in New Brunswick where young people are cleaning up and reclaiming polluted streams and rivers.

For young Canadians still in school the new approach means youth internships where private sector firms are giving kids in grade 10 or 11 hands on work experience tied in with the school curriculum. This year alone there are 25,000 young interns across Canada thanks to the strong partnerships we are building with the private sector. Business and government are working together to give young people a shot at a great future.

Bill C–96 means the Canadian Tourism Human Resource Council addresses the training needs of 1.2 million workers across this country. For women, this bill means Women in Trades and Technology, a national group helping women get into more trade, technological and blue collar jobs, with a national support network, courses and training programs designed specifically for women.

For some 30,000 unemployed Canadians it means getting a helping hand as they create their own jobs and become self–employed and, in the process, creating an additional 30,000 jobs for other Canadians.

For all Canadians this bill means the federal government working with the provinces to test new approaches in employment and training, learning and education and income support and services.

For example, in P.E.I. the Choice and Opportunity Project is designing and testing a delivery model to improve integrated services for persons with intellectual disabilities, eliminating barriers within generic programs and services and moving from segregated to inclusive community systems. The project is conducted in partnership with the Canadian Association for Community Living and the P.E.I. Association for Community Living.

In Newfoundland, the project "Transitions—The Changes Within" is helping over 5,000 people by testing a tuition voucher system that helps students remain in full time studies, helping post–secondary graduates gain work experience and becoming self–employed, helping unemployed workers find full time work.

In British Columbia an initiative is under way to improve the quality and access to child care for working and studying families through community one stop access centres, testing delivery models for the delivery of child care and finding ways to help children with special day care needs.

In New Brunswick the job corps project provides an annualized income to participants, people over 50 who were unemployed or on social assistance, in return for 26 weeks of volunteer work.

In every province we are making a real difference in the lives of Canadians from all walks of life. We are making a difference because we have transformed HRDC and our approach to delivering the programs that Canadians need.

This transformation will continue. In August the Minister of Human Resources Development announced the establishment of a new modern service delivery network that will reach more Canadians than ever before, the most sophisticated, efficient delivery network in the government.

We are developing new, more flexible programs and services through the human resources investment fund, programs that will be locally based, locally driven and focused squarely on results.

• (1550)

That is what the bill really means: a new direction for the department; a new focus for jobs and opportunity; a new approach to helping Canadians catch hold of their dreams for the future.

The human resources development department is doing good things for Canada. Bill C–96 will let us do more and better things. Let us not put up roadblocks. Let us get on with the job of serving Canadians.

I have a comment for an hon. member opposite. When I, along with other colleagues of the House, put in 12, 15 and 16–hour days across the country, in all corners, from sea to sea to sea, most members of the committee stayed in the room and listened to the witnesses. They listened to Canadians. Some hon. members stayed for one hour a day. There were stories of them going out on to the streets and signing up members for their party. I am ashamed of the conduct of some members of the House.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to rise on behalf of the people of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt to oppose Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts.

As we all know, this piece of so–called legislative genius proposes to transfer legal powers from one department to a new department. A new department. Another department.

Once again the Liberals are not listening to Canadians. Canadians have repeatedly demanded, in fact they have begged the Liberals to reduce the size of the federal government. All over the world, western democracies are reducing the size of bureaucratic monsters. Canadian provinces are doing everything they can to reduce the size of their operations. Other governments are trying to eliminate the waste of taxpayers' dollars, to eliminate duplication of tasks, to eliminate overlap in duties and to eliminate inefficiency and ineffectiveness. Not the Liberal Party of Canada.

The federal government, under the command of a man who brought our country to the brink of destruction, is creating more bureaucracy and red tape.

The Liberals are quick to say that this legislation only serves to reinforce existing federal powers for social programs. In the current post–referendum phase in which we are living Canadians do not want to reinforce any areas of federal government intervention. In fact, Canadians are demanding alternatives to the status quo.

The Liberals insist the legislation does not create any new powers for the federal government. How can we believe this, given the Liberal government's intention to increase government and to reinforce its firm grip of power over social programs for Canadians?

The Liberals are silent with respect to the increase or decrease of staff in the human resources development sector. There is nothing more scary than a silent Liberal, unless it is the Liberal defence minister saying that he needs a pen. In fact, this legislation contains a royal recommendation which authorizes expenditures that are undisclosed. Undisclosed?

This bill is a masterpiece of Liberal silence. Ask any Liberal member and he or she will tell you with a straight face that any expenditure under the bill is expected to be minimal, so Canadians have nothing to worry about.

The defence minister's new quill–tipped, gold lettering engraved pens, encased in some kind of black velvet, were a minimal expense.

The Liberal government's $100 million gun registry is a minimal expense. Most non–Liberal Party sources agree that $100 million is the minimal amount that the punishment of law–abiding, responsible firearms owners and users is going to cost. On the subject of how much the gun registry is going to cost, most authorities, that is those who do not belong to the Liberal Party of Canada, believe it will cost Canadian taxpayers much more than $100 million.

• (1555)

Since this past August I have uncovered over $100 million worth of wasteful and questionable spending by the Minister of National Defence and his senior officials. One hundred million dollars means nothing at all to this Liberal government. It has only to be careful to make sure that the defence minister does not spend $100 million on gold–plated pens.

The Reform Party of Canada is looking forward to building a new Canada of the 21st century. The Reform Party has a program which would allow the federal government to withdraw from fields it currently occupies jointly with the provinces.

The provincial premiers are in favour of negotiating the transfer of power from the federal government to the provincial governments. The Reform Party's voice has no attachment to the status quo. The Reform Party is not interested in dragging our country back into a constitutional quagmire. Our 20–point plan can modernize and decentralize the country, something for which Canadians are clearly asking.

Bill C–96 is an embarrassment to the Liberal government. The Liberals should withdraw this phoney bill. The Prime Minister has nearly smashed our nation to smithereens as a result of his complete misunderstanding of the will of the people of Quebec and all other provinces. The Prime Minister misjudged the referendum within Quebec. He misjudged the referendum as a national issue. Canadians had to take it on themselves to travel to Quebec to express their wish for that province to remain in our family.

Canadians were hoping the Prime Minister would lead the way in assuring Quebecers that all Canadians wanted Quebec to vote no. Canadians as usual since October 1993 were sorely disappointed by the Prime Minister. We have been let down. The Prime Minister and the Liberals have lost the confidence of our nation. Yet the Liberals are busy creating another federal government department. This is pure balderdash.

The Minister of Human Resources Development and the Minister of Western Economic Diversification has been fudging his handling of Canadian social programs since the Liberals took office. The infamous red book made lofty promises of social policy reform. This minister has yet to be able to get anything meaningful past the Liberal cabinet.

The bill is a desperate attempt by this minister to do something about our nation's social policy. Canadians want social policy reform. This bill creates bureaucracy. It does not reduce government or reform social policy. This bill takes the existing situation and shuffles it all around.

The Reform Party is offering Canadians the opportunity to decentralize powers to the provinces and truly reform our public tax supported institutions. We propose to get our money's worth from what we have to work with. Unlike the Liberals, we want to bring power closer to the grassroots of Canada. We do not propose to continue allowing bureaucrats in Ottawa to answer their phones and just say no to whatever the people of British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and all other provinces are asking.

Western Canadians have as many problems with the status quo as our Quebec counterparts. Virtually all Canadians want change and the Liberals do not realize it. Our forefathers managed to change our nation each time we were faced with difficulties in how we would govern ourselves.

In terms of social services, including medical services, we propose to change the role of the federal government to that of fostering co–operative interprovincial agreements rather than imposing unilateral standards and withholding transfer payments as a punishment for non–conformity. By proceeding with the bill the Liberal Party is acting completely against the will of Canadians. The government should be ashamed.

• (1600)

I must sound the alarm for Canadians watching that the bill does away with an annual report for the new department. As hard as it is to believe, even though we are $550 billion in debt the Liberals are creating a department of the federal government that does not even have to report its administration costs.

The Liberal Party and its leader have been terribly smitten because they have been trying to appease Quebec without consideration for the wants and desires of other provinces.

The Reform Party is rising like a phoenix out of the west. After the next election the Reform Party will have at least an additional 100 seats. These seats will come from lost Liberal seats in rural Ontario and eastern Canada. The grassroots movement of our party is a wave that is sweeping across the nation. After the next election Canadians will see a new form of federalism come to the country with the Reform Party of Canada as a new government.

On behalf of my constituents and all Canadians I say no to Bill C–96.

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C–96, the Department of Human Resources Development Act.

I am also pleased to respond to some of the suggestions of the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt. He said that his party seeks to eliminate overlap and inefficiencies and is a rising phoenix. The phoenix is dragging its tail. It is trying to make its point on cheap shots about the Prime Minister and about the minister of human resources.

Mr. Stinson: There is nothing cheap there.

Ms. Cohen: A phoenix is a bird that cheeps and this phoenix is certainly about the cheapest around.

Canadians are demanding alternatives to the status quo. Canadians are demanding efficiencies. The bill does not deal with substantive issues. The bill deals with issues consequential to not creating a new department but merging three different departments. The bill is about efficiencies, about preventing overlap and about producing better results for the Canadian taxpayer.

Members know that the Department of Human Resources Development already exists through orders in council. An obvious question might be: Why bother proceeding with this in a legislative format? The department is working. Why not put the legislation off until other substantive issues could be included? It is a fair question and I would like to address it briefly. In my view there are essentially five reasons why we need the bill and why we should proceed without delay.

First, we need a straightforward way to clarify the role of the department and to clarify ministerial responsibilities. The existing arrangements are set out through orders in council. They are perfectly legitimate as transitional arrangements. However, in the final analysis the government, and I am sure everyone in the House, even the great Reform phoenix, would prefer to see this complex trail of statutory powers leading back to the enabling legislation of many different founding departments replaced with one single, coherent bill that sets out the mandate and the powers of the department in one place. That is just common sense. It ought to appeal to all of us. It certainly ought to appeal to the Reform Party.

Second, by providing that single coherent mandate we could then clarify the identity of the department, something that is important both for its employees, although I do not think the Reform Party is worried about them, and for its clients, Canadian citizens, people the government cares about.

For more than a year employees from the four founding departments, labour, employment and immigration, health and welfare and the secretary of state, have been working together to create a new organization. They have accomplished a great deal but their own sense of belonging, being part of a single focused organization, really cannot be complete until the legislation is passed.

Bill C–96 means that the people who work for the department can turn the page and head into a new chapter. At the same time people in organizations who work with the department need to know with whom they are working. This is difficult when, for example, departmental officials at this point legally cannot really use human resources department letterhead. For legal and contracting purposes they still use letterhead from departments that in the eyes of our partners do not even exist any more. That may seem like a minor issue, but it creates a great deal of confusion among our partners and is expensive.

It is related to the third reason why we need Bill C–96 now. It would be overstating the case to say that existing arrangements are an administrative nightmare, but it does not overstate the case by much. Without enabling legislation for the department even simple issues like getting a person transferred turns into a complex, time consuming and costly process.

When more detailed contracts are involved the process gets very messy. This is understandable and unavoidable during a major restructuring and transition, but there comes a time to bring that transition to an end. Two years have passed since the reorganization started and the time is now because we need to move forward. This is the fourth reason for the bill.

We have to consolidate the progress we have achieved in integrating social and labour market programs and sharpening the focus on developing Canada's human resources. More important, we need to clear the way for further progress.

As we undertake a major overhaul of the UI program, as we develop new programs and services under the human resources investment fund, as we work to improve programs for seniors, as the department implements the next phase of re–engineering and streamlining services to Canada, we need to clear the way.

This brings me to the fifth and most important reason we need the bill. Canadians need and deserve the best possible service. In the end that is what really matters about the bill. In the end that is what Liberals worry about. The displaced workers who walk into the Canada employment centre in Windsor, Ontario, deserve the same kind of integrated, results oriented support focused on helping people adjust and get new jobs.

The single mother from my riding who is looking for help needs the kind of integrated service that will help her care for her children while getting the skills and income support that will help her to build a life with a future.

The young person stuck in a cycle of dead end jobs and unemployment after leaving school needs help breaking that cycle. That is what Human Resources Development Canada is there for. We need to ensure that the department can do its job. It is important to clear up the administrative tangles left over from earlier times. It is important to establish a clear identity and coherent mandate for the new organization to function properly. It is important to ensure that as the department looks to the future there is a solid foundation to build on.

It is important also to continue to fulfil the overwhelming desire of Canadians, a desire that is clear in all 10 provinces and in the territories. What Canadians want is a strong federal government that can make sure that programs and services are delivered uniformly across the country.

Bill C–96 creates the department that will provide that foundation in the human resources development area. We need to pass the bill. We need to get on with the work of serving Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take part in this debate today on Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development.

Over the next ten minutes, I intend to look at the issue of employment centre restructuring, from the particular point of view of Quebec, where, from now on, we will have 78 sub–offices coming under 28 offices called regional management centres.

I will also address this issue as it relates to a case of particular concern to me, namely the CEC of Trois–Rivières, because we were stunned and outraged to learn, on June 22, 1995, that the department planned to establish the regional management centre in Shawinigan rather than in Trois–Rivières.

This announcement immediately gave rise to a general outcry. Yours truly was the first one to denounce such plans, soon to be followed by the mayor of Trois–Rivières, the Chamber of Commerce and 70 organizations of the greater Trois–Rivières area, including 40 municipalities, all of which passed resolutions denouncing the federal government's plans in this respect.

This eventually resulted in a petition being circulated over the summer by the EIC employees' union, with the full support of the Federation of Senior Citizens, because this bill is a direct attack on senior citizens, and of the local branches of the Fédération des caisses populaires Desjardins, which helped circulate the petition. As a result, upwards of 25,000 citizens have signed the petition and expressed in writing their opposition to these plans the federal government has regarding our region.

As you can see, in addition to being very unpopular in the Trois–Rivières region, this decision actually contradicts the department's own criteria for determining the most sensible location for these offices.

In fact, the criteria were based first of all on the total population; second, on the number of people on unemployment insurance; third, on the number of people receiving income security benefits; fourth, on the number of senior citizens concerned; and finally, on the number of businesses and employers affected by the activities of the employment centres. The department, preferring to ignore its own criteria, concluded for obvious reasons that it was better to locate the regional centre in Shawinigan instead of Trois–Rivières, although there is twice as much economic activity in the Trois–Rivières region as in Shawinigan.

The same ratio applies to the total population, the number of senior citizens and the number of businesses. This is one more example that shows why it makes no sense to locate in Shawinigan instead of Trois–Rivières. The practical implications are all explained in a document we happened to receive not long ago. This is an internal management document entitled: "Preliminary Report on Centralization of Claims Processing".

This document was released less than a month ago on October 23, 1995, and prepared by a committee of 11 department officials, including several senior officials. The report more or less describes the future role of the sub–offices, including Trois–Rivières. The sub–offices will receive benefit claims, transmit the claims and collect the facts from the client. According to a note in the document, this will only consist in taking down information provided by the client.

They will take this information down in Trois–Rivières and routinely send it on to Shawinigan, where more than half of the files will come from Trois–Rivières and the surrounding region. Trois–Rivières in this case includes Cap–de–la–Madeleine and Trois–Rivières West. What about Bécancour, which will have to deal with Drummondville? It does not make sense. There is no administrative or historic link between the residents of Bécancour and Drummondville, which is another absurd aspect of this plan.

We, that is my colleagues for Champlain and Richelieu and myself, wrote to the minister to make the appropriate representations. People in our regions, especially the unemployed, will have a hard time as a result of this plan. Six weeks later on November 10—as soon as possible, as usual—we received a written reply from the minister who, by the way, was too busy to meet three members of Parliament. He referred us to an assistant deputy minister in Montreal, Mr. Gladu. We will let somebody else go and meet him.

In his letter, the minister explained why Shawinigan had been chosen instead of Trois–Rivières, and I quote: "The government decided to centralize Human Resources Development Canada's internal services for the Mauricie region at the Shawinigan centre because it felt it would be useful to bring together a certain number of services and departments, including Revenue Canada and Human Resources Development Canada".

Which means it was a matter of accommodation, office space would appear to be available at the Taxation Data Centre in Shawinigan. The reason is therefore simply a physical one, despite the decision's unpopularity and unreasonableness. It is a matter of premises that has led to preparations to move it to Shawinigan–South and yet, in the present building, there are premises available. Even more will be coming available soon, because the network will disappear in the restructuring, and this will free up a whole floor and another one, two floors leased until 1999, which will be available and could accommodate all the personnel required for a regional management centre in Trois–Rivières.

This reason does not hold. What is more, the minister says that the future centre in Shawinigan, in addition to offering the same programs and services as in Trois–Rivières, will manage internal services relating to the administration and processing of unemployment insurance claims. This tells us about the role of the Shawinigan centre rather than the one in Trois–Rivières.

Here again, according to this document, not only will the actual files of people from Trois–Rivières be in Shawinigan, but departmental investigations will be done from Shawinigan, appeals to the board of referees will be made there and complaints about unemployment insurance will be lodged there. According to the same document, three claims out of four will be reviewed, as they call it, and will be given special follow–up because of some complexity or other. Therefore three claims out of four arriving in Trois–Rivières will be transferred to Shawinigan and given special treatment.

Here is what the minister says in his missive. He tells us that he has no intention of making any changes to the way the department is serving the people of Trois–Rivières. Well, at this time, the physical files of UI claimants are in Trois–Rivières; departmental investigations are conducted in Trois–Rivières; appeals to the UI arbitration board are heard in Trois–Rivières; and relatively complex files are processed in Trois–Rivières. Therefore, we cannot trust the minister when he tells us that the services provided to the people of Trois–Rivières will not be affected in any way. This cannot be true in my opinion.

How can we trust the minister? What guarantee does he give in this letter that there will be no changes? There is no guarantee. The more we look at this, the more we realize that the decision to move and almost dismantle the Trois–Rivières manpower centre—whose staff, according to our information, will be reduced from around 100 one or two years ago to 12—is purely political.

This is a purely political decision. If the hon. member for Saint–Maurice, the Prime Minister wants to show his constituents that electing him was not a mistake, that they did the right thing for the riding of Saint–Maurice by electing him, he may have the right to take measures, but he has no right to do so at the expense of the people of Trois–Rivières and the surrounding region and to look down on them. He has no right to do that, and I take this opportunity to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and to tell this House that we will not give up. We do not accept this decision and we never will.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the service delivery network initiative, a feature of this bill, is a significant step forward in providing Canadians with faster, more effective and efficient services. It gives the government and local communities greater flexibility to help those about whom we are all most concerned, those Canadians in need of some assistance from their government, whether it is through unemployment insurance, a retirement pension or many of the other services now under the jurisdiction of the Department of Human Resources Development. Not only does it provide for greater self–service, it enhances access to in–person service.

The service delivery network was spurred by the need to accomplish two goals: improve the quality of service and reduce costs. These goals may seem contradictory. The government, however, was convinced from the beginning that better and more innovative service is a means of saving money. It is also a way to meet the needs of Canadians more effectively.

Canadians clearly agree. They know fiscal restraint and social responsibility are both essential to Canada's future; they told us so during our wide ranging consultations. That is what the new service delivery network achieves; faster, more responsive, localized and personalized service at less cost.

• (1620)

Given the tone of the debate on Bill C–96, it would be useful to restate the background behind the reform. First, it bears repeating that Bill C–96 is an administrative measure, not a policy instrument. The new service delivery network breaks new ground in terms of innovation and creativity. What it does not do is create new powers for the federal government; nor does it invade provincial jurisdiction in matters of labour market development. It is an administrative reform initiative, period. It is not necessary or even desirable to alter jurisdictional arrangements or create new authorities.

[Translation]

How will this new service delivery network benefit Quebecers? The new network will affect the lives of Quebecers in many ways. Across the province, Human Resources Development Canada provides services through an expanding network of offices. Whether through programs and services relating to employment, old age pension benefits and unemployment insurance or any of the various job–related services, every Quebecer will be affected by one or more of these programs at one time or another, from their youth to their retirement.

HRDC offices in Quebec serve more than one million people. For students alone, there are 87 Canada Employment Centres for Students. The Quebec network administers several employment programs and Canada–Quebec agreements, a number of joint ventures involving the province and the federal government, 50,000 contracts relating to manpower and a $13.3 billion budget.

In 1994–1995, HRDC helped more than 164,000 Quebecers find jobs and nearly 45,000 students find summer jobs.

Education is another area in which HRDC makes a significant contribution. Without the required skills, Canadians and Quebecers have no hope of matching the competition on the rapidly changing global market we are dealing with today. That is why HRDC pumped $1.5 billion into the Quebec post–secondary education system. Young Quebecers certainly took advantage of this financial assistance to further their education.

[English]

The department helped nearly 280,000 participants in employment services and nearly 150,000 employment program participants. It served 850,000 old age security pension plan recipients. As well, HRDC contributed more than $2.7 billion under the Canada assistance plan to help some 700,000 people receiving social assistance benefits. It provided the unemployment insurance service to a monthly average of 528,000 claimants.

[Translation]

HRDC funds pilot projects like Éduplus, Formetal and La Puce to develop innovative ways of serving the public. The department also contributed to the outstanding success of groups like the Cirque du Soleil, which flourished with the financial support of HRDC.

This list of achievements speaks volumes. It shows that meaningful partnerships between the federal government and the people of Quebec promote community building and shape its future. By providing easier access to improved services, we broaden even more future prospects.

• (1625)

These initiatives and programs did not appear out of thin air; they are the result of sustained efforts by the department in Quebec. They certainly bear the Quebec government's seal of approval, since most of them arise from various partnership agreements that have been signed.

[English]

There are the Canada–Quebec interim agreements on labour force development measures, the Canada assistance plan, the agreement on enhancing employment opportunities for social assistance recipients, the Canada–Quebec agreement on the assignment of unemployment insurance benefits, the Canada–Quebec agreement on the exchange of information, the Canada student loan program with block funding to Quebec, the post–secondary education financing agreement with block funding to Quebec.

[Translation]

Do Quebecers appreciate these services? Undoubtedly, as evidenced by the 50,000 contracts relating to manpower, representing about $685 million, that were awarded in Quebec, including 9,600 contracts with non–profit organizations; 9,300 contracts with private sector enterprises; 2,800 contracts with public sector enterprises such as municipalities; 3,200 contracts with the Government of Quebec for the provision of institutional training and 25,000 contracts under the fee payer trainee program.

[English]

I have described the daily ongoing service of Human Resources Development Canada to the residents of Quebec and in co–operation with the people of Quebec. These are not the inventions of the new service delivery network. They are the content the network was designed to deliver more effectively, more responsively, more creatively.

Opposing improvements in the delivery of programs does not serve the interests of Quebecers. Confusing administrative reform with reform of social policy or jurisdictional changes does not serve the interests of Quebecers or of Canadians anywhere. Innovation and creativity do serve the interests of all Canadians, including Quebecers, and innovation and creativity are what the new service delivery network is all about.

The Department of Human Resources Development has every intention of remaining innovative in its delivery of services and programs but it has not by this initiative invented any new programs. We do need new ideas and ways of doing things. We need clarity of vision, which is what this bill represents, a new way for a new future of delivering programs right across the country, helping those who most need to adapt in a new economy.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate.

Human Resources Development Canada I believe, from my longstanding commitment to the Liberal tradition, is central to the government's maintaining its credibility with the people of Canada. Of all government departments Human Resources Development Canada is the one at this time that should get the most support and the most encouragement from all members of the House.

• (1630)

As we are going through a period of restructuring we have these incredible forces from the right that say cut, eliminate, offload, decentralize. When we are doing that for the purpose of eliminating waste I am sympathetic.

I believe human resources development has to be one of the departments of the national government that remain strong and intact. It must be the counterbalance to provincial forces that quite often are shortsighted and think in a parochial way rather than in the interest of the whole of Canada. I maintain that unless we have national programs with national standards it will be very difficult for us to maintain a sense of national will.

I am totally opposed to offloading any more of the decision making process in an area like human resources development to the province of Quebec or to any other provinces. All of a sudden we will have that parochial thought process emerge. We will become a country in which essentially we have about five or six different standards, thought processes emerging. When we are trying to develop national standards it is virtually impossible when we go that route.

I will give an example in terms of my own province, Ontario. We have a Conservative government which is being very shortsighted in the way it is treating its human resources development opportunities.

Mr. Stinson: Not according to the people.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): A member from the Reform Party said not according to the people.

I have to take a minute to talk about the people and why the provincial government is so popular in Ontario. We have in the country now an emerging culture. A book written by John Kenneth Galbraith was called The Culture of the Content. What we have now is a culture in which there are people who have work, who have a job, who have everything going for them, who might have a lot of RRSPs, whose business may be in good shape, who are essentially content. They represent about 70 per cent.

The 70 per cent who are basically content, who have their paycheque secure, or who have enough investment income that they can look after themselves are essentially comfortable with this right wing agenda. Those people are not being as sensitive as they used to be toward those in our community who do not have, who do not have work, who do not have the opportunity to get retrained. We must as governments invest in some people to be retrained.

We have in our province a Conservative government catering to the contented culture. It is forgetting the 30 per cent who are having a very difficult time. The Ontario government's vision is very much like a business vision. It is like earnings per share per quarter.

• (1635)

When building a country we cannot run it like a business. We have to think of the investment in human capital for the long term. It is essential that we have a counterbalance at the national level.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, when I try to talk in a constructive way about the issue here, the Reform Party does not let me finish. There may be a day when those gentlemen might be given the trust by the people of Canada. If they have been given the trust of the people of Canada, they are not supposed to get the trust and then simply say hand it over to the province.

The Chamber is meant to be a counterbalance to those regional and provincial forces. When one is in the Chamber, one does not speak only for one's own riding and one's own province. When in the Chamber, one is supposed to speak for all of Canada. We are here to speak for all of Canada.

Ontario has a shortsighted vision evolving in which we do not have investment dollars going into human resource development. We should be thanking God that we have a minister who will not be pushed around by the bureaucrats in the Department of Finance when they are trying to offload this place. He will maintain his presence for a strong national human resources development department.

To the members of the Reform, there are many I have had good constructive debate with—

An hon. member: Does that include giving something to the Winnipeg Jets?

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): The member asked whether giving money to the Winnipeg Jets is a good decision? He is taking me off the subject matter of my speech but I will talk about the Winnipeg Jets. I declare conflict of interest with the Winnipeg Jets. As members know, my son played his nine games with the Winnipeg Jets. He is only a 19–year old kid.

I support the commitment of the Government of Canada to try to maintain another National Hockey League franchise in this country. I come from Toronto where we do not have any problems maintaining a franchise. This is not a country that has looked out only for those provinces that have. We should be looking out for provinces that do not have the same resources as downtown Toronto.

It does not bother me if some of the cashflow from Ontario is distributed to Winnipeg or other places if it means we can maintain our national sport. It does not bother me.

An hon. member: Big business.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): It is big business. It is a multi–billion business that has created exports, equipment, players, tourism and exposure. Do not underestimate the contribution of hockey as a national sport.

Let me get back to my speech on human resources development. Mr. Speaker, please do not dock me for the diversion that was generated by the Reform Party on the Winnipeg Jets.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The only commitment I will make—I cannot put you in the penalty box—is that you have two minutes to wrap it up.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I will not argue with the Speaker because I am afraid of a 10–minute misconduct. That means I will not be able to speak tomorrow.

• (1640)

I want to go back to the essence of the department, human resources. Many of the ideas and decisions taken by the Department of Human Resources Development do not always come out of Ottawa. It is very rare. That is one of the myths, one of the spins we hear from the Reform Party.

I know many of the ideas for human resource development, ideas for job creation or jobs for retraining, actually come from the grassroots, from the local human resource development offices. I bet there is not a member of Parliament who has not had an idea come through the system and get approved where the idea came right from the community.

To all members and to my dear friends from the Bloc Quebecois please, the people of Canada have spoken. They want a strong national government. We must begin by reinforcing the voice of the people to make sure the Department of Human Resources Development is the ground swell for rebuilding this great, strong, national government that once was.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, education; the hon. member for St. John's East, domestic violence.

[Translation]

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, now that the Quebec referendum is over, the Liberal government is finally tabling the most important piece of its legislative agenda, that is Bill C–96. We had to put up with years of Liberal dickering and federal pussy footing to arrive at this result: at last, this government is showing its true colours.

The government can try its best by including so–called "technical" details in its bill, by saying that it merely seeks to "establish" a legal entity, and that it "streamlines" federal bureaucracy to meet the concerns of those involved. However, nothing can hide this obvious will to increase federal involvement in fields of provincial jurisdiction.

On October 5, in response to questions from the official opposition, the Minister of Human Resources Development deemed appropriate to say that the Bloc Quebecois obviously had "not taken the time to read the bill".

Whether the minister agrees or not, the fact is that the Bloc Quebecois, the Quebec government, the Société québécoise du développement de la main–d'oeuvre, the socio–economic partners in Quebec, including those representing management, union and social sectors, not to mention the Quebec minister of state responsible for joint action, have all read the same document and come to the same conclusion: Bill C–96 strengthens the centralizing views of the federal government and increases its involvement in the employment and social program sectors, including manpower training. This shows a complete disregard for the consensus reached in Quebec on the need to have all necessary powers, so that the Quebec government, in co–operation with its socio–economic partners, can channel its energy and its resources where they are needed most, based on the actual and increasing needs of its population.

On October 4, Louise Harel denounced, in a press release, the federal attempt to set up a parallel structure to get involved in the manpower training sector:

"Like its labour market partners, the Quebec government denounces Ottawa's intentions to set up its own parallel manpower structures in Quebec. This federal initiative amounts to a flat rejection of the unanimous Quebec consensus, repeatedly expressed, both under the previous administration and under the current one, on the need for Quebec to regain control over all labour adjustment measures, including the related budgets".

• (1645)

Let there be no mistake. This bill is a screen allowing the Liberal government to hide its real intentions. This makes it the cornerstone of federal interventionism for the Liberal government, which is now determined to ignore Quebec and overlook the provinces' wishes. This is a great example of the importance and role the federal government wants to give the provinces in tomorrow's Canada.

Bill C–96 mirrors the Canadian constitution: encroachments, overlap, duplication, and waste. Bill C–96 clearly shows that the federal government has no intention of respecting provincial jurisdiction. How can we not denounce this attitude?

This is not the federal government's first encroachment on provincial jurisdiction. After taking over unemployment insurance in the 1940s, it consolidated its hegemony in the labour sector by creating employment centres and manpower training programs. Fifty years later, we are forced to recognize that the federal government has no intention of withdrawing from that sector.

Bill C–96 undermines Quebec's efforts to set up a single framework for labour initiatives, thus confirming the official opposition's worst fears. The minister is trying to take advantage of his reform to give himself more powers at the expense of the provinces. Bill C–96 gives the government the powers it needs to bypass the provinces in concluding agreements with local organizations.

The federal government will then be able to go after municipalities and offer them responsibilities contracted directly with the Department of Human Resources Development. This would allow the minister to delegate powers to the new employment commission or any other entity, thereby bypassing provincial governments and administrations. Quebec's fears and concerns are justified, since the minister can impose his own standards on these entities by delegating these powers, without, of course, the agreement of the Canadian Parliament or the provinces. This is the Canadian version of decentralization.

This bill, if passed, will provide the necessary legislative framework to allow the minister to implement his much talked–about UI reform, which is the second piece of the federal puzzle. Several clauses of Bill C–96 grant huge discretionary powers to the head of the department, which, in the opinion of the official opposition, promotes greater federal interference and invasion of the provincial jurisdiction over social matters, and manpower in particular.

For instance, clause 6 of the bill states that the "powers, duties and functions of the Minister extend to and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction—not by law assigned to any other Minister, department, board or agency of the Government of Canada, and are to be exercised with the objective of enhancing employment, encouraging equality and promoting social security".

It is clear that, with Bill C–96, the powers, duties and functions assigned to the minister are larger, because his thrust area is no longer specified in the act. One can wonder about the deeper motives of the legislator.

As for clause 7, it could hardly be vaguer. It states that "In exercising the powers or performing the duties or functions assigned to him under this or any other act of Parliament, the minister may— cooperate with provincial authorities with a view to the coordination of efforts made or proposed for preserving and improving human resources development".

Nowhere does it say that the minister has to cooperate with the provinces. The minister is not required to respect provincial jurisdictions.

• (1650)

However, clauses 20 and 21 are even more worrisome. Clause 20 provides that:

> —the Minister may enter into agreements with a province— agencies of provinces, financial institutions and such other persons or bodies as the Minister considers appropriate.

This covers a vast range. As for clause 21, it provides that:

> The Minister may authorize the Minister of Labour, the Commission or any other person—to exercise any power or perform any duty or function of the Minister.

It is obvious to the official opposition that, through these legislative provisions, the minister is getting the powers necessary to delegate, to whomever he considers appropriate, the management of his department's policies and programs. From now on, the minister will have the power to contract out, at his full discretion and with full impunity.

In this instance, the minister will have the power to enter into agreements with local or regional organizations, such as municipalities, and thus completely ignore the provinces.

The federal strategy taking shape with this bill will inescapably generate a clash between the already well established manpower network and that of the federal government, with the numerous programs and grants of all kinds that the government will provide throughout Quebec. That strategy is already being used by the federal government. The establishment of this superdepartment, along with the discretionary powers given to the minister, will only reinforce the centralizing position of the federal government.

Unfortunately, by acting in this way and rejecting Quebec's efforts and desire to be effective in the manpower sector, the federal government clearly shows a lack of integrity. By establishing national standards in that field, the government carries on its tradition of interfering in fields which are not under its jurisdiction.

Quebec and its dynamic forces denounce the federal will to further interfere in an area where the programs and initiatives must be defined by the Quebec government, based on the real needs of its population.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–96 does not in any way alter present federal and provincial powers. No matter how you look at the situation, there is absolutely no intrusion in spheres of provincial jurisdiction. This is forbidden by the bill itself.

The time has definitely come for all levels of government—federal, provincial, municipal—to rise above all jurisdictional quarrels and to start finding solutions for working together, pooling their resources and helping the people they serve.

The Bloc would prefer to see us do nothing. On November 9, the member for Mercier served up a fine piece of jargon about jurisdictional issues. Perhaps she might like to come back down to earth and talk to us instead about the people concerned.

Perhaps she might talk to the millions of Quebecers who each year turn to the Department of Human Resources Development for help, to let them know which of them will be abandoned and unable to take advantage of the $13.3 billion we spend in their province every year.

Perhaps the Bloc ought to talk to the 164,000 Quebec men and women we helped to find a job last year, to say, "We will not be helping you any longer". Perhaps the Bloc members could let us know which of the 44,789 students who found summer employment last summer we ought not to have helped.

Perhaps they could tell some 700,000 Quebecers that the federal government ought not to have spent close to three billion dollars for the social aid program they depend upon to live.

Perhaps the Bloc could explain jurisdictional issues to the half million unemployment insurance recipients there are in Quebec every month.

• (1655)

Perhaps they could tell us which of the 400,000 Quebecers who benefit from our employment programs and services we should abandon.

Perhaps they could explain to the 850,000 Quebec seniors why they should not receive their Canada pension plan and old age security benefits.

Perhaps they could explain to Quebecers why the federal government should not invest $1.5 billion in their postsecondary education system.

While some members worry about the imaginary threat of federal power grabs, the Department of Human Resources Development is doing the work it has to do, with Quebecers and the Quebec government. Bloc members say, in the name of respect for provincial jurisdictions, that we should do nothing. I, however, say that, in the name of change, we should find ways of doing a better job.

It is not by erecting walls that we will do a better job. We need a better philosophy. We need the type of philosophy articulated by the minister when he talked about the need to empower the community and the people to make more choices.

What was the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup's answer? No. People should not be empowered to make more choices. This is not the Bloc's philosophy. We need the kind of philosophy articulated by the minister when he talked about new partnerships between the government and the private sector, between the government and the school boards, between the government and the provinces.

What was the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup's answer? "No, we do not want to work together to bring about changes". The hon. members for Mercier and Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup made much of the fact that Bill C-96 allows us to conclude agreements with Quebec organizations for implementing our programs and delivering our services.

HRDC already has thousands of contracts and agreements with a myriad of Quebec organizations, including agreements with the Quebec government that are important to those people trying to return to the labour force. The existing legislation already allows us to negotiate such agreements. In 1994-95 alone, HRDC signed over 50,000 labour agreements in Quebec, representing a total of $695 million in funding for programs and income support. This bill simply renews these agreements. Nothing has changed.

Is the Bloc telling us that we should stop investing millions of dollars to help laid-off workers, as we are now doing under the program for older worker adjustment? We could not do so without the power to enter into agreements with financial institutions and to buy the pension plans these workers need.

Does the Bloc mean to say that we should stop building new partnerships in Quebec, partnerships that help reduce duplication and overlap and improve service delivery to Quebecers? Because we would be unable to establish partnerships if we no longer had the means of ensuring their smooth running.

Let there be no mistake about it, the partnerships we enter into are indeed effective, and the basic concept of flexible federalism which supports these partnerships is also effective. Think about the many current agreements between HRDC and Quebec, including the interim Canada-Quebec agreement on certain manpower development initiatives, the welfare recipient accord implementation agreement, the Canada-Quebec agreement on employment in the agricultural sector and the agreement on the global transfer of funds to Quebec under the Canadian Student Loans Program, just to name a few.

• (1700)

These master agreements are effective and they have a decisive impact on the lives of thousands of Quebecers.

I submit that we should consolidate these partnerships, further decentralize powers and let Quebecers decide what programs and services are best suited to their needs.

Labour market programs and services are already amongst the most highly decentralized federal measures. They are implemented through a very wide network of local centres that have gained a reputation for reliability and co-operation within the communities they serve.

The government is currently decentralizing by delegating decision making authority back to the regions, all the way down to the local level, where it should rest. Over the past year, we have been leaders and made tremendous progress in this area. We completely redesigned the way the Department of Human Resources Development operates within communities in Quebec and across Canada.

The federal government also undertook to work together with the provinces to afford Canadians maximum flexibility with respect to services. Take for instance the Canada social transfer for health and social programs, which is to replace the Canada assistance plan. The purpose of the social transfer is to help provinces provide the social services and benefits of their choice, which they cannot do at present because of inflexible rules.

Obviously, this is good news. We are making real progress on the road to co-operation, while also preserving our integrity. We are making real progress by putting stable social programs in the hands of Quebecers.

Bill C-96 is about the pursuit of these achievements. It will allow us to continue to work together, to define the roles of the various levels of government, and to create links between them.

These initiatives are certainly better than the alleged usurpations of authority. It is high time we started creating links that will bring us closer together.

This is why we officially asked the Government of Quebec, as well as those of the other provinces, to co-operate with us to decentralize services. Several provinces have already joined us to discuss ways to define our respective roles and promote more effective co-operation. Consequently, I urge all members of the House to encourage Quebec to join us to meet that challenge.

The motion from the Bloc Quebecois is certainly not a constructive move to bring about the type of changes that we all want. Rather, it is yet another obstacle on the way to the future.

What purpose would be served if the House did not go ahead with Bill C-96? None at all. It would not help the Bloc Quebecois to proceed with the type of changes it claims to be seeking. It would not help Canadians to get the services which they expect and which they need.

It would only force the Department of Human Resources Development to continue to work in isolation, outside the simple and consistent framework provided by the bill. It would only maintain the administrative burden resulting from the lack of enabling legislation, since even the simplest operations, such as a transfer of personnel, can trigger a complex, long and costly process.

We can certainly do better than that.

It goes without saying that co–operation is better than confrontation, discord and separation. We have to recognize that, at a time when we are trying to make the best of the resources of federalism, in which Quebecers have put their faith.

Co–operation is better than living in the past, as we are trying to redefine the role of partners, which must be fulfilled by governments, that is being partners with individuals and communities, but also partners among themselves.

Such is the philosophy, the vision underlying the establishment of the new Department of Human Resources Development.

Bill C–96 is the foundation of that department. With the approval and support of this House, we will pass this legislation and carry on our work.

• (1705)

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is with great interest that I am intervening today in this House on Bill C–96, an act to legally establish the Department of Human Resources Development.

This is a long way from the agricultural portfolio for which I am usually critic for the official opposition, but the significance of the changes brought in by Bill C–96 requires me to speak out.

Application of this bill would be disastrous for Quebec, and I must defend the interests of my constituents first, but also those of all Quebecers.

What the government is preparing to do by going ahead with this bill is quite simply unacceptable. Bill C–96 is a tool with which the minister intends to broaden his powers once again, going over the heads of the provinces to do as he sees fit.

This bill enables the minister to ignore the provinces by establishing direct links with local organizations or individuals of his choice. What we are to understand from this is that, when the federal government speaks of decentralization, it is merely replacing the salaries of federal employees with grants to local organizations, thus retaining total control over program standards.

With Bill C–96 it is absolutely clear that the federal government does not intend to respect this area of provincial jurisdiction in any way. We in Quebec will not allow this to happen.

Once again, this reminds me that, only hours after the last referendum, the Prime Minister of this country, the leader of the party across the floor here, the Liberal Party, the one that started off promising no changes, nothing on the table, after the conference on the UN, said there was no question whatsoever of proposing any changes. And with that great declaration of love, paid for by all of us of course, that put any possibility of decentralization, any possibility of change, on ice.

This bill was already prepared, of course, but it is totally contradictory to what the Prime Minister of Canada had suggested.

In reaction to Bill C–96, a proposal was made by Claude Béland, with the support of Ghislain Dufour, a person who cannot be accused of defending the sovereignist cause. As you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, Ghislain Dufour does not run with the sovereignists, but with the party across the floor. He asked that the SQDM unanimously adopt a resolution demanding that the federal government transfer the budgets it allocates for manpower training to Quebec and that it not establish a structure parallel to the SQDM.

Henri Massé, secretary general of the FTQ, also pulled no punches in his attack against this federal plan. "We no longer want the federal government butting in where it has no business to be—that is, manpower—and going over our heads to implement a parallel structure".

Still in connection with the referendum campaign, Victoriaville, in the next riding to mine, Lotbinière, had an important visitor, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, representing a Montreal riding whose name escapes me.

• (1710)

I know that an Ontario resident has his riding in Montreal and happens to be our Minister of Foreign Affairs. He told about fifteen people at a public meeting in Victoriaville that it was Quebec's fault if there was any duplication. Now really! Sure, that is what he said. He did not realize it but there was a reporter—he thought he was alone, no media—who only had a tape recorder and the next day they played his tape of the minister's speech on the radio news.

It really takes colossal nerve and then some, to go to Victoriaville, in the riding of Lotbinière, and say it was Quebec's fault if there is any duplication. Now that is a clear case. Let them stay home. We do not want them. The Liberal predecessor of the PQ government, under Robert Bourassa and then Daniel Johnson, unanimously adopted a resolution asking this government to stay out of manpower training. They just do not understand. Two structures and deficit upon deficit.

In fact, one of my constituents from East Broughton, Clément Paré—I asked his permission to mention his name—told me: "People do not understand. It is like a well at one end of my property. I take a pipe to bring the water from the well down to the bottom of my property. The further I get from the well, the more likely I am to get leaks, and I also lose pressure". It does not take a university degree to understand that.

He said: "It is the same in Ottawa. You pay taxes to Ottawa, the money goes from East Broughton and Frontenac and is sent to Ottawa, some of it gets lost on the way, and then it goes back down to East Broughton and to Thetford, and some more gets lost, and we are left with the crumbs". That is the kind of system we have: duplication throughout.

Mr. Speaker, I told you the story about the well and I saw your knowing smile. This is a very good example. I think my constituent, Mr. Paré, has very good judgment, and that is probably why he voted and worked for the Yes side in his beautiful municipality of East Broughton.

As I left my riding this morning, I stopped in Weedon to get some gas, and I noticed the Pepsi–Cola vending machine had been struck by a car. So I told the garage owner: "Too bad about that. Your Pepsi machine is broken already". He replied: "Yeah, sure, it was not big enough". In fact, it was huge, standing there outside the garage. Actually he was joking when he said: "It was not big enough". I said: "Too bad, it will cost you a few dollars to repair that". He said: "Oh, that does not matter". So I said: "How come?" He said: "It does not belong to me, it belongs to Pepsi". You see, Mr. Speaker? It belongs to Pepsi, so it does not matter.

People often react the same way to Ottawa. When I was the mayor of a small municipality, I remember we spread eight inches of nice new gravel on the sixth line. My constituents who were, of course, a small group, came to complain that the municipality was spending too much money. I said: "No problem. You are not paying for it". They said: "How come?" I said: "The money comes from the province". They said: "So you got a grant, Mr. Mayor?" I said: "Yes. I got it through our MNA". They said: "Great, the money comes from Quebec! It is not our money".

So you get the same reasoning when it comes from the federal government. When it comes from the federal government, it comes from somewhere on this planet, nobody knows exactly where. My point is that when the Minister of Foreign Affairs, this Ontarian who represents a Montreal riding, when he said in Victoriaville that if there was any duplication, it was not the federal government but the Quebec government, it really takes a colossal nerve.

The board of directors of the Canadian Institute of Adult Education has also condemned the Liberal government's initiative. The CIAE strongly objects to Bill C–96. The Bloc Quebecois is not alone in its opposition to Bill C–96. With this bill, the federal government has demonstrated a flagrant lack of respect for the aspirations of the provinces and especially those of Quebec in matters of education, manpower training and development.

With all these agencies and many others that are opposed to Bill C–96, the government of Quebec condemns outright the federal Liberal government's insistence on going ahead without considering the needs expressed by the groups concerned. Quebec Employment Minister Louise Harel reacted as follows to Bill C–96: "This is an outright refusal on the part of Ottawa to consider the consensus that exists in Quebec and was repeatedly expressed by the previous administrations of Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Johnson and by the present government headed by Mr. Parizeau, a consensus on the need to patriate all programs and budgets for manpower adjustment to Quebec".

In concluding, I want to point out that the Quebec Liberal Party, when it was in power, demanded that the federal government withdraw from this provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate, at second reading, on Bill C–96 establishing the Department of Human Resources Development and amending certain acts, which was tabled in June.

This bill provides, essentially, for the administrative reorganization of the department and brings together sections and services from the former Departments of Employment and Immigration, Health and Welfare, Labour and the Secretary of State.

It reaffirms the federal government's involvement in manpower training, employment and social programs.

It contains no indication of the federal government's intention to respect provincial jurisdictions.

Reaction in Quebec to Bill C–96 was therefore negative. The FTQ cautioned the federal government about its latest attempt to intervene in areas of Quebec's jurisdiction in manpower development. The federation's general secretary, Henri Massé, indicated they had had enough of Ottawa's involvement in this area and its bypassing the province to set up parallel structures. He said that Quebec had established a special partnership in the area with the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre or SQDM. He added that there was a strong consensus favouring Quebec's becoming solely responsible for policies on manpower adjustment and occupational training within its borders and its acquiring the funds the federal government allocates to these programs.

The Conseil du patronat agrees with the unions on this, something that does not happen very often. Even Robert Bourassa's Liberal government opposed a similar move by Ottawa in 1991.

The SQDM has asked the federal government to keep out of areas of Quebec's jurisdiction in manpower development.

• (1720)

The board of directors, on a motion by Claude Béland, the president of the Mouvement Desjardins, seconded by Ghislain Dufour, the president of the Conseil du patronat, unanimously adopted a resolution to call on the federal government to transfer to Quebec the funds it allocates to manpower training. Furthermore, they asked Ottawa not to establish any structure parallel to the SQDM.

The Quebec minister of employment, Louise Harel, denounced the bill in the following terms: "This federal initiative amounts to a flat rejection of the unanimous Quebec consensus, expressed, both under the previous administration and under the current one, on the need for Quebec to regain control over all manpower adjustment measures, including the related budgets".

I take this opportunity to again protest the upcoming closure of the Canada Employment Centre on rue Papineau, which serves the population of my riding of Bourassa in North Montreal, where the real rate of unemployment is nearly 30 per cent. It is a model CEC, which provides top quality service to a large clientele. Unions, business, community groups, users and my constituents vigorously oppose its closure.

Furthermore, the federal government has decided to close 34 other Canada Employment Centres in an effort to cut expenses, thus resulting in the layoff of nearly 1,000 public servants. Computerized job kiosks will become more prevalent.

The unemployment rate remains a very high 11.2 per cent in Quebec. The jobless have an urgent need for support services to which only 10 per cent of them had access last year. Instead of helping people who are looking for a job, the government makes it more difficult for them to have access to information and counselling services.

One must add that these closures are all the more difficult to explain as the unemployment insurance fund, which is entirely financed by employee and employer contributions, has a five billion dollar surplus.

Last September, the unemployment rate in Canada increased from 9.2 to 9.4 per cent. In Quebec, it went from 10.9 to 11.2 per cent. In British Columbia, it climbed from 8.8 to 9 per cent. Last year, cuts in the federal and provincial public sector resulted in the loss of 86,000 jobs. In October only, 3,000 civil servants lost their jobs. And yet, Bill C–96 contains no concrete measure to create jobs.

If you allow me, I will take this opportunity to ask the minister of Human Resources Development to speed up the negotiations with regards to a social security agreement between Canada and Chile. In 1990, with the return of a democratic regime in Chile, as president of the Chilean council in Quebec, I had asked for negotiations to start on this issue.

As a member of Parliament, I wrote the minister on several occasions. It was only at the end of 1994 that representatives of both countries met for the first time in Santiago. The second meeting took place last June, in Quebec City and in Ottawa. The Chilean community in Quebec and Canada would like this agreement to be signed without delay; it will benefit many Canadian and Chilean citizens who have lived and worked in both countries.

• (1725)

I would also like to congratulate the FTQ and the CSN which signed a solidarity and co–operation agreement that on November 13 will create a partnership between these two unions. This agreement confirms their common will to enhance the impact and the influence of organized labour in our society.

I think that it is an historical agreement and an extraordinary measure bringing together two Quebec labour unions which will jointly face future challenges, including employment and the protection of existing social benefits.

The next FTQ convention will be held from November 27 to December 1st in Montreal, where the theme will be to fight unemployment and prepare the future.

The job issue will be the focus of all discussions because the streamlining, restructuring, voluntary termination of employment and early retirement programs are continuing and even increasing, in both the public and the private sectors.

I wish my FTQ friends an excellent convention.

Given the cuts in unemployment insurance, thousands of unemployed people will have no other choice but to ask for welfare, but welfare benefits have also been cut over the past few years. Recently, Ontario decreased welfare benefits by 21.6 per cent. It is unfair and cruel for Canada to fight the deficit at the expense of the have–nots of our society. I denounce the Liberal government's irresponsibility and lack of action in the fight against poverty.

In closing, I would like to say that I approve the amendment to Bill C–96 presented by the member for Mercier.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: The vote is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

I have been requested by the government whip and the opposition whip to defer the division until tomorrow, immediately after Government Orders.

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–83, an act to amend the Auditor General Act, as reported (with amendments) from the committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Deputy Speaker: There is only one motion in amendment standing on the Notice Paper for report stage of Bill C–83, an act to amend the Auditor General Act.

[Translation]

Motion No. 1 will be debated and voted on.

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–83, in Clause 5, be amended by deleting lines 1 to 23, on page 3.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I want to address the motion that we have tabled, an amendment to remove the amendment tabled by the Liberals during the committee meeting of November 2, which amended Bill C–83, in clause 5, by adding section 21.1, from (a) to (h).

• (1730)

I note that this bill was given a fairly bumpy ride in committee, if I may say so. The Liberals seemed to be caught between a rock and a hard place, to be torn between public servants and politicians. First, members opposite moved and voted on their own amendments, then cancelled them and moved and voted on new ones. You will agree that this is confusion at its best.

The amendment our friends opposite, our friends of confusion and discord, are proposing seems to be a big catchall of environmental principles that constitutes a dangerous foot in the door of provincial jurisdiction.

A careful reading of section 21.1 and its points (a) to (h) leads us to believe that the Liberals may have wanted to better explain the work of the future commissioner of environment and sustainable development. If that was their objective, they are way off the mark. Instead of presenting precise objectives in support of the future commissioner, the Liberals propose to give him a series of broad environmental principles that, ultimately, will not make his task any easier. Even worse, these broad principles will extend his mandate to a point where he will be unable to carry it out.

However, this section is, once again, a case of the federal government wanting to interfere in provincial jurisdiction. Indeed, through this section, the commissioner will have the mandate to monitor the progress of departments according to sustainable development criteria that are clearly the responsibility of the provinces.

Thus, under section 21.1, a department encroaching on an area of provincial jurisdiction will get a positive appraisal from the federal commissioner. There was certainly nothing else to be expected from the Liberal committee members. True to themselves, they repeated the same arguments they had put forward when we were studying the CEPA, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

It is becoming increasingly clear that the goal of Liberal committee members is to extend as much as possible federal jurisdiction on environmental matters and to use the federal government's spending power as much as possible, although that attitude is viewed as an aggression by the provinces. Committee members constantly refer to great green principles such as sustainable development, bio–diversity or systemic approach, to promote an increased federal presence in the area of environment.

Of course air pollution is not restricted to one region. Of course water knows no boundary. Of course species move around. We all know this, but this is no reason for the federal government to become or set out to become the sole keeper of the environment, especially since the provinces have made great strides in that area and have taken their responsibilities. The same certainly cannot be said for the federal government, something the Liberals should recognize.

The federal government has not made rapid progress and has failed on many environmental issues under its jurisdiction. Why then should we give it more responsibility, when it does not even carry out its primary duties? Why do they absolutely insist that the federal should interfere in areas of provincial jurisdiction against the provinces' will? There lies the failing, if I may say, of our dear Liberals. The Liberals have some great environmentalists such as the hon. member for Davenport and the hon. member for Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis, who, much to their credit, are also great champions of Canada. That is exactly where their weakness lies: they are fervent federalists.

Their vision of the environment is clearly influenced, not to say marred by their natural federalist tendencies. That is why they tie everything that has to do with the environment to the federal system. This kind of attitude is alarming and dangerous for the environment because the farther one is from the field, the harder it is to find a solution. It is obvious that the provinces are closer to the environment and are therefore in a better position to deal with environmental issues.

Let us have a look at the concept of sustainable development to be found in the bill, a concept the Liberals use a great deal to crowd out the provinces. Sustainable development is an ideal all societies should strive for.

• (1735)

What is at stake here is not the validity of this principle, but the way it is implemented. The Bloc Quebecois not only recognizes the validity of the principle, but also the need, not to say the urgent need, to translate it into concrete measures.

We believe this principle should be implemented by the provinces because they have the overriding jurisdiction over the environment. It is up to the provinces to promote the conditions needed for sustainable development.

In a federal system, the principle of sustainable development takes on a new dimension, that is respect for jurisdictions and areas of authority. Obviously, the squandering of both financial and human resources, due to a double structure, is in no way sustainable. However, pursuant to their amendment, the Liberals are asking the commissioner to monitor the progress of the various departments, by taking into consideration criteria which clearly come under areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

Let us look at paragraph (a) of the clause dealing with the integration of the environment and the economy. In fact, this part of the commissioner's mandate can turn into subsidy programs for suppliers or targeted purchase programs, for example.

Using its spending power, the federal government has often launched programs or projects in areas of provincial jurisdiction. In many cases, after a few months, the federal government withdrew and let the provinces, including the province of Quebec, foot the bill and go through the ordeal of quashing these projects.

This way of doing things can in no way help to protect the environment. Short term and paltry measures are to be excluded.

Paragraph (b) talks about protecting the health of Canadians. Health is an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. It is the responsibility of the provinces to prevent health risks due to water and air pollution or soil depletion.

Again, duplication of standards and inconsistency with the provincial standards are inefficient and costly for the governments as well as for the private sector and the public. The federal government has again opened the door to new quarrels concerning the division of powers.

Given the rather firm stand taken by the provinces on this issue, it is hard to understand the attitude of the federal government. That proves again that the Liberals do not understand a thing about the repeated demands for change made by Canadians and Quebecers.

We are anxious to see the changes promised by the other side on October 30. It will probably, in the end, be another case of "Much ado about nothing". I am fair–play and ready to wait and see. All the more so since the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs seems to be quite a miracle worker.

Paragraph (c) of clause 21.1 has to do with protecting ecosystems. As owners and managers of the land, the provinces have jurisdiction over ecosystems. As an example, to assume this role, Quebec created 17 national parks. It also gave itself the legislative tools to preserve biodiversity.

Provinces which have not yet done so have the responsibility to act and pay heed to the demands of the world community which, for example, made some criticisms in the OECD report concerning Canada's environmental performance when it comes to protecting ecosystems.

Those are some of the items that make us doubt the will of the federal government to respect the provinces.

Clause 21.1 of Bill C–83 is rather to the contrary. In mentioning vast environmental concepts the federal government shows its intention to interfere further in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

The federal environmental record is nothing to cheer about.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the government, I want to respond to what the hon. member for Laurentides said and to the amendment she moved to the bill.

I should read the section the hon. member wishes to remove from the bill.

It is section 21.1, which reads as follows:

21.1 The purpose of the Commissioner is to provide sustainable development monitoring and reporting on the progress of category I departments towards sustainable development, which is a continually evolving concept based on the integration of social, economic and environmental concerns, and which may be achieved by, among other things,

(a) the integration of the environment and the economy;

(b) protecting the health of Canadians;

(c) protecting ecosystems;

(d) meeting international obligations;

(e) promoting equity;

(f) an integrated approach to planning and making decisions that takes into account the environmental and natural resource costs of different economic options and the economic costs of different environmental and natural resource options;

(g) preventing pollution; and

(h) respect for nature and the needs of future generations.

I find it really surprising that the hon. member for Laurentides has decided to move such an amendment to the bill at this time.

[English]

She knows perfectly well that her leader, the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean, was a minister of the environment and supported all these same principles. She comes into the House today while he is occupied considering his future and proposes an amendment that undermines the whole concept of sustainable development and a way of treating it in Canada.

I am absolutely astounded that the hon. member for Laurentides is getting away with this. I suspect that if the Leader of the Opposition were in Ottawa he would hound his colleague, the member for Laurentides, for proposing such an amendment as this. She has tried to claim this amendment is one that affects provincial jurisdiction but on its face it most patently does not.

It says that the commissioner will provide sustainable development monitoring and reporting on the progress government departments are making. How can government departments be making progress on things that are not within their jurisdiction? They must deal with matters within their own jurisdiction. If they were dealing with matters beyond their jurisdiction, they would be doing something unlawful. Everyone knows that government departments do not do things that are unlawful, at least not very often.

The hon. member who is making these claims is saying that government departments are in fact dabbling in provincial matters all the time and therefore this section is bad because the commissioner in his work might impinge on provincial jurisdiction if the government department was doing so and he was reporting on it. Presumably if he thought the federal government department was overstepping its bounds he would report that.

After all, he is an officer who has some authority, according to my reading of this bill. I do not claim to be terribly familiar with it. I was not on the committee where the amendment was brought in but I understand the commissioner is given certain authority, which in my view is very sensible authority, to deal with a whole host of issues, all of which are of great concern to Canadians. Every one of the items I read from the list is of concern to Canadians.

Yet we have a situation where a party headed by a former minister of the environment who supported all of these things when he was minister—

Mr. Boudria: He invented some of them.

Mr. Milliken: As the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has said so ably, he invented some of them and I am sure his memory of these things is better than mine. The hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean invented these very concepts and now one of his henchmen comes into the House and tries to undermine the whole process.

I am shocked. I am sure every member of the House is shocked at the duplicity of the opposition in saying one thing through its leader when he was minister of the environment and saying another now through the hon. member for Laurentides with this frankly ridiculous amendment.

I see even the members of the Reform Party are smirking. They must agree this amendment is pretty wild. It is not something they would support. I am sure they support the bill. I am sure they realize the bill is in the best interests of all Canadians as I am sure the Leader of the Opposition does. After all he knows more about environmental issues than I do. He was minister for several years. I know it was with a government that showed a callous disregard for the environment but he had a reputation for doing the best he could in difficult circumstances.

Some say that perhaps—

Ms. Augustine: —he should have remained.

• (1745)

Mr. Milliken: Some say that perhaps he should have remained as Minister of the Environment, but he did not. On the other hand, I understand there were often times when he did not get a lot of support from his cabinet colleagues on environmental matters he raised. He may have gone out on a limb and done it in an appropriate way from time to time, but I do not know. I was not in the cabinet. It is not something I could easily comment on, but we certainly can see the effect of his environmental crusade. The hon. member for Laurentides has wilfully abandoned all the principles her leader stood for when he was Minister of the Environment.

As I said, I find myself almost at a loss for words in trying to understand the amendment she has put forward today. I can only assume that the Leader of the Opposition did not see this amendment before it was tabled. If he had, he would have blown a gasket, in common parlance, and that would have been the end of the amendment.

I can only say that I hope there is a vote on this. I want to see the Leader of the Opposition come into the House and vote against the principles he so resolutely stood for when he was Minister of the Environment.

He may have forgotten some of the things he learned when he was minister.

An hon. member: Remind him.

Mr. Milliken: I am trying to remind him by this speech. I hope he reads it very carefully and I am sure the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell would agree.

Sometimes remembrance is important in these things. The Minister of the Environment always learns something about his or her portfolio when occupying that portfolio. When the member for Lac–Saint–Jean was a minister, I remember him standing and answering questions, defending the government's environmental policy in the House. Now we see his party trying to undo the work of a committee of the House and the work of the present very competent Minister of the Environment, the hon. member for Hamilton East.

The hon. member for Laurentides is pleading with me to continue this eulogy. I certainly could do that. She knows what a competent minister we have. The fact is all these ministers have stood for this kind of principle and they have all adopted the principle of sustainable development as the cornerstone of Canada's environmental policy.

The hon. member for Davenport, who I am sure will be speaking on this amendment in a few moments, can remind us of how long this principle of sustainable development has been a cornerstone of Canadian environmental policy. It is reflected in this bill. Here is an opportunity to have an officer with some authority to report on government departments on how they are doing on specific concerns. It was a great list.

The hon. member for Laurentides wants to throw the whole thing out of the bill. I do not understand it. Of course, the government will oppose this change. It is wrong headed. It is contrary to principles espoused by the hon. member's own leader. It is contrary to the principles that were agreed on in the committee which studied the bill. I am shocked to hear at this late date that the hon. member for Laurentides would take it in her own capacity to move an amendment to the bill that would undermine what I think is the view of the vast majority of Canadians and the vast majority of members of the House.

I want to indicate the government's strong opposition to the amendment. We will support the bill and the amendments that were made in committee. We feel the committee's amendments were entirely appropriate and the bill as it stands is a good bill.

Mr. Paul Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the environment is an issue very dear to Canadians. We all want to do what we can to preserve this great country. Every day we ask ourselves: What can we do to make certain that the environment can be preserved and saved?

The member for Laurentides is a great believer in environmental issues yet I have to question her amendment to Bill C–83. The bill is not a solid, forthright piece of legislation. There is no doubt about that. However, removing the part in clause 5 dealing with sustainable development makes a weak bill all that much weaker. It removes benchmark measurements on reporting.

The Reform Party has been consistent in its position on Bill C–83. The bill would be much more effective if the role of the environmental commissioner were completely taken over by the auditor general. We know that the commissioner will be an employee of the Office of the Auditor General. The commissioner will have to pass everything by the auditor general before it can be released to Parliament and the public.

Bill C–83 makes the government look as if it is serious about cleaning up the environmental practices of federal departments. However, the real question is whether or not this commissioner is going to really make a difference. The role is a strange one. The commissioner would monitor and report annually to Parliament through the auditor general on the extent to which federal government departments had met sustainable development objectives and implemented the actions set out in their sustainable development strategies.

When the auditor general came before the environment committee, he stated quite clearly that there would not be a responsibility given to the commissioner that could not be performed by the auditor general himself. Therefore, Reform sees the role of the commissioner as outlined in this bill to simply be another level of bureaucracy, all of course at the expense of the taxpayers. It is a long envisaged proposal now coming in the form for the sake of appearances without any real substance.

Let us not forget the Minister of the Environment stated that one objective of the commissioner would be to look into waste reduction. Therefore, if the auditor general's office took over more responsibility in terms of environmental issues would this not be cost effective as well as a reduction of wastefulness?

The environment minister has truly convinced herself that Bill C–83 will be a solution to some of Canada's environmental chaos. The minister believes that when the commissioner reports to Parliament, federal departments are going to listen and then act. However, if they do not act now to the regular auditor general's reports, why would they act on a commissioner's report on environmental issues?

Let me illustrate the point. The report from the auditor general in May 1995 looked at Environment Canada and the management of hazardous wastes. The auditor general reported that there was a lack of effort on Environment Canada's part to control the storage and destruction of PCB wastes. The control of PCBs is under the regulation of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act in order to minimize risk to human health and the environment.

The auditor general stated: "On March 31, 1995, Environment Canada terminated its leadership role in the management of PCB destruction without devising a plan to guide federal departments to further consolidate PCB wastes, reduce their volume and develop action plans for their destruction. This could seriously impede the government's ability to ensure safe and cost effective storage and timely destruction of federal PCB wastes".

The control of PCB wastes is crucial for true sustainable development. Unfortunately, the environment minister has not followed through with the auditor general's recommendations. Therefore, my question is: When and if the environmental commissioner is put into place, what will he or she say that will be any more convincing than what has already been said by the auditor general himself? The answer is nothing. The section of the bill adjusted by the Bloc amendment before us makes the bill ever more unfocused and vague and does not enhance any function at all.

Canadians will soon realize that the commissioner is just a smoke screen created by the environment minister to make it appear that she is working to clean up the environment. She has done little throughout her tenure as minister that accomplishes an improvement to our environment. Her talk is shrill and her actions are sometimes expensive; the end result being an increased deficit with little to no environmental improvements.

My friend from the Bloc Quebecois has an amendment at this stage that deletes what I believe to be the only clear specification in this legislation. While I do not agree that we should have a separate commissioner under the auspices of the auditor general, I do believe that if there has to be one it is essential that the person provide the best report possible on all sustainable development strategies to all category one departments.

In this time of budget restraint and fiscal responsibility, I am bothered that the minister has chosen to spend the taxpayers' hard earned money with such a redundant position merely to add prestige and political significance to environmental issues. Such redundant spending is common among most Liberal ministers. It will only be a matter of time before Canadians come to the realization that to achieve a new and more environmentally sustainable Canada a different party must come to government.

In closing, I cannot support the Bloc amendment. Bloc members continue to whine about preserving provincial jurisdiction while at the same time the Quebec provincial government creates overlap after overlap. The fiscal consequences for the poor people of Quebec due to the separatists' colorations and manipulations of public policy are very serious. The amendment adds nothing positive or helpful to a poor bill and therefore I cannot support it.

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to put this amendment into perspective, I would like to pay homage to the hon. member for Frontenac and the hon. member for Terrebonne. They participated in the work of the committee which produced a report over a year ago proposing the measures contained in this bill, namely the creation of the position of the commissioner for the environment and sustainable development.

Both the hon. member for Terrebonne and the hon. member for Frontenac conducted themselves in committee in a very constructive manner. In the conclusion of their dissenting report, they outlined three principles. One of the three principles reads as follows: "It is imperative that the economic and environmental aspects of federal government decisions and policies be intrinsically linked". We fully agree with that principle. We applaud the hon. member for Terrebonne and the hon. member for Frontenac for having concisely put forward such an important concept.

However, we have enormous difficulties in reconciling the political direction which was taken by the hon. member for Laurentides and her colleagues. They are running in conflicting directions. They are not reinforcing each other. The motion of the hon. member for Laurentides which is now before us dismantles and ridicules the concluding principle I have just read.

That is what the amendment the committee proposes, which the hon. member for Laurentides wants to wipe out, intends to do. It intends to intrinsically link the environmental and economic aspects of government decisions. The hon. member for Laurentides is proposing to wipe out this important concept.

This is a very sad moment. The amendment by the hon. member for Laurentides means that her party is not in favour of protecting the health of Canadians. This is what her amendment would achieve.

Her party is against the integration of the environment and the economy. This is what the amendment would achieve. Her party is against the protection of the ecosystem. That is what her amendment proposes. Her party is against meeting international obligations. That is what her amendment would achieve. Her party is against the promotion of equity. That means that her party is in favour of inequities. That is the effect of her amendment.

Her party is against an integrated approach to planning and making decisions which take into account the environmental and natural resource cost of different economic actions. That is what her amendment would achieve.

Her amendment would eliminate the principle of pollution prevention. Does that mean the Bloc Quebecois is against pollution prevention? That is the net effect of the amendment. The net effect of the amendment is to delete pollution prevention from the bill. The net effect of the amendment is to eliminate the concept of protecting the health of the public, of protecting the ecosystems and of meeting international obligations.

Finally, the net effect of the amendment is to eliminate the respectful nature and the needs of future generations. In other words, the effect of the amendment is to say that the Bloc Quebecois rejects the Brundtland report and the definition of sustainable development. As the parliamentary secretary to the House leader already asked, is that the direction the member for Laurentides has received from her leader? Is that the new political direction of the Bloc Quebecois? Or, is it perhaps that the member for Laurentides badly needs a psychiatrist to remove her obsession with federal–provincial relations, her obsession with seeing under every chair a federal monster, a federal presence which may disrupt the quiet life of the people in her riding?

It is absurd to say that the amendment by the Bloc Quebecois reflects the majority of thought of members of her party for whom I have the highest respect. I do not recognize in the amendment the preachings, the interventions or the thoughtful examination I have experienced when the member for Frontenac and the member for Terrebonne were members of the committee. This is diametrically opposed to what I have heard from that party until now.

I find it unbelievable that we should be debating an amendment of this nature which runs counter to everything the leader of the Bloc Quebecois said when he was Minister of the Environment and what his colleagues have said until now in support of sustainable development. There is no federal plot, I reassure the member for Laurentides. There is no fear to be had for jurisdiction because Canadians know very well that the environment does not know boundaries.

Perhaps the member for Laurentides forgets there would not be any clean up of substance of the St. Lawrence River were it not for the federal government, were it not for the intervention in the Great Lakes of the federal government in co–operation with Washington. We know very well the source of pollution in the St. Lawrence River. It emanates and originates from activities on both sides of the border well upstream. Therefore the role of the federal government in cleaning up the St. Lawrence River is of paramount importance.

The geopolitical law of gravity of water whereby rivers have to flow in a certain direction has escaped the attention of the member for Laurentides. She is more preoccupied with the federal presence than with the health of the people in Montreal and downstream. This is the obsession of the member for Laurentides when analysing and considering bills of an environmental nature.

The member for Laurentides is worried about the waste of two levels. If we do not have a federal level concerned with international relations, who will do it? We will have a Canada for the next thousand years and therefore we need a federal presence in implementing this type of legislation. Whether or not the member for Laurentides likes it, that is the political reality of today, tomorrow, the day after and for many generations to come, as the vote proved on October 30.

Turning to the Reform Party members, they seem to be engaging in a very fashionable game in the House. Unfortunately they are copying the member for Laurentides. They like to attack the minister. They find this is the greatest sport since the invention of soccer. We have news for them. The minister is the best we ever had considering the work she has done under most difficult political and economic circumstances.

Whether or not the Reform Party likes it, the minister has managed to promote harmonization on federal–provincial relations on the environment. This minister has managed to bring about an agreement on harmonization with British Columbia. It is quite interesting that the criticism is from members from British Columbia. The minister achieved that. The minister has produced the bill dealing with a commissioner for sustainable development, keeping a red book promise. The minister has engaged the Americans in consultations on the Great Lakes for the sake of the health of Canadians who live in that basin, namely the health of Canadians whose livelihood and well–being depend on the fresh water of that fantastic system.

The minister brought in and has before the House legislation on manganese, legislation that would remove MMT from gasoline, legislation that is opposed tooth and nail by the Reform Party on behalf of the Ethyl corporation which seems to have quite an influence on its way of thinking. We have a Minister of the Environment who has the courage to bring legislation before the House that hopefully will be approved very soon.

This is not the end of the list. The minister will provide a governmental reply to the Canadian Environmental Protection Act report of the committee of the House, which is probably one of the most difficult tasks ever faced by an environment minister who has to be concerned at the same time with the environment, with health and with the economy. That is not a minor feat for any environment minister.

Members of the Reform Party cannot appreciate that. It is only an indication of their political naivete or their political inability to understand the complexity of issues and to appreciate the complex role faced today by the Minister of the Environment. That is not all.

The Minister of the Environment has managed to put on the table the extremely difficult issue of climate change and the necessity of reducing carbon dioxide emissions in the country, probably one of the most difficult issues to handle.

It may well be it has escaped members of the Reform Party that there is a climate change issue surrounding us, one that is at least accepted and talked about by the scientific community. The Minister of the Environment has managed to put the issue on the agenda and is right now in Edmonton discussing the matter with her provincial colleagues.

The Minister of the Environment has put on the agenda the question of the protection of endangered species, a matter which to my greatest disappointment does not have the support of the Reform Party. As recently as this morning the Reform Party opposed proposed legislation not by the minister but by a backbencher.

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, for more than a year, I had the opportunity to sit on the Standing Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development chaired by the member for Davenport. I have to admit that, up until about ten minutes ago, I admired the member for Davenport. Unfortunately, I discovered this afternoon, in the speech he just made, that he had a total lack of respect for my colleague, the member for Laurentides, especially when he asked her if she needed a psychiatrist.

• (1810)

It was a low blow and I think the member for Davenport should apologize. He really went a little too far. During all the time that I sat with him on the environment committee, I always noticed his honesty and his judgment as a politician, particularly in environmental matters.

It is therefore with great pleasure that I stand in this House to speak to Bill C–83, an Act to amend the Auditor General Act.

It has been a few weeks since we last talked about this bill in the House, so I should take a few minutes to review its contents briefly.

Bill C–83 amends the Auditor General Act to achieve five objectives, which I will sum up quickly.

Firstly, to ensure that environmental considerations in the context of sustainable development are taken into account in the Auditor General's reports to the House of Commons.

Secondly, to require the appointment of a Commissioner of the Environment and Sustainable Development.

Thirdly, to impose requirements for responding to petitions received by the Auditor General about environmental matters under federal jurisdiction—and I repeat it for the benefit of the member for Davenport—under federal jurisdiction in the context of sustainable development.

Fourthly, to require monitoring and reporting to the House of Commons on petitions and the extent to which departments have met the objectives, and implemented the plans, set out in their sustainable development strategies.

And finally, fifthly, to require that departmental sustainable development strategies be prepared and tabled in the House of Commons.

On a technical level, the adoption of this bill will require the implementation of a number of things. First of all, there must be an appropriate definition of sustainable development. I will come back to that later.

But I will say to the hon. member for Davenport, who got carried away a few minutes ago, that the government has been in power for two years. A sunken barge has sat in the waters between Prince Edward Island and the Magdalen Islands for 25 years now. At the end of June, we learned quite by accident that there was an important quantity of PCB tainted oil in the sunken ship. The barge has been there for 25 years and the Liberals were in power during most of that period, except for the nine years of the Mulroney government and the nine months of the Clark government.

It is easy to boast about sustainable development, but that barge was supposed to be refloated this year and nothing has been done. They chose the wrong solution because it was cheaper, but I can guarantee you, as does my colleague for Davenport, that, once the Irving Whale is refloated, when we get the bill the cost will be more than if we had chosen the better solution to begin with.

Sustainable development, what a trendy expression. It is useful if one wants to get reelected, of course. But why did they not apply it in the two years since their election? Of course, the Liberal Party sed up a fine committee—the Easter–Gagnon committee—that went to the Magdalen Islands and arrogantly told the people to step aside, that they would refloat the barge.

• (1815)

We can refloat it, they claimed. Give us 12 months, and we will refloat it. How much did it cost us to have the Gagnon–Easter mini caucus go around making political points?

The member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine learned his lesson with the last referendum. The islands' voters showed the member who had promised to resign if the no lost in Quebec where the door was.

Mr. Robichaud: He won in his riding.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): He was scared. He was so scared on the evening of October 30 that he was shaking all over. "I should never have made empty promises".

Mr. Robichaud: He won in his riding.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): He won in Bonaventure, but he lost in the Magdalen Islands. Close to 60 per cent of the voters on the Islands voted against him. There is one Liberal member of the Quebec legislature, Georges Farrah, however, and one in Ottawa, who did not even get 40 per cent. That really requires a colossal amount of nerve.

I was teaching ecology at the Disraeli comprehensive high school when several million dollars were spent there. The Liberals were not in government at the time, of course; it was the member for Sherbrooke who was acting as Minister of the Environment. He had organized a television show in prime time Sunday evening, coast to coast, paid for by the taxpayers, on the Green Plan, six billion dollars over five years. That turned into five billion over six years, and got watered down and watered down, until today no trace remains. Nobody knows what became of the Green Plan.

In the schools we showed videotapes of it, which provided our young students with some glimmer of hope about the environment and sustainable development. Now it has been junked. In the waste basket. And that is where the environmental commissioner is headed.

The intent is to water the thing down so much that it will end up in the waste basket and thousands, hundreds of millions of dollars will be spent and—

I would like to tell you about an example given by a friend from East Broughton, who said to me on the day after the referendum "It is a bit like bringing water from several kilometres away. You start with a big pipe and you end up with a tiny one at the other end; there is surface tension, leaks here and there along the way". We know what it is like in the federal pipeline system with its leaks here and there, you get to the end of the pipe and there is hardly any water coming out, no water pressure, nothing left. Everything got lost along the way.

It is the same thing we say to you, my friends across the way, "Mind your own business, but mind it well. And when something is not your business, not within your area of jurisdiction, then butt out and stay where you belong".

It is true we all breathe the same air, we all drink the same water and we all walk on the same ground. When you came to Montreal on October 27 to tell us you loved us, at taxpayers' expense, of course, we let you breathe our air. When we come to Ontario, you let us breathe your air.

This is how we want to live. So stay home, and when it is a provincial matter for Quebec, mind your own business. We are quite capable of minding our own business, better than you are.

An agreement was signed with the United States to develop the Great Lakes. It is working out fine. We get a report every two years. That is fine. It is having no effect on the United States' environment. You are not going to meddle with American environmental jurisdictions, why do you want to meddle with Quebec's? We will not tolerate it. That time is long gone.

When your jurisdictions are involved, look after them, but keep out of our space.

Having said that, I again call for an apology from the hon. member for Davenport, who showed disrespect for my colleague for Lotbinière.

• (1820)

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion negatived on division.

(Motion No. 1 negatived.)

Hon. Fernand Robichaud (for the Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C–83, as amended, be concurred in.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until Tuesday, November 21, at the end of government business, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

EDUCATION

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP): Mr. Speaker, a little while ago I asked the Minister of Human Resources Development what he thought of Statistics Canada reports that Canadians with lower levels of education are having serious difficulties in the workforce. How did he see the serious, significant reduction of funds to post–secondary education and how did he think it would affect the generation of opportunities Canadians need?

Education is a right of all Canadians. Research studies suggest that technical institutes, colleges and universities offer Canadians the most fertile ground for future prosperity and a place in the workforce. In today's information economy, the job prospects of Canadians and their earnings are increasingly dependent on what they know. The success of Canadians and, indeed, of Canada's future rests on the notion of accessible and affordable post–secondary education for all who can benefit from it.

This unfortunately is not the case in Canada. With the present government's policies these crucial objectives are farther from being met than ever before.

Studies reveal that the majority of post–secondary education students originate from an upper middle class socioeconomic background. Higher tuition fees and increasing living expenses are creating huge debt loads for students and reducing accessibility for potential university and college students.

More effort, not less, needs to be directed to ensuring that young people from sections of society which are presently under represented in our post–secondary education institutions are provided with opportunities to study. Post–secondary education must be available to all Canadians if Canada is to prosper.

A recent Statistics Canada study reveals that educational requirements have risen so sharply that young Canadians now need a university degree to earn roughly as much as a high school graduate in the same age group earned a decade before. Over the same period the earnings of high school graduates decreased by about a quarter. Those without high school certificates have an even more difficult time of it.

• (1825)

Young people have lost significant ground over the last decade. However it is also important to recognize that the incomes of university graduates have grown rapidly with work experience, while high school graduates have only seen modest gains.

The broad point is that future economic growth for Canada and for Canadians will depend on how much education Canadians attain. The country and the government need to commit themselves to the notion that all Canadians have a right to accessible and affordable education. Quality education should not only be available to the rich.

Over the last 15 years under successive Liberal and Conservative governments this right has been eroded by drastic cuts to funding. Considering that only 43 per cent of young Canadians in the 25 to 29 year old age group had a high school diploma in 1993, the future of Canada's economy does not look bright unless we turn the situation around.

In 1995 university applications were down about 5 per cent on average for first year university places. This is the sharpest drop of its kind in more than 20 years. We are going in the opposite direction to what Canada needs. With nearly half of young Canadians facing a future of low or stagnant incomes, high unemployment and diminishing opportunities for full time work, we are headed toward a polarized society and an economy functioning at well below desired objectives if we do not reduce the educational deficit.

Despite all the evidence showing that higher education is a prerequisite to prosperity both for Canadians and for Canada, the federal government continues to cut funding for post–secondary education; a 25 per cent cut to health, post–secondary and social programs, the deepest cut since the second world war.

The government states that we cannot afford the cost of investing in our young people and of investing in the future. It must start listening to common sense. The government must not cut Canadians' lifeline to future prosperity. Instead it must start listening to young Canadians who want a quality future, a quality workforce and the opportunity to contribute to a quality economy and a quality society.

These drastic cuts to post–secondary education cannot be justified. Since the government has forgotten, I will remind it once again that funding for post–secondary education is a critically important investment in Canada's future. Canadians and Canada deserve better.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to start by making a very clear statement: young people are very much a priority of the federal government.

In April 1994 the government announced the youth employment and learning strategy to address problems that have held back many young people from participating fully in society. By that I mean high school dropout rates have been high. There has been a lack of access to post–secondary education, work experience and effective job training.

We have moved on several fronts. We have made serious amendments to the Canada student loans program by increasing loan limits for full time students from $105 to $165 per week and by raising the yearly loan limit for part time students to $4,000. For the very first time we are offering special opportunities grants for women pursuing doctoral studies, for high need students and for persons with disabilities. We have begun to offer the programs because we saw within the federal sphere there was a void that needed to be filled and we did that. We also have Youth Services Canada and youth internship programs. Combined they have had a positive impact on the lives of over 30,000 young people.

These measures speak to how the government, the federal Government of Canada, has been able to address key concerns and issues affecting young people.

This is only the beginning. We realize that the future lies within our young people, within future generations. For this reason we have combined all these tools so that the future for the country and for future generations will look bright.

We have also made some headway in youth entrepreneurship programs that have helped young people acquire the proper skills, not to mention the important measure taken this summer of creating over 44,500 jobs through our summer job action plan and the spinoff from the Canada employment centre for students which was over 175,000. The commitment of the government as far as youth policy is concerned is crystal clear.

DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a number of years ago Nellie Nippard was stabbed 33 times by her husband and left for dead. By some miracle Ms. Nippard survived and today works with the women's organizations in Newfoundland.

Just two years ago another woman, Brenda Young, suffered multiple stab wounds at the hands of her boyfriend while her two young children slept in the other room. Unfortunately Ms. Young did not survive her attack.

Both of these women are from my home province of Newfoundland. One of them lived in my riding of St. John's East. The violence they endured was extreme but unfortunately it is not rare.

There are thousands of women in Newfoundland and across the country who live in fear and are subject to violence. In spite of the good work and good will which exists across the country for enhancing the security and safety of women, the violence persists.

Statistics show that more than half of all women in the country have experienced at least one incident of violence, as defined under the Criminal Code, in their adult lives. Twenty–five per cent of women have experienced violence at the hands of a current or past marital partner. On average, a woman is killed every six days in Canada, often in a private home or by someone she knows.

Women make up 59 per cent of all homicide victims killed in a domestic relationship. Forty–two per cent of women surveyed in 1993 reported they felt unsafe walking in their neighbourhood after dark, over four times the figure of men.

Despite the statistics, some cling to the belief that the problem is not that bad or dismiss it as a women's issue. This problem needs to be addressed. The eradication of violence against women can be accomplished only with the full partnership of all members of society.

This can no longer remain a women's issue. Violence against women affects us all. When women are abused there are costs to the victim, the family and to society. Taxpayers pay significant sums of money in medical costs for doctors, hospital emergency wards and medical health clinics; in criminal justice, costs for police services, courts and corrections; and in social service, costs for welfare, housing and daycare. As well, employers pay for violence against women in higher absentee costs and low productivity rates.

The most recent example of how violence against women affects more than just the victim was raised in the Newfoundland Select Committee on Children's Interests. The committee has been holding public hearings across the province. It heard from the administrator of the Iris Kirby House, a women's shelter in my riding, about how devastating domestic violence can be for our children.

The committee heard how children who witness family violence show signs of low self–esteem, which leads to a lack of self–confidence and a feeling of insecurity. As these children get older, depression, withdrawal and pessimism set in, leading to suicidal tendencies, drug dependency and emotional instability.

These children often do poorly in school because they have difficulty concentrating, are frequently absent and show behavioural problems. Also, research shows that children who witness violence in the home are more likely to live in a violent relationship in their adult lives.

We are approaching December 6, which some may not realize is the national day of remembrance and action on violence against women. It is a time for us to pause and remember the 14 women who died tragically at the Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal six years ago. As important as December 6 is, we need more than just one day of awareness about violence against women. We need to take action on a daily basis.

We need to continue to provide support and funding for the various women's shelters and treatment programs which provide cost effective support and services.

I know the government has taken action over the past two years to address the issue of violence against women, but I would like the parliamentary secretary to assure my constituents and all Canadians that this is and will continue to be a priority of our government.

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for articulating the situation very well.

I assure her that in the past two years the government has taken many concrete and positive steps toward reducing and preventing violence against women and children. Our strategy is multi–faceted just like the problem of violence which is particularly costly socially, psychologically and economically to our society.

[Translation]

We also took a number of legislative measures, starting with the firearms bill.

I wish to urge the members of the other place to pass this bill immediately. They cannot remain insensitive to the distress call sounded by the families of the victims of events at the École polytechnique and by the individuals my hon. colleague just mentioned. Two thirds of the people killed by their partners are women and one third of all victims of homicide are women.

[English]

We have introduced amendments to the Criminal Code to make peace bonds more effective in keeping abusers away from women and children. As of January 1, 1996 Bill C–41 will require tougher sentences for crimes involving abuse of trust or those motivated by gender based hate.

The government supports community based solutions. For example, more than 2,000 projects have been funded through the family violence initiative, which has been extended for another year. Status of Women Canada has made available community kits on violence against women, a step by step guide to community action. I hope many communities will write in to get copies of it and use it, as many have already done.

At the recent fourth United Nations world conference on women in Beijing Canada was active in securing strong wording on violence against women. The final agreement states that violence is never a private matter, that the state has an obligation to legislate against violence against women and to prosecute and punish those who commit violence.

In the interest of our women and our children and the men in our society we must reduce violence in our society. In Canada the government is working to fulfil that obligation.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House a report from the Canadian branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association concerning the 41st Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference in Colombo, Sri Lanka from October 3 to 13, 1995. It is tabled in both official languages.

PETITIONS

INCOME TAX

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. This particular petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Edmonton, Alberta.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

STANDING ORDER 109

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, notice of which I gave the Chair this morning.

This point of order concerns the government's disregard of Standing Order 109, under which it is required within 150 days of the presentation of a report from a standing or special committee to table a comprehensive response.

On June 20, 1995 the Standing Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development presented its fifth report concerning its review of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act in the House of Commons. According to Standing Order 109 the deadline for the government to table its response to this report was yesterday, Monday, November 20. As of today, Tuesday, November 21, the government has not tabled its response and has given no indication of when it might do so.

Mr. Speaker, on April 19, 1993 your predecessor ruled on two questions of privilege raised by the members for Scarborough—Rouge River and Winnipeg South Centre relating to the issue of the late tabling of documents. In his ruling the former Speaker had this to say:

I find the situation particularly disheartening—There are people in departments who are supposed to know these rules and are supposed to ensure that they are carried out.

In both of these cases the government failed to do so until after the matter was brought to the attention of this House—

As members are well aware, the tabling of documents constitutes a fundamental procedure of this House.

It is part of our rules and ensures that members have access to the information necessary to effectively deal with the issues before Parliament.

Your predecessor ruled that the Standing Committee on House Management should examine the issue of late tabling and the House agreed to such a motion moved by the member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

Consequently, the committee tabled its report on this matter on June 17, 1993.

The committee report stated:

The Speaker's ruling clearly sets out the issues involved.

There are provisions in the Standing Orders of the House as well as many statutes passed by the House that require documents to be tabled in the House within certain time periods.

Non-compliance with a deadline set out in a statute or the standing orders is a serious matter. It constitutes a breach of law, or a rule of the House.

The committee believes that the statutory and procedural time limits must be complied with.

I continue to quote from the committee's report:

If a document cannot be tabled within the prescribed time, the responsible minister should advise the House accordingly before the deadline; it is not acceptable that the deadline be ignored.

It may be that the time periods set out in the Standing Orders and certain statutes need to be reviewed and, where necessary, amended.

Until this is done, however, it is essential that the deadlines be respected.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask that, as the committee that studied this matter recommended, until these time limits can be reviewed, you rule that the government should immediately table its response to the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development as required by Standing Order 109.

The Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake for putting his point so succinctly.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I just discovered the situation the hon. member has described a few moments before the sitting opened. Had I been aware of it beforehand, certainly I would have made inquiries in order to provide him with more detailed information for the reason for the apparent lapse in the filing of this document on time.

I assure the hon. member I will take the matter up with the Minister of the Environment and make inquiries as to why there has been this apparent delay in the tabling of the report.

I thank the hon. member for drawing the point to the attention of the House. The comments he makes with respect to the application of the rule and its importance to the workings of the House are extremely apt and timely. I do not disagree with his suggestion in that regard.

I will have to look into the facts surrounding the preparation of the government response to the report and get back to the hon. member and to the House at the earliest possible time. I hope to be in a position to do that shortly after question period today.

The Deputy Speaker: The Chair will take the matter under advisement and thanks both members for their submissions. I will expect the hon. parliamentary secretary to report back to the House as indicated earlier today on this matter.

• (1015)

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you might find disposition on the part of the House to give unanimous consent to the following motion. I am sorry I was not ready to present it at the appropriate time in Routine Proceedings. I move:

That, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 83(1), the Standing Committee on Finance may make an interim report on the matters referred to in the said standing order no later than December 12, 1995 and may deposit its final report thereon with the Clerk of the House on January 17, 1996.

I understand there have been various discussions among the parties in respect of the motion and agreements reached in the Standing Committee on Finance. It is the intention of all parties that those commitments be fulfilled in respect of the adoption of the order.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—CANADIAN AEROSPACE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean-Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ) moved:

That the House condemn the government for having dropped the Canadian content requirements in the contracts for the purchase of military equipment and refusing to set up a genuine program for the conversion of the military industry, thus endangering the Canadian aerospace industry located in Montreal.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my remarks in support of the motion I put forward will certainly go beyond this motion concerning the latest statements made by the defence minister and the Department of National Defence about the acquisition of certain pieces of equipment.

First of all, this motion condemns the government for having dropped the Canadian content requirements in the latest helicopter contract announcement, when this condition was clearly respected and even required in previous contracts.

I started by reviewing how this matter had evolved, a situation that has prompted us to table this motion. During the summer, the minister of defence announced the acquisition of British submarines, which were to cost $1.6 billion excluding maintenance, staff training, and renovations.

An hon. member: We did not buy them.

Mr. Collenette: You are still dreaming.

Mr. Jacob: Just one moment. I see that the department is reacting rather quickly, and I will give you enough time to respond. Allow me to continue.

Given the population's strong, I would even say violent, opposition to the purchase of these submarines, they came back with a new formula. The cost of the submarines went down to $500 million with ill–defined exchanges of training time. Again, there is uncertainty.

The minister announced at the time that negotiations had not started and would be postponed. They waited until the middle of August, while it was still summer, before telling us that they had bought new armoured personnel carriers for our Canadian soldiers.

We see that the Canadian content is very high. The contract was awarded without tender to a London, Ontario, company, a General Motors subsidiary, for the manufacture of armoured personnel carriers. I then said on behalf of the official opposition that buying new armoured personnel carriers was a waste of money when we already had over 1,700 of them in stock and when only about 215 or 218 were used for the most part during the mission in Bosnia.

The minister had indicated at the time, during special joint committee hearings, that a report had been prepared and that the Bloc Quebecois agreed with the procurement of these armed personnel carriers.

Unfortunately, I do not think that the minister bothered to read the Bloc's dissenting report, because this report, drafted by the Bloc Quebecois members of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy, clearly stated that, in our view, buying new APCs for better armour protection was only justified if Canada and its peacekeepers were to continue to take part in warlike actions and armed conflicts.

My understanding, based on what was discussed at committee and elsewhere, was that a review of Canada's peace effort was contemplated and that we would only participate in missions that did not involve the use of weapons, as was always the case in the past for our peacekeepers. It seems very clear to me that, if the nature of peace missions was to be changed to focus again on peacekeeping—the kind of missions the Canadian Armed Forces have always being involved in and carried out remarkably—there would be no point in having APCs with improved armour since our role would have changed. That was clearly stated in the Bloc's dissenting report. In this regard, the Bloc Quebecois always stood by its policy, remaining steadfast, regardless of what the minister and his department might say.

Coming back to the history of the tendering for APCs, a certain company was awarded without tender the $2 billion armoured vehicle acquisition contract.

From then on, nothing could be done. When the government makes a decision without taking into account the fact that we oppose the acquisition of armoured personnel carriers and awards the contract, since all members have the duty to look after the interests of the people they represent in their region or province, we ask that the government at least acknowledge the existence, in Quebec, of a company whose expertise in manufacturing armoured vehicle turrets is internationally recognized and we even go as far as demanding that the contract and economic benefits be split.

Shortly before the referendum, as I recall, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs had sent a letter to Oerlikon stating that it would, of course, be considered for a later turret manufacturing contract with GM. Later, we learned that there were no dealings between GM and Oerlikon and that it was out of the question for GM to be forced to go with Oerlikon. The turrets can easily be ordered from the U.S. They had no qualms making this kind of statement. This reminds me that all this love expressed before the referendum now appears to be dissipating like some sort of vapour blown away by the wind.

I would like to add, regarding this famous armoured vehicle renewal contract, that this is another instance where there seems to be something of a double standard. As far as the work to be carried out in Quebec is concerned, no problem, no requirements need to be set. On the other hand, for those vehicles to be overhauled in Chatham—because Chatham was affected by base closures—the minister said the part of the work on the 450 armoured vehicles must be carried out in Chatham to offset the losses caused by the closure of CFB Chatham.

Strangely enough, there is no infrastructure whatsoever in Chatham to support the repair and overhaul of these vehicles. This means that subsidies will have to be granted, as this was done—as several members probably remember—for the Canadian patrol frigates, since Halifax did not have the basic infrastructure required to build the frigates. Between $350 million and $360 million was spent in subsidies to put the infrastructure in place so that the shipyard could secure the contract.

• (1025)

A competitor for MIL Davie, in Lauzon, which had the required infrastructure to execute the contract, appeared out of thin air. Something similar is happening now. When there is a closing in a place such as Chatham, some compensation must be made through economic spinoffs. Consequently, the government requires that the upgrading of the 450 armoured personnel carriers be done in Chatham.

As for the closure of the military college in Saint–Jean and the downsizing at the military base in that municipality, the government should use the same approach, avoid any double standard and say: "Yes, the Saint–Jean region was adversely affected. Consequently, since Oerlikon is located in the area, we should tell GM that a portion of the armoured personnel carriers contract ought to be awarded to Oerlikon". But no.

The minister tells us that he cannot get involved in the discussions going on between the companies. If this is the case, why is it that he can require that part of the upgrading be done in Chatham, where there is no existing infrastructure, but cannot do so when a similar situation occurs in Quebec?

I now move on to the helicopter issue, more specifically the recent announcement made by the defence minister concerning the acquisition of 15 search and rescue helicopters. During the review of Canada's defence policy, the Bloc did agree with the acquisition of search and rescue helicopters.

However, it did not agree with buying armoured personnel carriers and submarines and this is clearly stated in the dissenting report. It might be worth taking a look at that document, so that we are not accused of being inconsistent. The fact is that we did show consistency in our approach to this issue.

In the case of the helicopter contract, there is again some sort of a double standard. There is really no Canadian company that builds search and rescue helicopters similar to the Labrador. You have to go to Boeing with the Chinook, Sikorsky with the S–70, Eurocopter with the Cougar, and Agusta–Westland with the Cormoran, as well as another Russian company.

In Quebec, there is Bell Helicopter. This Quebec company, Canadian company builds helicopters that do not quite meet the requirements of the defence department for search and rescue helicopters. Therefore, the minister decided to call for tenders. Since no Canadian company builds these helicopters, a call for tenders can be made. No Canadian content requirement has to be met. Yet, in the case of these helicopters, we could, given the existing infrastructures, have part of the contract executed by a Canadian company, or at least demand that this be done, as in the case of Chatham, or in the case of GM, in London.

As mentioned by the special joint committee in its discussions on the procurement policy, the government is adamant about calling for tenders, to save money. However, if you use that approach, you have to do it all the time and in a consistent manner, regardless of which industry is involved, or whether that industry is located in Quebec or in Ontario. It is difficult to see any consistency in the approach used by the department, since it applies a given measure in one case and different one in another situation.

Let me give you another example. By calling for tenders the defence minister is saying, we do not trust our Quebec companies. Bell could bid to provide a portion of the helicopter's equipment, and Oerlikon could bid to build the turrets of the armoured personnel carriers. We want some Canadian content and we want to award contracts to existing companies, but the minister tells us that we do not trust our companies.

It seems to me that he has a funny way of showing his lack of confidence in Ontario companies, since in the past five years the federal government has awarded more than $3 billion worth of contracts in Ontario without any bidding process.

I would like to see the same rule apply. If Canadian unity and the federal government are so profitable to the provinces, let them put their money where their mouth is. As far as I am concerned, the only thing they are giving is one more demonstration that, in the case of Quebec and, I might add, some other provinces as well—Parenthetically, let me add, in connection with the base closures in the west and the expansion of the base in Edmonton, when you evaluate all of the costs of closing and reconstruction, there are no savings; it will cost $60 million more.

There are some unkind souls who would say: "Tough luck for those living west of the Rockies, west of Edmonton, because they had the misfortune of voting Reform and this is when the bases got cut in their region". I am beginning to realize that this is a kind of repeat performance: if you do not vote for the Liberals, you pay for it afterward.

If that is how Canadian unity is created, I am even more anxious for Quebecers to finally wake up to the reality. I have the impression that perhaps our colleagues in the West might appreciate that too, at some point.

Mr. Lavigne (Verdun—Saint–Paul): Like in Northern Quebec?

Mr. Jacob: The comments of my colleagues across the way are most amusing.

To continue, I would like to add that, during the defence policy review, we discussed procurement policy. A degree of agreement was reached that National Defence ought in future to purchase from companies already equipped with the necessary expertise and infrastructures, in order to make optimum use of the taxpayers' funds.

Here again, in the Bloc's dissenting report, reference was made to certain situations in which it had been found that there had been overruns, sometimes extremely substantial, and that the construction of certain plants had cost the taxpayers dearly. I referred earlier to the fact that Halifax got infrastructure subsidies in order to obtain the frigate contract. Under such circumstances, the costs are definitely greater.

Except where it would be more profitable to acquire systems already available within Quebec or Canada, I am convinced that this procurement policy is a good thing, nevertheless.

We must, however, avoid simplistic analyses of the situation. In some areas of activity, there are Canadian and Quebec firms which are totally competitive and competent and, contrary to some people's desire to see all defence spending curtailed or totally abolished, I feel that it is definitely necessary. The defence industry, whether in Quebec or in Canada, includes certain high tech jobs I feel are very important, if not vital, for certain regions, whether in Quebec or in elsewhere in Canada.

However, as I said right at the start, it is important to have a procurement policy but it must be applied consistently, whether in a given sector within Quebec or elsewhere in Canada, the Maritimes or Ontario for instance.

In the dissenting report, reference was made to the necessity of our immediately opposing abandonment of the regional redistribution policy, because it might serve the interests of Quebec businesses in coming months.

• (1035)

The systems whose manufacture is currently in the planning stages call for technical expertise located outside Quebec, whereas the opposite situation has prevailed in the past.

For this reason, Quebec may well find it increasingly harder to secure its "fair share" in future. It is unthinkable that a policy that has been a barrier for Quebec in the past could be terminated now, at a time when it could be invaluable.

That is what we said in the dissenting report prepared by the Bloc Quebecois. When the minister says we agreed, we did have certain reservations. The minister says we agreed with the purchase of armoured personnel carriers, but we had certain reservations and as far as the submarines were concerned, we were definitely against that purchase.

I may add that at the Department of National Defence, at Defence headquarters, there is a policy for defence procurement. It is dated June 1995. This is not old stuff. This is an internal document circulating within the department.

Here is one item that states: "Contribute to long term regional and industrial development and to achieving relevant national objectives".

This is another one: "Priority shall be given to products and services that are respectively manufactured and provided in Canada and to certain other products and services if there is sufficient competition".

During the 1993 election campaign, the Liberals often referred to a defence conversion program, and in fact this was part of the Liberal Party's wonderful red book. They have now been here for two years, and I wish someone would show me an example of defence conversion. In any case, it certainly did not happen in Quebec. If it did anywhere else, it was a well-kept secret. Maybe in the maritimes because I vaguely remember that at some time, the Minister of Supply and Services tried to take a certain amount from the Department of National Defence for some industry.

Unfortunately, in every case the defence conversion program proposed by the Liberals—and unfortunately people often call this having a selective memory—when the Bloc Quebecois approved the cancellation of the EH-101 helicopters, that approval was conditional on the implementation of a thorough and practical defence conversion policy.

It has now been two years and nothing has transpired. Some of my colleagues will expand a little on the DIPP and the new development fund for defence conversion. Let us face it, this is a worldwide phenomenon. Since the end of the cold war, the defence industry has not been in the best of shapes. Just in Quebec, in the past five years, deliveries of defence products have declined by 48 per cent.

This means Quebec has lost nearly 30 per cent of the jobs connected with Canada's defence industry. Neither the policy nor the promises in the Liberal Party's red book with respect to defence conversion specify how this is supposed to work.

Several times the minister of defence told us that his budget had no money for defence conversion and that it was the responsibility of the Department of Industry. In the red book it was put very clearly, but we have seen no results. When we in the Bloc point out that certain expenditures seem to be a waste of money and the government goes ahead anyway, we have no choice but to ask the government to apply the same economic spinoff policies it applies to Ontario or the maritimes but not to Quebec.

• (1040)

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the 1994 White Paper on Defence, published last December provided a mission statement for the basic roles of the Department of National Defence and the Canadian Armed Forces in a post cold war context.

The Department of National Defence's mission is to protect Canada, to help keep the peace in the world and to promote Canada's interests abroad.

Policy focuses on keeping the armed forces versatile and combat ready, buying the broadest possible range of military options at a reasonable price in Canada. Maintaining the forces enables us to carry out our major defence roles, that is, of defending Canada and North America and contributing to world security.

The defence policy responds to pressing needs to reduce federal government expenditures in order to resolve Canada's serious financial problems. Defence programs, arising from the 1995 federal budget, are totally in keeping with the policy set out in the white paper. Military expenditures will be brought below $10 billion over this year and the coming two years. Even though the $1.63 billion reduction over this period represents a 14 per cent reduction in absolute terms, the department will in fact lose more than 18 per cent of its purchasing power. I see this as a victory.

Our budget has been cut. We will nevertheless take a number of measures to increase the forces' operational capacity. For Canadian forces to be able to retain their combat potential they will be provided with indispensable equipment such as the armoured personnel carriers the government has just announced. I noted that the hon. member spoke a lot about armoured vehicles and I will come back to this a little later on in my speech.

The acquisitions program will focus on extending equipment life whenever it is cost effective to do so. Only equipment vital to maintaining Canadian forces capability will be acquired and procurement will be off the shelf whenever possible.

[English]

Let us talk about this whole question of off the shelf procurement and why it makes sense. I would like to dispel a number of myths that have developed about off the shelf buying which have appeared recently in the press, certainly in the press in the province of Quebec.

It is a great oversimplification to think of off the shelf buying as getting something that is all packaged and ready to pluck from a local hardware store. The department of defence has been developing and putting into practice a much broader concept of an off the shelf acquisition process, one that incorporates elements of a much simplified, less prescriptive acquisition approach. This process can be viewed as buying better and buying smarter in a more businesslike fashion in acquiring goods and services. It maximizes the use of existing industry products, practices and technologies.

The underlying rationale for this approach is an attempt to reduce costs in buying and supporting equipment. Clearly off the shelf acquisition is good for taxpayers since it does reduce costs and puts our limited money where it is needed most. It is good for soldiers, sailors, airmen and airwomen because it quickly gets the needed equipment to them and ensures we have combat capable forces.

My colleague the parliamentary secretary will talk a little about the former practices of developing ideas, concepts, specifications, the contracting process, Treasury Board approval and how long it takes. He will talk about that from the perspective of being a former naval officer, about what it means to the men and women in the forces in relation to the delay in getting equipment.

Off the shelf procurement is good for industry. Canadian industry, especially in the aerospace sector, is now quite mature, has good capability and can compete with the best in the world.

[Translation]

I am surprised by the attitude of my colleague opposite, by his lack of confidence in the Canadian aerospace industry, which is located in the province of Quebec. He has no confidence in his own industries, in his own province. This is further evidence of the repressive mentality of the separatists and the sovereignists, which views Quebec as poor and fragile. I for one do not accept this argument.

• (1045)

[English]

In the recent past there has been an increasing emphasis within defence on off the shelf acquisitions. Basically we are trying to do a number of things. Wherever possible we try to purchase equipment where the performance has been demonstrated in the field. We try to evaluate carefully the cost of marginal increases and the capability of new equipment. We try to avoid unique Canadian solutions that require expensive and risky research development or modification of existing equipment. It sounds to me like that is not a bad idea.

In other words, we in defence and in the government at large are becoming smarter buyers. We are maximizing the purchase of what is already available to meet defence requirements. We think this is essential for the Canadian forces because it provides our troops with the necessary equipment in a timely and cost effective manner. We have been very consistent in moving toward a greater alliance on off the shelf procurement.

[Translation]

In its 1994 report, the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy—I see that the hon. member was on this committee—recommended that the procedure for buying military equipment be simplified. The committee called for a commitment to buy off the shelf military equipment and to avoid complex procedures for buying custom made products. The report also said that DND's acquisition policy should emphasize off the shelf products.

Favouring off the shelf equipment does not mean that DND will not consider the need for regional industrial benefits in Canada, but there will be times when it is totally appropriate from an economic point of view to buy commercially available products. DND will certainly not want to needlessly increase procurement costs and pay for extra work in order to provide regional benefits.

It is very interesting to note that, in his contradictory comments on the report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy, the hon. member from the Bloc stated that procurement cost overruns are due in large part to the Canadian content restrictions, for which taxpayers had to pay more because the existing industrial base could not meet the needs.

What you have here is a glaring contradiction. What the hon. member said today contradicts his Bloc colleagues' minority response to the report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy, as well as all the sovereignist arguments we have heard in recent months. They are always contradicting themselves.

[English]

I want to deal with one of the real canards—we use that in English, but we do not use it in French in quite the same way—the hon. member has thrown on the floor of the House of Commons: this notion that the province of Quebec is once again subjected to terrible things by the federal government, in this case in the area of defence.

Quebec has about 25 per cent of the population of Canada. About 20 per cent of total defence expenditures are spent in the province of Quebec, not quite the 25 per cent. However, when it comes to capital purchases it is about 27 per cent. That is because much of the defence industry in this country is located in the province of Quebec.

The hon. member, as I said earlier, does not seem to have confidence that the industry in his own province can compete in the case of the search and rescue helicopters and in the case of the armoured personnel carriers. He gives the impression that the armoured personnel carriers are going to be totally and absolutely built, every bolt, every part, in London, Ontario. That is crazy. He knows that is not the truth.

The GM diesel division in London, Ontario assembles—and it does a very good job—the armoured personnel carriers, but most of the parts, the motors and other equipment come from other places. Guess what? Some of those places just happen to be in the province of Quebec, but he would not admit that because he does not have faith.

This is one contradiction we see in the separatist argument, whether it is on national unity or on something like defence. They do not have confidence in themselves. They do not have confidence in what Quebec has attained within Canada. The aerospace industry is primarily situated in the province of Quebec, and it does a pretty good job. We recognize that. However, it would be nice if somebody like the hon. member and his party, the Bloc Quebecois, would recognize and have confidence in their own industry.

Let us talk about how Quebec has really been put under the thumb in recent years. One of the few things the previous government did that I could support was direct a contract to Bell Helicopter in Montreal. The hon. member stood a few minutes ago and lambasted us for directing the contract to General Motors diesel division. The Tories did that, and guess who the beneficiary was? It was Bell Helicopter. The condition was that they would build a brand new plant in Mirabel. I have been through the plant and I have been on the new Griffon helicopters, and they are outstanding. That is technology that is in Quebec. The hon. member does not recognize that. It was a $1.2 billion contract.

[Translation]

A $1.2 billion contract was awarded to a Quebec company, Bell Helicopter.

[English]

Why? Because Bell Helicopter agreed to establish this plant as the prime builder for certain lines of helicopters. It gave the world product mandate to Bell Helicopter in Montreal.

General Motors of the United States has done the same thing in Ontario on armoured personnel carriers and with diesel locomotives. The diesel division of General Motors has a world product mandate.

The hon. member could be mired in the isolationist, regional politics of Quebec and of the past grievances, but I think even the sovereignists in Quebec have to appreciate that the world has changed, that we are competing globally, competing in a North American free trade environment.

After making very painful adjustments, which hurt Quebec and hurt Ontario in many of the manufacturing industries, Canada is now starting to see some light. It is companies like General Motors and Bell Helicopter and a raft of others that are getting the world product mandate for particular equipment, systems, and technologies that will be the future of Canada and the future of Quebec.

The hon. member has consistently attacked the government defence policies with respect to closures.

[Translation]

It is not true to say that the closure of the Collège militaire royal is the only closure in the country under the budget of two years ago, it is not true.

It is very difficult as a Liberal minister to close bases in Cornwallis and Shelburne, Nova Scotia and elsewhere in the province, in Ottawa and Toronto and in Chatham, New Brunswick. It is very difficult to close these bases. We closed 30 bases across the country, but the word is the government closed only the Collège militaire royal in Quebec. It is not true. This is another example of selection of incorrect information.

In the last budget, we announced the closure of the base in Chilliwack, British Columbia. One of the measures is to move a school—where, you ask—to the Saint–Jean base in Quebec. Oh no. The poor people of Quebec do not get their share of military installations. Not true. We moved the cadet and recruit school from Cornwallis to the Saint–Jean military base, to the big complex, the big building. We moved this school, and, in the last budget, we announced the move of the Chilliwack school to Saint–Jean.

He talks about the expansion of the base in Edmonton, Alberta, as a major base. I know you are very interested in this base because you are a member for Edmonton. This is logical.

The hon. member neglected to tell the House that we expanded the Valcartier base, in his own riding. It is a big, big undertaking. He is well aware that a lot of buildings went up and that there was a lot of construction in his riding, but he forgets to mention it. It is a political issue, because Quebec is always the victim in the Canadian yoke. Not true.

[English]

What we see here are inaccuracies, half truths, a selection of facts that do not add up with what we have done.

They want to talk about French speaking Canadians in the armed forces. About 30 per cent of the army are francophones. About 27 per cent of our officer level are francophones. We have had no trouble recruiting for the Royal Military College in Kingston.

The debate we had was interesting. My good friend, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, has successfully worked with local officials in Kingston to expand the college.

[Translation]

I am proud as a Canadian to visit the Royal Military College in Kingston and to see that it is bilingual. It is an institution that is not in the province of Quebec, but it is entirely bilingual. Every day, both English and French are spoken there. The atmosphere is very Canadian, bilingual, and I think it came about as the result of a decision to concentrate everything in Kingston.

However, I am told the hon. member for Charlesbourg visited the college with a colleague and was disappointed. He was really disappointed, because he could find nothing to criticize. He spoke with young soldiers and cadets, and everyone told him things were fine there.

We are well aware that it is not exactly the province of Quebec. We know that Kingston is primarily an English city, but it has a very warm welcome for francophones. The mayor and the people of Kingston, the people at Queen's University and all of the institutions made a real effort to welcome francophones to Kingston.

He was really disappointed. I am told he saw no problems. He was exasperated, because he would criticize the closure of the Collège militaire royal in Saint–Jean daily in the House, and when he visited the college in Kingston, he realized that his criticism was unfounded.

[English]

We have here yet another example of the separatists coming to the House and provoking people's emotions. Every night on the news in Quebec we saw stories of how this was terrible, that this particular decision, which was taken for logical financial reasons, was somehow anti–francophone, anti–Quebec. That is not the case.

I encourage any member to go to the Royal Military College in Kingston and speak to francophones from Quebec. They will tell you the atmosphere is welcoming and is conducive to study and conducive to building a great nation with two official languages. That is the by–product of a very tough decision. We do not get that when we listen to the speeches of the hon. member. Somehow the closing of the Collège militaire royal was the only thing that happened in the defence budget that year. The fact is we announced close to $7 billion worth of actual and projected cuts including the cancellation of the EH–101.

I want to talk for a few minutes about the acquisition program. We are well on target. We have announced the armoured personnel carriers. We have announced the search and rescue. We have not addressed the other two major procurements in the white paper but those will be addressed one way or the other.

The hon. member talks about submarines. How many times does a person have to repeat that the government has not made a decision on whether or not to buy the submarines? If we decide not to, then we will announce it. Then the hon. member will be happy but I am sure he will find something else to criticize. He is using this as something with which to whip the government and it is not based on fact.

I say with great respect this motion certainly does not reflect the actual situation in the country with respect to procurement, with respect to Canadian content and with respect to defence policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, no questions but a few comments.

When the minister says there are contradictions in what we say, I am sorry, but I think that the problem here is with understanding and interpreting what was said. When I said earlier that there were extra costs for Canadian and Quebec taxpayers, this was when there were no infrastructures, as in the case of the Halifax shipyard for the frigates contract. When the infrastructures are there, I made it clear that it is possible, and I said that as well, to save money by going on the market.

When the minister accuses us of bad faith or putting a spin on certain things, I think he is very good at that himself, because, when I made the comparison with Chatham, where the military base was closed—in fact I read what the Premier of New Brunswick had to say about that—the minister compensated by ordering repair work to be done in Chatham. Because the base was closed, the order was given, in this case. In other cases, it was not.

I also mentioned several times that the Liberal Party's red book referred to defence conversion, but neither the minister nor anyone else ever brought this up. When we talk about procurement and we say that Quebec is not getting its fair share, I do not see why, if the infrastructures are there, we should not get the same treatment as everybody else.

Finally, yes, I did visit the Royal Military College in Kingston but the experience did not exasperate me, not at all. This is another wrongful interpretation by the minister. I thought it was a very beautiful location, except there may have been a conscious effort to sugar coat this bitter pill, but it is a nice place, and I did not come back exasperated, not at all.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I forgot to say in my speech that in the point that raised by the hon. member, the reference was to Chatham, New Brunswick.

We made the announcement that there would be some work done in Chatham, because closing that base was more difficult than anywhere else in Canada, but he again forgot to say, and it is only normal that he should forget, that in our announcement we also said that most of the armoured personnel carriers would be repaired, restored and overhauled in the National Defence workshops in East Montreal.

[English]

In other words, he talks about the small benefit of 270 person years and about $50 million that is going to Chatham, New Brunswick. However he does not talk about the $400 million and all the jobs that are going to be preserved in the east end of Montreal. The people in the east end of Montreal knew what defence did. When the votes came in on referendum night we saw that the no vote was strong in the east end of Montreal, contrary to the predictions made by the hon. member's party.

• (1105)

We have a good story to tell. I only hope that in the future the hon. member will admit to some of the great things we are doing in Quebec, such as continuing the very competent workshop in the east end of Montreal and the preservation of all those jobs.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to stand today on behalf of the people of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and all Canadians in opposition to the Bloc motion. I find it strange that the hon. member for Charlesbourg just a few short weeks ago was soliciting members of the Canadian Armed Forces to join a new Quebec armed forces and today he is actually trying to appear to be concerned about the Canadian Armed Forces. It is quite frightening to see this type of motion. I urge the hon. member to seriously read section 62 of the Criminal Code and reflect on his actions of a few short weeks ago.

I also take this opportunity to voice the outrage of Canadians over the mismanagement of the defence portfolio by the Liberal minister. Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has its own provincial angle on this issue, one which is largely out of touch with that of the majority of Canadians, despite the Bloc's sacred title. The Reform Party, the de facto opposition party in the House, opposes the motion put forward today by the Bloc Quebecois because grassroots Canadians want value for their tax dollars.

Canadians have told us that Canada desperately needs to replace its aging military equipment with new equipment which can meet a certain set of performance criteria. We need to buy this equipment off the shelf so that we can purchase the best equipment with our taxpayers' dollars. I support and I am determined to fight for the removal of all measures which are designed to insulate industries from competition.

Canada is over $550 billion in debt. Much of our equipment is older than the military personnel using it. We can no longer play the regional development game when our armed forces need new equipment within the current environment of fiscal restraint.

This does not preclude Canadian companies in the Canadian province of Quebec from bidding on military procurement. I am confident that Quebec's military and aerospace industry, like the military and aerospace industry in other provinces, is up to the task of competition with other national and international firms. An off the shelf policy is certainly less threatening to Quebec industry than the Bloc's attempts to separate from Canada. That would do more harm to the military and aerospace industry in Quebec than any government policy to seek the best price for military hardware.

The motion is almost amusing in light of last month's referendum.

Can Canadian industry compete with the best in the world? I must answer with a resounding yes. There are dozens of military products and industries which are world class and have succeeded or can succeed in the international marketplace.

The Bloc Quebecois wants to reprimand the government for having dropped the Canadian content requirements in contracts for the purchase of military equipment. That is ridiculous. Canadians know that buying military hardware off the shelf is the only practical way for military procurement in Canada.

Procurement is central to the operations of any military service. In the modern era when weapons systems are so complex and design and delivery stages can extend over a decade, successive Canadian governments have too often overspecified Canadian forces requirements. Successive Canadian governments have also used the military as a tool for industrial benefits and for the pursuit of regional economic development. The result has been costly to Canadian taxpayers and the armed forces.

These factors are responsible for the gigantic bureaucracy for the management and control of military procurement. The costliness of an all Canadian design that has not faced international competition has resulted in our armed forces using outdated equipment. Too many resources were being spent on one megaproject while the modernization and upkeep of existing equipment was put on the back burner.

In other words, whenever possible the armed forces must purchase the most cost effective and capable military platforms, such as helicopters, armoured personnel carriers or submarines. If no Canadian defence industry can produce the entire platform at a competitive price, then so be it. There will still be room for Canadian industry in the development and manufacture of subsystems and in the long term, maintenance of the platform.

In addition to acquiring military platforms for the armed forces in a timely manner the savings to taxpayers would be enormous. The whole procurement process would be simplified. The role of government agencies would be eliminated and significant costs associated with seeking regional benefits would disappear. The end result would be a better equipped armed forces for the money.

In some instances, Canadian industry will be able to compete and acquire a licence to manufacture an existing platform in Canada. I am sure Canadian industries will be highly successful in competing globally for manufacturing rights to existing products. When this occurs the armed forces and the taxpayers will again be the winners. The procurement process will be streamlined. Jobs will be created. Spending will remain in Canada and other Canadian firms will get the opportunity to compete for subcontracts.

My fear is that the Bloc Quebecois motion is actually redundant. I am not confident this government is going to follow through and implement a true off the shelf policy. Let us look at the government's procurement track record so far.

In 1994 the Minister of National Defence tabled his white paper on defence, the first comprehensive look at Canada's defence policy since 1987. In it the minister pays some lip service to the off the shelf concept. The white paper states under the heading of procurement: "The Department of National Defence will adopt better business practices. Greater reliances will, for example, be placed on just in time delivery of common usage items to reduce inventory costs. The department will increase the procurement of off the shelf commercial technology which meets essential military specifications and standards".

While this is hardly a ringing endorsement of an off the shelf, taxpayer friendly way to military procurement, it is a start. Maybe this government's actions are stronger than its words. Let us look at some of the specific purchases by the Minister of National Defence since 1993 and see if he shows some concern for Canadian taxpayers and Canadian military personnel and determine if he has grasped the off the shelf concept.

One of the latest procurement contracts I am aware of is the minister's $2,000 gold plated pen contract with an Ottawa firm. If the minister had a concern for his troops and Canadian taxpayers, he would have shopped around for a bargain. He would have gone to Grand and Toy and Office Depot, to name two major pen suppliers, which have commercially available pens that could be purchased off the shelf. But no, the minister had a number of specifications. They had to be quill pens with gold engraved lettering and supplied in a crushed velvet pouch. So much for the minister and his lip service to off the shelf.

Wait. Maybe that purchase was just a fluke. Maybe the minister's track record improves when we examine something that is not for his personal use. Let us examine the government's track record vis–à–vis one of the major equipment purchases this government faces. Let us look at this government's handling of the replacement of search and rescue shipborne helicopters.

This sorry tale begins in the dying days of the previous Tory government. Prior to the 1993 election the Conservative government had set in motion the purchase of the EH–101 replacement helicopter. By the fall of 1993 hundreds of millions of dollars had been spent on research and development.

The hefty cost of the EH–101 which totalled $4.4 billion including training personnel, spare parts, training manuals and training programs prompted the Liberal Party to make a campaign promise to scrap the purchase. This campaign ploy is proving to be costly to taxpayers and a minefield for the Minister of National Defence who has to replace our current deficient fleet while showing the taxpayers that the Liberal government has saved them money.

The fallout from this campaign promise has been great. Our military personnel were told they would have to spend more time flying obsolete and increasingly dangerous helicopters. Our ability to enhance our defences and to get the most out of our new frigates has been deferred. Taxpayers have been forced to waste up to some $600 million on cancellation fees, but all the costs are not in yet. Some experts are saying that the total could cost Canadian taxpayers up to $1 billion at the end of the day.

Sadly the Liberal cabinet is playing politics again. The defence minister has publicly committed himself to purchasing new helicopters and finally announced last week that he would purchase 15 new search and rescue helicopters. He boldly proclaimed that they would be purchased off the shelf for just $600 million. Six hundred million dollars to $1 billion is the amount the Liberal government has forced Canadian taxpayers to spend on helicopters since the election of 1993. But where are the helicopters? The $600 million figure like our aging Labradors and Sea King helicopters does not fly.

To purchase the 15 helicopters Canadian taxpayers are really being asked to spend $1.2 billion to $1.6 billion when the EH–101 cancellation costs are factored in. That equals about $80 million to $100 million each. That is probably more than the average cost of each EH–101 helicopter.

The only reason the minister is forced to commit himself to an off the shelf purchase of helicopters is the political game of football the government has been playing with helicopters. The EH–101 cost included spare parts, pilot training, manuals and other incidentals. The defence minister left these costs out of his assessment, making his new search and rescue variant more costly to taxpayers.

There is more too. The minister has lowered the operational specifications for the helicopter by 15 per cent. The EH–101 was not an overspecified helicopter. The EH–101 had a set of specifications to meet Canada's expansive geography and our severe weather conditions. Specifications include a range of 550 miles; a speed of 160 knots; a hover capability for a 7,500–foot altitude; a capacity to rescue and carry nine people; a day, all night and all weather capability including severe icing conditions and the capability of making a safe recovery following the loss of one engine.

The Liberals had wasted so much money calculating the EH–101 deal they could not afford to purchase an off the shelf helicopter that could meet Canada's unique needs.

The announcement that the operational requirements for our search and rescue helicopters is being reduced calls into question the Liberal government's commitment to Canada's search and rescue. What are we telling our fishers and their crew off the west coast of Vancouver Island in an emergency situation? The government is sending them a strong message, scribbled with a pricey quill pen that says: "We may not be able to assist you. The weather is too bad and you are out of range. Good luck".

As for the shipborne helicopters, the cabinet and the defence minister are still wrangling over the difficulty in deciding how to tell the public they need to spend billions of dollars on a project they cancelled as a campaign promise.

I expect to see the same result with the shipborne helicopters as with the search and rescue variety. Canadians will get at best an inferior helicopter in less numbers for the same price as the EH–101.

Who are the losers? First Canadian taxpayers and second our military personnel. The Minister of National Defence has an approved defence budget and an approved white paper which apparently account for the purchase of new shipborne helicopters. Yet the minister is unable to get cabinet approval to make this important decision. Why? Media reports speculate on the worst. They believe cabinet is fighting over the division of regional benefits.

In August the Financial Post claimed a Parliament Hill lobbyist had said that the Minister of Human Resources Development and the Minister of Transport were pressing the Minister of National Defence for investment in their regions.

When looking at other major procurement items on the government's agenda it becomes apparent the minister was forced into an off the shelf promise on helicopters because of the fiscal mess the government has put itself in over the EH–101 cancellation.

The recent press conference the minister held to announce his plans for search and rescue helicopters was a non–event, to say the least. The minister only announced his intent to accept bids, something most of us thought had occurred long ago. Normally the minister would announce the items to be procured, the cost to the taxpayers and the industry involved.

This is exactly what happened in August when the minister announced his intent to purchase 240 new armoured personnel carriers in addition to a program for refurbishing about 1,200 of our existing M–113s, Grizzlies and Bisons. In this example the minister threw the concept of off the shelf to the wind. It was lucky for him that he had no APC cancellation contracts to contend with. In this case the minister knew exactly which companies would be awarded the contract. General Motors of London, Ontario was awarded the contract to produce 240 new APCs for $800 million, with the government keeping the door open to ordering another 411 at a future date for a cost of just over $2 billion.

To determine whether this contract was value for money, I submitted an access to information request in August asking for documents showing the minister and his senior officials at DND shopped around and bought the best APC for the money. The information act states that the department must respond to requests within 30 days of receiving them. It is now the end of November. I have heard nothing from the Department of National Defence and I expect the worst. I imagine the department is stonewalling because it knows this is not an off the shelf purchase.

I bet those documents are sitting on the bottom of the in basket of the deputy minister of defence as we speak. I also bet the next set of defence estimates this spring will have a column under the APC project entitled regional benefits.

While the verdict on the new APCs is not in yet, it is clear the APC refurbishing contract awarded to Montreal's 202 workshop is an exercise in regional pork barrelling. This was the price of cabinet approval for the purchase and represents old style politics at its worst.

The latest major purchase the minister has made known is the option to purchase surplus British Upholder class submarines to replace our aged Oberon class subs. The asking price of $800 million dollars for four Upholders, training vessels, spare parts and documentation is a bargain. I suspect cabinet will not allow the minister to announce this purchase because there is no pie to be divided among the regions.

To conclude, the motion put forward by the Bloc Quebecois is the exact opposite to what Canada must do to get its fiscal house in order. This is not surprising. What is surprising is that the government has not embraced the off the shelf concept as a means by which Canada can upgrade its aging and increasingly dangerous military equipment.

If Canada is to maintain its modest military and continue to play an effective role in our nation's defences and international affairs, it must change and it must change quickly. As the Reform Party defence critic I will be watching every aspect of DND's purchases, from pens to submarines. I will ensure that taxpayers and our dedicated military personnel are getting the most for their money.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak on the subject before us this morning.

The political rhetoric I have heard from the two speakers in the main opposition and the third parties somewhat disappointed me. The tenor of the debate this morning was not the tenor present in the standing special committee of the Senate and the House of Commons in which there was a modicum of consensus. This did not seem to come out on the floor of the House of Commons today. Notwithstanding I should like to get rid of the political rhetoric and talk about some of the reasons my party and I will not be in support of the motion.

Essentially the procurement policies of national defence have been developed over a period of time which has seen a lot of grief with respect to procurement policies. Perhaps at the time they were appropriate to the occasion but now, because of the paring down, the lack of resources, the difficulties with funding, the end of the cold war and the difficulties in planning defence procurement, we have to do it differently.

I believe I can quote the auditor general in his 1993 report as being objective in his major study of defence procurement policies.

The Deputy Speaker: I apologize to the hon. parliamentary secretary. It is an opposition day and a Bloc motion. The Chair is in the habit of going back and forth and made a mistake. It is not in fact the turn of the parliamentary secretary.

The hon. member has returned to his chair and with permission I ask that the hon. member for Shefford speak in proper order.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Certainly, as we say south of the border, I will concede but I was hoping to ask some questions to the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to reverse the speaking order so that the hon. member can put his question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rose to ask the member a question, but since Your Honour recognized me on debate I thought I would commence my debate.

The hon. member mentioned a couple of things I want to clarify, but first I want to make a comment. I was a bit concerned about some of the statements made by the hon. member for Charlesbourg, some of which were raised by the Minister of National Defence, when he suggested the only province that suffered defence cutbacks was the province of Quebec.

I will say in a different manner and perhaps with a different emphasis that I belong to the maritime provinces where the economy is in very rough shape, particularly in Newfoundland. It hurt me as parliamentary secretary to see my colleagues who occupy 31 of the 32 seats in those four provinces being hit with a tremendous blow because the necessary reductions in defence were done objectively.

I refer to the closing of Canadian forces bases Chatham, Cornwallis, Shelburne and the reduction in CFB Shearwater. These were major economic blows to the Atlantic region. I do not think we have heard any of those four members cry wolf. Despite the hardship it has caused politically and otherwise, they have accepted that it is part of government reduction. It would have been graceful if other members had done the same thing.

With respect to my question to my hon. colleague in the third party, he talked about the procurement policies and how they have developed. He used a bit of politics, which I suppose is his duty as the defence critic and which I accept in good spirit. I wonder if he has read the 1993 report of the auditor general. Does he recall some of the discussions we had in the special committee on national defence with respect to some of the difficulties that the old procurement policies had? The policies took a long time and emphasized the wrong things. By the time the equipment was developed it was out of sync.

• (1130)

I also want to make another comment and ask him to respond to it. He said that the EH–101 was not an over designed helicopter. I wonder if he realizes that the EH–101 specifications and capability efficiencies were developed at the height of the cold war. By the time the hardware was developed, it responded to a threat that no longer existed.

I wonder if he has taken that into consideration when he says the EH–101 was the best helicopter for the day.

Mr. Hart: Mr. Speaker, we are saying that the procurement policies of governments in the past were not adequate. They were not fair to Canadian taxpayers. They were not fair to the people who pay the bills.

Under the old system, it could be 15 or 16 years from the time a decision was made to purchase a piece of equipment until it is actually delivered. The frigate program is a good example of that.

I was in the navy in 1973. It was about 1975 that the planners of the frigate program started to come around to the ships to talk to the sailors and to the people in the military about the purchase of new frigates. As members know, we have just recently taken delivery of the very frigates that were in the planning stages in the mid–1970s.

Our procurement process over the years has not been a good one. It has not been value added for the Canadian taxpayer. It has left the military personnel who are challenged with these very heavy commitments that the government places on them with aging equipment, as we see with the Labrador and Sea King helicopters. They are literally falling out of the sky while we wait for an announcement on helicopters.

The helicopters were a big campaign promise. Many would argue that the cancellation of the EH–101 helicopter was probably what won the Liberal government victory in the last election campaign.

What is happening now? The Canadian taxpayers are paying the cost for cancelling the EH–101. I am not overwhelmingly endorsing the EH–101 project but I am not going to say that we should have ruled it out and used it as a political football, which is what the Liberal Party did during the election campaign.

It did not come down to whether the specifications were right. We did not talk about that in the election campaign. We did not talk about whether it was value for the Canadian taxpayers. The Liberals did not talk about that. They just said that they were going to cancel it regardless of the requirement for it, the specifications for it, the terrain that we have to live with in Canada, one of the largest countries in the world. It has excessive weather.

They did not talk about that. They made it a campaign promise to cancel the contract. The figures run about $600 million right now for the cancellation of the EH–101 helicopters. Now the taxpayers know that those figures could reach $1 billion.

The member shakes his head and says that no, it will not reach $1 billion. Why, since I have had access to information on this very subject since the summer, has this government that claims to be open, responsive and interested in letting Canadians know all the information not been forthright about the actual costs of cancellation? It has not done that.

These members have not been forthright. If I can use the member's own words, the government is being opaque on this issue, very much so.

• (1135)

This issue with the helicopters is so much like this Liberal government. After spending $600 million in cancellation fees so far, after the minister announced the government is going to spend $600 million on a new search and rescue helicopter with a decreased capability of 15 per cent, we still do not have helicopters today. That is $1.2 billion right there. The costs are not in yet and Canadians do not have one helicopter to show for it.

This is hypocrisy. The government is going to have to get down to real terms. It is going to have to go to the Canadian people and tell them exactly what the requirements are for the search and rescue helicopter. You cannot even get that information from the minister and the department.

The government is supposed to be open, consulting with the people. Why does it keep secret the information on this procurement? It is not right. I will do everything in my power to fight this and make sure that the government is held to the fire on this one until a purchase is made.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, in response to that I would have to tell the hon. member I do not know from where he is getting his figures. I am disappointed he would use this kind of rhetoric to suggest that these things are happening when in fact they are not.

I have another point I wish to make which I believe he understands but may have misconstrued. He says the helicopters are falling out of the sky. That is not true. Those helicopters are safe to fly until the year 2000. He knows as well as I that the Canadian forces will not permit their pilots to fly helicopters that are unsafe. I want to clarify the record on that. He is looking over at me and nodding with a smile on his face. I know he is playing politics again.

Mr. Hart: Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question, on my recent visit to Shearwater while I was being told that the Sea King helicopters were in the best condition they have ever been in 30 years, cranes were lifting them off the flight decks of the frigates.

Canadians might recall the words of a Canadian pilot who was a trainer in Sea King helicopters. He was quoted in the Globe and Mail: "You only fly a Sea King as far as you want to fall".

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Resuming the debate, with my apologies to the member for Shefford.

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak about the equity, or inequity if you prefer, of which Quebec is a victim with respect to military procurement.

The recent government decisions to purchase new armoured personnel carriers and 15 search and rescue helicopters are far from reassuring to Quebec. It is now a well known fact that Quebec is far from receiving its fair share of federal defence spending, and this has been the case for some years.

All indications are that this inequality will increase rather than decrease. In fact, the new National Defence procurement policy is likely to affect Quebec even more than before.

My colleague, the member for Charlesbourg, clearly demonstrated this morning just how much Quebec is a victim of the federal government's double standard.

I would like to add my voice to his in severely criticizing the government for dropping any requirement for Canadian content from its most recent military procurement policy. What is even worse is that it refuses to put into place any true program for defence conversion. It is very easy to imagine what the consequences will be.

The consequences are that this new government policy will directly endanger the entire aerospace industry. We all know that this industry is mostly concentrated in Montreal, Quebec.

• (1140)

My Bloc colleagues will have the opportunity later today to address more specifically the important issue of defence conversion.

I, for one, want to underline the negative impact the federal government's new policy will have on Quebec. I should, however, start by reminding you that Quebec has been cheated out of a minimum $650 million a year on average in the distribution of federal defence spending in the last 15 years at least, and I will not go any further because it could be worse.

This does not come from me but from the defence department's own statements and figures. In concrete terms, it means that, in the last 15 years, Quebec has received only 17.9 per cent of all defence spending, including 13 per cent of infrastructure costs and 15 per cent of personnel expenditures.

I should also remind you of the conclusion reached by a defence department official, Charles Trottier, in a study he released last February. In the last 15 years, Quebec has received 27 per cent less than its fair share of defence spending. Mr. Trottier compared this loss to the James Bay project or $10 billion over 15 years. This represents a $10 billion shortfall for Quebec. In terms of jobs, this represents a loss to Quebec of 15,000 direct jobs and 25,000 indirect jobs per year on average: nothing less than 40,000 direct and indirect jobs.

In fact, if distribution had been fair, Quebec should have twice as many defence facilities as it now has. Twice as many. Such injustices to Quebec are systemic within the armed forces. This demonstration clearly shows that the federal system is fundamentally flawed, as I will try to explain to you.

Even the minister of defence confirmed that Quebec has been treated unfairly. When he appeared on Radio–Canada's Enjeux last April, the minister said about Quebec that they could not afford the luxury of being totally fair.

I myself asked the minister how he could have the gall to consider fairness a luxury. "Fair"—that is all we ask—to Quebec. Guess what he replied to me? In complete contradiction with his own remarks and suggesting that Quebec was favoured by capital expenditures, which is not true, he said, and I quote: "The province of Quebec generally leads the country in its share of defence capital acquisition expenditures and probably will continue to do so in the future when the new defence acquisitions are announced."

Let us talk about these new defence acquisitions that Quebec is allegedly getting its fair share of. Let us look at this. What are the facts? We know that the government has taken a piecemeal approach to announcing such acquisitions so that the pill will not be too bitter for the taxpayers.

Let us start with the new armoured vehicles. What is Quebec's share of this huge contract worth more than $2 billion? Try as we may to find it, Quebec's fair share is nowhere to be found. Why? Because it just does not exist.

The fact of the matter is that the federal government awarded this contract, directly and without a tender call, to the GM plant in London, Ontario. Quebec companies were not even invited to tender for this contract.

• (1145)

Worse yet, they are not even guaranteed a chance of bidding for subcontracts with GM Ontario. But everyone is well aware of the fact that Oerlikon of Saint–Jean, in the riding next to mine, in Quebec, has all the expertise required to carry out at the very least the turret part of the contract.

My colleague, the hon. member for Saint–Jean, will certainly have an opportunity sometime today to get into this issue of Oerlikon. In spite of the official opposition's pressing plea, the Liberal government absolutely refused to require GM Ontario to go to tender for its subcontracts.

As a result, Ontario is the only province benefiting from this great $2 billion contract. Two billion dollars is a lot of money. All that for Ontario, a province which has a very strong majority in the Liberal caucus. So, when the minister says that Quebec will benefit from the new defence procurement, we can only conclude that it will certainly not be through the armoured vehicles contract.

But let us give the minister another chance. Let us take a look at the procurement contract for the 15 new search and rescue helicopters. Perhaps we will find that Quebec gets its fair share in that deal. After all, it would only make sense, since Quebec was the big loser following the cancellation of the previous contract to buy the EH–101 helicopters. We are not talking about a $2 billion contract like the one awarded to Ontario for the armoured vehicles, without any call for tenders, but it is nevertheless a deal worth $600 million. And $600 million is not peanuts.

Let us ask ourselves this question: Will Quebec, as the defence minister claims, get its fair share of that second military procurement contract? Again, anyone could foresee the answer to that. Quebec has no guarantee whatsoever that this will be the case. Why? Because the government suddenly changed its military procurement policy.

This is a strange coincidence, is it not? While the aerospace industry is located primarily in Quebec, the government suddenly decides to call for tenders, contrary to what it did in the case of the armoured vehicles contract, which was awarded to Ontario without any call for tenders.

This is ironic, especially considering that Quebec was the province most affected by the cancellation of the EH–101 helicopter contract. By the way, that was a $4.8 billion contract.

If I raised that issue, I would probably be told that we should not oppose the government's decision to call for tenders, since it is in the best interests of taxpayers, whose fiscal burden is already heavy enough, and we certainly agree with that. Public finances are indeed in bad shape and it is not our fault.

The Liberals were going to do marvellous things. What marvellous things? I can use either an exclamation mark or a question mark. In all sincerity, I will tell you that it is surely the case. But then why did the government use a different approach in the case of the armoured vehicles contract? Why did the Liberal government not apply the same policy in the two cases? We are still waiting for an answer.

And why does the government refuse to require that GM Ontario allow Quebec businesses to bid on those subcontracts? Again, we are still waiting for answers that are not coming.

Wise observers might point out ironically that what it good for Ontario is bad for Quebec or for the rest of Canada. The problem is that the minister lacks the courage to say so publicly. We realize that he comes from Ontario; that is obvious. In any case, if we take for granted that calling for tenders is okay where Quebec is concerned but that the same rule does not seem to apply to Ontario, one question remains relevant. This question is why, in the case of the search and rescue helicopter contract, the government has suddenly dropped all Canadian content requirements. This is rather peculiar, especially since it could have disastrous consequences not only for Quebec businesses but also for Canadian businesses.

Professor Yves Bélanger, who is also director of the University of Quebec in Montreal's research group on the defence industry, was quoted in yesterday's Le Devoir as saying that, by dropping the Canadian content requirement, the Liberals have taken away from Canadian businesses the best argument they had to force multinationals to negotiate partnerships with them. We are now familiar with the word "partnership", which came up repeatedly during the referendum campaign. Partnerships are the future.

The spokesperson for the Aerospace Industries Association of Canada also agrees. Let me read you what he said in relation to the government's new procurement policy. Here is what he said about it: "If you push it to the extreme, all Canadian development programs would disappear, making it extremely difficult to maintain our defence industry." Thanks to whom? To the Liberal government.

These concerns are especially justified, since, according to analysts, none of the manufacturers competing for this contract are from Quebec or Canada. Apparently, there are two American companies: Boeing and Sikorsky, and three European companies: Eurocopter, Agusta–Westland and the Russian manufacturer Kamov.

In the case of Agusta, there is cause for concern because serious accusations of corruption have been made against this company in Europe. But not only does the government refuse to investigate the circumstances of the EH–101 contract award, as requested by the now Minister of Human Resources Development when he was in opposition—

An hon. member: That is different.

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): It would indeed seem that, here, in Canada, it is quite a different story, depending on which side of the House you are sitting.

Also, one can wonder whether or not the government is getting ready to offer a "sweet deal" to this company.

At any rate, let us come back to the remarks made by the defence minister on Radio–Canada's program Enjeux in April. As I said earlier, the minister had stated on that occasion that Quebec was receiving its fair share of defence procurement. He said so. Now, if Quebec, and Oerlikon of Saint–Jean in particular, is literally excluded from the $2 billion APC acquisition contract, which was awarded to Ontario, and if Quebec is not guaranteed any benefits arising from the $600 million search and rescue helicopter contract, what does this leave as Quebec's fair share?

That is hard to predict, since the federal government is announcing its defence acquisitions in a piecemeal fashion, one slice of baloney at a time, in the hope, of course, that taxpayers will find the pill easier to swallow.

• (1155)

That way the bill does not seem as steep, but if you add everything the result is the same. However, according to the most recent statements made by the defence minister regarding that issue, we can presume that the government is about to buy, at a cost of more than half a billion dollars plus several other considerations, four used submarines that England is no longer interested in. That country wants to get rid of these submarines, and we are going to buy them.

We will buy four old submarines, which are no longer in use. This is what we will get. We will then be better protected. What do you think Quebec could get out of such a deal? As I just said, there is every indication that these are British submarines. Quebec will obviously not get anything out of that deal. But it will have to pay its share, its 25 per cent. Quebec always gets 13, 14 or 15 per cent of everything, but it pays 25 per cent. This is unacceptable.

The government's new policy no longer requires any Canadian content, unless of course it applies to a procurement contract which can help Ontario increase its large share of federal defence spending. This creates a double standard. There is one policy for Ontario and one for the rest of Canada. I can only conclude that Quebec which, as we all know, is far from receiving its fair share of federal military spending, will continue to be greatly and unfairly penalized by this government.

It is no wonder that more and more Quebecers feel that the only alternative is, to be sure, a sovereign Quebec. Quebec's sovereignty will soon become a reality and, when that happens, Quebecers will turn their backs on these injustices, which cost them dearly.

In conclusion, I have no choice but to blame the federal government strongly for giving up the Canadian content requirements in military procurement contracts. These requirements were among the last guarantees that, some day, Quebec might get its fair share—no more and no less—like the others in Canada, that it might be recognized as a province, and that it might get what it is entitled to.

Therefore, I join with our defence critic, the hon. member for Charlesbourg, in blaming the government for its current action.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the member's remarks today. He has been very selective in his speech and has forgotten some very important historical realities.

I would like to go back to the period of 1979 to 1981, when the Government of Canada under the leadership of the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau basically put the foundation in place for the Quebec aerospace industry. The member conveniently did not touch on that period of time; he conveniently overlooked it. This tends to be the basic strategy of the Bloc Quebecois members. They forget the foundation upon which an important industry like the aerospace industry was brought to Quebec.

I remind the member of the government's decision in 1980 when the Government of Canada purchased the F–18A. Almost 80 per cent of the offsets that were part of that contract went to the province of Quebec. In no way, shape or form do I begrudge that because I am a Toronto member, an Ontario member. We celebrated that great purchase under the leadership of Pierre Trudeau.

• (1200)

I also remind the member that it was under the leadership of the present Prime Minister that the decision was taken to get involved with the Canadair Challenger jet. Canadian taxpayers, not Quebec taxpayers, invested almost $1 billion into research and development to lay the foundation that led not only to the Canadair executive jet but also to the Canadair commuter jet, which is now being manufactured in the province of Quebec not just through Canadair–Bombardier but also through various aerospace manufacturers.

I will give a third example. There was a contract given to maintain the F–18As, I believe about four years ago. The actual price submitted by Bristol Aerospace in the province of Manitoba was cheaper than the contract price in Quebec. The government of the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney made sure under his leadership that the maintenance contract for the F–18As, our fighter jet, went to the province of Quebec.

I do not want to suggest that as a Toronto member I resent any of those contracts going to those manufacturers in the aerospace industry in Quebec.

When we talk about what is Quebec's fair share I can point to a specific example where a Liberal government under the leadership of Pierre Trudeau laid the basic foundation for the aerospace industry, which I recognize is an industry leader in the world.

We have to deal with something that happened during the regime of the last government: the free trade agreement. I campaigned vigorously against the free trade agreement. I campaigned against it for many reasons. One reason was chapter 14 of the free trade agreement where essentially there was unfettered foreign access to our markets, whether it was for procurement, manufacturing, or investment opportunities. We essentially gave up a big part of our sovereignty under that chapter.

Members of the Bloc voted for, supported and campaigned for the free trade agreement. We must remember that one article in the free trade agreement prohibits us as a nation from dictating Canadian content. So when the member from the Bloc in his speech today talked about the government not dictating Canadian content, he should have realized that his leader campaigned against dictating Canadian content when he supported the free trade agreement. You cannot suck and blow at the same time. The member from the Bloc Quebecois I know is fighting for his people, which I respect. But we must deal with the truth. The truth of the matter is that we cannot dictate Canadian content.

I believe in the Quebec aerospace industry. When Pierre Trudeau, a great Liberal Prime Minister, laid the foundation to put that industry primarily in the province of Quebec, I believe he made the right decision, not just on behalf of Quebecers but on behalf of all of Canada. The member from the Bloc Quebecois is forgetting a very important factor in any business equation. I want to get to the point about procurement. I have confidence in the Quebec aerospace industry in the sense that it does have the capacity to produce a quality product at a better price.

If we were to promote and support the quality product and competitive price that Quebec aerospace industry operators provide, we could overcome the insecurity the Bloc Quebecois member has about his own industry. Any businessman, if the product is quality and the price is right, will always get the business. Therefore we should not give up on the aerospace industry having the ability to produce a quality product or service at a quality price. Rather than throw in the towel and give up on the industry, let us rally around it.

I do not believe the member from the Bloc Quebecois has that confidence. Essentially what he is saying today is that we should be dictating that automatically these firms should get the business.

Before the free trade agreement I liked the situation in which we tended to be a little more protectionist. I fought for a more protectionist role. The member's current leader said we do not need that kind of protection. We should be consistent when we are having this debate. If the member would not be so selective and instead would look at all the things in a total equation, I believe he would see that the people of Canada and the Government of Canada have done their absolute best to be fair to Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Madam Speaker, it seems fairly obvious that the hon. member considers former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau his guru, since he has referred to him four times within one short presentation.

What we in Quebec are demanding, and I use the word "demand" advisedly, is to have equity, to see Quebec treated equitably, to see Quebec receive what it is entitled to. It is true that, by around the end of the seventies, an aerospace system was in place in Quebec, and now the government across the way cannot be allowed to make use of legislation to kill it off bit by bit. This government must not be allowed to use dubious laws, unwanted laws, to cause Quebec's aerospace industry to disappear. I feel that this is important, and those in the industry say the same. It is one thing to establish an aerospace industry, but quite another thing to destroy one, and that is what is being done now with the legislation being passed and the way Canadian and Quebec companies are being treated.

Personally, I have no problem at all with insecurity, despite what the hon. member said about my seeming to be insecure. What I want is to see Quebec treated equitably, fairly, more fairly than at present. I think it is important—and there is no question of insecurity in working on behalf of one's constituents, the people of Quebec who elected us to this House—and I think it is important to say so.

Madam Speaker, the hon. member took seven minutes to ask his question, and it seems to me I ought to be able to respond to it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): You may respond within the allocated ten minutes.

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): Madam Speaker, perhaps then he ought to have taken a little less time in putting his question, so that I could have as long as he. But I respect your decision.

I merely wanted to say, in closing, that without the members present here in the House when the Conservatives passed the Free Trade Agreement—we know that the Liberals were opposed, Ontario was opposed. Why? Because Ontario has always been Number One. So, without the Quebec members—this is proof that Quebecers have a world view. We are open to the rest of the world, and we want to be able to negotiate, to trade with everyone.

[English]

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Madam Speaker, before I begin this debate I want to thank my hon. colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for his usual intelligent, logical, non-political intervention in this debate, which I think is slowly starting to rise in its level of intelligence. He has introduced some sense, some logic and some good debatable points into this debate. Because I have such respect for the points he has made, I am not going to reinforce them in my presentation.

• (1210)

I want to start with the motion to provide a backdrop for my debate this morning:

> That the House condemn the government for having dropped the Canadian content requirements in the contracts for the purchase of military equipment and refusing to set up a genuine program for the conversion of the military industry, thus endangering the Canadian aerospace industry located in Montreal.

Coming from Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, I would expect that it would take into consideration not just the aerospace industry in Montreal but the aerospace industry in Canada and indeed all the military industry in Canada. You cannot talk about the military industry and relate it to one province. We just do not do business that way in our country. The hon. members know that as well.

I will give a personal experience, which will provide the thread for my thesis. My thesis essentially is that we can no longer continue to do business the way we have been doing it. The climate is not the same. The military climate is not the same and the fiscal climate is not the same. We have changed and we have changed for a reason. If the hon. members opposite would follow the logic of my presentation, I give them forewarning this is the general pattern.

In my previous incarnation I had the fortune, or some would say misfortune, to serve at Department of National Defence headquarters. For an operational officer in any branch of the armed forces this is not considered the highlight of one's career. One likes to be out in the field driving ships, tanks, airplanes, or whatever the case may be.

My first tour, which was rather traumatic, came in 1967, my first time in Department of National Defence headquarters or Canadian forces headquarters as it was then called. One of the first projects I became involved in was a replacement ship for the 20 St. Laurent class destroyers that were built in the post-war period.

I have to say in deference to the issue, and I would be less than honest if I did not, that they did have Canadian content and were considered to be among the best in the world. It was a different time, a different environment, different circumstances—post-war. In 1967 the debate for the replacement of those destroyers had begun. Not only had it begun but it had been going on for some time, maybe a couple of years.

To take a snippet of this point in history, the genesis had been set for the four gas turbine general purpose frigates, or DDH-280s as they became known. There were four special ships in the making, but they had a long time to go as well.

In 1967 the debate had already begun on a replacement for the 20 post-war destroyers. On December 22, 1977, ten years later, a cabinet document approved the construction of the Canadian patrol frigates. That was in December 1977.

I will now report that the last of that class of frigate will be commissioned next year. Actually HMCS St. John's will be commissioned in St. John's, Newfoundland on June 24, 1996, and the last of that class will be commissioned in Cornwall, HMCS Ottawa, in September 1996. After approval in 1977, the last to roll off and be commissioned will be practically 20 years later. That is a long time. That is 30 years from the conception to the last of the class delivery. I do not care what anyone says. I do not care what province they are from. I do not care what they represent or what discipline they belong to. That is too long.

During the cold war we produced equipment for something that might happen. It is happening today. There are 50 wars going on and we are involved in some of them. We cannot have equipment for tomorrow; we must have it for today. We cannot go on planning for 30 years, expecting and not delivering.

If they do not want to heed what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence and Veterans Affairs has to say, I refer them to none other than the auditor general. In his 1993 report he essentially reinforced more eloquently and more specifically the points which I have made. He found three major difficulties with the present procurement system in national defence.

There were 550 major capital projects under way at one point in time. A capital project was in the vicinity of $100 million. That in itself is a challenge.

I am going to repeat this because if I heard somebody say this in the House I would say that they were wrong by a multiplier of 10. The first difficulty which the auditor general found was that it took 5,550 days from the time a capability deficiency was discovered in the inventory of capital equipment in national defence until Treasury Board approval. Not delivery, approval. It took 5,550 days which is 15 years. The system is cumbersome. The number of man hours used in that process would indicate why national defence headquarters was so large and why there was so much difficulty in reaching agreement on the kind of equipment we needed.

The second difficulty was that one of the major pieces of baggage the defence program management system had was the business of content and industrial regional benefits which were always built into the program. As my hon. colleague for Broadview—Greenwood has pointed out, that is no longer permissible under the free trade agreement.

The difficulty was that in trying to build in regional industrial benefits and offsets, quite often the major contract was averted. The major project which was proceeding apace, logically and reasonably, despite the time frame involved, got thrown off course because of an interjection which was too far downstream to be brought into the original concept of the contract. That threw the system off. The end result was that we did not get the best equipment for the money spent. Yes, it was rationalized, but the auditor general did not believe the rationalization was reasonable.

The third major difficulty which the auditor general found in 1993 was that because of the length of time it took to produce Treasury Board approval for the equipment and because of the dynamic instability inherent in the system, by the time the product was produced it did not necessarily relate to the threat or the deficiency which existed 15, 20 or 30 years before.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): The original requirement.

Mr. Mifflin: The original requirement.

I do not want to belabour this, but the case in point was the EH–101. It was a good helicopter, but it was too good for what was needed at the time. It was designed for the cold war. By the time the selection process had come to an end, the cold war was over and the requirements had changed.

Where did we go from there? We had many discussions in the special joint committee on national defence, in which I was honoured to play a role, along with other colleagues of the House. There was some disagreement, but I thought the work of that committee was conducted very co–operatively. The report was hailed as a good report from the bottom up. In 10 months of study the committee consulted over 1,200 Canadians and every kind of group which was involved and interested in national defence, from the positive to the medium to the negative. We took into consideration all of their concerns.

One of the major areas we spent time on was the procurement of equipment. Major equipment groups, defence preparedness groups, Canadian defence associations and the military equipment requirement industry came and spoke with us. Our conclusion was not in support of the motion the opposition has put forth.

In the major discussion one of the things we focused on was that the procurement function was central to the operation of any military service. If we do not have equipment we cannot really have a decent force. This is especially so in the modern era where weapons systems are becoming more complex, more sophisticated and more expensive, not just because of the escalation in money but also because of the escalation in complexity and sophistication.

The design and the delivery schedules extend over 10 to 15 years. I used the example of the Canadian patrol frigate. I think the first one was delivered in 1988 and we will be delivering those ships until 1996. That is an eight to ten year delivery schedule.

The factor that was considered in the special joint committee was the regrettable tendency for the Canadian forces to overspecify the requirements and generally to use every procurement opportunity as a chance to design and build the very best weapons system possible. Best was the enemy of good enough.

The second point we focused on was that there was a stringent set of oversight and accountability requirements imposed over the years and probably for good reason by the Treasury Board.

Together these factors produced a bureaucracy and a system for the management and control of federal procurement that has grown out of all proportion to the real needs of the Canadian forces, out of proportion to the size of the Canadian forces which over the last 10 years has been reduced both in size and in budget. I will mention some figures on that in a few moments.

Our recommendations were threefold. We believed that a significant reduction in the unnecessary superstructure was long overdue. The recommendation was made that first of all the government make a public commitment to purchasing military equipment off the shelf and that it avoid the complex, slow moving custom designed procurement and production processes that characterized too many capital projects in recent years, some examples of which I have given.

In this spirit the procurement policies of the department and the Canadian forces should show a bias toward the purchase of commercially available products whenever possible, be it Canadian or offshore.

The final recommendation, and we felt strongly about this, was that the deputy minister and chief of the defence staff working with the officials of other concerned departments should take immediate steps to modernize and streamline the procurement process. The parliamentary secretary for industry and the parliamentary secretary for public works will be commenting on that this afternoon.

The white paper stemmed from our special joint committee. In the white paper a considerable effort was devoted to looking at capital equipment. The opening thoughts were that we had to change security environment and we had to change fiscal circumstance. This demanded that national defence radically restructure its plans to purchase capital equipment.

To put it more succinctly, if we add up all the reductions, in the last decade national defence has had funding reduced by $21 billion which is a lot of money over a decade and 21,000 people in the regular force which is a lot of people. I have not counted civilians and I have not counted the reserve force.

We cannot give up that amount of funding for whatever reason and expect to do business as usual.

An hon. member: Over how many years?

Mr. Mifflin: Over a decade. That is a lot. In the last two years since 1993 there has been a reduction of $7 billion from the department. That is from 1993 to 1999 and is in the 1993 budget. In last year's budget there is another $2.8 billion. I am talking about a lot of bucks here and a lot of jobs. I am talking about a lot of corner cutting which has to be done to make do with the money we have to buy the equipment we need. We cannot do business as usual which is the point I am making here.

• (1225)

First of all, we have put emphasis on extending the life of equipment whenever cost effective and prudent. With respect to new equipment, the acquisition will be only for purposes considered essential to maintaining the capability of the Canadian forces and for the widest range of defence roles. We want the equipment to do as much as possible without compromising the role and the major purpose of the equipment. We want to get fewer types of equipment, which is now the case, and to purchase equipment that is easier to maintain.

With respect to planned acquisitions, in 15 years capital equipment alone was cut by $15 billion. I talked about $21 billion but that involved other reductions in base closures and that kind of thing. That is a lot of money.

The Department of National Defence had to adopt a better business practice where greater reliance was placed on the just in time delivery of common usage items to reduce inventory costs. Also, in direct response to the recommendation made by the joint committee, the department increased off the shelf procurement of commercial technology which meets the essential military specifications.

The Department of National Defence has embarked on a program to enhance its partnership with the private sector. The most recent and best example of this is the way we are going about the acquisition of our 15 search and rescue helicopters, which does indicate a tremendous partnership and co–operation with the private sector. We have built in a lot of flexibility to the private sector.

Where business case evaluations demonstrate potential for increased cost effectiveness, support activities currently conducted in house will be transferred completely to Canadian industry, or shared with private industry under various partnership arrangements. This again speaks of more flexibility, cost effectiveness and efficiency.

We are also continuing to seek new ways to support our operational forces. If we can contract out to maintain the equipment, that is quite satisfactory to the department. I could quote examples but because of the time I will finish the main thread of my presentation.

In Canada today, 60,000 people are employed in high technology industries, such as aerospace and electronics, which are directly linked to defence procurement. These linkages extend beyond the production of defence equipment to include technological spinoffs into commercial products and access to international markets.

The challenge of lower R and D and capital spending, as I alluded to earlier, and more off the shelf purchasing will be to maintain and improve the industrial impact of those expenditures which remain. To this end, it is the intention of the Department of National Defence to work with Industry Canada and Public Works and Government Services Canada toward harmonizing industrial and defence policies to maintain essential defence and industrial capability.

In general, the government will seek to foster defence conversion despite what the motion suggests. We are going to foster conversion not by a vast infusion of money, but through other initiatives which the Minister of Industry has espoused in very clear terms in this House during question period and in major speeches he has made. I am surprised there is so much doubt on the other side.

We are looking at overall industrial growth and the international competitiveness of Canadian firms consistent with our international trade agreements.

To summarize, what we did before may have been all right when we had the budget to do it, when there was the threat climate to do it and when circumstances permitted. All of the circumstances have changed. We can no longer do business as usual. We have had a major overhaul in the way we do business: in procurement, in life cycle management, in life cycle maintenance.

• (1230)

I look forward to the rest of the debate today to see if we can pick up some more ideas to further enhance what I believe is already tremendous progress in this area.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Madam Speaker, I have two comments and a question for the parliamentary secretary.

I do not know whether this is a military tactic, but he digressed somewhat from the topic at hand—I am actually very glad he did so—to discuss timeframes and the whole structure at headquarters for supervision, programming auditing, and so forth, all of which takes forever. He said as long as 15 years, in some cases.

This is indeed one of the problems of defence procurement. The Auditor General mentioned this in his 1993 report, and he made his case very eloquently. We also discussed this on the special joint committee, but I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary what exactly has been done within this whole review process.

There was, for instance, the software for maintenance of the frigates, for which the military had set certain criteria. After a lot of negotiations and unavoidable delay, we finally obtained a small percentage what the military had asked for. After spending about $30 million on this software, we have yet to obtain what we want.

I wonder how the parliamentary secretary can say that things have changed within the Department of National Defence. If we are going to buy equipment directly on site, will defence testing requirements become stricter or will they remain the same after acquisition of this equipment?

We have now reduced the EH-101 capability to 15 per cent. Are we going to upgrade it again afterwards? Because nothing has happened to change the whole situation he referred to in the department and at headquarters in the past two years. That is my first comment. I would like to know whether the parliamentary secretary has any specifics.

Second, in his speech he said that we could no longer afford to use defence procurement as a tool for regional development, as the federal government often did in the past. As I said earlier—and I appreciate the fact that the parliamentary secretary talked about being logical—when there is no infrastructure, I agree we should not create a new infrastructure, but when it exists, when a company has the infrastructure, then we can use and adapt it to defence criteria.

When we talk about armoured personnel carriers, I am always reminded of the fact that the last deliveries of Bisons, which are now judged to be obsolete or old, were made in 1994. If defence equipment is old after only one year, I really wonder about the future of the Canadian army's equipment.

[English]

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I recognize that he has agreed with some of the things we have said, as he did in the special joint committee.

I emphasize that the changes I have just related to him and to the House are not yet a year old. I assure him from the bottom of my heart that the name of the game is what is the most cost effective way of doing business. He is right in pointing out that we have done things differently depending on the kind of contract we have. However, that points out the flexibility in the system.

We no longer have to go through a system of hoops, milestones and baggage difficulties because it says so in the manual. It is done differently depending on which is the best way to do it and what is the most cost effective way of doing it.

The best example I could give the hon. member for Charlesbourg is to tell him about one area of technology, which I know he understands, so I will relate it to him very briefly.

• (1235)

In 1985 the Canadian navy had less than 350,000 lines of code. I am talking about software now. A decade later the number of lines of code in software in the computer and command control systems and technology transfer systems has increased by a factor of 30. It has just under 10 million lines of code now.

The member knows what that means with respect to software managers, the number of people who work in the software production areas and who are involved in maintenance and producing programs.

Different ways have to be found to do this. Some work may have to be contracted out as was done in one case. The member alluded to the case of Paramax. I think he was satisfied with the number of witnesses that were heard who indicated the difficulties we had with that and in other areas. That is one area to which I would like to respond.

However, this system is still evolving. The examples that he used indicate that we are prepared to do things differently and hopefully in the right manner. We may not get it right 100 per cent of the time, which is always the case when we are making a change. But we know that we have the major thrust right.

I want to respond to comments the hon. member made earlier and to clarify, in case there is any doubt in his mind, with respect to the submarines. He sat on the special joint committee. I am not going to read the recommendation because it is very clear. I can almost do it verbatim. The special joint committee said that, reluctantly, as much as it believes Canada needs a third dimension in surveillance of the oceans, which are the same size as the country, a submarine capability is needed to replace the aging submarines now. They are at the end of the line.

Pretty soon the capability to have people serve in submarines will be lost because the submarines will be gone. Therefore the capability will go with it. The report said, reluctantly, that Canada could not afford to spend the $5 billion needed to get four new submarines. However it did say that because Canada is a maritime country and because it really needs this third dimension to see beneath the surface as well as on and above the water, that if there was an opportunity to buy four submarines that were fairly modern, advantage should be taken of that.

As it turned out the British navy had retired its new submarines, the Upholder class. They are not old submarines. One of them has never been used. How can Canadian content be put into an opportunity buy? The committee agreed and said that its members did not specify a particular country. As it turns out it was the Upholder class in Britain, but it could have been other classes. It was not specified. The committee members did not restrict themselves. They said: "If we can get something at a bargain price that somebody else does not need any more, then buy it". It is like a major capital equipment garage sale. I wanted to clarify that.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a question for my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence. The thrust of his speech dealt with the whole issue of off the shelf. We must be more sensitive to off the shelf purchases.

I realize that some of the prime military manufacturers are not Canadian yet Canada has some of the best component part manufacturers in the aerospace industry. What is the government or the Department of National Defence doing to marry our aerospace component manufacturers with those prime military manufacturers? Is there something that could evolve like the auto pact which we have for the automotive sector?

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, I am delighted that the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry put that question. I must tell the House that we did not consult before.

The best example I can give him is the announcement made a week ago last Wednesday by the Minister of National Defence with respect to the acquisition of the capability for 15 search and rescue helicopters.

• (1240)

It allows the aerospace industry to be totally flexible in the way it goes about responding to this request. It can either provide helicopters by saying that it thinks those are the ones that are the best, and if it is assessed, that is the way it goes or the Canadian companies can say that they will lease helicopters. Having leased or bought them, the maintenance of the helicopters can be contracted out using the aerospace industry in a manner that perhaps was not conceived before and the inflexibility of this cumbersome system that I described in my presentation did not allow. More flexibility means more efficiency and better use of Canada's considerable aerospace industry.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is an interesting motion that we are debating this afternoon:

> That the House condemn the government for having dropped the Canadian content requirements in the contracts for the purchase of military equipment and refusing to set up a genuine program for the conversion of the military industry, thus endangering the Canadian aerospace industry located in Montreal.

Right off the top, I have to say that this motion has great difficulty with one of the realities of the economic world today. We live in a global economy. The motion fails utterly and completely to address the question that Canada must be competitive in that world. It seems to state that looking for subsidies somehow seems to be the answer. I could not disagree more with the thrust of the motion. I might wish to condemn the government for other things but that is certainly not one of them.

I would like to take a slightly different approach to this whole business and look at it from the industrial point of view, from the development of industry and, in particular, innovation and the science and technology thrust that ought to happen in Canada. One of the first of these is that Reformers encourage investment, not subsidization.

This country needs to develop entrepreneurs, risk takers, people who understand what it means to take a new idea and make it work. It is, after all, these innovators in this new technological world that are the engine of the new economy which is developing all around us.

We need to develop a culture that rewards entrepreneurship, innovation and research and ensures that there is a level, competitive and honest marketplace in which these people can operate. That is what we need. This motion does the exact opposite. It throws the whole marketplace and the honesty of the marketplace right out the window. Therefore, we cannot approve it for that reason.

If entrepreneurs are developed with the skills to be innovative and to take the necessary risks, we will develop the kind of fibre in the people who will make Canada strong and who will get us to the competitive position that we need.

In order to do that, we need to do something else. We need to encourage investment in capital structures, in buildings. We also need to develop investment in equipment. That is obvious. The one that is not so obvious is that we need to have investment in research and development.

Let me draw members' attention to what the president of Digital Canada had to say about Research and Development Canada: "By far, the most overriding issue is the investment climate for innovation in Canada". We have all heard stories of new Canadian inventions. These are not so new. They have been around for a while but they were new at one time. One was the heart pacemaker and the other was the variable pitch propeller. Both of these inventions were exploited not in Canada but in other countries because of the reluctance of Canadians to take risks.

It is unlikely that Canadians are any more risk adverse than anyone else in the world. They will take risks. However, we have always had taxation and fiscal policies that encouraged investment in enterprises that had hard assets to back them up as opposed to enterprises that were based strictly on knowledge. That is the direction we will be moving in the future.

I am so encouraged to see that at least some of our banking community is beginning to recognize this. They are beginning to recognize that we need to recognize assets that are not hard and fixed but rather rest really in the minds, the capabilities, and the skills of individuals.

• (1245)

Then he goes on to an example of a particular company. Guess which company it might be? The Digital Equipment Corporation, which was founded in 1957 with only $70,000 of venture capital. That was put up by a company in Boston called American Research and Development. It took 70 per cent of the equity in the company but also showed the founders of the company how to build and manage a successful company. The result was that when that company went public on the American Stock Exchange in 1966, less than 10 years later, that $70,000 investment was worth about $30 million. That is significant.

It was the tax provision that existed in the United States at that time that made it possible for these ventures to succeed as they did. We need to learn from these successful countries and do something very similar. It has nothing to do with the kind of subsidization that is being advocated in this motion.

We need to go one step further as well. Canadian investors and Canadian entrepreneurs need to recognize that they need to have a change toward venture capitalists. They seem to have the idea, which is only human—I am certainly like that—that if something is mine, it is mine, and I want it all.

When you get into the idea of venture capital, these people who have the deep pockets with millions and sometimes billions of dollars in them, and who are prepared to underwrite the venture, do not want to just give that away. They want to say this is a good idea and they want a part. The company we just looked at took 70 per cent but it became a $30 million investment later and gave a tremendous return to the owner.

The person who has the great idea needs to recognize that they have two options: they have all of the idea with no money to develop it, which means they will never make any money and never get rich; or they have the option of going to somebody who has a deep pocket, venture the thing out, share the major risk on the other side and get rich in the process as well.

That attitude needs to develop in Canada. It needs to develop among academicians. It needs to develop with our entrepreneurs. It needs to develop on the part of parents of people who are seeking success in the industrial world.

We need to move into another area as well. We need to get into the area of management. When we get into high tech specialized industries and we need specialized management as well. We need managers who understand science. We need managers who understand technology.

You can be the most brilliant scientist, the most brilliant technologist and understand all the machinations and all the intricate workings of networks and things of that sort, but if you cannot manage people it is no good. It takes a special kind of management skill to do this. We need to do that.

There are two skills I would like to draw to our attention today. The first of these is these people need to learn how to solve problems. That becomes the key. It is not so much are you able to push the button or are you able to program the computer, but rather can you solve a problem. Then you must recognize that you probably cannot do it alone and that your skills need to be combined with those of someone else, a third party and a fourth party, so that the group together forms a team. That team then begins to solve the problem. At different times different members of that team will become leaders. The whole concept of seniority and the other things that are traditional with us will go out the window.

This motion, on the other hand, says no, no, no, do not do that; just create a government program for this industry so that it can be diverted to peacetime operation rather than military operation. No. Government needs to encourage the development of balanced people who can do the kind of management we talked about. We need to give to the individuals who seek this kind of education an opportunity to do that.

Members in the House will remember that we proposed a voucher system of education so that the student, the researcher or the scientist who wants to advance himself becomes a person who selects where, when and into how much detail he will go to get that skill in development. It seems to me that is rather significant. Instead of having the university decide here is your program, here are your answers, come and get them, the student says no, he needs this kind of an answer and asks if they have this kind of expertise. He searches around until he finds it, gives he voucher to the institution and says he wants to do this. The institution benefits, gets the money and has the resources to give this student what he needs.

We need those kinds of things. We need new people, we need investment, we need all those kinds of things. We need to go beyond that as well. We need to develop a sound vehicle for the transfer of technology from the place where the brains are to where it is actually applied in a profitable way. Canada has a gap here. That gap is an inability to adequately, effectively and consistently transfer technology from the research bodies, usually universities and governments, to the development industries in order to provide strategic technologies for manufacturing, service and resource based sectors.

Usually the best way to do that is to collaborate between sectors. The centres of excellence do this to a degree, as does IRAP, but we need to do something a little more advanced than that. We need to support more industry driven networks like Innovation Place in Saskatoon. That is an example of how university, industry and government can collaborate and bring about true advancement in technology and the application of skill and innovation to new ideas.

It is becoming rather clear that some professors, who all want seniority and who all want these great salaries, are having great difficulty getting to the level of income they aspire to. At this particular centre of innovation these professors are driving the best cars around. They are living in the biggest houses. They have the kinds of bank accounts they have always dreamed about. Why? They have the willingness to take their intellectual property and work together with an industrialist or entrepreneur, to work together with certain elements of the government and say that together we can build a whole new way of doing things. They have succeeded in doing that, and congratulations to them.

There is something this government has done that is not too bad. It has financed a study called "The Commercialization of Research in Canada". Get a load of what this report advocates, which is very interesting. I hope the government has the nerve to do this: "Canada's universities should radically improve their intellectual property policies and processes for transferring scientific discoveries to industry or lose eligibility for government research grants". Madam Speaker, have you ever heard of this type of thing before? This is absolutely unbelievable.

The report goes on to state: "The policy should clearly articulate a university stance on the following issues: the responsibility of researchers to identify research results with possible economic or social benefits; electronic publishing; ownership of the intellectual property; a process for reporting and recording the facts of the case; routes and options for the protection of the intellectual property; options for revenue sharing; guidelines for technology transfers and commercialization, especially with Canadian based businesses; and exceptions to the policy in particular cases where a special contract is more desirable with the terms of the policy, such as in contract research, network research, or research involving a prior intellectual property". That is some of the most forward thinking I have heard in a long time.

It goes on: "Failure to develop such policies or to hire a person responsible for identifying and disseminating intellectual property and technology transfer policies to all individual researchers within the university should preclude all of the school's researchers from eligibility for government–industry targeted funding, such as granting council strategic programs".

Is that not a refreshing sound to hear? This would be absolutely amazing. Think of what this would do to the university. This would bring together for once the community and the academician. It would bring together the industrialists and the taxpayers who fund all this stuff in the first place and show how we can build a better Canada. That is the kind of motion we should be debating today, not the kind of motion that is before the House.

They are radical suggestions. Should they happen? Yes, they should happen. The reason they should happen is because Canada is in a globally competitive environment. Competition has become the imperative. It is a sad thing to say that science is not sufficiently recognized in the House. It is high time we recognized the significance of the role science plays in our daily life. We need to become aware that it is not only competition; it is also the role science plays in our economy and in our industry. While that may raise the ire of basic researchers who are afraid of having their work hijacked by economic demands, it must be accepted.

There will be an inevitable division between the traditionalists and the innovators. They will fight with each other. While neither can be excluded, the innovators must receive attention. The marketplace will ultimately decide that. Their time has come. They are the ones who can provide Canada with a foundation of economic independence. They will provide global competitiveness. The innovators are skilled in technology and science. The traditionalists, like all of us, will benefit from the country's wealth. Their task will not be lost; it will be assured. They will have jobs. We cannot let the naysayers turn us away from what is necessary. We must support the innovators, choose the path and move forward in that direction.

These are major new directions for our country. They are not easy to develop. They will not happen overnight. They require co–operation at all levels. I am very encouraged by some of the things that have happened recently. The important thing to recognize is that industry has to get into research. Industry must form consortia to share the costs of research.

I would like to address the comments of the Auditor General of Canada with respect to science and technology in Canada. He had some pretty serious things to say. With respect to some of the comments we should stand back and say wait a minute, is it really that bad? Yes, it is. He suggests that the lack of progress in previous attempts to produce results oriented action plans can be attributed to a lack of overall government–wide leadership, direction and accountability for implementing dramatic changes. That is probably one of the worst indictments anybody could make about the Government of Canada.

Seven billion dollars are spent on research and development in Canada. This country has a debt of $560 billion. We spend $7 billion on research. Not one of those dollars should be taken away. We need to spend that kind of money. In fact we should probably spend more. When the Auditor General of Canada says this money has not been focussed, has been spent in a manner that does not have a general direction, I say shame.

We need a focus. We need direction. We have been waiting for over two years for a policy on science and technology. It is still not here. I hope it will come very soon. We need it desperately. If we are to be an economically viable country, if we are to be competitive globally, we must come to grips with this part of our development.

We must oppose the motion. Instead of doing what the motion proposes, we need to encourage investment. We need to encourage innovation. We need to develop a new attitude toward venture capital. We need to develop specialized management. We need a sound vehicle for technology transfer. We need to recognize the value of collaborative research. Finally, we must take seriously the Auditor General of Canada's caution to get off our butts and get a focus and a direction for the country.

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak to the motion. The concept that the Government of Canada has not been working hard to ensure a strong aerospace industry in Canada is totally false. Canadian involvement in space and in the development of the Canadian space industry has been exemplary. The story of Canadians in space shows clearly that Canadians can solve problems.

In typical Canadian fashion we have been modest in singing the praises of Canada's accomplishments in space. I am here today to ensure that Canadian scientists, Canadian engineers and Canadian entrepreneurs get their full recognition in terms of the marvellous accomplishments they have made and are making in the name of Canada in space.

Canadians are space pioneers. More than 35 years ago Canada launched Alouette. We were the third country in space, a pioneer. It is the same today. Just last month we launched RADARSAT, the world's most sophisticated earth observation satellite. Canada is leading the world.

Last week we saw Major Chris Hadfield onboard NASA's STS–74 shuttle mission to Mir using Canadian technology to help bring together the Russian space station and the U.S. space Atlantis. The two events showcased Canadian technology to the world in an unprecedented way.

I welcome the opportunity to tell Canada's story in space and specifically to underscore today the very important role Quebec has played in this effort. Ours is an increasingly competitive world and governments cannot afford to invest time, effort and money in ventures that do not bring significant gains both to scientific knowledge and to economic and environmental benefits the world over.

Canada's space program is a growth industry, aligned with the new realities of information technology providing us not only wonderful new technology for manipulating in space but new communications technology. Canada is a world leader in this area.

The Canadian space industry provides employment for 4,000 Canadians and pulls in annual revenues of more than $500 million. Over the last decade the average annual rate of growth in the space industry has been 15 per cent, with Quebec a particularly high performer.

[Translation]

Over the past ten years, the space industry in Canada has grown annually by 15 per cent, with Quebec being a particularly strong performer.

[English]

The space program was established to meet Canada's needs in areas vital to our economy: telecommunications, resource management, surveillance and environmental monitoring. Satellite communications has been the way for the auto route of information, the information highway, the 20th century equivalent of the railway providing linkages that help bind the country together from one end to the other.

The Canadian space program is also driven by a desire and a political will to ensure the development of a globally competitive economy. In a fashion, all regions of the country have been able to draw on the government's space effort, to transfer space technology from government laboratories to the private sector and to capitalize on employment and economic activity generated as a result of this visionary program.

• (1305)

The province of Quebec and its aerospace industry have been beneficiaries of the program. The location of the Canadian Space Agency in Saint–Hubert on Montreal's south shore is testimony to the importance of Quebec in this national effort. It underscores Montreal's international role in space, in satellite communication and in the information age.

The space agency has brought several hundred highly educated scientific people to the greater Montreal area and has added to Montreal's position as a centre of high technology. I am particularly heightened by the fact that Quebec has shown considerable leadership in the program, the industries and the people of Quebec. More than $540 million in contracts have been won by Quebec firms since 1988, which is more than 35 per cent of budget of the space program.

Quebec's leadership position in the space sector is further reinforced by strong engineering skills and industrial activities. The RADARSAT satellite was built by the Spar aerospace facility at Sainte–Anne–de–Bellevue, as was MSAT, an advanced telecommunications satellite scheduled to be launched in the first quarter of the next calendar year. Mission control for RADARSAT is located at the space station in Saint–Hubert.

In building the satellite Spar was able to draw on the skills of a pool of highly specialized small and medium size enterprises that provided various components of the RADARSAT satellite. In economic terms some 60 per cent of the RADARSAT program was awarded to Spar and its subcontractors. This is just the beginning of the RADARSAT story.

Presently a study is under way to look at partnership arrangements for the next generation of RADARSAT to ensure commercialization of the RADARSAT system and launch of the second RADARSAT satellite. It is significant that a major Quebec based firm has become involved. I am referring to SNC–Lavalin, a firm that has successfully established itself as a world leader in project management.

Let me take a moment to talk about Canada's RADARSAT satellite. It is a remarkable Canadian achievement to have built and successfully launched a satellite earlier this month. The satellite uses radar to allow continuous monitoring of the earth's surface. Unlike most of the previously launched earth's observation satellites which cannot see through clouds and cannot therefore monitor much of the earth's surface much of the time, RADARSAT can monitor it continuously. By using the radar it can peer through the clouds and have a continuous assessment of the nature, the events and the changes on the surface of the earth.

Not only does Canada's RADARSAT provide a complete and continuous coverage of the earth's surface but it uses an extraordinary technology developed in Canada to provide a remarkably flexible, precise and complete coverage. RADARSAT can provide full coverage of Canada's Arctic area every 24 hours, full coverage of Canada's entire land mass within three days, every three days, and full coverage of the total surface of the world, of our globe, every seven days.

RADARSAT will provide for Canada and for the world a remarkably new tool to monitor crop development, to assess the status of crops, yield, insect infestations and all sorts of other things that may happen to the crops planted and to assess the status of forests, the growth, the harvesting, the regeneration and so forth. It is a wonderful tool with the ability to monitor the world's forests and specifically help Canada better manage its own forests.

It is very important for shipping to know precisely what is happening in terms of ice conditions like those in Hudson Bay or the northern Atlantic. RADARSAT will be able to provide that. The monitoring of water conditions to better control floods during spring runoff not only in Canada but around the world is a wonderful new technology that helps people the world over to live better and have a higher quality of life.

These are but a few of the potential applications of RADARSAT. Thanks to the foresight of our government, Canadian industries now have an extraordinary commercial advantage in RADARSAT. Canadian industry is well positioned to take advantage of the benefits of the new satellite. Canadians have expertise in the technology and are now actively marketing the potential of RADARSAT, its satellite system and its earth monitoring capabilities the world over.

I want to talk for a moment about the space agency in Saint–Hubert, home to Canada's astronauts. Chris Hadfield landed yesterday at the Kennedy Space Centre after a seven–day mission of historical dimensions. Here again Canadian content in a mission characterized by NASA as one of the most technically demanding ever undertaken by the shuttle program was significant owing to the Canadian role, the role of Canadian technology and Canadian astronaut Chris Hadfield, in bringing together the United States and Russia, the world's two space superpowers, in a successful partnership in space.

Marc Garneau, the first Canadian in space, paved the way for future Canadian flights on the shuttle. He will once again be space bound next year. Julie Payette is continuing her training and we expect this will lead to a flight opportunity in the years to come.

Canadian astronauts provide a wonderful role model for young Canadians. They are very important in a world where such role models are too infrequent. It is particularly significant as we try to promote the development of the science culture to have role models like Chris Hadfield, Marc Garneau and Julie Payette.

On behalf of the Government of Canada, the hon. Minister of Industry and I unveiled the second long term space plan in June 1994. We reconfirmed that Canada would be a significant contributor in space in the future. We reconfirmed that Canada would make a significant contribution to the international space station program, the largest scientific endeavour ever undertaken in the history of the world.

The program will break new ground in fields as diverse as biotechnology, physiology, material science and fluid physics, a new era in understanding space medicine, to name just a few. Canada will provide the technology that will make possible the assembly and maintenance of the world's science and technology institute in space. The operations of the Canadian contribution, the mobile servicing system, a leading edge robotics system, will be located in the space agency's facility in Saint–Hubert. Astronauts and space station operators from around the world will come to Saint–Hubert to train and to become knowledgeable about this very sophisticated and, one could say, intelligent robotic system.

I am proud to have been associated with the Canadian space program.

[Translation]

I am very proud to be associated with the Canadian space program.

• (1315)

[English]

Since we have become the government we have been privileged to participate in and lead many initiatives to ensure the continued prosperity of Canada and the Canadian Space Agency, to ensure the continuity of our Canadian astronaut program, to ensure a continued place for Canada in space, in new technology, in communications. Canadians are justifiably proud of our accomplishments. We should all be pleased with the social and economic benefits that come from this national effort. In today's information economy we are indeed fortunate that Canada has such a strong space program.

In closing, let me emphasize once more the important role and the foresight our government has played in leading the Canadian space effort. It has mobilized an effort that will transfer increasingly some extraordinary technology to Canadian industry and provide at the same time the technology that will help us monitor and improve the global environment.

[Translation]

This is our future, this is Quebec's future, this is Canada's future.

[English]

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I will be sharing my time with the member for Kootenay East. I hope my voice will hang in there. If you see my lips moving and no sound, you will know it has disappeared.

Today's topic is a rather interesting one. At this time I could see a lot better wording than might be part of this question. We should start off by saying as the last member has, how proud we are of our aerospace industry and of our astronauts. Certainly every time we hear the Canadarm mentioned, all of us feel proud of what we have accomplished. Our future is in the area of technology and that is certainly something all Canadians know and are proud of.

However, when we talk about this motion, about Canadian content and about the protection of some industries over others, I cannot help but go back a little bit in history. I cannot help but go back a little bit in terms of what some of the other members are saying.

I cannot help but go back to the F–18 contract in Winnipeg. Obviously the lowest bid was there and the recommendations were there. The qualifications for doing the job were there. Certainly the people of Manitoba, the people of the west do not forget the party politics that were played in the decision to move the F–18 contract to Montreal. Now we hear the other side of that. Now we hear the fears that we are going to lose this industry for Quebec.

All of us are looking for a free enterprise system in which all parts of Canada are treated equally, where one part does not have favoured status over the other, where we stop playing party politics and we start getting down to what is good for Canada. That should be the emphasis instead of what we are talking about today.

We also have to look at the criteria when we look at defence contracts. Obviously we want to have Canadian content, but not Canadian content if it is not competitive. If it is not competitive, it better get competitive if that industry is going to survive. If it has to be subsidized and protected, then it is obviously very short term and very short sighted planning by that company and by this government.

We also must be aware of globalization and what that means. We are now in a global market. We now have NAFTA and the World Trade Organization. We cannot talk about protecting industry and protecting the inefficiencies of the past.

We have to talk about being competitive in the world. We have the training. We have the technology. We have the people. Let us not hide behind government, behind bureaucracy, or behind rules that set up how we are going to give contracts. Let us do it because we are the best. Let us do it because we are the most competitive and thus we will market our products around the world. That is what globalization and free trade means. It is what the World Trade Organization will mean in 10 years. Canada can do very well in that field. So, let us not be embarrassed and shy and not be out front. Let us not hide behind the past.

• (1320)

We could also be talking about the Department of National Defence today. We all know that it desperately needs new equipment. All of us know of the helicopters. My hon. seatmate here talked about helicopters falling out of the sky. Certainly the search and rescue people need that equipment, but let us have a game plan. DND must have a real game plan, what it needs and what it is going to do. It seems as though we get knee–jerk announcements. We have heard announcements about a $600 million expenditure for helicopters, but the minister does not know for how many. I could not believe what I heard in that announcement.

We obviously need all terrain vehicles. It was shameful what our troops used in the former Yugoslavia. With regard to armaments, we must keep modern and up to date and have the best for Canadians.

Looking at the budgets, we can see that for years we have been cutting budgets and we have increased the requirement for our armed forces. This has done nothing except to cause morale problems and equipment problems in the military.

We need to become diligent shoppers. That does not necessarily mean we have to buy in Canada. Remember, we must be competitive.

This is a very timely topic today. I would also like to know what provisions we have in place to prevent the patronage of the past which was so common. Everybody knew about it and it seems to have carried on into the present government. We need to make sure there are guidelines in place so that this does not happen again. It does not give politicians a good name and it certainly does not give Canadians a good name when this sort of thing takes place. We should not be politicians for sale.

We also have to ask questions about DND and the seemingly constant turmoil. It appears as though it is constantly having problems. No sooner does one crisis go away than a new one surfaces. We have to ask what it is doing to get its act together. That could easily be a topic for today.

I refer to the former deputy minister of DND. I wonder why approximately a year ago he quickly disappeared from the scene to go to the United Nations as if to get him out of town.

What about the EH–101s? How much did it cost to pay those off?

The hon. member across the way mentioned that we should be very proud of our students and graduates who are filling technical jobs. I am very proud of them but I am concerned because at the University of Waterloo for example, 91 per cent of graduates in the electronics area are going to the U.S. for jobs. I am really concerned about that. I am concerned that we spent that money on training. That is a costly resource and we are losing them because they cannot get a job in Canada. We must work on that because they are the best.

We have to talk about peacekeeping as well when we talk about armaments and DND. We need to know what to expect from our military. We need to have that game plan before we actually start talking about and worrying about the content of the equipment we are buying. We need to discuss it in Parliament. We need to discuss what those objectives and criteria are. We cannot keep doing things on a knee–jerk basis. We cannot do things where we have parliamentary debate and the decision has already been announced outside the House. We cannot keep doing that.

• (1325)

We need to do something to restore public confidence as well. There is a great pride in our Canadian peacekeepers. There is a great pride in what we have, but when we send them under-equipped and poorly controlled we have problems. We know what that has done to our reputation. We can talk about Somalia; we can talk about Rwanda; we can talk about the former Yugoslavia. All of those are problems which have hurt our reputation. We should be concerned about that.

We need to set up criteria. We cannot go every place. We are not equipped to do that. We do not have the equipment. We know that we must ask about the cost, not that cost is more important than lives, but that is the reality. We cannot go everywhere. We can only afford so much and we have to ask those questions.

In looking at these criteria we do need new equipment. We need to raise morale. We need efficiency. We need to get rid of the bureaucracy that seems to be causing all the problems.

In closing, rather than whining about competition and Canadian content, we should get competitive. We should worry about our place in the marketplace. We should demand a fair and open bidding system. We should get rid of the politics, the patronage and the old line political games that so often go on. That will do more.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the comments made by the member opposite.

I commend the member for his deep interest in the Canadian Armed Forces but at some point we have to fish or cut bait. I am not exactly sure of the position of the Reform Party with respect to procurement policy for the Canadian Armed Forces. I have listened many times and I have heard the Reform Party talk about the wholesale cutting of departments, that what the government has to do first and foremost is to tame that debt and deficit monster. That means wholesale cuts across the board to departmental expenditures.

The member opposite knows full well that out of the non–statutory expenditures of this government, the previous government and the government before it, one of the largest envelopes of non–statutory expenditures is in national defence. What I am trying to ascertain from the member's comments is whether he agrees there should be new expenditures in national defence. If that is the case it may go contrary to what his party said particularly during the last election about going in and cutting those departments.

Is the member in favour or not in favour of the EH–101 contract and its process? Does the member believe and advocate that the government of the day go forward with further expenditures in defence procurement? In particular, I am speaking about the replacement program for the Sea King helicopters. The member mentioned quite correctly that some of the search and rescue and Sea King helicopters have had some difficulty because of their age. Unfortunately there has even been loss of life as some of those helicopters have gone down. I am not necessarily convinced it was because of the age of the helicopters.

I want to seek something clear and unequivocal from the member. Is he in favour of further defence procurement spending, yes or no? If the answer is yes, does he wish to see this government accelerate its procurement policy with respect to new helicopters? Would he and his party support the government spending billions of dollars for the replacement of the Sea King helicopters?

The hon. member talked a great deal about open procurement policies. What he said during his comments was that far too often these things are knee–jerk. Is the member not aware that a House of Commons committee travelled and came up with a report dealing with the future of the Canadian Armed Forces? In response to that report the government came out with the defence white paper which clearly outlines the government's policies with respect to national defence. Last, he says that before these big procurements are finalized they should be debated in the House. Is he an advocate that House time should be spent debating each and every procurement contract of the Government of Canada?

• (1330)

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I am not sure I will get all 20 questions answered, but I will make an attempt.

We are saying that national defence must have better equipment. However before it gets better equipment, we have to target what we are going to do. We have to establish the criteria and then we have to do it.

He talks about the report that was presented. I was on the foreign affairs part of the committee and there was communication between the two committees. The point is that the recommendations were to cut from the top. That has not been done.

If cuts are made at the top that money will be available for the bottom. Cuts should not be across the board but certain things should be targeted. Some things are gone 100 per cent, other things will increase. The sort of slash and burn tactic that the member has in mind is totally not what Reform members have in mind because we will target. We will set our criteria and then we will have something that is efficient. We will apply the same efficiencies that business applies, which government has totally ignored for all these years.

It is a matter of going after the top. Government does not seem to be able to do that. It is too easy to cut from the bottom up.

As for the EH–101s, that should have been looked at very carefully. I am sure the government did, but did it know of the potential costs of the cancellation? Did it really look at all of that?

From what experts say the EH–101 probably was not the helicopter that was needed. What the minister is proposing is probably a good idea, but he has to have his act together. How much does it cost? How many are being bought? How many are needed? That is what has to happen.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is very interesting that we meet here today to discuss a Bloc Quebecois supply motion which attempts to get even more Canadian dollars to spend in Montreal.

On the basis of the number of dollars that have been sent to the province of Quebec from the so–called have provinces, Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario, one would think there would already have been a recognition of the tremendous amount of support there has been on the part of all Canadian taxpayers to the idea of the old line parties of attempting to buy the loyalty of the people, and I think of them as being in the minority in the province of Quebec, who would see Quebec secede from Canada.

It is also interesting that on this particular day we also note that the leader of the Bloc Quebecois has decided that he is going to continue in the House of Commons as Her Majesty's official loyal opposition, working his attempt to break up Canada, all the while waiting to become the premier of the province of Quebec.

I seriously doubt the sincerity of the motion being brought forward by the Bloc Quebecois. Indeed, in its own way it is rather mischievous.

Furthermore, after taking a look at the issue of whether there should be a Canadian content to our military procurements, it strikes me that it runs a very strong parallel to the attitude of this old line government, the Liberals and their predecessors, the Conservatives, relative to regional economic development grants. It falls into exactly the same category.

There seems to be a will on the part of the old line parties to create a national level playing field. In a matter of about 25 minutes, the auditor general's report on regional development grants will be released. It will be very interesting to be able to focus on a dispassionate review of how these grants have worked and whether a national level playing field has been created.

• (1335)

With respect to the issue of taking military product off the shelf, there is an over–arching issue. The over–arching issue is that Canada, at the federal level, is not taking into account the non–funded liability of the Canada pension plan, which is already over half a trillion dollars in debt. It is approximately $550 billion to $560 billion in debt. Much to the amazement of people when they actually take the time to think about it, the government is borrowing about $100 million every day to pay the interest on the money which has been borrowed. Therefore, when talking about necessary military equipment procurement, if there is a greater value for Canada's tax dollars, that must be paramount in the decision making process.

The idea of being able to intervene in the Montreal economy, or for that matter to intervene in the Canadian economy, is appealing. It certainly has been shown to have a tremendous appeal to members of the old line political parties. The $100 million which is borrowed daily will destroy our ability to fund health care, post–secondary education and the Canada assistance plan. Even old age security is under threat as a direct result of the desire of the government and its bedfellows, the Conservatives, to intervene in the economy.

If an off the shelf policy for these procurements can be created and achieve the savings which Canadians are looking for, then the question is: What would that do to business in Canada?

As a proud Canadian I am constantly impressed with our ability to compete. In the world there is no nation of people who are better able to adapt and compete. Canadians do not need this kind of over–arching government intervention to help competitiveness.

It also drives home the issue with which we were faced during the latter days of the referendum. I recall being told that the majority of Canada's CF–18s were at Bagotville, Quebec. I also recall being told that the vast majority of armaments, that is, the munitions for the Canadian Armed Forces, are in the east end of Montreal. When the Bloc defence critic, on the letterhead of the leader of the Bloc Quebecois, advised people in the Canadian army to desert and join the new Quebec army, I really have to wonder about the sincerity and the depth of thought which has been given to this issue by the Bloc Quebecois. Why in the world would we permit ourselves to fall into the situation in which there is even more investment in that field in Montreal when the people who are proposing this legislation are talking about separating Quebec from Canada?

The defence critic, I presume, is shepherding this motion through the Chamber on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois. His comments, in my judgment, were nothing short of sedition. You cannot be telling people in the Canadian army to desert. That is absolutely and totally unacceptable. I understand that a legal action has been commenced. I rather hope it has some success.

• (1340)

It is just about time to call a spade a spade. If the Bloc Quebecois was serious about this motion, if it really wanted to see Canadian procurement and if it is talking about taking Quebec out of Canada, how in the world can it not be seen as being totally contradictory? As a matter of fact, the two things are absolutely diametrically opposed to each other. They simply do not fit. In all good conscience, how could any Canadian go along with this motion?

To get back to the smaller issue of procurement, because truly the larger issue is that of the Bloc attempting to smash Canada, Canadians, because of the size of the debt, must demand value for their tax dollar. This motion simply would not achieve that.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I want to put a question to the member for Kootenay East. It has to do with the issue of Canadian content.

The greatest dollar value of exports, not just in terms of dollar value but number of jobs created in the country today in the manufacturing sector, is the automotive industry. The automotive sector represents the greatest number of jobs and exports. The foundation that has generated that reality today started when the auto pact was negotiated with the United States of America.

In that auto pact, percentages of Canadian content were negotiated. As the automotive industry was developed, the taxpayers invested in the foundation stages hundreds of millions of dollars in new equipment, in research and in the capacity to manufacture a world class, automotive, technology manufacturing capability.

When we have such a model of proven success in job creation in a sector that is bringing literally billions of dollars to the treasury right now when it is looked at in its totality, why should we not do a careful analysis to see if we could not create the same opportunity in the aerospace sector?

I realize the free trade agreement states that Canadian content can be dictated no longer. I opposed the free trade agreement which was one of the reasons why I opposed it. I felt it took a piece of our industrial policy making capability away from us. However, why would we not take a look at the aerospace industry in the same light as the automotive industry?

Mr. Abbott: Madam Speaker, I find that question to be very reasonable. There is a very significant difference between myself and the other member because I look at the aerospace sector and the procurement of any of these armaments, be they tanks or helicopters, as being dollars spent by Canadian taxpayers, whereas the procurement of an automobile is dollars spent by a consumer.

• (1345)

I also contest and simply do not accept the concept that Canadians directly invested dollars in General Motors or the Ford plant. These are multinational corporations that have their own investers and their own ability to borrow. While from time to time they have depended on ill–thought programs the various old line governments have come forward with, the reality is the dollars that are being invested are not only being invested by the multinational corporations but are being raised by multinational corporations.

I have a very significant difference of opinion with the other member. To underline the major difference I just spoke about, the dollars being spent on the procurement of equipment for our armed forces are Canadian taxpayers' dollars. The dollars being spent for the procurement of an automobile are being spent by the consumer.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Barely a minute remains. The hon. member for Charlesbourg will allow for an answer.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would just like to say to the representative of the third party that, in his list of figures and in his comments, when he talks of surplus military equipment in Quebec, he is completely forgetting to mention the navy.

There is nothing in Quebec to do with the navy. It is to be found in the west and in the maritimes. As far as the F–18s are concerned, most of them are not in Quebec. He should go over his figures and inform himself better. As regards the awarding of contracts, I might propose this list here of the latest contracts worth more than $3 billion, awarded to Ontario without call for tender. In the west, the Western Star was obliged to accord part of this contract to Quebec—6.5 per cent. In another contract, there was no mention of Quebec at all.

All of this to say that often things are interpreted according to the figures or information one has available. I would simply like to point out to the member from the third party that, if he wants more specific information in order to have a better understanding of Quebec and its representatives, I would be pleased to provide it, because, unfortunately, I have run out of time.

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I will share my time with the hon. member for—

[English]

Mr. Abbott: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I believe I was asked a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Sorry, the time has expired. I asked him to take 30 seconds. Please go ahead very briefly.

Mr. Abbott: Madam Speaker, I would suspect that the member, along with many of the old line parties, sees the military as a make work project. We do not.

Second, I was not referring to surplus purchases. What I was referring to was that there was current active military equipment based in Quebec that under the Bloc Quebecois, under the separatists, would have ended up, as far as they were concerned, under their control in the event the vote had gone the other way. I do not think Canadians see that as being rational or reasonable.

[Translation]

Mr. Discepola: Madam Speaker, I will be sharing my time with my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

I am very pleased to take part in this debate, because I finally have the opportunity to set the record straight.

The Canadian space program, which has been running for 35 years already, has allowed Canada to carve out an enviable position among developed countries. Canadians have reaped benefits from it that have improved their quality of life, if only in terms of satellite communications.

It is with much pride that I point out the excellent work of the Canadian Space Agency, one of the most prestigious federal institutions which now has its headquarters firmly established in Saint–Hubert, near Montreal.

• (1350)

As a member of the government, I am proud to be associated with this success and to have been part of the agency's accomplishments since my arrival in the House.

The construction of its headquarters in Saint–Hubert, an investment of almost $80 million, has created, either directly or indirectly, almost 1,000 person–years. According to studies that were done to quantify the economic spinoffs of having the agency in Saint–Hubert, it is estimated that it has injected about $75 million into the Quebec economy annually, both in terms of salaries and the purchase of products and services.

These are the figures, but one of the main economic benefits of having the agency in Quebec is its impact on that province's industrial base. Here are some concrete examples: the development of new cutting–edge technologies in strategic sectors such as communications and data processing software; the international reputation consolidating Montreal's status as a global player; and the establishment in Saint–Hubert of other space facilities such as the RADARSAT ground control station, the control centre for the mobile servicing system and the astronaut and international space station operator training system.

One of the main social advantages is the training of the hundred or so students who come every year to specialize in high–tech areas.

Since 1988, Quebec has received over 35 per cent of the total budget of the Canadian space program, which means that $540 million worth of contracts are awarded to Quebec–based companies. Quebecers are among the main beneficiaries of the Canadian space program.

Spar Aerospace alone, which is located in Sainte–Anne–de–Bellevue in my riding, has received a significant portion of the contracts for the production of MSAT and RADARSAT satellites, which testifies to the excellence of Quebec engineers. RADARSAT, which was launched into orbit on November 4, is the result of more than 15 years of co–operation and political will. RADARSAT also ushers in a new global industry. The resulting global trade will contribute to the development of a new natural resources management and environmental monitoring business. And it is mainly in Quebec that this great project has materialized.

And that is not all. At present, a feasibility study is under way to gather all that is required to implement Phase II of RADARSAT. But what must be pointed out here is the participation of a new player, namely SNC–Lavalin, whose reputation as the world leader in large scale project management is firmly established.

The Canadian Space Program also promoted the diversification of several Quebec businesses, which have gained a world–wide reputation of excellence. Take these four for example: CAE Electronics, of Ville–Saint–Laurent, with contracts totalling $90 million; MPB Technologies, of Montreal, whose contracts are worth in excess of $16 million; FRE Composites, of Saint–André, with a total contract worth of $11 million; and BONEM, of Quebec City, with contracts totalling $4 million.

The need to adjust to new realities brought about by market globalization and by the growing importance of a knowledge–based economy represents a major challenge. In this context, it is important that we be able to define new partnerships between teaching institutions and industry. Like the other provinces, Quebec has displayed impeccable leadership. Fifteen years ago, there were no university programs to prepare for the future in high–technology sectors. Through an initiative of the Centre d'adaptation de la main–d'oeuvre aérospatiale du Québec, post–graduate programs meeting international standards were developed.

• (1355)

Today, a particularly innovative university–industry partnership has resulted in a master's degree in aerospace engineering being offered in five Quebec universities. This training strategy is proving to be very effective in enabling Quebec to keep playing a lead role in the space industry.

To invest in the space industry is to invest in our children. This vision born 35 years ago has not died; it keeps making Quebecers and all Canadians prouder and prouder.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a short question. Since it is almost two o'clock, I would prefer to begin my remarks after question period.

I would like to build on the member for Vaudreuil's point. He alluded to the notion of creating this infrastructure, which ultimately leads to exports. This is the point I was trying to make earlier to the member for Kootenay East when I asked the member of the Reform Party if he did not see the investment that was made in the automotive industry from the auto pact until the free trade agreement. Under the free trade agreement we do not have the same options of opportunity to invest in that industry, but thank goodness it has a great foundation now: the auto pact leads, in terms of job creation and exports, any sector in our country.

The point I was trying to make to the Reform Party is this infrastructure we have invested in within the province of Quebec in the aerospace industry now leads to tremendous exports not only in terms of military hardware, helicopters, et cetera, but also aircraft like the Canadair commuter jet, which is now being exported all over the world, creating jobs not only within the province of Quebec but across the country.

Could the member for Vaudreuil confirm for the House that the investments the Liberal government has made in the aerospace industry are now leading to all kinds of exports around the world, which ultimately means jobs for Canadians?

Mr. Discepola: Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, I am proud that the commitment by our government has always been to promote the industry and sustain the industry.

I am hearing from the industry that it is not after handouts. It really wants to be on a level playing field on an international scale. If we take a look at the successes in the aerospace industry, a major beneficiary of which is the region of Montreal, we would not have to look very closely to see the success of Canadair, the success of SNC–Lavalin, Bombardier, and recently the joint partnership that Pratt & Whitney announced with Russia.

If we are to allow this industry to promote itself and to grow, we have to give it the level playing field and the tools necessary for it to compete on a world scale.

REPORT OF THE AUDITOR GENERAL OF CANADA

The Speaker: Colleagues, I have the honour to lay upon the table the report of the Auditor General of Canada to the House of Commons, volume 3, dated November 1995.

[Translation]

I should remind the hon. members that, pursuant to Standing Order 108(3)(d), this document is deemed permanently referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

As it is two o'clock, we will now proceed to Statements by Members.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL INSTITUTE FOR THE BLIND

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this year the Canadian National Institute for the Blind dedicated its annual review to the more than 20,000 people from across Canada who work as CNIB volunteers.

Volunteers work at all levels of the organization, from national policy development to fundraising to the support of core services. They enable the CNIB to do much more than would otherwise be possible, transforming each $5 donation into an estimated $100 of impact for clients.

The CNIB values its volunteers because the imagination, experience, purpose and insight they willingly provide would be difficult to buy at any price. Without volunteers its work would be unthinkable.

I am sure all members join me in recognizing and thanking those Canadians who give so generously of their time and energy in support of the CNIB.

BEAVER RIVER

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last week I drove 3,300 kilometres around Beaver River conducting my fall tour. I talked to hundreds of people at town hall meetings, school classrooms and in my office.

People are concerned about the government's bills on MP pensions, employment equity, gun control and so on. The thing they asked more questions about rather than anything else was the referendum. Everybody in the meeting asked now what.

This morning we find out that now what means another referendum. People at home recognize the distinctiveness of Quebec with regard to language, culture and civil law. Because the term distinct society is undefined they think it would be a lawyer's delight to see it enshrined in the Constitution as it would be wide open to interpretation. I even had a Liberal supporter ask me what part of no the Liberals did not understand in the Charlottetown accord.

We must move forward to the new Canada, not backward to failed ideas and plans. They did not work. They are not working and will not work. Let us scrap the unity committee of politicians and let the people speak.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, overall reductions to benefits paid to recipients of unemployment insurance are adding to the welfare rolls of many provinces including Saskatchewan.

The cumulative impact of the cuts to the unemployment insurance program has been the addition of over 15,000 persons to the Saskatchewan assistance plan caseload at a cost of $63 million. In addition to the UI reductions, the Liberal government transferred responsibility for providing assistance to off reserve status Indians, adding another 10,000 people to the welfare roles at a cost of $38 million. In Saskatchewan, UI payments decreased by over 25 per cent from $410 million in 1992–93 to $300 million in 1994–95.

The Liberal government was elected on a platform of providing jobs. Instead it has thrown more workers on to welfare roles in Saskatchewan than ever before, adding to the burden of Saskatchewan taxpayers.

Canadians get angry when the unemployed are forced to live on welfare while in Ottawa a Liberal MP receives a free new suit simply for getting off his chair.

SPACE PROGRAM

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, congratulations to Chris Hadfield on his voyage in space and best wishes to members of his family in Peterborough riding: son Kyle at school in Lakefield, sister Pat Bowlar in Norwood and Aunt Caroline Kitchen in Peterborough.

A Canadian has now operated our Canadarm in space and it will be the prototype for a giant space crane. Next year Marc Garneau, one of our most distinguished astronauts, will be returning to space. He will be followed by yet another Canadian astronaut: three Canadians in space within a year and a half.

The astronaut program is one of the most successful features of the Canadian Space Agency which is based in Montreal but which has a nationwide science and technology network. Our astronauts have inspired students from kindergarten to Ph.D. III. They have had a healthy effect on all science and technology in Canada.

Canada is united in its space efforts. Let us remain united on this blessed portion of the earth's surface.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, ten years ago, Ontario recognized French as one of its two official languages before the courts. The province has since passed several provisions which have made it increasingly bilingual in the judicial field. In fact, a case can now be heard in French at any level of the provincial legal system, including that of the appeal court.

The Association des juristes d'expression française, which held its convention in Ottawa this past weekend, has always been at the forefront of the movement to improve our bilingual judicial system. This is a complex and difficult task, and I want to congratulate the association for its dedication and its determination in overcoming any obstacle to that very important goal.

The program benefits all Ontarians. It also shows that, in North America, the French language and culture have a much better chance of being preserved, and even expanding, in a bilingual Canada than in separate states.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the senators will decide tomorrow if they will oppose the House of Commons firearms bill. Some of us may be in favour of Bill C–68, some of us may be against certain provisions, but all members of Parliament would agree that the voice of the people of Quebec and of Canada has been heard on this issue, in this House.

The debates lasted a long time and many witnesses came to express their concerns. The federal government rejected most of the amendments put forward by the witnesses who appeared before the committee, and the Liberal members rejected the amendments proposed by the official opposition members.

However, Bill C–68 concerning firearms was passed by hon. members who were democratically elected by their constituents. Respect for our democratic values should, of itself, prevent senators from opposing this legislation. Whether they are Liberal or Conservative, these senators do not speak for the people, they only speak for themselves.

NATIONAL MEDICARE DAY

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a recent poll in the Medical Post says that 58 per cent of consumers and 76 per cent of physicians expect Canada's system of health care to get worse in the next 10 years. To express the public's concern the Canadian health care coalition has declared today, November 21, National Medicare Day.

In support I must question the mixed up priorities of a government that maintains grants to businesses and industry, grants to special interest groups, grants for multiculturalism and official bilingualism and the latest list of waste and mismanagement in today's report of the auditor general but cuts grants to the provinces for medicare.

Recently the North Okanagan Labour Council brought the public's concern about medicare to the attention of the city of Vernon, the city of Kelowna, the district of Lake Country and the north and central Okanagan regional districts.

I salute all these groups for expressing their strong support for Canada's system of publicly funded health care.

BANKING

Ms. Bonnie Brown (Oakville—Milton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I commend Canada's major banks for their corporate citizenship in establishing a banking industry ombudsman. This will strengthen procedures for handling complaints from small business when the operation begins on April 1, 1996. Certainly the framework is welcome news to the small business community that has often voiced its frustration in dealing with lending institutions.

In addition they have announced the appointment of their own internal ombudsman. I know that Mr. Al Horton who resides in my riding has accepted the challenge involved in becoming the first ombudsman for the Bank of Montreal.

Canadians should know that expenses to operate the system will be borne by the banks and not by the taxpayers. The new framework will benefit the small business community, a sector that is vital to the Canadian economy and to job creation in Canada.

ICELANDAIR

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, November 10, I was pleased to join provincial counterparts, Iceland Ambassador Einar Benediktsson and Icelandair representatives in welcoming Icelandair to Halifax International Airport in Nova Scotia.

Icelandair is a 60–year old privately run airline. It is no mere beginner. It carries 1.2 million passengers every year. Icelandair will begin scheduled service to Halifax on May 14 next year. It will go from Halifax International Airport to some 20 destinations in Europe through Reykajavik. We in Halifax West and in Nova Scotia look forward to the tremendous potential this brings for tourism in Nova Scotia.

Icelandair recently held a Reykjavik to Halifax flight for Scandanavian tour operators, an important first step for this exciting tourism opportunity. Icelandair knows what more and more companies are coming to realize, that metropolitan Halifax and the province of Nova Scotia are good places to do business.

BRAIN TUMOUR FOUNDATION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, brain tumour month is in October of each year. It has come and gone, but the challenge to assist those afflicted remains with us.

Over 10,000 Canadians are diagnosed each year with a brain tumour. A cause or cure has yet to be found for this devastating disease. The key to successful treatment of a tumour is early diagnosis which is only possible if people become aware of the signs and symptoms of the tumour. Researchers are constantly opening new doors to the possible causes.

The mission statement of the Brain Tumour Foundation of Canada is to fund brain tumour research, provide patient and family support services and educate the public. The foundation needs our support.

STRIKEBREAKERS

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after voting in favour of an antiscab bill brought forward by the Bloc Quebecois in 1990, the Liberal Party is about to make an about–turn by refusing today to support the bill that I introduced in this House in order to prohibit the use of scabs during labour disputes.

Again, the federal government is giving in to Ontario and ignoring Quebec's legitimate demands. Need I remind members that the Ontario government has just abolished its antiscab legislation which protected workers in that province?

What the Liberal Party is about to do is totally outrageous. We hope that, when Liberal members rise in the House to defeat the bill this afternoon, they will realize that they are breaking promises they made to workers in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, prairie farmers and western Canadians were shocked and outraged to hear of the ludicrous benefits lavished on Canadian Wheat Board commissioners. For the last 15 years, wheat board commissioners have set their own perks and privileges that included eight weeks of vacation per year and severance packages of up to $290,000.

At last we have seen the reason for closed doors and secrecy at the wheat board. Since they are not accountable to anyone they have been able to fill their pockets at will. Shame on the Liberal government for not fully correcting an injustice by removing these benefits retroactively.

This is a damning reminder of the gold plated MP pension plan all over again, farm bankruptcies and fat cat wheat board commissioners. It is a prime example of the Liberal red book promise of equality.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again the Reform Party has insulted the intelligence of the people of Prince Edward Island and the rest of Atlantic Canada. The statement yesterday by the member for Vegreville oozed with contempt not only for local politicians but for the people themselves.

This patronizing, condescending attitude comes from a party whose solution for the problems of Atlantic Canada is simply to move people out. It comes from a party which opposes any form of regional development funding for Atlantic Canada. It comes from a party which espouses the belief that the only Canadians who deserve full health care are those who can afford it. It comes from a party which would replace the development of self–reliance in strong communities by an individually oriented survival of the fittest type society.

Perhaps most significant of all, it comes from a party that received less than 1 per cent of the popular vote in P.E.I. in the last federal election and will receive less in the next federal election.

LEADER OF THE BLOC QUEBECOIS

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this morning, the Bloc Quebecois members were the first to learn, directly from their leader, that he had decided to run for office as successor to Jacques Parizeau as leader of the Parti Quebecois. In our hearts, sadness was followed by pride and confidence that this extraordinary man will help the Quebec people achieve their legitimate ambitions with respect to their destiny.

We are all aware of the great qualities of this man and we know he will muster the creativity and the energies of all the people, in order to meet the many challenges that we, Quebecers, will have to face.

We are proud of the work we did with him. His decision sets a milestone in our common struggle for Quebec because our leader and the Bloc Quebecois is engaged in the same struggle, the struggle of the Quebec people.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, lately Reform Party members have been spending a lot of time talking about Atlantic Canada. They have made a couple of trips east and now claim to be instant experts on our region.

For example, these Reform experts believe that the Atlantic fishery is dead, even though it was worth over $1 billion last year; that we should have been softer on foreign overfishing, and that the federal government should get out of Hibernia, despite the fact that it creates thousands of jobs and means millions of dollars to the Newfoundland economy.

• (1415)

As a Newfoundlander born and raised, who lives and pays taxes in St. John's East, I would like to tell the third party what we do not want. We do not want the Reform slash and burn agenda, which includes massive cuts to UI, health, and regional development. We do not want the Reform plan for a flat tax, which would guarantee that poor people are taxed at the same rate as the rich.

It is clear that Reform's ignorance is far greater than its knowledge of Atlantic Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux–Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for regional development in Quebec.

Yesterday, it was announced that CP Rail's head office in Montreal will be closed and relocated to Calgary, leading to the loss of 710 jobs in Montreal. CP Rail justifies its decision by saying that an increasingly large portion of its activity is centred in the western provinces. Ottawa's policies have always supported western railway development at great cost, while encouraging rail cutbacks in the east.

Does the minister acknowledge that CP Rail's move to the west is the result of the discriminatory policies that have always been practiced by the federal government with respect to rail transportation?

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is always regrettable when there are layoffs in any sector. I know how difficult job losses are for any community. However, this was a decision made by a private corporation whose board of directors had to take into account their competitive situation not only in Canada but in North America.

This decision made by CP affects a number of people across the country, including a 28 per cent change in Toronto, a 20 per cent change in Vancouver and a change in Montreal.

On the broader question of what this government is doing to ensure that we have a competitive, affordable transportation system in this country, the member will know because he is a member of the Standing Committee on Transport, that we are determined to ensure that we have a competitive, affordable railroad industry so that our shippers and our customers can be well served and we can continue to create jobs in the export market.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, be that as it may, given the extremely negative impact of the federal government's discriminatory policies on Montreal, what does the minister responsible for regional development plan to do to compensate for the loss of 710 jobs as a result of the CP Rail move to Calgary?

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that the eastern headquarters of CP's operations will continue in Montreal. Over 2,500 good quality jobs for CP will remain in Montreal.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Montreal has the highest number of poor families in Canada, and one of the highest rates of unemployment.

What hope do Montrealers have left, in the wake of the problems created wholly by the federal government which lead to unemployment, job loss and poverty in this major Quebec centre?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Liberal): Mr. Speaker, if one looks at the assistance to small and medium business provided by this government, if one looks at the federal policy on the pharmaceutical industry, if one looks at the assistance to the aeronautical industry located in Montreal, it is very clear that the federal government has the well-being of Montrealers at heart.

Now the time has come to address the economic agenda and drop the political agenda of the Bloc and the PQ.

• (1420)

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after thousands of jobs were lost as a result of a decision by CN to streamline its operations, a decision that severely affected Montreal, this city now faces a decision by CP Rail to move its headquarters.

Since the federal government is responsible for a shift in railway operations towards Western Canada and it has done nothing to contain the negative impact of downsizing by CN and the CP headquarters move, what excuse does the minister responsible for regional development have for failing to deal with the major economic problems that have affected Montreal in the past two years?

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am happy the member has just mentioned CN because this government has privatized CN, the largest share issue in Canadian history and it has gone extremely well. Over $2.2 billion will come back to this government and this country by virtue of CN's privatization.

Second, it should be noted that Bill C-101 builds on creating opportunities for the creation of short line railroads in Quebec and throughout the country, creating jobs, creating businesses. That is what the government is committed to doing, creating jobs and opportunities across the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the inference is that a member from Ontario is looking after regional development in Quebec.

This government claims to take care of the real problems of Canadians. Well, the minister responsible for regional development identified Montreal's real problems back in June 1992. He then referred to innovative policies for defence conversion and a general upgrading of the industrial infrastructure.

Since he has done nothing to stop unemployment in Montreal and has in fact done the exact opposite, why does he not implement a program for the economic renewal of Montreal, as he suggested in 1992?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the past year 66,000 new jobs were created in Quebec. These new jobs were created thanks to this government's policies.

The hon. member referred to the national infrastructures program. This program has helped to create hundreds and thousands of jobs in Quebec. The Bank of Canada's monetary policy has helped to bring interest rates down. The Canadian government's tax policy has helped to reduce the deficit—

meanwhile, the Quebec government did nothing—which has given Quebecers something to look forward to. I am very proud of our record.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has decided to depart this chamber for Quebec City. He is going to prepare for one last attempt to take Quebec out of the federation.

The task in this Chamber is to prepare the case for federalism and to do so with a clarity and a vision that was completely missing from the last referendum campaign. In the dying days of that campaign, the Prime Minister belatedly promised to fundamentally change the way the federal government operates. He promised quick action.

Is the Prime Minister ready to act? What action does the Prime Minister propose to fundamentally change the way federalism operates so as to strengthen the case for federalism like it has never been strengthened before?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we said there were to be some changes and we will proceed with some changes.

For example, we started more than a year ago signing agreements with nine provincial governments to eliminate the duplication that is mentioned on this side of the House and the other side of the House. We hope we will be able to do the same thing with the new government in Quebec so there will be less duplication.

We will look at what can be done in terms of making the federation work better, but I do not believe that dismantling the federal government will solve the problem. We need a strong federal government that has an active presence in all parts of Canada and in Quebec. That would solve the problem. It is not by dismantling Canada to make a community of 10 communities that we will succeed, as is the proposition of the leader of the third party.

• (1425)

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, no one has argued in favour of dismantling the federation. This is typical of so much debate in the Chamber. No one debates anyone's real position. The position is moved off to the extreme and they debate the extreme, not the real position.

The fact of the matter is that 60 per cent of Canadians outside Quebec and 80 per cent of people in Quebec want some change in the alignment of powers between the federal and provincial governments. They want control over natural resources, social services, language and culture to be in the hands of the government closest to them, and that is not the federal government.

When is the government going to do something practical and concrete in response to this desire for change and a realignment of the powers between the federal and provincial governments? This is not dismantling; it is realignment.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is value to having a federal government. For example, on this side of the House we are strongly in favour of a medicare system that is equal for all citizens in every part of Canada. It is not only the desire of the people of Alberta, B.C. and Ontario; the people of Quebec want free medicare through which all Canadian citizens and all citizens of Quebec can be admitted to the hospital not because they have money but because they are citizens.

When the leader of the third party talks about dismantling the five conditions of medicare he is on the way to dismantling the country.

When we were fighting to keep Canada together, it was not very useful for the leader of the third party to talk about the Constitution. That was the time to talk about national unity and jobs for all Canadians.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the weakness of the Prime Minister's answer profoundly disappoints.

We were looking for action and all we got from the government was a committee. We were looking for statesmanship at a time of national crisis and all we got was political cheap shots. We are looking for strength and all we get is tired old answers and weakness.

The Prime Minister makes a profound mistake by interpreting the demand for decentralization in Quebec or anywhere else as the dismantling of federal programs.

When is the federal government going to propose some major change in the alignment between the powers of the federal and provincial governments?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are working every day to make the federation more efficient. But I am not working from the basis that we have to destroy the federal government to be successful. We believe there should be a resolution that is a two–way street, not a one–way street of devolution.

It has always been my position that there are some things the federal government should do for the good of all Canadians. That is exactly what we are trying to do.

The leader of the third party is always talking in terms of weakening the central government. If we do that, at the end of the road we will not have Canada any more. We are fighting to keep Canada united.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for regional development in Quebec.

In his report tabled today in the House, the auditor general casts doubt on the ability of the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec to create sustainable jobs and revenues. In Quebec alone, since 1988 FORD–Q has spent $1.15 billion on businesses and organizations without first verifying their financial viability. Of 11 businesses examined, five had to close their doors before receiving the final government subsidy payment.

• (1430)

How does the minister explain that, in the midst of a public financial crisis, FORD–Q is incapable of awarding federal funding more judiciously? Why is it taking so long to put a stop to this endless wasting of taxpayers' money?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, just in the years the member mentioned—between 1988 and 1994—, the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec committed $1.1 billion. This commitment generated investments of $6.4 billion in over 4,000 projects in Quebec. This is job creation, and we are proud of it.

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the auditor general indicates that program overlap in regional development is a source of waste, as we all know, and that FORD–Q had no influence on the policies of other federal governments.

Will the minister finally understand that the federal government must get out of this area of jurisdiction and transfer the funds to the provinces, which are in a better position to act, in any case?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the report the hon. member is reading is different from the one I have.

First, I would point out to the member that most of the criticism of FORD–Q applies to the 1980s. Things have changed since then. That is, the programs of the 1980s cannot perhaps be adapted to the 1990s. This is why FORD–Q completely changed its programming in order to create an SMB access centre, which has led to hugely successful SMBs.

I would like to quote from the auditor general's report: "The development of the new programming framework is the result of strategic reflection. FORD–Q's approach is well structured. Roles and responsibilities were clearly defined, and appropriate mechanisms put in place to ensure activity co–ordination and follow up. Our examination revealed—this is the auditor general speaking—that the department had given reasonable consideration to information on past activities and on its internal and external environments".

The auditor general congratulated us, and I would like to congratulate the department officials here today.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, reliable sources confirm that foreign governments are very upset about our SIGNET program of communication between our embassies and Ottawa. SIGNET is leaking. SIGNET is leaking not only our information but the information of our allies.

What has the Minister of Foreign Affairs personally done to respond to the complaints of our allies to ensure that the secret information in SIGNET is kept secret?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday in the House, the government does not discuss security or intelligence matters.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that is the same answer I have been getting as I have tried to research this through various people. I have talked to the acting director of SIGNET and I have talked to security. It is our allies who are telling us to do something.

In opposition the government whined about patronage, whined about SIGNET costing too much, whined about the $100 million that was being spent. Now the government risks losing not only international trade, it also risks losing co–operation with our allies and losing our reputation. What is the minister going to do to change this?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I see that the hon. member has been reading some press articles which have motivated him to ask questions in the House.

I want to assure him that the system is fully operative. It is working to the satisfaction of the government and to the people who are using it.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for FORD–Q. In the report he tabled today, the auditor general points at serious flaws in the management of federal regional development programs. He states, among other things, that since 1988, the federal government has spent $4.5 billion for these programs without knowing if they have really helped create jobs and if they were properly spent.

Does the minister responsible recognize that it is inadmissible to spend $4.5 billion, $1.15 of them in Quebec, without any clear creation of jobs?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as a mater of fact, quite a number of jobs have been created as a result of the Federal Office of Regional Development's activities. I can tell you that whenever I visit one of the 13 FORD–Q offices in Quebec, and meet business people, I meet individuals who have created jobs thanks to the federal office's activities.

Indeed, if there were problems with program evaluation, the department recognized them and this is the reason why we changed our programming and the way we operate. I do accept the member's congratulations on our new programming.

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, obviously, the minister of finance is skating around the issue, but the auditor general was very clear. Since the auditor general has pointed out that FORD–Q's methods for evaluating program spinoffs are flawed, does the minister intend to take corrective actions so that taxpayers may have a clear and correct idea of reality?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we did that two years ago.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

His minister of agriculture was to release the final report of the Canada–U.S. Commission on Grains two and a half months ago on September 11. The minister of agriculture is rivalling the Prime Minister and the Minister of Human Resources Development in the do nothing department.

My question stems from his promises to launch reforms to a number of key agriculture areas based on numerous reports and studies. Can the Prime Minister tell the House why he allows his agriculture minister to delay the Canada–U.S. joint commission report, even though the commissioners who have drafted the report have suggested the content is complete and is similar to material released in the interim preliminary report?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take this question on behalf of my colleague, the minister of agriculture. Let me confess that I do not have the kind of knowledge this question requires to give a good answer. But I do know that the best minister of agriculture who lives and breathes on the North American continent today sits to my left in the House of Commons.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans knows no bounds in his attempt to become the replacement for our current Prime Minister.

One wonders if the minister's delay has more to do with the fact that the report will give legitimate fodder for those farmers calling for the reform of the Canadian Wheat Board. The minister indicated yesterday in the House on a plebiscite that "this plebiscite was not the be all and end all of wheat and barley marketing". It seems that the minister fears allowing producers the right to determine how they market wheat and barley.

Does the joint commission's report contain definitions and content that the minister is withholding from the public's view because it might influence the outcome of the Alberta plebiscite on wheat and barley marketing toward an outcome the minister does not particularly want?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, even a minister of fisheries knows you cannot put the cart before the horse. The reality is the plebiscite results will not be released until December 5. The member opposite would be the first one to stand and complain if the minister of agriculture came to conclusions in advance of knowing the plebiscite results and finishing the consultations.

Be patient and a very excellent minister will do a very excellent job as usual.

DIPLOMATS

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Canadian diplomats are having the government pay for plane tickets that they do not use, and then getting refunds from the airline and pocketing the money. This practice is such that a diplomat posted to Australia with his family can derive benefits equivalent to one third of his annual pay by cashing in his plane tickets.

Given that his government is asking all Canadians to tighten their belts, how can the Minister of Foreign Affairs justify tolerating such an outrageous practice benefiting diplomats?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not up to date. Had he attended the foreign affairs standing committee's meetings, his question would have already been answered, because this issue was raised and an answer provided in committee.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we have raised this question in this House before, but never got any real answers. That is why we are asking it again today.

Could the Minister of Foreign Affairs explain to Canadian taxpayers why he refuses to immediately put an end to this practice, which is unacceptable at a time when UI benefits are being cut back to replenish the state's coffers?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member did not like the answer he was given. As a matter of fact, he has just confirmed having received an answer. He may not like it, but he must understand that arrangements between government employees and Treasury Board are made under the applicable collective agreements, which are honoured by the government.

Should we exceed our powers and not comply with the terms of these arrangements, the hon. member would be the first one to complain that we are not respecting collective agreements.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we were all very proud to see Canadian astronaut Chris Hadfield return safely to earth yesterday from a successful eight-day mission aboard the space shuttle Atlantis.

This government has made it clear that it is very important to establish spending priorities that meet the needs of Canadians. Would the Secretary of State for Science, Research and Development please tell this House what exactly are the benefits Canadians receive from space flights like the one Chris Hadfield returned from yesterday?

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It is true that sometimes when we are deep in snow on the ground in Canada it is nice to have the sort of inspiration and hope which is provided by Chris Hadfield up in space using Canadian technology including the space vision system to link in partnership in space two former cold war protagonists.

I should add as well that earlier this month we launched RADARSAT which is positioning Canadian entrepreneurs competitively in the global earth observation market with some very new technology. It provides some remarkable advantages as well in monitoring and being able to improve the quality of our global environment.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of public works.

The auditor general accuses the regional agencies of inflating the job creation numbers. Jobs are counted twice, part time jobs are considered full time jobs and jobs that no longer exist are counted as jobs. This is a serious indictment against this government whose jobs platform has been shredded to pieces by the auditor general's report.

Will the minister admit to Canadians that the government's job creation strategy through borrowed money, infrastructure programs and regional development agencies is a $10 billion failure?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It clearly indicates to the House the clash of ideologies between this party and that party. The ideology of that party as it relates to Atlantic Canada is one of "will the last one leaving please turn off the lights". It is migration out for the Reform Party when it relates to Atlantic Canada.

• (1445)

I welcome the auditor general's recommendations. We have moved on many of them and hope to live up to almost all of them in due course.

In the agency I represent two national reputable firms surveyed 1,150 of the various private sector companies that received financial assistance from ACOA. They told us that 96 per cent of the jobs the firms said they were going to create they did create.

The auditor general surveyed 51 companies and he found that some of the precision, if you will, of the reporting could be improved on, and we will do so.

He also said:

> Our findings, while based on a significant portion of the reported jobs created, cannot be used in place of the survey as an estimate of the jobs created by the Agency's clients.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let us take a look at some examples. While the government was downsizing the fish processing industry, it spent $2.2 million to upgrade a fish plant. This caused a neighbouring fish plant to close down. The 250 jobs that were created were stolen from the other fish plant. The second one closed down in 1994, yet somehow these 250 jobs that disappeared entirely showed up as job creation.

Will the minister tell us on what basis jobs stolen, jobs lost, jobs eliminated and money wasted will count as jobs created?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is totally incorrect. The reality is that our particular agency vastly underestimated the number of jobs which were created in our region.

The auditor general reviewed only two programs. He did not review the contribution that entrepreneurs and tourism, for example, made to the Atlantic economy.

The hon. member might be interested to know that notwithstanding the difficulties in the fisheries in Atlantic Canada, the Ministry of Fisheries and Oceans, and in particular the minister, can confirm that we do have in many parts of Atlantic Canada a viable fishery. That fishery can grow. It can be enhanced. It has to have the leadership of the private sector and as a regional agency we want to work with them in order to enhance that.

AGUSTA

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the same day the government announces its intention to call for bids on 15 new search and rescue helicopters, the Minister of Public Works and Government Services announces the conclusion of an agreement with Agusta to break the contract for the EH–101s.

My question is for the Minister of Public Works and Government Services. Are we to understand from the announcement of this agreement with Agusta that the government has given up trying to investigate the circumstances surrounding the awarding of the contract for the EH–101s, which is what the present Minister of Human Resources Development was calling for when he was in opposition?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know about the appropriateness of the question in view of the fact that I believe it is the subject matter of the opposition day today.

Let me repeat what I have said on three separate occasions. The Government of Canada has entered into negotiations concerning termination costs for two contractors with the Government of Canada. We were successful with one. We have held very long, very exhaustive negotiations with E. H. Industries on termination costs. We have reached agreement. I hope to be able to provide the details in due course, but because of certain confidentiality rules I am not at liberty to provide that today.

I said before on the floor of the House of Commons and I have said it outside of the House that this particular matter has been resolved. When the details become available to all members, they will realize that the Government of Canada has achieved its particular objective.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given Agusta's involvement in dubious events in Belgium during negotiations for a similar helicopter contract, and given that the contract for the EH–101s was negotiated at the same time as the one that was the focus of the scandal in Belgium, how can the minister persist in his desire to pay hundreds of millions of dollars in compensation to Agusta, without a preliminary investigation?

• (1450)

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again the hon. member is incorrect. It is not compensation. It is termination cost. We have reached agreement. In due course, the details will be provided to the House.

FISHERIES

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Fisheries Council of Canada wrote to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on November 10 graphically pointing out that the government spends more than five times as much as Norway and ten times as much as Iceland on fisheries administration even though both of these countries catch more fish than Canada.

Will the minister admit that his department's spending on fisheries administration is totally out of control and must be drastically reduced if Canada's fishery is to remain viable and competitive in the future?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do know a few things about fish. I will not make any admission that the cost of administration within DFO is totally out of control.

I know the member will want to carefully do his homework with respect to making representations on behalf of the Fisheries Council of Canada. What he should know is that the Fisheries Council of Canada said that we should have a fishery more like New Zealand. In New Zealand 73 per cent of all the quota available in the whole country is held by only eight companies.

If the Reform Party is seriously suggesting that some 64,000 fishermen ought to disappear so that eight corporations could hold 75 per cent of the quota, then the member should say so.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the minister insists on spewing his bilge in the House rather than answering questions.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I am not sure about all the terms that are used in fisheries and oceans, but I do not think that was very nice. I would ask the hon. member to be a little more judicious in his words.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): I apologize, Mr. Speaker. We are not talking about changing the structure of the Canadian fishery. We are talking about getting the cost of administration under control.

The fisheries council states unequivocally that the minister's plans to drastically increase access fees will make Canadian fishermen even less competitive in world markets.

Will the minister commit to reducing spending in his department by $50 million rather than saddling Canadian fishermen with another $50 million in new access fees which are nothing more than a tax?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I hope the member knows the difference between bilge and bunk because what he is spewing now is bunk.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I am not sure I understand but I would like the hon. minister to get on with his answer.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, the member has asked a specific question, will I cut the department of fisheries by $50 million? The answer is no. I am cutting it by $250 million.

I want to advise the member that it is not the Fisheries Council of Canada that speaks for the fishermen, it is the Harvesters Council. We met them last Monday and the member should try doing the same. Talk to a few fishermen once in a while.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAYS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

Would the minister say whether the CPR consulted with or advised the government before cutting 700 jobs in Montreal yesterday and shifting its headquarters to Calgary? If so, what reasons were given? Does the government have a plan to deal with this additional loss of quality jobs in the Montreal area?

• (1455)

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the decision by CP Rail was one taken by a private company. I have no knowledge of nor reason to believe that the company or any of its directors either consulted or gave information to the government in advance of that decision.

I point out that it is always regrettable when jobs are lost in any community. However, if we are going to address the ability of the private sector throughout Canada to create jobs we are going to need to do it in a way that enhances and enables the private sector to invest and thereby stimulate growth and jobs.

It would seem to me that it would be very advantageous for the city of Montreal if the kind of co–operation that was offered by the Government of Quebec was such that companies potentially investing or staying in Quebec could feel that they were doing so in an atmosphere of political stability and where they could have confidence in seeing their investments grow and improve.

ASSISTANCE TO RESEARCH

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

There will be serious budget cuts in 1995–96 and 1996–97 for the research funding councils. For instance, the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council budget for that period will be cut by $142.3 million.

Is the minister aware that cutting assistance to research carried on outside federal laboratories will penalize Quebec most heavily, because this is the type of federal merit–based research funding in which Quebec receives a fair share?

[English]

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reaffirm to the hon. member that decisions made by the granting councils, and in particular the Natural Sciences and Engineering Granting Council to which he referred, are taken impartially with reviewers from across Canada in a way that is fair and recognizes excellence.

I am pleased to say that from the point of view of Quebec, Quebec scientists and researchers are doing very well competitively and, from the granting councils in general, they receive their fair share and often very much more than that. It is a good compliment to Quebec, under the circumstances, with the granting councils operating fairly.

JUSTICE

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General of Canada. In 1987, Wanda Woodward was strangled by Daniel Gingras, a convicted murderer who was out of prison on a birthday shopping pass.

Six years have passed since the family filed suit for damages against the prison system. To date, the case has not been settled nor has an apology been issued to the Woodward family.

Only a few weeks ago, the solicitor general eagerly defended Correctional Services Canada for a $12,000 payout made to convicted murderer John Lee because Lee was beaten up in jail.

If a criminal such as Lee is paid off so quickly and those actions defended by the minister, why is he not coming to the defence of the Woodward family and their plea for just compensation for their daughter's murder?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when this matter was brought to my attention I began looking into it. I can say that discussions are under way between the lawyers of the Department of Justice and the lawyers for the plaintiff.

LAND MINES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs on the subject of land mines which kill or maim some 2,000 people every month.

Mines Action Canada, Dr. Chris Giannou and others working for a total Canadian ban on the stockpiling, production, export and use of land mines welcomed the minister's recent statement supporting these objectives.

Will the minister confirm the government's intention to implement this important new policy? Will he also tell the House when this new policy will take effect?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I have said on several occasions, the objective of the Government of Canada is to eventually completely eliminate the manufacture, export and use of land mines. There are, of course, a number of countries doing this. This is why discussions are under way in the UN to gain acceptance of this objective by all countries.

Canada has already taken part in some meetings and will play an extremely active role in the next, to be held in Geneva early this coming January, in order to gain worldwide acceptance of the objective we are pursuing.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It involves the contracting out of household moving services for the furniture and effects of employees of the federal government. The moneys involved are in excess of $100 million annually.

Will the minister inform the House as to what steps he has taken to ensure greater competition in awarding the moving contracts, which will result in savings to the taxpayers of Canada?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in response to my hon. colleague, I have to tell the House that the interdepartmental committee on household goods removal has sought to deliver household goods in a more cost efficient manner.

The committee, in consultation with industry and all members of the House from four different parties, has developed an approach that basically responds to and is approved by the Bureau of Competition. It develops a strong potential for saving, increases the level of competition and access by new entrants and moderates the implementation risks involved.

I am pleased to inform the House this is a better method of moving. I think it is agreed to by all members. I thank all those who co–operated in the consultations.

POINTS OF ORDER

STANDING ORDER 109

The Speaker: This morning we had a point of order raised by the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake. The hon. parliamentary secretary wants to speak to this point of order.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake and the point of order he raised this morning about the government's lack of response to a report of the Standing Committee on the Environment, I understand that the report of the committee was a very lengthy one and involved 141 recommendations for change to the Environmental Protection Act. That act is currently under review in light of the committee's recommendations.

The government is preparing a response, but because of the length of the report and the very complete report that was tabled by the committee, it was unable to be completed for today. It is anticipated that a response should be forthcoming within the next couple of weeks.

I realize that the standing order requires tabling of a report within a limited time, but rather than table a short or incomplete report, which would not have answered all the committee's concerns, the government chose to take extra time to do this. I regret this fact was not communicated to the House in advance to warn hon. members so that the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake would not be in the position of asking for this today.

I assure the House that the government will proceed with the matter with dispatch. I hope I will be in a position to have the Minister of the Environment here shortly, within a few weeks, to table the government's response to this report.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have just a short response. First, I thank the hon. member for his quick return with an answer to this very important question. I appreciate the time he has taken today to bring the government's response timetable to the attention of the House.

I wish to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the previous Speaker's ruling on a matter like this did indicate that it was disheartening when a government missed a deadline.

• (1505)

The government committee that had studied this issue previously said: "If a document cannot be tabled within the prescribed time, the responsible minister should advise the House accordingly before the deadline. It is not acceptable that a deadline is ignored".

It should be very clear in the House that when the rules of the House are put in place to aid and assist members of Parliament in doing their jobs, the government has a responsibility to uphold those rules. I believe very strongly that something has to be said to the government and the minister responsible in this regard.

The deadline was missed. The government had an obligation to come to the House prior to the deadline being missed. It is unacceptable for them to have missed this deadline.

The Speaker: I think the point of order is well taken. I think the hon. parliamentary secretary has given a response and a commitment to the House that the information will be forthcoming within the next few weeks.

I concur that the rules of the House should be adhered to and it is regrettable when they are not. I hope the explanation that was given by the hon. parliamentary secretary to the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake at least in this particular case will satisfy him.

The House has heard the commitment taken by the parliamentary secretary. If that is acceptable to the House, I will not rule on the point of order because it seems to have been resolved at this point.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity to share time with my colleague, the member for Vaudreuil, on this Bloc Quebecois opposition day motion.

It is important to go over the words of this motion presented to the House by the Bloc. They are condemning the government for having dropped the Canadian content requirements in the contracts for the purchase of military equipment and refusing to set up a genuine program for the conversion of the military industry, thus endangering the Canadian aerospace industry located in Montreal.

It is important for all Canadians to know, specifically Canadians from Quebec, people from Quebec who still believe in Canada and even the separatists for that matter, that it was a Liberal government that basically set up the foundation of the aerospace industry in the province of Quebec.

We only have to go back to when the current Prime Minister was the minister of industry in 1977. As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, he was the one who bought the rights for the Canadair Challenger jet. That Canadair Challenger jet, which started out as an executive jet, as we all know today is probably one of the best commuter jets manufactured in the world. That industry is alive and well in the province of Quebec, which is part of the Bombardier Corporation.

We just need to go back to 1980–81, when the then Liberal government under the direction and leadership of Pierre Elliott Trudeau made a multi–billion dollar purchase of the F–18A fighter aircraft and 80 per cent of the offsets in that fighter aircraft were basically let out to the aerospace industry in Montreal.

• (1510)

The history of and the commitment of the Liberal government to the aerospace industry in the province of Quebec are well laid out. There is a great commitment and there is great history. For the Bloc Quebecois to suggest that we as a government are not committed to supporting this industry is simply incorrect.

In the motion the Bloc Quebecois is saying that the government dropped the Canadian content requirements. It is forgetting what happened when many members of the government were in opposition.

I would like to return to the free trade agreement. The leader of the Bloc Quebecois supported the free trade agreement. Many of us on this side of the House opposed the free trade agreement. One of the reasons we opposed the free trade agreement was chapter 14, which essentially gave people offshore unfettered access to and unlimited control over the Canadian industry. As part of that agreement we now are prohibited from dictating Canadian content.

We have to remind the members of the Bloc Quebecois that they cannot suck and blow at the same time. It is not possible. They cannot stand up in the House to support the free trade agreement, which essentially gives up our ability to dictate Canadian content, then come back three years later and condemn the government for having dropped the Canadian content requirements. That is the motion we have before us today.

The members of the Bloc Quebecois opposed the notion of having control over Canadian content three years ago and they are regretting it today. It was the Liberal Party that opposed the free trade agreement as it was negotiated by the previous government.

I have always believed the auto pact was an example of a negotiated trade agreement in which we could enshrine our interests and our ability to ensure Canadian content. That was a unique feature of the auto pact. However, we gave up the opportunity to negotiate a similar agreement for the aerospace industry.

It is very important for us to let Quebecers know the Liberal government is not opposed to the aerospace industry in Quebec being a vibrant and healthy sector. The Liberal government will not do anything to hurt the industry. If anything, we are going out of our way to help it.

The question that was brought up by some Bloc Quebecois members this morning is what is Quebec's fair share. The Canadian space station is based in the province of Quebec. That is one of the premier institutes of the industry. The commuter jet of Canadair is being manufactured in Quebec. The maintenance of the F–18A, our fighter aircraft, is being done in Quebec today. As a Toronto member, an Ontario member, I have absolutely no difficulty with that. It is a good move. By building a critical mass of expertise in the province of Quebec in the aerospace industry we create a capacity to bid on some available subcontracts, prime military contracts available throughout the world.

• (1515)

In other words, we obviously do not have the capacity to build total military aircraft or total products in an off the shelf sense. However, because of the component specialization that exists within the aerospace industry in the province of Quebec, we can bid on some component parts with any of the prime manufacturers not only in the United States but anywhere in the world.

It is very important to make sure our fellow Canadians realize this avenue of opportunity is available for people in the aerospace industry in the province of Quebec.

It is true that in the past we were much more aggressive in dictating Canadian content. However, because of the ability to make a quality product at a competitive price, there is probably a lot more opportunity in the aerospace industry in the province of Quebec than Bloc members are giving it credit for.

As part of the new defence industry conversion program we are trying to say to those people in the aerospace industry that although we no longer give direct grants we will make sure we give them marketing support. If they have a quality product in that sector at a competitive price—and we certainly have an advantage because of our Canadian dollar—then the secret would be centred in the whole area of marketing. We have to market the aerospace industry in the province of Quebec.

Rather than stand in the House today and cast doubt on the ability of the aerospace industry to compete, we should be boasting about the quality products made in the aerospace industry in the province of Quebec and figuring out ways of doing things together.

The Speaker: I regret to inform the member that his time has expired, but we have time for questions and comments if there are any.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on this opposition day, the debate is on a subject chosen by the Bloc Quebecois, and I must say I have always had a special interest in national defence.

There are a number of reasons why that is so, the main one being that in my riding, we have an important entity that reports to the Department of National Defence and I am, of course, referring to the Bagotville Base.

The base is a major employer in the Saguenay—Lac–Saint–Jean area. Bagotville provides employment for more than 1,250 military personnel and 280 civilians.

• (1520)

That alone makes it a major economic asset to a region that, need I say it again, has the highest unemployment rate in Canada.

I am sure that the same could be said of other regions in Canada, since there are always substantial economic spinoffs for a region where a base is located. Many small industries are located around the base itself and have often developed expertise in the defence industry.

Cutting or downsizing at that level does not affect only National Defence as such, it also affects small businesses in the vicinity. There is cause for alarm when the federal government decides to close part or all of its military infrastructures, since residents then have to adjust their lives accordingly.

On February 22, 1994, the Minister of National Defence in this government sent me the following letter, and I will read two extracts: "I regret to announce that the project to develop an air to ground weapons range for CFB Bagotville in your riding has been cancelled".

The most important part of the letter is this: "Although we considered the importance of maintaining the balance of economic and regional benefits, the decisive factor in making these difficult decisions is as follows: they must be based on military and economic considerations".

The letter says: "National Defence will work closely with other departments and regional development agencies that will help communities plan for the future".

You may recall that subsequently, on July 10, 1995, the Minister of National Defence replied as follows: "There are plans to cut 305 military and 15 civilian positions in the 3rd Squadron at CFB Bagotville. However, this information is only an estimate and further changes may be made subsequently". That probably means additional cuts.

What surprises me is that following these cutbacks, the Department of National Defence says it will work in close co–operation with other government agencies to help these communities plan their future. Well, despite the cuts in my area, we have not seen and I have not sensed any willingness on the part of other departments to get involved to deal with certain situations. Certainly not. And of course a number of bills have been tabled in the House, starting with the bill to establish the Department of Human Resources Development, the department that is closing employment centres. Employment centres are being closed while the unemployment rate goes up.

We also have trouble retraining or providing new kinds of training for people who have been laid off, and I am talking about both the military and civilians.

• (1525)

We must face the federal government's new choices. I think that the government has forgotten that the economic development of many communities depends on defence. When the federal government decides to leave a region or change its equipment, it should act a little more responsibly.

In the area of defence, a so–called responsible government should focus on conversion. As my Bloc colleague said earlier, the aerospace industry is one of the areas best suited for conversion. Yet, it seems that this sector remains one of the most fragile in Canada, at a time when several other countries have opted for conversion.

The governments of all countries with significant aerospace industries actively support this sector. One only has to think of companies like General Dynamics in the U.S., which grew because it received defence contracts from the U.S. government. The governments of all these countries put in place major conversion programs.

We, in Quebec, have expertise allowing us to believe in this reality. We have engineering firms, architectural firms, trained technicians who are ready to face these new challenges. In most cases, the federal government's policy on projects requiring new infrastructures is to go ahead without calling for tenders.

I am going to tell you something. Last week, the commander of CFB Bagotville and I inaugurated a $2.8 million arena in my riding. When this project was on the table, architectural and engineering firms from outside Quebec were invited to prepare plans and specifications, when we, in the Saguenay—Lac–Saint–Jean region, have construction firms that can build massive dams like the James Bay project. Yet, they are incapable of building a small arena for some 200 to 300 people, an arena which has, of course, become very important for the military. It is very important.

The question is not whether or not to have an arena, but rather who will be the builders, architects and engineers involved. After running around here, there and everywhere in various departments, I managed to arrange that a firm from our area would at least be allowed to submit a bid. Finally. Many thanks to the government employee who told me: "All right, Mr. Fillion, CEGERGO will be invited to bid for building the arena".

It was not a matter of favouring this particular firm over another, but a matter of placing this firm on an equal footing, to at least give the chance to a firm that is paying taxes to Canada and employing hundreds of people to bid on an arena project.

• (1530)

The defence department, through its construction engineering branch or what not, said the firm would be allowed to bid because it had done some work in James Bay and built a 20–storey building in Montreal. I guess they felt it had some credibility, so they decided to accept it as a contender. Would you believe that the contract, a turnkey contract, was eventually awarded to this very firm, CEGERGO. Turnkey means that everything was run from the office, using expertise from my region.

By going to tender, we give our regions a chance to develop. In contracting however, it is important that everyone be given a chance to compete. I am sure that we end up saving money this way.

In the United States, between $4 billion and $6 billion is allocated to conversion assistance in the Clinton plan. Of course, their population is larger. In Europe also larger sums are invested in this area. When you make an effort to look around and see what is going on outside of Canada, you realize that, more and more, Canada's track record as far as its aerospace industry is concerned is not great.

In Canada, funding for programs designed to help the Canadian defence industry has been steadily cut year after year. We are told that a great deal of streamlining is happening in terms of cuts to defence spending, but at the same time people are left jobless. That is not important. It is not important that, at some point, communities find themselves in bad shape. However, they do not realize that, even though cuts are being made in the defence budget, as well as in other departments, Canadians have an increasingly heavier tax burden. Try to make some sense out of that.

In the late 1980s, the budget was somewhere around $300 million. This year, in 1995–96, it is only $102 million and it is constantly diminishing. The government does not care at all about those who relied on the defence industry. As you know, the aerospace industry plays a vital role in Quebec's economy. This is a reality we have repeatedly stressed in this House. That industry is important for many Quebecers, since the salaries paid in that sector are quite good.

In 1993, close to 20,000 Quebecers worked in the aerospace industry. Therefore, the federal government should increase its research assistance in that field. In addition to increasing the budgets allocated for research and development, Canada should change its defence procurement policy regarding goods and services as quickly as possible. This is all the more necessary, given that the new policy no longer includes Canadian content requirements, thereby jeopardizing the development, around each and every base, of companies which have developed such expertise.

• (1535)

Given the federal government's lack of action, these companies are forced to compete with foreign businesses, most of which are heavily subsidized by their respective governments. This creates a double standard. It is very difficult to be competitive when the federal government reduces its subsidies. We are competitive in terms of design and work, but we cannot compete at an economic level since these foreign companies are subsidized by their governments. Yet, we have the expertise. We provide quality products and services.

How, then, can these businesses be competitive when the same types of businesses elsewhere are heavily subsidized?

I can understand the concerns of the people who have built up these businesses with their time and money and the sweat of their brows. We need not be surprised if they also have to relocate outside Canada in order to survive. There is no doubt whatsoever that if Ottawa pulls out of funding research and development, a lot of people are going to be worried.

The Government of Quebec will be worried as well. The Quebec minister of industry is committed to looking at ways his government might offset the federal withdrawal. The federal government, via the Department of National Defence, creates a need and then when it finds itself no longer able to foot the bill decides: "Let us shift everything. The provincial government will have to find some solutions".

This is just another way of dumping responsibilities one has assumed off onto the provincial government, withdrawing gradually and leaving them to take up the slack.

In my opinion, this is not a responsible way for the federal government to act. It must change its procurement policy in order to foster the development of leading edge industries. We must take a page from the book of other countries which encourage industrial development.

I trust that this government will, in future, require a minimum of Canadian content when purchasing equipment.

[English]

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to respond by making a comment on the hon. member's presentation.

I congratulate him on coming from a great part of Canada, the Chicoutimi area. I know the area quite well. I used to spend parts of the summer there with my family staying at the Club de chasse in Tadoussac. I fished on Lake Tadoussac at the mouth of the Saguenay. It is a very beautiful part of the world.

• (1540)

With respect to the tenor of his comments, some of the things the member said may sound sensible and logical. Perhaps in different times we nurtured the idea of Canadian content when we could afford it. It was a luxury. I point to the St. Laurent class destroyer, to the DDH280 and to other acquisitions that had total Canadian content, with some exceptions of boiler equipment and other auxiliary machinery.

All countries are cutting back. In the course of my duties as parliamentary secretary over the last two years I have had the occasion to meet with the secretary of defense if the United States, the minister of defence of the Federal Republic of Germany, the minister of defence of Holland and other defence ministers. If there is one thing we have in common it is that we are cutting back. There is a peace dividend. The cold war is over. While we are peacekeeping and fighting brush fires which are real wars in that sense, the scale is different.

In the last decade the Department of National Defence has given up $21 billion and 21,000 men and women in uniform, 45 per cent of its civilian workforce. It has reduced the reserves from 29,000 to 23,000 in two years. We can no longer do what we used to do and I did not find that factored into the equation presented by the hon. member.

I know he did not intend to mislead. To talk about principles, theories and things that would be nice if there were no limitation on funding is one thing. However, if he would look at the reality of the situation, at the issues that dictate procurement policy in national defence, he might come up with a slightly different approach. I want to ensure the hon. member has factored that into his equation.

It is the same with conversion. The answer to conversion is not a massive infusion of money. Canada cannot afford that. Let us try to do as other countries have done with initiatives and other ways of doing it, as I suggested earlier, were presented by the Minister of Industry and the minister of public works.

[Translation]

Mr. Fillion: Mr. Speaker, first I think the hon. member should come and visit the region before it closes down. As I said earlier, we have a very high unemployment rate, and when you add all the people who are on welfare, I think the government should go down there and reassure these people. I would appreciate it if he came down for a visit. I would be delighted to have him as a guest.

As for his comments, I must say that, when they talk about Canadian content and they tell us that when we had a lot of money, we could afford Canadian content, we could give the people in our regions something to hope for and tell them: "Get into those fields, start factories and small businesses and adapt to what is out there". Today, now there is nothing left, the government has dropped the whole thing and we let others do the job.

If you consider all the government programs we have in this country, I am sure we would be able to find the money to fund defence conversion. There are so many programs.

In fact, the auditor general himself said today in one of his reports that the Federal Office of Regional Development for Quebec had spent $4.5 billion without knowing where it all went and what it accomplished. In fact, this kind of money could be used for programs to help develop this defence industry.

My point is, we should look at the various programs that exist today, that are poorly managed and that cost us an awful lot in terms of time, money, energy and interest, especially, and accomplish absolutely nothing. We could give these industries a special boost.

• (1545)

In any case, if these industries are not given financial support, they still remain competitive in terms of the products they manufacture or the services they offer. And that is where the answer lies. Because these businesses are competitive, we can develop expertise, using programs that today are not accomplishing a thing but could be reviewed and redirected to National Defence.

[English]

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to join in the debate on the Department of National Defence and the Canadian industrial base as proposed by the official opposition.

[Translation]

This is the age of information, the age of rapid change. We are not just talking about technological change, which most of us have managed to keep up with over the course of the past ten years, but about change in the very nature of the way people relate to each other and the way things are done. With the fall of the Berlin wall, we began a period of change more radical and intense than anything we have known since the invention of the cold war.

[English]

I am here today to speak about those changes which affect the relationship between DND and the defence industry and suggest a view of what that new relationship may look like.

Actions in the world have caused a reaction in DND. Let me trace the main actions and then the DND reaction. The first action was the fall of the Berlin wall, which led to a reassessment of Canadian defence concerns.

The second action is the fiscal situation in the country. We have a deficit and a significant debt. The negative effects of the situation have been made clear to all of us over the past year. There is now widespread agreement that this situation must be revised through budget cuts.

The third action results from the need to reduce the number of employees in the federal public service, including DND. This results in a significant reduction in the workforce. All of these actions affect DND, resulting in changed roles, reduced budgets and reduced personnel.

[Translation]

Now let us have a look at the industry side. We can see that these same events—the fall of the Berlin Wall, the reduction in military personnel and budget cuts—have put considerable pressure on Canadian industry and their export markets. This is the case, specifically, for many of the companies involved in Canada's defence industrial base, which we want to be able to count on in the event of an emergency.

As for DND's reaction, it does not require a whole lot of intelligence to realize that the department is no longer merely a spectator in this age of change. It is a participant and must make its own changes. DND must look after its affairs differently and change its structure if it is to succeed in this new context.

• (1550)

[English]

This need for change led to the defence white paper of December 1994. In general this document reconfirmed the need for multi–purpose, combat capable sea, air and land forces to perform a wide variety of tasks at home and abroad: the protection of sovereignty and security; co–operation with the United States in the defence of North America and contributions to peace and security abroad.

In addition, the white paper indicated that to accomplish these ends, DND would have to operate more efficiently and make optimum use of equipment, infrastructure and human resources specifically to focus on maintaining core capabilities, reduce and refocus regular and reserve forces and the civilian workforce, reorganize the command and control systems and purchase affordable equipment.

The white paper also recognized the need for the department to exchange or enhance its partnership with the private sector, work toward harmonizing industrial and defence policies to maintain essential industrial capabilities, transfer activities currently conducted in–house to Canadian industry or to share them with industry under various partnerships arrangements when a business case of the same could be made, modernize and streamline procurement process and in general to seek innovative ways to support operational forces.

It must not only be said of the Canadian defence industrial base that DND must adapt to the new circumstances but that our industries must also do things in a different way with a different structure if they hope to fulfil their corporate visions in the new age.

It would be worthwhile to provide an overall context for the Canadian defence industry through some relevant defence statistics. Canadian defence spending is quite small compared with that of other western nations. It is about 1.5 per cent of GDP. Canadian defence and defence related industry accounts for little more than 1 per cent of the gross domestic product and somewhat less than 1 per cent of the Canadian labour force which equates to between approximately 60,000 and 80,000 direct and indirect jobs.

With few exceptions like Bell Helicopter, CAE, the diesel division of General Motors, Diemaco and Saint John Shipyard Ltd., our industry produces subsystems, components for niche markets rather than complete systems. A Canadian defence industry is highly specialized with particular strength in the areas of aerospace, electronics and communications. This enables our industries to be well positioned in the competitive process.

[Translation]

Canada's defence industry has the ability to diversify its activities and to come to terms with niche markets, which augers well for its future. As you can readily understand, Canada's defence expenditures alone will not support Canada's current defence industrial base. Our defence industry's survival and prosperity depends on its selling or exporting dual purpose commercial products.

I would now like to talk about the factors and new realities governing relations between DND and the defence industry in Canada. It is clear, on the one hand, that our present budget precludes our supporting an industry base of the size we might have had a few years ago. Funding additional resources is totally beyond our present means.

• (1555)

[English]

Our desire today is for a sound Canadian defence industrial base which optimizes the number of national sources of goods and services available to support the Canadian forces during operations.

In addition, the scenario for operations today for us and our major allies is pretty much accepted to be "come as you are". Under these conditions, our interests are best served by supporting the overall health of a Canadian industrial base which includes a broad range of technologies and support capabilities that we need.

From another aspect, DND has the responsibility to recognize the considerable impact which expenditures from the defence budget have on the Canadian economy and the Canadian industrial base.

DND must smoothly integrate other factors and government program initiatives such as the development of dual use technologies, demonstration of a peace dividend, defence industry conversion, development of export markets and the like into its procurement process.

Let me give some specific examples of our changing relations with industry. Although DND's budget has been reduced, the department remains committed to the goal of devoting a greater share of defence expenditures to capital acquisition.

To maximize the return from these expenditures, the department will be approaching its future capital procurement based on principles such as the following. First, it will accelerate the shift to off the shelf technology and commercial specs and standards. Second, it will augment our reliance on the private sector in the day to day support of commercial items. Third, it will seek to avoid unique Canadian solutions that require expensive and risky research development or modifications. Fourth, whenever possible it will purchase equipment with performance which has been demonstrated in the field.

As a result of the budget cuts and changes in thinking mentioned earlier, it is only logical that the department will have to rely to a much greater extent on the private sector to meet equipment support needs of the Canadian forces in the future.

The trend will be government partnering with industry, that is government seeking solutions from industry rather than dictating solutions to industry. In addition, in order to allow Canadian firms to increase their productivity and competitiveness, DND is looking at how it can make doing business with government easier.

[Translation]

While both DND and the industry try to maintain a sufficient industrial base, they are under considerable pressure and must adapt to a completely different defence framework in industrial terms. Exporting, which in the past was a way to compensate for a low demand from Canadian forces, has become a double–edged sword.

World over–supply and competition from the former eastern block and Asian countries will create an increasingly competitive market.

[English]

As defence budgets around the world began to shrink significantly there was much talk about the need to convert military production to civilian or commercial production. However, defence firms used to selling to one customer, the government, find themselves ill–equipped for the commercial market where tastes change rapidly.

The same problem of the conversion to the private sector market was faced in the United States. The problem in defence downsizing and conversion for the Canadian industry is much less significant than that in other western industrialized nations.

As I stated previously, the Canadian defence industrial base is a highly diversified one. In fact, only a handful of companies make complete defence systems such as Oerlikon Aerospace and Diemaco.

• (1600)

Also included in Canada's defence industry are several companies that make complete dual use or commercial systems for the global market, such as Canadair, CAE Electronics and Bell Helicopter; manufacturers that are primarily oriented toward niche marketing and the exports of parts components and sub–components, such as Pratt & Whitney Canada, Canadian Marconi and Allied Signal, and several repair and overhaul contractors, such as IMP and CAE Aviation. As such, the Canadian industry is well placed to respond to and weather the challenges posed by defence downsizing.

Spar Aerospace, for example, has reduced its defence operation and has increased its market diversity. At the same time it has vertically and horizontally integrated its operations by acquiring an interest in Telesat Canada. Furthermore, it has acquired Comstream and prior data giving an additional technology in the area of satellite broadcasting and data compression as well as access to additional markets.

Other companies, such as Computing Devices of Canada, have chosen to remain in the defence market realizing that there are still many opportunities in the global defence market for competitive high tech companies.

At this juncture I think it would be valuable to give an insight into our assessment of what the major features of the defence environment are likely to be. Broadly speaking, the following characteristics will likely dominate. First, domestic procurement expenditure by the Department of National Defence will not see any appreciable increase and will decline across the board. Second, the nature of what is bought and the size of the buys may change. This could mean a move toward non–leading edge technology in weapon systems and an increase in demand for repair and overhaul items, thereby placing greater emphasis on services. Third, there will be an excess capacity in the worldwide defence sector. Finally, competition will grow and worldwide protectionist tendencies will be more difficult to maintain under the world trade agreement.

The preceding features will affect government and industry equally. However, the appropriate response to the new defence environment will need to take into account the complementary but unique role each plays.

Let me deal with industry first. The rationalization of a North American defence industrial base will likely conform to the following scenario.

First, there will be a gradual movement out of the defence sector, particularly on part of those marginal firms that only entered the defence business to take advantage of the increased DND procurement activity and for which defence sales have always been a marginal aspect of their sales. The pressure to exit may be offset to some extent by the growth in the use of dual–use technologies, giving rise to new marketing opportunities for the businesses.

Second, while still searching out export markets firms that remain in defence sales will probably reduce still further the portion of their business activity devoted to defence.

Third, there will be an increase in strategic downsizing, merger and joint venture activities. We must try to reduce risks and offset unit cost increases. We have seen a great deal of evidence of this with major U.S. contractors already. Firms are selling off unprofitable divisions to concentrate on core expertise in particular systems or acquiring competitors' divisions to remove former competitors and emerge as centres of expertise.

Fourth, product lines will be re–evaluated in terms of the civilian and military mix. Extra efforts will be made to respond where possible to the new demands for innovative products.

Finally, there will be a renewed emphasis on technology based R and D.

In spite of the difficult international environment that lies in wait, the bottom line is that the Canadian defence industry has been successful to a significant degree because of its outward business approach.

On the government reactions, the Canadian defence industrial base plays an important role in meeting the peacetime and wartime requirements of the Canadian forces. As such, we ignore the health of Canadian industry at our peril. The role of the government in management of change in the industrial base falls into three categories. First is the maintenance of a suitable trade environment for Canadian industry. Second is to select support through established programs or specialized assistance where warranted for critical operational requirements. Third is enhancing the Canada–U.S. material co–operation.

• (1605)

In giving the House a brief overview of how the department is responding to current challenges I need to stress two factors. First, DND's resources are finite. It cannot simply throw money at the problems faced by industry, as the essence of its corporate problem is a significantly reduced fiscal framework in which to operate. Second, the fact that much of Canadian industry is focused on sales abroad, to the U.S. in particular, presents DND and the government with a unique policy challenge. A substantial degree of vitality of Canadian industry and its ability to support our operational needs is strongly influenced by developments in the U.S. Our industrial base planning must take this unusual situation into account.

DND must smoothly integrate factors and government program initiatives such as development of dual–use technologies and demonstration of a peace dividend, defence industry conversion and development of export markets and the like into its procurement processes.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to let you know that I will share my time with my colleague from Terrebonne, who will join the debate in a moment. I understand that I will have ten minutes to make my point.

To start with, I will say that this morning, when I came back from Montreal, I turned on the parliamentary channel and watched the debate on the motion before us now. I was surprised to see that my Reform and Liberal friends were questioning the legitimacy of the motion we moved in this House today.

Some were claiming that the leader of the Bloc Quebecois was going to be the premier of Quebec, others, that my colleague from Charlesbourg was basically guilty of insurgency. I could not help but remember why I was elected to Ottawa. It should not be forgotten that Quebecers pay $29 billion a year to Ottawa, and that in return they are entitled to services at an equivalent level.

With regard to today's debate, which in a sense is the history of the Canadian content requirement in defence spending, it should be noted that for decades Quebec has not been given its fair share by the defence department. For the past ten years, the shortfall has been $600 million a year.

I believe that as elected members from Quebec we have every right to move such a motion, which is perfectly legitimate, to boot. I had a look at statistics. We know that for a long time now the Saint–Jean area—and the Montreal area for that matter since Saint–Jean is part of the Montreal region—has been the victim of this kind of shortfall, which translates in terms of job loss.

I have the statistics right here. From 1990 to 1994, we lost 7,800 jobs out of a total of 13,900. I believe that in the current difficult context, these jobs would be very valuable.

In my own riding, we too are victims. I do not wish to belabour the point, but I will remind the Liberal Party of the terrible blow it dealt Saint–Jean when it closed the royal military college. This represents a $32 million loss for our economy every year. Believe it or not, this college was the most efficient, which means that it was less expensive to train officer cadets in Saint–Jean than in Kingston or Royal Roads.

In spite of that, the Liberal government decided to close the Collège militaire royal de Saint–Jean. Thirty–two million dollars; it was the most efficient and the most bilingual military college.

We all know that the Canadian Parliament often boasts of its ideology and its policy on bilingualism. Pierre Elliott Trudeau himself, not the greatest advocate of Quebec I must admit, came in person to Saint–Jean and said that the college was the greatest proof that bilingualism could succeed. Nonetheless, in its last budget, the liberal party closed the Collège militaire royal de Saint–Jean.

Another inequity I would like to point out today is directly related to the debate and the issue at hand; I am talking about Oerlikon.

• (1610)

The Oerlikon case is another example of inequity towards Quebec and Saint–Jean. We all remember that the minister announced, August 16, that he was planning to award a two billion dollar contract to General Motors for the manufacture of armoured personnel carriers. At the time—I remember it well—the minister explained that the situation in London, Ontario was urgent. He said that they were almost out of contracts in London and that, since it was the centre of expertise for armoured vehicles, he had to award the contract to GM without any call for tenders. Why did the minister say that? Because it was also a centre of expertise. He said that no other plant in Canada could build better armoured vehicles than GM in Ontario.

Once again, the minister and the Liberal Party were forgetting Quebec.

The hon. member just mentioned the case of Oerlikon, and I hope he is listening to me in the lobby. The Oerlikon situation is clearly unfair in this regard, since out of the $2 billion contract for armoured personnel carriers about $500 to $600 million will be used for the gun turret. It happens that Oerlikon Canada is the centre of expertise for turrets in Canada.

Of course, General Motors said: "Listen, you are giving us a whole contract and you must understand that we have affiliates". Among others, there is one in Santa Barbara, called Delco, which is specialized in gun turrets. Therefore, GM seems to be saying: "You give us the $2 billion contract and we will subcontract to whoever we want". And as good capitalists and good business people, they give the subcontract to Delco of Santa Barbara, California. So you can see the impact of the department's decision on the Canadian content and on Quebec which, once again, is being excluded.

Canadian taxpayers are going to pay a $2 billion bill and almost half the money will be used to create jobs in the U.S., in Santa Barbara, California. I think this goes against the Liberal program, which we all read so carefully during the election campaign and which said in English: "Jobs, jobs, jobs" and in French: "Emplois, emplois, emplois".

At the first opportunity it had, the government cut the jobs and sent them to California, saying to Canadian workers: "You pay your taxes to Ottawa and as for you, Quebecers, send $29 billion to Ottawa and you will get $600 million less".

We have here an opportunity to compensate for this shortfall for one year, since the contract is worth some $500 million to $600 million, but the Liberal Party is missing this opportunity. I find this totally deplorable because it shows a double standard.

If we recognize GM in London, Ontario, as a centre of expertise for armoured vehicles, why do we not also recognize Oerlikon as the Canadian centre of expertise on turrets? We find this hard to explain. As a buyer, the government should use all the means at its disposal and ask General Motors in Ontario to have the turrets made by Oerlikon in Saint–Jean, the Canadian centre of expertise on turrets.

Lobby groups are at work. A number of people are trying to convince the federal government that my arguments are valid, but the government is not budging. Even the Bloc Quebecois has raised several questions on this issue, but all the minister can say is, "Submit your bids to GM and I might be able to talk to them, perhaps we will see if your bid is the best".

The federal government could even use this as an excuse to back out, because Oerlikon executives claim that they have sufficient expertise to carry out the contract for less than Delco in Santa Barbara. Although this would save Canadian taxpayers money, the minister continues to turn a deaf ear. I find this totally unacceptable.

If at least the minister said, "Look, Canadian content requirements have been reduced; they are no longer mandatory. So let us award the armoured personnel carrier contract to General Motors in London and call for bids on the turret contract in a way that is open and fair to everyone".

• (1615)

Even then, Oerlikon claims that it could do better than Delco any day. I visited the plant, and it is true that asking them to make turrets for armoured vehicles is like asking a Ferrari plant to build Volkswagens. They are perfectly capable of performing the task. They are already producing Ferraris. The Ferrari of turrets is produced in Saint–Jean.

Now they want the Volkswagen turret to equip the new armoured vehicles to be sent elsewhere claiming that General Motors was awarded the whole contract and that nothing more can be done because they do not want to interfere too much. They say: "Delco also makes them. Why meddle in this business. We just want to give the contract to GM and have nothing else to do with it". It think that this is utterly unfair to the Saint–Jean area and for Quebec as a whole.

Oerlikon has been lobbying extensively in the past little while. In fact, I think that the company's president is here, in Ottawa, today in a further attempt to make the government see reason. I also think that those involved were quite forceful, because perseverance has not got us anywhere so far. There are people who try, day in and day out, to get across to the department that the arguments I just mentioned are valid. Unfortunately, the federal government is apparently doomed because, any time it contemplates giving something to Quebec, it takes longer to make a decision than it normally does for any other part of Canada.

It certainly did not take the minister very long to decide to award the contract to GM. In no time flat, he decided: "I must help GM. It is a centre of excellence and short of contracts." As far as Saint–Jean and Quebec are concerned, that is another story.

That is why I take this opportunity today to try to show, once again, that this is unfair and that it is not too late to make it right. I ask the Liberal government and all my government colleagues to impress on the minister responsible that Canadian taxpayers, and indirectly, Quebec taxpayers, stand to save money. The minister should take his responsibilities and give Oerlikon the same consideration he gave GM when awarding GM the contract. We are dealing with two centres of expertise and potential savings to the taxpayers.

[English]

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague on his remarks which I listened to with great interest.

I want him to know I have quite a bit of sympathy for his comments on the closing of Collège Saint–Jean. It is indeed a beautiful military college with a great history and tradition. I want to remind him that the government in closing Saint–Jean also closed Royal Roads in British Columbia. A lot of my family live in Victoria and I know Royal Roads very well. It was a very fine military college with a great tradition.

All Canadians feel pain when cost cutting affects jobs and the people of our regions. I sympathize with the Bloc member and all Bloc members when they bring that kind of position forward in the House. However I would submit to my hon. colleague that the government did approach this matter, certainly in the closing of the colleges over which it did have control, with great equality of spirit.

Is the hon. member familiar with Royal Roads? Can he speak with the same passion about this college near Victoria as he does with Collège Saint–Jean? Does he not agree that however unfortunate it was to close Collège Saint–Jean and Royal Roads given that we had more college space than we needed in these cost cutting times, the government really acted very responsibly and with a sense of fairness?

[Translation]

Mr. Bachand: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me an opportunity to elaborate, particularly on the issue of unfairness. There is unfairness at two levels. The first level is rather ideological in nature and has to do with culture and language. Saint–Jean was the main route for young francophones interested in becoming officers in the Canadian forces.

• (1620)

Closing the military college in Saint–Jean—and we have news from Kingston today—will have an impact on the number of young francophones in the Canadian forces. If I had more time, I would give you figures which show that, already, this decision has had such an impact.

But I want to go back to the financial issue raised by the hon. member. It is true that Royal Roads was also closed. But, again, there is an injustice related to the compensation given to the two military colleges. Saint–Jean, which had an annual budget of $39 million, was given $5 million for each of the next five years. Royal Roads, which had an annual budget of $19 million, was given the same compensation.

So, Royal Roads, a college half the size, with half the budget and half the number of officer cadets, gets the same compensation as Saint–Jean. Not only is it unfair to close the military college in Saint–Jean because it is the main route for francophones interested in becoming officers in the Canadian forces, but there is also an economic injustice in that the compensation of $5 million per year given by the federal government is the same for both institutions, even though one had an operating budget twice the size of the other. Saint–Jean should have received $10 million per year, considering the size of the two institutions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Resuming debate, with the second half of the twenty minutes allocated now being shared with the hon. member for Terrebonne.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make the House aware of the importance the Bloc Quebecois attaches to defence conversion. This is the main reason why we selected it for our opposition day. It is important in Quebec and it is important in my region. I should point out that I have SNC Technologies in my riding, a munitions plant, and its employees are extremely worried about federal government inaction on defence conversion.

Before addressing the matter we are looking at today directly, I would like to take this opportunity to denounce the Canadian Armed Forces' lack of respect for francophones in its ranks. Last February 22, the Office of the Commissioner for Official Languages followed up on numerous complaints about the lack of compliance with the Official Languages Act in the Canadian Armed Forces. Its letter stated that there would be an investigation to compare the situation of francophones in Moose Jaw and that of anglophones at Bagotville. The report was to be submitted within a few weeks of the February letter. Nearly a year later, the report is still secret, despite the Access to Information Act, probably because the conclusions do not put the government in a very good light.

All we are asking is for the investigation to be made public, first of all, and then for them to comply with their own legislation. Now, back to the key point of this debate, defence conversion; this must be looked at on a world scale, but also in terms of Quebec, primarily the Montreal area, and Canada. The situation is not a very comfortable one. With the end of the cold war, defence industries everywhere in the world are in a crisis situation. The market, estimated to be in excess of $450 billion, dropped 10 per cent between 1987 and 1994. This slump is far from over; according to international experts, there might be another drop of some 25 per cent within the next few years, which is why it is important to have an eye to the future in this sector.

The result of this crisis in the industry has been major job losses world wide. For example, 700,000 jobs have been lost in the USA, and 600,000 in Europe. In Quebec and in Canada we are far from being protected from the inroads being made upon the defence industry world wide. In Quebec alone, sales figures in the defence sector dropped 48 per cent between 1987 and 1992. During that same period, lower defence sales resulted in the disappearance of 11,000 of the 57,000 jobs directly linked to defence.

As I have already stated, there is a company close to my riding whose 500 employees are worried at the lack of action. Considering the situation in the defence industry, there are two other points that must be taken into consideration.

• (1625)

First, we must remember that jobs lost in the defence industry are jobs in a sector with a very high concentration of advanced technology. The jobs that disappear are high calibre, lucrative positions. In fact, salaries paid in the aerospace industry, which plays a major role in the defence industry, are on average 24 per cent higher than the average salary in Canadian industry. Twenty–four per cent is a lot.

Second, we must consider the fact that these changes in the defence sector are particularly hard on Quebec, where a major part of Canada's defence industry is located. This is not partisan politics. This is the truth. Because of the way the industry is distributed within the province, these changes come down hard on the Montreal region which is the driving force of Quebec's economy.

In other words, a lack of federal programs to help the defence industry weather this crisis will be particularly damaging for Quebec and weaken the ability of Quebecers to make advanced technology one of the strengths of their economy.

I am referring here to sectors like telecommunications and the aerospace industry, where we have to do everything we can to promote development and provide a solid basis for competitive growth in the long term. If we want to build this solid basis for the future, it is important to help the defence industry negotiate the rough spots it is experiencing today. This can be done partly by helping the industry adjust to changing conditions, something the government has failed to do.

For instance, we could provide incentives for defence producers to develop non military applications of their products.

Since the defence industry uses advanced technology, which benefits the economy as a whole, it would make sense for the government to have programs that provide incentives for defence conversion, which is already the case in other countries.

In the United States, the Clinton plan provides between 4 and 6 billion dollars worth of funding for defence conversion. In Europe, largely thanks to the KONVER program, hundreds of millions of dollars are invested for this purpose.

And then there is Canada. Does this country have a program similar to the European and American programs that focus on defence conversion? Unfortunately, it does not.

The only program that comes close is DIPP, which has been around for several years, and it certainly does not focus exclusively on defence conversion.

Its purpose is also to support companies that work in the defence industry, especially in aerospace and avionics, and to facilitate and consolidate R&D activities in these companies. It also focuses on setting up networks of suppliers of derivatives and components for these sectors and promoting investment and exports in manufacturing sectors with a high added value.

The purpose of the program is to help defence industries remain competitive on world and Canadian markets. It provides companies in the defence sector with incentives to continue their activities. It is only in recent years that part—and it must be remembered that it is only a small part—of the budget for this program has been allocated to promoting defence conversion.

Here, we could perhaps point out that expenditures under the DIPP program have a major economic impact. Every dollar spent under the program is estimated to produce more than $40 worth of economic benefits. We must not forget that, through its strong participation and dynamic role in the defence industry, Quebec enjoys a significant amount of these benefits.

This, therefore, is the only federal program with a goal of defence conversion, even though it may be both limited and inadequate. While the program does not entirely serve the needs of conversion, it could at least serve as a basis for the work needed in this area. It is simply a basis requiring constant work, but at least it is something. Even the Liberals promised to face the challenge of defence conversion in their famous red book. They have forgotten in the meantime, as everyone will agree.

They acknowledged, and I quote: "Defence industries today employ directly and indirectly over 100,000 Canadians. The end of the Cold War puts at risk tens of thousands of high–tech jobs". They promised in the red book, and I quote once again: "A Liberal government will introduce a defence conversion program to help industries in transition from high–tech military production to high–tech civilian production".

This then was a promise to build on the existing program to help the sector through its difficult times. Where is it at today? Forgotten, gone, like most of the other promises the other party made.

Looking at the record to date, we see that the benefits derived from the defence industry are substantial for Quebecers and Canadians, but that the industry is facing a serious crisis. Some adjustments must be made. Conversion of a significant portion of the defence industry to civilian production would help us keep and develop high calibre jobs. Other countries have taken on this challenge, as I mentioned earlier.

In Canada however the federal government has not, truth be known, managed to respond coherently to the problem, despite empty promises—something that does not surprise us. The only reaction to the crisis in the defence industry up to now has been a few adjustments to an existing program and cuts to it, on top of everything else. And yet, the Liberals had promised much more to help the industry survive this crisis.

Despite the logic of providing more active support for defence conversion, the Liberal government has not kept its promises. The DIPP budget is in free fall. It reached its peak in 1989–90 at over $300 million. In 1994–95, the figure was less than $144 million. New cuts are expected for 1995–96. The DIPP will then amount to only $102 million, a 66 per cent reduction over six years, at a time when business is facing a serious crisis.

These cuts will only continue, and the 1997–98 budget should drop to only $24 million. In fact, the program no longer accepts any new projects, and the government is honouring only the commitments it has already undertaken. This is a funny way for the government to keep its promise to facilitate defence conversion, do you not agree?

At a time when the industry needs it more than ever, the government is drastically reducing its participation. Its budget cuts are placing an enormous burden on Quebec. While Quebec businesses received $168 million in 1989–90, this amount dropped to $80 million in 1992–93. This is quite disturbing for the people who work in this sector in Quebec and in the Montreal region.

In conclusion, I think that so far the federal Liberal government has behaved inappropriately and irresponsibly by promising assistance while at the same time cutting back on the defence conversion program. This is a Machiavellian way of looking at things and avoiding the problems by shoving them aside to make them disappear. The time has come to initiate an honest program to face the real, global crisis everyone recognizes. The government must act now.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member who just spoke. He talked about the cold war and the many jobs available during the cold war. He seemed saddened by the fact that those jobs have disappeared now that the cold war has come to an end. I would like to ask him if the economic solution, according to the Bloc, is to go on with cold, hot and lukewarm wars and to have jobs that support wars and conflicts around the world.

Does he really believe that the key to a prosperous economy is to perpetuate conflicts throughout the world and base our economic future on arms sales?

Mr. Sauvageau: Mr. Speaker, I feel like laughing. Where I come from, we say of a nice action or activity that it is a good show. I would say to the hon. member across the way that she is missing a good show. She has missed good, coherent speeches.

• (1635)

Most of all, I would like to remind her of her party's promises. You said, my dear colleague, "The defence industries today employ directly and indirectly over 100,000 Canadians". You wrote, "The end of the Cold War—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I simply wish to remind members that they should address their comments to the Chair.

Mr. Sauvageau: I apologize, Mr. Speaker.

The Liberal Party wrote, "The end of the Cold War puts at risk tens of thousands of high–tech jobs". This does not come from us but from the red book. I say through you that I hope the hon. member agrees. The Liberal Party also wrote that it would "introduce a defence conversion program to help industries in transition from high-tech military production to high-tech civilian production".

The purpose of the Bloc Quebecois' opposition motion is simply to remind the Liberal Party of its red book promises. We have never, ever said that we wanted other conflicts. This is totally unrealistic and does not make any sense.

Mr. Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Ridiculous.

Mr. Sauvageau: We heard the word "ridiculous".

But it is important to recognize that other countries are putting in place defence conversion policies while Canada is cutting conversion budgets.

I think this is a serious problem. We must stop treating this matter lightly and start asking serious questions.

[English]

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I enlighten the colleague who has just spoken on this issue to what has been occurring in the industry of which the motion speaks. He and his colleagues certainly seem not to be as familiar with the industry as I would have expected them to be.

It is somewhat suitable that we are having this debate the day after Canadian astronaut Chris Hadfield returned from a very successful aerospace mission. It is also interesting to note that RADARSAT was launched very recently. I seem to recall that the city of Montreal was somehow involved in the launching of RADARSAT into space. One of the things members opposite might do is to watch events in Montreal and to be a little more familiar with the ways in which Montreal companies and other companies in Quebec are participating in this very prosperous industry.

Quite simply, the Bloc Quebecois has it wrong. The hon. member for Charlesbourg who proposed this motion would have this House believe there is no conversion of the military industry to civilian production and that the Montreal companies in the aerospace industry are facing hard times as a result. Perhaps he and his colleagues were not listening when this House debated defence conversion on May 5, 1994. Perhaps they did not participate in the debate or perhaps the Bloc Quebecois simply wants to stir up the pot, any pot. Let me give the member some of the facts.

First, the Canadian aerospace industry is already well on the road to converting from military to civilian applications.

[Translation]

Montreal companies have been in the forefront of this trend and provide excellent examples of firms that have managed to win a niche in the international aerospace industry while at the same time remaining competitive.

Here are statistics that are well known in the Montreal aerospace sector.

In the 1980s, 70 per cent of the sales of the aerospace and defence industry were for military use, and 30 per cent for commercial use.

• (1640)

Today, the mix is reversed, with sales of military equipment down to 30 per cent while sales of commercial products have gone up to 70 per cent. And the commercial component keeps growing. Soon the civilian, commercial component will account for 80 per cent of Canada's defence and aerospace sales.

If the hon. member took a closer look at the Montreal industry, he would realize that these statistics reflect the reality and see how Montreal aerospace firms run the entire range of commercial aerospace design and manufacture.

Is the hon. member interested in final assembly of aircraft? He should look at Bombardier and Canadair. They specialize in commuter aircraft. Perhaps the hon. members across the way should think about that before they raise the issue of defence industry orientation.

Does the hon. member want examples of Montreal firms that design and manufacture helicopters? There is Bell Helicopter Textron.

Landing gears? Héroux Inc. Does he want to know more about world class aircraft engine designers and manufacturers? He need only remember that Canada is a world leader in the manufacturing of small commercial turbo fan engines. One of the leading manufacturers is, of course, Pratt and Whitney. Most of the company's R&D is on advanced materials, which can be used for any number of commercial purposes.

For avionics systems, the hon. member need only think of Canadian Marconi.

Finally, if the hon. member for Charlesbourg and the other hon. members who have taken part in the debate today want information about flight simulators, they should talk to CAE Electronics Ltd. They will learn that not only are this company's simulators used for commercial as well as military aviation, but CAE has begun drawing on its flight simulator technology to enter into the health field.

These Montreal-area companies are world renowned for the quality of their design. They have built a solid reputation in serving particular niches in commercial aerospace.

[English]

I certainly hope members opposite are listening. The Montreal industry has prospered because it is part of a broader Canadian aerospace sector.

Once again, let the hon. member look at the facts about the aerospace industry in Canada. We have the sixth largest aerospace industry in the world. In 1994 aerospace sales were $9.6 billion and the industry employed 53,000 people. The Aerospace Industry Association of Canada estimates that the sector will add more than $8 billion to Canada's GDP from exports in the coming year. The aerospace sector continues to be the one high tech industry where Canada maintains a consistent trade surplus, which was $2.5 billion last year. Let us go back one more year where more detailed statistics are available.

• (1645)

In 1993 total Canadian sales of aircraft components and related products and services were $7 billion, of which almost $5 billion were exports. Quebec firms accounted for over $4 billion of the $7 billion worth of sales, representing 60 per cent of the total sales of the Canadian aerospace industry.

Almost 200 aeronautics firms with approximately 25,000 people are located in Quebec. The companies and the employees clearly have a major interest in the continuing success of the aerospace industry.

What are the keys to success? How did we reach the position where Canada is a world leader in aerospace? There are many reasons. I am sure hon. members across the floor would be happy to list some of them. The skills of our workforce across the country including Montreal, the quality of our educational institutions and the high standard of living that attracts people from around the world are characteristics of the industry and of the country.

[Translation]

But one of the most important reasons for the success of the aerospace industry in Montreal is one that Bloc members will never mention or recognize, even though they must realize that it is the truth. They will have to agree that one of the major reasons why the Montreal aerospace industry has become a world leader in the commercial aerospace sector is the benefits of a strong and united Canada.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Ottawa West for being so enthusiastic in showing how dynamic Quebec aerospace industries are, and for being so accurate in reading the directory of aerospace industries located in the Montreal region. I do not think the hon. member missed a lot of them, her inventory is excellent.

However, I want to ask her two very simple questions. There is a federal defence conversion program called DIPP. I would like to know the budget of that program and whether the Liberal government intends to increase or reduce that budget in the coming years.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member will realize that I am not the Minister of Industry, that I am not his parliamentary secretary, and that I am not a member of the standing committee on industry. Consequently, I do not have the budget figures in my head. However, I can reassure the hon. member. I mentioned the case of CAE Electronics, in Montreal. The member may not be aware that this company recently received $5 million from the federal government for a project.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a comment and a clarification to the deputy whip. I have some figures regarding the so–called vitality of aerospace industries in the Montreal region. I will simply tell the hon. member that, from 1990 to 1994, 7,391 direct jobs were lost in 30 companies, including 6,684 in the following eight companies alone: Paramax, Expro, Marconi, MIL Davie, Vickers, SNC, Pratt & Whitney, and Bendix. Again 6,684 jobs were lost in these eight companies over a four–year period.

The aerospace industry is in fact experiencing a definite decline. The 7,000 people who lost their jobs are certainly not proud of the alleged vitality of that industry.

• (1650)

I would also add that, if these companies have somehow managed to expand and gain an international reputation, it is not thanks to federalism but, rather, in spite of it.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to my colleague across the way that it is Canada which has a good name worldwide in the aerospace industry, not the province of Quebec. I might point out to him as well, perhaps, that about half of the jobs in the aerospace industry are in the province of Quebec, and that 60 per cent of aerospace industry sales are in Quebec.

If he were properly acquainted with the industry, he would know very well that it has always responded to change, frequently and rapidly and has always had its ups and downs. In general, the industry has continued to improve, to grow, to step up its sales everywhere in the world, and Quebec has played a very important role in this success.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the member for Ottawa West has been accusing us for a while now of not knowing our own program, of not being familiar with the issues. We are not, however, speaking only of the aerospace industry, but rather of defence conversion in our opposition motion. A while ago, I asked a question about DIPP budgets and she replied—this is not really an accusation—that she did not have all the figures.

I would simply remind her though you that the budget has been cut 66 per cent over the past two years, a two thirds reduction. Moreover, the plan is to bring it down from $220 million to $24 million for 1997–98. So, I am reminding her of the figures. At the same time, the program set out in the Liberal red book indicated that investments in defence conversion would be a priority.

Mr. Speaker, does the member not see a dichotomy between the reality of short–term abolition of DIPP and the red book promise to invest in defence conversion? I am not speaking of Montreal aerospace companies, but of a defence conversion program in conjunction with a promise about the defence industry and a reality.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is precisely because of the change in the world context, referred to by my colleague previously, that programs must be changed. DIPP was a program for the defence industry and is perhaps not appropriate in the current context.

We have taken some very significant steps to improve the situation, particularly in the very important small and medium size industries, promoting world trade, which is very important for this sector of the industry; another very important thing we are doing is promoting specific programs for small and medium businesses. I think that the fact that a program has existed in the past does not necessarily mean it is the program for the future, and in this case DIPP was useful in the past when military sales were more substantial than they are today.

• (1655)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before debate resumes, pursuant to Standing Order 38, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt—Department of National Defence; the hon. member for Rosedale—Cuba; the hon. member for Davenport—nuclear weapons; the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake—Canadian Wheat Board.

[English]

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have great difficulty accepting the proposition that the province of Quebec has suffered a disproportionately low share of defence spending over the years. I would aver that the greatest threat to the Montreal aerospace industry is the unstable economic climate that has resulted from the group of politicians who are trying to take their province out of the Canadian federation.

Canada's aerospace industry, for example Bombardier of Montreal and Bell Helicopter of Mirabel, has graduated from being a one–product firm or branch plant to becoming full fledged industry players capable of manufacturing a full range of aircraft.

This growth has placed even greater pressure on federal research and development support and new aerospace project start ups cost hundreds of millions of dollars. This may not be a large amount of money by global aerospace industry standards which are heavily subsidized, but the Canadian government has heavy debt and heavy deficits and there are insufficient funds to go around.

As for Quebec, in the 1960s the Pearson Liberal government moved the Air Canada overhaul base from Winnipeg to Montreal for political reasons. Later the Progressive Conservative government gave the F–18 maintenance contract to Montreal for political reasons, despite the fact that Bristol Aerospace of Winnipeg had submitted the lowest bid and the best bid.

Regional balancing efforts are still apparent and even now industry rivals are positioning themselves for the best shot to bid for the new helicopters. In the human resources minister's riding, the consortium of Westland Group PLC and Agusta SPA is trying to sign up Bristol Aerospace's Winnipeg operation.

When proposals were placed before the Liberal cabinet to purchase the much needed helicopters, submarines and armoured vehicles, they were stalled when regional pressures came into play. The government must realize by now that it made a mistake in cancelling the EH–101 contract. It is now trying to do a balancing act to work out communications plans to announce which province will get what specific work from contracts for military hardware.

For example, the armoured personnel carrier contract going to General Motors of London, Ontario, has been balanced with the Montreal workshop being given the contract to refurbish the M–113 armoured personnel carriers, even though the whole contract might better have gone to New Brunswick. This is regional pork barrelling and represents the essence of old style politics. However, poor political decisions and poor planning must be corrected and the armoured personnel carrier purchase starts in this direction.

Canadian soldiers have for too long been placed at risk because of inadequate equipment. Our well trained, combat capable and highly respected peacekeepers have been sent to war zones outfitted with decades old equipment, some dating from the second world war.

Morale is affected because the troops feel abandoned by their senior leadership who seem to be more interested in pleasing their political masters than taking care of their troops. Defence budgets have been poorly managed. There has been gross waste at the top and a growing rift between the frontline troops and those behind desks at national defence headquarters.

That buck stops here in Parliament with government. Political decisions will re–equip our army with modern armoured vehicles, mine clearing equipment and provide enough helmets, socks or flak jackets to outfit all our soldiers. These equipment shortages point directly at this government and previous governments that have carried on their defence commitments without spending the money to pay for them.

For example, our troops in the former Yugoslavia have had to leave behind helmets and other basic equipment so new replacement rotations would have these necessary tools. Our defence minister has said:

> We will commit forces to such operations if suitable resources are available, and if our personnel can be appropriately armed and properly trained to carry out the task and make a significant contribution to the success of the mission.

• (1700)

Suitable resources have not been made available to protect the lives of Canadians and personnel have not been adequately armed. If Canada remains unwilling to commit the necessary resources in a timely fashion to protect and provide the needed resources for Canadian forces soldiers, we will be forced to rely on the heavy weapons of other countries or step back and let nations willing to spend the money to equip their troops do the job.

If the government plans to deploy a larger force on multilateral peacekeeping missions, our men and women will find themselves short of everything from modern night vision gear to anti-armour weapons, heavy machineguns and updated communications equipment.

The procurements of new equipment such as the helicopters, armoured vehicles and submarines are vital replacements for aging equipment, not new capabilities. They meet only the minimum requirements to enable Canada to maintain a semblance of controlling its destiny.

Canada is bound by law and treaty to provide domestic security, collective defence and participation in multilateral peacekeeping operations. Each role requires its own capabilities. If the Canadian forces are to do the tasks requested of them, they must have the necessary tools to perform those tasks.

Government has belatedly addressed the need for new and refurbished armoured vehicles and it seems there is enough money in the defence budget for submarines to replace the navy's aging Oberon class vessels, but cabinet is again dragging its feet, while affordable options available now could be lost. These replacement submarines could be picked up second hand from Britain at a bargain price, but the window of opportunity is closing quickly.

Over many years the Canadian navy has developed substantial experience in submarine and anti-submarine operations. Although the cold war may have ended, there are still over 700 submarines in service with more than 40 nations around the world and others are under construction. Submarines have become the weapon of choice for many small nations with limited defence budgets. It would seem shortsighted for Canada's defence forces to forgo the opportunity to retain and profit from their submarine expertise. Canada's three Oberon class patrol submarines, procured in the 1960s, are now reaching the end of their operational life, having become increasingly restricted and expensive to operate. Thus, Canada must now choose whether to retain or give up our submarine capability.

The Liberal government's cancellation of the 43 EH-101 shipborne and search and rescue helicopters because they were too costly means that it will be necessary to buy aircraft off the shelf in Europe or the United States. That means the government has sacrificed benefits to the Canadian economy the EH-101 would have created. The CH-133 Labradors, which have been in service since 1963, will finally be replaced with up to 15 new helicopters, type and capabilities unknown.

I have great difficulty accepting the government's placing a bid for up to 15 helicopters. How many do we need? Do we need 10? Do we need 12? Do we need 14? Or do we need 15? If we are setting a dollar figure and saying we will buy as many as that figure will buy, that does not seem to be the way to do the job. We either need 15 helicopters or 14 or whatever the number is, and that is what we should bid for.

Government tenders will be issued early next year for bids on the new helicopters. The new fleet is to commence operations by December 1998, with all replacement helicopters in service by October 2001.

Without question, the government has had to reduce the capabilities of the replacement helicopters by at least 15 per cent to save on costs. These helicopters are to be used to save lives in emergency situations and under predictably severe conditions. I do not think the people who are on the receiving end of life saving efforts will appreciate that they are being served by a less than fully capable helicopter. By fully capably I mean all weather, icing and night capabilities.

Canada is still left without a shipborne helicopter capability to replace the troubled aging Sea Kings. In the 1970s DND began a long term plan to replace Sea Kings, which at that time had been in service for 15 years. It was understood that the Sea Kings would be kept in service until the 1990s. Finally, in 1986 Treasury Board gave approval to clear the way for industry to submit proposals on a replacement helicopter.

• (1705)

Aérospatiale of France and European Helicopter Industries, EHI, both submitted proposals. In August 1987 the EH-101 was chosen. In 1988 that contract was awarded.

The Sea King replacement package will be very nearly as expensive as the EH–101 would have been, but without any Canadian industrial participation and benefits to regions across Canada.

The government is well into its mandate and is attempting to put together a package that will look good to the public. It is announcing equipment purchases in bits and pieces to hide the real costs involved, talking of leasing and staggering new purchases in such a way as to camouflage the real costs.

The cost of cancelling the EH–101 may be as much as $680 million when termination penalties, sunk costs on the program and the acquisition costs are considered. In fact others have estimated that the EH–101 cancellation costs will approach $1 billion.

British government auditors will review and certify claims for compensation submitted by EH Industries to the Canadian government. This would not be subject to negotiation, but behind the scenes EH Industries could receive favoured status in the new helicopter bidding in exchange for reduced compensation for the cancelled contract.

The government had already paid $336 million toward the EH–101 prior to its cancellation. The 1994 main estimates set aside a further $250 million for settlement payments. Thus, if these earmarked funds are spent the taxpayers will have paid $586 million without acquiring a single helicopter. This does not take into account the loss of work in high tech jobs, the direct and indirect compensation for Canadian industry, nor the military, which was left dealing with the many problems associated with our aging Sea Kings and Labradors.

Cancellation of this contract has left the frigates and the Tribal class destroyers lacking the capabilities of a new shipborne helicopter.

The government promised in the defence white paper that it would immediately begin to identify options and plans to put into service a new, affordable replacement shipborne helicopter by the end of the decade.

The price tag attached to the EH–101 purchase included approximately $1.6 billion to $2 billion for the training of air crew, maintenance, spare parts, operating expenses and administration. It was an all–inclusive cost program, unlike any that had been run before it, to my knowledge.

The 1992–93 fixed cost for the EH–101 program was $4.4 billion, but a figure frequently used by the media and by the Liberal government was $5.8 billion, which was the inflation adjusted projected cost for the end of the program and not a true reflection of the actual costs.

The EH–101 program was spread over 13 years and its life expectancy was 30 to 40 years. Many alternative off the shelf aircraft have only light icing capability, while the EH–101 was a true all weather aircraft.

One of the key factors that led DND to select the EH–101 was that it could replace both the Sea King and the Labrador, keeping the costs of the new shipborne aircraft as low as possible. Replacing both the Sea King and the Labrador with one aircraft gave Canada the opportunity to lower the production and long term maintenance costs. One aircraft means lower production costs per airframe, one spares chain, a single maintenance schedule and a single pilot training program. Government has basically thrown the baby out with the bath water because of ill–informed politically based election strategy.

Now it is all smoke and mirrors. Contracts and announcements are dragged out while the Canadian forces wait on their political masters to determine their fate. Time is being frittered away. Government must move ahead immediately, either to replace aging equipment or reduce overseas commitments and obligations.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, we believe that in defence spending, as in other spending, the raison d'être should be the best equipment at the best price. That means that we do not get into the defence department supporting regional development. We buy defence equipment based on defence needs and defence dollars are spent on defence. Once we get into trying to prop up an area or balance that prop with another prop elsewhere, the defence department carries disproportionate costs, which do not accurately reflect the money that is to be spent on the defence budget.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today as I look at the motion before the House, in particular at the last lines of it, I am amazed by its wording. The motion ends up saying "thus endangering the Canadian aerospace industry located in Montreal".

What is being said there actually is that we cannot compete with other people around the world. That is wrong. We as Canadians have proven in the high tech field that we can compete around the world and in many areas we lead the world. I will not accept for one minute that the aerospace industry in Montreal or Boeing in Canada or any others cannot compete.

As we talk about the Department of National Defence's support for the Canadian defence industry, let us remember that a lot of things have been done jointly between the military and civilian companies to put success stories together. They have worked very co–operatively over the years.

Let us look at some examples from the past several years of Canadian defence company successes. The contracts awarded in the late 1970s and early 1980s to a Quebec firm, Bombardier, for jeeps and medium weight trucks are a good example. As we all know, under able leadership the company established itself as world class while generating significant revenues and employment in Quebec.

National Defence has continued to contract with Bombardier–Canadair for the CF–18 systems engineering support. Canadair is now endeavouring to market a CF–18 support expertise abroad. The Department of National Defence is supporting these efforts by way of making available technical personnel to brief foreign defence officials on the Department of National Defence's maintenance and support regimes and how Canadair fits in.

People who leave the Canadian forces through retirement quite often go into other companies and take their expertise with them. This is just an extension of defence helping them out during the days of active service of a member of the forces.

More recently, the Department of National Defence provided similar assistance to a Kitchener–Waterloo firm, Diemaco, a manufacturer of small arms. The Department of National Defence was there to assist Diemaco in its marketing efforts with the Dutch. A defence materiel co–operation memorandum of understanding in place with the Netherlands facilitated our efforts and those of Diemaco.

Through our involvement in NATO, specifically in joint NATO projects and through the NATO industrial advisory group, the Department of National Defence in Canada has played a key role in identifying opportunities for Canadian firms and assisting them to participate in NATO projects in the development stage. Quebec aerospace firms in particular are very active. Among them are CAE, Canadian Marconi, Heroux, Oerlikon Aerospace, SNC and Bell Helicopter.

• (1715)

Examples of important contracts include: CAE simulators for NATO AWACS aircraft which enabled the company to become a major competitor for simulators on AWACS, airborne early warning and control systems type aircraft; Héroux landing gear for NATO AWACS aircraft which positioned it to compete for and win other 707 aircraft business; allied signal actuation systems for military air to air and shipborne missiles known as the NATO Sea Sparrow.

[Translation]

National Defence offered its support along with other defence departments in co–operation with other departments to Canadian defence contractors. The most recent example is of the firm Héroux Québec, which lost its bid for a contract to repair and maintain landing gear for the American air force.

Héroux had been doing the work satisfactorily for many years. However, when the contract came up for renewal, this Canadian firm lost out to a bid made by USAF interests under rather dubious circumstances. Héroux appealed the awarding of the contract to American authorities. With the help of our officials here in Ottawa and in Washington, the Departments of Foreign Affairs and International Trade put considerable pressure on the American authorities and on the USAF. Héroux and its advisors also made very well supported appeals so that the work on the landing gear could continue.

[English]

We realize that if Canadian defence contractors are to survive, they cannot depend on Department of National Defence procurement alone. This is more true as the Canadian forces have been reduced in size. They must export or sell to commercial markets or both. National defence has provided assistance in the form of loans of equipment, material and personnel for demonstration purposes and the use of facilities to test and evaluate product enhancements or to demonstrate products. Generally speaking, this form of assistance has not placed overly significant demands on our resources.

We have however over the past three years devoted significant time and effort in organizing industry promotional events in conjunction with ship visits to foreign ports. Some 25 Canadian companies, including the Quebec firms, Loral Canada, formerly Paramax and UNYSIS Canada; CAE; Bell Helicopter; and Canadian Marconi have participated in ship visits by Canadian patrol frigates to ports in Asia, the Middle East, Europe, the United States and South America. CAE, a company which participated in every ship visit has told us that the ship visit to Korea led directly to a major contract in that country.

I have named but a few of the successful Canadian defence and defence related companies. These companies are located in virtually every region of the country. Canadian defence and defence related companies are successful by their own efforts. They build on their strengths and their reputations to produce competitive leading edge technologies. They aggressively market them throughout the world. They diversify into commercial or dual use markets and also aggressively pursue those markets.

Again it is Quebec aerospace and defence electronics companies like Héroux that recently won a major contract for commercial aircraft work. Canadian Marconi and Spar Aerospace are in the forefront of diversifying their operations and are going after increased exports and commercial work. Other progressive firms like Indal Technologies of Mississauga, Ontario are also building on their expertise and aggressively pursuing foreign markets, sonars for the royal navy, helicopter haul down systems for the U.S. and Japanese navies.

If I may go back to one of my original comments, Boeing Incorporated has branch companies in Arnprior, Ontario and Winnipeg, Manitoba. These companies have done well in Canada when they have been given a chance to bid openly on the market. However, during the latter years of the Conservative government they were not even given a chance to bid. They have since revolted against that type of attitude. Companies located here in Canada, whether they are branch companies or original Canadian companies, want a chance to bid on the open market for these contracts. It is a healthy situation for all of them.

I know that Boeing was very disgusted with the bidding process during the Conservative government years. We came to office with the promise that we were going to open up the system for bids. People were going to have an opportunity to play fair, to be able to bid on the open market, to make up their engineering designs and submit them and have them properly perused. A successful bidder would be picked with integrity and honesty. That is the route this government is taking.

As today's motion indicates, we are now opening up bids for helicopters. A lot has been said about the cancellation of the EH–101. Let us remember that particular contract had a bad beginning. That was one company which had been given favouritism and other companies in Canada did not have a chance to openly bid on that contract. Helicopters were built for search and rescue that were also built for on board ship helicopters. Those helicopters do not have to be the same. Because everything was built into both of them, the cost of those helicopters went through the roof. That was one of the key problems with it.

• (1725)

If the best deal is to buy a helicopter off the shelf and put the goods into it here, then that is the way we should go, providing everybody has the opportunity to buy those helicopters and to put the equipment in them. Any subcontracting that would be done would be open to Canadian companies. They would have a chance to put their expertise and their various engineering departments to work. They could sit down, draw their plans and present their best effort. Experts in the defence department along with other personnel would review these contracts and would decide which was the lowest bid and the best bid. We would be getting the best product for our money.

It is very important that these companies understand they have a fair place to bid in the Canadian nation. To come forward and insinuate in a motion to this House that a company located in Montreal or in any other part of Canada is not capable of competing responsibly does not give credit where credit is due to our companies.

Many professionals are retiring from our armed forces. They are going into these aerospace companies with their expertise and years of experience having handled the equipment. They too will have new ideas. They will have an excellent idea as to what must be in that product if it is going to be the best for Canadian aerospace products.

Our Canadian forces will be smaller. Therefore it is very important that they have the best equipment in the years to come. I was rather surprised when a senior person in the forces said to me the other day that the new technologies the Canadian forces have makes it almost possible for a regiment to do today what it took a whole battalion to do a few years ago.

People who have worked over the years on aeroplanes, on shipborne helicopters and on search and rescue helicopters know what is needed in those desolate spots. They know what is needed when there are high windstorms. They know what is needed when facing great difficulties at sea. Those people are important to the companies. They know what is needed and what should be recommended.

The Department of National Defence with its expertise and others it can draw upon put all of that in the bids to begin with. There may be some very good suggestions thereafter on the part of those experts who work for the companies making bids. Suggestions are always welcome in the aerospace business as in any other business.

It is good to have a debate in the House today on the subject of the Minister of National Defence having made the announcement that we are now open for bids on search and rescue helicopters. That is not the route which the previous government would have taken.

We have told Canadians through the Minister of National Defence that search and rescue helicopters are now up for bid. Companies can bid on them. May the best company with the best product win. In that way our Canadian forces and those who are going to be flying search and rescue helicopters in the future will be well served. Those for whom the search is made will have a better chance of survival because we have a good aerospace business. Our people are quite capable of producing a good product here.

Finally, I say buy the product off the shelf, put into it what we absolutely need to make a good and reliable product and let us go from there. It is an open system. It is a fair system. It is a bidding system. It adds to the integrity that the government is trying to put back into the minds of the Canadian public so the taxpayers will know they are getting the best for their dollar because the bidding system is open again. It is not back room dealing, it is up front bidding.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if you were to seek it I believe you would find unanimous consent that the two private member's items to be voted on, namely Bills C–317 and C–275, be dealt with after the government bills now before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The question is on the amendment.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

ENDANGERED AND THREATENED SPECIES ACT

The House resumed from November 20 consideration of the motion that Bill C-275, an act respecting the protection and rehabilitation of endangered and threatened species, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to order made on Monday, November 20, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion of the hon. member for Davenport at second reading stage of Bill C-275.

As with the previous vote, the vote will take place row by row.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

TREATMENT OF MUNICIPAL SEWAGE

The House resumed from October 19 consideration of the motion; and of the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The last time the matter was before the House the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the chief government whip, had the floor and had approximately five minutes remaining in debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago, when I was interrupted by a member calling quorum, I was in the process of discussing the infrastructure program, but an incident occurred. It is worthwhile reviewing it for the House.

[English]

It went like this. The Reform Party proposed a motion. While we were debating its motion it called quorum on itself. Then it failed to produce the quorum it had asked for and we had to adjourn the House. I understand from the annals of parliamentary history that this is rather unprecedented.

We always have new things when we deal with the Reform Party and calling quorum on oneself is one of those things. If that were not bad enough, failing to produce it afterward beat it by a bit. In any event it interrupted my speech for two weeks. I am just catching my second wind but I will get around to it.

We have a motion from the Reform Party about infrastructure. It tells us that the government should be in favour of improving treatment of municipal sewage and so on. That is exactly what we are doing through the infrastructure program, the very successful infrastructure program, might I add, which has brought many water, sewer and such improvements to a variety of localities in Canada.

I know the member across the way is saying that is not good.

Mr. Harris: Not that many.

Mr. Boudria: "Not that many" he says. I am glad he asks how many. Let me bring them to the attention of the House. In the province of British Columbia water and sewer projects have been approved so far in the order of $493 million. That is not enough, say the Reformers; they said not many. In Alberta, a place familiar perhaps to one or two Reform MPs, it was $149 million.

• (1835)

We are only talking about water and sewer. We are not talking about roads, highways, engineering, non-residential gas and oil, equipment, dams and irrigation. We are only talking about those infrastructure projects.

In Saskatchewan it was $80 million; in Manitoba, $53 million, and in Ontario, $355 million again in the area of water and sewer. In Quebec it was $537 million; in New Brunswick, $89 million, and so on. I could go on and on with the numbers in this wonderful program promised by the Liberal Party in the red book and delivered for the benefit of all Canadians.

Those are grants under the infrastructure program for water and sewer of the kind the hon. member for Comox—Alberni is asking us to support. There is some dissension within the ranks of the Reform Party on this subject, particularly in the mind of the Reform Party member from Simcoe who denounced some weeks ago the infrastructure program. He said that it was a porkfest or something like that. Those were words he used.

However, not long before he had written a letter to the minister responsible for infrastructure, the President of the Treasury Board who does a fine job in this regard, by the way. This is the Reform MP from Simcoe who had previously denounced such projects as porkfests when they were in somebody else's riding. Now that they were in his riding he sent a letter asking for the government to support not one, not two, but three projects including the same kind of arena he denounced in somebody else's riding. That was only a coincidence. Yes, Reformers do that from time to time.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Boudria: My colleagues are totally upset. I ask them to contain themselves. I know it is terribly upsetting for them to see Reformers do it, but I am sure the recall process will take care of them when they talk out of both sides of their mouths like that.

The hon. member for Comox—Alberni has also had a number of such projects in his riding. For instance, in the village of Ucluelet it cost $2.27 million to repair its inlet. In the regional district of Comox—Strathcona it cost $749,000 to upgrade sewage pumps. In Port Alberni it cost $113,000 to increase the sewage lagoon capacity. In the village of Cumberland, which is a great name in my riding as well, it cost $41,000 to upgrade sanitary sewers. The government and the President of the Treasury Board should be congratulated by the member for Comox—Alberni.

I thought I would have a few more minutes because I was interrupted for two weeks, but if my time has expired I guess I will have to accept it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I know the member worked diligently over the past few weeks to prepare himself for this intervention but the rules must prevail.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the comments by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. As off target as they were, the hon. member talked about some projects that involved sewer work, work on the systems. However I think he missed the real intent of the bill.

• (1840)

The member of the Reform Party tried to address that there are a number of major cities in the country that fail to treat some or all their sewage. In other words, major cities such as Vancouver, Victoria, Halifax and even Montreal are dumping large quantities of raw sewage untreated into the harbours. This is what the hon. member for Comox—Alberni is trying to get at in the bill.

Most towns and cities across the country have sewage treatment and sewage carrying facilities. It is difficult to believe that in 1995 major cities in Canada fail to treat their sewage in any way and dump it raw into the oceans and rivers.

I mentioned the dumping of raw sewage occurs in Halifax, Vancouver, Victoria and Montreal. It is interesting that it also occurs in Montreal. Hon. members will be interested to note that despite the fact Montreal has a very serious problem with its sewage, it was awarded the NAFTA environmental secretariat by the Liberal government. I assume a city would get such an award because it practises good environmental standards. Yet the city of Montreal, a very serious offender in the dumping of raw sewage, was chosen by the Minister of the Environment to receive the environmental secretariat.

Why would the minister overlook a serious environmental problem and award a secretariat on environmental issues to the city of Montreal? Could it be just another appeasement to the province of Quebec that was not deserved in the first place?

In 1994 it was reported that 17 major cities in Canada failed to treat some or all of their sewage. While provincial governments set the standards for sewage treatments, it is up to the municipality to actually treat the sewage. Many cities have lagoons that provide minimal treatment. In some of the cities I mentioned raw sewage minus the solids is dumped directly into the ocean or water basin. Needless to say, the dumping of raw sewage poses a serious health hazard.

In dealing with health hazards, one of the most notable examples occurred earlier this year on a reserve in Manitoba when a number of residents fell seriously ill because the treatment facility of their town had fallen into disrepair.

Pollution resulting from sewage not only damages our health but damages our economy. Members are aware the cities I mentioned are in many cases large tourist attractions in Canada, particularly Victoria and Vancouver, where probably a few million tourists come to enjoy their aesthetic qualities. However they are shocked to find a practice that allows the dumping of raw sewage into the harbour. This does not bode well for the tourist industry. Members will be aware that in some areas tourism is crucial to the economy. Vancouver and Victoria are good examples.

• (1845)

Pollution from sewage is very damaging to the fishing industry. Sewage degrades the water quality and dissolves oxygen levels resulting in damage to marine life and polluted shorelines. Our fishery plays an important role in the Canadian economy on both the east and west coasts. While overfishing has damaged the fishery to a great extent, it is shameful that it continues to be damaged by our own wilful neglect in not setting some standards for treating raw sewage.

The member for Comox—Alberni and I certainly think it is time to take the matter of untreated sewage seriously. The red ink book of the Liberals talks about the detrimental effects of untreated sewage. It promises to assist provincial, regional and municipal governments to finance new or renewed sewage treatment infrastructure.

In order to facilitate a clean–up, the Liberal government introduced its infrastructure program to look after some of these problems. This program was introduced despite the fact the government did not have any money, provincial governments did not have any money and the municipalities did not have any borrowing authority unless by a referendum or some other process given to them by their citizens.

This program was intended to address some of the serious problems in sewage treatment and sewage transport and that is good. If specific areas of concern were addressed, then we would probably have less problem with the infrastructure program than we do despite the fact that it was done on borrowed funds.

Where money was intended to go to water systems and infrastructure at the municipal and provincial levels, instead we find that a lot of these funds have been used for what we could consider quite frivolous and unnecessary things. This should be of concern. For example, funds have been used for things like circus training centres, snow blowers and boccie courts. The Canadian public is angry that we are spending $2 billion at the federal level, $2 billion at the provincial level and another $2 billion at the municipal level, money that we do not have.

There are such projects as $500,000 for a canoe hall of fame in the Prime Minister's riding; $18,000 to improve the sound system in a curling rink; $72,000 to build two outdoor tennis courts; $14.4 million for a building for circus training; $15 million for renovations to Edmonton's hockey rink, and $173 million to build a trade centre in Toronto. When average Canadians think about infrastructure they think about roads, sewers, culverts and things that allow communities to grow and to look after some of the waste problems they have.

The infrastructure program has become quite a joke in many areas. The spending goes on and on yet sewage is still being dumped into lakes and oceans. It is unacceptable that the government did not place some stricter criteria on the spending of moneys in its infrastructure program.

With respect to the amendment made by the Bloc member, all we have here is the Bloc asking for something for nothing again. The Bloc is saying if the government puts money in for a sewage treatment plant or whatever in the province, if the province or the municipality chooses to opt out they simply get the cash instead to do with it as they like. This idea is another example of the Bloc wanting something for nothing. It defeats the purpose of any kind of infrastructure program funding in the first place.

I ask hon. members in the House to support Motion No. 425 put forward by my colleague from Comox—Alberni.

• (1850)

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to address Motion No. M–425 put forward by the hon. member for Comox—Alberni. The motion states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should support the undertaking of a country–wide program of improving the treatment of municipal sewage to a minimum standard of at least that of primary treatment facilities.

The concern I have about the motion is that such a new country–wide program would only duplicate existing efforts of the federal government, provincial governments and territorial governments.

Our government initiated the Canada infrastructure works program which is geared specifically to upgrading infrastructure. I note that sewage treatment was given a high priority in the program. For example, in my riding of Halifax West, one of the most important and costly projects which the program funded was the upgrading of the Mill Cove sewage treatment plant. It is a very important program which will provide better service for the whole Bedford–Sackville area. That is one of the two largest programs in my riding. The other one relates to road building. Both are solid traditional infrastructure programs.

There are other kinds of infrastructure. These days we have to recognize that even things like fibre optics can be important for infrastructure and for the ability of a community or a country to develop its economic base.

I also note that the Reform Party did not support the infrastructure program when it was first introduced.

I remind hon. members that the primary responsibility of implementing standards or guidelines for fresh water, recreational or drinking water quality and sewage treatment discharges rests with provincial and territorial governments and not with the federal government in Ottawa. The role of the federal government is to supply leadership and advice in support of the provincial and territorial governments through the co–operative establishment of national guidelines and appropriate action in the federal domain.

National guidelines exist in this area and are constantly being updated. For example, through federal and provincial co–operation, health based guidelines for drinking water and recreational water quality are developed. In fact, the fifth edition of "The Guidelines for Canadian Drinking Water Quality" was published in May 1993. This document is popular among those who study water quality issues. The document recommends limits for microbiological, chemical and radiological contaminants which have been found in drinking water and are known or suspected to be harmful.

The guidelines are used in all parts of Canada. They are developed in co–operation with the health and environment ministries of the provinces and territories. The guidelines fall under the auspices of the Federal–Provincial Subcommittee on Drinking Water. It is important work which is in progress.

The process began in the 1970s. For this reason among others, Canada's drinking water is one of the safest drinking waters in the world. We have to recognize how fortunate we are in this country to have this supply of safe fresh water.

The impact of standards for sewerage is to protect raw water sources which might be used by Canadians for drinking water or recreational purposes. It is the raw water sources which we are talking about.

The environment is one of the key determinants of population health. We all know these days about the increase in allergies and respiratory illnesses which seem to be traceable to environmental causes. Water quality is an important indicator of our efforts to protect human health in this area.

Of the many environmental factors, the quality of their drinking water is of major concern to Canadians. We know this from a number of public surveys and consultations which the government has undertaken. We also know that Canada is in the enviable position of having great riches of fresh water within its boundaries. I believe that Canada has the greatest resource of fresh water in the world. Approximately 83 countries in the world do not have access to fresh drinking water. It is atrocious. The problem is the greatest in those countries which are highly populated.

Our infrastructure program is a co–operative effort of federal, provincial, territorial and municipal governments. It is already being used to upgrade and improve sewage treatment across the country, just as it is in my riding with the upgrading of the Mill Cove sewage treatment plant. This is in keeping with our red book commitments.

• (1855)

In our present situation, the federal, provincial, territorial and municipal governments are prioritizing the infrastructure works program to benefit all Canadians because we have to look at what is vital to Canadians. Microbiological characteristics of the water are still considered to be vital to public health protection and for that reason guidelines are under continuous scrutiny.

There are microbiological guidelines for coliform and total bacteria in drinking water. In fact, it was recently updated and sections on viruses and protozoa in finished water are being prepared. Microbiological contaminants will not be removed from source water if we adopt this motion. This motion will not reduce trace chemical contaminants in the fresh water supply to our municipal drinking water systems.

It will not help, for example, in the case of Five Island Lake where the lake system is contaminated by a PCB site or actually an orphan site which has a number of toxins which need to be cleaned up. This motion will not address the problem of that water system.

The establishment of a national primary sewage treatment standard will not improve the microbiological qualities of drinking water, nor will it significantly improve fresh water quality.

One of the important things we should be moving toward in this regard and one of the things happening in Halifax, for example, is the work toward the removal of toxins and other contaminants at source. That is a very important step we have to take. It is a matter of taking responsibility for the quality of our water and what we dump into our sinks and into our water system.

We have an obligation to all Canadians to expend our resources in the most efficient manner possible. Every dollar we spend must have the maximum possible health benefit to the Canadian public. Health Canada has a duty to Canadians to address serious health issues affecting water quality. We are concerned with disease–causing organisms and cancer–causing chemicals in our water. We have to be concerned about those things more and more these days.

These are the serious issues of the day that Health Canada is addressing. These are also the issues that will not be touched on by this proposed motion. Since primary sewage treatment will not reduce organic substances found in source water from municipal drinking water and disinfection is essential to maintain a safe drinking water supply that will protect the public health, the establishment of a minimum standard of primary treatment will have little public health benefit with respect to drinking water.

Water quality improvements are already occurring under the Canada infrastructure works program, the Canada–Ontario agreement to clean up the Great Lakes and the Quebec–Canada entente to address issues in the St. Lawrence River basin.

I believe the member for Comox—Alberni had the best of intentions in putting forward this motion. Unfortunately, it does not address the real problems facing Canadians today. An isolated program to spend large sums of money on municipal sewage treatment will cost Canadian taxpayers dearly without doing much to increase public health protection.

Health Canada is working now in partnership with other levels of government to improve water quality across the country. These are the initiatives we must continue to develop to ensure that the quality of our drinking water remains the envy of the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by saying I have a particular interest in this topic, because the riding of Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, which I have the privilege to represent in this House, happens to have one of the largest waste water treatment plants in Canada.

Officially opened on November 2, 1987, the Montreal Urban Community waste water treatment plant today has an average capacity of more than 23 cubic metres per second, so that between January 1, 1995 and October 15, and this is just an example, the plant processed about 578 million cubic metres of waste water. To give you a better idea of what is involved, this is the equivalent of the volume of the Olympic stadium.

• (1900)

And to give you some idea of the amount of sludge left after this process, imagine a line of 25 tonne trucks all the way from Montreal to Ottawa, in other words, it is a plant operating at full capacity.

I may add that, to carry out these operations, the plant in my riding has a total budget of about $43 million, in fact slightly more, and employs a total of 290 people in treatment operations, maintenance, engineering, mechanical engineering and data processing, in other words, all the people who work in this plant. Generally speaking, waste water treatment plants have become indispensable in our modern cities.

That being said, the Bloc Quebecois takes the position that we support the principle of protecting the environment, but to us it is obvious that the environment is better protected when each government does what it is supposed to do.

That is why the amendment moved by the hon. member for Laurentides is so important, since, if motion M–425 presented by the hon. member for Comox—Alberni were adopted in its present form, without any changes, this would give the Liberal government, the present government, further opportunities to do what it always has done, which is to invade jurisdictions that are not its responsibility. Basically, that is the reasoning behind the motion of the hon. member for Laurentides.

Motion M–425 before the House today asks this House to support the undertaking of a country–wide program of improving the treatment of municipal sewage to a minimum standard of at least that of primary treatment facilities, in other words, facilities that will eliminate phosphorus deposits.

Currently, managing the environment is largely a municipal responsibility. Municipalities are responsible for supplying clean water, as we said previously, for sewage treatment and garbage collection and disposal.

Under the Constitution, and this is the crux of the matter, municipalities are administrative units that receive their powers from the provincial legislatures. Consequently, the federal government has no legitimate right to deal directly with municipalities.

Of course, in Quebec we are accustomed to seeing the federal government proceed in this way. I may recall that it was this kind of behaviour by the federal government that caused nearly half the population of Quebec, nearly 50 per cent, to vote yes on October 30, and it will certainly be a little more than 50 per cent next time.

Since this government has shown it has no intention of changing any of the bad habits we have been criticizing for the past 30 years, we can assume that, at the time of the next referendum on Quebec, more and more Quebecers will understand they have only two choices left: become a majority with full control over their destiny or remain a minority, with their interests subjugated to those of the majority to which they will not belong.

To say the least, it is disappointing, but nevertheless, quite incredible, that this motion is being proposed in this House by a member of the Reform Party. We all know our friends in the Reform Party claim to want to decentralize Canada. They see it as the likely solution to our political problems. It might not be constitutional decentralization, but a real decentralization of powers to the provinces. Obviously this bill invades provincial jurisdictions.

I find it unfortunate that the Reform Party is sponsoring this bill. This party, it must be remembered, initially set itself up as the alternative to the impasse Canada found itself in federally after the failure of the Meech Lake Accord and all that followed. The text of the motion before us, however, shows that the more things change, the more they stay the same. They are still talking about more centralization, as if nothing happened in Quebec.

As we know, and as the English language papers pointed out, our Prime Minister succeeded to some extent in lulling Canada into a bit of a stupor over what was actually happening in Quebec.

• (1905)

Events in Quebec woke people up somewhat. Now they are trying to pretend nothing happened and settle everyone down again, while they go on centralizing in Ottawa, as if nothing has changed.

By voting in favour of this motion without the necessary amendments—one of which has been proposed by my colleague for Laurentides—the federalist parties in this House will simply confirm to Quebec voters that the no side did not favour change, despite what they hoped and continue to hope.

That is why my colleague from Laurentides put forward an amendment to this motion that would give all provinces the right to opt out with full financial compensation, so that they themselves could spend the money on the environment and not on anything else.

This amendment would have two advantages among other things. First, from a constitutional point of view, it would allow all levels of government to exercise their powers properly in their respective areas of jurisdiction, contrary to what is now the case. I would like to remind you that the environment is not among the areas of jurisdiction explicitly assigned by the constitution. It has often been said that the environment was not on the agenda when the constitution was drafted, but still. This is a so–called ancillary power deriving from the areas of jurisdiction explicitly mentioned in the Canadian constitution.

Before the mid–1980s, the Quebec government, which has jurisdiction over local and territorial matters, played a key role in assuming most environmental responsibilities. As provided for in the constitution, the federal government was happy to get involved in areas complementary to its jurisdiction, and everything was just fine.

In 1985, the federal government started to become much more involved in environmental matters. It did so mostly by using its spending power and the new powers it had been granted by the courts. This has led to many cases of overlap and duplication. This situation has gotten worse since the election of the present Liberal government, which is trying to further centralize decision making in Ottawa.

If there is one thing that is perfectly clear about the bills that I have seen tabled in this House, it is that almost every bill introduced to amend other bills or to encroach on areas of jurisdiction that may previously not have been clearly defined gives ever more authority to the ministers.

At present, there is a great deal of duplication and overlap in federal and provincial environmental regulations. Therefore, private sector enterprises often have to spend time, energy and money on gathering information on a large number of programs, answering inquiries from both levels of government, attending numerous committee meetings, preparing for inspections that are often conducted by both levels, meeting requirements that are often different depending on the level of government involved, and the list goes on ad infinitum.

For instance, there are currently eight federal regulations overlapping existing Quebec regulations on the same subject. Yet, they keep wanting to make more regulations and centralizing more and more. Cases in point are the storage of PCB material regulations and pulp and paper effluent regulations.

There are also environmental benefits, since appropriate solutions to problems to be dealt with locally will be easier to find. You will no doubt agree, Mr. Speaker, that local authorities are in a better position than anyone else to find solutions suited to the particular circumstances of their respective communities. As far as the environment is concerned, government's ability to understand local problems and challenges depends on how far removed it is from the field. The further it is removed, the less it is able to find practical solutions likely to gain acceptance and generate co–operation within local communities. That is the spirit behind the amendment moved by my hon. colleague for Laurentides, which we support.

[English]

Mrs. Carolyn Parrish (Mississauga West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am here today on behalf of the government to address Motion No. M–425 put forward by the member for Comox–Alberni. It calls for a country–wide program of improving the treatment of municipal sewage to a minimum standard or at least that of primary treatment facilities.

A basic weakness of the motion is that it proposes to solve the problem of municipal waste water through the use of a specific directed technology. Since when have Reform Party members believed in imposing the use for every province of a uniform method when they do not even believe in the consistent application of a basic health care principle?

What we should be concerned about is not the process used to effect treatment of municipal waste water, but the quality of the final product and its subsequent short and long term effects on humans and the ecosystem. The shortsightedness of this bill is typical of many Reform motions: immediate, quick fixes that show the lack of experience that comes from not really understanding how other jurisdictions of government work, how the municipal political mind works.

While the Canadian Federation of Mayors has been consistently requesting an infrastructure program, the first government to take the request seriously is the Liberal government. A minister was put in charge of the program who has been a well respected, long serving mayor and he tailored the program to suit the unique and individual needs of all municipalities, municipalities that are fiercely protective of their jurisdictions.

Under the federal Fisheries Act, for example, no person including a municipality, is allowed to discharge water where fish are found or treated water which contains any substance that is harmful to fish. The focus should not be on what technology is used to treat municipal water waste, including domestic sewage, but on the final quality of the water.

As a technology for treating municipal waste water, primary treatment is a physical, mechanical process, very simplistic at best. It can remove material like sand, grit, stones, twigs and larger objects like wood and plastic. It can settle out the heavy organics of domestic sewage, but that is about all primary treatment can achieve.

A fundamental concern related to municipal waste water is how much oxygen demanding matter it contains. Oxygen demanding matter takes up oxygen from its environment to decompose. A primary treatment system, if efficiently designed and operated, can only reduce up to 40 per cent of the oxygen demanding substances found in municipal waste water. The remaining 60 per cent will be discharged into the system.

It is important to remove as much organic matter as possible that requires oxygen to decompose from municipal waste water so it does not consume oxygen that fish need to thrive. Such matter does not then demand heavy chlorination and subsequent disinfection processes.

Primary treatment cannot address concerns related to toxins, including removal of heavy metals that are commonly found in Canadian municipalities.

A country–wide program of improving the treatment of municipal sewage to a minimum standard of at least that of primary treatment facilities will not in all cases adequately conserve and protect the environment. More important, in the jurisdiction of water treatment, municipalities will, en masse, cry foul if the federal government presumes to tell them how to achieve a technology that many of them have to this date perfected in an extremely economical manner.

I would not like to be the federal politician who attempts to tell Mayor Hazel McCallion of Mississauga, a mayor well known for her strength of character, how to treat her water system rather than what minimal standards should be maintained coming out of Mississauga. In fact, when the current infrastructure program was designed and offered to Mississauga, the city council did not request money for water treatment. The basic structures were in such good shape that Mississauga requested a one–third portion contribution for a living arts centre which created, as an aside, 950 jobs.

The standard of water in Mississauga is absolutely one of the highest in the country. No government has ever told the city how to do this.

Improving the treatment of municipal sewage is a commendable objective, but it does not fully address the issue of conservation and effective management of Canada's water sources. What is urgently needed at the municipal level are sewer use bylaws to restrict access to the sewer systems of substances not amenable to treatment. Also municipalities should charge water users the full and true cost of both supplying drinkable, usable water and treating waste water after its use, as is done in Mississauga. At this very time water charges in Mississauga are double, water amount going in and water amount going out.

Municipal water in Canada has traditionally been underpriced in comparison to other utilities or essential services. Many years of water prices set at artificially low levels by municipalities have not allowed Canadian communities to accumulate adequate reserve funds for renovation and upgrading of water infrastructure. Also low water prices have offered no incentive for technological advance. Thus, the municipal water industry has been left with old technologies, inefficient plants and very low levels of innovation.

A country–wide program to improve sewage treatment to at least the level of primary treatment would still leave all current pricing problems intact and without resolution.

• (1915)

According to 1991 statistics, which are the most recent figures available, the level of revenues collected by Canadian municipalities for water use and sewerage charges is in the order of $3.3 billion. With the probable exception of property taxes, revenues from water use are the largest source of income for municipal governments. At current prices, for many Canadian municipalities this revenue source is still insufficient for municipalities to operate and maintain their water infrastructures.

What are Canadians to do to deal with this apparent shortfall? Surprisingly, researchers have found that as the price of water increases, the demand decreases. This is not witchcraft. We have all seen this in the pricing of many commodities.

In accordance with the polluter pays principle, municipal water customers should pay for waste water treatment according to their level of water use. The federal government cannot be big brother and pay for all minimal water treatment across the country. Treatment according to the level of water use is the most important product of proper water conservation.

Similarly, industries that use municipal sewers and treatment as their primary or only method of waste water abatement should pay for the extra stress they place on water treatment plants. Perhaps municipalities should even pay their provinces in proportion to the level of contamination of their effluent for the right to deposit their waste water in lakes, rivers and other communal waterways.

Cheap water in Canada has led to unnecessarily high water usage. Higher water usage has led municipalities to install water systems that are larger than would be needed if realistic pricing policies were implemented by Canadian communities to bring out true water conservation.

I believe water conservation is the real way of the future. Pricing based on quantity of water used provides each user with the incentive to conserve water. This leads to cost savings by water consumers as well as municipalities themselves in terms of their capital expenditures and maintenance costs of waste water treatment plants. It also encourages less reliance on unpredictable purification chemicals, which in the future may cause other problems.

Let me emphasize that there is wastage by the consumer, who has no incentive, financial or otherwise, to conserve water supplies. In addition, public utilities find it cheaper to process and pump more clean water through the system than to find and repair expensive leaks. In some areas of Canada, system leakage accounts for 40 per cent of total pumping. Country–wide primary treatment for municipal sewage, as proposed by the hon. member for Comox—Alberni, will do nothing to correct that.

If I may call the attention of the hon. members to the 1987 federal water policy, the concept of full cost pricing, which includes extra sewer charges for industrial waste and the promotion of universal metering, is a cornerstone of that document. The infrastructure related components of the federal water policy accord well with the policies outlined in Creating Opportunity: The Liberal Plan for Canada.

The 1987 federal water policy is based on a user pay principle. This means users should be responsible for funding a particular service in approximate proportion to their consumption. User pay wherever possible is an appropriate principle for our times and one this government endorses.

To monitor the progress of implementation of the 1987 federal water policy, Environment Canada undertook in 1991 a survey of water piping practices among Canadian municipalities of at least 1,000 inhabitants or more. The results were somewhat of a disappointment. The Government of Canada had spent the four years since the release of the 1987 federal water policy promoting the benefits of full cost pricing as a means of water conservation and adequate financing of water infrastructure programs. Environment Canada found, however, that half of the surveyed municipalities were still charging a flat rate for water use.

Under such circumstances there is no incentive for water consumers to lower their consumption. In addition, water consumers often have no idea of how much water they are actually using as there is no meter attached to their facility or home to court and compile the number of cubic metres of water used.

In summary, a country–wide program with the sole goal of improving municipal sewage treatment to the minimum level of primary treatment would not solve Canada's problems in the area of municipal waste water treatment. Minimal chemical purification and ultimately a serious concern for conservation of this valuable resource is the true direction this government should be taking. Therefore I will not be supporting this very shortsighted bill at this time.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to wager that if Motion No. M–425 came from the other side of the House it would get a different hearing in the House.

• (1920)

I cannot imagine anyone concerned about clean water and health issues saying that this bill will not look after all the problems of Canada in terms of our water supply. Who says it would? Motion No. M-425 simply calls for raising the standard in Canada to a minimal standard, a standard that would have solid settling, chlorination and discharge of sewage in a much different manner from what we have today. Is it simplistic to try to raise the standard of water treatment in Canada? Where I come from it is not.

I would like to tell a little story relating to water quality. I am a fisherman. I enjoy sport fishing. The river that flows through the community near me is world class as a sport fishing river, the Bow River. In my youth I fished in that river and was unable to eat the fish. They were beautiful rainbow trout, wonderful to catch. A 24–inch rainbow would take me 20 minutes to land, but I released every one. They were oily downstream of Calgary. There was a huge amount of waste going into the Bow River.

I have a cousin in England who is a very keen fisherman. He came all the way from England to fish in the Bow River with me. He asked me whether I expected he would catch a wild trout in this beautiful stretch of water. I pretty well guaranteed him that he would. I told him what time of year to come. I said that I had some experience there and had the opportunity to just about guarantee him that unless there was a change in weather, a tremendous amount of extra mud in the water, he would be guaranteed a fish.

He did catch the first wild rainbow trout of his life. I will never forget him holding that beautiful fish out of the water and asking for a picture to be taken, then saying to me, "I must release this fish, it will be polluted". I was able to say to him, "No, Derrick, that fish today is edible". Over the 25 years since I had been fishing this river Calgary had cleaned up its act to the point where this beautiful fish could be eaten. He said, "I am a conservationist, I think I will release it anyway". And he did.

Does the treatment of effluent downstream of a big city make any difference? I believe it does.

I heard all kinds of praise for the infrastructure program from members opposite, an infrastructure program that I flatly think is an abject failure. To borrow $6 billion and mortgage the future of my children and my grandchildren to provide short term jobs in Canada is fundamentally flawed.

I will give one example of how badly the infrastructure program failed. This is a municipality I am responsible for in my own constituency.

Ms. Cohen: Are you going to make the announcement?

Mr. Hill (Macleod): You bet. I am making that announcement here in front of everybody in Canada.

The infrastructure program was a pronounced failure in a constituency at home. What did the municipality do for infrastructure in my own constituency? It bought a grader, a Yankee–built grader. It shipped it home by a U.S. trucker. It paid for it with borrowed dollars. It produced one job, just one job. The infrastructure program in this municipality produced one job. Is that an advantage? That is an advantage for whom? It is an advantage for a U.S. manufacturer with a grader. The infrastructure program is an abject failure.

• (1925)

This bill will simply raise the standard in Canada. Will it solve all the problems in Canada? It will not. If this bill were coming from the other side of the House, there would be effusive praise for such a bill. Since it is not, I am convinced it will not gain support.

I ask members opposite, how can they argue against cleaner water in Canada? How can they argue with that?

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to speak to Motion No. M–425 because I want my Reform colleagues to know that I support it wholeheartedly. I am delighted indeed that the Reform Party has brought it forward.

I regret that my colleague from Mississauga West and I find ourselves on different sides of this debate. The reason I support this bill so wholeheartedly is that not only does it address a very serious problem and address it in a very responsible way, but it also addresses the problem of federalism versus regionalism. I find to my absolute delight that the Reform Party has put a motion on the floor that actually argues for a strong central government rather than regionalism, as that party tends to support generally.

I am very aware of the sewage problem that occurs in Victoria, where sewage treatment consists of building a longer pipe into the ocean so that the effluent does not come back to the beaches of Victoria. I am also aware that the United Kingdom is very angry right now because constantly on the beaches of the Hebrides, the Orkneys and the northern coast of Scotland are effluent, plastic materials and garbage that can be identified as coming from Canada. This is absolutely an intolerable situation.

Why can we not rely on municipalities to spend the money to give the kinds of treatment facilities that are demanded by this motion? The answer is that municipalities are driven by local interests. Often they have priorities that are very local and are unwilling to support things that actually pertain to society at large and to our global environment. In other words, if it is not in one's own local backyard then it is easier to spend elsewhere.

We have a situation where regional interests cannot look after the problem and we must look to a strong federal government to provide the money and the leadership to attack this problem. I regret absolutely that we do not have in the Constitution some provision that says the federal government would have the power to prevent Victoria from simply dumping sewage into the sea.

Not only is this motion well taken but it is ironic because it shows that the third party—and I have great admiration for the third party on certain issues—supports the kind of concept that we Liberals have when we see a strong central government showing leadership in many ways.

I have to add that implicit in this motion is the suggestion that the federal government should have the necessary funds to provide minimum sewage treatment in various municipalities across the land.

In conclusion, I do not support the Bloc amendment because that is a regional amendment, but I want the Reform Party to know, especially the member for Comox—Alberni, this is a very fine motion. I congratulate them on bringing it before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided for consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 98, the order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

• (1930)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 38 on behalf of the constituents of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt on an issue of national importance.

On October 3, I asked the Minister of National Defence a question pertaining to Colonel Kenward who ordered the destruction of video tape evidence of an airborne regiment hazing video. The minister's response was, to say the least, insufficient.

The video tapes that were ordered destroyed impeded the investigation of the military police. Lieutenant–Colonel Kenward, who was subsequently promoted to full colonel by the chief of the defence staff despite the minister's own reservations, ordered the destruction of the video tapes. It was later revealed that three copies of the video tape existed.

This does not justify the actions of Lieutenant–Colonel Kenward. There will never be any way of knowing whether the three copies match the one destroyed by Lieutenant–Colonel Kenward's order.

This case is an example of the serious problems with the system of justice at the Department of National Defence. This case may in fact be providing details of a miscarriage of justice within the senior command of the Department of National Defence.

The Minister of National Defence notified me in his response on October 3 that the chief of defence staff, General John de Chastelain, would hold a press conference on the issue to clear the air. I personally attended that press conference and I would like to say that it did not clear the air. It muddied the waters further.

The CDS presented the official side of the story with a documented audit trail detailing how Lieutenant–Colonel Kenward was promoted to full colonel. What became clear from these documents was that the chief of defence staff had intervened on behalf of Lieutenant–Colonel Kenward to ensure his promotion.

Documents he released showed that he wrote to the Canadian Armed Forces judge advocate general on behalf of Lieutenant–Colonel Kenward. The correspondence included quotes from Kenward himself denying that he had intended any wrongdoing. The judge advocate general, after considering this counsel from his superior, the chief of defence staff, cleared Kenward's name and cleared the way for Kenward's promotion.

This type of shenanigans underlines the culture of cover–up at the highest level of the Department of National Defence. Kenward's promotion to full colonel was secured despite the concerns of the military police and the Minister of National Defence.

The minister has publicly admitted that he expressed his concerns regarding the promotion to the chief of defence staff and the chief of defence staff refused to heed them. Clearly the minister has no confidence in the CDS and the CDS has little respect for the minister's judgment.

This case is indicative of the problems with our military justice system. It is difficult to believe the military police had their investigation thwarted by the chief of defence staff and the judge advocate general.

I believe that justice was not served. Canadians still want the Minister of National Defence to clarify his position. When did the Minister of National Defence learn that Colonel Kenward had destroyed video tape evidence? Was it before or after the promotion? Why did he have reservations about the promotion of Kenward to full colonel?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this all relates to Somalia and the airborne. The hon. member is clearly misguided in his attempts to discredit the Minister of National Defence and the government.

The Reform Party platform of using specious arguments and half truths for partisan gain has done nothing to help Canada deal with the issue at hand.

By contrast, the Minister of National Defence and the government have acted forthrightly and effectively. I believe this is what Canadians are seeing and what they are asking for. They are rejecting the disparaging arguments being put forth by the Reform Party.

Let us look at the facts. It was this government that called for an inquiry. More specifically, it was this member as opposition defence critic who asked for the inquiry two and a half years ago, not the Reform Party. It was this government that ensured the inquiry would be public. It was this government that made the commitment to make Canadian forces members available to the commission when they were called upon to testify. It was this government that encouraged people with any information that may be of interest to the commission to go forward to the inquiry. It was this government that ensured the Somali inquiry was provided with complete and accurate information and that relevant documents were made available to the commission.

• (1935)

DND and the Canadian forces have and will continue to co–operate fully with the commission that has been established. Not all our actions have been easy. The public rightfully demanded that the government address this serious issue in an expedient manner, but this had to be tempered with prudence. Where others may have attempted to score quick political points, we stayed the course waiting for the Westray mine decision so that justice would not later be undone as a result of a legal technicality.

These actions point toward leadership, integrity and a willingness to get things done. There is nothing to sustain the utterly fallacious and ultimately destructive arguments being put forward by the Reform Party. We will certainly not be goaded into taking ill advice and precipitous action. We are monitoring the commission proceedings. Canadians can rest assured that appropriate actions will be initiated when and where they are warranted.

Now is the time to let the commission do its work. We look forward to hearing the recommendations of the commission. In summary, the Canadian forces have a long and proud heritage that we are not prepared to discard. I suggest that the Reform Party share this sentiment.

CUBA

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, some time ago I had occasion to ask the minister about the issue of the Helms–Burton bill dealing with an embargo against goods from Cuba. I should like to introduce my question this evening by reminding the representative of the ministry about some of the facts of the bill.

We in Canada share the interest of American legislators and Americans generally in seeing Cuba begin to respect human rights and to open up its economy to forces from outside so that it has a liberal, open economy for the benefit of all Cuban citizens. What we are talking about here is the method whereby this change may be obtained.

We believe, it seems to me in our government, in a form of open trading whereby we can liberalize trade relationships by having relations with one another. The United States, for some reason not difficult to understand because it is rooted in U.S. domestic politics, has chosen in respect of Cuba an embargo that flies in the face of its policies with respect to other countries, which seeks to penalize the Cuban government and the Cuban people for the fact that they are unwilling to conform to U.S. standards and practices.

We do not deny the United States has the right to embargo Cuba if that is what its domestic policies call for it to do. What we object to, what I will ask for further information on and what I asked in the question I earlier posed to the minister was what we were doing in Canada to ensure the measures being adopted by the American Congress do not proceed in a way that would violate international law, violate international obligations of the United States to Canada and violate our rights to conduct our relationships with Cuba and the Cuban people in a way that we can ensure Canadian policies and Canadian law are respected.

The bill on which I asked the question, known colloquially as the Helms–Burton bill, has in it several items that are very problematic to us as Canadians. They prohibit U.S. persons from extending financing to businesses that traffic in property confiscated by the Cuban government. A U.S. person is defined in the bill in such a way that it could extend to subsidiaries in Canada. It denies entry into the United States of persons, individuals or shareholders of corporations who traffic in U.S. property. It gives to the United States courts the jurisdiction to decide compensation claims for property confiscated by any foreign government.

In all respects we have serious problems with these propositions. It represents in many ways a secondary boycott which the United States has said in the past it totally disapproves of in respect of the Arab boycott of Israel. It represents extraterritorial measures against Canadian corporations carrying on lawful business in this country and with Cuba. It gives to the United States courts a jurisdiction that frankly would introduce extraordinarily difficult measures in respect of dealing with the United States in United States courts.

These measures reflect a view of the United States Congress that is willing to take measures against the interests of the United States in many respects, against international law and against its international obligations to Canada and other nations. As such, it is a dangerous precedent because it reflects a sense of the United States power which says it is above the rules it has set and in which all of us participate.

• (1940)

I would be anxious to know what measures the Government of Canada can take to tell the U.S. Congress what we can do to protect ourselves. How can we use the Extraterritorial Measures Act which we already have? How can we respond to Congress to let the U.S. know that we in this country intend to pursue our rightful place in the international community in a way that respects our interests and our proper commercial relationships with a friendly country?

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rosedale and the chairman of the parliamentary Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs and International Trade will agree with me that Canada and the U.S. share common objectives of democracy, human rights and market oriented reforms in Cuba. However, we differ on the best way to achieve such goals. Canada favours engagement and dialogue.

Currently there is legislation before the U.S. Congress which would extend the U.S. embargo against Cuba. When the legislation was first introduced in February, the Canadian government examined it and found provisions which could be harmful to Canadian interests. We made our concerns known to both the administration and Congress. As well, businesses and other groups on both sides of the border have opposed the legislation. Many other countries have also expressed concerns over the legislation.

Canada's key concerns related to proposals that would restrict imports of sugar and sugar–containing products from countries which import sugar from Cuba and that would allow U.S. citizens to make claims in U.S. courts against foreign companies investing in property expropriated by the Cuban government. This approach to claims would be contrary to generally accepted principles of international law and could have repercussions on international investments beyond Cuba. The proposals would restrict entry into the U.S. of officers of certain foreign companies which have business dealings with Cuba.

What is the current situation? Different versions of the bills have been passed by the House and the Senate and these now have to be reconciled in a conference committee. Canadian efforts were successful in having the proposed sugar restrictions removed from both versions of the bills.

Our other key concerns have been partly addressed. While the version of the bill passed by the Senate removes the provisions on investment claims and temporary entry, these remain in the House version of the legislation. Canada is continuing to press for the controversial provisions dropped from the version passed by the Senate to not be reintroduced in any final version of the legislation.

It is not clear when the conference committee will present a reconciled version of the legislation or if the common bill would be able to muster enough votes to pass both the House and the Senate. If passed, the final stage would be to send the bill to the President for his consideration. As the hon. member knows, the U.S. administration shares many of Canada's concerns. The U.S. Secretary of State has told Congress that he will recommend that President Clinton veto the bill if an unacceptable version is passed. Should the objectionable provisions be reinserted, Canada would urge a presidential veto of the bill.

I compliment the hon. member. I know he has many connections, communications and dealings with colleagues in the United States. He has also been playing a very important role in helping us to keep a Canadian foreign policy, while letting the United States keep its foreign policy in relation to Cuba.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on November 8 I asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Foreign Affairs why Canada withdrew its sponsorship of UN resolution L–3 which seeks a stop to nuclear weapons tests.

Nuclear tests are presently being carried out by the French government and are being planned by the Government of China. Both governments are contravening the spirit of the extended nuclear non–proliferation treaty and negotiations toward a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty.

It might be recalled that on September 5 the foreign affairs minister issued a news release in which he deplored the tests. He stated: "Canada's policy on testing is clear: no testing by any nuclear weapons state and speedy progress toward concluding a comprehensive test ban treaty". In keeping with this policy, on October 31, Canada and the United Nations chose to co–sponsor UN resolution L–3 which seeks a stop to nuclear weapons tests.

• (1945)

Suddenly, on November 7 Canada and the United Nations decided to withdraw its co–sponsorship. The reason? It would appear that the sponsorship was a mistake. Whose mistake is the question.

The next day, November 8, the Prime Minister from New Zealand re–emphasized Canada's position stating that Canada deplores the actions of the French government and that Canada hopes the tests will stop rapidly.

Today, on November 21, the question is: How can we deplore nuclear testing at the level of the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Prime Minister, except to co–sponsor an important UN resolution against testing and then a week later withdraw our co–sponsorship of a resolution that is not only consistent with the views of government leaders, but also consistent with our stated unequivocal policy on nuclear weapons testing?

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to respond to the hon. member for Davenport on the subject of Canada's position on nuclear testing.

I can assure the hon. member that today, November 21, Canada's position on nuclear testing rests on a bedrock of Canadian tradition in support of a comprehensive test ban treaty. On this issue, as the hon. member said, our position has been consistent and clear. It remains unchanged to this day: no testing by any nuclear weapons state.

The government has repeatedly stated Canada's deep commitment to the early conclusion of a comprehensive test ban treaty. Such a treaty should prohibit all nuclear testing regardless of size, in all environments for all time. For Canada, this remains our most important and immediate arms control and disarmament priority.

Last week, in the first committee of the United Nations General Assembly, Canada voted in favour of a resolution strongly deploring nuclear testing. Canada was also a lead co–sponsor of the resolution which calls for the early completion of an effective CTBT. Together these resolutions represent Canada's firm position on testing.

Canada played a leading role in securing the indefinite extension of the treaty on the non–proliferation of nuclear weapons last May. The indefinite extension of the NPT provides the foundation for real disarmament.

Among the decisions agreed to by all the countries of the NPT review conference was the need to complete a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty no later than 1996.

Canadian actions since then have been calibrated to ensure that everything possible is done to meet the commitments taken in May and to reinforce the integrity of the non–proliferation treaty.

Canada's active role in the CTBT negotiations in Geneva and our efforts to develop the necessary political support for the early conclusion of the CTBT within multilateral fora such as the OAS and the recent Commonwealth heads of government meeting have been buttressed by the welcomed announcements made by the U.S.A., U.K. and France that they support a zero threshold comprehensive test ban treaty. A zero threshold CTBT would ban all tests for all time.

We believe these public affirmations by three of the five nuclear weapon states will greatly assist the negotiations in reaching an early and successful conclusion to the CTBT.

In conclusion, let me repeat yet again that Canada's position on nuclear testing is clear and firm. We oppose all testing and remain committed to a CTBT in 1996.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important issues facing prairie people today is the future of the Canadian Wheat Board. The vast majority of prairie producers support the Canadian Wheat Board yet they feel that its future is being threatened. There are many reasons for this, not the least of which has been the federal minister of agriculture's complete reluctance to stand up for the board whenever it needed defending.

The latest threat, however, is the continued freelancing of wheat into the United States by individuals who seem to think they can ignore the law to further their own goals.

• (1950)

There have been numerous organized attempts to cross the border from Canada into the United States to sell wheat. These are strictly prohibited by Canadian law. In doing so these freelancers are exacerbating trade tensions between Canada and the United States, are risking the complete shutdown of agricultural trade between Canada and the United States, or at the very least are risking the imposition of yet another cap on the sales that currently occur under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Things are not getting any better out there. Canada has enjoyed some very good wheat sales into the United States. Millers and pasta makers want our high quality durum and the Canadian Wheat Board has been taking full advantage of that in promoting the high quality Canadian product throughout the U.S. marketplace.

However, U.S. farmers do not like this. There is a lot of political and public pressure on U.S. congressmen and senators to stop the cross–border traffic in wheat. Canada could very well find itself squaring off with the United States in the near future, not just across our border, but in the world marketplace as well. This is looking more and more likely as the new U.S. farm bill comes into being.

The Americans are looking at maintaining a dominant role in the world marketplace. They are looking to increase their grain production. They are expecting to leave their export enhancement program in place. When you add this into the pot with the negative feeling toward those north of the border, that could certainly be bad news for Canada.

In maintaining friendly trading relations with the United States, the Canadian Wheat Board has successfully sold tonnes of wheat into the United States over the years. The wheat has moved quietly and quickly into the U.S. market and Canadian farmers who respect the board have been rewarded with increased payments from the board.

In supporting the board, Saskatchewan's minister of agriculture, Andy Renaud, said: "The Canadian Wheat Board can move grain into the U.S. for the benefit of all prairie farmers, not just a few, and do it in a way that minimizes as much as possible the threat of new trade restrictions".

He also said that the Saskatchewan government supports strong action to stop illegal sales to ensure that the U.S. market remains open for all farmers.

The Americans, and in particular the American multi–national grain corporations, realize the strength of the board and have been campaigning to force us to get rid of it. The board has been so successful that the U.S. feels threatened by it. Now some Canadian farmers are joining forces with these Americans to try to kill the board.

They falsely believe that without the board they will have better success at marketing their own grains in the United States. The board is defending itself in the marketplace but it needs help from Canada's minister of agriculture. Good words are one thing but actions are more important.

At a recent grain industry general meeting the minister said that those who cross the border with grain for sale are law breakers and that those who violate the law are harming their cause to get changes to the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

In response I urge the minister not to make changes to the Canadian Wheat Board Act. And one more time I ask him, is he prepared to take whatever action is necessary to defend single desk selling and enforce the rules and regulations as they have been set out in Canadian law?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and his comments.

I say at the outset that many if not all my constituents are going to be surprised to see me stand up and answer a question on prairie farmers and the Canadian Wheat Board, but as the hon. member knows the duties of a parliamentary secretary are many and varied, particularly during the adjournment debate.

The Canadian Wheat Board Act and Canadian Wheat Board regulations, as the hon. member knows, state that any export of wheat and barley requires an export licence issued by the Canadian Wheat Board. The law is very clear on this point.

The Customs Act administered by Revenue Canada is applied in support of the Canadian Wheat Board program. It requires exporters shipping wheat and barley to the United States to first obtain an export licence. It is very clear.

Proceeds from the sales of the unauthorized exports are not deposited into the Canadian Wheat Board pooling accounts. Therefore, when this occurs producers who comply with the wheat board export program receive no benefit and are hurt by the resultant loss of the potential export opportunities engendered by the legal freelancers, as pointed out by the hon. member.

Within the democratic system of government in Canada there are other ways to work for change without deliberately engaging in unauthorized and illegal activities which may create unnecessary problems with the management of our international trade relations.

The western grain marketing panel process was put in place so that grain farmers, industry and other shareholders could have an opportunity to participate in a number of grassroots fora to discuss the current grain marketing system including the Canadian Wheat Board.

On behalf of the minister of agriculture, I would advise those who are dissatisfied with the current marketing system to participate fully in the western grain marketing panel and its process to improve the system and to do what the hon. member is suggesting is a more orderly method of conducting business.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 38, the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24.

(The House adjourned at 7.56 p.m.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, November 22, 1995

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers

The Speaker: We are beginning a new tradition today which has been decided in committee and by order of the House. I shall now recognize the hon. member for Beaver River to lead the House in the singing of the national anthem.

[Editor's Note: Whereupon members sang the national anthem.]

THE LATE GARY HERREMA

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with sorrow that I report on the passing on Monday of Gary Herrema, chair of the regional municipality of Durham.

Mr. Herrema, who was a long time resident and farm operator in Uxbridge, was first elected in 1969 as councillor for what was then Scott township. As a testament to his leadership abilities, Gary Herrema became Durham regional chair in 1980 and remained in that position until his death just this last Monday.

Durham, for the edification of the House, represents 425,000 people.

I am proud to note that not only was Gary Herrema a Liberal candidate in the 1984 federal election, he was also an active and long time supporter of his community, of Parliament and of Canada.

Today Durham residents and their fellow Canadians are saddened by the loss of Gary Herrema. On their behalf, I convey my heartfelt sympathy to his wife, Helen, and to his family.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Gary Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the senators held hearings in western Canada on Bill C–68, giving many Canadians the only chance they had to be heard.

The senators heard testimony from retired town councillor Jim Barker in Dauphin, Manitoba. He estimated that by the year 2003 the town of Dauphin will have to hire two more RCMP constables and two police clerks to handle the additional workload to implement the Liberal government's flawed firearm registration scheme.

Barker testified: "The ratepayers of this town will have to budget a minimum expenditure increase of $200,000 per year. It is interesting to note that if these costs are at or near average, then the total cost to the lower levels of government in Canada for firearms registration would be around $540 million per year".

This new evidence had never been heard by Parliament before and justified the senators' decision to take their hearings on the road. Why is it that senators in Ontario, Quebec and Atlantic Canada did not give their citizens the same opportunity to be heard as voters in the west?

HIGHWAY 104

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, thanks to the hon. member of the Conservative Party from Sherbrooke who wrote to the auditor general, the death valley diversion in Nova Scotia became a national issue.

In turn, the auditor general is very critical of the government for diverting $26 million from a federal–provincial agreement for work on a dangerous stretch of the Trans–Canada Highway to a tourist trail in the riding of the minister of public works.

The auditor general noted in his report that "the agreement assigns a duty of project review and approval but in this case, such a review was pre–empted by ministers who presented the matter as a fait accompli to officials who, in the circumstances, could only implement the decision".

Although they were forced to reverse their decision in August, upgrades to death valley will still be paid for by toll fees.

The public works minister, agreeing with the leader of the third party, once said the province was showing real leadership by making people pay user fees for their highways. The people of Nova Scotia and my party certainly do not feel that way.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada has a long tradition of active involvement within the UN field of human rights. This tradition started with the late John Humphrey, one of the architects of the international bill of rights and the first director of the UN human rights division.

Canada continues to play a prominent role in promoting universal human rights and in strengthening international human rights mechanisms.

Since the establishment of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights in 1993, Canada has sought to integrate the activities of the high commissioner and other human rights institutions into the UN's political, security and developmental activities and into the early warning and preventive work of the organization. This is an indication of Canada's overall emphasis on addressing root causes of instability which is consistent with the vision UN Secretary–General Boutros Boutros–Ghali outlined in his "Agenda for Peace".

As we welcome the UN Secretary–General to our nation's capital, let us reaffirm Canada's commitment to promote human rights in the community of nations and to strengthen the United Nations.

LINCOLN AND WELLAND REGIMENT

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, members of the Lincoln and Welland Regiment from St. Catharines have recently received two additional and long overdue battle honours from World War II.

The medals are in honour of the exceptional conduct and courage of the members of the Lincoln and Welland Regiment while part of the 10th Infantry Brigade of the Canadian 4th Armoured Division during battles in Kustan Canal and Bad–Zwisch, Germany in April 1945.

Colonel Don Muir, a major in command of a rifle battalion during both battles, noted that fighting was very intense in those last weeks of the war. Roy Adams, the regiment's president and also a veteran of those battles noted that his only regret is that many of the men who helped them earn these honours have passed away.

I would just like to say how proud I am and all Canadians are of our veterans. Their dedication, discipline and sacrifice made an allied victory possible in the second world war.

Congratulations to the Lincoln and Welland Regiment on this well earned, overdue honour.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, western Canadian farmers are frustrated by the manner in which the WGTA payout is being handled. The lack of direction in providing formulas for sharing of the payment by landowner and tenant producer has caused confusion, tension and in many cases bitterness at the farm gate. Farmers who have financial agreements with the Farm Credit Corporation are particularly upset with its handling of the WGTA payout.

The minister instructed the FCC in March 1995 to pass along the benefit to producers. That benefit has mysteriously shrunk over the last eight months to a whopping 25 per cent of the benefit. Their questionable rationale was that holding back 75 per cent of the benefit would result in lower lease and sale agreements. The fact is the Farm Credit Corporation lease agreements and buyback asking prices have actually increased by as much as 20 per cent.

• (1405)

Farmers are demanding that the agriculture minister and the Farm Credit Corporation honour their original commitment to the producers of prairie grain.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's thinly disguised threats to the CBC, which he accuses of not fulfilling its mandate as a promoter of Canadian unity, are an attack on the freedom of the press.

It is therefore not surprising that the Fédération professionnelle des journalistes du Québec has launched a petition aimed at preserving the independence of this crown corporation. The FPJQ feels that the Prime Minister has questioned the corporation's independence from the government.

For the Bloc members, there is nothing ambiguous about the message between the lines of what has been said by the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister and the minister of fisheries: the CBC is vulnerable to government pressure.

Now one wonders whether the scope of the budget cuts is not a form of reprisal by the Prime Minister, who has never accepted the change in the CBC's mandate and sees it as nothing more than a propaganda organ.

LEADER OF THE BLOC QUEBECOIS

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, since the election of the Parti Quebecois in September 1994, the people of Quebec have been held hostage by a handful of power hungry politicians with nothing better to do than to govern by referendum.

Rather than take advantage of his first press conference to differentiate himself from his predecessor, the leader of the Bloc chose to follow in his footsteps, announcing right off the bat his intention to sign no new constitutional agreement with Canada and to prepare for another referendum on Quebec separation.

My constituents in Saint–Denis need jobs and a stronger guarantee of security for themselves and their children. And it is certainly not by scaring away investors, as the PQ has done for the past year or more, that the leader of the Bloc will manage to reduce unemployment in Quebec.

The people have waited too long. It is high time now for the Parti Quebecois to finally put "their hearts in their work".

REFORM PARTY OF CANADA

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the 52 ridings the Reformers won, Reformers outspent Liberal candidates by almost half a million dollars.

That is right. The party that likes to point fingers at others about spending spent over $2.2 million to win its seats. Now, two years after having won those seats, Reformers have told the media they are going to sit in them less. That is right. They spent almost $43,000 a seat and they have said that Ottawa costs too much and they do not like it here.

We have lots of expensive seats on the Reform side but no one wants to fill them. Perhaps it is time for us to have a seat sale.

POLITICAL PARTY AGENDAS

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to express serious concerns.

In this House there is a separatist party that is quite open about its desire to break up Canada. We may not like its beliefs but its mandate is clear.

However, we have another party, the Reform Party, that does not like social programs, does not like our health care program, does not like the Canada pension plan and criticizes every attempt to end duplication. Time and time again that party has shown its contempt for Atlantic Canada. Now it says it will be the voice to represent Atlantic Canadians. I tell this House that Atlantic Canadians will not support a party that cannot decide what to support itself.

The Liberal Party agenda has always been clear. The Liberal government believes that all Canadians are born equal and deserve equal rights. We believe in offering a hand up to those in need and we continue to work night and day to rebuild an economy to assure that all Canadians have an opportunity for employment.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal old federalists in Atlantic Canada continue to fail people in the region. Their short term patronage ridden band–aid solutions are not working.

The Liberal solution to unemployment in Cape Breton is simply to airlift people out to Ontario. They cling to the belief that bureaucrats and politicians should have all the say in how regional development resources are spent. They ridicule Reform's proposal to give citizens at the provincial and community levels the tools needed to develop self–reliance and a strong economic future.

• (1410)

Rather than make the operations of the fisheries department more efficient, the Liberals are now imposing enormous tax increases on fishers and ports users. It is no wonder most Newfoundland MPs do not live or pay taxes there.

It is clear the government has neither a workable short range or long term vision for the Atlantic provinces. Reform will continue to listen to the needs and aspirations of Atlantic Canadians.

BOSNIA

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois welcomes the historic peace accord signed yesterday in Dayton, Ohio by the leaders of Bosnia, Croatia and Serbia. After four years of multilateral efforts to restore peace in the former Yugoslavia and end a bloody war that has claimed more than 250,000 lives, today there is hope that this accord will lead to a lasting peace.

Enormous challenges remain, however, and the international community will be asked to continue to provide not only humanitarian aid but also a 60,000 strong implementation force through NATO. This accord demonstrates that we were right to stay over there to protect the civilian population and take part in peacekeeping operations. We also believe we have a duty to take an active part in the peace process and the reconstruction which is about to begin.

RAILWAYS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, recently constituents who work at CP Rail and VIA came to me about safety concerns they have about the way the recent collective agreements are being interpreted and enforced.

Canadian Pacific locomotive engineers are concerned about what is called turnaround combination service. VIA running crews are likewise being made to work when in previous times they could have booked rest without penalty.

Making tired people drive trains is not progress; it is tempting fate in the name of a false bottom line. I urge the Minister of Transport to look into the situation and tell CP and VIA to smarten up for the sake of the employees and in the interests of public safety.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to reply to the rants of the Reform member for Vegreville about the political injustice he perceives exists in Atlantic Canada and specifically in P.E.I.

I take particular exception to the member's statement that "Islanders are forced to endure political oppression". Nothing could be further from the truth.

The only oppression that would occur in the Atlantic region would be if the Reform Party's policies of cutting the public health care system and Americanizing existing social programs were imposed on the people. I was shocked at the unfounded accusation of the member for Vegreville with respect to the political atmosphere on P.E.I.

Once again the Reform Party is exemplifying its pathetic policies of gaining cheap party support through divisiveness not only within the country as it did during the referendum but now within regions.

Shame to the member for Vegreville for unfounded accusations that can only be called cheap political fearmongering.

NATIONAL PATRIOTS DAY

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow on national patriots day, Quebeckers will pay tribute to those men and women who more than 150 years ago decided to defend and promote values which today are often taken for granted: freedom and democracy. It is no coincidence that November 23 was chosen by the National Assembly as the day on which we honour the memory of those who fought for civil and political freedoms as well as their national freedom.

On November 23, 1837, the Patriotes defeated British troops at Saint–Denis–sur–Richelieu, although the British outnumbered them and were better equipped. About a year ago, this House adopted a motion officially recognizing the historic contribution of the Patriotes to the establishment of democratic and responsible institutions. However, this government has taken no concrete action to make this recognition effective. I hope the government will acknowledge the will of the House and take appropriate action without delay.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Monday in a particularly hallucinogenic episode the member for Vegreville visualized himself and his party as the deliverers of freedom and democracy for the poor oppressed souls in Atlantic Canada.

His reference to the politically oppressed people of P.E.I. was just the latest and greatest example of why the Reform Party was not, is not and will never be anything but a bizarre footnote in the history of a short lived, radical, ideological party.

The Reform Party should have no illusions about sucking in the good people of Atlantic Canada. The people of Prince Edward Island and the Atlantic provinces have shown great maturity in the decisions they have made through the political process.

• (1415)

The statements made on Monday by the hon. member for Vegreville and in the past by those from his party only strengthen the case that the people of Atlantic Canada made the right decision on October 25, 1993 by completely rejecting the Reform Party and giving a resounding vote of support to the Prime Minister and the Liberal Party, the only national party that speaks for Atlantic Canadians.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in the final stretch of the referendum campaign, the Prime Minister made a commitment to respond to Quebeckers' desire for change. In the days following the referendum, the government set up two committees. One, chaired by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, is to propose changes to the federal system by Christmastime. Yesterday, outside the House, the government leader postponed the tabling of the committees' proposals by several months.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Are we to understand that the extension of the deadlines of the ministerial committee on constitutional change announced yesterday by the Prime Minister means he has been unable to rally the premiers of English Canada round a proposal for constitutional change?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first let me say we are very sorry to see the Leader of the Opposition leave the federal scene.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Over the past two years I have really enjoyed meeting him daily and answering his questions. I therefore wish him all the luck in the task he set for himself yesterday of dealing with Quebec's real problems—good management and putting Quebec's public finances in order. Obviously, someone else will be here across the way, in a few months.

However, to answer the hon. member's question, first, we have always said we were prepared to make changes. But we never promised to make constitutional changes, particularly since I promised during the referendum campaign that I would make no constitutional changes and that the House would not debate constitutional change if the Government of Quebec did not approve.

Yesterday, I got an answer from the Leader of the Opposition, who said he absolutely did not want any constitutional change. Therefore I am in no hurry, since he does not want any, and we said would not make any without their support.

However, some administrative changes may be made. There are signs of willingness on the part of the federal government, which could be debated and voted on in the House. I said that we would proceed with certain items between now and Christmas and I asked the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and his committee to report back by Christmas. We are not talking about several months. This is November 22, and in a month from now it will be three days before Christmas. So we are not talking about months, but weeks, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I note the profound sadness overcoming the Prime Minister at the prospect of my leaving the House of Commons, should the members of the Parti Quebecois so wish it. But he should not worry: I will not be far away.

I listened carefully to the Prime Minister's response on the changes he is not planning to make any more. Am I wrong, or did the Prime Minister say that he is backing down on the promise of constitutional change he made less than a month ago, that he is contemplating merely minor administrative changes and that his committee will now be called the ministerial committee on administrative change?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has gone back to his old habits of commenting on what we have said. He made absolutely gratuitous statements during the referendum, and we will not let him get away with it any more.

I never said we were going to change the Constitution. He should read the speech I gave. I said we were going to make changes to the federation, constitutional changes, if necessary, but I never said they were going to be constitutional. I also said there would be no constitutional change without Quebec's approval. The Leader of the Opposition said yesterday he did not want any. He wants to remain a separatist—good for him. So we will bear this in mind, we will do what has to be done to keep the federation running and we will get on with the real problems, as the Leader of the Opposition put it, we will be concerned with job creation, good government and the deficit problems of both the federal and the provincial governments.

If the Leader of the Opposition really wants to work on these problems, we are prepared to co–operate with him.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what a sorry about–face. If I ever do go to Quebec City, I will tell Mr. Johnson not to hold his breath for the changes he is expecting from the Prime Minister.

Should we conclude, and this question is clear—if there is one thing I have learned in this House, it is how to answer questions—are we to conclude that, as of today, less than a month after the referendum, after the speech we all heard in which the Prime Minister promised Quebec everything anyone could ever want after the referendum campaign, are we to understand that he is reneging on these changes he made hastily at the time and that he is going back to his old strategy of putting English Canada to sleep and offering Quebec nothing?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what I said in my speech was very simple. I said that my party and I had been, are currently and would be in favour of a distinct society for Quebec, something the Leader of the Opposition and his party fought against in the Charlottetown accord.

Furthermore, during the referendum, he criticized us for not having supported that, when they voted against it in the Charlottetown referendum and all the PQ members voted against the Meech Lake accord in the National Assembly. We are still in favour of a distinct society, as we indicated in Charlottetown and in this House. In order to add it to the Constitution, we require the approval of the Government of Quebec. The Leader of the Opposition has said he does not want it written into the Constitution. So we will not do it against the wishes of Quebec.

Secondly, I said that we did not want any constitutional changes without the agreement of the Government of Quebec or the people of Quebec, as has happened in the past. Sometimes referendums can be held. Here again, we cannot act without the approval of Quebec. We can, however, impose certain restrictions on ourselves, if we wish. This is perhaps what we will do.

As for sharing responsibilities, the minister responsible has signed nine agreements with the provinces to improve the system and put an end to duplication. The current PQ government is not interested in such an agreement. I hope that, as government leader, the Leader of the Opposition will make good management a priority and help us determine which jurisdictions are in competition so we can ensure that taxpayers in Quebec as in the other provinces receive the most for the taxes they pay annually to the two levels of government.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what a regrettable performance by someone wanting to renege on his commitments and not able to find a way to get out of those he cannot keep.

The Prime Minister of Canada was one of those who loved us so madly three days before the referendum that he promised recognition of a special status for Quebec. He promised us a right of veto, as well as decentralized powers. That is what he promised us just before the referendum, when he loved us.

• (1425)

Will the Prime Minister be frank enough to admit that he then heeded his mentor Pierre Trudeau's admonition of several weeks ago, and that his about–face is the result of the word from Trudeau?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I told Quebeckers there would be no constitutional change without the consent of the Government of Quebec.

Yesterday the man who wishes to head the Government of Quebec said that this was impossible, that he was a sovereignist, that he did not want any changes to the Constitution. I was not the one who said this, it was the Leader of the Opposition himself. As I have said, I will not make any changes against his wishes; let no one blame me for heeding the wishes of the Government of Quebec.

Second, as for the distinct society, we have affirmed this and will have other occasions to affirm it, and I hope that the hon. member for Roberval will get up in this House and state that he is in favour of a distinct society if that is what is wanted. I can hardly wait for that day to come.

Then we shall see what really happens. During the referendum campaign, they said that in their hearts they were opposed to a distinct society because they are sovereignists, and still unfortunately separatists.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, are the words of the Prime Minister, who is getting caught up in an increasingly tangled web, not an admission of his powerlessness, his inability to fulfil his commitments toward Quebec made within three days of the referendum, when he was in love with Quebec?

Is this not an admission of powerlessness? Does the Prime Minister realize that mere cosmetic changes will never satisfy Quebec, and that he is incapable of an in depth solution to the problem?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my speech is recorded and is clear. I said that the party I represent was in favour of a distinct society and that we were going to affirm it. We will have the opportunity to affirm it, even if the Bloc Quebecois does not want us to.

Second, I have said and I am committed to it, that we would not make any constitutional change without the consent of the Government of Quebec or the people of Quebec, and we are going to keep our word. Nothing can be clearer than that, and I repeat it today in this House.

As for better administration and shared responsibilities, we are working on this at the present time, and I trust that we will have the co–operation of the new Government of Quebec, unlike the current one, which has never wanted to discuss it seriously with the minister responsible for federal–provincial relations.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, all of us are familiar with the principle that those who do not learn from the mistakes of the past are bound to repeat them.

In the Quebec referendum campaign the biggest mistake the Prime Minister made was to grossly underestimate the demand for change in his home province. It was only in the last week of that campaign that he mentioned change at all, and when he did so it was so vague as to have no positive consequence on the campaign.

Will the Prime Minister repeat that mistake again by putting change on the back burner or will he present Canadians with a substantial plan for showing the way this federation ought to operate?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the third party always refers to the fact that we do not need any constitutional change. He said that in the House not long ago. He says that he does not want to weaken the federal government but whenever he makes a speech he asks us, for example, to dismantle medicare.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): They are changing their minds because the people of Alberta at this moment are telling the provincial government that they do not want to see medicare destroyed.

We are working to make sure there is less duplication and a better sharing of responsibilities between the provincial governments and the federal government. We are working on that.

• (1430)

However, if the goal is to destroy the central government in Ottawa so that we will have a community of communities, this Prime Minister is not for that.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister speaks of destroying the country and dismantling federalism. I remind him he is the one who allowed the country to get within .6 of 1 per cent—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Calgary Southwest.

Mr. Manning: Mr. Speaker, we are talking about mistakes. The worst mistake the federalists can make in preparing for the next and final contest with the separatists would be to use yesterday's tactics. Yesterday's tactics are for yesterday's federalists, not the new federalists of the 21st century.

That means it would be a profound mistake to go back to the contents and tactics of the Meech Lake or Charlottetown accords, with their talk of special status, distinct societies or vetoes for Quebec.

Will the Prime Minister assure the House and all Canadians that he will not be marching backwards into the future, that he will not go back to Meech or Charlottetown for solutions to the current struggle between federalists and separatists?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, here again we see the leader of the third party in bed with the separatist party in the House of Commons.

When we were fighting in Quebec the leader of the third party was in the House shooting at us, contrary to what the leader of the Conservative Party was doing; in the campaign, working for Canada. The leader of the Reform Party was always on his feet trying to ensure he might some day become the prime minister of the rest of the country, because he will never be the prime minister of the whole country, Canada.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious the Prime Minister will not listen to me. Maybe he will listen to someone from Quebec.

One of the most telling letters I received during the referendum was from a soft sovereignist who said he would probably vote yes, but who added this explanation: "The matter at hand is not really the separation of Canada and Quebec, but the separation of Quebec from the present form of federal government. You as a Reformer said you want decentralization, which necessitates serious change to the present form of federal government, but negotiations in good faith with the Liberals will not accomplish this".

This Quebecer does not want to separate from Canada but from an overcentralized federal government. He is one of the 80 per cent of Quebeckers who want a realignment of federal–provincial powers.

Some hon. members: Order.

The Speaker: I know the hon. member for Calgary Southwest will now put his question.

• (1435)

Mr. Manning: What is the Prime Minister's response to this demand for change from a Quebecer who really wants to stay in Canada?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the person is a soft sovereignist. Perhaps the leader of the third party, who hopes some day to be the leader of the opposition, although he might not succeed if he does not become better than he is, should stop quoting from separatists or quasi–separatists and start to really work with us to make sure Canada is a good country with values and a social system that binds all Canadians together.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. After hinting that he would not respect the democratic results of the referendum, the Prime Minister said he wanted to prevent another referendum from being held in Quebec and then went on to criticize the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which, according to him, did not show sufficient support for national unity during the last referendum campaign.

Does this mean that the Prime Minister not only wants to prevent Quebeckers from voting again on their future at the appropriate time but also wants to control the news coverage they get through the CBC?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, certainly not. I made certain comments. I said that some people complained about the way the CBC behaved during the referendum campaign. Someone also said that the CBC was jeopardizing its reputation and should be lumped in with all the other lackeys and puppets of the government.

Even the Leader of the Opposition criticized the CBC during the referendum campaign. I gave one opinion, and there were people who were not satisfied with the CBC's performance, including the Leader of the Opposition.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to set the record straight. The Leader of the Opposition criticized the CBC when the network refused to broadcast the Yes committee's message, not because of its news coverage.

Is the Prime Minister saying that he intends to put back into the Broadcasting Act the obligation to promote national unity and thus force the CBC to be its master's voice instead of an independent news broadcaster?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think that what we want is objective news coverage. As I said at the time, I am hardly in a position to complain, because since I want a good night's sleep, I do not listen to the CBC before I go to bed. That is why I am healthy. I get a good night's sleep.

However, we want our news coverage to be objective. But the funny thing is that when the opposition criticizes the CBC, there is no problem. But when the government party does, it is not fair. What I had to say, I said publicly. I have never spoken to the president of the CBC since he was appointed. I let him get on with his job. However, I will not refrain from expressing my opinion as party leader, like the Leader of the Opposition did during the referendum campaign.

TAXATION

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the auditor general has pointed out that the new E–file method of filing tax returns has serious flaws and is therefore open to substantial abuse, while the Minister of National Revenue says the system just needs a little fine tuning.

Canadians will quickly lose confidence in a system that penalizes honest taxpayers by letting others off the hook while this minister wants to squeeze every taxpayer until it hurts.

• (1440)

What commitment do we have today that the minister will fix the problems raised by the auditor general?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are happy at Revenue Canada to have the comments of the auditor general. However, the hon. member has exaggerated and used figures which are simply not accurate.

The auditor general said: "Although our analysis is insufficient to draw firm conclusions about cause and effect—more years of data are required to determine if this movement is temporary or permanent in nature".

Electronic filing provides substantial improvements in service to Canadians, to the taxpayer and to the government in terms of reduced costs. It improves the opportunity for effective surveillance to prevent fraud by people who might cheat the system. It also dramatically increases the speed with which cheques get out to the public.

It is a new system introduced in 1990. It is a system on which there are not full information years on which we can base substantial comparisons, but every indication is that the system is working absolutely as well as the previous paper system, except for the advantages I outlined.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister is asleep, like most of the others.

The government squeezed another $7.3 billion out of Canadians in the last fiscal year. It is obvious the government intends to balance the budget through increase taxation, not cuts in spending. Last year it collected $7.3 billion more in taxes while it reduced the deficit by only $4.5 billion.

Will the minister admit he does not have a tax cutting policy that works or a taxation collection policy that works, and that he does not know how he will fix either of them?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has correctly pointed out the tax system is generating more revenue. The basic reason is the confidence the business community has in the Minister of Finance. However, if I may modestly add, another reason is that Revenue Canada is working more effectively than ever before.

New developments in technology and the information highway are particularly difficult for Reformers to understand. We must still tell them the old system of inefficiency, time consuming as it was, which cost the taxpayer money and which led to more abuse and fraud, is not the way we will be going in the future.

We have over the last two years picked up $7 billion through our enforcement programs. We are doing this in a manner which recognizes that the client, the ordinary Canadian taxpayer, is in almost every case, at least 96 per cent, an honest citizen.

The approach of the opposition—

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister does not listen to Radio–Canada, one wonders how he can criticize the network.

My question is directed to the Minister of Human Resources Development. In his report released yesterday, the auditor general made it clear that manpower training programs are poorly adapted to the requirements of Canadian businesses.

Would the minister agree that the auditor general's harsh assessment of federal manpower training programs is further evidence it is high time the federal government withdrew altogether from manpower training and left it up to the provinces?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to set the record straight, I listen to CBC radio.

• (1445)

The auditor general said something we have been saying for the past two years: that we have to substantially revamp training programs to ensure that the private sector takes far more responsibility, invests far more of its dollars to help young people in particular get jobs, and that people in the existing workforce upgrade and get the kinds of skills required within the area.

Since 1993, as we have begun to make the changes the auditor general observed, we have been able to leverage over 77 million additional dollars from the private sector for training young people. It shows that while the auditor general was observing what should be done we were already doing it.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the minister stop being so stubborn and acknowledge that, if manpower training programs are to reflect the requirements of the private sector in terms of training and jobs, the minister should respond to a consensus in Quebec among government, business, unions and interest groups, all of whom want to see responsibility for manpower training patriated to Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate the hon. member did not do her homework before she asked the question. If she had, she would know that in July 1994 we signed an agreement with the province of Quebec, with the SQDM, in which we have a basic agreement and partnership on the supply of training. The SQDM advises on labour market demands, approves course selection, identifies qualified training institutions, determines course curriculum, confirms that training responds to skills. We are working in partnership with the SQDM to make sure we get full dollar.

I agree that we have to go beyond that. That is why in the reform we are developing we intend to give far more space to the provinces in the training area so they can make those choices and at the same ensure that clients under the unemployment insurance program are properly and effectively served and getting back to work.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, five years ago the Treasury Board approved a policy to make all government contributions to businesses repayable. In the finance minister's 1995 budget speech he confirmed that policy. Yet at FEDNOR only 92 per cent, at ACOA 83 per cent, and in his own FORD–Q only 76 per cent of the loans are being made repayable.

Why is the finance minister not enforcing his own guidelines within cabinet?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development— Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in all regional agencies a series of loans were outstanding that are in the process of running. The policy applied to new loans. There was to be a phase in process; one was not to impose this immediately so that business would be able to adjust.

When one looks at those loans within the regional agencies, it is the commercial loans that are repayable. As well, the regional agencies have activities in non profit making areas, structural areas that may well help the economy or a particular region. Those are not repayable.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, despite the minister's fine words there is no real accounting in regional development. I point to his department. Over a quarter of the loans approved by his department did not even need government assistance in the first place, according to the auditor general's report. Those approvals amounted to $65 million for FORD–Q.

Will the minister commit today to stop this hemorrhaging of Canadians' hard earned tax dollars? In other words will he do his job?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the vast majority of the criticisms levelled by the auditor general as far as the regional agencies were concerned were levelled in terms of activities that took place prior to the election of the government.

A number of those criticisms were recognized by the individual ministers when they took office. It is as a result of the recognition of those criticisms that the fundamental changes in all the agencies have taken place, changes which have gone a long way to rectify the criticisms the member has just brought forward.

CP RAIL

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

In addition to the loss of 710 jobs in Montreal, CP Rail's decision to move its headquarters will further diminish the city's position within Canada's transportation sector. The decision to move CP headquarters is a direct result of federal railway policies which, thanks to enormous subsidies and protected branch lines, have caused a shift in railway activity to Western Canada.

What does the Prime Minister intend to do to compensate for the jobs lost in Montreal as a direct result of federal policies that provide massive subsidies for the railways in Western Canada?

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, who is a member of the Standing Committee on Transport, will have a great opportunity for his party to get on the record to help this government build an efficient and affordable railway system in the country.

If he wants to ensure that we have good transportation he will support the government's Bill C-101, which will make it possible in Quebec and across the country to build short line railways and make sure that customers and shippers can move their goods in an efficient and affordable manner so that the country can continue to build on the export business.

What the Bloc Quebecois can do for the country is help us build a great transportation system.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question was directed to the Prime Minister, so I expected a member of the government to reply.

The Prime Minister said he wanted to deal with the real problems—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: My dear colleagues, as you know, when questions are put in the House, anyone on the government side may answer the question. I would ask the hon. member to put please his question right away.

Mr. Mercier: Mr. Speaker, I meant a member of cabinet.

The Prime Minister said he wanted to deal with the real problems, but the federal government is causing these problems with its discriminatory treatment of Montreal.

Now that CP Rail is leaving Montreal and Canadian Airlines International has stopped its operations at Mirabel, another consequence of railway policies, when is the Prime Minister going to take steps to make Montreal the focus of the transportation sector, which it has always been until now?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is all very well for the Bloc Quebecois to keep blaming the government, but perhaps they should take a good look in the mirror. Considering the kind of climate they created in Quebec during the past few years and the intolerance they have often shown towards minorities in Quebec, it is hardly surprising that right now, some people want to get out of Montreal.

VIETNAM

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

On October 4 I asked the Minister of Foreign Affairs to raise with the Vietnamese government the case of nine religious, academic and cultural leaders then in prison in Vietnam. I am happy to say that two of these prisoners have now been released and they have arrived in North America.

Could the minister assure the House that he would continue the policy of quiet diplomacy on behalf of the remaining members of the group still in prison?

Hon. Raymond Chan (Secretary of State (Asia-Pacific), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to respond to the hon. member that our foreign affairs minister was in Vietnam recently and made representations to his Vietnamese counterpart, the foreign affairs minister of Vietnam, and to the Prime Minister of Vietnam to encourage greater respect for human rights.

We are also seeking Vietnamese concurrence for a visit to Vietnam by Canadian Human Rights Commissioner Max Yalden to further develop dialogue in that area. Canada continues to voice concerns about the human rights situation in Vietnam in international fora.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Canadian Heritage has instructed the president of the CBC to come up with $350 million in spending cuts. Today he is announcing that he will be $120 million short in that department. There is no guarantee that the mandate committee report at the end of the month will give the president the scope to make the cuts he needs to make.

Will the Minister of Canadian Heritage show some leadership for a change and untie the hands of the president of the CBC and allow him to go ahead and make some fundamental cuts to the CBC, including allowing private broadcasters to start to deliver some of the services the CBC currently delivers?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our colleague should be aware that today the president of the CBC announced very important re–engineering within the CBC. This is in keeping with reduction of the deficit and reduction of budgets. He has the support of the government in his effort to turn the CBC into a modern, forward looking agency.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I just explained that to the minister. I am glad he was listening so carefully. The problem is he is $120 million short. Surely the minister picked that up when he read the newspaper this morning.

The CBC is at a watershed today. Will the minister show some leadership and give the president of the CBC the mandate he needs to go ahead and make further cuts so he can achieve the $120 million in savings and the scope he needs to fundamentally rethink the CBC, including allowing private broadcasters to play a larger role in delivering those services?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely to enable the president of the CBC to rethink the CBC that the government has formed a committee to examine the mandate. The mandate is the heart of the CBC. The reports of the mandate committee will be available at the end of this month. In the meantime, our colleagues may hold their breath.

INFORMATION HIGHWAY

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

Recently, the Information Highway Advisory Council tabled its final report. This report completely trivializes Quebec culture, since it calls for an information highway serving a single so–called Canadian identity and culture. As well, various elements of this report are likely to result in further federal intrusion into areas in which Quebec is already fully exercising its responsibilities, health and education for instance.

Does the minister commit to rejecting these recommendations, which invite the federal government to interfere in areas that are exclusively Quebec's jurisdiction, such as health and education?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a committee has indeed made recommendations. I would like to point out to my colleague that, among the recommendations made by one of the working groups created by this committee, there are some that are content–related, that is to say culture and all of those elements which may make up content. This is the specific area I shall address.

We will be bringing forward a series of recommendations following up on the work of these committees and of the advisory council, and I trust that our colleague will be able to see that our decisions are judicious ones and link Canada up to the world information highway.

FISHERIES

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the fisheries minister said in the House this week that his new $50 million tax grab, which he calls access fees, will be applied in a fair and equitable manner. Reform profoundly disagrees with this intolerable tax, and now we find that native commercial fishermen will pay only half the access fee that non–natives pay.

Will the minister now admit this policy is essentially discriminatory at its core, commit here and now in the House to equality of treatment for all Canadians and stop treating non–native fishermen as second class citizens in their own country?

• (1500)

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the member, who comes from Prince Rupert and who has within his constituency both native and non–native fishermen, would not want to get up in the House and inadvertently or carelessly, which would not be in his nature, cause a division between the native community and the non–native community.

Mr. Abbott: You are causing the division.

Mr. Silye: It is your rule.

Mr. Tobin: I have a bad throat so you will have to be quiet if you want to hear the answer. I am not used to yelling.

As the hon. member knows, people with native backgrounds occupy 40 per cent of the commercial sector of the industry. Coming from Prince Rupert I am sure he knows that. The commercial fleet, the people who speak on behalf of the aboriginal fisheries, the sports sector, in fact all sectors, are attending a round table process. The purpose of this process is to bring the industry together to produce a plan for the proper management of the fishery.

The process is not finished and until it is those kinds of conclusions cannot be drawn. We ought to let people who want to work together—

The Speaker: I would remind hon. members to address the Chair.

JUSTICE

Mr. Gary Pillitteri (Niagara Falls, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, crime prevention has always been one of our major goals. We all know that in order to prevent crime it is necessary to respond to the underlying social costs of criminal behaviour. Access to education and training are the essential elements from crime prevention.

Therefore, what is the government planning to do to promote involvement in the justice system?

Hon. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government is very concerned about community safety and security as it relates to young people.

We have set up a program that reaches across the country from the far west right into the Atlantic and up into the north. Fifteen communities across the country will benefit from this initiative. For example, one project announced in September is situated in the southern Ontario region. We expect to have 20 youth participate in this project once it is under way.

The government is working with all partners in order to better aid Canada's youth. In addition to that, human resources development is working with community partners and youth to improve public safety as a whole.

HEALTH

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour on behalf of the Standing Committee on Health to present its sixth report in accordance with its order of reference of November 1, 1995.

The committee has considered votes 1a, 5a, 10a, 20a and 25a under health in supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1996 and report the same.

A copy of the minutes of proceedings relating to the study is tabled.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the 10th report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development on Bill C-107, an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission, and have agreed to report it without amendment.

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I think you would find consent for the following motion. I move:

> That the Standing Committee on Finance or any of its subcommittees be authorized to adjourn from place to place within Canada during the week commencing November 27, 1995 to hold prebudget consultations and that the necessary staff accompany the committee.

PETITIONS

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, today I have two petitions to present on behalf of the constituents of Simcoe Centre.

The first petition concerns section 745 of the Criminal Code. The petitioners request that Parliament repeal section 745 of the Criminal Code so that convicted murderers have to serve their full 25–year sentence behind bars.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second group of petitioners request that the Government of Canada not amend the human rights act to include the phrase of sexual orientation.

The petitioners are concerned about including the undefined phrase of sexual orientation in the Canadian Human Rights Act. Refusing to define this statement leaves interpretation open to the courts, a very dangerous precedent to set.

Parliament has a responsibility to Canadians to ensure that legislation cannot be misinterpreted.

• (1510)

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition which is signed by a number of residents of my riding of Stormont—Dundas.

The petitioners call on Parliament to ensure that approximately 70 Cornwall jobs at the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority headquarters remain in Cornwall. They also emphasize that the city of Cornwall cannot afford any more economic losses of jobs in an already depressed area which has been hard hit by the closure of several industries.

Many other petitions were circulated locally. While not in the proper form for this House, they still request that the same consideration be given and that Parliament recognize the historical link between the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and the city of Cornwall by keeping the head office and those jobs in the seaway city.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. The petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Cambridge, Ontario.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society.

They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—RIGHTS OF VICTIMS

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.) moved:

That this House condemn the government for failing to make progress in reforming the criminal justice system in terms of introducing measures to ensure that the rights of the victim are protected and that these rights supersede the rights of the criminal and in terms of changing the name of the week of November 19 to 26 from Prisoners' Week to Victims' Rights Week.

He said: Madam Speaker, I will be dividing my time. It is an honour and a privilege to lead off the debate on this Reform motion.

On March 17, 1994 I had the pleasure of participating in our first debate in the House on victims' rights. The example I will use comes from my home province of Saskatchewan. It illustrates the government's preoccupation with criminals' rights rather than victims' rights. It is the case of Gregory Fischer, a convicted cop killer. He was sentenced to life imprisonment with no chance of parole for 25 years.

Fischer had just applied for early release under the Liberal government's faint hope clause, section 745 of the Criminal Code. Mrs. Marie King–Forest, the wife of RCMP Constable Brian King, had to fight hard for her right to be heard at these hearings. She had the support and sympathy of many friends, the police, the public, the media and many MPs in the House.

How did the Liberal government respond to this one victim's lonely struggle? What was her family's reward for reliving the nightmare of her husband's mindless murder by two cold–blooded killers? The Liberal government rewarded Mrs. King–Forest with a small change to Bill C–41, giving victims the right to introduce a victim impact statement in the judicial hearings that decide to release these killers early. The court rewarded Mrs. King–Forest's efforts by cutting two years off Gregory Fischer's sentence. That is Liberal justice.

The Liberals are poised once again to drag Mrs. King–Forest through the same ordeal because now Darrel Crook, her husband's other murderer, is applying for early release under the same Liberal loophole in the Criminal Code.

• (1515)

If the Liberals had accepted our amendment during the debate on Bill C–41, section 745 of the Criminal Code would have been repealed and Mr. Crooks and the hundreds of other killers who were serving life sentences with no chance of parole would have served their full sentences. If our amendment had been accepted, Mrs. King–Forest and her family would not have to endure another senseless judicial hearing.

Under a Reform government, when the court says no chance of parole for 25 years, that is exactly what the heartless criminal will get. If do–gooders are concerned about killers' rehabilitation, let them play their games after the full sentence has been served. Certainty in sentencing, protecting society and giving the relatives of the victims some peace and closure are more important than letting a killer back on the streets a couple of years early.

Everything our party has done with respect to the criminal justice issue has been governed by our fundamental principle that the rights of the victim should supersede the rights of the criminal.

During the debate on Bill C–37, the Young Offenders Act, we proposed changes that would better protect victims rights. We proposed changes that would place more emphasis on victim compensation as part of the sentencing. We proposed that the parents of young offenders be held legally responsible for the crimes committed by their children, if it could be demonstrated that the parents failed to exercise reasonable parental control. Under these proposals parents would be required to compensate victims for property crimes committed by their children.

Unfortunately, the Liberals ignored our advice and recommendations. They voted against our amendments and against giving victims more rights than the criminals.

During the debate on Bill C–41, the sentencing bill, Reformers proposed changes that would ensure victims were protected. We proposed that victims be given the right to express their views on whether the use of alternate measures were appropriate for the crime against them. We proposed measures which would ensure sentencing would be proportionate to the gravity of the criminal conduct and to the actual harm done to the victim. We proposed changes which would give victims the right to give verbal victim impact statements.

As stated previously, we proposed the repeal of section 745 of the Criminal Code, which would ensure killers stayed in jail for the full term of their sentence. For Reformers, life means life. Unfortunately, the Liberals ignored our advice and recommendations and voted against our amendments and against giving victims more rights than criminals.

During debate on Bill C–45, the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, Reformers proposed changes that would give victims more rights. We proposed amendments that would ensure victims received direct financial compensation from the offender's income while incarcerated. We also proposed that violent criminals be denied parole and statutory release thereby protecting the rights of victims to life, liberty and security of the person.

We proposed that criminals who commit criminal acts while on parole or conditional release be sent back to serve the full sentence of their crime and then the full term of the sentence of their second offence. Two plus two is four consecutive sentences, not concurrent.

To protect victims of child sexual abuse, we proposed a child sex offender registry and that this registry be made available to police investigating a child sexual offence. We proposed that all persons convicted of sexual assault would serve the full term of their sentence. Once again, the Liberal Party ignored our advice and recommendations and voted against our amendments and against giving victims more rights than the criminals.

Reformers have gone to great lengths to introduce and enhance victims rights every chance we get, but the Liberals simply ignore them. They do not seem to get it. They seem locked in the Liberal thinking of the 1970s. Liberal ideas are socialist concepts that have failed and failed miserably. Reformers give their ideas freely because they have come from the common sense of the common people.

The Liberals across the aisle seem to ignore these ideas at their own peril. In the next election common sense will prevail and common people will only re–elect members who best represent their views in the House. That means voting the constituents' wishes and not the Liberal cabinet's wishes.

• (1520)

When criminals are arrested, the police read them their rights. Victims are never informed that they have rights. They are treated just like another piece of evidence. If a criminal has rights then so must the victim and if the victims have rights, should they not also be entitled to know what those rights are?

I have been working on a list of victims rights since the day I arrived on the Hill. Here is what I have come up with so far. I do not know if I will be able to finish the list, but this will give an idea.

Victims have the right to be informed of their rights, to be informed of services available, to be informed about the investigation, to be informed about the court proceedings. They have the right to receive notice of any hearing and have a right to receive notice of the release of an offender.

Victims have the right to legal counsel, the right to be heard by the crown before the trial, a right to be heard in the judicial process, a right to have their case prosecuted and a right to prompt disposition of prosecution. They have the right to restitution from the offender, and a right to prompt return of private property. Victims have a right to privacy, a right to protection from intimidation and a right to defend themselves, family and property. Victims have a right to exercise all of these rights.

Now that we have an idea what victims rights are, it is time for the federal government to start codifying these rights and working with the provinces to build legislative guarantees and administrative mechanisms to ensure that victims can properly exercise these rights.

There is a cruel irony that we are having this debate this week, for November 19 to 26, 1995 has been proclaimed by the Liberal government to be prisoners week. The Liberal prisoners week clearly demonstrates where this government's priorities are.

Do members know that there is no week of the year, not even a single day of the year dedicated to the victims of crime? We have a week dedicated to prisoners, but not one for their victims.

The federal government has proclaimed a week for brotherhood and sisterhood, a week for waste reduction, a week for international archives, a week for dental hygiene, a week for disarmament and on on the list goes. There is a week for earth and a week for professional secretaries but there is no week for victims of crime. It is time to correct this colossal oversight. I urge members of the House to support our motion to declare this week victims rights week.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to this issue today.

We are making every attempt to reflect exactly what happens in the Liberal government's agenda concerning victims. We want to reflect that the government's failure is in effect a failure to address the rights of victims.

I am going to demonstrate that with a small story. When I raise these stories in the House of Commons, I am accused at times, in fact a number of times by the minister of immigration as picking out and isolating certain cases which are not really reflective of what happens in Canadian society. That is a lot of hogwash. The fact is that the kind of case I am going to talk about this afternoon happens virtually every day in Canada.

I was in a hospital about 11 weeks ago and I met a lady who was quite despondent. She was crying because her 19–year old son Allen had been hit by a car at an intersection. He is in Royal Columbian Hospital. He had broken legs, a broken arm and his pelvis was broken in seven places, I believe. His head was basically crushed. He has a 20 to 25 per cent chance of living. Allen's mother Debbie does not believe that the system looks after her as a victim. Her husband Allen senior, feels the same way. I asked her to explain what happened.

A young offender stole a four by four truck. He drove it through the streets of Surrey, British Columbia, and toppled the four by four truck over Allen's Fiesta.

• (1525)

Right away, the young offender was read his rights and I will read those in a moment. He was whisked away. The other young fellow who was with the young offender was let off. He was only an accomplice sitting in the same vehicle they stole.

Mr. and Mrs. Wayne asked the crown prosecutor to make sure the guy who was charged with eight counts was sent to adult court, just like the Liberals said would happen. They also asked to be informed of any plea bargaining that took place. Guess what? Plea bargaining took place and they did not know it. I found out about it.

Of the eight charges, five were dropped in the plea. Three of the minors were presented and brought forward. Why the minors? That is obvious. Why was it so fast? It took about five or six weeks to run this young offender through from the time of the accident to sentencing. Five weeks is almost unheard of. The reason in all likelihood is that the young offender would have been charged with manslaughter had young Allen Wayne died. That is why they rushed him through, which is another protection for the victim. Now what happens?

Let us go to the sentencing. What does the judge give him? This is where victims and parents do not understand what is wrong with this Liberal government. This guy gets 15 months open custody, go home. He gets three years prohibition from driving. However he is already on prohibition from driving and gets charged with that count. Prohibition from driving means nothing to this fellow. What does he get for prohibition from driving? He gets one day concurrent open custody. One day. What is being told to young offenders here? He just about killed somebody—he may die yet—and for driving while prohibited he gets one day.

This happened. It was not dreamed up. The Waynes have a right to feel the way they do because the laws, the rhetoric and all this hogwash which is brought into the House by the Liberal government is nothing more than that. It is rhetoric and hogwash. Most victims, if not all of them, know that. The government will not go very far pushing hogwash.

Let us hear what is read. I asked the police for this recently after watching the television show "To Serve and Protect" one Sunday night. During the show a lady was sitting on the street crying and bleeding. The police had the guy who obviously did it and were reading him his rights. She was sitting there unattended.

The police said he was being arrested for whatever he was charged for. "It is my duty to inform you that you have the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay. You may call any lawyer you want. A legal aid duty lawyer is available to provide legal advice to you without charge and can explain the legal aid plan to you. If you wish to contact a legal aid duty lawyer, I can provide you with a telephone number". The victim was sitting on the street bleeding and crying, wondering what rights she had. Very few.

We will present some victims rights shortly. We will see if the government has the courage, particularly the backbenchers, to adopt some of those rights. My guess is they will not. They will find some small thing in the victims bill of rights to oppose it, thereby throwing it out.

How much time do I have, Madam Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Three and a half minutes.

An hon. member: Too many.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Good. Too many, he says. That is what is wrong over here. We have too much time to talk about victims rights. That is what is wrong with the Liberal Party.

• (1530)

Victims should have the right to be informed of their rights at every stage of the process, including those rights involving compensation from the offender. They must also be made aware of any victim services available. Is that too much to ask?

Victims should have the right to be informed of the offender's status throughout the process, including but not restricted to location of the accused from time of arrest, notification of any arrests, upcoming court dates, sentencing dates, plans to release the offender from custody, including notification of what community the parolee is being released into, parole dates and on and on it goes.

All information is to be made available on request. What is wrong with that? What is wrong with people having those rights today? Bonnie Lucas in my riding would say: "That is what I wanted when my estranged husband came home and burned our house down with our kids in it. We just escaped from it".

All she asked the parole board was: "Would you mind telling me when he is getting out, because he is going to come after me again?" That is all she asked. What happens? We find out he is out living very close by, and on and on it goes.

Victims should have the right to give oral and written victim impact statements before sentencing, at any parole hearings and at judicial reviews. What is wrong with that?

Victims should have the right to be informed of details of the crown's intention to offer a plea bargain before it is presented to the defence. Allen and Debbie Wayne are appalled, as everybody should be, that this young offender had five of the eight charges against him dropped conveniently. He was out on the street the next day while the police were still filling out their forms.

Victims should have the right to know why charges were not laid if that is the decision of the crown or the police. So often we hear they are going to lay some charges but no charges come. They wonder why. It happened in my office. My secretary had her house ripped off three times in a row. She did not know why charges were not forthcoming. To this day she still does not know, except we hear these guys are into bigger things: "You are kind of a zero and we are after the bigger stuff". She does not know why charges were not laid yet they know who did it.

Victims have the right to protection from anyone who intimidates, harasses or interferes with the rights of the victim. I can speak to that one with Joan Cave who was sexually assaulted. The guy was sent into Vancouver remand, writing her threatening letters from remand while we paid the postage. Surely there is something better we could do.

The government has been an absolute disaster on criminal justice programs.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened to the member's discussion. Simple solutions for complex problems seems to be the agenda of the Reform Party. If we have problems with taxes, flat taxes will solve the problem. If we have problems with debt, just cut government in half and they will al go away. If we have a problem with the criminal justice system, rename a day, rename a week; that will make it better.

The reality is the problems with crime in this country are deep seated. I do not hear the Reform Party talking about how to solve the real issues of crime in our society.

I have some statistics on violent crime in Canada which include all categories: crimes of violence, property crimes, Criminal Code offences, drugs. From 1991 to 1992 there was a 6.3 per cent reduction in total crime. In 1993 there was a further 5 per cent reduction in crime. In 1994 there was an almost 5 per cent reduction in crime. Remarkably these are periods of a Liberal government. During the entire period of time this government has been in office crime has been and is being reduced in Canada.

• (1535)

This will not make headlines in local newspapers but the reality is crime is being reduced. I know the hon. member on the other side does not want to hear that, but these statistics are factual.

I will address what I consider some aspects with the problems of crime in our society. We have gone through a whole generation of young people whose only access has been the electronic media. Often the only babysitter of choice for a whole generation has been the electronic media, the television. We have glorified crime on television and a lot of these young people today cannot distinguish between pretend crime and real crime.

How do we want to address these real factors? The government, through the CRTC, is now trying to find ways to use the V chip to take violent acts in programming out of the home environment and allow parents to have the ability to filter out violent programming within their houses.

The hon. member is saying the Liberal government is doing nothing. I think this is a very profound thing which affects over a long period the attitudes and conduct among young offenders. Just by doing away with the Young Offenders Act we will not do away with crimes by young offenders.

It is time the Reform Party started talking about real problems and real solutions instead of just saying hang them and they will go away.

I wish the member would address some of those real problems.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I read seven solutions and within each one there were other issues. It has taken us months and months of research and some guy stands up and says we have simple solutions and he does not hear how Reform will solve problems. The members on the government side are not even listening to what is being said. That is because the front bench tells says: "We will do what we want and you guys will be told how it goes".

What makes me really sick about all this is to have somebody from that side roll out the demographics, roll out the statistical data, to tell us it is a 6.3 per cent reduction crime and then a 4.9 per cent. One of the national parole people phoned me one day.

Madam Speaker, the hon. member had five minutes. Surely I can get—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sure the hon. member realizes that the debate time is 10 minutes and questions and comments are 5 minutes. You have 30 seconds left.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I would ask the House, if this member gets five minutes—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member for Durham had four minutes. You have been speaking for 30 seconds and you have 30 seconds left.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Thanks a lot. When I get calls from the parole board saying that we have an 87 per cent success rate, I say that is nice, it has a 13 per cent failure rate. They had better think about this over there. It is the 13 per cent who are coming through the doors. It is the 13 per cent plus their families who are worried—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Resuming debate, the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for Brandon—Souris.

• (1540)

The hon. member for Fraser Valley West has made some interesting allegations which I do not think are quite fair. The government has done a great deal in the areas the member mentioned with respect to victim impact statements. Recent amendments to the Young Offenders Act require victim impact statements. Under section 745, statements from victims are permitted and encouraged. The judges are to request statements from not only the victims or the families of the victims in this case but friends and neighbours of the victims.

The parole board now has to seek out statements from victims. It must give victims an indication of when someone is to be released who may endanger that person. That was not the case before but it has recently been the case. To my knowledge it is being implemented by the parole board.

There are improvements being made, in particular in the areas the member mentioned.

The assertion that there has been no attention paid to the role of victims is not quite fair. I wonder whether this assertion is not based on confusion about the purposes and principles being applied in criminal justice interventions.

Surprisingly, until recently no such statement existed in the Criminal Code. This situation was at odds with the degree of attention that we pay in Parliament to matters relating to tax, international trade and unemployment insurance. It is at the stage of sentencing that the criminal justice system most consciously and visibly expresses its denunciation of behaviour; its attempts to deter or incapacitate people from further wrongdoing or when it orders reparation or redress for harm done or sets in place measures to bring about the rehabilitation of offenders.

Parliament's role to date in this process has been too often limited to setting maximum penalties for specific offences rather than dealing with the policy objectives of the sentencing process. It was clearly time Parliament put its collective mind to describing the kind of criminal justice system it wants to forge for Canadians.

This occasion was given to us in the sentencing bill, Bill C–41, introduced by the Minister of Justice. Of all the representation we receive, the most heart rending, as all members would agree, is the representation from victims. Victims of crimes often feel their immediate emotional, financial and physical needs are not being addressed.

The criminal justice system may appear at times to be overly concerned about the court process and the punishment of the offender and insufficiently concerned about victim needs.

Parliament has had the opportunity in this session to debate an important bill touching several aspects of the way victims are treated within the criminal justice system. With the sentencing bill, Bill C–41, Parliament had for the first time an opportunity to address the purpose and principles of criminal sentencing. The bill brought together the purpose and principles of sentencing, procedure and evidence and the various sanctions the courts may impose in a form that represents the collective view of Parliament and which touches on many issues of vital importance to victims.

Let me give some examples. Bill C–41, recently passed in the House, specifies that if an offence is motivated by bias, prejudice or hate it will be considered an aggravating factor in sentencing. The statement specifies that if an offence was motivated by bias, prejudice or hate based on race, national or ethnic origin, language, colour, religion, sex, age, mental or physical disability, sexual orientation or other similar factor, the court shall consider that the motivation be an aggravating factor.

• (1545)

Numerous recommendations have been made respecting breach of trust for offences involving violence against women and other vulnerable persons, including children.

A 1993 survey by Statistics Canada demonstrated that almost one–half of women reported experiencing violence during their lifetime by men known to them. In too many cases positions of trust were exploited, for example by parents against their children or by a physician against his or her patient.

In 1984 the Badgley committee called for the protection of children from persons they already know and may trust. Bill C–41 states that where there is evidence that the offender in committing an offence abused a position of trust or authority in relation to the victim, it shall also be considered an aggravating factor in sentencing.

All these changes respond to concerns raised by community groups, victims, and others about hate motivated violence and the plight of victims.

Bill C–41 took other important steps. The statement of purpose and principles specifically indicates that objectives for sentencing include the provision of reparations for harm done to victims or to the community and the promotion of a sense of responsibility in offenders in acknowledgement of the harm to victims and to the community. It goes further. Specific provision is made to ensure that any information provided by victims is considered during hearings held under section 745 of the Criminal Code.

A new set of measures respecting restitution, developed co–operatively with the federal government and our provincial colleagues, is set out in the bill. A priority for restitution is set out in the bill. If a court finds it appropriate to award both a fine and restitution, the priority shall go to restitution.

The House added a provision as well respecting restitution, stating that in the case of bodily harm or threat of bodily harm to an offender's spouse or child, the court may order restitution for expenses incurred by that person as a result of moving out of the offender's household, as well as for temporary housing, food, child care and transportation. Provision is made to ensure that restitution orders can be enforced by the civil courts.

The Criminal Code will specifically state that any restitution ordered by a criminal court will not limit the victim's right to sue for damages in the civil court.

The House of Commons participated in an important debate involving the status of victims in the criminal justice system. Significant changes were brought to our criminal law, aimed at improving the situations of victims in the system. The government and the House are concerned about victims and have demonstrated that concrete action at the legislative level is a priority of the government.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have difficulty trying to relate to the government that the legislation it plays with is not a full implementation of what is necessary.

For example, when the Young Offenders Act was changed in the House we said all along that the government was not changing the law to suit the real world out there. We wanted to change a number of issues. That did not happen. Many of the victims rights groups out there said time and time again that the government was too soft on its legislation. Yet government members stand in the House, as my colleague did just now, and say they are working on it and it is coming along.

• (1550)

This has been a long time in happening. I will give some idea of the frustration that abounds. For instance, when we debated Bill C–45 we asked for the some issues to be addressed. My colleague from Wild Rose and I put a number of motions to the House that day. One of the motions would have provided for compensation to victims of crime and for medical treatment for victims of sexual assault to be paid by the perpetrator. That was voted against and defeated by the government. We also asked that there be no provision for statutory release for violent offenders, and that was defeated.

The government might ask what violent offenders have to do with victims rights. This has a lot to do with victims rights. Dwayne Johnston is a good case in my town. In The Pas, Manitoba, he was convicted for stabbing a 17–year old lady 56 times. He was sentenced to life, with eligibility for parole in 10 years. It is six and a half years later, and guess whose community he is in. Mine.

We are asking the government to carefully consider a lot of tough legislation that has to be put in place. It should not stand in the House of Commons and say that it is working on it or or that it has come 20 per cent of the way, that life is long and that it has a long time to do this. That is not what we are asking about. The government has to take the bull by the horns and deal with it.

We asked to ensure that criminals serve their full sentence if conditional release is revoked or suspended. If they are doing time, get out on parole and commit another offence, it is revoked; they do their full time. That was turned down by the government.

I do not think those are unreasonable requests. Yet time and time again in the House we hear that there cannot be an agreement between Liberals and Reformers because we are on the tough side of it and the government is on the liberal side of it.

The people who really count when we are asking for victims rights are the victims and the non–victims out in our Canadian society, the potential victims. Those are the people we must look after today.

I have had several discussions with private companies that build and operate prisons, and it is no coincidence that they are moving into Canada. They are doing that successfully. The reason is the confidence has gone in the government.

Why can the government not take another step forward, get tougher on these laws and not stop with this point of view in the legislation?

Mr. MacLellan: Madam Speaker, the hon. member says he does not want to hear about things the government is working on.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): I did not say that.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I ask that responses be addressed through the Chair.

Mr. MacLellan: We have to be able to say what we are working on. It is important that as part of the answer it be perceived that the government is working toward further solutions. A lot of the areas relate to provincial jurisdiction such as maintenance orders and matters of family law.

Also, we have done things with regard to the Young Offenders Act. We have said that with respect to young offenders we are making more information available. We have said there will be access to victims and they can present statements. We have said that we will allow people to use information from criminal cases in civil cases. We have done an awful lot, and the member should recognize that.

• (1555)

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have found the exchange very interesting this afternoon. Like other members, I have been working with young people all my working life. I sense that this is very pertinent in terms of where we are now, where we are going and where we have been.

I had the privilege of attending the conference in Cairo in May of this year on the treatment of prisoners. This brought together 143 countries from around the globe, representing all cultures and all components of society. The feeling I came away with, and which was articulated directly by some European countries, was that they expect to have no prisons in due course. They are working toward that objective in terms of treatment of offenders. They are putting in place other strategies. They sense and we agree that there will be resulting benefits. I am sure the articulation by the justice department and my colleague will also do that.

We have some pilot projects taking place in the country right now. In Manitoba there is a victim services program, which commenced about five years ago. It offers assistance, psychological and in some cases financial. More important, it offers counselling services for people who have been victimized by various parties in society.

I do not subscribe to the lock them up and throw away the key approach, as some members do, in pursuit of increasing public safety. This is more likely to increase public risk when prisoners finish their sentences and return to the community. Evidence from the United States in those states that have instituted very simplistic and punitive based treatment such as California shows there was a rise in crime rate, not a decrease. I suggest to parties that subscribe to those views that maybe there should be a re–examination of the data as well.

My colleague from Durham put forward statistics in terms of the drop in crime rate. I think the information he provided to the House is very accurate. I too have viewed those stats.

The hon. member's concern for victims of crime is admirable, but I must say that I find the phrasing of the motion a bit unclear. He suggests that more needs to be done to protect the rights of the victim. He goes on to imply that one way to achieve this protection is to diminish the rights of the offender. There are several problems with this assertion.

We should ask whether there is a necessary trade–off between competing rights. Is justice better served by somehow reducing the rights of an accused person? The motion does not specify where rights are objectionable. The emergence of the victims rights movement in Canada is one of the most important criminal justice trends we have seen in the last 20 years. Yet I doubt that any victims organizations in Canada would advocate eliminating the right of an accused to a fair trial, the right to due process, the protection of habeas corpus or the protection of an accused against self–incrimination. Do I need to remind the House that there are rights guaranteed to all Canadians under sections 7, 10 and 11 of the charter of rights and freedoms?

• (1600)

I will not dwell on the matter of comparing the rights of the accused to the rights of the victim, but I do suggest that the motion misses the mark. I believe a more constructive approach, simply put, is to determine where and how the victim should be involved in the criminal justice process. The concept we should embrace is access to justice for the victim.

At what point in the criminal justice process does the victim deserve to have input? Should the victim have input into the police investigation, to the trial of the accused, at the sentencing stage or later at the parole decision making stage and finally when the offender is released from custody?

If we can provide the victim or the victim's family with the appropriate access to the criminal process in a timely fashion then maybe we can be a little less concerned about who has more rights.

Let us examine the progress that was made over the last two decades both in terms of the general recognition of the needs of victims and specific measures.

Much of the policy and the programs dealing with victims derived from a report by a federal task force on justice for victims of crime in the early 1980s which offered 79 recommendations to both levels of government for improving social, criminal justice and health responses to victims of crime.

In 1985 Canada co–sponsored the UN Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime. This document soon became the basis for a unique Canadian statement of principles. This statement was endorsed by the federal government and the provinces and territories in 1988. It has provided a reference point for provinces to develop their own policy and legislation on victim's rights and most jurisdictions now have victims oriented legislation. It is important to note the provincial perspective since the provinces' responsibility for the administration of justice means that all access to justice issues are under federal control.

Progress continued during the 1980s and in 1988, Parliament passed Bill C–89 which amended the Criminal Code in several relevant areas. For example, the code now provides for protection of the identity of the victims and witnesses of sexual offences and extortion offences. The law also makes it easier for victims of property crimes to prove ownership and the value of stolen goods.

Perhaps most important, the law now provides for victim impact statements. Section 735 permits provinces to determine the form for victim impact statements in their jurisdiction. In effect, this provision creates flexibility by allowing police based victim witness service programs to generate victim impact statements or alternatively crown or court based services as appropriate.

In my view the victim impact statement is a crucial element in sentencing. It is appropriate that the Criminal Code not only provides for such formal statements but allows the court to consider any other evidence concerning any victim of the offence for the purpose of determining sentence.

The motion argues that there has been little recent progress in advancing victims rights. I would conclude the opposite. Bill C–41 passed recently by the House contains an amendment to the Criminal Code stating that the court shall consider the victim impact statement. This mandatory requirement consolidates the role of the victim impact statement in the sentencing process.

While we are on the subject, please note that the victim in this context is broadly defined so that where the victim himself or herself is deceased, any relative of that person or anyone who in law or in fact is responsible for the custody of that person, or for his or her care or support of that person can present the victim impact statement and it will be considered. This is a significant improvement.

There are other measures in Bill C–41 that will benefit victims and keep the focus and the impact of the crime on the victim. The new section 726.2 requires a court when imposing a sentence to state the terms of the sentence and the reasons for it and to enter those terms and reasons in the sentence.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Madam Speaker, does the hon. member receive any letters from victims across the country asking for improvements to the system? I would like to know how many he receives. We have about 500,000 now in storage ready to pass on to the Minister of Justice. They are all crying for changes to make things better.

• (1605)

Is the member aware of a 2.5 million signature petition calling for a pile of different changes? Is the member aware of the hundreds and hundreds of other petitions around calling for these changes?

Last, but not least, is he aware that there are literally thousands of people who belong to victims' organizations? Do you know why they exist, Madam Speaker? Because this government is not doing anything. All those people would like to go home, go back to work, get back to a normal life, including the Carpenters of the Carpenter group, the Stu Garriochs of Calgary and the FACT group, the people from the CRY group in Vancouver, the CAVEAT people from all across the land. They are trying to lead normal lives and they cannot because they are victims. They are joining together trying to get some changes.

They are trying to get changes to this warm, fuzzy little Criminal Code that was invented by the Liberals and they have not changed a thing.

Is the hon. member aware of these things? If he is, for heaven's sake why do the Liberals not wake up and do something?

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, I will respond in this fashion. The approach of the government has been to take under advisement the recommendations that are forthcoming from various groups.

It is a very important process to get that information to the attention of the government. I would think, as my colleague mentioned in his speech, that it is the most heart rending experience as a member of the House to hear some of the concerns that have been raised by these groups.

Let us not cherry pick and only look at the extreme circumstances. I am not alleging that the member is doing that but there are those who look only at the worst case scenario and use that as the reason for passing extreme kinds of legislation.

We have to look at both sides of the issue and the government is doing that.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the member opposite in his presentation referred to the idea of finding forms of punishment other than jail to act as a deterrent. He said he is not in favour of this throw away the key approach to the jail system. Reformers are not either.

Reformers have presented ideas that would replace using imprisonment as a deterrent. We have presented many different concepts. Unfortunately I have not seen any of these ideas being picked up by the Liberal Party.

Some of the ideas we have presented are boot camps, public service, which is being used, corporal punishment as a possibility, capital punishment which can act as a deterrent and certainly will prevent an individual from murdering again. These are just some of the things that we have proposed.

We have proposed paying restitution to victims. We have proposed requiring the person who has committed the offence to pay restitution to the victim as a deterrent. None of these have been picked up by the government.

I ask the member for one example of legislation presented by the government which has put in place a deterrent other than jail so that we do not have to have this throw away the key approach to dealing with prisoners.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, but time has just about expired.

Mr. McKinnon: I will be equally brief, Madam Speaker.

It would be out of my league to give a long list of things. I will give one example. I am only going back to my high school principal days where we actually had to bring together the victim and the perpetrator, going eyeball to eyeball. It was necessary for that to take place in our community with youth victims.

• (1610)

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Madam Speaker, I wish to inform the Chair that I will be sharing my time with the member for Québec.

The Reform Party's motion borders on the ridiculous. I am no longer surprised by their manipulation of public opinion. It is pure and simple demagoguery. We have reached a point where their endless interventions are beginning to get on our nerves.

An hon. member: Sit down.

Mrs. Venne: It is not clear exactly what they want. I am being asked to sit down, but I have no intention of doing so.

Does the Reform Party want to change criminal law and the Criminal Code? Do they want to change the powers of the Minister of Justice, of judges or lawyers? Are they unhappy with judicial proceedings? Do they want to do away with the presumption of innocence? What is their intent? I do not know.

I would, however, like to draw attention to the Reformers' approach. While I do not disagree with parts of their motion, I am, however, flabbergasted at the back room scheming of the third party. The third party, I repeat. It is important to mention this, because the motion we were to debate is not the one before us today.

The Reform Party, or should I say, the Opportunity Party, wanted to table a motion, not on victims' rights, but on their own status in the House. We are already well aware of the ambitions of the member for Calgary Southwest, who wants to become leader of the opposition even before the Leader of the Opposition has left.

[English]

Mr. Silye: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Where is the relevance at this point? We are debating victims rights.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): That is a point of debate, sir.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: So, Madam Speaker, I continue by saying to you that we have reached the height of hypocrisy. At the last minute, and because of the fact that our leader has not resigned his position, the Reform Party stopped talking about political opportunism and started talking about victims of criminal acts. That takes some nerve. How can we trust a party that is concerned about victims only when its political manoeuvrings do not succeed?

The Reformers often set themselves up as defenders of the weak and of the oppressed when it suits them to do so or, as in this case, when they have no choice. Their chivalry will always depend on how much air time they can get with it. Let us not forget the attitude of the Inquisition Party in the matter of gun control. When the time came to systematically obstruct proceedings both in the House and on the justice committee, the Lancelots of the west became the defenders of native rights.

They contended that they could simply not support a bill that might trample native rights or contravene ancestral treaties. If they think we do not see through their little game, they better think again. We can see them coming a mile off. Today they are proposing a motion on victims' rights, when, not so long ago, they opposed a bill to protect victims.

If they want to talk about victims, let them talk about those who succumb to wounds inflicted by firearms. How can they promote the rights of victims and ignore those who die from gun shot wounds? The statistics on deaths caused by firearms are staggering. In 1991, suicides made up 77 per cent of the 1,445 deaths attributable to firearms. Of the 732 homicides recorded in Canada in 1992, 246, or 34 per cent, were committed with a firearm.

• (1615)

In the last ten years, the majority of homicides were committed with shotguns or rifles. Three times out of four, the woman murdered by her spouse was killed with a shotgun or a rifle.

From 1990 to 1992, in Quebec, 1,293 deaths were attributed to gun shots, an average of 425 deaths annually. Still in Quebec, three deaths out a four that are caused by a firearm are suicides, for a total of about 300 suicides each year. These statistics cannot be ignored.

If Reform members want to talk about victims, they should talk about the ones I just mentioned. If not, they should keep quiet instead of talking nonsense. These far right hypocrites are here only to make political gains. Every chance they get, they tear off their shirts in public in order to attract attention and stand in the limelight.

They should try to emulate the Bloc Quebecois, this mosaic of ideas and talents that, for more than two years, has been fulfilling the double mandate that Quebec voters gave it, that is, to promote Quebec's sovereignty and to act as the official opposition of a government that never stops insulting the intelligence of Quebeckers and their legitimate representatives.

While Reform members are revelling in political fiction, we, the Bloc members, are getting ready to pursue the goals that we set for ourselves five years ago, that is, to consolidate our political strength in Ottawa, around Quebec's interests alone, in order to dispel any ambiguity and to support Quebec's march towards sovereignty.

The motion put forward by the Reform Party invites us to condemn the government for two reasons: first, because it supposedly failed to make progress in reforming the criminal justice system in general; and second, because its criminal legislation allegedly favours the rights of the criminal over those of the victim.

What I find shocking is that this motion is a perfect example of disinformation. This is a good way to exploit public resentment. The motion before us simply reflects the nightmares of an extreme right cut off from reality.

This motion is a mishmash of reactionary preconceived notions. They might as well blame the government for winter arriving a little early this year.

According to the third party, the whole criminal justice system should be reformed. Does the Reform Party at least know how? Does it have any alternatives to offer? We all have complaints about the justice system, of course. It is one thing to say that it is flawed; it is another to state that the whole system must be reformed without proposing any alternatives.

As everyone knows, I have always fought for the rights and protection of victims. I have already suggested to the House that victims should be given a much greater role in our judicial proceedings. I have already submitted that the victims should be represented by lawyers, produce their own witnesses, examine and cross–examine crown and defence witnesses, plead on the evidence, suggest sentences or participate in negotiations; in short, they should take part in the whole judicial process and even be allowed to appeal any ruling.

That is an alternative. Those are concrete solutions. We must start thinking about this and come up with serious proposals instead of a botched motion that amounts to a vague criticism of the whole justice system and the supporting legislation.

• (1620)

[English]

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague from Saint–Hubert for her excellent remarks. I appreciate the support she shows for the government in this debate.

I would like to ask her a question which pertains to her remarks about sovereignty, the role of the Bloc and the direction in which her party is going.

In the context of sovereignty and in the context of the motion before the House, in her attitude toward sovereignty, would she recommend that individuals born in Quebec who commit major crimes be incarcerated only in Quebec or should they be put in jails across the country? Is it a federal thing or a separatist thing for her, the incarceration of prisoners who are born in Quebec?

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member is serious in asking me that, but I will answer any way, because his concern seems genuine.

There is no doubt that, upon achieving sovereignty, Quebec will look after its prison population, like any sovereign country. Quebec, as a sovereign country, is not different in that respect from any other sovereign country.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened to the remarks made by the hon. member for Saint–Hubert. I shall set the sovereignty issue aside, since, as can be expected, we disagree on that point.

I wonder if she would not agree with me that it is somewhat ironic that the Reform Party would come and talk to us about victims and whatnot on the very day when a gun control bill is being debated, and perhaps voted on in just a few hours in the other place—to use correct parliamentary terminology and to be in order—that they would raise this issue today, knowing full well how many victims guns have made, not only in our country but also south of our border, where, admittedly, there is hardly any gun legislation.

Is it not— how could I put this, again, in parliamentary terms? —less than honest on the part of the hon. members of the Reform Party to address this whole issue of victims of violence without mentioning that they are the ones who moved and continue to move heaven and earth to prevent the establishment of gun control across Canada until now and who lobbied certain Conservative members of the other place about this?

Mrs. Venne: Madam Speaker, of course I agree with what the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is saying, because that was precisely my point.

Of course, any discussion about victims must include victims of shootings. And of course, the Reform Party completely ignores them. I also agree that, soon, in less than an hour in fact, the other place will be voting on Bill C–68.

I will go and see how the matter is settled in the other place and I hope that it will not have to be debated all over again in this House. As far as we are concerned, I think that it is clear that every conceivable concession and compromise has been made, ultimately leading to the passage of Bill C–68. I hope that the bill will come back unchanged and that there will be no need to consider it again.

[English]

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it was very interesting to listen to the comments of the hon. member for Saint–Hubert.

She touched very briefly on the rights of native communities. I was wondering if she would reflect on the rights of the Inuit people who reside within the province of Quebec. Does she believe they have the right to self–determination? Does she similarly believe that they could also be a nation within the definition of that word? Do they have the right to secede?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I strongly question the relevancy of those questions to the motion we are debating.

• (1625)

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: You are quite right, Madam Speaker, this question has nothing to do with the matter at hand.

I would like to point out to the hon. member that, when I mentioned aboriginal people earlier, it was in reference to the position the Reform Party had taken, again, during the gun control debate. I simply made a reference to them earlier.

As for the question per se, I think it might be answered in a different setting.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Madam Speaker, although I find the motion proposed today farfetched and not really in line with the Reform Party's position on firearms, it does at least afford us the opportunity to address and reflect upon a significant social problem: victims.

Where there is a victim there is usually crime, violence, or at the least a socially unacceptable act. People can also be victims of unfair policies, stifling economic situations, unattainable job markets.

Societal values and our attitude towards the way people treat each other are changing. Today's definition of "victim" therefore differs considerably from what it was, say, fifty years ago.

I shall speak particularly of women as victims, since women are my primary concern, given my portfolio as status of women critic.

This morning I leafed through a most interesting book, the Traité des problèmes sociaux. This treatise, published under the direction of a number of eminent Quebec academics, covers a multitude of topics related to our society. Looking through the table of contents, I was struck by the innumerable types of victims there can be within a society.

Among the subjects covered were: occupational diseases, mental illness, alcoholism and other addictions, STDs and AIDS, crime, prostitution, pornography, poverty, unemployment, racism, homelessness—and these are but a few of the topics in the Traité des problèmes sociaux.

You can see then, and this is what I wanted to talk about, the unbelievable number of social and personal situations that can "create" victims, if we can use that verb here.

Of course, women are not the only victims of poverty, unemployment, racism. They are, however, most often the victims of domestic violence, prostitution and pornography. The victims of certain problems are almost always women, because of their gender, along with children.

Moreover, problems related to unemployment, illiteracy and poverty affect women differently, because of their family responsibilities and society's perception of their role within it.

Even governments are not immune to prejudice. We need only think of this government trying to calculate benefits paid to women based on family income. This is the best example of the victimization of women because of their role within the family.

As for the notion of victim, Denise Lemieux traces its evolution, in the context of spousal abuse. She writes, in the above–mentioned text: "What stands out, if you look at this over several centuries, is the major attitudinal and legislative change regarding wife beating. Tolerated in the seventeenth century, sometimes even glorified by the popular culture of the time as a manly thing, and by the law and the religion of the time as a paternalistic punishment for the wife, children and servants, violent behaviour gradually became a reprehensible thing, as principles of democratic government began to spread".

Principles of democratic government. So, there seems to be a connection between the principles of government and the concept of victim. This is interesting. One such principle, affirmed by the Canadian and Quebec charters, provides that men and women have equal rights.

• (1630)

When equality is denied, whether because a man beats his wife, or because a government pays smaller benefits to a woman than to a man, that woman becomes a victim. When a government tolerates the fact that members of its army organize parties to celebrate the killing of 14 young women, all women become victims.

So, the concept of victim is related to a certain vision of society. Everywhere, our governments have officially proclaimed a vision of society in which women have the same rights as men. We will have to recognize that women are victims whenever equality is not respected, whether in the family home, or in the policies and practices of the government.

Those in power will also have to concentrate their energies on eliminating the inequalities between men and women. Our aim is to have fewer and fewer victims or none at all.

Until then, our efforts must go to re–establishing a balance between victims and those responsible for situations creating victims, at whatever level.

Let us go for openmindedness, and let us make sure, as leaders, that we provide our young people with positive role models. Let us work to provide women with equal opportunities in all settings. Let us eliminate social, economic and political inequality between men and women. Let us make men understand that discriminatory behaviour is completely unacceptable—at work, at home, in associations, in the courts of justice and in government offices.

Let us put our fine words into practice. This is surely one way to ensure victims' fundamental and democratic right to equality and quality of life without violence.

[English]

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to speak on this issue. I am certainly pleased that the warm and fuzzy questions asked by the Liberals to the warm and fuzzy Bloc members regarding law and order are over with. That was difficult to take.

I would like to quote a few statistics I have picked up with regard to what the hon. member from the Liberal Party stated a while ago. I am going back to 1984. The rate of violent crime since 1984 has increased 49 per cent. The rate of sexual assault has increased 8 per cent annually since 1984. Assaults accounted for six out of ten reported violent incidents in 1994.

Consider that since 1984 when the Young Offenders Act was introduced, crime has gone up by 140 per cent. Members over there stand on their feet and tell us how much better it is getting because the crime rate went down 3.2 per cent or 5.9 per cent or whatever from one year to the next. It is not getting better. There are a number of incidents we could talk about which reflect this.

When will we in the House realize there are victims? Guns do not make victims; killers make victims, in case members opposite have forgotten.

The people who were victimized close to Montreal recently by young offenders with ball bats provide an example as do George and Tom Ambas from Scarborough, Ontario, who lost a brother in their store to young offenders with knives. We do not need to talk about what weapon is used. We need to talk about the fact that there are victims because of killers.

• (1635)

In the Reform amendments to the legislation we attempted to incorporate those things that were suggested to us by victims through their petitions and letters. We listened to Canadians and we tried to put their wishes into the criminal agenda through our motions.

For example, we tried to get Bill C–45 amended which would allow victims to be paid out of inmate funds. There would be mandatory restitution. All of the things we put in were geared toward improving things for the victim. Not one member in the House voted for those amendments, except for Reform Party members. All the Liberals said no and all the Bloc said no to things like mandatory restitution. We were trying to do something that would make it a little easier for the victims.

A lady in my riding was raped. She is a former student where I taught. The perpetrator was identified by her, picked up at breakfast and was out on bail by noon. Is living in fear following that rape fair to the victim, knowing that the perpetrator is still on the loose? If we arrest violent offenders, surely we can keep them in jail. Why would a victim stand up and cheer any system that would let the perpetrator out only a few hours after the crime? Somebody explain that to me.

In the case of Ann Marie Bloskie, her killer made lots of advances toward her and she always refused. Her killer tried to force her into sex. When she fought back he crushed her skull with a rock and then he sexually assaulted her. He went home and slept. The next day he returned and further abused the body. Then he buried her.

This killer loved violent, sexually explicit porno videos. He showed no remorse for the crime. He had deep seated psychological problems that would require life long treatment, said the psychiatrist. This crime happened just a few weeks short of his 18th birthday, so the judge said it was in the best interests of the murderer to be tried under the Young Offenders Act. There was no mention of the victim, no mention of the family.

Her killer is now nameless. He is now walking the streets because all he got for that crime was three years. After three years he is back on the streets but nobody knows for sure who he is. The parents of the victim were not notified that the killer was released.

Fixing those problems is the kind of thing that makes plain, ordinary common sense. That is what is on the agenda of Canadians. It is on the Reform agenda because it is what Canadians want.

Why is having a binding referendum for capital punishment on the Reform agenda? Because it is on the agenda of Canadians. That is why. In polls all across the land, 70 per cent of the people have indicated that is what they want. If it is on their agenda, it is on the Reform agenda. It is too bad the Liberals do not listen to the people in their ridings.

Things get worse. We talk about victims. I really get worried and upset when I see some of the things that have been produced by the government. I know some Liberals were visited this very day by a group who are quite concerned that there is an organization putting pamphlets in the schools which promote anal sex as a method of reducing violence and pregnancy. I looked at the little booklets and guess who prints them and pays for them? The taxpayers of Canada pay for them, compliments of this government's health department.

• (1640)

Members sit over there and laugh. I hope they laugh when their grandchildren come home with this kind of garbage. I hope they can laugh then. I cannot laugh when this happens and I will not laugh. I think it is ridiculous and it is a shame. They know it is happening. They see it happening. It is being printed by the Canadian health department. If members have any doubts, they can come on over and I will show them.

Those are the kinds of things Canadians are telling their MPs. They do not want it because it is creating more victims and causing problems. I do not want it either but if we try to do something about it, those on the other side are overcome with warm, fuzzy feelings. It is always the criminal, the criminal, the criminal.

I cannot believe that grown men and women would allow those kinds of things to happen. I cannot believe that a colleague of mine, who taught in a school just as I did, would find that an acceptable piece of junk to come into the building. I know he would not.

The trouble is that the justice system is absolutely not addressing anything which is causing victims more grief. They could do it if they wanted to.

Christine Silverberg, the Calgary chief of police, has written: "Dangerous violent criminals should never be released". I agree. "There should be a victims bill of rights". I agree. "Victims are the most neglected group in the legal system from beginning to end". I agree. "Victims should be involved in every government decision dealing with their assailants". I also agree with that.

When will government members wake up and listen to the people of Canada, listen to what the petitioners are saying and listen to what their letters state which I know they all receive?

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to indicate to the hon. member that the constituents of Winnipeg North in addressing this issue have not only called to tell us about their concerns for safety in their homes and on the streets but they have also shared solutions.

One of the important things my constituents have told me is that we should address the fundamental causes of crime. That is just like preventive medicine. Unless we address the root causes of crime we may not totally address the issue.

I am proud to say that in my constituency of Winnipeg North the MLA for The Maples in my riding has now established the Maples Youth Justice Committee. The MLA for Inkster has established a similar organization, as has the MLA for Kildonan. I have met with all of them.

What specific initiative has the member taken in his own riding to address the root causes of crime? Does the Reform Party acknowledge that prisoners week is an international religious event that includes victims, families and communities as it addresses the issues of the victims and the prisoners? Does the Reform Party not acknowledge that the victims of the misuse of firearms, for example the relatives of the victims of the massacre in Montreal, were correct in asking for gun control? If that is so, where does the member's party stand on this issue?

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, I object to any kind of a week that is named prisoners week. If this week was intended to honour victims then it certainly is not named right. The first thing I thought of when I heard we were having national prisoner's week is good old Clifford Olson, good old Karla Homolka and good old Paul Bernado. That is exactly what crossed the mind of most people in my riding when they phoned me and said: "What in the devil is prisoner's week?" I said: "I do not have any idea at all. I just heard it was announced". They do not have brains enough to at least name it right.

• (1645)

Now they are going to defend it by saying that what they really meant was this and that and so on, but it sure did not come out that way. If you are to have something besides honouring those kinds of individuals then say so and name it properly.

Let us go to the second question. You must have not been listening, sir, when I told you about these pamphlets that are getting into—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Address your questions through the Chair, please.

Mr. Thompson: I am sorry, Madam Speaker. The hon. member must not have been paying much attention. I have been asked by the people who have brought all these materials to me to question the government as to why the health department is funding those kinds of documents that lead to nothing but trouble, that lead to crime. A root cause. It is called morals, dealing with the morals.

When you bring it to the government, it tries to defend it. If it can defend it, that would be one thing, but it cannot. It has had its opportunities to defend it and it cannot. Even backbenchers would not support some of the garbage that was going on. Of course they get punished for that. That is the rule over there: listen to the boys on the front line. They do not have enough guts to stand up on the back row and take their own stand.

I do not want to get into this great gun debate once again. We have gone through that so much. Guns are no different from any other weapon. They cause problems. The victims are victims regardless of why or how. If any member could show me that the registration of a gun will save a life at the hands of a criminal, I might support it. I do not think anyone can show me.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the debate today, for Canadians who are following it, is on an opposition day motion. This is a day when an opposition party has an opportunity to set the agenda for debate in the House. Reform has introduced for debate today a motion first of all to discuss the lack of progress being made in reforming the criminal justice system. Second, we refer in our motion to another opposition day motion we had about a year and a half ago on the same topic:

> That this House condemn the government for its inaction with regard to the reform of the criminal justice system, in particular its allowance of the rights of criminals to supersede those of victims.

Here we are again a year and a half later with the same concerns. As we heard from my colleague who just spoke, these are very strong, serious concerns. These are not matters we take lightly. They are matters we keep hearing from our constituents and other members of the public that they want to see dealt with. They are saying the government is not dealing with them.

A year and a half ago we urged the government in debate, which we were able to introduce, to do something. A year and a half later we are making the same request, the same appeal to government. You wonder why.

In our motion we urged the government to do two things. One is to introduce measures right now to ensure the rights of the victim are protected and supersede the rights of the criminals. We are also asking the government to change the name of this week, November 19 to 26, from prisoners week to victims rights week.

• (1650)

Reform's position is very simple. We say the whole priority of the criminal justice system should be the protection of the lives and property of law–abiding citizens and that should come ahead of the protection of the rights of criminals.

The state exists to protect the lives and property of citizens. That is the reason we organize. That is the reason we have institutions of society, so we can live in a civilized manner and can respect each other's rights, respect each other's safety and each other's lives.

If we are to do that as a state, we have to make law breakers afraid of breaking the laws and afraid of what will happen if they violate the rights of other people. It would not be too strong to say that one of the main purposes of having an organized society and an organized government is to make law breakers afraid, to bring fear of law breaking into our society.

We have to ask ourselves does our society make law breakers afraid? I do not think there are very many Canadians who would answer that question in the affirmative. We have had many examples brought up in the House over the last several months. Law breakers commit horrendous crimes and are right back out on the street living a normal life while the victims and their families have torment, grief, upset, pain and agony. Yet criminals and law breakers have every protection, every consideration, every possible assistance and comfort extended to them.

Our whole society, our whole approach to the criminal justice system in this regard is totally on its head. That is why we have the strong concerns of Canadians continually being brought forward in this whole area.

What does the government say? What is it doing about the situation? The justice minister is saying all the right things. He is saying yes, we are going to protect victims; yes, we are changing and toughening up the justice system; yes, we want the public's confidence in the justice system.

These are all well and good, but here we have a minister who has had over two years now to do some concrete, strong, forceful, vigorous things to rectify this situation and instead is taking timid, weak, ineffectual baby steps in correcting a situation causing continual concern and grave frustration to our citizens.

The second thing we have seen the government do is get really tough with law–abiding citizens. If they do not register their firearms, they will be in big trouble, they will have a criminal record, but nothing is being done about these weapons which can be obtained illegally and quickly by any law breaker in the country.

We have done so little to make them afraid to do that. We put the fear of God into the law–abiding citizens, who did not need it in the first place, and we have done nothing to ensure that law breakers cannot obtain an illegal weapon in the nearest bar in 30 minutes.

How will this protect our society? The whole philosophy of our criminal justice system is on help, sympathy and support for prisoners and law breakers. It says a lot that this is prisoners week. We have prisoners week but no victims week at all.

I was rather surprised when I read an article about women inmates decrying the lack of rehabilitation programs. A woman inmate was saying: "In two years I got nothing. Nobody listens and nobody cares. I am broken hearted. Inmates are upset with the lack of programs".

• (1655)

There is as real desire to help everyone we can in society to be the best citizens they can. When we have people who have broken the law and violated the rights of others who are outraged and incensed that they are not getting help and support, when the victims of crime are coming in a poor second, surely the attitude we are fostering is wrong. There must be a change very quickly.

I cite one other example that sums up what is wrong in our justice system. We have a convicted murderer who has sued corrections Canada and the Government of Canada for negligence in protecting him. This murderer was convicted for stabbing a 15–year old boy while trying to sexually assault him.

He sued because he was beaten up by other inmates in 1991. This year he was awarded an out of court settlement by the Government of Canada to compensate its lack of protection for him.

I contrast that with the family of a young woman who was murdered by a convicted murderer who in honour of his birthday, a wonderful day, was given a nice pass to go shopping and to enjoy himself. He had been convicted of murdering someone, but of course we do not want to be too harsh on anyone in our society and we would certainly not keep a convicted murderer from having a shopping trip on his birthday.

This convicted murderer went out on his birthday and gave himself an even better present than a shopping trip. He assaulted and killed a young woman. The system again failed to protect someone, this time an innocent young woman, not a convicted murderer.

The family of the young woman naturally made an appeal for compensation to the Government of Canada. Where has that appeal gone? For six years there has been absolutely no offer of compensation.

It is incumbent on us to get serious about turning our justice system to the protection of the citizens and innocent people.

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Madam Speaker, one of my favourite poets is Shakespeare. One of the soliloquies from "Macbeth" talks about sound and fury signifying nothing. We have a lot to learn from Shakespeare because talk is cheap and action and hard work are the real tests.

When we talk about being concerned about victims we have to listen to victims when they come before us. This is a day when in the other place we will have a vote on gun control.

I remember as vice–chair of the justice committee the victims coming before us on gun control, the victims groups saying how badly they needed the legislation. I remember the suicide experts coming before us saying how badly this legislation was needed. I remember the women's groups coming before us saying how badly they needed this legislation. There is work to be done.

We have done work in the government. We have talked about balancing rights. We do not put one right above another when public safety is the issue, and that is the issue. It is not whom we rank in order. There is a realistic need to address the problems in society.

The party opposite thinks the way to address problems is to single out notorious, terrible events. These events are terrible and there are great losses. However, there is no ownership on caring for victims in society by any one of the parties in the House. We all care about victims in society.

The difference is that when we care, we roll up our sleeves and do some real work. We look at real facts. We voted for the legislation that puts gun control in place because the victims asked for it. We voted for the legislation on sentencing because it gives an ability for the victims to go to the courts to get compensation. We go and we get victim impact statements at hearings.

• (1700)

The Reform Party can find some little place in these pieces of legislation where they do not care about those bills and they vote them down. The victims count. CAVEAT, a national organization, met this week in Hamilton, and where did it rate the provinces that take the attitude that is closest to the third party? It rated them as a d in Alberta and a d in Ontario. Where did it rate our minister? It rated him up there because he has the fortitude to stand behind a bill that will do something for victims.

What we need to figure out here is who is really working. Who is working when we have victims of misuse of firearms? Who is working when we have victims of family violence? I remember comments on December 6 last year from the other side. It has no understanding of family abuse.

We have bills that bring sexual offenders now to the ends of their terms. We have improved the Young Offenders Act and we will do more. We take DNA evidence. They came alongside on that, and that is good. Maybe that is a real vision for the future, looking at a bill and making sure it works and helping us implement it.

The Reform Party did support the drunkenness defence bill, but today it likes to forget that we did that bill. That helps victims.

I wish I had 20 minutes, because I have a lot more to say on this issue. Behind the scenes we will do the real work and not just push the trigger buttons.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am absolutely delighted to hear the passion with which the member opposite commits to helping victims. I would like to give her and her government suggestions as to what we could do to increase the rights of victims.

We could give them a right to restitution from the offender. We could give them a right to prompt return of property. These are rights they do not now have. We could give them the right to be informed of services to help them in the trauma they have experienced. We could give them the right to information and notification in a whole range of areas, which I would be very happy to supply to the member. We can give them a right to be heard by the crown and a right to be heard throughout the judicial process.

We could give them a right to privacy, a protection from unnecessary invasions of privacy; a right to refuse to be interviewed by defence counsel; a right to waiting areas in the court buildings that are separate from those used by the accused; a right to be free from intimidation; a right to have a prompt disposition of prosecutions; a right to be informed of victims' rights; a right to an explanation of their role and the scope and progress of the proceedings.

There are a whole range of areas where we can help victims in very practical ways.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Madam Speaker, this month marks the second anniversary of the period during which it has been my privilege to serve the Prime Minister and the government as Minister of Justice. During that time there have been no experiences that have left deeper impressions on me and there has been no work that has been more important to me than those occasions on which I have met with victims of crime, spoken to family members who survive others who have died as a result of crime and heard from them about their perception of justice and the justice system.

I refer to meeting with Priscilla de Villiers, whose daughter Nina was murdered, and meeting with Chuck Cadman in Vancouver, whose son Jesse was murdered. Priscilla de Villiers reacted by creating CAVEAT, which is now a strong national organization standing for the rights of victims and drawing the attention of Canadians, including governments of all levels, to the shortcomings in the justice system. Chuck Cadman created the organization called CRY, in which thousands of people participate actively for constructive change in the justice system.

• (1705)

I have met with Rita Jervis, a woman from the Maritimes whose husband was shot and who herself was seriously injured. She survived that attack to devote her energies and her efforts to improving the justice system.

I met with the parents of the young people murdered at the McDonald's restaurant in Cape Breton. I heard from them about the tragic and everlasting sadness and suffering that is the result of that dreadful crime.

I met with Stu Garrioch and his wife in Calgary, whose son was killed in crime.

I met with Margot B, the courageous woman from Quebec who campaigned across the country for changes in the system as a result of her victimization of sexual assault.

I met with Jay Danelesko in Edmonton, whose wife Barb was murdered in the middle of the night in their home. She died in front of their children.

I met with Monica Rainey, whose own son, a toddler, was the victim of sexual molestation. She turned her energies and her extraordinary talents into efforts to create ways to protect other children from that kind of victimization.

I met with Steve Carpenter, who lost his daughter in a dreadful tragedy in British Columbia.

I met with Morris Rose, whose son died a victim of violent crime.

I met with Tom Ambus last week in Toronto, whose brother was brutally stabbed to death on the floor of Tom Ambus' store.

It is said that victims are too often forgotten, that victims are the orphans of the criminal justice system. I stand in this place today to say that those persons and all the other victims with whom I have met have left too deep and indelible an impression on this Minister of Justice ever to be forgotten as I approach the issues in my portfolio, ever to be forgotten as I bring forward proposals for change, ever to be forgotten as I work to develop the policy of the government toward criminal justice.

I shall never forget as I do my work the part they play and the part they have played, not only through the suffering they have endured through the awful loss of loved ones, but also through the way in which they have helped the police in the investigation of the crimes, how they have had the courage to testify in the prosecution of those responsible, how they have devoted their energies afterward, notwithstanding their personal pain, in efforts to improve the justice system, working constructively for change.

[Translation]

Since I took up my duties as Minister of Justice, we have tabled several bills aimed at improving the criminal justice system for the benefit of Canadian society as a whole and more specifically for the benefit victims of crime.

[English]

I believe the changes we have made have improved significantly the circumstances for victims in the Canadian system of justice. I point to Bill C–41, which for the first time sets out in the criminal law of this country in statute the principles and the purposes of sentencing, including the obligation of the criminal justice system to provide reparation to victims of crime.

Bill C–41 specifically provides that the court will consider as an aggravating circumstance that someone was victimized by reason of a breach of trust, by reason of violence by a man against a woman in a domestic context, or by reason of hatred based on the personal characteristics of the victim. They are all on the bad list.

Bill C–41 also contains changes in section 745 of the Criminal Code to ensure that the surviving family members of someone who is murdered must be heard from by the court when an application is made for permission to seek early parole under section 745.

• (1710)

Perhaps most important for present purposes, Bill C–41 also provided for much strengthened provisions for restitution. I listened to the hon. member opposite describe the urgent need for avenues of restitution for the victims of crime. Bill C–41 brought together significant improvements, which were combined in that bill to provide that from and after the date of its proclamation the courts will be empowered to order, even without the victim asking for it, appropriate restitution. The victim may take that order, register it in the courts in the same manner as a civil judgment, and it can be enforced in the same manner as a civil judgment, taking the responsibility for enforcement off the shoulders of the victim and putting it where it belongs.

In Bill C–42 the government proposed changes that are now in effect in the Criminal Code of Canada to provide that peace bonds, restraining orders made by the courts to keep threatening persons away from their potential victims, can be made on application by police officers instead of by the potential victim himself or herself, to relieve them of that obligation, to make it that much easier for them to have that court protection.

Bill C–42 provided dozens of ways to streamline the criminal justice system for the benefit of victims, including for example those who have lost property in crime may establish ownership of the property for the purposes of the prosecution simply by swearing and filing an affidavit rather than having to take the time and trouble to appear in court personally to establish that technical proof.

In Bill C–72 we expressly provided words in the Criminal Code that will bring home the personal responsibility of those who intoxicate themselves voluntarily and then commit a crime of violence involving the general intent of harming others. The preamble of Bill C–72 is express testimony of this government's concern about and commitment to victims of crime. Bill C–72 stands as a profound and important statement from this Parliament on behalf of victims that those who intoxicate themselves voluntarily and then harm others in those circumstances will be held accountable and cannot rely upon their own self–induced drunkenness or intoxication from drugs as an excuse. That is action on behalf of victims.

In Bill C–37 the changes to the Young Offenders Act expressly provided for the first time for victim impact statements in court proceedings involving young offenders. In the second phase of that work involving the young offenders, which was commenced by the justice committee of the House this week, I expressly asked the committee to look at different approaches toward juvenile justice with specific reference to the role of the victim. I asked how we can have that act improved to more directly involve the victim through reparation, through confronting the offender, through restitution, through community work, so that people who are the victims of crime can have some sense of justice out of the process. I expressly asked the committee to work with me in designing changes to achieve those objectives. I share those objectives with the members opposite. We have the same goals in mind. I have invited them this week as members of the committee to work constructively with me toward the attainment of these goals.

In Bill C–104, which received the agreement of all parties in the House, we introduced for the first time an express provision in the Criminal Code empowering police officers to go to the courts for a warrant to obtain bodily substances for testing for DNA, important forensic evidence either to establish guilt or prove innocence. That is a step forward for victims. When combined with the further legislation the Solicitor General of Canada is preparing to establish a data bank for DNA samples of those convicted of crime, we will have available to the authorities in this country an invaluable resource to detect and ultimately pre–empt and prevent crimes of violence against victims.

When we speak of victims of crime, indeed, when we speak of violent crimes generally, it is very important to remember that 70 per cent of the victims of crime are acquainted with their assailants. The general impression that some might have that violent crime is confined to the streets where strangers lurk dangerously to assault us, is not right. The vast majority of victims know the person who attacks them. That leads to a related point.

• (1715)

An appalling percentage of crime goes on in the home and involves violence by men against women. It is to that cause, against that kind of crime, that we must also unite in our efforts and in our opposition. Violence by men against women tragically forms too large a part of the crime problem in the country. We must work through the wide variety of strategies available to combat, to reduce and ultimately to end it.

I draw the attention of hon. members to the importance, not just of legislative initiatives but to crime prevention. Because law alone, no matter how much improved by the suggestions made by hon. members, will never, ever be enough to address the problem of crime and community safety.

It cannot work in isolation because it deals with symptoms and not with causes. It becomes engaged when it is too late. The crime has been committed, someone has been harmed and the charge has been laid. Crime prevention is a strategy by which we can take community resources and energy and through linking police enforcement with the justice system, with social agencies, with families, we can do something about crime before it happens.

All across the country as I go from the west to central Canada to the maritimes, I see the energy and the commitment of communities. Instead of just wringing their hands about community safety, they are rolling up their sleeves and doing something constructive about it.

The National Crime Prevention Council created by the government in the summer of 1994 provides the national instrument by which that energy and that commitment can be brought together and focused on that important national objective.

Let it not be thought that we will make ourselves safe simply by ratcheting up the penalties and making the laws more harsh. That is only part of the approach. We must also look at the underlying causes of crime. We must recognize that preventing crime has as much to do with the strength of families as it does with the length of sentences. It has as much to do with literacy as it does with law. It has as much to do with community co–operation as it does with mandatory supervision.

No one here should think that we are serving victims if we offer them only vengeance. Victims want more than to see the offender punished. That is where hon. members of the third party, in my respectful view, fall short in their approach to this problem. More is required than simply vengeance.

If ever there was eloquent evidence of that principle, it was offered by the family of one of the victims in the Bernardo tragedy. I believe it was the Mahaffey family. When asked about capital punishment, the Mahaffey family said: "That is not our objective. That is not what we are after. What we are after is to make sure that something positive comes of this awful tragedy. What we are after is to make sure that person is put away for life in prison. What we are after is to ensure that it never happens again". That is what victims want and it is toward that constructive objective that we must work together.

A few weeks ago I spoke outside on this magnificent Hill to a rally organized by a group of victims seeking changes in the criminal justice system. I undertook on that occasion to work with them in the name of justice for changes to our laws to achieve the objectives of which I have spoken today. I intend to keep that commitment.

I said earlier that I welcomed this opportunity to respond to the motion before the House today. The government is proud of its achievements because it has a made a concerted effort to approach the problem of crime from various angles.

• (1720)

I am not suggesting that all has been said and done. But I do know that creating new crimes with increasingly stiffer sentences will not solve the problem. Finding the causes of crime is no easy matter. It involves a cause and effect analysis as wideranging and complex as human nature itself. However, to claim that we can solve the problem by getting rid of criminals as long as possible is simply to evade the issue.

[English]

The motion before the House today is somewhat of a surprise since it emanates from members of the third party. Sometimes the way they express themselves on such subjects, one would think that the members of the third party have a monopoly on righteousness when it comes to the position of victims.

Their position, I am afraid, is hardly that strong. I suggest that their presentation today of this resolution offers somewhat of an embarrassing contrast for the third party. Today, through their resolution and their arguments, they would have us believe that their priority is the rights of victims and the perspective of victims.

On Monday of this week a group of victims met here on the Hill. They made a very powerful, a very emotional and a very moving presentation in favour of Bill C–68, urging the Senate to adopt the government's proposals on gun control.

Those victims also have a point of view. The men and women who stood on the Hill on Monday in favour of Bill C–68 are victims too. They want Bill C–68 put in place because they know it is in the best interests of victims and the criminal justice system in this country.

It is the members of the third party who have fought so much against Bill C–68 in the past and continue to do so. Perhaps that is the best evidence of the flawed approach of the members of the third party toward the proposition in which today they pretend so strongly to believe.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the speech of the justice minister.

A year ago Reformers brought up the same issue, asking the government to be a little more active in trying to protect victims and their rights. For years, the criminal justice system—as a lawyer, he would know this—has been geared toward the rights of the criminal. From the moment the offender is arrested to the moment of the expiration of the sentence, our system is built around the criminal. The victim has been generally ignored.

We brought this to the attention of the House. There has been some movement and very little improvement. We want to make more improvement.

If Parliament is intent on protecting society, it should and will have to recognize and codify victims' rights. As a party we have pushed four issues: official standing in court cases and parole hearings, which the minister has not invoked; mandatory victim impact statements and victim compensation, where there is an opportunity to draw from the criminal himself or herself some compensation, and to recognize that the rights of the victim outweigh the rights of the criminal.

Our charter of rights and freedoms in some ways give criminals privileges that are unheard of. We talked a year ago about the 46–year old woman, mother of three children, who was raped by a convict on day parole. The victim tried to get a Quebec court to compel her attacker to take a blood test for HIV but the court ruled against her, saying that the blood test would compromise the rights of the accused rapist.

Protecting the rights of the accused at the expense of the victim of a crime is a crime in itself. Today, we have the Bernardo and the Homolka situation. We have two prisons that are connected by a tunnel—

The Deputy Speaker: Will somebody tell the minister it is normally expected that the minister would wait and reply to questions and comments. I thank the minister for coming back.

• (1725)

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, I posed the question. He is a busy man. Maybe he is going out to fix up our victims rights. Maybe he is going to do something about the bill.

Getting back to the point I was making about the two prisons where Bernardo and Homolka are held, a tunnel connects the two. According to the charter of rights and freedoms, he is going to be able to have conjugal visits with members on the female prison side. This is not punishment.

Mr. Hoeppner: It's ludicrous.

Mr. Silye: It is ludicrous, I agree with the member from Manitoba.

I guess I need another preamble for my question. I believe that we should make violent criminals—that was my comment and now to the question for the—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Silye: We are laughing and joking, but it is not really funny.

This man has been the justice minister for two years. All he wants to do is register firearms at a cost of $400 million and impose a bunch of ludicrous infringements on private property and carrying on like that, rather than doing what really is important which is toughening up the criminal justice system, making our streets safer and actually punishing people who commit crimes.

It is wonderful to talk about the causes of it. It is wonderful to look at how we can help these people to not commit these crimes. Those are solutions that are of a much longer term. In the short term the punishment should fit the crime and parole should not be given to violent offenders.

Why not make violent criminals serve their full sentence without possibility of parole? Why not get tougher with the criminals, show that the justice system is tough, then look at the rights of the victims and give them the satisfaction that at least the government of this land is looking after their rights and not just the criminals rights.

Mr. Rock: Mr. Speaker, may I first of all make it clear that I intended no disrespect to the hon. member when I left the Chamber for a few moments. I am sure he knows that and I trust that the Speaker knows it as well.

In response to the point raised by the hon. member, I take it that what he is advocating is a balance in the approach. We must take steps to strengthen the criminal justice system. We must also be sensitive to the rights and the interests of the victim. I believe that is what we have reflected in the steps we have taken as a government.

We have introduced in Bill C–68 mandatory minimum penitentiary terms, the longest in the Criminal Code, for those who use guns in crime. That is a very significant punitive element in the criminal law. I know that it has the support of the members of the third party.

At the same time in Bill C–41 we have recognized the role and the rights of the victim in the strengthened restitution provisions. We have changed the section 745 procedure so that they are guaranteed a role in such applications. In Bill C–42 we have made it unnecessary for them to go to court, for example, when—

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP) moved that Bill C–314, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act (other pension income), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to say a few words at second reading of my private member's bill, Bill C–314. I made a few comments when I introduced it but for members in the House today I want to remind them that this bill is an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act (other pension income). The bill requires all pension or retiring allowance payments received by a member of Parliament which are paid from public funds to be deducted from the member of Parliament's sessional allowance payments.

The following occupations fall under the definition of a public or retiring allowance paid from the public purse: a member of the legislative assembly of a province or a provincial parliament; a member of the public service of Canada or a province; a judge of any court in Canada; a member of the Canadian forces; a peace officer; an employee or officer of a crown corporation of the crown in right of Canada or of a province; an employee or officer of a board, bureau, commission, council, institute or agency of the crown in right of Canada, the crown in right of a province or a municipality; an employee or officer of a publicly funded school, school board, college, university or hospital; an employee or officer of an organization that the board by law orders to be an equivalent organization, crown corporation, agency of the crown, or college, university or hospital.

The bill is a reverse double dipping bill. There are two definitions of double dipping. The first is members of Parliament with pensions taking government jobs while still drawing their parliamentary pension. This definition has been primarily dealt with in Bill C–85. The President of the Treasury Board introduced the bill and it was passed. It was part of the pension adjustment bill.

The second definition of double dipping, which this bill addresses, is MPs elected while collecting a public pension. They are receiving in essence a pension from a position which I made reference to plus receiving their member of Parliament allowance.

For example, there is a former MLA in this assembly who receives a pension of approximately $61,000 annually. He was elected to the House and receives a full salary as a member of Parliament as well. Therefore he is earning something in the order of $165,000 for serving the public. This bill would take the $61,000 pension and subtract it from the $64,400 which is due to a member of Parliament, thereby only paying this person to continue to serve the public at the federal level his $61,000 pension and $3,400.

I will take the House through a bit of the history of double dipping in Canada. Prior to 1976 pensions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, members of Parliament, the military and public servants were regulated by Parliament and the regulations were quite uneven. A former member of the military could not keep their pension if elected to Parliament, yet a civil servant could. It was also not possible for a former member of Parliament to join the public service and collect their pension. The rules did not allow for a level playing field. Certain occupations were eligible to collect pensions while working in another occupation, while others were not.

This was updated in 1976 but instead of preventing all public pensioners from drawing a salary and a public pension, the process was opened up to allow them to collect both. In hindsight this was a costly, unfair and unacceptable practice, as it is now, in light of our fiscal situation and in light of a significant increase in unemployment, in particular with young Canadians.

The purpose of a pension is to provide income to an individual in recognition of years of service. In essence it is a deferred income or a deferred benefit earned while working to be paid when one retires. It is meant to sustain retirees in a satisfactory manner during retirement. A public pension is provided by the taxpayers so that the retiree has a source of income.

The proposal I am putting forward through Bill C–314 is seen in other jurisdictions. For example, it is a policy with many school boards to deduct salaried earnings from retirees who go back to the classroom to teach so they are not double dipping, receiving a pension from the school board as well as receiving a full time salary—doing two things; double dipping in terms of getting double revenue for doing one job and also taking the job away from somebody who needs it much more than the person who is receiving a substantial pension.

This policy was established because school boards could not justify to the taxpayer that a teacher should be able to earn a salary from teaching when they claim to be retired from the very profession in which they are working.

• (1735)

The bill would save the House of Commons literally millions of dollars annually because the payroll would be reduced. As well, there are currently at least 60 members of Parliament who could be affected by the bill. The numbers are approximate, we do not know for sure. A number of Liberals, Bloc members and Reform members are currently receiving pensions from previous public service and collecting a full salary as members of Parliament. They fall into the categories of MLAs, MPPs, municipal politicians, teachers, military officers, peace officers and various and sundry civil servants.

Some are receiving generous pensions and others will be eligible soon for benefits while still serving as a member of Parliament. The bill reflects the fact that these individuals are continuing in their role of serving the public and should not be paid twice. They should not be considered retired from public life and then pursue a career as a member of Parliament and be paid twice to serve that very same public.

Many members of Parliament in most veins agree that serving Canada is an honour and a privilege. We should not abuse that privilege. All we do by receiving a public pension while being a member of Parliament receiving a full salary is add to the cynicism of the public by abusing the goodwill of the Canadian taxpayer.

Bill C–314 recognizes that despite the level of government there is only one taxpayer paying the salaries of MPs, retired municipal politicians and retired civil servants. If a retired person becomes a member of Parliament, that person should no longer be considered retired.

The government does not allow persons who are collecting unemployment insurance benefits to collect welfare benefits at the same time. We have this in other jurisdictions such as school boards and unemployment insurance. UI does not allow persons to collect unemployment insurance while holding a job either. If a person does this they are considered to be cheating the system. Why are members of Parliament exempt from this form of double dipping? In essence those of us who are receiving pensions could be considered cheaters on the taxpayers.

We cannot expect Canadians to tighten their belts with massive cutbacks to government programs while we receive a public pension and a public salary at the same time. Contributions members of Parliament would make in terms of savings could go toward a special fund.

For example, consider a member who makes $61,000 in pension income. That $61,000 could go to this fund which could be used on an annual basis to be paid directly on the deficit. This could provide very significant leadership to Canadians in the sense that the members who receive these pensions with this deduction from their MPs salary could use this fund annually toward reducing the deficit while telling Canadians we are making some very difficult choices and that we also believe as members of Parliament we are to make some difficult choices ourselves which will address the deficit issue.

We also see an opportunity to save money for taxpayers. However, we have seen governments in the past, and particularly this Liberal government, make some significant cuts to transfer payments in the health, education and social service areas. It is not really saving money. It says it is saving money by cutting back $7 billion this year with respect to health, education and social services costs but all it is really doing is transferring this to other levels of government, the provincial governments and the municipalities across the country. The taxpayer has to make up the difference of the $7 billion.

We are also seeing a government making cutbacks to unemployment insurance. In Saskatchewan's circumstance we have seen the unemployment insurance program cutback so dramatically in the last two years that over 15,000 people have been taken off UI as a result of the new cutbacks by the Liberal government. They are now being put on the Saskatchewan assistance plan case load, which costs an extra $63 million a year.

In addition to the unemployment insurance reductions, the Liberal government has transferred responsibility for providing assistance to off reserve status Indians, adding another 10,000 people to the welfare case load of Saskatchewan alone at an estimated cost of $37 million. We have seen $63 million, $37 million, $100 million on those two initiatives under the unemployment insurance benefit scheme alone.

• (1740)

The Liberal government was elected on the platform of providing jobs and of course it has thrown more people out of work and on to welfare rolls in Saskatchewan than ever before, adding to the burden of the Saskatchewan taxpayer.

Bill C–314, which I am proposing, would assist in a very minor way but illustrates the Liberals have no new ways of trying to save money. All they want to do is pass off the expense of running our country to another level of government.

I will say a few words now about double dipping in the Reform Party. If the Reform Party is concerned about double dipping, it would support the bill. The bill creates a level playing field. Members of Parliament would see retirement income deducted from their paycheque during their tenures as members of Parliament.

Members of the Reform Party have stated they would not accept the parliamentary pension before age 60. Yet there are Reform MPs who gladly accept publicly paid pension benefits from the provincial governments they have served in other public sector jobs, be it teaching, municipal governments or other provincial government sectors.

This in my view is hypocrisy on the part of the Reform Party. The Reform Party is insulting the intelligence of Canadian taxpayers. If it is wrong for a former member of Parliament to accept his pension and take a public sector job, then why can a former MLA now in the Reform Party receiving a $61,000 a year pension not do the same thing when he becomes a member of Parliament?

Reform Party members must lead by example and voluntarily deduct their pension incomes from their salaries and give the difference back to the House of Commons or to the deficit.

I have some very profound arguments and a great deal of support for the bill. Barbara Yaffe of British Columbia wrote in the Ottawa Citizen on April 20:

> Now that the diabolical double dip has been addressed, the Chrétien government might want to take action on the reverse dip.
> Double dipping is to be forbidden under the reforms to the MPs' pension plan announced in February by Treasury Board President Art Eggleton. But the reverse dip was not mentioned in those reforms.

The column was quite laudatory for me and with respect to this bill. She does quote a number of members of Parliament who are serving in the Reform and Liberal parties: the member for Bonavista—Trinity Conception, a retired naval rear admiral; the member for Lethbridge; the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan; the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands, a former armed forces officer, and it goes on and on. I would like to read the whole article but I do not think it would be appropriate at this time. However, the bottom line is there is a great deal of support for the bill.

I am not doing this out of mischievousness. I am doing this because it is a serious issue for Canadians and for Parliament. I am doing it with sincerity. As a former member of the Saskatchewan legislature, I have gone on record before and after the election that if I was serving my country in the House of Commons I would never take a pension for my former service as a member of the Saskatchewan Legislative Assembly. I will stick by that regardless of whether the bill is passed.

I reaffirm my position that as a former member I will not take a public pension, my legislative pension or my pension as a corporate planner with Saskatchewan Telecommunications because I believe it is a privilege to serve my constituents, my province and my country. Regardless of what position I am in, I will take only the salary due to me and disregard and postpone taking any pensions I am entitled to.

In this regard I am putting the bill forward in a serious manner. I hope that members of the Reform Party and the Liberal Party will join with me in supporting the bill.

• (1745)

There are a few more things I would like to add with respect to some of the impacts on the bill but I note that the Liberal member opposite is anxious to say a few words on it.

There have been some comments in the House today concerning the MPs pension plan. There are members of Parliament who will argue that members should not receive any pension whatsoever. For those who argue for no pensions, one has to question their motives. Is it because they already have a pension, or is it because they are representing interests which will pay them handsomely for doing other things? Or is it simply an attempt to falsely bribe the electorate into believing that if the MPs are not worthy of pensions or MPs should not take pensions they might be more worthy of support by the electorate?

I think those arguments are false. People will support honest, hardworking politicians who are fair, who work to build our country and who raise taxpayers' money fairly and spend it even more fairly and wisely in a very accountable fashion. People will agree that if we are not doing a good job or if we are corrupt or dishonest, we deserve nothing. In fact, nothing is still too much for some in people's minds because of the lack of work they have done or the corruption they have been involved with.

No one disagrees with that but it does not mean because there are some bad apples in a profession that all are bad, or in the case of members of Parliament that none deserve or are entitled to pensions. I do not subscribe to that.

I believe if taxpayers treat their members of Parliament satisfactorily in terms of pay and benefits, be they current or deferred or both, that the members of Parliament will be responsible and accountable to those who pay their salaries and benefits. If members of Parliament or any other elected official are not paid satisfactorily, they will receive income from other sources. Perhaps they will be accountable to those other sources more so than those people they are representing in this wonderful institution called the House of Commons.

I do not take for one second the argument that members of Parliament should not take a pension if they deserve it, if they have earned it and if they have served their country well. There is some room to manoeuvre in terms of the possibility of not having served the country in an honourable or honest fashion. Then perhaps some penalties might arise. However, I certainly believe Canadians would agree that if a member has worked and earned his or her pension then the member is entitled to it.

There will always be a debate on how much the pension should be, but the point is that the concept of a pension is realistic. If a member of Parliament receives a pension, the member will work hard in this House of Commons to ensure that all Canadians receive a fair pension.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden as he introduced this private member's bill. While he may have had some very virtuous points, I think his bill is misguided.

It is unfortunate that this bill cannot come to a vote because then we could make a decision on it. However, it is not a votable item so we will have to make do and it will be dropped from the Order Paper after the debate. That is not going to stop me from expressing my views about the hon. member's bill, of which I am sure the hon. member for Mackenzie was a reluctant seconder.

Having said that, it is important to look at what the hon. member has proposed in reality. While it may have a superficial appeal in terms of actual fairness, I suggest it is not exactly what Canadians would want.

Canadians earn pensions in the course of their employment as part of the remuneration for the employment they are engaged in. In other words, if I take a job and am paid a specific salary, attached to the job will be the possibility of a pension.

• (1750)

Let us assume that the job is one that has a pension attached. My salary will be lower than it might otherwise be in order for the employer and I to contribute to a pension plan. We will contribute at varying rates according to the terms of the contract but nevertheless, contributions will be made to a pension plan.

It will be understood that that is deferred compensation. It is money that I am not being paid in the course of my employment to ensure that I receive additional moneys later. I make that agreement when I make a deal with an employer. The hon. member knows that all kinds of persons engaged in employment contracts make those kinds of deals.

He is now saying that where a person is subsequently elected to the House of Commons, at the time that he is entitled to draw a pension from another source, that pension should not be paid to him or her. Or, if it is paid, his or her salary as a member of Parliament is reduced by the dollar amount of the pension.

Let us imagine for a moment that in my previous employment I had been engaged in a place where I earned a pension. I was not, but suppose I was. Suppose that on my election to the House because I had left my previous employment I was eligible to a pension of $30,000 a year. That would mean my sessional indemnity as a member of Parliament would be reduced from the standard $64,000 to $34,000 because I was receiving this additional pension from my previous employment. They were funds that I had earned in the course of that employment and which were payable to me as a result of that work.

Let us assume that the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden had no pensionable earnings from previous employment. He came to the House and earned his $64,000. What inducement would there be for me to work on a full time basis as a member of Parliament when my salary was less than his? I would be paid $30,000 less by Parliament for doing exactly the same job presumably he was elected to do. Why should I do that? Why should I be paid on a different basis?

We are all paid the same amount as members of Parliament. Some of us work harder than others. We accept that fact, but the House does not make any differentiation between that. We are all paid the same and it is assumed we all do the same work. We all certainly have the same responsibility.

Some of us get a little extra money because we are parliamentary secretaries or cabinet ministers. However as members of Parliament, we all receive the same basic pay. It is not adjusted downward because one of us receives a pension. Yet, the hon. member not only would draw that distinction between MPs, he would then draw it only in respect of those who received pensions from a public sector pension fund.

If mine happened to be from a private employer, I could keep my money and take no reduction. If it came from a public sector employer, I would take a cut in my pay as a member of Parliament. I do not think it is fair and the hon. member on serious reflection would realize it is unfair.

Tempting as it is to go after his friends in the Reform Party, that is not the way to do it. Pensions represent deferred earnings. The sessional indemnity that members of Parliament earn is paid for us to do our job here. After all, we are paid to do the job we were elected to do at the specified rate I have indicated. That rate surely is one that is not overly generous. To suggest that it ought to be reduced because someone gets a pension modest or otherwise from another source is unfair.

Who will be prejudiced by the hon. member's bill? Let us look at who is likely to end up suffering. It will be those who are over an age where they could draw a pension. Younger members of Parliament will not qualify for a pension in any event. It will almost exclusively be more senior members who will be affected by this. Senior members are here to work as are the younger members. Why should they be paid less as members of this Parliament because they are older and entitled to another pension? I ask the hon. member to reflect on that. I do not think he has in drafting the bill.

There is no reason for the hon. member to assume that all public pensions are heavily subsidized the way the MPs pension has been until the recent changes the government brought in and which I assume is the evil he is driving at. He is suggesting that because public pensions are somehow subsidized by the taxpayer they are a polity different from those that are paid by private employers and therefore a public sector pension should result in the lowering of the MPs salary.

I do not agree because many public sector pensions are not subsidized heavily by the taxpayer. They are paid on the basis of matching contributions by employer and employee, as are private sector pensions. I suggest there is nothing unfair about that.

• (1755)

The ability to draw a pension from one employer, private or public, when working with another stems from the fact that the individual completed a career and has moved on to another. In private work if I have qualified for a pension in my first job and move to a second job and draw the pension, that factor is not taken into account by my second employer in determining salary. That matter will be negotiated between me and the second employer. If I happen to be in an organization where the rate of pay is fixed by some kind of collective agreement, I will be paid at a standard rate with no possible reduction because I happen to be receiving a pension from another source.

Given that, why would the hon. member seek to interfere in that employer–employee relationship particularly those under a collective agreement which he says he and his party support so staunchly?

We all know what happened in Ontario with the recent New Democratic Party government. The New Democrats claimed to be the great friends of labour but by the time they left office after the last provincial election everyone acknowledged they were not the friends of labour. In fact they were probably the greatest enemies the Ontario labour movement had for some time, until the Mike Harris government came in, but that is another matter. We all remember with great fondness the Rae days the former premier imposed in the province of Ontario. The hon. member for Lisgar—Marquette may not be fully conversant with the disaster we suffered in Ontario for the five years ending earlier this year. It seems we have moved from one disaster to another in our province.

I see the chief government whip is advising me that the gun control bill has cleared the Senate, 64 votes to 28. Mr. Speaker, I thought you would want to know. presume that is without any amendments.

Mr. Boudria: That is right.

Mr. Milliken: That is very good news.

The other problem with the hon. member's suggestion, as I have indicated, is we would end up with great inequality in the House where two members of Parliament sitting side by side in the House might find themselves earning different amounts because one happened to draw a private pension and one happened to draw a public pension.

Mr. Solomon: That happens now.

Mr. Milliken: Yes, it happens now because members come here with varying amounts of money. Some are well to do. Some may have a very substantial investment income. They still get paid a salary of $64,000 and change for doing their job as a member of Parliament. Every single member of Parliament gets that.

The ones who are getting paid extra, and I point this out to the hon. member, are the ones who are doing work which is additional to their work as members of Parliament. He may not think that the additional work is significant but the fact is all the ones who are getting paid extra are being paid extra because they do additional work. All the ones who are not doing additional work in this House are receiving the same amount of money.

I quote the hon. member for Calgary Centre who justified one of his own members receiving a pension from a provincial legislature by saying: "The member the Liberal MP asked me about is not guilty of double dipping. It is not double dipping. This individual served in the provincial legislature. This individual resigned from the provincial legislature. This individual offered his services to the Canadian public on a federal basis".

The hon. member for Lisgar—Marquette loves it when I quote one of his colleagues.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I finally heard the fact that I can agree with him, that what the member for Lethbridge is doing is not double dipping. We have heard the Liberals so often saying: "The double dipper is sitting right there". Finally they have seen the light. Thank you for that, Mr. Speaker. We are making progress in the House. That is what I like to see.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this bill. I listened to the very eloquent remarks of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

I am sorry I was not here for previous remarks but I was in the other place watching the other place do the right thing. NDP members would have acknowledged it at one point, but more recently they do not acknowledge quite as much that gun control is a good thing.

• (1800)

In any case, the other place passed gun control, as the member for Kingston and the Islands indicated, 64 to 28. That is excellent news. All Canadians, except for a handful of New Democrats and a larger handful of Reformers, would agree. That is a very good thing.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I heard the hon. member talking about something going on in the other place. What did he say the Conservatives did over there? I was not quite clear as to what he said.

The Deputy Speaker: I appreciate that the hon. member is being light hearted, I believe, but we do have rules of relevance in the House. As you know, the Chair often sits here and squirms and wonders why we do not observe those rules. Normally the Chair waits for a member to get up and say that somebody is speaking totally off the subject. I am sure the hon. chief whip to the government party will make his remarks relevant to the subject very soon.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to the bill, but at the same time I am also pleased to inform the House that some Conservative members in the other place voted for the bill, some voted against the bill, some abstained and so on. In other words it is the same thing as usual: several different messages coming from the Tories.

We are back to Bill C–314. I am pleased to be speaking about that. The hon. member from the New Democratic Party is proposing this bill to us today. As my colleague for Kingston and the Islands has indicated, this is not a bill that some of us are willing to support.

The bill would create a number of inconsistencies. Apparently one of the issues is the concern for public funds. It is interesting that some public pensions would be applicable in terms of the reduction from salaries and others would not. For instance, if an MP happened to be older than 65 years of age, the CPP or QPP provisions would not be reduced, even though that is a public pension as well, but other pensions would. OAS would not be covered, veterans pensions and so on, but military pensions would. You can see that there are a number of inconsistencies created in what the hon. member is trying to address.

The government has gone a very long way toward improving the pension plan for members of Parliament. I believe the government has done the right thing. I was pleased to support the government's initiative. I was pleased to defend it. I did not happen to think there was much wrong with the system as it existed even prior to that change, but some people feel, and those in the Reform Party are in that category, that MPs should have less pension and virtually double the salary. This is what the member for Calgary Centre has suggested.

When I was asked by the media what the chances are of doubling MPs' salaries, I said it is about the same as the chances of Brian Mulroney being re–elected. In other words, it is not a very likely proposition, to put it mildly. Most Canadians would not look too favourably on either one of those two situations. Of course that did not happen.

It is wrong as well to somehow portray, either through the bill or others, that MPs are overpaid. I do not share that view. I am not suffering. I believe I am making a decent salary. In comparison with other people in society, I do not believe that we are overpaid. In my province of Ontario, a high school vice–principal—there must be two dozen of them in my constituency—is paid a salary which is larger than mine. A high school principal makes even more. Then there are the school superintendents, the directors of education and so on. I am only addressing people in the public sector involved in education.

Mr. Hoeppner: Do they get a living allowance?

Mr. Boudria: The hon. member opposite asks about a living allowance. I do not get one. I do not qualify for such an allowance. Perhaps he does not know that. I do not qualify because I do not operate two homes.

Mr. Hoeppner: What about mileage?

Mr. Boudria: People who travel for a living are reimbursed for their mileage expenditures. That is fairly standard. The hon. member opposite knows that.

People in the educational sector, those who travel from school to school, get a travel allowance. The hon. member knows the answers to all these questions. He is just trying to be funny. Heaven forbid that he would not know better than what he is pretending today. If he does not, maybe it is a lost cause.

At some point in the future, perhaps not in this Parliament, because I do not see how it could be done, I would like to see the whole issue of compensation for MPs revisited. There have been two reports in this Parliament which both recommended an overall increase in benefits. Of course that will not happen.

We even had a party which pretended that MPs should receive 15 per cent less. Some of them adhered to that principle, others pretended to do it and others did not. We never knew which was which. The scheme was abandoned because it was not appropriate. The public was being fooled.

Some of them said that they were not using their tax free allowance and were giving it back. However, once the MPs' pension was reduced they said that they would keep it to create their own pension scheme.

The Reform Party's preachings in this area are a little less than totally sincere.

It has been a pleasure to speak to this bill, which would require all pension or retiring allowance payments paid from public funds to be deducted from the member's sessional allowance.

However, there are certain aspects that are not given sufficient clarification in the hon. member's proposal. First, some public pension plans are not paid from public funds. That is number one.

There are entities in this country that are neither public nor private, in other words, they are sort of in–between. And finally, of course, even if a pension is public, that does not necessarily mean it is subsidized by the government or by the public jurisdiction concerned.

As far as I am concerned, I do not intend to support this bill and I would urge my fellow members to do likewise.
